Such a wide-spread belief naturally brought into existence a class of healers who professed to be able to cure those possessed by expelling the demons—the latter being supposed to be invisible. Amongst the Jews, these exorcists were recognised as legitimate practitioners, and their power to eject the evil spirits was not disputed. If the disease grew worse or the convulsions were repeated, a plea was always at hand—the demon had returned. The case was then one for prayer and fasting (Mark ix. 29). This being the settled belief of the times, it is not surprising that Jesus was represented as going about expelling these imaginary demons, which beings were in some cases believed to be the cause of insanity, epilepsy, blindness, dumbness, and other infirmities; upon the ejection of which the disease or infirmity departed. The following are examples from the Gospels:—

> Mark v. 2—13.—"And there met him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit.....and no man could any more bind him, no, not with a chain.....and no man had strength to tame him," etc.

This maniac Jesus is stated to have cured by the command, "Come forth, thou unclean spirit, out of the man." In this case, however, it was a "legion" that came out.

> Matt. ix. 32, 33.—"And as he went forth, behold, there was brought to him, a dumb man possessed with a demon. And when the demon was cast out, the dumb man spake."
> Matt. xii. 22.—"Then was brought unto him one possessed with a demon, blind and dumb; and he healed him, insomuch that the dumb man spake and saw."
> Mark ix. 17—29.—"And one of the multitude answered him, Master, I brought unto thee my son, which had a dumb spirit; and whensoever it taketh him, it dasheth him down; and he foameth, and grindeth his teeth [etc.].....Jesus rebuketh the unclean spirit, saying unto him, Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I command thee, come out of him, and enter no more into him. And having cried out, and torn him much, he came out."

Here the command to "enter no more into him" indicates the plea of the exorcists when taxed with failure. In some of the Gospel cases the demon is represented as recognising Jesus and his divine power (Mark i. 23—26; v. 7; etc.); also, when upon one occasion Jesus is accused of expelling demons by the agency of Satan, he retorts by referring to the professional Jewish exorcists: "If I by Beelzebub cast out demons, by whom do your sons cast them out?" Here, no doubt is expressed as to the expulsion of the evil spirit, the question being only as to the agency. It is unnecessary to cite further examples. The Gospel accounts of the casting out of evil spirits prove incontestably that both the primitive writer and the later editors shared the common superstition of the times. But these accounts prove more: they prove that the Gospel narratives which record the expelling of demons are deliberate fabrications. Demoniacal possession, as we know, was a delusion born of the crass ignorance and great credulity of the times—the so-called "apostolic age" being one of far greater mental darkness than that which gave birth to the belief in witchcraft. It is almost needless to say that no such events as those narrated in the Gospels ever actually occurred. The writers simply concocted the stories in accordance with the ideas prevalent in their days. If Jesus went about attempting to expel evil spirits, he was just as ignorant and credulous as the Gospel writers themselves, and he certainly never caused a dumb demoniac to speak, or a blind one to see: these fabrications were written for the credulous people of the Gospel times who believed in demoniacal possession.

I turn now to the other miracles ascribed to "Jesus the Nazarene." The upholders and defenders of these alleged miraculous works tell us that Jesus performed them by the power of God, and that "with God all things are possible"—which is the usual apologetic way of begging the whole question. Science knows nothing of the existence of God, or of the omnipotence with which he is credited. As Hume justly says:—

> "Though the Being to whom the miracle is ascribed be in this case Almighty, it does not upon that account become a whit more probable; since it is impossible for us to know the attributes or actions of such a Being, otherwise than from experience which we have of his productions in the usual course of nature. This still reduces us to past observation, and obliges us to compare the instances of the violation of truth in the testimony of men with those of the violation of the laws of nature by miracles, in order to judge which of them is most likely and probable."

The soundness of this reasoning is proved by the fact that in every case in which a Bible miracle can be tested by history, the alleged miracle is found to be a fabrication. Of this fact the following are notable examples: the Three men in a furnace—the Writing on the wall—Daniel saved from the lions—the Destruction of the army of Sennacherib (Dan. iii., v., vi.; 2 Kings xix. 35). In the latter case we have also irrefutable evidence, which proves that the Hebrew deity was powerless to protect his servant Hezekiah from Sennacherib.

Hence, the question of the actual occurrence of miracles must, in the last resort, be decided by evidence. With respect to the miracles ascribed to Jesus Christ, we are first asked to believe that all the superstitious ideas held by the people of the apostolic age were rational and correct. How, otherwise, could Jesus cast out demons, if demoniacal possession had not been an actual fact? We are next asked to believe that an ignorant and credulous man in that age possessed the power to cure any disease or infirmity by merely touching the person afflicted and commanding the distemper to depart. To ask any rational person of the present day to believe such crudities is simply preposterous.

Coming, now, to the Gospel miracles, what evidence do we possess for the actual occurrence of the following? Peter's mother-in-law cured of a fever—a leper cleansed—a ruler's daughter raised from the dead—a paralytic cured—a man's withered hand restored to health—two blind men made to see—a centurion's palsied servant cured—five thousand persons fed with five loaves—Jesus walking on the sea—Jesus stilling a tempest by saying "Peace, be still"—Jesus blasting a fig-tree by his word—and several other miraculous performances. What evidence have we that all or any of these alleged miracles really occurred? We have none whatever. All we know is that Matthew, Mark, and Luke—who did not live in apostolic times—found them recorded in an old primitive Gospel, and took the liberty of copying them, besides making sundry additions and improving the composition—that is all. Who the primitive writer was, or whence he obtained his accounts, nobody knows. The probability is, that he belonged to the sect of the Nazarenes, and merely committed to writing all the hear-say stories in circulation in his day.

What, again, are we to say of the twelve other miracles recorded by the Synoptists—one being the raising a widow's son from the dead (Luke vii.)—which were not taken from the primitive Gospel? These were obviously unknown to the writer of the primitive account, and must, therefore, have been concocted after his time. They were probably found amongst some apocryphal writings that have not come down to our day. To the foregoing may be added seven other miracles recorded only in the "Gospel of John"; but in the latter case there is no mystery—the writer piously fabricated these himself.

The Essenes and Nazarenes, as we know, spent much of their time reading the Old Testament scriptures, and must have noticed the following passage (Isaiah xxxv. 4—6):—

> "Behold your God will come with vengeance.....he will come and save you. Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb shall sing."

The foregoing is figurative language; but the Nazarenes understood it literally, and ascribed such works to a deceased member of the sect who was esteemed a prophet—an exorcist named "Jesus the Nazarene," whom they called the "Anointed One" or "Christ," because the spirit of God was said to have descended upon him at his baptism.

Readers who think it unlikely that the foregoing passage in Isaiah suggested the stories of Jesus working miracles of healing are, of course, at liberty to reject the theory; but, whether this be so or not, there can be no doubt whatever as to the character of the Gospel miracles. They are, one and all, silly Christian fabrications. Moreover, when no evidence is forthcoming to corroborate a number of alleged miraculous occurrences, we are obliged to fall back on reason, common sense, and experience; and these tell us in the plainest language that—whether believed to have occurred or not—no such supernatural events ever really happened. The Gospel miracles were piously fabricated by different persons, and at different times, between A.D. 70 and 140; but were all concocted for one and the same purpose—to gain converts to the new Christian religion, or, as the forger of the Fourth Gospel puts it "that ye may believe that Jesus is the Anointed One, the Son of God" (John xx. 31). And that the early Christians did fabricate stories for this purpose is proved by the number of lying apocryphal Gospels that were in circulation before the canonical Gospels were written. Christian apologists, of course, assert that these were all the work of heretics; but no proof of such authorship has ever been produced. The only case in which one of these ancient fabricators is mentioned is that of the writer of "The Acts of Paul and Thecla," respecting whom Tertullian says (Of Baptism 17): "Know that, in Asia, the presbyter who composed that writing.....after being convicted, and confessing that he had done it from love of Paul, was removed from his office." This presbyter was not a heretic; but he had the misfortune to live a little too late, and he had no friends in his church to declare at the end of his narrative "and we know that his witness is true" (John xxi. 24). more, those who concocted the stories of the Virgin Birth, and of the infancy and boyhood of Jesus, believed in the divinity of that Savior; they were, therefore, orthodox Gentile believers. The Nazarenes and other so-called heretics, who believed Jesus to be only a man, could not have fabricated such narratives.

The historian, Mosheim, in his Christianity before the time of Constantine, says of the author of the Shepherd :—

> "He knowingly and wilfully was guilty of a fraud. At the time when he wrote, it was an established maxim with many of the Christians that it was pardonable in an advocate of religion to avail himself of fraud and deception, if it were likely that they might conduce toward the attainment of any considerable good."

The fact here referred to is historically true. And that this "established maxim" has been actually carried out, and fraud and deception stretched to their fullest extent, the existence of our four canonical Gospels is a conclusive and a standing proof.

"Our English Peacock."

> "A strain too learned for a shallow age,
> Too wise for selfish bigots."—SHELLEY.

IN a letter written when the nineteenth century was young, Shelley tells his friend, Thomas Love Peacock :—

> "Your 'Melincourt' is exceedingly admired, and I think much more so than any of your other writings. In this respect the world judges rightly. There is more of the true spirit, and an object less indefinite, than in either 'Headlong Hall' or 'Scythrop.'"

Since that time three generations have passed away. To most readers "Headlong Hall" and "Melincourt" are names that awaken no associations. If they know Peacock at all, they know him as the friend of Shelley, who published his version of the separation of the poet from his wife. But of his own work they know nothing, unless, indeed, some Shelley enthusiast has hunted out "Scythrop," in order to gain an idea of the poet from the caricature. Yet Peacock was a scholar and a wit, and his tales are like those delightful stories of Voltaire in French, but like nothing but themselves in English. The humor is Aristophanic, Rabelaisian. He was, like Mr. Bernard Shaw, a profound anti-romantic, whose every sentence was filled with romance. A Freethinker with Tory prejudices, he lived through the days of the Oxford Movement, and died with an invocation to the gods of Greece upon his lips. Consider, too, his place in the world. Older than his friend Shelley, he was, with Byron, an executor of the drowned poet's will. He knew Lamb, Leigh Hunt, and Keats. He worked in the same office as James Mill, and dined once a week with Jeremy Bentham. As an old man, he greeted the fame of Dickens, and Thackeray owed much to his inspiration. He was the father-in-law of George Meredith, who dedicated his poems of 1851 to the old Pagan, and he lived long enough for people now among us to point at him as one who saw Shelley plain. Peacock may be a satellite of the great stars of literature, yet how his radiance brightens the heavens.

Common sense was the prime characteristic of Peacock. He loved a life of independence, and he would not sacrifice his freedom for profit or prospects. When it became necessary for him to settle down in life, he obtained a clerkship in the East India Company's office, and proved an excellent man of business. To his mother he was the best of sons; to Shelley a staunch friend. When he proposed to the lady who became his wife, he had not seen her for eight years. He would not ask her to share poverty with him; but when he had a home he at once gave her a place in it. Writing to Shelley at the time of his marriage, he casually mentioned the fact, without enlarging in any way upon it, so that Shelley was in doubt whether he was married or not. Not long after his marriage, his wife became a confirmed invalid. When his mother died, he was left in the charge of a family too young to help themselves, and requiring constant attention. Other domestic bereavements followed; but his serenity never gave way. To the end of his life he remained cheerful, witty, and agreeable, loving to see all around him bright and happy. No man ever lived who was more convinced that life was worth living for those who will accept the delight of reasonable desires and sober pleasures.

Peacock was often asked to write the life of Shelley; but he refused steadily. He wished that Shelley might be allowed to remain a voice and a mystery; but as this was not to be, he corrected the errors in what others published. With this view he wrote three papers in Fraser's Magazine between 1858 and 1862, and in these he stated that Shelley's separation from his wife was not the result of coldness or misunderstanding, but sudden and unexpected.

Peacock's literary activity extended over half a century, beginning with two small volumes of verse. His first novel was Headlong Hall, and his latest Gryll Grange, all packed with wit and satire. The novels are not smooth love stories, or analyses of vicious characters. They present us with a number of persons, each of whom is the exponent of some theory or other—a phrenologist, or an economist, or, maybe, a hypochondriac, or a fop. Parsons nearly always appear, and are subjected to much ridicule. We begin with "Gaster" and "Grovelgrub," and end with "Dr. Opimian." Peacock always looked on the clergy as maintaining, not wholly from disinterested motives, an order of society destructive of freedom and progress. They were beneficiares who slumbered and ate, and resisted every sort of innovation in the cause of humanity. This was no novel view of the Church, nor was it untrue; but Peacock brought a Voltairian wit to bear on the subject. He had a quaint love of fanciful names, such as Dickens used with great effect; and the creator of "Sir Oran Haut-ton," in this respect, was as successful as the historian of "Dotheboys Hall."

It would be easy to write a book on Peacock and his circle, but space allows only a thumbnail sketch. Many deeply interesting and well-known personalities were numbered among his acquaintances. He lived a pleasant, bookish life, through two great periods of English literature, and he was liked and esteemed by some of the very greatest of his contemporaries. Maybe, his own writings will be always "caviare to the general," for a liking for his witty stories is evidence of a choice literary palate, but his association with the immortals will always ensure a recognition of Peacock, the friend of Shelley and Meredith.

MIMNERMUS.

TRANSMUTATION.

A Jew turned Catholic, and the priest, sprinkling him with holy water, told him that would seal the transaction. Shortly after, the newly transmuted Jew gave a supper-party to some Catholics, including the priest. In the centre of the board stood a great, brown, juicy turkey. The priest lifted up his hands in horror at sight of it.

"My friend," he expostulated, "to-day is Friday, and we can eat no meat, only fish."

"We'll fix that," replied the Jew, giving a whispered order to the servant. The man shortly returned, bearing a basin of water. The Jew sprinkled a few drops over the turkey; then he turned to the priest.

"You can eat that turkey now, your reverence."

"But——"

"Never mind, interrupted the convert. "That basin contained holy water. If your holy water can make a Catholic out of a Jew, surely it can make a fish out of a turkey. Gentlemen, have some fish."

Acid Drops.

Mr. A. E. Ashmead-Bartlett's letter from Constantinople, published in the Daily Telegraph of August 15, is another frightful impeachment of the Bulgarians. Listen to this :—

> "Of the Allies the Bulgarians have proved themselves utterly unworthy to pose either as champions of Christianity or of civilisation. They have acted with a cruelty and a barbarity even towards the subjects of their late allies which has shocked and disgusted a world long since accustomed to the horrors of the Balkans, and if you multiply a hundredfold the crimes committed against the Servians and Greeks it will only give a very temperate picture of the atrocities they have committed in Thrace since the Treaty of London was signed.
> "They have embarked on a vast campaign of extermination against the Mohammedan population which rashly chose to remain in Europe, they have destroyed every Mohammedan village they have visited, they have murdered the men and have murdered and outraged the women and children ; in fact, the full tale of their crimes which I shall send you in a few days constitutes one of the most wicked and appalling records of barbarity in the history of the world."

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett points out that the Turks, according to all rules of warfare, are entitled to keep Adrianople if they can, now that they have taken repossession of it. We all remember Mr. Asquith's phrase in the House of Commons in the early days of the war when the Christian Allies were carrying everything before them. He said that they should not be robbed of the fruits of their victories. Will he explain now why the Turks should be robbed of the fruits of their victories? The Bulgarians captured Adrianople with some help from Servia and Montenegro. Owing to circumstances, chiefly of their own creation, they could not hold it; and the Turks marched into the city again, almost without striking a blow, the Bulgarians evacuating the place in a formal manner. For our part, we hope the Turks will hold it, not only against the Balkan Christians, but also against the "advice" of the European Christian Powers. Their advice to the Turks has always been to make peaceful concessions to Christian robbers. Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett tells us that Adrianople is now held by 200,000 picked Turkish troops, who will fight to the last gasp before "handing back Adrianople and Thrace to the tender mercies of the Bulgarians."

Systematic butchery of civil inhabitants—the women being outraged first, and the children gashed with bayonets—and the destruction of villages; this has been the Bulgarian policy from beginning to end. Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett asks why Moslems and Christians are not judged by one rule of morality? Why should every Turkish misdemeanor be denounced throughout the Christian world "when nothing is said when whole Mohammedan villages are razed to the ground, when men are slaughtered, and the women and children killed after being outraged." Sir Edward Grey's policy in the House of Commons is to give no reply to questions about "atrocities." He knows that an honest answer would damn the Balkan "liberators" to everlasting infamy—and he does not want to see fellow Christians damned in the sight of "infidels." The withering power of Christian bigotry is such that the outrage and murder of Mohammedan women makes next to no impression on the minds and hearts of the ladies and gentlemen who sing "Onward Christian Soldiers!" But it makes a great impression on Mohammedans throughout the East, and especially in India, whence money is being sent in a copious stream for the help of distressed co-religionists. Adrianople is now occupied by men who are burning to avenge the sufferings and indignities inflicted upon the women of their race. They mean business. They have their backs to the wall. They are mostly young men. And to capture Adrianople again would mean a deluge of blood. This is what Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett tells the readers of an important London newspaper. And it deserves consideration.

We are all for peace against war. But there is something higher than peace and something worse than war. Better die bravely than live like cowards. It may be worthy of a Christian not to resent, and, if possible, avenge, the rape of one's women-folk and the butchery of one's children. But it is unworthy of a man. And the Turk's worst enemies never called him a craven. At least they never found him so.

Once, if a man absented himself from church, he was fined, but nowadays the clergy are very anxious to get any male members to balance the number of females, who are the last support of the fast-emptying churches. A pathetic note to that effect appears in the last issue of the "St. George's Church Messenger" (Southend-on-Sea), where seat-holders are asked to be kind to "the small boy who comes in twos or threes" to the church. How are the mighty fallen! The bodyguard of Christ, which used to be composed of stalwart warriors, is now sunk to a handful of women and children.

Mr. Lloyd George with Celtic impetuosity has declared that the Insurance Act was doing the work of the Man of Nazareth. We were not aware that the Act insured against hell.

At the Medical Congress a story was told of an alleged Irish corpse which complained at the wake that he did not get a fair share of the insurance money. The tale has been told with greater point of the Bible character, Lazarus, who had two funerals.

The Guardian naturally seeks to "improve" the occasion of the recent International Medical Congress. It says that the "close connection" between Christianity and medicine is shown by two papers read at the Congress. One was a paper by Miss Stowell discussing whether St. Paul was a Roman, the other by Dr. Caparoni on the "Sepulchral Inscriptions of the Christian Doctors in the Catacombs." The connection seems to us as close as that between Macedon and Monmouth. Christian medicine is plainly enough particularised in the New Testament, and for practising it—and depending upon it—many a simple-minded person has been sent to Christian gaols. The prayer of faith shall save the sick—that is Christian medicine in a nutshell. It is the only medicine ever blessed by the Church, and many and many a doctor has been punished and imprisoned for defending secular scientific methods of cure. The early anatomists worked with the ban of the Church upon them. The greatest of them, Vesalius, came to an untimely end owing to Church persecution. Scientific medicine, like every other form of science, grew up in defiance of Christian prejudice, and the old maxim, out of three doctors two Atheists, gave a very good indication of the general position.

Dr. Caparoni came to the conclusion that many of the doctors of Rome were Christian slaves, basing this conclusion upon the inscriptions on the graves in the catacombs. It is doubtless true that many of the Roman doctors were slaves. This because the slave of Rome was nothing like the degraded slave of more recent Christian times. He was often enough an educated man, and enjoyed much that was taboo to the slave under Christian ownership. But Dr. Caparoni is on very delicate ground when he bases his conclusion on the catacomb inscriptions. For these inscriptions are not peculiar to Christianity. They were in common use among non-Christian religious sects. But, owing to Christian ignorance and cupidity, it has been the fashion to claim every grave bearing a symbol or an inscription such as were afterwards used by Christians as proof that the grave held a Christian occupant. It is in this way that thousands of martyrs have been manufactured to bolster up Christian pretensions. The best of Christian scholars are now chary of adopting this line of proof, and we are surprised that Dr. Caparoni was not more cautious.

"What the present position of medicine would be had Christianity never come to the world, may be a curious speculation," says the Guardian. It may be a curious speculation, it certainly is not an uninstructive one. Medical science was well on its way when Christianity came. The savage theory of possession, revived in full force by Christianity, had been abandoned by the doctors of Greece, Rome, and Alexandria. The causes and cure of disease had been studied and written upon. Had Christianity not come to the world, medical science would have pursued an unbroken career of development, and many discoveries of which we are still in search might have been ours. But Christianity came. Cures by faith, by miracle, and by relics became the rule. The priest took the place of the physician; the hospitals of antiquity were closed, the sanitary and hygienic science of old was forgotten, and for cities reeking with filth and disease, the Church gave its universal cure of faith and miracles. For over a thousand years, medical and surgical science lay under a ban, and they who would estimate what medical science might have been had Christianity never appeared, must add to the knowledge of antiquity at least the thousand years lost by the triumph of the Cross.

At last even Spain has insulted the Catholic Church, and her priests are, in consequence, in a towering rage. The Royal Decree of May 5 this year provides "for the inspection of the schools and the instruction imparted therein, but in no way mentions the share of the ecclesiastics in the matter." Cardinal Aguirre has issued a circular urging the bishops to do their utmost to render the Decree practically null and void. How well these ecclesiastics know that the secularisation of the schools would result in the extinction of the Church! But the secularising process cannot be stopped even in Spain. It is in the air and must go on until every shred of superstition has disappeared.

Rev. George Atkinson, United Methodist minister, at Barrow, is a lucky person. Being found guilty of stealing stockings and gloves from a hosiery stall in the market-place, he was bound over in £10, with one surety of £10, to be of good behavior for twelve months. This lenity was in consideration of its being his first offence. Probably, also, because of his profession and the number of Free Church ministers who attended the court "to help Mr. Atkinson to bear the strain of the charge"—as the Daily Sketch so kindly puts it.

Rev. Cecil Frederick Blyth, aged sixty-one, came up to the great modern Babylon from his rural home at Recking, Suffolk. He took a lady to a West-end restaurant to dinner, and afterwards went to her flat, where he died suddenly of heart failure. There is no moral. There would have been a big one if he had been a Freethinker.

We have been giving the poor clergy a rest lately. Here are a few of them who turned up in one day's "Latest Wills." Rev. Dr. Francis William Tremlett, of St. Peter's, Belsize Park, London, N.W., left £7,689. Rev. James Barlow, Rahemy, Co. Dublin, £19,971. Rev. T. H. Austin, Queniborough, Leicester, left £2,595. This is not a big average—something under £10,000—but that is a fair-sized bump to go through the needle's eye.

The Rev. C. Silvester Horne says that "sin never goes unpunished." If by sin is meant wrong-doing, the statement is entirely false. It would be much more accurate sorrowfully to admit that most sins escape punishment. Clever financial swindlers are seldom brought to book. There are hundreds of men whose one pleasure is to ruin girls under age; but not one in a hundred gets convicted and imprisoned. The sweaters of the poor are counted by the thousand, and they are clothed in purple and fine linen, and fare sumptuously every day. Yes, alas, the great majority of sins go unpunished. This is not complimentary to God; but it is terribly true.

Pagans and Protestants go to hell-fire when they die, however strong their faith in Christ may be, unless they are in invincible ignorance of the Catholic Church. God may admit them to heaven, in that case, if they "carefully observe the natural law and the commands engraved by himself in the hearts of all." So teaches "Alfonsus" in the Catholic Herald for August 16. And this is his warning to all:—

> "The way of salvation in the Catholic Church is sure and certain for those who follow it; we cannot be sure and certain about any other way."

"Alfonsus" goes further, and holds that outside the Catholic Church salvation is impossible; but he makes the charitable admission that you may be in the soul of the Church without belonging to its body, which is surely a distinction where there is no difference. It follows from this, of course, that for Freethinkers there is no hope whatever, because they believe neither in the Catholic Church nor in any other. For us, poor things, not even God's "uncovenanted mercies" can be of any use.

Professor Bury's little book, A History of Freedom of Thought, seems to have got on the nerves of some Christian reviewers. "J. B.," of the Christian World—he is only one among others—is sorely disappointed with the book because "from beginning to end it is frankly materialistic." This, being interpreted, means that Professor Bury points out that during the last eighteen hundred years the great enemy to freedom of thought has been Christianity. The broad toleration of Greece and Rome was replaced by the narrow intolerance of the Christian Church. We do not see what else Professor Bury could have done. As Professor of Modern History at Cambridge, and editor of Gibbon, he went straight to the facts; and the facts are too patent, when honestly stated, to bear more than one interpretation. Every historian worth mention has been compelled to record the same story, although it has not always been stated in so many words. And, free from all ambiguity, that story is that the greatest disaster that ever befel the principle of human liberty was the conquest of the civilised world by the Christian religion. Ancient Rome gave liberty to all religions. Christianity gave freedom to none. Professor Bury's book is far from exhaustive—it could not well be so, seeing its small size; but it is at least impartial, and tells the truth in a plain way. If it has a weakness, it is that it fails to do complete justice to the influence on the public mind of the propaganda of popular Freethought carried on by brave men and women whose names are unknown to the ordinary historian, but whose labors have borne fruit in our larger measure of intellectual freedom.

We are shocked! Rev. C. Benson Perkins points out in the Methodist Times that in the east end of Sheffield there is church and chapel accommodation for only about 1 in 40 of the population. This is very serious, but we have not heard of the churches and chapels there that are over-crowded. Mr. Perkins does not say that they are. He simply says that there ought to be more. But why? If the churches there already are not filled, why build more? Of course, every new church or chapel means a new post for someone, and that, so far as we can see, is the only reason for building them. And in the annual reports there is, perhaps, the additional reason that growth can be reckoned by the increased number of seats provided, without troubling whether people are sitting in them or not.

The British and Foreign Bible Society boasts of having circulated 936,346 Bibles; 1,266,919 New Testaments; and 5,696,297 Portions of Scripture during the year 1912-1913. These publications are reported to be in 450 different languages,—some of which, we suspect, must be rather lingoes than languages. This is, of course, a great achievement in its way. But it ceases to be wonderful when we recollect that the Society had command of an income of £171,947 last year, besides the income derived from sales of £95,271. Any book in the world might be pushed round by such an expenditure. The volume of Shakespeare's writings pushes itself round the world, without any adventitious aids in any shape whatever. It is translated into nearly all languages worth talking about. Nobody is tempted to buy it, nobody has it pressed upon him as a free gift. It takes its place amongst general literature, and makes its own way. Consequently its diffusion over all parts of the globe is more wonderful than that of the Bible.

The Vicar of Wellingborough, Northants, has been preaching against bazaars, whist drives, charity dinners, dances, and teas, as means of raising the wind for Church purposes. He felt it necessary to extend his condemnation even to Punch and Judy. But what is wrong with that entertainment? Is it more fantastic than many a New Testament miracle? Say, for instance, Jesus Christ's pedestrian performance on the rolling deep?

The clergy of Swanage would never allow Jesus to give a show within the three-mile limit in front of their town: certainly not on the Lord's Day. They are up in arms against the visit of an excursion steamer which brings people from Poole and other places on Sunday; and they have succeeded in getting the Town Council to protest against, and if possible put an end to, this diabolical invasion.

How the Christian clergy obey their own Scriptures! "Owe no man anything," the Bible says. Well, it transpires in the bankruptcy proceedings against the Rev. Arthur Henley Sharpley, vicar of Mangotsfield, Bristol, that he had borrowed £1,053 of no less than sixteen moneylenders, and was still indebted to every one of them.

The paper of the Actors' Church Union suggests that a certain charming musical comedy actress should act as churchwarden. If the lady will wear her theatrical war-paint and etceteras, the unregenerate outsiders might be persuaded to attend that place of worship.

LOST FAITH.

"Aren't you going to say your prayers, Willie?"

"No, I'm not. I'm tired of praying for this family without getting any results."

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £162 14s. 5d. Received since:—Per Miss Vance: W. Milroy, 5s.; John Milroy, 5s.; F. J. King, 10s. Mrs. Clarkson, £3 3s.

R. KENNEDY.—Missing number forwarded. Every precaution is taken at our publishing office, but things will go astray in the post. We are always ready to send another copy in place of the one that was lost, if subscribers will advise us of the miscarriage.

E. B.—Many thanks for cuttings.

TRADE UNIONIST (S. Africa).—The reverend gentleman's sermon is of the flunkey order. He serves the powers that be, in conformity (by the way) with New Testament teaching. Your letter is exactly to the point. It would hardly get into any newspaper in the old country; so you are not as badly off as you imagine. We are glad to hear that Freethought is spreading amongst the "wage earning" classes in the Transvaal and other parts of South Africa.

R. IRVING.—Pleased that you so highly appreciate "the splendid way" in which we have spoken for the "downtrodden Turks and Moslems when the British Christian press was gloating over their death agony." Thanks for the paper.

E. STARLING.—Very much pleased to see the Walsall prosecution defeated.

T. W. STEWART.—See paragraphs. Our shop manager is communicating with you respecting the "specimen copies."

J. B.—Thanks for the cuttings. There is nothing, in the report of the Walsall case, alleged against the defendant, that would be considered outrageous on any topic but religion. We have always contended that this subject should be treated like any other. We pressed that view upon the jury in 1883. We uphold it now. And we have always been ready to help any man prosecuted for doing no more. We draw the line at reckless speech that ought not to be tolerated on any subject—at least in places of public resort. Equal freedom of speech on all subjects is our principle. Not absolute freedom,—that is impossible—but equal freedom.

F. M.—We had already written on the matter. Thanks, all the same.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for useful cuttings.

J. JOHNSON.—We have dealt with it, as you will see.

F. J. ROSE (Johannesburg).—Mr. E. B. Rose was never "connected" with this journal, we have not seen him for many years, and we know not his present address.

R. H. VICKERS.—Thanks for your good wishes.

MARK MELFORD.—We hope the medical prophecy in your case will not be fulfilled; but we note the serenity with which you face the apparent prospect. Your compliments on our own work since you saw us released from Holloway Prison are appreciated.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote will have an announcement to make next week with regard to his platform work during the approaching winter season.

Mr. Cohen is back from his holiday and all the better for three weeks' rest and change. Miss Vance is enjoying the stimulating air of Yarmouth. Mr. Lloyd is off for a brief holiday on the South Coast.

Mr. Frederic W. Walsh, of Leamington, whose pathetic case is known to our readers, has written a well-informed, able, and interesting essay on "Auguste Comte and the Religion of Humanity." This is being printed in pamphlet form, with a Criticism by the Rev. L. G. Berrington and a Rejoinder by Mr. Walsh. It is for private circulation only. But "saints" who would like to have a copy can obtain one by applying to Mr. J. Breese, 270 Ladypool-road, Birmingham. It would be a graceful act if applicants enclosed a penny for the postage. This is not essential; but we venture to make the suggestion.

Two summonses against Mr. Thomas William Stewart for using "profane language" at open-air meetings at Walsall have been dismissed by the magistrates. Mr. Stewart appears to have made a spirited defence. He argued that a summons for "profane language" at a Freethought meeting was simply a "blasphemy" prosecution in "disguise."

There were two really funny points in this Walsall case. When Mr. Stewart began his defence the presiding magistrate (Mr. Jupp) told him that "the Bench could not allow any argument." That is really worthy of Dogberry himself. The other point is this. Joseph James Betteridge, a tobacconist, said that the defendant's lectures had been a great source of annoyance to him—"He named Crippen and many other notorious criminals as examples of what Christians were, and generally spoke in contempt of sacred things"—including Crippen, we suppose. The funniest fools are generally solemn—and usually religious.

We understand that our Bible Handbook figured pretty largely in the course of this Walsall prosecution. The police seemed to think it a very dangerous publication—which in one sense it is, as it was intended to be. It was designed to be dangerous to Christianity.

The foolish action of the Walsall police has had the opposite effect to what they expected. For one thing it brought a crowd of people on Sunday night to hear a debate between Mr. Stewart and Mr. H. C. Orchard, one of the police court probation officers. An opposition religious meeting caused trouble, and the likelihood of violence induced the police to escort "the Athiest" to a place of safety.

On Mr. Foote's suggestion the Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws has sent a copy of Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner's little book, Penalties Upon Opinion, to every member of the House of Commons. This should be a great help to the Bill which we printed in these pages some two months ago.

We congratulate the Dewsbury Reporter on its courage in quoting (and mentioning) the Freethinker. It refers to our recent paragraph on the Charlotte Bronte letters published in the Times. She stated in one of them that her writings had received the approbation of Shelley and Coleridge; yet Shelley died when she was six years old and Coleridge died before she was eighteen. This seemed to require elucidation. The Reporter says that the explanation is perfectly simple. "Shelley" was a misprint for "Southey," and by "Coleridge" probably meant "Hartley Coleridge." We are afraid that the latter explanation is unsatisfactory. There never was but one "Coleridge."

Herr Bebel, the great Social Democratic leader, directed in his will that his body should be cremated. Bebel was an Atheist.

The New Age corrects the Chestertons, who have been blowing the trumpet too loudly over the New Witness, which they propose to turn into a Company, with an anticipated profit of £1,006, on a sale of 7,000 copies and 20 per cent. returns, and £30 worth of advertisements weekly; on the expenditure being £210 for directors' fees and £1,664 for editor's salary and contributions. The New Age remarks that £30 weekly is a big sum for advertisements, especially as the paper is to continue to indulge in "unfettered criticism"; in fact, one would imagine that the New Witness was the only paper in England devoted to its principles—which the New Age reminds it is not true. There are not many papers thus devoted, but "there are others." Moreover, 20 per cent. returns, the New Age says, is a "marvel of economic publishing"; indeed, it allows 30 per cent. in its own statement of accounts—of which more presently.

On this point of "returns" we have a word to say ourselves. The Freethinker is a wonderful paper in many ways, and in this way amongst them. Our "returns" are probably the least of any periodical that was ever published. They do not amount to more than about 7 per cent. on the average; which shows what a steady body of readers we possess. If it were not for that fact we must have succumbed long ago.

But to return to the New Age. Our contemporary prints its own statement of accounts, for the benefit of "posterity," if it should take an interest in such things. Here is the statement:—

Actual Revenue.	£
4,500 Copies, less 30 per cent. Returns	1,200
Advertisements at 5s. per week	13
	1,213

Actual Cost.
Printing and Paper and Stationery	1,500
Editor's Salary	200
Staff, Literary, Secretarial, Publishing, Accountancy	350
Rent, Office Expenses, Legal Charges, Postage ...	200

Actual Annual Loss ... £1,037.

The editor's salary in this statement is a very modest amount. The Freethinker editor's salary is more modest still. During a few years after 1899 it was £3 per week. During all the rest of the time, before and since, it has been nothing at all; and for a good many years he paid contributors their modest salaries out of his own pocket in addition,—the money coming mainly out of his Honorarium Fund or the Summer Holiday Fund which preceded it.

It is not our intention to follow the example of the New Age any further. We do not see what good could come of it. Besides, the Freethinker is printed and published under special conditions, in consequence of its insecurity until the Blasphemy Laws are entirely abolished. What we want to draw our readers' attention to is the fact that all honest "advanced" papers have a struggle for existence. We have maintained the Freethinker year after year for a whole generation. It has not been subventioned; on the contrary it has subventioned other enterprises. Only to take one instance, neither the National Secular Society nor the Secular Society, Ltd., is charged a single penny for editorial or commercial advertisements in our pages; nor has a single penny been charged for expenses against any Fund that we have raised in our columns.

We are not boasting. Far from it. We are simply stating facts that ought to be known. Those who do know them, and bear them in mind, will not wonder why appeals have to be made for the President's Honorarium Fund. We must live on something. We could earn enough to live on by outside literary work, but we should be obliged to devote less and less time to the Freethinker, which would never do —and none at all to the general interests of the movement.

What know'st thou, man, of Life? And yet, for ever 'twixt the womb, the grave, Thou pratest of the Coming Life, of Heav'n and Hell thou fain must rave.

. . . . . .

While Reason sternly bids us die, Love longs for life beyond the grave;
Our hearts, affections, hopes, and fears, for Life-to-be shall ever crave.
Hence came the despot's darling dream, a Church to rule and sway the State;
Hence sprang the train of countless griefs, in priestly sway and rule innate.
For Future Life who dares reply? No witness at the Bar have we,
Save what the brother Potsherd tells—old tales and novel jugglery.

God by God flits past in thunder, till his glories turn to shades;
God to God bears wondering witness how his gospel flames and fades.
More was each of these, while yet they were, than man their servant seemed;
Dead are all of these, and man survives who made them while he dreamed.

Christian Beasts in China.

[Judging from the English newspapers, during the recent war in the Balkans, one would think that only Turks committed atrocities, or Christian armies unhappily corrupted by Turkish example. Students of history know how far this is from being true. The greatest atrocities in human history have been committed by the soldiers of the Cross. And we need not go back many years to find a striking example of the horrible and disgusting behavior of Christian soldiers. In 1900 a punitive expedition was sent out by the European Powers to China, to avenge the death of a few missionaries, who were sent to heaven a little prematurely by the Boxer rebels. Christian soldiers, from all Christian nations, were ordered to teach the Chinese better morals and better manners. The lesson was taught with rifles and bayonets, —and it was done in the way described in the following article, which we wrote at the time, and which is reprinted from the Freethinker of January 20, 1901. We feel like dedicating this reprint to the Daily News.—Editor.]

Sir Robert Hart ended his first article on China, in the November number of the Fortnightly Review, with a sentence that was very significant to those who had enough information to be able to read between the lines. "Meanwhile," he wrote, "the once crowded Peking is a desert, and the first few days of foreign occupation have seen much that need not have occurred and will certainly be regretted."

Since then all the i's in this passage have been dotted with a vengeance. The whole truth has not been told—for, as one correspondent said, the English papers would not dare to print it; but enough has leaked out to damn the Christian Powers (who are pretending to school and punish China) as the vilest malefactors in the sight of civilisation and humanity.

In the first place, the armies of the Christian Powers in China have proved themselves well-practised thieves. They are not even at war with China, for war has not been declared. Ostensibly they are there to enforce certain laws of international morality, which they allege that the Chinese have violated. Yet the first thing they do, after shooting down the Chinese who stand in their way, is to indulge in unlimited looting. It is agreed on all hands by correspondents at Peking and elsewhere that temples, palaces, and private dwellings have been rifled with Christian completeness; and that what could not be carried away has too frequently been wantonly destroyed. And the cream of the joke, as far as it is a joke, is the fact that the Christian missionaries have had a good share in the plunder. Mr. Thomas F. Millard, the Daily Mail correspondent, says that, "In all the loot phases the missionaries have had their share. The day after the Legations in Peking were relieved a prominent missionary, accompanied by a large number of Christian Chinese, invaded the residence of a prince and made a big haul. Incidents like this were numerous. When the purchasing period came, missionaries not only attended the sales, but opened loot marts themselves, sending their Chinese converts out to provide the stock." Dr. E. J. Dillon, in the January Contemporary Review, says that, under the pretence that civilised rules of war do not apply to barbarians, the looting was continued until "there was nothing left worth carrying off." The Japs left off looting first, but they had got most of the gold. After them came the Russians. The "civilisers," as Dr. Dillon facetiously calls them, burst into the imperial apartments of the Forbidden City, and took away what they called souvenirs. "Coolies carrying coals," he says, "to steamers in Hong Kong could not be more expeditious than was this respectable gathering of military and civil officials in stowing away the most unwieldy vessels, images, and ornaments between their coats and their skins." The looting, in fact, was so profitable that it became quite a fashion. Not satisfied with pillaging the Chinese quarters of the city they entered, the allied troops sometimes looted the houses of European residents, carrying every portable article away, and destroying what they could not carry. "Pianos," Dr. Dillon says, "were demolished with bayonets, mirrors shivered in a hundred fragments, paintings out into strips. This," he adds, "was done by Europeans in the houses of the people whom they had been sent to protect." Some netted hundreds and some thousands of pounds. Common soldiers, of course, did not get as much, but they had their proportion of the spoil of the Heathen Chinee, who did not know the bill he was running up when he shot a German Minister and sent a few missionaries to the kingdom of heaven.

It will not surprise any student of history, or of human nature, to learn that looting and destruction of property are by no means the worst inflictions upon the Chinese by the allied army of the Christian Powers. Sir Robert Hart only suggests the wholesale slaughter that has been going on. Dr. Dillon, however, does not shrink from telling the story. Mr. George Lynch, the special correspondent of the Express, had to some extent anticipated him. "The cry of 'Sha, sha!' (Kill, kill!)" he wrote, "which the Boxer mob shouted outside the Legations, has been answered from Europe by the German Emperor's speeches for 'Vengeance, vengeance,' and in paying a visit to the house of the prefect of the German section yesterday afternoon, the effects of his speeches were everywhere apparent." "Woe to the vanquished men, women, and children," Mr. Lynch added, "during the next six months." Dr. Dillon is far more precise. He gives details which are enough to freeze the blood or make it boil, according to the reader's temperament. Here is his most general statement:—

> "During the war which was waged, but not formally declared, no quarter was given to Chinese regular soldiers; in battles and skirmishes no prisoners were taken, and after easily gained victories wounded enemies, instead of being cared for, were put to death like venomous reptiles; nay, thousands of defenceless and well-meaning Chinamen were slaughtered in cold blood, and not always, it is said, with the swiftness or the minimum of physical pain with which the man of average humanity would snuff out the life of a wild beast. In Tungtschau and Peking, Chinese girls and women of all ages were raped first and bayonetted afterwards by men whose governments were wrapping themselves up in the soft wool of Mary's little lamb."

On leaving Tientsin, Dr. Dillon passed through what had been a happy, smiling, and prosperous district, until the "civilisers" from Christian Europe fell upon it. The result is best told in Dr. Dillon's own words:—

> "In the twinkling of an eye it had all been transformed, and fathers, sons, daughters, and mothers now lay hidden in the mould, covered with matting, buried in the rubbish or floating down the river. A wave of death and desolation had swept over the land, washing away the vestiges of Chinese culture. Men, women, boys, girls, and babes in arms had been shot, stabbed, and hewn to bits in this labyrinth of streets."

After relating a number of particular instances of wanton cruelty, Dr. Dillon tells us what he saw of the terrible massacre at Tungtschau:—

> "I speak as an eye-witness when I say that over and over again the gutters of the city of Tungtschau ran red with blood, and I sometimes found it impossible to go my way without getting my boots bespattered with human gore. There were few shops, private houses, and courtyards without dead bodies and pools of dark blood.....No native's life or property was safe for an hour. Men I had been speaking to before lunch were in their graves by sundown, and no mortal will ever know the reason why. The thirst of blood had made men mad. The pettiest and most despicable whipper-snapper who happened to have seen the light of day in Europe or Japan had uncontrolled power over the life and limbs, the body and soul, of the most highly cultivated Chinaman in the city."

The Japanese generals were the first to repress these bloody outrages. "In worldly wisdom," Dr. Dillon says, "as in their commissariat and hospital organisation, the Japs were considerably ahead of the best of the Christian allies." The Russians seem to have been the worst, as might have been expected, and next to them the French. No quarter was given by them to the Chinese, whom they shot down like dogs irrespective of age or sex. "The British forces," Dr. Dillon says, and one is glad to hear it, "took prisoners when possible and looked after the wounded." But down to the end of October none of the other European troops "approved the principle or imitated the practice."

Up in far Manchuria, over which the grim paw of the Russian bear has been laid heavily, the Chinese have been massacred in myriads. "An Eye-Witness," writing to the Westminster Gazette from Blagovestschensk, told a tale of horror that could scarcely be eclipsed by the worst records of the past. Whole towns were wiped out of existence. A district inhabited by at least 100,000 Chinese had been turned into a desert. Steaming down the Amour the ship's paddles were obstructed every minute by festering corpses of Chinese men, women, and children. "We shall never be able," this writer said, "to ascertain the exact number of those who perished by fire, by the sword, or by drowning; but we know now that nothing is left of those villages so animated a few days ago, and that a pall of deadly silence hangs over the whole countryside, which henceforth seems accursed for ever."

Students of Milton will recollect his terrible phrase of "Lust hard by Hate." The murderer and the violator are brothers, or at least first cousins. Where the Christian "civilisers" have gone they have paid no respect whatever to the Chinese women, whom they have too often treated like Jack the Rippers, violating them first and stabbing and slashing them to death afterwards. Let us hear Dr. Dillon:—

> "Females of all ages have been abused to death..... Wives and daughters hanged themselves on trees or drowned themselves in garden-wells in order to escape a much worse lot. Chinese women honestly believed that no more terrible fate could overtake them than to fall alive into the hands of Europeans and Christians. And it is to be feared that they were right. Buddhism and Confucianism have their martyrs to chastity, whose heroic feats no martyrology will ever record. Some of those obscure, but right-minded girls and women hurled themselves into the river, and, finding only three feet of water there, kept their heads under the surface until death had set his seal on the sacrifice of their life..... But a large number of ill-starred women fell alive into the hands of the allied troops. I saw some of them in Pekin and Tungtschau, but already dead, with frightful gashes in the breast, or skulls smashed in, and one with a horribly mutilated body."

But the infamy of this treatment of Chinese women, guilty of no offence whatever against their outragers, is best seen in a specific instance. We quote from Dr. Dillon again:—

> "'What in heaven's name is this?' I exclaimed, one day, thumping with my knuckles a very big black box in the house of a rich man, who may then have been in Abraham's bosom or in Dives' company. The house was in Tungtschau, the sombre receptacle in one of the largest rooms, and a torturing stench proceeded from it. 'It is the girls, sir; three girls," answered my attendant, who was a European. 'Their corpses are lying in the box there,' he explained. 'Who put them there?' 'Some officers.' 'Are you quite sure of it?' 'Yes, sir; I was here when it was being done.' 'Did you see the young women yourself?' 'I did. They were the daughters of the man who owns the house. The officers raped them, and then had them stabbed with bayonets. When they were dead they were put into this box, and it was covered up, as you see.' 'Good God, what a dismal state of things we are coming to.' 'That sort of thing happened before, sir. Very often, too, I can tell you. There were worse cases than this. These here were raped and stabbed; others have been raped to death, and got no stabbing.'"

Even in the month of September, Dr. Dillon says, three French soldiers entered a house in a respectable part of Peking which was then under Russian "protection." The father, mother, and daughter were all at home. Seeing the maiden, the scoundrels resolved to deflower her. First they shot the parents dead, to prevent their interference; but the victim's screams were heard by Chinamen next door, and they induced a European to go with them and see what was going on, and on the arrival of these unexpected visitors the three scoundrels decamped.

Mr. George Lynch says that when the French general was remonstrated with about the frequent occurrence of disgraceful outrages by his troops, he replied: "It is impossible to restrain the gallantry of the French soldier." Gallantry, forsooth! Was there ever a worse prostitution of the word than applying it to the deeds of men more brutal than wild beasts in a state of rut? For even those beasts practise a measure of courtship with their females.

Dr. Dillon exonerates English and German officers from blame in this respect. On the whole, however, he says that "To compare nationalities in respect of the guilt of their representatives would be at once misleading to the historian and prejudicial to the cause of humanity." Outrages on women were frequent and heinous, and continued to be perpetrated long after looting and massacre were checked by the generals.

"The policy of the Powers," Dr. Dillon says, "is a sowing of the wind, and the harvest reaped will surely be the whirlwind." Chinese men prize the honor of their women as much as we do, and Chinese women are as chaste as our own. The exploits of these Christian beasts in China will, therefore, dwell like a consuming fire of vengeance in the hearts of thousands of Chinese husbands, fathers, sons, and brothers. They will long for the day of retribution. And it may come a good deal sooner than many imagine. It is impossible to keep China from arming and drilling. Her population is too great, her territory is too vast, her resources are too prodigious. Christian Europe is driving her into militarism in mere self-defence. She has always desired peace, but she is being hounded into war. And when she realises Sir Robert Hart's prediction, and has twenty million soldiers, all equipped with the most scientific weapons of offence, let the Christian Powers look to themselves! For their own orgy of blood and lust may be repeated at their own expense.

Why is it, we have to ask in conclusion, that so little protest has been raised over here against the conduct of these Christian beasts in China? The first answer is that they are Christians. That fact seems to make all the difference in the world. It is only the sins of the "heathen" that stink in the nostrils of the devotees of the meek and lowly Jesus. The second answer is that the Chinese question is not being taken up by any great political party here for the sake of political capital. So slender is the real disinterested love of "righteousness" bred in the average Christian after nearly two thousand years of the "only true religion." This truth should be realised by Freethinkers, and it should make them more zealous than ever in attacking the Christian superstition. If we must have a religion, let us discard the Religion of Christ and try the Religion of Humanity.

G. W. FOOTE.

"The simple fact is, that there do not exist any reasons for the Christianisation of China, except from the standpoint of the missionaries themselves. Their superstitions, if ridiculous in European eyes, are, surely, perfectly harmless. Wherein lies the moral harm of Fêng Shui? or in that curious, widespread belief in the duality of nature? The errors they fall into as to the meaning of natural phenomena are not such as Christianity can dispel. The Bible itself has been shown to be full of similar errors. A deeper and wider scientific knowledge alone can cure them."—T. C. HAYLLAR, Nineteenth Century, November, 1895.

"For the most part the 'religious world' is so occupied in hating and despising the beliefs of the heathen, whose vast regions of the globe are painted black on the missionary maps, that they have little time or capacity left to understand them."—DR. E. B. TYLOR, Primitive Culture (1873), vol. i., p. 420.

IT is hardly possible to understand the working of Christian missions in China without dealing in some degree with the character of the Chinese. Many high authorities assure us that it is impossible for a European to thoroughly understand the Chinese character in all its ramifications. This may be true—the Chinese experience the same difficulty in understanding ours—but still there are points of their character we can understand and appreciate. Generally speaking, with a few exceptions, the missionaries exaggerate the faults and peculiarities; deny, or belittle the virtues, and ridicule the religion of the Chinese.

The officials of the societies who send missionaries out expect them to write for the edification of the supporters of missionary work, upon whose subscriptions they depend. Therefore, the blacker the character of the Chinese, and the more ridiculous their beliefs are painted, the more need for the administrations of the missionary.

To deal with this mass of misrepresentation would require another series of articles, at the risk of wearying our readers. However, let those who are interested in the subject take the works of the Rev. J. Macgowan (of the London Missionary Society), Sidelights on Chinese Life and How England Saved China, and, after reading the character of the Chinese as portrayed there, let him, as an antidote, read the fine work of Mr. R F. Johnston, Lion and Dragon in Northern China (Murray: 1910). Mr. Johnston, as District Officer and Magistrate of Wei-hai-wei, has an intimate knowledge of the Chinese. So, also, had the late Sir Robert Hart, the famous Inspector-General of Chinese Customs, who knew and greatly admired the Chinese character, and whose book, These from the Land of Sinim (Chapman and Hall: 1901), shows how things appear looked at from the Chinese point of view. Professor H. A. Giles—Professor of Chinese at Cambridge University, and formerly one of our Consuls in China—is another authority whose works, Chinese Sketches and The Civilisation of China (Home University Library: 1s), form a corrective to missionary animadversions. Sir Hiram Maxim has also done great service by compiling, from many of the best books written on China, a damning indictment of missionaries and their methods, in his Li Hung Chang's Scrap Book (Watts: 7*s.* 6d), which should adorn the shelves of every Freethinker. We ourselves are indebted to this work for our acquaintance with M. Eugene Simon's valuable work on China (now out of print), which should be read. Dr. Morrison's book, An Australian in China, is another eye-opener.

Another cause of the missionaries' bad opinion of the Chinese is, no doubt, because they are only acquainted with the dregs of the population. A foreigner in England who was only acquainted with the slum-dwellers of London, Liverpool, and Manchester, or of any of our great cities, and compiled a book dealing with our manners, customs, and religion, from the experiences so acquired, would not give a very faithful account of our character as a whole. Probably we should not recognise the portrait. Yet this is the position, generally speaking, of the missionary in China. As Mr. Arthur Diosy, in his fine work, The New Far East, has pointed out:—

"The modern Missionaries devote themselves, almost invariably, to the conversion of the lower classes. To appreciate the futility of this proceeding, we have only to imagine Britain governed absolutely by an administration composed of Newdigate Prizemen, men who had graduated high in Classical Honors, and Senior Wranglers. What would we think of the wisdom of Buddhists who, wishing to convert the whole of the British Empire to their faith, commenced operations with a mission to the costermongers in Golden-lane and Newport Market, and to the inmates of the Salvation Army's 'Shelters'? That is, broadly indicated, the position of Missionary enterprise in the Far East..... Unfortunately for the progress of Christianity in China, the very fact that it is there more than anywhere else, the religion of the lowly and oppressed, attracts to the Chapel a crowd of wastrels and social wrecks, who requiring, as they do, the consolations of the faith more urgently than their more prosperous brethren—yet do great harm to the Missionary cause. If dishonest, and they are often sad impostors, making a trade of their conversion, they bring discredit on the Missionaries and make them ridiculous in the eyes of the Chinese; if > honest, their sad plight and the low social scale to which they have fallen, make their better-situated countrymen hesitate to join the same congregation. The Chinese authorities are continually complaining that every Mission-house becomes a veritable Alsatia for all the vagrom men and shiftless fellows of the neighborhood. This complaint is exaggerated, no doubt, but there is a substratum of truth. In short, Christianity in China is not 'fashionable'; it is not even considered 'respectable,' and that is a great drawback to its success with a nation that prizes respectability—'face,' as it calls it—above all things."*

Mr. Dicey adds that the imperfect command of language leads to absurd and irreverent expressions where solemn words were intended. The insufficient acquaintance of novices with Chinese manners, customs, and thoughts, and the dictatorial interference of missionary societies and boards at home, totally ignorant of Chinese conditions, "have caused millions of Chinese to look upon Christianity and Western civilisation with scorn and loathing."

Mr. Archibald Little declared that "no respectable Chinaman would ever admit a missionary into his home." †

Sir Henry Norman tells us that:—

> "the ordinary foreigner carefully avoids the employment of the native Christian in any subordinate capacity, having found by experience that in many cases he has only lost his native virtues to acquire foreign vices in their place. Conversion to Christianity is looked upon by many natives merely as a means of an easier livelihood. A friend of mine asked a Chinese servant, whom he had previously known, what he was engaged in doing. He replied: 'My have got that Jesus pidgin.' He was no more intentionally irreverent in saying this than I am in quoting it; he merely meant that the profession of Christianity, with its comfortable concomitants, was his new occupation."‡

The Chinese have two great failings which have contributed a great deal to the siege of troubles they have endured of late years—their conservatism and their pride.

Unlike the Japanese—who foresaw the inevitable conflict with the Western Powers, and casting aside their antique weapons, borrowed the arms and the science of the West to repel the West—China made no effort to meet or to parry the approaching onslaught, made no effort even to understand the "barbarians" or "foreign devils," as she terms, and always has termed, the inhabitants of other countries. In her ignorance she did not know of the power or resources, or even the existence of the other nations adjoining and over the sea. Her pride would not allow her to acknowledge that any of the outer barbarians could rival her ancient civilisation or threaten her imperial majesty. Then, again, the inbred conservatism of the Chinese is against innovation or reform of any kind. No Chinaman would ever dream of doing anything differing from what his father and grandfather did before him; it would be in the highest degree disloyal, setting himself up to know better than his ancestors. The Chinese exist now, in inland China, exactly as they existed more than three thousand years ago. What China really wants is not religion—the Western nations are discarding it themselves—but science; a knowledge of geography, history, engineering, and the technical knowledge to place her upon an equal footing with her neighbors.

As Mr. Eames, the historian of the English in China, observes:—

> "The conception that the Emperor is divinely appointed has affected Chinese ideas of geography. These are based on the supposition that China is situated in the middle of the earth, while all the other nations, grouped around in a respectful circle, make obeisances in a manner not unlike that in which Joseph's sheaf was worshiped by those of his brethren. The name by which the Chinese prefer to designate their country is the Middle Kingdom. Sometimes they improve upon this by adding the word 'flowery.' They seek to impress upon the outer barbarian the fact that their land is peculiarly favored by Heaven by being bright and sunny, while all the rest of mankind have to dwell in the dark and desolate regions of the earth. In their opinion, the sovereigns of other countries, ruling over lands that have been wont to bask in the sunshine of Heaven's favor, are but vassals of the Son of Heaven, towards whom he exercises a benignant toleration. To this is partly due that feeling of contempt which every Chinese feels towards all foreigners."*

Until quite recently, says the same writer, the Chinese believed that they were superior in power to all the nations of Europe combined; and—

> "to this day the Chinese comfort themselves with the belief that they only have to develop their national wealth and they will be able to defy the world. When it comes to morality, the merest Chinese coolie shows by his look of conscious superiority, as he passes us in the street, that to his mind the best of us are but outer barbarians" (p. 228).

Another competent writer, who knows the Chinese intimately, says:—

> "The Chinese, whose education is confined to a study of their own classics and the acquiring of a good literary style, are often quite unaware that there are other nations in the world besides themselves. It is not that they think they are the finest nation, as we all do, every one of us, if we tell the hidden secrets of our hearts, but that they believe there are no others; only border tribes, sometimes turbulent, with wild sort of chieftains over them, who come to China either because they have no land and are weary of living always on the sea, or because theirs are such poverty-stricken districts that there is tea, no silk, no sunshine to ripen anything. Therefore, we come as suppliants to China, begging of them to trade with us and let us have some of their good things; and then, in a turbulent fashion, force them to take our opium or the like in exchange."†

It may be thought the Chinese must admire our mechanical inventions, but, as Mr. Arthur Smith observes, these things do not make the impression we should expect or desire. "They recognise the fact that we are their superiors in mechanical contrivances; but many of these contrivances are regarded in the light in which we should look upon feats of sleight-of-hand, curious, inexplicable, and useless."‡ The Rev. J. E. Hardy says the inventiveness of the white man, in the eyes of the Chinese is "no more worthy of respect than is the cunning of the fox or the strength of an elephant."§ Mr. Arthur Smith also observes that—

> "From a variety of causes the typical Chinese scholar regards all foreign ideals as inferior to those of the Chinese, and the effort to introduce them into China with the same mixture of amusement, contempt, and indignation which we should instinctively feel toward an organised attempt to import into a Christian land the religious system of Mohammed, to the displacement of Christianity. This is his most moderate and temperate view. When he becomes at all excited and intolerant, he views the advent of Western ways and moral teachings precisely as well-educated Westerners would the propagation of Anarchistic tenets and the inculcation of Nihilistic practises among the people of our own land."‖

Nor can we be surprised at this when we remember the series of terrible calamities the Chinese have experienced, due to missionary aggression. As Sir Robert Hart has remarked, the very presence of the missionaries—

> "has been felt to be a standing insult, for does it not tell the Chinese their conduct is bad and requires changes, their cult inadequate and wants addition, their gods despicable and to be cast into the gutter, their forefathers lost, and themselves only to be saved by accepting the missionary's teaching?"¶

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 35 SUNDAY, AUGUST 31, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

The local traditions of Christianity are clear enough during the last 1,300 or 1,400 years. It is during the first two or three centuries that the chain fails.

—MACAULAY.

"Only a Woman's Hair."

ANY man who can take Bacon in one hand and Shakespeare in the other, having read them both, and say that they were written by the same hand and display the same faculties of mind, is almost past praying for—from a literary point of view. Mark you, having read them both is a necessary criterion. Catching at occasional words and ideas is futile. Such things were in the air for all men of brains and reading. No, it is the weight of the whole work that must tell. And, judged in that way, is it possible for anyone with even a moderate literary sense to hesitate in his verdict?

Many years ago the present writer pointed out the difference in the styles of Bacon and Shakespeare, and in their ways of thinking. Bacon's style, as may be seen by comparing the first and last editions of the Essays, tended to greater simplicity; Shakespeare's style, as may be seen by comparing the earlier with the later plays, tended to greater complexity. This was really because Bacon's mind did not grow like Shakespeare's. He lacked the creative energy. From first to last he had dignity, but no fire; but the blood of Shakespeare ran hot from Venus and Adonis to the Tempest. His restraint was not that of a cooling nature, but that of a great, patient, and perfected artist. And see how differently they think. Bacon's wisdom of life is open, worldly, and largely cynical; it is that of a very distinguished player in the great game. Shakespeare saw all that just as well, but he saw behind it; perhaps we should say below it—for the difference is really between superficiality and profundity. The great game palls in time; it is the more intimate things of life that outlast and outweigh the more public. When the doom falls on Macbeth, it is the death of his wife, more than the loss of his crown, that fills his mouth with ashes; and when Hamlet is at his last gasp he thinks only of his good name, and "the rest is silence"; but that silence held his love as it was to hold his life—the love that leapt to his lips as he leapt into her grave beside Laertes.

> "I loved Ophelia: forty thousand brothers
> Could not, with all their quantity of love,
> Make up my sum."

Precisely in their treatment of that very passion of Love, as the present writer observed so many years ago, lies perhaps the most fundamental difference between Bacon and Shakespeare. Bacon's essay on Love is cynical. The man of the world, the well-bred statesman, looked on Love "as the child of folly." To him it was a more or less inevitable nuisance; a tragi-comical perturbation of social life. Shakespeare saw in it the very mainspring of existence; in which he was true to nature—and evolution. Bacon says that Love speaks "in a perpetual hyperbole." Shakespeare knew that too. He said that the lover "sees Helen's beauty in a brow of Egypt." But he knew more. Behind the hyperbole was the passion that made it, and that was the thing beyond price; not the "child of folly," but the inspirer, the chastener, the sustainer. "Conscience is born of love," said Shakespeare, in one of his sonnets; and this all-profound sentence, this full-inspired oracle, is like a glove flung in the face of Bacon's shallower philosophy.

The present writer was, long afterwards, delighted to see this very point raised in Colonel Ingersoll's splendid lecture on Shakespeare. Ingersoll quoted what Bacon wrote of Love, and added on his own part the simple words, "The author of Romeo and Juliet never wrote that." Only nine words. Yet they are enough. To the knowing reader everything is there.

Turning from the greatest of our poets to the greatest of our generals, the magnificent Marlborough, we may remark that by far the most important thing in the world to him was his Sarah; the beautiful, witty, termagant great Duchess, with a feminine brain to match the masculine one of her husband. When he died she opened a cabinet, in which he kept in secrecy all he most valued, and she found a mass of her own hair. Years before, when furious because he had disobeyed her, she had resolved to mortify him; and the rest shall be told in the words of Mr. Fitzgerald Molloy, who has written her Life under the title or The Queen's Comrade:—

> "Knowing that her beautiful and abundant hair was a source of pride and delight to him, she had impetuously cut it from her head. The shorn tresses had been left in a room through which he must pass, and in a place where he must see them. But he came and went, saw and spoke to her, showing neither anger, sorrow, nor surprise. When he next quitted the house she ran to secure her tresses, but they had vanished, and on a consultation with her looking-glass she saw how foolish a thing she had done. But she said nothing about her shorn locks, nor did he, and she never knew what had become of them until they were found by her among those things he held most precious."

Is it a wonder that the great Sarah asked with amazement if anyone imagined that she could marry another man after having been the wife of John Churchill?

One is reminded of a darker picture, connected with one who stands alone in English literature, as he really stood alone in life. After the death of Swift there was found a lock of Stella's hair. It was enclosed in a paper, on which he had written the words: "Only a woman's hair." Could pathos go further? Is it not more touching than a storm of ejaculations or a deluge of tears? Thackeray moralised over it in his too facile way, but Swift frightened him, and he did not see to the heart of this mystery. Read the "Journal" with its "little language," then read that "Only a woman's hair," and then go your way, sobered and softened, as one who has lighted on an unspeakable tragedy.

Bacon would have smiled at that "Only a woman's hair." Another proof (he would have said) of what he had declared of Love that "in life it doth much mischief; sometimes like a siren, sometimes like a fury," and that "great spirits and great business do keep out this weak passion." Shakespeare would have had quite other thoughts. He would have understood how a lock of hair could be more to a man than the Lord Chancellorship of England.

The Study of Religion.

NOWADAYS one does not care to rob clergymen of any little comfort they may find in the religious situation. There is so much to discourage and so little to cheer them. Church attendances steadily diminish, there is a general complaint as to the falling off in subscriptions, and heresies of all kinds find voice in the pulpit, while those who protest are plainly told they are old-fashioned and need to move with the times. Popular preachers are driven to political subjects to attract audiences, and there are serious proposals for adopting the cinematograph as a regular adjunct to the Sunday service. In America, a company has actually been formed for this purpose, although it naturally promises to restrict itself to religious and educational subjects. Still, the thing may grow, and we have no doubt that the younger portion of the congregation will find Samson's exploits with the Philistines, or Jonah's adventures with the whale interesting enough. Parsons must live, churches must be maintained; and if this cannot be done on the old lines new methods must be adopted.

No one, therefore, will grudge the Rev. Dr. Neville Figgis extracting comfort from the reflection that there are many signs of our living "once more in an age of faith." There is an awakened interest in religion. "The spirit of scientific research has become alive to the fact of religion as a human phenomenon, and it is studied with increasing enthusiasm and research among all kinds of races and in every stage of culture." Therefore, Dr. Figgis is pleased, because "once religion is seen to be a natural and inevitable fact.....an increasing minority will turn to that religion which is most pure, most emphatically religious, most representative—the religion of religions." The steps are simple. An awakened interest in religion leads to a study of religions among all races of people; having studied these religions, people are driven to the recognition of Christianity as the purest and most representative, with the result that we shall all end in being reunited to the Christian faith.

This is quite an idyllic prospect—from the Christian point of view. Only one can recall a time when the recognition of religion as a natural phenomenon was resented as gross infidelity. And so in truth it was; for religion in the doctrinal and Christian sense is not a mere natural phenomenon. It stands in a category of its own. The orthodox doctrine of revelation involved this. Religion was revealed to man because he could not have acquired it by any other means—at least, not true religion, and a false religion was worse than none at all. At any rate, Dr. Figgis's thankfulness appears to be excessive. It is not warranted by the facts. The greatest and most confirmed Atheist living does not doubt that religion is a natural—a human fact. It would be sheer lunacy to doubt it. In human thought there are only two ultimate categories. One is supernatural and the other natural. The Freethinker does not believe in the former; he does pin his whole faith on the supremacy of the latter. And certainly no Freethinker was ever lunatic enough to deny the existence of religion. He affirms it "as a natural and inevitable fact," only he explains it—and there is no surer way of killing religion than by explanation. A religion explained is a religion doomed. That is why all Churches, Christian and non-Christian, appeal ultimately to man's sense of mystery. Faith lives on the unintelligible, and churches are built on the unexplainable.

Dr. Figgis is quite right in saying that religion is now being studied with enthusiasm, and that this study is pursued among all races and in all stages of culture. In this direction, as in many others, the pioneers have been Freethinkers. In our own days the names of two such men as Tylor and Frazer are enough to prove this. Distinguished religionists such as the late Robertson Smith—dismissed from his post for heresy—have done valuable work, but the honor of leading the way rests with the unbelievers. And there are two reasons why unbelievers led the way. In the first place there was the necessity of meeting Christianity on its own ground and demonstrating the hollowness of its claims. Events have moved so rapidly during the last generation or so that we seem ages removed from the time when educated Christians really believed that the doctrines and teachings and symbols of Christianity were peculiar to that religion. It required a long fight to force from Christians a general recognition that Christian doctrines and symbols existed in other religions, some of them already ancient when Christianity was in its cradle. The Christian replied that all these were inventions of the Devil or copied from Christianity. To-day there are few educated Christians who would deny that the Christian miracles, the story of a crucified and resurrected Savior, a virgin birth, a day of judgment, heaven and hell, all have their counterparts in other religions. Christian preachers have not yet developed enough honesty in the pulpit to tell these things to their congregation, but they know that many of their hearers are aware of the truth, and, if pressed, would admit as true what has been said.

Secondly, there has been an enthusiasm for religious research, because it was seen that the truth concerning one religion could only be derived from a study of all. What can one make of the Christian doctrine of Deity by itself? Little or nothing. It is a mere incomprehensible jumble, or, at best, offensive and contradictory so far as it is understandable. But when we take this doctrine and relate it to the belief in God among other peoples, study its growth as a natural fact, and note the causes that have led to its development and modification, we see that the whole question is a historical and psychological one. The question is no longer whether there is a God; the vital question is how did people come to believe in one? The question of veracity gives place to one of origin. By examining the beliefs of all peoples we can in thought stand at the cradle of Deity. We can see the social and mental conditions that gave it birth. Gods are reduced to a species, with all the varieties classified and labelled in the anthropological museum.

Or the great Christian belief in miracles. Who now seriously bothers to prove that the Christian miracles were actual historic facts? It is with them as with Deity—no longer a question did they occur, but only one of how did people come to believe in their occurrence? Research showed the Christian miracles to be in no sense peculiar. Other religions had theirs, and of an exactly similar kind. Still further, miracle was pushed back to the region of magic, to a time when men in their ignorance of nature believed anything was possible, because nothing was certain. The magic-working of primitive mankind became the miracle-working of the later and more elaborated religions. And the miraculous element in religion persisted just so long as there existed a type of mind suitable to it. Again there is nothing before us but a problem of historical psychology. It is not a question of evidence at all. Evidence does not establish a miracle, and it very seldom disproves one; still less seldom does it disprove the possibility of a miracle. People either outgrow the miraculous or they continue to believe in it.

The enthusiasm for research has, then, made plain three things. First, the fact that all religions are fundamentally alike. They all originate in the same conditions, and involve the same fundamental beliefs. Second, that these beliefs owe their origin to human ignorance of natural causation; and until that ignorance is removed, religion is indestructible. Thirdly, the primitive mind persists under all stages of culture. In relation to religion, there are worshipers in twentieth-century churches who are as truly primitive as the uncivilised inhabitants of an African forest. To the student of comparative religion there is no vital difference between the incantations of a primitive medicine-man and the petitions of an Anglican, Catholic, or Nonconformist preacher. The prayers of a Church of England clergyman for the success of the British arms is upon precisely the same level as the religious dance of a North American tribe before setting out on a fighting expedition. Scientific research has indeed established the unity of religion, but it is a unity rooted in the uncivilised nature of mankind.

Finally, the scientific interest in religion is partly due to a perception of the truth that superstition plays a large part in determining the form of early society and of early institutions, and that no study of social origins can be adequate which ignores this factor. Far from belittling the influence of religion on life, the Freethinker has been foremost in pointing out the enormous range and extent of its influence. That it has been an influence for evil makes no difference to this fact. But early society is so beclouded with superstition that there is not a single institution that escapes its influence. Birth, marriage, and death—family, social and political life—are all fashioned under the denominating influence of religious beliefs and fears. The consequence is that a study of social life, an examination of the significance of many of our surviving institutions, drives the student to a study of the origin and value of religious beliefs. The cheap sneer of uninformed Freethinkers that the militant unbeliever is flogging a dead horse because so many people have given up a belief in current forms of Christianity is thus quite wide of the mark. You cannot understand what a thing is until you know how it became what it is; and it is ultimately in the interests of a wider and more scientific sociology that the Freethinker insists upon a complete and careful study of religion in all stages of culture.

We admit, then, that religion "is studied with increasing enthusiasm among all kinds of races and in every stage of culture." But how can this be converted into an increasing belief in the veracity and value of religion? That is really what Dr. Figgis wishes his readers and hearers to believe, although he does not say it in so many words. How many of the master names in anthropology are believers in the Christian religion? Very few, I fancy. Some may believe in a transfigured Christianity, which, on close examination would turn out to be not Christianity at all, but a misnamed humanitarianism. The vast majority of investigators too clearly realise the level of culture betokened by orthodox Christian beliefs to have any real faith in them. When a man has traced the idea of a God or of a soul back to their origin in the fear-haunted dream of a primitive savage, what is the use of all the fantastic arguments that have been invented in the name of philosophy to support those ideas? When scientific research takes in hand the study of a delusion, its days are numbered. The end may be delayed, but it cannot be averted. It does, indeed, point out that religion is "a natural and inevitable fact"; but so is many another delusion that has flourished during the history of mankind. But the inevitability of religion's appearance on the human stage is offset by the inevitability of its disappearance. The ancient salutation, "O king, live for ever!" never extended by a single hour the life of the individual to whom it was addressed. That the gods can live for ever is a belief just as surely rooted in delusion, and as certain of disproof by the logic of facts. The gods come and the gods go; and while the tenure of existence may be longer with some than with others, the same fate awaits them all.

Then and Now.

Thirty-two years ago a memorable debate took place between Colonel Ingersoll and Judge Jeremiah Black upon the subject of "The Christian Religion." That discussion is of interest to-day because it illustrates the method of attack and defence generally followed at that time both in America and this country. The first thing that strikes us is the comprehensiveness of Colonel Ingersoll's survey of the field to be covered. His statement of what he understood to be the fundamental doctrines of Christianity was such as to necessitate a critical examination of the whole Bible, because at that time the whole Bible was regarded as the Word of God. It is true that Bishop Colenso's great work on the Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua was already in circulation; but it should be borne in mind that both Houses of Convocation had condemned it as heretical, and that Bishop Gray, of Cape Town, had publicly excommunicated him. It is also true that Essays and Reviews had been published ten years prior to the occurrence of the debate, but we cannot afford to ignore the facts that for the space of four long years after the publication of that famous book a violent storm raged in academic and clerical circles, and that two of the contributors to it were condemned in the Court of Arches. The truth is, that the Protestants of thirty years ago still believed in the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible. Hence to make his attack on Christianity effective, Colonel Ingersoll was obliged to begin by attacking the popular doctrine about Holy Scripture. This portion of the discussion has only an historical interest now. On critical questions the generality of Protestant scholars stand to-day where Freethought advocates stood thirty, forty, and even a hundred years ago. What the Colonel maintained was that there are "a few reasons for thinking that a few passages, at least, in the Old Testament are the product of a barbarous people," and that the moral code of which Jehovah was believed to be the author "is in many respects abhorrent to every good and tender man." There was nothing extravagant about that statement, and it is often made to-day from Christian pulpits; but its effect on Judge Black was to make him boisterously angry. Forgetting his manners and his logic he thus burst out:—

> "Does Mr. Ingersoll know what he is talking about? The moral code of the Bible consists of certain immutable rules to govern the conduct of all men, at all times, and in all places in their private and personal relations with one another. It is entirely separate and apart from the civil polity, the religious forms, the sanitary provisions, the police regulations, and the system of international law laid down for the special and exclusive observance of the Jewish people. This is a distinction which every intelligent man knows how to make. Has Mr. Ingersoll fallen into the egregious blunder of confusing these things? or, understanding the true sense of his words, is he rash and shameless enough to assert that the moral code of the Bible excites the abhorrence of good people? In fact, and in truth, this moral code, which he reviles, instead of being abhorred, is entitled to, and has received, the profoundest respect of all honest and sensible people" (The Works of Robert G. Ingersoll, vol. vi., p. 36).

There is a true Christian Evidence ring about that passage. The opponent is coolly set down as being neither good, honest, intelligent, nor sensible; and nothing is advanced but bare assertions, which Mr. Ingersoll characterises as "base and spurious coins." Then the renowned Freethinker delivers himself of the following wise and true utterance:—

> "We have a right to rejudge the justice even of a god. No one should throw away his reason—the fruit of all experience. It is the intellectual capital of the soul, the only light, the only guide, and without it the brain becomes the palace of an idiot king, attended by a retinue of thieves and hypocrites."

The supreme fault of Christianity is its remoteness from real life. That is why it is made to rest upon the immoral doctrine of the atonement and to base salvation upon belief. Colonel Ingersoll sketched the history of the sacrificial system of the Israelites and then said:—

> "This terrible system is supposed to have culminated in the sacrifice of Christ. His blood took the place of all other. It is necessary to shed no more. The law at last is satisfied, satiated, surfeited. The idea that God wants blood is at the bottom of the atonement, and rests upon the most fearful savagery. How can sin be transferred to animals, and how can the shedding of the blood of animals atone for the sins of men?"

Ingersoll's arguments against salvation by faith and through the atonement of Christ are logically and ethically sound. No honorable man, he contends, would be willing to let the innocent suffer for him. Such a willingness would amply prove that the man was utterly unworthy of the sacrifice. "What would we think of a man who would allow another to die for a crime that he himself had committed?" The curious thing is that the doctrine of the atonement against which Ingersoll fulminated with such eloquence thirty years ago has now been abandoned by nearly all Protestant divines. It is no longer preached except by an old-fashioned clergyman here and there. But Judge Black defended it with great earnestness and declared that Colonel Ingersoll disgraced his own intellect by describing it as absurd, unjust, and immoral. Then he said:—

> "The plan of salvation, or any plan for the rescue of sinners from the legal operation of Divine justice, could have been framed only in the councils of the Omniscient. Necessarily, its heights and depths are not easily fathomed by finite intelligence. But the greatest, ablest, wisest, and most virtuous men that ever lived have given it their profoundest consideration and found it to be not only authorised by revelation, but theoretically conformed to their best and highest conceptions of infinite goodness. Nevertheless, here is a rash and superficial man, without training or habits of reflection, who, upon a mere glance, declares that it 'must be abandoned,' because it seems to him 'absurd, unjust, an immoral.' I would not abridge his freedom of thought or speech, and the argumentum ad verecundiam would be lost upon him. Otherwise, I might suggest that, when he finds all authority, human and Divine, against him, he had better speak in a tone less arrogant."

We thus see that Judge Black had a characteristically Christian style of treating his opponent. Unable to meet his arguments, he turned round to heap abuse upon him, to call him "a rash and superficial man, without training or habits of reflection," who spoke arrogantly from an empty head. That method is still in operation. Many a defender of the faith has nothing else to fall back upon. To himself he whispers maliciously, "Since I cannot answer him, I will fling brickbats at him; I will pelt him with foul epithets; I will blacken his character for him; and for God's sake I will lie about him like any trooper." It is a very hoary-headed method, and it always goes down with the mob; but it does not help the cause on behalf of which it is employed. Not long ago two Sunday-school teachers, out of mere curiosity, attended a Freethought lecture. The hall was crammed with Christian believers who did everything within their power to prevent the lecturer from being heard. They nearly succeeded, and felt particularly proud of themselves; but the two teachers were so disgusted with their cowardly behavior that they immediately resigned their Sunday posts and avowed themselves Freethinkers. The curious thing is that fairly intelligent apologists do not realise that slander is at once the most cowardly and the most futile of weapons, and that its use is bound sooner or later to react upon the user. Christians have always taken a special delight in belittling and reviling Paganism, especially the Paganism of ancient Greece and Rome. Judge Black spoke of it in the following extravagant language:—

> "Reflect what kind of a world this was when the disciples of Christ undertook to reform it, and compare it with the condition in which their teachings have put it. In its mighty metropolis, the centre of its intellectual and political power, the best men were addicted to vices so debasing that I could not even allude to them without soiling the paper I write upon. All manner of unprincipled wickedness was practised in the private life of the whole population without concealment or shame, and the magistrates were thoroughly and universally corrupt. Benevolence in any shape was altogether unknown. The helpless and the weak got neither justice nor mercy. There was no relief for the poor, no succor for the sick, no refuge for the unfortunate. In all pagandom there was not a hospital, asylum, almshouse, or organised charity of any sort."

Since that vile calumny was written thirty-two years ago it has been demonstrated beyond the possibility of a doubt that the picture of ancient Rome therein painted is an entire caricature. Even a bigot like the late Dr. Reich and a great scholar like Professor Harnack have given it the lie direct. But what we wish to point out is that Christian apologists, in pursuing this method of exalting Christianity, have overreached the mark, and a strong reaction has already set in both in America and Great Britain, as well as on the Continent, in favor of Paganism. At several of our seats of learning champions of the cheerful and sane outlook upon life of the Greeks of the fifth century B.C. are hard at work sowing the seed of a new, saner, and more virile Paganism in the minds of their students and readers which, based upon modern scientific knowledge, is, in their confident hope, destined to supersede the Christian religion and initiate the establishment of wholesome and happier conditions of life all round. Literature and science are at last joining hands and working harmoniously towards the bringing about of so glorious an end.

> "Why should a Chinaman abandon, at the bidding of anyone, a cult so essentially humane and deeply poetical as the worship of his ancestors? The Chinaman who did so would not be a better Chinaman. The chances are that he would be a vagabond, a déclassé item, instead of a respectable link in an endless chain of social continuity."—T. C. HAVILLAN, "The Chinese View of Missionaries," Nineteenth Century, November, 1895.

> "I believe it to be strictly within the limits of truth to say that foreign missionary effort in China has been productive of far more harm than good. Instead of serving as a link between Chinese and foreigners, the missionaries have formed a growing obstacle."—SIR HENRY NORMAN, Peoples and Politics of the Far East, p. 304.

AND why should missionaries be sent to China? To teach the Chinese morality? That is like carrying coals to Newcastle; for, in the teachings of Confucius—who lived five hundred years before Christ—the Chinese possess one of the finest codes of morals in the world.

Even the much-belauded Golden Rule, which many Christians regard as containing the very pith and essence of Christianity, "Do not unto others that which thou wouldest not that they should do unto thee," was taught by Confucius, not only once, but "again and again."* Professor Giles, who has made China and the Chinese a lifelong study, and who is one of the highest authorities on the subject, declares:—

> "The cardinal virtues which are most admired by Christians are fully inculcated in the Confucian Canon, and the general practice of these is certainly up to the average standard exhibited by foreign nations."†

Indeed, says Freeman-Clarke:—

> "The sacred literature of the Chinese is perfectly free from everything impure or offensive. There is not a line but what may be read aloud in every family circle."‡

Which is a great deal more than can be said for the Bible, which contains passages that no clergyman would dare to read from the pulpit to a mixed congregation.

How the Chinese regard these parts of the Holy Book may be judged from the following statement of Sir Henry Norman, who says:—

> "Protestant missionary tracts are distributed bearing coarse illustrations of such Biblical incidents as the swallowing of Jonah by the whale and the killing of Sisera by Jael. Moreover, up to the present, the Protestant missionaries have circulated the whole Bible in Chinese. They have recently seen their error, and are now considering the advisability of following in the steps of the more circumspect Roman Catholics, and withholding certain parts obviously unfit for Oriental comprehension."*

Lord Curzon also remarks that:—

"The missionary societies do not seem to have sufficiently realised that the Holy Scriptures, which require in places some explanation, if not some expurgation, for ourselves, may stand in still greater need of editing for a community who care nothing about the customs or prepossessions of the ancient Jews, but who are invited to accept the entire volume as a revelation from on high."†

Then the missionaries outrage the most sacred sentiments of the Chinese by declaring that the ancestors they revere and worship are paying the penalty for their ignorance of Christianity by endless torments with devils in hell. Dr. Morrison quotes several missionaries as teaching this horrible doctrine, among them Mr. Broomhall, Secretary of the China Inland Mission and editor of the missionary magazine, China's Millions, as saying: "The heathen are all guilty in God's eyes; as guilty, they perish." Of another missionary in China who taught "hell," Dr. Morrison says: "There are hundreds in China who teach as he does."‡ As Mr. Hayllar well says:—

"But when we come to the supernatural basis of the Gospel, no common meeting-ground seems possible. The literates especially reject Christian miracles with contemptuous indifference. What the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius is to the Protestant, or the cures of Lourdes to the Paris physician, such are the supernatural chronicles of Holy Writ to the literate. His mental attitude towards all such matters is in the highest degree sceptical. Why, if there were to be stupendous events, material to his wellbeing in another life, should they have happened in a remote corner of Asia, outside the ken of the Middle Kingdom? The idea is as offensive to his patriotic pride as to his trained intelligence. Moreover, if there is but one true road to salvation, what has become of his ancestors, and the sages whose memory he venerates? Is it pretended that, instead of being objects of worship, they are expiating unconscious sins in endless and undreamt-of tortures? To be instructed at the same time that the best he can look forward to in the future is to share an unseen paradise with foreigners, whom it is his dearest wish on earth never to see again, is equally terrible."§

Look, then, says Dr. Morrison, at the enormous difficulties the missionaries raise for themselves in China:—

"They tell the Chinese inquirer that his unconverted father, who never heard the Gospel, has, like Confucius, perished eternally. But the chief of all virtues in China is filial piety; the strongest emotion that can move the heart of a Chinaman is the supreme desire to follow in the footsteps of his father. Conversion with him means not only eternal separation from the father who gave him life, but the 'immediate liberation of his ancestors to a life of beggary, to inflict sickness and all manner of evil on the neighborhood.'"‖

Because there is no one to appease the ancestral spirits by the performance of ancestral rights and propitiatory offerings.

To tell the Chinese that their great teacher, Confucius, affectionately known to them as the "uncrowned king," is in hell, is as great an outrage as it would be for Chinese or Indian missionaries to come over here and tell Christians that Jesus Christ is in hell.

And why should the Chinese give up the teaching of Confucius for that of Christ? Mr. R. F. Johnston emphatically declares that:—

"If China thinks, or Europe persuades her into the belief, that her backward position among the great Powers of the world is due to Confucianism, she will be doing a great wrong to the memory of one of her greatest sons and a greater wrong to herself."¶

This was in reply to the missionary, Griffis, who declared that "Confucius cut the tap-root of all true progress," and, therefore, was responsible for China's arrested development. "It is to be hoped," says Mr. Johnston further,

"for the sake of China that many centuries will elapse before Confucianism as a moral force, as a guide of life, fades away from the hearts and minds of the people" (p. 302).

Sir Robert Hart, for so many years Inspector-General of Chinese Maritime Customs, who passed nearly all his life in China and knew its people as intimately as any European can, was of the same opinion. Mr. Douglas Story, after observing that, "No European knows so much of China and the hidden things of its mysterious inner life as the Inspector-General," tells us that he was "a profound believer in the value of the Confucian philosophy as an educator of Chinese minds," and adds:—

"As Sir Robert himself told me, he advised the retention of the ancient ethical training for the four literary degrees according to the custom in China for over two thousand years, and then the addition to this curriculum of a fifth and final degree in Western science. He argued that by such means the best brains of the land would be instructed in the high moral precepts which are the theme of Chinese classics, and would at the conclusion of the course be in a fit state to imbibe and to profit by the teachings of modern science. 'Train your youth in the classics,' he said; instruct them in the philosophy of Confucius, and then, when their moral education is complete, let them turn to the lessons of modern thought and knowledge. In such way you will possess a well-built fire laid beneath a chimney which will ensure complete combustion."*

The teachings of Confucius are thoroughly adapted to the Chinese character. As Mr. Diosy well says:—

"There is no doubt that the Sage [Confucius], himself a typical Chinese, knew his countrymen thoroughly, and formed for them a rule of life he knew to be suited to their peculiarities. Hence the extraordinary sway his teaching has exercised since his death, in 479 B.C., over the minds of the Chinese. Surely, the memory of no man, not even of Mohammed, is venerated by so many millions at the present time, and this veneration of Confucius had existed for a thousand years when Mohammed preached Islam."†

And Mr. Archibald Little has pointed out:—

"The entrance of Protestantism into China, with its inquiring and disputatious spirit, is proving fatal to the ingathering of the harvest anticipated by devout Catholics as the result of two centuries of toil in this ungrateful land. As in the West, the door once opened to doubt, dogmatic Christianity is doomed."

For, as we have seen, the Chinese look upon the multitude of differing sects as different religions. Mr. Little also tells us:—

"And it must not be supposed that, to quote one of the many false impressions derived from missionary reports, the Chinese are so steeped in materialism as to be callous in regard to moral teaching, and hence to be dependent on Western charity for their spiritual food. Hortatory works, urging men to reform their lives, are perpetually being circulated by benevolent individuals, in addition to which the people are stimulated by open-air exhortations by paid preachers. A common sight in Chungking in the evening, after the day's work is over and the shops are closed, is an elevated stand at a street-corner, consisting of a raised table draped in red cloth; upon it two flaring red candles, and behind it a man in full ceremonial dress, with the stiff official hat and silk ma-kwa, addressing the crowd. At first sight one would, but for his careful costume, take the man for a story teller, surrounded as he is by a group of silent listeners, until on a nearer approach you find he is expounding the doctrine of the native classics and exhorting men to repentance. No nation has so many wise saws and moral maxims always at its fingers' ends as the Chinese; scarcely a sentence but is interlarded with a proverb or a text from the ancient sages. That a people so generally well read as are the Chinese, and possessing in the teachings of Confucius a doctrine in no way inferior to Christianity, and which, unlike the latter, has survived unquestioned throughout all the wars and commotions of twenty-five centuries; to expect that a people so unemotional and so eminently practical in the application of their ethics to the wants of daily existence, should ever pin their faith to a work like the Hebrew books of the Bible, seems to a layman preposterous. Just as Christians fail to live up to the teaching of the New Testament by selling all and giving to the poor, and loving their enemies—especially if they happen to be Freethinkers.

"The Boom that Thou Gavest Me."

THAT modest writer, Mr. Hall Caine, is fortunate in having publishers who are so unlike himself, for seldom has any book been heralded with such a blare of trumpets as his latest novel, The Woman Thou Gavest Me. These industrious tradesmen announce the book as "a love story for all the world and for all time," and inform the reading public that of the Eternal City 702,212 English copies, of the Christian 643,228, of the Manxman 397,966, have been sold up-to-date. The new story is to be translated into sixteen languages, including Japanese and Yiddish.

The reasons for a popularity such as this are worth considering, for, if foreign sales come anywhere near the English purchases, it may be assumed that contemporary English fiction is represented in Europe by Mr. Caine as French literary art is by Anatole France, Belgian by Maurice Maeterlinck, Italian by Gabriele D'Annunzio, and German by Herman Sudermann.

Yet some people, not wholly illiterate, have been known to admit that they could only regard Mr. Caine's tremendous popularity with wonder and stupefaction. The genius of Hardy and Meredith, as of Shelley and Keats before them, dawned slowly on the general reader. But here is a writer of novels whose books run into new editions as fast as the printing presses and the bookbinders can supply them. Like Miss Marie Corelli and Mr. Charles Garvice, he has succeeded in winning the hearts of myriads of readers. What these stern moralists are to the worldly minded, Mr. Hall Caine is to the other worldly minded. In each, vulgar, but virtuous ordinary people and grotesque villains win the unlettered appreciation of their readers. Mr. Caine represents this taste, with the addition of an affectation of realism and the sham ethics of an invertebrate Christianity.

In his latest work, Mr. Caine breaks no fresh ground, but tells a commonplace love story in strident tones and with much elaboration of detail. Although occupying nearly 600 pages of close print, the plot can be told in a few words. A woman is married by force to a profligate brute; gets disgusted with her husband; loves an Arctic explorer; gives birth to an illegitimate child; and dies of consumption. The characters in the novel are older than the everlasting hills. There is not a single portrait of an actual personality; but only personifications of bravery, self-sacrifice, profligacy, greed, and so forth.

The story, it will be seen, is frankly popular, and incidentally presents a considerable opportunity for introducing theatrical effects, and the author's fondness for the Catholic Church. Indeed, Mr. Caine takes nothing for granted, and "wallows naked in the pathetic." Naturally, the explorer must be an Arctic one, and, when his mistress is suffering, by some theatrical telepathy he hears her voice calling him over thousands of miles of space. Mary O'Neill, the heroine, is what our American cousins call "a continental idiot." Forced into a loveless marriage with an almost unknown man, she has not sufficient sense to earn her own living after leaving her husband, and gets consumption through drying her baby's wet clothes on her own body. Although madly in love with an explorer, she does not read the daily papers to be informed of the expedition, and she starves herself in order that her child may be strong and healthy. Frankly, the book is altogether unreal and melodramatic, for, when the heroine is forced by poverty to solicit in Piccadilly, the only person she accosts is her long-lost explorer.

Mr. Caine tickles the ears of the groundlings with Biblical phrases. The title strikes the key-note, and Mary's narrative begins with the following words:—

> "'Out of the depths, O Lord, out of the depths,' begins the most beautiful of the services of our Church, and it is out of the depths of my life that I must bring the incidents of this story."

The ending has the same air of novelty:—

> "'Very soon the mist will rise, and the day will break, and the sun will come again, and—there will be no more night.'
> "These were the last words penned by Mary before her gentle and tortured spirit took flight from earth."

It is enough to break a poor critic's heart. However, Mr. Caine is giving pleasure to thousands of Yiddish, Japanese, and other readers, and no great harm is done, if, in reading his work, they cherish the pleasing delusion that they are reading really great English literature. But, since Mr. Caine plainly labors under the belief that he is a great writer, it is a pity that he cannot be enlightened. He has won a very large body of readers precisely because he is not a genius. Why should he not be content? Why should he hug the delusion that he is a brother to Hardy and Meredith, to Anatole France or Gabriele D'Annunzio? He is the universal provider of the circulating libraries, and is as little an artist as any other manufacturer.

Acid Drops.

When the present writer was a little boy—under eight years of age in fact—he lived next door to a house that had been "haunted" until the local parson solemnly "laid" him (it was a he) at night with a lighted candle and full regimentals, in the name of the blessed Trinity. The little boy used to hang about that once haunted house a good deal, hoping to catch sight of Mr. Ghost if he should ever turn up again. Some people used to say that "the thing" could be heard and seen occasionally, but only after long intervals. He never appeared to the little boy, however; perhaps because the youngster was born to be a sceptic, and it is well known that ghosts only appear to believers.

We dare say a good many ghosts have been "laid" since then. But a case has just been reported in which the haunted house was a parsonage. It was Asfordsby Rectory, Leicestershire, occupied by the Rev. F. A. Gage Hall. The nocturnal visitant had disturbed the household for some thirty years. It had a partiality for pulling the bedclothes off sleepers in the middle of the night. It was tolerated for a whole generation, in point of time, and then the rector took a sudden decision to deal with the nuisance. So he dressed up in "full fig"—as they used to say in last century's novels, and solemnly ordered Mr. Ghost to depart in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. It may be that the mention of three rival ghosts, and especially the last of them, upset the poor fellow's equanimity; anyhow, he took the hint and made himself scarce—and the rectory is now quiet and humdrum without him.

Such is the story that the newspapers give a lot of space to. And this is a Christian country, and it is nearly two thousand years after Christ, and Christianity is the cause of civilisation. No doubt the reader sees the joke.

Nothing could be more characteristic of the good Christians in London than their latest dead set at Jack Johnson. He is a pugilist, but there are plenty of white pugilists, and friendly reports of their performances are given by the English newspapers, including the dear Daily News. He is said to be "immoral"—which appears to mean, not only that he is fond of the ladies, but that the ladies are fond of him. But are there no "immoral" persons on the music-hall stage already? And is it necessary to make such a fuss about adding one to the number? He is also declared to be a fugitive from justice. Yes, from such justice as whites deal out to blacks in America. White men are allowed to consort with black women over there, but black men are not allowed to consort with white women. Johnson has done nothing that is illegal for white men to do, and nothing that is a crime under the laws of England. To talk about his "breaking the white slave laws of his country," as even the Citizen does, is malicious nonsense. The bed-rock truth is that Johnson's offence is his color; he is a black man, and he can beat any white man who likes to stand up against him.

Rev. Dr. Clifford calls Jack Johnson "a most disreputable individual." This is vague slanderous gabble. What specific crime has he committed? We have not heard of anything definite to his discredit. If there is, what is it? We should like to see Dr. Clifford brought to book for this slander. He evidently thinks he can say what he pleases about Jack Johnson with impunity. Perhaps he relies on the difficulty the black pugilist would find in getting justice against the white preacher.

Sir Hiram Maxim is to be congratulated on his letter to the Daily News. He has seen Jack Johnson in Paris, and obtained particulars of the pugilist's crime, which the Rev. F. B. Meyer and other gentlemen full of "Christian charity" are making so much of. Our readers will be surprised to learn that Jack Johnson's only "crime" is marrying his wife. She was employed as cashier at Johnson's café at Chicago—and this is what followed, in Sir Hiram's words:—

> "A strong friendship sprung up between Johnson and his cashier. The girl wrote to her mother in Ohio that Johnson wished to marry her, and she asked for her mother's consent. The mother disapproved very strongly; she went to Chicago naturally in a fearful rage, and those who wished to have a part of Johnson's money took advantage of the situation and brought criminal proceedings against him on what they were pleased to call the 'White Slave Trade,' i.e., they claimed that it was the White Slave Trade because the woman was a native of another State, and she had left her native State to meet Johnson in another State—the same as it would be in England if a woman in Essex should join her lover in the county of Kent. The proceedings were of the most abominable character, but nothing could turn the white woman against her black lover, and they were married."

Sir Hiram saw and conversed with Mrs. Johnson at Paris. She is the idol of her husband, and they are as happy as possible together. But she came out of Ohio and married him in another State, and American lawyers are trying to convict him as a "procurer" in consequence. Fancy a man procuring his own wife—for himself! What devilry will the Americans be up to next? Isn't it enough to soak negroes with kerosene and burn them alive on mere suspicion? Must they improve even on that?

Jack Johnson's first crime is that he is black. His second is that he whipped Jefferies, the white pugulist, who was put forward to rescue the championship from him, and failed so ignominiously. Other fighting films were shown freely, but the films of that fight were not allowed to be exhibited anywhere between New York and San Francisco.

Jack Johnson is a fighter. So are the clergy. He fights tangible adversaries. They fight the invisible Devil. He appears to be an honest man. They are—well, we are really not equal to the task of describing them.

Two poor Jesuites in the "Latest Wills" of August 22. This time they are hardly worth noting. But here they are. Rev. James Protheroe, Porthcawl, Glamorgan, left £4,344. Rev. William Frederick John Kaye, Archdeacon of Lincoln, left £4 082. Small humps, it must be allowed; yet still too large to go through the needle's eye. But here are two better developed humps from the same day's record. Rev. Percival Laurence, rector of Walesby, Lincolnshire, left £25,824. Rev. William Henry Custler, of Hendon, left £58,025. Ah! That's the sort.

One is struck, too, by the way in which these poor servants of Christ hurry along through this vale of tears. The age of the first was not stated, but the others lived to 84, 73, and 85 years respectively. How sad they must have felt at keeping out of heaven so long!

Turkey has not evacuated Adrianople, and is not likely to do so. Of course, the Powers could force her to give it up if they were united, and decided to do so; but these Christian nations distrust each other so thoroughly that they agree best when nothing is to be done. Meanwhile, it is rather amusing to read the moral lectures being delivered by some of the English papers, and the moral indignation expressed at Turkey not keeping rigidly to the terms of the Treaty of London. Not one of the Christian Allies have kept their agreement with each other; they have lied and robbed and murdered in turn. It is the non-Christian Power that must keep to the terms of an agreement forced upon it at the point of the sword—as though, under existing conditions, there is not as much justification for the Turks retaking Adrianople as for the Bulgarians to capture it in the first instance. But, apparently, the Christian papers of this country are convinced that a Mohammedan is the only one of the bunch that ought to act up to the letter and spirit of an agreement.

The following is cut from the Daily Mail of August 23, and is a telegram from its Paris correspondent:—

> "The steerage of a Transatlantic liner running from Trieste to New York was the scene of violent encounters between parties of Servians, Greeks, and Bulgarians returning to America after serving in the recent war.
> "The captain of the ship, an Englishman, had all the 1,200 third-class passengers searched for arms when two days out of port. Afterwards they were deprived of knives and forks, and for the rest of the voyage had to eat all their food with spoons alone."

How these good Christians love one another!

Dr. Page, the new American Ambassador, delivered what appears to have been an eloquent speech at the unveiling of the Mayflower monument at Southampton. Two sentences in his speech are noticeable. The men of the Mayflower, he said, "made the Deity a partner in their enterprise." That, we think, was not specially a characteristic of the Puritan settlers. It has been a characteristic of Englishmen in all their colonising efforts. God was always with them; they went to spread the knowledge of God; the Deity was always ostentatiously invited to a partnership. It was only when the dividends were declared that he was forgotten. The second remark was that the Pilgrim Fathers were not only God-led; they were God-led Englishmen. That, we suppose, is a sort of congratulating God Almighty on the nature of his followers. The colonists were lucky in having God as leader; God was lucky in having Englishmen as followers. Yankees had not then been invented, or he would doubtless have selected them. Failing them, he fell back upon Englishmen. Therefore, we admire the wisdom of God, also the judgment of Englishmen. Honors are about equal.

"It is no exaggeration to say that a mind which doubts the historicity of Jesus is to all historical and spiritual intents a thoroughly unsound mind." As this comes from that cock-o'-the walk, Sir Robertson Nicol, we suppose the matter ought to be regarded as settled. But we have our doubts. Is there anyone of education and discernment who really does believe the Jesus of the New Testament to be a historical character? We doubt it. For they each retain what they call a New Testament Jesus by throwing a large part of him overboard. One drops his miracles, another rejects his miraculous birth, another denies his bodily resurrection and ascension, another does not believe in his conflicts with Satan. And what is really all this but a rejection of the historical character of the New Testament Jesus? The New Testament Jesus is the one depicted in the New Testament, with all the stories and characteristics, from the miraculous birth to the ascension. To reject these and still claim to believe in his historical character is ridiculous. It is as though one claimed to believe in Napoleon the First, but denied that he was a soldier, that he was Emperor of France, that he fought Austerlitz, Jena, Waterloo, and died at St. Helena. One might believe in some person that one chose to call Napoleon, but it would not be the Napoleon of history. So with Jesus. To say that Jesus was a historical character, but that nearly all miraculous things related of him are false, is puerile. The historicity of Jesus honestly means the historicity of the New Testament character of the New Testament stories related of him. If these are not true, nothing worth bothering about remains. The question of whether there may not have been someone, about whom the only certain thing we know is that nearly all we are told about him is false, is not worth the trouble of discussing. Sir Robertson Nicol's statement is pure bluff.

Sir Robertson Nicol says that sceptical critics forget that there is historical evidence for the death and resurrection of Jesus. We should like to see it. We do not want evidence of his death. Evidence for his birth will be enough. If that is established, we are quite content to take his death for granted. And we should dearly love to see the evidence for his resurrection. Evidence, we mean; not what Christians usually understand as such. We do not want to be told that some people a long while ago believed in it, or that in more recent times other people are convinced because certain drunkards have been made sober, or any other of the fantastical rubbish that is served out so liberally in the pulpit. We mean the kind of evidence that would convince a jury of educated and impartial men. The difficulty of demonstrating certain assumed historic facts is, again, a mere piece of bluff. The accuracy of accounts of ordinary events may be difficult to demonstrate, because it may be only a long while after that they assume importance. But the birth and death of a God is in a category by itself; and it should have been accompanied by evidence that would have commanded the world's assent once and for all.

Rev. D. Ewart James, of Southend-on-Sea, has been lamenting the decay of dressing for Sundays, and sighs for the top-hatted, frock-coated, rolled-umbrella days of yore. The reverend gentleman will not stop the fashion. Church parade in the Garden of Eden was not a dressy affair, and even the apostles never wore trousers.

"Sand Services" runs a headline in the Christian Globe. It is a dry subject, but such services ought to be suitable to a religion built on the same material.

The Methodists of Vancouver intend having a cinema theatre of their own, and have started with capital amounting to £20,000. It will cost that sum for films only, if the pious picture-lovers start with a realistic film of Noah and the animals in the ark. There is one picture that would cost them more than that—Adam and Eve before the fall.

Dr. J. M. Gray is quoted in the Christian Globe as saying: "If we deny the endless miseries of hell then we must give up the idea of the endless joys of heaven." This may be logical; but it won't catch on. Not yet. You can't expect the poor Christians to suffer the loss of Heaven and Hell in one year.

Rev. J. Cones Vaughan, of Endcliffe Park Congregational Church, Sheffield, preached recently on "Is there a Hell?" and said that "the hell of everlasting, hopeless torment did not exist." Freethinkers have been saying the same thing for centuries, and there is no great novelty in the discovery. Moreover, the reverend gentleman gets credit for liberality of opinion, whilst the Freethought pioneers got imprisonment and ostracism.

Mr. Harold Begbie is to write the Life of the late General Booth. This is a most excellent choice. The title of the book should be the Romance of the Salvation Army. The facts are in Mr. Manson's book already. William Booth never troubled about them; neither, we feel sure, will Harold Begbie.

A correspondent of the Westminster Gazette has made the wonderful discovery that "the Turks provoked the Crusades." This is astonishing news and surprising chronology. We never heard before, from any historian of the Crusades, that there was any provocation in the matter, except on the side of the Christians, who suddenly found that they could not tolerate the Holy Land and the sepulchre of their Savior being in the hands of the "infidels." For that, and that alone, they made war on the "infidels"—that is to say, the Saracens. And both the Holy Land and the sepulchre of Christ are in the hands of the "infidels" still.

Whether the sepulchre of Christ is authentic or not, it is at Jerusalem, and a big church is built around it. That church is divided into two. One half is used by the Greek Christians—the other half by the Latin Christians; and they love each other so that a guard of Turkish soldiers stands between them to keep them from flying at each others' throats.

The British and Foreign Bible Society report that the sale of Bibles in the Balkans has been greater during the past year than in any similar period. We presume the beneficial influence of the Holy Book has been shown in the two Balkan wars and the behavior of the Christian combatants.

Mr. R. J. Campbell asks whether the Gospel of Christ has "really effected any marked and permanent change in the feeling about death?" So far as the present is concerned, we answer, Decidedly no. People to-day face death much as people have always faced it. Some are afraid of death, some never trouble about it, some face it with calm resignation. And their profession of religious belief makes, apparently, no difference whatever, since one meets about the same proportion of each class in the religious as in the non-religious world. Education and temperament count for far more in the matter than does religious belief. It is, of course, a carefully fostered Christian teaching that Christianity enables people to bear the blow of death with calmness, and even with cheerfulness. But this is quite false, and almost everyone's experience proves it to be so. We defy anyone to detect, in the mere attitude of the average man or woman towards death, whether he or she is Christian or not. Of course, if one happens to be a Christian, a set phraseology will be used. But in the grief shown, and the state of mind manifested, the religious person is apt to show less genuine resignation, and certainly less strength of mind, than the average Freethinker.

Historically, the "Gospel of Christ" did make a difference in the feeling of mankind about death. It was noted by a clerical Professor—Professor Mahaffy—that an examination of the inscriptions on Pagan tombs showed an entire absence of morbidity. There was no morbid talk about death being a "release," or about the littleness of life, and no trace of fear. They were all in the spirit of bidding a last good-bye to a loved friend or relative. The change came with Christianity. That taught people to dread what might possibly await them after death, and also sought to reconcile them to the fact of death by dwelling upon the littleness and sinfulness of life. There is no question whatever that for many centuries Christianity made death more terrible, and so made people greater cowards in its presence, than had ever been the case before. So far as the Christian teaching affected men's minds about death, it affected them altogether for the worse. And so long as the Christian doctrine of heaven and hell maintained its force no improvement was possible. Improvement only came as this teaching lost its power. Then a saner and more rational attitude of mind towards death became possible. And in this instance, as in many others, the philosophy of the better Paganism showed itself far more commendable than that of the Christianity which succeeded it.

The twenty-five delegates from the Medical Congress who visited the Llandrindod Wells district got no welcome from the Urban District Council. The function was to have taken place on a Sunday, and the Nonconformist members kicked for all they were worth against such an abominable desecration of the Lord's Day. Science has no chance against religion in Wales.

A strike has taken place among workmen employed at Liverpool Cathedral. Efforts are being made to settle the quarrel. The newspapers do not state whether the clergy prayed for the workmen, or sprayed them with holy water.

We have received the following cutting from the Daily Express of August 12. It is a little behind date now, but it is too good to lose:—

> "The Bishop of Manchester, preaching on Blackpool sands on Saturday, told the story of an answered prayer—a true story, he said, that had been passed on to him by one of his own clergymen.
> "There was no bread in a cottager's house, and the father was out seeking work. The mother had not laid the table because there was no food to put on it.
> "At the suggestion of the little girl of the family, the mother laid the table, and then the two knelt down and prayed: 'Give us this day our daily bread.' Some time later, when the father returned, he threw a shilling on the table and explained that he had met an old employer, to whom he mentioned his distress. The old employer gave him the shilling and employment.
> "The mother, father, and child compared notes, and found that the father had met the employer at the exact time at which the prayer was being offered in the home."

Surely the Bishop of Manchester was playing to the gallery in that ridiculous anecdote. He must have been bamboozling his audience. It is difficult to believe that he is himself the dupe of such an absurdity. Perhaps, if the story were investigated, it would turn out to be pure fiction; or what little truth there was in it might prove to be a mere coincidence. Why should God go out of his way to help those three people, and leave millions of others without the slightest assistance? And why did his benevolence rest content with a shilling, when he might as easily have made it half-a-crown? A partial God and a thrifty God was the God of Dr. Knox's story.

Rev. James Beeby, of Wimbledon, says that "Christianity will never be popular." If hundreds of thousands of priests, and millions of money, and the alleged aid of "Omnipotence cannot make it popular in two thousand years, it had better be given up as a bad job.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £166 17s. 5d. Received since:—J. M. Gimson, £3 3s.; J. Hopkins, 2s. 6d.; A. H. Deacon, 2s. 6d.; Mr. McCarthy, 4s. 4d.; G. W. Wright, 5s.; E. Parker, 5s.; Two Barnsley Freethinkers, 10s.

E. RAGGETT.—Bible stories are fairly worked out in our Bible Romances. One cannot go back upon such work; it is done once and for all. We have not heard from Mr. Bryce lately.

H. ARNOTT.—The Old Testament is written in Hebrew. The oldest manuscripts date about A.D. 900. They are many centuries later than the New Testament documents. Nor is the Old Testament in any sense "the oldest Scripture in the world."

E. B.—Many thanks for cuttings.

C. CLINTON.—The subject you write about is vastly important, but it is outside our special scope in the Freethinker.

G. W. WRIGHT.—Pleased to hear you consider this journal an "intellectual treat," which has "altered your outlook on life considerably." The extracts you so highly appreciated were from a selection by E. B., which had to be broken in the make-up of the paper. We think you may expect more of them.

PRESS CORRECTOR.—We meant no offence to your profession. Judging by books in general, they do their work extremely well. We understand also that the pride of bad authors, and the love of profit on the part of their publishers, must sometimes stand in your way.

BERTRAM H. WATTS.—We hope we have your name correctly, but your signature which looks so wonderfully clear, rather puzzles us. We had already noted Professor Bury's definitions of Atheism and Agnosticism. They will be corrected in our review. You are quite right in your criticism.

E. PARKER.—Your wishes don't add to the amount of the subscription, but they add to our appreciation of it.

TWO BARNSLEY FREETHINKERS.—Your letter is inspiriting. We shall be glad to receive such letters until the Freethought millionaire comes along—and after.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for useful cuttings.

BLACKBURN SECULARIST.—It was not sent to us; your copy is the only one we have seen. We are not giving any more cheap advertisements. Thanks, all the same.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote has engaged to lecture at the Secular Hall, Leicester, on Sunday evening, September 21. This will be a good occasion for trying his strength for platform work after his late severe illness. Leicester is the only place except London where only one lecture is required on Sunday. Two lectures might be something too much for a start. Mr. Foote feels himself fit; but you never know till you try, as the proverb says. The result of the Leicester visit will decide whether he will take two lectures at Birmingham, Manchester, Glasgow, and other places that are pressing for a visit.

It is Mr. Foote's intention to minimise his lecturing work for a time. He will not lecture every Sunday—at least not up to Christmas. He means generally to husband his strength, and the wear and tear of travelling is obviously the first thing to be dropped. There is plenty of literary work awaiting him, and the issue of fresh books and pamphlets through the Pioneer Press.

As soon as he has seen this number of the Freethinker through the press Mr. Foote will be going off on his long-deferred visit to Yarmouth. Anybody who can arrange fine weather for a week is earnestly invited to do so. But we are not hopeful. Last summer was an allegation, and this summer is not a realisation.

We have lately enjoyed a few days in the company of Mr. M. M. Mangasarian, of Chicago, whose name is well-known to our own readers. To give us longer time together Mr. Mangasarian came down to the seaside place where we avoid the London atmosphere and get plenty of pure air—without which we should not keep fit for our work very long. We spent some thirty-five years in London, and that is enough for one man's share. We were glad, therefore, that Mr. Mangasarian made our companionship easy during the few days referred to. We were also glad to find him looking well and fit for the hard work he will have to resume when he is back in Chicago. We met Mr. Mangasarian first at the memorable Rome Congress; we liked him then, and he reciprocated the feeling, which has since grown into a warm mutual friendship. We earnestly wish him a long life of happiness and usefulness. In his case the former will depend upon the latter. He is a born propagandist of the Humanist philosophy, and nature endowed him with all the requisite qualities for the task.

Mr. Bottomley's "Unconventional Thoughts" in last week's John Bull would have been none the worse for the acknowledgment that all his facts in the "Religion and Drink" portion were derived from Mr. Foote's Bible and Beer. We are not exactly complaining, for we know what modern journalism is, but Mr. Bottomley stands out of the rank of the profession. Moreover, we like to see our work getting all possible publicity, even though it brings us neither profit nor praise.

Mr. J. M. Gimson, of Leicester, writes: "This Honorarium Fund of yours is too nearly stagnant. I send a second small donation to enliven it a bit."

The July number of the Examiner, of Christchurch, New Zealand, edited by Mr. W. W. Collins, contains the following editorial paragraph:—

> "Mr. G. W. Foote, President of the National Secular Society and Editor of the Freethinker, has, we regret to say, again been the victim to a severe illness. We are exceedingly glad to learn that he had so far recovered as to be able to preside over the National Secular Society's Conference, which was held in London on Sunday, May 11. We send our sincerest wishes for his speedy restoration to full health and strength. And we do this not only on personal grounds, but because never more than now was such strength as his of greater value to the great cause to which he has devoted the energies of his life."

We beg to assure Mr. Collins that his good wishes are sincerely appreciated.

Mr. Gimson is a student of English literature—as an amateur, not professionally—especially in regard to belles lettres, and more particularly the novelists. He writes us as follows on a matter that was sure to attract his interest:—

> "Apropos of Charlotte Bronte's letters—the paragraph from the Dewsbury paper given in 'Sugar Plums' does not help matters. Your note settles the Coleridge reference, but the substitution of Southey for Shelley does not help in either, for Southey died in 1843, before Charlotte Bronte had published anything, and his mind had given way some time before that. The statement she makes is most inexplicable."

We agree with Mr. Gimson. There is one theory, of course, not yet suggested—namely, forgery. We see nothing in the letters to render this inconceivable.

The Leeds case comes on the day after the Freethinker goes to press—on Wednesday, August 27. We have no information to give, therefore, but we hope to have good news for next week. Meanwhile we beg to remind our readers that the N. S. S. has defended, or offered to defend, in every "blasphemy" or "profanity" prosecution where the defendant has made any attempt to stand his ground.

The Gospel History a Fabrication.

The Ministry in Galilee Fraud.

We have examined the accounts in the Synoptics of the alleged ministry of Jesus in Galilee, and find them to be merely compilations made from hearsay stories, originated by nobody knows whom. A further examination of the subject from another point of view leads to the same inevitable conclusion—that there was no public ministry of "Jesus the Nazarene" in Galilee at all. This fact becomes obvious when we come to consider the rough-and-ready method of maintaining order in Palestine in the first century.

Both before and after the reputed time of Jesus, it was the uniform practice of all rulers, whether king, tetrarch, or procurator, to suppress all abnormal gatherings of the people by sending against them a body of troops, with orders to slay the leaders and chief followers, and disperse the rest. This was done as a precautionary measure against insurrections and the wanton destruction of life and property by the mob. The grossly ignorant and credulous people of those times were easily led into excesses by cunning agitators or self-styled prophets: hence, these were hunted down and slain whenever they showed themselves. The mere fact of the appearance in public of an individual who preached a new religion or counselled "innovations" was sufficient to bring down upon him and his followers the guardians of the public peace. In considering this subject, our modern ideas of liberty and the right of public meeting must be set aside. The people of the first century, more especially the Jews, could not be trusted to assemble in large numbers without committing all kinds of excesses, and acting like madmen. After the death of Herod the Great, when his sons were in Rome waiting to be appointed tetrarchs of Galilee, Samaria, and Judæa, all the hooligan population of those provinces plunged the whole country into anarchy and bloodshed, which was not suppressed until Varus, president of Syria, came with a legion of Roman soldiers, and crucified two thousand of them. Again, when, during the siege of Jerusalem, the hooligan element gained the upper hand, the city was turned into a pandemonium, and all the quiet and peaceable inhabitants were subjected to the most horrible outrages: and this went on daily until the city was taken.

The following examples of "innovators" are mentioned by Josephus.

1. A religious pretender who led a number of people to Mount Gerizim in Samaria. Pilate, being then procurator over that province, "sent horsemen and foot-men" against him, who slew the leader and put his followers to flight (Antiq. 18, 4, 1).

2. John the Baptist, who was put to death by Herod the tetrarch "lest the great influence John had over the people might put it into his power and inclination to raise a rebellion" (Antiq. 18, 5, 2).

3. "A certain magician named Theudas," who called himself a prophet, and led a multitude of people to the Jordan. The procurator Fadus, as soon as he heard of the gathering, "sent a troop of horsemen out against them," who slew many and dispersed the remainder. "They also took Theudas alive, and cut off his head, and carried it to Jerusalem" (Antiq. 20, 5, 1).

4. The two sons of Judas of Galilee, James and Simon, were arrested by the procurator Tiberius Alexander, who caused them to be crucified. Their offence is not stated: probably they were seen in public with crowds around them, and their father having raised an agitation forty years before, the governor thought it safer to crucify them offhand.

5. An Egyptian, who proclaimed himself a prophet, and drew after him "a multitude of the common people" towards the mount of Olives. As soon as Felix, the procurator, was informed of the event, he sent from Jerusalem "a great number of horsemen and foot-men," who slew four hundred of the followers, but the Egyptian managed to escape (Antiq. 20, 8, 6).

6. The procurator Festus sent "horsemen and foot-men" against a "certain impostor" who had induced a number of people to follow him into the wilderness: the pretender and his dupes were slain (Antiq. 20, 8, 10).

In recording the putting down of these "innovations" Josephus implies that the authorities performed a duty they owed to the public. Moreover, it is quite probable that none of these pretenders had the smallest idea of raising an insurrection against the State; but the populace, when excited, might get out of hand and do much mischief: hence the prompt action taken to suppress the innovations.

Coming now to the case of "Jesus the Nazarene," that teacher (according to the Gospels) appeared in Galilee as a prophet and miracle-worker, and was followed wherever he went by great multitudes of people (Matt. iv. 25; etc., etc.); so much so indeed that he had to go up a mountain or into a boat to escape them. He is also said to have spent two whole years of his ministry (A.D. 28—30) in Galilee, wandering from city to city, and from village to village—always followed by a vast multitude. The question arises, then, Where was Herod the tetrarch? For it is quite certain that, had that ruler heard that a self-constituted prophet was going about Galilee preaching a new religion, both Jesus and his disciples would have been summarily dealt with before the new ministry was a week old. News of a prophet declaiming to the populace in every city or village which he entered would not be long in reaching the ears of Herod, and would be immediately followed by an order to his chief captain to send a strong force against the innovator, and to see that neither he nor his disciples were allowed to escape. This is what every ruler in Palestine did in those times, and what Herod himself had done in the case of John the Baptist. Why, then, did Herod the tetrarch permit this innovation to go on? The answer is, that he had no occasion to do anything; for Jesus never came into Galilee as a preacher. Had he done so, the tetrarch would have heard of it at once: for he resided at Tiberias, a city near the sea of Galilee which he had himself built some years before. The Nazarene could not have gone about the province followed by his multitudes, as represented in the Gospels, without having his ministry curtailed by the sword.

The Jerusalem Ministry Fraud.

According to the accounts in the first three Gospels, Jesus and his disciples came into Judæa a few days before the passover, and upon leaving Jericho "a great multitude followed him" (Matt. xx. 29). When the procession neared Jerusalem Jesus rode upon an ass, "and the multitude..... cried saying, Hosanna to the son of David: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Having in this manner entered Jerusalem, it is not surprising that "all the city was stirred," more especially as the multitude shouted "This is Jesus the prophet" (Matt. xxi. 8—11). Next, "Jesus went into the temple, and cast out all them that sold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold doves." And no one in the city appears to have had the power to check such high-handed proceedings. The "chief priests and scribes," it is true, "were moved with indignation;" but they were helpless and did nothing. In the evening Jesus retired to Bethany (xxi. 12—17). Next morning he returned to Jerusalem and went into the temple: there the chief priests and elders asked him, "By what authority doest thou these things?" This question he evaded by a quibble, and then told them some parables in which "they perceived that he spake of them" (xxi. 18—46). On that day, or the one following, Jesus publicly denounced the hypocrisy and evil doings of the scribes and Pharisees, the calumny taking up the whole of chapter xxiii. From this oration I make the following short extract:—

> "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! .....Fill ye up the measure of your fathers. Ye serpents, ye off-spring of vipers, how shall ye escape the judgment of hell?"

We have no evidence that the scribes and Pharisees of the time of Jesus were "hypocrites," or that they did any of the things of which they are accused; nor do we know that one of them was such a systematic perverter of the truth as the writer of the first primitive Gospel, or the later forger of the Fourth Gospel, to say nothing of the fabricators of the admittedly lying apocryphal Gospels.

But it is unnecessary to follow the career of Jesus farther: the Gospel accounts of his doings in Jerusalem, and of his arrest, trial, and crucifixion, are all pure fiction. Had Jesus really appeared in Judæa in the days of the procurator Pilate, and had he entered Jerusalem at the head of a shouting multitude, both his ministry and his person would have been cut short by the Roman soldiers who were always on guard there. There would have been no arrest or trial: he and his disciples, and the most prominent of his shouting adherents, would have been put to the sword before they could have penetrated far within the city. The fabricator of the Jerusalem story appears not to have known that from A.D. 6, when Judæa was made a Roman province, until the beginning of the Jewish war (A.D. 66) a garrison of Roman soldiers was stationed at Jerusalem, their quarters being the spacious tower of Antonia, which was close to the temple. This fact is several times referred to by Josephus (Wars 2, 12, 1; 5, 5, 8; Antiq. 20, 5, 3; etc.). Thus, he says of some narrow passages near the temple—"through which the guard (for there always lay in this tower a Roman legion) went several ways, with their arms, on the Jewish festivals, in order to watch the people, that they might not there attempt to make any innovations." This Roman garrison is referred to in "the Acts" (xxi.—xxiii.) as rescuing Paul from the hands of the infuriated populace: the Gospel writers, apparently, knew nothing of it.

At the time when Jesus is represented as riding into Jerusalem, that city would be filling with Jews from all parts, who came to find lodgings for the passover week; and Pilate, or his chief captain, would be making preparations for dealing with anyone making "innovations." Jesus would thus be entering a trap from which there was no escape. To cut down the self-styled prophet and his disciples would be the first step in quelling the disturbance, no quarter being given to those caught red-handed: for Jesus was the leader of a hostile demonstration against the priests and elders and others in authority. This was a greater innovation than any of those recorded by Josephus; for none of those pretenders had the audacity to march into Jerusalem, to set the city authorities at naught, and to utter denunciations against them. No Roman governor who was responsible for the order of the province committed to his care would have permitted such an innovation, and if he chanced to be absent, the officer commanding the Roman legion within the city would know how to act. In either case there would be no trial, though there might be many executions. Josephus has not recorded Pilate's suppression of this astonishing innovation, though he has mentioned minor ones that occurred before and after. We may safely say, then, that the Gospel accounts of the "triumphal entry" into Jerusalem, and all that is said to have followed it, are unhistorical; otherwise we should have some account of the affair, and of the punishment dealt out to the innovators.

It has been said that the Jews had no power to put Jesus to death, and so brought him to Pilate to go through the farce of a trial: but, as a matter of history, we find that they often took the law into their own hands, more especially in a question relating to their religion. In the case of Stephen (Acts vii.) we are told that "they cast him out of the city, and stoned him." There was no handing him over to the procurator, and, though the incident is not historical, this is exactly what they would have done to Jesus had he really uttered the denunciations recorded in Matt. xxiii. The latter chapter, too, is a further proof of fabrication? Who heard the words uttered? Who wrote them down? From whom did the primitive writer get his report? The answer is in each case the same—"No one." The chapter was fabricated for the occasion.

ABRACADABRA.

A Plant and a Parasite.

THE spirit of rebellion rang fiercely through his words. They were hot with the contagious enthusiasm that sets even dull minds ablaze. Bitter contempt, like a poisonous antidote to a poisoned subject, coated the sharp points of his arrows, and indignant wrath strengthened them. His language was often coarse, but never weak. He was a fighter who knew that the glamor of life lay with the "respectable" people, not with the men to whom he spoke; and so his words were like their lives, hard, bitter, rough, and strong.

Every man in the crowd knew the speaker loved his fellow men, knew it for a certainty about which no doubt could cling. No amount of splendid oratory could have achieved that more successfully than the hard language he used. He drew the crowd with him up the heights; shaped for them their formless longings; let the light of his genius shine upon their needs, their desires, their faltering, death-clogged aspirations. He brought near and clear thoughts that had long hung dim on the obscure horizon of their purblind minds. He inoculated them with some of his own strength; and their eyes flashed, and their lips moved restlessly. And from their unusual feeling of power came the applause that rewarded him. Then the crowd melted into the darkness, becoming part of it.

I remained behind, wishing to speak to him for a few minutes. During his speech I often found myself wondering about the relationship between his ideas and the minds of his street-corner audience. I knew these men's lives and minds, as I thought, too intimately. The uncouth relaxations from uncouth labor, the ugly tongue they spoke, their low attitude to everything that seemed to possess any refinement, the continual use of base sex references, the merriment these caused, the sordidness of their minds, all relieved only occasionally by a flash of human purity, had encircled me like a heavy mist from my earliest association with men and their ways. Such knowledge, in itself, should be sufficient to make one a rebel at war with every superstition that ever darkened the minds and lives of men.

His ideas were diametrically opposed to their method of life, and yet he so dexterously worked upon the little best in their natures that, for the moment, they became cleaner, straighter men. He cursed thoughtlessness, and they knew he denounced them. Sharply he pricked their many foolishnesses, and they felt like beaten dogs. His fiery invectives frequently brought a self-accusing growl of approval. He whipped them till they squirmed, and poured upon them a tornado of denunciation against their "slave-worship," and they recognised they were slaves worshiping the men and things that made and kept them slaves.

It was here the thought-thread, linking his ideas to their minds and lives, snapped in my mind.

His slashing attack on industrialism as one of the causes of this slave-worship was all very well in its way; but to me it seemed, despite his powerful words, he had taken the lesser cause. Certainly he had emphasised the abrasion from our minds of antiquated theories; and had put a bomb under the man who allowed appreciation to descend to reverence; and, also, he had not spared the man who preached commandments to other people, and could not, or did not, obey them himself. But that seemed insufficient. It lacked the decisive note. It fringed the question. It was all very well to preach freedom; but freedom realises itself first in the mind; and a mind touched even with the slightest admiration of religion cannot possibly be free.

Challenging him on the point, I asked why he had obviously and deliberately refrained from introducing religion, and he replied: "What you say is true; religion is more of a mental influence; but its 'penetrative influence,' as you call it, is not worth bothering about. I, of course, agree that, as we have to go vid the mind, bad influences must be fought; and that religion is, therefore, one of the first obstacles we should encounter. At the same time, the religious influence is a triviality compared to the industrial influence. I have thrown both the cursed things into the balance. The latter is the more damnable. The worker understands it better. He sweats blood under it. He feels it tearing the life out of his miserable body. He hasn't a soul: born without it: dies without it. I am fighting the bigger devil. The worker can test the truth of what I say, simply by looking at his comrades. It's different with religion. The average worker doesn't give a damn for it: treats it as non-existent: it is, for him. That's why I leave it alone. The 'penetrative influence' of religion, as you call it, is played out. It is too slight, in comparison to the other thing. That has killed the religious obstacle, so far as the worker is concerned."

"And still," I remonstrated, "you have labor leaders, with a considerable working-class following, who can pray in public. And we cannot possibly forget the very many speakers you have who say God with an intonation of sanctimonious solemnity, knowing the majority of their working-class audience, if they do not turn their eyes heavenward, will, at least, have a spasm of reverence. The existence of these very far advanced people in your movement seems to prove that religion still exercises some away. It proves the religious attitude is still alive, and it seems to suggest that what I have called the 'penetrative influence' of religion is at work, even yet, notwithstanding your assertions to the contrary. The workers still show more respect for the cloth than for their masters."

"We differ," he retorted, "the average worker, more's the pity, shows more respect for his master than for his minister, if he has such a luxury."

"Questionable," I broke in, "and that's why I wish you wouldn't forget that minister-worship preceded master-worship, and has a bigger and longer history behind it. The average worker often shows his respect for his master by striking."

"And he has struck church attendance as well, not spasmodically, but permanently."

"Maybe; but he has still to strike from the instruction he received at church, an instruction that opens channels for the 'penetrative influence' of religion. This mental environment, because of its age, has a greater power than the industrial environment against which you turn your broadsides. It is, besides, a much more subtle thing; for it fixes itself to the mind when the mind is young, destroying, if only in part, the power of logical thinking that might develop in the young brain, and be strong enough, in after days, to tackle and subdue the social problems you spoke about. Religion prepares the young mind for the coming dulling influence of unjoyful labor by partially chloroforming it. And this malevolent characteristic is not confined in its operations to the children of the middle class alone. Even if it were, it would be sufficient to justify your continual antagonism."

"You're like the rest of Freethinkers," he said. "You imagine that the death of religion is the first article of progress to strive for. I tell you religion is a nonentity where the worker is concerned. To him it is a dream; he laughs at it in the morning. We counteract the influence of the dream, wherever it has any, by filling the worker's mind with realities."

"The influence of some dreams is not so easily dissipated. Let the dream but have historical and social life behind it, and the dream becomes a reality in its effects. The time is coming, and may not be so far distant, when you revolutionaries will discover we Freethinkers were not so far wrong in our estimation of your attitude. Creeds, too, struggle to survive. Religion sucks nourishment from young ideas that show the potentiality of growth. It is fastening itself now to the safe portions of your plant. It will gain some renewed strength from your plant's life; and its resuscitation of vitality will retard the maturity of that for which you now strive. The Freethinker says, 'Cut it off, ere it is too late.' The roots of religion are diseased. Disease springs from it; and you and your movement should be kept clean at all cost. Good night."

ROBERT MORELAND.

Two Warriors.

BEFORE the tomb where rest the ashes of the great, one is moved by feelings which escape analysis. Whether they are instinctive or intuitive, one cannot say; but they have their primary being in the heart. It was with these mixed feelings of reverence and hero-worship that I found myself on Wimbledon Common, the wild and free garden of Swinburne.

It is now lovely beyond description. As I write, the songs and echoes of birds resound through those leafy glades where once the Master trod. There is a Naples blue sky, making a magnificent canopy over the rustling leaves of the queenly birch-trees. The gorse has scattered its golden bloom, and now the seed-pods are browning in the sun. Soon they will burst, and fling their seed far and wide in the profligate way beloved of Nature. A red and gold butterfly flits by, and hovers round the eyebright which trails its tiny star-shaped flowers round the feet of the tall rushes. The bramble bloom tells of the approaching end of the summer, and the young birds will soon be able to relieve their parents of responsibility. All these signs observed by Freethinkers who are nature-lovers speak of endless change, but they give intense delight to those who do not vainly imagine man to belong to some supercarthly species.

I am now where the Master hath been. He has looked on these peaceful scenes of beauty, his foot has pressed the heather, and his eye has caught the glories of these colors and wrought them in imperishable verse. To a lover of Swinburne, his very presence is almost felt amidst these surroundings, and I cannot associate anyone's name but his with this lovely wind-swept common.

Swinburne was a prophet. His visions and ideals were of such strength and splendor that even admirers of Shelley found them too spacious to comprehend. Shelley was the light, but Swinburne was the fire, which burnt up the dead wood and festering jungle of each and every superstition. To sense this fiery spirit of revolt and destruction, the reading of "A Year's Burden" confirms the verdict that he invested his song with the robes of flame.

> "Are ye so strong, O kings, O strong men? Nay,
> Waste all ye will and gather all ye may,
> Yet one thing is here that ye shall not slay,
> Even thought, that fire nor iron can affright."

I often speculate as to whether he had Giordano Bruno on his mind when he wrote those virile lines.

There is a great stir in the air lately about Nietzsche; it is a pity that the efforts to give him a wider circle of readers cannot also be used to circulate in a cheap form his English poetic prototype. What humbugs the English are to be sure! They can subscribe thousands of pounds to save a miserable and dreary place called the Crystal Palace, they can even "Peter Pan" Kensington Gardens, but to an Englishman who was a monarch of ideas in the regions of thought, they cannot even raise a stone. London is statue-ridden. Good, bad, and indifferent, the figures of disreputable kings, of fire-eating and Bible-loving soldiers, stare upon us from all quarters. Pensions are showered upon those warriors who swept down with gunpowder poor devils armed with bow and arrows, and yet Swinburne finds no champion to support a scheme to commemorate his name. A bronze statue of Liberty awarding the wreath of victory to this slayer of superstition would be a fitting monument to adorn the stretch of country beloved of the poet. But then the English are so peculiar; they would rather, to their shame, wear cheap rag roses. Thus, in a Christian country, they would help to keep the hospitals in their ignoble position of depending on voluntary subscriptions. Jonathan Swift left the greater part of his fortune for the erection of asylums in England, as he said the people needed them; my respect for this sardonic Irishman increases every day.

Where is the man who might kiss the hem of immortality's robe by erecting a statue to one of nature's aristocrats? Where are those poets of Bohemian fraternity who profess to love their art? In honoring Swinburne they would be honoring one of the greatest of singers since Shakespeare; and this would be the highest tribute they could pay to their art and to Swinburne. It is too much to expect. We have a commercialised pulpit, a corrupt and bought press, and now we are treated to the degrading spectacle of poets bellowing their claims to the Laureateship. Shades of the muse in exile! Very soon the sign of Lombardy will be graven over the temple door of the Sacred Nine.

From Wimbledon Common to Parnassus is a far cry, and I had originally intended to write of the relationship of Nietzsche to Swinburne, but the open sky, and with only the Book of Nature to refer to, makes a straight line of thought impossible. At some future date, with the editor's permission and the readers' indulgence, I shall endeavor to show the kinship of spirit between Nietzsche and Swinburne.

Swinburne killed death in his "Hymn to Proserpine," and the Superman-idea of Nietzsche, with the great "Yea" to life, conclusively proves to Freethinkers that they were twin spirits fighting in the greatest cause of all. The "Yea" to life, and the "Nay" to the hideous Christian trappings of death, were two of the most powerful broadsides fired into the discredited hulk of Christianity.

WILLIAM REPTON.

God and Life.

[A few more excerpts forwarded in compliance with Mr. Foote's request at bottom of page 408 of the Freethinker.]

ALL the world over, I wonder, in lands that I never have trod,
Are the people eternally seeking for the signs and the steps of a God?
Westward across the ocean, and Northward across the snow,
Do they all stand gazing, as ever, and what do the wisest know?

—SIR ALFRED LYALL, Meditation of a Hindu Prince.

Life is pleasant, and friends may be nigh,
Fain would I speak one word and be spared;
Yet I could be silent and cheerfully die,
If I were only sure God cared;
If I had faith, and were only certain,
That light is behind that terrible curtain.

But what if He listeth nothing at all
Of words a poor wretch in his terror may say?
That mighty God who created all
To labor and live their appointed day,
Who stoops not either to bless or ban,
Weaving the woof of an endless plan.

—SIR ALFRED LYALL, Theology in Extremis.

So many Gods, so many creeds,
So many paths that wind and wind,
While just the art of being kind
Is all the sad world needs.

—ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

An Ode to the Devil.

ONE Sunday, as I pensive sat,
Revolving over this and that,
Beneath my pane, a brazen blare
Told me Salvationists were there.
I shut my window, but in vain;
The music of this Sabbath's bane
My spirit through the glass pursued.
I muttered something strong and rude.
Then, when the tamborinists' din
Had ceased awhile, there floated in
From one wild man, with hair unlevel,
A noisy discourse on the Devil.
"A bloke," he said, "on mischief bent."
These words an inspiration sent.
My heart went out to Satan then,
Who tempted me these lines to pen:

. . . . . .

Hail, friend of humankind, good Satan, hail!
Thy sterling virtues shall not be unsung
The while thy vices, magnified, are hung
Upon the very housetops. Satan, hail!

Father of lies? Nay, rather friend of truth,
Who, like Prometheus, to knowledge led
(If it be true what some say Moses said)
The early fathers of our tribe uncouth.

'Tis not my task to paint thee dazzling white.
Thy greatest enemies, or those who claim
To hold in greatest scorn thy hated name,
Shall here inspire the praises I indite.

The sweetest joys that this fair earth can give
Have fallen, one by one, beneath the ban
Of God's black-coated killjoys, until man,
Afraid to die, has hardly dared to live.

Who tempted us to taste the luscious fruit
The tree of knowledge bears? What gift divine
Could ever equal this great gift of thine?
Who could the worth of knowledge o'er compute?

Those who denied their earth-born God a sire
First taught that love of man and wife were vain.
The purest source of joy man e'er could gain
By unwed priests was trampled in the mire.

When two young hearts were warmed by love's sweet flame
'Twas said the Devil fanned the soft desire,
And all who would to holiness aspire
Must flee from love, and shun conjugal shame.

'Twas thou who tempted men to wash their skin
When holy saints the bath disdained to use;
All who a life of Godliness would choose
Must reckon cleanliness a pagan sin.

Did one man bravely dare to stand alone,
That man was called thy child. Dared one to think,
He stood already on perdition's brink,
All thine were those who called their souls their own.

When puritans grew strong, and in thy name
Forbade the dance, the play, and all delights
With which men loved to gladden days and nights,
Thy temptings, Satan, spoiled their dismal game.

Thanks to thy work, as many parsons wail,
Our weekly day of freedom oft is spent
In country rambles, and thy aid is lent
To those who use the Sunday tram and rail.

Do some desire with Wagner to commune,
Or taste the joys of Mozart's gentle strain
Upon their day of rest, the fact is plain
That Satan's artful plan commands the tune.

All pleasant things have thus been traced to thee.
Love, knowledge, recreation, all are thine.
Without thy temptings, lower than the swine
In point of intellect our race would be.

Let those who will desire with God to be,
Who fashioned hell,—on adulation fed,
I'd rather share thy damned, eternal bed.
Good Satan, kindly save a place for me.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 36 SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Generosity is first, although it is not in the Decalogue.
—"MARK RUTHERFORD."

The Victory at Leeds.

THE battle at Leeds is over, and we have to report another victory for Freethought.

Our readers know what the battle was about. But we may as well summarise the situation.

Woodhouse Moor is a place of public resort under the jurisdiction of the Leeds City Council. Meetings of various kinds are held there, and the Council issues "permits" to take up collections and sell literature at such gatherings. This is no doubt a wise regulation in some respects, but there can be no excuse for applying it with partiality to bonâ-fide societies. But this is precisely what the City Council, under the guidance of the Parks Committee, was trying to do. It refused a "permit" to the local Branch of the National Secular Society. No other body had been refused. The Secularists were denied the privilege which all other bodies enjoyed. It was, in short, an attempt to penalise them on account of their opinions. And this is persecution. Call it by what apologetic names you please, it is simply persecution.

It was rather more than insinuated that the Leeds N. S. S. Branch had been refused the "permit" because of its "objectionable literature." If this meant anti-Christian literature it was beside the point, for under the present law—as laid down by Lord Chief Justice Coleridge in 1883, and endorsed by Mr. Justice Phillimore and Mr. Justice Darling more recently—anti-Christian literature has the same right of circulation as Christian literature possesses. To be valid, therefore, the charge of selling "objectionable" literature would have to carry the sense of being obscene. It was easy to disprove that charge, and the phantom of "objectionable literature" vanished as soon as it was confronted.

The Leeds Branch could not be expected to accept tamely such a discrimination against its rights as a body of English citizens. It took steps to defend them. The only way open to them was to challenge the censorship of public meetings by bringing it to the notice of the general public; and this could only be done by defying it, in order that the matter might be argued and decided in a court of justice.

Mr. Ernest Pack, on behalf of the Leeds Branch, sought my advice as the President of the National Secular Society. I tendered it in a long and careful letter, dated July 17, and published in the Freethinker of August 3.

A public meeting was held at Woodhouse Moor on Sunday, July 20, and a collection and sale of literature took place without a "permit." It was a big and enthusiastic meeting, and a resolution against the partisan action of the City Council in relation to the "permits" was carried unanimously. Acting on my advice, only one person (Mr. E. Pack) took up the collection, and only one person (Mr. Jackson) sold the literature. These gentlemen were in due course served with summonses for breach of the bye-laws.

The summonses were heard on Wednesday, August 27, before the junior Stipendiary, Mr. Marshall, and not before the senior Stipendiary, Mr. Atkinson, as I had hoped. Mr. Marshall was fair and considerate enough from his point of view. He held, as I had foretold might be the case, that he had only to be satisfied that the bye-law had been broken, and to act accordingly. This attitude of his excluded an able speech that Mr. Pack had prepared, of which I have seen the brief. He was told plainly and firmly, but not unkindly, that it was no use trying to argue an impossible case. There was an adjournment for Mr. Pack to think it over. No penalty would be inflicted if he would give an undertaking not to repeat the offence. This he would not do. But he had till Friday to reconsider the matter, and to consult the N.S.S. headquarters—which for this purpose were then at Yarmouth.

Letters and telegrams passed to and fro between Leeds and Yarmouth. I was dead against an "undertaking"—except temporarily with a view to further litigation. Mr. Marshall had refused to state a case. He said that there was no point of law involved. Mr. Pack pressed that there was, and in my judgment he was right, but the magistrate had command of the court.

Happily, a new thing happened. Mr. Pack very wisely got into communication with officials representing the Parks Committee and the Town Clerk's Office. He satisfied them that they had a bonâ fide Branch of the N. S. S. at Leeds, and it was agreed that the "permits" should be issued. And there the battle ended—in an access of good feeling on both sides.

Curiously enough this way out of the trouble was the first suggestion in my letter of July 17. "If," I wrote, "there is any reasonable hope that a fresh application for the 'permit' would meet with a better fate, I think you should make it. Citizens should not flout the public authorities unnecessarily, and if there has been a mistake you should give them an opportunity of rectifying it." But the Branch committee decided against that suggestion.

I desire to congratulate Mr. Pack on the energy, and good sense, and readiness to take advice from an older soldier in these wars, which he has displayed in these proceedings. I laughed over his amusing account of how the word "mandamus" spread consternation everywhere.

Mr. Pack tells me that although he could not make any use of my letters in Court, they "had very much to do with the final turn of affairs—perhaps everything." "When you advise," he further says, "there is not much left to ask a lawyer, and I take this opportunity of thanking you for the care and attention you have given the Branch's case, for which we are all grateful."

I should be ashamed to quote such things in the ordinary way, but there are times when it is pardonable.

I take this opportunity of saying that no man, and no society, has ever had a battle to fight for Freethought, without commanding (or rejecting) my assistance. Fortunately the pages of the Freethinker contain the proof of this assertion. I appeal to them against the calumnies of the day and hour. They contain the testimony of more than thirty years.

God's Children.

AMONG the religious begging circulars delivered by hand or sent through the post, I recently received an appeal on behalf of an institution that professes to care for the welfare of homeless children. The circular makes an urgent appeal for funds, and impresses upon the reader the fact of there being many thousands of children abroad without homes, needing food, and utterly uncared for. I have no doubt that the statement is substantially true, although one must allow a little for exaggeration. In such cases exaggeration seems inevitable, especially when religion is on the carpet. It was a religious charitable organisation that touched provincial readers with an appeal on behalf of poor London children who had never seen a flower or a blade of grass. This in London, which probably contains more vegetation than any other capital in Europe, and where, even in the slums, the love of a back garden is notorious. Of course, with or without the greenery, the case is bad enough. No country is really deserving the title of civilised where children are unfed, unhoused, and uncared for; although, as a matter of fact, it is only in civilised countries that such cases occur. Uncivilised people would be almost unable to realise such a condition of things, and, if it existed, we can be sure the fact would be used as a fresh inducement to subscribe to missionary enterprise. And, curiously enough, it is in Christian countries that the neglect of children is most marked. It is seldom or never heard of among Jews. I have never heard it alleged against Mohammedans. Japan is said to be a perfect paradise for children. And among the Esquimeaux Nansen said that he never heard of or saw a case of child-neglect or ill-usage. In England many thousands of such cases are taken up annually by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children; and the need for such a society is surely a clear condemnation of Christianity as a moralising factor in life.

I did not, however, sit down to write with the intention of dwelling upon these aspects of the matter. My attention was drawn by two expressions in the circular. One was that these homeless youngsters were "God's children"; the other was that those who were feeding and sheltering these youngsters were doing a work of God, and this would be helped by every subscription that was given. Everyone who gave a donation would feel that they were fellow-workers with God, and that, it may be presumed, would be ample reward for every religious mind. At any rate, it should be comforting to God that a number of people are able and willing to help him in the work of looking after his children.

Now, I do not deny that these homeless youngsters are God's children; I do not know whether they are or not. If they are not, it is a gross libel on the Deity. No man would like it to be said of him that his children were wandering about the streets without food, or shelter, or clothing. He would not like to have it made public if it were true; he would be naturally indignant if it were false. And even Deity must be expected to possess sensibilities, which ought to be respected. For the circular makes no pretence of proving paternity. It does not say that certain evidence has been given and verified to the end that these children belong to God. It simply collects a number of half-starved and generally neglected children, looks them over, and straightway declares they must be God's. Why? Do they wish the reader to infer that this is an old habit of the Deity? I believe that, in the case of a burglary, detectives are sometimes able to say who is the burglar by the style in which it is done. It doesn't seem good enough. It looks like taking a scandalous and perhaps unwarrantable liberty with one who is not here to defend himself in person. Mark Twain said that in all the attacks on the Devil one heard only one side of the case, and he would much like to hear what Satan had to say in self-defence. Well, we really hear little more from God. And one would like to hear what he has to say of these professed admirers of his, who, whenever there is an earthquake, or an epidemic, or anything unpleasant happens, straightway put it down to God's account. As an Atheist, I desire justice—even for God.

Suppose they are really God's children. If that is the case, why should any decent body desire to be a fellow-worker with him? Why is helping to feed and shelter these children called a work of God? Of course, in a sense, it is so. When John Smith absconds, and the Guardians have to feed and shelter his family, they may be said to be doing the runaway's work. But in that case we do not find a demand for the poor-rate accompanied by an announcement that we should pay cheerfully because we are doing John Smith's work. Not a bit of it. What we see is a small placard outside the police-station announcing that the Guardians desire to lay hands on the said John Smith and punish him for bolting and leaving his children chargeable to the parish. In this case we are actually asked to praise the author of the children's being for leaving them in the lurch, and told that we should feel honored by associating with him. And the children, when they are got into a charitable institution, will be taught to say, "Our Father, which art in heaven," and thank him for giving them their daily bread. And that when their Father has left them uncared for, and their daily bread is provided by promiscuous subscriptions.

Mind, I do not say they are God's children. I do not know. I am only trying to look at the matter impartially and to be fair all round. All the parents I know are mere men and women. When they look after their families, we say they are good parents; when they neglect them, we say they are bad ones. If my neighbor's children are hungry, it must be because either there is no food in the house to give them, or there is food, and the parents deliberately starve them. And I do not see how we can judge God's treatment of his children in any different manner. It is really not fair to punish a man for neglecting his offspring, and to praise God when he throws his children upon the world, dependent on public charity.

Of course, it will be said that God's care for his children is shown by the very circular that lies before me. He helps them by creating instruments to do his will. But the plea will not stand. John Smith might as reasonably contend that he should be praised for creating the necessity that brings a Board of Guardians into existence. There are cases where a woman has actually left a child on the doorstep of a well-to-do person in the hope that the child would get the comforts and attention she was unable to give. And with what result? It was quite useless the woman pleading that she could not feed the child, and that she hoped that in this way her child would be fed. She was charged with child desertion, and punished for it, just the same. A parent, says both the law and common sense, must stick to his or her child, and not desert it under any condition. Is there any more justification for God handing over his responsibilities to a charitable institution than there is for a man handing his over to a Board of Guardians or to some chance individual?

There is the seductive phrase that we are doing God's work, or helping God in his work of running the world aright. But what is God's work? And why should we do it for him, or even help him to do it? From all that one can judge, God's work is done in such a manner that it takes man no small part of his time to undo it, or to correct it. God sends diseases and man discovers the antidotes. At the recent Medical Congress the honors of the assemblage fell to Professor Erlich, with his famous antidote for syphilis. For about four hundred years this disease has been a scourge in Christendom, punishing both the vicious and the virtuous, the innocent and the guilty alike. And when the remedy arrives it comes from man, not from God. The same is true of all other diseases. For, note, the diseases are not created by man, but the remedies are. Man does not have to discover the diseases; they discover him.

They are there in God's scheme of work, ready to hand, ready to operate. The remedies do not thus lie ready to hand. They have to be sought out by laborious, painful, sometimes dangerous methods. It took four hundred years to discover an antidote to syphilis. It took less than forty years for it to infect Europe from end to end, and would have operated more quickly had modes of travelling been easier and quicker.

God's work! The best of the world and of human nature is not God's work, but man's. God did not leave the world habitable to a civilised human being; it was man who made it so. God spreads a river over a countryside, and leaves a morass. Man deepens the channel, raises embankments, drains the land, and so creates utility, order, and the possibilities of development. God leaves man a savage, and human association civilises him. God leaves man ignorant, and human inquisitiveness and industry gives him knowledge. God leaves man the prey of brutal passions; men teach each other how to restrain them, or to transmute them into finer feelings. And all the time God is dogging the footsteps of man, providing a new disease for every change in life, punishing every false step with unfaltering cruelty, afflicting old and young, strong and weak, good and bad, with impartial malignancy. Man's only protection against Deity is knowledge; and of all the trees in the garden the tree of knowledge was the only one of which he was sternly forbidden to eat.

There is some truth in the statement that we are helping God. That is a game man, in his folly, is continually playing. When we see God's blunders we help him correct them, and then praise his wisdom for providing them. When the deplorable and ignoble character of his ancestry is exposed, we help him by creating a fictitious one. When his character and doings in past ages is made plain, we assist by creating a whole army of apologists to whitewash his reputation. Of course, it is the duty of children to help their parents; but that is mainly because, as the children reach maturity, the parent approaches old age and helplessness. Is that what Christians have in mind when they talk about helping God? I should not be surprised. For God does grow helpless as mankind reaches maturity. He is most powerful when they are in their childhood; most arrogant in his claims when they are most helpless. God and man cannot both grow at the same time. As one rises, the other falls; and a little less readiness to help God might result in the absence of anything to assist.

C. COHEN.

Christianity and Other Religions.

THERE are such things as foregone conclusions, or conclusions that precede all argument. To believers in Christ the truth of Christianity is a foregone conclusion, and so is the truth of Mohammedanism to Mohammedans, or of Buddhism to Buddhists, or of Hinduism to Hindus, or of Confucianism to disciples of Confucius. This is a rule to which there is absolutely no exception. The Rev. James Hope Moulton, D.D., is a Tutor in New Testament subjects at Didsbury Wesleyan College; and recently he undertook to deliver the Fernley Lecture, choosing for his subject, "Religions and Religion." It was, of course, a foregone conclusion that with him "Religion" meant Christianity. From the very moment of his appointment no one was in the least doubt on the point. The Lecture has just been published, and a review of it appears in the British Weekly for August 21 by another theological professor, Dr. Denney, of Glasgow. The title of the review is an amplification of that of the book, and reads, "Religions and the True Religion"; and here again it is a foregone conclusion that, in the leading article in the British Weekly, by "the true Religion" can only be understood the religion of Christ. All this, both in the volume and in the review, is a thing that cannot possibly be otherwise. Even the arguments adduced are so many foregone conclusions. You can tell exactly what they are without reading either book or review. They have positively no originality whatever, except that of re-statement by men of Professors Moulton's and Denney's well-known abilities. Let us look at them for a few moments.

This lecture was delivered in connection with the Centenary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society by "an enthusiast for the propagation of the Gospel." We are not in the least surprised, therefore, at the following statement which occurs in Dr. Denney's article:—

> "Professor Moulton is convinced that in his own faith he holds the key to the world's spiritual history, and in the strength of that conviction he welcomes everything in other religions which prepares the way for Christianity, or enables those who have been reared in them to understand the Gospel."

Now, suppose that a Mohammedan scholar had published a book on the same subject, and that another Mohammedan scholar was reviewing it in a Mohammedan newspaper, do you not think that the above extract, without the change of a single letter, could be legitimately applied to the author? We admit that, in all probability, the Mohammedan author would not convince the Christian; but we are fully as persuaded that the Christian author is not any more likely to convert the Mohammedan. A man's religion is a mere accident of birth and country. The devotees of every religion under the sun believe most firmly that theirs is the only true religion, and are astonished beyond measure when they learn that there are people who think differently. Dr. Moulton is spoken of as "an expert in the science of religion," the science of comparative religion; and being a Christian theologian nothing could have been more of a foregone conclusion than that he should sum up his book by saying that "our new science enables us to write a new chapter of the Præparatio Evangelica."

Dr. Denney is honest enough to recognise the fact that other students of "our new science" have arrived at an opposite conclusion. He says:—

> "There are scholars who use their knowledge of all religions to discredit faith in any. There are scholars, in particular, who use their knowledge of ancient religions to discredit Christianity. There is nothing in it, they tell us, which is not derived from earlier religions; the very figure of Jesus in the Gospel is merely the literary incarnation of ideas which originated no one can well tell how, but which certainly had no basis in history."

All such scholars Dr. Denney dubs "anarchists of criticism," and he seems to think that Dr. Moulton takes them too seriously and treats them with excessive "geniality and good humor." But they have an ever-increasing number of followers. W. B. Smith, Jensen, Drews, F. C. Conybeare, and J. M. Robertson are no longer faint voices in the wilderness. The books which they issue are being read and studied by a growing public, to which Professors Moulton and Denney no longer appeal. They do not all agree, but the faces of all are undoubtedly towards Rationalism. Dr. Denney is of opinion that "it is no exaggeration to say that a mind which doubts the historicity of Jesus is to all historical and spiritual intents an unsound mind." It is really of no consequence what the Glasgow Professor thinks of such a mind, because it would be equally relevant for us to conclude that "it is no exaggeration to say that a mind which believes in and worships a supernatural being called Christ is to all historical and intellectual intents an unsound mind." But let that pass. The non-Christian scholars just alluded to, avail themselves of their knowledge of the science of comparative religion to make two claims, each of which is said to discredit Christianity. The first deals with the idea of the dying God, or the God who dies and rises again for the redemption of mankind. This idea was common to several Oriental religions which had invaded the West and were competing with one another for supremacy there at the time of the rise of Christianity. Now, the claim made on the basis of that fact is thus stated by Dr. Denney:—

> "In some undefined way it is loosely supposed that this prevalent conception of a God who dies and rises again, and whose death and resurrection are ritually celebrated and regarded as of vital interest to the worshipers, has influenced both the New Testament story of Jesus, and the Christian interpretation of the great events in his career. Most of what is written in this line is absolutely uncritical, and can only be perpetrated because the writers have forgotten for the moment that Jesus is a historical person, and that there is historical evidence for what the New Testament says of his death and resurrection."

Has it not occurred to the learned divine that, in the latter half of that extract, he begs the whole question? The critics alluded to have not forgotten, even for a moment, that the Gospel Jesus is a historical character. What they contend is that there is no more historical evidence for the Gospel Jesus than for Attis, Adonis, or Osiris, or, in other words, that they are all alike supernatural beings for whose historicity there is not a single scrap of evidence. What Liberal Christians maintain is not that the Gospel Jesus is historical, but that out of the Gospel Jesus, which they admit to be largely legendary, it is possible to deduce or construct a really historical person, which we seriously doubt.

Now, both Denney and Schweitzer are clearly mistaken when they assert that "a God who comes to earth to die for men and rise again—and nothing but this is a redeeming God—is quite unknown to any of the ancient faiths." There are two eminent Professors who flatly contradict that statement. The one is the brilliant Greek Professor at Oxford, and the other the well-known Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in Yale University. Professor Gilbert Murray declares positively that the idea of a dying and resurrected God or God-man was a popular article of faith prior to the advent of Christianity. He says:—

> "The figure of the Redeemer occurs in two pre-Christian documents, discovered by the keen analysis and profound learning of Dr. Reitzenstein: the Poimandres revelation printed in the Corpus Hermeticum, and the sermon of the Nassenes in Hippolytus, Refutatio Omnium Hæresium, which is combined with Attis Worship" (Four Stages of Greek Religion, p. 145).

Professor Benjamin W. Bacon, of Yale, bears the same testimony thus:—

> "In the Pauline Gospel the story of Jesus is a drama of the supernatural regions, wherein his earthly career as prophet, leader, teacher, sinks to the level of the merest episode. As pre-existent spirit, Jesus had been from the beginning 'in the form of God.' As the period of its consummation drew near he took upon him human form, descended through suffering and death to the lowest depths of the underworld, and by Divine power had reascended above all the heavens with their ranks of angelic hierarchies. Whether Paul himself so conceived it or not, the Gentile world had no other moulds of thought wherein to formulate such a Christology than the current myths of Redeemer-gods. .....The influential religions of the time were those of personal redemption by mystic union with a dying and resurrected 'Savior-god,' an Osiris, an Adonis, an Attis, a Mithra. Religions of this type were everywhere displacing the old national faiths" (The Making of the New Testament, pp. 49, 50).

Professors Murray and Bacon are quite as competent critics as Dr. Denney, and possess a more intimate acquaintance with the period in question; and they are both free from supernatural prejudices.

The second claim of the non-supernaturalistic critics is that the mysteries of the Pagan religions influenced the development of the Christian mysteries, such as the Sacraments, Baptism and the Lord's Supper. This is not seriously denied by either Dr. Moulton or Dr. Denney; and neither of them succeeds in proving that there is any essential difference between Christianity and the religions with which it was, for some time, in competition in the Roman Empire. We hold that the following extract is as applicable to the Gospel Jesus as to the mythical beings of whom it speaks. Dr. Denney says:—

> "Attis, Adonis, and Osiris are in no sense historical; they are embodiments of the decay and reanimation of natural life year by year. The spirit of vegetation decays, and is quickened again with every revolution of the sun, and human beings are profoundly, and it may be piously, interested in this perpetual miracle in Nature."

Our conclusion, and by no means a foregone one, is that there is no true religion in the sense claimed by these two divines; that while some religions are, in some respects, better than others, they are all equally false on their supernatural or theological side. If the word must be used, the only true religion is the simple, natural one of doing good.

> "It is practically impossible to convert a Chinaman to Christianity, and leave him still a faithful member of his family, and a loyal subject to the powers that be. Confucianism is so woven in with family observances and political doctrines that if the one is overthrown the rest follow. 'I come not to bring peace, but a sword,' has been but too truly exemplified in this country, and nothing but the weakness of the Chinese enables them to tolerate missionaries as they do."—ARCHIBALD LITTLE, Through the Yang-tse Gorges, p. 309.

> "The chief difficulty consists in the conclusion to which the great official classes [in China] have arrived—that the missionaries are their most relentless and implacable enemies, calumniating them, and misrepresenting their actions at every turn, and using all their influence and the great means at their command to overthrow their system of government and abolish their rule for their own flagitious purposes. I use the word 'flagitious' because the very presence of missionaries in China, being a cause of the most complete perplexity to the minds of the educated classes, they can see no possible explanation of it, except in some sinister political purpose; the avowed objects striking them as being too puerile for a moment's serious consideration. That foreigners, to whom their country is indebted for unnumbered humiliations, who inflicted opium upon them, and stole the treasures of their Summer Palace, should produce men whose sole aim, under the guidance of a Divine command, is to benefit them, is an idea only to be entertained by children, or by poor, uninstructed people beguiled by bribes and unhallowed rites!"—T. C. HAYLLAR, "The Christian View of Missionaries," Nineteenth Century, Nov. 1895, pp. 769-70.

How it was that the Chinese endured for so long the accumulation of injury and insult which we have recorded may be explained by the essential tolerance and love of peace inherent in the Chinese nature—a characteristic which is commented upon in almost all works dealing with that race. Mr. Arthur Smith observes: "One of the best traits of the Chinese character is a talent for extreme forbearance with ills which cannot be cured."*

Sir Robert Hart has told us of his—

> "Many talks with Chinese acquaintances on the questions of the day—the doings of the treaty Powers and the difficulties of China—have shown how the situation is viewed by those whose attention it has attracted, and it has always on such occasions been a source of astonishment to observe how they retained their calmness and philosophy while inwardly boiling with indignation and trembling with apprehension. Whether it is their rice diet that is at the bottom of the general calmness of the national temperament, physiologists and psychologists can best determine."†

Time and again our Government had been warned of the consequences of acquiescence in the outrageous proceedings of the missionaries in China. The Tsungli-Yamen (the Chinese Foreign Office) had many times protested, without avail, as indeed had our own Consuls—notably Sir Rutherford Alcock—and others in authority in China, like Admiral Richards. Mr. Michie, an authoritative writer upon Chinese matters, had written a big book exposing and denouncing the methods of the missionaries. Many articles had also appeared in our leading magazines, like the Nineteenth Century and the Fortnightly Review. So the Government could not plead ignorance of what was going on. But the missionary societies were powerful organisations, commanding immense revenues, and the Government were not going to unchain the tiger of Christian intolerance by meddling with their affairs. The only result of these humanitarian efforts on behalf of the Chinese was the issue, by the late Lord Salisbury, of a "Memorandum of Advice" to the leading missionary societies, containing the pious wish "that any endeavor to combat heathen prejudices and superstitions should be conducted with moderation and judgment, and that care should be taken to avoid giving legitimate cause for offence"—a piece of advice which had as much effect as water on a duck's back. Even so long ago as 1888, the late Mr. Archibald Little—who is recognised as one of the best writers on China, after pointing out that the great Taiping Rebellion was the result of missionary propaganda, observed :—

> "It is not generally known that a practical people like the Dutch, who hold the larger portion of the Malay race under their rule, forbid propagandism entirely, throughout the whole extent of their vast territories. We cannot, then, wonder at the Chinese desiring to do the like; and in common justice should allow the Government free action in a question of internal economy like this." *

If this policy had been observed from the beginning by our Government, many millions of lives and untold sufferings would have been saved.

As for the missionary societies, they were utterly callous in the matter of human life. If a missionary was killed, he was straightway hailed as a martyr, and the tale of his sufferings, properly embellished, made it good for the collection boxes. Then there was the indemnity, in blood and money, to be extorted, by the aid of gunboats, which would teach the heathen that they would be forced to have the emissaries of Christ whether they liked them or not.

The Chinese Government were powerless to avert the explosion which they could clearly see approaching. The English Government dare not attempt to deal with the missionary societies, and so events marched on the final catastrophe, which occurred in 1900, and is known as the "Boxer Rebellion," the keynote of which, says Mr. Michie, writing at that time, "may be gathered from the proceedings of the conspirators, from their placards and lampoons, and from their secret correspondence" "is general detestation of foreigners, special enmity to Christianity and its accessories, and aversion to the symbols of material progress." And, as he further remarks, "Nor is the present state of things a growth of yesterday. The ferment has been working for forty years—to go no further back—with many sporadic outbreaks to mark its progress."†

The Boxers—so dubbed by English journalists in the Treaty Ports—whose name would be better translated as "Righteous Harmonists," or "Righteous Fists," represented, not merely one of the many secret societies of China, says Mr. Dicey, "but they represent the feelings of the vast majority of the pig-tailed hundreds of millions in their war-cry, 'Expel the Foreigners!'"‡ And while Protestant missionaries blame Catholic missionaries, and Catholic missionaries blame Protestant missionaries, for a large share in provoking the outbreak, both parties blame the foreign traders in China as well. But Sir Robert Hart, who, from his position as Inspector-General of Chinese Customs, could speak with authority upon this point, says: "The foreign mercantile public cannot fairly be accused of having done aught to outrage Chinese feeling or evoke Chinese ill-will."§ He places the blame wholly on the missionaries who had done so. And although Sir Robert Hart went through all the horrors of the siege of the Legations, yet he declares that the rebellion "was patriotic in its origin and justifiable in much that it aimed at cannot be questioned, and cannot be too much insisted on."* He further remarks :—

> "The first doings of the Boxer patriots show that their plan of operations was, on the one hand, to destroy Christian converts and stamp out Christianity, and thus free China from foreign trespass, contamination, and humiliation. These are the objects which will be kept in view, worked up to, and in all probability accomplished—with other weapons in their hands—by the children or grandchildren of to-day's volunteers" (p. 53).

After the first successes of the Boxers, they received the support of the official class in China. The Dowager-Empress was wholly in sympathy with them. This is her account of the Boxer risings, as she described it to Princess Der Ling :—

> "Do you know how the Boxer rising began? Why, the Chinese Christians were to blame. The Boxers were treated badly by them; and wanted revenge..... These Chinese Christians are the worst people in China. They rob the poor country people of their land and property, and the missionaries, of course, always protect them, in order to get a share themselves. Whenever a Chinese Christian is taken to the Magistrate's Yamen, he is not supposed to kneel down on the ground and obey the law, as others do, and is always very rude to his own Government officials. Then these missionaries do the best they can to protect him, whether he is wrong or not, and believe everything he says, and make the magistrate set the prisoner free."†

No doubt that hundreds of Chinese Christians fell victims to the fury of the Boxers, and their deaths lie at the door of the missionary societies who induced them to leave their faith. Baron von Ketteler, the German Ambassador, was murdered, and the foreign Legations in Pekin were besieged. Then came the German Emperor's shout for "Vengeance, Vengeance!" and the Chinese were once more destined to experience the "resources of [Christian] civilisation."

That the foreign Legations in Peking were not destroyed, and the Europeans in refuge there were not killed, was entirely owing to the divided counsels of the Chinese themselves. There were two parties among the ruling officials at Peking; both were of one mind as to ridding the country of the hated foreigners; but the more enlightened party, aware of the power and extent of the foreign nations, knew that China could not hope to contend against them with any hope of success, and that to destroy the Legations would only end in the foreigners invading the country in irresistible force, overturning the Throne, and dividing the Chinese Empire among themselves.

As Sir Robert Hart remarks, the attacks on the Legations "were never pushed home, but always ceased just when we feared they would succeed." Had it been otherwise, he says, "we could not have held out for a week, perhaps not even a day." And they came to the conclusion—

> "that somebody, probably a wise man who knew what the destruction of the Legations would cost Empire and Dynasty, intervened between the issue of the order for our destruction and the execution of it, and so kept the soldiery playing with us as cats do with mice, the continued and seemingly heavy firing telling the Palace how fiercely we were attacked, and how stubbornly we defended ourselves, while its curiously half-hearted character not only gave us the chance to live through it, but also gave any relief forces time to come and extricate us, and thus avert the national calamity which the Palace in its pride and conceit ignored, but which someone in authority in his wisdom foresaw and in his discretion sought to push aside."‡

Acid Drops.

Lord Guthrie's summing-up at the trial of Albert Wade French, the secretary of the Glasgow Branch of the National Sailors' Union, on a charge of murdering James Martin, of the British Seafarers' Union—resulting in an acquittal—contained a protest against the religious bigotry displayed in some questions put to one of the witnesses by the prisoner's counsel. One question was "Are you a Jew?" and Lord Guthrie inquired "What had that to do with the case?" His lordship added that "An honorable Jew was as trustworthy as any nominal Christian." But this is putting the case very gingerly. Surely an honorable Jew is as trustworthy as an honorable Christian. Another question was "Are you an Atheist?" and Lord Guthrie's comment on this was still more open to criticism. "Counsel ought to have known," he said, "that there were no Atheists; there were Agnostics. A man might have doubts, but for a man positively to believe there was no God was absurd." But the Atheist does not deny the existence of God. The etymology of the term shows that it simply and properly means "without God"—which is exactly what "Agnostic" means as far as it has any sort of definiteness. We will not end this paragraph, however, without congratulating Lord Guthrie on his rebuke of religious bigotry being introduced into a court of justice.

Jack Johnson has invited the Rev. F. B. Meyer to half-an-hour's audience with him before representatives of the press. The Rev. F. B. Meyer says that he never received the letter. We daresay that letter would go astray. Anyway, Mr. Meyer knows of the letter now, and we wonder whether he will have the manliness to say to Johnson's face what he has said behind his back. Johnson is a man of more than average intelligence, from all we can gather, and we should be much interested in the result of the interview. Rev. F. B. Meyer will probably conclude that discretion is the better part of valor, and that to attack Johnson from the pulpit is preferable to meeting him face to face.

Rev. F. B. Meyer continues to outdo himself in the attack upon Jack Johnson. We never saw a more impudent, and at the same time hypocritical, letter than the one of his printed in the Daily Chronicle of August 29. He says that the question of Johnson's color has not entered his mind. What else was it then that inspired his denunciation of "this man" when Johnson was here before? "This man" was not allowed to fulfil his boxing engagement in London; it was too brutal and degrading a performance to be tolerated. Yet a precisely similar performance was permitted to take place at the National Sporting Club some three weeks afterwards,—the performers being two white men. Mr. Meyer never opened his lips, as far as we remember, against the "meeting" of the white boxers. He spent all his indignation upon the black-and-white encounter.

Perhaps the rev. gentleman will tell us in a few plain words what is the specific ground of his objection to Jack Johnson? The man is a pugilist,—so are others. He is branded as "immoral," without any definite allegation of immoral acts; moreover, the idea that his immorality should exclude him from the music-hall stage, in face of the well-known characters of some white performers on the same boards, is obviously nothing but a disguised objection to his color. Mr. Meyer sneers at Johnson's "serious imputations on American jurisprudence." He has travelled in America, and he must be incredibly ignorant if he does not know how blacks are treated by whites in that country. Has he never heard of negroes being excluded from white men's churches, and Sunday-schools, and Young Men's Christian Associations? Has he never heard of how they are compelled to travel? Has he never heard of accused negroes, some of whom have subsequently been proved innocent, being dragged out of gaol by mobs, and hung up to trees and riddled with bullets, or soaked in paraffin or kerosene and roasted alive? Has he never heard of beastly indignities practised upon negroes' bodies? There are good Christians, but when it comes to "infidels" they are not to be trusted. They do not understand that the "infidel" has any rights whatever. They display, in relation to him, neither common sense nor common decency. In the same way there are plenty of good white men in America, but when it comes to "blacks" they are not to be trusted. Most Englishmen realise this truth, and they will understand the real value of Mr. Meyer's taunt that Jack Johnson is a fugitive from justice. Justice! Good God! And this prater about "justice"—from whites to blacks—is a Christian clergyman!

Mr. Meyer's vindication of American justice is positively amusing. "The son of a wealthy white millionaire," he says, "has just been condemned to be hanged in Atalanta, a Southern city, on the evidence of a negro servant." Surely the reverend gentleman's logic is worthy of the imbecile ward of a lunatic asylum? The point at issue is not black men's treatment of whites, nor white men's treatment of each other, but white men's treatment of blacks. But, perhaps, after all, we ought not to be too severe upon Mr. Meyer. He displays the logic of his profession.

The reverend gentleman's last joke takes the biscuit. He calls upon Jack Johnson to go back to America, and submit to be tested by the oath and the examination of witnesses. "The world," he says, "will then be able to form its own conclusion." Yes, but where will poor Jack Johnson be? Doing heaps of time in an American prison. It is too big a price for one man to pay for another's satisfaction. Mr. Meyer takes himself too seriously. He seems to consider himself God Almighty's right-hand man. What we should like to see is an official note of the appointment.

Every movement that brings people of different nationalities into friendly conference makes a little in the direction of peace, but we must confess to inability to join in the very high expectations over the opening of the Palace of Peace at the Hague. Curiously enough, wars have been rather more numerous since the first Peace Congress at the Hague was held than before. Since that event there has been our own South African War, the Spanish-American War, the Russo-Japanese War, two campaigns in the Balkans—to say nothing of a number of small military enterprises. And to these we must add the tremendous increase in armaments all over Europe during the past ten years, with the statements of responsible Ministers that it is hopeless to expect any immediate cessation of this rivalry. The truth is that the delegates at the Hague seem much more concerned in settling the conditions of warfare than providing for its abolition; and in trying to settle the conditions under which wars are to be fought, each nation is trying to steal an advantage over the rest. The fact is that there are no two nations represented at the Hague who really trust each other. Two of the Great Powers of Europe, inspired with mutual confidence, could with comparative ease inaugurate an era of peace. But this condition does not exist.

Of course, the parsons have had to have a hand in the ceremonies at the Hague, although they have never done anything to promote peace, and their religion has been responsible for more wars than any other religion in the world. In this case Dean Hensley Henson preached a peace sermon in the Church of the Embassy at the Hague. Dean Henson professed to find a great improvement because, in deference to the Christian conscience, wars waged to-day for commercial benefit were compelled to cover their purpose with hypocritical pretence of nobler things. Well, we beg to point out that wars never were waged openly for profit, for the simple reason that no army could be held together on those terms. There was always the pretence of national honor, religious duty, and similar shibboleths. The modern world offers nothing new in this respect. And of all wars which satisfied private greed and gave scope to brutal ferocity, those waged in the name of religion have been the worst. The Balkan War—easily the most brutal and greedy of modern times—began in the name of religion, gained the sympathy of Christians by an appeal to religion, and the Christian Allies have even secured a certain measure of silence concerning their misdeeds because speech might have brought discredit on Christianity.

Naturally, Dean Henson could not conclude his sermon without a fling at Atheism. Lamenting the failure of modern civilisation in the direction of a genuine peace, he asks whether it is to sink before "the dismal shapes of the Atheist and the Anarchist." That is so like the parson. Call people names when you can, and if not that, then fix on to tendencies that are admittedly deplorable names that people have been carefully educated to dislike. We might leave the Anarchist to defend himself, since a defence of anarchy forms no part of our work, nor is Anarchism one of our convictions. But what on earth has either Atheism or Anarchism to do with the European inability to maintain a genuine peace? The nations of Europe are not given over to Atheism, and no one can accuse them of Anarchism. Their policy may be anarchistic, but that is a different matter. But Dean Henson knows quite well that the dominant voices in the Councils of the Great Powers are Christian, and he might soon learn, if he does not already know, that the modern peace movement owes far more to the spread of Freethought and to the efforts of Freethinkers than to Christianity. Still, it is an old clerical game to blame one's opponents for all that is unpleasant in the world, and Dean Henson is a very old hand in the religious business.

The Holy Synod of Russia has appointed September 11 as a day to be set apart for prayer for drunkards. The ceremony is to be annual, so that evidently it is not expected that the prayers will be answered with anything like promptitude and completeness. One would think that if Providence answers the prayer, it would do so by curing every Russian drunkard at once. That would be something like a cure, and would produce a striking impression on the rest of the world. We may also note that the Russian Church has not been, in the past, over-zealous in this matter of sobriety. Quite the reverse. For a long while both the Government and the Church deliberately encouraged drinking. One reason for this was that the Government derived a financial benefit from the sale of vodka; the other, that it kept the villagers free from plots and conspiracies. A vodka-soaked peasant was much more likely to remain a good son of the Church and a loyal subject than a sober one. Both the Church and the Government understood this, and acted accordingly.

Is one day of prayer for the cure of drunkards enough? It wouldn't be so in England, and we understand that Russia is the most drunken country in Europe. Besides, the Christian God is far from being a teetotaler himself—if we are to believe the Bible.

The Sea Dyaks of Borneo are very truthful people. They erect a "monument" to the man who tells a lie. That would never do in any Christian country. It would leave very little "land question" for Mr. Lloyd George to settle in England.

The late Dean Stanley had the audacity to call the Patriarch Abraham an Arab Sheikh. Professor Denney, of Glasgow, tell us that people were scandalised then, and that all sensible people are scandalised now by such an irreverence. In the Church it is a sin to tell the simple truth about the supposed founder of the Hebrew race. Dr. Denney will not allow us to speak of him as anything but "the Father of the faithful, the pattern of those who, through all the trials of life, hold fast to the word of the living God, and find the reward exceeding great." You must not mention that he was a liar, and for selfish purposes passed his wife off as his sister. You must not refer to his cruel treatment of Hagar, the Egyptian maid, and her son. It is only as an ideal servant of Jehovah that we are permitted to think and speak of him. Such is the condition of our being regarded as "sensible people."

In Professor Denney's opinion, it is equally irreverent to speak of Jesus as "the Carpenter of Nazareth." "The whole interest of the Church in Jesus is that he is the Son of God, that he receives sinners, that he is the Savior and the Lord of men." He may have been a carpenter, it is true, but it is indelicate and impious to allude to so earthly a fact in so heavenly an institution as the Church.

Whatever should we do without the Bible? After some weeks' discussion of the Parable of the Unjust Steward, the Guardian comes to the conclusion that "Possibly we have to wait for the true exposition, and the key to it may be lying in some buried papyrus." That is the beauty of having an inspired record. A non-inspired writer would have said what he had to say, and his readers would in all probability have understood him. But an inspired writer sets down his message, and, after nearly two thousand years' commenting and puzzling, it is decided that we must wait for the accidental recovery of some non-inspired writing to find out what the inspired writer meant. Perhaps the biggest joke of all is that the editor of the Guardian is quite oblivious to the humor of the situation.

A portentous announcement is made in the Daily Telegraph. Mr. G. Currie Martin, B.D., is publishing a volume of lectures on Inspiration. "The author's object," we are told, "is to show that inspiration is not primarily enshrined in books, but is the touch of the Divine spirit upon personality." This must mean, at bottom, that the touch of the Divine spirit is laid upon Mr. Martin. According to his definition, it is only the inspired that can discern inspiration; which is a beautiful conclusion—for the inspired, who have everybody else at their mercy.

"Wanted—More Humor in the Church" is a thick-type heading in the Christian Globe. Are they going to start a Punch and Judy, and lay the cross and the Man of Sorrows on the shelf?

Canon Newbolt must be a very simple-minded man if he really believes that "goodness can only be attained through the Gospel of grace." If that statement, recently made in St. Paul's Cathedral, were true, it would inevitably follow that all Christians are good, while all non-Christians are bad; but this conclusion, thoroughly logical though it be, is so monstrously false that not even Canon Newbolt has the temerity to adopt it. And yet the reverend gentleman can stand before a congregation in the heart of the City of London and unblushingly teach the most damnable heresy ever invented, namely, that goodness is obtainable only through grace, and grace alone through the Sacraments. Any fool who keeps his eyes open can see at a glance how utterly irrational, because absolutely untrue, such a creed is.

The Canon says that "man is trying to save society by human means and is utterly failing to achieve his purpose." Here, again, the facts are dead against him. During the last forty or fifty years pure Humanism has brought about several social reforms; but the grace of God has done practically nothing for society during the vast period of nearly two thousand years. The Canon tells us that "the Gospel of the blessed God is a very real and vital thing," and so it is—to the preacher; but to the world at large it has always been, and is, the most real and vital fraud imaginable. The priest has lived and fattened on it, but at the expense of starving the laity.

Canon Newbolt has been going for those people who at this season of the year "take a holiday from God." The people indicated are those who, when away at the seaside, neglect church-going, and so "give God a holiday." We have often observed the fact, and have taken it as an indication of how little conviction lies behind the practice of church-going. The fact is that, while church-goers represent only a small proportion of the entire population, a large proportion of these go as the result of mere social convention. It is a part of the social fashion, and it requires more self-assertion than the average British citizen possesses to break a practice that is labelled as respectable. But at the seaside the social bond is loosened, to the extent that one is unknown; and for a time one may indulge one's inclinations with impunity. Exactly the same thing occurs when people move into a new neighborhood or emigrate. Some of the Churches have created a machinery for keeping "removals" shadowed. No one has yet suggested the same thing for holiday-makers. Perhaps that is coming.

Dr. Ryle, Dean of Westminster Abbey, falls back upon the old, unverified and unverifiable theological hypothesis that "there has been something more, something nobler, in the history of mankind than the mere warfare of fighting organisations, the mere instinct of survival and mastery, the mere ingenuity of clever invention," and by this "something more" he means conscience, or the moral sense. He even refers to Darwin in confirmation of such a view; but the great Newton of biology never gave the slightest support to this theological dogma. The one object of his Descent of Man is to show that man does not possess a single faculty or sense which is not present, on a lower scale, in the animal. The moral sense is exercised by all gregarious beings, at whatever stage of development they may be.

Where the Dean goes hopelessly astray is in assuming that conscience represents a relation between man and God, whereas, in reality, it is purely a social faculty, a faculty that owes its very existence to social life. It is a theological fallacy to maintain that conscience "points man towards his Creator, the Personal Spirit Supreme of the Universe." Does Dr. Ryle imagine that the five hundred millions of Buddhists, all of whom are Atheists, have no conscience? Has he the hardihood to assert that the myriads of Confucians in China, who are taught to pay no heed to the Deity, are destitute of a moral sense, when we are assured by those who know them best that they are morally our equals, if not superiors? The very reverend Dean is evidently under the dominion of the usual inverate Christian prejudices.

Every institution that prevails in Christendom has its justification in the Christian religion. Militarism is as fully Christian as brotherly love, in fact much more so. Militarism is the most conspicuous and dominant fact in every Christian country, whilst Christian charity is a rarity under the sun. We are not surprised, therefore, at the Dean of Durham's statement that "the soldier takes his place in the scheme of a Christian State by the same title as the policeman, the judge, and the moralist." We agree; but we hold that if Christ reigned on earth, as Christians say he does, not one of the officials mentioned would have the ghost of a title to a place in the scheme of the Christian State. Militarism is the complete negation of the Christianity of the New Testament. That Christianity is a farce is amply demonstrated by the simple fact that the King is at once the Defender of the Faith in the United Kingdom and the head of our Army.

One benefit of competing religionists quarrelling is that a certain amount of truth-speaking is likely to crop up during the fight. We have called attention on several occasions to the large exodus from the Church that is taking place in Germany. Whether the Church happens to be Lutheran or Catholic, the exodus goes on; and last year, in Berlin alone, the number is said to have reached one hundred thousand. Dr. Clifford, with his customary "slimness," has pointed to this phenomenon as a triumph of what he calls the "free church principle." He wishes his readers to infer that these people are simply disgusted with a State Church, and are still good Christians on Free Church lines. We haven't the least doubt that Dr. Clifford knows the facts to be quite the contrary of this; and at any rate the Catholic Times blurts out the truth. It says that "a very large proportion of the losses of the Government Church is due to religious indifference and absolute unbelief." The Christian World has also been honest enough to say the same. It is left for Dr. Clifford—who has been so long playing fast and loose with terms in connection with the Education question that it seems to have become a habit—to ignore and misrepresent facts that even his fellow-Dissenters have been compelled to acknowledge and place in their true light.

Nothing is more amusing than a parson with a high and mighty air of patronising science. He will praise it and its work, but he is careful to say, or to imply, that, after all, the poor scientist is only groping imperfectly after truths that he is already acquainted with. Thus, the Rev. Dr. Scott Lidgett graciously informs the world that evolution is not an explanation, but only a description. It does not explain the origin of the universe; it does not explain the "primal impulse" from which the whole movement proceeds. "It does not explain the particular forms and laws that are impressed upon the universe." And so on through a number of other things that Dr. Lidgett is good enough to inform us that evolution cannot tell us, but by inference he can. The poor, plodding, uninspired scientist must take a back seat when the Methodist preacher comes on the scene. It is all very amusing, and also very characteristic of the parsonic tribe.

Of course, evolution is a description. Properly understood, it is a formula descriptive of certain general modes of operation. That is all; but that is all that any scientific law is or pretends to be. Of course, it does not explain the "primal impulse"—one wonders what on earth Dr. Lidgett conceives this venerable bogey to be like—for the simple reason that it knows nothing of any such phenomenon. A primal impulse is primal nonsense. It does not explain the laws that are "impressed upon the universe," because the "laws" are inseparable from the universe, and are, in fact, nothing but a scientific description of the movements of the universe. And, of course, it does not bridge the "apparent" gulf between mind and matter. If it is only apparent, there is no gulf to bridge. At any rate, it will be time enough for anyone to try and bridge the gulf when it has been shown that a gulf is there. At present, all we can say with certainty is that there is a gap in our knowledge; and Dr. Lidgett and his kind are the last in the world likely to help in filling that gap. Finally, science does explain one rather important thing: it explains Dr. Lidgett. Our knowledge of the evolution of the medicine-man enables us to explain how a member of this species, with no special knowledge of the subject in question—offering, indeed, a plentiful absence of available information—can give himself airs of superiority over those who have made natural phenomena their life's study. This has been characteristic of the medicine-man throughout human history. It is the badge of their tribe. Dr. Lidgett is merely an interesting survival of a very primitive social state. Such survivals are useful enough in their way, but it does not do to take them too seriously.

How amazingly intimate and minute is the knowledge of God possessed by "J. B.," of the Christian World. He can tell us exactly how the Divine Being feels in any given circumstances. For example, when he "finds a good Jew, a Mohammedan of pure life, he feels a thrill of love and infinite pity for him." Thus the narrow prejudices of a Christian are ascribed to the Deity. To be sure he loves "a good Jew," or "a Mohammedan of pure life," but he "feels a thrill of infinite pity for him," because he has the misfortune not to be such an one as "J. B." is. Has it never dawned upon the brilliant essayist of the Christian World that by an orthodox Jew or Mohammedan even he may be looked upon as a legitimate object of the infinite pity of Jehovah or Allah?

The Christian World complains that a certain P. S. A. secretary received a circular from a Turf Society in Switzerland, inviting him to take shares in a St. Leger sweepstake. It says that the address of secretaries are published in the Brotherhood Year Book, and this makes them a target for such communications. The Christian World is indignant; we are a trifle suspicious. If P. S. A. secretaries receive circulars of this character, it looks as though the promoters of the sweepstakes expect to do business in this quarter. If they continue to receive them, it looks as though they have done business. Certainly, the Turf Society would not continue to work through the P. S. A. Year Book unless it brought grist to its mills.

The Pope is in a funk about nothing. He has issued a condemnation of Bergson's philosophy. Protestant clergymen generally regard Bergson as essentially a supporter of religion. But the Papa of the Catholics denounces his "false theories" and "poisonous errors," which are all the worse for being "sugar-coated" and thus rendered "subtle" and "seductive." The Papacy must be in a very shaky condition to be frightened with false fire in this way. The only effect of Sarto's denunciation of Bergson will be a good advertisement for Bergson, who already announces that he will reply to the Vatican in a series of winter lectures.

The following resolution of the Southern Presbytery of the Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland with regard to the late Cadder disaster is taken from the report in the Glasgow Herald:—

> "The Southern Presbytery of the Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland observe with sincere grief the very painful visitation of Divine Providence at Cadder coal pit which happened on Sabbath, August 3, and feel it to be their duty to God and their fellow-men to protest against the practice of the Carron Company, inasmuch as it now appears that they employ their men to work on the Lord's Day, and also against the action of the men themselves, who deliberately work on the Sabbath in defiance of the Lord's command to the contrary. The Presbytery would strongly urge upon employers and employees, whether in connection with this company or elsewhere, the great importance of abstaining from such transgression of God's law, as Sabbath desecration is a grievous sin which will not escape punishment in time and in eternity. The Presbytery would extend their deep sympathy to the bereaved families and dependants of the men, who have been so suddenly and unexpectedly overtaken with such a dire calamity."

According to this rigmarole there will be no accidents in mines if Sunday labor is abolished. If the Presbyterian gentlemen who drew it up really believe it they are several centuries behind the times. It had better be regarded as a professional manifesto.

"God tells me I must do so," said a ten-year-old schoolboy, named Robert Beedell, of Newton St. Cyres, Devonshire. Then he committed suicide by falling under a railway express at a level crossing. The jury found it a case of "suicide while of unsound mind." Hearing God speak is pretty good evidence of insanity nowadays. Formerly it was good evidence of inspiration. Look at the Bible, for instance.

"The Lord is such a long time taking me," said little Doris Cotton, of Forest-road, Shepshed, Leicestershire, to her father. She was fourteen years of age and had suffered for eighteen months with consumption, growing weaker and weaker. "Dad," she said, "lift me up to the window, so I can throw myself out." Soon afterwards—and it was Sunday morning—she managed to do this for herself, and her dead body was found on the causeway below. We suppose there is a Christian moral in this, if one could only dig it out. Perhaps it illustrates the consolations of religion.

September 21, Leicester.

October 5, Birmingham Town Hall; 19, Manchester; 26, Stratford Town Hall.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £171 9s. 9d. Received since:—An Old Worker, £1; A. Galpin (U.S.A.), £1; W. H. Harrap, 5s.; Andrew Shiel, 10s.; Admirer (Reading), 10s.; Robert Stirton and friends (quarterly), £1 1s.

FREETHINKER.—The word "Atheist" did not "creep into" the Dictionary. It has been there for any length of time. If there is any "creeping in" at all, it is to be laid to the charge of the word "Agnostic," which was coined by the late Professor Huxley. We have referred to Lord Guthrie's protest in this week's "Acid Drops."

ADMIRER (Reading).—Sorry for the delay. See this week's list. Pleased to have your acknowledgment of "many moments of pleasure" derived from reading the Freethinker.

A. R. MACKENZIE (S. Africa).—We are for free speech everywhere, of course, but we cannot do much to defend it in any other country than our own. Neither can we deal with purely political questions anywhere. We think you will see, on second thoughts, that this is our proper and most useful policy.

B. EVANS.—Shall be sent as requested. Thanks.

T. HUNNOTT.—The book arrived all right. Please accept our thanks.

W. H. H.—We have none at present, but may have some before very long.

W. MARTIN.—We should hardly care to reprint it in the Freethinker. Eulogies of Bradlaugh by Mrs. Besant, written in the old days, have lost their grateful flavor now. Our best wishes go with you on the journey you are taking.

T. H. ELSTOB.—Thanks far your appreciative and encouraging letter. We will try to oblige with "More."

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings.

J. FERGUSON.—Letters posted at Glasgow on Tuesday cannot possibly be dealt with in "this week's Freethinker." Monday is the latest day for ordinary matter, and Tuesday morning for anything really urgent. We print early on Wednesday, and are on sale in the afternoon. A paragraph on the cutting will be found in this week's "Acid Drops." Glad to receive your thanks for "the very great pleasure" you derive from "being a constant reader" of this journal.

ANDREW SHIEL writes: "Mrs. Shiel and I have both read your paper from the first issue, and seem to enjoy it better all the time; in fact, we can still enter into a sort of struggle as to which of us shall have the first look through when Thursday comes round." This correspondent congratulates us on our "sustained and almost superhuman effort to keep the old flag of freedom flying."

T. FOWLER.—Always glad to receive useful cuttings.

M. MARTIN.—See "Acid Drops." Thanks.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Having had three fine days and three dismal days, as far as the weather is concerned, with his old friend J. W. de Caux, J.P., at Great Yarmouth, Mr. Foote is seated in the editorial chair of the Freethinker again and seeing this issue through the press.

Mr. Foote does not intend to lecture every Sunday for some time. He has booked a few provincial engagements by way of trial, and in each case the Branch or Society has been informed that the engagement may be cancelled if it turns out that he has resumed platform work prematurely. He has been strongly invited to open the new session at Glasgow, but he thinks it imprudent to undertake such a long journey just at present. He hopes, however, to meet his Glasgow friends again at a not too distant date.

The Pioneer Press has several new books and pamphlets nearly ready for publication—including a cheap edition of Mr. Foote's Bible Heroes, and some fresh issues of the "Pioneer Pamphlets" series. Other writings of Mr. Foote, and some of his more immediate colleagues, will be announced very shortly. The Pioneer Press intends to be very active on the publishing side this coming winter. Special efforts will also be made to push the circulation of the Freethinker.

Mr. F. J. Gould sails on the White Star liner Adriatic for New York on September 25. He will be spending several months in the United States, where he will visit many places under the auspices of the Moral Instruction League, but not in connection with the American Ethical Union, as in 1911. He will give moral teaching, in his well-known way, at the request of School Boards and other such bodies; the whole program being arranged by Professor F. C. Sharp, of Madison-square, who does it con amore and non-commercially. Mr. Gould's late visit to India, on a similar mission, was in every way successful. Besides public recognitions, Mr. Gould has received a token of thanks from the Gackwar of Baroda in the form of a silver vase. Before leaving England for the United States this month Mr. Gould has passed the pages of a new volume from his pen entitled Pages for Young Socialists, with Prefaces by Mr. H. M. Hyndman and Mr. J. Keir Hardie, and pictures by Mr. Walter Crane. We may add that Mr. Gould promises us what he calls "scraps of the usual sort" during his wanderings in America. Our readers will appreciate these "scraps" as they did before on the occasion of his visit to India.

The Positivists are the most insular people in the world and this characteristic is reflected in the Positivist Review. Nevertheless we like calling attention now and then to that publication; and we take this opportunity of repeating that we have every respect for its able editor, Mr. S. H. Swinny. The September number contains some interesting articles, and a beautiful funeral address by Mr. J. Carey Hall, the happy translator of Pierre Laffitte's Positive Science of Morals. Perhaps the article that attracts most attention is Professor Gilbert Murray's review of Mr. Marvin's The Living Past. Professor Murray calls upon Mr. Marvin to "justify the vast importance he attributes to Shakespeare." "Of all great men of genius," he adds, "I can hardly think of one who contributed so little to human progress." He even blames Shakespeare for not understanding the Puritans. Surely this is Professor Murray in a new vein. Perhaps he will explain what he means by "progress." Meanwhile we venture to think that it is Gilbert Murray, and not William Shakespeare, who fails to understand the Puritans. Shakespeare saw that they brought no new truth for the world, but a most unlovely temper. One can sympathise with the American humorist who said it was quite true that the Pilgrim Fathers landed on Plymouth Rock, but it might have been better for the world if Plymouth Rock had landed on the Pilgrim Fathers.

An American "saint" writes us as follows:—

> "As an old reader of the Freethinker I regret to see the President's Honorarium Fund grows so slowly. To obviate that, as far as old age and decreasing income will permit, I take pleasure in handing you a slight contribution (£1). I hope many others may do likewise."

It is pleasant to find that we have good friends in all parts of the English-speaking world.

Canon Newbolt has been condemning society novels and the Salome dance. Considering what noses for indecency the clergy possess, it is remarkable than none of them ever notice the "nauseous unreserve" of the Bible. As for the dance of Salome, it is distinctly less sensational than David's pas-de-seul.

A story is going the rounds that one of Mr. Cook's lady patrons, recently returned from a lightning trip on the Continent, boasted that when she was in Italy she "saw so many people in the garbage of monks."

The Salvation Army has been holding an anti-drink crusade. One intoxication fighting another.

The Gospel History a Fabrication.

THE PREFACE TO LUKE'S GOSPEL.

THE form of dedication which Luke has prefixed to his Gospel (i. 1—4) has for three centuries been a source of misunderstanding to Bible readers, many of whom, misled by the wording of the English translation, have believed the writer to have lived in apostolic times. In the Revised Version several unimportant alterations are made in this paragraph; but the misleading portion is allowed to stand. Thus, Luke, in referring to the pre-existing narratives relating to Jesus, is made to say:—

> "even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word."

Luke was one of the "us"; but he was not an "eye-witness" or a "minister of the word." The passage should read:—

> "even as they, who from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, delivered them unto us" [i.e., handed them down to Luke's day].

No one, from the latter statement, could mistake Luke for an eye-witness, or even the companion of an apostle: and it was for this reason that our priestly revisers would not put the words "delivered them unto us" in their proper grammatical position. The whole paragraph, as amended, reads:—

> "Forasmuch as many have taken in hand to draw up a narrative concerning those matters which have been fulfilled among us, even as they, who from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, delivered them unto us, it seemed good to me also, having traced all things accurately from the first, to write unto thee in order, most excellent Theophilus; that thou mightest know the certainty concerning the things wherein thou wast instructed."

From this dedication we obtain a glimpse of Luke's time. We see, in the first place, that several other Christian scholars had already compiled or edited a series of Gospel narratives; and it is clearly implied that any educated Christian was at liberty to do so; "inspiration" for such a purpose had not then been thought of. The Gospels to which Luke referred as recently compiled were those "according to" Mark, Matthew, John, and Marcion.

Next, Luke says that the matters contained in the Gospels had been "fulfilled" among them; that is to say, were a fulfilment of so-called "prophecy." Chief among these would be the destruction of Jerusalem, the prediction of which event was composed after its occurrence, and piously placed in the mouth of Jesus; to which Luke himself contributed some additional circumstances which he knew had actually occurred (Luke xix. 43, 44; xxi. 23, 24). From this Preface, again, it would appear that Luke really believed that the primitive Gospel from which he and the others took their accounts, had been written by "eye-witnesses and ministers of the word." There was, we may suppose, a tradition to that effect; but this did not prevent him from making alterations wherever he thought he could improve the narratives, not even in the sayings ascribed to his Savior.

The next point is, that Luke states he had "traced all things accurately from the first": a statement which is simply untrue; for in the age in which that compiler lived, it would be impossible for him, or for anyone else, to collect evidence concerning the sayings and doings of Jesus Christ. But Luke records several events which are said to have occurred thirty years before the ministry of Jesus (Luke i., ii.). How did he "trace accurately" these matters? He relates, for instance, a speech (of eight verses) made by the angel Gabriel to the priest Zacharias in the temple, no other person being present (i. 13—20); also, another speech (ten verses) by the same angel to Mary the Virgin, no one else being present (i. 28-37). He records an address (four verses) by Elizabeth to her cousin Mary, in a private interview, and an ecstatic declamation (ten verses) uttered by Mary in reply (i. 42—55), no other person being present. He records, again, an outpouring of the spirit (twelve verses) by Zacharias (i. 68—72), and a short speech (three verses) by an angel to some shepherds (ii. 10—12). How did Luke "trace accurately" these circumstances? As a simple matter of fact, he could not; and he did not trace anything. The Virgin Birth story is a Christian fabrication which Luke added from apocryphal writings of his time, and all the foregoing events in connection with it are of the same fictitious character. Luke simply selected the narratives which he thought most credible from the Christian writings known in his time. By "tracing things accurately" he meant his searching through Josephus for names or events to fix the time when Jesus was born, and when he and the Baptist commenced to preach.

Luke, again, records a number of parables which were unknown to the writer of the primitive Gospel, and of which, apparently the compilers Matthew and Mark had never heard. These are: the Good Samaritan—the Servants watching—the Barren fig-tree—the Great Supper—the Lost piece of silver—the Prodigal Son—the Unjust Steward—the Rich man and Lazarus—the Importunate Widow—the Pharisee and Publican—the Ten pieces of money—and several others. Where did Luke get all these? Where, also, did he find the account of the raising of the Widow's son to life, of which the other editors appear never to have heard? The answer is, Nobody knows; but there can be no doubt whatever that they are all Christian fabrications. The evidence for this fact, though inferential, is sound and conclusive. We have, in the first place, no evidence that the sayings or discourses in the Gospels were ever uttered by Jesus; but, assuming that they were, they were not taken down at the time, and could not be remembered by hearing them spoken once. The alleged "divine inspiration" of the writers is a modern assumption which the Gospels themselves disprove. Where, then, did all these sayings come from? There can be but one answer: they were fabricated by some of the more cunning and unscrupulous scholars (probably teachers) among the early Christians. Those recorded only by Luke were fabricated at a later period than the others.

Again, if, as I have twice shown to be the case, the public ministry was a Nazarean fraud, then Jesus did not utter any of the sayings ascribed to him in the Gospels: we thus arrive at the same conclusion.

MOST EXCELLENT THEOPHILUS.

Who was the "most excellent Theophilus" for whom Luke wrote his Gospel? Respecting this great personage all Christian commentators and Biblical critics profess entire ignorance. There can be little doubt, however, that he was the Theophilus who became bishop of Antioch about A.D. 168. This Christian bishop and Luke's Theophilus were both persons of distinction, and both had been "instructed" in the Christian faith. There was also a tradition (referred to by Eusebius and Jerome) that Luke was a native of Antioch. From his Letters to Autolycus we learn that Theophilus of Antioch was a convert to Christianity late in life, and would therefore know less of the Christian writings than one brought up in that faith; and, being an educated man—he had read the works of Josephus, whom he names—he would naturally require a copy of the Gospel soon after his conversion. Apparently, the one in use at Antioch did not satisfy him; hence, Luke, an educated Christian of long standing in that church, compiled a revised Gospel for his especial use, and borrowed his Josephus for reference to historical matters. This Gospel was, no doubt, commenced shortly after the conversion of Theophilus, which would be many years before that personage was promoted to the office of bishop—say, some year after A.D. 150. This bishop of Antioch is the only Theophilus known who in any way answers the Theophilus of Luke's Preface. Luke's Gospel is first mentioned by Irenæus about A.D. 185.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

A few brief comments are necessary respecting this second book of Luke. Like the Third Gospel, it was compiled for the use of the "most excellent Theophilus," and is from beginning to end pure fiction. Luke, it is true, was not the fabricator; that editor merely combined and put into shape some narratives from three apocryphal writings concocted before his time. We know from various sources that there were in circulation in the second century a number of fabulous stories relating to Peter and Paul, among which were the Acts of Peter, the Acts of Paul, the Travels of Peter, the Travels of Paul, and the Travels of Peter and Paul. Luke has simply selected, combined, and revised the narratives which he considered most credible in these writings, and has added names of procurators and other matters from Josephus to make the narratives appear more historical. Moreover, the long speeches which he has placed in the mouths of Stephen, Peter, and Paul have been shown to be his own composition.

The importance of the Book of the Acts is, in one sense, even greater than that of the Gospels; for not only are the miracles, ministry, and crucifixion of Jesus repeatedly referred to as historical facts, but the book is assumed by all shades of Christians to be a reliable account of the promulgation of the Christian religion by the so-called "Apostles" of Jesus, and even hostile critics sometimes accept it as such. Hence, it is used to fix all dates of the early history of the Church at Jerusalem, and also of the propagation of the gospel in other places by Paul. Now, if we carefully examine the Pauline Epistles, we shall find nothing in them —no name of emperor, king, tetrarch, procurator, etc.—to indicate when the writer lived. This period is obtained from the unhistorical "Acts," though the accounts of Paul's doings in that book are flatly contradicted in the Epistles.

That the narratives in "the Acts" are fictitious is beyond doubt: they simply require to be read to be recognised. In chapter i., for instance, is narrated the ascension of Jesus, with the apostles watching until he passes beyond the clouds: then two angels appear, and say that he will return in like manner. In chapter ii. we have an account of the descent of the Holy Ghost with "a rushing mighty wind," and tongues "like as of fire" alighting upon each of the apostles; after which these spirit-filled men are able to speak every known language. Next, on the day of Pentecost, all the foreigners in Jerusalem "hear them speak every man his own language," which is followed by a speech from Peter which converts 3,000 persons. And we are asked to believe that Peter would be allowed to address such a multitude, in Jerusalem, and at one of the three great festivals, and to set the city in an uproar, by preaching a new religion, without let or hindrance. Where was the procurator? and why did he permit such an innovation? And what were the armed Roman soldiers within the city, who were on the lookout for innovators, doing? The writer of the Pauline document from which Luke took chapter xxiv. knew that no such innovation would be permitted in Jerusalem; so he represents Paul as saying (xxiv. 12, 18):—

> "and neither in the temple did they find me disputing with any man or stirring up a crowd.....they found me purified in the temple, with no crowd, nor yet with tumult."

I have no space here to go into any more absurdities. It is true that the account of the propagation of the gospel by Paul appears more rational; but it is not historical. He is a miracle-worker in the Acts; but he has no such power in his Epistles. He works in harmony with the apostles in the Acts; but he denounces them and their interference in the Epistles. He is called "Saul" in the Petrine portion of the Acts (i.—xii.), and "Paul" in the Pauline portion (xiii.—xxviii.), the explanation being that Luke found the name "Saul" in the Acts of Peter and the name "Paul" in the Acts of Paul and Travels of Paul, and, believing they referred to the same person, changed Saul into Paul in the first Pauline chapter (xiii. 9).

We are told by orthodox critics that Luke was he companion of Paul during certain journeys in he Acts which are recorded in the first person, in which the writer employs the words "we" and "us"——meaning himself, Paul, and other co-workers—but this is an apologetic perversion, and assumes that Luke was one of the "ministers of the word" in apostolic times, which his Preface tells us he was not.

As regards the "we" narratives, Luke has simply incorporated in the Pauline portion of the Acts some narratives relating to Paul which he took from another source—the latter being written in the first person. It is the writer of this document that employed the words "we" and "us." These portions of Paul's journeys are the following: Acts xvi. 9 to 18; Acts xx. 5 to xxi. 19; Acts xxvii. 1 to xxviii. 16. If the first two of these sections be read carefully, it will be seen that the writer was not a follower of Paul, and that when he said "we" and "us" he referred to himself and his own travelling companions, not to Paul and his colleagues: whence it may be inferred who this "we" writer was believed (in Luke's time) to be. I leave these questions as a little problem for critical readers.

ABRACADABRA.

Creation Myths.

REFERRING in the Encyclopædia Biblica to the Genesis cosmogony, the eminent Leipzic Assyriologist, Professor Heinrich Zimmern, remarks that, "To seek for even a kernel of historical truth in such cosmogonies is inconsistent with a scientific point of view."

In the light of the fact that present-day science is unanimous in regarding the existing universe as the result of an orderly process of development, the myths and legends of savage and semi-civilised peoples are now relegated to their proper anthropological province. But although they are quite valueless to the geologist and the astronomer, these myths nevertheless retain their importance to the students of comparative psychology and comparative religion.

There is no longer any doubt that the Babylonian tablets preserve a far older account of the Creation than that recorded in the Book of Genesis. Still, although the Hebrew myth bears unmistakable evidence of its indebtedness to the earlier Babylonian epic, each story must be regarded as a comparatively modern rendering of the vastly older creation fancies of prehistoric man.

The story of the slaughter of a huge dragon at the commencement of the world's history is met with in many lands. Nearly all the authorities agree that the oldest known versions of this myth are those of Babylonia and ancient India. The Babylonian story informs us that at the Creation the mighty god Marmuk slew the terrible dragon Tiamat, and, having vanquished this creature, he created the heavens and the earth by "splitting the huge carcase of the monster into halves and setting one of them up to form the sky, while the other half apparently he used to fashion the earth." Upon this Babylonian myth is based the so-called Mosaic cosmogony. In the words of Professor J. G. Frazer—

> "The account of creation given in the first chapter of Genesis, which has been so much praised for its simple grandeur and sublimity, is merely a rationalised version of the old myth of the fight with the dragon, a myth which for crudity of thought deserves to rank with the quaint fancies of the lowest savages."*

The Indian variant is embodied in the ancient Vedic hymns. We gather from these that the brave and mighty Indra fought and defeated a colossal dragon named Vrtra, which had so dammed up the waters that they no longer flowed in their appointed courses. After Indra had slain the baleful dragon with his thunderbolt, the springs once more discharged their waters, which, filling up the dried river-beds, resumed their suspended flowings and somewhere reached the sea. But Indra's mighty achievement only terminated the conflict for the time being. The warfare between Indra and his satanic adversary is periodically renewed. At certain seasons it may be said that the dragon that was slain now liveth again, and is at his old mischief. This myth refers not so much to the Creation as to a "regularly recurring phenomenon." As we shall see, this Indian myth, like its Babylonian counterpart, is colored by its native surroundings. In its present form it must be viewed as a fanciful description of the commencement of that season of storm and lightning which succeeds the prolonged heat of the tropical summer.

> "At such times all nature, exhausted by the drought, longs for coolness and moisture. Day after day, men and cattle may be tormented by the sight of clouds that gather and then pass away without disburdening themselves of their contents. At last the long-drawn struggle between the rival forces comes to a crisis. The sky darkens, thunder peals, lightning flashes, and the welcome rain descends in sheets drenching the parched soil and flooding the rivers. Such a battle of the elements might well present itself to the primitive mind in the guise of a conflict between a maleficent dragon of drought and a beneficent god of thunder and rain. The cloud-dragon has swallowed the waters, and keeps them shut up in the black coils of his sinuous body; the god cleaves the monster's body with his thunderbolt, and the imprisoned waters escape, in the form of dripping rain and rushing stream."

The myths of different peoples express in various ways the seasonal changes which the revolving years bring round. The legends of George and the Dragon, and of Apollo and the Python, certainly seem to symbolise summer's triumph over winter's darkness and decay. In the Babylonian myth of Marmuk, the solar divinity, and his conflict with Tiamat, the dark dragon, the yearly change which transforms the Euphrates valley from watery dreariness to the floral splendors of spring is symbolically portrayed. All through the winter the broad Babylonian plain is hidden by its liquid covering, and presents the appearance of a sea. With the coming of spring the sun recovers its lost power, the clouds break up, the waters slowly subside, and the solid earth, arrayed in its green mantle once again, returns to gladden the hearts of men. The sombre dragon Tiamat personifies the dark cloud-masses, the waste of waters, and the constantly falling rain; Marmuk, on the other hand, represents the vernal and summer sun which banishes the reptilian powers of darkness and deluge.

Lower stages of human culture provide innumerable examples of a kindred character. Among the north American Indians, for example, most weird and wonderful Creation stories, in which animal gods figure as the world's begetters, are constantly met with. But to return to the resemblances between the Babylonian and the Hebrew Creation Myths. By common consent these resemblances are so striking that no candid inquirer any longer disputes that both have arisen from a common source. The Babylonian cosmogony is many centuries older than the legends contained in the first chapter of Genesis. Both accounts postulate water and darkness as the sole existences at the beginning of things; in each cosmogony the creation of light marks the commencement of the world's career. In both accounts the appearance of the heavens is the outcome of the deity's division of the waters of the primeval chaos so that the upper waters form the heavens and the lower ones the oceans of the earth. "In the Babylonian epic," writes Canon Cheyne, "this division of the waters of the flood is in the closest relation to the battle with Tiamat; nor can we doubt that a parallel description once existed in the Hebrew myth of creation."

A comparison of the Babylonian with the Jewish arrangement of the several separate creative acts is both interesting and instructive. The following lists give the order of the acts of creation as presented by the cuneiform tablets and the inspired volume respectively.

Babylonian Tablets.	First Chap. Genesis.
1. Heaven	1. Heaven
2. Heavenly bodies	2. Earth
3. Earth	3. Plants
4. Plants	4. Heavenly bodies
5. Animals	5. Animals
6. Men	6. Men

As is evident at a glance, the uninspired version is eminently the more scientific of the two. Nor need this awaken astonishment. The Assyrians and Babylonians—not to mention the ancient Egyptians and other contemporary races—were far more highly cultured and civilised than the Israelites of old. The Chaldean astrologers and astronomers were keen observers of the sun, moon, and stars. As a consequence, a much better case could be made out for the divine origin of the Babylonian cosmogony than for that recorded in Genesis. In any case, the former myth more closely resembles the history of the evolution of the present phase of the visible universe which modern science has disclosed than the cosmogony so generally and so falsely attributed to Moses.

The semi-nomadic Israelites learnt much from the more advanced races with whom they came into contact; and from the Babylonians, we have many reasons for thinking, they learnt most of all. But the Hebrews not only borrowed their cosmogony; they also muddled it in the borrowing. The Babylonians apparently realised that the creation of the heavenly bodies was a necessary preliminary to the appearance of vegetable life on the earth's surface. But to the less philosophical Israelite the presence of plant life without the all-essential light and heat of the solar orb seems to have caused no surprise. This glaring absurdity alone—one, however, out of many—is sufficient to stamp the Genesis story as utterly valueless from a philosophical or scientific point of view. And with reference to the divine claims still sometimes urged on behalf of the Genesis myth, it may be remarked, once more in the words of that distinguished ornament of the Church of England, Canon Cheyne, that "all available evidence points to the direct or indirect borrowing on the part of the Hebrews."

Closely allied to Creation Myths are the very numerous legends concerning the deluge of waters. The two flood stories blended in the Book of Genesis—for separate legends have been more or less skilfully combined in the narrative—were also adopted by the Hebrews from their Babylonian masters. The Babylonian legend itself survives in two forms. One is preserved in the fragments of Berosus, an ancient Egyptian priest, who compiled a history of Babylon. The other may be studied in the cuneiform tablets preserved in the British Museum, and first translated by the late George Smith in 1872. Of these two accounts, the first mentioned is of small importance, but the second is of priceless value to the archæologist. The legend itself is of great antiquity, and is regarded by experts as at least as old as 3000 B.C. This circumstance alone puts all claims of Hebrew priority out of court.

The great Assyriologist, Professor Zimmern, is of opinion that the harmony between the narrative and the local conditions of Babylonia justifies the conclusion that that country is the birthplace of the story. "It is more difficult to determine," he writes,

> "whether any real historical event lies at the foundation of the narrative, or whether we have to deal with a mere myth. In itself, it would, of course, not be inconceivable that in days of yore an unusually extensive flood from the Persian Gulf, combined with continuous rain, burst upon the Babylonian lowlands, and destroyed countless human lives; that a dim tradition of this event was preserved; and that the Babylonian Deluge Story was a last deposit produced by this genuine occurrence. Judging, however, from what is known of the growth of myths, especially among the Babylonians, we think this is far from probable."

As in the myth of Marmuk and Tiamat, the native conditions of the country color the story. The Chaldean Deluge myth bears every appearance of a a nature legend. The flood story may be safely regarded as a poetical description of the rain which descends so copiously during the Babylonian winter. The hero saved in the ark or ship was in all probability the sun-god.

The views advanced in the foregoing paragraphs command the assent of our own great Assyriologist, Professor A. H. Sayce, who writes as follows:—

> "The sacred tree of Babylon, with its guardian 'cherubs'—a word, by the way, which seems of Accadian origin—as well as the flaming sword or thunderbolt of fifty points and seven heads, recall Biblical analogies, while the Noachian deluge differs but slightly from the Chaldean one. Indeed, the Jehovistic version of the flood story in Genesis agrees not only in details, but even in phraseology, with that which forms the eleventh lay of the great Babylonian epic. The hero of the latter is Tam-zi or Tammuz, the 'sun of life,' the son of Ubaratutu, 'the glow of sunset,' and denotes the revivifying luminary of the day, who sails upon his 'ark' behind the clouds of winter to reappear when the rainy season is past."

The Touch of Truth.

IN the pilgrimage of life, as Christians sentimentally call our unceasing warfare against the bedevilments of God, we often notice Truth, her face radiant with merriment. She is no perpetually solemn mistress; for there are times when the comicalities of opposing things awaken a glee within her as strong and as overwhelmingly jubilant as her knowledge of her own power.

A laughing Truth gives an electric thrill to the mind. A merry Truth is the salt of the intellect. And those whose brains have been fashioned into weapons for "the best of all causes" are rewarded by a happiness others do not enjoy. They see the disappearance of the mist men's wasted breath has caused to rise about the face of Truth; and they see her laughing with a contagious abandon that makes the heart young, and fresh, and fragrant. With every burst of merriment another idol is shattered, another god dies, another superstition goes slinking into the forgotten past, another tyranny cringes, currishly, away into the dusty museum of solemn shibboleths. There is a sharpness about the air they cannot abide. Freedom means a virile happiness; if it does not signify that it is nothing.

The book I was reading contained sermons. The title-page was amissing, and so author, date, and name were unknown. Nevertheless, the title might well have been Hell-Fire Contributions; the writer's name, Godfrey Helinuff; and the date a century ago, in the days when the world was not wicked.

The preacher was a Scottish Calvinist, with a particularly keen sense of God's selective power. At heart the man was really a lover of his fellows: he left no stone unturned in his endeavors to take all his congregation with him to Heaven, where he could, for evermore, dwell in peace with them, his brethren.

To accomplish this, he had developed a remarkably strong capability to denounce the shortcomings of his flock. Many of the sermons were individualistic trouncings. They made direct references to members of the congregation, whose lives, the pastor considered, were not such as to entitle them to accompany him on his homeward way.

One man had not kept rigidly to the commandment that refers to maid-servants; and his evil doings were submitted to a searching investigation. Nothing was hidden by the worthy administrator of God's holy rod of correction. The verbal flames of punishment flickered, and flashed, and burst forth in volcanic luridity. The man's sin was so expatiated upon; the results were so minutely portrayed; the detail so closely followed, step by step, that the congregation must have experienced a regular eruption of obscenity. The blue flames were not, assuredly, extinguished, so far as visibility goes, by those of amber and red.

Another member of the congregation had dared to quote, from Burns, a passage that related in some suspiciously irreverent manner to the previous Sabbath's castigation. According to the author, the fault, bad enough in that sense as it was, actually lay in the quoting from such an impious book on the Lord's Day. The trangression deserved nothing less than the complete cancellation of the sinner's claim in paradise; and by the time the minister had finished his non-stop flight the religious criminal's literary leanings were suffocated in the fumes of sulphur.

The son of a douce elder of the Kirk had so far forgotten his father's responsible position that he had allowed himself to be caught, and by the minister, too, in the act of sneaking, on a Sunday, into the garden where the gooseberries grew. Notification was given by the minister to his congregation that the boy had already expiated the offence at home; now it was the father's turn. Failure properly to carry out parental duties anent the observance of the Sabbath meant Hell for the child and Hell for the parent; and the righteous old warrior in the pulpit spared no pains to make it as hot as he could.

And so, sermon after sermon, individualistic faults were made the bases of discourses on the awful reality of Hell, its proximity to people, their liability to be received in its ever-open and welcoming mouths, and the frightful punishments that awaited them therein. No quarter was given; no mercy shown. Considerate sensitiveness to the feelings of others was a triviality compared with the love God's inspired castigator had for his congregation and his attempts to lead them home to heaven. Public ridicule was, by the grace of God, a good and necessary thing. Detailed information of private faults and failings was, by the grace of God, a gateway from sin. Ministerial opprobrium was, by the grace of God, the wrath of God.

And since then no Scotsman, bred in the hamlets of his country, has ever been known to be anything but pure, upright, noble, possessing a "deep-rooted soul," his face reflecting the glory of the God of the Calvinists, and his whole life one great irrefutable argument of the existence of that God!

The last sermon was very quiet and restful, in comparison to the others, as if God's apostle had become a little tired of his labors as public chastiser, and longed for peace; and his farewell remembrances of the horrors of Hell were weak and weary in every sentence. So must have thought the man who had possessed the book before me; for between the last two leaves was a pamphlet cutting which read:—

> "And it came to pass that the hills did not budge, nor did the mountains skip like kittens; for the glory of the Lord is such that it is woven in the mists, which the winds disperseth to all the airts; and even to the cleverest fools there cometh a time when their heart of hearts giveth the lie to the memories of their minds. Their tongues stammer in their perplexity; the bravest hide their heads, and the cowardly cry as a child newweaned. Be ye assured that the hottest flame of Hell will, in the days to come, melt; and men will laugh at the folly of their fathers, and their laughter will chase the gods from the skies and the priests from the earth."

It was the only touch of Truth in the book.

According to the Daily Sketch, most members of the Royal Family are on the 'phone. From the fuss the clergy make, one would imagine that the King of Kings was also connected up.

"Hurricane of Red-Hot Bricks" reads a scare headline in a recent issue of the London Daily Chronicle. To our surprise, it has no association with the place mentioned in so many pulpits, but refers to a paltry boiler explosion.

An order for a quarter of a million tons of coal has been placed with the Carlton Main Collieries. The order has no theological significance.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 37 SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Nothing more debases a nation than religious despotism.
—NAPOLEON.

Vulgar Freethinkers.

IN one of the volumes of the Golden Bough, Professor Frazer devotes a number of pages in proving that to the primitive savage mind names are things—or, at all events, they are the equivalent of things. A name is so much a part of an individual that some never disclose it, lest an enemy, by becoming acquainted with it, should work the owner injury. Group names are often concealed for the same reason, and the mention of a deity's name is also fraught with danger. Professor Frazer quotes with approval the opinion of another anthropologist that in all probability "the whole Aryan family believed at one time, not only that his name was a part of the man, but that it was that part of him which is termed the soul, the breath of life, or whatever you may choose to define it as being."

In some directions a very large number of people are still in the mental condition betokened by this identification of names with things, or, at most, they do not look beyond the name to see what the thing is, and whether the name fits it. Call a thing bad, and thousands will straightway condemn it. Call it good, and they will accept it without further examination. Popular experience crystallises this in the saying, "Give a dog a bad name, and you may as well hang him." Sometimes it would be kinder to do the hanging first; and one suspects that the hanging is often only deferred to make the hangman feel that he has been engaged in a justifiable work. Formerly, in the political world, a great many people shunned the name of Radical because others chose to associate it with all kinds of disreputable teaching and conduct. When the Utilitarian philosophy was called "pig-philosophy," that quite settled it so far as many were concerned. And when Atheism received from the religious world an ornamentation of rascality, thousands shunned the name as though it were the plague. Such a word as "Agnosticism" became quite reputable by contrast. Not only reputable to religionists, but to many timid Freethinkers likewise. Thus the writer of a recent popular booklet on the existence of God explains that he prefers the term "Agnostic" to "Atheist" because, while descriptive of his own position, some people misconceive it; and in the same breath points out that "Agnostic" is not free from ambiguity. Presumably the writer knows what he means by both words, and means by both the same thing. But he prefers a word inherently ambiguous to one that is misconceived, stupidly or deliberately. Why? One cannot escape the suspicion that here is another instance of the fear of a name. Atheism is called names. Agnosticism has not been so generally complimented.

Turning over the pages of Gleams of Memory, by the late James Payn, I came across the expression that serves as title for this article. Having occasion to mention certain of his acquaintances who were evidently heterodox in their opinions, Mr. Payn hastens to add, "It is not to be supposed, however, that the friends of whom I speak were Freethinkers of the vulgar sort." I do not know whether the caution was written in Mr. Payn's behalf, or in order to protect the reputation of his friends. It may be that the writer did not wish his friends to be identified with anything so anathema to the respectable world as vulgar Freethinking, or it may be that he wishes to protect himself from the imputation of having vulgar associates. For next to being a Freethinker oneself, is having Freethought friends. Of course, if the Freethinking acquaintance happens to be a man of position or of wealth—the latter is as good as the former in this country—nothing will be said. But if he happens to be a man of no position and poor, not even to have had a first-class education, then the less said about one's unfortunate friendship the better. In any case, the expression is, as Ilam Carve would say, characteristically British. It is quite English to estimate the value of unpopular opinions in terms of wealth or social opinion, or even as lacking the hall-mark of an expensive education.

The root meaning of "vulgar" is something that is in common use, or pertains to the crowd or to the common people. But that does not quite fit Freethought. The mass of people are not Freethinkers; and although Freethought has very many more followers to-day than it has ever before had, it cannot strictly be said to be common. It is Christianity that is common; religion that is really vulgar. And, class for class, whether we take the Freethinker in the higher or in the lower social circles, the one whose parents have been in a position to give him a costly education, or the one whose education has stopped short at the elementary school, one may safely challenge comparison with others in the same social stratum. They are usually the pick of their class. Necessarily so, for the mere movement away from the ruck of accepted opinion implies a higher level of character. To compare the Freethinker of poor social position with Christians who have had all the advantages of a costly—if often wasted—education, is as fair as comparing the blood-and-fire Salvation Army preacher with Haeckel, Meredith, Metchnikoff, Spencer, or Tylor.

I suspect that what Mr. Payn had in mind was not vulgar Freethought, either in the original sense of "vulgar" or even in the sense of Freethought as expressed by poorly educated people, but plainly spoken Freethought. It is permissible, for example, to write Freethought in expensive books which only a few can purchase. It is vulgar to do so in penny pamphlets, and still more so in tracts that are to be distributed gratuitously. It is quite permissible to attack religion in language more or less obscure, accompanied by insincere expressions of respect for the thing attacked, regrets at not being longer able to support it, and untruthful confessions of the pain experienced at its rejection. But to say plainly, fearlessly, honestly, that the whole thing is a lie, that its rejection lifted a load from the mind, and that the world seems a happier and a better place without it; all this is unpardonably vulgar, unutterably offensive. You may express this in language of faultless character, there may not be a single expression to which exception can be taken—it still remains vulgar and unforgivable. It is not vulgar because it is coarse and brutal; it is vulgar because it is straightforward and uncompromising.

I daresay that Mr. Payn must have come across a number of Christians who were coarse in speech, brutal in manner, and offensive in the way they expressed their opinions, and, from all points of view, genuinely vulgar. But he does not say "It is not to be supposed, however, that these were Christians of the vulgar sort." That in itself would be considered offensive. The Christian who pesters one in the street with inquiries about one's soul, who offers his impertinent sympathies on one's forlorn state, who pushes his coarse and ignorant literature through one's letter-box, is never described as vulgar. There is no judicial decision that attacks on Freethought must be expressed in such a manner that the chaste mind of a policeman is not affronted thereby. That only holds with regard to Freethought attacks on religion. It is not vulgar to morally steal the body of a dead Freethinker and carry out the farce of a Christian funeral. It is not even vulgar to tell lies about living Freethinkers. These are only examples of religious zeal. And although some Christians are superior to such actions, none condemn them.

Curiously, this particular fault is not characteristic of the very religious man. He does not usually discriminate vulgar Freethought from any other kind of Freethought. He impartially damns all varieties. It belongs more to the one whose religious beliefs are shaky, and who seeks to guard himself from suspicion by a free denunciation of other people. It is manifested with even a certain class of Freethinkers. A large part of the attractiveness of Agnosticism lies in its being "respectable" when contrasted with Atheism. The use of the word by Huxley and Spencer—both Freethinkers, but occupying commanding positions in the world of science and philosophy—provided a useful cover for timid souls. Genuine Agnosticism was just as "vulgar" as genuine Atheism. No one has ever been able to indicate any substantial difference between them. But it was a safer word. It diverted enmity and allayed suspicion. The Agnostic could always say, in effect, "It is true I do not believe in a God, but I do not call myself an Atheist. I am not as bad as he is. I have the redeeming merit of being ashamed to say what I am in unmistakable language. And if the religious world wants someone to kick, let it kick him." And he felt safe so long as the Atheist was there. Of course, if the Atheist was not there, if all the "vulgar" Atheists decided to become respectable Agnostics, Agnosticism would be no more a protective term than is Atheism under present conditions. It is a very shallow pretence, this of vulgarity, but it evidently serves.

After all, the world would have been in a parlous condition but for these "vulgar"—that is, straightforward—Freethinkers. All the Deistic attacks on Christianity were denounced as "vulgar" by religious critics. Paine, and Southwell, and Hetherington, and Carlile, and Holyoake, and Bradlaugh were all "vulgar" Freethinkers. They went to prison—all except the latter—because they dared to tell the truth in a plain, straightforward manner, such as any person of intelligence could appreciate. Their vulgarity lay in their clarity; it was their honesty that was the offence. In a society of hypocrites the honest man is a "sport," and every new variation has to face the hostility of the established species. But they did their work. They took the truth that was being whispered and shouted it from the housetops. They unlocked the truth from expensive volumes and distributed it in cheap papers and pamphlets. They forced the Churches to throw overboard doctrine after doctrine, and invited truth to be an occasional, if always shy, visitor to Christian pulpits. Above all, they made life easier — perhaps possible—for the "respectable" Freethinker. English freedom owes far more to the popular propaganda, carried on by men and women of poor position and limited resources, but unconquerable courage and incorruptible honesty, than it does to those who have often reaped profit and a cheap distinction in a field prepared for harvest by "vulgar," and, so far as the world is concerned, unknown Freethinkers.

Once upon a time, the Freethinker was simply wicked. That was a plain, straightforward charge, and Christians stuck to it as long as they could. But, then, Freethinkers became more numerous and better known. It did not pay to call them wicked. The charge was refuted by common experience. Then they became "vulgar." It was permissible to attack religion so long as it was done with deference, in a mincing manner, and with an apologetic air, as though you were half ashamed of the task. That is the stage we are now in. You may believe religion to be a lie, but don't say so. Suggest that it is a doubtful truth. You may believe it to be an evil, but don't say that. Say that the Churches have been responsible for much wrong-doing. You may be a Freethinker yourself, but don't give yourself away. Point out in what respect you differ from "vulgar" Freethinkers, and suspicion will be allayed. Above all, remember the great commandment, "Thou shalt love ease and social distinction with all thy soul; and though thy life may be half a lie, yet will thy days be long and thy name honored in the kingdom of public opinion."

C. COHEN.

In Praise of Unbelief.

IT is quite the fashion with some divines, at present, to extol Scepticism with all the eloquence at their command. The Rev. Professor H. R. Mackintosh, D.D., contributes an article on its merits to the British Weekly for September 4. The general prevalence of unbelief, even among professing Christians, is incontrovertible. The strongest faith is ever in conflict with doubt. On this point Dr. Mackintosh is most explicit:—

> "Those know little of personal religion who have not watched this profound conflict in themselves, or who deem it weak to confess it in the proper quarter. The thing is happening every day. Half the soul is for trusting God, the other half for suspecting him or defying him. One voice pleads that recent sorrow is the touch of a Father's hand, another cries that to speak of Fatherhood is folly. Each believing consciousness in its kind is a battlefield for these two. A Sceptic is hidden in the devoutest heart."

Everybody is fully aware of the truth of that passage, though the majority of clergymen would, perhaps, be inclined to deny it. When an intimate friend complained to Luther that there were times when he was unable to believe anything, to his astonishment, the Reformer gave warm thanks to God for the confession, saying that until then he had thought himself alone in that temptation. Bunyan has a great deal to say on the same subject, and one of his books is entitled Holy War. But no one has expressed himself with greater candor than Dr. Mackintosh does in the following extract:—

> "Life does not confirm the notion that by some sudden or magic change the followers of Jesus can fling off the temptation to unbelief for good and all. The soul cannot be wound up to make right feeling thenceforward automatically certain. Warfare with doubt is no inexplicable accident; it is part of faith's life."

The reverend Professor quotes someone who says: "There are sceptical thoughts which seem for the moment to uproot the firmest faith, and there are blasphemous thoughts which dart unbidden into the most reverent souls."

Now, what are we to make of such an uncompromising admission? What the divines claim is that doubt, if properly treated, becomes a means of grace. In itself it is "a deadly and insidious enemy," and Dr. Mackintosh speaks of the "lonely horrors" of it; but the object of its existence is to strengthen faith. It is here that we may grow in grace and knowledge by fighting and throwing it. On this account Professor Mackintosh urges us "to curb our minds and tongues when we might speak bitterly of unbelievers." Be appearances what they may, a believer is hidden in the most sceptical mind just as

"a sceptic is hidden in the devoutest heart." Of course, if a man encourages his doubt by letting it have its way with him, perdition stares him in the face and shall be his lot for ever, but if he courageously faces and wrestles with it, he shall have reason to praise God for sending it. Is this the true philosophy of unbelief? According to the Christian creed everything comes to pass by the providence of God; and, surely, unbelief can be no exception. Though our "deadly and insidious enemy," our "humiliating and enfeebling companion," unbelief is yet a servant of the Lord, always doing his will. If we are wicked enough to allow it to exercise dominion over us, it will do the Divine will by destroying us; but if we rise up against and conquer it, by the help of Christ, it will serve God by indirectly increasing and purifying our faith. Dr. Mackintosh expresses the opinion that complete victory over doubt is not possible in this world. "Life will be over, and the eternal presence won," he says, "before we shall see the last of this humiliating and enfeebling companion." Now, we maintain that if God existed, doubt would be absolutely impossible. Unbelief is a positive proof that the Divine Being is not an object of knowledge. If he were an object of knowledge, he would be known to all mankind. They who affirm that they know him and have communion with him, mistake faith for knowledge, and are self-deceived. Knowledge and doubt cannot coexist. They who know that in the Indian Ocean there is an island called Madagascar are never hunted by disbelief in its existence; but if the statement were made that there is a city as big as London on the planet Saturn its truth would legitimately be open to doubt, because no one has ever seen such a city, and consequently its existence is incapable of any sort of proof. At best, such a city is merely an object of belief, not in any sense of knowledge. Its existence is a thing that can be neither proved nor yet disproved; it is purely and simply a creation of the imagination. Now, if, like Madagascar, God were an object of knowledge, no one would ever be tempted to disbelieve in him; but being, like the city in Saturn, simply an object of belief, it inevitably follows that millions of people totally disbelieve in him, whilst the firmest believers are constantly harassed with doubts and fears.

Supernatural belief is of necessity irrational, and doubt is the mind's natural protest against it. Take the belief in a Supreme Being, and consider its utter baselessness. "No man hath seen God at any time," or heard his voice. The idea of the Universe, with all its imperfections and cruelty, being the work of such a Being, is laughed to scorn by the reason. Disbelief in God is, therefore, commendable, being reasonable. To treat it as a sin is to be guilty of high treason against human nature. Dr. Mackintosh is mistaken when he says that "half the soul is for trusting God," the whole mind, when left to itself, being for having nothing at all to do with him. The children who receive no religious education whatever grow up into men and women who are never troubled by any thought of a Supreme Being. By nature every human being is a complete Atheist. The reverend gentleman is equally wrong in saying that the other half of the soul is for suspecting God or defying him, the truth being that the mind, uncorrupted by superstitious training, is utterly without the God-idea. If Dr. Mackintosh's statement were true it would be an insufferable insult to the God in whom he believes. Again, take the belief in the spiritual world, and examine it in the light of reason. What evidence of its existence has ever been adduced? Like God, it is solely an object of belief. No one has ever seen it, or a single one of its inhabitants. It is fully as imaginary an object as that city in Saturn. Some of us have seen Madagascar ourselves, and others believe in its existence on the evidence of those who have. That is to say, to some of us Madagascar is an object of knowledge, while to others it is an object of belief founded on the testimony of travellers who have been there. But nobody ever lived who could truthfully declare that he had visited the spiritual world, and could testify that it actually existed. And yet the divines speak of it as if it were an object of knowledge, or of belief founded on unimpeachable testimony. As a matter of fact, it is neither; and we claim that to believe in it is an offence against common sense.

The same remarks apply to the belief in Christ. His existence is equally insusceptible of verification. Dr. Mackintosh alludes to his "unchanging grace"; but what has it ever done for mankind? It is said to be a supernatural commodity, but we have not seen anything supernatural about the character and conduct of the people who glory in its possession. We do not for a moment doubt the sincerity of Martin Luther, but we are quite sure that he gave expression to a morally degrading heresy when he cried, "We are nothing; Christ is all." No other heresy has ever wrought so much harm in the world as that; and, unfortunately, it is dying a painfully slow death. Dr. Mackintosh says:—

> "One tried plan of safety is to cast ourselves down into the depths of Christ's sympathy, and take the shelter of his power. He, if we ask him, will reinforce the higher impulse, and disable fear, and strengthen us to believe with passion whatever about God and the great salvation is worth believing."

If there had been any reality in Christ's love and sympathy, ours would have been a perfectly good and happy world for the last nineteen hundred years. Instead of that, even Christendom, where Christ is asserted to have conquered, groans under an intolerable load of crime and misery, of oppression and injustice; and the Christian city of New York is admitted by a Christian missionary to have more murders committed in it in one week than are committed in one year in the Pagan city of Canton, in China. Where does the benefit of Christ's reign show itself? If Christendom stands morally no higher than Heathendom, are we not to conclude that God in Christ has been a dismal failure?

We therefore wish to sing the praises of unbelief in the Fables of the Above, because the belief in them has seriously hampered mankind in its upward march. It has prevented it from taking its problems into its own hands and solving them by the exercise of its own inherent powers. If Christ is all and does all, it would be presumption on our part to undertake any tasks whatever. Our duty is to pray and wait, self-reliance being the worst of sins. We rejoice to know that this demoralising heresy is at last passing, and that mankind is slowly learning to lean upon and help itself. Unbelief in God means belief in man, and doubt about the next world spells certainty concerning this. On this account we pronounce religious unbelief a highly praiseworthy virtue, which ought to prevail more and more.

> "Out of this vast scene of war and terrible rapine it would be an agreeable recollection if one could think that some of the missionaries raised their voices in merciful protest against the outrages committed by the Allied soldiery. But no such voice was heard. They stood by silent spectators of this crucifixion of Christianity."—G. LYNCH, The War of the Civilisations, p. 318.

> "Even some missionaries took such a leading part in 'spoiling the Egyptians' for the greater glory of God that a bystander was heard to say, 'For a century to come Chinese converts will consider looting and vengeance Christian virtues.'"—SIR ROBERT HART, These from the Land of Sinim, p. 90.

WE shall not follow the Allied Forces on their march to Pekin. Mr. George Lynch, one of the correspondents, has partly described the horrors of that devastating march. He says, when the Chinese—

> "heard the guns of the invaders, and saw at night their path torchlit by burning villages, [they] evidently thought that the time had come for their wives and sisters, as well as for themselves, to save themselves by suicide. There are things that I must not write, and that may not be printed in England, which would seem to show that this Western civilisation of ours is merely a veneer over savagery. The actual truth has never been written about any war, and this will be no exception."*

Mr. Foote's fine article, written at the time, and lately reproduced in these columns, "Christian Beasts in China," gives some idea of what happened. When they arrived in Pekin, the looting began. Pekin is a wealthy and populous city, full of great trading establishments, large warehouses, and thriving banks. Mr. Lynch declares that the Allied Forces constituted "the biggest-looting excursion since the days of Pizarro" (p. 179). And the missionaries, who caused all the bother, took a hand in the looting as well. Mr. Lynch says:—

> "First of all, there were the missionary looters. They had a number of converts more or less dependent upon them. This was given by them as a reason for what some people considered their stealing and holding sales of stolen goods. Their modus operandi was first to hoist flags over the houses of wealthy inhabitants, thereby protecting the buildings from the soldiers. Then on the doors they would affix a notice saying this was the property of such-and-such a mission. The reverend gentleman would then move into one of the houses, and start to hold a sale of the contents. When the goods were exhausted he would move on to another, and so on" (p. 182).

It is not only upon China that the missionaries have brought such awful disaster. Japan had a terrible experience of Christian fanaticism. A man of genius has described the result of the introduction, by the Jesuits, of Christianity into that country, as follows:—

> "This religion [Christianity], for which thousands vainly died, had brought to Japan nothing but evil: disorders, persecutions, revolts, political troubles, and war. Even those virtues of the people which had been evolved at unutterable cost for the protection and conservation of society,—their self-denial, their faith, their loyalty, their constancy and courage—were by this black creed distorted, diverted, and transformed into forces directed to the destruction of that society.....Viewed from another standpoint than that of religious bias, and simply judged by its results, the Jesuit effort to Christianise Japan must be regarded as a crime against humanity, a labor of devastation, a calamity comparable only,—by reason of the misery and destruction which it wrought,—to an earthquake, a tidal-wave, a volcanic eruption."†

The Polynesian Islands of the South Seas—regarded by most Christians as the peculiar crown and jewel of missionary enterprise—has the same tale to tell. Mr. Frank Burnett, who knows the islands well, tells us that the various Christian sects not only fought and quarrelled among themselves,—

> "but also urged the pugnacious and excitably inclined native to take sides in their unseemly squabbles to such an extent that the Government had to parcel the islands out among the three different warring religious communities in order to prevent the imminent danger of anarchy and lawlessness, with its bloody consequences."‡

And this is how things went on, under missionary rule, before the British protectorate was declared:—

> "At Tapuiouea, under combined chief and missionary rule, the Christians, who numbered at least two-thirds of the population, becoming very zealous in the interests of, and with the view of propagating, the faith, gave their Pagan brethren the alternative of either at once embracing the Christian religion or of being cleared root and branch from off the earth, thereby emulating the Jewish chosen people in their treatment of the Canaanites. The minority proved unreasonable enough to refuse compliance with such a righteous demand; consequently they were, without any delay, attacked by the Christian section, led on by the native missionaries, and, after some fighting, were defeated; whereupon they, with their wives and families, barricaded themselves in the large Maneappa or Council House on the island. An attempt to storm this place of refuge having failed, after mature consideration it was deliberately set on fire, with the result that, including those who were ruthlessly slaughtered while attempting to escape the flames, the lives of from 1,200 to 1,500 men, women, and children were sacrificed by Christian zealots for their 'holy cause.'"*

In New Zealand the same effects followed the introduction of Christianity and the distribution of the Bible broadcast among the natives. The Pai Marire, or Hau Hau, religion of the Maoris was, like that of the Tai-pings, founded wholly upon the Bible; and transformed the natives into incarnate fiends. Colonel Hamilton-Browne, who took a leading part in fighting these fanatics, says that by the year 1858 the Bible had been translated into the Maori language, and—

> "very many of the natives had learned to read, and the Sacred Writings were read with avidity. Now the Maoris were puzzled, like many others, by the various denominations, each claiming they were right and that the others were wrong, yet all asserting they drew their inferences from the same Book. Among the tribes existed bitter rivalry, hatred, and jealousy, so they gloried in belonging to different sects, and consequently added religious rancor to their tribal hatred. Missionaries, however, travelled through the country with impunity, not one receiving any harm until 1865. There was, however, a very great desire on the part of a vast number of the natives to find out which was the real and true faith, so that many of them joined one sect after another, as if to discover which fancy brand of religion suited his own constitution best; and being highly intellectual and keen reasoners, they came to the conclusion that each sect was only formed from the interpretation by the devotees of the Book itself, and that therefore they [the Maoris] had a perfect right to interpret the Sacred Writings in any way they saw fit. Just previous to the promulgation of the Pai Marire faith the Maoris had elected a king. Why, therefore, should they not have a new religion? Hence the growth of the Hau Hau's."†

The Maori wars, which began in 1860, had, up to 1864—says Colonel Hamilton-Browne, who served as Commandant in the Colonial Forces—"been carried on by the natives in a manner that had earned them the respect of our men. Their splendid courage, combined with their wild chivalry, made them an enemy worthy of the highest praise." But after 1864, says the same writer,—

> "the invention of the new religion, called Pai Marire turned the Maoris, both Christian and Pagan, from chivalrous, if savage, enemies into howling, blood-thirsty fanatics who murdered in cold blood, with every vile atrocity, man and woman and child not only of the white race but even also of the Maoris who refused to join their crazy faith."‡

And this lasted for seven years, until in 1871, when unable any longer to face the superior forces brought against them, the remaining Hau Hau's fled to the King Country and remained quiet.

And what is the result of missionary teaching on the African? Miss Mary Kingsley, in Travels in West Africa (1897), had the courage to tell the truth about African Missions. She said:—

> "The missionary-made man is the curse of the Coast, and you find him in European clothes and without, all the way down from Sierra Leone to Loanda. The Pagans despise him, the whites hate him; still he thinks enough of himself to keep him comfortable" (p. 490).

And she emphatically declares:—

> "I have no hesitation in saying that in the whole of West Africa, in one week, there is not one-quarter the amount of drunkenness you can see any Saturday night you choose in a couple of hours in the Vauxhall-road, and you will not find in a whole year's investigation on the Coast one-seventieth part of the evil, degradation, and premature decay you can see any afternoon you choose to take a walk in the more densely populated parts of any of our own towns" (pp. 493-4).

Professor Huxley, after a voyage round the world, in which he had an opportunity of seeing savage life in all conceivable conditions, declared that he found "nothing worse, nothing more degrading, nothing so hopeless, nothing nearly so intolerably dull and miserable as the life I had left behind me in the East End of London." And he said he would "deliberately prefer the life of the savage to that of those people in Christian London."*

As Dr. Knighton remarked :—

> "We spend millions of pounds in the vain endeavor to Christianise remote savages of all kinds, human beings to whom the elements of Christianity are incomprehensible. We have millions of people in Europe in want of the necessaries of life, of education, and of all that makes life endurable."†

In many places savage tribes have been almost wiped out of existence through the missionaries insisting upon the natives wearing clothes quite unsuited for the tropics. Mr. Dunderdale, speaking of the Australian blacks, says :—

> "The blankets we kindly gave them by way of saving their souls were manufactured for the most part for the colonial market, and would no more resist rain than an old clothes-basket. The consequence was that when the weather was cold and wet, the black fellow and his blanket were also cold and wet, and he began to shiver; inflammation attacked his lungs, and rheumatism his limbs, and he soon went to that land where neither blankets nor rugs are required. Mr. Tyers was of opinion that more blacks were killed by the blankets than by rum and bullets."‡

The Rev. C. Haldon, a strong advocate of foreign missions, tells us that "The amount annually given in the United Kingdom to Foreign Missions by all denominations is about two millions sterling. This is a fact which the historian of to-morrow will be bound to expatiate upon."§ The historian of to-morrow will expatiate upon it right enough, but not in the manner that the Rev. C. Haldon anticipates. It will be with righteous indignation at the folly and wickedness of spending this enormous sum yearly —which takes no account of the equally enormous sums contributed by America, France, and Germany— upon heathen, where it does no good, but a great deal of harm; while a large part of our own people are sunk in the uttermost depths of misery and degradation, to a degree quite unknown to any savage tribe on the face of the earth.

W. MANN.

Goethe's Rhapsody on Nature.

(About the year 1780.)

NATURE! We are by her surrounded and encompassed—unable to step out of her, and unable to enter deeper into her. Unsolicited and unwarned, she receives us into the circuit of her dance, and hurries along with us, till we are exhausted and drop out of her arms.

She creates ever new forms; what now is was never before; what was comes not again—all is new, and yet always the old.

We live in her midst, and are strangers to her. She speaks with us incessantly, and betrays not her mystery to us. We affect her constantly, and yet have no power over her.

She seems to have contrived everything for individuality, but cares nothing for individuals. She builds ever, and destroys ever, and her workshop is inaccessible.

She lives in children alone; and the mother, where is she? She is the only artist: from the simplest subject to the greatest contrasts; without apparent effort to the greatest perfection, to the preciseest exactness—always covered with something gentle. Every one of her works has a being of its own, every one of her phenomena has the most isolated idea, and yet they all make one.

She acts a play on the stage; whether she sees it herself we know not, and yet she plays it for us who stand in the corner.

There is an eternal living, becoming and moving in her, and yet she proceeds not farther. She transforms herself forever, and there is no moment of standing still in her. Of remaining in a spot she does not think, and she attaches her curse upon standing still. She is firm, her step is measured, her exceptions rare, her laws unalterable.

She has thought, and is constantly meditating; not as a man, but as nature. She has an all-embracing mind of her own, and no one can penetrate it.

Men are all in her, and she is in all. With all she carries on a friendly game, and rejoices the more they win from her. She plays it with many so secretly that she plays it to the end ere they know it.

The most unnatural is also nature; even the stupidest Philistinism hath something of her genius. Who sees her not everywhere sees her nowhere aright.

She loves herself, and clings ever, with eyes and hearts without number, to herself. She has divided herself in pieces in order to enjoy herself. Ever she lets new enjoyers grow, insatiable to impart herself.

She delights in illusion. Whoever destroys this in himself and others, him she punishes as the strictest tyrant. Whoever trustfully follows her, him she presses like a child to her heart.

Her children are without number. To no one is she altogether niggardly, but she has favorites on whom she squanders much, and to whom she sacrifices much. To greatness she has pledged her protection.

She flings forth her creatures out of nothing, and tells them not whence they come, nor whither they are going. Let them only run; she knows the way.

She has few springs, but those are never worn out, always active, always manifold.

Her play is ever new, because she ever creates new spectators. Life is her finest invention, and death is her artifice to get more life.

She veils man in darkness, and spurs him continually to the light. She makes him dependent on the earth, dull and heavy, and keeps rousing him afresh.

She gives want, because she loves motion. The wonder is that she accomplishes all this motion with so little. Every want is a benefit; quickly satisfied, quickly growing again. If she gives one more, it is a new source of pleasure; but she soon comes into equilibrium.

She sets out every moment for the longest race, and is every moment at the goal.

She is vanity itself, but not for us, to whom she has made herself of the greatest weight.

She lets every child tinker upon her, every fool pass judgment upon her; thousands stumble over her and see nothing; and she has her joy in all, and she finds in all her account.

Man obeys her laws, even when he strives against them; he works with her even when he would work against her.

She makes of all she gives a blessing, for she first makes it indispensable. She lags, that we may long for her; she hastens, that we may not grow weary of her.

She has no speech nor language; but she creates tongues and hearts through which she feels and speaks.

Her crown is love. Only through it can one come near her. She creates gaps between all beings, and is always ready to engulf all. She has isolated all, to draw all together. By a few draughts from the cup of love she makes up for a life full of trouble. She is all. She rewards herself and punishes herself, delights and torments herself. She is rude and gentle, lovely and terrible, powerless and almighty.

All is always now in her. Past and future knows she not. The present is her eternity.

She is kindly. I praise her with all her works. She is wise and quiet. One can tear no explanation from her, extort from her no gift, which she gives not of her own free will. She is cunning, but for a good end, and it is best not to observe her cunning.

She is whole, and yet ever uncompleted. As she plies it, she can always ply it.

To everyone she appears in a form of her own. She hides herself in a thousand names and terms, and is always the same.

She has placed me here, she will lead me away. I trust myself to her. She may manage it with me. She will not hate her work. It is not I who spake of her. No; both the true as well as the false, she has spoken it all. All the guilt is hers, all the merit hers.—Open Court.

A mass, if not the majority, of people in every civilised country is still living in a state of intellectual savagery, in fact, the smooth surface of cultured society is sapped and mined by superstition. Only those whose studies have led them to investigate the subject are aware of the depth to which the ground beneath our feet is thus as it were honeycombed by unseen forces. We appear to be standing on a volcano which may at any moment break out in smoke and fire to spread ruin and devastation among the gardens and palaces of ancient culture wrought so laboriously by the hands of many generations.—Prof. J. G. Frazer, "Scope of Social Anthropology."

Literary Gossip.

The September number of the Humanitarian contains two interesting articles. One is "The Language of Domestic Fowls" by Edward Carpenter and George Merrill; the other is "What is Humanitarianism?" presumably from the pen of Mr. Salt. I have the honor to agree with nearly the whole of it. But I do not, because I cannot, endorse Dr. A. R. Wallace's denial of the cruelty of nature in the operation of natural selection through the struggle for existence. It is true, of course, that a great deal of suffering, both in the lower animals and in ourselves, is a matter of imagination; but, in the ultimate result, it is that very faculty which is the vital basis of the humanitarian argument. Dr. Wallace's attitude is simply that of a super-naturalist, who has an object in "moralising" nature, instead of admitting that nature is simply non-moral. He has lately contended that our present civilised society is the worst that ever was; yet he still upholds the absurdity that wisdom and goodness are behind the world. Perhaps they are behind it; they are not in it.

It is easy to say that man's cruelties are deliberate, while nature's are not; but what, in that case, becomes of Dr. Wallace's argument—which is for intention in nature? That the lower animals kill each other in the quickest way means that they are hungry when they are doing it; they are after food, and not sport. When you come to man, you find that he delights in cruelty. It would take a big book to contain an account of the devilries he has practised upon his fellow man merely for a difference of opinion on quite imaginary subjects. But why call these "unnatural cruelties"? They are quite on all fours with the doings of nature. What man ever killed his most hated enemy with the cruelty that nature inflicts upon the victims of cancer? Man is not capable of such things. Nature beats him hollow in this as in other directions. She always gets the better of him in the end. Witness hospitals, cemeteries, and crematoriums. And there is a powerful passage in Mill's essay on "Nature" which nobody has ever answered—and nobody ever will answer; because it is less an argument than an unchallengable statement of facts.

Some time ago I censured a well-known journalist for using "antiquarian" as a substantive. I said that there was no such substantive in the English dictionary. The proper word was "antiquary." I have been told that I was wrong; at least the word "antiquarian" as a substantive has been pointed out to me in an English dictionary. I knew it could be pointed out,—not only in one, but in a dozen English dictionaries. The expression I used was not an English dictionary, but the English dictionary—which is equivalent to the English language. I still stand by what I said. Dictionaries do not make words, they register them; and they register slipshod as well as accuracy. It is demonstrable that "antiquary" was always used properly for hundreds of years. Sir Walter Scott would have been soundly rated if he had called one of his novels The Antiquarian. Even now in the popular dictionaries "Antiquary" takes precedence. "Antiquarian" has a secondary place as being used both as an adjective, which it properly is, and as a substantive, which it properly is not.

The illegitimate use of the word came in, as so many other illegitimacies did, in the modern era of cheap newspapers, universal reading, and irresponsible journalism. For my own part, I do not pretend to omniscience or infallibility; but I do respect our noble English tongue; and I may add that my knowledge of it is not derived from dictionaries, but from a personal study of its literature, and above all of its masterpieces, written by great men of genius who had something to say, and not by journalists of the day and hour who were earning the only thing they could earn—their daily bread.

Slipshod writing is only too common nowadays. He who writes for daily or weekly papers of immense circulation writes for the unlearned and the uncritical. He may start well, but he is apt to become slovenly, because he has not the impulse of genius, and the public he addresses is so unexacting. Presently he is satisfied to fill his space in a passable way; and if his readers continue to look upon him as an oracle it is because a one-eyed man—however poor that solitary optic may be—is easily first amongst the blind.

I am sorry to say that Mr. A. E. Fletcher, a Christian Socialist, who constantly praises the Sermon on the Mount without ever being detected in reducing an iota of it to practice, seems to have permanently joined this species of journalists. He takes a sixth of a page or so of Reynolds' and chatters in a know-all, careless way about books and writers. Last week he took Swinburne for his subject, under the title of the "Rhetorician of Democracy." One gathers from the article with this invidious heading that it would have been far better for Swinburne if he had consulted Mr. Fletcher, instead of following his own imperfect judgment. Mr. Fletcher could have given him a great many useful hints; including, for instance, what time his death would have been most serviceable to his reputation; although that is a matter on which poets are no more ready than other persons to take advice.

Brief as Mr. Fletcher's article is it contains something about himself (of course!) as well as about Swinburne, and several references designed to show the extent of the writer's erudition, besides some blunders which he would have to avoid if he were writing in a journal that had a well-informed respect for literature. We are apprised of that obscure fact (or tradition) that Milton thought Paradise Regained was better than Paradise Lost. Also that Landor thought his Gebir (written when he was a little over twenty!) was going to be his masterpiece; though he afterwards "said himself somewhere [how elegant and precise!] that he believed there was only one man who ever read it besides himself, and that was Robert Southey." Such chatter is, to say the least of it, careless. Severe judges might call it by a much harsher name. It was De Quincey who believed that he was the only reader of Gebir until he met with a fellow reader in Southey. How many readers the poem had is not to be determined at this time of day, but we know that its admirers included not only Southey and De Quincey, but also Shelley, Byron, Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Sir Walter Scott.

Mr. Fletcher is more truly his old self in his remarks on Songs Before Sunrise. But why does he speak of its "strong rhetoric"? Did it not contain magnificent poetry? Was not its thunder melodious? Did not the poet hail freedom, justice, and humanity in language fit for the gods? Mr. Fletcher admits that Swinburne was, in his younger days, "all a wonder and delight." Being printed as a quotation these words are taken, we presume, from Browning's glorious invocation of his dead wife at the end of the first part of the great Ring and the Book:—and spoiled in the taking.

Swinburne was a great critic as well as a great poet. Mr. Fletcher finds that "as a critic of other poets, he was extravagant both in his praise and his blame." I deny it. I admit that he was enthusiastic. Good red blood poised from his heart; not the milk of the sentimentalist nor the ginger-beer of the pedantic commentator. One of Swinburne's most delightful characteristics was the royal way in which he heaped praise upon other great (or good) writers—even amongst his contemporaries. There was not an atom of envy or jealousy in his composition. "Never to praise with enthusiasm," said Vauvenargues, "is the sign of a mediocre nature." Swinburne praised with enthusiasm. He praised noble work nobly. It is nonsense to say, as Mr. Fletcher does, that he was "not over generous to Tennyson." To say this is not to have read or not to have remembered. And when one is told that he was "very unfair to Praed," one can only reply, "Who the devil was Praed?" Praed!

I venture to say that Swinburne's criticism shows the highest qualities of judgment. He was nearly always right—if I may be allowed to say so. He had a wonderfully sound instinct for the best work in all departments of literature. And the addition of eloquence, which ordinary critics do not command, made his prose delightful to those who, if they had no genius themselves, were responsive to its appeal.

Mr. Fletcher is a Christian. I am an Atheist. Contrary to the common notion, it is the Christian, and not the Atheist, who has lost his reverence. It is very odd. But not so odd when you go below the surface of things. A Christian believes that God died for him. How is real reverence compatible with such insane vanity as that?

G. W. FOOTE.

Thus while the avowed creed of the enlightened minority is constantly changing under the influence of reflection and inquiry, the real, though unavowed, creed of the mass of mankind appears to be almost stationary, and the reason why it alters so little is that, in the majority of men, whether they are savages or outwardly civilised beings, intellectual progress is so slow as to be hardly perceptible.—Prof. J. G. Frazer, "Scope of Social Anthropology."

Acid Drops.

Religion — and especially modern religion — seems the quintessence of selfishness. One would imagine that a man who had any claim to that title would hardly think of himself in the midst of the horrors of the railway disaster at Aisgill Summit. But there was one survivor who naively told a pressman of his feelings in the following manner: "The sight was one," he said, "which I shall carry with me to my last day on earth. I cannot even speak about it, because I realise that it was only by Providence that I myself am not numbered amongst the dead." Perhaps we should charitably hope that this gentleman did not fully realise what he was saying. If he did he must have believed that Providence planned that horrible "accident," with all its shocking details of human suffering, just to satisfy the survivors of their importance in the divine economy. Even little babies were burnt to death in order to make this gentleman see what deep interest the Almighty took in his preservation. Such is the moral influence of religion! No wonder it has been called the curse and degradation of mankind.

The case of a lady traveller was not as bad as that of the gentleman who reckoned himself in the good books of Providence, but it showed that religion does not minister to disinterestedness. "One woman," the same report says, "holding her baby close to her, was sobbing out a prayer of thanks that her life had been saved, with that of her little child." There was at least the mother's love to claim forgiveness in this case.

An hysterical penman in the Christian Age wishes God to help the "lower-class" Secularists. Not even God could help the lower-class Christians—judging by the samples at Christian Evidence meetings.

"Sitting like a stuffed cow gazing with vacuous mind at what passes before your eyes" is, according to a Sunderland vicar, one of the effects of picture shows. Especially, we presume, on Sunday evenings.

Kansas State, a number of the inhabitants of which recently requested the Governor to arrange for a day of prayer to secure rain, has now prepared a scheme for the erection of huge reservoirs to prevent drought in future. This seems a sad waste of public money and an insult to Providence. If prayer can bring rain, it is folly to waste time and money on building reservoirs in order to conserve the water. The wisest thing would be to segregate all the believers in prayer on a tract of land and build the reservoirs among those who think more of engineers than of Jehovah.

Mr. Carnegie told a representative of a Dutch Press Agency that he likes newspaper men whatever the paper they represent. All papers are alike to him, he said. We believe Mr. Carnegie to be quite sincere in saying this. Any other advertiser would say the same thing. It is not the opinions of the papers they care about, but their circulation.

To be quite serious and quite frank, Mr. Carnegie is just an example of the demoralising power of wealth. We have been unable to see anything in Mr. Carnegie but a mind of a very commonplace order, with a perfect mania for advertising Mr. Carnegie. All he has to say on any subject never rises above the commonest of commonplaces. Had he not been a multi-millionaire, he would never have been heard of. Being a man of millions, he is able to secure that his name shall be stuck about the country on buildings that have to be maintained by the ratepayers. He figures at the Hague solely in virtue of his money. He issues an appeal to the German Emperor for peace solely because he has money, and which, coming from a poor man of ten times Carnegie's ability, would have been treated as an act of impertinence. The press fawns on him and chronicles his doings and his carefully calculated gifts. When wealth is worshiped in this way, it becomes one of the gravest of social dangers and a centre of demoralisation.

The Rev. W. L. S. Coghlan, vicar of Holy Trinity, Stepney, says "God doesn't care for clothes; He isn't a second-hand clothes dealer." It is a delicate subject, but when on earth "the Lord" was not exactly a Beau Brummel. He did a little tailoring in Eden; but that was a very long time ago.

The clergy have little sense of humor, and anyone with a keen appreciation of fun might do worse than glance at any of the parish magazines. Writing in the current number of The Brightside, published in connection with Cliff Town Congregational Church, Southend-on-Sea, the Rev. D. Ewart James states, "All being well, our organ will first speak to us on Monday, September 8." Certainly, the age of miracles has not passed.

Father Gasquet, head of the English Benedictines, is paying a lecturing visit to the United States. A press agency reports him as saying that the condition of religion in England, outside the Catholic Church, is most deplorable. Oxford and Cambridge are becoming more and more Atheistical, the Anglican Bishops are frankly Freethinkers. Within a generation, says Father Gasquet, England will be divided between Roman Catholics and Freethinkers, as Protestantism is becoming more and more a negligible force. Father Gasquet's conclusion is that those who are not drifting away from all religion are drifting towards Catholicism. We quite agree with the concluding sentence, and we should be pleased to feel that the prophecy concerning what is to happen during the next generation is sound. We are afraid, however, that Father Gasquet is merely beating the big drum in an attempt to convince people that the Roman Church is the only refuge against Freethought. We believe it is the best refuge, but Father Gasquet overlooks the fact that while the Protestant world is being tapped by his own Church on one side and by Freethought on the other, the Roman Church itself is ultimately powerless to arrest the disintegration of religion. That is part of a general world-movement. The Roman Church may form a kind of religious Alsatia for deities seeking protection; but even Alsatias do not last for ever.

The Solicitor-General, Sir J. Simon, has been getting into hot water with his Nonconformist backers. Very thoughtlessly, he promised to speak at a Nationalist demonstration at Newry on Sunday, September 28. This has, says the Daily Telegraph, roused a storm of indignant protest in English Nonconformist circles, and it is expected that the Solicitor-General will discover that he cannot attend. Dr. Horton says that Sir John Simon's action will damage the Government far more than anything else could do. That guardian of the public morals, Rev. F. B. Meyer, has also entered his familiar greasy protest against one of his Majesty's Ministers attending a demonstration on Sunday. The Lord Primate of Ireland says that Sir John has already taken steps to climb down. We should not be surprised. Sir John Simon is a politician, and as such is not likely to offend supporters if he can possibly avoid it. The Irish voters are not in his constituency, and it will be safer to offend them than English Nonconformists. But it is a pretty state of affairs when men placed in responsible positions are so quickly brought to heel at the command of a number of Sabbatarian bigots. A due sense of personal dignity should lead Sir John Simon to treat such reproofs with contempt.

Sir John Simon, having returned from a holiday, corrects the announcement that he had engaged to address a Nationalist meeting on Sunday, September 28. His letter to the Primate of the Protestant Church in Ireland is a smart performance. He turns the tables on that ecclesiastic by asking what the Protestant Churches in Ulster are going to do on Sunday, September 28? Are the clergy not to preach against Home Rule on that date? Are they not urged to "allow their churches and services to be used as the place and occasion of demonstrations in support of Sir Edward Carson's political policy?" And if these are not political meetings what are they? Thus the Primate is caught in his own trap. We are glad to see that the Solicitor-General does not perceive anything wrong in a political speech on Sunday—at a proper place.

In India the revenue from the sale of intoxicating drinks has increased from two to four millions sterling during the last ten years. In India there is no religious instruction in the State schools, and so the Methodist Times improves the occasion by asserting that "It is education apart from religion that must be held mainly responsible for this decadence," and invites subscriptions to the missionary fund. We beg to point out that England grew more and more drunken while education was wholly in the hands of religious organisations, and when there was no education apart from religion. It has become less drunken since education has been partly freed from religion. We are not silly enough to assert that the drunkenness resulted from the religious teaching, or that a growing sobriety was wholly due to the State taking education out of the hands of the Churches. But if we did so the argument would be quite as good as that advanced by the Methodist Times.

A local preacher writes to the Methodist Times that he has not much hope of the world being converted before Christ's second coming. Neither have we. He also believes that the second coming will convert the world at once. So do we. We agree completely with this local preacher. When Christ comes again we quite believe that it will work a wonderful conversion in all who are then alive. And if the Freethinker is then alive, we shall not be surprised to find the whole of its staff converted—editor and all. When he comes. Yes, when!

We have often had the impression that Dissenters believe civilisation commenced with the "Free" Churches. Many little things keep occurring to confirm this. For instance, the managing director of the Free Church Lecture Agency says that if it had not been for the Free Churches, lecturing would scarcely have come into existence at all. After that, we should not be surprised to learn that the Free Churches invented gravitation and manufactured the British Constitution.

Two little French girls have been seeing visions of Joan of Arc. She appears to them every day in the same spot, and cinematograph operators have been on the spot to "film" the appearance. Of course, the camera fails to show the vision; but this does not interfere with a number of people believing it to be genuine. The proof is that when the girls were shown a picture of the spot, they still saw the saint there—which is just what one would expect. Joan addresses one little girl in Latin and the other in French. It is said that feeling runs very high among the villagers, and the number of visions seen by other people increases daily. An epidemic of mystic hysteria seems to be setting in. Such occurrences remind one how very thin, after all, is our veneer of civilisation.

M. Henri Bergson has been hailed by the hard-pressed defenders of the faith as a modern St. George attacking the dragon of Freethought. At the time we doubted if they would find the distinguished philosopher so orthodox as they thought. The Pope has now condemned M. Bergson's views as "false theories" and "poisonous error."

The prospectus of a seaside school for boys announces that "the headmaster believes that a child should be taught to follow the religion of his mother." If the lady were a Seventh Day Adventist, or a Muggletonian, the schoolmaster's face would be worth seeing.

A book has been published with the suggestive title, Religion and Fairyland. So far as the Bible is concerned, from the talking snake in Eden to the aeronautical expedition of the Messiah, the book is mainly a collection of fairy tales.

The Rev. Frank Ballard, the notorious infidel slayer, has been described by a Christian Commonwealth interviewer as "a man with no skin to his soul." This is a fortunate circumstance should the reverend gentleman ever visit the Nether Regions.

A Roman Catholic Bishop—Bishop Amigo—visited Wandsworth Prison the other day to attend to the spiritual needs of his co-religionists. He found 200 there to welcome him, and delivered an address in the prison chapel. He pointed out what a "great blessing and privilege" it was to have a special chaplain and a beautiful chapel at their service, and urged them to make the most of it. We have no doubt they will, and many of them will pay the place a return visit. We are also told that the Bishop was delighted at the hearty way in which the prayers were said and the hymns were sung. Quite so; we should not be at all surprised to learn that some of these inmates in Wandsworth Prison are amongst the most devout in the diocese. Evidently their offences, whatever they were, do not interfere with the fervency of their religion; and just as evidently the fervency of religion does not prevent their being in Wandsworth Prison, with a special chaplain and a beautiful chapel, not open to the general public. The joke is that this account is taken from the Catholic Times, so that it is not the creation of a sarcastic reporter. But we wonder what would be said if the President of the N. S. S. visited Wandsworth Prison and found 200 of his fellow unbelievers ready to listen to an address? The religious people seem somehow to get all the privileges.

"What a lot of Jews there are in high places" writes a society journalist. Was he referring to the fact that half Christendom worships a Jew and the other half a Jewess?

A new play is to be produced with the title of The Ever-Open Door. It has no relation to a recent controversy, but to London, which is getting almost as congested as the place where the "Lord" consigns his failures.

Southlands Brotherhood, York, has published a list of its Sunday afternoon speakers for September. Rev. A. Stanley Parker's is not bad—"Midnight Adventures in New York streets"—the streets, apparently, being in "the underworld." Councillor J. T. Clarke's subject, however, is better than that: "What God and I can do." We understand that God can do everything. Councillor Clarke, therefore, does all the rest. We are glad to know that the Almighty has such good backing.

Rev. W. H. Heap, of Hull, says that there could be "no absolute proof" of a future life "until we woke up on the other side." We have been saying that for forty years and more, and thousands of sensible people believe it. Mr. Heap joins us on this point. Many other clericals will do the same when they are honest enough—or frightened enough.

Blue Books are mines of information to the skilled reader. Two striking examples of drunkards reformed by change of environment and treatment appear in the report of the Inspector for Scotland under the Inebriates' Act. One was a drunken woman, well known to the police, who has for three years filled a responsible position and led an exemplary life. The other case is that of a married woman with a long list of convictions. She has also been reformed, and has lived respectably with her husband for over two years. As these women were reformed by purely secularistic agencies, their photographs will not be published in the religious press, and evangelists will not get delirious in reciting their stories.

Christian Scientists are now being brought into court, just like the Peculiar People. They may treat themselves as they please, but they must bring in a doctor to attend to their sick children. We did not know that this was the law of England, but the judges are evidently going to decide that it is. But if medical science is to take the place of prayer—and we are quite agreeable that it should—the New Testament should be thrown out of English courts of justice where it is still used as a swearing-block. To swear a man on that book, and punish him for obeying it, is a thing that could only occur in a Christian country. Christians are the worst hypocrites on earth. When a real Christian turns up all the others fall upon him. They would soon have Jesus Christ himself under lock and key, if his "second coming" were not so unconscionably delayed.

Rev. Arthur Wellesley Batson, sixty years of age, left Severn House, Watchet, Somerset, and went up to London. His rural innocence, combined with a little something to drink, which "disagreed" with him, got him into trouble. Eventually he had to pay the doctor's fee of 7s. 6d. at Bow-street, and the cabman's charge of 6s. The fine was only 1s. We hope the reverend gentleman has gone home. And we hope he will keep there. If he follows Paul's advice to Timothy there he can provide for any possible "disagreement."

Rev. Jos. Miller, of Great Bolas, aged 74, is marrying Miss Roberts, who is 54 years younger. He is marrying her for the good of the parish. That is the first consideration. The second is that he may "have a co-worker in holy things." The reverend leaves it at that. So will we.

Essex has got a Bishop. His headquarters will be at Chelmsford. But he will doubtless be often seen at Southend-on-Sea. Business is sure to call him there a good deal—especially in the summer time.

Potiphar's wife plays the game all right with Joseph in Sir H. B. Tree's Biblical drama. But her invitation to il casto Giuseppe has to be extended and subtilized for modern taste and manners. The lady spends only three words on the invitation in the Bible story. They prefer "Cat and Mouse" methods nowadays.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

September 21, Leicester.
October 5, Birmingham Town Hall; 19, Manchester; 26, Stratford Town Hall.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £175 15s. 9d. Received since: — Alex. Lewthwaite, 10s.; Greevz Fisher, 9s. 6d.

The Sides of Walworth: Mrs. Louis F. Side and Family, £1 2s. 6d; R. H. Side, £2; E. D. Side, £2; Mrs. E. D. Side, £1; Miss Beatrice Side, 10s.; Bartrum Side, 10s.

W. GOODBURN.—There is not much in it. The Hull men of God seem a very dull lot. Thanks, all the same.

THOMAS FOWLER.—See paragraph. Thanks.

M. ROGERS.—The suggestion would be all right if one could see the prospect of getting one's money back on the publication.

W. H. B.—See paragraph. Thanks.

E. B.—Your cuttings are always very welcome.

H. BAILEY.—It is of no special value. Might fetch 2s.

H. ROSETTI.—We hope it will prove effectual.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for batches of useful cuttings.

E. SCHMITZ.—Mr. Cohen is half sarcastic, of course, in calling this a Christian country. But, as a matter of fact, Christianity is legally established here.

A. M.—The verses have already been published, and they are not specially suitable for our columns. Are they?

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The Leicester Secular Society has selected "Shakespeare's Humanism in the Merchant of Venice" as the subject of Mr. Foote's lecture next Sunday evening (Sept. 21). There could hardly be a finer subject, and as Mr. Foote never lectures better than when he lectures on Shakespeare, there should be a crowded audience to welcome him after his late illness and absence from the platform.

What might be a difficulty on the occasion of Mr. Foote's visit to Birmingham on October 5 has been met by a new arrangement. Two lectures in the Town Hall, with only an interval of a couple of hours or so between them, are a great effort under any circumstances. It has been decided to drop the afternoon lecture this time and concentrate on the evening meeting.

It is rather odd that this dropping of the afternoon lecture should take place in connection with Mr. Foote—by whom it was introduced. There used to be but one (annual) meeting in the Birmingham Town Hall, which was held in the evening. Mr. Foote took it for several years running and worked the audience up to gratifying proportions. After some time he threw in an afternoon lecture. It cost the Branch nothing, and the collection helped to defray the day's expenses. Having "caught on" it was continued when other lecturers were introduced.

A new course of lectures will be delivered at the Stratford Town Hall under the auspices of the Secular Society, Ltd., on the second, third, and fourth Sundays in October. The lecturers will be Messrs. Cohen, Lloyd, and Foote. Subjects and other details will appear next week.

North London Freethinkers are requested to note that Demonstrations will be held at Parliament Hill to-day (Sept. 14) at 3.15, and at Finsbury Park this evening at 6. The speakers will be Messrs. Hope, Ratcliffe, Davidson, Miss Kough, etc.

Mr. Thomas Hardy opens the September number of the English Review with a short poem entitled "The Place on the Map." It is the story of a poor schoolmaster whose love for a woman should have been a joy to both, but proved a tragedy "Under superstition's hideous control." Mr. Henry Newbolt writes appreciatively of the immortal genius of Chaucer. In contrast with this is an outspoken article by "Civis" on "The Doctors and Venereal Disease"—a painful topic, but one affecting the very life-blood of England. Mrs. Walter Gallichan's article on "The Sexes Again" is able and powerful in its way, but it certainly invites criticism; and one of the best forms of it would be a day's narrative of the life of the society in which her suggestions—for they are not exactly proposals—were carried out. There are other interesting articles in this number of the English Review. The editor contributes a noticeable one on "Socialism and Social Sense."

We are glad to be able to cut the following paragraph from the Evening Dispatch (Birmingham):—

> "Evidently the world does move. The Chicago Dial reminds us that John Fiske, whose daughter has just been married, was once reprimanded and threatened with expulsion from Harvard because of his addiction to Darwinism. Less than ten years later he was called back to Harvard in order to expound the very views that he had previously been punished for holding. This change on the part of the Harvard authorities was not, of course, due to any liberalising process in theological thinking. It was due to the bayonet pricks of public opinion, which is the only propulsive power that theology has ever known—or will ever know."

Twenty years ago such a paragraph could hardly have appeared in any other journal than the Freethinker. Yes, the world does move. And everybody has got to move with it.

Someone loves (or hates) the Freethinker so much that he has been stealing it from the West Ham Public Library at the Green, Stratford, E. A capable pair of eyes are watching for him when he calls for his next weekly copy.

An Isle of Man reader, who is nearly eighty-two years of age, says that his "life would be very dull without the Freethinker." This is a better testimonial than most journals could print. Honestly, we mean; for some journals will print anything.

The veteran Mr. R. H. Side, who is now eighty-nine years of age, called at our office early in the week and left the Side family's annual contribution to the President's Honorarium Fund. Our old friend is afraid he won't be able to come to any more annual dinners. He says that he sat in a draught last time, and was also unable to hear; and that he requires something better at his time of life. Of course he does. And we will see that he gets it.

Mr. Foote will review the new shilling shocker—Is There a Hell?—in next week's Freethinker. He will follow it with a review of Professor Bury's History of Freedom of Thought—on which he has a good deal to say that will not be said elsewhere.

Even with the best intentions a man's words may be altered by those who quote them "from memory." What must it have been in early Christian days when there was no printing and most people were illiterate? Our own readers have already begun to quote a phrase of George Meredith's wrongly. In a letter to us he spoke of our fighting "for the best of causes." Will our readers note that this is the authentic text—and keep to it.

Let us praise the pioneers of progress—the thinkers, the discoverers, the propagandists—whose only weapon was the living word. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was God." We subscribe to that text. The living word passes from man to man, from city to city, from nation to nation, from generation to generation; and as it passes it cries, "Behold I make all things new." Without armies, battlefields, or bloodshed the Word which is God achieves its conquests. The youthful Tennyson well sang that Wisdom wrought in the same way:—

> "No sword
> Of wrath her right arm whirl'd,
> But one poor poet's scroll, and with his word
> She shook the world."

The Gospel History a Fabrication.

MATTHEW'S GOSPEL.

THE Gospel in use among the Nazarenes—viz., that "according to the Hebrews"—was, as we have seen, called by many "the original Gospel of Matthew," and was said by some to be the canonical Matthew "mutilated" because it did not contain the Virgin Birth story. It would appear, then, that if the first two chapters of Matthew be expunged, that Gospel would be little more than a revised Greek copy of the Gospel of the Nazarenes. Now, if we compare the Gospel of Matthew with the other two Synoptics, we find that Matthew differs chiefly in containing certain lengthy discourses which are not given by the others. Chief among these is the Sermon on the Mount, which fills three long chapters (v., vi., vii.), though Luke gives a number of extracts from it (vi. 20—49). The next long discourse given by Matthew only is chapter xxv., which, after introducing the subject by two parables—the ten Virgins and the Talents—gives a graphic description of the Last Judgment, in which only those were allowed to enter heaven who had showed kindness to the "brethren" by feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, housing the homeless, and visiting the sick. This Last Judgment scene is of the same character as one found in the ancient Egyptian "Book of the Dead," and was, no doubt, taken from that book by the Nazarenes, and made their own plan of salvation. Hence, the religion of the primitive Jewish Christians was simply humanitarianism, the belief in Jesus as a god forming no part of their creed. To this twenty-fifth chapter should be added several parables bearing upon the same subject which are recorded by Matthew only. These include the Tares and the Draw-net (Matt. xiii.), the Merciless Servant (Matt. xviii.), the Laborers in the Vineyard (Matt. xx.), the Marriage of the King's Son, and the Wedding Garment (Matt. xxii.).

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

This notable "Sermon" is represented in Matthew's Gospel as delivered upon an unnamed mountain; Luke's short version of it is said to have been spoken upon a plain: it is also represented as delivered at two different periods in the ministry of Jesus. After reading Matthew's long and complete version, we need little critical knowledge to see that this so-called "Sermon" is in character and structure a purely literary composition, which was never uttered extempore on either of the occasions represented. Moreover, it is in itself a complete code of rules and prescriptions relating to conduct, which are identical with the known doctrines and practices of the Essenes. The Nazarenes and Essenes were Jews who conformed to all the Mosaic ritual except animal sacrifice, for which they substituted gifts to the altar at Jerusalem. Matthew's Sermon is but a copy of the doctrines and principles of the society, drawn up by elders of the sect, and was probably read out daily to new members until they knew all the paragraphs by heart. The Essenes did not go about trying to make converts, as described in the Book of the Acts. Their principles were known and respected by all Jews, and those who had thoughts of adopting their mode of life went to their houses, and were allowed to stay with them for a short period. Josephus did so before deciding to become a Pharisee. The following passages in the "Sermon" show that it was drawn up for Jews who still conformed to the "law of Moses":—

> Matt. v. 17.—"Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil."
> Matt. v. 23, 24.—"If therefore thou bring thy gifts to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift."

The following passage commends the continence practised by the stricter order of the Essenes:—

> Matt. xix. 12.—"and there are eunuchs, which made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven sake. He that is able to receive it, let him receive it."

The Christian teacher, Origen, understood the last passage literally, and being "able to receive it," he did so: but it is possible that the passage only means what is stated in Rev. xiv. 4.

THE TEMPTATION AND TRANSFIGURATION.

One of the most obvious of the Gospel fabrications is the story of Jesus being tempted by a real live Devil (Mark i. 12—13; Matt. iv. 1—11; Luke iv. 1—13). This temptation is threefold: (1) Jesus having fasted forty days is asked by the Devil to turn stones into bread; (2) Jesus is placed by the Devil on the pinnacle of the temple, and asked to cast himself down unharmed; (3) the Devil promises to give Jesus "all the kingdoms of the world" if he will worship before him. After resisting these temptations "the Devil leaveth him, and behold, angels came and ministered unto him."

In the Zend-Avesta, the holy prophet Zoroaster is first assaulted and afterwards tempted by the Persian devil Ahriman. One of these temptations is that Ahriman promises to make him "ruler of all the nations" if he will renounce the god he serves—which he refuses to do.

In the Buddhist scriptures, Gotama, when about to leave home, wife, and child to devote himself to the enlightenment of mankind, is tempted by Mara, the Evil One, to wait for seven days until "the wheel of empire" should make him "sovereign over the four continents"—but he refused to stay. Many years later Gotama Buddha fasted for several weeks, during which he was assailed by Craving, Discontent, and Lust, the daughters of Mara, whom he resisted: then, on the forty-ninth day "angels came and ministered unto him." These legends date from several centuries B.C., and were, no doubt, known to the Nazarenes, to whom they suggested the story of the temptation of Jesus.

A second obvious fabrication is the alleged transfiguration of Jesus (Matt. xvii., Mark ix., Luke ix.). Upon this occasion the Nazarene, with Peter, James, and John, ascended a high mountain.

> "And Jesus was transfigured before them: and his face did shine as the sun, and his garments became white as the light. And behold, there appeared unto them Moses and Elijah talking with him.....and behold a voice out of the cloud saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased: hear ye him."

In this story, Peter recognised the two resurrected men, and names them. The Buddha was also transfigured before his death. Another obviously fabricated story is that of the baptism of Jesus, with the dove and the voice from heaven. It is almost needless to say that all the alleged events in the Gospels are narrated as historical occurrences: hence, all Christians who endeavor to get rid of the most obvious fabrications by treating them as allegories are simply perverters of their own scriptures.

It is unnecessary to cite further examples: the whole of the Gospel "history" is of the same fictitious character. There is not a scrap of evidence that any human being ever heard or saw any of the sayings or doings ascribed to "Jesus the Nazarene." They are one and all early Christian fabrications, and as such I will now leave them and bring this series to a close.

PALEY'S EVIDENCES.

Some weeks ago I noticed in the Freethinker that a writer in the Athenæum says of Paley's Evidences of Christianity:—

> "Now that Euclid has gone, it is the only compulsory subject which gives the slightest idea of the meaning of an argument; and, if Paley's premises are granted, his conclusions are hard to refute."

It is really amusing to see Paley's Evidences placed next to Euclid for reasoning, and more so to be told that "if Paley's premises are granted"—etc. What an "if"! I thought everyone knew that it is in the premises all the fallacies lie. Thus, Paley's main

"argument" for the truth of the Gospel miracles runs as follows:—

> "If twelve men, whose probity and good sense I had long known, should seriously and circumstantially relate to me an account of a miracle wrought before their own eyes, and in which it was impossible that they should be deceived;.....If I myself saw them, one after another, consenting to be racked, burned, or strangled, rather than give up the truth of their account;—still, if Hume's rule be my guide, I am not to believe them. Now I undertake to say, that there exists not a sceptic in the world who would not believe them."

Here we see assumption piled upon assumption, every one of which can be challenged. I select this example because the same style of reasoning is still employed by all kinds of Christian advocates. I have noticed several cases during the last year or so.

Now, it is scarcely necessary to say that we have not the testimony of "twelve men" who witnessed the alleged Gospel miracles: we have not even the testimony of one man. Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were not witnesses of anything they record, and though two of the apostles are said to have been named Matthew and John, the latter were not the writers of the Gospels so called. Not one of the writers of the canonical Gospels was an apostle, and all four lived in post-apostolic times.

Paley's "twelve men" are the so-called "twelve apostles" of Jesus, respecting whom nothing certain is known except the names: and such being the case, it is simply ridiculous to assert that they were noted for "probity and good sense," in the modern acceptation of the terms. Assuming that they were no worse than other Jews of their time, they were very ignorant and credulous men, whose heads were filled with all the superstitious ideas of the times in which they lived: they could not, in fact, be otherwise when their teacher himself believed in demoniacal possession. Paley further says that the "probity and good sense," with which he gratuitously credits them as possessing, "had long been known"—which is obviously untrue.

In drawing up his premise, Paley evidently had his eye on the accounts narrated in the Book of the Acts, in which twelve apostles are represented as going about preaching a new religion and creating disorder, regardless of threats, stripes, or imprisonment. It never entered his mind that no Roman procurator would have allowed such doings to go on for a single day; but apart from that, he ought to have had the sense to know that in the account in the Acts we have not the testimony of the "twelve men" to anything done by Jesus: for they are merely some of the dramatis personæ in that work of fiction, and, as everybody knows, an author can make the characters in his story say or do anything he pleases. At the very most, the testimony derived from the Acts could only be that of one person, the writer; but in this case we have not even that testimony, for Luke was not a witness of what he records in that book. Moreover, the long speeches placed in the mouths of Peter, Stephen, and Paul are fabrications made by Luke himself. The critical scholar Renan and the author of Supernatural Religion have each independently compared those orations in the Greek, and, after studying the various forms of expression, have arrived at the same conclusion—that they were all composed by Luke himself. A writer in the Encyclopædia Biblica makes the same admission.

Paley further says that the Gospel miracles were "wrought before the eyes" of his "twelve men," and that "it was impossible that they should be deceived"—his only authority for which statement being the Gospel narratives themselves. But, supposing those narratives to be pure fiction—as they undoubtedly are—how then were miracles "wrought before the eyes" of the apostles? And not having witnessed any of these "mighty works," what nonsense it is to say "it was impossible that they should be deceived"? We are thus dealing with silly assumptions.

Lastly, what evidence have we that these "twelve men" allowed themselves to be "racked, burned, or strangled, rather than give up the truth of their account"? We have none whatever. Many absurd stories of martyrdom are told by later Christian writers; but these, when sifted, prove to be nothing but fables. We do know, however, that in later times thousands of Christians have suffered torture and death rather than deny certain facts or doctrines which to them were simply matters of belief: whence it follows that the only apparently real argument used by Paley—that of steadfastness to religious convictions under persecution—is no proof of the truth of the matters believed.

ABRACADABRA.

Holiday Notes and Reflections.

FOR several years past I have recorded my impressions, in these columns, of the manner and method adopted by the various types of religious folk at the seaside of propagating their special superstitions for the edification of visitors, and I have derived a good deal of pleasure—which I hope has been shared by my readers—in stating my views in these columns. This year I visited Clacton, a growing seaside resort on the East Coast, after an interval of eight years, and I found it had undergone considerable development; indeed, everywhere I found signs of prosperity. Fine wide streets, with large, handsome buildings on the main thoroughfare, and then street after street of well-constructed houses, with beautiful gardens in front, and in one part of the town what promises to be a handsome Garden City. There are plenty of churches and chapels in Clacton, representing many varieties of sects of the Christian faith; there is also a large Salvation Army Barracks, and several mission-halls belonging to Primitive Methodists and other Christians of an equally primitive kind.

Clacton is not, like many other seaside places, a fishing district, and although the natives are a slow-going kind of people, they are not without a certain amount of intelligence that makes them less susceptible to religious impressions than the ordinary uncultivated fisherman. Most of the lodging-house keepers, however, appear to be very pious persons, if one may judge from the number of pictures that adorn their rooms—pictures representing the Virgin Mary and young Jesus when he was a baby and various framed texts from the Gospels that hang upon the walls. Over my head, as I lay in bed, was the portrait of young Jesus when he was about fifteen or sixteen years of age; and a more effeminate looking youth it would be difficult for anyone to imagine. At Clacton the religious folk have no open-air meetings on the front; the only meetings they have—with the exception of the Salvation Army—are either held in their churches and chapels, or outside of them, after the usual indoor services are over. The only meeting I saw during my visit was that of a small section of the Salvation Army that paid a visit to the street in which I was lodging and sang a song to the tune of an old nigger melody that I remember to have heard when I was a boy. A venerable-looking old gentleman, not unlike the late General Booth, but without his pronounced Jewish nose, was the leader of this little band; but, as he delivered no sermon, but contented himself with offering up a short prayer, I am unable to speak concerning his ability to uphold the traditions of the Army as an inspired prophet of the Lord. But, as I have said, there are plenty of churches and chapels in the town, and to these visitors are cordially invited to attend. On the West Cliff a very beautiful church—St. James's—is in the course of erection, and visitors are very earnestly invited to contribute to the cost, which is to run into several thousands of pounds; and the worst of it is that while it is difficult to get enlightened people to contribute towards the provision of a Freethought Temple or Institute in London, where scientific and rational ideas may find expression, there always seem to be plenty of people willing to spend their money on the erection of buildings in which old and effete ideas on theology may be propagated.

At Clacton I came across a melancholy figure, who is regarded as a sort of silent follower of the meek and lowly Jesus. He is a tall, thin, delicate-looking man, with a gloomy cast of countenance; with aquiline nose, thin lips, dark brown beard and moustache. He sits about near the bandstand, apparently taking no heed either of the music or the passers-by. He wears a long, shabby frock-coat, worn almost thread-bare, and patched in many places; his shoes are much the worse for wear, and covered with Blakey's. Nearly everyone looks at him as they pass by. He rarely speaks or smiles; but he gives a sad glance at those who appear to pity him.

I heard one of the members of the crowd refer to this strange man as "J. C.," and then, pointing to his forehead, said that the poor fellow was a little touched in the upper story, which clearly goes to show that the ordinary man in the street regards Jesus as being somewhat insane, with only occasional intervals of good sense. This melancholy man of Clacton, I afterwards learned, had been disappointed in love, and had registered a vow that he would never, till the day of his death, wear any other clothes than those in which he was to have been married, and so far he has kept his word. It seems, then, that the effect on the mind of a person who is over-earnest in love matters is not unlike that of persons who are over-earnest in matters of religion—that way lies madness. M. Jules Soury, in his work on Jesus and Israel, maintained that all religious enthusiasts were insane, that most of them suffered from chronic congestion of the brain, and many of us have witnessed some sad examples of this malady. This strange character, to which I have just referred, like Jesus, was very effeminate in appearance. How is it, I may ask, that Christians worship as a God a being who was so destitute of manly characteristics? Christians say that Jesus was so good, so kind, so tender, so loving, and all that kind of thing, but they never say "Jesus was so bold, so courageous, so manly, so heroic"; and, consequently, strong, manly men can never have much admiration for him. In point of fact, the qualities of nature which we most admire in women we generally despise in men.

When I found that there were no religious meetings being held on the front, I considered the question as to whether there were any clergy or ministers announced to preach at any of the churches or chapels within reasonable distance worth hearing, from a Freethought point of view, and I decided, whether rightly or wrongly, that there were not. Moreover, it is such a long time since I went to a church or chapel to hear a discourse, that I felt that, apart from the feeling of being in a very uncongenial atmosphere or environment, only a very powerful and logical speaker could draw me away from the front, where I had an opportunity of listening to a very efficient military band while I gazed upon the calm, blue sea as the waves rolled ceaselessly on to the shore.

And, after all, it was only a small minority of the people who had gone to church—the majority were on the front listening to the band, bathing, or going brake drives. But I saw many good, kind Christians when they came out of church. They came on to the front before dinner, and the ladies seemed to take as much delight in displaying their fine clothes and their expensive jewellery as the most worldly minded ladies in the crowd.

Some of the churches, no doubt, have good congregations during the summer season, but when the visitors have returned to their homes, I suspect that there are plenty of empty pews to be found in all the churches and chapels, not only of Clacton, but at most of the seaside places in this country.

While away on my holidays, I did a fair share of reading; I read a couple of Geo. B. Shaw's plays and several serious essays on the question of Peace. I also waded through the "Hell-fire" correspondence in the Daily News. Some of the letters, in my judgment, were extremely good from a Freethought point of view, especially that by Wm. Archer, who calls himself a "Protestant," though he is as much a Freethinker as I am, one by a Unitarian minister, and another by Mrs. Ormiston Chant.

Wm. Archer, like Thomas Paine, showed that there are gradations in the culpability of sin; that a man who would tell a good spanking lie would hesitate a long while before he would think of cutting a man's throat.

On the other hand, the Unitarian parson demonstrated that hundreds of thousands of people had been condemned to hell by priests and parsons on a wrong interpretation of that word. But the letter to which I desire to call particular attention was one by the Rev. Dennis Lloyd James, Chaplain of Gordon-road Workhouse, Peckham. He wrote that there was a hell open to sinners and unbelievers, and he insisted on Christians upholding this belief. "As long as sin remains a fact," he says, "in God's moral universe there must be a hell both in this world and the next. Hell in this world is sin ripe, in the next rotten ripe, hence irremedial; hence the doctrine of eternal punishment."

It is bad enough for a priest or a parson to frighten little children with the story of a Devil or hell-fire, but children may live long enough to outgrow these wicked ideas; but to torture the minds of old people in the workhouse or in the infirmary with the wicked lie that any God of goodness will consign a poor creature to either a figurative or a literal hell for ever and for ever is nothing short of infamous; and I am only sorry that I am not a member of the Camberwell Guardians, so that I might give this reverend gentleman a piece of my mind.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Noses.

SOME people will think this a strange heading for an article. A few, perhaps, will turn up their noses at it, and ask, "What will the man write about next?" Probably the most severe will say the subject is below the dignity of philosophy. But, with all due respect, we think they are mistaken. There was once a cant about the dignity of history; everything was beneath its attention except the doings of princes, popes, generals, and statesmen. But the coup de grace was given to that superstition by Lord Macaulay. Nothing is really trivial to the eye of a philosopher. The laws of the universe are as much involved in a grain of sand as in a planet. The mystery of life is as great in an insect as in a Shakespeare. A common song has often been more powerful than a law passed by both houses of parliament, sanctioned by the crown, administered by judges, and enforced by policemen, gaolers, and soldiers. Has it not even been said that the history of the world would have been changed by a difference of an eighth of an inch in the length of Cleopatra's nose? Let us have done then with "dignity," and let us look at facts. And who can say that noses are not facts? Is not the nose called "the prominent feature"? Why, there was a gentleman, immortalised in an old epigram, whose long nose was an advance agent—a herald to announce he was coming. His nose was a fact, anyhow. Look at Cæsar's nose, look at Wellington's, look at Napoleon's. Such noses are not only facts, but tremendous facts. They ploughed deep furrows in the world's history. They are unforgettable noses.

Laurence Sterne, our great English humorist, wrote a long dissertation upon noses, which is well worth reading; although, like the Bible, it is not exactly fit for children. A later writer devoted a whole book to noses—and a very witty and instructive book too. We are therefore not the first in the field. Nevertheless, our remarks will have their speciality. We shall not follow Sterne or his successor, except in point of time, but strike out a line of our own.

The nose, dear reader, has played a very great part in religious history. The priests have always led the people by that organ. It was the easiest to catch hold of, but that was not the reason. The fact is, the nose was the gate of piety. The soul went in and out of the nostrils. When the Hebrew prophet had a dead boy to resuscitate, he stretched himself upon the lad seven times; at last the lad's soul came back, and the reanimated corpse sneezed. And why did it sneeze? Parsons cannot answer the question. But we can. The lad's soul re-entered his body through the nose; in doing so it set up a titillation, and relief was found in the usual way.

Dr. Tylor, in his splendid work on Primitive Culture, has some instructive pages on this subject. Sneezing customs are general, though not universal. When the Englishman who sneezes cries "God bless me!" he is following an old custom of which he has lost the original meaning. The object was to keep evil or foreign spirits from entering. Zulu diviners cultivate sneezing, which they regard as an indication of the presence of the spirits they are invoking. Calabar negroes, when a child sneezes, will say "Far from you!" with a gesture as if throwing off some evil. On a Samoan's sneezing, the bystanders exclaimed "Life to you!" The Jewish sneezing formula is "Good life!" The Moslems say "Praise to Allah!" Prometheus, in the Greek mythology, prays for his artificial man, when it gives the first sign of life by sneezing. Jehovah breathes into Adam's nostrils to make him a living soul. Jacob prays that man's soul may no longer depart from his body when he sneezes. The sect of Messalians used to spit and blow their noses to expel the demons they might have drawn in while breathing. Mediæval exorcists drove the devils out through the patients' nostrils. Josephus, the Jewish historian, relates that he saw a Jew, named Eleazar, curing demoniacs in the time of Vespasian, by drawing out the demons through their nostrils with a magic ring.

This is enough to explain the religious mystery of noses. The reader is now aware why the priests have kept their eyes on those organs. The men of God suspect and hate our eyes. They tell us we must not walk by sight. We must walk by faith. That is, we must follow our noses; or, in other words, walk by smell. The parson goes in front, and we must tramp after him. As Hamlet says, "you shall nose him as you go," by his flavor of brimstone, until at last you come to the great treacle-pot called Heaven.

"Affiliated" Criminals.

THERE are no declared Agnostics, Freethinkers, or Atheists listed in the monthly report just published from the State Penitentiary of Nebraska — which is, perhaps, not be wondered at, since Nebraska is the home of that eminent and influential Christian, William Jennings Bryan. Of the 250 odd inmates 76 are Catholics, 65 Methodists, 57 Baptists, 31 Christians (Campbellites), 15 Presbyterians, 13 Lutherans, 9 Episcopalians, 6 United Brethren, 4 Congregationalists, 2 Christian Scientists, 2 Mormons, 1 Hebrew, and 75 Non-sectarians. Thus four-fifths of the persons imprisoned for crimes in Nebraska are affiliated with church, syangogue, or tabernacle, and but one-fifth are unattached. Of the population of Nebraska, the Roman Catholics form somewhat less than 10 per cent., but they supply more than 20 per cent. of the criminals. According to the Government census, the non-church members of Nebraska make up nearly 70 per cent. of the population. And yet these 75 "unaffiliated" are only a little more than 20 per cent. of the prison population, while the "affiliated" supply the 80 per cent. Let us here refer to the statement of Mr. Bryan, which, to eke out his meagre salary of $12,000 a year, he is now repeating at the Chautauquas for $500 a lick, that if we were to divide the sheep and the goats, here the people who are with the church and there the people who are not, on the one side would be found all who are virtuous and law-abiding, and on the other side the criminal and worthless class generally. And right in his own State the prison statistics rise up to overwhelm him. If Mr. Bryan's religion were as generally accepted by the law-abiding as by the law-breaking population, Nebraska would be 80 per cent. instead of only about 30 per cent. "affiliated." There is no excuse for misrepresentation regarding the close relation, in all countries, between religion and crime. The facts have been made the subject of close investigation by unprejudiced minds. That religion makes people good who would not be so without it, or that unbelief loosens rather than strengthens the moral character, is a pious fiction and nothing more.—Truthseeker (New York).

Friend or Fool.

To discover the will of a Deity whose sway
In the universe naught can resist,
It would seem at first sight that a sensible way
Is to notice the things that exist.

By his hand into space all the planets were hurled;
He for ages unchallenged has reigned.
It would seem as if God who created the world
Had created the things it contained.

But no; we must learn we are wide of the mark.
What is logical need not be right;
The disciples of Reason are all in the dark,
The disciples of Faith in the light.

If from slavery, cruelty, carnage, and crime
The intentions of God should be gleaned,
The Almighty Creator would seem for all time
But a paramount Infinite Fiend.

So we learn the Almighty is not what he seems,
But is better and kinder by far.
He intended great things that are still only dreams—
Is distressed by the facts as they are.

The Lord is the potter, and man is the clay;
But, in spite of his infinite skill,
He sadly refuses to have his own way,
And mould the poor stuff to his will.

The Lord is a shepherd who places his sheep
On the edge of a dangerous rock;
And, while to destruction they stumble or leap,
Sits bewailing the fate of his flock.

But, on seeing the fruit of the theory they state,
His defenders may open their eyes;
For, in robbing our hearts of a Deity to hate,
They have given us one to despise.

In working his dolls on their minature stage,
If a showman would imitate God,
He'd weep for poor Judy and tremble with rage
When his Punch was applying the rod.

But, despite all the freaks that his puppets have
The showman contrives to keep cool; [played,
While God by his puppets is grieved and dismayed,
And sits in despair like a fool.

Great God! though the timid who cringe at thy feet
May in terror thy wisdom avow,
The man who's conducting the show in the street
Is a hundredfold wiser than thou.

E. H. B. STEPHENSON.

KNOW THYSELF.

Man has been studying all sorts of things during the ages, and most of them unreal. At last he has taken to studying himself, and therein lies his salvation. "Man, know thyself," said the wise ancient. After the lapse of nearly three thousand years, man is beginning to think there is something in the advice. Some hundreds of years ago, the great Montaigne expressed astonishment at the fact that while man could not make a flea he would be making gods by the dozen. Happily, he is growing tired of that branch of industry. Instead of looking towards the fancied heavens, and exclaiming to their imaginary sovereign, "What is man that thou art mindful of him?" the modern man is taking himself a great deal more seriously. He is rising from his knees and trying to stand erect. He is full of a newly awakened curiosity. He has heard so much about the gods! "What am I? What are my fellow men? What were the men who went before us? What will the men be who come after us?"—such are the questions he is now asking. And this means an entirely new departure. The theocentric theory is giving way to the homocentric theory. Theology, the science of God, is giving way to Anthropology, the science of Man. We are at the beginning of the end—in spite of all the Church Congresses in Christendom.—G. W. Foote.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 38 SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

We must laugh at men to avoid crying.—NAPOLEON.

Is There a Hell?

THIS is the title of a shilling book with a sensational cover, edited by that voluminous author Mr. Anonymous, and published by Cassell & Company—who appear to believe that there is money in it, as we dare say there is, for it has been the subject of correspondence in half the newspapers in Great Britain, and the theme of sermons in thousands of pulpits.

Not for the first time has money been made out of Hell. The clergy have made most of their money out of it from the beginning. Nobody was ever found hurrying to Heaven. That was only the other place. People were anxious to keep out of Hell, and Heaven was the only alternative. It had no great attraction of its own. The real question was whether you were to be "lost" or "saved." "Lost" meant going to Hell. "Saved" meant giving it the slip. You simply put up with Heaven. You would much rather have continued living on earth,—if you could, but, alas, you couldn't.

But to return to our muttons—as the French say. This book is called "A Symposium by Leaders of Religious Thought." The description may be correct. We shall not dispute it. Not one of the contributors to this volume knows anything about Hell. They say "I believe" or "I think" or "I hold" or "It seems to me." The know-nothings address the ignoramuses. The blind lead the blind. But there is nothing new in that. It has been a constant characteristic of religious history. All that the blind leaders wanted was more "cheek" than the blind who were led.

We are going to give some attention to Is There a Hell? It is very instructive in its way, and sometimes amusing, though that is not intended. Its contributors number sixteen; they are all professional workers in the Lord's vineyard; they belong to various Christian Churches; and they show collectively what the "leaders" of the Christian world are driving at. They have all sorts of views about Hell, but they are all for keeping it. That is their one agreement.

But before we go through this book we venture to reproduce our own views on Hell, written some twenty-five years ago. This article will be new to the great majority of our readers. When they have read it, and then read what the sixteen clerical defenders of the faith have to say, they will understand how long it takes the Christian Churches to reach even the rear positions of the Army of Freethought.

WHERE AND WHAT IS HELL?

This is a question of great importance, or at least of very great interest. According to the Christian scheme of salvation, the vast majority of us will have to spend eternity in "sulphurous and tormenting flames," and we are naturally curious as to the situation of a place in which we shall experience such delightful sensations.

But there is hardly any subject on which we can obtain so little information. The clergy are becoming more and more reticent about it. What little they ever knew is being secreted in the depths of their inner consciousness. When they are pressed for particulars they look injured. Sometimes they piteously exclaim "Don't." At other times they wax wroth, and exclaim to the questioners about the situation of hell, "Wait till you get there."

Just as heaven used to be spoken of as "up above," hell was referred to as "down below." At one time, indeed, it was believed to be underground. Many dark caves were thought to lead to it, and some of them were called "Hell Mouth." Volcanoes were regarded as entrances to the fiery regions, and when there was an eruption it was thought that hell was boiling over. Classic mythology, before the time of Christ, had its entrances to hell at Acherusia, in Bithynia; at Avernus, in Campania, where Ulysses began his journey to the grisly abodes; the Sibyl's cave at Cumæ, in Argolis; at Tænarus, in the southern Peloponnesus, where Hercules descended, and dragged Cerberus up to the daylight; and the cave of Trophonius, in Lebadea, not to mention a dozen less noted places.

The Bible always speaks of hell as "down," and the Apostles' Creed tells us that Christ "descended" into hell. Exercising his imagination on this basis, the learned Faber discovered that after the Second Advent the saints would dwell on the crust of the earth, a thousand miles thick, and the damned in a sea of liquid fire inside. Thus the saints would tread over the heads of sinners, and flowers would bloom over the lake of damnation.

Sir John Maundeville, a most engaging old liar, says he found a descent into hell "in a perilous vale" in Abyssinia. According to the Celtic legend of "St. Brandon's Voyage," hell was not "down below," but in the moon, where the saint found Judas Iscariot suffering incredible tortures, but let off every Sunday to enjoy himself and prepare for a fresh week's agony. The master of bathos, Martin Tupper, finds this idea very suitable. He apostrophises the moon as "the wakeful eye of hell." Bailey, the author of Festus, is somewhat vaguer. Hell, he says, is in a world which rolls thief-like round the universe, imperceptible to human eyes:—

> "a blind world, yet unlit by God,
> "Rolling around the extremest edge of light,
> Where all things are disaster and decay."

Imaginations, of course, will differ. While Martin Tupper and other gentlemen look for hell in the direction of the moon, the Platonists, according to Macrobus, reckoned as the infernal regions the whole space between the moon and the earth. Whiston thought the comet which appeared in his day was hell. An English clergyman, referred to by Alger, maintained that hell was in the sun, whose spots were gatherings of the damned.

The reader may take his choice, and it is a liberal one. He may regard hell as under the earth, or in the moon, or in the sun, or in a comet, or in some concealed body careering through infinite space. And if the choice does not satisfy him, he is perfectly free to set up a theory of his own.

Father Pinamonti is the author of a little book called Hell Open to Christians, which is stamped with the authority of the Catholic Church, and issued for the special edification of children. This book declares that hell is four thousand miles distant, but it does not indicate the direction. Anyhow, the distance is so small that the priests might easily set up communication with the place. But perhaps it only exists in the geography or astronomy of faith.

Father Pinamonti seems particularly well informed on this subject. He says the walls of hell are "more than four thousand miles thick." That is a great thickness. But is it quite as thick as the heads of the fools who believe it?

Our belief is that hell is far nearer than the clergy teach. Omar Khayyam, the grand old Persian poet, the "large infidel," as Tennyson calls him, wrote as follows—in the splendid rendering of Edward Fitzgerald:—

> "I sent my soul through the invisible,
> Some letter of that after-life to spell,
> And by and bye my soul returned to me,
> And answered, I myself am heaven and hell."

Hell, like heaven, is within us, and about us in the hearts of our fellow-men. Yes, hell is on earth. Man's ignorance, superstition, stupidity, and selfishness, make a hell for him in this life. Let us cease, then, to dread the fabled hell of the priests, and set ourselves to the task of abolishing the real hell of hunger, vice, and misery.

The very Churches are getting ashamed of their theological hell. They are becoming more and more secularised. They call on the disciples of Christ to remedy the evils of this life, and respond to the cry of the poor for a better share of the happiness of this world. Their methods are generally childish, for they overlook the causes of social evil, but it is gratifying to see them drifting from the old moorings, and little by little abandoning the old dogmas. Some of the clergy, like Archdeacon Farrar, go to the length of saying that "hell is not a place." Precisely so, and that is the teaching of Secularism.

The Religion of Sir Oliver Lodge.

MORE than the usual amount of anticipatory interest, and much more than the usual quantity of newspaper paragraphs, have been forthcoming concerning Sir Oliver Lodge's address as President of the British Association. This was not due to the public or to journalists suddenly awakening to the importance of scientific research. To the former, science still remains a more or less harmless kind of hobby; and to the bulk of the latter, something useful for providing wonder-raising paragraphs or rhetorical flourishes about the greatness of human ingenuity and the unconquerable strength of man's intelligence. The interest centred mainly in the fact that Sir Oliver Lodge is one of the few men of science that stand forward as an apologist for religious beliefs—that is, so long as he is allowed to define and express religion in his own way. If his religious beliefs were properly tested by the doctrines taught in any of the churches in Christendom, they would be condemned with hardly less severity than are those expressed in this journal. Between Sir Oliver's God and the Christian God there is all the generic resemblance that exists between Monmouth and Macedon. There is a similarity of sound; and if the genuine thing cannot be obtained, the next best thing is to get something with the same name.

Particularly when the Christian world is in so critical a position. Once upon a time the Christian Churches were selective. They took care that only those who were in genuine agreement should enter their doors. It was the duty of the newcomer to prove that he agreed with the doctrines taught. Nowadays, the Churches are collective; their policy is to gather as many as they can without a too rigorous entrance examination. The entrant need not prove that he is a Christian; so long as he is not positively disreputable, the Churches will do that for him. They must collect all they can and be thankful for what they get. A man may mean by "God" nothing but a nebulous, undefinable, unusable sort of an abstraction; and by "Christ" no more than respect for a Jerusalem Labor Leader; but if he will only use these words, it is enough. He will be claimed as a Christian by some church that seeks to atone for empty seats by claiming a large congregation that never attends. If he happens to be a man of the scientific standing of Sir Oliver Lodge, the threads of connection may be still more attenuated; hard-pressed theologians will treat them as though they were ropes of steel. For about scientists the Christian world is far from easy. Counting only those who openly call themselves Freethinkers, it claims all the rest as on the side of religion. There is a strong feeling—when there is no actual knowledge—that it is not so, but it comforts restive minds. It is felt more strongly that between scientific and religious teaching there is direct conflict; but, again, it professes a cheering conviction to the contrary. Consequently, when it was announced that Sir Oliver Lodge would speak—in part of his address—on the relation between science and religion, there was great jubilation, and it was assumed that the reference would amount to a reconciliation. And to theologians assumption is the equivalent of proof. The reconciliation would be attempted, therefore it would be done, therefore the latest deliverance of science was in support of religion, therefore to be non-religious was to be unscientific.

And, after all, those who looked for any startling revelations on religion—some papers were foolish enough to announce that Sir Oliver would produce proofs of a future life—were doomed to disappointment. As the Times curtly said, "The sensational disclosures expected in some quarters were not forthcoming." Sir Oliver did make a profession of faith in a future life, but he was careful—and properly careful—to point out that this was a personal confession. And with all possible respect to Sir Oliver Lodge, that is not of great importance. As a well-known man, there is, of course, a certain interest attaching to Sir Oliver's personal opinions; but as material for evidence, for or against, this personal confession carries no more weight than any other personal confession.

And when all was said, very little was said—certainly nothing that was in any way new or startling. The direct references to religion only came in at the very end of the address; by far the greater part being concerned with the present position of scientific speculations with which I am not now concerned, and concerning which no one has a greater readiness than myself to play the part of a very grateful listener and reader. But to say, as Sir Oliver did in concluding his speech, that we "are deaf and blind to the grandeur around us, unless we have insight enough to recognise in the woven fabric of existence, flowing steadily from the loom in an infinite progress towards perfection, the ever-growing garment of a transcendent God," is not science, but rhetoric. It seems, indeed, but a grandiloquent way of putting the old saying, "The fool hath said in his heart there is no God." The grandeur and beauty around us remain, and the story of development remains the same whether the universe is the garment of a transcendent God or not. Such expressions tickle the ear without illuminating the mind. The Daily Mail hit the nail on the head by quoting "a scientific listener" who remarked that it was just a "rhapsody on faith." And a rhapsody defies argument.

The Daily News illustrated its capacity for saying silly things where religion is concerned by remarking in the course of a leading article, "That such an address should be delivered is in itself significant." Why? Last year, at Dundee, Professor Schafer delivered an address that was a direct negation of all that Sir Oliver said on behalf of religion. The Daily News found nothing significant about that address, although plain speech on the subject is really most remarkable in this country. Moreover, it was undeniable that Professor Schafer had behind him the bulk of scientific opinion at home and abroad. What has occurred in the interval to make the declaration of Sir Oliver Lodge remarkable? The Daily News says the address "indicates a profound change in the attitude of science to the problems of the universe." By the problems of the universe it evidently means the question of religion, for it is characteristic of the religious mind to consider religion as the only thing of importance. In what direction has this profound change occurred? Surely the fact of a scientific man making a confession of religious faith does not warrant such a statement. One swallow does not make a summer, and one Sir Oliver Lodge is not science; nor did he speak, in this respect, on behalf of science. The Daily News itself supplied the reply to its own rash generalisation. With a fine disregard of consistency between its news columns and its editorial, the summary of the British Association report was headed, "Plea for Tolerance by Scientists. A Fair Field appealed for by Sir Oliver Lodge." But if the address marked a profound change in the attitude of science, why plead for tolerance? Why ask for a fair field? The "profound change" would itself guarantee tolerance—more than tolerance; it would bespeak a warm welcome.

I prefer the heading of the news column to the senseless prattle of the anonymous editorial. And I think Sir Oliver would agree that he gave the fairer view of the situation. For he gave plenty of evidence that in dealing with religion before a scientific assembly he was very much alone. He felt his audience to be either hostile or indifferent. He confessed that he ran "the risk of annoying my present hearers." He asked scientists to "allow us to make the attempt" of dealing with the universe on religious lines. He asked them to "give us a fair field." Such language is absolutely meaningless unless used to an audience by one who feels that he is in almost a minority of one. Sir Oliver was, and is, evidently under no delusion on this point. He knows that science has undergone no profound change in its attitude towards religion; that neither himself nor philosophers of the Bergson type speak for religion in the name of science. He and they may criticise the findings of science if they please; they may see fit to supplement scientific generalisations with religious beliefs; but the attitude of science towards religion remains exactly what it was.

Here is another piece of Daily News religion that I may as well deal with before I come to what Sir Oliver Lodge actually did say. Says the writer of the editorial: "He carried the war into the camp of the Materialists, and sought to make the doctrine of personal immortality credible, if not on a fictitious basis, at least on assumptions that science might accept." Evidently, even the Daily News realises that Sir Oliver's studies in psychical research does not put the doctrine of immortality on a fictitious basis. And, after all, the only assumptions that science might accept with honor are those that do rest on a scientific basis. The Daily News writer seems to be under the delusion that assumptions need not rest on anything. But, in science, assumptions must have a basis in fact, and must prove their utility by their ability to explain facts. An assumption that does not rest upon facts generally accepted by the scientific world is neither more nor less than a scientific nightmare. And Sir Oliver Lodge himself admits that his "facts" of psychical research are not generally accepted. In the Christian Commonwealth for September 10 there appears the report of an interview with Sir Oliver, and one of the questions put to him was: "What are the assured scientific conclusions regarding psychical research?" The answer was: "Scientific men have not universally accepted any conclusions—not even telepathy." Not even the data of the psychical researchers are accepted by scientific men as a body. How, then, in the name of all that is rational, can an assumption be acceptable to science before the facts it sets out to explain are admitted to be genuine. The order of scientific procedure is simple: First, establish your facts; then show that these facts are not explained by any theory at present in the field; next, propose a theory that will cover the facts established, and which does not conflict with what we otherwise know to be true. That is the only plan of operation acceptable to science, and the theory of immortality does not fulfil a single one of these conditions.

(To be concluded.) C. COHEN.

An Old System Under a New Name.

"BOYCOTT" is a new word in the English language, being only a little over thirty years of age. It first came into use with the agrarian disturbances in Ireland during the years 1880-1. The Nationalists maintained that if a man took a farm from which another had been evicted he thereby became a deserving object of punishment, and no punishment was held to be adequate if it fell short of "isolating him from his kind as if he was a leper of old." That teaching quickly struck its roots into the Irish mind, grew, ripened, and bore abundant fruit in terrible deeds. At that time, Captain Boycott acted as Lord Erne's agent, and came into serious conflict with the Land Leaguers. He evicted many tenants for what the agitators considered to be inadequate reasons. The consequence was that the tenantry and others were restrained from all intercourse with him and his family. His servants were forced to leave him, and his crops were gathered in by Orangemen from the North. Such was the treatment meted out to Captain Boycott, and subsequently the system was baptised into the name of its first victim. But while the name is new the system is old, possibly the oldest in the world. It is the worst form of coercion, or a general conspiracy to compel the offending party to desist from his grievous course of action. An older term for it is ostracism, which takes us back to the end of the sixth century B.C. in the history of Greece. Ostracism was a political device adopted by Clisthenes at Athens to protect the democratic government against seditious sentiments and actions on the part of private citizens. The punishment was a ten years' banishment from Athens, and it is well known that among the first exiles was Clisthenes himself. The law provided that once a year the people should have an opportunity of indicating who, in their opinion, required to be banished, which indication they made by writing the name or names on oyster-shells; hence the word that has been in use ever since, the Greek for oyster being ostreon.

We thus see that boycott is a very recent coinage to represent a fresh development of a very ancient system of persecution. Boycott applies to opinions, however, much more than to actions. The Christian Church has been, in all ages, the biggest boycotter in the world. How many thousands of heretics it has isolated, banished, and burned, confiscating their goods, and making beggars and outcasts of their children, during nineteen hundred years! The record is not a pleasant one to contemplate even for the blindest believers. The first boycotter of whom we read was God. For the most trivial act of disobedience he banished Adam and Eve from their home, not for ten years, but for good and all, with the result that their descendants are spoken of as miserable exiles at this very day. God having left them such an example, it is no wonder that his people have always prided themselves upon their boycotting performances. No example has ever been more faithfully followed. We do not feel disposed to blame God's people, for so long as they believe in him it is their first duty to imitate him, which, in this particular at least, they have most loyally done. While strongly deprecating the fierce persecution of the Jews under Christianity, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that as long as they had the power they were cruel persecutors themselves. In the Jewish Church heresy was guarded against by the most stringent and heartless measures. Korah, Dathan, and Abiram were not sinners above their fellows, nor was any charge of immorality or of crime ever brought against them; but because they foolishly imagined that they were as good as Moses and Aaron, and could celebrate the offices of the Tabernacle as efficiently and with as much acceptance as if they had been of the priestly order, they were completely excommunicated and ostracised at the instigation of Moses, who, however, put the whole responsibility for his action upon Jehovah, saying, with the proverbial cunning of his race :—

> "Hereby ye shall know that the Lord hath sent me to do all these works; for I have not done them of mine own mind. If these men die the common death of all men, or if they be visited after the visitation of all men; then the Lord hath not sent me. But if the Lord make a new thing, and the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up, with all that appertain unto them; then ye shall understand that these men have provoked the Lord. And it came to pass, as he had made an end of speaking all these words, that the ground clave asunder that was under them. And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their houses, and all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods. They, and all that appertained to them, went down alive into the pit, and the earth closed upon them; and they perished from among the congregation. And all Israel that were round about them fled at the cry of them: for they said, Lest the earth swallow us up also. And there came out a fire from the Lord, and consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense" (Numbers xvi. 28 35).

Those were deeds of which Moses felt somewhat ashamed, as we judge from the words, "I have not done them of mine own mind." With the historicity of the narrative we are not now concerned, our whole attention being concentrated upon the fact that, in the story as it stands, three men, found guilty of a technical or ceremonial offence, are hurled into and completely swallowed up by a cleft of the earth, Divinely provided, together with their wives, children, servants, most distant relations, and entire property, and that in connection with the same offence two hundred and fifty more are put to death. Do believers in the Bible as God's Book realise that it contains such unspeakably horrible passages? Our point is that primarily boycotting is a Divine act, and that in all cases persecutors justify themselves by falling back upon the authority of God. In this respect there is no difference between the Jewish and the Christian Church. It is God who is ultimately held responsible for the acts of both.

We are often assured that the boycott of people whose opinions differ from those of the majority is now at an end. Proudly do many tell us that this is the age of freedom, in which every person is at liberty to hold and express what opinions he or she pleases. Theoretically, this may be true enough, but practically it is as false as it can be. Unpopular opinions are still penalised, not by the death of their promulgator, and the confiscation of his goods, but in various little ways which in their sum total are exceedingly irritating and injurious. The whole community is biased against the Freethinker. He is not only looked down upon and despised, but he is also subjected to a systematic treatment that both annoys and harms him. If he keeps a shop, it is shunned; if he runs a newspaper, it is ignored; if he has a profession, his chambers are seldom visited and possible clients are warned against him; if he takes part in a public propaganda, he is reviled and slandered; if he has literary gifts, they are woefully depreciated. In these and a million other ways he is made to suffer, and those who make him think they glorify God thereby. It is surprising to what an absurd extent certain forms of literature maltreat Freethought. There is a new Encyclopædia, called the Everyman, in the process of publication just now, which is to consist of twelve volumes, of the same size as the Everyman Library books. It is therefore our latest work of reference; but, unfortunately, those who refer to it find it seriously disappointing. They search for an article on Freethought, but discover that the word does not occur in it as a heading. Thirteen lines are devoted to "Freethinkers," but all the information we derive is that it is "a term used of all who reject belief in divine revelation, applied specially to the deistical writers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries." Reading these few lines no one would dream that there are such wretches as Freethinkers in existence to-day; and the only authorities mentioned are Lechler, who published his work on Deism in 1841, and A. S. Farrar, whose book appeared in 1862—both absurdly out of date. The article on "Atheism" does not occupy one column, and there is not a single word in it concerning the Atheism of the present time in Great Britain and America. The writer does not cite one authority. "Agnosticism" gets three-quarters of a column, and is dismissed as having had in this country "many able exponents in the 'seventies and 'eighties of last century." You are to infer that it is quite dead now. The only authorities alluded to are "An Agnostic Apology by Leslie Stephen, and Professor James Ward's Naturalism and Agnosticism," neither of which conveys the slightest information about present-day Agnosticism, which is a greater factor in the life of the people than at any former period. In its treatment of such subjects the Everyman Encyclopædia ranks no higher than the periodical literature of the Churches.

The reality of the boycott cannot be doubted. It meets one at every turn. Freethinkers have never yet had fairplay, and are not getting it now. We do not complain, because we know that in spite of the boycott Freethought is silently spreading. It is a leaven that is gradually transmuting the whole lump of human thought. In spite of the burning zeal and incessant labors of innumerable Christian workers, the Churches are becoming more secularised every year. Supernaturalism is a vanishing quantity everywhere. Christians ought to learn a lesson from their own history. There was a time when they too felt the terrible pinch of the boycott, and groaned with fear and trembling under it; but they triumphed in spite of it. We are a despised and persecuted minority to-day, and we too feel the crushing weight of the boycott. But let us not lose heart, for our day of power is coming quite as certainly as theirs did. Yes, it is even now hastening on; and our only hope is that when it is come we shall be too noble-minded, too self-respecting, to apply the boycott to them in their days of decline, as they are doing to us. We assure them that we have no desire to retaliate.

The Remedial and Fatal Effects of Faith.

AMONG the peasant populations of Catholic Ireland, France, Spain, Germany, and Italy a firm faith in the efficacy of relics and other forms of superstition still retains its force, and, melancholy to relate, cultured lay Catholics are not above pandering to this ignorant credulity of their uneducated fellow-religionists.

The two most celebrated centres of the contemporary survival of the crude superstitions of savage humanity are located at Lourdes and Treves. The one is in rural France and the other in Catholic Germany. Seated near the Pyrenees, and safely sheltered from the more civilised influences which have made intellectual France possible, Lourdes became the scene of some very remarkable events.

According to a carefully elaborated legend, the Blessed Virgin appeared to a peasant girl at noon on February 11, 1858. During the succeeding six months, the apparition reappeared on seventeen different occasions. To add to these marvels, a previously unknown spring suddenly sent forth its waters on the sacred spot. This liquid was endowed with miraculous powers, and many wonders were reported. As was doubtless foreseen, the populace flocked to the scene of these extraordinary events, and the barriers which had been erected by the incredulous local authorities were very soon removed by command of the Emperor Napoleon III., to whom, as supreme magistrate, such superstitions were eminently useful. The Bishop of Tarbes then selected a commission of priests and "scientists" to examine the evidence for these astonishing occurrences, and after three years' "inquiry" this accommodating commission came to the conclusion that the apparition was genuine; that the ecstacies of the girl to whom the Blessed Virgin Mary had appeared were also genuine, and that the miraculous properties of the waters were quite above suspicion. This piece of solemn imposture has since grown in importance. A fine basilica, together with the Church of the Rosary, now adorn the scene of the alleged miracles. The Fathers of the Immaculate Conception kindly superintend the holy grotto, and a flourishing business has been developed.

The second outstanding instance of pious legerdemain is associated with the old-world city of Treves. The Holy Coat—der heilige Rock, as the Germans call it—is preserved in the cathedral of this city. In the words of the Catholic Dictionary:—

> "A very ancient tradition asserts it to be the seamless coat which our Savior wore at the time of his Passion. The Empress Helena [the same lady, we may remark, who so providentially discovered the identical cross upon which Christ was crucified] having come into possession of it in the Holy Land, is said to have given it to the city of Treves, where she resided for a considerable time. The earliest written testimony to this effect is found in a chronicle of the first half of the twelfth century, where Helena is said to have presented the relic to the church during the episcopate of Agritius (314-334). Several other notices of the Holy Coat are found in documents mounting up to, or nearly to the twelfth century. But the most remarkable and interesting piece of evidence, in support of the authenticity of the relic, is an ancient ivory belonging to the Cathedral (lost for some time but recovered in 1844), on which the Empress is figured seated at the church door, and awaiting the arrival of a procession closed by a chariot in which there are two ecclesiastics guarding a chest. Above the chariot is the face of Christ, by which some relation between our Lord and the contents of the chest seems to be indicated."

This famous bit of old ivory was submitted to the Archæological Society of Frankfort, and that learned body pronounced it of fourth or fifth century origin. As to the Holy Coat itself, it is supposed to have been translated from the choir to the high altar of the cathedral in 1196. There it appears to have remained for nearly four hundred years, when the clergy exposed it to the gaze of the credulous multitude on various occasions during the sixteenth century. The ancient garment was stored for security either in the Castle of Ehrenbreitstein or at Augsburg throughout the next two hundred years. In 1810, that deeply pious man, the great Napoleon, consented to the restoration of the old coat to its native city, and if we may trust Catholic writers, a gaping multitude of a quarter of a million of people journeyed to Treves to celebrate this great event. But all earlier triumphs were eclipsed by the splendors of 1844, "when eleven bishops and more than a million of the laity flocked to Treves from all sides during the period.....for which the Holy Coat was exhibited."

To be sure, on such an occasion as this miracles occurred, and the "joy and piety" of the deluded multitude must indeed have been a moving sight. The scornful and superior sceptic who regards religion as a splendid thing for the crowd—had such an one been present—might conceivably have recognised in this spectacle another mournful illustration of the truth of Campanella's line—

> "The people is a beast of muddy brain."

In any case, even Catholics were shocked at the sorry business:—

> "Certain unstable Catholics [solemnly says the Catholic Dictionary] took offence at the proceedings, and wrote against the authenticity of the Holy Coat. Among these were Czerski, an ecclesiastic from Posen, and Rouge, a suspended priest of Breslau."

But, despite the indignant protests of these enlightened priests, the faithful remained faithful still. The Holy Coat was again exhibited at Treves in 1891, and added to the profits and prestige of the church, and miraculous cures were alleged by more or less truthful witnesses.

That nervous diseases may be alleviated or even temporarily cured by suggestion is a statement that few medical men would dispute. A doctor with a good bedside manner, which is united with a sunny and optimistic temperament, is nearly always more successful in rallying his patients than an abler and more experienced rival practitioner in whom these estimable qualities are lacking. Pleasurable emotions of all kinds act beneficially upon the most dejected of invalids. And those best qualified to form an unbiassed judgment upon the cures reported from Lourdes and Treves—if we accept a small percentage as genuine—are convinced that imagination, excitement, change of scene, and other natural phenomena are the real explanation of the supposed miracles. As a matter of plain fact, no healing of organic disease has ever been known at either shrine. Broken limbs are never set; amputated organs are never restored. Cancer, consumption, and scores of other malignant diseases await present treatment and ultimate cure at the hands of the man of science alone.

Just as hopeful feelings exalt the human system, so do fearful forebodings depress it. Nor are these phenomena confined to the civilised races. Savage peoples supply abundant illustrations, and the beneficent or baleful effects of happiness or misery may be easily observed in animal life by the least attentive onlooker.

Among the New Zealanders the sanctity of their divine chiefs was so great that it proved fatal to all who inadvertently or deliberately profaned it. Writes Professor Frazer:—

> "For instance, it once happened that a New Zealand chief of high rank and great sanctity had left the remains of his dinner by the wayside. A slave, a stout, hungry fellow, coming up after the chief had gone, saw the unfinished dinner, and ate it up without asking questions. Hardly had he finished when he was informed by a horror-stricken spectator that the food of which he had eaten was the chief's. 'I knew the unfortunate delinquent well,' [proceeds Professor Frazer, quoting from a work by a Pakeha Maori]. 'He was remarkable for courage, and had signalised himself in the wars of the tribe,' but 'no sooner did he hear the fatal news than he was seized with the most extraordinary convulsions and cramp in the stomach, which never ceased till he died about sundown the same day. He was a strong man, in the prime of life, and if any pakeha [European] Freethinker should have said he was not killed by the tapu of the chief, which had been communicated to the food by contact, he would have been listened to with feelings of contempt for his ignorance and inability to understand plain and direct evidence.'"*

Numerous similar well-authenticated instances are mentioned by Professor Frazer, such as the following: A Maori woman, having innocently partaken of some tabooed fruit, on being informed of its sanctity, at once wailed out that it would kill her. She ate her forbidden fruit in the afternoon, and gave up the ghost before noon on the following day.

Among the Maoris the most innocent infringement of the customs relating to tabooed persons or things was, when made known to the transgressor, practically certain to prove fatal. On one occasion, the tinder-box of a native chief became the unconscious cause of the deaths of several savages. This article was mislaid by the chief, and was picked up by some natives, who used it to light their pipes. But when they discovered that it was the chief's property, and was, in consequence, sacred or taboo, they were so overcome by superstitious fear that they all died from fright. Even the "holy coat" of a New Zealand chief proved fatal to anyone who, through accident or design, happened to use it as an article of attire:—

> "A chief was observed by a missionary to throw down a precipice a blanket which he found too heavy to carry. Being asked by the missionary why he did not leave it on a tree for the use of a future traveller, > the chief replied that 'it was the fear of its being taken by another which caused him to throw it where he did, for, if it were worn, his tapu [that is, his spiritual power communicated by contact to the blanket and through the blanket to the man] would kill the person.' For a similar reason a Maori chief would not blow a fire with his mouth; for his sacred breath would communicate its sanctity to the fire, which would pass it on to the pot on the fire, which would pass it on to the meat in the pot, which would pass it on to the man who ate the meat, which was in the pot, which stood on the fire, which was breathed on by the chief; so that the eater, infected by the chief's breath conveyed by these intermediaries, would surely die."

* Golden Bough (1911), "Taboo and the Perils of the Soul," pp. 134, 135.

The above illustrations of the fatal effects of morbid fancy could be easily augmented by examples from the various Polynesian peoples, to whom the Maoris are closely related. Nor is this deadly influence of imagination restricted to this race. There is evidence that it is widespread among savage stocks. In their important work dealing with The Native Tribes of Central Australia, Spencer and Gillen record instances of savages who, having discovered that otherwise quite harmless wounds had, unfortunately, been inflicted by weapons endowed with magical powers, immediately give up all hope of recovery, refuse all food, and soon pine to death.

In South America kindred cases are met with. If the medicine-man of a Brazilian tribe—

> "predicted the death of anyone who had offended him, the wretch took to his hammock instantly in such full expectation of dying, that he would neither eat nor drink, and the prediction was a sentence which faith effectually executed."

In savage Africa, when the most hardened warriors are once persuaded that they have been bewitched, they regard death as their immediate doom, and all attempts to save them prove unavailing.

Professor Frazer mentions a remarkable instance of the fatal consequences of superstitious fear which was recorded by the Capuchin missionary, Merolla, who travelled in the Congo towards the end of the seventeenth century. Among the Congo natives it was customary for the wizards to ordain that certain foods should be avoided by the young savages. These prohibited foods were termed chegilla. It so happened that a young native, whose chegilla was a "wild hen," while on a journey, put up at a friend's house by the way. The host prepared a wild hen for his guest's breakfast, and the traveller asked whether it were a wild hen:—

> "His host answered 'No'; then he fell on heartily, and afterwards proceeded on his journey. About four years after these two met together again, and the aforesaid negro, not being yet married, his old friend asked him, 'If he would eat a wild hen?' To which he answered, 'That he had received the chegilla, and therefore could not.' Hereat the host began immediately to laugh, inquiring of him, 'What made him refuse it now, when he had eaten one at his table about four years ago?' At the hearing of this the negro immediately fell a trembling, and suffered himself to be so far possessed with the effects of imagination, that he died in less than twenty-four hours later."

The foregoing examples of the fatal effects of superstitious terrors possibly help to make plainer the circumstance that the religious frenzy excited by such exhibitions as those at Lourdes and Treves may occasionally so exalt the nervous system that neural diseases may experience a temporary benefit. But, obviously, there is nothing in these very few instances of alleviation of pain and suffering which in any way demands a supernatural explanation. The most vaunted recoveries alleged at Lourdes and Treves count as nothing when compared with the marvellous operations so successfully performed by famous surgeons like Sir Victor Horsley and other true benefactors of the human race.

Theology is nothing more than a science of words, which by dint of repetition, we accustom ourselves to substitute for things.—D'Holbach.

Acid Drops.

"Christianity," said Nietzsche, "has been the greatest misfortune of mankind." As one sees it incarnated in the average Christian it is positively loathsome. It robs him of whatever little sense of honor he was born with, and leaves him without common moral decency—especially in relation to "infidels," as those paltry, pernicious people call their intellectual superiors who have the brains and courage to think for themselves. We have just heard, for instance, quite accidentally, of the death of Mr. S. H. Munns, of the Terrace Hotel, Margate, a well-known place on the old front by the sea. We have known Mr. Munns so long that we cannot recollect off-hand when we first made his acquaintance. He was known, and known as a Freethinker, to nearly everybody in Margate; and during many years of the later part of his life (he was a good deal over eighty, we believe) his position as a local magistrate brought him into public prominence. His tall figure, his benevolent face, his humorous eyes, and his jocular manner, made him a noticeable personality. You couldn't confuse him with the rank of people even in a crowd. He was in the fullest sense of the word a Margate character. And his Atheism was a fact of common knowledge. We repeat it—his Atheism was a fact of common knowledge.

Nobody is immortal. Atheism seems conducive to longevity, but even Atheists must die, and old Mr. Munns has "joined the majority"—as the polite Romans of the pre-Christian days so cleverly and nicely put it. The moment the breath was out of his body the Munns family—who, we suppose, inherit the business that his energy, sagacity, and assiduity built up—proceeded to treat him as if all his rights expired when he became incapable of defending them. They buried him as quickly as the transaction could be carried through, and they gave him a Christian funeral. And some man of God was found (for the usual consideration) to tell lies over the old Atheist's coffin. Lies that he knew to be lies; lies that the "mourners" (heaven save the mark!) knew to be lies.

Mr. Munns was the wag of Margate. But people did not roar with laughter at his sallies; their faces broadened with a happy appreciative smile under the influence of his sly ironical humor. He would not have lost his temper, we believe, even if he could have witnessed the pious farce at his graveside. He would probably have smiled and said "I told you so."

What looks like another case of similar Christian piety occurred in last week's Athenæum. We found there a notice of the sudden death of Mr. William Carew Hazlitt—a grandson of the Hazlitt, who was a friend of "Saint Charles" Lamb, and Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and William Wordsworth, and himself a great writer, for whom Robert Louis Stevenson had such high admiration. Mr. W. C. Hazlitt did a lot of dryasdust work. He also wrote two real books. One was on Shakespeare. This is mentioned in the Athenæum obituary notice. The other was as he himself called it "a book for men and women," its title being "Man considered in Relation to God and a Church." He favored us with a presentation copy of this book last spring, when we were too ill to give it the good long notice that we intended to give it in the Freethinker—and a short notice of such a book would hardly have been just or useful. It was the fifth edition "greatly enlarged and partly rewritten," and the first edition had been published as far back as 1891. We had read our own (purchased) copy of the 1895 edition, and held it in much respect. The last edition was obviously a great improvement. It contains 352 pages, besides 58 pages of Introduction; say 600 pages in round numbers. It is thus a big book, and it is also an original book; that is to say, it came almost entirely from the writer's own brain and pen. It is a thoroughgoing criticism of Christianity and Priestcraft by a scholar and a gentleman. It is a noble book, and a brave book, and it is the writer's gravely considered and carefully written message to his fellow-men. Yet it is not so much as alluded to by the Athenæum. Such is Christian honor even in what used to be the leading literary journal in England!

We shall make it a point of honor on our own part now to give a longer account of the late W. C. Hazlitt's book to our readers very shortly; as soon, in fact, as we can find time to do it.

A meeting of the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews was held the other day to consider the question of finance. The Society has a deficit of £6,900.

and it is necessary to raise a sum of £10,000 to meet the needs of the coming year. There was, of course, the usual talk of opportunities for increased work opening, but the principal opportunities appear to be those presented by indigent Jews who have worn out the charity of their co-religionists. How otherwise a Jew is to benefit by becoming a Christian no one has yet been able to explain. Christianity does not make them more sober, more law-abiding, better parents, or better husbands. They simply become Christians—for a time. Very few of them take this step. The natural evolution of the Jew is to Freethought. To change one religion for another is like exchanging an abscess for a cancer.

"Deny Heaven and Hell," says "Dagonet" in the Referee, "and the Bible goes by the board—and the New Testament follows it." Mr. Sims evidently thinks the New Testament is not a part of the Bible, but a different book altogether. He must have known better once. But we dare say it is a long time since he last opened the "Blessed Book."

Lord Loreburn's letter about Home Rule by consent was quickly challenged by the National Free Church Council, or at least the portion of it that met at Shrewsbury on Friday, September 12. The resolution passed at this meeting is sufficiently drastic:—

> "That this joint meeting regrets that Lord Loreburn should have suggested, even by implication, that the Welsh Disestablishment Bill may possibly have to be sacrificed to facilitate a Home Rule settlement; and this meeting desires to state in the clearest and most emphatic manner that not even in the interests of Irish Home Rule, or of any other question, can Wales consent to any postponement of the Welsh Bill, whether out of consideration of the exigencies of any political party or otherwise; and confidently calls upon the Government to fulfil its repeated pledges to Wales, and as confidently calls on the Welsh Members to see that the Welsh Disestablishment Bill, without further delay or concessions shall become law during the lifetime of the present Parliament."

What the Nonconformists really care about is the destruction of the Established Episcopal Church. State privileges to religion, outside the Establishment, they are quite willing to share in; such as exemption from rates and taxes, which are paid by all their fellow-citizens.

Home Rule appears to be doomed. The Bishop of Ardagh has "been in constant prayer to God that he would take the matter into his own hands, and avert the danger that threatens us." Mr. Asquith will please note. Perhaps he will turn on a Catholic praying machine to counteract the Protestant one—before it is too late.

Rev. A. F. Tracey, who has been vicar of Townstall with St. Savior, Dartmouth, for twenty years, says he has been there too long to be good for the parish or himself. "As there seems no room in England," he says, "I am going to try my fortune in New Zealand. I would have sought a curacy in England, but my wife says no vicar would stand me more than three weeks." That may be true without being to his discredit. In our (paper) crossing of swords with him we have always found him a gentleman. Our good wishes go with him wherever he goes.

Mr. Tracey has a parting shot at the Freethinker in his parish magazine—and incidentally at Mr. Bottomley who relied upon Mr. Foote's Bible and Beer. Mr. Tracey quotes Proverbs xxxi. 6, 7:—

> "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts. Let him drink, and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more."

Mr. Tracey contends that this is not Bible teaching. "The words are not those of an inspired writer at all." The first verse of the chapter states that it was spoken by King Lemuel. This is true. But the first verse is confused, and it probably means "a nameless king." Moreover, the speech is adopted and made a part of the book of Proverbs, whose author, by the way, is just as "nameless" as that old king. If the question of authorship is pressed the whole book is wrapt in a fog. Besides, that last chapter of Proverbs contains the description of the good wife and mother, which the Christians are never tired of quoting. Perhaps, by this time, Mr. Tracey is ready to endorse his own statement that "No ordinary Christian knows his Bible half as well as the editor of the Freethinker."

The New Witness, run apparently by the Chestertons, has an article "On Place-Names in Poetry," in which we read that "Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus" is "a phrase which stands unrivalled in the poetry of the world." The writer should read Milton.

Another article in the New Witness is by Mr. Cecil Chesterton on the new edition of Mr. Bernard Shaw's Quintessence of Ibsenism. Mr. Chesterton has a peculiar view of his own as to the old edition of "G. B. S.'s" book:—

> "The real value of the Quintessence of Ibsenism, especially its historical value, is of quite another kind. Mr. Shaw calls it a torpedo, and he is right. How well that torpedo was aimed I have only too good reason to know, for I was on the ship that it struck. The ship was irreparably damaged. It sank; and while a few strong men (like Mr. Foote and the Under-Secretary to the Board of Trade) are still clinging to the wreckage of its stout timbers, the majority of its crew are struggling in the water in a manner at once grotesque and pitiable. For myself, I had the good fortune to be picked up by the boat of an obscure fisherman—that was called Peter.
> "Mr. Shaw may have thought he was firing his shot at Orthodoxy. I do not know; anyhow, he did not hit Orthodoxy. What he did hit, what he certainly brought down was that high Idealistic Rationalism, the creed of Mill, of George Eliot, of Huxley, which was at that time the creed of almost all intelligent people."

There is something very novel about this. We fancy it will astonish Mr. Shaw himself. That terrible explosion never reached our ears, and we don't remember the ship going down. Mr. Chesterton is quite mistaken as to the state of Freethought in England to-day. It has permeated the public mind to an enormous extent. Bradlaugh's following was largely political. Freethought is stronger now than when he left it; as, indeed, it was bound to be with the course of time.

There was food for thought in the Daily Sketch picture of pilgrims to Lourdes being carried on board the boat conveying them from England to France. They were going to Lourdes to be cured of their physical maladies. "Now and then," the Sketch said, "one is healed—but nearly all return, their hopes shattered once more. But still they pray." Poor creatures! They believe that the Holy Virgin could cure them all if she liked, but it would be "blasphemy" to ask why she doesn't.

The "now and then" cases of healing are mainly nervous, and the benefit received (more or less temporarily) is due to excitement and auto-suggestion. Nobody ever went to Lourdes with one leg and came away with two.

The epidemic of visions at Alzonne, in the South of France, referred to in last week's Freethinker, is growing rapidly. At first the visions were confined to two little girls who received messages from Joan of Arc. Now nearly everybody sees her; while others see the Virgin Mary, St. Michael, St. Margaret, St. Catherine, and "the Holy Face." Alzonne appears to have become a regular holiday resort for saints. According to the Daily Telegraph, one who goes to Alzonne and fails to see a vision runs a chance of being lynched. Indeed, a reporter of the Matin who did not see any of the saints had to leave in a hurry. The villagers suggested throwing him into the river. Going to see the visions, says the Telegraph, has become the chief occupation of everybody. Processions are constantly visiting the place. People come in on bicycles, and, although the bishops remain aloof, the clergy appear to be reaping a harvest. It is just probable that we may see another Lourdes established.

Rev. C. B. Law, vicar of Chesbunt, who made himself notorious over the Hoddesdon motor-'bus disaster, declares that "God is calling upon men everywhere to repent." Judging from the newspaper reports, the clergy want this call as badly as any other class. Maybe the reverend gentleman wants it a bit himself. Preachers are not necessarily good at practice. "A daw's not reckoned a religious bird because it keeps a cawing from the steeple."

Some people, says Mr. R. J. Campbell, are asking, in connection with the disaster on the Midland Railway, where God comes in? Exactly; if there is a God, he must come in somewhere, either in a positive or a negative sense. When the smash occurred on the Great Eastern, the Rev. Len Broughton explained what God was doing at the time. The preacher, who was on the train, was saved by the direct interposition of Providence. That is all right. God was looking after Broughton, and could not attend to others at the same time—or, perhaps, they were not worth the trouble. Mr. Campbell says that he had himself travelled over the Midland line the day before the accident, but he does not feel inclined to thank God for his safety. We congratulate Mr. Campbell on his modesty, and so much common sense.

Still, where does God come in? The question is insistent. Mr. Campbell practically says he doesn't know. But he suggests things which he believes may comfort people. His advice is to bear in mind that it is not only in railway collisions and Titanic disasters that pain and suffering exists:—

> "Somewhere in London now there is someone going through mental and bodily anguish at least equal to anything experienced by anyone involved in the Midland Railway disaster. If we wonder why God does not prevent a calamity on such a scale as this, we must also wonder why he does not stop the suffering that is going on all the time."

Well, we do wonder; but we fail to see that the presence of pain everywhere answers the question raised by pain being present in a particular direction. It can only be that suffering is general, which we quite admit. And, instead of blaming God for being careless or cruel on a special occasion, we have to conclude that carelessness is characteristic of his conduct of things in general. Finally, Mr. Campbell asked his hearers to remember that the next life was very near, and death was the only means of living it. Really! We may suggest to Mr. Campbell that death is a fact, a solid, indisputable fact. Another life is only an assumption, and one in favor of which no reliable evidence has ever been produced, in spite of it being the business of many thousands of people to provide it.

What always strikes us about this kind of apologetic talk is its utter futility. It never comes into contact with the question raised. The Christians, ancient and modern, orthodox and heterodox, are continually furnishing the world with accounts of cases in which God has directly interfered for the benefit of particular individuals. It may be a case of conversion, or the cure of a disease, or a "providential" prevention of disaster, or a feeling of happiness in response to prayer. Yet when anything like the Aisgill collision occurs, and the Christian is asked why the God who could intervene to secure a convert remains passive during a collision, the answer forthcoming is that God is just as careless or as brutal in other directions, and we must not expect him to be kinder or more careful here. As though there is anything more in this than an extension of the charge! God can intervene to secure a convert; he does nothing to prevent three little children being crushed or roasted—perhaps crushed and roasted—to death. "We feel," says Mr. Campbell, "that if we could prevent a thing so terrible we should do so. But the Almighty did not interfere." Quite so; one only need add, What would be thought of the man who could have interfered but refrained from doing so?

Several Pacific islands in the Tonga group have dropped "down below," and hundreds of natives and a few whites have gone down with them. Beautiful, benevolent "Providence"! "For his tender mercies are over all his works."

According to the London correspondent of the Glasgow Herald, the Secretary of the Lord's Day Observance Society expressed surprise at the recent prosecutions for playing golf on Sunday in Scotland. From this professional Sabbatarian's remarks we gather that he has a most elementary knowledge of the law. We accept him, however, as an authority on the decline of Sunday observance in Great Britain. "He pointed out," the Herald correspondent says, "that the opening of golf courses on Sunday has sadly depleted Sunday-schools and Bible classes of their senior boys. In one case he specially mentioned all the senior boys save one were absent from a Bible class on the first occasion that a neighboring golf course was open on Sunday." How sad! Where is our pocket handkerchief?

The Glasgow godly are in a flutter. We understand that their churches, and other buildings connected with them, are exempted from rates; but that is not enough—they want to frustrate the mere correct valuation of the properties by the City Assessor. In other words, they don't want the public to know the full extent of their relief from the local obligations that devolve upon the rest of the community. The Valuation Committee gave a discreet decision on appeal. The churches and the halls, etc., connected with them are to be valued separately. This looks fair enough, but in practice it reduces the value of the churches immensely. So the godly will soon recover their old peace of mind. They haven't to pay, and nobody knows what they are worth. Which is privilege supported by mystery,—a state of things very much to the taste of the men of God.

According to a Reuter telegram a young Christian Syrian girl, having wedded a Mussulman, her family killed her with stones and sticks, and then fled to England, where it is hoped they will be arrested. Religious bigotry is capable of anything. It was always the same, and it always will be.

Bishop Gailor, head of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of Tennessee, was arrested up-country on a charge of being a confidence man of some sort. It was a case of mistaken identity. But the charge was a shrewd thrust at the Bishop's profession.

A Reuter's telegram from Berlin explains the disaster to the Zeppelin airship, through which thirteen people were drowned. It says that the airship was properly equipped, it was not overweighted, and the gas had not diminished. The wreck was entirely due to a change in the weather, and "the accident must be attributed to a Higher Power." Evidently, God doesn't like the Zeppelins. We remember that when some people tried to scale heaven by building a tower, the "Higher Power" got riled. On that occasion he confounded their tongues. This time he drowned them. What will he do next?

Father Henry Day, S.J., attended the Trades Union Congress, and gave his impressions of the Congress to his congregation in the Church of the Holy Name, Manchester. He was most struck by the absence of religion of any sort, and he felt that the one thing needed to make the Congress really powerful was to Christianise it. Of course, Father Day means the right sort of Christianising, and would like the delegates to have a nice compact body of Catholic priests as their acknowledged head. This Jesuit priest does indeed dream of a time when the Roman Catholics shall have captured the Trades Union Congress. He advises "Catholic working men to join trade unions wherever they were." Then let them "take off their coats for work, make their power felt, become secretaries in the branches, and have a say in things." It is to be observed that Father Day doesn't advise them to join the trade unions as working men, but as Catholics. And it is as Catholics that they are to "have a say in things." That is, Catholics are to become trade unionists in order to play the game of the Catholic Church in a quarter from which all Churches should be excluded. We hope that genuine trade unionists will bear Father Day's advice in mind.

Mr. Lloyd George has been doing some week-end talk in a Methodist chapel in Mid-Wales lately. He appears to think that the Welsh have succeeded the Jews as the Chosen People. "It is my belief," he said, "that Wales will not go astray so long as it has its mountains and men, and God will see that it will have its mountains and men to the end of time—the mountains to mould the men and the men to emulate the mountains in their stability and their unconquerable strength." We understand now. We also understand why most of the great men of the United Kingdom—including Mr. Lloyd George—came out of Wales. It is all due to the mountains. Flatter parts, like Warwickshire, produce inferior personages, like Shakespeare and George Eliot; and flatter parts still, like Lincoln and Norfolk, produce more inferior personages, like Nelson and Tennyson. This is as clear as daylight; it looks so plain when you once see it. We thank Mr. Lloyd George for the explanation.

Addressing the Sunday-school children, Mr. Lloyd George said: "If anything is worth quoting at all it is worth quoting correctly." We quite agree with him. But we do not follow him when he goes on to say "I am sure this applies to God's Word." We presume the book referred to is the Bible—and we should really like to know in what sense Mr. Lloyd George regards it as God's Word. We don't think he will oblige us. There will be crinkles round his eyes—but no answer.

A Lancashire reader sends us a local paper containing a report of a sermon on the latest burning question, "Is There a Hell?" by the Rev. Ralph Shields, of Haslingden. There is nothing of any importance in the sermon; the preacher just gives the old orthodox doctrine. It is "Hell-hot—without sugar." But there is something funny at the finish. The column had to be filled up, and either by accident or design the editor stuck in a paragraph advertisement headed "Are You Ill?"

One morning's Daily Mail list of "latest wills" contained the following:—Rev. Benjamin Cotton, of Rochford, Essex, left £1,018. Rev. James Annesley Dawkins, of Leamington, left £9,810. Rev. Henry Dickenson Hubbard, of Reading, left £13,786. They were respectively 87, 85, and 89 years of age. How slow these men of God are to go "home"!

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, September 21, Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate, Leicester; at 6.30, "Shakespeare's Humanism in the Merchant of Venice." Admission free. Questions and Discussion after the Lecture.

October 5, Birmingham Town Hall; 19, Manchester; 26, Stratford Town Hall.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £183 17s. 9d. Received since:—E. Raggett, 10s.; W. Lupton, 10s.; J. D. Hyman, 2s. 6d.

L. E. ADAMS.—See paragraph. Thanks.

REV. U. DHAMMALOKA.—Your letter to hand, with enclosure, which is placed to your credit. Change of address noted. Glad you have recovered from your long illness, and shall be pleased to hear from you again when you have any news to communicate.

THOMAS FOWLER.—Always glad to receive cuttings, but please let them be as up-to-date as possible.

R. S. P.—We are obliged.

A. M.—We don't want to be too hard on Praed. We read him in the long ago, when we had youth and more leisure than we have now, and read "everything." He wrote society verses and political satires—good enough in their way, but belonging to the passing hour. You ask our opinion of Victor Hugo. Matthew Arnold described him as half man of genius and half charlatan. We think that was Arnold's arithmetic, but we are only quoting from memory. We should alter the proportions, but Arnold noted a real flaw in that splendid genius. Les Misérables is one of the great books of the world. We cannot deal with Hugo's poems in a brief reply to your question.

E. B.—Many thanks for cuttings

E. RAGGETT.—The object of Bible Romances is to teach as well as to amuse. It contains more information about the Bible—or rather about its contents—than any other single book ever published; and it anticipated every important point of the "Higher Criticism." Our object has always been serious. We never had a taste for mere clowning, and clowning for a living, except in a circus, is a very poor position for any man with the least self-respect. Grinding out "humor" daily is a frightful occupation for a rational being. It is calculated to drive a superior practitioner to suicide and an inferior one to the brandy bottle. For real wit read Shakespeare. For laborious and sometimes painful impromtus read Oscar Wilde.

H. DAWSON.—We had already noticed the John Bull paragraph. Thanks all the same. The letter is not editorial. It will do good in that district.

A. TAYLOR, who sends us a report of a discourse on Hell "by a local Fire Insurance agent," says: "The Freethinker is just 'ripping,' and I am already looking forward to next week's particularly."

R. AXELBY (1) Your friend's statement about Shelley is a rare joke. We have heard lots of funny falsehoods about that great poet, but we never heard before that he was "a victim to drink." Shelley was the most abstemious of men, often dining on bread and water. He very rarely touched wine; probably not half a dozen times in his life. Some of his friends were of opinion that he injured his health by over-abstinence; not doing justice to his body and overtaxing his brain. Practically he was a teetotaler and vegetarian. (2) The Globe Shakespeare is in one volume, but the type is small; so is that of the one-volume Oxford Shakespeare. The type of the Leopold Shakespeare is larger: so is the price.

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

C. W. THOMAS.—Glad to receive such an appreciative and encouraging letter from New Zealand. By all means send us the paper you mention.

IRISH FREETHINKER.—It is the usual news from Lourdes; just a few instances of benefit from excitement and expectation.

J. WEST.—The reverend gentleman's views on vaccination and smoking are no affair of ours. The Freethinker only deals with parsons as parsons.

H. READ.—"Lectures on Noses"—a book at one time well known, but now only obtainable second-hand, and that rarely.

A. J. MARRIOTT.—We may give Mr. Shaw's new play a turn.

MCCANN.—Cuttings are too late on Tuesday.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote's last lecture before his late severe illness was delivered, we believe, at Leicester. We have not access at the moment to the Freethinker file, and we are writing from memory. It is curious that Mr. Foote's first lecture after his recovery from that illness should also be at Leicester. He occupies the Secular Hall platform in Humberstone-gate this evening (Sept. 21), his subject being "Shakespeare's Humanism in the Merchant of Venice." The Leicester "saints" are always fond of hearing Mr. Foote on Shakespeare, and this special subject should prove attractive to a good many other liberal-minded people, especially to those among them who have a taste for literature. Mr. Sydney Gimson, the Leicester Secular Society's president, takes the chair at 6.30 p.m. A reasonable time will be allowed for questions and discussion after the lecture.

The Leicester Secular Society sends us its Lecture Program from the first Sunday in September to the last in December. It is a very varied list of attractions, and should fill the Hall when the weather is not too bad. We are glad to see Mr. J. M. Robertson's name in the list. It may be taken as an answer to those who ask questions about his Freethought occasionally—forgetting that his sceptical books are still on sale as openly as ever.

Mr. Foote has been prolific in lecture titles. A complete list of them, from 1870 to 1913, would be fairly exhaustive and rather striking. We notice two of his old titles in the Leicester list against the names of Mr. J. M. Robertson and the Rev. R. Roberts, of Bradford—"Christianity in the Melting Pot" and "The Use and Abuse of the Bible." The latter was one of the subjects in the list of Mr. Foote's first lectures in the old, and long ago pulled-down, St. James's Hall in Regent-street in 1895. We are not suggesting plagiarism, but only stating an interesting fact.

Mr. Bottomley has "done the handsome." The following paragraph appeared in last week's John Bull:—

> "BLESSED BE BEER!
> "Many readers have written expressing their surprise at the weight of Biblical authority which we adduced in favor of gladdening the heart with wine. If they would know more of this aspect of the subject, they should read the pamphlet Bible and Beer, by Mr. G. W. Foote, published by the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, E.C., to which we were indebted for much of our information."

Thanks!

The Demonstrations arranged by the North London Branch of the N. S. S. on Sunday last at Parliament Hill and Finsbury Park were highly successful. The addresses delivered by Messrs. Davidson, Hecht, Hope, and Ratcliffe were received with great applause by large audiences. The platform, a brake drawn by a pair of magnificent horses, was generously supplied by Mr. E. Wilson.

We are always glad to see one of our exchanges, the Examiner, edited by Mr. W. W. Collins, at Christchurch, New Zealand. We get it rather late—the August number reaches us about the middle of September. But its interest does not depend so much on chronology. We hope our contemporary has a constantly increasing circulation—as it deserves.

Mr. Stopford Brooke's new volume of lectures, Ten More Plays of Shakespeare, is one that we shall have to introduce more formally to our readers. At present we want to bring the following important passage to their attention on Shakespeare's religion—or rather his irreligion:—

> "His belief in a divine justice is shaken in Hamlet, is almost mocked at in Measure for Measure, is really absent in Macbeth, but is replaced by a belief in chance as at the root of the universe in this play, Othello, while in King Lear it is altogether gone."

Some of our readers will recollect that this is essentially what we have been arguing for twenty or even thirty years. The Freethinker has been a pioneer in all sorts of ways.

It is in King Lear, perhaps the very greatest work of human genius, that Shakespeare shows himself, practically, a pure Atheist. This is a very significant fact. Tolstoi called this great play a poor stupid production. Mr. Bernard Shaw knows better than that. He has said that King Lear is a masterpiece, and that no man will ever write a better tragedy. And it was in this wonderful play that Shakespeare's mind reached the climax of its sceptical development.

Mayor Gaynor, of New York, who died so suddenly on his "holiday" voyage to England, seems to have been a remarkable man in many ways. We have seen references to him, from time to time, in the New York Truthseeker, as a liberal-minded man on several questions related to religion, —for instance, the Sunday question. This impression is confirmed by some extracts from his letters wired over by the New York correspondent of the Daily News. The following is a brisk passage from a letter to a complaining clergyman :—

> "Reverend and Dear Sir.—You tell me your parishioners insult you because of your beard. Have you trimmed it in some peculiar way contrary to Scriptures, or are you certain it is your beard which is the cause of the trouble?"

Here is another passage, also from a letter to a minister, who wanted a licence to preach for the conversion of the Jews in the streets of the most Hebrew part of New York:—

> "This work of proselytising from other sects is carried too far. Haven't Christians appropriated the entire Jewish sacred Scriptures? Was not the New Testament also written entirely by Jews? Was not Jesus born of the Jewish race? The Jews' pure belief in one true living God comes down to us from the twilight of fable: it is the one great unbroken lineage and tradition of the world. How many Jews have you converted so far?"

Writing to his sister, six weeks after he was shot, three years ago, he expressed himself as follows with regard to death and the "hereafter":—

> "I was not a bit afraid to die, if that was God's will. I said to myself, 'Just as well now as a few years hence.' No one who contemplates the immensity of Almighty God, his universe and his works, and realises what an atom he is in it all, can fear to die in this flesh, even though it were true that he is to lose his identity and be dissolved for ever into infinity, the matter and mind from which he came."

We shall look forward to something interesting about Mayor Gaynor in the Truthseeker.

Lady Sophia Palmer (as was), the Comtesse de Franqueville (as is), gives in the Nineteenth Century what to her is a sad account of the results of the separation of Church and State in France. "Not only in State functions and public ceremonies and great public administrations," she says, "is God ignored; in schools, colleges, clubs, hospitals, and asylums the name of God has been wiped out. And the result of this permeates every town and village, every workshop, and every home." In other words, when Church and State are separated, religious people can no longer put their symbols and shibboleths on public property. This is the newest "martyrdom."

But if you wish to shatter the social fabric, you must not expect your professor of Social Anthropology to aid and abet you. He is no seer to discern, no prophet to foretell a coming heaven on earth, no mountebank with a sovran remedy for every ill, no Red Cross Knight to head a crusade against misery and want, against disease and death, against all the horrid spectres that war on poor humanity. It is for others with higher notes and nobler natures than his to sound the charge and lead it in this Holy War. He is only a student, a student of the past, who may perhaps tell you a little, a very little, of what has been, but who cannot, dare not tell you what ought to be. Yet even the little that he can contribute to the elucidation of the past may have its utility as well as its interest when it finally takes its place in that great temple of science to which it is the ambition of every student to add a stone. For we cherish a belief that if we truly love and seek knowledge for its own sake, without any ulterior aim, every addition we make to it, however insignificant and useless it may appear, will yet at last be found to work together with the whole accumulated store for the general good of mankind.—Prof. J. G. Frazer, "Scope of Social Anthropology."

IT must always be a source of wonder that Christianity which, at a certain period was the greatest enemy of art, should turn as its most powerful patron. Over and against this religion which destroyed almost every vestige of ancient art, stands the great art fervor of the Church. Yet it is not so difficult a problem to solve after all. In truth, the Church was impotent against the imaginative impulse of the Latin race,* which sooner or later was bound to assert itself in art. Thus, the Church had no alternative but adaptation; but, of course, with a means. Through the medium of art, she saw how she could further clinch the mind. Where doctrines were only inculcated through the heart, they were now to be preached only through the eye. The flowers of paradise, the fires of hell, the ineffable Madonnas, and the martyred saints, were all to appeal to the senses. Little did Mother Church foresee whither her scheme would eventually lead her. She simply awakened mankind to the realities of life. Those very flowers of paradise were still flowers, and they meant the country and nature. Those fires of hell and the martyred saints meant suffering, and, above all, human suffering. Those Madonnas meant the mother and the family. For the arts are only the mirror of life after all, and perhaps, as Heine says, the Italian painters combatted priestdom more effectively than did the Saxon theologians.

Thus did art become the "handmaid of God," and, incidentally, of the Church. Everything connected with art came from her or to her. Giotto was lauded and befriended by the pontiffs of his day. Raphael was offered a cardinal's hat, whilst Michael Angelo and Pope Giulio were almost inseparable. If the Church did not always have the mind of the artist, as with the freethinking Perugino, or the Atheist Da Vinci, yet it always had his brush, for there was small subsistence for an artist outside of "the fold." Indeed, few would have dared to have stood outside. Among the few who dared, was one who not only refused both his art and his knee to Church and State, but openly attacked them. His name was Salvator Rosa.

The mind of genius, and the artistic genius especially, is inherently anarchistic. It is "something unsociable," as Anatole France says. Revolt is its note sensible, and determines the whole gamut of its expression. Indeed, one is almost tempted to say, the greater the genius the more pronounced is this revolt. Of Salvator Rosa it has been said that "from his cradle to his tomb he was the creature of impulse." Boyhood finds him in antagonism to his masters; youth, in Bohemian wanderings and sojourning with banditti; opening manhood, in opposition to the art schools and its resultant—misère. Then the bloom of life brings him among the rebels of Masaniello. Thus the formative years of his life are spent in conflict. We shall see how this constitutional impulse or revolt adapts itself to the circumstances of his life and again reacts upon his art.

Salvator Rosa was dedicated to the Church, and as a youth entered a monastic seminary in Naples, known as the "Collegio Somasca." His studies naturally brought him in contact with the literature of ancient Greece and Rome, and from that moment his naturally free and independent spirit fell in line with the pagans. But his masters would not allow such profound veneration for the pagans as Rosa was prone to express, and soon his classical studies had to cease. Virgil had to make way for Johannes Scotus, Sallust for Chrysostom Javello, and so forth. Rosa strenuously resisted these Church studies, and neither reward nor punishment could induce him otherwise. He had to leave the school in consequence. From the day he stepped from the doors of the school, Rosa belonged to the Greeks. To them he owed his fundamental conceptions of art and life. Their influence glow and flash in every canvas and poem that came from his master mind.

Literature and art had a strong attraction for Rosa, and no sooner had he returned home from the collegio than we find him in the workroom of his brother-in-law, an artist, Francanzani. In those days it was considered "the thing" for all and sundry who sought painting as a profession to submit to a certain routine or beaten track. First, there was the workroom of some master; then came what was called seeking their giro, a sort of artistic pilgrimage to the galleries and churches throughout the land; and, finally, was their definite attachment to some art school or faction, who ruled everything in the art world from a commercial point of view. Naturally, the young rebellious Rosa would no more submit to this art routine than he would submit to the Church routine at the collegio. He was, as Lady Morgan, his most sympathetic biographer says: "A lover of liberty upon instinct." And so, one fine day, he set off from his native town, like a true Bohemian, to seek his own workroom, his own giro, and his own school. Not to the crowded cities, but to the wilds of Apulia, Calabria, and the Abruzzi. These wild but splendid regions had once formed part of that Magna Græcia, vestiges of the towns which still remained, and even the inhabitants still held the old free spirit which animated the citizens of the Greek republic.* Such an atmosphere was most congenial to the impulsive spirit of Rosa. Here he found his workroom on the broad bosom of Nature, his giro in "liberty" his watchword through life, and his school in those pagans who lived before the night of Christian superstition fell on this world.

All of Rosa's art work and his writings reveal a deep reverence for nature. It was innate. "How I hate the sight of every spot that is inhabited," he writes to a friend. It was his wonderful landscapes that made him the idol of the Roman people, and perhaps has given him more lasting glory with posterity than any other class of his work.

Sir Joshua Reynolds says:—

> "Rosa saw the necessity of trying some new source of pleasing the public.....and therefore struck into a a wild, savage kind of nature, which was new and startling."

Nothing could have been more alien to the spirit of Rosa than "pleasing" that class which Tourgenev called "that old woman—the public." Rosa simply painted nature as his revolté organism conceived it. In the hands of his great landscape predecessors, Claude and Poussin, nature had always appeared in beauteous repose and tranquillity, clothed in radiant sunlight or refreshing skies, verdant fields or quiet lagoons. That was nature, healing and beneficent, as they saw it. But to Rosa it appeared different. He saw nature cruel and pitiless: the tornado or threatening sky, the yawning chasm or blasted forest, the seething gorge or desolate pass. His figures, too, in these scenes. No ideal arcadians have contemplation here, but men, banditti, wayworn travellers—all who have suffered or been at the mercy of this cruel nature.

After his sojourn in the wilds, Rosa returns to civilisation, full of aspirations such as all young geniuses are wont to have, but alas! there was a grave awakening for a soul enamored of nature, liberty, and the ancients. He had yet to learn of the old Bohemian road, misère, which a modern (that grand Bohemian, Murger) speaks of, upon which everyone must tread who enters the arts, without other subsistence than art itself. Soon Rosa was to tread that road. If he had but bowed to the art conventions of the day, as taught in the workroom, the routine giro, and the schools, he would have learned that Madonnas, dead Christs, holy families, martyred saints were the only marketable art commodities. Instead of this, young Rosa was painting his wonderful landscapes or scenes from classical history. And so no patrons came to poor Rosa, who could only get rid of his work through the revenditori for a small pittance.

Chance threw his work in the way of Lanfranco and Falcone, both eminent painters, whose influence would have been invaluable to anyone but a rebel like Rosa, who stedfastly refused to prostitute his art for any market or patron, and would say: "Liberty was beyond price, and the honors and wealth of the world would not purchase him."

Rosa then tries Rome, and like Horace, makes the journey on foot. But the Eternal City, the very cradle of Western art, was no different to Naples. The "schools" and the market commanded everywhere. Once again he has to bargain with the miserable revenditori, and once again misère. But his art had some consolation for him. Day and night found him feasting his eyes on the Rome of the Cæsars from one of the seven hills or along the Tiber's shores.

Rosa was the first great artist to stand outside the "patronage" of the Church, State, and the Schools. Not that he did not work for patrons (for he admits himself that sometimes he had to keep down his "infernal pride" in this respect) but never did he seek patrons or submit to orders from them. "Carpenters," he would say, "may work upon given plans, but genius never." Nor would he cater for the public in their insatiable demand for "saints and saints and saints again." As for the schools, which he considered were labels to cover mediocrity, he never ceased to pour out his wrath upon them. These attacks brought the whole of the artistic community in open hostility to him, which did not abate until his death. From this he suffered much, and it was the means of keeping him out of the most influential art society—the Academy of St. Luke.

A most important event in the life of Rosa was his friendship and service with Masaniello and the Neapolitan revolution. When the revolt broke out in 1647, Rosa immediately set out for the scene of action, to throw in his lot with the rebels. Here Falcone and other artists had already formed themselves into a troop known as the Campagnia della Morte, of which Falcone was a captain. This had offered its services to Masaniello, and in this campagnia Rosa became enrolled. History records that it took part in the chief events of the rebellion, and Rosa is spoken of as one of Masaniello's "best soldiers." However, Masaniello was betrayed and assassinated, and that practically ended the revolution. The Campagnia della Morte was disbanded, Falcone flying for safety to France, whilst Rosa hurried to Rome.

At the outset I spoke of the main influences which seemed to subordinate the art and philosophy of Rosa—his nature worship, his democratic views, and his reverence for the classic ideal. Of his nature worship as shown in his landscapes and marine views I have already dealt with. It remains now but to delineate the influence of the other two.

Rosa was always a rebel, and it must be remembered that he was the first who dared to write in the cause of liberty in Italy. His poem of La Poesia is a most powerful indictment of the crimes of the rich and the miseries of the poor. How he escaped the dungeon is an enigma to me, for we know how his brother-in-law, the artist, Francanzani, suffered capital punishment for a political offence. whilst Nicolo Franco was put to death by Pius V. for a satire.

Rosa's cantata, beginning, Non á trequa, is a long complaint against society for its treatment of genius. In the satire, La Musica, he rails at the hands which shower wealth upon people who "amuse" the public, "whilst genius can scarcely procure a sheaf of straw to rest upon." One of his etchings displays the figure of genius careless of the treasures which wealth pours out before it, for the eyes are directed towards the form of liberty, who

* Rosa even lived for a time with a troop of banditti in the Abruzzi.

"Ingenuus, liber, Pictor, successor et equus, Spretor opum, mortisque, hic meus est genius."

Rosa had a deep reverence for the person and ideals of Masaniello, and his death and the failure of the democratic cause sank deep into his mind. His whole being glowed with indignation when he contemplated that vile priesthood and sordid aristocracy triumphant over the suffering people. Anguish and bitterness drove all thoughts of his art from him. The pen alone could soothe his wounded feelings, and it was then he wrote his great satires La Guerra and Babilonia. How beautifully he apostrophises the heroic Masaniello in La Guerra. In Babilonia he refers to his country as the "slave of slaves," the "very focus of all abuses in government, of all ridicules and superstitions in society." He tells us he has no illusions in life: "I know that man is the jest of fortune; mortal glories may never seduce me. I have ever before me the image of the tomb." He knew, too, that this freedom of speech would "keep him in the shade," and throw him "out of the pale of common sympathy." These satires were delivered before the very élite of Rome, including the high officials of Church and State, who sat and listened to Rosa inveighing against their tyranny of the people.

When he settles down once more to his art, the brush of Rosa only speaks as his pen had done; and when the "smart set" came to his studio, they found two canvasses entitled L'Umana Fragilita and La Fortuna, which were but a reflex of the bold opinions of his satires. Princes and prelates who saw them went their way saying, that they had already heard Rosa's satires, but now they had seen them.

L'Umana Fragilita, which might be called "The Insignificance of Life," represented a beautiful girl, decked with fragrant flowers, seated on a glass globe, and bearing a sweet child, which she caresses. Another child lies cradled at her feet blowing air bubbles, whilst a third plays with a skein of flax which it has set fire to. Hovering over this joyous group is death, grim and dreadful, dictating these words: Nasci pœna—vita labor—necesse mori. Rosa expressed in this picture, as he did in Babilonia, his view of the worthlessness of life, when one confronts its all, with "that fell sergeant, death."

The second picture, La Fortuna, depicted a fair woman pouring from a shell a stream of riches, crowns, mitres, honors, orders, jewels, and gold into the hands of a seething multitude, all striving for fortune's favors. These are beasts of the field, reptiles, carrion, and swine, who, in their greed and avarice, trample under foot the symbols of genius, liberty, and philosophy—the pen, the pencil, the compass, the book, the globe. Whilst the ass decks himself with orders, the swine dons the mitre, the fox mounts the cross, and crowns and coronets are assumed by wolves and vultures.* This daring picture, with its companion, soon spread abroad the cry of Atheism and sedition, which was furthered by Rosa actually exhibiting them on the feast of St. John. Rosa had already incurred the odium theologicum for previous satires, and now his recent connection with Masaniello's revolution, followed by these "blasphemies," made everything clear to his enemies. Some actually saw in the swine and ass of Fortuna the physiognomies of certain prelates of the Holy Church, and in a goat the features of Innocent X.; and, in a very short time, information was laid against Rosa. Within the dread walls of the Inquisition clouds were gathering, but just before his arrest his friend, Don Mario Ghigi, interceded on his behalf by means of an "explanation" of his picture. But the Church would not be appeased, and Rosa's fate looked black. Fortunately, his friend enabled him to escape to Florence, and the Church was cheated of its prey.

* There is another picture of Rosa's with this idea. It shows fortune shading her eyes with one hand, whilst the other scatters gold indiscriminately.

What Rosa's precise religious views were there is no definite record, but he was clearly a Freethinker. No one who has read the cantata beginning Non è tregua, in which Rosa rails at everything human and divine, could accept him as a son of the Church. Accustomed from his youth to drink his philosophy from the founts of classical literature, he had a decided leaning to Epicurianism, although he was a Stoic from temperament. That the Church branded him as a heretic, and that he refused the sacrament on his deathbed, is perhaps mere negative evidence. Rosa not only looked upon the Church as an enemy to liberty but he had a personal quarrel with it as an artist, and strongly blamed it for the deterioration of painting. Also, when he saw the sister art, music, suffering in the same way (at a time when the Church was trying to make its services "attractive" by introducing light music) he made a terrific onslaught upon it, in which occurs the following profane couplet:—

"In loose strain the Miserere is given,
And wafts the soul upon a jig to heaven."

All this apart, as high above everything else, stands Rosa's art opposition to Christianity, since he almost entirely ignores its doctrines in his paintings. The one great instance of its use is his famous picture of Purgatory, which at the same time preaches a higher doctrine than might be expected from its mere title. This "double meaning" was evidently divined even during Rosa's lifetime, since he was accused of painting a satire. Here is the picture: below are the lost souls in hell with agonised looks and outstretched hands, supplicating the Blessed Virgin, seated above in all her beatific glory, and smiling benignly. But the Holy Mother of God knows them not, nor even heeds them. There is also an Assumption of the Virgin, dating from the same period; but the great bulk of his work reveals a wider religion—one that embraced humanity. The pagan spirit dominates throughout his art, and whatever one may claim for this selection, either deliberate or instinctive, it certainly carries its significance.

Look at his greatest creations: the sublime Prometheus, which has been described as portraying "all human symmetry and suffering." His Philosophy Holding a Mirror to Nature, bearing an old lesson of Rosa's—philosophy alone can see nature as she really is. The Death of Socrates, a subject chosen later by another rebel and Freethinker, the most famous painter of the French Revolution, David. Pindar and Pan, which shows satire dictating to poetry. Polycrates Expiating His Crimes, by that death which the tyrant of Samos had often doomed others. Justice, banished from heaven taking refuge with some peasants on earth. This a most heretical idea; fancy finding more justice in "courts below" from the "lowly," than in "courts above" from the "Most High"! Diogenes, flinging away his cup on seeing a child drink from its hand. Pythagoras on the Seashore, paying fishermen to free the fish they had caught. The Death of Regulus, another superb satire on human society. The famous Catiline Conspiracy, Mercury and the Woodman, and a host of others, all of which testify how completely Rosa was obsessed with the pagan ideal.

"The Jew Book" gives Rosa but a tithe of material. Among the most noted from this source is the fine Job, Hagar in the Desert, St. John in the Wilderness, and Jeremiah. The artist had a sort of spiritual kinship with these folk. They, like himself, were "bitter in soul" and victims of misère. Sir Joshua Reynolds (Discourses) speaking of Jacob's Dream, refers to "the sublimity and grandeur of the sacred volume from which he drew his subject." So you see, if one cared to apply this canon of Sir Joshua's to a subject taken from pagan literature, say, the Catiline Conspiracy, it will make the Bible stand in comparison with Sallust, as the "Gaby Glide," does to the Eroica Symphony.

I have previously claimed as an argument, the selection of the subject, and so it may be urged, per contra, that Rosa painted a Christ! The reply is, that he also painted a Mahomet, a Jupiter, a Bacchus, and so on, to a score; and if he once or twice chose a Christian saint for a subject he did the same for a Roman Augur.

Salvator Rosa became the most famous painter of his day, and that notwithstanding all his political and religious heresies. The courts of Europe begged the honor of his brush and palette. To all, whether high or low, who were willing to accept his art, as he conceived it, he would say Yes. But to dictation he would not submit, neither to patrons, the schools, nor the market. And so it happened that this great genius, whose fame rang through Europe, and who numbered princes and prelates among his personal friends, was not "officially" recognised in his own country. To Church and State, as such, his name was anathema. He was a heretic and a rebel. Year after year went by and he saw all the official and public work being placed in the hands of second-rate artists, whilst he was ignored. But finally the conspiracy against him breaks down awhile, and in 1689, four years before his death, the "official" recognition comes, and this is how Rosa writes his friends concerning it:—

> "Ring out the chimes! At last, after thirty years existence in Rome, of hopes blasted, and complaints reiterated against men and gods, the occasion is recorded for me giving one altar-piece to the public. The Signor Philippo Nerli, the Pope's depositario, resolved upon vanquishing the obstinacy of my destiny, has endowed a chapel.....and in despite of the stars themselves, has determined that I shall paint the altar-piece."

Four years later, Rosa was beyond the Church's favors or flats. They buried him in the church of Santa Maria degli Angioli alle Terme—a fitting tomb for this great pagan of art. This very church was once the principal hall of the Thermæ of the Emperor Diocletian, the treasure-house of the great art of the Roman Empire. What a revenge!

H. GEORGE FARMER.

Twin Spirits.

IT is an interesting study to trace the duality of purpose and spirit in those liberators and leaders of mankind who are only divided by language. Swinburne and Nietzsche, living in the same period, labored to destroy this thing called Christianity, and unconsciously they worked in harmony, although they chose different mediums for their attack. Rich with invective, and with words clothed with fire, Swinburne's style contrasts vividly with the aphoristic prose vigor of Nietzsche; but they both beheld the common enemy in all its hideousness and depravity. With a taste of what Byron would have called "Attic salt," the creator of the Superman delivers his opinion of Christian saints in this manner: "In order that the lowest instincts may also make their voices heard, God must be young. For the ardor of the women a beautiful saint, and for the ardor of the men a Virgin Mary has to be pressed into the foreground." Swinburne, surveying the whole Valhalla of gods and goddesses, with almost a note of pity for her, says of the Virgin Mary:—

> "For thine came pale and a maiden, and sister to sorrow."

Both of these intellectual monarchs derived most of their inspiration from the study of Greek; the high road to Atheism or Agnosticism is to be found through that land where gods are plentiful as stars. Perhaps we poor Freethinkers may have a glimmering of the childishness and vicious monopoly contained in the First Commandment. Be that as it may, we are entitled to resent the arrogant claims of that small patch of land called Palestine when it presumes to produce the only God, after centuries of other god-making and god-breaking by other countries.

In reading The Antichrist, with its wealth of bitterness and denunciation directed against Christianity, one is instinctively reminded of the "Hymn to Proserpine." The fierce derision of one and the sublimity of the other forms a mental picture of destroyer and builder. The anger of Nietzsche knew no bounds when dealing with the effects of priestly destruction:—

> "The whole labor of the ancient world in vain! I am at a loss for a word which could express my feelings at something so atrocious.....In one night it became merely a memory. The Greeks! The Romans! Instinctive nobility, instinctive taste, methodic research; not stamped to death by Teutons and other heavy-footed vandals! But destroyed by crafty, stealthy, invisible anæmic vampires! Not conquered, but only drained of blood!"

Could the analogy of thought be more complete and striking when we remember the lines, "The world has grown grey from thy breath"? and further on in Swinburne's masterpiece, where Proserpine is compared with the mother of God, we see the desire to exalt and praise one who could even give death with loving hands. The present writer trusts that he has given a correct impression in this imperfect article of that subtle spirit of working in unison which exists in all countries. Nietzsche attracted to his destructive side Strindberg, Brandes, Zola, and a whole host of stalwart cosmopolitans. In a like manner, Swinburne's powerful influence drew Victor Hugo and Mazzini from their native homes, and all were practically agreed on the essentials of true progress. It would appear that the barbarous Christian creed creates its own destroyers; Nietzsche had been a Christian, with aspirations of becoming a parson! But Greek culture and a catholicity of reading has a magnetic influence on those who are not content to seek refuge in clouds of faith. Our greatest poets do not rummage in the charnel-house of Christianity for inspiration; they roam over those wide and free worlds where Eros, Aphrodite, and Hyperion welcome their arrival with the best they can bestow. In passing, we might mention that the poet of the pot-house is indicative of how far England has fallen from those standards of taste in Greek ideals which were good enough for Swinburne and Nietzsche. Those readers who have endured the tortures of "The Everlasting Mercy" will be able to judge for themselves.

Over the universe the fine threads of thought, shining like gold, connect country with country—Lucretius to Anatole France, Theocritus to Swinburne, Theognis to Nietzsche; but all, be it noted, do not have their starting-point from Nazareth, the negation of culture, the sepulchre of the spirit of humanity. I cannot do better than conclude with an aphorism from Nietzsche: "It is indecent nowadays to be a Christian." This is magnificent, sublime, glorious. It is concentrated venom and wisdom, and with the spectres of the "gibbetted Gods" looming against the murky sky of ignorance, not all the Walter Paters, or Coleridge's, or Christian subsidised painters can lend a dignity to a faith drenched with blood at its conception, and maintaining its tradition to this day.

WILLIAM REPTON.

WHY INFANTS OUGHT TO BE DAMNED.

If we want to see Christian theology at its best, we must go to the old divines. A famous Presbyterian of his day was Dr. William Jameson, who occupied the post of Professor in Glasgow University. In his Verus Patroclus, published in 1689, he explains why children are damned in the following manner (pp. 147-8): "Certain it is, from the whole tenor of the Scriptures, and, in special, Revelation xxii. 25, that those who in the sight of God are dogs are guilty persons, and to be excluded from heaven, and, therefore, to be thrust into hell; but whole nations, without exception, are such (Matthew xv. 26). Therefore, infants, being a part of these nations, deserve to be excluded from heaven and sent to hell.....' None can enter into the kingdom of heaven except they be born again' (John iii. 7). But surely this new birth is the gift of God, and a privilege which he may withhold from whom he will; and, therefore, without prejudice to his justice, may exclude whosoever hath it not from the kingdom of heaven; but none are excluded from it but guilty persons, which, I believe, none will deny; therefore infants may well be accounted guilty persons."

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 39 SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Why do these religions oppose and exterminate one another? Why has this been the case ever and everywhere. Because men are ever men; because priests have ever and everywhere introduced fraud and falsehood.

—NAPOLEON.

Is There a Hell?—II.

HELL has long been cooling off. It is said that nearly all the scientific men went there and they improved the place beyond recognition. The oldest inhabitant was puzzled to know where he was. A few of that venerable species were so discontented with the change, so disturbed in their habits of life, so wild at being robbed of their last consolation, that they made themselves a perfect nuisance. For the sake of the peace and quiet of the place, Satan had to put them them outside, with some fuel and matches to start a hell of their own. The place, indeed, is so much altered that it has had to change its name. It is no longer called Hell; it is now called Hades, as may be seen by the Revised Version of the Bible. The new name is quite attractive. It would admirably suit the advertising placard of a seaside resort. Many a young fellow would like a girl with that name. It suggests another Maid of Athens. But it lacks force as a "swear word." It is hardly strong enough to move a cat from a garden wall.

The contributors to Is There a Hell? accept the renovated establishment. Their clerical predecessors preached the old Hell of brimstone and fire, and eternal darkness in spite of the flames, and everlasting torture of the hopelessly damned; and they burnt people alive in this world for doubting the orthodox view of the next. The fire and the flames are now given up. Yet the old Hell was proved from the Bible, and the new Hell is proved from the same book. And the same book has been used, and will continue to be used, to justify whatever changes of doctrine the Christian Churches deem necessary.

How does a change become necessary? The explanation may be given with reference to the biological law of natural selection operating through the struggle for existence. A changing environment means that a species must adjust itself to new conditions of existence or perish. An unchanging environment means that a species may continue to exist indefinitely without further adjustment. The change never originates in the organisms; it always originates in the environment. When it does originate in the environment the law for the organisms is "Change or die."

This is how the Christian Churches change. They never change of themselves. The motion of development never comes from within. It comes from outside. A change takes place in the environment; that is to say, in the intellectual, moral, and æsthetic condition of mankind. Science shows, for instance, that the universe was not made in six days—if it was made at all. When that fact was established beyond dispute, it was found that the word "day" meant period. Further advances of science compelled the clergy to find, as the most sagacious of them soon did, that the whole Creation Story was a legendary narrative—embodying, of course, the sublimest truths. That is how the matter stands to-day. Further changes in the environment will compel further changes in the Churches' doctrine. We say compel, for that is always the process. Organisms will not change unless the environment does. Churches will not change unless the world does. And the world does move. Galileo muttered the truth when the Inquisition made him openly deny it; and Pascal said later on that if the world did move all the Cardinals at Rome could not prevent its moving, or themselves from going round with it.

Let there be no mistake on this point. It is idle for the Christian Churches to pretend that they have not really changed. They point to the Bible, and say "It still stands." They point to the words, and say "They are still there." But words have no intrinsic value. They are arbitrary symbols, differing in different languages. The English word "God" and the French word "Dieu" mean the same thing, though they have only a single letter in common. The words are nothing in themselves; it is their meaning that matters. If the meaning has changed the words have changed. And if the Bible does not mean what it did, it is not the same Bible, in spite of the unchanging words.

The Catholic Church is represented in this little book by Father Benson. He also gives up the old "literal"—that is, honest—Hell; and even argues that it is incompatible with our modern notions of the goodness of God. This is intended for the higher class of readers. The lower class of readers are supplied with something less refined and elevated. The Catholic Church still gives its imprimatur to Father Pinamonti's and Father Furness's little books on Hell. These little books are placed in the hands of the children of the lower classes. They give the most awful descriptions of the tortures of Hell. Older copies give pictures of these tortures. Such books are shocking, abominable, disgusting. They are calculated to terrify children. That is what they are meant for. Yet higher-class adult readers are assured that the flames and the serpents are all fancy. Even the Catholic Church has to consider the environment.

There is no end to the sleek audacity of the worst profession in the world. Some years ago the Free Churches, as they facetiously call themselves, drew up a new Catechism. The old stupidity was retained, but the old terrors were omitted. There was no mention of—no allusion to—the Devil. A friend of ours wrote to Dr. Agar Beet for an explanation. Dr. Beet was a member of the Catechism Committee. He had also been in trouble with the Wesleyan Methodist Conference over the question of everlasting punishment. This reverend gentleman replied to our friend's inquiry in the most simple manner. He said that he had no definite explanation to offer. The Devil appeared to have been "overlooked." Fancy overlooking the Devil! It was like Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark. The truth is, of course, that the Devil was not overlooked. The Devil was dropped.

Spurgeon, the famous Baptist preacher, did not overlook the Devil. Nor did he overlook Hell. He also took care that his congregation did not overlook them either. There was no painted fire in his Hell. It was all real. He insisted on this with the emphasis of personal knowledge. One would think that, like Dante, he had been in Hell and out again. His sermons contain many graphic descriptions of the great "pit." Here is one of them:—

> "When thou diest, thy soul will be tormented alone; that will be a hell for it; but at the day of judgment thy body will join thy soul, and then thou wilt have twin-hells, thy soul sweating drops of blood, and thy body suffused with agony. In fire exactly like that which we have on earth thy body will lie, asbestos-like, for ever unconsumed, all thy veins roads for the feet of pain to travel on, every nerve a string on which the Devil shall for ever play his diabolical tune of Hell's Unutterable Lament."

Spurgeon could speak of Hell like a commercial traveller who carried samples. But the time for that is gone—and gone for ever.

Dr. Isaac Watts, of famous memory, in Dissenting circles—and really a good writer if he had only kept to subjects on which it was possible to know something—was just as bad as Wesley and Whitefield. He did not "overlook" Hell in his World to Come. But the best idea of his notions of the abode of "damned sinners" (this is not our expression, but John Wesley's) is afforded by the following hymn, which used to be number 42, in the second book of Dr. Watts's old collection:

> "With holy fear and humble song,
> The dreadful God my soul adore;
> Reverence and awe become the throng,
> That speaks the greatness of his power.
> Far in the deep where darkness dwells,
> The land of horror and despair,
> Justice hath built a dismal hell,
> And laid her stores of vengeance there.
> Eternal chains and heavy plagues,
> Tormenting racks and fiery coals—
> Darts to inflict immortal pains,
> Dipt in the blood of damned souls.
> There Satan, the first sinner, lies,
> And roars and bites his iron bands;
> In vain the rebel strives to rise,
> Crushed with the weight of both thy hands.
> These guilty souls of Adam's race
> Shriek out and howl beneath thy rod;
> Once they could scorn a Savior's grace;
> But they incensed a dreadful God.
> Tremble, my soul, and kiss the Son.
> Sinners, obey your Savior's call,
> Else your damnation hastens on,
> And hell gapes wide to wait your fall."

There is a fluency and a vigor in this hymn which explains its being a great favorite in the days when the Devil was a haunting terror and Hell a dread reality. It could not be sung now in any church or chapel in England.

We will now consider the contents of Is There a Hell? a little more in detail. First we will take the anonymous editor's Introduction. This is how he opens:—

> "Whether or not we confess it to our fellow creatures, we all cling desperately to the belief that there is another life beyond the confines of this one. Atheists tell us glibly enough that we die like dogs; that our souls perish with our bodies; that when the earth has swallowed us up, we become part and parcel of the clay from which we were originally made, and there is an end of the whole matter. But in our heart of hearts we do not believe the Atheists, and we do not even believe that the Atheists believe themselves."

"Die like dogs." What a vulgar expression! What have dogs done to be singled out for this insult? Dogs have been known to save drowning people who could get no help from their felow human beings. Dogs are the most stedfast of friends. They are also the most unbribable. If every man has his price, it is not true of every dog. A millionaire could not get a dog away from a beggar. And what about the "die"? When our time comes we shall all have to die like dogs. There is nothing peculiar in a dog's death. All animals have to die alike. "Lower animals" involves "higher animals." Man is as much an animal as a dog. Shakespeare calls him "the paragon of animals." And what Shakespeare saw Darwin has confirmed.

Spiritual Blindness.

IT is an incontestable fact that whatever objects one person can see are visible to all others who care to look at them. As long as you retain your sight you are capable of beholding every substance within your range. You need not pray to any supernatural being, "Open thou mine eyes that I may behold the beautiful things that surround me." Your eyes are your own, to open or close as you may desire. It is true that some people have a longer and stronger sight than others, which may have been inherited or acquired by training; but the fact remains that the total lack of vision is either the outcome of disease or accident, both of which are preventible. Blindness, which is a most terrible affliction, is always caused by a purely physical defect. The blind are fully aware of this; but the idea of denying the reality of vision never enters their heads. They know perfectly well that in temperate regions nine hundred and ninety-nine in every thousand do actually see. When a child is born its parents do not require to send up to heaven the prayer, "O Lord, be gracious unto us and grant that the eyes of our darling may be opened." The child opens its eyes automatically, and vision ensues. Now, the curious thing is that, while tacitly admitting the truth of all this, the divines aver that man has spiritual eyes also which never spontaneously open, but must, in every case, be opened by a supernatural being, who, however, scarcely ever opens them at all, or opens them most inadequately. The Rev. Dr. Selbie, Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford, says:—

> "We are told that, with all its wonders, the human eye is but a very imperfect optical instrument at the best. If that is true, it is still more true that we are all more or less spiritually blind. Some of us have hardly had our eyes opened at all to the things of God. Some of us confess that clouds and darkness are round about us, and that we cannot see."

We are quoting from a sermon by the Principal which appears in the British Congregationalist for September 18. It was preached at Paddington Chapel, London, and its message is that we are all, including the preacher, more or less spiritually blind. It never occurred to him, that his discourse, from beginning to end, is a bill of indictment against God, presented to the Paddington Chapel congregation as grand jury, who, by listening to it with approbation, declared it to be a true bill. For countless ages the petition has been going up to the Throne of Grace, "Open thou mine eyes that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law"; and yet, in this second decade of the twentieth century of our Lord, Dr. Selbie is obliged to acknowledge that "we are all more or less spiritually blind, which proves that God is a most unwilling, if not bungling, eye-opener.

Is not that a most humiliating confession to make, and exceptionally dishonoring to the Divine Being? The brightest and ripest saint on earth to-day has his spiritual eyes only less than half opened, so that, at the very best, he sees the things of God merely in a mirror, darkly. Even Dr. Clifford, who is nearly eighty years of age, and has been a preacher of the Gospel from early manhood, is reported to have characterised his own faith thus:—

> "I cannot say I never have any doubt. I have doubts. I have knocked at the door again and again, and it has not been opened. Faith is a struggle, and faith in the perpetuity of a life that seems so brittle has to be fought for."

Tennyson, too, speaks in the same strain. All he can claim is:—

> "A little hint to solace woe,
> A hint, a whisper, breathing low," and even of this he "may not speak. In "The Vision of Sin," he says:—

> "At last I heard a voice upon the slope
> Cry to the summit, 'Is there any hope?'
> To which an answer pealed from that high land,
> But in a tongue no man could understand."

Sometimes highly emotional preachers indulge in absurdly extravagant language, speaking of God as if they know him much better than they do their most intimate friend, and of the heavenly Jerusalem in terms of far greater intimacy than they would dare to employ in a description of the town in which they reside; but the generality of believers, however, are more accurately represented by Tennyson, Dr. Clifford, and Principal Selbie. They have doubts. They have knocked at the door innumerable times, and it has never once been opened. They are not sure; they only hope it is all true. Yes, says Dr. Selbie, we are all more or less spiritually blind, and have great need to pray the prayer, "Open thou mine eyes," but many there are of whom we must say that they are totally blind. These are his very words:—

> "You wonder, sometimes, perhaps, that some men you know make so little of religion. You think of famous people who have been against religion, and have written against Christianity, and you think they are very clever, and you wonder why all the world does not think just as they do. But did it never occur to you that these people are blind? They are atrophied on one side of their nature, so to speak. There are certain things which they cannot see, just as color-blind people are unable to see certain things which you can see perfectly well. These men who leave God out of account, who say there is nothing in Jesus Christ beyond what is in any great human genius—these men cannot see. They are blind. Eyes they have, but they see not. Ears they have, but they hear not."

We frankly admit the blindness, but positively deny that it is caused by the atrophy of an existing organ of vision. What we maintain is that so-called spiritual blindness represents a normal condition of the human mind. We are spiritually blind because we have no eyes, and we have no spiritual eyes because there are no spiritual things to see. Once a man has seen the sun, shall he ever be troubled with any doubt as to its existence? To have seen is to know, and knowledge casteth out scepticism. To see an object, however dimly, is to know that it is there; and to know that it is there is to be incapable of doubt. The fact that Dr. Clifford has doubts proves that he has never really seen the things whereof he speaks. Had he seen them, doubt would have been an infinite absurdity, an impossibility. We hold that no one has ever seen them because they cannot be seen, and that they cannot be seen because they are not. What then? Are we to infer that all Christians are cunning hypocrites? By no means; multitudes of them being profoundly truthful and sincere. What we are necessitated to infer concerning them is that they are living in the Paradise of Fools, a region in which vanity and conceit hold sway. Dr. Selbie, humble, sincere, and conscientious though he be, takes for granted and emphatically affirms that unbelievers are the victims of spiritual atrophy, or that by neglect and wicked living they have drugged faculties which in him and his friends are doing their appointed work. How often has that been said of Charles Darwin, whereas Darwin himself assures us that he lost his Christian beliefs because he realised how utterly groundless they were. He became an Agnostic not because he starved his higher nature, but because he gave it its appropriate vent in the study of Nature round about him. The things of God ceased to exist for him because God himself had vanished. Because he expressed regret at having lost his love of poetry and music in consequence of his long absorption in biological research, Christians jumped to the idiotic conclusion that he lost his religion because he had so culpably neglected its exercises, which every honest reader of his Life knows to be absolutely false. In the same way, Dr. Selbie says of the opponents of religion generally that "they are atrophied on one side of their nature." We repudiate the insulting expression with scorn, and unhesitatingly declare that "the things of God," "the things of the spirit," and "spiritual vision" are theological assumptions, or inventions, of the objective reality of which there is absolutely not a single shred of evidence. They are simply dream-objects created by a restless and misguided imagination in times of ignorance and credulity. And yet Dr. Selbie has the audacity to stand up in a pulpit before a believing assembly and, in effect, institute the following comparison between them and the unbelieving crowds outside: "We see; they are blind. We exercise the whole of our nature, all our faculties being at work; they are atrophied on the higher and nobler side of their being. We are right; they are wrong." This is what is called preaching the glorious Gospel of the blessed God, and they who do it boast that humility is the first and last Christian virtue, being, in fact, the essence of the Christian life.

Now, we boldly deny the moral right of Christians to sit in judgment upon the rest of mankind. It by no mean follows, as they assume, that we are wrong because we differ from them. They form a minority of the human race. They have never been more than about one-third of the world's population. And yet they arrogate to themselves all the prerogatives of undoubted superiority. The world, they assert, will never be set right until it becomes Christianised, though nothing can be more conspicuous than the fact that Christendom, especially the most Christian portion of it, is as far from being set right to-day as it ever was. The truth is that, on the average, Christians are not better than other people, and in many cases not even as good. They have never succeeded in demonstrating that they possess and exercise faculties of which we are destitute, and until they do that their proud claims must fall to the ground. We are convinced that they are self-deceivers on a gigantic scale, consumed by their pride, warped in character by their devotion to "the things of God," hindered in their progress on earth by their glorification of heaven, and robbed of the true joys of time by their concentration upon the hypothetical bliss of eternity. We see only this world and this life, and we believe we are wise in restricting our attention and activities to their all-important interests.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Religion of Sir Oliver Lodge.—II.

(Concluded from p. 595.)

IN the opening of his speech, Sir Oliver Lodge made a parenthetic reference to the conflict between religion and science that is worthy of a word of comment. In leading to the conclusion that scepticism might be carried to too great lengths, and long accepted scientific generalisations rejected in the first flush of new discoveries, he said:—

> "Let me hasten to explain that I do not mean the well-worn and almost antique theme of theological scepticism—that controversy is practically in abeyance just now. At any rate, the major conflict is suspended; the forts behind which the enemy has retreated do not invite attack; the territory now occupied by him is little more than his legitimate province."

Sir Oliver was, of course, speaking on behalf of the mass of scientists; and this sentence quite bears out what I said in the preceding article. The vast majority of scientific men have no interest in religion, save as a phase of anthropological study. Religious beliefs are not now the subjects of keen attack by them, because theologians have had their lesson, and no longer dare to estimate the value of scientific teaching in terms of religious belief. Their forts do not invite attack because they are really not worth attacking. And their "legitimate province" is the province that lies outside of all knowledge, actual or attainable. Sir Oliver could hardly have better expressed the scientific contempt for current theological doctrines.

Another point worth noting is that Sir Oliver specifically denied being a "vitalist" in the sense of believing in an "undefined vital force." And he added that "to attribute the rise of sap to vital force would be absurd. It would be giving up the problem and stating nothing at all." This is precisely what I have said over and over again. "Vital force" is no more intelligible or useful than "God."

It is, as Comte would have pointed out, the metaphysical form of the theological explanation, both of which have the quality of leaving the problem exactly where it was.

Having said this, it is difficult to find adequate justification for the claim immediately set up in the expressions: life "introduces something incalculable and purposeful into the laws of physics"; that "we see only its effects, we do not see life itself"; and "life appears necessary" to the conversion of the inorganic into the organic. As these statements are made in order to back up the theory that vital phenomena are dependent upon the existence of a power that cannot by analysis be reduced to a combination of other forces, but always remains true to itself, one fails to see in what way this differs from the "vital force" just discarded? So long as we claim the existence of a separate force, it matters little whether we call it life or vital force. It is really the old thing under a new name. The expression "we do not see life" is hopelessly unscientific. All we can mean by life is the phenomena which, when occurring, we call vital, as we call other phenomena chemical, and others physical. Might we not as reasonably say we do not see heat itself, nor chemical affinity itself, but only their effects? The reply would be that "heat," apart from any particular form of heat, is a pure abstraction. And so one may also say that life, apart from vital phenomena, is equally an abstraction. It is always wise to be on our guard against mistaking abstractions for concrete realities.

In order to avoid repetition, I leave for a moment certain aspects of the expressions cited. "Materialism," says Sir Oliver, "is appropriate to the material world; not as a philosophy, but as a working creed, as a proximate, an immediate formula for guiding research. Everything beyond that belongs to another region, and must be reached by other methods. To explain the psychical in terms of physics and chemistry is simply impossible." And, again, "the extreme school of biologists.....ought to say if they were consistent, there is nothing but physics and chemistry at work anywhere." Why so? The laws of physics are the generalised expression of the behavior of one group of phenomena; the laws of chemistry are the generalised expression of another group of movements. The chemist does not deny the laws of physics; he says they explain phenomena within certain limits. Beyond those limits we have to consider other modes of operation which he calls chemical. And the physicist quite agrees with him. And neither claim, so far as I am aware, that the laws of physics or of chemistry, or both in combination, explain biological phenomena. If they did, there would be no need of biology as a separate department. All that "the extreme school" really assert is that physical and chemical laws continue to operate in biological processes—which Sir Oliver Lodge fully admits—but that at a certain stage the interaction of chemical and physical forces produce new groupings and new complexities which are called by a new name—biological—because they represent a new set of phenomena. And this the biologist admits. The chemist no more denies the existence of the psychical than the biologist denies the existence of chemistry. He does deny the existence of the psychical as a separate and independent force which is merely brought to bear upon other forces; but that is an entirely different question. Nor need the chemist deny the existence of the psychical merely because he analyses a psychic state and furnishes reasons for believing that if our analysis were exact enough, and our synthesis equally complete, no separate "psyche" need be invoked. He is merely exhibiting the conditions which, when existent, he agrees with others in calling psychical, and which cannot be properly described under any other name.

To put the whole matter briefly, each group of phenomena—physical, chemical, biological, or mental—requires the framing of new "laws" to express their modes of operation. This is not because they involve the appearance on the scene of an absolutely new force, but because the emergence of the conditions that give rise to the new group cannot be adequately expressed in the terms that apply with descriptive fullness to preceding groups. Thus, if we assume two bodies travelling in space in a line that will bring them together, we have a problem in dynamics. Allow them to collide with sufficient force, and the two may be converted into an incandescent mass. Our problem then becomes one of thermo-dynamics, and a new "law" must be framed. Follow the subsequent development of the mass, and still more "laws" must be framed to describe the chemical changes that take place. But there is no introduction of an independent force; there is only the framing of new "laws" to describe the emergence of new and more complex conditions.

I do not, therefore, follow Sir Oliver Lodge when he says the "extreme school" holds that "the laws of chemistry and physics are supreme,—and they are sufficient to account for everything"! No Materialist who understands his case says anything of the kind. You can no more adequately express mental phenomena in terms of physics or chemistry than you can express chemical phenomena in terms of psychology. Each set of laws are valid within their own legitimate sphere. Mental life is as real to the Materialist as to the Spiritualist. It is almost laughable the way in which Spiritualists of all schools avoid meeting what is really the essence of Materialism, and insist upon putting into his mind conceptions that none but a scientific lunatic could entertain.

I agree with Sir Oliver that life introduces something purposeful into nature. That it introduces something incalculable is highly disputable, since incalculable is only the equivalent of our inability to calculate under present conditions of knowledge. But purposeful, yes. It is part of the phenomena of life that it should exhibit purpose. This is really saying little more than that life introduces into nature living things. No one disputes so obvious a proposition. But that is really not what Sir Oliver Lodge implies. The implication of his position is that life is introduced in order to establish the governing fact of purpose. If he does not mean this, it is impossible to see what he does mean, and he is simply thrashing the air. For no one will deny the fact of purpose as a mere phenomenon of life. There was purpose in Sir Oliver delivering his address, just as there is purpose in my writing these articles. It is not really purpose as a fact in life that is in question. It is purpose as lying behind the introduction of life that Sir Oliver is trying to establish. If he can establish that, well and good. If he cannot, he has no case. And whether he can or cannot, the one solid fact is that he has not done so.

What Sir Oliver does, finally, is—first, to assert that thirty years' experience of psychical research has convinced him that "discarnate intelligence, under certain conditions, may interact with us on the material side, thus indirectly coming within our scientific ken." To this one may reply that other investigators have not been so convinced, and even though all the alleged facts of psychical research were admitted as genuine, there still remains the probability that a more complete knowledge of the forces at work may render the hypothesis of surviving disembodied intelligencies quite superfluous. It is, at least, suggestive that assumed disembodied intelligences with whom communications have been set up are always those of the recently dead. And it is, therefore, permissible to assume that the minds of the living are the real sources of the revelations and communications. And one is naturally suspicious of an explanation that is essentially in terms of savage psychology modified to suit facts of recent discovery—if we admit all the stated facts to be absolutely genuine.

Secondly, Sir Oliver makes a quite unscientific appeal to our sense of the fitness of things. Surely, he says, referring to the ordinary scientific explanation, "Surely there must be a deeper meaning involved in natural objects.....Why do things struggle to exist? Surely the effort must have some significance, the development some aim." But why? Why must there be some aim in natural processes? If science is to be trusted at all, life on the earth had a beginning, and it will have an end. What aim, outside of the process itself, can there be if lifelessness is to follow animate existence just as certainly as it preceded it? The only "must be" there is in the case is that supplied by human reason itself, which reads into nature aims and purposes that we only know as existing in conjunction with animal intelligence. But animal intelligence is only a fractional part of natural phenomena as a whole; it is, apparently, an evanescent part; and what warranty is there for saying that qualities characteristic of a small part of nature "must be" characteristic of nature as a whole? There is none at all, so far as I can see; and the "must be" and "must have" is not part of a scientific induction; it is an appeal to pure sentiment and traditional teaching. Anyway, it is not the task of science to say what must be, but to find out what is. Any "must be" that does exist in science can only appear as the rigorously logical deduction from admitted data. Above all, these appeals to popular feelings about the fitness of things are in the highest degree unscientific and misleading. For the popular mind has been developed in an anthropomorphic school. It has been in the habit of looking for reflections of its own moods in nature, and as a result it has usually managed to find them. It is precisely this frame of mind that for two hundred and fifty years science has been striving to correct. That its task is not yet complete there is evidence on every side. The address with which I have been dealing is only one more piece of evidence to the same end. Sir Oliver Lodge is not, as he seems to think, a soldier in an army advancing to the conquest of new territory. He is rather one of the rearguard of a retreating force that has fought its principal battles and experienced hopeless defeat.

C. COHEN.

A Clearing-Up.

SOCIAL or mental freedom from any tyranny never comes like a lightning flash; clouds never disappear suddenly. The blow may be startling in the rapidity of its action; the result becomes a process of growth.

Some time ago I lay on a hillside looking at heavenly things. The sky was black with an ominous accumulation of dense clouds. The atmosphere was heavy with the foreboding of a storm; and everything, in heaven and on earth, seemed possessed of the anticipation of doom; except myself; for I was busy with analogies. Just when I reached the stage of slavery corresponding to the blackness of the sky, and when it seemed time that something should happen, coincidence would have it that a sudden gust of wind should come from the west.

It was the blow. Then the forces of emancipation began. The wind came in hurried gusts, and the trees near by chattered excitedly. The grass and bracken swayed irresponsibly, and a rabbit poked out its head to see what was going on. Gradually the wind became a strong, steady breeze. The tree-voices ceased their chattering to sing the song of Nature. Movement took the place of stagnant solidity in the heavens; and the bright, clear place on the western horizon slowly extended its eastern boundary. In about an hour the last of the heavy clouds was climbing the mountain range on the east, to disappear somewhere out of sight beside its ungainly brethren. And the air was full of freshness, and bright with gladdening sunrays.

The process took some time to come to its consummation. Had the first gust of wind not been followed by many more, had these not grown into a steady breeze, the sky would not have been cleared of its weight nor the air of its heaviness, and the doom might have been accomplished.

As it was with my picture of nature, so it is with the affairs of men. To cavil and complain that our labor's ideal is not realised within a lifetime seems to suggest an ignorance of the powers of mental conservatism. The man who sets out to free the mind from its dark clouds of prejudice and superstition must have a goodly amount of patience. A minute in the natural clearing of the sky might represent a decade in the clearing of the sky of man's mind. Pioneers cannot gauge the results of their work. That must remain to others. To complain is to retard. To continue fighting, regardless of apparent drawbacks, despite the tendencies of the mind for relief, for rest, is to prove the real pioneering spirit, to deserve all the praise one can bestow upon the possessor of it.

Religion has been the darkest cloud that ever cast its oppressiveness upon the life of humanity. The scope of religion has been illimitable, and its potentialities incomputable. It has sounded all the depths of human nature, and has ascended all the heights of genius, of love, of human grandeur. Not an attribute of Nature has it failed to steep in its gloom. It has gone with men to the fringes of the forest of thought, and, with them, for its own purposes, has penetrated to the hidden lakes of truth. From man's weakness and from man's strength it has drawn the food of its days. And even man's great desire for freedom has not been allowed to go unaccompanied. Religion has tracked it like a sleuthhound, keen on its scent, recognising that the grandest of man's desires was its deadliest of enemies. With an almost admirable tenacity has Religion stuck to the way of the print of the footsteps of Freedom; and when it saw an opportunity of attack, or an opportunity to steal ahead and proclaim the victory, it has neither hesitated to attack nor to steal. And so has it wormed its way into the heart of things, achieving a reflected power and a glory that it claims as its own birthright.

If these things be true, if the clouds be so heavy, if the atmosphere be so oppressive, the breeze must be strong and prolonged that would clear the air and the skies of man's mind. The mind of the average individual moves in a small space, and the national mind moves in a space not much, if any, larger. Within the limits of that space the influence of religion has been of tremendous import in the past, and is yet. Ideas of such venerable age are not subdued as easily as the inclination to break stones. They are not shattered at a blow. They are not blown away with the first gust of the winds of adverse criticism. Accustomed to the heaviness and heat of restriction, they chill and die slowly in the crisp fresh air. So slowly do they relinquish life that the gradual diminution of their vitality but proves their past power and strength.

Against habits of thought that have become characteristic of the national being, that are so well developed that the least return of mediæval oppressiveness can give them resuscitation of life, those who would fight must possess a patience, a courage, a conviction, rarely, if ever before, found necessary. The hardest task ever undertaken by the mind of man has been to conquer and reject the religious habits of the mind of man. Mental warfare demands qualities, sterner qualities, than those requisitioned in the brutal slaughter of men; and we cannot say that Freethought has failed in the duties conviction imposes upon it.

The patience required from Freethought, the never-sleeping courage, the continual activity, the constant, steady breeze of truth, demanded from it, have not been found wanting. The conviction that the skies will yet be cleared of their dark, heavy clouds and the air relieved of its unhealthy oppressiveness by the strong ceaseless flow of criticism is Freethought's inspiration. It has taken up the task. It recognises the responsibilities. It will lay down neither until the impurities of superstition are swept from the air and skies of man's mind. The blow has been struck; the gusts of wind have become a steady breeze; the process of emancipation goes on, its operations increasing in activity as the breeze quickens in velocity; and the little space on the western horizon gradually becomes bigger and brighter, telling us that Freethought's labors realise their reward surely, if slowly.

ROBERT MORELAND.

The Dear Bishops.

"The Archbishop of —— and —— have returned from town to —— Palace, where they will entertain a house party during the session."—MORNING NEWSPAPER.

THIS interesting announcement is common enough. We do not refer to it on account of its novelty. Indeed, if it were less common it might excite more attention. If the average Christian were not used to such things he would "sit up," as the man in the street says, at the idea of a right reverend father in God figuring in "society" news like a sporting nobleman, a notorious actress, or a parasite-haunted millionaire. What an effort of imagination it involves to picture Jesus Christ giving a swell party, or Peter and Paul looking in at a fashionable at-home! Fancy the announcement that Jesus Christ had just left his town residence for his country seat, where he was going to entertain a number of distinguished guests! Fancy a newspaper paragraph to the effect that (say) John had just returned from a holiday at Ostend or Monte Carlo! The incongruity is quite staggering. But the case is altered since the infancy of the Salvation Army, of which General Booth's affair is only a small contingent. The religion of poverty became a road to riches. The religion of humility became a path to honors and dignities. The religion of the next world became the way to the best places in this world. It was a wonderful transformation change. Nothing like it was ever seen in a pantomime. And when the startling change was once effected it went on as a going concern. From the days of Constantine, the Christian emperor—though it is doubtful if he ever was a Christian—the representatives of Jesus Christ, the poor Carpenter of Nazareth, have affected wealth and display. Even now the Pope reckons himself above any Emperor, Czar, or Kaiser on earth. Cardinals count themselves as little less than Kings; in fact, they are Princes—of the Church. The Bishops of the Church of England sit in the House of Lords; that is, when they take the trouble to be present. They seldom attend unless the interests of their own order are at stake. Even the Nonconformist ministers play up to their position for all it is worth. Did not the late Rev. Hugh Price Hughes go to Court dressed in silk stockings and silver shoe-buckles? And did not General Booth travel like a patrician? We have seen him sailing up the platform to his private carriage, followed by a crowd of uniformed satellites, one carrying this and another that, and all crowding after him as though they were going to rush in after him through the gates of heaven.

But to return to the bishops. We call them the dear bishops. And are they not so? We pay the poorest of them some £4,000 a year, and the richest £15,000. Mr. Asquith receives £5,000 a year as Prime Minister of the British Empire. Dr. Davidson receives £15,000 a year as Archbishop of Canterbury. He is commercially worth perhaps a twentieth part of that figure. It would probably puzzle him to earn a thousand a year in the open labor market. As the chief apostle of Jesus Christ in England he ought to receive far less. A hundred a year should be the outside salary of a Christian preacher. In the case of a bishop fifty pounds a year should suffice. No doubt he would find it hard to live on that income if he did not trust a good deal in the Lord. But he ought to trust a good deal in the Lord. What is he a bishop for otherwise? He should show an example to the flock. They are expected to have faith, and he should have it more abundantly; in fact, if he had faith enough, he would be able to live without any salary at all. Meat and drink and clothes would come supernaturally. "For the Lord knoweth that ye have need of such things."

John Stuart Mill said that a bishop might not be a hypocrite, but he certainly looked like one. Living up to a sunflower, or a piece of old blue china, is nothing to living up to a bishop's costume. No man has ever done it. An honest bishop is an impossibility. He may be all right as a man, but as a bishop he is an impostor. Good to his wife he may be, kind to his children, amiable to his friends, and considerate to his acquaintances; but in his public capacity he is always a fraud. "Blessed be ye poor," he says with his tongue. With his hand he rakes in the shekels. He talks of the Son of Man who had not where to lay his head, and can hardly tell offhand the number of bedrooms in his own palace. He professes to lead others in following one who was despised and rejected of men, and he insists on having a good place near the front in every earthly procession. He preaches "Labor not for the meat that perisheth," and lives on the fat of the land. Generally he reaches a good old age, sticks to the world with all his strength, keeps out of heaven as long as possible, and only goes "home" when he can no longer live abroad. The longevity of bishops is proverbial.

How curious that all this contrast, and all this hypocrisy, should be displayed in the cause of religion! It is like keeping drinkshops in the interest of temperance, and brothels in the interest of morality! But when you look into it more closely the curiousness disappears. Religion has been used, all over the world, to deceive and exploit the people. Those who speak in the name of God are eager after the "goods" of men. Those who preach felicity above make themselves as comfortable as they can below. Those who promise mansions in the sky get hold of good residences on the solid earth. It is really a wonder that the multitude do not see this. The fact is gross as a mountain, open, palpable. But the people (we suppose) are caught so young by the clerical tricksters, and are so thoroughly imposed upon in their childhood, that they seldom recover their common sense in adult life, but go down to their graves in the firm belief that the fellows who have told them lies and robbed them are the appointed teachers of a God of truth and justice.

G. W. FOOTE.

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE.

Is anything to be learned from Hosea and his wife? Is there anything of use in Joel, in Amos, in Obadiah? Can we get any good from Jonah and his gourd? Is it possible that God is the real author of Micah and Nahum, of Habakkuk and Zephaniah, of Haggai and Malachi and Zechariah, with his red horses, his four horns, his four carpenters, his flying roll, his mountains of brass, and the stone with four eyes? Is there anything in these "inspired" books that has been of benefit of man?

Have they taught us how to cultivate the earth, to build houses, to weave cloth, to prepare food? Have they taught us to paint pictures, to chisel statues, to build bridges, or ships, or anything of beauty or of use? Did we get our ideas of government, of religious freedom, of the liberty of thought, from the Old Testament? Did we get from any of these books a hint of any science? Is there in the "sacred volume" a word, a line, that has added to the wealth, the intelligence, and the happiness of mankind? Is there one of the books of the Old Testament as entertaining as Robinson Crusoe, the Travels of Gulliver, or Peter Wilkins and his Flying Wife? Did the author of Genesis know as much about nature as Humboldt, or Darwin, or Haeckel? Is what is called the Mosaic Code as wise or as merciful as the code of any civilised nation? Were the writers of Kings and Chronicles as great historians, as great writers, as Gibbon and Draper? Is Jeremiah or Habakkuk equal to Dickens or Thackeray? Can the authors of Job and the Psalms be compared with Shakespeare? Why should we attribute the best to man and the worst to God?—R. G. Ingersoll.

Acid Drops.

"Ought Christians to Die Rich?" is the title of an article in the Methodist Times. Well, we never heard of one who struggled to die poor, and all of them seem willing to run the risk of dying otherwise. The writer of the article thinks it "is the Lord who gives His servants power to get wealth," so it is, apparently, all right. And as things go, the Lord must thoughtfully withhold the power from others, since we cannot all be rich. We might all be comfortable, but it is simply impossible for us all to be rich.

The Established Church, said Karl Marx, "will more readily pardon an attack on thirty-eight of its thirty-nine Articles than on one-thirty-ninth of its income." It is a case of "The Law and the Profits."

Professor B. Moore, at the British Association meetings, did not delay in giving a reply to Sir Oliver Lodge. In an address before the joint sections of Zoology, Physiology, and Botany, he laughed at the transcendental speculations that some people are so fond of, and claimed that by actual experimentation evidence had already been obtained of the steps of organic evolution. As the result of eighteen months' experiments, it is now clear, he said, that by the continued action of the law of molecular complexity, life must originate, that forms of life were now originating, that the origin of life was no fortuitous accident, and that the same processes were guiding life onwards to a higher evolution in a progressive creation. This is a clear endorsement of Professor Schafer's declaration of a year ago.

A discussion followed the address, in which Sir Oliver Lodge took part. He, of course, admitted the facts, so far as the experiments were concerned; indeed, whether it had been done or not, he quite admitted that the manufacture of living material might be accomplished. But when they got "potential living matter," that was not what he regarded as life. He regarded life "as something not of that order, but of a higher and different order." It would only be the construction of a chemical or physical vehicle that life would make use of. Well, one can only say, quite plainly, that against that attitude all argument is impossible, and no proof would be adequate. We are not surprised that the Daily Telegraph special correspondent remarked that Sir Oliver "scarcely used the language of science" in his argument. It was the speech of a pulpiteer, one who cares nothing whatever for scientific method or results, and is anxious only to see a preconceived idea or belief established.

Consider what the attitude of Sir Oliver Lodge is. He says to the chemist and the biologist:—

> "I admit that if you have not yet made, you may one day make, living matter from a combination of non-living matter. But when you have done this, you have not manufactured life. That is something quite different, and all you have done is to create a medium in which life may show itself."

Now that, we repeat, is not the language that one has a right to expect from a scientific man. Life is not something apart from its manifestations, life is the name given to certain properties or clusters of properties associated with a special kind of organisation. Life, by itself, is a sheer abstraction. It has no more existence than heat or light apart from undulatory phenomena. Life, as a name of certain groups of phenomena, is a plain, understandable term. But life, apart from these phenomena, is a conception as idle as it is absurd. Nay, it is not even a conception, it is a mere word, for no one, not even Sir Oliver Lodge, can have the ghost of an idea as to what can possibly be meant by it.

Two letters appeared the other morning in the Daily Sketch. One welcomed the announcement of Sir Oliver Lodge's "new continent" which the writer declared to be "far more real than the material earth," though he did not state how he found that out. He also welcomed the news of the "miracles" at Lourdes. The other correspondent suggested that the Church should gather together a lot of people with one leg or one eye, and send them to Lourdes. If only one of them returned with two legs or two eyes, it would "confound the agnostic for ever." We fancy this writer must have been reading the Freethinker. Anyhow, he was lucky to get his letter inserted.

In the recent "City Valuations" at Glasgow it was sought to get a house at 21 Burnbank-gardens reduced from £70 to £60. But the Assessor said there were no fewer than five clergymen claiming lodger votes in that house, and each had sworn that the room he occupied was valued at £10 a year at least. That made £50 for the bedrooms alone! The Committee, however, benevolently fixed the value of this clerical warren at £65.

Rev. Alfred Francis Hall, aged 26, a curate at St. Peter's Church, Upton Manor, was put into the dock at the West Ham Police Court to answer a serious charge of indecent assault on a lad that he had prepared for confirmation. The following letter was subsequently written to the lad's father, and was produced and read in court:—

> "Dear Mr. ——,—From the depth of my heart may I say how truly sorry I am for all that has occurred. The feelings of my mother and father are a sufficient guide to me as to what you and Mrs. —— must be feeling, and I know this only too well. I have by my own act blighted all my life, and I shall always have one thought searing my soul, and so my punishment is indeed terrible. Forgive me if you can, and know that I am dead to Forest Gate as far as the present and future are concerned. You had better show this to Mrs. ——, and think as kindly as you can of one who has been sorely tempted, and in his weakness has fallen.—Yours in penitence, A. F. HALL."

The prisoner was sentenced to six months' hard labor. Three other cases against the "reverend" gentleman were not proceeded with.

"You have your own Christian names, and Christ knows them," writes Bishop Montgomery in Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper. What a busy person he is supposed to be! It must be exhausting work, too, after counting the hairs of all our heads, and watching the sparrows fall.

The Salvation Army Home does not appear to be such a heaven upon earth as some people suppose. Recently, a poor woman, charged with stealing at Rochford Session, was asked if she would go to the Army home, and she said she preferred going to prison. She was sentenced to a month's hard labor. Comment is superfluous.

Principal Forsyth, Principal Selbie, Rev. Dr. Horton, Rev. Silvester Horne, and other men of God, have signed an appeal to every Congregational church in Great Britain to make up a big collection for the London Missionary Society, which is short of funds and has an increasing deficit in its balance-sheet. The appeal suggests the setting apart of a special Sunday for "considering the need of the non-Christian world and the obligation of members of the churches in the matter of giving." We venture to say that the need of the non-Christian world does not include anything that these reverend gentlemen, and their colleagues, are able to give. Most people, except those who live by it, or have friends living by it, recognise that the missionary game is pretty nearly played out. What answer is made to Sir Hiram Maxim's damaging book? They know better than to make one.

A small boy of eight, on his return from school the other day, exclaimed, in a state of great excitement, "O mother, my teacher is a liar." Startled by so bold and emphatic an assertion, his mother reproved him for speaking in so disrespectful a manner of his teacher. Unabashed, the little chap retorted, "But, mother, she did tell us a lie to-day." "What did she say?" came the maternal inquiry. "She told us that Jesus walked on the sea, and I am sure no one ever did or ever can walk on the sea." Then the mother added, "I suppose she got it out of some book or other." "I don't care a rap where she got it from," replied this youthful Freethinker; "all I know is that it is impossible to walk on the sea without getting drowned." This child of eight has got brains, which many adults either lack, or do not use.

The editor of the Church Times remarks that "Darwinism in its strict sense has gone by the board." Of course, the editor of the Church Times need not trouble to find out either what Darwinism is, or what living scientists think about it. But, on the other hand, he is not specially called on to exhibit his ignorance on the subject. We can assure him that Darwinism, in its strict sense, is not called into question by any scientific man worth talking about. How far Darwinism is operative in the fixation of variations is another question altogether. But, as a matter of fact, the biological world of to-day is probably more Darwinian than Darwin himself. The editor of the Church Times had better consult Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace, who is still with us. Or, if he is "suspect," let him ask Sir Oliver Lodge. Sir Oliver is not a biologist, but he is well able to give the needful correction.

A Lambeth woman was committed for trial the other day (Sept. 18) for ill-treating her children. She is said to have forced her little boy to his knees, and compelled him to sing hymns and say prayers. Then she dragged him to his feet and beat him. She is evidently a firm believer in religious education, and would doubtless resist the exclusion of the Bible from the schools.

Pious food reformers have a hymn-book of their own with which to serenade the "Lord." We can sympathise with any vegetarian who might be asked to join in the singing of "There is a fountain filled with blood."

If he is not careful, Mr. Hall Caine will be getting into trouble with some of his Christian friends. He is writing a series of articles in the Daily Telegraph on "Woman," and, after describing the manner in which the marriage of Isaac and Rebecca is narrated in the Bible, adds:—

> "It is a shocking story—shocking in its picture of the degradation of womanhood.....Not a hint of any higher impulse; any concurrence of the soul; any spiritual compulsion; any physical attraction; anything we call love; any exercise of nature's selective instinct. It is mere sale and barter, in which the woman, the thing bought and sold, is made to acquiesce in her own auction."

The rows we have got into for saying exactly the same thing of the position of woman in the Bible! Mr. Hall Caine says it as though it were almost an original discovery. He might have learned as much any time he pleased from the writings and speeches of Freethinkers. All the same, he will not please his religious backers by pointing out that amongst God's chosen people women were regarded as articles of merchandise. And he might have gone further still. He might have pointed to the Ten Commandments, in which the wife is lumped in with the husband's horse and ass and other articles of property. And she doesn't even head the list.

Nevertheless, Mr. Hall Caine needs be more careful, and more catholic, in his studies. He says, "Such, apparently, was man's earliest conception of woman's place and use in the world." We hope that Mr. Caine is not under the chapel-like impression that the Bible is, in an anthropological sense, an early record of human history. No serious student to-day would ever dream of going to the Bible for man's earliest conception of anything. Marriage by purchase is not by any means the earliest mode of contracting unions. It is obviously a peaceful refinement of marriage by capture. And there were earlier stages still. Mr. Caine makes the mistake of taking the Christian world too seriously. It might also do his Christian friends some good if he pointed out to them that contemporary conceptions of woman among many of the nations "who knew not God" were really much higher than those of the Bible.

It is related in a recent number of the Catholic Herald how a confirmed Freethinker became a Catholic. As usual, the name of the convert is conveniently withheld; but whoever he was, if at all historical, his intellectual calibre was such that Freethinkers generally will not mourn his loss. He had evidently been discussing the claims of Christianity to credence and trust with a Catholic who, declining to enter into controversy with him, said: "Look here, my friend; either Christ rose from the dead, glorious and immortal, or he did not. If the resurrection is true, a convent scandal would not make it untrue." This argument, thus stated, floored the Freethinker, and he immediately rose and blossomed into a Catholic. We have never met such a Freethinker in our lives; and even if we had, we would have been glad of the opportunity to make a present of him to any Church. As a matter of fact, a person endowed with such a slender intellect cannot be a genuine Freethinker.

More religion and brotherhood! The secretary of the St. Asaph branch of the British and Foreign Bible Society invited the bishop of the diocese to attend a meeting of that body. But the secretary is a Calvinistic Methodist, and a great many of the society's members also belong to that cheerful sect, with Baptists and other odds and ends of the Dissenting world. So the bishop wrote back declining the invitation on the ground that Churchmen have been subjected to a "campaign of slander and falsehood" in order to get the Welsh Church Bill through Parliament, and that to co-operate with the people responsible for this would be "nothing less than hypocrisy." The bishop does not say with David, "All men are liars," but he does say that Nonconformists are. And the latter will doubtless reply with "You're another." So the pious rail, and the ungodly laugh. Both have used slander and falsehood against Freethinkers, and its use has served as a means of cementing friendship. And religious people, having found this weapon serviceable for so long, can hardly be expected to drop it directly they fall out amongst themselves.

"How we may secure literary quarantine is agitating many minds," says Current Literature. These pure-minded censors might start by prohibiting the Bible from being placed in the hands of children, for if it were published for the first time to-day it would very probably land its producer in gaol.

Rev. R. R. Roberts, in vacating the presidency of the Presbyterian Church of Wales, asked the Conference to consider a number of things, and this was one of them. "Think," he said, "of the dragons that devoured our youth and made them first rogues and then atheists." We wonder who the dragons are. We also wonder how the young people who are devoured by these monsters have such a lively development afterwards. Mr. Roberts's view that roguery leads to Atheism is an instance of what Herbert Spencer would have called professional bias. It could easily be corrected by application to the nearest prison. Ninety-nine per cent., at least, of the inmates would be found to belong to some Christian Church or other. It would probably be difficult to find one Atheist in the whole establishment.

Rev. P. Watchnest, of Huddersfield, says, as prison chaplain, that every man he had visited in prison had passed through a Sunday-school. That is one of the outward and visible signs of a religious education, we presume.

Professor T. M. Kettle has some quaint ideas concerning Freethought. Writing in Public Opinion, he says, "The world sets me the conundrum: Christianity or the other thing? I am, as they say, at heart a Christian. But I read a twelve and sixpenny book blowing it sky-high." Even a professor might learn that the deadliest Freethought explosive can be had for twopence.

Rev. Dr. Clifford wants Passive Resistance to go on. "We want no tests for teachers but capacity and character; the Catechisms and creeds of the Churches should be kept out." Dr. Clifford discreetly omits to add that the Bible should be kept in. He is an opponent of Secular Education. He objects to the Church Catechism in a school that a Nonconformist contributes to support. He has no objection to "simple Bible teaching" in a school that an Atheist helps to pay for.

Prayers were offered, nearly a couple of months ago, for rain in the Newcastle district. When it came it was a devastating flood. The water was from ten to twelve feet deep in some parts of the town, and the Vicar of Jesmond (Rev. J. T. Inskip) is lauded in one of the local papers for helping "distressed" people "across the flooded channel and placing them in safety on the pavement." We should have thought this deserved no particular praise, considering that the reverend gentleman (whose God sent the deluge) was one of the main agents in bringing about the mischief.

"Providence" often fails to recognise its own buildings. That is why lightning conductors are attached to churches. But that precaution does not always ensure safety. In the recent heavy storm the parish church of Bothenhampton, near Bridport, was struck by lightning. A large portion of the bell turret, and the stone cross, were cut away, and fell smashing through the roof.

There doesn't seem very much to choose between any of the Balkan Allies when it comes to a question of dealing with non-Christians. Miss Durham is a lady journalist who wrote very warmly in praise of the Montenegrins at the beginning of the war. She has now written with equal warmth against them, and in consequence of evidence seen or collected by herself. She says that in Albania the Montenegrins closed the mosques, arrested the Mohammedans, and in batches of twenty to fifty gave them the choice of baptism or death. At Cherem all the males were killed, and the houses, with the women and children inside, burned. Other evidences of cruelty are given by Miss Durham, and she says she has been most careful in getting at the facts. The Catholic Times says that "how people professing any form of Christianity could perpetrate such outrages is almost inconceivable." We appreciate the editor's indignation, but we think he will find if he turns to the records of his own religion, that there is in all this nothing new in the history of Christianity. It is just Christian belief that has always given brutality a keener edge and cruelty a sharper zest.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

October 5, Birmingham Town Hall; 19, Manchester; 26, Stratford Town Hall.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged £185 0s. 3d. Received since:—Per J. Ainge (Leicester)—S. Leeson, £1 1s.; W. Leeson, 5s.; D. Winterton, 2s. 6d.; — Bartlett, 2s.; A. Wade, 2s. 6d.; A Friend, 3s.; J. Ainge, 3s. G. B. Taylor, £1; W. R. Munton, £2; E. Pinder and Friends (Leicester), £1 1s.; T. Raff (W. Australia), £2 2s.

G. B. TAYLOR.—Glad to hear from you on the rolling deep. When will your voyages bring you to London again? Your good wishes are cordially reciprocated.

DISGUSTED.—Many non-believers do go to church to please their womenfolk or to court respectability. "'Tis true, 'tis pity, and pity 'tis 'tis true."

A. W. HUTTY.—Is it not possible to accept the good in Nietzsche without troubling so much about what you regard as evil? It is only on the side of religion and ethics that he can be dealt with in the Freethinker. We may add that satirists should never be taken quite literally.

W. R. MUNTON.—Thanks for subscription; also for good wishes. We hope to do plenty of work for Freethought yet.

E. B.—Much obliged for cuttings.

E. SCHMITZ.—We quite agree that "Abracadabra's" recent series of articles on "The Fabrication of the Gospel History" would be very useful if reprinted in a permanent form; but we cannot afford to risk our slender resources until Freethinkers show more alacrity in pushing the circulation of such publications.

C. M —"Be ye fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth" occurs in Genesis i. 28.

B. EVANS.—See paragraph. Thanks.

W. GREGORY.—The date of the "Bradlaugh Sunday"—if we may call it so—has to be fixed by the N. S. S. Executive, not by the President personally. We are glad to hear that Mr. Davidson gave the Kingsland Branch so good a lecture on Bradlaugh last Sunday. Pleased to learn that the Branch's outdoor work is successful generally.

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

J. PARTRIDGE.—Your letter and ours must have crossed in the post.

J. W. O'LEARY.—Cecil Chesterton may have been on "the ship" that he says Mr. Shaw torpedoed, but we were not aware of the fact, and should not believe it if he did not state it himself. As it was so long ago (Bradlaugh died in January, 1891), Cecil Chesterton must have been very young then; and it could hardly have been a matter of great importance what opinions had the honor of his adherence. We are often puzzled by zealous Christians, emerging into some notoriety, who claim to have been Freethinkers in "the long ago."

S. G. MASON.—Thanks for the reference. But the periodical you mention is not sent to us, and we cannot buy everything.

E. F. REMINGTON.—We cannot tell you where Huxley said "he knew of no other religion save the Christian one that will keep a woman pure and virtuous." Nor can anyone else tell you.

W. REPTON.—Next week.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Birmingham "saints" expect a big audience next Sunday evening (Oct. 5) in the great Town Hall. Mr. Foote's subject will be "Sir Oliver Lodge's Theology"—with reference to his recent much-talked-of address to the British Association. Most of our readers will recollect that Sir Oliver Lodge is the Principal of Birmingham University.

Mr. Foote resumed his platform work at Leicester on Sunday evening. "Foote's weather" used to be a byword amongst the "saints" at Leicester; it meant fog, rain, snow or some other sample of English weather at its worst. Fortunately it was very fine on Sunday, and Mr. Foote managed to get through his task all right. The Secular Hall was filled with a most appreciative audience, gathered not only from the town but also from the surrounding districts, some "saints" walking a good many miles to hear the N. S. S. President. The lecture on "Shakespeare's Humanism in the Merchant of Venice" was followed with deep attention, and was evidently much relished. Mr. Sydney Gimson, who presided, stated how glad they all were to see Mr. Foote recovered from his late severe illness and back in the lecturing field again; and how much the "splendid" lecture they had listened to would make them look forward to his next visit.

Mr. Gimson's announcement of various Committee meetings in this, that, and the other room after the lecture, fell gratefully on Mr. Foote's ears. It showed that active work was going on, and that the Leicester Secular Society was facing the future with hopeful energy. Mr. Foote is sorry to say that he forgot to note the name of the young lady member who sang a solo (in the absence of the quartette) with such acceptance after the lecture.

Mr. Foote is none the worse for his Leicester visit; it rather did him good. The pleasurable excitement was a beneficial change from the very quiet life he has been leading lately. He still adheres to his declared intention of not lecturing every Sunday, especially as he wants time this coming winter for a larger output of literary work; but he can now step on the platform again without a shadow of apprehension.

Mdlle. Carmelita Ferrer, the dancer, who is appearing in London, is a niece of Francisco Ferrer, the "intellectual," and at the time of his sentence she made several appeals to King Alfonso for a reprieve.

A discussion on "Beyond the Grave" has been published in recent issues of the Walsall Observer, and the Freethought position has been ably stated by several correspondents.

A course of Freethought lectures, under the auspices of the Secular Society, Ltd., will take place at the Stratford Town Hall on Sunday evenings, October 12, 19, and 26. Mr. Cohen starts the series, Mr. Lloyd continues it, and Mr. Foote winds it up. There will be ample local advertisements. But the "saints" are asked to give the enterprise all the publicity they can. It is a thing we can never have too much of.

The Birmingham Branch opens its winter session to-day (Sept. 28) at the King's Hall, Corporation-street. Mr. E. Clifford Williams lectures at 7 p.m. on "Lessons from the Life of Charles Bradlaugh."

A MODEL KING.

In St. Ferdinand, King of Castile (d. 1252), the virtues of a king shone out brightly—magnanimity, clemency, love of justice, and, above all, zeal for the Catholic faith and a burning desire to protect and propagate its religious worship. He showed this especially by the vigor with which he pursued heretics. He never allowed them to exist in any part whatever of his dominions. When they were discovered, he himself with his own hands carried the faggots to burn them.—Breviarium Romanum, Feast of St. Ferdinand, June 5.

Grant us grace so to follow thy blessed saints in all virtuous and godly living, that we may come to those unspeakable joys, etc.—Col. for All Saints.

CARLYLE AND THE CHURCH.

His (Carlyle's) destination was "the ministry," and for this, knowing how much his father and mother wished it, he tried to prepare himself. He was already conscious, however, "that he had not the least enthusiasm for that business; that even grave prohibitory doubts were gradually rising ahead." It has been supposed that he disliked the formalism of the Scotch Church; but formalism, he says, was not the pinching point, had there been the preliminary of belief forthcoming. "No church or speaking entity whatever can do without formulas; but it must believe them first if it would be honest."—J. A. Froude, "The Early Life of T. Carlyle."

Huxley's Fight for Truth.

THE average member of the broader-minded section of the public, in our comparatively calm and tolerant generation, can form no conception of the bitter battle which secured us the modicum of freedom we now enjoy. That circumstance alone more than justifies those who insist on recalling the invaluable services rendered to science and Freethought by such heroes as Bruno, Galileo, Copernicus, Darwin, Spencer, Haeckel, Huxley, and Tyndall. And in fighting for the liberty of the platform and the press, the names of Richard Carlile, Charles Bradlaugh, and George William Foote will ever endure as outstanding examples of men whose courage was never shaken in the struggle for liberty and truth. It is occasionally insinuated, or alleged, that the present recognised standing of Rationalism as a legitimate instrument of thought and expression is due exclusively to the titanic labors of the great Freethinking scientists, historians, and philosophers alone. Although the writer can never think without emotion of the benefits which these men have conferred on the human race, he nevertheless realises that their paths were made easier—in any case in nineteenth-century England—by the iconoclastic labors of the aggressive Secular movement.

This movement very materially assisted in weakening the barriers of religious bigotry, and in accustoming the community to the more or less unpalatable fact that honest and able men were prepared to challenge, and debate on an open platform, the received religion of their country.

Moreover, these bold men paid the penalty which all uncompromising reformers right down the ages have had to pay for courage and sincerity. The scientists and men of letters were thus enabled to write and teach with an ampler freedom than would have been granted them in an age in which those who spoke more plainly than themselves were wanting. The men who were prepared to face political and social ostracism, and, if need be, go to prison for their opinions; the men who were willing to brave the insolence of office, and the law's injustices and delays, in vindicating personal and public rights, played a part in the stern fight for English liberty which some future Buckle or Gibbon will adequately recognise and record.

Despite such mitigating influences, the opposition encountered by the gentle Darwin, when he submitted his discovery to the world, was by no means devoid of bitterness. The year 1859 saw the publication of the Origin of Species, a work which, directly and indirectly, has probably done more to revolutionise modern thought than any other. As is well known, evolution is older than Darwin, but that great naturalist enunciated the law of selection, which placed evolution on a firm theoretical basis. But before that doctrine triumphed, there were many fierce conflicts. And in winning over the scientific world to evolution, Darwin's doughty lieutenant, Huxley, played a similar part in England to that performed by Haeckel in Germany:—

> "The idea that all the varied structures in the world, the divergent forms of rocks and minerals and crystals, the innumerable herbs that cover the face of the earth like a mantle, and all the animal host of creatures great and small that dwell on the land or dart through the air or people the waters,—that all these had arisen by natural laws from a primitive, unformed material was known to the Greeks, was developed by the Romans, and even received the approval of early Christian Fathers, who wrote long before the idea had been invented that the naïve legends of the old Testament were an authoritative and literal account of the origin of the world. After a long interval, in which scientific thought was stifled by theological dogmatism, the theory of evolution, particularly in its application to animals, began to reappear, long before Darwin published the Origin of Species." *

Buffon, the famous eighteenth-century naturalist; Erasmus Darwin, the poet and botanist, and ancestor of the immortal Charles; the unfortunate, misunderstood, and still immensely underrated Lamarck, were, among others, evolutionists before Darwin. When we remember the disadvantages under which Lamarck labored, his contributions to evolutionary philosophy appear very remarkable. He regarded the doctrine of descent as the real basis of the science of life. He traced the highest living things to the simplest beginnings, and he urged that man's progenitors were ape-like animals. But this great pioneer was before his time, and his message passed unheeded. Nor did Herbert Spencer—another pre-Darwinian evolutionist—make much impression on his earlier contemporaries. Both in conversation and from reading, Huxley was rendered familiar with Spencer's views. But, although he had already abandoned his orthodox beliefs, he remained quite unconvinced. That Spencer's position was clearly and cogently put, is abundantly proved by the following passage, which formed part of one of his articles in the Leader of March, 1852:—

> "Those who cavalierly reject the theory of evolution, as not adequately supported by facts, seem quite to forget that their own theory is not supported by facts at all. Like the majority of men who are born to a given belief, they demand the most rigorous proof of any adverse belief, but assume that their own needs none.....We may safely estimate the number of species that have existed, and are existing on the earth, at no less than ten millions. Well, which is the most rational theory about these ten millions of species? Is it most likely that there have been ten millions of special creations; or is it most likely that by continual modifications, due to change of circumstances, ten millions of varieties have been produced, as varieties are being produced still?.....Even could the supporters of the development hypothesis merely show that the origination of species by the process of modification is conceivable, they would be in a better position than their opponents. But they can do much more than this. They can show that the process of modification has effected, and is effecting, decided changes in all organisms subject to modifying influences.....They can show that in successive generations these changes continue, until ultimately the new conditions become the natural ones. They can show that in cultivated plants, domesticated animals, and in the several races of men, such alterations have taken place. They can show that the degrees of difference so produced, are often, as in dogs, greater than those on which distinctions of species have been founded. They can show, too, that the changes daily taking place in ourselves—the facility which attends long practice, and the loss of aptitude which begins when practice ceases,—the strengthening of the passions habitually gratified, and the weakening of those habitually curbed,—the development of every faculty, bodily, moral, intellectual, according to the use made of it—are all explicable on this principle."

These powerful arguments apparently made no appeal to Huxley. He was almost destitute of that faculty of scientific imaginativeness which was so pronounced in his friend, the brilliant Tyndall. As a consequence, he was condemned to wait until Darwin's great work appeared before he could see the light. In the law of natural selection—Darwin's most important contribution to evolutionary philosophy—Huxley at once recognised an agency which obviously would account for those transformations in the animal and vegetable kingdoms to which the fossils preserved in the rocks so unmistakably point. The imposing array of evidence of variation which Darwin presented in the Origin also carried great weight. No unprejudiced naturalist could any longer dispute that a never-ceasing struggle for existence went on in the world of life. And it was equally undeniable that the successful competitors in this struggle were precisely those plants and animals which displayed variations which favored them in the contest. Still, although never wavering in his evolutionary beliefs after 1859, Huxley was at no time an adherent of the doctrine of the all-sufficiency of natural selection. Like Darwin himself, particularly towards the close of his life, Huxley regarded natural selection as an extremely important, but by no means exclusive factor in organic change. But the fact remains that the conversion of Huxley and other eminent contemporary scientists was more largely due to the theory of selection expounded in the Origin of Species than to all the wealth of evidence in favor of evolution, which that extraordinary work contains.

The principle of selection supplied the key which solved the riddle of organic transmutation. MacGillivray, Dr. Wells, and Patrick Matthew, among others, to some extent anticipated Darwin and Wallace in recognising the power of the selective principle. But there the matter ended, so far as they were concerned. Chalmers Mitchell has noted the further interesting fact that in classic Greece, the philosopher Aristotle had asked :—

> "Why are not the things which seem the result of design, merely spontaneous variations, which, being useful, have been preserved, while others are continually eliminated as unsuitable?"

Darwin forwarded a copy of the Origin to Huxley some weeks before the work was in the hands of the public. He appears to have entertained some anxiety as to Huxley's conversion to his views. But, to Darwin's intense delight, Huxley, on the eve of the book's publication, wrote to inform its author that its careful perusal had made him an evolutionist, and that he had become convinced that natural selection constituted a true cause for the production of species. As Huxley himself put it :—

> "My reflection, when I first made myself master of the central idea of the Origin was 'how exceedingly stupid not to have thought of that.' I suppose Columbus's companions said much the same when he made the egg to stand on end. The facts of variability, of the struggle for existence, of adaptation to conditions, were notorious enough; but none of us had suspected that the road to the heart of the species problem lay through them, until Darwin and Wallace dispelled the darkness, and the beacon-fire of the Origin guided the benighted."

To the mind of Huxley, as also to the minds of a few other progressive thinkers, previously enigmatical phenomena were now perfectly clear. Facts utterly at variance with the theological dogma of special creation, but obviously explicable in the light of evolution, now appeared in multitudinous variety. The arid bones of classification became pregnant with the spirit of life. All the boundless enthusiasm of Huxley's nature was set on fire by Darwin's revelation, and he was fully alive to the sternness of the impending conflict. The leading anatomist of his day, Richard Owen, an evolutionist at heart, soon made his peace with the obscurantists. Within the world of science itself, those who were against evolution in any form, constituted a formidable body. The waverers had to be convinced before the battle could be won.

The clericals were made furious by this damnable doctrine, and evidently meant mischief. Huxley entertained the shrewd suspicion that all those who were constitutionally impatient with "new-fangled notions" would curse rather than bless. All this he seized an early opportunity of intimating to Darwin, as the following characteristic letter proves :—

> "I trust you will not allow yourself to be in any way disgusted or annoyed by the considerable abuse and misrepresentation which, unless I am greatly mistaken, is in store for you. Depend upon it, you have earned the lasting gratitude of all thoughtful men; and as to the curs which will bark and yelp, you must recollect that some of your friends, at any rate, are endowed with an amount of combativeness which (though you have often and justly rebuked it) may stand you in good stead.
> "I am sharpening my claws and beak in readiness."

Back to the Devil.

STUDENTS of early religions and the superstitions of savages tell us that the primitive form of religion consists in a propitiation of malignant spirits, and it is quite an accepted generalisation of sociology that as knowledge and culture increase, religions exhibit less of the elements of fear and acquire a stronger element of morality. Devils were believed in before gods.

This might almost have been anticipated from first principles. In the presence of the unknown man's dominant feeling is suspicion—apprehensiveness. Fear is born of ignorance, and as ignorance is the normal and prevailing condition of primitive man, fear forms the normal and prevailing characteristic of his beliefs. The unknown is feared and suspected by the savage simply because it is unknown, as the child dreads and suspects the darkness because it knows not what that darkness may contain. To form some notion of the state induced in the primitive mind by natural phenomena of menacing aspect, we need only imagine what form our own feelings and ideas might probably take in the presence of, say, a terrific thunderstorm or earthquake, if we were without any conception of natural causation, in complete ignorance not only of the properties but of the very existence of the atmosphere and of electricity, and knew nothing of the physical condition of the earth's crust and of the subterranean forces.

Fear of the unknown is, then, the fundamental element of primitive religion, and hence it follows that, as knowledge increases and the domain of the unknown diminishes, this element of fear also diminishes, and the religious feeling of which it is the mainspring and cause grows weaker. The moralising of religion which the increase of knowledge and the growth of intelligence bring about is thus necessarily accompanied by a diminution of absolute belief—of that blind, intense faith with which the older religions were held. No enlightened votary of a modern religion holds his faith with that intensity and absolute conviction which a savage shows in his beliefs; for the savage's beliefs, based as they are on a fear of mysteriously powerful and malignant beings, are to him matters of supreme importance—things of life or death immediately affecting his welfare. Religion, in short, is based on fear of evil, morality on love of good; and while the one depends on ignorance, the other depends on knowledge. We cannot love the unseen and unknown, but we may well fear it. The child's suspicious fear of the darkness is the basis of religion. The child's sure and confiding love for its mother is the basis of morality.

Thus we reach the conclusion that belief in and fear of the powers of evil form the root elements of religion, and that the weakening of such belief and fear would accordingly be accompanied by a decadence of religion. Our modern clergy who sometimes bewail the growing indifference to religion and the diminishing attendance at their churches would probably resent with some emphasis the suggestion that the decadence of religion is intimately connected with the decadence of the Devil, but this shows gross ingratitude for all that the Prince of Darkness has done for religion in the past. What would they not give for the prevalence now of that intense and invincible faith which peopled the earth with demons and foul fiends constantly on the watch for the souls of men; which lived under a perpetual dread of satanic influences; which attributed epilepsy and insanity to demoniacal possession; and which believed in the devil-scaring potency of charms, amulets, and relics? What would they not give for the revival of the child-like faith we find in such stories as that of Satan making love to a lady in the semblance of a saintly bishop, or of a nun swallowing a devil in a lettuce by imprudently eating that vegetable without previously making the sign of the cross? How many glorious truths of science would they not barter for some of that holy zeal which made the anchorites of the early Church scourge and torture themselves in the deserts in their struggles against diabolic promptings, or which induced Martin Luther, with a more human and robust pugnacity, to fling his inkstand at the Devil?

The decadence of the belief in his Satanic Majesty has indeed been going on apace, and the process seems now wellnigh complete. He has ceased to exist in serious literature, and one of his latest appearances in fiction seems to have been in a novel published some years ago, wherein he is made to figure as a cultured modern gentleman attending social functions in evening dress. This is surely the lowest depth of degradation we can imagine for the Prince of Darkness, and the substitution of "swallow-tails" for the orthodox caudal appendage must have been enough to make all the unfallen angels weep. If there be any "mute, inglorious Miltons" still among us they must either remain inglorious or choose other themes for epic verse than the speechifyings of devils in hell, the serpentine wiles of Satan in the matter of Eve's choice of fruit, or Raphael's long-winded accounts of military campaigns in heaven. It must indeed be a sad reflection for the clergy that almost the only work now extant and widely read in which the Devil is treated with the fullest respect and seriousness is the "Word of God." Here he survives in all his original glory, from his earliest escapades in Genesis to his final consignment to the lake of fire in Revelation; for that quaint collection of fables and fallacies called the Bible still illustrates a few useful truths, and one of them is that a Devil must be inevitably associated with a God, and that no religion can get on without one.

A theological system which tries to uphold the existence of a principle of good without equally emphasising the existence of a principle of evil is an unbalanced and lop-sided affair which can neither carry conviction to the intellect nor persuasion to the conscience. On the one hand, the profoundest problem of existence to the theologian—the problem of evil—is left unsolved; and, on the other hand, the moral motive is left incomplete, for—from the theological point of view—the theory of punishment is no less justifiable as affording a moral motive than the theory of reward, and the one should be as strongly invoked as the other to afford a complete and logical scheme for the moral government of the universe. The love of God is to the fear of the Devil as the sun's light is to its heat, and the first is as closely dependent on the second in the one case as in the other. This is why modern Christianity is such a feeble, cold affair—a pale, phosphorescent gleam, only shining with any brightness in very dark corners. To brighten up the lights of heaven it will be necessary to fan afresh the fires of hell.

This brings us to a consideration of the remedy. A restatement of religion is obviously required. The Devil must be restored to his pride of place, and that with even greater powers than before. We want a new John Knox to preach the gospel of the Prince of Darkness; a new Jonathan Edwards to proclaim the evangel of hell-fire. Nothing so revolutionary is, of course, to be expected from the quiet sheepfolds of the Anglican or Roman Churches, so the new prophet must be looked for among the ranks of Dissent. At first sight, it would seem that the Salvationists, with their thoroughgoing doctrines of Blood and Fire, might be the section of Christendom best fitted for this great task, but any religious movement in modern times must be of an intellectual character, and it must be confessed that, whatever may be their merits, the Salvationists scarcely exhibit the qualities which would be required of pioneers in an intellectual movement. At the other extreme of British Nonconformity the New Theologians certainly put forward some pretensions to scientific thinking, and favor a moderate use of the reasoning faculties—chiefly in the direction of trying to prove that black is the same thing as white by calling them both grey. But the path along which they seem to be moving leads in a diametrically opposite direction to the one here indicated. They seem to be devoting themselves to explaining away those very elements of religion the necessity of which I have been trying to point out, and instead of insisting on the supreme importance of the Devil to the religious theory of the universe, they seem to be engaged in a mistaken attempt to get rid of him altogether.

But there will have to be no greyness about the regenerated Devil. He will have to be far blacker than the most terrified imaginations of past ages have painted him, for he will have to be as powerful for evil as the Deity is powerful for good. Zoroastrianism furnishes the only parallel for the theological system here proposed, and the Devil will have to be raised from the subordinate position of a fallen angel to the dignity of an Ahriman—a primal principle of evil, coeval with the Deity and equal to him in power. Zoroastrianism is, indeed, the most logical religion that has obtained credence among men, but even here a slight inconsistency is apparent, for the system of Zoroaster seems to admit a final conquest of good over evil as the foreordained and certain end of the moral order. This inconsistency will have to be carefully avoided in the new system, and the result will be an immense strengthening of the moral motive.

The principles of good and evil being exactly balanced, neither is supreme in power. But the moral element in man co-operates with the principle of good, the immoral element with the principle of evil. Thus, as equal quantities on the opposite sides of an equation cancel each other and leave the solution of the problem to be determined by the values of the other terms, so man's moral nature becomes the determining factor in the moral process, and man himself is the arbiter of the moral fate of the universe. If man advances ethically; if the good in him increases and the evil diminishes as his evolution proceeds (and this appears, on the whole, to be the case), the final triumph of good will be assured, and each individual human being, by his good or evil conduct, either aids or opposes this result. Moreover, it might be arranged that at the final settlement of affairs the defeated power will have to relinquish to the conquering power all the human souls in its possession, somewhat as prisoners of war are handed back at the close of a campaign. Hence it would follow that, as the probabilities are so much in favor of the final triumph of the good principle, the prospect of eternal punishment will become very remote, and there will be a very strong probability that all human souls will eventually be "saved." And, as every human being's conduct contributes to the final result, it would also follow that the virtues of the good man would prove efficacious, not only for the saving of his own soul, but for the final rescue of the souls of all men, good and bad alike. Surely, no religion has ever offered a grander moral motive to mankind.

And how would the existing religions fare under such a system? They would all fall into their due places as tentative, imperfect, but more or less praiseworthy efforts made by man in the course of his advance to aid the principle of good in the great moral contest. The new religious system would unify and reconcile all the various religions, as a complete and true philosophy (if we could find one) would unify all the sciences, and reconcile any apparent discrepancies they may now exhibit. All religions would then be regarded as equally deserving of support, religious animosities would cease, and universal tolerance would prevail—for the first time in human history. For every religion would then be fighting a common enemy for the achievement of a common good, and when men are confronted by a powerful, fierce, and implacable foe, they do not wait to dispute over the rival advantages of the weapons they are using.

We recapitulate the points in which such a religious system would prove superior to existing systems.

Digitized by Google

The problem of the origin of evil would be solved. The evil principle would be without origin, and coeval with the good principle.

The problem of the persistence of evil would be solved. We should no longer have to reconcile the occurrence of famines and pestilences, of earthquakes, floods, and conflagrations, and all the misery they cause, with the existence of an all-powerful and beneficent Deity.

The terrible doctrine of eternal punishment would fade away.

A sublime and moral motive would be furnished.

Universal toleration and charity among the various existing religions would be brought about.

Here, then, we have a logical and consistent theology, built on rational methods. Its only drawback is that the stones of its foundations are purely imaginary, but that is a defect inseparable from every theological system that ever has been or ever will be invented.

A. E. MADDOCK.

Ingersoll on "Blasphemy."

I DENY the right of any man, of any number of men, of any Church, of any State, to put a padlock on the lips, to make the tongue a convict. I passionately deny the right of the Herod of authority to kill the children of the brain.

A man has a right to work with his hands, to plough the earth, to sow the seed, and that man has a right to reap the harvest. If we have not that right, then all are slaves except those who take these rights from their fellow-men. If you have the right to work with your hands and to gather the harvest for yourself and your children, have you not a right to cultivate your brain? Have you not the right to read, to observe, to investigate—and when you have so read and so investigated, have you not the right to reap that field? And what is it to reap that field? It is simply to express what you have ascertained—simply to give your thoughts to your fellow-men.

If there is one subject in this world worthy of being discussed, worthy of being understood, it is the question of intellectual liberty. Without that, we are simply painted clay; without that, we are poor, miserable serfs and slaves. If you have not the right to express your opinions, if the defendant has not this right, then no man ever walked beneath the blue of heaven that had the right to express his thought. If others claim the right, where did they get it? How did they happen to have it, and how did you happen to be deprived of it? Where did a church or nation get that right?

Are we not all children of the same Mother? Are we not all compelled to think, whether we wish to or not? Can you help thinking as you do? When you look out upon the woods, the fields—when you look at the solemn splendor of the night—these things produce certain thoughts in your mind, and they produce them necessarily. No man can think as he desires. No man controls the action of his brain any more than he controls the action of his heart. The blood pursues its old accustomed ways in spite of you. The eyes see, if you open them, in spite of you. The ears hear, if they are unstopped, without asking your permission. And the brain thinks in spite of you. Should you express that thought? Certainly you should, if others express theirs. You have exactly the same right. He who takes it from you is a robber.

For thousands of years, people have been trying to force other people to think their way. Did they succeed? No. Will they succeed? No. Why? Because brute force is not an argument. You can stand with the lash over a man, or you can stand by the prison door, or beneath the gallows, or by the stake, and say to this man: "Recant or the lash descends, the prison door is locked upon you, the rope is put about your neck, or the torch is given to the fagot." And so the man recants. Is he convinced? Not at all. Have you produced a new argument? Not the slightest. And yet the ignorant bigots of this world have been trying for thousands of years to rule the minds of men by brute force. They have endeavored to improve the mind by torturing the flesh—to spread religion with the sword and torch. They have tried to convince their brothers by putting their feet in iron boots, by putting fathers, mothers, patriots, philosophers, and philanthropists in dungeons. And what has been the result? Are we any nearer thinking alike to-day than we were then?

No orthodox Church ever had power that it did not endeavor to make people think its way by force and flame. And yet every Church that ever was established commenced in the minority, and while it was in the minority, advocated free speech—every one. John Calvin, the founder of the Presbyterian Church, while he lived in France, wrote a book on religious toleration in order to show that all men had an equal right to think; and yet that man afterward, clothed in a little authority, forgot all his sentiments about religious liberty, and had poor Servetus burned at the stake for differing with him on a question that neither of them knew anything about. In the minority, Calvin advocated toleration; in the majority, he practised murder.

I want you to understand what has been done in the world to force men to think alike. It seems to me that if there is some infinite being who wants us to think alike, he would have made us alike. Why did he not do so? Why did he make your brain so that you could not by any possibility be a Methodist? Why did he make yours so that you could not be a Catholic? And why did he make the brain of another so that he is an unbeliever—why the brain of another so that he became a Mohammedan—if he wanted us all to believe alike?

After all, may be Nature is good enough and grand enough and broad enough to give us the diversity born of liberty. May be, after all, it would not be best for us all to be just the same. What a stupid world if everybody said yes to everything that everybody else might say.

The most important thing in this world is liberty. More important than food or clothes, more important than gold or houses or lands, more important than art or science, more important than all religions, is the liberty of man.

If civilisation tends to do away with liberty, then I agree with Mr. Buckle that civilisation is a curse. Gladly would I give up the splendors of the nineteenth century—gladly would I forget every invention that has leaped from the brain of man—gladly would I see all books ashes, all works of art destroyed, all statues broken, and all the triumphs of the world lost—gladly, joyously would I go back to the abodes and dens of savagery, if that were necessary to preserve the inestimable gem of human liberty. So would every man who has a heart and brain.

How has the Church in every age, when in authority, defended itself? Always by a statute against blasphemy, against argument, against free speech. And there never was such a statute that did not stain the book that it was in, and that did not certify to the savagery of the men who passed it. Never. By making a statute and by defining blasphemy, the Church sought to prevent discussion—sought to prevent argument—sought to prevent a man giving his honest opinion. Certainly a tenet, a dogma, a doctrine, is safe when hedged about by a statute that prevents your speaking against it. In the silence of slavery it exists. It lives because lips are locked. It lives because men are slaves.

To be able to discern that what is true is true, and that what is false is false—that is the mark and character of intelligence.—R. W. Emerson.

The moral amelioration of man is the principal mission of woman.—Auguste Comte.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 40 SUNDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

The foremost in the race are those who have thrown off the load of superstition which still burdens the backs and clogs the footsteps of laggards.—PROF. J. G. FRAZER.

The Glorification of Sir Oliver Lodge.

IT is not difficult for a scientist to earn the gratitude of the religious world nowadays. Investigators may risk their lives over and over again in dabbling with the culture of poisonous germs; they may give, as the result of long and patient study and experiment, a discovery such as that of radium to the world, or so fruitful a hypothesis as Natural Selection. These things leave the religious world unmoved; but let a scientific man come forward and pronounce himself in favor of some sort of a religion—that blessed word covers now almost anything—and preachers of all kinds write in his praise. He at once becomes one of the greatest, if not the greatest of living scientists. His utterances are stamped with the insignia of infallibility. His personal impressions are "the deliverances of modern science," the warfare between religion and science is at an end—or, at least, the fighting is only maintained by dwindling guerilla bands of discredited irreconcilables.

In connection with Sir Oliver Lodge's address before the British Association the course of events has been exactly what one might have predicted. Had its tone been non-religious it would have passed without comment. Had it been anti-religious it would have been pointed out that other scientific authorities disagreed with it. As it was pro-religious no mention has been made of the amusement it has caused amongst scientific men, and nothing, of course, of the fact that a very large body of scientists —the majority, probably—totally disagree with him. The Church Times, the Guardian, and the Daily News, form a trinity that sees a change in the attitude of science towards religion. Well, science is exactly where it was, and certainly there is no change in Sir Oliver Lodge. He has never been anything but religious. He has been for years trying to harmonise science with religion; and when a man gets that bee in his bonnet it is not easily dislodged. Everyone knew what Sir Oliver was, and those who laughed at his fantastic collection of reconciliations, quite appreciated the value of his genuinely scientific labors in other directions. On the other hand, those who accepted his reconciliations seriously, probably knew little and cared less about his scientific work. At any rate, Sir Oliver was always religious; his case is not that of a man brought to religion by scientific study, but that of one who has retained something of religion, despite his scientific attainments.

A perfect chorus of praise has gone up from everybody, except scientific men themselves. Dr. Clifford and Mr. Campbell have publicly expressed their "gratitude" for the address. The Bishop of Birmingham has returned his thanks. Even the Catholic Universe remarks that "The presidential address of Sir Oliver Lodge to the British Association marks an epoch in the history of experimental science." Well, beyond the fact that Sir Oliver said that he had conducted a number of experiments which supported the belief in a future life, without disclosing either their nature or the method adopted, the address had about as much connection with experimental science as with the market price of cabbages. I am, of course, only referring to the religious portion of the address, which is the only part with which the Universe, and the gentleman mentioned above, are concerned. One would imagine that Sir Oliver had brought forward some entirely new discovery, produced some unknown facts, demonstrated some unsuspected truth. But he did nothing of the kind. All he said at the British Association he has said scores of times before, and there was nothing that scores of others might not have said for him.

Numbers of sermons have been preached on Sir Oliver's address, all striking the same key. There are two before me at present, one by the Bishop of Birmingham, the other by the Rev. Dr. Warschauer. The Bishop's address is chiefly remarkable for saying nothing in four columns, although, as it was a sermon before the members of the Association, his method was, perhaps, the wisest that could be adopted. He hoped that religion and science would henceforth live in harmony, and that both, confessing a "reverent Agnosticism," would work together for the common good. A pretty sentiment; only one wonders what would be the religious contribution to the common stock. The Bishop admitted that during the last hundred years our more correct knowledge of man, of living beings, and of the universe in general had come from science. It had shamed religious people out of their "self-importance." Quite so; it was the growth of science that gave people more correct views, not religion. What, then, is the religious contribution? The Churches did set out to teach us about man and the world, about disease, about life, about death—and afterwards. And what happened? Why, every message delivered in the name of religion that admitted of proof or disproof has been shown to be wrong. It taught astronomy, and blundered; it taught geology, and blundered; it taught biology, and blundered; it was proved to be ignorant of every subject it claimed knowledge on—save one. The only subject on which the falsity of its teaching has not been demonstrated is that of a future life. And that because neither proof nor disproof is possible.

What is, then, the use of religion in the world? It has nothing to tell us that cannot be better told elsewhere. It has no knowledge of anything superior to the knowledge available elsewhere. If it is at its worst it can only obscure and obstruct; and at its best it can only re-echo what non-religious teachers have discovered. "You need us," says the Bishop of Birmingham, addressing the scientists. The impudence of it! Imagine a Laplace, a Lyell, a Darwin, a Pasteur, or a Metchnikoff needing the clergy to help them in their work. There is a fable which tells of the way in which a mouse helped a lion. I do not recall one of an elephant needing a donkey.

Dr. Warschauer's address is of a different order. For his own sake it would have been better had he adopted the Bishop of Birmingham's plan, and confined himself to amiable generalities. As it is, his remarks are definitely and uniformly stupid. He has the orthodox misunderstanding of Materialism, and assumes that it claims to explain everything in terms of chemistry. As I pointed out last week, Materialism no more undertakes to explain everything in terms of chemistry than in terms of physics. It does not even tie itself down to any given conception of "matter." At most it is a plea in favor of unbroken continuity and invariable causation. Of course, in this Dr. Warschauer was following the lead of Sir Oliver Lodge; but Sir Oliver could have saved him from his favorite argument of the impossibility of getting anything out of a combination unless it has previously been placed there. He says that religious people need not be alarmed about Materialism, for "what but Divine Wisdom could have endowed.....chemical substances" with the capacity for producing life? "How could anything come out of them that was not first put into them?"

Now, Sir Oliver really would instruct Dr. Warschauer better than this. He is evidently under the impression that the qualities of a compound are secreted somewhere among its factors as a performer hides a card up his sleeve. Sir Oliver Lodge would be the first to tell him that what he says cannot be is of constant occurrence. Sir Oliver has, in his anxiety to reconcile religion and science, often played fast and loose with scientific conceptions, but his practical training as a scientist has always saved him from stupid blunders of this kind. What he would say is, not that a compound does not manifest qualities not previously there, but that at a certain stage of development a new power, life, adds its directive influence to what is taking place. There is nothing whatever to prove that this is so; but it is not open to the charge of ignorance. To put it quite plainly, Dr. Warschauer's statement is open to that charge. And it needs but little acquaintance with scientific methods and principles to prove it.

Two things Dr. Warschauer is specially thankful to Sir Oliver for. One is that he has helped to kill "the popular superstition" that while "men of religion are usually divided," men of science are "always at one." He says he remembers this "very superstition being brought out with great gusto by Mr. Foote of the Freethinker, in his debate with myself," and, of course, also remembers how very clearly he pricked the bubble. It is a pity to disturb such complacency, but Mr. Foote was never silly enough to assert that men of science were all in agreement. The contrary is so obvious that none but a fool would make such a statement. What Mr. Foote did point out was that scientific men had behind them a body of accepted facts upon which they all took their stand, from which they could reason upon new facts that presented themselves, and to which they could refer for verification or correction. And this body of accepted truth is steadily growing. In contrast to this there are no generally accepted facts in religion; there is no body of admitted truth to which all may appeal. The very data of religion is in question. The more scientific men discuss their differences, the greater becomes the measure of their disagreement. Sir Oliver killed no popular superstition—unless it is a superstition popular in Dr. Warschauer's own church.

Dr. Warschauer is also thankful to Sir Oliver because he taught "science its proper place," "pointing out its limitations." In other words, says the preacher, "there are large domains where the writs of science do not run." Again, the zeal of the preacher causes him to overreach himself. Sir Oliver Lodge did not put "science" in its proper place; he did not point out that there are regions where its writ will not run. On the contrary, he was appealing for the application of science to the very region where Dr. Warschauer says it will not apply. What Sir Oliver protested against was the methods of physical science being used as decisive. He said that you could not test beauty and happiness by the tests used in physical science. In this the Materialist may agree without the least injury to his position. And it is probably due to the fact that Sir Oliver is a physicist that he has come to identify, in thought, science with his own branch of study.

Dr. Warschauer is a true theologian. He loves science, but he says, "Thank God, there is somewhere where it doesn't apply! Thank God, there is a region where you cannot apply methods of exact observation, where our knowledge defies classification and co-ordination. Thank God, there is a region concerning which we can only guess, and about which verifiable knowledge is impossible. For so long as we believe in that land there is a haven of refuge for the preacher of religion."

C. COHEN.

Echo of a Friendly Encounter.

IT was our good fortune, recently, to meet a young gentleman who, not long ago, came into fairly close touch with Freethought and Freethinkers. For twelve months the association continued, during which time he divested himself of every rag of supernatural belief he had ever possessed, becoming, in fact, a veritable Freethinker. But eventually he imagined that there was gradually taking place an appreciable softening of the moral fibre in many of his new friends. Sexual purity appeared to be on the decline amongst them, nor was honesty any longer universally held to be the best policy. Divorce proceedings and prosecutions for theft and other crimes were not unheard of in their ranks. The conclusion to which our friend found himself irresistibly driven was that Freethought robbed people of something ineffably valuable, for which it offered no adequate substitute. "If you take religion away from people," he said, "you ought to have something equally as valuable, or more valuable, to put in its place." This is a very old argument which has been, and is, a standing difficulty in the way of many minds. It is taken for granted by multitudes that when one thing is removed its place must be filled up by something else. This is a plausible fallacy, but before we discuss it there are two or three preliminary points to consider. In the first place, it by no means follows that, when a Freethinker falls into irregular habits, his Freethought principles are the cause of it. If those habits are really hurtful to the community, if they are in their very nature anti-social, they must be uncompromisingly condemned; but, surely, it cannot honestly be claimed that the responsibility for them lies at the door of Secularism, because Secularism denounces them in the name of reason. When a Freethinker happens to go wrong, which is very rarely, how apt his Christian judges are to exclaim, "What else could you expect from an Atheist?" or, "No wonder; he rejects Christ." As a matter of fact, however, departures from rectitude are not limited to Freethinkers. We are informed that there are some eighty thousand prostitutes in the city of London, and the question naturally arises: By whom are they supported? No one would dream of asserting that they are exclusively dependent for their living on the comparatively small number of Atheists in our midst. There is ample evidence that they are supported by priests, by clergymen, by Sunday-school teachers, by men who believe that the Bible is God's Word. Are Christians never prosecuted for all sorts of felonies? Do they never make an appearance in the Divorce Court, or are they altogether above committing suicide? By whom are our prisons crowded? Is it not a fact that Freethinkers are rarities within them? Now, are Christians prepared, for once, to be perfectly logical and fair? Will they be consistent enough to say openly that the crimes of Christians are the appropriate harvest of their Christian principles? If not, we call upon them, in the name of truth and fairplay to refrain from vilifying Freethought in that horribly unjust and wicked fashion.

Again; there is, no doubt, a sense in which our friend's allegations are more or less true. It is a fundamental contention of Christian teachers that it is impossible to observe what they call the moral law without supernatural help, which is supposed to manifest itself in the form of grace, mercy, or redeeming love. This help must be diligently or passionately invoked on bended knees, and the suppliants must regard themselves as helpless until it comes. "By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God," is Paul's emphatic utterance. Seeing a man on the way to the gallows, a minister of the Gospel cries, "There go I were it not for the grace of God." "What would there be to prevent me from robbing or murdering you," asks a believer, "if there were no God?" Not much, we admit. Ever since the Edenic catastrophy, human nature is, in and of itself, utterly incapable of any good thought or action. God alone, by his grace, can make and keep us virtuous. Now, if a man persistently trained from earliest childhood to cherish that belief loses it, the first result is a sense of helplessness and despair which engenders moral recklessness and unconcern. In such a case the loss of supernatural belief not unnaturally proves damaging to the character. If a person abstains from doing wrong from dread of supernatural punishment in a world to come, what more reasonable than that the casting out of that fear should be accompanied and followed by a temporary demoralisation of the whole nature? To people brought up in so hideous a creed there can be nothing more dangerous than the sudden dropping of it. Having always been solemnly urged to distrust themselves, and put their entire trust in heaven's mercy, the disappearance of the supernatural object of faith and source of all human strength and virtue, disturbs their mental equilibrium and throws them into a state of moral disorder. Trust in self comes slowly and with difficulty to such folk, and while acquiring it they may slip into several moral quagmires and suffer harm.

Our friend persists in asking, "What are you going to put in the place of these supernatural hopes and fears?" One might as reasonably ask, What are you going to put in the place of disease? The answer is, Nothing. Disease is an intruder in the system, and all that the physician has got to do is to evict it as quickly as possible, and once it is gone the system automatically returns to its normal condition. So, likewise, supernatural belief is a disease of human nature. Nearly everybody takes it because everybody else is eager to impart it. It is a virus, a parasite or microbe which infects the whole system, and in many instances it has so entrenched itself in the system that it cannot be eradicated; that is, it has reached an incurable state. Our point, however, is that it is a foreigner, an intruder, who has no right to be present; an enemy, towards which our first duty is to dislodge and turn it out, bag and baggage, and that once it is outside we need put nothing in its place, but allow the system time and opportunity to recover its normality. Health is a condition; order after disorder; peace after the tumult of war; man in full command of himself and all his faculties. This is what Freethought is doing its utmost to bring to pass; and in proportion as it succeeds man's moral or social life will gain enormously in every respect. It is well known that the healthiest and happiest people in any community are those represented by the third or fourth generation of Freethinkers. They have had sufficient time to readjust their relationships both to themselves and the outside world.

On two important points our friend is radically mistaken. The first is the assumed adequacy of the Christian moral code. Nietzsche rendered magnificent service by pointing with such fine clearness that it represents a morality fit only for slaves. Will any unprejudiced person maintain that the Christian law of marriage is defensible? Does anybody imagine that the problems of sex are already solved? Has the last word been spoken on the subject of Capital and Labor? Morality ought to be progressive, but there is no room for progress in the Christian system. What may appear immoral to our friend may only be a higher form of morality, for which he is not yet sufficiently advanced. The other point concerns the status of the reason in human thought and life. Our friend fears that it is not a reliable guide through the world. We agree with him. For convenience's sake we break the mind up into so many faculties; but the division is purely imaginary. Man is a unit, the whole of which is involved in every action. When we speak of the reason we are thinking of the whole man as working in a certain direction; but no action can be uninfluenced by a single faculty. The reason is specially engaged in the task of unravelling the various tangles into which social life has become enmeshed; but in all its operations the emotions are represented. In reality all that we contend for is that man is capable of managing his own affairs without assistance from any superhuman region. That he cannot do this solely by the exercise of the powers inhering within him is incapable of verification; but there is the most ample evidence that he has failed to do so with all the supernatural aid which the Church assured him was at his disposal. Faith has had an innings of many thousand years, and society still groans under heavy burdens of oppression and injustice. Let reason have an innings, and let it prove by the success or failure of the play what it can or cannot do. We confidently predict that once man is permitted to tackle his problems in his own way and strength he will in time solve them all satisfactorily and set the world right.

We are convinced that opposition to Freethought comes only from those who misunderstand and misrepresent it. The theologians do not wish to possess an accurate interpretation of it, and we cannot hope to lead them out of darkness into light, because they seem to love the former rather than the latter; but we are gradually getting a hearing from young men and maidens over whom their influence is decidedly on the wane. These are in process of discovering the truth for themselves, and the truth is making them free.

J. T. LLOYD.

A Talk With Mother.

"I sought to strike
Into that wondrous track of dreams."
—TENNYSON.

THEOLOGIANS have placed the Garden of Eden in Mesopotamia, travellers in Africa, ethnologists in Atlantis, mythologists in Lemuria, philosophers in Utopia, and imaginative journalists at the North and South Poles; the whole series constituting a real embarrassment of choice. Even so, it did not present difficulties to the Freethinker reporter. A few weeks before I had been despatched by the stern editor, who had instructed me definitely to obtain an interview with Eve, the mother of the human race.

The dangers of the journey, however manifold, paled beside the pleasures in store for the journalist. Fancy the sensation which the most satiated of reporters must experience on beholding a tree certified to be that of "Good and Evil." Fancy, too, the traveller's tales waiting to be written, unfolding possibilities almost too good to be true. The rewritten story of the Fall would have the force and flavor of the newest scandal. All conscientious editors would seize upon such an item for reproduction in their pages, and the glory of the Freethinker's journalistic "scoop" would resound throughout the world.

Perched upon a peak of the Pamirs, provided with flowers that never wither, with delights that never end, with songs that never cease, Eden surged above the barren plains, a mirage of terrestrial bliss. The perspiring reporter ascended the heights upon which it was set. It was a hard climb to the top, but Eve was to be found there; and the editor's definite instructions could not be ignored.

Eve was "at home," and at the reporter's approach she rose and greeted him.

"You are enterprising," she said, "and so I welcome you. One gets so tired of stay-at-home folk."

The reporter bowed, and gravely said, "Freethinkers are always enterprising, madam; I came on a special errand."

"What is it?"

"An interview," I managed to stammer, being overcome at the spectacle of beauty unadorned. Eve appeared pleased. She brought out some apples. "Do you know," she said, "I have never been interviewed for the papers. I thank your editor for the compliment. Why did you wish to see me?"

"I really wanted to know whether you were ever married to Adam; because people are so straight-laced nowadays."

"Please to bear this in mind, sir," she replied with emphasis, "we were modest back in the old days."

"No offence, dear madam," I assured her. "Perhaps you can offer a kind word upon the present style of dress, inasmuch as we are slowly coming round to your fashions."

"Your women lack dignity and strength. Do you think we should have survived at all if we had been rigged out like that? Besides, think what we escaped. We had no washing to do on Mondays, nor did we have to sew buttons on our husbands' shirts, patch their pantaloons, get their overcoats out of pawn, or even argue about long hairs on their shirt fronts. We had much to be thankful for."

I gasped in astonishment.

"Yes," she continued, "I surprise you; but I am no ordinary woman. I was never a 'flapper,' and, indeed, started life at full age—and——"

When I recovered consciousness the clock was striking seven, and I found I was at home in my own room.

Napoleon's Religion.

> "In spite of terrors of Napoleon, he is entitled to the gratitude of mankind. He pulled down the Pope, and the monks in Spain and Italy, and the Inquisition in those countries. He carried the light of liberal principles to dark and enslaved regions. It will be impossible for all the kings and priests in the world to make men as ignorant and submissive as they were before he marched over the Alps..... Napoleon—and that was his greatest fault—gave, in some sort, a sanction to falsehood, and hypocrisy, and imposture, by going to mass. His example was of evil tendency. The act was, besides, a compromise with fraud."—William Cobbett, Register, vol. xxviii., p. 6.

The time should be approaching when both Frenchmen and Englishmen will take an impartial view of the great personality who, a century ago, so rapidly rose to power in Europe. The harsh judgments of historians like Scott and Lanfrey may perhaps be somewhat modified by the conviction that Napoleon, like lesser men, often acted from necessity rather than from will. Lust of power grows by what it feeds on. The fabric of Napoleon's dominion ever needed new conquests to make the earlier ones secure. If ever a man could dominate circumstances and, by seizing the opportune moment, subordinate them to his purposes, it was Napoleon. Yet Napoleon believed in destiny, and would have said with Bismarck, "There is so much I must in my life that I rarely reach I will." He said himself, "My son cannot replace me; I could not replace myself. I am the creature of circumstances."

Napoleon came at the break-up of the old feudalism, and completed the work. France was fighting for very life against the allied monarchs of Europe, and he won his way to the top by dint of his inherent fighting qualities. Physically, he was different from other men. His head was abnormally large, his blood circulated abnormally slow. In this respect such a man was never known. His pulse beat only forty to the minute. This indicated great reserves of energy and callousness. He could easily stand work, troubles, and sleeplessness that would have killed other men. His habit was to get to bed at eleven and be up at three, and he had the "two o'clock in the morning courage." In war he could do everything for himself. Il n'est rien à la geurre, que je ne puisse faire par moi-même." He said with the same frankness, "J'aime le pouvoir comme un musicien aime son violon" (I love power as a musician his violin). He went straight to his point unembarrassed by scruples.

Rarely has the "Will for Power" been more absolutely incarnate or more reckless of honor, truth, sympathy, affection, or human life. He said to Metternich he thought nothing of the lives of a million men. As a matter of fact, between 1804 and 1815, there were killed more than 1,700,000 Frenchmen, not to mention allies and enemies. The eternal Ego may be said to have been at bottom of his religion. On his beautiful bronze face was stamped, as Heine remarked, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." Woe to those who stood in his way!

Yet he believed in fate, which he identified with God. He was a Deist of the school of Voltaire, thinking with him, "Si Dieu n'existait pas il faudrait l'inventer" (If God did not exist it would be necessary to invent him)—exactly what has been done. He had a genuine belief in an overruling Power, but he was consistent throughout. He regarded religion as an instrument of policy, and utilised it to render others subservient to himself. Atheism he was suspicious of. Those who deny celestial rule are apt to question terrestrial rulers boldly. To Laplace he noticed that his great work, La Mécanique Céleste never once mentioned the name of God. "Sire," replied the astronomer, je n'ai pas eu besoin de recourir à cette hypothesè." Laplace had no need to recur to that hypothesis, but Napoleon had. He had a strong sense of the mystery of existence, and he knew that God was among the magical words, as he called liberté and égalité; excellent to conjure with. His God or fate was an unknown one. He said, "The problems of Providence are insoluble." "All predictions are imposture, the result of fraud, folly, or fanaticism." Yet he would have repudiated Positivism had it been started in his time. "A religion," he remarked, "which relates to this life, without teaching man whence he comes and whither he goes, is not supportable [soutenable]."

Napoleon did not believe in any special revelation. He said, "I once had faith. But when I came to know something, as soon as I began to reason, which occurred early in life, at the age of thirteen, I found my faith attacked, and that it staggered." He became, as he said, "no capuchin," but a man of the world, ready to utilise it for his own aggrandisement. Of the Christian religion, he said, "As far as I am concerned, I do not see in it the mystery of the Incarnation, but the mystery of social order, the association of religion with paradise, an idea of equality which keeps the rich from being massacred by the poor." Again he says, "Society could not exist without an inequality of fortunes, or an inequality of fortunes without religion." "A man dying of starvation alongside of one who is surfeited, would not yield to this difference, unless he had some authority which assured him that God so orders it, that there must be both poor and rich in the world, but that, in the future, and throughout eternity, the portion of each will be changed." Christianity was not true, but it was useful. He said frankly to his friends, "It is said that I am a Papist. I am nothing. In Egypt I was a Mussulman; here I shall be a Catholic, for the good of the people. I do not believe in religions; but the idea of a God! [then pointing upward] Who made all that?" (Thibaudeau, p. 152).

His sentiments were the same when at St. Helena. Mrs. Abell, in her Recollections of the Emperor Napoleon (p. 69), relates how she catechised him on the subject in Anglo-French. "Pourquoi avez-vous tourné Turque?" He did not at first understand me, and I was obliged to explain that "tourné Turque" meant changing his religion. He laughed and said, "What is that to you? Fighting is a soldier's religion; I never changed that. The other is the affair of women and priests; quant à moi, I always adopt the religion of the country I am in." He was much annoyed when accused of Atheism, though he confessed himself a fatalist, saying, "I believe that whatever a man's destiny calls upon him to do, that he must fulfil." His belief in destiny was doubtless genuine, though it, too, had its utility in impressing others with the idea that he was the man destined to rule, and that the stars in their courses fought for Napoleon.

Napoleon's phenomenal intellectual capacity is admitted on all hands. His words often have the sharpness of a sword. "Half measures are always dangerous." "Hazard nothing, gain nothing." "Speeches pass, actions remain." Scorn dominates sometimes, as when he says, "No government so tyrannical as one calling itself paternal." "The kitchen is a fine accessory to government." "Men are rare." "People in general are but big children." "There are rattles for all ages." "We must laugh at men to avoid crying." "From the sublime to the ridiculous there is but one step." "Fortune is an arrant courtesan." "Wash your dirty linen at home." "We can march quicker when we march alone."

His utterances on religion are of this serious cynical turn: "In all countries," he said, "religion is useful to the Government; it should be used to control the people." Again he said: "Nothing more debases a nation than religious despotism." "The decadence of Italy dates from the moment when the priests would govern the finances, the police, and the army."

The intimate alliance of the Christian religion with political tyranny he noted in saying, "The French people, in order to obtain a constitution founded on reason, had to conquer eighteen centuries of prejudice" (Moniteur, vol. xxix., p. 90). In Egypt he told his soldiers to co-operate as cordially with believers in the Koran as with Jews and Christians, and to show the same respect to their muftis and inmans as to archbishops and rabbis. He himself observed the feast of Ramazan, realising the verse of Voltaire on Zaire, that he is "a Christian in Italy, a Freethinker in Paris, and a Mussulman on the banks of the Nile."

When First Consul, Lafayette urged him to give equal liberty to all sects, placing them, as in the United States, outside the Government, he observed, "Lafayette is right in theory, but he always believes himself in America. The Catholic religion prevails here. Moreover, I have need of the Pope, and he will do whatever I wish." He disliked sects, and idealogues were his bête noir. "An established religion," he remarked, "is a kind of vaccination, which, in satisfying our love of the marvellous, guarantees us against quacks and sorcerers; the priests are worth more than the Cagliostros, Kants, and the rest of the German dreamers."

Speaking of his soldiers wearing the turban when in Egypt, he said, "Collectively, an army may well pretend to be of any description of worship, but it should in this obey the orders of a general-in-chief, who is as much the organ of his country as the flag is its symbol. Yet it would be odious for the soldiers individually each to deny the beliefs and faiths of their fathers, to improve their own position." He found his own policy confirmed, not by their words, but by the deeds of priests in all ages.

At St. Helena he said, "Theologians of all religions are the same; they spare neither ink nor words to enforce, according to their passions, their authority, or their caprice, a certain elasticity to the law of Moses, to that of Jesus Christ, or of Mohammed."

Napoleon sought to, and did, utilise religion in the matter of his coronation, his divorce, and the conscriptions. He considered it as a buttress of his own power, and at the time of the Concordat observed, "Mark the insolence of the priests who, in sharing authority with what they call the temporal power, reserve to themselves all action on the mind—the noblest part of man, and take it on themselves to reduce my part to physical action. They retain the soul and fling me the corpse." He wished to be head of the Church as well as of the State. "You will see," he said, while negotiating the Concordat, "how I will turn the priests to account, and, first of all, the Pope." Parodying Voltaire, he said, "Had no Pope existed, it would have been necessary to create him"—viz., to give a spiritual sanction to his own authority. He let the clergy know they were servants of the State. When the curé of St. Roch refused to bury an opera dancer, he published in the Moniteur: "The Archbishop of Paris orders the curé of St. Roch in a retreat of three months, in order that he may bear in mind the injunction of Jesus Christ to pray for one's enemies." The Church was made the handmaiden of the State.

All Catholic children were taught to pray for and serve Napoleon. "For God has raised him up for us in times of peril, that he might restore public worship and the holy religion of our forefathers, and be its protector." M. Taine says:—

> "Every boy and girl in each parish recite this to the vicar or curé after vespers in their tiny voices as a commandment of God, and of the Church, as a supplementary article of the creed. Meanwhile the officiating priest gravely comments on this article, already clear enough, at every morning and evening service; by order he preaches in behalf of the conscription, and declares that it is a sin to try to escape from it, to be refractory; by order, again, he reads the army bulletins, giving accounts of the latest victories; always by order he reads the pastoral of his bishop—a document authorised, inspired, and corrected by the police.....'You must praise the Emperor more in your pastoral letters,' said Réal, Prefect of Police, to a young bishop. 'Tell me in what measure.' 'I do not know,' was the reply. Since the measure cannot be prescribed, it must be ample enough."

Napoleon said, "Popes have committed too many absurdities to be believed infallible." Yet it was his own attempt to subjugate the Pope which led onwards to the claim for infallibility. He has left on record his plans to be head of the Christian Church. "If I had returned from Moscow victorious," he said, "I should have exalted the Pope beyond measure, surrounding him with pomp and deference.....I would have made him an idol. He should have dwelt beside me. Paris would have become the capital of the Christian world, and I would have governed the religious as well as the political world. I would have had my religious as well as my legislative sessions; my council would have represented Christianity; the Pope should have been only their president. I would have opened and closed these assemblies, approved and published their decrees, as was done by Constantine and Charlemagne." Here we see the quality by which Napoleon outshone the great generals of all ages—his imaginative daring. It may seem strange that a man of such soaring mind and dauntless ambition should never have questioned the great god-ghost bogie. But, in truth, with all his clear, direct view of the things before him, he was in matters of speculative philosophy but an uncultured Corsican. "Who made all that?" satisfied him as a complete answer to Atheism, just as it satisfies, for a time, the merest child. So he remained a Deist.

La Casas reports him as saying:—

> "Everything proclaims the existence of a God—that cannot be questioned; but all religions are evidently the work of man. Why are there so many? Why has not ours always existed? Why does it consider itself exclusively the right one? What becomes, in that case, of all the virtuous men who have gone before us? Why do these religions oppose and exterminate one another? Why has this been the case ever and everywhere? Because men are ever men; because priests have ever and everywhere introduced fraud and falsehood."

He said that his incredulity did not proceed from perverseness or from licentiousness of mind, but from the strength of his reason. Yet, added he, "no man can answer for what will happen, particularly in his last moments. At present I certainly believe that I shall die without a confessor." His doubt on the subject was warranted by self-knowledge. But it was rather his desire to die with all the éclat which the Church ceremonies could give than the return of faith which, after his trying illness, led him to receive on his deathbed the sacrament from Père Vignali.

Naked Woman Penitent.

CURATE AND POLICEMAN SHOCKED.

MELBOURNE, July 22.

THE sight of a naked woman kneeling before the altar of All Saints' Anglican Church at St. Kilda intensely shocked the curate on Sunday afternoon. The clergyman's attention was attracted by sounds of supplication from the direction of the chancel, and on investigating he was astonished to see an absolutely unclad woman kneeling before the altar. That was too much for the reverend gentleman, who promptly left the church and sent for the nearest policeman. Soon a young constable appeared, and drew near to the unknown penitent, who was certainly representing to the life the well-known story of Elizabeth of Hungary.

His urgent suggestion that she should clothe herself being unheeded, he was in a dilemma what to do and so left the church and prevailed on someone to summon some of the lady teachers from All Saints' Sunday-school to intercede with the penitent and get her to dress.

The first two young ladies who volunteered were scared by the "wild look" which they said the woman had in her eye; and they took to flight. But some of the older lady teachers were induced to go in. They at length got the woman apparelled. She proved to be between 35 and 40 years of age.

Her statement to the constable was that she had been making earnest intercession in great humility to be made a better woman. She added that she had been living at Nott-street, Melbourne, and at Fitzroy-street, Fitzroy, but she was uncommunicative on other points.

On being taken to the St. Kilda lock-up, Dr. Louis Henry, J.P., interrogated her, with but little more success. She, however, told him that she was in communion with God when she was found naked in the church, and had gone there because she was surrounded by a lot of devils. The doctor formed the opinion that she was a hard-working woman who was suffering from an acute form of religious mania. He certified accordingly, and the woman was taken to the receiving home at Royal Park.—Taranki "Budget" (New Zealand).

ON SEEING GHOSTS.

Whenever a real ghost appears,—by which I mean some man or woman dressed up to frighten another,—if the supernatural character of the apparition has been for a moment believed, the effects on the spectator have always been most terrible,—convulsion, idiocy, madness, or even death on the spot.....But in our common ghost stories, you will always find that the seer, after a most appalling apparition, as you are to believe, is quite well the next day. Perhaps, he may have a headache; but that is the outside of the effect produced. Alston, a man of genius, and the best painter yet produced by America, when he was in England, told me an anecdote which confirms what I have been saying. It was, I think, in the University of Cambridge, near Boston, that a certain youth took it into his wise head to endeavor to convert a Tom-Painish companion of his by appearing as a ghost before him. He accordingly dressed himself up in the usual way, having previously extracted the ball from the pistol which always lay near the head of his friend's bed. Upon first awaking, and seeing the apparition, the youth who was to be frightened, A, very coolly looked his companion the ghost in the face, and said, "I know you. This is a good joke; but you see I am not frightened. Now you may vanish!" The ghost stood still. "Come," said A, "that is enough. I shall get angry. Away!" Still the ghost moved not. "By —," ejaculated A, "if you do not in three minutes go away, I'll shoot you." He waited the time, deliberately levelled the pistol, fired, and, with a scream at the immobility of the figure, became convulsed, and afterwards died. The very instant he believed it to be a ghost, his human nature fell before it.—Coleridge, "Table Talk."

MORE FLASHES FROM NIETZSCHE.

One should not go into churches if one wishes to breathe pure air.

The Christian faith from the beginning is sacrifice: the sacrifice of all freedom, all pride, all self-confidence of spirit; it is at the same time subjection, self-derision, and self-mutilation.

The tendency of a person to allow himself to be degraded, robbed, deceived, and exploited might be the diffidence of a God amongst men.

We are most dishonorable towards our God: he is not permitted to sin.

Not their love of humanity, but the impotence of their love, prevents the Christians of to-day—burning us.

It is a curious thing that God learned Greek when he wished to turn author—and that he did not learn it better.

Christianity gave Eros poison to drink; he did not die of it, certainly, but degenerated to vice.

Disguise it as we may, the government of mankind is always and everywhere essentially aristocratic. No juggling with political machinery can evade this law of nature. However it may seem to lead, the dull-witted majority in the end follows a keener-witted minority. That is its salvation and the secret of progress. The higher human intelligence sways the lower, just as the intelligence of man gives him the mastery over the brutes. I do not mean that the ultimate direction of society rests with its nominal governors, with its kings, its statesmen, its legislators. The true rulers of men are the thinkers who advance knowledge; for just as it is through his superior knowledge, not through his superior strength, that man bears rule over the rest of the animal creation, so among men themselves it is knowledge which in the long run directs and controls the forces of society. Thus the discoverers of new truths are the real though uncrowned and unsceptred kings of mankind; monarchs, statesmen, and law-givers are but their ministers, who sooner or later do their bidding by carrying out the ideas of these master-minds.—Prof. J. G. Frazer, "Scope of Social Anthropology."

RELIGIOUS PREJUDICES.

If your nurse has told you that Ceres presides over corn, or that Vishnu or Sakyamuni became men several times, or that Odin awaits you in his hall towards Jutland, or that Mohammed or some other travelled to heaven; if, moreover, your preceptor deepens in your brain what the nurse has engraved, you will hold it all your life. Should your judgment rise against these prejudices, your neighbors, above all your female neighbors, will cry out at the impiety and frighten you. Your dervish, fearing the diminution of his revenue, may accuse you before the Cadi, and this Cadi impale you if he can, since he desires to rule over fools, believing fools obey better than others; and this will endure till your neighbors, and the dervish, and the Cadi begin to understand that folly is good for nothing, and that persecution is abominable.—Voltaire "Dictionnaire Philosophique."

I would rather go to the forest, far away, and build me a little cabin—build it myself—and daub it with clay, and live there with my wife and children; and have a winding path leading down to the spring where the water bubbles out, day and night, whispering a poem to the white pebbles from the heart of the earth; a little hut with some hollyhocks at the corner, with their bannered bosoms open to the sun, and a thrush in the air like a winged joy. I would rather live there and have some lattice-work across the window, so that the sunlight would fall checkered on the babe in the cradle. I would rather live there, with my soul erect and free, than in a palace of gold, and wear a crown of imperial power, and feel that I was superstition's cringing slave, and dare not speak my honest thought.—R. G. Ingersoll.

THINK AND LET THINK.

Do you know that every man has a religious belief peculiar to himself? Smith is always a Smithee. He takes in exactly Smith's worth of knowledge—Smith's worth of truth, of beauty, and divinity. And Brown has, from time immemorial, been trying to burn him, to excommunicate him, because he didn't take in Brown's worth of knowledge, truth, beauty, divinity. He cannot do it, any more than a pint-pot can hold a quart—or a quart be filled by a pint. Iron is essentially the same everywhere and always, but the sulphate of iron is never the same as the carbonate of iron. Truth is invariable, but the Smithate of truth must always differ from the Brownate of truth.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Mr. Dooley, the American humorist, has been describing women as angels. "But," he adds caustically, "I used to agree with Hogan whin he said pollyticks was too rough for women, but after readin' what they've done in England I'm afraid they may be too rough for pollyticks."

Acid Drops.

The Catholic Times and the Christian World have been carrying on a controversy over the education question. A great deal of it has been an illustration of the pot commenting on the kettle's complexion, but in its last rejoinder the Catholic Times gets home a clean hit. The editor of the Christian World objects to religious dogmas being taught at the public expense. Very good, replies the Catholic editor, but what is the teaching "that the Bible is the Word of God, inspired, revealed, authentic, and that it has an authority for belief and conduct which is possessed by no other volume on earth," but a dogma? And he asks:—

> "Why should the State pay teachers to teach that dogma, or to assume it when teaching the contents of the book, and not pay Catholic or Church teachers for teaching other dogmas? Why should Nonconformists, at the expense of the public purse, have their dogmas taught if we may not have ours? So long as Free Churchmen insist on Bible teaching or Cowper-Templeism, they are insisting on a privilege for themselves."

There is really no adequate reply possible to these questions, and so long as Nonconformists stand for Bible teaching in their schools, Catholics and Churchmen have them, logically, at their mercy. The reply that the Bible is in the schools as literature, or as a manual of ethics, is sheer cant. It is there in a privileged position, except where teachers are better inclined, it is made the basis of religious instruction, and its teaching involves some of the greatest of dogmas. Some Nonconformists are straightforward enough to recognise this, and to stand forward as advocates of Secular Education. But the vast majority, led by men like Dr. Clifford, support the teaching by the State of dogmas in which they believe, and shriek themselves hoarse against the State teaching dogmas in which other people believe. Their attitude is only one of the many illustrations of the way in which Christianity blinds men to a sense of justice and fair play all round.

September 19 was the anniversary of the death of St. Januarius, and the miracle of the liquefaction of his blood duly occurred in the Cathedral at Naples. This "saint" is said to have been beheaded in 309, and his head was given to the Church by the Duke of Anjou some seven hundred years later. On the anniversary of his death, a priest approaches the head, holding in his hand a small bottle containing some of the congealed blood of the martyr. When the bottle is brought within sight of the head, the blood melts and runs down the side of the bottle. It is, of course, a mere chemical trick, and has been duplicated time after time. Any head will do, but asses' heads are necessary to a proper performance of the religious rite.

Once upon a time the blood refused to liquefy. This was when the French were at Naples, and Murat had been made king by Napoleon. The priests wanted to get rid of Murat, and the non-liquefaction of the blood was a means of stirring up ill-will among the people. Murat was, however, equal to the occasion. He planted some cannon opposite the Cathedral and threatened to blow the church to pieces unless the miracle occurred within a given time. The bishop held out as long as he dared, protesting that it could not be done. But Murat meant what he said, and the bishop knew it. The miracle, consequently, took place in good time. That was over a century ago, and the same piece of jugglery is still being performed by knaves for the benefit of fools. And yet some people talk of Christianity as a civilising force!

Very reluctantly the Guardian at length admits the impossibility of turning the Turk out of Europe—for the present. But it hopes for the best, barely hides its satisfaction that the peace just concluded will not last long—or, at least, only until Bulgaria is strong enough to have another try. We should have thought that by this time the most prejudiced would have come to the conclusion that the Turk was certainly not worse than any of the Christian nations whose cupidity and barbarity prevented them dividing fairly the spoils they had won. Evidently, however, the Guardian is unconvinced. It says: "The great work of turning the Turk out of Europe still remains to be accomplished." But why should the Turk be turned out of Europe? The only reasons that we can see is that he is not a Christian, and some people have convinced themselves, almost as an article of faith, that Europe must be entirely in the hands of Christians. Well, the most of it is, and look at the result! Could it have been much worse had there been no Christians at all in Europe? Would it, in that case, have been in as deplorable a condition as it is? We have our doubts concerning the second query—but we have none at all about the first. Christianity as a civilising force is one of the greatest failures the world has ever known.

The Churches are beside themselves with joy over Sir Oliver Lodge's unscientific pronouncements from the Chair of the British Association. Even the staid and ecclesiastically orthodox Church Times is in rapture, and, in its issue for September 19, devotes an eloquent leading article to a discussion of "The Wane of Materialism." The writer falls into the usual error of asserting that the day of Materialism is past. "Darwinism," he solemnly assures us, "has gone by the board." Its advocates "have seen not merely subsidiary details, but the very foundations of their creed overthrown by later discoveries." "The Materialistic dogmas" of the mid-Victorian era "are utterly discredited to-day." Many other assertions of that wild, irresponsible character are made in the article; and one is tempted to infer that the writer himself must have known how entirely false they are. Leading biologists of the day have again and again given them the direct lie in the press. Everyone remembers that last year's meeting of the British Association gave a stronger and more enthusiastic support to the mechanistic interpretation of the Universe than any of its former sessions. By whom is it "utterly discredited"? By the clergy and about half-a-dozen scientists who happen to be also Spiritualists. As Sir Ray Lankester has repeatedly declared in letters to the Times and the Telegraph, Darwinism is the foundation upon which present-day biologists build. Will the Church Times be good enough to inform us by which discoveries Mechanism has been overthrown?

Sir Oliver Lodge was asked recently whether the inquiry into the constitution of matter and the origin of life had made it easier to believe in God? The question was not a very intelligent one, and we cannot say that Sir Oliver gave a very intelligible answer. He said that the belief had not been made easier, but it had been "made fuller and truer and more real." Now, we should dearly like to know how investigations of the kind named can make our knowledge of God fuller or more real. People know to-day as much about God as ever they did, and Sir Oliver Lodge knows just as much as anybody else. Whatever be the constitution of matter, its relation to the existence of God remains the same. And most certainly nothing has occurred in the world of science to make our knowledge of God more truthful—that is, more exact—than it was. "God" still remains what it always has been—a word that explains nothing, serves no useful purpose, and is positively harmful, inasmuch as it persuades many they have an explanation when all they have got hold of is a phrase.

Sir Oliver Lodge's British Association Address has "encouraged" Dr. Clifford to anticipate a time when the world will witness the marriage of physical science to theology. In that case, we anticipate a speedy decree of nullity.

Eight children were burned to death in a tenement fire at Quebec, and the rest of the family were rescued in a shocking condition. "Providence" was too busy watching the sparrows, or counting the hairs on people's heads, to trouble about burning children.

The newspapers are making a fuss over the death of a Canning Town woman in her 103rd year. At that age Methuselah was still at school, and Noah was as green as a Boy Scout.

A lunatic sent to the Church Army's Senior Missioners a card of pansies for "thoughts." He knew what was wanted.

The future of China is on "the knees of God" says the editor of the Christian Globe. When Deity gets up there should be some breakages. Japan appears to be anticipating the event.

That brilliant artist, Mr. Will Dyson, who draws the cartoons for the Daily Herald, has a caustic wit with a profane flavor. A recent drawing of his, dealing with the library censorship, was entitled, "And a little child shall lead them," and depicted a procession of leading novelists preceded by a pert "flapper."

"God" is very cheap nowadays. "King Carson" himself assures his followers that he cannot fail because he trusts in God. We understand that the Nationalists are equally confident of the divine assistance. What on earth, or in Ulster, will poor "God" do? One thing is certain. He is sure to be on the winning side.

We see by the report in a Leeds newspaper that Mr. E. Pack has had to bring an assaulter into the Police-court. Mr. Pack was annoyed at the persistent sale at his meetings of an anonymous, discreditable paper called ——. But why should we give it a gratuitous advertisement? He felt obliged to denounce it, as it was sold by persons who should have known better, and to explain that it was not in any way associated with the Secular movement. One of the sellers jumped up on the plinth-platform and spat in Mr. Pack's face. This led to the Police-court appearance, and the assaulter's undertaking not to sell it again within a hundred yards of Mr. Pack's meetings. We understand that the Stipendiary Magistrate remarked that the publication in question was justly called "obscene," and that he passed it over to the Chief Constable in open court.

It is odd to see in the Yorkshire Evening Post a letter protesting against Atheist lectures in Victoria-square, Leeds, and dated from the Clarion Café. The writer, who signs himself Arthur Lister, and sneers at "these Secularists," does not appear to be acquainted with the Clarion editor's opinions.

We have received news of the arrest of Mr. W. T. Stewart for "blasphemy" at Wolverhampton. No further news of the case has reached us up to the time of our going to press. What are the Christian bigots doing? Are they trying to give a special advertisement to Mr. Foote's lecture in the Birmingham Town Hall? Or is it simply another specimen of their ill-conditioned zeal for the kingdom of God?

Last week's Referee gave prominence to the following letter:

"BLASPHEMY IN THE PARKS.

"To the Editor of the Referee.

"Sir,—The Referee is a powerful paper. Will it assist in putting down a notorious evil by giving the following matter publicity? I refer to the disgusting blasphemy indulged in by the Freethinkers in Hyde Park.

"I have lately listened for a while to the speakers, and their language is both horrible and disgusting. I hold no brief for any form of religion, believing that all are entitled to their opinions. But to all earnest and decent-minded persons the remarks indulged in by these filthy fiends are beyond all reason. The worst of it is, these men are applauded by the crowds of young men and women who surround them.

"The following are samples of the remarks which I have heard within the last few days: 'Your filthy Church,' 'Your dirty God,' 'Your God was born in a pub.,' and even more horrible and blasphemous suggestions which I dare not even indicate.

"Now, educated and refined women are forbidden a hearing in a just cause, and yet these men are allowed to poison the air and people's minds with their obscene remarks. It is a great disgrace and a crying evil. I am sure you will recognise the importance of putting this down, and if the Referee's influence can be used it will, I am sure, earn the gratitude of all right-thinking men and women. I am, Sir, yours, etc.,

"Sydney E. Rist.

"Clapton, September 25, 1913."

"Right-thinking men and women," of course, are men and women who think like Sydney Rist—whoever he may be, for he is quite unknown to fame. We hope there are not as many of them as he imagines. The adjectives this correspondent is allowed to throw about are disgraceful to himself and discreditable to the Referee. Note how he leads up to the word "obscene." At first the Freethinkers' language is only "blasphemy," but it ends with being "obscenity" for the sake of "putting it down." Which is the Christian policy all over. "Give a dog a bad name and hang him." It is an old game, and is played by nobody as well as by the Christians.

The three samples of wicked language adduced by the Referee correspondent are not obscene, whatever else they are. "Your filthy Church" is founded upon the newspaper reports of the clergymen who are so often found guilty of fetid offences. "Your dirty God" is justified by many Bible passages, including Ezekiel's dinner, which was made and cooked by the direct orders of Jehovah. "Your God was born in a pub." is not exactly elegant. But if "an inn" be substituted for "a pub." it is literally true. What does this impudent bigot want? Let him get the Churches and the Bible cleaned up a bit. Freethinkers won't be so able to speak such hard words about them then.

"Whiskers and religion have ever been associated," says the pious Daily Chronicle. "Imagine a priest of any of the Greek churches without his flowing beard." Yes! And fancy the "Son of Man" with a clean shave and a close crop!

"M. C. L.," of the Catholic Herald, admits that in his private capacity the Pope is as fallible as ordinary mortals, that he is not sinless, or incapable of committing sin, as Christ is declared to have been, but firmly holds that when he "is speaking as head of the Church, exercising his office of pastor of all Christians, and of his supreme authority defining a doctrine to be held by the whole Church, he is infallible; that is, incapable of teaching error or false doctrine. Yes, "surely the distinction is clear"; but how does "M. C. L." account for the fact that different Popes have promulgated contrary dogmas? Is he not aware that there have been numerous papal schisms, for which the fourteenth century was notorious above all the others? Has he forgotten that for ages there was a bitter conflict between Augustinianism and Arianism, now the one and now the other being ex cathedra pronounced orthodox? Or can he tell us which, if either, of the two rival Popes was infallible? Facts are stubborn things—dare he face them?

We had no idea that Mr. Ramsay Macdonald was so religious. We know he was a politician, and perhaps that may explain things. And the religion he favors is of the good old Presbyterian type. So, at least, we gather from his utterances at the ordination of a new minister at Lossiemouth Presbyterian Church. At the luncheon that followed the ordination, Mr. Macdonald protested strongly against the attempts that were made to brighten religious services. What was wanted, he said, "was the staid, solemn, impressiveness of the old-time minister." We confess we are astonished. Perhaps the new minister was very solemn, and Mr. Macdonald was trying to make him feel at home. Perhaps he was just poking fun at the whole thing. Perhaps there are some old-fashioned Presbyterian voters to be caught. We can't say. On the face of it, it looks as though Mr. Macdonald would sympathise with the minister who thanked God there had never been a Pleasant Sunday Afternoon in his church.

At a sale at Croydon of effects from Addington House, formerly a residence of many Archbishops of Canterbury, a massive solid brass bedstead was sold for thirty-one shillings. There is no room for tears, for the Founder of the Christian superstition was sold for about the same price.

Sir Thomas Lipton says that "few college-bred men are successful in business." That may be true of the provision trade; but they are sufficiently astute in the soul-saving department.

Rev. E. F. Borst Smith, author of Caught in the Chinese Revolution, says that when people meet with indications in China of missionary work, it is usually of medical rather than non-medical work. This we can well believe. Chinamen in need of medical attendance are not stupid enough to refuse aid from a doctor because he happens to be a Christian. The same is true of India and elsewhere. The truth is that these "medical missions" are so many bribes to the natives abroad, and so many blinds to the natives at home. The first are induced to attend the mission for the sake of non-Christian ministrations; the latter are led to believe that those who come are animated by a desire to hear the Gospel. If the missionaries abroad were to drop the purely secular baits held out, the results of missionary work would be such that none but the most incurable fanatics would support it.

Through a false report of his death, a stationmaster at Widnes has had the experience of reading his own obituary, and the newspapers are making the most of it. There is nothing novel in this, for many Biblical persons had two funerals. Imagine the return of Lazarus after the club-money had been spent.

Mr. Lloyd George has been praised by the Liberal press for using the word "lie," which they attribute to his Celtic directness. Mr. Foote used the word in the Price Hughes pamphlet years ago, and it was then thought offensive by the same Liberals. Mark Twain has a very neat definition: "A lie is an abomination unto the Lord, but a very present help in time of trouble."

A north country newsagent called one of our readers who buys the Freethinker of him weekly "a One-World man." "You should see," he added, "the curious people who come in for the Two Worlds."

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £193 2s. 3d. Received since:—T. J. Thurlow, 5s.

D. DAWSON.—Glad you find the Freethinker an intellectual treat and do your best to promote its circulation. Thanks for the references. The frequency of illegitimate births in pious Wales is a byword. The same may be said of godly Scotland.

W. W. (Glasgow).—Determinism is well expounded and defended in Mr. Cohen's little book. There is no need for us to write at any length on the subject while that volume is in the field. It deals with Mr. Blatchford's great mistake with regard to Determinism without mentioning him. If that is not enough we will fulfil the old promise that you refer to. We were anxious to avoid what might look like personal antagonism, and the result was procrastination from a possibly mistaken motive. Your three questions cannot be answered in a few words. "Utilitarianism" needs a new definition before we could endorse or deny it. Evolution has thrown a fresh light on the whole question of morality.

J. MITCHINSON.—Sorry we are unable to use it. It would do more good in ordinary papers than in our columns.

G. SMITH (Montreal).—Thanks for the cuttings, also for your good wishes.

H. ROBERTS.—You are right; it is comic to see the Churches hanging on to Sir Oliver Lodge, who, so far as we know, doesn't belong to any of them.

JAMES CLARKE.—Glad you have derived so much advantage from reading the Freethinker. See "Acid Drops." We cannot open a space for general questions.

W. CLUCAS.—You will see a paragraph on Mr. Foote's lectures at Manchester in this week's "Sugar Plums."

WELSH RATIONALIST.—Your "question" is an essay, and cannot be dealt with in this column.

B. GREENWOOD.—Pleased to hear you think so highly of this journal. Sir Hiram Maxim's book is, as you say, too costly for the bulk of the readers whom it would interest; but such works are expensive to produce and do not circulate like the newest novels.

J. PARTRIDGE.—Glad the Birmigham Branch began the new session so well last Sunday with a good audience to hear Mr. Clifford Williams's excellent lecture on "Charles Bradlaugh."

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Sugar Plums.

Birmingham has been placarded with big bills advertising Mr. Foote's lecture this evening (October 5) at the Birmingham Town Hall. His subject is one of special interest, "Sir Oliver Lodge's Theology"—that gentleman being the Principal of Birmingham University. The lecture begins at 7 o'clock, all seats are free, and there will be opportunity for questions when the lecture is over. Discussion is forbidden by the conditions under which the use of the Town Hall is granted.

The use of the Birmingham Town Hall is granted free of rent to the local Branch of the N. S. S., but there are the necessary expenses of lighting, cleaning, etc., to be borne, and the cost of advertising the meeting is considerable. The "saints" may therefore be asked to come prepared to contribute liberally to the collection.

Lancashire "saints" are reminded that Mr. Foote visits Manchester very shortly. He is to lecture in the Secular Hall, Rusholme-road, on Sunday, October 19. There will be two meetings, afternoon and evening, as usual. Mr. Foote's subjects will be announced in due course.

Mr. Cohen starts the new Glasgow Season on Sunday, October 19. The meetings will be held at the North Saloon, City Hall—which is a Corporation building. Unfortunately there are restrictions to which the Glasgow 'saints" are unaccustomed. No charge can be made for admission, for one thing; and this is rather a crippling condition unless the "saints" who can afford to do so put their hands more deeply into their pockets than there has been any necessity for in the past.

A mistaken idea seems to prevail in Freethought circles at Glasgow,—namely, that Mr. Foote refuses to visit the city for lecturing purposes again. All he did, when asked to open the new season's program of the Glasgow Branch, was to say that he did not deem it prudent to start platform work after his late severe illness with two lectures on one Sunday, sandwiched between two long railway journeys on Saturday and Monday. He has to leave home at 9.30 a.m. at the latest in order to get to Glasgow at 10.30 p.m. To begin lecturing again with such an effort would have been very unwise. Mr. Foote looks forward to meeting his Glasgow friends again at no very distant date.

The North London Branch of the N. S. S., having brought their successful outdoor season to a close on Sunday, and strengthened their position by the accession of several new members, have arranged a course of indoor lectures during October at the Foresters' Hall, 5 Highgate-road, Kentish Town, N.W. The Hall adjoins the "Bull and Gate," and is almost opposite to the Kentish Town Midland and Tube Railway Station. Mr. Cohen opens with a lecture on "What is Secularism?" Admission is free, and North London "saints" are particularly requested to help in advertising these meetings.

A discussion on religion in recent issues of the Middlesex County Times has been enlivened by a contributor who signs himself "Ah Loo Sing," who has a remarkable knowledge of the weaknesses of Christianity.

Mr. S. H. Swinny, editor of the Positivist Review, who has visited Portugal and investigated the alleged ill-treatment of Royalist prisoners by the Republican Government, will deliver a special lecture on "Portugal and its Prisons" at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, this evening (Oct. 5). Admission free, and questions and discussion allowed after the lecture, which begins at 7.

"God Save the New Age." Thus concludes an editoria announcement in the last week's issue of our earnest and interesting contemporary. We hope, however, it has not come to that yet. The New Age is one of the papers that would be missed. We don't see eye to eye with it in several things, but the paper has brains,—which is precisely the thing most wanted (in both senses of the word) in English journalism. "More brains, O Lord, more brains" was George Meredith's prayer for the English nation generally; though it doesn't seem to have been answered to any appreciable extent up to the present. Yes, the New Age has brains. It also has courage. And these are not the road to fortune in philistine England.

Our gallant contemporary is raising its price from threepence to sixpence. We are afraid that this is not the way to cover the loss of over £1,000 a year which it lately stated it was sustaining.

We beg our readers' help in the following matter. There seems to be a dead set made against the Freethinker at present in certain trade quarters. The tale is going round that we do not accept "returns" at our publishing office, and this deters newsagents from ordering copies that may, as they think—unless they only pretend to think—be left upon their hands unsold. We beg to assure our readers that this is not true and never has been true. This journal has always been sent out "on sale or return." The complaint we are noticing has no foundation whatever. We hope our readers, when they happen to hear it, will inform their newsagents accordingly; and place their orders for other literature where they can get supplied with the Freethinker.

The conclusion of Mr. Foote's article on "Is There a Hell?" stands over till next week. Mr. Foote has just been so tremendously occupied with behind-the-scenes work that he has had very little time for anything else. His pen is represented in this number of the Freethinker but not in a special article.

We are reminded of a passage in Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner's "Life" of her father. "To be a real President of the National Secular Society," she says, "involved the performance of a vast amount of labor, the greater part of which was unrecognised and unseen." And the Secular Society, Ltd., which has come into existence since, by no means lessens the labor.

Huxley's Fight for Truth.—II.

HUXLEY'S forecast was fully realised. The public, clerical and lay, was shocked and scandalised at the audacious supposition that man, proud man, created in the image of God, was, after all, dressed in nothing save a little brief authority. It soon became obvious that the paragon of animals was, through logical necessity, to be included with other evolved things.

> "Carlyle himself, to whom many of the freest and noblest spirits in Europe were beginning to look as to an inspired prophet, could see in it nothing but a 'monkey damnification of mankind.' The dogmatic world saw in it nothing but a deliberate and mischievous assault upon religion. The Church of England in particular was beginning to recover from a long period of almost incredible supineness, and there was arising a large body of clergy full of faith and zeal and good works, but quite unacquainted with science, who frankly regarded Darwin as Antichrist, and Huxley and Tyndall as emissaries of the Devil. Against evolutionists there was left unused no weapon that ignorant prejudice could find, whether that prejudice was inspired by lofty zeal for what it conceived to be the highest interests of humanity, or by a crafty policy which saw in the new doctrine a blow to the coming renewed supremacy of the Church."*

Not only was the evolutionary teaching assailed with unrestrained ridicule, misrepresentation and hatred; the evolutionary teachers had also to defend themselves from the most shameful insinuations concerning their personal character. The sweet-natured Darwin was commonly compared with an ape, an animal he was popularly alleged to closely resemble. But this calm and patient student of nature's wonders philosophically ignored all that the sacerdotalists, and those whom they inspired, chose to say or think about him. He went serenely on in prosecuting those inquiries into natural history which won him the proud title of the Newton of biology. But with Huxley it was different. He was not content to champion the cause of evolution only, he was determined to smite the Philistines hip and thigh. An early opportunity was afforded him for displaying his prowess. Among the comparatively few favorable notices of the Origin was the now famous review which appeared in the Times.

> "The Origin [writes Huxley] was sent to Mr. Lucas, one of the staff of the Times writers at that day, in what I suppose was the ordinary course of business. Mr. Lucas, though an excellent journalist.....was as ignorant of any knowledge of science as a babe, and bewailed himself to an acquaintance on having to deal with such a book, whereupon he was recommended to ask me to get him out of his difficulty, and he applied to me accordingly."

Thus, by a happy accident, Huxley was enabled to place a brilliant essay on Darwin's masterpiece before the educated section of the English reading world. Although Darwin was not in the secret he suspected the identity of the writer of the review. He immediately wrote to Huxley with reference to it, and in the course of his letter he says:—

> "Certainly I should have said that there was only one man in England who could have written this essay, and that you were the man; but I suppose that I am wrong, and that there is some hidden genius of great calibre; for how could you influence Jupiter Olympus and make him give you three and a-half columns to pure science? The old fogies will think the world will come to an end. Well, whoever the man is, he has done great service to the cause."

In 1860, Huxley publicly proclaimed his evolutionary opinions in a brilliant lecture before a highly cultivated audience on "Species, Races, and their Origin."

In April, 1860, he contributed a long and weighty essay on Darwin's work to the pages of the Westminster Review. The same period witnessed the publication of two bitterly hostile articles, one of which appeared in the Edinburgh and the other in the Quarterly Review. The Edinburgh essay came from the pen of Sir Richard Owen, who had hitherto been regarded as a worthy representative of the best traditions of science. He occupied an influential position in society, was unquestionably, at that time, our foremost anatomist, and his views were well known to his intimates as far from orthodox on the problem of species. But, with painful shortsightedness, and mean littlemindedness, he was prepared to sacrifice his reputation with posterity for the sake of ephemeral orthodox smiles. There is also some reason to believe that he was by no means unwilling to gratify his jealousy and dislike of those younger and more progressive scientists who seemed likely to thrust him from his proud position of supremacy. He now changed from his previously favorable attitude towards evolution to one of bitter antagonism. To his time-serving he added deceit, for he remained professedly friendly with the rising evolutionists at the very time that he was preparing his venomous attack in the Edinburgh Review. The style of the anonymous writer, coupled with his wide scientific knowledge, at once made plain his identity, although Owen long endeavored to conceal his connection with it. The nature of the article was such that even the passive Darwin was moved to say, "It is painful to be hated in the intense degree with which Owen hates me."

The Quarterly article was written by Wilberforce, Bishop of Oxford. It proved a splendid combination of ignorance and arrogance. After dwelling upon the circumstance that anything that a man of Darwin's calibre chose to say on a scientific subject was, to say the least of it, entitled to respect, Huxley, when reviewing the matter in 1887, went on to recall the deplorable fact that for years subsequent to the publication of the Origin, misstatement, buffoonery, and denunciation characterised the vast majority of press references to the theory of evolution. And, with reference to the Bishop of Oxford's Quarterly article, Huxley says:—

> "Since Lord Brougham assailed Dr. Young, the world has seen no such specimen of the insolence of a shallow pretender to a Master in Science as this remarkable production, in which one of the most exact of observers, most cautious of reasoners, and most candid of expositors, of this or any other age, is held up to scorn as a 'flighty' person who endeavors to 'prop up his utterly rotten fabric of guess and speculation,' and 'whose mode of dealing with nature' is reprobated as 'utterly dishonorable to natural science.' And all this high and mighty talk, which would have been indecent in one of Mr. Darwin's equals, proceeds from a writer whose want of intelligence, or of conscience, or of both, is so great that, by way of objection to Mr. Darwin's views, he can ask, 'Is it credible that all favorable varieties of turnips are tending to become men?' who is so ignorant of palæontology that he can talk of the 'flowers and fruits' of the plants of the Carboniferous epoch; of comparative anatomy, that he can gravely affirm the poison apparatus of venomous snakes to be 'entirely separate from the ordinary laws of animal life, and peculiar to themselves.'"

So much for the good bishop's effusion. But at the meeting of the British Association held at Oxford in the autumn of the same year, Huxley was destined to meet both Owen and Wilberforce face to face. In the home of lost causes and forsaken beliefs the new evolutionary teaching was assured of a warm reception. The special creationists were quite certain that they would now completely crush their antagonists. In the various sectional meetings, Huxley stood almost single-handed against a host of parsons and professors. But the two chief encounters were between Huxley and Owen on the one hand, and Huxley and Wilberforce on the other. Owen had the audacity to assert that differences of kind, and not merely differences of degree, distinguished the brains of apes from those of men, and this solemn pronouncement was joyously received by the majority of his listeners as a staggering blow to the theory of descent. Without the slightest hesitation, Huxley there and then gave Owen the lie direct, and "pledged his reputation to justify his contradiction with all due detail on a future occasion."

* Professor Chalmers Mitchell, Huxley, pp. 111, 112.

This undertaking, as every student knows, Huxley afterwards carried out. He demonstrated in detail the untruthfulness of Owen's allegations, and no contemporary anatomist would now for one moment support the position which Owen took up. In the words of the late Professor Weldon: "It is difficult to understand how an anatomist of Owen's experience could have made such statements; and his subsequent explanations are equally unintelligible."* In order to enjoy a temporary triumph, this eminent if unreliable man seems to have been prepared to sacrifice the respect of that posterity which was certain, sooner or later, to be placed in possession of the real facts of the case. Moreover, Owen must have had the mortification of knowing that, after Huxley's repudiation of his assertions, his authority as an anatomist had been severely shaken in the opinion of those best qualified to weigh the evidence each disputant had advanced.

This combat electrified the atmosphere, and two days later the Bishop of Oxford delivered an eloquent and impassioned address, in which he denounced evolution in general and Huxley in particular. Apparently carried away by the applause of his audience, to whose religious prejudices and emotions the Bishop made a powerful appeal, he concluded by asking Huxley whether he was descended from an ape on his grandfather's or grandmother's side of the family. This polished episcopal peroration provoked the following withering reply. Said Huxley:—

> "I asserted, and I repeat, that a man has no reason to be ashamed of having an ape for his grandfather. If there were an ancestor whom I should feel shame in recalling, it would be a man, a man of restless and versatile intellect, who, not content with an equivocal success in his own sphere of activity, plunges into scientific questions with which he has no real acquaintance, only to obscure them with an aimless rhetoric, and distract the attention of his hearers from the real point at issue by eloquent digressions, and skilled appeals to religious prejudices."

Only too well did Huxley now realise that if the evolutionists were to unmask falsehood, and bring truth to light, with unequivocal success, they could afford to give the enemy no quarter. He therefore decided upon dedicating his life to the cause, and his writings, addresses, and discoveries proved invaluable in securing the ultimate triumph of the doctrine of descent. And so complete was this conquest that, when, thirty years after the celebrated gathering at Oxford in 1860, the British Association again met in the university city, the then President, Lord Salisbury, Conservative Premier, professed churchman, and bishop appointer, was compelled to admit, when referring to evolution, that Darwin,—

> "has, as a matter of fact, disposed of the doctrine of the immutability of species.....Few now are found to doubt that animals, separated by differences far exceeding those that distinguish what we know as species, have yet descended from common ancestors."

But in the intervening years little transpired that reflected any credit on the sacerdotalists. At an earlier date, when Lyell was battling for the recognition of geological truth, that great man was subjected to the meanest annoyances. And that eminent physician, Sir William Lawrence, was driven to suppress his excellent Lectures on Man through the fury of the orthodox party. So fierce was the animosity aroused by this work that, acting on the theory that it constituted an attempt to undermine revealed truth, Lord Eldon refused an injunction to protect the rights of the author in his own property.

This theological bitterness was rearoused in the 'sixties. But the enemies of enlightenment had to meet a man of tougher fibre in Huxley. Backed by a few upper class intellectuals, scientists, and men of letters, and supported by that body of public opinion which the secular and other advanced movements had brought into being, Huxley had to fear no infringement of his personal liberty. The opposition to evolution now took the form which theological fanaticism always takes when its teeth have been filed. Abuse, detraction, and vilification, Huxley philosophically took for granted.

When we reflect, that even to this hour, many thousands of broad-minded people regard their ancestral association with ape-like creatures as somewhat disconcerting to their dignity, we are bound to ungrudgingly admire the courage with which Huxley proclaimed man's kinship with lower animal forms. At this very period a Scotch university refused a professorship to a distinguished scholar merely because he had expressed views that were favorable to evolution. When so much bigotry stalked abroad, Huxley was evidently swimming against a powerful stream. At any suggestion of relationship between men and apes the respectable and religious were up in arms. And Huxley's "presumptious blasphemies" were not whispered to an elect few. They took the form of a series of lectures to working men, in 1860, on the "Relation of Man to the Lower Animals"; and, two years later, these addresses were expanded into his celebrated work, Man's Place in Nature. The uproar was deafening at the time; but when, in the early 'seventies, Darwin published his Descent of Man, that even more advanced work was received with comparative calmness. It was now obvious that Huxley had fought and won.

In advanced circles, Huxley has been reproached for certain concessions to broken orthodoxy; but it is only the merest justice to remember that his services to Freethought and humanity were very great indeed. All his writings—even his scientific text-books — may still be read and re-read with pleasure and profit. He was a man of varied culture who, had he never become a famous scientist, would almost unquestionably have risen to a high place in the republic of letters. His hatred of humbug, his battles with the bishops, his overthrow of Gladstone, his sincere desire to render the general public familiar with those natural truths which many men in his position would selfishly restrict to a privileged class, all redound to his honor. In the judgment of the writer he was an outstanding modern humanist, and it may be fitly said of Huxley, the brave Freethought warrior, that,—

> "The elements
> So mixed in him, that Nature might stand up,
> And say to all the world, this was a man!"

Man's Euthanasia.

A DREAM OF THE FINAL VICTORY.

THAT weird and awful condition of things, which astronomers and physicists had predicted as the inevitable fate of the solar system, had at length arrived. The days of life on the earth were drawing to an end. The human drama was closing amid slow-moving scenes of cosmic gloom.

The sun had smouldered down to a dull red glow of cheerless and sullen aspect. The tidal drag on the earth's rotation had done its work, and our planet now moved along its orbit in sluggish inertness, turning one face always towards the sun. There was neither dawn of morning light nor fall of evening shadows. Day and night had ceased. Time itself seemed to have come to an end. The sun had for ever disappeared from one hemisphere, and even where seen, it never rose nor set, but in response to the earth's annual motion seemed to swing slowly northward and southward, like a pendulum whose oscillations are about to cease. Now and again, at long intervals, a pale ghost of a moon stole across the twilight sky; while behind the wearily swinging sun, the stars—not the constellations of old, but stars in strange new groupings — pursued their bright processions through the circling year.

And the surface of the earth told the same story of lapsing energies—of approaching doom. The tideless seas were still as death. No tempests swept their waters, no billows broke upon their coasts, but, except where the ice sheets spread, the ocean lay stagnant as a marsh, and about its creeks and bays there luxuriated degenerate forms of fungoid and algal life. Save for plants and animals of man's cultivation, most of the higher flora and fauna had perished. Much invertebrate life, both terrestrial and aquatic, survived. Fish of lower types and aquatic reptiles still occupied the waters; but, except for a few arctic and sub-arctic forms, all mammalian and bird life, under natural conditions, had succumbed. In short, except for the persistence of man himself, and the forms of life under his protection, the classes of living things on the earth were approximately the same as they had been towards the close of the Mesozoic period. Evolution was retracing its steps.

The dark side of the earth, bound in fetters of relentless ice, was, of course, deserted by all forms of life. The central meridian of the sunward hemisphere passed through that region which used to be called Arabia, and by some curious freak of fate the scenes of man's earliest civilisations seemed likely to be also the scenes of his final doom. Those regions named in past ages Egypt, Syria, Mesopotamia, Hindostan, were the only regions peopled by the dying race. Here, man lived in close fellowship and communion, as though in response to that universal instinct whereby gregarious creatures crowd together for companionship and mutual aid when a common danger threatens.

But even thus, the population was not dense. Apart from the adverse conditions brought about by the cosmic and climatic changes, human fertility had declined, as that of all old and worn-out stocks must eventually decline. All over the yet extensive area in which human civilisation was still possible, scarce fifty million human beings were dwelling. But these were the heirs of all the ages—these were the elect of human kind—and amid all the gloom of nature there shone the clear and steady ray of man's indomitable spirit.

A group of these men of the latter days walked slowly across the sands of a gloomy desert absorbed in converse of high and solemn import, while a distant illumination of the sky seemed to indicate the position of some great city resplendent with light. As a pause fell over the discourse, they gazed at the dull red glow of the motionless sun, and then one spoke thus in a tone of quiet irony:—

"So this, then, is our end. This is the goal of man's career—the final purpose of all his efforts—the reward of all his labor. A century or two of deepening gloom may yet be his portion, and then the end. The end of all his intellectual splendor, of all his moral greatness, of all his physical energy. The achievements of science, the glories of art, the triumphs of mechanical power—all knowledge, all skill, all human endeavor shall sink to nothingness; and this dark orb will continue revolving for yet unnumbered ages through the black voids of space, the grave of man's vain and foolish hopes, the ghastly sepulchre of his bones."

Another pause ensued, during which the group, turning their eyes from the speaker, again quietly regarded the red orb of the sun hanging low down in the southern sky. Presently, a grave, firm voice took up the discourse:—

"This idea of a purpose in nature which still survives with a few of us is closely connected with the old god-idea which used to puzzle and vex the ancients, and which has long since been exploded. The teleological idea should, therefore, be no longer tenable by us—it should not even linger as the last shred of human superstition. Nor would it do so if all of us realised—what is surely indisputable—that the idea of a purpose, a design, a pre-appointed end, is merely a subjective notion having no reality apart from man himself. The ultimate substance of existence, functioning through its inherent energy—which process we call causality—involves an absolute and eternal necessity which leaves no room for design—indeed, it is the very negation of the idea of design. If nature must take a certain course, what becomes of its "purpose"? And if there be no purpose or end outside of consciousness, it surely follows that consciousness must be an end to itself. The purpose of life is that very life itself in its varying degrees. A noble life achieves a noble purpose. A base life achieves but a base purpose. Man's physical end, therefore, which we all realise to be not far distant, has no connection whatever with an ethical purpose, for this will have been achieved to the full in man's own ethical progress and the high goal to which he has attained. The ethical end—happiness pursued along the path of virtue—is ours already. We have fought and conquered, we have striven and achieved, we have labored and loved. This, the only ethical purpose conceivable, we have attained, and be the physical end what it may, we can await it with calmness and fortitude. We read that one of the earliest philosophies which suggested themselves to the intellect of man was that called Stoicism. This sublime doctrine will also illuminate his end."

"And though the physical end of any particular ethical process has no moral significance," pursued another speaker, "that is to say, though any stage which moral advance may have attained when the physical end overtakes it affords an equally logical justification for such advance—yet the recent researches of our scientists in the field of astro-physics lead us to believe that, in the vast majority of cases, organic and super-organic evolution run a complete course in each stellar system. Organic evolution, from the first inception of life to the highest form of intelligence possible in any case, forms but a passing incident in the vastly longer process of physical evolution, from the first inception of ponderable matter to its final return to the ether. Thus the ethical process, wherever it happens to be going on, must be regarded as but a passing incident of the cosmic process; and if physical evolution in any part of the universe may be likened to a wave on the ocean of existence, organic evolution may be likened to a momentary ripple on the surface of that wave. So the cosmic process would generally afford sufficient opportunity for the complete development of the ethical process. There would, no doubt, be exceptions, but owing to the inconceivable vastness of the spaces through which any particular process of material condensation must take place, every sidereal system would probably be isolated in a region of practically infinite extent, and thus the chance of any sudden catastrophic termination to the evolutionary progress of the system would be infinitesimally small."

During the pause of contemplation which followed, a brilliant meteor flashed out in the northern sky, lighting up the desert for a few seconds with a clear white radiance, and revealing a weird scene of far-spread desolation. Then another spoke.

"Nor does the gloom of our physical surroundings much affect us who are so familiar with its cause and progress; and even were we less used to these conditions, the time has long passed when natural phenomena could influence man's feelings and ideas. Indeed, it might be argued without extravagance that the physical conditions under which we live may, during their gradual development, have been of some intellectual advantage to the race. Our ancient records tell us of a time when the sun shone with a brilliance which the eye could not bear, and seemed to move across the sky with undying energy; when the moon shed a clear and silvery light; when the skies were blue; when green fields and woods decked the earth; and when fresh breezes flecked the ocean's surface with the foam of dancing waves. Perhaps it is not surprising that, under such conditions and during ages of intellectual darkness, the superstition about a beneficent ruler should have arisen and been maintained—indeed, we are told of cases where the sun and moon were actually worshiped—and such superstitions could not have failed seriously to retard man's intellectual and moral progress. The aspects of nature under which we live afford no opportunity for such delusions, and may have played an important part in their destruction."

"This much is certain," said another voice with quiet decision, "we shall die as free beings—as masters of ourselves — not as the creatures and puppets of an irresponsible and capricious deity. Our destiny will be neither that of criminals nor of slaves — neither to suffer eternal and unmerited torments, nor to pour forth ceaseless adulations before a despot's throne. We shall pass, as all nature's manifestations pass, back to the eternal existence whence we arose; that existence which is neither kind nor cruel, neither just nor unjust, neither creator nor created; which contains within itself all the potentialities of being, and which is at once the origin and end of all things."

Thus the wonderful discourse went on, scaling the heights and sounding the depths of human speculation with the majestic calmness and detachment of brave men doomed to death. With such a spirit animating him, man's final victory was assured.

ATHEISM AND ART.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—May I, as one of your least occasional contributors, congratulate Mr. H. George Farmer on his excellent article, "Salvator Rosa: Artist and Rebel." It is my humble opinion that there is an inclination of the trustees (who are often people of real influence in the religious world) to give the public just as much of genuine art as they think, and as little of any with the sublime Pagan touch as possible. For proof of this I would ask anyone to take a walk through our National Art Gallery. It is true that we have specimens of the richness of Rubens, and also examples of the beauties of Murillo and Titian; but the general conception of the whole exhibition makes one murmur of the artists, when leaving, "How truly Christian they all must have been!" Allowing for Turner and Hogarth and a few more, a tour of inspection makes one feel pleased to be alive in the twentieth century, even in spite of the Blasphemy Laws. To have lived in the time of those half-demented people, who painted the ghastly pictures of the fourteenth and fifteenth century, must have been an ordeal; yet we find writers in our daily press, especially at Christmas, going into journalistic adoration over crudities which could only have been painted in Bedlam. Is it not another example of nothing being too mean for the use of a religion which, when all other methods failed, could be safely used to terrify people into a state of religious devotion? The persecution and ostracism of Salvator Rosa can easily be understood; the majority of historians would have us believe that Atheists in Art were unknown. The principle is nicely applied, when we come to think of it; unless a painter believed in the Trinity, say, he was incapable of anything truly artistic. Once again thanking Mr. H. George Farmer and the Freethinker for an intellectual treat gathered from ground which I think, as a Freethinker, is rather neglected.

WILLIAM REPTON.

P.S.—As a matter of interest, I might say that in the National Portrait Gallery there is a portrait of Thomas Paine, but short-sighted people should make a rule of asking to see it.—W. R.

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON SEPT. 25.

The President, Mr. G. W. Foote, occupied the chair. There were also present:—Messrs. Baker, Barry, Bowman, Cohen, Cowell, Cunningham, Davey, Davidson, Leat, Moss, Nichols, Quinton, Roger, Rosetti, Samuels, Thurlow, Wood, and the Misses Kough and Stanley.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed.

The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were admitted for Leeds and Preston Branches and the Parent Society.

Mr. Thurlow reported on behalf of the Sub-Committee elected to consider and report upon certain literature circulated at Freethought meetings.

The Secretary reported upon the outdoor work at various stations, and further arrangements were made in regard to Edmonton.

Various minor details were discussed, and the meeting then closed.

E. M. VANCE, Secretary.

IS CHRISTIANITY PLAYED OUT?

"Hence, doubting spirit, cease thy troubled quest;
Believe, have faith, and God will do the rest."
So speaks the wise apologist for that
Which seems to be at present falling flat.
"Our Christ," the parson cries, "our Christ played out?
Away! 'tis hideous sin to raise a doubt.
If you suggest that such a thing is true,
In everlasting fires you're sure to stew.
We know the Church does not, and cannot, cope
With human ills; the parsons, clergy, Pope,
On earthly misery have naught to say,
But tune their harps to heaven's immortal lay.
'The earth's the Lord's,' the Bible tells us so;
He's thus responsible for earthly woe.
'Tis naught to us what ails the human scum,
If good subscriptions to our coffers come.
Our occupation 'tis to advertise,
And wealth amass as pilots to the skies.
With squabbles oft we draw the public eye,
And thus to 'draw' the public pocket try.
From suffering men our path is very wide;
We pass their troubles 'on the other side.'
The only matter that we care about
Is 'What's the richest crowd?'—with them we'll shout.
Distress in everything around we see;
Oh, Lord, may no distress abide in me!
Such is our pleasant, though p'rhaps selfish, song;
With happy hearts through life we jog along.
We preach the gospel, and to faith exhort;
And, though 'tis true salvation can't be bought,
Still all our worshipers we oft assure
The more they give, the Lord will bless the more."
Religion pays too well to be played out;
Whilst fools exist, so will the pious tout. G. R.

HOPES AND HAPPINESS.

To destroy a groundless hope is not to destroy a man's happiness. The instantaneous effort may be painful; but it is the price which we have to pay for a cure of deep-seated complaints. The infidel's reply is substantially this: "I may destroy your hopes; but I do not destroy your power of hoping. I bid you no longer fix your mind on a chimera, but on tangible and realisable prospects. I warn you that efforts to soar above the atmosphere can only lead to disappointment, and that time spent in squaring the circle is simply time spent. Apply your strength and your intellect on matters which lie at hand, and on problems which admit of solution. The happiest man is not the man who has the grandest dreams, but the man whose aspirations are best fitted to guide his talents; the most efficient worker is not the one who mistakes his own fancies for an external support, but he who has most accurately gauged the conditions under which he is laboring."—Leslie Stephen, "Essays on Freethinking and Plain Speaking," p. 356.

THE BIBLE AND TRUTH.

We have proof in the Bible that, apart from the lying which constituted false witness and was to the injury of a neighbor, there was among the Hebrews but little reprobation of lying. Indeed, it would be remarkable were it otherwise, considering that Jahveh set the example; as when, to ruin Ahab, he commissioned "a lying spirit" (1 Kings xxii. 22) to deceive his prophets; or as when, according to Ezekiel xiv. 9, he threatened to use deception as a means of vengeance. "If the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I, the Lord, have deceived that prophet, and I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him from the midst of my people Israel." Evidently from a race-character, which evolved such a conception of a deity's principles, there naturally came no great regard for veracity.—Herbert Spencer, "Principles of Ethics," sec. 158, vol. i., p. 402.

POPE'S EPITAPH ON GAY.

Of manners gentle, of affections mild;
In wit a man; simplicity, a child:
With native humor tempering virtuous rage,
Form'd to delight at once and lash the age:
Above temptation in a low estate,
And uncorrupted, e'en among the great:
A safe companion, and an easy friend,
Unblamed through life, lamented in thy end.
These are thy honors! Not that here thy bust
Is mix'd with heroes, or with kings thy dust;
But that the worthy and the good shall say,
Striking their pensive bosoms—"Here lies Gay!"

Are all your Mosques, Episcopal Churches, Pagodas, Chapels of Ease, Tabernacles, and Pantheons, anything else but the Ethnic forecourt of the Invisible Temple and its Holy of Holies.—Richter.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 41 SUNDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Sir, the State in choosing men to serve it, takes no notice of their opinions; if they be willing to serve it, that satisfies.—OLIVER CROMWELL.

A Vain Delusion.

EVERYBODY is acquainted with the fact that for the last ten years it has been the boast of the pulpit that the attitude of science to religion has become one of positive commendation. It is undeniable that a change has taken place in the relation between the two, but it is equally incontrovertible that the change has not been on the side of science. As we have repeatedly affirmed in these columns, science is farther away from religion to-day than it was in the 'sixties and 'seventies of last century. We might almost go to the length of saying that the attitude to religion of present-day scientists is one of utter unconcern. Into their various observations and experiments religion does not enter at all. Is it possible, for example, that any honest clergyman can rise from a careful perusal of The Mechanistic Conception of Life by Jacques Loeb, one of the most distinguished biologists of the day, and declare that science lends a helping hand to religion? Or is there a theologian of any note who, after reading A Treatise on Zoology, or The Kingdom of Man by Sir Edwin Ray Lankester, has the temerity to assert that scientific discoveries tend to confirm the dogmas of theology? The truth is that science is so far from supporting religion that it completely ignores it. Its observations and experiments are conducted on the assumption that natural law is everywhere supreme, and that there is "no room in the Universe for the working of a Divine power." This is the assumption that underlies the work of practically every biologist of to-day. The editor of the Church Times is radically mistaken when he tells us that "Darwinism, in its strict sense, has gone by the board," and we confidently challenge him to name five accredited biologists who hold such a view, the incontestable fact being that Darwinism is the foundation upon which all biologists build. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the science of the present is more materialistic than was the science of the mid-Victorian era.

Let us take Huxley, to whom the divines are so fond of alluding as an outstanding exponent of a materialistic interpretation of the Universe which is no longer scientifically tenable. We are proud to be numbered among the warmest admirers of Professor Huxley, but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that he was but a lukewarm supporter of Freethought. When appealed to for help in the well-known case of the Editor of this journal his reply was as follows:—

> "I have not read the writings for which Mr. Foote has been prosecuted. But, unless their nature has been grossly misrepresented, I cannot say that I feel disposed to intervene on his behalf."

That utterance was wholly unworthy of Professor Huxley, and shows conclusively that he was not at heart a thoroughgoing Freethinker like George Meredith. As a matter of fact, he was a vigorous opponent of Materialism. He did not believe, as Darwin himself did, that Darwin's theories, rightly understood, "abolished teleology and eviscerated the argument from design." It is a curious fact that, whilst he did more than anybody else to persuade the public that Darwinism was "an intelligible hypothesis good enough as a working basis," he was never himself a whole-hearted believer in it. As the late Sir W. T. Thiselton Dyer says of him, in his biographical sketch in the Encyclopædia Britannica:—

> "With the transparent candor which was characteristic of him, he never to the end of his life concealed the fact that he thought it wanting in rigorous proof."

Indeed, so far was he from being a Materialist that he solemnly pronounced Atheism to be "on purely philosophical grounds untenable." While accepting the theory of the spontaneous generation of life, he did not dogmatise on the subject. He wrote:—

> "To say, in the admitted absence of evidence, that I have any belief as to the mode in which the existing forms of life have originated, would be using words in a wrong sense. But expectation is permissible where belief is not; and if it were given me to look beyond the abyss of geologically recorded time to the still more remote period when the earth was passing through physical and chemical conditions which it can no more see again than a man can recall his infancy, I should expect to be a witness of the evolution of living protoplasm from non-living matter. I should expect to see it appear under forms of great simplicity, endowed, like existing fungi, with the power of determining the formation of new protoplasm from such matters as ammonium carbonates, oxalates and tartrates, alkaline and earthy phosphates, and water, without the aid of light. That is the expectation to which analogical reasoning leads me, but I beg you once more to recollect that I have no right to call my opinion anything but an act of philosophical faith."

If we compare that extract with Professor Schafer's Address from the chair of the British Association last year, it will be evident that the present age is much more materialistic than that of Huxley, and in the discussion that followed the Address the advocates of the mechanistic interpretation of the Universe were all-victorious.

With the above facts in mind, we respectfully invite the editor of the Church Times to specify "the crudely materialistic dogmas formerly presented as the final result of science which are utterly discredited to-day." We shall be surprised if he succeeds in naming even one on the testimony of half-a-dozen first-class scientists. Of course, a man who is ignorant or unscrupulous enough to say that "Darwinism, in its strict sense, has gone by the board," is capable of making any extravagant statement; but we shall insist on his adducing ample evidence of the truth of his assertion as to the abandonment of a single scientific dogma held by the majority of scientists thirty or forty years ago. His reliance on Sir Oliver Lodge is ridiculous in the extreme, because outside his own department Sir Oliver is the most unreliable witness living. In his recent Address he said that "in physiology the conflict ranges round vitalism"; but at Dundee last year, Dr. Benjamin Moore, Professor of Bio-Chemistry in the University of Liverpool, exclaimed, "Vitalism is dead." Ten years ago Sir Edwin Ray Lankester made precisely the same announcement. Writing to the Times for May 17, 1903, he said:—

> "I do not myself know of anyone of admitted leadership among modern biologists who is showing signs of 'coming to a belief in the existence of a vital principle.'

Digitized by Google

> .....Modern biologists (I am glad to say) do not accept the hypothesis of 'telepathy' advocated by Sir Oliver Lodge, nor that of the intrusions of disembodied spirits pressed upon them by others of the same school."

Science, we are told, has completely failed to interpret the Universe on mechanistic lines. At present it is in a state of hopeless bankruptcy. Intellectualism has come to the end of its tether, and confesses itself defeated. Forty years ago the scientists fancied that they had found a key that would unlock all doors, and that the inevitable result would be the banishment of all mystery. The riddle of the Universe was about to be read for all time. Such, we are assured, was the fond dream of the mid-Victorian men of science. The only one among them whom the Materialists can claim was Tyndall, who, in reality, was the humblest and most unassuming of men. So far was he from pretending that science could answer all questions and solve all mysteries that we find him continually confessing and deploring his ignorance. At the close of his interesting address on "Scientific Materialism" he gives the following good advice: "Let us bow our heads and acknowledge our ignorance, priest and philosopher, one and all." What the scientists set out to do was to study Nature by means of observation and experiment, to discover what the facts of existence really were, to put them in order in the evolution of the Cosmos, and to understand our own relation to the whole of being. Is it true that now at last they confess themselves disappointed and defeated? On the contrary, they know that they have succeeded beyond their most sanguine expectations, and that their prospects are indescribably bright and encouraging. They have already made marvellous discoveries, all of which confirm them in the belief that the day is coming when the vast and orderly mechanism of Nature shall be an open book, clearly read and deeply enjoyed by all mankind. Even now, the working of that mechanism is sufficiently understood to enable us "to a large extent to perceive, foresee, and manipulate it so as to bring about certain results and avoid others."

Science is not bankrupt, has not failed, but is still pursuing with greater confidence than ever the objects it had in view forty years ago; nor is it one whit more friendly towards religion than it was then. Years ago the omniscient Daily Mail told the English-speaking world that science was completely discredited, and it has repeated the false assertion now; but the Daily Mail is wrong. Science has never attempted to demonstrate the existence of the soul, or the reality of the life to come. God, the soul, and immortality are outside its range altogether, to attempt the demonstration of which would be the height of folly. The dogmatic religion, to which the Daily Mail recommends its readers to look for safe guidance, is being gradually undermined by the very science for which it has so violent a contempt. The situation is comical in the extreme, and so impossible. The falling Church at once claims science as an ally and condemns it as an exploded fallacy. Our comfort lies in the fact that side by side with that of a sinking religion we have a rapidly rising science. Knowledge has arrived, and faith is under notice to quit.

J. T. LLOYD.

Brotherhood and Bunkum.

ONE does not need to be a centenarian to recall numerous movements that were, in the minds of their conductors, going to revolutionise religion, restore Christianity to its primitive purity, and conduct the world by a short cut to the millennium. At one time, it is the Christian Endeavor movement; at another, the Pleasant Sunday Afternoon epidemic, or some special interpretation of Christianity that despairing Churches clutch at like a drowning man at a straw. All these movements come and go, and they all pass through much the same phases. There is a rapid recruiting from various churches and chapels, there are conferences and congresses, reports of the splendid progress made, and then—a gradual decay and practical disappearance. If they survive, they continue as part of the ordinary church or chapel machinery, and Christian preachers are left faced with the problem of dealing with a world that is steadily drifting away from all religious belief.

For some time past the boom has been connected with the Brotherhood movement. Its new president, the Rev. Silvester Horne, declares that it is not only going to revolutionise life, it is also going to reestablish Christianity—the latter is, indeed, the prelude to the former. For Mr. Horne is not one of those who believe "you can reform society by the simple process of leaving God out." Which is quite natural—in a parson. A society that had no place for God would not be reformed. It would be lacking—parsons. Moreover, the Brotherhood movement is democratic in principle; it has grasped the true principles of Christianity; it is "a return to what is primitive and fundamental"; it is "out to give to Christianity a more human interpretation and a more human application"; and Mr. Horne has "no fear that the working people of this country are going to surrender their Christian inheritance."

Now, all this is really intensely funny, although Mr. Horne is not a humorist—not intentionally, that is. But the finest strokes of humor are produced unconsciously, and Mr. Horne makes a bull's-eye. Consider all that it implies. Over nineteen centuries ago Jesus Christ of the New Testament came into the world with a definite mission before him. He founded a pure religion, one that brought health, hope, and deliverance to a dying world. The power of Christianity was such that it completely conquered the old Pagan civilisation, and it has been the source of inspiration for all that was good in life ever since. Centuries roll by, and then two remarkable discoveries are made. The first, is that Christianity is losing ground. It could conquer a civilisation already existing, but it cannot hold its own in a civilisation which, so they say, was founded by itself. The second discovery is that, except for a semi-mythical period known as primitive Christian times, the world has been on quite a wrong tack. All the great Christian writers—one might even include the New Testament itself—all the Churches, past and present, have made a colossal blunder. They have all assumed that the main purpose of Christianity was to secure man's salvation in the next world. But they were all wrong. Its great and central gospel was salvation in this world, to be secured by the principle of Brotherhood. Christianity must have a human—that is, a secular, application. Jesus Christ came and lived and died, not as generations of Christians have believed, for the salvation of man's soul, but to secure better wages, better houses, and a better social structure.

Now, if Mr. Horne's position and statements do not imply this, they are either meaningless or a sheer piece of bluff. When the Freethinker points to the reign of Christianity as one of the most colossal disasters that ever overtook a civilised people, men like Mr. Horne object, and proceed to indicate the immense benefits flowing from the Christian Churches. But on his own showing, all these Churches were built on error, taught error, and pointed human energies in the wrong direction. And no indictment that was ever framed by the most uncompromising Freethinker could be more sweeping than this. He says that for at least fifteen hundred years the Christian Churches have been leading men astray. They either did not know what genuine Christianity was, or they deliberately taught a false creed. In either case their influence has been bad. Whichever way you have it, Mr. Horne is endorsing the Freethought attack. It is Christianity that has been the great enemy to civilisation, and it must be swept on one side before genuine progress can be made.

Mr. Horne says that what the Brotherhood movement wants is "clean, healthy human homes, and honest industry, and high civic responsibility." To announce this as a wonderful discovery in the Christian Church, and to indicate that there is great difficulty in convincing Christians of the desirability of these things, is, again, an emphatic condemnation of historic Christianity. In any case, Mr. Horne is late. Thomas Paine preached this gospel over a century ago. Freethinkers have been preaching it ever since; and Mr. Horne is only preaching it now because Freethought is making it impossible for the Churches to preach any other gospel with success. For Mr. Horne, like other parsons, stuck to the old gospel so long as it would stick to him. How much of this "social gospel" should we have heard if churches and chapels had continued to be filled with people who were willing to listen to the gospel of "other-worldism"? But churches must be filled somehow, preachers must secure audiences, and the discovery of a social gospel is no more than the last resource of a clergy who despair of retaining a hold on the people by any other means. The game is not a new one, in principle. Over and over again the Catholic Church has had a timely revelation that helped it to surmount a difficult situation. Mr. Horne is not a Catholic, and it would be hardly safe to claim a revelation. But he can fall back upon a rediscovery of primitive and fundamental Christianity. Where humbug is so common, a little more or less makes no great difference.

In what way does the Brotherhood movement indicate a revival of Christianity? It does not comprise the bulk of the working classes. It does not comprise those who were non-Christians before the movement began. They are not converted. The Brotherhood crowd is gathered just as other religious crowds are gathered—by vigorous recruiting among other churches and chapels, with a sprinkling of those who, led by sentiment more than reason, are attracted by the discussion of secular and social topics. Of course, the mass of people are more ready to listen to lectures on these subjects than to sermons on theology. But that does not prove the strength of religion; it only exhibits its weakness. The Brotherhood movement is there simply because it keeps religion in the background, or confines it to some innocuous and vague formula about the Fatherhood of God. Let religion take the first place, and a large part of the attendance would drop off. As it is, the Christian Commonwealth, which has had little but praise for the movement, says that the representatives at the Birmingham Conference "had to face the fact that the Brotherhood movement is showing signs of arrested development," and that individual societies are "preoccupied with the problem of declining membership." Naturally; there is only a certain number from which these bogus social movements can draw. So soon as the limit is reached, the reaction begins. Then a new movement has to be initiated, only to share the same fate. Luckily for the Churches, the crop of fools is constant. But outside the Churches and the mass of people available for religious exploitation, the number of people definitely severed from both Church and Chapel steadily increases.

I do not believe that any clear-sighted social reformer expects any great good to result from these religious movements. He may keep on speaking terms with them, he may use them as so many pawns in the game he is playing, but that is about all. He knows that the real aim of these preachers is not social improvement, but an increase in the strength of religious organisations. Their object is a successful Church, not a reorganised society. To that end all things are legitimate—brass bands, theatrical displays, sensational revivalism, or a semi-hysterical interest in social problems. Every European reformer knows—and the bulk of the leading ones say—that Christianity, as such, has no real interest in social progress. In every country in the world the churches and chapels act as the guards of vested interest. Even in England and America, where the growth of public opinion has forced some of the clergy to adopt different tactics, we are apt to forget that these represent only a miserable minority. The majority of Christians are still following the old ruts and playing the old game.

There is no doubt whatever that conservative interests view these religious developments with anything but dread. Of course, they would rather not have them. They would prefer that the old preaching of humility, and suffering, and patience, and submission should continue. But if it cannot continue, if something must be done to please people and to satisfy the desire for social reform, it is far better that what is done should be under the auspices of religion. If it does nothing better, it will guarantee the minimum of change. How else is one to account for the way in which large employers of labor, great landowners, etc., patronise these religious developments? They know that exactly what Mr. Horne accuses, by implication, other churches of doing, he is doing himself. He is heading forces that might be dangerous into a comparatively innocuous channel—a place where social aspiration evaporates in religious sentiment.

The position is really simple. The demand for social justice is either well-based or it is not. If it is sound, theology cannot endow it with extra strength. Justice to man for the sake of man, is a plain principle, and one that appeals to all. Justice to man for the sake of God, is an appeal that has never yet secured decency and fair play, and never will. Those who are trying to-day to weld together the demand for social justice and theology, are not primarily interested in reform. Their dominant interest lies elsewhere, and they will sell the social cause whenever the two interests conflict. All history proves the truth of this; and although present day tactics may delude some—may even delude preachers themselves—others will not fail to see behind the mask of the social reformer the face of the religious evangelist. And behind him they will catch a glimpse of those sinister vested interests that form the life-blood of the Churches, and for which they will continue to fight so long as they stand to gain by the advocacy.

C. COHEN.

Cancer and Roses.

OUTSIDE there was a blue-black sky, glittering with starlight; inside there was an imagined heavenly canopy glowing with God's love. Outside roses and honeysuckle slept on the walls of the house, but not so soundly as to forget to breathe their perfumes into the air; inside the atmosphere was heavy with the taint of sickness, a death sickness that was made, to me, all the more tragical by the dreams of the sufferers.

They thought God was with them in the little room. His love, they imagined, was easing the pains of the one and soothing the grief of the other. They saw the Paradise they had been taught to long for; and now that it was time for one of the sisters to go, all the beauty of God's love, and all the strength and comfort of his everlasting arms, had been required to soften the blow.

The one who would remain was praying by the bedside of her sister. She was picturing the delights of heaven; and in her intensity it seemed to both that their spirits had already forsaken the clay, and were soaring together through the ineffable bliss.

Outside, in the old garden, the white roses seemed to gleam, with a strange fascinating beauty, in the darkness. It was as if their white petals reflected the star-rays, illuming the air with a soft mysterious light, weirdly beautiful. You could nearly feel the gleam. It seemed to seek you; it seemed to go stealing through your body like the warm glow of some old and dim memory suddenly revitalised. A curtain of quietness closed about your mind, shutting out everything but the loveliness before your eyes. There was something uncanny about it; for the gleam seemed to be purifying you in its own beauty. You felt conscious of the process.

I suppose this feeling is more or less similar to the religious awe we read of and never see in operation. There is a considerable difference, of course, even granting the effects are somewhat alike. The roses were facts; the gods the sisters were worshiping were ideas. So were the glow of God's love and his loving-kindness; but the gleam that seemed to come from the roses was caused by the keen contrast between the white petals and the darkness, giving the sharp atmosphere the appearance of luminosity. You forgot those things when the spell enwrapped your mind; and if you had continued to overlook them when the beauty evanished, and had you sought some cause outside nature, you would very probably have blocked the truth by the obstacle named God.

While the night air had been purifying my body and mind, the sisters were bathing their minds in the fancy-lit mists of the supernatural. Thanking God for the many joys he had given them, and would give them, they forgot for a brief moment the cancer that had robbed one of them of her beauty, and was now robbing her of her life. Praising the great giver of all things for his wonderful loving-kindness, they forgot, for a little moment, the physical pain one had suffered, and the mental anguish the other had endured. Anticipating the happiness of each other's company in the heaven of their dreams, they had forgotten all about that other sister, whose nature, made by the God they worshiped, had led her "astray," and whom they had banished because of her iniquity.

A few minutes under the influence of a mental anæsthetic is poor balancing for years of misery; the selfish happiness of it bitter when it freezes human sympathy.

The religious emotionalism of the sisters would not last long, I knew; for there is little room in the mind for religion when acute pain racks the body. Human needs and human attention come before religion in point of experience. Religious bigotry may harden the heart against the weakness of those nearest to us; but when it comes right down to personal requirements, the same religious bigotry evacuates its position: human needs force it out. What suffering Christians refuse to others is gratefully taken by themselves; their religion gets the slip in the interests of their bodies.

When everything has been said for the strength of religion, the depths of its roots, and the heights of its topmost leaves, and all that, and however true these things may be, it is still wonderful how easily and how quickly religion does the disappearing trick, particularly when its presence is most important to the individual. The supposed good attributes of religion might have remained beside the sisters during their suffering just as easily as the bad attributes remained when they sent the other girl about her lonely business. Religion is a funny thing! The good of it seems to slide away in a moment or two, while the bad lasts for ever, approximately. It is full of irrationalities; and naturally enough, being but an agglomeration of them, when you come to analyse it.

My thoughts were becoming slightly tinged with sarcasm, when a shriek of pain cut the silence like a lightning flash. Hastily I went indoors, reaching the bedside in time to see the last twitchings of the lips of a lamb of God, killed by a loathesome disease.

We Atheists are supposed to be spiritually blind; but what kind of a blindness is it that transforms a terrible yell of agony into a jubilant shout of praise? My companion told me, some time later, that her sister had gone home on the wings of a prayer, that her entrance into Paradise had been heralded by her shout of joy.

I went out from the death-room, with that idea in my mind. Into the darkness I went; and the stars were still gloriously brilliant in the sky, and the air was still sharp and fragrant, and the weird gleam still shone from the white roses in the old garden. Sitting down on a chair, I let the loveliness of my surroundings quieten the mingled sorrow and wrath that I felt. And then I put the old questions to my pipe again, the questions that make me seem callous in the estimation of my Christian friends, the simple questions that make God ludicrous when not completely impossible, the questions that undermine the foundations of religion, the questions that blow it up.

And inside there was a sister, who had refused to be comforted, whose idea had given rise to my invisible wrath, and whose beliefs, despite their roots and heights, were so badly made that they were valueless; for she was weeping her eyes out upon the covered bosom of her dead sister.

Robert Moreland.

Is There a Hell?—III.

We left off, at the end of our last article, with some remarks on the anonymous editor's statement about Atheists teaching that "we die like dogs." We put in a good word for the dog as being more faithful than the majority of human beings. We will only add, on this point, in the first place that this pious gentleman should read Byron's epitaph on his dog "Boatswain," and, in the second place, that reading the Bible is pretty sure to induce a false notion of man's canine friend. "Holy Writ," especially in the Old Testament, uses the word "dog" to indicate a practiser of unnatural vice. Which, by the way, is a piece of very vulgar insolence; for it is impossible to estimate man's indebtedness to the dog in the course of his evolution, and man's virtues, far more surely than his vices, are to be found amongst the lower animals.

After all men do die like dogs. Shakespeare calls man "the paragon of animals" and all animals die alike, just as they are all born alike—at least as regards the various mammalian species. "Yea, they have all one breath," as the wisest book in the Bible says. And there is nothing but man's vanity to support the idea that his "soul" is less perishable than theirs. "Dust thou art and unto dust thou shalt return" is said of man in the Bible itself; and the "breath of life" infused into man in Genesis is precisely the same "breath of life" that was infused into the rest of the animal creation.

"In our heart of hearts," this writer says, "we do not believe the Atheists, and we do not even believe that the Atheists believe themselves." This is a fair sample of Christian manners in controversy. In ordinary disputes such an attitude commonly provokes a "you're another" reply. But it is hardly worth while descending to that level of discussion. Atheists may very well leave the Christians in full possession of that kind of argumentation.

We pass on to another part of the Introduction to Is There a Hell? There is truth, and more of something else, in the following passage:—

> "Of recent years there has been more talk in the pulpit of heaven than of hell, and not a few people have endeavored to persuade themselves that there is no hell. This is a very natural reaction from the terrifying notions of a material hell which were inflicted for many generations upon our forefathers ..... The Dantesque picture of this hell as a penal place of flames, and smoke, and physical torture, appalled the people of yesterday and sent children to bed in agonies of terror. But that was an absurd picture. One can burn one's hand in a furnace, but one cannot burn one's soul there. Only a spiritual fire can be felt by a spirit."

It is perfectly true that civilised people have revolted against the descriptions of hell that terrified little children, and were meant to terrify them. But it is no less true that those descriptions were based upon the plain language of the Bible. Such expressions as "everlasting fire," "the lake that burneth with brimstone and fire," and "the smoke of their torment ascendeth for ever and ever," are not to be explained away as merely symbolical without bringing the Bible into contempt. To call the orthodox picture of hell "Dantesque" is simply an evasion. Dante's conceptions of hell were first of all derived from the Christian Scriptures. Huxley practised a similar evasion, but for a very different object,—namely, to disarm prejudice and obtain a peaceful hearing. In his American lectures on Evolution he criticised the "Miltonic" theory of creation severely; but all the time he meant the "Mosaic" theory—that is, the Biblical theory. When the discussion opened between Huxley and Gladstone the "Miltonic" had soon to be dropped for the "Mosaic." For the old parliamentary hand wanted his adversary to suffer as much odium as possible; and in this particular instance he was not entirely without justification.

It may be observed, also, that the "absurd picture" was not so absurd in view of the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, which this writer completely overlooks, although it is still taught by the Catholic and Anglican Churches, and is included in the Syllabus of Religious Instruction in elementary schools, of which Dr. Clifford, one of the leading Free Church divines, is so amazingly proud. We have already quoted Spurgeon's eloquence on this very point. When the risen body had joined the immortal soul they were to be tortured together for ever; and the fire in which the body was to be burnt without being consumed was "exactly like that which we have on earth." That was a wicked hell, but it was an honest hell. And if Spurgeon believed in it, as he probably or possibly did, he was right in warning people against it.

The various writers of this volume do not give up hell altogether. There is a certain terrible vigor in the word, which is utterly lost in the "Hades" of the Revised Version. Hell is cooled down, but not abandoned. It is still serviceable. Listen to the anonymous editor again:—

> "Hell may not be a place; it may be a state. Heaven may not be a place; it may be a state. But if heaven is the reward of the righteous, there must be a negative of non-reward, if not an antithesis of direct punishment, and the negative or antithesis of heaven must be hell."

There must be a hell! Of course there must. The clergy will not discard it while it is of the least worth to them. When it is nothing but a sheer loss, they will get rid of it altogether, without the slightest compunction.

For the present hell is indispensable. All the contributors to this volume—Catholic priest, Anglican clergyman, Nonconformist minister, and Jewish rabbi—are agreed upon this one point. Listen to the editor again:—

> "In the succeeding pages of this book a number of well-known religious authorities give their own views upon the subject—views which in many particulars are dissimilar from one another. But it will be found that every one of these authorities gives an unqualified 'Yes' to the vital question—'Is There a Hell?'"

These "authorities," as the editor calls them, are no authorities at all. They dismiss as false what their predecessors taught as truth. What they now teach as truth will be dismissed as false by their successors. "Authorities" indeed! Their agreement is confined to the one point,—that there is a hell. Where it is, what it is, and who will have to go to it, and whether they will have to live in it for ever—these are points on which these "authorities" are in open disagreement.

Some of them argue, and justly enough, in our opinion, that heaven and hell are parts of the same view of the "beyond." If you give up the latter, you have no logical ground for retaining the former. They stand or fall together. Listen to the Rev. Dr. R. F. Horton on this point:—

> "If we are to be logical we must, when we give up hell, give up heaven also. It is the feeblest form of sentimentality to profess a belief in heaven—and especially to accept heaven for ourselves—when we have no fear of hell and have given up believing in it. And to do the modern mind justice it does, as a rule, frankly surrender both. The disbelief of to-day in hell is equally a disbelief in heaven. The vast bulk of the indifferent have no expectations of any future life, and if they genially declare that God is too kind to send them to hell, they practically believe that he is not kind enough, or, at any rate, has not the power, to send them to heaven. They have dismissed the whole idea of a future life for themselves and for their friends, and they live practically in the present and for things that can be gained and enjoyed here in this life."

This is quite true. Heaven and hell are falling together. No one that we know of was ever anxious to go to heaven. It was only the alternative to hell. There was no other place of refuge. A man who rushes out of a house on fire is in no hurry to decide where he will eat his next meal and take his next night's sleep. Ask him where he is going and he replies, "Out of this." Christian Churches traded chiefly on the fear of hell. The hope of heaven was but an afterthought. We cannot see that it is any more attractive now. What has happened is that hell has become less terrifying. Dr. Horton himself does not paint it in very lurid colors:—

> "We are obliged to revise the geography, if we may so call it, of the spiritual world. We do not say that heaven is above and hell is beneath, for such expressions have lost their meaning for us with the fuller knowledge of the solar system. What do we say? We say, in the light of Christian revelation, that heaven is a state of permanent reconciliation with God, and that hell is a state of permanent enmity to God. To be reconciled with God is to be in heaven, even here, and to be at enmity with God is similarly to be in hell."

Rev. Silas Hocking goes farther than this. "Heaven and hell," he says, "may be in the same place; and heaven will be hell to the man who loves evil things." Mr. Hocking appears to be a universalist. He denounces the old idea of hell most severely:—

> "To talk of a hell so horrible that no man with a heart in him would throw a dog into it, and yet to preach that the Almighty Father cast the bulk of the human family into it to burn for ever and ever, is to insult the very name of the Being whom we are taught to love."

After this it is easy to understand that Mr. Hocking believes that in course of time "all men will grow to see the good" and that "all lost souls will be reclaimed."

Rev. Dr. Charles Brown writes on "the Absurdity of a Material Hell." Still, the sinner must look out:—

> "I preach that there will be a terrible awakening for people who have trifled with duty and conscience, and who have rejected the light. I preach that there must be something unutterably awful under the figures which our Lord used of the outer darkness, the undying worm, the unquenchable fire. I preach, and I sincerely believe, that there is some experience that is more terrible than we conceive in store for the wilful and unrepentant sinner."

This gentleman is very insistent with his "I preach." But how does it matter what he preaches? The only important thing is what he knows, and he knows nothing—just like his colleagues.

One idea possesses all these clerical gentlemen. They follow Jesus in dividing people into sheep and goats—good and bad; and there is heaven for one lot and hell for the other. But what a childish philosophy is this! Few of us are angels; few of us are devils. Most of us are neither black nor white, but various shades of grey. The best of us have our defects; the worst of us have our redeeming qualities. Bad men and good men are a very unphilosophical division of the human race. Things are not so simple as that. If they were the world would have few problems to trouble it. With all the "good" men on one side and all the "bad" men on the other we should soon come to a settlement of human affairs. Pascal said that man never has the choice between good and evil—he has only the choice between various mixtures of both. Just in the same way are goodness and badness mixed in mankind. Consequently the doctrine of heaven for one set of people, and hell for another set of people, is puerile, and can only be dismissed with the contempt it deserves by intelligent people.

Acid Drops.

The Church Congress has provided the usual cartload of words to a very few grains of sense. All sorts of problems have been discussed, without anyone being much the wiser or better. And, as usual, the speakers were most definite where knowledge was impossible, and least certain where courage and industry could have supplied them with positive information. The relation of the sexes, for instance, all the speakers agreed, ought to be governed by the Christian ideal. But, as no one proceeded to say just what the Christian ideal was, peace was maintained. Otherwise, the Congress might have witnessed some lively scenes. Canon Grane, speaking on War, said it was a wonder that the saving grace of humor had not shown us "the reductio ad absurdum to which civilisation, minus Christianity, had brought the leading Christian States." If Canon Grane had not been a clergyman, one might have expected him to realise that the fault is not that civilisation has been deficient in Christianity, but that it has had too much. Sir Ernest Sutour, who really ought to have known better, touched the limit by declaring it incontestable that "Christianity had done much to mitigate the horrors of war and to promote good feeling among nations." Examples: England and Germany; Germany and France; Bulgaria, Servia, and Greece.

Some spirited comments on Sir Oliver Lodge's presidential address are contributed by Sir Ray Lankester to the Daily Telegraph. He says, as we said in the Freethinker, that Sir Oliver's profession of "belief" is a very interesting piece of autobiography, but "singularly out of place at a meeting for the advancement of science." Sir Ray (these titles seem sadly out of place, somehow, in connection with scientific work) points out that the business of science is not to discuss "possibilities," but to verify facts, however wildly improbable they may appear at first sight. Had scientific men adopted the plan of Sir Oliver Lodge and discussed mere speculative possibilities, they would still have been quarrelling over ghosts and goblins and vampires and witches. Instead, they insisted that "the vampire and the dragon should be placed 'on the table,' that angels should be brought before them and their power of dancing on a needle's point exhibited, before they would discuss these things at all." And the result of the adoption of this attitude was the rapid disappearance of the superstitions for which so many worthy men have stood sponsors.

Sir Oliver Lodge, says Sir Ray Lankester,—

> "Seeks to prepare the way for the reception of his hypothetical as plausible and needful conceptions by conjuring up select specimens of scientific investigators who are so blinded by their occupation in special branches of science that they are unable to do what he is able to do—namely, to take a large view of existence. He seems to think that there are biologists and others ignorant enough to maintain that all existence and 'the nature of things' can be explained by physics and chemistry. He supposes such persons to deny the existence of ghosts on the ground that they cannot be accounted for by physics and chemistry. There may be such persons, and we leave Sir Oliver to deal with them when found. There are others (of whom I am one) who—in common with Huxley—admit that science does not explain existence nor the ultimate nature of things at all. Sir Oliver makes an urgent appeal in favor of the plausibility of ghosts. He omits to state or consider the real objection which all reasonable men entertain to a belief in the existence of ghosts—namely, that the President of the British Association has not, any more than have other such believers, brought forward a particle of experimental evidence in favor of it. The best evidence forthcoming is not sufficient to induce a normal man to bet five pounds on the successful demonstration of a ghost's existence against five thousand offered on the other side."

This is a well-deserved rebuke, and it was necessary that someone should administer it. When ill-informed people are told in scores of sermons and religious journals that science has altered its attitude towards religion, etc., etc., it is well that someone in authority should point out how much alone in the world of science Sir Oliver Lodge stands. It may be that the acceptance by people of Sir Oliver's speculations as the verdicts of modern science may lead others beside Sir Ray Lankester to speak out. In that case it will be Freethinkers who will have to thank Sir Oliver for his presidential address.

While the Church Congress was discussing the elevating influence of Christianity on the fair sex, Albanian women were fighting the Servians with rifles and hatchets. There is often a contrast between theory and practice.

The Balkan Christians have three gods. The Turks have only one. There is about the same ratio in their cruelties.

It gives one the creeps to see a paper like the Westminster Gazette playing to the gallery just as badly as journals of far less intellectual calibre. On the opening day of the Church Congress our contemporary had a front-page article on "The Church and the World." It was very well written, and in some respects very able. This passage, for instance, was as sound as it was pungent:—

> "The Church of England is very militant about Disestablishment and Church schools, but it seems to a great many observers to be strangely pacific and quiescent about a great many other things of at least equal importance; and by some unfortunate chance, whenever it has to give a vote, it gives one which history almost invariably judges to have been on the wrong side."

But at that point our contemporary seems to have felt that discretion was by far the better part of valor. Severe criticism of the Anglican Church in particular would have to be balanced by compliments to Christianity as a whole; so it began to call attention to some comforting "facts which concern all the Churches." "We see many signs," it went on, "that the modern world is becoming in a general way more religious. There is a marked reaction from the materialism of forty years ago. Our scientific men are beginning to tell us that all things are possible, and the President of the British Association delivers a religious address from his chair." We should like to think this was sarcasm, but we are unable to do so. The writer deliberately abases himself, and grows maudlin in putting his neck into the Philistines' yoke for the sake of his salary. Otherwise we might ask him what he means by "the materialism of forty years ago"—who are the scientific men who teach the nonsense that "all things are possible"—and why President Lodge's address is any more important than President Schafer's from the chair of the British Association? Above all, we should invite him to indicate some of those "signs" of the world's growing more religious. We wonder if he refers to the rivalry in armaments between Christian nations or the meek and mild virtues of the Christian Balkan States?

There were several reports of the Wolverhampton "blasphemy" case in the local papers. We have reproduced (on another page) the longest from the Express and Star. Any other choice might have been misrepresented. But we add the following extract from the Birmingham Daily Mail of October 1, giving some of the alleged "blasphemies":—

> "There never was a man called Jesus at all."
> "What did he teach?"
> "I could train a parrot in three weeks to say Jesus was a great teacher."
> "Nobody outside a lunatic asylum would believe that Jesus lived."
> "We have splendid history books and a dozen eminent men who have never heard of Jesus."
> "Josephus is the only reliable historian, and there is no mention of Jesus in his books."
> "If a man believes Jesus lives he is in error, and if he says he does live he tells a deliberate untruth."
> "Jesus was not a teetotaler."
> "I could name you a hundred Christs all born of Virgins."

Such are the expressions that expose a man to a criminal prosecution in this "land of freedom." Here and there a sentence may be marked by what some people would regard as bad taste. But bad taste is not a crime. If it were, the bulk of the population of England would be in prison—if those outside were numerous enough to keep them there.

We quite understand that what is sub judice is not open to public discussion. Mr. Stewart's case is sub judice, but his statements are not. The statement that "There never was a man called Jesus at all" is sub judice in the court of historical controversy, but not in any police-court or at any court of assize. Without being responsible for Mr. Stewart's literary composition, we take the fullest responsibility for the substance of his statement. We are prepared to repeat it as often as may be necessary. To put it forward as "blasphemy" is a disgrace to the police, and to listen to it is not very creditable to the Stipendiary. Why, there is a member of the present Government, Mr. J. M. Robertson, who has written a big book to prove what the Wolverhampton "blasphemer" alleges in the first and last of his "criminal" utterances. One man is prosecuted for making a statement, and another man who proves it enjoys a place in the Government and £1,200 a year. Shaw himself couldn't do justice to this tragi-comical discrepancy. One would have to leave it to Swift.

We prefer to say nothing at present about the complications in Mr. Stewart's case. We may have something to say about the matter when the case is over.

Knowing the Blasphemy Laws as well as we do, we are often astonished at the nonsense that is written and spoken about them. Complaint is made, for instance, that "blasphemers" are arrested instead of being summoned; in fact, the recent arrest at Wolverhampton is treated as something entirely new. It is really nothing of the sort. George Jacob Holyoake was arrested in 1842 and several of his colleagues were arrested afterwards. Harry Boulter was arrested in 1908. The young Sheffielder, S. E. Bullock, was arrested in 1911. We have not kept a detailed record of the Nottingham case, but we fancy there was an arrest in that also. There was no arrest, of course, in the prosecution of the Freethinker in 1882. Mr. Foote's was a press offence, and the prosecution had to proceed under the Newspaper Libel Act.

"Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," says the Lord's Prayer. But somehow or other it doesn't get done. A speaker at the Church Congress—the Rev. H. Dunnico, of Liverpool—pleaded that working men should have "a chance to become the creatures that God intended them to be." Poor God! His wishes are always being frustrated. Clerical land-nationalisers are always declaring that God meant the land for the people,—only the landlords have been too many for him. When Jesus Christ said that the meek should inherit the earth he must have meant in coffins.

One Lord God Almighty (that sounds well!) is to be besieged by praying ladies, and all the friends they can induce to join them, during the week from November 1 to November 8. A call to prayer for that period is issued by the Catholic Women's Suffrage Society, the Church League for Women's Suffrage, the Free Church League for Women's Suffrage, the Friends' League for Women's Suffrage, the Jewish League for Women's Suffrage, and the Scottish Churches' League for Women's Suffrage. The "call" states that "the enfranchisement of women is in accordance with the wil of God." Here we have the will of the poor Deity frustrated again. It is pitiable.

Where do the ladies find what is, or is not, in accordance with the will of God? They certainly cannot find anything like woman suffrage in the Bible. If they followed Paul's directions they would keep silence in public and talk all they wanted to at home. But the time has gone by for that—and gone by for ever.

The "militants" don't join in this week of prayer. They prefer arson. Yet Mrs. Pankhurst is a pious lady, and takes the name of God in vain as well as the other suffragists.

"He has taken a prominent part in social and religious work." This is what a newspaper report says of James Vose, who was charged before the Bolton magistrates with obtaining money by false pretences from the Britannic Insurance Company. Accused was remanded, bail being refused.

Rev. Cecil Frederick Blyth, rector of Rickinghall, Suffolk, left £4,303. Rev. Duncombe Herbert Sawyer, of Bournemouth, left £15,822. Their present address must be warmer than ours this October.

A workman named Thomas Tosheeky was lately buried by a heavy fall in a coal mine at Wilkes Barre, the result of a slight explosion which destroyed the props of his working. His fellow workmen spent a whole week in digging him out. He was fed by means of liquid food through a pipe driven through the solid rock to his living tomb. Conversation was also carried on through the same channel. To keep his spirits up a gramophone was placed at the outer end of the pipe. But there was no "Nearer my god to thee" in the entertainment. The program consisted of the latest ragtime pieces and music-hall sketches.

More "chatter about Christ" from Bernard Shaw, who says that "Christianity has not gained an inch since the Crucifixion." We admit the fiction, but there was no Cross, and no Christ, and no Christianity but what was made up during several centuries from religious material derived from all points of the compass. It is a pity that Shaw doesn't take a more scientific view of the Gospels. Jesus Christ is as imaginary as Don Quixote, and to discuss the teaching of either of them at this time of day is a great absurdity.

A bright, clever girl was occupying a Woman Suffrage stand. She had occasion to mention the Daily Mail, and some of the crowd called out "the Daily Liar." "Oh, well," she said, "I know it has another name." There was a good laugh, and she deserved it.

We are reminded of that incident by the Daily Mail's recent attack on Mr. J. M. Robertson, M.P. It accused him of extravagant vituperation, which it attributed to "the thoroughness of his early training as a street-corner orator under the banner of the late Mr. Bradlaugh." We don't remember Mr. Robertson's speaking at any outdoor meetings, and Bradlaugh was one of the most careful speakers who ever lived.

Miss Marie Lloyd, the famous music-hall artiste, was ordered by the New York Immigration authorities to be deported as an "undesirable." Solomon himself would never have passed those terrible officials.

Mrs. Philip Snowden, speaking at Manchester, said that, unless the Christian Church was fair to women, they would forsake the Church. "Angels and ministers of grace defend us!" If the ladies leave the Church the poor clergy will have to sing in the streets.

A woman was sentenced to six months' hard labor for stealing umbrellas and handbags from St. Faith's Chapel, Westminster Abbey. It was stated that she constantly attended churches. In that capacity, doubtless, she counted as many devout believers in the religious census tables, published to the greater glory of God.

There is a National Gas Exhibition at Shepherd's Bush. We hope the clergy are adequately represented.

Atheists, Agnostics, Freethinkers, and all such people are devoid of the sense of beauty. Christians all know that. Yet it was left to Mr. H. S. Salt to protest against the proposed vulgarisation of the Sty Hill Pass in the heart of the Cumberland mountains.

The Church of England clergy have a good conceit of themselves. Canon Cunningham, of Farnham, trotted out what he might have called a home-made recipe for good legislation in the House of Commons. After the House had discussed any Bill before it, one of the late W. T. Stead's "tips from heaven" would be solicited:—

> "When all the several views had been voiced," said the Canon, "surely a great silence would be kept for a space, while severally and collectively the House would consult the Unseen Presence and seek His counsel. When this had been revealed the Speaker would voice what he had come to feel had been given to the assembly. It might be on other lines than anything previously suggested, and the leaders would rise one after another to say 'Amen.'"

Evidently the reverend gentleman doesn't expect John Morley in the House of Lords, or John Burns and John M. Robertson in the House of Commons, to raise any objection to this pious performance. Nor does he suspect the possibility of the Speaker objecting to play the part of a mediumistic telephone.

"Every slum is a blasphemy," said the Rev. P. E. Rattenbury, speaking at the Baptist Union meeting at Manchester. Yet the Blasphemy Laws are still confined to Freethinkers.

Another exploded Messiah! A Breslau plumber, named Hermann Steinicke, got a number of dupes to accept him as the "returned Christ." He promised them a happy life with three or four hours' work a day when his "kingdom of peace" came in again. In return for this promise he obtained money from them that enabled him to live in luxury. Finally, however, they turned upon him, and had him arrested as a swindler. He is now doing time.

We congratulate the Methodist Times on its ability to see the trees through the wood. It pronounces the religious difficulty to be the difficulty in connection with Home Rule. We hardly thought anybody believed to the contrary. Every statesman who has attempted to deal with the Irish question on any comprehensive scale has found himself faced with the problem of reconciling Catholic and Protestant. Both talk, professionally, about love; both illustrate in practice the power of religion in general and of Christianity in particular, to generate hatred. For nothing but religion could make men hate each other as bitterly as do Catholics and Protestants. A difference in mere political opinion would admit of easy compromise. In religion, hatred becomes a virtue, and reasonable concession a vice. For it is not love of their own religion so much as hatred of the religion of someone else that is the real motive power in Ireland. And the situation only proves what a fundamentally anti-social, non-moral, and disruptive power religion is.

It is abominable that parents who hate the idea of beating their children should be compelled to send them to school where they may be beaten by strangers. A woman applied to the Acton magistrates the other day for a summons against a schoolmaster who had caned her son. She stated that there was a mark five inches long and two inches wide on the boy's back, and that a doctor who had seen him considered it was brutal treatment. The summons was not granted. Yet, as the woman said, she would have got into trouble if she had struck the boy so herself.

Is it not a shameful confession on the part of English school-teachers that they cannot maintain discipline without a stick? Those who really mean this have mistaken their vocation. Why should they be unable to dispense with what has long been given up in the schools of other countries? A teacher who struck a child in a Japanese school would lose his (or her) engagement on the spot. But there is no Bible reading in the Japanese schools. That may make all the difference.

Eugenio Prosetti, a Roman bootmaker, has served a sentence of fifty-four years' imprisonment for murder in Italy. It is difficult to see how such a sentence is preferable to capital punishment. We admit that the "mercy" of it is worthy of a Christian country—and the Christian deity.

Christianity is the only religion that supports a man under trials and affords him consolation in adversity. Yet nobody is surprised when a Christian commits suicide. There was a heading "Curate's Suicide" in the Star the other evening. It ought to have convulsed London, but we needn't say it didn't. The curate in question was the Rev. Henry Thirkill Johnston, aged twenty-nine, a former missionary in Calcutta. He had suffered for some time from a severe nervous breakdown. He laid his head on the metals before a Great Northern express, and "Providence" let him lie there.

What taste the monarchical superstition seems to inspire! Ex-King Manuel's interrupted honeymoon has been in the newspapers day after day. It was enough to make a feline night-disturber sick.

A Coventry reader says: "I wrote you some time ago about an issue of the Freethinker I had not received. It has just turned up, and I am herewith returning it to you, as it shows how easily the Post Office miscarries things." The word "Coventry" on the wrapper is not in our shop manager's best handwriting, but it is legible enough to any person looking at it attentively. But where it has been—or rather where it has not been—is a puzzle. Amongst the postmarks we notice Bombay. From there it seems to have been returned with a written suggestion to "Try Cowley, Cheltenham, R.U., Angleterre." Finally the actual address of Coventry was "tried" and the poor packet reached its destination at last. We must at least give the Post Office credit for ingenuity.

We suggest to Mr. Farmer, whose learned and pregnant articles on musical composers and other artistic matters are familiar to our readers, that he should follow up the history of the National Anthem. The music is not bad—in its way, but the words are "a caution." Yet people take off their hats to "politics" and "tricks" and "fix" as if they were listening to the sublimest flights of Shakespeare. The "victorious," "glorious," and "over us" form another poetical beauty of "God Save the King." How the "over us" got in is a curious speculation. Mr. Farmer may solve it. As a help to him we may point out that the very words "long to reign over us" in relation to the monarch occur in old Bishop Latimer's first sermon before King Edward the Sixth. From the context we should judge that the phrase was even then a familiar one.

"Woman in the coming season will try to recapture the lost art of blushing," says the Daily Mirror. We suggest that a selected course of Old Testament reading might produce the desired result.

"A War Over One Man" is a description of an industrial dispute in the press. Yet history records worse ironies. The Crusades, in which myriads of men lost their lives, was a war over the tomb of a man who never lived and never died.

A "ghosts'" dinner took place in Fleet-street recently at the "Cheshire Cheese," and the bogeys consumed a considerable quantity of meat pudding and liquid nourishment. This was a more harmless recreation than the ghostly amusement recorded in the early part of the Gospels.

Lord Salisbury told the Church Congress that "neither baths nor parlors were the saving of souls." Agricultural souls, of course. He might have added that a lot of poor Christian people object to baths, like the water-fearing tramp who asked if he couldn't be cleaned on the vacuum system.

Another poor Jesusite! Rev. Dr. George Green Gillan, of Carmunnock, Lanarkshire, left £12,600. A large sum to make out of thrifty Scottish Christians. But he managed it.

Someone has sent us a little publication called the Religion of a Business Man by Herbert Parker, B.A., Liverpool. This gentleman chuckles over the fact that the Freethinker pays a tribute to "the great Nazarene" every week by dating after him. "Every time," he adds, "Charles Bradlaugh dated a letter he was rendering silent homage to the might of Christ!" This antiquated folly was once very common. It only lingers now in the most hopelessly stupid circles. It might as well be said that Mr. Parker renders a silent tribute to Roman emperors every time he writes the name of certain months of the year; worse still, that he renders a silent homage to Pagan divinities every time he writes the names of the days of the week.

The following appeared in the Bristol Herald-Courier, Tennessee:—

"Knoxville, Tenn., September 2.

"Two preachers, Matthew and Luke Duncan, brothers, of Frost Bottom, Tenn., fought over an argument about the Bible last Saturday, and after they had fought, both took to the woods. Matthew was captured yesterday and taken to Oliver Springs. He fought savagely when taken, knocking several men down before being overpowered. During the night at Oliver Springs he was lashed to a post for safekeeping. To-day he was committed to the State hospital for the insane at Lyon's View. His brother, Luke, has not been found.

"They fought following an argument as to who has the supreme power, the Lord or the Devil. Matthew maintained that God has power over the Devil, and Luke took the other view."

This sort of thing is astonishingly common in America. Christian preachers over there beat the British variety hollow as lunatics and criminals.

"If the story is true that the Socialists and anti-clericals of Rome attempted to mob a delegation of Catholic societies from abroad visiting the Pope, then it is evident that the Socialists and anti-clericals of that city have as faint or erroneous a conception of equal rights and impartial liberty as was displayed in New York by the Irish Catholics who mobbed a troupe of actors presenting a play that was not to their taste. If anti-clericalism is but Catholicism reversed, and means only hatred of the persons of the Catholic faith, it is not so vast an improvement as it might be over Catholic bigotry."—Truthseeker (New York).

A Socialist at Toulon bit off an adversary's nose after a political argument. Who was it said that Socialism was a religion?

£102,000 has been raised for the Church Missionary Society as a result of the recent Swanwick Conference. This will raise the price of "rice" Christians.

Christian Evidence lecturers, and other defenders of the Design Argument, will note with pleasure that a fowl, dressed for table at Whittlesford, Cambridgeshire, was found to possess two hearts, both of which had worked independently. "He doeth all things well." Sometimes over well.

What Secularists these Christians are! At Carshalton Surrey, they have been raising funds for a church institute by selling lead pencils, which were bought at wholesale rates and retailed at a penny each. When the full amount is raised the result in all probability will be attributed to prayer and not pencils.

The Bishop of London, when before the Divorce Commission, pretended to represent the "Christian view" of marriage. The President tried in vain to get him to tell where it was to be found. No such thing exists, unless it be in the Catholic Church. The discussions at the recent Church Congress show that all sorts of views on the subject are held even by the clergy of the Church of England.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

October 19, Manchester; 26, Stratford Town Hall.
December 7 and 14, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £193 7s. 3d. Received since:—Annonymous (Liverpool), 15s.; W. H. B., 2s. 6d.; G. Le Quesne and Friends (New Zealand), £1 1s.; Welsh Doctor, £2.

W. RICHARDS.—Why do you call him "the doctor"? He is no more a doctor than you are. Thanks for the papers, though we had already received them from other hands.

E. B.—Many thanks for cuttings.

W. H. B.—Thanks for pleasant letter.

J. DRISCOLL.—Not without merit, but hardly up to our level of publication.

E. HANNAN.—Thanks for your trouble. But we hardly know what to make of Leeds. Perhaps we had better give it a rest for a bit.

A. H.—See paragraph.

J. HECHT asks if anyone can find work for a worthy Freethinker who wants it badly. He has been an active member of the Edmonton Branch. He is skilled in the management of horses, an experienced driver, and a good canvasser.

BIRMINGHAM "SAINT."—"Blasphemy" cases must go to the Assizes. They have to be tried by a judge of the supreme court. A special statute to that effect was passed some seventy years ago.

W. MCLELLAN.—Your letter was sent on to us at Birmingham, too late for any useful reply, even if we could have given advice in the absence of full details.

WELSH DOCTOR.—The memorandum we made in a hurry after the lecture on Sunday night has got mislaid somehow. We therefore acknowledge your subscription to the President's Honorarium Fund in one of the ways first suggested.

E. B.—Much obliged for cuttings.

L. E. ADAMS.—Your letter repeats what we have often said, and the case, being purely private, cannot be used as evidence.

A. POTTS.—From various sources.

W. P. BALL.—Thanks for welcome cuttings.

W. DAVIDSON.—Always pleased to hear from you, but kindly let it be before Tuesday.

W. H. HARRIS.—We don't think Bernard Shaw's reply to the reverend gentleman is just what you appear to think it. But we cannot deal with the matter just now.

W. G. KING.—We are seldom able to deal with things that reach us on Tuesday, unless they are really urgent. We had already written on the Wolverhampton prosecution.

W. GARDNER.—We saw the correspondence on Hyde Park "blasphemy" in the Referee. We don't think, however, that the Home Office or the Police want more "blasphemy" prosecutions in London. Perhaps an attempt may be made to deal with "improper" language. But even that could only be justified by treating Freethinkers and Christians alike. Any check in the interest of the peace must be applied impartially all round.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote was not able to travel to Birmingham on Saturday evening, as he has usually done in the past. He had therefore to travel on the Sunday, leaving home at 9 in the morning and arriving at Birmingham at 2 in the afternoon, after nearly missing the connection at Paddington. He entered Birmingham in a deluge of rain; the deluge continued all the afternoon and all the evening, and apprehension was felt as to the success of the Town Hall meeting. But there was a splendid audience in spite of the weather and Mr. Foote had a great reception, which Mr. Fathers, the chairman, noted with much pleasure. The criticism of "Sir Oliver Lodge's Theology" was followed with close attention throughout, and enthusiastically applauded at the finish. Many questions were asked and answered, and there was the time-honored complaint of "no discussion" which is a condition attaching to the grant of the Town Hall for the meeting. Mr. Foote's visit should give a fillip to the N. S. S. Branch's regular Sunday propaganda in the King's Hall.

Mr. Foote is only delivering two lectures at the Queen's (Minor) Hall this side of Christmas—on Sunday evenings, December 7 and 14. During the month of November he will devote himself exclusively to literary work and fresh publications through the Pioneer Press.

District "saints" are reminded that Mr. Foote visits Manchester next Sunday (Oct. 19) and delivers two lectures (afternoon and evening) in the Secular Hall, Rusholme-road.

Glasgow "saints" are once more reminded that Mr. Cohen lectures in their city next Sunday (Oct. 19).

The Stratford Town Hall course of Sunday Freethought lectures begins this evening (Oct. 12). Mr. Cohen occupies the platform and we hope the local "saints" will do their best to advertise the meeting amongst their friends and acquaintances. Mr. Lloyd takes the second lecture of this course and Mr. Foote the last.

Despite the unpleasant weather on Sunday last, the bright and cheerful-looking little Foresters' Hall, Highgate-road, was comfortably filled. Mr. Cohen was in excellent form, and his lecture was greatly appreciated. Mr. J. T. Lloyd occupies the platform next Sunday, and the North London "saints" should give him a hearty welcome.

The tenth annual Bradlaugh Dinner is to be held rather late—on October 23—at the Holborn Restaurant. Tickets are 5s. each—but only 3s. to members of the Bradlaugh Fellowship; and can be obtained of W. J. Ramsey, 146 Lansdowne-road, Hackney, or of H. Reeve, 107 Green-street, Bethnal Green. There is a piquancy in the announcement that Mr. Bernard Shaw is to occupy the chair.

The October number of the English Review contains an excellent article by Florence G. Fidler on "The Position of Women under the Hammurabi Code." The editor contributes his monthly supply of vigorous editorial notes—chiefly, this time, about Home Rule. Some of the other contents are interesting, but they do not call for special mention in our columns.

George Macdonald, of the New York Truthseeker, has had a month's holiday. He appears to have spent it in his native district in New Hampshire, amidst old friends and other persons of "rural simplicity"—to borrow Lord Rosebery's happy description of the mental characteristics of the "slim" Dutchmen of South Africa. They have stirred up George's own native humor, and caused him to contribute one of his happiest efforts to the old paper. We confess to having had several good laughs over it. We are also glad to infer that the month's holiday has afforded our distant friend and colleague some real bodily and mental refreshment.

George Macdonald's early reference to a certain minister of the gospel (he got across the fraternity pretty soon) is dry—but not with the dryness of Shakespeare's remainder biscuit after a long voyage:—

> "A few days before the Old Home Day I had fallen in with a Universalist minister who does odd jobs of preaching in a number of near-by parishes. With him I discussed religion and Rationalism, and found him cognisant of biblical criticism at least as late as Colenso on the Pentateuch. He was liberal and reasonable enough to admit that if the Christian religion had not been invented and presented to the world until the twentieth century nobody would think it worth patenting. Its success, he said, required the age of ignorance and credulity in which it originated. That was going far, for a minister, and so when he took the floor during the services at Surry I looked for something educative. But there was nothing. His preaching proved as dusty and musty as the rest."

The "Colenso" touch is George all over.

Here is another passage about ministers:—

"If going to meeting in New England is to continue, it looks to me as if the people and the preachers would need to come together for a heart-to-heart talk. A preacher can be liberal enough in his expressions when he is talking to somebody who knows that orthodoxy is a blown-out tyre in these automobile days; but the suspicion does not seem to have entered his mind that the people are as well acquainted with the fact as himself. On the other hand, the people talk like Rationalists, but seem to suppose that the ministers are unconscious of their state of mind. So they are pious enough when the preacher is about, and the minister is orthodox in their hearing. Both sides are wearing masks in the other's presence. The minister has every Sunday the opportunity of a student or teacher to tell his hearers something they don't know and so to be to them a source of information about progress made in religious thought and even in science. But he is either too lazy or afraid, and his people haven't the sense or courage to demand something besides the old husks he feeds them. The churches are poorly supported, and the contributors are paying reluctantly for something they don't want, and wanting what they don't get."

Capital! And what a lot of good nature there is in it!

We think we like George Macdonald best of all, however, in his personal touches. For instance, he meets an old farmer friend that he hadn't seen for a generation. "I went to school with him," he writes, "in the 'seventies. I shook his hand, and, to make conversation, asked, 'Has anything happened since I saw you thirty-five years ago?' He thought a minute, and then —— 'Well,' he said, 'I don't know as there has.'" That is so natural that one can imagine the interview. It is equalled, if not bettered, by a later sparkle. George was rather proud in former days of his wrestling and his spelling. But he painfully remembers that he was not always successful. "A consumptive from Boston name Will Cleland, then rusticating for health, took a fall out of me at wrestling, and I was spelled down in my fourteenth year by Ben Crosby, a boy later adjudged an idiot and put in an asylum."

The month's holiday has done George Macdonald good. It hasn't made him a humorist; nature did that; but it has pricked him up to do more justice to the fact than he seems to fancy he is entitled to do—at least as a regular thing—in the Truthseeker. But, for our part, to use an Hibernicism, we wish he could have a month's holiday every week.

We have received the following letter from the antipodes:

"Dear Sir,—A few friends and devoted admirers of yourself and of the noble work of emancipation from the shackles of superstition to which the best years of your life have been ungrudgingly given, hearing with keen regret of your recent indisposition, desire to send you a small spontaneous token of their goodwill.

"On behalf of these friends, therefore, I have much pleasure in enclosing the sum of one guinea, which has been subscribed among them, and we trust that this small mark of our esteem may be of some slight service to you in furthering the glorious cause of Freethought.

"My fellow-subscribers unite with me in wishing you a speedy restoration to health, and ardently hope that you may long be spared to wield the bloodless sword of Reason against the ranks of Ignorance and Superstition.—I am, very truly yours, GEORGE LE QUESNE."

Our readers will be interested in the following item taken from the Glasgow News (Sept. 30):—

"The remains of Colonel Leith Hay, a gentleman who resided for a number of years in Lochaber, and who died last week, were yesterday interred in Glen Nevis burying-ground, Fort-William. The Colonel left explicit, albeit somewhat peculiar, instructions as to his burial, and amongst other things it was stipulated that his coffin, which was to be made from fir grown at Achnacarry, was to be quite plain and to contain no name-plate. Another stipulation was that no clergyman was to attend the obsequies, and that on the approach to the grave a piper should play 'The Cock o' the North.' These instructions were faithfully carried out at the interment yesterday, and the incongruity of a funeral cortege proceeding to a cemetery to the accompaniment of a rollicking marching tune was pronounced in the extreme. Unmarked by any solemn rites or ceremonial the body was silently committed to the tomb."

A piper instead of a clergyman at a funeral! And the good Christians have to put up with it.

Nature proposes to herself no aim in her operations, and all final causes are nothing but pure fictions imagined by men.—Spinoza.

Charles Bradlaugh—an Appreciation.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH was not a commonplace man; he was a great man; or, as the saying is, a man-and-a-half. One of those rare and fine spirits who appear on the great stage of the world at long intervals to enhance the power and dignity of man—who crowd their lives with noble services in the cause of truth and justice. He would have been conspicuous in any age and in any society.

For the love of humanity he endured persecution, calumny, and bitter struggles. The people, the politicians, the press, the pulpit, all combined their great forces to denounce, to libel, to crush this mighty giant and to attack his character with virulence. They called him a vulgar and dangerous agitator, a Godless man, a breaker of holy images, a Republican, a man who impeached the royal House of Brunswick, and boldly denounced the unjust system of paying regular pensions to individuals whose ancestors were of doubtful character, and whose pedigrees would have done no honor to horses in a stud book. He defied the gods in heaven, the Devil and his friends in hell and on earth, and other sundry nobilities of this world.

His following was immense. Mr. Foote tells us in his interesting Reminiscences, that at the last Bradlaugh demonstration, on February 15, 1888, in Trafalgar Square, seventy or eighty thousand people were present. The conflict was a desperate one. It was between truth and falsehood; and the overthrow of tyrants and the deluders of mankind if Bradlaugh triumphed over the forces of obscurantism. He put up to auction all the theatrical properties of priestcraft. What a sacrilege!

But truth is great and will prevail. Next to the glory of discovering a new idea is the elimination of a false one. Everything was against him; but no power on earth can, at any time, drive to despair a genius of such vigorous determination. He began the war of his life with every disadvantage. He was not born in the purple, and was without family connections, without friends, without means or any social influence. He stood alone—firm in his policy and lofty principles. He laughed at difficulties that would have overwhelmed a lesser man. He trampled over prejudices like a bull in a china shop. Legends, traditions, ancient privileges, old and new superstitions were all treated by him with sovereign contempt. As he was a born actor, in the best sense, he was very effective. He had nothing but genius, wonderful energy, and purity of aim to inspire and guide him in his holy crusade. Creeds, geographical limitations, imperial bombast, and hoary institutions did not intimidate him. He did not isolate himself and stand for country or party. He was a citizen of the world, and, in the words of Horace, he was a man, and felt interested in all that concerned man—irrespective of color, class, creed, or country. He was too great, too enlightened, too noble a man to belong to one family, one party, or one country. He belonged to the republic of the world; he preached the gospel of humanity. Religion, to him, was not a bag of tricks made of impossible dogmas, doctrines, ritual, ceremonies, and other fooleries; it meant pure life and noble deeds; the service of man and not the worship of an imaginary God. He loved real men and women.

Compared with others, he had very few illusions. Indeed, it is neither possible nor desirable to be without them. To him this was a grim world and not a playground for gambling with the destinies of humanity. Tennyson's words, "Nature red in tooth and claw," banished from his mind the prating of ages about the love of God, his providence, and his wise dispensations. He was incurably convinced that true and lasting salvation must be the work of man. He therefore labored with a heart and a head and a will to clear the social, religious, and political atmosphere of all shams, frauds, and delusions. This was not an easy task, but Bradlaugh believed in himself—the hallmark of all great men. He was a man born to conquer and to command. Thousands became devoted to his personality and ideals. His ever-increasing followers were fired by his zeal and enthusiasm. He led a propaganda whose aim was war, and not petty spectacular skirmishes. The people idolised him. He possessed all the qualities of a great leader: strategy, knowledge, geniality, and reserve force. He was a promoter of truth and gave to the world his best, caring nothing for rewards and applause. He gave no quarter and expected none. He was a magnificent fighter and played the game fairly and like a man. He was not a hireling, but a hero. He worked like a Trojan and stamped his personality on his generation, and left a name and fame which will shine brighter with the march of time.

In honoring his memory we do not canonise or worship him like a divinity, but remember him as a great man—a man who left humanity in his debt. He was essentially a self-taught man. In the words of Carlyle, his university was a library of books. Nature was his tutor, goodness his theme, a passion for truth his whole philosophy, and the emancipation and happiness of the human race his ultimate end and object in life. What a man! What a noble ideal! Of such is the kingdom of heroes and heroines.

He was a clear-headed man and soon gave up soldiering, as he did not believe in that form of rascality called patriotism—the killing of innocent people to add to the (false) glory of his country.

When he became a clerk in a solicitor's office he mastered all the bewildering technicalities of the law which proved so useful to him in his future conflicts with the forces of law and order. By reading and reflection the light of knowledge dawned upon his clear intellect and acute judgment.

His lectures and addresses impressed all those who heard him. He was not a meteor, but a fixed star. Thousands attached themselves to his blazing propaganda and became fascinated by his style of oratory, at once clear, eloquent, and fatally logical.

He founded the National Reformer, with contributors like Mrs. Besant, Mr. Foote, and many other rising men. The articles proved a shock and gave a rude awakening to all the Churches. The clergy attacked him, lied about him, hunted him everywhere, but all to no purpose. The more they persecuted him the harder he worked. He replied to them, debated with them, and routed his enemies in hollow fashion. He lashed them unmercifully—and they felt it. The whole country rang with his name. His triumph was complete, and the rise of the Higher Criticism and the unwilling surrender of one dogma after another are a tribute to his work and success.

The Churches have been losing ground ever since. Bradlaugh undermined the Rock of Ages and ridiculed the high pretensions of the clergy. He was the pioneer of various secular, rationalist movements which have become such a power in our time. All the best informed minds at present concentrate their attention on the affairs of this world. This is largely due to Charles Bradlaugh, Mr. Foote, and many other able men and women.

His legal and parliamentary struggles, and his ultimate triumph, are now matters of history. Those incidents in his life reflect no credit on his persecutors—religious or political. When he entered the House of Commons—that great museum of cultured curiosities and pathetic monstrosities—the members soon discovered his genius, ability, patience, insight, grasp of all political problems, honesty, disinterestedness, clear vision, impartiality, reach of knowledge, and noble aims.

He was a strong Individualist and believed in self-help and independence. He was not a believer in Socialism and officialism. In his judgment, education, arbitration, conciliation, co-operation, and legislation were the best and sanest methods for securing social reform. His firm attitude excited the hatred of the more fanatical Socialists. His great achievement was the Act dealing with Oaths and Affirmation.

As the President of the N. S. S. he did a great work, but failing health compelled him to resign on February 16, 1890. With great judgment he nominated Mr. G. W. Foote (the Christians always emphasise the initials, G. W., whenever they refer to Mr. Foote) as his successor. This gave no surprise to those who knew the high qualifications of our present President. Mr. Foote was then, as he is now, a man of great ability, literary tastes, and a sound and subtle critic of human character. He has a personality and many faculties and charms that appeal to the imagination of his readers and auditors. His other great colleague, Mrs. Besant, also suffered much persecution. She was then a great power; but now, alas!—let us be charitable and judge her as she was at her best.

Bradlaugh pleaded eloquently on behalf of the people of India. When he went there he received a great ovation. Mr. Foote tells us that, although Bradlaugh was a poor man, he declined handsome gifts of money made by the people of Hindoostan.

The physical and mental pressure became too great and he broke down completely. He died on January 30, 1891. His funeral was an imposing scene, and the grief of the whole civilised world and the appreciation of his services are his lasting epitaph.

His creed is best described in his own words in the pamphlet by his talented daughter, Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner, entitled Did Charles Bradlaugh Die an Atheist? In the same pamphlet, on p. 7, will be found his dignified reply to the false rumors that were circulated about his change of opinion.

He died as he lived, a confirmed Atheist. We have the written testimony of Dr. Bell and his daughter concerning this much-canvassed topic—a perennial theme with many lying Christians.

What is the moral of his life?

It is very easy to criticise men, but most difficult to estimate them. Let us be fair and just and not flatter his memory, but paint him as he appeared to those who knew him well and loved him. It is our duty to do full justice to the great services he rendered to humanity. He was impulsive, electric, and himself said he was hardly a poet. Full of passion and emotion, he possessed a logical and practical mind. He was a hard hitter, a most severe critic, but transparently fair. He was a philosopher and a statesman, and had a genius for public affairs, according to the judgment of Mr. Foote. He was not only a born orator, but a born ruler of men. His commanding personality, his insight, his generous sympathies, his iron grasp of all the essential problems of life, his love of progress and order, his knowledge of the world and human nature, marked him out by temperament, education, and circumstances, as a leader of a revolutionary intellectual movement.

He was indespensable after the Oxford Movement and its reactionary tendencies. What a contrast he was to Cardinal Newman! They were both sincere, elemental, and lovers of truth. They both had a distaste for hypocritical compromises of large principles. Between Catholicism and Atheism there is no compromise. Newman's honesty and logic drove him to Rome—singing pathetically, "Lead, kindly light." Bradlaugh's clearer vision made him an Atheist.

The impartial historian, while admiring them both, must record with sorrow Newman's crusade against the progress of human reason, and shed tears at the fall, crash, and death of such a fine intellect. He will say of Bradlaugh that he loved the light and opened vistas to humanity in all directions. In the one case a beautiful sunset passed into the dark night of obscurantism, in the other, the dawn passed into the great light of day.

History offers many such contrasts: Dante and Shakespeare, Napoleon and Washington, Edmund Burke and Thomas Paine, Bernard Shaw and the Pope of Rome, Harry Lauder and the Bishop of London—are cases in point. The tragedy of the human intellect is too sad to contemplate.

Bradlaugh, though an orator, was not a great literary writer like Mr. Foote and Mr. Robertson. The styles of talking and writing are different. The dash, the go, the fire, the overwhelming flow and fluency of words and ideas lend charm, dignity, and power to oratory, but are totally inappropriate to the calm, patient, and stately marshalling of arguments on the printed page. Cicero, Edmund Burke, and Macaulay united both excellencies, but such a combination is very rare.

Bradlaugh had a capacity for broad outlook, brushed aside all minor details, and boldly took large views. He had the divine afflatus and was too matter of fact and hurried for literary artifices. He had more natural abilities than book-learning; he was not a pedant, but a philosopher—not a petti-fogging politician, but an enlightened statesman. He was educated and well-informed, but not a man of classic culture or scientific acquirements. He would have risen to the top in any profession and achieved success in any activity.

In his large view men and women were not puppets or pawns in a game of chess; not commodities for sale; but human beings, who needed light, sympathy, encouragement, and full opportunities to lead comfortable and happy lives.

In the law courts he showed his grasp and learning and mastery of legal technicalities. The judges were much impressed by his personality and his vast acquaintance with legal precedents and all the machinery and trickery of jurisprudence. It would be a delicate task to strike a balance between the profits accrued from the Mosaic law or the institutes of Justinian. The law and the profits go together. Mr. Foote, who heard some of the most eminent lawyers in the last generation, tells us that no practised lawyer approached Bradlaugh in grasp, subtlety, and skill in handling complicated cases and elucidating legal points.

Bradlaugh worked for the triumph of liberty and justice. The only fees he received were sleepless nights, bad health, and persecution. True heroism consists, not in doing things for glory and gold, but for the good of others. It shuns rewards and the applause of a fickle multitude who one day praise a man to the skies and the next day stone him. Such is the ingratitude of the world! Real happiness consists in increasing the happiness of others; and kindness to dumb animals is not less meritorius than kindness to our brothers and sisters.

Love of God is vague and vain, but the love of humanity should be our greatest aim. This is the love that passeth understanding. A grateful nation may sometimes raise monuments and sepulchral arches to glorify the life of a great man, but the most enduring monument is the worth of his own life.

Among the men and women who have influenced the thoughts and destinies of their contemporaries and left a deep mark on their own and future generations, Bradlaugh occupies a large place. He gave cheerfully and freely his life, health, pleasures, comforts, and wonderful gifts to the cause of true religion and human welfare—a man who has enriched his country, not by leaving millions of money, which no honest man can accumulate without wholesale exploitation, but by spreading the light of great ideas which mould human character and modify social institutions, bringing the human race nearer to the goal of complete emancipation from the slavery of the body and the mind. He left behind him a shining example of service and high aims. He was always in harness and had no time to be tired. The way to honor him is to walk in his footsteps—to remember that the best way to honor the dead is to discharge our duty towards the living. Life is too short for whining or frittering away in selfish occupations.

He is the true benefactor who boldly sweeps away from the human imagination a lie, a fraud, or a delusion, and plants the seeds of truth, harmony, and social order. To secure general happiness, the resources of nature, human learning, and art should be open to all.

Work is neither a blessing nor a curse, but a necessity, and ought to be made pleasant and shared by all.

The world was not leased by God or the Devil to a few choice individuals whose waste, idleness, and extravagance cause most of the miseries of mankind.

Bradlaugh's great aim was to readjust the claims of all on the lines of sanity, economic justice, and freedom. This is, in reality, the whole task of true statesmanship; the rest is all rhetoric and vanity.

Where there is poverty, ignorance, crime, disease, prostitution, political shuffling, and the spirit of war, there can be no order—no civilisation.

Given a free and enlightened people, who can measure the potentialities and possibilities of their lives?

Bradlaugh saw clearly and steadily the whole tragedy of a civilisation based on tyranny, stupidity, and supernatural beliefs. He had faith in man.

What a world this would have been if such great minds did not light up the dark places in men's minds.

He was one of those choice spirits—a true man. The world has produced greater men, but none more honest or more indispensable. No niche in any pantheon contains a nobler figure than Charles Bradlaugh.

Alleged Blasphemy.

"DR. KNICKOLI" BEFORE THE STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATE.
COMMITTED TO THE ASSIZES.

A LECTURER named Thomas William Stewart, alias "Dr. Knickoli," appeared at Wolverhampton Police Court this (Wednesday) afternoon, and was charged with committing blasphemy by attacking the truth of Christianity "by ribaldry, profanity, and indecency" on September 26 and 27.

He brought with him several books and sheets of MSS., and after explaining to the Stipendiary (Mr. N. C. A. Neville) that he wanted to make notes of the proceedings, he was accommodated with a seat behind the solicitors' bench.

Defendant's wife sat in the gallery—also taking notes.

Among the local gentlemen present were the Rev. J. A. Shaw, Alderman Price Lewis, Councillor W. Hodgson, etc.

Mr. K. Tweedale Meaby (Deputy-Town Clerk) prosecuted, and said three charges were being preferred. So far as they had been able to find out, the defendant was a prominent resident of Sheffield. He was a travelling lecturer and a seller of pamphlets, obscene literature, and very improper goods. From the evidence it seemed very clear that the man was endowed with an adequate supply of words for what he wanted to express.

Besides the charge of blasphemy already mentioned, Mr. Meaby said there was another charge of sending on September 29 a postal packet, a certain obscene article; and another, of offering for sale on September 26 a certain indecent object. The prosecution, Mr. Meaby said, did not suggest for a moment that there was any offence on the part of the defendant if he, with due gravity and propriety, contended that religion was untrue or if he attacked even the fundamentals of religion, but what the prosecution did allege was that he wilfully perverted, insulted, and misled others by licentious abuse applied to sacred subjects. He (Mr. Meaby) should submit that what the defendant said came within the definition of blasphemy in the English law.

The first charge was then taken.

Mr. Bernard W. Molton, sub-editor on the Express and Star, spoke to recording in shorthand the speeches of the defendant on the 26th and 27th ult., at Snowhill and on the Market Place respectively.

A transcript of the notes was read out by Mr. Meaby, and the defendant was promised a copy of the notes. They had reference to Scriptural passages and theological opinions. In one passage the defendant was alleged to have said that he would not mind doing three months at Stafford. "Nothing would please me better," he said, "than to be prosecuted. It would be a fine advertisement for me. I would not mind three months in every place in England."

Mr. Molton was cross-examined by the defendant, who occasionally became excited.

Detective-inspector Nixon corroborated.

Defendant (cross-examining): What do you mean by profanely scoffing at the Christian religion?—Witness: You were speaking with contempt of Jesus Christ.

Well, who is Jesus Christ?—I am not going to enter into an argument.

Digitized by Google

Can you make a thing that is not, ridiculous?—Now you are talking like a showman.

Detective-sergeant Jeffreys said he attended the meetings in question, and corroborated the evidence of the previous witnesses in every detail.

Detective-sergeant Murphy also said he corroborated the previous witnesses in every detail.

Defendant (cross-examining): Have you consulted me privately?

Witness: No, I have not.

Have I not your written request for private advice on a delicate subject?—Yes, you have; I asked for it for a purpose.

Then you aided and abetted me in doing wrong?—Oh, no. We wanted to see what the advice consisted of.

The Stipendiary: I don't think this has anything to do with the case.

Defendant went on to cross-examine witness regarding the correctness of the shorthand writer's transcript, and asked the witness if he could swear that the words read in the extracts were used?—Yes, when they are repeated.

Of course you could, damn it. I could expect that.

To the Stipendiary: I apologise to your worship—a figure of speech.

The Stipendiary remarked that a man would be a marvel if he remembered every word of a speech.

Defendant: But you have heard three witnesses swear that they can corroborate the exact words. Then a man who can corroborate it must be a marvel or a liar.

This was the case for the prosecution.

On being committed to the Stafford Assizes, the defendant said he would not say now what he had to say, as it would take some hours to do so.

The Stipendiary told him that bail would be allowed, himself in £50, and a surety of the same amount.

The defendant thought he had a man in Court who would go bail for him, but on asking for him he was found to be missing.

A travelling friend of the defendant ran out of Court to look for him, and as he was away some time, another man volunteered to go bail.

However, on entering the box, the volunteer was asked to take the oath, but he declined, saying, "I do not believe in anything of this."

Thereupon the Stipendiary observed that he would not take the bail offered unless the bondsman would swear.

The defendant appealed to the volunteer to take the oath "as a personal favor," but just then the Court doors opened, the missing man entered, and was bound over.

The second charge of sending through the post a certain obscene article was then preferred, the defendant pleading "not guilty."

Mr. Meaby remarked that the defendant was not only a lecturer upon religion, but a dealer in obscene literature.

The defendant asked for an adjournment so that he could prepare his defence. He was only informed of these other charges at eleven o'clock this (Wednesday) morning, he said.

The Stipendiary agreed to an adjournment of seven days, bail being allowed in his own recognisances of £25.

COLERIDGE ON GHOSTS.

Define a vulgar ghost with reference to all that is called ghost-like. It is visibility without tangibility; which is also the definition of a shadow. Therefore, a vulgar ghost and a shadow would be the same; because two different things cannot properly have the same definition. A visible substance without susceptibility of impact, I maintain to be an absurdity. Unless there be an external substance, the bodily eye cannot see it; therefore, in all such cases, that which is supposed to be seen is, in fact, not seen, but is an image of the brain. External objects naturally produce sensation; but here, in truth, sensation produces, as it were, the external object. In certain states of the nerves, however, I do believe that the eye, though not consciously so directed, may, by a slight convulsion, see a portion of the body, as if opposite to it. The part actually seen will by common association seem the whole; and the whole body will then constitute an external object, which explains many stories of persons seeing themselves lying dead. Bishop Berkeley once experienced this. He had the presence of mind to ring the bell, and feel his pulse; keeping his eye still fixed on his own figure right opposite to him. He was in a high fever, and the brain image died away as the door opened. I observed something very like it once at Grasmere; and was so conscious of the cause, that I told a person what I was experiencing, whilst the image still remained. Of course, if the vulgar ghost be really a shadow, there must be some substance of which it is a shadow. These visible and intangible shadows, without substance to cause them, are absurd.—Coleridge, "Table Talk."

What is meant by Conscience? If it means the perception of right and wrong, it is an intellectual faculty, which varies in individuals and societies, some having greater discrimination than others. If it means the recognition of distinct, settled categories of right and wrong, it depends on social and religious training. In a high state of civilisation these categories approximate to the laws of social welfare and disease; in a low state of civilisation they are fantastic and fearfully distorted by superstition. There is hardly a single vice that has not been practised as a virtue under a religious sanction. Finally, if conscience means the feeling of obligation, the sense of "I ought," it is a product of social evolution. It is necessarily generated among gregarious beings, and in the course of time Natural Selection weeds out the individuals in whom it is lacking or deficient. Social types of feeling survive, and the anti-social perish. And this is the whole "mystery" of conscience.—G. W. Foote, "Ingersolliem Defended Against Archdeacon Farrar."

MIDDLE-CLASS RELIGION.

The religion of this vast English middle-class ruling the land is Comfort. It is their central thought; their idea of necessity; their sole aim. Whatsoever ministers to Comfort—seems to belong to it—pretends to support it, they yield their passive worship to. Whatsoever alarms it they join to crush. There you get at their point of unity. They will pay for the security of Comfort, calling it national worship, or national defence, if too much money is not subtracted from the means of individual comfort: if too much foresight is not demanded for the comfort of their brains.—Dr. Shrapnel, in George Meredith's "Beauchamp's Career."

MORALS AND MIND.

Imagination or mind employed in prophetically imaging forth its objects, is that faculty of human nature on which every gradation of its progress, nay, every, the minutest, change, depends. Pain or pleasure, if subtly analysed, will be found to consist entirely in prospect. The only distinction between the selfish man and the virtuous man is, that the imagination of the former is confined within a narrow limit, whilst that of the latter embraces a comprehensive circumstance. In this sense, wisdom and virtue may be said to be inseparable, and criteria of each other. Selfishness is the offspring of ignorance and mistake; it is the portion of unreflecting infancy, and savage solitude, or of those whom toil or evil occupations have blunted or rendered torpid; disinterested benevolence is the product of a cultivated imagination, and has an intimate connection with all the arts which add ornament, or dignity, or power, or stability to the social state of man. Virtue is thus entirely a refinement of civilised life.—Shelley.

The true philosophy is to retire within oneself, and listen to the voice of reason, amid the stillness of the passions.—Rousseau.

AN ACCOMPLISHED MINISTER.

Church service was over on Christmas morning and three prominent members walked home together, discussing the sermon.

"I tell you," said the first, enthusiastically, "Doctor Blank can certainly dive deeper into the truth than any preacher I ever heard."

"Y-es," said the second man, "and he can stay under longer."

"Yes," said the third, "and come up drier."

'Tis a good thing preachers don't go to Congress. Whin they're ca'm they'd wipe out all th' laws, an' whin they're excited they'd wipe out all th' popylation. They're niver two jumps fr'm th' thumbscrow.—Mr. Dooley.

SPIRITUAL CONSOLATION.

Husband (sarcastically): "Well, my dear, did you derive much consolation from your attendance at church this morning?"

Wife (enthusiastically): "Rather! Mrs. Gibbs had on that old blue hat of hers, and I sat right in front of her the whole morning."

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 42 SUNDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

MR. BRADLAUGH WAS AN ATHEIST, BUT HIS STANDARD OF DUTY WAS A VERY HIGH ONE, AND HE LIVED UP TO IT. HIS LIFE WAS AN EXAMPLE TO MANY CHRISTIANS, FOR HE ABOUNDED IN EVERY CHRISTIAN VIRTUE.

—Henry Labouchere.

"Labby" and Bradlaugh.

The Life of Henry Labouchere. By Algar Labouchere Thorold. London: Constable & Co. 18s. nett.

MR. THOROLD has written a very entertaining, and by no means uninstructive, book about one of the most curious and fascinating personalities in the public life of England during the second half of the nineteenth century. I came across Henry Labouchere a good deal myself in the 'eighties. With Sir Wilfrid Lawson and Mr. Samuel Storey, he was connected with the People's League for the Abolition of the House of Lords, of whose Committee I was a member. I met him several times in connection with the work of the then youthful Metropolitan Radical Federation. And of course I saw something of him in connection with Bradlaugh's parliamentary struggle. On the whole, therefore, I am in a position to say, without impermissible temerity, that this Biography presents a lifelike portrait of the man who was universally called "Labby."

It is not my purpose in this article, however, to deal any farther with the book in general. I have to confine myself mainly to the chapter headed "Labouchere and Bradlaugh."

This chapter is of profound interest to Freethinkers. Mr. Thorold does justice to Bradlaugh as well as to Labouchere. These two men, so dissimilar in their personalities, yet so similar in opinions and objects, were thrown together in the struggle for the constitutional right of an English constituency to be represented by the man of its own choice in the House of Commons. This, and this only, was the issue in that great contest. Bradlaugh never denied the right of the House of Commons to expel him if it chose. What he denied was its right to refuse him admittance. A member must be in before he can be turned out. That is plain logic; it was also the law of England, as Bradlaugh succeeded in demonstrating. Fortunately the borough of Northampton elected Labouchere as his parliamentary colleague. They fitted each other to a nicety. Bradlaugh fought like a Trojan outside; Labouchere fought with at least the wiles of Ulysses inside. The final victory was won between them; although, of course, Bradlaugh was the Titan of the mighty struggle.

It was extraordinarily lucky that Labouchere was not only a Radical like Bradlaugh, but a Freethinker to boot. He laughed at being called "the Christian member for Northampton." It was one of the best, if unintentional, jokes of the age. Mr. Thorold takes care to make it plain that "the Christian member for Northampton" had no intellectual differences with the Atheist member. He raises that point early in the Preface:—

> "In his personal outlook on things he was as completely non-religious as a man could be. He was not anti-religious. He fully recognised the utility of religious belief in others, perhaps even in society at large, and he based this recognition not so much on the hardness of men's hearts as on the thickness of their heads. But personally he, Henry Labouchere, took no interest whatever in the matter. In philosophy he was a strict agnostic, owning Hume, for whom he had the greatest admiration, and the Kant of the Critique of Pure Reason, as his masters. And he was remarkably well read in the works of those philosophers."

Labouchere was as cynical and witty as Bradlaugh was passionately earnest. "I do not mind Mr. Gladstone always having an ace up his sleeve," he once said, "but I do object to his always saying that Providence put it there." Spoken in Labouchere's soft, bland voice, the witticism must have been irresistible. He was not a propagandist, but his convictions were held tenaciously. On this point one may quote the following sentences from Mr. Thorold:—

> "It has often been pointed out that the difference between religious and irreligious people does not lie so much in opinion as in temperament. Labouchere had an essentially irreligious nature, he was a born impeí, as the French say: Mr. Bradlaugh had the soul of a Covenanter. As far as speculative religious opinions were concerned, they practically coincided."

It is not quite clear to me, at any rate, how the difference between religion and irreligion can rest upon a mere basis of temperament. This is to exclude it from all relation to the intellect. Yet the remark about Labouchere seems sound enough. The reader who does not know French must, unfortunately, be told that there is no English equivalent for impie.

One may pause at this point to quote a striking passage from Mr. Thorold stating his view of the inner meaning of Bradlaugh's battle with the House of Commons, and the significance of his ultimate victory.

> "This means that the modern state is non-theistic, and that our civilisation, of which the state is the political expression, is based on those positive social needs of man, to which theological problems, however interesting in themselves, are irrelevant. Thus, in Bradlaugh's victory, to the winning of which Mr. Labouchere so powerfully contributed, one of the most important principles of 1789 was definitely ratified by the representatives of the people, the Lords, spiritual and temporal, and the sovereign of this country. A truly momentous event, the importance of which it would be hard to overestimate. For it means that God has ceased to exist in England as a political entity."

I should personally endorse this judgment—in spite of the sporadic application of the unrepealed laws against "blasphemy" and "profanity." No front-rank Freethinker has been attacked for a great many years, and any such attack would probably be unsuccessful, especially if initiated in London. Provincial prosecutions do not excite national interest, unless the persons aimed at are of national reputation—which, from the very nature of the case, is unlikely.

Mr. Thorold calls Bradlaugh "that upright and greatly persecuted man." He pillories some of the bigoted Christians who referred to "Iconoclast" as "the bellowing blasphemer" and in other charitable ways. But the best tributes to Bradlaugh in this chapter come from the pen of Labouchere himself. The following was written soon after Bradlaugh's death.

Digitized by Google

"Mr. Bradlaugh was my colleague for ten years. During all these years our relations, political and personal, were always of the most cordial character. He was in private life a thoroughly true and amiable man, while in public life he was ever ready to sacrifice popularity to his convictions of what was right. He was, as is known, an atheist, but his standard of duty was a very high one, and he lived up to it. His life was an example to Christians, for he abounded in every Christian virtue. This the House of Commons came at last to recognise. I do not think there is a single member more popular or more respected on both sides than he was on both sides. Often and often Conservatives have, in a friendly way, said to me: 'What a much better man your colleague is than you are!' And I heartily agreed with them."

Here is another passage worth reproducing:—

"Regarding money, he was more than disinterested. So that he had enough to pay for his food, his clothes, and for his modest lodging in St. John's Wood, he never seemed to trouble himself as to ways and means."

Nor must one overlook the following:—

"He had a great affection for his books, and the only time I ever saw him disquieted about money matters was when he feared that he might have to give them up, owing to some bankruptcy proceedings that were threatened, in consequence of one of his numerous actions on the oaths question."

Bradlaugh's death as an Atheist has never been questioned except by hopelessly foolish or blackguardly Christians. Mr. Labouchere's last hours were in keeping with the rest of his life. Mr. Thorold says:—

"The earliest remark of Mr. Labouchere's that I have recorded in this book was a jest, and so was the last I heard him utter. On the afternoon of the day before he died, as I was sitting at his bedside, the spirit lamp that kept the fumes of eucalyptus in constant movement about his room, through some awkwardness of mine, was overturned. Mr. Labouchere, who was dozing, opened his eyes at the sound of the little commotion caused by the accident, and perceived the flare-up. 'Flames?' he murmured interrogatively. 'Not yet, I think.' He laughed quizzically, and went off to sleep again."

He was near his long sleep, and he had earned it.

Materialism: Its Meaning and Value.

THANKS to Sir Oliver Lodge, "Materialism" is a little more in evidence just now than is usual. Despite the stock assertion that Materialism, as a mode of scientific or philosophic thinking, is dead, the British Association Address has been welcomed as a much-needed declaration against the Materialistic theories of scientific thinkers. Their welcome has, therefore, been also a confession. It made plain the existence of great uneasiness concerning this alleged corpse. They all agreed that Materialism was dead, but the agreement was wholly between themselves. They inspired each other with courage by a mutual assurance that no enemy was present. But when a scientific man did say a word in favor of ghosts — disguised as "discarnate human intelligences"—and the supernatural—respectably clothed as a "directive mind"—the relief experienced was great indeed. Strange that there should have been so much thankfulness for a promise of help against an enemy who does not exist!

The truth is that this expressed belief in the death of scientific Materialism is no more than an elaborate pretence. Materialism is not dead; it was never more alive than at present, and was never more generally recognised as the very groundwork of scientific research. I am not, of course, thinking of the bogies that some people create and call Materialism. Nor do I mean that all the theories propounded by Materialists from time to time have been either justified by results or are still worthy of credence. I mean by Materialism the principle which—for want of a better phrase—has now come to be known as "mechanistic"; and it may safely be said that this rules to-day without serious challenge. To put the whole matter pointedly, even defiantly, to be scientific is to be Materialistic. To be a Materialist is the first requisite of the scientific worker.

Exactly what Materialism means I hope to be able to show later. At present my chief aim is to emphasise its place in the world of thought and its potency as an instrument in interpreting natural phenomena.

There is no line of cleavage in the intellectual world at all comparable to that which separates naturalism from supernaturalism. Between the two there is no logical middle term. There have been endless "harmonies" of the two, from the days of the Greeks down to Sir Oliver Lodge; but these have very seldom outlived those who proposed them, and in the end the two views have been left unreconciled and irreconcilable. This line of cleavage is not only the deepest in the intellectual world; it is also the oldest. It meets us at the very beginning of orderly reasoning about man and the world. The naturalistic interpretation gives us the very birth of what we call science, and it gave the first definite challenge to an all-controlling supernaturalism. At the end of several thousands of years these two views are still confronted. The fight for the ruling interpretation of nature still lies between the naturalist and the supernaturalist. It is true that no one now gives complete adherence to supernaturalism. The mechanistic interpretation is admitted to be sound, even though limitations are predicated. And it is equally true that the naturalism of many falls short of completeness. Under the guise of philosophy—some seem to think that philosophy is above the operations of scientific method—a pseudo supernaturalism still obtains; but the two views still represent the logical extremes of thought, and it is between these two that the battle must ultimately be fought. All other conflicts are affairs of outposts only. And the one permanent feature in this long contest has been the controversy over what has been known as Materialism.

"Materialism," says Lange, in the first sentence of his classic, History of Materialism, "is as old as philosophy, but not older." It was an apt rebuke to those who were more concerned with superficialities than with fundamentals. One might go even further than Lange and say that if we take philosophy as either the equivalent of organised knowledge, or the search for a verifiable principle of unity, then Materialism marks the very beginnings of sound philosophy. Human mental life begins in a world of delusion. The earth is flat, not round. The stars, so far off, are within almost grasping distance. The imaginary is as real as the actual. The simple appears complex, and the complex simple. Words play the part of things, and things are without constancy and order. If the world had been deliberately created by a deity whose whole aim it was to deceive man, the situation could not have been better devised. For long ages, so far as men think about the causes of things, their thoughts are radically false. The great task before man has always been to release himself from the snare of mere appearance and from the cloud of fantastic beliefs that usurp the place of theories based upon verifiable facts.

Under these conditions, the first step towards improvement, whether in ancient or modern times, is by way of pointing to a principle or to facts that appeal to all minds, to which all may refer, and which are above the coercion of mere fantastic theory. And unsatisfactory as were some of the early forms of Materialistic teaching, nothing else could have broken through the thick cloud of fable that blocked the way to useful knowledge.

It is to the credit of ancient Greece that—so far as we have any reliable records—the first attempt at a really scientific interpretation of nature began in that country. And it must be placed to the credit of Materialism that it commenced in an assertion of a principle to which Materialism has always remained true. When Thales affirmed water to be the cause of all things; or Aixemenes, air; or Heraclitus, motion; or Empedocles, the four elements; there was affirmed the principle that natural phenomena owed their existence to the operation of forces inherent in nature itself. The need of external control was questioned, a principle of natural examination indicated, and an inevitable conflict initiated. The great battle between naturalism and supernaturalism, between science and theology, had commenced. Henceforth there were only two logical camps in the mental world. The one tracing everything to the operation of natural causes; the other, not indeed denying their operation, but asserting their ineffectiveness without a guiding or creative divine mind. From Thales down to Sir Oliver Lodge these two forms have, to use a biological phrase, "bred true." They were represented at the British Association of a few weeks ago, as they were in the streets of Greece—albeit the relative strength of the two parties had undergone a profound alteration.

An advance of profound importance was made by another Greek thinker—Democritus. With truth he might have said, "Give me atoms and I will give you a world." Only fragments remain of his writings, but his philosophy, which reappears in Epicurus, and over and over again in the history of science, was saved from extinction by its clarity. His main teachings were that nothing comes from nothing, and nothing can be destroyed. Here was an affirmation of the principles upon which all science rests—the indestructibility of matter and the conservation of energy.* Everything, he said, has a cause and happens by necessity. Things are constantly being formed and constantly changing, and the variety of things in the world is due to the variety of the atoms and their innumerable modes of combination. But, beside the atoms and empty space, there is nothing but opinion. Democritus left no room for Deity, nothing for him to do; no room for that popular bugbear, design in nature. He saw that the causes of things have to be found in things themselves; and his teachings, faulty as they were, may be regarded as the most valuable contribution made by a single individual to the entire structure of scientific thought.

Metaphysicians and priests might contest these principles, but, once enumerated, there was small possibility of their being altogether ignored. Henceforth, they remain a power to be reckoned with. Epicurus gave them greater literary expression, and applied them to ethics. Lucretius, in one of the most remarkable pieces of writing that antiquity has given us, worked out a complete system from which the supernatural is definitely excluded. His main object was to show that nature did all things by itself, although tradition and ignorance attributed them to the gods. Had human thought continued the line of investigation marked out by the best of the ancient Greeks, the scientific discoveries and wonders of the past century might easily have been the world's possession centuries ago. How much the world lost by the overthrow of Pagan civilisation, no one can tell. It is only gradually that we have learned to partially appreciate how much the ancients knew, and the measure of our knowledge in this direction supplies us with some indication of the world's loss by the Christian conquest.

This, however, we can say with absolute certainty. Just as it was ancient Materialism that cut a way through the mass of fable and theology that prevented mankind setting out in an intelligent search for truth, so, at the Renaissance, and again in the seventeenth century, and yet again in our own days, all real advance has been dependent upon a tacit or avowed recognition of those basic principles of which Materialism has never ceased to assert the validity.

C. Cohen.

* Perhaps it is necessary to point out that the disintegration of the atom does not involve, as some people seem to imagine, the annihilation of "matter." It can only prove that the atom is no longer to be held as the primal form of matter. Materialism is quite unaffected by the fact.

Dogmatism and Subterfuge.

In its "Men and Matters" department the British Congregationalist for October 9 charges Mr. Bernard Shaw with taking "so great a delight in doing evil." The particular evil alluded to is that of attacking the Christian religion in the new play, Androcles and the Lion, now being acted at the St. James's Theatre. That journal is of opinion that it is the duty of ministers of the Gospel to recognise this evil and denounce it with unsparing severity. One clergyman, at least, seems to have discharged that obligation with remarkable thoroughness. The Rev. Arthur Hill, of Tollington Park, London, according to a report in the religious newspaper just mentioned, recently characterised Androcles and the Lion as "a brilliant flank attack on the Christian religion." He said:—

> "How any intelligent man can imagine that this drama is enacted to expound the beauty of the Christian religion, or to defend or uphold it in any form, passes my comprehension. You have there one of the most alert intellects of our age obviously in open warfare with everything that the Christian religion has stood for during twenty centuries."

Mr. Hill waxed exceedingly vehement as he piled words upon words in condemnation of this wicked drama, in which Christian martyrs are treated as "snivelling, sponging, greedy hypocrites," the God of the New Testament is deleted, and the crucified Christ banished. Having worked himself up into a very high pitch of indignation, the reverend gentleman exclaimed:—

> "I am with every man who is on our side. I am against every man who is against our faith. I am with every Church, great or small, that believes in Jesus Christ and his Gospel. I am at war to the knife with every man who dares to make that faith the theme of foolish and flippant jests."

As we read that extract two things suggest themselves to us. The first is that Mr. Hill, in the heat of that exuberant diatribe, completely forgot his vocation as preacher of the Gospel of redeeming love. It is his business to be for all men in the hope of winning them to Christ. Mr. Bernard Shaw is one of the people for whose salvation the Son of God died, and, surely, to be against him, as Mr. Hill declares himself to be, is equivalent to being against the loving Savior of mankind. The second thing is that if the reverend gentleman is resolved to be against every man who rejects and assails the Christian creed he has his work fully cut out for him. He will have to be against millions upon millions of his fellow-beings.

The opponents of Christianity are spoken of as evil-doers, but it happens that they are thus described by utterly incompetent judges. By what authority do Mr. Hill and his followers sit in judgment upon Mr. Shaw and those who agree with him? The former have nothing but the fact of their belief to support them, while the latter challenge that belief in the name of common sense. The strangest fact of all, in this connection, is that the Christian's faith and knowledge contradict each other on every point. He believes that the Gospel is the power of an omnipotent and all-loving God unto salvation, but knows that it is nothing of the kind. He believes that the risen and ascended Christ occupies the throne of the Universe and reigns, though he knows that he does neither; and he glorifies this imaginary king by putting his knowledge under a bushel and diligently nursing his faith. Now, if Christianity were true, faith and knowledge would be, not only in absolute agreement, but literally identical. The fact that they are so deeply at variance utterly disqualifies a Christian for speaking with authority on any Christian topic, and deprives him of the right to treat anti-Christians as doers of evil.

So far as the report of his sermon is concerned, Mr. Hill comes before us an unblushing dogmatist, who takes it for granted that to be against his faith is to be on the broad road that leadeth to destruction. This is so self-evident that it would be a culpable waste of time even to attempt to prove it. So Mr. Hill indulges in an uncompromising and unqualified dogmatism. He realises how difficult it is to fight "the men who stab us in the back, make us the byword and scorn of the world, and then tell us that they are doing us good," and so he prefers open foes to those who make brilliant flank attacks, though he deals with both in his own haughty, cavalier fashion. It is possible, however, that he abstains from argument because it is so rare a commodity on his side. Faith is always fancy's child, never reason's, and whenever an attempt is made to argue on its behalf it proves quite futile. We have a telling example of this in the Correspondence of the Rev. Professor David Smith, D.D., in the British Weekly for October 9. A Belfast student, who avows himself practically an Agnostic, asks the Professor a few pertinent questions, such as, On the assumption that a God of love exists, how do you explain the cruelties practised in connection with the Jewish Tabernacle ritual? Do you believe that such a God ordered the total destruction of whole communities, innocent and guilty alike? On the same assumption, how do you account for the appalling cruelty of Nature which one witnesses every day? "Could a God of love have created creatures who must subsist by preying upon others weaker than themselves?" Those questions are genuine posers, and no one knows it better than Dr. Smith. He does not even try to answer them; he merely shuffles, trifles with words, but never comes to the point. He taunts the student with his serious lack of up-to-dateness, his old-fashioned standpoint, the standpoint of "a blind and stupid orthodoxy" which held sway fifty years ago. "The plain fact is," he says, "that your theory of the Universe is at least fifty years old: you contemplate those difficulties from the pre-Darwinian point of view." Then he adds:—

> "A detailed discussion of your difficulties is impossible here; but this much may be said—that it would be like the breaking of the morning if you got hold of the principle of evolution, and applied it to your perplexities. History is an evolution—the gradual unfolding of the Divine purpose, the slow and painful growth of humanity toward an ever fuller maturity."

The plain fact is that Dr. Smith completely evades the difficulties raised by the Belfast student. The principle of evolution offers no solution of them, but leaves them just exactly where they were before it was discovered. The facts of cruelty, suffering, and sorrow in the Universe are not affected in the least by your acceptance or rejection of the Darwinian hypothesis. If a God of love exists, the evolutionary process has been under his guidance at every step from the very start. Who can contemplate the awful suffering attending the struggle for existence without being filled with shuddering horror? Is it not incredible that it can have been under the direction of an all-powerful, all-wise, and all-loving Heavenly Father?

There is nothing easier than to speak contemptuously of "the blind and stupid orthodoxy" of fifty years ago; but it does not seem to us that Dr. Smith's orthodoxy is one whit less "blind and stupid." Take the following specimen:—

> "The Bible is the record of revelation, and revelation is an historical process—God's gradual self-discovery in the national life of Israel. Consider what this means. At the outset Israel stood on the common level of Heathenism, and God revealed himself to her little by little as she was able to receive it."

Where was God prior to his "self-discovery in the national life of Israel"? Why did he choose to find himself in the national life of Israel, rather than in that of the Egyptians or the Greeks? Or on the supposition that he did reveal himself as a stupendous respecter of persons in his selection of Israel as the medium of his gradual self-discovery, why was not Israel ever so much better in every respect than all other nations, and why did he allow her to be scattered abroad and eventually lost for ever? Was such conduct, such glaring favoritism, worthy of a Deity of infinite justice and love? Even Judah fared no better in the end than Israel. She crucified his only begotten Son, and as a punishment was driven out of her own land and permitted to become a despised, rejected, and cruelly persecuted race for upwards of fifteen hundred years. These are stubborn facts, and no theory of evolution, on any Theistic basis, affords the slightest explanation of them. Dr. Smith only complicates the whole subject by his introduction of a self-discovering Divinity as a superintending agent into the evolutionary process in which, according to his own admission, "existing types have been evolved by the forces of environment and the struggle for existence." This strange admission is made in answer to the question, "Did God create beasts of prey?" but by making it the Professor virtually gives the case for Theism completely away. If God had no share in the evolution of beasts of prey, why should it be necessary to assign him any share in the production of man? He makes practically the same concession in connection with the extermination of whole communities in Old Testament warfare. He says:—

> "All this, like the polygamy and concubinage of the patriarchs, belongs to a rudimentary stage in the development of civilisation, in the process of moral and religious evolution."

Of course; but all this is wholly inexplicable on the assumption that the process of evolution has always been under the charge of an infinitely powerful, wise, and good God.

Professor Smith wonders that the student's love of animals has not made him a better theologian. We rather think that his love of animals may have discredited his theology and made him an Agnostic. What is beyond controversy is that Dr. Smith's endeavors to amalgamate Theism and Darwinism are ridiculous in the extreme. The truth is that we must choose either Theism or Darwinism, for we cannot have both and retain our sanity.

The Secret of Victor Hugo.

Among the cheap reprints of the works of famous authors, it is doubtful if there has been one that has given more general satisfaction than this fine edition of the works of Victor Hugo, which has been issued by the enterprising house of Messrs. Nelson. Swinburne, who often wrote extravagantly, but never at random, has proclaimed with all his unrivalled eloquence that Hugo was the greatest of his contemporaries. Apart from Swinburne's admiration of Hugo, his knowledge of the great Frenchman's writings was unequalled, and his appreciation was always pleasant and inspiring.

Swinburne was never half-hearted, and he always came charging down the wind like a knight in armor. Les Chatiments he described as "a book written in lightning"; Les Contemplations as written in "sunlight and starlight." He boldly proclaimed La Legende de Siecles to be "the greatest book published in the nineteenth century," Les Miserables to be "the greatest epic and dramatic work ever created or conceived"; Les Travailleurs de la Mer to be "a work unsurpassed even among the works of its author for splendor of imagination and of style"; and Quatre vingt-treize to be "a work as rich in thought, in tenderness, in wisdom, and in humor, and in pathos, as ever was cast into the mould of poetry or fiction." Finally, he calls Hugo "one of the very greatest among poets and among men."

It would be difficult to undervalue the insight and sympathy which marks this generous appreciation of the great English poet to the great Frenchman whom he ever regarded as his master. Hugo's work was very different from the jewelled toys turned out of the literary workshops at the time. As often grandiose as grand, he was at least a master artist, and, compared with others, his work was as the ocean to a millpond. Each succeeding volume from his pen abundantly proved his genius. The French language had been ransacked for centuries, yet here was a man who was able to introduce new rhymes by the dozen, and not merely grotesque rhymes, but for the loftiest purposes of poetry. Nothing shows his command of language and his prodigious vocabulary more than this. He was, indeed, a Napoleon of verse, and the prefaces to his verses remind one not a little of the Emperor's addresses to his army. They read like the addresses to poetic victories. Even when words are put into God's mouth, for Hugo used deity as Shakespeare did witches, we cannot help seeing the deific alias of Hugo.

It is characteristic, too, that all shades of religious opinion should be ably represented in his pages. Theism, Pantheism, Atheism, every mood, from a glowing optimism to a cynical despair is there. He would have sympathised with Septimus Severus, who kept a bust of Christ in his private room, "along with Jupiter, Orpheus, and other creatures of the same kind."

Hugo is plainly not at home upon "sacred ground." He was too much of a Voltairean to write like Dante, Calderon, or Milton. He cared no more for that reservoir of falsehood, the Bible, than he did for Herodotus, Ossian, or Sismondi. To write successfully upon Christian themes, a man must feel as a Christian. Hugo's piety was but a reflex of the sentimental interludes in his life, inserted between the Freethought of his mother and the scepticism of his later years.

Hugo's chief prose works, Les Miserables and Les Travailleurs de la Mer, possess that hold upon the reader which is the distinguishing mark of every book that deserves to be called a literary masterpiece; but I sometimes think that Hugo's life is more dramatic and is more attractive than anything that he wrote. His long and chequered career was filled with experiences of the most diverse kind. He mixed with princes, he knew the men and women of the streets, he was well known in the political arena, the wide worlds of literature and the theatre were open to him. He knew the extremes of triumph and exile; at one time the popular idol, and at another eating the bitter bread of banishment.

The story of his exile gives dignity to a stormy life. For nineteen dark years his voice did not falter nor his heart fail. From Jersey and Guernsey he dispatched that marvellous series of songs and satires which passed secretly from hand to hand in France, and were read with tears and cries of rage during that reign of terror which ended in the downfall of the Second Empire. These poems were veritable bombshells in the political arena, for Hugo wrote poetry as an eagle flies, and his devastating genius rocked the French political world out of its complacency.

Did ever despot suffer such impeachment as the pinchbeck Napoleon the little? Was ever monarch attacked in such grand and sonorous lines with such sinewy rhetoric, sounding declamation, pictorial richness? The barbed words of the author were carried over hill and dale, over even the ocean, and found their responsive chords in humble people living in small towns and remote villages, and became to them things which marked out one day from another by the ecstasy of intense emotion.

The love of liberty and of democracy has been a common possession of the great poets, but few have surpassed Victor Hugo in the ardor of his devotion and in the rapture of his praise. An avowed Freethinker and an unashamed Republican, Hugo always stood in the very forefront of the battle. In his lyrics we find a most magnificent expression of the claims of the indomitable human spirit which stands erect in the presence of adverse fortune and bids defiance to all malign fate. There is no finer ethical inspiration than breathes through the unforgettable lines of his inspired utterance. Let Valjean, the convict, Gilliat, the fisherman, Gavroche, the street urchin, speak of his humanity; and the superb crown of song laid on the altar of Liberty proclaim his love of Freedom. It was a most animating message that the great French Freethinkers of the eighteenth century bequeathed as a legacy to the nineteenth century. Equally inspiring was the message of this great poet of the nineteenth century brought to the twentieth as a gift, and it is of splendid augury for the future that liberty in our day should have received such a glorious coronal of song as had never before been laid at her feet:—

> "Our glorious century gone
> Beheld no head that shone
> More clear across the storm, above the foam,
> More steadfast in the fight
> Of warring night and light
> True to the truth whose star leads heroes home."

Mr. Chesterton's Challenge.

CONCERNING an "Acid Drop" dealing with the Infallibility of the Pope, which appeared in this journal for October 5, and is to be found on p. 632, Mr. Cecil Chesterton writes as follows:—

> "SIR,—Must I own that I had completely 'forgotten that for ages there was a bitter conflict between Augustinianism and Arianism, now the one and now the other being ex-cathedra pronounced orthodox'? Would the author of your 'Acid Drops' mind refreshing my unfortunate memory by mentioning, say, one or two of the many occasions upon which Arianism was officially approved by the Holy See? Also, by the way, why 'Augustinianism'? I do not impugn the orthodoxy of St. Augustin's faith, but I cannot recall that he had anything whatever to do with the Arian controversy. Are you perhaps thinking of St. Athanasius?"

We thank Mr. Chesterton for giving us the opportunity to enlarge upon and prove the statements made in the "Acid Drop" in question. Of course, the term "Augustinianism" was used in a loose, general sense, to cover the doctrines usually known as orthodox in the Catholic Church. Every Church historian knows that there is no essential difference between the tenets advocated by Athanasius and those championed later by Augustine. Again, the paragraph under discussion did not contain the words "Holy See," as employed by Mr. Chesterton. Technically speaking, the "Holy See," never approved of Arianism, for the simple reason that it did not exist during the Arian controversy. What the "Acid Drop" contended was, that Arianism had been ex cathedra—from the chair, or with authority—pronounced orthodox on repeated occasions. From the beginning, Holy Church, as the Body of Christ, or the Temple of the Holy Ghost, has been held to be infallible; and we are quite willing to admit that this view is legitimately based upon definite New Testament declarations. Nothing is more undeniable, however, than that this infallible Church has always been the scene of the most acrimonious controversies. The followers of the Lamb have invariably been notorious for their unlamblike characteristics. Their quarrelsomeness was a byword. They quarrelled for generations about the Trinity, while their disputes over the person of Christ lasted some three hundred years. The ineffable relations of the Godhead were a subject, the discussion of which roused the passions of all classes to positive fury. As Eusebius tells us, "Bishop rose against bishop, district against district, only to be compared to the Symplegades dashed against each other on a stormy day." Speaking of Constantinople, Gregory of Nyssa informs us that "Every corner, every alley of the city, was full of these discussions—the streets, the market-places, the drapers, the money-changers, the victuallers. Ask a man 'how many oboli,' he answers by dogmatising on generated and ungenerated being. Inquire the price of bread, and you are told, 'The Son is subordinate to the Father.' Ask if the bath is ready and you are told, 'The Son arose out of nothing.'"

It was to put an end to these disputes that the first General Council was convened by Constantine the Great. This famous Council met at Nicæa in 325. It was one of the stormiest assemblies ever held. The two men around whom the tempest raged were Athanasius and Arius, who hated each other as only two Christians could. Illustrative of the extent to which the Holy Fathers were under the control of unholy passions, there is an old legend to the effect that the Right Reverend Bishop of Myra made an exhibition of his Christian gentleness by dealing a blow, with all his force, at Arius's jaw. In the end, by a snatch vote, Athanasius won, while Arius was sentenced to a life of exile. Ten years later, another Council was convened at Tyre, before which Athanasius appeared as defendant instead of Arius. In ten short years the tables had been completely turned, Athanasius being now deposed and banished, while Arius was to be received in triumph at Constantinople. After the banishment of Athanasius, a synod, held at Jerusalem, examined the new confession of faith submitted by Arius, and pronounced it orthodox. Still another Council, convened at Antioch, reaffirmed the deposition of Athanasius, and promulgated anew the Arian creed. It is also a well-known fact in ecclesiastical history that the great Italian Council of Ariminum lapsed into Arianism, some say by an oversight. The truth is that, as Dean Milman puts it, "The two great patriarchates of the East, Constantinople and Alexandria, brought to issue, or strove to bring to issue, their rival claims to ascendency, and council after council promulgated, reversed, and re-enacted their conflicting decrees."

We hope we have now sufficiently refreshed Mr. Chesterton's "unfortunate memory" to enable him to see that the claim to infallibility for either Pope, Council, or Synod is unspeakably absurd, so absurd that only blind faith, such as the Church always demands, can tolerate it. All through her history, from the days of the Apostles to our own, the Christian Church has been mainly occupied in promulgating, reversing, and re-enacting her contradictory and irreconcilable decrees; and even to day it is only by the exercise of arbitrary authority, as the Modernists well know, that anything like peaceful unanimity can be maintained.

ANCIENT HINDU SCEPTICISM.

Did God exist, omniscient, kind,
And never speak his will in vain,
'Twould cost him but a word, and then
His suppliants all they wish would find.
If God to men allotted woe
Although that woe the fruit must be
Of men's own actions, then were he
Without a cause his creatures' foe,
More cruel thus than men who ne'er
To others causeless malice bear.

—Muir's "Religious and Moral Sentiments from Sanscrit Writers."

FREE WILL.

Men deceive themselves in this, that they think themselves free. Now, in what consists such opinion? Solely in this, that they are conscious of their actions, and ignore the causes that determine them. The idea that men have of their liberty comes, then, from this, that they know not the cause of their actions, for to say that these depend on the will is to use words to which no meaning is attached.—Spinoza.

OLD AND NEW FAITH.

Faith in a divine power, devout obedience to its supposed will, hope of ecstatic unspeakable reward, these were the springs of the old movement. Undivided love of our fellows, steadfast faith in human nature, steadfast search after justice, firm aspiration towards improvement, and generous contentment in the hope that others may reap whatever reward may be, these are the springs of the new.—John Morley.

Acid Drops.

Holy Russia is Jew-baiting again. One almost shudders at the awful picture of superstition and fanaticism. This "Ritual Murder" trial is as bad as the old prosecutions for witchcraft. If you want one overwhelming indictment of Christianity, point to the Jews. And if you want a new proof of the greatness of Shakespeare's heart and the grandeur of his genius, turn to that matchless passage in the Merchant of Venice where Shylock voices the protest of his race against ages of Christian inhumanity. What intellect, what passion, pouring in a torrent from the Master's soul! And it was written more than three hundred years ago, when all Europe was sunk in the barbarism that Russia lies in now.

The Bishop of London objects to the Churches taking money from people who employ girls at starvation wages, and drive them to prostitution to eke out a living. We have nothing whatever to say against the Bishop's objection, except that it is rather late in the day to raise it, and if it were acted on the Churches would soon be short of funds. It is notorious that, among sweaters of labor, religious people figure very prominently; and, indeed, if all religious employers paid a fair wage, the problem of underpaid labor could be very easily dealt with. Moreover, why draw the line at sweating? What of the revenues of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, derived from slum areas and the like? Will the Bishop refuse that portion of his salary which comes from these sources? We doubt it. We remember the Bishop explaining that his £10,000 per year was barely enough to make ends meet, and we scarcely think he will do anything that would mean a reduction of income. Similar objections to the Bishop's have been raised before, but they are mostly intended for the shop window. They know the advice will not be acted upon; and, if it were, those who give it would be the first to explain that their words had been wrongly construed.

Lord Hugh Cecil has a pretty habit of saying some very caustic things. Discussing the Ethics of Property at the Church Congress, he told his audience that the Church's manner of dealing with reform was like the man who ran after a 'bus and only caught it at the end of the journey. The illustration hits off the situation exactly. The Church is the last even to talk about reform; to conceive it bringing it about is the dream of a fanatic or a fool.

"What is right in heaven," said Mr. Snowden at the Church Congress, "must be made the rule on earth." We hope not. We have heard of some very curious things in heaven, and we feel sure there would be trouble if earth did likewise. And, after all, Mr. Snowden might better justify his claim to be a Labor leader if he left heaven alone. People have decided what ought to be right in heaven by first of all finding out what is right on earth. If Mr. Snowden does not know, he has yet to learn the alphabet of genuine reform.

Southern Italy has been visited by another terrible earthquake. There was a wild rush of worshipers from the principal church at Santa Maria di Capua Vetere, where vespers were being held; many people were knocked down and trodden upon, and two women killed. Such is the elevating influence of religion in the presence of danger! At Naples images were dragged out of churches and placed in the public squares, to protect the women who remained there all the night.

"When Secretary of State Bryan set out upon his lucrative lecture tour with the 'Prince of Peace' packed in his grip, he made the explanation through his paper, the Commoner (August, 1913), that he could not meet his expenses out of his salary of $1 000 a month, and must 'augment' his income by resort to the platform. On September 9 Secretary Bryan signed for publication in another paper the statement that he speaks on educational subjects only, and 'it is for this object that I give my lectures, not for a lucrative end.' That statement is printed in the New York Times. The explanations are contradictory, and have nothing in common except that both are false. The falsehood of the first consists in saying that he needed the money for expenses, and of the second in saying (1) that his subjects are educational, and (2) not given for a lucrative end. The lectures are not educational, for no one learns anything from them that is true. Bryan is in the religious class with Pastor Russell and Billy Sunday. People are not educated by ignoramuses."—Truthseeker (New York).

Rev. A. B. Maughan, of Beighton rectory, near Sheffield, finding he was in the wrong train, pulled the communication cord and stopped the train for his own convenience. The penalty for this sort of thing is £5, but the Blyth magistrates treated it as a purely technical offence, and dismissed the case on payment of costs. There are some advantages in being a clergyman.

While conducting divine service at the Chapel of the Holy Spirit at Haywards Heath, the Rev. G. Pearson "suddenly became demented." Suddenly? Surely the poor man had been graduating for that condition. No one in his complete senses, at this time of day, could be pursuing the clerical occupation.

Why do things of this kind happen in churches, which, being consecrated, are full of the Holy Ghost? The parson is full of the Holy Ghost too—by virtue of his ordination. Strange!

Man's imagination cannot keep pace with the subtlety and variety of nature. The incidents of every novel and every play have occurred, or will occur, in the ordinary course of things. Many years ago we wrote a little story of a Mad Parson, who lost his head in a pulpit, and was besieged by his congregation, who tried to put an end to his scandalous sermon. It may be found in our Comic Sermons.

"The care of Children" was the subject of a paper read by Dr. Mary Murdoch at the National Union of Women Workers Conference at Hull. In the course of the discussion there was a striking speech by Miss F. R. Gray, headmistress of a girls' school, who was very severe on religious novels. We venture to reproduce her words from the Daily News report:—

> "The crying need of our young people of to-day, Miss Gray declared, was discipline. Lawlessness rather than freedom, self-gratification rather than self-control, desire for present pleasure rather than for future happiness—these were all signs of the times.
> "There was a lack of moral fastidiousness in much of the literature of to-day.
> "'The books of which I am thinking,' she went on, 'are written with an ostensibly moral, and even religious, motive, and they are false to the core. They teem from the press in England and in America in their hundreds of thousands, and they are frequently commended by persons of undoubted piety.
> "'The life that is depicted in these books is utterly unreal,' declared Miss Gray. 'There is no fidelity to nature or to art; the only interest is the love interest, and this love is a mere animal passion that should be called not love but lust. While on the one hand it triumphs over the ordinary principles of morality, such as truth, justice, and honor, on the other it associates itself with religion in a way which may fill one person with nausea, while from another it conceals the poison.
> "'I often wonder how many young women have found the downward path more easy and more alluring because of these "religious" novels. They are to be found in the libraries of girls' clubs and Sunday-schools as well as in our free libraries.'"

This is a very grave impeachment of a certain class of pious literature.

The Guardian says it has the "utmost respect" for Suffragan Bishops. They work very hard, and "they have little time to think." That is really a gem, and we decline to run the risk of dimming its brilliancy by any comment.

There was one meeting of the Church Congress at which Nonconformists and Churchmen fraternised. This was when they had for discussion the relations of Christianity to civilisation. And, of course, they all agreed that civilisation was nothing without Christianity. This was the one point they could talk about without quarrelling, and it was demonstrably false. Civilisations have been wrecked by Christianity, but none have been made by it. The civilisation it inherited it destroyed—or, on the most favorable view of affairs, failed to preserve. And it has always been living upon the fruits of imbuing agencies that in nine cases out of ten it did its utmost to crush out of existence. The Churches never could agree on preaching a common truth, but they can agree to preach a common falsehood.

It almost seems as though the rule of Christian writers is to find out what are the facts and then state the reverse. Thus, in The Christian Tradition and its Verification, Mr. T. R. Grover says: "Nowhere in classical literature—perhaps nowhere in non-Christian literature—is there a teacher of men who is recorded to have taken the same interest in children that Jesus did." Now, what was the interest Jesus took in children? His interest in them was to use them as an illustration of the simplicity and credulity that would attain the kingdom of heaven. That is about the limit of his interest in them. As a matter of fact, one striking feature in the New Testament as a whole is its scant recognition of family life. And this feature remains true of early Christianity. Children are practically ignored, and their influence on adult life completely overlooked. Writers like Dean Milman and Principal Donaldson have pointed out the striking absence of the recognition of home life in early Christian writings, and the consequence of this in increasing the barbarity of succeeding ages. The era of the deliberate manufacture of records in support of Christian claims is past, but that of the equally deliberate falsification of historic fact is still with us. And the mass of misrepresentation is so great that adequate correction is almost hopeless.

Although we do not suppose that anything very drastic will result from the report of the Royal Commission on Divorce, the Church of England is getting a little uneasy about it. A proposal has been made to invite the co-operation of Nonconformists, in order to guard and protect the Christian ideal of marriage. The Church of England Men's Society is to propose a resolution at its forthcoming Congress declaring the Majority Report to be contrary to the law of the Church, and affirming its adherence "to the principle of the indissolubility of marriage." These people are evidently living away back in the Middle Ages. Sensible people will realise that the indissolubility of marriage—under all conditions—simply does not, and cannot, exist. Even where it exists in theory, it disappears in practice. Above all, it is not a question of the law of the Church, but the needs of contemporary society. A dissolution of marriage is always regrettable, but all sane folks will admit that there are other eventualities more regrettable still, and it is in order to avoid these that some revision of our divorce laws is called for.

Rev. A. M. Mitchell, vicar of Burtonwood, near Earlstown, Lancashire, says "There is none other landowner but God." In England, too! But the reverend gentleman admits that God is not in possession. And the landlords smile. They dread Lloyd George more than Parson Mitchell's "God."

The land question "is above party," Mr. Mitchell says; "it is a task for all citizens, all Christians." This is a fair sample of the loose way in which these men of God gabble. Mr. Mitchell seems to think that "citizens" and "Christians" are convertible terms. If he does not mean that, what does he mean? One of two things,—either citizens are not Christians, or that Christians are not citizens. We leave the reverend gentleman to get out of his own muddle.

Marrying a man to reform him is an ancient folly. According to a newspaper report a man called James Flynn has just been sentenced at London Sessions to twenty-one months' hard labor. He was one of the five convicts who made a startling escape from Gloucester Gaol in October, 1906. After his release on ticket-of-leave he courted and married a Salvation Army girl, but in a few weeks he wanted her to support him by the worst of occupations, and she was compelled to leave him. A religious wife does not appear to have done him any sort of good.

In the case of the Berkeley Hotel burglary, Mr. Justice Darling reduced a sentence of seven years' penal servitude to three years. Justice Darling explained that was not because the prisoner in question was a good man, or any better than his associates; it was solely because he had "assisted the community" by betraying his fellow-burglars. This is quite a common practice; but we do not find it quite clear how the community is assisted, or future burglaries made more difficult, by the reduction of this sentence. It is some comfort, of course, to the owners of property to get it back. It is cheering to the police to bag the whole of the gang. It is satisfactory to the judge, we presume, to sentence them. And when we have enumerated these advantages the list seems to be about exhausted. At any rate, we do not see where the community has been assisted to any vital extent.

What is the interest of the community in this matter? Its chief interest is surely not the restoration of a little property—important though that may be to the owner. It certainly is not to gratify the professional pride of either policeman or judge. It seems to us that the chief interest in the situation is the criminal; and this is the one aspect of the situation that is left out of account. The important thing is that the criminal is there, and the vital question is what to do with him. These men were all equally guilty. They were all, we will say, equally oblivious to the sacred rights of property; yet one man has his sentence reduced by more than one-half—for what? It is really a reward for proving himself to be a little worse than the others. The one decent quality he possessed was that of sticking to his "pals." True, it was loyalty in a bad cause; but loyalty is loyalty, no matter how expressed. Then along comes "Justice" in wig and gown, and says: "You are all equally bad characters, at present. But if one of you will prove yourself worse than the others—if, in addition to being a thief, one of you will turn traitor—that one shall be rewarded." And straightway "Justice" destroys the last shred of decency by a threat of torture. We say deliberately, by a threat of torture. For it is torture to say that if a man turns traitor to his "pals" he shall receive three years, but if he remains loyal he shall have seven.

And so "justice," as understood in a Christian country, plucks the last decent feeling from a man instead of using it as a lever for improvement. It will not be pretended that this particular criminal is the better man for betraying his associates. He will come out of prison, in all probability, rather worse than he went in. And justice declares itself content. For our part, we would like to see it made positively illegal for judges to bargain with criminals in this manner. Let the police catch, and let judges condemn. The more efficient they are the better. And, if we can summon up enough common sense, when the police have caught and the judge has condemned, let us deal with the criminal as a problem to be solved once and for all. But, in the name of common decency, let us put an end to a bargaining between judges and criminals which does nothing to diminish crime, and only serves to prove how barbaric we still are in our dealing with social questions.

An article in one of the religious quarterlies is on "The Supply of Missionaries." That's all right; the critical question is—the demand for them. At present the supply always exceeds the demand.

More "Providence." This time at Nome, Alaska. More than half the city has been devastated by an earthquake; 500 houses are destroyed, and nearly 4,000 people are homeless. What the hurricane began the fire finished. "He doeth all things well."

Bishop Cameron, of Capetown, told the Church Congress that it was practically impossible to have Europeans and natives worshiping in the same church. He said that "in many places to attempt to enforce such common worship would mean the alienation of the whole European community." So much for the Christian Brotherhood of Man in actual practice. What the European community will do when it gets to heaven is a bit of a puzzle. Perhaps there, too, there will be compounds for the colored folk. Or, perhaps, they will be colored afresh. It is curious, by the way, that in all the visions of heaven that have been seen, all the inhabitants were white. We do not recall a single description of black angels hovering round the throne. Bishop Cameron strongly recommended "providing Europeans and natives with separate opportunities of worship." He also advised against the blacks being allowed to vote on terms of equality with the whites in Church Synods. This, he explained, might lead to the European vote being quite swamped. Bishop Cameron evidently believes in the franchise so long as he can make sure which way the vote will go. Why not adopt Mr. Dooley's advice—let them all vote equally, and a white bishop do the counting?

The Bishop of Barking has been presented with six hundred guineas in order that he may take a little holiday. Some holiday makers with that some of money would be away for years.

When God Laughs is the curious title of a shilling novel. In that other work of fiction, the Bible, God laughs in the Old Testament and weeps in the New. Readers buy or borrow the book, and take their choice.

The opening of the first Sunday-school Exhibition at Sittingbourne reminds us that such schools were originally established to teach ordinary education on the only day in the week available, prior to the introduction of the Factory Acts restricting the use of child labor. Sunday-schools nowadays have nothing to do with real education. Instead of the rule of three, they teach the truth of the "three-in-one"; instead of sense, nonsense. In short, they are incubators for hatching little Christians.

Mr. Eden Phillpott's new play, The Shadow, is unconventional in so far that it has a murderer for a hero, who knocks a miserly squire on the head one dark night. The hero justifies his action by saying, "Bean't the Bible full o' such things?" A shrewd hit which should make the "gods" sit up.

Albert Davis died in Bedford Gaol after a hunger strike of nearly five months. He rarely touched food but more often took a little milk. His death was due to exhaustion. This came out at the inquest. He was only twenty-one years of age; he had no brothers or sisters, and his father and mother died from small-pox when he was nine years old. What a desolate fate—even for a criminal! He appears to have thought he would get himself released—like the Suffragettes. He forgot that he was only a man. Besides, he belonged to a very poor family. Moreover, as forcible feeding was not used, his case was not reported to the Home Secretary.

A nice point was raised at the Marlborough-street Police Court when several Suffragettes were brought before the "beak" for fighting the police at the arrest of Miss Annie Kenney on the previous afternoon. One of the culprits was a clergyman; evidently a very "high" Churchman, for he claimed to be a "priest of the Catholic Church," while admitting that he was "a priest of the Church of England." He objected to be sworn on the book which had just been kissed by a wicked policeman. He even claimed to affirm. But the magistrate would not let him do that. He was told that he would have to be sworn on the Scriptures sanctioned by the Church to which he belonged. There was perhaps a lot of practical good in this decision. But could it be maintained at law? On the whole, we venture to doubt it. One would like to hear the point argued.

After bombarding Cabinet Ministers, the women—or the pious among them—are to take a turn at bombarding God. A number of "Leagues" have combined to issue a circular calling for a week of prayer. They say the claim for the enfranchisement of women "can be rightfully and conscientiously pleaded before God." Well, but he ought to know all about it as it is. We can understand arguing it out with Asquith, but why argue it out with God? Anyway, we expect it will be a one-sided discussion.

The Referee has been printing a number of letters complaining of "Blasphemy in the Parks." The letter-writers are enthusiastic but contradictory, for one complains of the pollution of the minds of young women, and another says "one never sees a decent woman" at these meetings. Another correspondent writes from Paris. Perhaps he walks over to Hyde Park every Sunday.

The now godly Referee prints further letters on "Blasphemy in Hyde Park." It is the dull season, parliament is not sitting, the sea-serpent has ceased to attract, and our pious contemporary is short of copy. There is nearly always a business explanation of these things.

The Rev. W. L. Watkinson told a gathering at a Wesleyan Methodist luncheon recently that "I was wasting my time reading a bit of fiction the other day." Was it the Bible?

Canon Samuel Augustus Barnett left estate of the gross value of £10,580. Not bad for a faithful friend of the working man.

The newspapers have been using heavy type to draw attention to a Kentish apple weighing a pound and a quarter. They would have to use poster type to do justice to the apple in the Garden of Eden.

Otto, by the grace of God, King of Bavaria, has reigned over his kingdom for twenty-seven years, although he is quite mad and is confined in Furstenried Castle. His devoted subjects must be worthy of the same institution.

"Everlasting Fires" is the wording on an advertisement in the daily press. It has no theological significance; and only relates to a special brand of coal.

A real conversion will take place shortly. The unfinished "Temple of Jezreel," on Chatham Hill, is to be converted into a picture palace. It was built about thirty years ago, at a cost of £45,000, by James Jezreel, founder of the "New and Latter House of Israel." When five stories had been reached, Jezreel himself died. Poor Jezreel was born too late to work that oracle.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, October 19, Secular Hall, Rusholme-road, Manchester; at 3, "Sir Oliver Lodge's Theology"; at 6.30, "Shakespeare's Humanism in the Merchant of Venice."

October 26, Stratford Town Hall.
December 7 and 14, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £197 5s. 9d. Received since:—P. M. W., £1 1s.; W. Bailey, £20; Five Edinburgh Saints, 10s. 6d.; G. Smith, 10s.

A. EYLES.—Miss Vance, the N. S. S. secretary, is sending you a form for the withdrawal of your children from religious instruction. Our shop manager is executing your order.

P. M. W., subscribing to the President's Honorarium Fund, through our publishing office, writes: "I should like to say how glad I am that the President is so much better. How greatly I admire his ability and his devotion to the cause, and how sincerely I wish him health and strength to carry on his work."

E. B.—Many thanks for cuttings.

W. GOODBOURN.—The reverend gentleman's advertisement is not worth repeating here. He seems to expect to fill his church with readers of a racing paper. But the poor men of God must do something to fill up.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are always welcome.

H. ROBERTS.—May be suitable next week.

G. SMITH.—Thanks for your "further small mite" to the President's Fund. We note your view that it should progress more rapidly, and would do so if converts only gave their old "pew rents and collection money."

J. ROBERTSON.—Acknowledged as desired. Thanks also for good wishes. Mr. Foote is keeping well. If the insomnia would only go right away he might almost hope to flutter the laurels of Methuselah.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote's friends in Manchester and the district will probably be glad to hear him again. They will have an opportunity to-day (Oct. 19). He lectures, afternoon and evening, at the Secular Hall, Rusholme-road, All Saints; and his subjects are, or should be, attractive.

Although it is Mr. Foote's intention not to lecture two Sundays following, for some time at least, he is breaking this rule next Sunday (Oct. 26), when he lectures at the Stratford Town Hall, right after his visit to Manchester. This is unavoidable if he is to take one of the Stratford dates.

A medical friend, who travelled a considerable distance to hear us lecture at Birmingham, does us the honor to remind us that he is indebted to us for his "mental emancipation in the old days" when he "was a student in London." He also writes:—

> "I thoroughly enjoyed hearing you again at Birmingham, after so many years, and made an effort to go there. I was glad to see your health permitted you to stand the strain of speaking in such a large hall. Your voice sounded very clearly and could be heard in the back parts of the hall."

Some of our friends will like to read that.

Mr. Cohen lectures at Glasgow to-day. See the "Lecture Notices" for particulars. We hope the local "saints" will give his visit the utmost possible publicity. That is all it wants.

Arley Lane, who does the "Pulpit and Pew" for the Birmingham Weekly Mercury, devoted his two columns in last week's issue to Mr. Foote's lecture in the Birmingham Town Hall on Sunday evening, October 5. We reproduce the first portion of his descriptive report:—

> "Once, when sheltering from rain under a tree in the vicinity of the Benbulben mountains in the West of Ireland, a laborer who had run from his work to avoid a drenching, said—
> "'It never rains here. It doesn't stop to rain. It tumbles down in solid sheets of water. When the wind blows on it, ye might think it was rainin' bullocks. By the seven lame pipers of Ballydehob, but it's the rale rain we get in the Benbulbens.'
> "Let me advise all my friends to drive the forty miles from Bundoran to Sligo, with the Benbulbens on their left, the Atlantic on their right.
> "But let the day be fine.
> "My last run over that ground was done in a rainstorm that nearly washed me off the car, so that I reached the Imperial Hotel at Sligo more like a drowned rat than an English tourist.
> "All of which came to my mind as I plashed through the streets of Birmingham on Sunday eve, now and then peeping in at church and chapel doors that I might observe how many had come to worship the Creator on a very wet evening.
> "For though it was not raining bullocks, the downpour was so continuous and persevering that one wondered what it might have accomplished if its talents had been exercised in another and a more virtuous direction.
> "Not many in the churches; fewer still in the chapels; public worship, it would seem, is largely dependent on the weather.
> "'You can't expect folks to turn out on such a night,' was the actual observation of a preacher of distinction. What? Not for God? Not for heaven? Not for the everlasting ecstasy?
> "Is weather to stop us from pursuit of the heavenly Jerusalem? Are we to risk the gates of pearl because of an evening's rain?
> "But if the churches and chapels were drawn blank, the Town Hall was full.
> "Full to the last benches in the great gallery; full to the front bench on the floor.
> "No music; no singing; no attraction beyond the speech of Mr. G. W. Foote, who was announced to deal with the Theology of Sir Oliver Lodge.
> "Not that the crowd cared two straws for Sir Oliver or his Theology.
> "Close inquiry proved that most were subjects of good-humored derision.
> "'Sir Oliver,' said one, 'is an unbeliever who talks to mugs in the chapels.'
>
> "Said another: 'I'm here to hear Foote, no matter what he talks about.'
> "These were apparently respectable, shrewd, and intelligent men of the upper working-class.
> "The congregation was, in fact, mostly composed of men, just as the church and chapel congregations are mostly composed of women."

It will be noticed that Arley Lane corroborates what we said about the terrible rain and the splendid audience. The rest of his report is a bright and humorous summary report of the lecture. Occasionally the reporter offers a little criticism of his own, but it is always good-tempered and impartial. We thank him for breaking the ridiculous silence on the part of the Birmingham press, which affects to be ignorant of Mr. Foote's existence, although his name on a bill brings a great crowd of people—without any help from them.

There was an improved audience last Sunday at the Foresters' Hall, Highgate-road, and Mr. J. T. Lloyd's excellent address was followed with the keenest interest. The platform this evening (Oct. 19) will be occupied by Mr. Max Hope, who will deal with "The Assumptions of Sir Oliver Lodge."

Mr. Cohen had a good meeting at the opening of the Stratford Town Hall course of lectures on Sunday. His lecture was warmly applauded, and was followed by interesting questions and discussion. Mr. Lloyd occupies the same platform to-night (Oct. 19), his subject being "Heroes of our Faith."

A man who is prosecuted for "blasphemy" has a perfect right to conduct his own defence in his own way; though whether that is always the best way to frustrate the Blasphemy Laws, and help to break them down, is open to discussion. When our advice is asked for in any particular case we are ready to give it. We have usually found, however, that it has not been followed. Perhaps the best thing we can do is to offer a few words on the subject generally.

According to the common law of "blasphemy," ever since Lord Coleridge's judgment in 1883, it has been perfectly legal to attack the fundamentals of Christianity, provided that the disputant respects "the decencies of controversy." That is the whole point at issue now. It is useless to argue that anyone has the right to say what he likes, when he likes, where he likes, how he likes, and to whom he likes. He cannot possibly have such a right as that in a place of public resort, where other persons have the same right to be that he has himself. What has to be argued is that he has not transgressed the "decencies of controversy"—meaning thereby the ordinary decencies of controversy. A Freethinker may claim the same freedom of speech that prevails, for instance, in political discussion. He should be able to speak of Jesus Christ as freely as the most extreme Tories—and the Daily Mail—speak of Mr. Lloyd George. He should be able to speak of Christianity as freely as Sir Edward Carson or Captain Craig speaks of Home Rule. He should be able to speak of Christians as freely as they speak of "Infidels." He should be able to speak of the "gods" of to-day as freely as religious people speak of the "gods" of the past, or the "gods" of distant parts of the world. Equal freedom with other controversialists is what the law allows him, and what he should maintain against his prosecutors.

The worst thing a man prosecuted for "blasphemy" can do is to indulge in an attack on Christianity or a defence of Atheism. The jury are not there to decide such matters, and persistence in such a line of defence will only annoy them and incline them to "get their own back" when their turn comes to speak. Showing-off is another bad policy. It will not be easy to make the judge take you at a fanciful valuation, and juries naturally resent being treated as bigger fools than they are. Above all, don't display too much of what the man in the street calls "lip." He who is pleading for fairplay should respect it himself. He who is pleading for toleration should at least be conciliatory. George Jacob Holyoake made a nine hours' speech at his trial in 1842, and he used to say humorously, but not without some degree of truth, that he deserved his sentence for talking at such inordinate length.

We are assuming, of course, that the defendant in a "blasphemy" prosecution wants to make the best use of his opportunity to attack the Blasphemy Laws and hasten their repeal; in other words that he is fighting for an acquittal at the best or a disagreement of the jury at the worst. That is the only thing that really counts. Making conviction difficult is the only effective way of stopping prosecutions. But if a defendant is animated by other motives, they are of no importance to anyone but himself, and would not excite our interest or demand our attention.

Camberwell Borough Council has employed the Bishop of Southwark to consecrate a new addition to Forest Hill Cemetery. Councillor A. B. Moss offered to do the job at half the Bishop's price. His offer was not accepted. Had it been so the Council would have lost nothing on one side and gained something on the other. Cash in hand is a solid thing, and Mr. Moss's hocus-pocus would have done the land quite as much good as the Bishop's.

There are few lady speakers on the Freethought platform, and we should make the most of those we have. Birmingham "saints" are reminded—and we ask them to let their friends and acquaintances know it—that Miss Kough lectures this evening (Oct. 19), at the King's Hall, Corporation-street.

Mr. W. Bailey, of Manchester, who has already subscribed liberally to the President's Honorarium Fund, writes us as follows:—

> "Dear Mr. Foote,—As some compensation for the loss you have sustained in the curtailment of your lecturing tour, I send you a further contribution of £20 towards your Honorarium Fund, hoping that friends of the 'best of causes' may see their way to similar action. I trust your pen may for many years yet continue to expound those principles to which you have devoted a long and strenuous life.—Believe me sincerely yours, W. BAILEY."

We appreciate Mr. Bailey's good wishes, as well as his generous subscription, and we hope they will be realised. But we also hope that our voice, as well as our pen, will do a good deal more service to Freethought before the end.

This is not exactly a "Sugar Plum" but we don't know where else to put it—for we don't mean it to be an "Acid Drop." Mr. Justice North, who sentenced us to twelve months' imprisonment for "blasphemy" in 1883, died on Monday (Oct. 13) in his eighty-fourth year. We were the last prisoner he ever tried. He was removed to the Chancery Court after our trial—which he took twice at the same Sessions in order to secure a conviction. He had been for many years in retirement and most people thought he had joined the great majority. His one passport to immortality is his historical connection with the Freethinker case.

Musicians and Freethought.

> "The quickening and growth of the spirit of Rationalism have produced consequences not entirely beneficial: for although the purgative function of the inquiring mind and the apotheosis of that entirely Protestant quality called common sense have done much to guard us from temptations to error, yet we have lost a great deal in the domain of the mystic and the picturesque.....The truth remains.....that so far as art is concerned.....the triumph of reason and the reign of positive negation are attended by results which can only be called deplorable."—Extract from the Musical Standard.

I NEVER really knew what the "balm of Gilead" was, but I apprehend the phrase alright, and I should say that the above piece of writing must be as this very "balm" to all those highly respectable people who sit in choirs and organ-lofts, for whom the said periodical specially caters, apparently. But I have a notion that all this fuss about Rationalism and negation has something of the air of the "twice-told tale" about it. Once upon a time, we were told that the world was less moral, less just, less sober, and all on account of Rationalism. Now we are informed that we are less "mystic" and "picturesque," and it is all on account of this same Rationalism. Personally, I have not the slightest idea what the terms "mystic" and "picturesque" convey in music; but Rationalism is to be "deplored," and so it is blamed for the world's loss of some idea or emotion which no one has ever seen, felt, or heard.

When one speaks of the "mystic" in a certain class of literature, I understand fairly well; but in music, or even in art generally, what does it denote? Can music evoke any such precise idea, state, or emotion to the senses that can be defined as "mystic"? Even a word like "picturesque" (except in a general connotation, i.e., fit to become, or fulfilling the subject of a picture) evades definition. All this talk about the mystic and picturesque in music is sheer verbiage, and ought to be relegated, with those other "palpably nugatory" abstractions which so annoyed Ruskin, to the land of "What is it?"

As for Rationalism, Professor Bury's recent book, A History of Freedom of Thought, will, for the modest sum of one shilling, educate the writer to a better circumspection of his subject. To the Greeks of old, Rationalism was necessary not only for their philosophic speculation, says the Professor, but "as a condition of their literary and artistic excellence." The whole history of art and literature down to the present time is subject to this identical interpretation, as may be understood from Lecky and Bagehot. That England has been backward in the arts is due, says Buckle and Herbert Spencer, to the very absence of this Rationalism. But I feel sure that the writer in the Musical Standard is relying more upon an interpretation of his thesis through individuals rather than by general influences, and, as he specifies music, I will endeavor to show, by recalling some of the greatest names in the art, how utterly ridiculous is this chatter about the "deplorable" results of "Rationalism."

Bach (1686-1750) is one of the greatest names in music. He is generally looked upon as part and parcel of the Church, at least by people who only see with their eyes. They note a host of his works bearing the title and purport of religion, and they think that is sufficient. Yet it is difficult to conceive him in any way but as a Rationalist. Bach was a Capellmeister, and, therefore, religion was his business. German opera was practically non-existent, and the concert platform was unknown, and so Bach was subject to the Church's religious forms because there were no other vehicles for his art. Theology or creed was evidently of secondary importance to a man who could write the B. Minor Mass for the Catholics and the St. Matthew Passion for the Protestants. No one but a free man in creed and theology would use material (as Bach did) from secular works in religious compositions. Look at the opening chorus of the Christmas Oratorio, which is taken from the Birthday Ode for the Queen of Poland, while the Virgin's song, concerning the advent of Christ, originally appeared in the secular cantata, Hercules auf dem Scheidewege, where it is sung by Vice when endeavoring to seduce Virtue.

Handel (1685-1759) is another greatly misunderstood artist. Here in England he is considered one of the pillars of the Church. The Messiah has almost become part of middle-class religion. But Handel was, as Edward Fitzgerald says in one of his chatty letters, "a good old Pagan at heart, till he had to yield to the fashionable piety of England." One writer in Grove's Dictionary actually demonstrates that wherever Pagans appear side by side with Jews and Christians in the oratorios, the former have "musically" the best of it. For example, in Saul, the "Along the monster Atheist strode" is quite picturesque beside the respectable piece which follows—"The youth inspired by thee, O Lord." In Theodora the "Venus laughing from the skies," compared to the Christian choruses, is like a fresh breeze blowing into a stuffy room. Handel, like Bach, used his secular material for his oratorios. Little does John Smith, grocer, know, when he talks about the "heavenly music" of the Messiah, that he may be listening to the Italian Duets! Handel was a Pagan.

The great literary and social ferment (essentially rationalistic) which brought about the French Revolution naturally bore some musicians with it. Among the greatest of these was Gluck (1714-87), whom Burney called "the Michael Angelo of Music." He gave the world those wonderful operas, Orpheus, Alceste, and Iphegenia, all of which are cast in the mould of classic antiquity. We know nothing of Gluck's religion, but we know something of his art, and that must guide us. It was in the Pagan art of ancient Greece that Gluck sought his ideal, and in the æsthetics of the Freethinking encyclopædists of his day that he looked for the guidance of this ideal. Gluck was decidedly a Rationalist, but still he wrote that immortal aria "Che faro senza Eurydice."

Gossec (1734-1829) was one of the official musicians of the Revolution, and besides being ordained by the Republic as the first composer in France, and writing operas, he composed several revolutionary pieces, such as the Hymn à la Raison, L'Offrande à la Liberté, etc. He was known as a Freethinker, not only in religion, but in art. Like later reformers—Berlioz and Wagner—he wrote for huge orchestras and bands.

Grétry (1741-1813) was another musical reformer and partisan of the Revolution. He advocated a sloping auditorium and a hidden orchestra long before the days of Bayreuth. His writings are full of "reforms." He was the friend of Voltaire and a decided Freethinker. Indeed, his name appears in Maréchal's Dictionnaire des Athées. Among his "rebel" music is the Fête de la Raison and La Rosière Républicaine. Both Gossec and Grétry are names which count in musical progress.

For the real musical reverberation of the French Revolution we must look to Beethoven (1770-1827), the "great pathfinder," as Wagner calls him. That he was a confirmed Freethinker is allowed by all his biographers.* He was in open revolt against all the creeds, and would even make fun of the Bible. Among his works are two masses and an oratorio, which, on account of their religious titles, will specially claim our attention here. The Mass in C, says Nohl, "is not a religious composition," and Macfarren suggests that it "might scarcely have proceeded from an entirely orthodox thinker." In the Missa Solennelle, which Beethoven considered his "most finished work," the formula of the Church is completely ignored. "Its astounding grandeur," says Schlüter, "leaves no room for religious feeling." Dannreuther says it is a "a veritable hymn to humanity.....before the glory of which all that pertains to any particular Church, to any particular priesthood, vanishes as shadows in a noonday sun." Look at its Agnus Dei. Where is the peace in the Dona nobis pacem? It is revolt! Even in his solitary oratorio, the Mount of Olives, biographers find the "unchristian hand" of the composer. The way Christ is made to sing a lengthy scena ed aria, a florid duet, and quite a "sparkling trio" (as Rockstro says), has shocked England so much that a special libretto has been substituted. Beethoven is one of the greatest names, if not the greatest, in music, and he is this in spite of his "deplorable Rationalism."

The creator of the German lied was Schubert (1797-1828). He wrote hundreds of compositions, from symphonies down to simple strophe songs; and, notwithstanding all the so-called benefits which this Christian civilisation has conferred upon the world, he died a pauper at the age of 31. Schumann says that Schubert could have set a placard to music. His settings of Goethe, Schiller, and Heine are real tone-pictures. Grove says we know nothing of his religion. Yet we have that delightful poem of his preserved by Schumann, which tells us all we need know:—

> "Leave them racing, hurrying on
> To some distant goal,
> Building creeds and proofs upon
> Half-seen flashes in the soul.
> Not a word of it is true,
> Yet what loss is theirs or mine?
> In the maze of human systems
> I can trace the thought divine."

From this it would seem that all religions were the same to Schubert, and thus he could write a Mass for the Catholics, an Oratorio for the Protestants, and a Psalm for the Jews! He was certainly a Rationalist, and he wrote the "mystical" Der Wanderer and the "picturesque" Erlkönig.

One of the freest minds in art which took service under Heine's flag, in the "war of liberation," was Robert Schumann (1810-56). One has only to read his prose works and his letters to know how utterly free he was from that "inherited usage" which was Heine's bête noir. J. M. Wheeler gives him a place in his Dictionary of Freethinkers. He wrote a Mass and a Requiem, which, although they bear the Catholic formula, are full of characteristics opposed to Catholic ritual. His so-called "profane oratorio"—Paradise and the Peri—is considered by most writers as his chief work, and the very title of the composition gave offence in certain "respectable" quarters. Schumann was the first musician to sally forth sword (or shall we say pen) in hand to rout the Philistine.

Berlioz (1803-69), "the mighty Hector," believed neither in a God nor Bach, says his friend Hiller. In his charming autobiography, which W. E. Henley ranked as a classic of its kind, Berlioz tells us how he scandalised the pious Mendelssohn by laughing at the Bible. I suppose it is not too much to say that he is the greatest musician France has produced. His Damnation of Faust, like the Faust of Schumann, is a true understanding, and worthy setting, of Goethe's masterpiece, and infinitely superior to Gounod's cheap and tawdry stuff. Berlioz' works are like huge canvases of tone. Heine said his music reminded him of "primeval monsters and fabulous empires." Among his so-called religious works are an oratorio, The Infancy of Christ, a Requiem, and a Te Deum. Of the two latter, one eminent critic has said, they "stand like colossal statues at the gates of a barbarian temple. They are absolutely unchristian in feeling." Surely this writer didn't expect a Berlioz to write à la Sankey-Moody hymnal. Berlioz was an Atheist like his father, and I suppose he is one of those people responsible for the loss of the "mystic" and "picturesque" in music. Bah! it is enough to make a stir in that ground of Père la Chaise.

Félicien David (1810-76), the composer of the symphonic ode, Le Désert, was a Freethinker, much taken up with St. Simonianism. Offenbach (1819-80), the most brilliant exponent of the lighter opéra comique, was also a Freethinker. English critics complained that he even introduced his scepticism into his libretti. Many will remember the recent revival (up-to-date) of his Orphee aux Enfers in

* In an article, entitled "Beethoven and the Revolution," in the Freethinker (August 4, 1907), I dealt at length with Beethoven's religious views.

London. Henry Litolff (1818-91), a famous pianist in his day, but now only known to fame as the composer of the overture, Robespierre, and the delightful Spinnlied, was a thorough rebel and Freethinker. When a youth he threw himself into the Vienna rebellion of 1848, and even at middle age he couldn't keep out of the Paris Commune of 1871. Another fine pianist, alive to-day, who took part in the Paris Commune, and is a Freethinker, is Raoul Pugno.

We will now turn to the land of the bel canto—Italy. The first free musician, at any rate in modern times, is Rossini (1792-1868), known best of all for his opera, William Tell, the overture to which is such a favorite in all concert répertoires. Rossini was a reformer. It was he who broke the back of the singers' tyranny and domination. When the "star" of the day said, "I shall sing such and such a cadenza there, Signor Rossini," the signor replied, "You will sing just what I have written; no more and no less." Chouquet tells us that Rossini was a sceptic. He also wrote music that may be called "religious," with a stretch of fancy—for instance, Moses in Egypt and a Stabat Mater—but it must be patent to the meanest musical person that every note in these is stage music. A hymn of thanksgiving in Moses is worked out to the accompaniment of a polonaise!

The great Verdi (1813-1901), whose Trovatore, Traviata, and Aïda, belong to our operatic répertoires, was also a Freethinker. In his earlier days he was always in trouble with either Church or State on account of his libretti. I remember reading that during his latter days, when in retirement, how he insisted upon priests keeping to their soul-saving business, and not interfere with secular affairs.

Boito (1842), the composer of Mephistophele, is still living. He was one of the rebel poets of Italy, with Carducci, in the 'sixties and 'seventies. He is a candid Freethinker, and in his Mephistophele made a daring satire on the Roman Church. In the scene where Mephistopheles is crowned, all the demons and witches kneel down in adoration to a parody of the music of the Catholic Tantum Ergo. Needless to say, the stage was rushed on the first performance, and a riot ensued.

Now we come to one who startled all the dovecotes of respectability in art and life—Wagner (1813-88). He was an inherent rebel. In 1849 he was among the democrats advocating reform in Dresden, and finally took part in the rebellion. On its suppression, Wagner fled to Switzerland, but his assessors, Bakounine, the apostle of Anarchism, and Roeckel, the musician, went to prison. Wagner was always a strict Freethinker and an Atheist. At first, a friend and follower of Feuerbach; then of Schopenhauer. In later years, although still maintaining his animus against the God-idea, he became enamored with the ascetic side of Christianity, in an ultra-development of Schopenhauer's surrender of the will. His operas, Tannhäuser and Lohengrin are well known to the masses, but it is in his stupendous music-drama—The Ring of the Nibelung—that he reveals his great genius. Not content with revolutionising his art, he preached the reason for his revolt in some of the most remarkable books of the century, viz.: Art and the Revolution, Music of the Future, etc. An excellent summary of his philosophies, in art, religion, and politics, is contained in Bernard Shaw's The Perfect Wagnerite. I suggest it will not be presumptuous to claim Wagner for Rationalism, and for having contributed a quota to the progress of music, even if we have lost something of the "mystic" and "picturesque"!

Hans Von Bülow (1830-94), a great pianist, a great conductor, and a composer of note, was a militant Freethinker, if not an Atheist. His writings bear abundant evidence of this. As a young man he was swept into the revolutionary philosophies of '48, and they always seem to have stayed with him. To him the God-idea was all-harmful, and he blamed it for all the "banalities in the world," including Philistinism. He was a man every inch of him, this same Von Bülow.

Anton Rubinstein (1830-94) has been designated the "founder of the musical education and civilisation in Russia." He was, besides that, one of the world's greatest pianists, and his works are among the classics of the musical art. His well-known Melody in F belongs to "the people," whilst his Ocean Symphony will be cherished by the elect for all time. Rubinstein was a confirmed Agnostic, and priests were a continual fund of amusement to him. The orthodox oratorio, where artists sing highly dramatic incidents dressed in conventional "evening dress," and as immovable as a rock, raised his ire. Rubinstein said that if the people wanted Bible history in libretti, they ought to have it with full scenery and effects, and to this end he devised his "sacred operas"—Moses, Christus, etc., but they were unsuccessful.

Brahms (1833-97), who was bracketed with Bach and Beethoven as the "Three B.'s of Music," also belongs to the Rationalists. His Four Serious Songs are poems upon the uncertainty of human life, and almost a glorification of Death. Grove's Dictionary admits that the composer did not hold to the immortality of the soul. The writer says "the dogmatism of the Churches did not appeal to him." The great German Requiem, although it has the mark of a church piece by title, is nothing of the sort. Again, we have a critic (Streatfeild), as with Berlioz, who calls the work "unchristian"—i.e., I suppose because the composer does not allow the æsthetic principle to play "second fiddle" to the devotional. Brahms' Song of Destiny, and Song of the Fates, tell us more of his heresy.

The intellectual opening of Russia, which seems to have been sequential to the liberal decades following the emancipation of the serfs, gave to musical art the genius of Moussorgsky (1835-81). Here was a staunch democrat and Freethinker who dared (and it meant dare in those days in Russia) to say, "Hold out the hand of fellowship to the masses, and learn from them the true purpose of life." He practised what he preached, but what a sad tale it is in his life. His songs are truly "human documents." Those weird Songs and Dances of Death reveal his very soul. One writer has called him the "musical Nihilist," and not without reason. The Peep Show is a delicious satire. Moussorgsky hated "authority," and the official, the priest, and the academic person all come in for severe handling under his lash of satire.

Two masters of the Neo-romantic school—Greig and Tschaikowsky—belong definitely to Freethought. Everyone knows their music, if really not the best of it. Greig (1843-1907) was the friend of the great literary Freethinkers—Ibsen, Björnson, and Brandes. He set to music the chef d'œuvre of the first, Peer Gynt. Björnson's Sigurd Jorsalfar also had his setting. He ignored Christianity, and Brandes tells us he was a Freethinker.

Tschaikowsky (1840-93), the great tone poet of pessimism, was an Agnostic. His letters, especially those to Von Meck, tell us of all his "doubts." Providence, immortality, and the rest, all are discussed by him. Critics actually tell us that he reveals his "doubts" in his music. Markham Lee, in his brochure on the composer, says he can imagine Tschaikowsky saying, in his Pathetic Symphony, "There is no God!"

Unquestionably, one of the first names in music to-day is that of Richard Strauss. His conception of the musical art is something immense. He uses tone as a Titan. But I must pass on to his philosophy. It is clearly Nietzschean, as revealed in his tone-poems, Also sprach Zarathustra and Ein Heldenleben. The composer has, in the former, attempted to represent man in his effort to solve the riddle of the universe. In Heldenleben Strauss portrays man's life-conflict, his triumph, and final peace. This, like Tod und Verklärung, called forth a perfect storm of hostile criticism on account of its realism. Strauss also belongs to Freethought.

Among the foremost French composers of modern times are Massenet, Bruneau, and Charpentier, all Rationalists. Massenet (1842-1912) was a confessed Voltairean. His oratorio, Marie Magdaleine, and the opera, Hérodiade, caused considerable stir by reason of the freedom of their texts. Bruneau was the friend of Zola, and a good fighter for liberty all round. His "naturalism" in L'Attaque au Moulin and La Rêve was subjected to much criticism. Gustave Charpentier is still living. He is a staunch Freethinker and revolutionary Socialist. His opera, Louise, and a tone-poem, La Vie du Poet, reveal revolutionary ideas.

These are the names of giants in the musical art, and I claim them for Rationalism. If music has lost anything by this "Rationalism," it is only the bonds and fetters which bound it to social and religious convention. The progress of all art is dependent upon progress in civilisation, and the latter seems to be determined in relation to conflict with "the powers that be." Thus Rationalism or Freethought, in its conflict with religion, is an absolute condition of civilisation, and so of Art.

H. GEORGE FARMER.

Shelley and Keats on Richard Carlile.

SHELLEY'S first piece of important prose was the "Letter to Lord Ellenborough," before whom Daniel Isaac Eaton was tried for "blasphemy" in March, 1812, his offence being the publication of the third part of Paine's Age of Reason. This virtuous man and honorable publisher was found guilty and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment, also to stand in the pillory. Shelley was not yet twenty, and he waited to see if some older and more influential champion of freedom would "raise his voice in the indignation of outraged humanity." But no one spoke, and the young poet stepped into the breach. The manuscript of his letter was entrusted to Mr. Syle, a well-known printer and publisher of Barnstaple. Shelley ordered a thousand copies to be printed, but the tradesman was more easily frightened than the author. Mr. Syle suppressed and destroyed all the remaining sheets after some two hundred copies had been delivered. It was difficult to circulate even a few of these copies, but the pamphlet survives amongst Shelley's prose works, and is a monument to his honor. It is not, as a composition, to be compared to such a superb achievement as the later Defence of Poetry, which was so highly—yet not too highly—praised by James Thomson. But the Letter to Lord Ellenborough was one that only Shelley could have written; it is creditable alike to his head and heart; its style was wonderfully mature for a youth only half way through his twentieth year; and it has the distinction, we repeat, of being his first prose writing of real importance.

Six years and a half later, in October, 1819, Richard Carlile had to answer six indictments for "blasphemy." He read the whole of the Age of Reason in his defence, in order to have it published as part of the report of his trial. He was found guilty (of course!) and sentenced to a fine of £1,500 and three years' imprisonment in Dorchester Gaol. The news of this judicial crime reached Shelley at Florence, where he was "in hourly expectation of Mary's confinement." He was also "full of all kinds of literary plans." Yet he could not forbear giving his attention to the new "blasphemy" case. Writing to the Gisbornes on November 6, 1819, he said: "I have just finished a letter of five sheets on Carlile's affair." What became of it we do not know. Is there any Shelleyan alive—Mr. Wise, Mr. Dobell, or another—who can give us any information on the point? Dr. Dowden, Shelley's official biographer, says that the letter was "addressed to Leigh Hunt." He gives a brief account of it, running only to seven lines; and winds up, characteristically, with bigoted nonsense about "the indecencies of Paine's commentary on the story of the birth of Jesus Christ"—as if it were not Shelley's opinion, but Dr. Dowden's, that really mattered.

The Carlile case attracted the attention of another great poet—John Keats. Writing to his brother George, before Carlile's trial came on, Keats first observed that England was recovering from the reaction which followed the French Revolution, and then he proceeded:—

> "There are little signs whereby we may know how matters are going on. This makes the business of Carlisle [Keats's spelling] the bookseller of great amount in my mind. He has been selling deistical pamphlets, republished Tom Paine, and many other works held in superstitious horror. He has even been selling, for some time, immense numbers of a work called The Deist, which comes out in weekly numbers. For this conduct he, I think, has had about a dozen indictments issued against him, for which he has found bail to the amount of many thousand pounds. After all, they are afraid to prosecute. They are afraid of his defence; it would be published in all the papers all over the empire. They shudder at this. The trials would light a flame they could not extinguish. Do you not think this of great import?"

Richard Carlile was happier than he knew. His own indomitable manhood was equal to anything. No one ever looked on the face of danger with greater equanimity. He was incapable of fear. He was as stubborn as the oak of his native Devonshire, as enduring as the Dartmoor granite. And he had friends amongst the people, and friends of eminence like the great Jeremy Bentham. But he was unaware that his fight was watched by two mighty poets, both Republicans and Freethinkers, both friends of human liberty and progress, both young and fated to die young, and both destined to become fixed stars in the firmament of English literature. Richard Carlile has been sneered at by dilettante reformers, who had none of his passionate devotion to principle, nor a single spark of his fiery courage. They could never have wielded his sword even if they had seized it in a moment of unwonted enthusiasm. He fought like a Titan, and there was no room for "delicacy" in such a struggle. He had all the qualities that were requisite. And the two most exquisite poets of his time—for Coleridge was alive then, but not creative—looked out from their towers of song and saw where his whirling sword gleamed in the desperate fight, and recognised, with the intuition of genius, that he was a true hero battling for the most precious possession of humanity; for that intellectual liberty, without which life is a slavery and happiness a disgrace.

G. W. FOOTE

Everybody will remember the destruction of Messina by earthquake in December, 1908. A Daily Chronicle representative has been writing on that City of the Dead—for the old city is left in its ruins and a new city is springing up beside it. The only church that the earthquake left standing was San Niccolo. It stood, but its interior is a scene of desolation. Another edifice—a Pagan one—was luckier:—

> "Littered about the quays and floating in docks I noticed scores of Royal Custom House registers of the earthquake days. Wavelets ripple over the sunken wharves, the quayside and adjacent streets remain rent asunder in mighty gaps; the Parade all upheaven, smashed, and encumbered with rubbish as when the tidal wave, 150 feet in height, retired after its vent of herculean castigation. One object rivets attention. The giant form of Neptune, trident in hand, surveys the scene serenely from the summit of his superb fountain. The sea has respected its god. Pious folk pointed me to the survival of this and like pagan memories, in contrast with the annihilation of their own sacred shrines, as proof positive that the quake was the handiwork of demons."

What a brain-addling thing superstition is!

Obituary.

With the deepest regret I record the death of our comrade and friend, John Clark, of Leyland, near Preston, who died on October 8 (while unconscious), after a short but severe attack of pneumonia. He was a member of the Preston Secular Society; and when conscious he refused the attentions of the clergy. All his spare time was taken up with the propaganda of the causes he loved. He lived and died a Secularist, but was buried a Christian. The funeral took place Saturday, the 11th.—A. P.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 43 SUNDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

It is the practice of the mob first to stone and then to erect useless memorials to their greatest benefactors. All who set themselves to replace ancient error and superstition by truth and reason must lay their account with brickbats in their life and a marble monument after death.—PROF. J. G. FRAZER.

Bible Blunders.

PEOPLE who have given the subject fair attention have long known that the Bible does more than contain inaccuracies; it positively abounds in them. There are hundreds of substantial contradictions, and thousands of formal discrepancies. This fact must have been known, at least to a considerable extent, by the old orthodox divines, who went through the Bible with exemplary diligence, and sprinkled their sermons profusely with well-stocked pepper-dridges of more or less apposite texts. But they never admitted it. They kept on saying that Holy Writ was without a single mistake, and that the man who found one had an infidel squint or was misled by the Devil. Their theory was well expressed by the late Mr. Spurgeon, who once affirmed that every sentence of the Bible was written with an Almighty pen, and every word fell from Almighty lips. Spurgeon said that more that fifty years ago. There is not one leading minister who will say it now.

Bible blunders are indeed an inexhaustible theme. Mr. Gladstone, one of the prosiest and dullest of harmonisers, never touched more than the fringe of the subject. He confined himself to the stock illustrations which had been dealt with by hundreds of writers before him—a fact, by the way, which exemplifies the Grand Old Man's terrible lack of originality. He devoted whole pages to showing, in his peculiarly vague and diffuse manner, that the word "day" in the fantastic Creation Story really meant a chapter, that it had nothing to do with chronology, but was a device of composition. He devoted many more pages to showing that if the narrative were read slowly and carefully, attaching a Gladstonian meaning instead of a dictionary meaning to every word, and adding all sorts of amplifications and qualifications between the lines, that old Creation Story was a magnificent manual of astronomy, geology, and biology, and that all the writings of Darwin (supposing them to be true—which Gladstone would never admit or deny) were but commentaries on the science of Moses. But clergymen like Canon Driver and Dean Farrar laughed at him as politely as possible. They knew it was all nonsense, and that the man who "reconciled" the Bible and Modern Science did not understand either.

The ground taken by the new school of Bible defenders is this. They frankly admit that it contains a multitude of mistakes in science and history, and from the point of view of common sense. They no longer declare that it is the Word of God; they say it contains the Word of God. The revelation is not formal, but suggestive. Somewhere or other within it, if we seek aright, we shall find all that is necessary to our salvation, and that is all it was ever intended for. Its writers were inspired as religious teachers; they were not inspired as scientists or historians; nay, they were not even preserved from falling into any of the errors, superstitions, and prejudices of their own age and nation.

This theory sweeps away all the common difficulties of the case. It gets rid of the science of Genesis, the inaccuracies of the historical books, the absurdities of Balaam's ass and Jonah's whale, and all the self-contradictions between "In the beginning" and "Amen." It will serve the Church for some time. But it cannot last for ever. It is essentially a transition theory. It marks the progress of clerical surrender up to date. Simply this and nothing more. "Inspiration" cannot be given up all at once. It becomes slowly diluted by reason, until at length there remains but a trace of the original spirit, which finds its expression in the paradox, "That is inspired which inspires me."

The word "inspired" like the word "genius" is fast obeying the common law of language. New words are invented in science and commerce, but old words are generally retained with an altered meaning in politics and religion. "Genius" once meant an attendant spirit; now it means an exaltation of natural faculties. "Inspired" once meant being the medium of divine messages to man; now it means being wound up to a high pitch of performance, as in the poet, the artist, the actor, the orator. We also speak of the performer's "soul" without the slightest reference to anything apart from his visible organisation. Thus do supernatural terms get emptied of their meaning.

The Bible is indeed a blunder altogether. Supposing there be a God, who is the Creator of all us, and who communicates with us spiritually, it is childish to suppose that he said all he had to say two or three thousand years ago, speaking in two languages that are only understood by comparatively a handful of his children, and taking no care whatever to preserve the written word from the accidents of time and change. No one can ever be assured that God has spoken unless God speaks to him individually. Revelation must always be personal. What is revelation at first-hand is only hearsay at second-hand. He who has God's authority for anything only brings me his own authority when he conveys it to me.

Supposing God spoke to Moses, how do I know that this is what he said to him? The very lapse of time raises insuperable difficulties. It will not do to tell me that similar difficulties occur in regard to the works of all ancient writers. Similar is not the same. There is a fundamental difference at the starting point. It does not materially affect my life or my principles to believe or disbelieve that Cæsar wrote the "Commentaries," or Cicero delivered those Orations. As the man in the street would say, nothing hangs to it. But an alleged revelation involves the greatest and most decisive consequences, in private and public life, and in all modes of thinking and feeling. So much hangs to it that the revelation should be unquestionable, which it cannot be in the case of a book like the Bible.

Freethought must keep on attacking the Bible. It is the Alpha and Omega of Christian theology and priestcraft. Theoretically the Christian has a God in heaven; practically his God is the Bible, and this is none the less true because he reads it in all sorts of different ways, for that is precisely how every God is understood by his devotees.

Materialism: Its Meaning and Value.—II.

LIKE other forms of scientific thought, the Materialism of antiquity underwent an eclipse consequent on the revival of supernaturalism, of which Christianity stood as the conquering expression. Until the Renaissance, Materialism as a mode of thought was either extinct or survived only in secret. The products of Greek thinking could not be altogether destroyed, but they were so overlaid with supernaturalism, and the investigation of natural phenomena so completely under the control of the Church, that for the better part of a thousand years the world remained practically stagnant. Many of the positive results of ancient thought were actually lost altogether. This was the case with the Pythagorean system of astronomy—revived at a later date by Copernicus. And when not lost, the true principle of investigation was ignored. The utter barrenness of the spiritualistic or supernaturalistic method was never more clearly shown than in the one period of civilised history during which it exercised complete control.

At the Renaissance, Materialism did for human thought what it has done over and over again in the history of science. Just as in the dawn of Greek philosophy so it again brought men's minds back to an unchallengable reality—to facts that could be grasped by all, and tested by all. And with each revival, like the waves on an incoming tide, it registered a more assured advance. This time its rise was strengthened by the sound scientific work that had been done in the schools of Mohammedan Spain. Great advances had been made there in many directions; but, above all, the science of chemistry had been created. This served, more than anything else, to make thinkers familiar with the conception of force as something inherent in matter rather than external to it. In its more developed form we have, in place of force, energy. Most advanced scientific workers to-day show a strong inclination to drop "force" altogether as introducing a quite needless anthropomorphic element.

The causes that led up to the deeply-rooted modern mechanistic, or Materialistic, conception of nature may be briefly indicated. In astronomy, the Copernican theory effected a complete revolution in human ideas concerning the earth's place in the universe, and this in turn modified men's attitude towards the ruling form of supernaturalism. It was a sure instinct that led the Church to oppose the Copernican system, as, once admitted, the cosmology on which Christian teaching rested logically collapsed. Following this, Galileo and Newton, in formulating the laws of terrestrial and celestial gravitation, made the important advance of reducing all mass motion to a "force" belonging to matter itself. In a way, this had been done by some of the Greek thinkers; but the Newtonian generalisation gave the idea an experimental and verifiable basis. In turn, Newton was attacked for Atheism and Materialism; and, so far as his theory eliminated the direct action of Deity, the charge was justifiable. With the Nebular Hypothesis of Laplace, the work of establishing the mechanistic principle in astronomy was practically completed. No future criticism of either theory could disturb that. Indeed, all criticism was compelled to express itself in terms of the Materialistic principle.

Just as Laplace used the dissipation of heat and the laws of moving bodies to explain the formation of the solar system, so geology became a science by abolishing cataclysmal and creative epochs, and tracing all geologic changes to the operation of known forms of energy. How recent most of our best scientific knowledge is, and how rapid advance may be once a fruitful idea is mooted, may be seen from the fact that Hutton, the real founder of scientific geology, formulated his theory as late as 1788. Other investigators—Werner, Hall, Humboldt, Sedgwick, Murchison—made important contributions to a knowledge of geological phenomena; and, finally, Sir Charles Lyell, in 1830, in his epoch-making Principles of Geology, established the principle of the uniform, continuous, and permanent action of known forces as accounting for the whole of geological phenomena.

Chemistry exerted also a profound influence in firmly establishing the mechanistic idea. The study of chemistry, for various reasons, has a larger connected history than most of the other sciences—with the possible exception of astronomy. When Dalton, in 1808, propounded the atomic theory, he brought back, by actual proof, the teachings of Democritus and other Greek thinkers. That has remained one of the basic conceptions of modern science, and is substantially unaffected by any possible theory as to the disintegration of the chemical atom. It still remains the most powerful instrument in the hands of the chemist. And when we add to the facts already named the establishment of the principle of the conservation of energy, and of the doctrine of evolution in the organic sphere, we have a world, practically complete in its general features, and in which the supernatural has no place whatever. For everyone of these teachings rests upon the conception of forces as internal instead of external. The whole phenomena of nature, from atom to planet, and from the tiniest speck of living matter up to man, exist as the result of "forces" inseparable from the material of nature. Henceforth, whatever the clash of scientific forces, the problem before all is that of deducing the known universe from the play of known or knowable forces. The supernatural has received its death-blow.

So far, I have not given any exact definition of Materialism. For, like other terms with historical associations, its meaning is best realised by understanding what these associations were. And from what has been said, it will be plain that the essential issue between Materialism and Spiritualism lies in the possibility or impossibility of explaining all phenomena as due to the composition of natural forces. This was the conception that characterised Materialism in the days of Democritus, and it is still characteristic of Materialism in our own day. If phenomena can be so explained, then the truth of Materialism is admitted, even though we may disguise our Materialism under other names. If we give up this method of explanation as hopeless, there is an opening for the spiritualistic theory, although an opening only. There would still be needed positive proof of its correctness. And, judged by its history, there need be no hesitation in saying that, whether Materialism be right or wrong, the spiritualistic theory is absolutely worthless as either an explanation of admitted facts or as an instrument of investigation.

On the other hand, not only has the mechanistic principle proven itself to be of enormous value as a mode of inquiry, but it possesses the valuable feature that its errors always admit of rectification. It should however, be pointed out, that the errors charged against Materialism are more properly chargeable to the science of the time. There is no need for wonder, to take an example, that when "matter" was thought of by all as made up of small, solid bodies, indivisible and indestructible, materialistic thinkers made use of that conception. But no change in our conception of the nature of matter can really affect Materialism. The answer to the question "What is matter?" must always be determined by contemporary science. If matter is thought of at one time as made up of solid particles, and at another as so many ethereal ganglia, the Materialist may rest content with either view. In any case, the word is no more than a symbol, useful to summarise our experiences, and so render them intelligible. The Materialist may, in brief, endorse Mr. Carvath Read's dictum, that "matter" "is a methodological category; it is for science to decide how it may best be defined as a means of understanding phenomena."*

* Metaphysics of Nature, p. 287.

Digitized by Google

The truth is, that a great deal of the discussion about matter is a heritage from the long reign of metaphysics. People assumed — and many still assume—that apart from what we know of the world as represented in consciousness, the whole of which may be traced to sensations and memories of sensations, simplex or complex; beside this it is assumed that we have some apprehension of another world dignified by the name of reality. Under various titles, noumenon, thing-in-itself, unknowable, etc., this has always been a veritable bugbear in the history of scientific philosophy. It is sheer futility. Of a world outside of consciousness we know nothing, and never can know anything—not even whether there is anything to know about. The phenomena described by the term "matter," and the phenomena described by the term "mind," are, for us, never more than two aspects of the same fact or set of facts. Modern psychology, if it has done nothing else, has at least made this clear.

But there are Metaphysical Materialists, as there are Metaphysical Spiritualists. And each perpetrates exactly the same blunder. To take away all sensible qualities: heat, color, smell, hardness, etc., and then to assume that there remains something which we call matter, and declare that to be the origin of everything, is as far removed from sound science and as truly metaphysical—in the vicious sense of the word—as it is to abstract all mental qualities and worship a mythical substratum—"mind." Mind as the sum of mental qualities is understandable. Matter as the sum of sensible qualities is also understandable. But neither mind nor matter, as things in themselves, is anything more than a figment—both useless and misleading. A genuine Materialism is committed to no such metaphysical nightmare. Its sole concern is the establishment of the simple principle that natural phenomena result from the inevitable composition of natural forces. Once grasp that principle in all its simplicity, and apply it with only a moderate degree of logical acumen to all the confusion that has gathered round the subject of Materialism, and a large part of the criticism levelled against it, disappears.

The Honest Doubter.

THE Rev. Dr. Wilbur Chapman is a professional revivalist who hails from America. Revivalism, as a profession, is not yet a hundred years old; but from the day of Moody and Sankey to this of Torrey and Chapman its popularity has been great. The chief object in view is the restoration of backsliders whom the local clergy are unable to reach. As a rule, backsliders are simply indifferent, lukewarm believers, and to win them back into the Christian fold is not a very difficult task. Convinced unbelievers do not attend revival meetings except out of curiosity, nor are they at all likely to be affected by the ordinary evangelistic appeals. Unbelief is a subject which the revivalist does not seem to understand. Dr. Chapman betrays his ignorance the moment he begins to talk about it. He tells his hearers that some are doubters because they are too stubborn to believe. He admits, however, that "some are born with a tendency to doubt," while convinced that, in the majority of instances, "doubt has sin as its tap-root." "For the one who is an honest doubter," he professes "all respect," and would like to help him if he could. He defines him thus:—

> "The honest doubter is the man who tells me that he cannot receive my hope and faith, that he does not know that he wants to receive either, but at the same time he tells me that if my hope cheers me, if my faith strengthens me, if it makes trouble easier to bear, and the tomb to be robbed of some of its gloom, he will say no word to me that will take away from me the thing that means so much to me. Such a man is an honest doubter."

We prefer to call such a man a cowardly doubter, who lacks the courage of his convictions. In Dr. Chapman's discourse a doubter is one who rejects religion, an Infidel, even an Atheist; but it is impossible to reject religion honestly without regarding it as false. To grow away from it while believing it to be true would be the absurdest thing in the world. But if one verily believes that religion is false is it not his duty to say so and try his best to make converts? Dr. Chapman believes that Christianity is a good which everybody needs, and he goes from one end of the world to the other coaxing people to accept it. Has not the man who is convinced that Christianity is untrue and has wrought incalculable harm in the world, an equal right to make proselytes, if he can? Was not Bradlaugh as legitimate a propagandist as Moody? He is not worth his salt who makes no endeavor to spread the faith that is in him.

Dr. Chapman has an endless store of anecdotes to illustrate whatever assertion he happens to make. The statement that "the doubt of many has a sin as its tap-root" is verified by a neat little story about a University student. He was one of the Upper-class-men, and the gentleman who was about to preach overheard a careless, slighting remark about religion in which he indulged on his way to the chapel. The minister turned and laid his hand upon his shoulder, saying, "May I speak with you for a moment?" When they were alone he said, "Are you a Sceptic?" "Yes, sir, I am," came the ready answer. The preacher said, "What sin are you covering? Tell me honestly what sin are you covering? For I know you are covering sin." Thereupon, the story proceeds, the young fellow's "face became as white as death," and with tears streaming down his cheeks he made a full confession of his guilt. Another pat story is of two men meeting somewhere in Africa. "Are you a Christian?" the one asked the other. "No, I am not a Christian," was the answer. "Why not?" "Because the Bible has so many contradictions in it." This answer casts a strong suspicion upon the truth of the story. They talked the matter out by the fireside, with the result, of course, that the Freethinker flung his unbelief to the winds, and became a zealous disciple of Jesus Christ. We are told of another, "the greatest Infidel Dr. Chapman has ever known," who, on hearing Moody say, "God is your Father; he has given Jesus Christ to be your Savior; will you take him?" bowed his head and exclaimed "O, God, if this is what thy love means, I will accept thy Son." Such are the stories that are so serviceable at revival meetings; and the people are so delighted to believe them. "A leader in Scepticism," "the greatest Infidel I have ever known," such is the description of the doubters who are supposed so easily to become precious jewels in Immanuel's crown.

Dr. Chapman's sermon contains one priceless gem, of the real value of which the preacher had no idea. Here it is:—

> "You may argue yourself into a position of Scepticism, which is greatly to be deplored; you rarely argue yourself out of it."

A truer observation was never made. Acceptance of Christianity is never an intellectual act. No person ever argued himself into a state of Christian belief. Every argument for belief is intellectually assailable. Our revivalist admits it, and says:—

> "You may encourage doubt by argument. It is not well to argue about these things that are so great and so sacred. Go at a man with an argument, and you will knock at the door of his head, and he will come back with an argument, it will be 'Greek meeting Greek,' and you will make very little progress."

Now, why is it easier for a man to argue himself into Agnosticism than out of it? Is it not because Agnosticism is fundamentally reasonable, while belief is against reason? It is a notorious fact that the most perfervid believers are in constant danger of lapsing into unbelief. The tendency of all faith is to die out; it can be kept alive only by artificial means. This is beyond all controversy. A Christian may argue himself into a position of Scepticism, but he may not argue himself out of it. It is very questionable whether a convinced, thoroughgoing Freethinker has ever become a Christian in any way whatever; but we do know of scores of Christians, after joyfully experiencing what is called the new birth, who have become Freethinkers by force of argument, and are permanently beyond the reach of all revivalists. Their Scepticism is a treasure laid up in their hearts, "where neither moth nor rust doth consume, and where thieves do not break through nor steal." They are quite prepared to talk the matter out with anyone who comes along; they would not be afraid to try a lance with Dr. Chapman himself, so assured are they of the perfect soundness of their ground. This revivalist is wise enough never to enter into argument with them. Dogmatising is so much easier and safer. He prefers to say to them, when they are not present: "You are dominated by the spirit of prejudice. You have not been fair to God's Word, to Jesus Christ and the Church." This is sheer balderdash, with not a word of truth in it. The fact is that the reverend gentleman is sitting in judgment upon people he does not understand. If the greatest Infidel he has ever known was converted by means of a few commonplace words uttered by the evangelist Moody, we deliberately declare that he is utterly incompetent to talk about Infidels.

The honest doubter is of necessity a maker of doubters. He does not stick his finger in his waistcoat and sneer, as Dr. Chapman thinks he does, but he does allow the light that is in him to shine before men. He not only tells you that he cannot receive your hope and faith; he goes further, and informs you what prevents him from receiving them, and that, in his judgment, you, too, would be much better off without them. This is by no means a sneering attitude, but the natural attitude of a man who believes that he is in possession of the only saving truth, which he is eager to share with all his brethren. Probably he was once a Christian himself, as zealous and joyful as any revivalist; but when the eyes of his understanding were opened, his faith and hope took wing and flew away. Now, has he not a perfect right to say that he has grown away from religion? When I meet such a man, says Dr. Chapman,—

> "I feel like saying to him, Did Gladstone grow away from it? and our own great McKinley, did he grow away from it? When the doctor said that McKinley was going to die, our great martyred President said, Gentlemen, if this is the end, then let us sing a hymn together."

We are not surprised now that the reverend gentleman is averse to arguing about these things. He has not mastered the art. Everybody knows that Gladstone died a Christian; but what on earth has that to do with the case? Charles Darwin, a greater man than Gladstone, did grow away from the Christian religion; and tens of thousands have done the same since. It is a difficult task nowadays to come across a scientist who is a whole-hearted believer. The fact that Gladstone died a Christian cannot surely serve as an argument for the truth of Christianity. You might as well argue that because, five hundred years ago, the majority of people believed in witches, it follows that witchcraft must have been true. We know that witchcraft was not true; and many of us are quite as sure that Christianity is as false. Had it been true, there would have been no need of Dr. Chapman and his ilk. Revivalism is itself a most powerful argument against its truth. So is the Church, with all its intricate machinery.

WE have an affection for all dictionaries. Even a gazetteer is a mine of suggestion; but a biographical dictionary or an encyclopædia is certain to make large inroads on our time. Take, for example, Wheeler's Dictionary of Freethinkers. In it there are thousands of entries, taken from all ages and all countries. That means many thousands of names of interest, many thousands of men and women who have played their part on life's stage, and who played it in a sufficiently remarkable manner to give their names a distinct interest to their descendants. We know of few more delightful occupations than the reading of such a book, and it is a thousand pities that Freethought publishers are not sufficiently wealthy to include the portraits of all the persons mentioned.

Such a book is informative, and turns the handles of many doors. We turn a page and encounter the name of Richard Carlile. It is but a name on the page, but what an indomitable spirit does it not conjure up. There flits into our memory the terrible martyrdom of this bravest of the brave soldiers of Liberty. Think of it! Carlile, the lion-hearted, suffered nine-and-a-half years' imprisonment for championing the liberty of the press. His brave wife and other members of his family, and shop assistants, divided among them fifty years' confinement. Further we see the splendid name of Edward Gibbon, the greatest of English historians, who "sapped a solemn creed with solemn sneer." He walks for ever as to the clash of arms, under an imperial banner. Without exploration we have found the magnetic and powerful name of Voltaire. What a man! His epigrams stung like wasps, and rankled for years afterwards. At sixty-four, when other men are thinking of slippered ease, he was writing Candide, the wittiest book in the world. Writing Œdipus at seventeen, Irene at eighty-three, he crowded between these two masterpieces the accomplishments of a giant. And Edward Fitzgerald, who turned the quatrains of the old freethinking Persian, Omar Khayyam, into a masterpiece of English poetry. "A planet larger than the sun which cast it," as his friend Tennyson described it. The name of Thomas Paine is homely, but what a personality does it not recall! A character of outstanding ability, a maker of nations, far from being the uncouth and unlettered man of popular imaginings.

There is a very significant entry in the name of the Empress Catherine, of Russia. How many critics of Freethought know that the evangel of Reason appeals equally to the monarch on the throne as to the man in the street. Catherine was a Freethinker in word and in deed. When Diderot was compelled by poverty to sell his library, she bought it for him, and installed him in it as librarian. Another royal "intellectual" was Frederick the Great. What must it have been to have been present at those festal evenings at Frederick's palace when the nimble wit of Voltaire challenged the best brains of Europe? It must have been a rich memory and an abiding delight, like those ever-memorable nights at the "Mermaid," when rare Ben Jonson exchanged quips and cranks with the smiling Shakespeare. Napoleon, the little Corsican who shook the world, is here, too, in the volume. A more shadowy figure is that of Kit Marlowe, the Elizabethan dramatist, whose untimely death prevented his trial for blasphemy. Sir Richard Burton, the untiring traveller, who penetrated to the "Holy of Holies" at Mecca at the peril of his life, is another of the glorious company of Freethinkers.

The "intellectuals" of France are represented by a splendid procession from Abelard to Anatole France. Who can see the name of Ingersoll without a quickening of the pulses? He comes riding down the wind like a knight in shining armor to attack the embattled hosts of superstition. And the lonely student, Charles Darwin, who turned "Adam" and "Eve" out of the "Garden of Eden," not with a flaming sword, but with a steel pen. Here are Heine, the gifted singer of Germany, dying upon his mattress-grave with a jest upon his lips, and Shelley, the sweet-souled English poet, who was deprived of his children for his Freethought, and men and women imprisoned for selling his works

A sense of fellowship with the fled centuries invades us as we see the name of Giordano Bruno, one of the most fearless martyrs for truth. And Time seems poised for a moment upon his spread wings as we encounter the puissant personality of Lucretius, one of the sublimest poets who ever sang under the eagles of the Cæsars.

Names like these are signposts to meet the reader and direct him towards the wonderful universality of Freethought. And, mind you, there are thousands of such signposts. "Wonderful" is the only adjective which will serve for this maze of wonders; this patient account of the men and women who have cared for intellectual freedom, written by a wise and careful student who himself emptied many an ink-pot in the service of a great cause.

Here under one roof, we may say, is the temple of Liberty and the house of Wisdom, compared with which the abbeys and cathedrals, churches and mosques, of the superstitious are but charnel-houses full of dead bones. For each of these men and women were, in their way, the apostles of freedom. They were knight-errants of the evangel of Liberty. From the far-off time when Lucretius rolled his richest thunders against the infamies of religion in his day, until twenty centuries later Swinburne rallied the soldiers of Freethought with the golden trumpet of his genius, Liberty never failed of its votaries. The bare records of the doings of these pioneers thrill and fascinate by very reason of their simplicity. The feats of Freethinkers have needed little of the embellishments which high-sounding language could give them. From Hypatia, murdered by a Christian rabble, to Ferrer, "butchered to make a Roman holiday," they strike our imaginations and hold our wonder in thrall. They are potent because of their very sincerity. Who could fail to recognise the splendid courage which held so steadfastly to the last moment, or fail to appreciate the iron nerve which bent only before the impossible?

We come to this in the end, that freethinking "saints" are the best. It is significant that in Christian Scotland the popularity of "St. Andrew's Day" is far less than that of "Burns's Night." Is it not true that in the sheer fight of personalities for the possession of England's Day, Shakespeare has beaten St. George, as our American friends would say, "to a frazzle"? There is always a risk when the man whose work lies in the town, as most of our work lies in the town, would rather sit a serviceable armchair than a charger in the ranks of Freedom. But one who has read in Joseph Wheeler's book of those whose monuments are more enduring than marble, might yet listen to the calling bugles of the Army of Liberty.

This is but a little cloud of biographical dust, and, if an apology is needed for such trifling, we point to the fact that the interest of such a volume is inexhaustible. It reaches from the greatest names in history to hundreds of men and women whose achievements were less important, but who, because they dedicated their powers to the service of intellectual liberty, interest us intimately.

> "Come let us drink in silence ere we part

> That brought its tameless passion and its tears,
> Renunciation and laborious years,
> To lay the deep foundations of our race,
> To rear its stately fabric overhead,
> And light its pinnacles with golden grace."

MIMNERMUS.

The Old and the New.

OUR fathers did the best they could. They believed in the supernatural, and they thought that sacrifice and prayer, fasting and weeping, would induce the supernatural to give them sunshine, rain, and harvest—long life in this world, and eternal joy in another. To them, God was an absolute monarch, quick to take offence, sudden in anger, terrible in punishment, jealous, hateful to his enemies, generous to his favorites. They believed also in the existence of an evil God—almost the equal of the other God in strength, and a little superior in cunning. Between these two Gods was the soul of man, like a mouse between two paws.

Both of these Gods inspired fear. Our fathers did not quite love God, nor quite hate the Devil; but they were afraid of both. They really wished to enjoy themselves with God in the next world, and with the Devil in this. They believed that the course of nature was affected by their conduct; that floods and storms, diseases, earthquakes, and tempests were sent as punishments, and that all good phenomena were rewards.

Everything was under the control and direction of supernatural powers. The air, the darkness, were filled with angels and devils; witches and wizards planned and plotted against the pious—against the true believers. Eclipses were produced by the sins of the people, and the unusual was regarded as the miraculous. In the good old times Christendom was an insane-asylum, and insane priests and prelates were the keepers. There was no science. The people did not investigate—did not think. They trembled and believed. Ignorance and superstition ruled the Christian world.

At last a few began to observe, to make records, and to think.

It was found that eclipses came at certain intervals, and that their coming could be foretold. This demonstrated that the actions of men had nothing to do with eclipses. A few began to suspect that earthquakes and storms had natural causes, and happened without the slightest reference to mankind.

Some began to doubt the existence of evil spirits, or the interference of good ones in the affairs of the world. Finding out something about astronomy, the great number, the certain and continuous motions of the planets, and the fact that many of them were vastly larger than the earth—ascertaining something about the earth—the slow development of forms—the growth and distribution of plants, the formation of islands and continents, the parts played by fire, water, and air through countless centuries—the kinship of all life—fixing the earth's place in the constellation of the sun—by experiment and research discovering a few secrets of chemistry—by the invention of printing and the preservation and dissemination of facts, theories, and thoughts, they were enabled to break a few chains of superstition—to free themselves a little from the dominion of the supernatural, and to set their faces towards the light. Slowly the number of investigators and thinkers increased — slowly the real facts were gathered—the sciences began to appear—the old beliefs grew a little absurd — the supernatural retreated, and ceased to interfere in the ordinary affairs of men.

Schools were founded, children were taught, books were printed, and the thinkers increased. Day by day confidence lessened in the supernatural, and day by day men were more and more impressed with the idea that man must be his own protector, his own providence. From the mists and darkness of savagery and superstition emerged the dawn of the natural. A sense of freedom took possession of the mind, and the soul began to dream of its power. On every side were invention and discovery, and bolder thought. The Church began to regard the friends of science as its foes. Theologians resorted to chain and fagot—to mutilation and torture.

The thinkers were denounced as heretics and Atheists—as the minions of Satan and the defamers of Christ. All the prejudice, ignorance, and malice of superstition were aroused, and all united for the destruction of investigation and thought. For centuries this conflict was waged. Every outrage was perpetrated, every crime committed by the believers in the supernatural. But, in spite of all, the disciples of the natural increased, and the power of the Church waned. Now the intelligence of the world is on the side of the natural. Still the conflict goes on—the supernatural constantly losing, and the natural constantly gaining. In a few years the victory of science over superstition will be complete and universal.

So there have been for many centuries two philosophies of life: one in favor of the destruction of the passions—the lessening of wants—and absolute reliance on some higher power; the other, in favor of the reasonable gratification of the passions—the increase of wants, and their supply by industry, ingenuity, and invention, and the reliance of man on his own efforts. Diogenes, Epictetus, Socrates, to some extent Buddha, and Christ, all taught the first philosophy. All despised riches and luxury—all were the enemies of art and music—the despisers of good clothes and good food and good homes. They were the philosophers of poverty and rags—of huts and hovels—of ignorance and faith. They preached the glories of another world, and the miseries of this. They derided the prosperous, the industrious, those who enjoyed life, and reserved heaven for beggars.

This philosophy is losing authority, and now most people are anxious to be happy here in this life. Most people want food, and roof, and raiment—books, and pictures, and luxury, and leisure. They believe in developing the brain—in making servants and slaves of the forces of nature.

Now the intelligent of the world have cast aside the teachings, the philosophy of the ascetics. They no longer believe in the virtue of fasting and self-torture. They believe that happiness is the only good, and that the time to be happy is now, here, in this world. They no longer believe in the rewards and punishments of the supernatural. They believe in consequences, and that the consequences of bad actions are evil, and the consequences of good actions are good.

They believe that man, by investigation, by reason, should find out the conditions of happiness, and then live and act in accordance with such conditions. They do not believe that earthquakes, or tempests, or volcanoes, or eclipses are caused by the conduct of men. They no longer believe in the supernatural. They do not regard themselves as the serfs, servants, slaves, or favorites of a celestial king. They feel that many evils can be avoided by intelligence, and for that reason they believe in the development of the brain. The school-house is their church, and the university their cathedral. The teacher, the interpreter of nature, is their preacher, and all the truths that have been demonstrated constitute their creed.

They believe in the gospel of Intelligence, and they wish to save the world from ignorance, superstition, and misery.

The New Religion satisfies the heart and brain.

The Old Religion is cruel, childish, and absurd. The Old Religion was in perfect harmony with a flat world, with a little heaven above it, and a large hell beneath. The Old Religion had a powerful savage, an immense barbarian for a god, and another savage for a devil. Man at his best was a poor slave, whose happiness and misery dwelt in the smiles and frowns of these supernatural monsters.

The New Religion has destroyed these phantoms. The universe is no longer governed by a tyrant, and man at last is free.

The Supernatural has almost gone, but the Natural remains—the Gods have faded, but Man is here.

—Ingersoll.

For the benefit of the treasury of Trinity Episcopal Church in Wheaton, Illinois, five young women allowed themselves to be sold at auction, September 20, at a vaudeville show given in the church's clubhouse. What disposition was made of the women by their purchasers is not told by the Chicago Examiner, which reports the sale. The proceeding is presumed to be innocent, but is reminiscent of the ages when women regarded it as the fulfilling of a vow that involved all that such a sale would suggest.—Truthseeker (New York).

Acid Drops.

How the clergy know, and follow, their own interests! They damn the people to all eternity when it is safe to do so for the slightest sign of independence. "Believe and be saved; disbelieve and be damned"—that is their message when the people are silly and weak enough to accept it. But when their power begins to wane they take to pleading instead of cursing, and coaxing instead of coercing. They court the "dear people" and make themselves out to be their kindest, tenderest, and most valuable friends. This game is worked best at a time of bereavement. It is not surprising, therefore, to read that as soon as the silence of grief was broken by speech at Senghenydd, where the deadly mine explosion took place, the men of God looked in with their cheap professional attentions. "Clergy and ministers of all denominations," a reporter said, "move about among the people, and Salvation Army lasses soothe the sorrowing ones with gentle words of comfort." What a ghastly mockery! "Soothing" the women with their men down in the burning pit! The very word is shameful; and only a maudlin religion like Christianity, with its wretched "consolations," could be guilty of such miserable meanness.

One of the rescuers down in the blazing mine was overwhelmed by a fall of roof and killed. It was a brave man's work and a brave man's death. Up above in the sunlight, at the same time, the Bishop of Llandaff was performing prodigies of "consolation." His first visit was to the home of Mrs. Baker, who had lost both her husband and a son, with a family of ten dependent upon her. In the midst of this affliction her new baby was born. Some good, kind woman might have carried sympathy into that stricken home. But what could the Bishop of Llandaff do there? What could any man do there? To speak in the name of God was a mockery. What had that poor woman done that "Providence" should send her so heavy a blow? What could the Bishop talk to her except humbug? By the way, she has since died.

Five men of Mrs. Ross's household were down in the Lancaster pit, and it was feared that all of them had perished. She also was visited by the heroic Bishop of Llandaff, who told her, as he told other humble mourners, to "look to Him to whom the widow and the fatherless are an especial care." Nothing but the religious training of these poor women can account for their listening patiently to such hypocritical nonsense. The kind attentions of "Him" would have been useful before the explosion; what use were they after it? The Bishop of Llandaff knows as well as we do that God's care for the widow and the fatherless is only a pious "gag." Science is more merciful than Providence. Had all who were concerned given Science fair play there would have been no explosion at Senghenydd, and the women would not have required any "consolation" for the loss of fathers, husbands, and sons.

Rev. R. J. Campbell has been orating at the City Temple on the recent tragedies on the sea, in the earth below, and in the air above. Many people, he says, find such tragedies standing in the way of "wholehearted assumption of the Christian faith." The explanation used to be that God does as he likes and is, after all, wiser than we are. But the new explanation is that "God cannot help himself in the matter.....It had to be, and omnipotence could not alter it." Which is equivalent to Carlyle's complaint that "God does nothing"—as we have always said.

Mrs. Theaker, a resident at Thorpe Bay, Essex, appears to be exceedingly intimate with God. Speaking at a recent meeting at her house, she said she had sausage-roll and dry toast for dinner on Christmas Day. Afterwards, while pondering over this tribulation, the Lord spoke to her about it, and said to her, "It is because you have never prayed for one"; and she whispered in reply, "No, I did not, for I trusted to the good doctor, who has supplied me with a Christmas dinner for eight years, and I heard afterwards that he was lying ill and unconscious at the time." This Culinary Christianity suggests the association of piety and pies, and prayers with pudding. Most Christians prefer the cash, and let the cookery go.

The Christians of Southend-on-Sea, led by their pastors and masters, are anxious to prevent any amusement on Sunday. They want everything closed except churches, public-houses, and the mouths of the asses which, like Balaam's quadruped's, are opened by the Lord.

A nineteen-years'-old choir-boy figured in a divorce case last week as a co-respondent. This is what comes of following the clergy's example.

The writer of the "Readers and Writers" column in the New Age notes a fact that has often been dwelt upon in the Freethinker, but falls into a curious error in indicating the cause of its existence. It is, he says, a proof "of the obsession sex has made of itself in the West that many such words as 'expurgated,' originally of a wide connotation, have come to be confined popularly to sex matters. Virtue, continence, licentious, sensual, passionate, lust—the list might be indefinitely extended. These words, I fancy, owe their degradation to novelists and women." Now, novelists and women may be charged with responsibility for a deal, but in this instance they could safely plead "Not guilty." Novelists—of the kind indicated—do not create a public opinion; they follow it, and strengthen it by pandering to it. Besides, this narrowing of ethical language until it has come to mean little more than sex relations is very much older than the novel-writing class, and its source lies much deeper than is indicated by the New Age writer.

To put the essence of the case in a sentence, the narrowing of words such as those cited to mere sex is only one of the many illustrations of the profoundly ill effects of Christianity on moral judgment. The older Pagan world rightly conceived the good man, the virtuous man, as one who was "straight" in all aspects of life. It did not specially emphasise sexual straightness; it held that as only one of the relations in life in which rectitude was desirable. The result was that the good man, in the Pagan sense of the word, was one who in all directions discharged his duty faithfully and well. On the other hand, Christianity was from the outset obsessed by the fact of sex. Sexual rightness was the crowning virtue, sexual wrongness the crowning vice. It did not, of course, deny that conduct in other directions was either virtuous or vicious; but it so dwelt upon sex that in course of time it edged other things out of consciousness when the words "vice" and "virtue" were mentioned. And the further result of this was that a man might be forgiven almost any form of rascality provided he kept—at least ostensibly—the seventh commandment. No one was made better by this; it is fairly easy to show that many were made worse. And if any illustration is needed of the truth of what has been said, the swarms of parsons always anxious to discuss sexual purity—or impurity—and their lukewarmness in denouncing other vices, will serve. As in so many other cases, the way of salvation lies in forsaking the Christian path and returning to the healthier humanistic one.

From a report in the Weekly Scotsman (Oct. 18) we learn that, at the recent royal marriage "the form of service had been printed in a shortened form," and that "Canon Sheppard, who read the opening injunctions, made it shorter still by omitting those passages which, in the Prayer Book, specify with needless explicitness the purpose for which matrimony was ordained." If the Church marriage service has already to be shortened and expurgated for royal brides and bridegrooms, it will soon have to be cleared of its beastliness for humbler couples—all of which is founded on Paul's sexual perversion. The plea that the brutal language of the Marriage Ceremony is at any rate true has not a shadow of justification in the light of human evolution. Marriage is not based upon love or lust; it is based upon the fact of offspring, and upon that alone.

Of the three parsons who assisted at the Royal Wedding, the Daily Chronicle says that one had to undertake his duties "for love," and serve without fee. That one was the Archbishop of Canterbury. What on earth does he get his £15,000 yearly for?

The Chairman of the Congregational Union says that a man may not be irreligious because he does not go to church, but he is not very religious unless he goes. That is exactly what we have always said. It is all humbug asserting that there are more religious people outside the Churches than in them. This discovery is only made in order to soften the fact that so small a proportion of the population attend church. In the main, when a man is really religious, he will attach himself to some church or chapel. And when he severs that connection, even though he may invent a number of excuses for the severance, the bottom reason is that he is losing his faith in religion.

Mr. Morgan Gibbon also asked, "Have strong, brainy, strenuous men no need of religion? And has the Church no need of them?" Strong, brainy, strenuous men answer the question by generally staying away. We quite admit that the Churches have need of this type—never more so—but they can't get them. Look at the mental calibre of the leaders of the Churches. Would they be leaders in anything but religion? Could anyone imagine the Bishop of London, or Campbell Morgan, or R. J. Campbell leading in anything but theology? Oh, yes; the Churches need brainy men, but as they can't get them they must make the most of what they can get. And the quality is steadily sinking.

The Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon, president of the Congregationalist Conference, has been sighing for the "old Sunday." Presumably, the dear old Sunday when Nonconformists were flogged if they did not attend the Government churches.

Mrs. Herbert Stead spoke of the duty of the Churches towards "the woman in the back street" at the Congregationalist Conference at Southend. The Churches have usually given blankets and promised coals—some in this world, more in the next.

A writer on education says that children should choose their own occupations. Impossible! Too many would wish to be parsons, and work only one day a week.

What a busy week Providence has had! The Volturno, with its mass of emigrants on a burning ship in a raging sea; between 400 and 500 killed in a single mine accident in Wales; a railway collision in Lancashire; and an exploding Zeppelin airship, with its tale of dead, in Germany. In the air, on the earth, under the earth, or on the sea, who can escape the power of the Lord? What a comfort it must be to the devout mind to reflect that these things come, not from the unconscious operation of "blind" laws of nature, but from a directive intelligence that baffles all attempts at human comprehension.

Rev. Edward Henry Greenhow, of the Vicarage, Chidcock, Bridport, left £11,623. We wonder if he has met the blessed-be-ye-poor preacher yet. Or did he go straight to the pit?

Punishment! What a silly and inhuman idea! It simply makes a bad matter worse. Yet the Christians are mightily in love with it, for it lies at the basis of their faith. They cannot even conceive the world going on without it. Here is Mrs. Phipps, for instance, chairman of the special schools sub-committee of the London Education Committee, defending the punishment of children by giving them bread and water instead of a square meal at dinner time. "Since the abolition of corporal punishment," she said, "they must have some form of punishment that would affect the children." Nonsense! Stop driving and try leading.

The Daily Telegraph notice of the death of the late Mr. Justice North lays on praise with one hand and brushes it off with the other. "He was least successful," our contemporary says, "as a criminal judge, and one of his sentences, that of twelve months' imprisonment on Mr. G. W. Foote for blasphemy, evoked some strong protests on the ground of its severity." Yes, and on other grounds too. He played the role of partisan on the bench, and allowed his friend, Sir Hardinge Giffard (now Lord Halsbury), the leading counsel for the prosecution, to walk out of the court in confidence that the case would be in excellent hands during his absence—as Mr. Foote told his lordship to his face.

A feeble jest that "Buddhism required a mild climate" raised a gentle giggle at a Wesleyan missionary centenary celebration meeting in London the other day. We agree that any climate would appear mild compared with the Christian hell.

A story has been published, entitled A Preacher of the Lord. If all of that profession buy a copy of the book, the author should become wealthy; and, should the "Lord" acknowledge the compliment, he should be also famous.

A Brentford school teacher has just been fined for punishing scholars by compelling them to go down on their knees. Not long ago the children used to be laid across the teacher's own.

The Maxims of Noah is the title of a new book. It sounds watery. We suppose the Maxims of Jonah will follow.

Writing on children's books in the Daily Mirror, a correspondent says: "Homer and Virgil may pass from the memory of the busy person, but not Cinderella." Just so! That is why the dear clergy wish the fairy tales of the Bible taught in schools.

"A woman was the only one who had the pluck to withstand the crucifixion of Jesus, and that was Pilate's wife," said Mrs. Councillor Lees, speaking at the Congregational Autumn Assembly at Southend-on-Sea. Another woman, Eve, caused all the bother that led to the crucifixion.

"Marriage is a life-long miracle," quoted the Daily Mirror, apropos of the Royal wedding. The miracles often get exposed in the law courts.

Holy Russia still keeps up her reputation. She refuses to let Dr. George Brandes pass her frontiers in order to deliver the lectures he had undertaken at St. Petersburg on Goethe and Strindberg. Brandes' father was a Jew, and Brandes inherits the blood, though he is neither a Jew nor anything else in the matter of religion. Moreover, he is unfriendly to Russia; that is to the Russian autocracy, which is, after all, more a bureaucracy. For these lofty reasons he is refused a passport.

Dr. George Brandes may use Shylock's exclamation to explain this Holy Russian outrage,—"I am a Jew." But what of that? Jesus Christ was a Jew. His mother was a Jewess. His father,—well that is delicate ground; but the man whom his mother called his father was a Jew. And all the twelve apostles were Jews. None of them would be admitted into Holy Russia to-day.

That good man, the Head Constable of Wolverhampton, who started the latest "blasphemy" prosecution, resembles the Psalmist in one thing. He is fearfully and wonderfully made. If he has a keen ear for "blasphemy" he has a keener nose for "indecency." A travelling Rag Time company had a poster depicting a boy scout surrounded by the flags of the nations. Nobody had so much as imagined that an objection could be raised to it by anyone outside a prison or a lunatic asylum. The Head Constable of Wolverhampton, however, is like Voltaire's Habbakuk "capable de tout." He objected to the posters as "indecent," and the company had to get them covered up all over the town.

If ever the Head Constable of Wolverhampton had to be executed there would be no need to electrocute him. Put him in a London music-hall chair, with a Russian or French up-to-date female dancer on the stage, and the deed would be done. The shock wouldn't kill everybody, but it would be fatal to this gentleman.

The Athenæum performed a great feat last week. It devoted six columns to a review of Mr. Thorold's Life of Henry Labouchere without mentioning Bradlaugh—although it mentions Northampton and "Labby's" twenty-five years' representation of the borough in parliament. This reticence is positively sublime. Christians ought to subscribe to present the editor with a testimonial.

The £70,000 deficit of the London Missionary Society occupied the attention of the Congregational Union Assembly at Southend-on-Sea last week. Mr. Basden, of Hampstead, offered the quaint suggestion that the fall was due to people keeping motor-cars. It looks as if the motors had outstripped the chariots of the Lord.

It will be interesting and instructive to watch the action of Church of England clergymen when the Government's land proposals are fairly before the country. The Church is, of course, directly interested in any drastic rearrangement of our land system, and any proposal that goes to the root of the matter is almost certain to affect its revenues. Moreover, the Church of England is the Church of the large land-owning class, and parsons will, therefore, be on the horns of a dilemma. If they back up any proposals for remedying the evils of the land system—that is, assuming they are really made—they will suffer the loss of their best friends. If they do not back them up, the hollowness of their professed interest in social betterment will be plain to all. In this matter the Church of England is more vitally interested than the Nonconformist Churches. They are just as much the Churches of the commercial classes, although the line of division is not so clear as it was some half-century since. But, already, if one may judge from such organs of Church feeling as the Guardian and the Church Times, the line of policy is decided on. That appears to be, sympathy for the agriculturalist, and real help for the landowner.

Fancy "pinching" clothes at the Chichester Diocesan Conference! The meeting was at St. Leonards, and Canon Bond and the Archdeacon of Lewes had new overcoats—which they never took home with them again. The thief who took the Canon's coat left an old one in exchange for it. The Archdeacon fared worse, the thief who took his coat carried off with it the notes of the reverend gentleman's speech, and completely upset him.

"Some of us," says the Bishop of Liverpool, "have undergone the experience of unlearning sacred lessons we were once taught." Some of us! We should all of us have had to unlearn our early religious lessons, more or less. In some cases we have unlearned the lot, in other cases only a part is unlearned, but in almost every case advancing years means throwing overboard much that, thanks to the indolence of parents and the rapacity of teachers, has been forced on the child's mind. For it is one of the evils of the situation that religious parents will teach, or allow their children to be taught, a cruder form of theology than they themselves believe in. In every other subject we give the children of our best; in theology, they are usually supplied with the worst. Adults will admit their grave doubts concerning many religious doctrines, but they will place them before children as unquestionable truths. It is one of the evils of religious education that this should be so. And the one way out is to leave religion alone until the child is old enough to understand it. The opposition to religious education in State schools rests on the sound basis of injustice to the adults. But the opposition to the religious teaching of children anywhere rests upon the more important basis of injustice to the child. Let us act fairly by the children, if we cannot act fairly by adults. Give the child a chance.

The restraining influence of religion is a parrot-cry of the clergy. It was not very apparent in the case of an Italian priest at Spello, near Perugia, who stole a valuable altar painting worth £4,000. Had he been less devout he might have taken the altar as well.

A provincial parson prosecuted a boy recently for stealing a solitary apple from his orchard. Perhaps the clergyman was thinking of that other pippin which "brought death into the world and all our woe."

When he first saw women in the pulpit, said the Rev. Morgan Gibbon at Southend, he felt what a good thing it was that Paul was "thoroughly dead." Paul should be ripe by this time.

Old Moore has published his Almanac for 1914, and the dulcet voices of the stars warn us that religious scandals are to be feared next year. No definite date is given, but, presumably, they will spice the Sunday papers as usual throughout the twelve months.

We don't think we ever read anything sillier than Bishop Welldon's letter in last week's Clarion. If he wants to champion Christianity in regard to the treatment of woman during its long history, why doesn't he reply to dignitaries of his own Church, such as Principal Donaldson, for a beginning? And is he really so ignorant as to believe what he says about Chivalry. He actually represents Chivalry as a Christian movement. He may have found it so in Tennyson's Idylls of the King, but let him turn to a history of Chivalry and learn the truth. Bishop Welldon might also stop the circulation of maudlin stories about himself. The latest tells how he pacified and overcame a lot of discontented working men by saying the Lord's Prayer. If he is really so good at that sort of thing, why don't they send him to Dublin? Why does he wait to be sent? Why not go "on his own"?

Gravity is always mistaken by the multitude for wisdom. A round-faced merry fellow shall make a bright, sensible speech, and he will be voted frivolous; but a long-faced saturnine fellow shall utter a string of dull platitudes, and he will be voted a Solon. The clergy, who know this, have developed a perfect art of dullness.

The Birmingham police have been trying to stop the sale of Freethought literature at meetings in the Bull Ring. The magistrates, however, declined to assist a partisan prosecution, and the case was dismissed.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, October 26, Town Hall, Stratford; at 7.30, "Shakespeare's Humanism in the Merchant of Venice."

December 7 and 14, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London.

To Correspondents.

President's Honorarium Fund, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £219 7s. 5d. Received since:—A Manchester Medico, 10s.; Rellim, 2s.; T. T., 2s. 6d.; G. W. S. (Grahamstown), 4s. 4d.

F. J. Voisey.—Thanks. See paragraph.

C. D. writes: "It is good to have one's memory of dear Wheeler refreshed by occasional reprints of his delightful copy. I hope that everyone enjoys them as much as I do. The last example helped me to get a new subscriber to the Freethinker." We are pleased to hear this. If we could afford it we would publish a good collection of Wheeler's articles in volume form; but as we cannot do that, we take pleasure in reproducing some of them in our present-day pages for the benefit of a new generation of readers.

E. B.—Many thanks.

W. P. Ball.—Much obliged.

Sinn.—Sorry we can't oblige.

T. Robertson.—We were afraid that Mr. Cohen would not be in the best of health for his Glasgow visit. Influenza has a way of lingering on the wrong side of the front door after you have said good-bye. We are glad to hear that the lectures were so successful in spite of the new restrictions.

R. H. Rosetti.—Glad to hear Mr. Lloyd's lecture was "followed with intense interest by a good audience at the Stratford Town Hall." Also that many questions were asked and answered.

P. Partridge.—Pleased to hear of Miss Kough's large audience and fine lecture at Birmingham.

The Secular Society, Limited, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

The National Secular Society's office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

Lecture Notices must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

The Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote had capital meetings at Manchester on Sunday. The afternoon meeting, in particular—especially in such brilliant weather, tempting people into the open air—eclipsed all expectations. Mr. Foote was enthusiastically received, and his lectures were warmly applauded. Many questions were asked after both lectures. Mr. C. Pegg was chairman.

"Shakespeare's Humanism in the Merchant of Venice" will be an out of the common subject at Stratford Town Hall this evening (Oct. 26). Mr. Foote has no doubt, however, that he will find Shakespeare appreciated there as elsewhere. It may be added that, up to the present, audiences seem to find this lecture singularly interesting.

Fancy the Freethinker being mentioned in Punch! This is indeed a blow to the old conspiracy of silence. The following appeared in Punch for October 15:—

> "'The last edition was obviously a great improvement. It contains 352 pages, besides 58 pages of Introduction; say 600 pages in round numbers.—Freethinker.'
> "Of course, if they ask us to, we will say it, but we don't believe it."

The explanation of the strain upon our contemporary's faith is easy. The 352 is a printer's blunder for 532. We hope our arithmetic passes muster now. As for printers and their blunders, even Punch must have had some experience in that direction. But all comic we trust, as in the present instance. Occasionally a tragic instance is enough to wring a heart of stone. We once wrote of an old stalwart of Freethought that in the heaviest fighting he never blenched. The printer turned it into bleached. We just caught it in time. Otherwise our only remedy would have been suicide.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures at the Leicester Secular Hall this evening (Oct. 26). The local "saints" should do all they can to advertise his visit and secure him a big audience.

Mr. Bertram Dobell's catalogues are always interesting. He is not only a seller of books, but a reader of books, and a writer of books. His new catalogue, numbered 222, contains many annotated items, one of which is as follows:—

> "Grote (George), Analysis of the Influence of Natural Religion on the Temporal Happiness of Mankind, by Philip Beauchamp, 8vo, sewed, 3s. 6d., 1866.
> "A work of (for its time) very advanced tendencies, first printed (I believe) by Richard Carlile, and never acknowledged by its Author."

Mr. Dobell is right in believing that this little work was first published by Richard Carlile. We have a copy of the original edition, dated 1822 and bearing Carlile's imprint. It is bound up with other things in vol. iii. of the Deist, and is finely printed in large handsome type, with a liberal margin, running to 140 pages. The edition that Mr. Dobell advertises is probably the one published by Edward Truelove.

John Stuart Mill mentioned the Analysis in his Autobiography (p. 69) as one that contributed materially to his "mental development." He says it was "written on the foundation of some of Bentham's manuscripts and published under the pseudonym of Philip Beauchamp." Mill refers to it again in his essay on "The Utility of Religion" as "a short treatise, understood to have been partly compiled from manuscripts of Mr. Bentham." Mill knew all about it, but he did not care to go farther. The real truth is that the book was written by George Grote, the historian of Greece, from manuscript notes of Bentham. Grote, like Mill, was one of Bentham's disciples. Mill was next door to an Atheist; Grote and Bentham were pure Atheists—Bentham aggressively so. Our old friend and colleague, J. M. Wheeler, told us that he had come across a lot of Bentham's manuscripts in the British Museum, some of which were evidently regarded as too strong for publication. Bentham's character was worthy of his intellect. He supplied Robert Owen with money to prevent the break-up of the New Lanark social experiment. He also supplied Carlile with money to carry on and extend his publishing business in answer to the "blasphemy" prosecutions. Some of the money went in publishing this very able and important work in Mr. Dobell's catalogue.

It is true, as Mr. Dobell says, that the Analysis was "never acknowledged by its author." The question even arises, Who was its author? Bentham was not, and Grote was not; yet they both were. The fact was well-known behind the scenes, and it was fully stated in Truelove's edition, if not earlier.

One wonders, by the way, if Macaulay would have penned his glowing tribute to Bentham as a jurisprudist if he had known that the old man was a confirmed Atheist.

The Glasgow Herald has made and published a discovery. "When men," it says, "hate each other intensely 'for the love of God' there is no crime too horrible for them to impute, and no cruelty so extreme that they will shrink from perpetrating it." That's all right. But it would have been called a vulgar lie in the Freethinker.

Some time ago we announced that we were trying to make up a second set of the Freethinker as a precaution against fire or other accidents. We have the volumes of this second set as far back as 1893, and we are anxious to obtain the remainder back to the start in 1881. We also stated that we wished to obtain a copy of our old Heroes and Martyrs of Freethought written—well, say before the Flood. Unfortunately we have received no response to our appeal. We venture to renew it. Of course we are ready to pay a reasonable price for the volumes (or numbers) that we desire—although we should cheerfully accept them as a gift if any holder could afford to present them. It would be best to reply to us direct. But anyone calling at 2 Newcastle-street on this business could see our shop manager, Mr. H. Saill, instead.

We are devoting a good deal of time and attention to our review of Professor Bury's History of Freedom of Thought —a subject which is, of course, of transcendent interest to our own readers. We hope to print a large instalment of our review in next week's Freethinker.

Mr. H. George Farmer, who has written another article for the Freethinker, this time on Courbet, says he will take our hint about the National Anthem. "Strange to say," he adds, "I have a lot of notes on the point, which I made some years ago." But he cannot get access to them just at present. On another point Mr. Farmer writes: "I sincerely hope you will not overdo yourself with two lectures at Manchester. The movement cannot afford to lose your guidance even for a day." The same hope was expressed at Manchester. It was expressed by the chairman and earnestly echoed by the audience. Perhaps there is more efficacy in Freethought than in Christian prayers. Anyhow, while we were very tired on Monday morning, we felt none the worse in any other way, and the voice was rather improved than worsened by the Sunday's effort.

Another successful meeting was held at Foresters' Hall, Highgate-road, on Sunday last. An appreciative audience enjoyed Mr. Hope's lecture, and several questions were asked. The final lecture of this course will be delivered to-day (Oct. 26) by Mr. C. E. Ratcliffe, who is a favorite of North London "saints."

The Bethnal Green Branch holds a "Tea, Social, and Dance" at the King's Assembly Rooms, Cottage-grove, Mile-end-road (near Grove-road), on Sunday, November 2. Tea on table at 5.45. Mr. C. Quinton as M.C. Tickets 1s. each, obtainable of Mr. J. Neate, 375 Bethnal-green-road.

There is one person, at any rate, who remembers our criticism of the late Wilson Barrett, the actor, and his trumpery play, the Sign of Cross. We cut the following from John Francis Hope's article on the "Drama" in last week's New Age:—

> "I believe that Miss Lillah McCarthy followed Miss Maud Jeffries in the part of Mercia in the Sign of the Cross. That was a long time ago, but 'the whirligig of time brings in his revenges'; for she is now Lavinia in Androcles and the Lion, and it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that Mr. Shaw has written only a parody of Wilson Barrett's 'masterpiece.' It is a little amusing to remember how ministers of religion gave handsome testimonials to that play; and to notice how ministers of religion are divided in opinion about Mr. Shaw's parody of it. So officially and officiously Christian was the welcome given to the Sign of the Cross that, in 1896, Mr. G. W. Foote, President of the National Secular Society, published 'a candid criticism' of it. If many more clergymen clasp Mr. Shaw to their bosom as the Rev. R. J. Campbell has done, I suppose that we shall have from Mr. Foote a candid criticism of Androcles and the Lion. Certainly, it would serve Mr. Shaw right, for a parody that does not define the thing parodied has failed in its function of criticism."

We rarely go to the theatre now, for we live out of London, and are more affected than we used to be by bad air. But we think of going to see Shaw's new play, even at that price, since it cannot yet be read in print; and if we do our readers (and Mr. Shaw) may be told what we think of it.

We made Maeterlinck's little book on Death the subject of a Queen's Hall lecture soon after its publication. Since then he has expanded the treatise, and now publishes it under the title of Our Eternity. We hope to give it attention shortly. Meanwhile we may note a brief review in last Sunday's Observer. The writer quotes three lines from Shelley as expressing all that the Belgian poet and essayist urges against the fear of death:—

> "And Death shall be the last embrace of her
> Who takes the life she gave: even as a mother
> Folding her child says, 'Leave me not again.'"

"Who can appreciate these lines," the reviewer says, "will not need to read Maeterlinck's essay." What is this? Is Shelley coming into vogue? "Then is doomsday near." Doomsday, at least, to many lies and many evils.

Tuesday's Daily News contained a column review of Shelley, Godwin, and their Circle, by H. N. Brailsford. The writer, S. K. Ratcliffe, spoke in the highest terms of Thomas Paine, and declared that Mr. Brailsford was hardly to be forgiven for calling that great man "Tom," who was the "splendid knight-errant of democracy."

Vanishing Relics of Man's Early Condition.

IN his Magic and Religion, and elsewhere, the late Andrew Lang endeavored to throw doubt on the well-established proposition that lowly savage peoples possess no conception of a Supreme God. Lang also took exception to the view propounded by Dr. Frazer that magic had preceded religion in order of development. But, acute as some of his criticisms undoubtedly were, they have received no support from subsequent inquiry into the customs and beliefs of savages, while some of his contentions have been completely crushed by more recent research.

There is every warranty for the conclusion that the lowliest surviving savage races are to be met with in the remotest recesses of Central Australia. An acquaintance with the facts relating to these primitive peoples is of priceless value to the anthropologist. In the archaic states of society and modes of thought of the Australian natives, we seem to discern the remotest past, and the most primitive stage of human existence still remaining on our planet.

The world of science is immensely indebted to Mr. A. W. Howitt and his colleague, Mr. Lorimer Fison, for their untiring industry in gathering and explaining the facts of aboriginal Australian life. Their pioneer work prepared the way for other students in the same instructive continent, but their greatest service to science was to stimulate Professor Baldwin Spencer and Mr. F. J. Gillen into conducting those observations which have rendered their names famous throughout the anthropological domain. The work of these two eminent men on The Native Tribes of Central Australia has given us an elaborate and carefully authenticated account of primitive savages practically unaffected and uncorrupted by European interference.

Although Australia is the largest of islands and the smallest of continents, it is one of the most isolated land surfaces of the earth. This island-continent was dry land at a time when vasts tracts of what are now Europe and Asia were covered by the sea. Cut off from larger land masses many millions of years ago, its flora and fauna are of a much more primitive pattern than those of the remaining continents. That fierce struggle for existence which was the order of things in other parts of the world was in Australia at a minimum for ages. As a consequence, plant and animal organisms which had perished in the conflict with higher forms elsewhere continued in Australia to survive. And for similar reasons the Australian savages have remained, right down to our time, in a more aboriginal condition than any other uncivilised people in the world.

Although some of the native tribes are less backward than others, all may be said to be remarkably primitive:—

> "While their neighbors, the Malays, Papuans, and Polynesians all cultivate the soil, and build substantial huts and houses, the Australian natives do neither. Pottery, common to Malays and Papuans, the bows and arrows of the latter, and the elaborate canoes of all three races, are unknown to the Australians.....No record, no folk tales, as in the case of the Maoris of New Zealand, of their migration, are preserved by the Australians. True, there are legends and tales of tribal migrations and early tribal history, but nothing, as A. W. Howitt points out, which can be trusted to as referring even indirectly to their first arrival. It is almost incredible there should be none, if the date of their arrival is to be reckoned as only dating back some centuries." *

All the available evidence points to the settlement of these races in Australia at a period very remote. Their rude system of counting betrays no sign of outside influence. Some tribes could not reckon beyond three; very few had any numeral beyond four, and with those that had reached the idea of "five," a word meaning "many" was in use. The various native languages differ to a surprising extent, being sometimes quite unintelligible between tribes separated by a very few miles of country. Nevertheless, the occurrence of common roots proves them to have arisen from a common source, which again points to the vast antiquity of the original settlement of the native races.

The wide gulf which separates the tribes of Central Australia from the civilised peoples of our globe is glaringly illustrated by two remarkable facts. Although these children of nature suffer severely from cold at night "under the frosty stars of the clear Australian heaven," the idea of warming their bodies with the skins and furs of the animals they slaughter for food seems never to have entered their heads. Absolutely naked, they crouch round their miserable fires during the hours of darkness, sometimes tumbling into them and scorching their bodies. The second even more astonishing fact resides in the circumstance that these savages are utterly ignorant of the connection between the intercourse of the sexes and the birth of children. Not only is this so, but they resolutely reject the true explanation of procreation when it is offered to them by their white visitors. Their own notions concerning the reproductive processes are indeed astonishing. It is their firm belief that in the days of long ago their ancestors wandered through the country in bands. These ancestral bands were formed of the members of the group that had descended from the particular plant, animal, or even inanimate object which was their totem. Writes Dr. Frazer:—

> "A totem is a class of material objects which a savage regards with superstitious respect, believing that there exists between him and every member of the class an intimate and altogether special relation.....The connection between a man and his totem is mutually beneficent; the totem protects the man, and the man shows his respect for the totem in various ways, by not killing it if it be an animal, and not cutting or gathering it if it be a plant. As distinguished from a fetish, a totem is never an isolated individual, but always a class of objects, generally a species of animals or of plants, more rarely a class of inanimate objects, very rarely a class of artificial objects." *

The Central Australians likewise suppose that at death the spirits of their ancestors formerly entered the earth, and at the spots which they selected for this purpose, spirit houses were formed. A stone or a tree is usually regarded as the object denoting the site selected by the spirits as their residence. Such spirit abodes are scattered all over the country and the ancestral ghosts that haunt them are perpetually on the look out for a convenient opportunity "to be born again into the world." When a woman passes one of these spirit dwellings the waiting and watching ghost seizes his chance and darts into her body. In course of time her baby is born and the infant is regarded as a reincarnation of the spirit that successfully waylaid the passing female.

> "It matters not whether the woman be young or old, a matron or a maid, all are alike liable to be thus impregnated by the spirits, although it has been shrewdly observed by the natives that the spirits on the whole exhibit a preference for such women as are young and fat."

Among these unsophisticated savages every confinement is regarded as the outcome of spirit agency. And that this most extraordinary delusion was in all probability the universal belief of the human race at the period when the ancestors of extant and extinct civilised peoples were in the same lowly stage of evolution is made abundantly manifest by the survivals of similar notions which are embalmed in the folk tales of the Indo-Germanic stocks. Sidney Hartland's Primitive Paternity and Legend of Perseus both abound in examples which very strongly countenance this conclusion. Very possibly with an eye on a certain Virgin Birth recorded in some of our own sacred books, Dr. Frazer pointedly says:—

> "Students of folk lore have long been familiar with notions of this sort occurring in the stories of the birth of miraculous personages, but this is the first case on record of a tribe who believe in immaculate conception as the sole cause of the birth of every human being who comes into the world. A people so ignorant of the most elementary of natural processes may well rank at the very bottom of the savage scale." *

On the more general problem of the genesis of religions, Spencer and Gillen's researches have thrown considerable light. These careful and painstaking observers have shown that, while magic is of universal occurrence among the natives, religion—employing that term as denoting prayer and sacrifice to, and praise of, superior spirits—is nearly unknown. Every aboriginal Australian is quite certain of the power of his own magical influences over nature. But a slight amount of differentiation has already set in. A few savages are regarded as greater experts in the magic arts than the average natives, and these favored mortals correspond to the wizards and medicine-men of other savage races. The belief in the efficacy of magical rites and ceremonies permeates the entire community. Scepticism seems to be quite unknown, and those who indulge in deceit themselves accord the fullest credence to the claims of other practitioners of the magic art.

Still, although magic is the predominating feature of the native superstitions, the germs of religion are not absent. And Dr. Frazer is probably correct in his surmise that these germs would in due course have developed into a full-blown religion had it not been for the arresting influences of European intervention. And turning to the tribes of South-eastern Australia, we find among them that a rudimentary form of ghost-worship exists. Fires were kindled near the resting-places of the dead, so that their ghosts might be made more comfortable. Among the Dieri, dead men of quality were remembered by the living, who placed food on the graves, while in the winter months fires were lighted so that the spirit could bask in their warmth. Moreover, some of the Western Australians maintain a fire on the grave for nearly a month, and, as the natives are confident that the departed will return, they deposit their finger-nails in a hole near their temporary resting-places, so that they may recognise their dead kinsmen when they revisit the world. In North-east Queensland the beginnings of a belief in the immortality of the soul have been discovered. Some of the tribes not only place food and water inside the grave, but they also bury with the corpse his ornaments, weapons, and other personal possessions. Dislike of the prowling habits from which all spirits suffer is shown in the custom of breaking the legs of the deceased and in maltreating other parts of his body. A conception of the future state as one closely resembling that which the departed led on earth seems clear from one of the customs of the Turribul tribe. Their dead were placed in trees.

> "If the deceased was a man, they left a spear and a club near him that his spirit might kill game for its sustenance in the future state; but if the deceased was a woman, they laid a yam-stick near her body in order that she might dig for roots."

With another tribe, a man suffering great agony will appeal to the dead for help in his distress. The defunct one is expected to reappear in a dream and teach the sufferer a song which has the power to dispel the malign influences which encompass him. Beliefs and practices such as these are incipient stages of ancestor-worship.

Other Australian tribes call on their totems before going to sleep, much as modern Europeans request the guardianship of their saints or divinities in similar circumstances. One of the Warramunga animal totems is a quite imaginary water-snake, from which these natives claim descent, and this totem is apparently on the high road towards apotheosis. Although in South-east Australia a belief is alleged to be prevalent that a sort of anthropomorphic creature dwells in the sky and keeps an eye on the doings of the people below, he appears to be merely a dead savage whose former exploits have been magnified by the native traditions. On the other hand, it is quite conceivable that this semi-divine being may owe much of his supposed importance to European influences. Among the Central Australian tribes whose beliefs have been preserved from all possible suspicion of foreign admixture, no belief in any high god can be said to exist. The testimony of our weightiest authorities is to the following effect:—

> "The Central Australian natives, and this is true of the tribes extending from Lake Eyre in the south to the far north, and eastwards across to the Gulf of Carpentaria, have no idea whatever of the existence of any supreme being who is pleased if they follow a certain line of what we call moral conduct, and displeased if they do not do so. They have not the faintest idea of a personal individual other than an actual living member of the tribe who approves or disapproves of their conduct, so far as anything like what we call morality is concerned."*

With regard to the alleged "discovery" of a high ethical faith among savages, Professor Baldwin Spencer, in a letter to Dr. Frazer, expresses his very firm conviction that there is an utter absence of "any such thing in Australia." As a plain matter of fact, the obstacles which the reactionaries have placed in the paths of the consistent evolutionists have all turned out to be the merest mare's nests. The more carefully and systematically the still surviving uncivilised races are studied, the clearer becomes the truth that wherever the human race has made progress its advancing career was commenced at lowly savage levels. Supernaturalism may have developed out of magic, or magic and the fear and supplication of the ghosts of the dead may have taken their rise together. In any case, each form of superstition has played its part in leading on to the evolution of all the religions that exist, or ever have existed, in the world.

God-in-Christ.

IT is blasphemous of me to link God-in-Christ with hyphens. There is more than a suspicion of disrespect in it; besides, I plead guilty: it is impossible to link the words in any other way. Even professors of long experience in the gentle art of web-weaving cannot accomplish the task of making God-in-Christ a reality. Their lives are full of the sustained endeavor. Every week, for six hours at the most, they heroically strive to achieve the performance. They are assisted by whole libraries of inspired wisdom. They are on friendly terms with God, who is their father, and with Christ, who is their brother; and, despite the much-emphasised statements that they dwell in the love of God, and drink their knowledge from the fount of life, they have, hitherto, failed to do what they claim to be able to do. Try as they will, they cannot reap the reward of their nerve-shattering exertions. God refuses to be linked to Christ except by verbal hyphens. Christ "is not having any."

A few Sundays ago I was lured to church by the title of the evening sermon. The subject was, "The Error of the Unbeliever." As an unbeliever, it was quite pleasant to know I had only one fault; and so I took the opportunity to discover wherein lay that error of my crooked ways, and at the same time to spend an evening in the company of Christ.

The whole sermon might have been condensed into one sentence: the error of the unbeliever is his unbelief. The pastor did not even attempt to prove it; and my conviction, that the modern apostles of Christ, following up their prototypes of the New Testament fairy tales, never prove anything, became more securely fixed in my mind.

Once the minister had disburthened himself of the wonderful discovery resulting from his three hours' preparation, I became interested in the congregation. I searched for the presence of Christ. He was nowhere to be found. There were no signs of him in the pulpit, nor were there any appearances of him in the pews. Christ, certainly, was conspicuous by his absence.

This was strange; but I remembered it was the spirit that should be looked for in such a place. If the spirit were present it would, assuredly, manifest itself in some way, and particularly to an Atheist. These people were assembled to worship Christ, and, consequently, if he were not addicted to telling "fibs," I was dead sure to see things.

How would the spirit show itself? I surreptitiously studied the eyes of the people nearest me. The light of the world would surely be evident there, I thought; but, no; the eyes were all dull and heavy, sleepy even. There was not one of the bright flashes of enthusiasm that stir the heart with contagious rapture; not one ray of the quick, inspiring interest, shooting from the eyes, and revealing the hot, glowing vitality that throbs with love; not one glimmer of the intelligence that is ablaze with passion for the thing loved. No; all these eyes were lifeless, empty.

And yet, the minister was holding forth the glories of God; how they shone, and how they, generally, were super-superlative in every sense. He ran the whole gamut of the wonders of his father; and not an eye twinkled with pleasure. He deflated on the powers of God till the atmosphere seemed to become divine, so to put it; and not an eye reflected the divine splendors. Something was wrong. The spirit was not walking up to its reputation. Naturally, I experienced a shade of disappointment.

Not being altogether hopeless, I turned my attention to the faces and forms of the congregation. Perhaps the spirit would quietly, if not ostentatiously, evidence itself in them. The same boredom was equally characteristic. There was no smile of joy, nor strength of determination, nor anything that suggests the resolution of conviction. Faces and forms were all sleepy, sodden, expressionless, and the spirit was not in them, obviously. These people were all tired. They might as well have been in a park chewing grass.

And yet, the pastor had, by this time, neared his peroration. He was working his voice into intense awfulness. The glory of God in Christ was the Christian's salvation. The father of Christ asked them through his son to arise and gather the fruits of his great vineyard; but the audience sat still, never moving a muscle. The pastor sent his voice up to the thirteen stars that decorated the roof. "The love of God in Christ, which the unbeliever has not," he elocuted, "is within you. God reposes his trust upon you [there was no doubt about the reposing of the trust]. You are his beloved children, to whose care he has bequeathed, through his holy son, the Lord Jesus Christ, the coming of his glorious kingdom. There is no hope for the world save through God in Christ. Amen. May the blessing of the Lord fall upon the words of his servant."

Then it was that the spirit began to move. There was a subdued shuffling of feet, a quiet shutting of Bibles, a low motion of people straightening themselves up. After twenty minutes' somnolency, the spirit of life reawakened to meander through a joyless hymn; and the short service came to an end.

There was something humorously pathetic about the affair; but it has its grim side. A goodly number of the congregation were known to me. Influential men were scattered about, employers of labor, city magnates, controllers of the press, trade-union officials. The remainder of the audience was gathered from the ranks of the middle-class workers. They represent the controlling portion of the nation. Against that social and political power Freethought, the destroyer of hypocrisy, the vanguard of progress, has to fight. The grimness of the struggle is, must be, inevitable; the opposing power is so strong, and we have but our minds.

But, softly, where is the spirit to-day, where is the enthusiasm, where the hot love, tempered with strong reason? In the minds of rebellious unbelievers in orthodoxy. We could sit for hours listening to the editor and his lieutenants, and go home with our minds, our nerves, tingling with delight, our beliefs rising into a grandeur, and our convictions growing greater with a courage that these sleepy Christians never enjoy from their twenty minutes with God-in-Christ. Victory never comes to them who wait; it comes to them who work; and the value of that work can be reckoned by "the spirit" crystallised in it.

Some Little-Known Freethinkers.

I.—THOMAS SCOTT.

FEW have done more valiant work for Freethought, in a quiet way, than the subject of my present sketch. Born April 28, 1808, Thomas Scott lived the life of a cultured gentleman and scholar. He had acted as page to Charles X. of France, and he travelled widely in all parts of the world. Having thoroughly investigated Christianity, he, in the latter part of his life, set himself to the work of enlightening others as to his conclusions. To this task he devoted his time, money, and talents. From his house at Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate, he began by issuing small tracts designed to aid the cause of free inquiry and free expression of thought. These were printed at his own expense and given away, mostly sent by post to the clergy and the cultured classes. Soon a number of writers gathered round him whose works he published and distributed, mainly at his own cost. Altogether, the pamphlets which he published made no fewer than sixteen good-sized volumes. Among the writers who contributed to the series may be mentioned Francis Newman, W. R. Greg, Dr. Willis, J. Cranbrook, M. D. Conway, E. Maitland, M. Macfie, C. Bray, E. V. Neale, J. Robertson, F. E. Abbot, Sir R. D. Hanson, W. Jevons, M. Kalisch, T. Lestrange, J. Muir, J. A. Symonds, P. A. Taylor, Rev. R. Suffield, Judge Strange, Dr. G. Wild, Dr. Zerffi, and Bishop Hinds. Thomas Scott was well called a prince of propagandists. He had always fresh irons in the fire, and the entire series of pamphlets were of the scholarly, cultured order, calculated to win the attention of those for whom they were designed.

As a specimen of his own incisive style, take the first of 213 Questions, to which answers are respectfully asked from the orthodox (1865):—

> "(1) As we are required to love our enemies, may we not safely infer that God loves his enemies? (2) If God loves his enemies, will he punish them more than will be for their good? (3) Would endless punishment be for the good of any being?"

As an instance of illustration, take the following from his reply to Dr. M'Neile, the Dean of Ripon, on the Resurrection:—

> "If anyone comes and tells us that a man, like the cow in the nursery rhyme, jumped over the moon, or that he walked through a six-feet-thick wall, or that he could show himself and vanish at will, we should say at once that his statements might possibly be true, so far as his report of what he thought he had seen was concerned; but that, if it was true, then the creature who did these things was not made of flesh and blood, but had an organisation so entirely different from man that no points of likeness could be traced between the one and the other."

The principal work issued with Thomas Scott's name was the English Life of Jesus. The title shows it was designed to do for English readers a similar work to that which Strauss and Renan had done for Germans and French. Unlike more popular and pretentious Lives of Jesus, it did not attempt to build an edifice without the needful materials, but rather examined those materials, and showed that they could not consistently be fitted together. It shows, in short, that in the Gospels we have to do with legends and fictions, rather than with facts. The work was written in conjunction with Sir W. G. Cox, or rather, I believe, was founded on manuscripts by that gentleman, who, being a dignitary of the Church of England, could not afford to put his name to such a work, and preferred that the whole credit or odium should fall on Mr. Scott, ever ready to do anything for the cause of Freethought. In 1871 Mr. Scott issued a challenge to the Christian Evidence Society, but that body acted with their accustomed discretion, and Mr. Scott followed up his challenge with a scathing exposure of The Tactics and Defeat of the Christian Evidence Society.

In a farewell address to his readers, after fifteen years of work, which he published in 1877, Mr. Scott said:—

> "The spectacle of millions of my fellow-countrymen bound hand and book by metaphysical and priestly exclusiveness made so painful an impression upon my mind that I felt irresistibly impelled to expose dogmatic assumptions and promote free theological inquiry as the undoubted right of all thoughtful minds."

He entered on his task single-handed, but he soon made friends who rejoiced to help him in his labors. He says:—

> "Expressions of sympathy with my design and offers of co-operation in the work reached me from what seemed to be the most unlikely quarters, and, for a considerable period afterwards, able and highly educated clergymen forwarded me manuscripts for publication, containing attacks on the false bulwarks of ecclesiasticism, and expositions of absolute moral verities. Cultivated and earnest laymen, capable of dealing with the points at issue, also came forward voluntarily and contributed useful papers to the series."

Essays on every branch of theology were issued "illustrating the unhistorical character of many Bible records, the gradual development of beliefs and ceremonies from Solar and Phallic worship to Christianity, the priestly origin of creeds, and the true inductive methods of investigation." In laying down his work he was able to say: "The persuasion gains ground everywhere that the only true orthodoxy is loyalty to reason; and the only infidelity which merits censure is disloyalty to reason." The seed, he says, may for a while appear unproductive. Mrs. Grundy is still strong. "But over all such untoward agencies the cause of freedom of thought and freedom of expression will certainly triumph; and every anathema of priests and denunciation by bigots will but tend to accelerate its progress."

Thomas Scott died at Norwood on December 30, 1878. In a memoir contributed to the Liberal of March, 1879, Mr. G. G. Flaws says:—

> "His was a grand presence; tall, yet robust, with strikingly handsome head and face; in bearing, dress, and manners every inch a perfect English gentleman. Though fond of deluding himself into the belief that he was destitute of humor, he often chuckled with kindly malicious glee at some of his own repartees, and unconsciously manifested great powers of drollery; albeit, his wit, if used in writing—which it seldom was—would have barbed itself with sarcasm. He hugely relished the lighter sallies in others, particularly when, through pen and pencil, they waged war against the unrealities of theology and the creeds. No man more detested cant, in every form; no man more gloried in sincerity, both in himself and others. He was as purely transparent a soul as ever honored mankind."

No notice of Mr. Scott would be complete without mention of his wife, who assisted him in all his work with whole-souled devotion. She was a lady of great culture and refinement, in every way fitted to be the helpmeet and companion of one of nature's gentlemen.

(The late) J. M. WHEELER.

GOOD CHRISTIANS!

Then there were gruesome stories of the massacres. A lady who had fled from Monastir recounted tales of cruelty, the work of Balkan Christians, which made mere crucifixion seem a deed of kindness. Our nearest neighbor had a cousin in the madhouse, the reason of his madness being this:—

He and some other Turkish students of good family had volunteered for service in the war and, being all acquainted, kept together. One night they were on outpost duty in a lonely hut, quite unaware that the force to which they were attached was in retreat, when they found themselves surrounded by Bulgarian komitajis. The character of the assailants was so well known that all were panic-stricken, and one, who was small, managed to get into an empty barrel which was in the hut. The boy in hiding heard what followed, when the students had been overpowered. "You'll look better without that nose, bey effendi. Those lips are much too long, they hide your teeth. And now that pair of ears—those eyes—that tongue!" Such words, with the horrid crying of the victims, still more, perhaps, his own terror which prevented him from coming out and sharing the fate of those he loved, drove the youth in hiding mad; not at the moment, for he managed to lie quiet and escape, but afterwards, when he had reached a place of safety.

Mere human rags, deprived of all that makes life sentient, found their way to Turkey with the refugees. Among a crowd of wretches who were taken care of on a farm belonging to my friend, Ali Haidar Midhat, every girl and youngish woman had been violated; and children of thirteen were big with child. In our village one saw many refugees. It was nothing uncommon at the railway station to send a tray round among persons waiting for the train on behalf of some unhappy individual. One day, when I was called on to contribute, the object was a splendid specimen of manhood who had had his tongue cut out. I think, too, there was something wrong about his ears, but cannot be quite certain for he wore a heavy turban.—Marmaduke Pickthall in the "New Age."

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 44 SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

When a man has the talent to attack with effect falsehood, prejudice, and imposture, it is his duty, if there are any social duties, to do it.—PROF. J. B. BURY.

Religion and Morality.

THE Bible is sown with atrocious or unreasonable prescriptions. For Jehovah, the inexpiable crimes are idolatry and blasphemy. The Jews were always to stone whoever incited them to idolatry, whether son, daughter, brother, or wife. They were to exterminate the inhabitants and the animals, and destroy the belongings, of idolatrous cities where Hebrews had been attracted and converted.

The blasphemer was to be stoned, and so was the sorcerer. Death was decreed against those who resorted to wizards. This is justice after the fashion of the negroes of Central Africa. Jehovah was also like certain idols on the banks of the Niger in his pronounced taste for the odor of burning fat. To eat of that holy fat was to the Jew a capital crime. The same punishment was awarded to those who should eat of the blood.

Against the enemy Jehovah commanded a savage cruelty. All the males of cities carried by assault were to be put to the edge of the sword. In other cities, which Jehovah gave as a heritage to his people, the whole population was to be massacred.

Elsewhere it is said that every girl who marries without being a virgin should be stoned. The wife is also an impure being. To touch her, or any object which has been in contact with her during her menstrual period, is to become impure until the evening. She is further impure during seven days, if she gives birth to a son; and during fourteen days after the birth of a daughter.

The most singular prescriptions are solemnly formulated. It is forbidden to shave or cut the hair round. Quadrupeds may be eaten if they ruminate and are cloven-footed, but no one must eat the hare nor the cony, which of course ruminate, but do not divide the hoof. It is also necessary to abstain carefully from certain fantastic animals, having at the same time four feet and wings, etc., etc.

If the commandments of Jehovah are sometimes singular, the methods of appeasing him, and of effacing sins, are not more rational. The almighty Lord is, above all, hungry for victims. Formerly, as we have seen, he devoured the first-born children; later he is contented with animals. He pardons, for a calf, a sin committed in ignorance; a broken oath for a lamb or a goat; a fraud or a falsehood for a ram without spot. For an emissary he-goat the sins of all Israel are remitted.

The Koran, which was born of the Bible, is not more sensible. It orders abstinence from the blood and flesh of the pig, and of animals suffocated, stunned, killed by a fall, or slain by a wild beast. For Allah, as for Jehovah, the greatest virtue is belief. No infidel must be loved, be it a father, a son, a brother, or an ally. The believer is rewarded in this life by rich booty from the infidels, and in paradise by dwelling in delicious gardens, peopled with black-eyed houris, etc. Reprobates, on the other hand, will drink boiling water like molten lead, and liquid feculence.

Essentially all anthropomorphic religions resemble each other, whether monotheistic, like Judaism and Islamism, or polytheistic, like the religions of Greece and Rome. From the theological point of view the great moral question is how to please the supernatural being or beings who are feared and adored, and above all how not to displease them.

Yet the gods of Greece and Rome cared less for the current morality than those of Persia, India, and Judæa. They were not the authors of the moral law; they were its guardians. Certain crimes were chiefly regarded as direct offences against the deities, and it was in that light they were expiated. Mommsen affirms that, at least in the primitive ages of antiquity, capital sentences were regarded as the effect of the malediction of offended gods. Stealing fruit by night, for example, was to commit a theft on Ceres, etc.

The great reward after death consisted in conserving an interest in the life of posterity, in being able to protect and assist them. It was this terrestrial life, above all, about which the practical good sense of the ancients was solicitous. In the belief of the Hesiod the shades of the men of the Golden Age had become good genii, wandering over the earth, and dispensing riches and repressing injustice; while the spirits of the wicked were tormented, and tormented men, in the form of spectres and lemures. These beliefs were generally prevalent, but there were no obligatory dogmas, nor was there any official preaching.

There was no theocratic code; nothing analogous to the amazing and often ferocious despotism of the great Asiatic religions; above all, no asceticism, and no doctrine of renunciation, except that which was preached by the Stoics, and which Christianity assimilated with such alacrity.

In sum, the morality of Greece and Rome, with its qualities and its defects, was laic and, above all, civil. Christianity came, and completely changed the direction of ethics. From that time this earthly life was considered as a pilgrimage, an exile; the heavenly Jerusalem was the destination. To arrive thither it was necessary to obey the orders that were reputed divine, whatever might be the result in this world. The great duty was to love and obey God; the great rock of danger was sin; and this, according to St. Augustine, could only be avoided, if it pleased the divinity, by the assistance of grace.

For the old philosophers death was a hard necessity, the effect of a law; for the Catholics it became a consequence of sin and an object of terror; for, after it, the soul had a thousand chances of being engulfed in the billows of infernal fire. Reprobates would burn there eternally, and, according to St. Gregory, the spectacle of their tortures would rejoice the elect.

This terror of infernal torment was, as we know, the great means by which Christianity inculcated its morality. None is more efficacious with believers, but it is certainly not the noblest.

It has been observed with reason that the antique virtues were masculine; they were courage, magnanimity, and, above all, patriotism. The whole influence of Christianity tended, on the contrary, to effeminate the character in addressing itself no longer to reason, but to emotion, in glorifying humility, meekness, love of God, continence, and faith. Faith above all; blind faith became the first of duties; Credo quia absurdum.

The ancient ideal was chiefly civil and patriotic; the Christian ideal was ascetic. For the sectary of Jesus the earthly country was little, and the Christian conscripts sometimes refused military service, even at the cost of martyrdom.

Abstinence, renunciation, and maceration were par excellence the means of attaining to sanctity. One should if possible be a monk; at the very least, conform his life to the monastic ideal, lead a mechanical existence, and not think.....The body was profoundly despised and neglected, and dirtiness became agreeable to God. St. Anthony never washed his feet; St. Ammon never saw himself naked; Sylvia, a beautiful virgin of sixteen, never washed more than her fingers; Paula and Melania, whose consciences were directed by St. Jerome, believed that "baths were defiling."

The ascetic detachment of the Hindoos was imitated, and far surpassed. St. Melenia, having lost her husband and her two sons, knelt down and thanked the Lord that she could henceforth serve him more fully. It was good to forget one's mother, and abandon one's children in order to consecrate one's self to the ascetic life. Evagrius burnt the letters of his parents from whom he had been long absent. St. Gregory relates that a young monk, being unable to express his filial affection, went secretly by night to visit his parents, and God punished him with sudden death.

But the death of virtue was chastity. All that related to the union of the sexes was regarded as horrible. Woman was the great enemy; she should blush for her sex, for her beauty, and for her apparel. Marriage was only tolerated. "It is better to marry than to burn," said St. Paul. St. Jerome, for his part, saw but one good thing in marriage; it produced virgins.....By the unanimous testimony of Fathers and Councils all sexual intercourse outside marriage was criminal. From the moment Christianity triumphed under Constantine, the Mosaic penalties against sexual offences were adopted and aggravated; adultery became a capital crime, and sodomists were drowned, decapitated, or ingeniously tortured.

The Christian desire for the extinction of the human species should have maintained suicide in honor, as it had been in antiquity. But in the eyes of the Christians it was murder. It killed the soul. Yet one form of suicide was ardently sought by the fanatics—namely, martyrdom.....Nevertheless, with respect to suicide, Christianity wrought a kind of revolution, both moral and, indeed, beneficent. It was the same with respect to abortion and infanticide, to which antiquity attached no great importance. Christianity, on the contrary, condemned and repressed them, not through humanity, but because the death of the unbaptised fœtus or child entailed the terrible consequence of eternal damnation.

Christianity did some good also in relation to slavery. Not that its doctrine condemned slavery in itself. On the contrary, St. Paul advised Christian slaves to be most docile; he even declared that the slave was the only property the Christians might keep, and taxed with vanity and stupidity those who thought otherwise. Indeed, in Europe the ecclesiastics were the last possessors of slaves. In the Christian doctrine equality was not for this world, and the servile virtues were glorified; yet the clergy carried on an active propaganda in favor of slaves. .....Charity was also enjoyed as producing, above all, if displayed to monks, abundant spiritual benefits. .....Christianity also opposed the bloody sports of the amphitheatre. In 329, after the Council of Nice, an edict of Constantine condemned the games of the circus, and the last combat of gladiators took place at Rome in 404.

Materialism: Its Meaning and Value.—III.

IN order that a question may be properly dealt with, it must first of all be correctly stated. This is a rule that holds good of all questions, and is especially applicable to a discussion on the subject of Materialism. If, for instance, instead of plunging at once into a discussion as to whether matter was ultimate or not, or whether matter and force were the sole forms of existence, the disputants first of all decided what could properly be meant by these terms, the controversy would certainly be more illuminating than it usually is, and a great deal of it would never exist. As it is, it has suited the Spiritualist to tie the Materialist down to a definition of matter that no Materialist was logically bound to accept, and on the other hand, many a Materialist has been only too ready to accept that definition, and so play into his enemy's hands. The result has often been, not merely a quarrel over mere words, but about words that could not have any real value.

I have already given an illustration of this in protesting against the attempt to tie the Materialist down to a given conception of "matter," instead of its being recognised that the word is never more than a term useful as describing a particular group of phenomena. Another instance of the same kind is found in the assumption that because "matter" is found adequate to describe certain groups of experiences, the Materialist is bound to prove that such a "reality" exists outside of all relations to a human brain. If this cannot be done, the Spiritualist holds that Materialism breaks down. We cannot, he says, prove that matter exists; how, then, can Materialism be scientifically sound?

Sometimes this kind of attack takes another form. Religious writers, and even teachers of science—who are not always scientific teachers—after discussing such things as gravitation and electricity, will conclude by saying, as though it were beyond dispute, "Of course, we do not know what gravitation and electricity are in themselves." And quite a deal of the now fashionable Agnosticism rests upon our assumed inability to know what "things are in themselves." Now, instead of spending one's time following people who talk and write in this fashion, wherever they choose to lead, a far more profitable method is to define the terms of the initial proposition. Is the problem correctly stated, or otherwise? What do we mean by a knowledge of things in themselves? Does science really ask us to first of all believe in, say, gravitation and electricity, and then to further believe in the existence of something else of which gravitation and electricity are, so to speak, merely shadows?

Now, I have no hesitation in saying that science makes no such demand upon us. When we are asked to believe in gravitation or electricity, science tells us what these things are, and we are enabled to know them in the most complete manner. What, for example, is gravitation? It is not something the effects of which are seen in the mutual attractions of matter. In a loose and convenient way we speak of a stone falling to the ground as the effect of gravitation, or in consequence of gravitation, but, strictly speaking, the stone falling is gravitation, and when we have determined the rate at which it falls, there is nothing else to know about it. Gravitation is a name given to the observed fact that masses of matter everywhere bear a certain quantitative relation to each other. When we have stated this in precise terms we have said all there is to say about gravitation. When we understand this we know all there is to know about gravitation. We do know gravitation in itself, because the law of gravitation, in itself, is nothing more than the mutual attraction of matter reduced to an exact descriptive formula. The proof of this is, that if we take away the "attractions" of matter all gravitation disappears. There is nothing left to know.

What is true of gravitation, is true of electricity, of life, of mind, of all laws and generalisations framed to describe natural phenomena. They are all group names. Phenomena are classified as physical, chemical, biological, or psychological, because they exhibit certain common characteristics. The laws of chemistry are generalisations descriptive of the behavior of one group. The laws of biology are descriptive of the behavior of another group; and so on, throughout. And "life" is not something apart from the motions of living beings, any more than heat is something distinct from things that are hot. The "thing in itself"—that is, the thing covered by the term used—is the thing we know, since that is all that is properly indicated by the name. Indeed, if the electricity, gravitation, life, mind, etc., that we know are not, "in themselves," like these things, all one can say is that in that case they are not these things at all, but different things altogether. The larger part of metaphysical controversy originates in the discussion of problems that are self-created, and are perpetuated because so few will take the trouble to think the whole out afresh for themselves.

All that the Materialist is really concerned with is that his conception of matter, or life, or mind, shall be broad enough to cover the facts. Some, however, are not slow to assert that this is exactly where Materialism breaks down. According to a recent writer on the subject:—

> "Materialism.....is the most uncritical of philosophies, but it is in one respect often like a true theory of existence as a whole, that is, it tends to be of an analytic character, though stopping short of a full analysis. As opposed to metaphysics, which has at least attempted to take account of all types of existence .....Materialism takes as its basis one of these three types of existence.....and practically it omits the other two." *

That is, Materialism is uncritical because it sticks exclusively to solid atoms, and ignores ether—which is presumably non-solid—and mind. If this were true Materialism would be not only uncritical, it would be sheer insanity. Writers who deal with the subject in this fashion might at least pause and ask themselves whether Materialists could be really such fools as to ignore so plain a fact as mind, and the inquiry might suggest to them the necessity of further examination as to what the Materialist actually meant. Materialism no more ignores psychological facts than it ignores material facts. It has a place and a meaning for both.

The same kind of delusion lay at the foundation of much that Sir Oliver Lodge had to say at the British Association. He said that if Materialism were to be accepted, physics and chemistry should explain everything. And he added that while they might explain a sunset, could they explain our sense of joy or perception of beauty at beholding it? To this a writer—replying in the interests of Materialism—asks, "Why not?" For my own part, I should meet both Sir Oliver Lodge and his critic with the single query, Why? Both appear to be floundering in the same sea of confusion. Why should physics and chemisty explain everything? Why should the Materialist be called on to explain an emotion in terms of chemistry? Let anyone seriously try to describe or explain an emotion in terms of chemistry or physics, and he will soon realise what a hopeless task he has set himself. It simply cannot be done. So far Sir Oliver Lodge is correct in saying that Materialism, as he conceives it, cannot deal with these things. And in asking "Why not?" his critic also misconceives the real nature of the problem before him.

To explain is to make intelligible. And in science all explanation consists in the establishment of equivalents. When it is shown that A B C are the factors of D, we have shown that D is the equivalent of A B C—plus, of course, all that results from the combination of the factors. When we say that we have explained water by showing it to be the product of H_2O, we have only demonstrated that whether we say water, or use the chemical formula, the two statements are identical. If we are working out a problem in dynamics, we meet with precisely the same principle. We must prove that the resultant accounts for all the forces proved to be operating at the time. So, then, it is open to the Materialist to claim, and he does claim, that this principle will also apply to the phenomenon of life and intelligence. That is, life and intelligence will ultimately be found to be due to the composition of natural forces, and that the principle ruling elsewhere in nature rules here also. So far, all is easy sailing, and in a general way—sometimes in more than general outlines—this has already been done. Neural changes as the equivalents of psychic states is an established fact, and experimental psychology has brought many detailed proofs of a quantitative equivalent of a qualitative state.

Now, the confusion into which Mr. Arnold, Sir Oliver Lodge, and scores of others fall, is this: they assume that because the Materialist asserts the possibility of establishing between psychic states and nervous conditions, and between nervous conditions and chemical combinations, some form of equivalence, the identities of the different phenomena are destroyed. If chemical combinations give rise to living matter, and living matter gives rise to mind, then, they say, everything is reduced to chemistry, and chemistry explains everything. The assumption is quite false. The identity of each phenomenon remains, no matter how produced, and each phenomenon can only be properly explained—that is, made completely intelligible—in terms of its own class. Psychology, Biology, Chemistry, Physics are group names used to distinguish certain clusters of phenomena having certain fundamental features in common. If chemistry could explain everything, there would be no need for any other science, and science would ultimately become a study of chemical actions and reactions. But no one imagines for a moment that this could ever be the case. It is admitted that at one time the earth was destitute of life, and it is also admitted that life was once without any trace of what we know as mind. And, however introduced or originated, once here as distinct groups of phenomena, life and mind must be described in terms of their own group, without any prejudice as to their mode of origin. Psychological facts must be described in terms of psychology, biological facts must be described in terms of biology, chemical facts in terms of chemistry, and physical facts in terms of physics. You can give the physical and chemical explanation of a sunset. You can also give the psychological explanation of the feelings we experience on beholding it. But you cannot give the psychological explanation in terms of chemistry and physics, because the fact belongs to a group of another order. A psychological fact is ultimate, as such; so are chemical and biological facts, as such. If by analysis you reduce the psychological fact to its biological and chemical equivalents, its character, as a psychological fact, is destroyed. To seek in analysis for what is the product of synthesis is surely the most stupid of pursuits.

I have dwelt at considerable length upon this point, but I trust that my readers will consider this quite justifiable. Materialism is so seldom rightly understood by its enemies, and often so sadly misunderstood by its friends, that its surely worth while making the position clear, even at the risk of being counted wearisome. And here, as in many other instances, the supernaturalist enjoys a certain advantage from his position. He can appeal to established prejudice in familiar language, and assent requires but little mental effort. But disproof of his position requires a consideration of scientific and philosophic principles such as only the minority are inclined to give.

Authority.

THE Rev. R. J. Campbell was one of the preachers at the recent Southend meeting of the Congregational Union, and the subject he discussed was "Christ as Authority." We are told that "the sermon, finely conceived and delivered with arresting power, was all too short for its absorbed hearers." It is a well-known fact that the Gospel Jesus is represented as speaking, not in his own name, but in that of his Father. In the wonderful prayer recorded in John xvii., he says to the Father, "The words which thou gavest me I have given unto them; and they received them, and knew of a truth that I came forth from thee." In the same Gospel we also read: "I spake not from myself; but the Father which sent me, he hath given me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak." Ignoring these and other similar sayings, Mr. Campbell declares that—

> "What astonished these Galileans most was that Jesus made no appeal to any authority but his own, cited no great names, rested his case upon no venerable tradition, no written word. His own word was enough—fresh, bold, assured, imperative. 'He taught them as one having authority, and not as the Scribes.'"

In answer to the question, "What intrinsically was this authority which men discerned in Jesus?" he says that it was not the authority of a commanding personality, or of an unusual positiveness and earnestness of speech, and, further, that it was not even what he said. Then he adds: "It was not so much what Jesus said as what he was, that constituted his revelation to mankind." Surely this is only another way of saying that the authority of Jesus inhered in his commanding personality. Mr. Campbell admits that none of his utterances can be regarded as original, and asserts that his authority "was something in himself that everybody felt when coming in contact with him." This is not true. Thousands came in contact with Jesus without finding anything in him that put him in a position of authority. Those of his own people who believed in him never numbered more than a couple of hundreds, possibly not nearly so many. In his own day he was "despised and rejected of men," which, speaking generally, is as true of him to-day.

Let us examine this point a little more carefully. Mr. Campbell alludes to "the sublime figure of the Lord himself, the unique phenomenon of the relationship in which he stood, and knew he stood, to the transcendental world of timeless values"; but to call a God-man "a sublime figure" is a culpable misuse of terms. A God-man is simply a chimerical, mythical being, and anything but sublime. "The transcendental world of timeless values" is equally unreal, existing only in the minds of those who believe in it. If Jesus was merely a man, Mr. Campbell's description of him is perfectly grotesque. To assert that the authority which Jesus exercises over the human conscience is infinitely greater than that ever exercised by anybody else is to ignore undeniable facts. Upwards of five hundred millions bow to the authority of the Buddha, and, taking them upon the average, they are morally equal, if not superior, to the followers of Jesus. Now, if Jesus really were all that this preacher asserts concerning him, it would be absurd to speak of "a strong craving evidenced on every hand for a truly authoritative Divine word to our age and to the individual soul." If the Gospel is true, that word exists, Jesus himself being the Word of God to the whole world. Yet Mr. Campbell is of opinion that "a new age demands a new word, and recognises its own insufficiency to utter it." If this is so, it follows that the prophecy of the Gospel Jesus concerning the future of his Church is not fulfilled. He said that if he went away he would send the Holy Ghost, and that when the Comforter came he would convict the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment, and guide his people into all the truth. That must have been a false prediction if Mr. Campbell's message is true. If a new age demands a new word, is in fact vainly craving for it, where is the Holy Ghost? He has failed to fill and guide the Church according to promise, and the world is still unconvicted. In addition to this lamentable failure of the Church, we are confronted by the bankruptcy of science and the breakdown of the reason, and here we are, with upturned faces, ardently craving for "a truly authoritative Divine word." This is eminently amusing.

After all, the new word, the truly authoritative Divine word, turns out to be an objective fact, which is the historical Jesus. Listen to this:—

> "The authoritative fact is Christ—Christ himself, not theories about Christ, not speculations concerning him, but Christ—Christ as he broke upon an astonished world nearly two milleuniums ago, and is breaking upon it afresh to-day—Christ in the Church, in the Bible, in the reason, but detected there, as in all that has been thought and said about him in past and present, because at a definite point in time he appeared, and lived, and wrought, and suffered, as a man among men."

There was a time when Mr. Campbell distinguished between Jesus and Christ, but now he seems to treat them as identical. "Christ is a break with the natural order, an invasion from the supernatural," he tells us to-day. "His advent in the world," he continues, "is not an event that can be fitted into our ordinary human categories; it is a supersession of them." Fancy a sane man averring that such a conception of Christ is not a theory or speculation. It is absolutely nothing else. Such a being never existed except in the fancy of theologians. If asked, "Did Mr. Campbell's Christ ever live?" we would return the emphatic answer, No, never. He is fully as mythical as Osiris, Adonis, Attis, or Mithra, after whom he was originally modelled. There is no higher law in existence whose mission it is to set lower ones aside. The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, which is described as freeing a man from the law of sin and death, is an invention of the theological mind, and to believe in it is an act of high treason against Nature. No being from a higher realm has ever allied himself by a stupendous miracle with our race. The fact that Mr. Campbell is what he is, is a conclusive evidence that the Christ he preaches never was at all.

Mr. Campbell has made a valuable discovery, and we shall allow him to tell us what it is in his own words:—

> "More than any other single influence whatsoever, or all other influences put together, he [Christ] has convicted the world of sin. The sense of sin is largely Christ-created, and he is the only remedy for the need he has thus awakened."

We have been saying the same thing about sin ourselves for years. Sin is a theological creation, just like Christ; and the remedy for sin is just as imaginary as sin itself. Nobody has a sense of sin who is not a believer in God. The priest-created sense of sin has driven many human beings into hopeless insanity. We once knew a man who, under a deep conviction of sin, was beside himself with baseless fear for the space of nine months.

Mr. Campbell has made another discovery of immense import. He says:—

> "If Christ could be accounted for in terms of human evolution, or in terms of the sequence of time and sense in any way, we should have no Gospel to preach. It is just because he cannot be thus accounted for that he is the light of the world. All our Christian institutions, creeds, and doctrines, are but the broken rays of that eternal light."

Nothing could be truer. The Gospel is as fantastic as the Christ who is its centre, and as impotent. It is called the Gospel of God, though he will not or cannot administer it himself. It is also named after Christ, but he is no more able to preach it than his Father. It is perfectly true, however, that without a supernatural Christ there could be no Gospel. Now, as Christ is said to be an invasion from the supernatural, so his Gospel is supposed to cause the supersession of natural law for all believers. The law of sin and death is God's, and so is the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus; but the latter is said to be a higher law which bends down and rescues a penitent and believing sinner from the cruel clutches of a natural law from which otherwise there could be no escape. Thus the Gospel is fundamentally immoral, and its influence upon those who verily believe it is bound to be demoralising.

Having abandoned the belief in an infallible Church and an infallible book, Protestants are without any genuine authority to fall back upon. That is why they have split up into six or seven hundred conflicting sects. It is the most difficult thing in the world to realise the presence of an invisible Christ; and if he still wears our humanity he cannot be everywhere present at one and the same time. Catholics are much better off in that they have a visible and Divinely appointed representative of him on earth, who is officially authoritative in all ecclesiastical and theological deliberations. Consequently, the Catholic Church has preserved its unity throughout its history. Blessed are they who are neither Catholics nor Protestants, but who have found in reason the only authority to which it is always safe to defer.

J. T. LLOYD.

A Catholic Bigot in China.

SIR HIRAM MAXIM'S drastic exposure of missionary methods in China, in his book entitled Li Hung Chang's Scrap Book, has been well received by all advanced journals in this country. Even the conservative Times, which has never dissembled any love for advanced views on religion, gave a short, but fair and accurate description of its contents, without comment, in its columns, of books received, which was as much as could be expected from such a quarter. And, as the Times Literary Supplement is undoubtedly the best literary review published in this country, and gives the cue to many lesser literary lights, this was a matter for congratulation. If there had been anything immoral or indecent in the book, we may be sure that its reviewers and critics would not have been backward in pointing it out. No such charge has been made in any of the notices we have seen of Sir Hiram's book in this country; and, as a matter of fact, nothing of the kind can be found within the covers of the book. This should be borne in mind in order to appreciate what follows.

A copy of the book was, in due course, sent to the editor of the Shanghai Times, a follower of Jesus named John O'Shea, who, from his name, would seem to be a Roman Catholic Irishman.

It should be stated that Sir Hiram Maxim had sent a letter to the Republican Advocate (which is also published at Shanghai), in which he points out the absurdity of sending missionaries to China to teach morality, seeing that the Chinese have the high moral philosophy of Confucius and Buddha; and citing the testimony of Legge, Edkins, Le Compte, and Eugene Simon to the teaching and practice of Chinese morality. This letter appeared on May 24 last. On May 26, O'Shea, the editor of the Shangai Times, published in that paper an editorial, entitled, "A Monstrous Maxim," of which we give the commencement:—

> "A maxim more wicked and misleading we have never seen in print than that to which our esteemed contemporary, the Republican Advocate, had the bad judgment to devote no fewer than five of the pages of its issue of the 24th inst. The same Maxim (we regret to say we are obliged to personify the word—his Christian name and title being Sir Hiram S., Knight, inventor, man of science, and of world-wide renown in fields of usefulness and enterprise in which his astonishing achievements would have unquestionably conferred lasting fame upon him had he only had the wisdom to restrain his manifest hatred for all religions and their teachings within the bounds of ordinary decency) lately endeavored to gain the attention of the reading public in the Far East through the medium of the columns of the Shanghai Times. Some days ago he sent us a book which he has had published, for the purpose of having us review it, but its character is so utterly execrable that we had quite made up our minds to take no notice of it whatever, and should unquestionably have acted upon this determination had it not been that in the Republican Advocate on Saturday evening we discovered the long letter over his name to which we are now referring, and which epitomises the monstrous piece of literature with which he has favored ourselves."

The blind passion of the writer prevents him seeing the obvious falseness of his charge of "hatred for all religions," for Sir Hiram's letter praises the high morality taught by the religions of Confucius and Buddha—a strange way of showing hatred, truly!

Note, also, the good old Christian method of dealing with the enemies of the faith. When the work cannot be suppressed—and, as we shall see, the writer suggests its suppression in China—then the next best thing to do is to take no notice of it, ignore it, boycott it, so that no one will know of its existence (this is still the policy of the press in our own country toward militant Freethought). If, unfortunately, it should reach the public through others being so ill-advised as to notice it, then there is nothing left but to pour mud and filth upon it; to charge it with immorality, indecency, obscenity, and blasphemy; in a word, to frighten people from reading it. History attests that this has been the method of Christianity from the earliest ages down to the present day, and the editor of the Shanghai Times provides a shining example of the malignity of Christian charity, which thinketh no evil; and the venom of Christian benevolence, which loveth its enemies.

With pen spluttering with holy rage, this defamer declares that Sir Hiram's book is a "compilation which would fairly put the Hunan Tracts, of infamous memory, and the pictorial abominations of the late Chou Han to the blush." To those who have not heard of these tracts, we may state that they were native productions, published to counteract the missionary propaganda, some of which were parodies of Christian dogmas, rites, and ceremonies; we have only seen one, and this represented Christians worshiping a crucified pig. Others were undoubtedly indecent and obscene, and to say that Sir Hiram's book puts them "to the blush" is really a criminal libel for which the writer would have to pay by a long term of imprisonment if tried before an unprejudiced jury, but Sir Hiram knows better than to trust the vindication of his honor to the justice of twelve Christian jurymen.

As a matter of fact, most of the illustrations in Sir Hiram's book are reproductions from Dante's illustrations of the Bible, and not the faintest shadow of indecency can, even by the most morbid Nonconformist conscience, be attached to any illustration in the book.

The editor of the Shanghai Times would have made a glorious officer of the Holy Inquisition. This is how he gleefully describes the end of Chou Han, the opponent of Christian teaching in China. He says:—

> "The Diplomatic Body in Peking were moved to take action with regard to the matter, in a way which secured the speedy relegation of the ingenious author and artist to a place where it was not in his power to do any further mischief. He languished for a long time in obscure imprisonment in Changsha, and died there, if we remember aright, only a few years ago."

No doubt he would like to condemn the distinguished author, whose character he so vilely assails, to a similar fate.

He goes on to observe that he does not know what action is likely to be taken with regard to the book, but it "should certainly never be allowed to circulate, or be translated, in China."

We reproduce here a few of the flowers of speech this good Christian, in the plenitude of his Christian charity, bestows upon the author and his book. It disseminates "poisonous slanders," "false and fœtid attacks" upon religion, "false and infamous slanders"; describes the world-famous author as "a renegade and a rascal," and concludes:—

> "The book is a monstrous, false, and thoroughly blackguard publication, and the author is unfit to wear the Cross of the Legion of Honor—of which, we perceive, he is a member, or any other foreign order (most of which are religious in their origin) or distinction whatever."

Such is the snarling fury into which this meek and humble follower of Jesus works himself over Li Hung Chang's Scrap Book. If half, or a quarter of the charges he makes against the book be true, why did not some of the numerous reviews of the work in this country mention it? The Times, which is so particular in such matters, never hinted that the work was indecent or blackguardly. And we challenge anyone to point out anything of the kind in the work.

Sir Hiram Maxim's career is honorably known to all the world, but who is this self-constituted champion of public morality and religion? Will his career stand investigation? What was his life and occupation before he became connected with the Shanghai Times? We have heard strange tales, which, if true, would show this pious editor in the character of "Satan rebuking sin."

It is the fate of every advocate of Freethought to be stung by these obscure reptiles of the Christian press—when they think they can operate with safety to themselves—and those who advocate advanced views are prepared beforehand to take the risk.

This scurrilous outbreak will not harm the distinguished author of this book. Already the leading missionary societies are lamenting a falling-off in their donations, and this book will help to still further curtail the financial supplies. We can rest assured that Sir Hiram Maxim's name will be honored generations after his Christian traducer is dead and forgotten.

W. MANN.

Up for Judgment.

St. Peter stood guard at the golden gate,
With solemn mien and an air sedate,
When up to the top of the golden stair
A man and a woman, ascending there,
Applied for admission. They came and stood Before St. Peter, so great and good,
In hope the City of Peace to win,
And asked St. Peter to let them in.
The woman was tall, and lank, and thin,
With a scraggy beardlet upon her chin.
The man was short, and thick, and stout;
His stomach was built so it rounded out.
His face was pleasant, and all the while
He wore a kind and genial smile.
The choirs in the distance the echoes woke,
And the man kept still while the woman spoke.
"Oh, thou who guardest the gate," said she,
"We come hither, beseeching thee
To let us enter the Heavenly Land,
And play our harps with the Angel Band.
Of me, St. Peter, there is no doubt;
There's nothing from Heaven to bar me out.
I've been to the meeting three times a week,
And almost always I'd rise to speak.
I've told the sinners about the day
When they'd repent of their evil way;
I've told my neighbors—I've told them all—
'Bout Adam and Eve, and the Primal Fall.
I've shown 'em what they'd have to do
If they pass in with the chosen few.
I've marked their path of duty clear—
Laid out the plan of their whole career.
I've talked and talked to 'em loud and long,
For my lungs are good, and my voice is strong;
So, good St. Peter, you'll clearly see
The gate of Heaven is open for me.
But my old man, I regret to say,
Hasn't walked in exactly the narrow way;
He smokes and he swears, and grave faults he's got,
And I don't know whether he'll pass or not.
He would never pray with an earnest vim,
Or go to revival, or join in a hymn;
So I had to leave him in sorrow there,
While I, with the chosen, united in prayer.
He ate what the pantry chose to afford,
While I, in my purity, sang to the Lord.
And if cucumbers were all he got,
It's a chance whether he merited them or not.
But oh, St. Peter, I love him so;
To the pleasures of Heaven please let him go!
I've done enough—a saint I've been.
Won't that atone? Can't you let him in?
By my grim Gospel, I know 'tis so,
That the unrepentent must fry below.
But isn't there some way you can see
That he may enter who's dear to me?
It's a narrow Gospel by which I pray,
But the chosen expect to find some way
Of coaxing, or fooling, or bribing you
So that their relations can amble through.
And say, St. Peter, it seems to me
This gate isn't kept as it ought to be.
You ought to stand right by the opening there,
And never sit down in that easy chair.
And say, St. Peter, my sight is dimmed,
But I don't like the way your whiskers are trimmed:
They're cut too wide, and outward toss;
The'yd look better narrow, cut straight across.
Well, we must be going, our crown to win;
So open, St. Peter, and we'll pass in."
St. Peter sat quiet, and stroked his staff,
But, in spite of his office, he had to laugh;
Then said, with a fiery gleam in his eye:
"Who's tending this gateway—you or I?"
And then he arose in his stature tall,
And pressed a button upon the wall,
And said to the imp who answered the bell,
"Escort this female around to Hell!"
The man stood still as a piece of stone—
Stood sadly, gloomily, there alone.
A long-life settled idea he had
That his wife was good and he was bad.
He thought if the woman went down below,
That he would certainly have to go;
That if she went to the regions dim,
There wasn't a ghost of a show for him.
Slowly he turned, by habit bent,
To follow wherever the woman went.
St. Peter, standing on duty there,
Observed that the top of his head was bare.
He called the gentleman back, and said:
"Friend, how long have you been wed?"
"Thirty years" (with a weary sigh);
And then he thoughtfully added, "Why?"
St. Peter was silent, with head bent down;
He raised his hand and scratched his crown;
Then, seeming a different thought to take,
Slowly, half to himself he spake:
"Thirty years with that woman there?
No wonder the man hasn't any hair!
Swearing is wicked, smoke's not good;
He smoked and swore: I should think he would!
Thirty years! with that tongue so sharp!
Oh, Angel Gabriel, give him a harp!
A jewelled harp with a golden string.
Good sir, pass in where the angels sing.
Gabriel, give him a seat alone—
One with a cushion—up near the throne.
Call up some angels to play their best;
Let him enjoy the music—and rest!
See that on finest Ambrosia he feeds;
He's had about all the hell he needs:
It isn't just hardly the thing to do
To roast him on earth and the future too."
They gave him a harp with golden strings,
A glittering robe and a pair of wings;
And he said, as he entered the realms of day,
"Well, this beats cucumbers, any way."
And so the old Scripture text stands fast:
The last shall be first, and the first shall be last.

Mr. Foote's being called on to speak at the Bradlaugh Dinner was a pure accident. He was undecided whether he would be able to attend or not. He was only certain at the last minute. He arrived, in fact, just a little late for the function, the chairman being already seated. That is why his name was not on the program. "Simply this, and nothing more"—as the owner of Poe's "raven" says.

Shaw described himself as a "mystic." He might have said a "comic mystic."

Acid Drops.

Apropos of our note last week of the influence of Christianity in contracting the meaning of ethical terms, a striking instance of the truth of what was then said was furnished by "Citizen Sunday." It was decided that all the churches and chapels should devote their sermons to a consideration of "the moral question." All religious people were to range themselves on the side of righteousness. They were to see that "bad houses" (not bad homes), suggestive prints, and objectionable pictures were destroyed, and that the "wild oats" theory with regard to young men was abandoned. This, according to the wisdom of these people, is the scope of "the moral question." It is sex, sex, and nothing but sex. What of the rack-renting landlord, the sweating employer, the slanderous speaker, the false friend, the hypocrite, and the thousand and one other forms of knavery? Evidently these do not come within the scope of "the moral question." There is nothing connected therewith over which parsons may lick their lips. And yet, we venture to think, that a genuine crusade against many of these evils, or all of them, might do more to bring about cleaner sexual relations than all the sermons preached last Sunday. It is true that you cannot be healthy without being clean; but there is also truth in the statement that you cannot be clean without being healthy. It is not very wise to clean a pig and then put him back in a filthy sty.

What is the principle that ought to underlie infliction of judicial punishment? According to Judge Avory, the principle is, mainly, to deter other people. The man punished is not of very great consequence. In sentencing driver Candle, for the Aisgill disaster, Judge Avory said, "I have to bear in mind that I sit here for the purpose, not so much of punishing a particular offender, as deterring others from offending in a like manner." Driver Candle might have replied, "If that is the case, why not select someone else and punish him?" If judges only sit to illustrate to the public at large what will happen if they commit certain actions, the end would be achieved by selecting a certain number of people, say, by ballot, and giving them certain terms of imprisonment corresponding to the offences against the committal of which all are warned. If that is the idea under which our judges and legislators labor, we are not surprised at the ineffectiveness of our criminal law. We venture to suggest that Judge Avory ought to sit where he does sit not primarly to provide warnings to possible offenders, but to deal with the offender actually before him, and to deal with him in terms of a rational understanding of human character and its environment. As a matter of fact, punishment, however severe, does not deter others, and never has deterred others. This was conclusively proved by the abolition of hanging in public. Certainty of detection is essential, but more important than that even, is to deal with each offender in a way that will correct whatever in his nature is capable of correction. Judge Avory may be capable enough, so far as a knowledge of the law and of legal procedure is concerned. He obviously has still much to learn concerning the philosophy of wrong doing and its proper treatment. As a matter of fact, the most important person in any case is the wrong doer. Everyone else is a mere incidental.

Six thousand pounds is to be spent for a house for the new Bishop of Sheffield. His "Master" frequently slept out of doors for want of better accommodation. "Blessed be ye poor! Woe unto you rich." But the Bishop chances it.

"Secularism is waning," says the Christian Commonwealth, "and the anti-religious element in the Socialist propaganda is disappearing." Socialists can look after themselves; but we know that far more Freethought literature is circulated to-day than ever before in the history of the movement. We know more about it than the editor of the Christian Commonwealth.

The editor of the British and Foreign Bible Society's Report has some curious ideas regarding Freethought, which he mixes up with Socialism. He says that in Germany "it is the universal experience of our colporteurs that Social Democrats are their most violent opponents, surpassing all others in hatred of the Bible and contempt for its teaching." Although the Society boasts of issuing the Scriptures in 450 languages, apart from the Socialists, only two Freethinkers appear to have come in contact with the Society's agents. One was in Timbuctoo, and the other in North Africa. The supporters of the Society must be as innocent as bull-pups if they swallow this soothing syrup for intellectual infants.

"French in a Week" is the alluring headline in an advertisement in a religious contemporary. It won't do, however, for all Christians know that the Holy Ghost can teach foreign languages in half a minute.

A writer in the Christian Commonwealth says: "The daisy copies not only the yellow orb of the sun, but greatly daring, the darting rays of light. The sunlight is the very life of the vegetable world, which in glad return, devotes its energy to unfolding an image of its God." If this sort of thing is acceptable to his readers, the editor had better call his paper "The Sun Worshiper."

The editor of the Christian Commonwealth suggests in a leader that the Churches should keep "young and simple and supple." They do not require the advice. Their suppleness would make an insurance agent turn green with envy.

Taking things on the whole, there seems to be about as much nonsense talked in the City Temple as in any place of worship in London. And, in a way, the nonsense there seems more offensive. For it is vented with an air of superiority, and as though its production had only been secured either by the possession of abnormal capacity or at the cost of many brain-racking nights. Here is a sample. Mr. Campbell told his congregation the other evening that those who see in "nature's catastrophes an unanswerable challenge to the gospel of Christ," should take note that it is to that very gospel "that they owe their capacity for perceiving that fact at all," and this is "in itself a presumption in favor of the view that behind all this clash and conflict of the inner and the outer in our total experience there remains a reconciling factor yet to be disclosed."

For downright nonsense this would be hard to beat. It never required very much capacity to recognise the challenge of evil in the world to Theistic beliefs, and it has been one of the commonplaces of controversy from the days of the Greeks onward. It is one of the stupidities—or knaveries—of Christian preachers to assume that human nature after Christianity was something different from what it was before Christianity appeared. People were just as capable of seeing, and feeling, "nature's catastrophes" before Christianity as afterwards. They were just as capable of seeing the possibility of recognising how impossible it was to harmonise them with the belief in a wise and good Providence, and that remains as impossible to-day. Mr. Campbell is as helpless before the problem as is any other preacher. His conclusion that there "remains a reconciling factor yet to be disclosed" is sheer fatuity. There was more sense in the old cry to trust in God. How does Mr. Campbell know there is a factor to be disclosed? And if it is not disclosed, how does he know what it is like? When stuff of this kind passes for thinking, and the men who voice it are hailed as great spiritual forces, what further proof is needed of the mental, and even moral, bankruptcy of Christianity?

The Christian Commonwealth, in a way, caps Mr. Campbell's absurdities by one of its own on the same topic. It says, referring to the brave attempts at rescue made at sea and in the pit, "While men and women are capable of these heroic sacrifices and reveal themselves the possessors of the unconquerable spirit in the face of such appalling terrors, we cannot believe that a malignant chance rules the affairs of mankind." "Malignant chance" is malignant nonsense. No one but a parson or a religious journalist would be capable of using the phrase. If there is a God, he may be either malignant or benevolent. But if there is nothing but natural forces, kindness or cruelty simply has no place in natural operations. Again, one feels impelled to ask whether knavery or stupidity is responsible for such language? And note it is the men and women who risk their lives to save, while God does nothing, save control the conditions that brush a few hundred out of existence in a few minutes. It is hopeless appealing either to Mr. Campbell or to the editor of the Christian Commonwealth, but some others will certainly see that malignancy rests with the God who animates nature, not with the natural forces that Theists believe express his will. Natural catastrophes in themselves are bad enough, but to have in addition the belief in a God who is responsible for their occurrence, is enough to drive mad those who seriously think out their position. Luckily for themselves most religious writers nowadays have a congenital protection against such a calamity.

Smith and the Church is the title of a book by Dr. H. H. Beattys, which asks the question whether Smith should attend a place of worship. If all the members of that numerous and respectable family should accept the invitation, the churches will have to put out the notices, "Standing Room Only."

"Science Conquers Rheumatism" runs a puff in a pious paper. That compliment to science was paid for at the usual rates.

A writer in the Southend Telegraph says "we must move our eyes from the Sea of Galilee and look for Jesus by the sea at Southend." When the tide is out there will be a chance for the police—and the longshore men. We look forward to the inquest.

The British and Foreign Bible Society's report states that their 1,200 native colporteurs sold 3,750,000 copies of the Scriptures during 1912, which is an average of 3,125 for each native. As many sales are by barter, which includes food, fish, fruit, eggs, pine chips, nuts, swords, and such articles, the Society's agents must be excellent tallymen.

The priests have kept remarkably quiet over the labor troubles in Dublin. But at last they have made a move. It was proposed to transport a number of children from their homes in Christian Dublin to friends in England who would maintain them until the labor war was over. Arrangements were made and a number of children ready for departure. Then the priests took alarm. The children would be freed from the direct influence of the Roman Catholic Church; and, while that Church does not mind their being reared in a state of semi-starvation, it does object to their spiritual welfare being threatened. So they have practically forbidden the parents to allow the children to leave, and the best part of them have withdrawn their consent. Mr. Larkin now finds himself in opposition to the Church, and, for the benefit of those who lay so much stress on the predominance of economics, we venture to predict that he will find this a much more powerful enemy than even the combined forces of capital. Perhaps it will drive him to the recognition of the fact that so long as superstition sits enthroned, stable social reform will remain more or less of an aspiration. Other reformers have been driven to that conclusion, against their inclinations. The consequences of this new development should at least prove instructive.

It was not to be expected that the Catholic priests would quietly allow Dublin children to be drafted over to English homes during the strike. Securing (and keeping) the young is all in all to the Catholic Church. Dr. Walsh knows what he is about, whether Mr. Larkin does or not. Of course we are not dealing with the ethics, but with the tactics, in the matter.

James Larkin now understands what it is to upset the Dublin priests. They quickly settled his hash. He has obtained seven months' leisure to reflect upon the value of religion as a social influence. We hope the lesson will not be lost upon the Trade Unionists of Great Britain. They dropped Secular Education out of their Annual Congress discussions just to please the Catholics. They ought to take it up again after this—lest a worse thing befall them.

There ought to be common sense enough in Dublin to get this strike settled with benefit to both sides. One is entirely against the employers if their real object is Trade-Union smashing. But they can surely give way on that point, as other employers have done, without loss of dignity; for there can be no dignity in seeking to oppress and degrade one's fellow men. Less passion and more cool intelligence should find a reasonable solution soon. Meanwhile the poor women and children are suffering from sheer want of food and clothing—and the wind is beginning to blow keener across the Irish Sea. We gladly give publicity to the appeal of A. Evans, Member of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress—220 Blackfriars-road, London, S.E. Warm clothing, boots, etc., are specially requested, and will be sent over by the weekly food-ship. Necessary repairs will be done at this address.

Rev. Benjamin Thomas Winterborn, of Beau Site, Crowborough, left £30,068. What a big fortune that would have seemed to the "Savior" and the twelve apostles! But things have altered since then.

Judge Malouin, at Quebec, has decided that no one Jew or number of Jews could bring an action because their religion had been libelled. The Christian religion, however, is protected in that way in England, under the law of Blasphemous Libel. Circumstances do alter cases.

The Dean of St. Paul's (Dr. Inge) has been trying to comfort his fellow-clergymen. He says that "there is no ground for anxiety," and that "the Church is a spiritual society" under the constant care of God. A spiritual society! What about the endowments? Of which, by the way, Dean Inge enjoys a liberal share.

Bishop March, Roman Catholic, Harbor Grace, Newfoundland, was shot by a madman while conducting divine service. One shot went wide, but another struck him on the head, only wounding him slightly. We suppose the Bishop's escape was "providential." But wouldn't "Providence" have been better occupied in keeping the madman out of the church altogether? All that is gained is a demonstration of the shot-resisting power of the Bishop's cranium.

Mr. Lloyd George is accused of "blasphemy" for quoting the sixty-fifth Psalm in the peroration of his Bedford speech. His accuser is a Church of England man. Of course! Everybody knows whom the Bible belongs to.

Sir Rufus Isaacs is the first Jew to hold the position of Lord Chief Justice of England. The Liberal press says he will adorn it. The Tory press shouts "Marconis!" Our view is that Sir Rufus Isaacs, like the late Lord Chief Coleridge, will find it awkward if he has to try a "blasphemy" case.

James Berry, ex-hangman, is dead. He jerked many a pious murderer to Jesus. We suppose he has followed them there himself. The meeting, however, must be rather embarrassing, one would think. The question of ropes will have to be tabu if the peace of heaven is not to be broken.

Rev. Dr. Felix, Rector of Llanhilleth, has been pointing the lesson of the Senghenydd explosion. The 422 miners who were "hurled out of the world" are only a part of a much larger number of "human souls" who emigrated the same day. "There are about 5,140 men, women, and children dying every hour," this reverend gentleman says, "and judging from their lives a very large majority of them are going to hell." The bereaved women know where their men have gone. No doubt they are grateful for the information. We should imagine that Dr. Felix is the most popular man in the district.

It is odd to see Dr. Stanton Coit's daughter married in a Christian church—that of St. Ethelburga, in Bishopsgate. Being a suffragette, however, she secured certain concessions in the marriage service. Dr. Cobb, indeed, was very obliging; though it is doubtful if he had any legal right to depart from the Prayer Book formulas. She did not promise to "obey" her husband. Nor did the knot-tier pray that she might be "faithful and obedient to her husband," but only that she might be "loyal to her husband." We see very little profit in these alterations. It is as absurd for a woman to promise to be "loyal" to her husband as to promise to "obey" him. How can "loyalty" figure in a contract? And does it not, in these circumstances, include some idea of obedience?

We can see, of course, that Dr. Cobb is displaying a business tact in his part of this accommodating arrangement. He recognises the fact that more and more people get married at registry offices every year. He thinks that they are driven away from the Church by the old-fashioned wedding ceremony. He fancies that if this ceremony be "rewritten" (his own word) brides and bridegrooms will all patronise the church again. We believe, however, that he is mistaken on this point. He may not like to admit it, but it is a fact nevertheless, that the great majority of brides and bridegrooms who patronise civil marriage don't want religious marriage at any price. Christians seem to think that playing the ostrich is both useful and dignified. It is neither. It is of no use, and it is marked by an utter want of dignity.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

December 7 and 14, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1918.—Previously acknowledged, £220 6s. 5d. Received since:—W. B. Snell (S. A.), £1 1s.; W. H. B., 2s.; A. Goodwin, 2s. 6d.; P. G. Peabody, £20.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for cuttings.

GLASGOW CUTTINGS SENDER.—Should be glad if you would send earlier. Tuesday is too late for use.

J. BOND.—Last week's motto was taken from one of Prof. Frazer's lectures. The Shelley quotation was the reviewer's.

W. H. B.—Thanks for "sincere good wishes."

E. B.—Many thanks for welcome cuttings.

A. GOODWIN.—Glad to have your pleasant letter.

A GOOD deal of correspondence stands over unavoidably till next week.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Mr. Foote had a capital audience at the Stratford Town Hall on Sunday evening—a really wonderful audience considering the detestable weather, which was the theme of endless lamentation in Monday's newspaper. Mr. Foote had two awkward journeys to the Hall and back again, but he was well repaid by the way in which his lecture was received by the numerous and enthusiastic meeting. It was on "Shakespeare's Humanism in the Merchant of Venice." No lecture of the kind could ever have been followed with intenser interest, and there was quite an ovation when the lecturer resumed his seat. Mr. Rosetti made an excellent chairman.

Mr. Foote's next public appearance will be at Queen's (Minor) Hall on Sunday evenings, December 7 and 14. The subjects of his lectures will be announced next week.

Mr. C. E. Ratcliffe delivered the last of the series of four Sunday evening lectures given at Foresters' Hall, North London. In spite of the rain, there was a very fair audience, and several questions were asked after the lecture.

Mr. Lloyd lectures this evening (Nov. 2) at the King's Hall, Corporation-street, Birmingham. Local "saints" will please note. With decent weather there should be a crowded audience.

Our review of Professor Bury's History of Freedom of Thought is postponed for another week while we get rid of an unpleasant though not a dangerous cold. We are rather glad in one way of the further postponement, as we are seeking to obtain a book to which we desire to make accurate reference on a rather important point.

The Bradlaugh Dinner this year was a good deal of a Bernard Shaw dinner. Mr. Shaw did his best to explain Bradlaugh in terms of Shavism. The great "Iconoclast" was really a Shavian without knowing it. He was really not an Atheist, but a remarkably religious man—if not a "mystic," which Shaw claims to be himself. But what is a "religious" man, if Bradlaugh is to be included in the fraternity? Shaw is very shy of answering that question; and we, for our part, cannot discover that he means anything more than a man of principle, who devotes his energies to the promotion of his convictions. Shaw is just like the Christians in wanting to include heroes like Bradlaugh within the category of the Shavian religion. It is a common trick of religionists, but it didn't work at the Bradlaugh Dinner. Shaw's speech was brilliant, witty, and entertaining, but it was sadly lacking in intellectual texture. Moreover, his chief object was obviously to set his own program, rather than Bradlaugh's, before the meeting. At some points he was not even decently careful. When he explained that he (Shaw) was still an Atheist, in the sense that he was when he saw Bradlaugh smashing the idols, he forgot that many persons listening had heard Bradlaugh, while others had read him, and knew that Bradlaugh's Plea for Atheism was critically hostile to every form of Theism—even to the most refined and metaphysical. Bradlaugh was not an Atheist for any of the secondary reasons suggested by Mr. Shaw. His Atheism was grounded on philosophy. He would have been an Atheist if orthodox Christianity, with all its idolatries, had never existed,—and if he had never been persecuted himself by its professors. Bradlaugh's Atheism, in short, was not personal, but philosophical. And if Mr. Shaw doesn't know this he is not qualified to talk about Bradlaugh's Atheism at all. If he does know it he was taking liberties with that Bradlaugh dinner-party at the Holborn Restaurant.

Mr. Cohen's letter, which appears on another page, deals with Mr. Shaw's curious argument about "the line of least resistance." We had our own opinion of it as we listened to it. We let it pass here, however, and turn our attention to Shaw's still more curious argument that Bradlaugh, being a miracle of men, estopped all objections to miracles in general. This is Shaw all over. One wonders at times whether he indulges in these confusions consciously, or whether he is a victim of his own humor. "A miracle of men" is a metaphor; it is permissible in poetry, but not in logic. Bradlaugh was not a "miracle" in the primary and strict meaning of the word. Calling him (and other great men) so only shows that in the puzzle of heredity the great law of variation in nature has been overlooked. Macaulay's memory and the mental arithmetic of a "Datas" are not "miracles." They are extraordinary developments of common human faculties. And all great men are explicable in the same way. Every faculty that Bradlaugh possessed in large measure was possessed in smaller measure by his less gifted fellow men—or they could not have appreciated and applauded him. In the same way, Shakespeare's admirers possess all the qualities that are displayed in his writings,—at least all that they admire; but these are in them comparatively weak and passive, while in him they are powerful and creative. And there is no miracle in a question of degree. A miracle is a difference in kind.

Mr. Philip G. Peabody, of Boston, who made up the ful sum (£800) of the President's Honorarium Fund last Christmas, has just sent us his cheque for £20 as his present year's subscription. He takes the opportunity of writing us a very encouraging (one might say flattering) letter,—from which we make the following extracts as likely to interest our readers:—

> "As I grow older (I am in my 57th year) I am more and more impressed with the conviction that the Freethought movement is at the bottom of all reform: religion is the sum and substance of all that is bad, wicked, selfish, and cruel: every meanness, every stupidity is aided and encouraged by it. That Christianity dies so slowly, and still has the power it has, is, to me, a never ending source of amazement—an almost miraculous tribute to the stupidity and heartlessness of the human race. It is sometimes hard for me to believe that such a race deserves salvation; and were the human race the whole question, I confess my attitude might be different. But whole races of sentient animals have their destiny to work out: they, at least, are entitled to live free from the cruelty that religion causes.....I am inclined to think that, at the present moment, there is no life in the world of as much value to the cause of Justice as yours."

With regard to the Freethinker itself Mr. Peabody writes:—

> "You are weekly producing, in my opinion, a volume of literary matter that constitutes a most wonderful monument to your devotion and ability. Omitting the cream of the whole paper—your own writings—you would even then be editing a paper of the highest literary and intellectual merit. For merely surrounding yourself with your staff of writers, you would be entitled to the highest praise. Long may you, they, and the Freethinker live and prosper!"

The last sentences touch us on a sensitive spot. Our old friend, the late Joseph Symes, once said to us, in a letter from Melbourne, where he fought so brave a battle: "I envy you your contributors." He had very good reason for it. But we smiled a little as we reflected that we might remind him that they did not fall from the sky. One has to find the right sort of contributors, and, having found them, to keep them—especially in the financial conditions of the case. That we have found and kept the contributors our readers have known is creditable to us—and no less creditable to them. It may be the top of our achievement.

Mr. Chesterton's Challenge.

[We have received the following fresh letter from Mr. Chesterton, and we print it together with Mr. Lloyd's reply —at which point the controversy must end in our pages.—EDITOR.]

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—May I refresh your "unfortunate memory" as to the actual terms of your original "Acid Drop" upon which I venture to comment. You were criticising a writer in the Catholic Herald who appears to have explained accurately enough the orthodox Catholic view as to the character and limitations of the Pope's infallibility. After saying that "in his private capacity the Pope is as fallible as ordinary mortals," he remarked that when he "is speaking as Head of the Church, etc.," he is infallible. Upon this your comment ran "but how does 'M. C. L.' account for the fact that different Popes have promulgated contrary dogmas?" In illustration of this you then referred to the "numerous Papal schisms" of the fourteenth century,—a period, by the way, during which, so far as I remember, no dogmas of any kind were promulgated. Then you went straight to the sentence which I ventured to query: "Has he forgotten that for ages there was a bitter conflict between Augustinianism and Arianism, now the one and now the other being ex cathedra pronounced orthodox?" Finally, lest there should be any doubt whatever about your meaning, you say: "Or can he tell us which, if either, of the two rival Popes was infallible?"

Now I put it to any fair-minded man whether your argument had any meaning whatever if it was not directed to proving that the Pope was not infallible. I am willing to waive the point that the phrase ex cathedra is an abbreviation of "ex cathedra Petris," and therefore applies exclusively to the Pope. But if the Pope was not concerned in the matter, how does your description of the "bitter conflict between Augustinianism and Arianism" bear upon the statement made by "M. C. L."?

The instances you bring forward in support of your revised case are, from the point of view of a Catholic, wholly irrelevant—or, rather, they tell in favor of the Papal claim. It is, of course, perfectly true that the State sometimes supported orthodoxy and sometimes Arianism. But nobody ever contended that the Roman Emperors were infallible, ex cathedra or otherwise. It is also true, no doubt, that when the orthodox had been banished or silenced by the civil power, the Arians held Councils which prescribed orthodoxy. But these Councils have no more authority for Catholics than the Wesleyan Conference or any other assembly of heretics. What you have succeeded in proving is that a Council is authoritative only when ratified by the Holy See. Which is our case.

Of course, I quite agree with you that "there is no essential difference" between "the tenets advocated by Athanasius and those championed later by Augustin." In fact there is no difference at all; for both held the Catholic Faith, the dogmas of which, when once promulgated, never have been, and never can be, reversed or altered in any way. That, again, is our case. But I thought the expression "Augustinianism" odd, as I should think it odd if someone said that Germany, in the sixteenth century, was divided between Popery and Wesleyanism, though Wesley undoubtedly held Luther's doctrine of justification by faith alone. And I pointed out the oddity because, taken together with the rest of your remarks, it seemed to suggest that your contributor did not know what he was talking about. I trust I shall not be thought discourteous if I add that I remain of that opinion.

As to what you say about the violence of Catholics and others during the early centuries of Christianity, it leaves me quite untouched. It merely shows that the "Faith once delivered to the Saints" was not that of Mr. Cadbury or of the quaint seventeenth century Protestant sect which first professed to discover the insanities of Pacificism in the Bible. Which once more is our case.—Yours faithfully,

CECIL CHESTERTON.

IN reply to the above letter I wish to say, in the first place, that I did not challenge the accuracy of "M. C. L.'s" definition of Papal infallibility in the Catholic Herald. What I called in question was the fact of that infallibility. I am surprised that Mr. Chesterton, in taking up the cudgels for "M. C. L.," does not even attempt to "account for the fact that different Popes have promulgated contrary dogmas," though this was the real issue raised in the "Acid Drop" under consideration. He neither denies the fact, nor explains it. Again, he neither denies nor explains "the numerous papal schisms," mentioned by me. He merely states that "no dogmas of any kind were promulgated" in the fourteenth century. My reference to that century was in connection with papal schisms, not the promulgation of dogmas. I beg to remind my critic of the stormy scenes amid which Urban VI. was elected to the Holy See in the year 1378; how, a few months later, the same Cardinals, with one exception, elected a rival Pope, in the person of Robert of Geneva, who took the name of Clement VII., and how for many years these two vicars of Christ, or "two worthless priests," as Macaulay calls them, vilified each other in the filthiest language, each being Antichrist to the other. By this schism Western Christendom was divided for thirty-eight years, and not a little bloodshed caused. I asked "M. C. L." which of these rival Popes is to be regarded as infallible? but his champion has not favored me with an answer. As there have been at least thirty similar schisms the ignoring of such a question is highly significant.

Mr. Chesterton is quite right in stating that my argument had no "meaning whatever if it was not directed to proving that the Pope was not infallible." I have never seen the slightest reason for believing in his infallibility, and certainly my critic has adduced no proof of it. Most assuredly he cannot be ignorant of the fact that many zealous Catholics have expressed the strongest opposition to such a claim, among whom was the distinguished scholar, Döllinger. It is a total mistake to say that I have "succeeded in proving that a Council is authoritative only when ratified by the Holy See." I have done nothing of the kind. Besides, "authoritative" is by no means synonymous with "infallible."

Mr. Chesterton applies infallibility exclusively to the Pope. According to him, every successor of St. Peter has been above doctrinal error. But what about Liberius, who won his popularity by becoming a semi-Arian? What about Felix II., who was a complete Arian? Liberius went to the length of subscribing the third Sirmian formula, giving up the "homoousion," an act which has ever since caused considerable embarrassment to the maintainers of the indefectibility of the Roman See. Surely, when promulgated by two occupiers of St. Peter's Chair, Arianism and semi-Arianism must have been successively pronounced orthodox by the highest authority on earth. Mr. Chesterton conveniently overlooks that important chapter in the history of the Church.

The closing sentences in the above letter are fine samples of Chestertonian irrelevancies, and need no further comment. The curious thing about the whole letter is that it admits all my facts, but denies their relevancy. I maintain, however, that nothing could be more relevant to my argument than the fact that a Pope subscribed a semi-Arian creed, or that the Church, in several councils and synods assembled, declared Arianism to be the orthodox Faith.

Free-Will and Necessity.

"Others apart sat on a hill retired,
In thoughts more elevate, and reason'd high
Of providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate;
Fix'd fate, free-will, foreknowledge absolute,
And found no end, in wandering mazes lost."

—MILTON.

WHATEVER Freethinker ventures to express views such as this paper sets forth is sure to meet with sneers and ridicule from the orthodox, who will also, most assuredly, try to turn his principles against himself. What then? Truth is truth; and its weakest friend ought never to feel ashamed of it. Besides, Christians of every denomination are shut up, by the logic of their position, to believe that absolute necessity prevails throughout the physical and moral world. The Calvanist avows this belief in his creed, though he endeavors to escape its logical conclusions when contending with the Arminian. There can be no doubt that Calvinists are necessitarians; for if all things are foreseen and foreordained, then nothing could, nothing ever can, happen otherwise than it does. If it is foreseen, it must happen; if it does not happen, it was not foreseen. But the Arminian, or freewiller, though on one point more logical than the Calvinist, is equally at sea upon another point not less vital. For an Almighty God must have all power; his creatures are mere marionettes, engines made and worked by the Creator, merely exhibiting his power in the semblance of personal and spontaneous actions. God's power is the only power, if he is all-mighty; and therefore all that is done is done by himself. This view—and it cannot be controverted without repudiating Christianity—tells with equal force against Calvinist and Arminian, as does also the foreknowledge of God. Given a being of infinite knowledge—he knows everything, every act, every motion from eternity to eternity, as the pulpits phrase it—and that which he foresees must, in its own time and place, occur. Prophecy lands those who believe in it on the same necessitarian shore; for the God who predicts knows all the circumstances beforehand, and his own power, physical and moral, is the only force concerned in the event.

I mention these points just to ward off unjust blows and to silence dishonest or unfair criticism; to show that whoever has the right to complain of my views, the Christians have no such right, either on physical or moral grounds.

As this paper follows up principles advanced in two former articles, viz., "Personal Identity" and "Ethics and Personal Identity," the reader is asked not to complain too severely if he finds here a repetition of some ideas previously expressed. The nature of the case renders such repetition unavoidable, though I hope it has been kept fairly within bounds.

Most people, whatever their creed, practically assume that the human Will is free. Even fatalists, Calvinists, and necessitarians generally praise and blame, reward and punish, human actions, just as if people could do as they pleased, and were absolutely free in their desires and deeds. There may be less inconsistency and absurdity in that than at first sight seems possible. Truth does not show itself all at once, and popular conceptions are generally incorrect, especially those relating to moral questions. It is not my intention to defend any absurdity which I recognise; nor can I reasonably hope for perfect success where great and wise men have so seriously and repeatedly missed their way. Still, I am of opinion that necessity constitutes no bar to morality, and that people may be as rationally rewarded or punished under its reign as under that of free-will. Indeed, I am not sure that necessity may not be consistent with freedom, though many would scout the supposition as insane. Be it so. Necessity certainly does not destroy or prevent the Will: does it destroy or prevent its freedom? A careful and honest investigation may enable us to return, at least, a dispassionate answer, if not an adequate one.

What is necessity? The word is French (nécessité), derived from the Latin (necessitas), unavoidableness, inevitableness, fate, destiny. Dr. Ogilvie thus defines the English word:—"That which cannot be put off .....that which must be, and cannot be otherwise; or the cause of that which cannot be otherwise; irresistible power; compulsive force, physical or moral." We need a fuller explanation of the term; and the correctness or incorrectness of our explanation must depend upon the views we hold respecting nature or the universe. If we regard all material things and forces as creatures of an infinite God, then necessity resolves itself into nothing but the divine will, or into God himself. With this as our starting point, the universe is necessary, that is, could not have been otherwise, but must be precisely thus, only because God willed and made it such. If we consider the universe as consisting of indefinite quantities of matter and force (whatever these names mean), which are inseparable, and have always existed, and have always acted and reacted as at present, then we must conclude that the phenomena of nature could not have been otherwise than they are, solely because their eternal elements are just what they are. To be sure, when the subject is fully examined, the Theistic and Pantheistic position equally lose themselves in the same conclusion; for an eternal God must be a necessary being equally with an eternal atom, and could not have been in any particular different from what he is. And thus we find that philosophy, whether it travels by the theological or the scientific route, arrives ultimately at the same goal, the goal of absolute necessity, a necessity co-extensive with the universe itself, that never for one moment, in any spot, relaxes its reign.

Matter and force are eternal. What their real nature may be I know not. They are first principles; and first principles admit of no possible explanation. Though we cannot explain their nature, though both matter and force may possibly be one thing, it seems impossible to doubt that chemistry and physics have demonstrated that neither matter nor force can be created or destroyed; and the conclusion seems inevitable that that which cannot be created cannot be destroyed, cannot be increased or diminished in quantity, must be eternal, and, as to its elements or primal nature, unalterable. If this be not true, then we seem still to have no real science or philosophy. Groups of facts united by empiric bonds or extemporised principles do not constitute a science. The groups of facts are no doubt united by some natural principle; when we are sure we have found that, we have a science. If matter and force be not eternal and unalterable in their qualities, then philosophy has no foundation, and science is, at best, but a record of observation and experience.

But if matter and force are eternal, so must their qualities be. For a thing cannot exist, would not be the thing it is, unless its qualities were present; and there seems no occasion yet for the inquiry as to whether matter or force may ever have changed in their qualities. If matter and force and all their qualities be eternal and unchangeable, their every phenomenon must be necessary, and could not have been otherwise. The phenomenon is, in fact, no more than a particular exhibition of those two: it has no separate, no independent existence; it comes and goes, but its elements remain essentially the same, no matter what appearances they may from time to time assume.

As far as the physical world is concerned, the doctrine of necessity seems so clearly established that even religious people no longer resist it. The time is practically gone by when God "held the winds in his fist and the waters in the hollow of his hand"; when "clouds arose and tempests blew by order from his throne." The departments of physical nature were formerly under the absolute control of supernatural powers and agents; now no part is thus controlled. The lightning is no longer left in the hands of any deity, for the very clergy run up lightning-rods to protect God's own temples from the stroke of his own thunderbolt. We need no better proof that theology is dying, that science and art are supplanting it, that necessity is now conceded to those departments of nature which in former days were specially subservient to the whims or exigencies of deity. For even the popular mind finds order, that is, necessity, in precisely those fields where divine caprice held its most unlimited sway. Men have now lost the power to pray for or against astronomical events. Who, with an almanac before him, could entreat his Heavenly Father not to send an eclipse or a conjunction of planets? Who could pray against the return of a periodic comet, or even invoke the aid of deity against the influence of an unexpected one? Can the mathematician pray about his figures and numbers; the chemist about his weights and measures, his mixtures, elements, and compounds; the musician about his notes; the builder about his materials? The truth has been mastered that no power can make $2 \times 2 = 5$, nor cause a triangle and a circle to coincide; that no power can produce water out of anything else than oxygen or hydrogen; that no brick or stone can be converted into wood; that the notes of the diatonic scale cannot change their essential qualities. Even the weather and disease have almost escaped from the grasp of the priesthood, and their total emancipation cannot be long delayed.

The emancipation of the physical world from the clutches of superstition may be regarded as an earnest that the moral world must soon follow it into liberty; for the moral, at best, is but another phase of the physical. We ourselves are necessary phenomena, and could not, with the antecedents we had, have been otherwise. We are effects of causes, which in turn were effects of certain prior causes, and so on till we are led by the chain of phenomena back to the solid substratum of matter and force. Had the materials of our bodies been different, we should have differed physically and morally; had our ancestry been otherwise, so should we; had our age or nation, our creed or government, been different, so must we have differed; had we been born in Mercury or in Saturn, how unlike life had been from the present reality! I presume no one questions this. Everything in our physics reappears in our moral character. Take an extreme case: suppose human beings had not constituted a race, and had never been propagated as they are. How strange life would have been without love, courtship, or marriage! Can anyone estimate the difference in which lack of those would have resulted? I trow not. Love, courtship, and marriage constitute the greatest events in the life of our race; round these cluster government, police, and religion; and round those the moral character of the individual is formed and developed. And here we see the necessities of human nature, themselves the natural product of prior necessities, resulting in equally necessary moral actions. The study of food, clothes, shelter, health, and disease will lead to similar results, viz., that the physical lead by necessary and inevitable processes to moral states and actions. One might enlarge indefinitely upon this subject, and illustrations might be culled from life by scores to evidence the truth that moral actions are as much necessitated as the fall of an unsupported stone, or the revolution of the seasons. It is not requisite, however, to proceed further in this direction, except only to remark, what everybody knows and admits, that the moral character depends much, and necessarily depends much, upon the education we receive in early life. Both a man's personal merits and demerits shrink into insignificance when seen in the light of truth—even if they do not vanish altogether.

Had we been able freely to choose our own nation, ancestry, constitution, sex, and all else that goes to make our life what it is, there might have been some excuse for the fiction of free-will, as it is generally understood. But unless the choice is made at the very beginning of the series, there is no place for it afterwards. A man may be able to refuse, under given conditions, to jump over a high cliff, but when he takes the fatal leap, unless he is in some way caught and supported by a force not his own, he must go to the bottom, no matter what tremendous issues may be involved. And so he must if he be thrown over by others. In the moral region this holds: one event, one incident, leads to another. Every effect is the product of a cause or causes; every effect in turn becomes the cause of something else. Cause and effect, in physics and in ethics equally, know no beginning, no end—they constitute an endless chain, the links of which are infinite in number, and all in their due order. We are the product of an infinite series of phenomena, every one of which has planted its elements in us, has left its mark upon us, in physics and morals. Whoever reflects upon it will readily perceive that our physical constitution, and every part of it, must have their effects in our thoughts, hopes, fears, desires, and wishes, motives and actions.

JOSEPH SYMES.

(To be concluded)

In Honor of Bradlaugh.

THE atmosphere was electric at the tenth annual dinner of the Bradlaugh Fellowship, held at the Holborn Restaurant on October 23. Not only was there an excellent attendance, but the announcement that Mr. Bernard Shaw would occupy the chair had attracted people from all parts.

At the outset, Mr. Shaw put everyone in a good humor by saying "grace," and he quoted some effective lines of Shakespeare with the happiest effect. Indeed, Mr. Shaw was in rare form, and his witty speech, in proposing the toast of the memory of Charles Bradlaugh, was much to the taste of the large and appreciative gathering, who frequently applauded the display of intellectual fireworks which Mr. Shaw had prepared for their benefit. A ripple of laughter followed the opening description of Bradlaugh "as a great religious force," which Mr. Shaw explained by saying that Bradlaugh found the world in such a state that it was necessary to emphasise the negative rather than the positive side of his creed. He called himself an Atheist, and Mr. Shaw said that he (Shaw) proclaimed himself an Atheist at this time, and he was an Atheist still.

Bradlaugh was expelled by that highly religious assembly, the House of Commons, which went out of its way to repudiate a greater honor than it deserved. Bradlaugh used the highly religious name of "Iconoclast," the eternal task of all the ages. In the days of Mohammed the idols were of wood and stone, but now they had about fifty for one they had then, but unfortunately, they were of flesh and blood. They had idols which they put into seven uniforms daily, and called them kings; idols which they dressed up in wigs and robes and called "justice," idols in blue uniforms and helmets, which they spoke of as "law and order;" and idols with collars buttoned at the back, instead of at the front, which stood for religion. Idols were very cheap nowadays.

Bradlaugh was not impressed by the idols, nor was he afraid of them. He was an irrational Rationalist, for he never followed the line of least resistance, which ought to have consisted of taking off his hat to the idols and of filling his pockets. That was what a large number of pastoral people did, who reviled Bradlaugh for his lack of religion; but Bradlaugh hit the idols as hard as he could. The speech closed with a graceful compliment to "my friend Mr. Foote, who is carrying on Bradlaugh's work," and a warning to Freethinkers to disbelieve the priesthood of science as much as they did the priesthood of religion.

Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner, in responding to the toast, recalled the days when Shaw and her father were "friendly enemies," and spoke of the glowing tribute to her father presented in unaccustomed views. She also pointed out that Mr. Lloyd George's land law reform scheme was one long since advocated by her father, and she also gave a lengthy account of her visit to the recent Freethought Congress at Lisbon.

To Mr. Arthur B. Moss was entrusted the toast of "The Fellowship," and he emphasised the Freethought side of Bradlaugh's career.

A lively speech followed from Mr. George Standring, who responded to the toast of "The Fellowship," which he said originated with some obscure and contemptible people. During its ten years of existence it had numbered two Members of Parliament, one clergyman, and the President of the N. S. S. among its chairmen. It had progressed from the abysmal depths of G. S. (George Standring) to the altitude of G. B. S. (George Bernard Shaw). It also numbered among its regular attendants, he humorously added, certain grey-bearded and bald-headed men and women who had known Bradlaugh.

Mr. E. H. Haywood proposed the toast of "Freethought at Home and Abroad," and spoke of the veneration felt for Bradlaugh by the younger generation of Freethinkers.

At the conclusion of this speech there were loud calls for "Foote," and the Chairman asked Mr. G. W. Foote to gratify the wishes of the company.

Mr. Foote, who was received with loud applause, said the last meeting he attended at which Mr. Shaw was present led to his going home for two months, and if this occurred again he should avoid Mr. Shaw in future. The average Englishman suffered from sleeping sickness. There was something in being a standing challenge in a country in which the inhabitants tend to lie down as near as possible to a pigs' trough. John Bull wanted his head knocked, and Bradlaugh did that.

Bradlaugh was not a politician, he was a statesman. His Titanic strength was expended outside Parliament, and when he took his seat after his unexampled conflict he was a broken man. The work he did was seminal work. He was a herald, not a member of the rear guard. Lloyd George to-day is but following Bradlaugh. The credit of founding the first Republican Society in England since the Chartist times belongs to Bradlaugh, and he (Mr. Foote) was always proud of being the secretary to that body. The virtues of the clergy were sometimes more dangerous than their vices. We have the Rev. Mr. Campbell stealing Freethought thunder, and Mr. Shaw completing the education of the congregation and preacher. If Mr. Shaw should ever succeed Mr. Campbell, he would either burst himself or burst the Church. Bradlaugh refused to use the word "religion," and was not a member of any Church. He was born too big for that.

Mr. Heaford concluded the speeches by replying to the toast of "Freethought at Home and Abroad," and a unanimous vote of thanks to the Chairman concluded the meeting, which broke up after the singing of "Auld Lang Syne."

Between the speeches songs were rendered by Miss Nell Gwynne.

"G. B. S." ON BRADLAUGH.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—It is a pity that one cannot be always accurate and striking; but, if a sacrifice must be made, by all means let it be in favor of accuracy. Particularly when not doing this involves the encouragement of modes of thinking that are fundamentally vicious. At the Bradlaugh Dinner, the other evening, Mr. Bernard Shaw is reported as saying that—

> "Though Charles Bradlaugh preached the gospel of Rationalism, he acted throughout his life in the most irrational manner. Instead of choosing the line of least resistance.....he chose the line of greatest resistance. When he met one of these idols, instead of taking off his hat and filling his pockets—which was the sensible rationalistic thing to do—he hit the idol as hard as he could, and very often he knocked it down."

The contradiction is quite fanciful, and does not exist in fact. Popular it may be to sacrifice all other considerations to financial gain, but why rational? It is really because people are not rationalistic that this course is followed in so many instances. Mr. Shaw surely has sufficient command of language to find terms that will correctly describe this kind of behavior, and when Bradlaugh is the subject, his speech need suffer no decrease in brilliancy as a consequence.

Nor did Bradlaugh, in his most heroic endeavors, ever cease to follow the line of least resistance. Great as Bradlaugh was, he was incapable of achieving the impossible, and too wise even to attempt it. The line of least social resistance was then, as it is still, to bow to popular idols instead of smashing them. But he who sets himself up as the teacher of a scientific sociology should recognise that the peculiarity of the human animal is that psychological impulsion is the determining factor in human conduct. Bradlaugh would, indeed, have encountered far less social resistance had he been an idol-worshiper instead of an idol-breaker. But had he followed that line he would have accomplished the remarkable feat of working along the lines of greatest psychological resistance, and that would have quite equalled the miracle of the Gadarene swine. Bradlaugh's real greatness lay in the simple fact that his line of greatest psychological impulse was one not common with the mass of the people. His line of least resistance was to do easily that which most people find so very difficult. Great men do not contradict human nature; they only illustrate its capacities and many-sidedness.

There does not seem very much to criticise in Mr. Shaw's confession that he had never been a Materialist, but always a Mystic. If "Mystic" is used as an equivalent for Idealist, the opposition to "Materialist" is most unfortunate. There are no greater Idealists in the social world than philosophic or scientific Materialists. If Mystic is not the equivalent of Idealist, the statement reads very much like pure cant—perhaps the result of too great familiarity with the pulpit.

Perhaps one ought to compliment Mr. Shaw on having crowded so much confusion in so small a space.

Some Little-Known Freethinkers.

II.—MAJOR EVANS BELL.

MAJOR THOMAS EVANS BELL was chiefly known by his works on Indian affairs. He entered the army in 1842, and was employed in the suppression of Thugee. He served his country well in India, and probably in nothing better than in his continued advocacy in books and pamphlets of the just claims of the natives. But this independent attitude did not commend him to the authorities, and stood in the way of justly earned promotion. As a Freethinker, he is to be remembered by his concise little book, entitled The Task of To-day, in which, taking up Carlyle's injunction to do the duty nearest hand, he examines the religion in which he had been reared. During the early days of the Reasoner, Major Bell supported that paper with both purse and pen, writing many Freethought articles under the signature of "Undecimus." He, indeed, contemplated selling his commission to devote himself to Freethought, but, by the advice of friends, was deterred. He returned to India at the outbreak of the mutiny, and became Deputy Commissioner of Police at Madras. He probably had some share in leading Judge Strange on the road to Freethought.

The influence of Carlyle is notable in The Task of To-day, which was published by James Watson in 1852, and is dedicated to G. J. Holyoake. He says in his preface:—

> "Life is a very serious thing; every gleam of truth reveals to us more of the laws of absolute fact, inexorable and eternal, which make up the inscrutable Future and Invisible, as they do the visible and mysterious Present. Shall we raise our puny hands or voices and fight against those laws? Shall we lie against eternal truth, or shut our eyes and ears against it? I dare do none of these things deliberately. My share in the work of the world is doubtless of the minutest consequence, but to me it is of infinite consequence. To me it is of infinite consequence whether I live a traitor and a coward, or a true man. Good or bad, this is my work; I found I had it to do, and I have done it. May I ever do so."

The Task examines the Christian evidences with the result of showing that they were accepted in days of gross credulity, and have been largely maintained by pious frauds. Thus he says:—

> "There was exactly the same evidence, and no more, in the third and fourth centuries that there is now—namely, certain narratives, the earliest of which was certainly not written sooner than thirty years after the death of Christ; but the superstition and ignorance of those times were such that accounts of supernatural events met with easy credit, and were attributed by some to divine, and by others to diabolical agency, according as they approved or disliked the character of the miracle-worker, or the tendency of his doctrines.
> "Hardly two centuries ago a man in England was considered, even by the educated, as little better than an Atheist if he doubted that many old women were endowed by the Devil with the power of working miracles without number."

The frauds, he shows, were not confined to Catholics:—

> "Although modern Protestantism has never pretended to miraculous powers, yet Protestant pious frauds have always abounded, and abound in the present day. It is a gross fraud to gloss over and conceal the infamous characters and obviously interested motives of many of the principal actors in the Reformation, in England particularly, as Protestant writers have done. Awful interpositions of Providence, exaggerated and fictitious accounts of deathbed scenes, both of believers and infidels, the lying reports of missionaries, and, in particular, the long evangelical speeches they are so fond of putting into the mouths of their converts, are instances of Protestant pious frauds."

The alleged evidences of prophecy are equally examined, and paralleled by the evidence for Mohammedanism. The Bible is shown to bear many traces of superstition and savagery, and he proceeds to examine the evidence for an alleged Great First Cause. He concludes this section with the words:—

> "To act this life well it is not necessary to know the secrets of the Invisible, the destinies of worlds and systems, or the life beyond the grave, if a life there be. That is the department of speculation and poetry, and not of knowledge or of action. We owe no service to the Invisible and Unknown; our work is here before us."

The little book concludes with the contention that morality must be independent of speculation, and an exhortation to mutual help and frankness in proclaiming unbelief in dogmas which have only cursed mankind:—

> "How long [he asks] could the present social ostracism be pursued against avowed unbelievers if the words, 'I am not a Christian,' were calmly and gently, but firmly, pronounced, not obtrusively paraded, in the drawing-room, the court of justice, and the senate, whenever passing event called for such an expression of opinion from a candid and honest man? How long could the Christian superstition enjoy its galvanic life in England if every man whose heart and intellect revolted from it were henceforward to raise his voice and pen to denounce and to abolish it? And in the speedy destruction and abolition of its influence lies our hope of peaceable and harmonious progress."

Major Bell retired from India in 1865, but continued to largely interest himself in Indian affairs. He died September 12, 1887. The Illustrated London News shortly afterwards gave his portrait, which is that of a remarkably fine-looking man.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

It is a marvel if any mischief be in hand, if a priest be not at some end of it.—BISHOP LATIMER.

Freedom of Thought.

A History of Freedom of Thought. By Prof. J. B. Bury, Litt.D., LL.D. (Home University Library, 74.) London: Williams & Norgate. 1s. net.

THE modest article "a" in Professor Bury's title is a sort of deprecation of too drastic criticism of his little book; which, besides, is written for a very popular audience and not for a court of scholars and judges. On the whole, we should say that this volume is likely to do a great deal of good. The public to which it is addressed will gain a fair idea—not always in the best perspective—of the progress of freedom of thought, especially in religious matters, from the very dawn of history till the present day. And the lesson inculcated is one of mutual respect amongst men for their common rights of free thought and free expression.

We do not use the word toleration. That is but a landmark on the road to liberty. To tolerate a man is to put up with him. There is an inevitable insolence in the word. It expresses the attitude of bigots and tyrants when they find that persecution and oppression are not as easy as they were, and that certain concessions must be made to the growing power of dissent and independence. To use the language of the man in the street, toleration means that the upper dog is beginning to be a little afraid of the lower one.

One of Ingersoll's best epigrams is very germane to this point. The Church (he said) never left off burning people alive because she was ashamed of it; she left off burning people alive when there were too many people who objected to being burnt alive. Liberty is never conceded; it is always won. The only thing that nature really honors is strength. Even the most "enlightened" Christians have never been eager to abolish such agencies of persecution as the Blasphemy Laws. The pioneer work of that movement has always been done by Freethinkers, and the only effective way of destroying such laws is to multiply the number of people who resent their existence. At critical moments a few of the better sort of Christians—nominal rather than actual Christians—rally around the standard of liberty; but the great mass of Christians hold steadily aloof; and in these cases it is sadly true that whoso is not for us is against us.

Professor Bury reminds his readers that freedom of speech is "taken as a matter of course, and seems a perfectly simple thing, in most civilised countries. People are so accustomed to it that they look upon it as a natural right." "But this right," Professor Bury says, "has been acquired only in quite recent times, and the way to its attainment has lain through lakes of blood."

Why should this be so? Why should one man, or one set of men, come to the strange conclusion that he or they have greater rights of thought and speech than the other inhabitants of this planet? Why is it so hard to persuade human societies that "liberty to publish one's opinions and to discuss all questions is a good and not a bad thing"?

Professor Bury offers the following observations on this point:—

> "At present, in the most civilised countries, freedom of speech is taken as a matter of course and seems a perfectly simple thing. We are so accustomed to it that we look on it as a natural right. But this right has been acquired only in recent times, and the way to its attainment has lain through lakes of blood. It has taken centuries to persuade the most enlightened peoples that liberty to publish one's opinions and to discuss all questions is a good and not a bad thing. Human Societies (there are some brilliant exceptions) have been generally opposed to freedom of thought, or, in other words, to new ideas, and it is easy to see why.
> "The average brain is naturally lazy and tends to take the line of least resistance. The mental world of the ordinary man consists of beliefs which he has accepted without questioning and to which he is firmly attached; he is instinctively hostile to anything which would upset the established order of this familiar world. A new idea, inconsistent with some of the beliefs which he holds, means the necessity of rearranging his mind; and this process is laborious, requiring a painful expenditure of brain-energy. To him and his fellows, who form the vast majority, new ideas, and opinions which cast doubt on established beliefs and institutions, seem evil because they are disagreeable.
> "The repugnance due to mere mental laziness is increased by a positive feeling of fear. The conservative instinct hardens into the conservative doctrine that the foundations of society are endangered by any alteration in the structure. It is only recently that men have been abandoning the belief that the welfare of a state depends on rigid stability and on the preservation of its traditions and institutions unchanged. Wherever that belief prevails, novel opinions are felt to be dangerous as well as annoying, and anyone who asks inconvenient questions about the why and the wherefore of accepted principles is considered a pestilent person.
> "The conservative instinct, and the conservative doctrine which is its consequence, are strengthened by superstition. If the social structure, including the whole body of customs and opinions, is associated intimately with religious belief, and is supposed to be under divine patronage, criticism of the social order savors of impiety, while criticism of the religious belief is a direct challenge to the wrath of supernatural powers.
> "The psychological motives which produce a conservative spirit hostile to new ideas are reinforced by the active opposition of certain powerful sections of the community, such as a class, a caste, or a priesthood, whose interests are bound up with the maintenance of the established order and the ideas on which it rests."

This is a very philosophic explanation of the matter. But we do not think it covers the whole case. One of the most powerful influences is omitted from Professor Bury's catalogue. We refer to early education, which, in itself, and apart from all other considerations, is so potent in preserving what Comte called "Order" at the expense of what be called "Progress." The training of a child up to, say, seven years of age is, for the most part, practically decisive of its future life. It is not at all a question of right or wrong that we are considering; it is the force of the impressions made upon the plastic and susceptible mind of childhood—whatever they are. And it must be borne in mind that education in the past has consisted more in teaching what is believable than in teaching what is knowable. The result is that old beliefs are, as it were, planted in the minds of successive generations; so that the work of progress, including the discovery of truth, necessarily becomes a fight against an artificial occupancy of the human mind by ancient errors in order to make room for new truths. The mother, the teacher, the priest—the whole force of adult authority over the child—stand up afterwards in opposition to the approach of new ideas and sentiments.

Many Freethinkers, even now, feel the appeal of the past when they suddenly hear a church bell or church music, or the voice of prayer flowing forth from the "sanctuary." Momentary it may be, but the buried past is not altogether dead; it is still capable of sporadic thrills, though incapable of complete resurrection.

With regard to Christianity, of course, the real truth is what the profounder George Eliot presented to the attention of the shallower Professor Lecky. What was the real explanation of the dreadful persecutions set forth in Lecky's Rationalism? What, after all, was the use of narrating facts without stating principles? The secret of persecution was the doctrine of exclusive salvation. On this point Professor Bury is perfectly sound:—

> "But the fundamental principle lay in the doctrine that salvation is to be found exclusively in the Christian Church. The profound conviction that those who did not believe in its doctrines would be damned eternally, and that God punishes theological error as if it were the most heinous of crimes, led naturally to persecution. It was a duty to impose on men the only true doctrine, seeing that their own eternal interests were at stake, and to hinder errors from spreading. Heretics were more than ordinary criminals, and the pains that man could inflict on them were as nothing to the tortures awaiting them in hell. To rid the earth of men who, however virtuous, were, through their religious errors, enemies of the Almighty, was a plain duty. Their virtues were no excuse. We must remember that, according to the humane doctrines of the Christians, pagan, that is, merely human, virtues were vices, and infants who died unbaptised, passed the rest of time creeping on the floor of hell. The intolerance arising from such views could not but differ in kind and intensity from anything that the world had yet witnessed."

This was as true under Protestantism as under Catholicism. The historical evidence on this point is overwhelming. Jewel, indeed, in his Apology for the Church of England, rebuts the Catholic accusation of indifference to misbelief by pointing to certain heretics who had been put to death, asking at whose hands they suffered their punishment. "We killed them," Jewel exclaimed, "not you." That was the common spirit of the age, and the common outcome of earnest Christianity. The remarks of Professor Bury on this point are as true as they are creditable to his impartiality:—

> "Nothing was further from the minds of the leading Reformers than the toleration of doctrines differing from their own. They replaced one authority by another. They set up the authority of the Bible instead of that of the Church, but it was the Bible according to Luther or the Bible according to Calvin. So far as the spirit of intolerance went, there was nothing to choose between the new and the old Churches. The religious wars were not for the cause of freedom, but for particular sets of doctrines; and in France, if the Protestants had been victorious, it is certain that they would not have given more liberal terms to the Catholics than the Catholics gave to them."

Which is what we have always said.

G. W. FOOTE.

(To be continued.)

Materialism: Its Meaning and Value.—IV.

(Concluded from p. 691.)

MODERN criticisms of Materialism are all preliminary defences of Vitalism in biology. Originally, Vitalism covered much more than the biological field, and in the history of the conflict between religion and scientific ideas every stage of the scientific advance has been contested by substantially the same arguments. Logically, indeed, the modern upholders of Vitalism are fighting at the wrong end. Once the principle of natural law is admitted, and the mechanistic or materialistic explanation accepted, no limits can be placed to its application. During the eighteenth century there was published in France a pamphlet bearing the title, Ought Women to Learn the Alphabet? It was a strange question, but it went to the heart of the subject. If women were allowed to learn the alphabet, argued the writer, on what ground could they be prohibited mastering the encyclopædia? If they ought to be stopped anywhere, it should be at the commencement. So with Materialism. Once admit that certain groups of phenomena—physical, chemical, etc.—exhibit no more than can be explained by the inevitable composition of natural forces, what real ground have we for believing that the principle will break down when applied to the phenomena of living beings?

None whatever. In the light of what has been said in previous articles, it will be plain that the question of the origin of life offers no fatal objection to Materialism. It is easy enough to say that Materialism cannot explain vital phenomena. The Materialist might fitly reply, If Materialism cannot, what can? It is not a question of materialistic impotence faced with spiritualistic knowledge. It is at best—or worst—theory against theory. And there is this important distinction between the two theories. On the one hand, Materialism is in line with the whole advance of human knowledge. There is no single known fact against it. Wherever ignorance has given place to knowledge, the principles of Materialism have been vindicated, and the supernatural pushed still farther back. All the Materialist really does is to assume that the future will resemble the past, and that natural causation will be found to be the key to unsolved problems, as it has been to those already solved. Still further, it is the only plan on which serious investigation is at all possible. You cannot study a mystery that is admittedly hopeless. And wherever scientific investigation is being pursued, it is on the assumption that the Materialist explanation is the true one. There is not a single investigator who expects to discover, as the result of his experiments in vital phenomena, a new and independent force. What he is looking for are the exact conditions under which vital phenomena originate. That is why physico-chemical formulas play so large a part in these investigations. For the search for the origin of life means only the search for those physico-chemical conditions under which vital phenomena appear. And when we know these, just as a knowledge of the conditions under which gravitative or chemical phenomena appear tells us really all there is to know about gravitation or electricity, so we shall then know what life is. Sir Oliver Lodge's comment that this will only tell us the condition under which life manifests itself, but not what life itself is, may be dismissed as pure nonsense. It is for the Supernaturalist to prove that beyond the thing we know as life there is something else that we neither know nor ever can know.

On the other hand, all the probabilities are dead against Supernaturalism, or Vitalism, in any form. As an instrument of investigation, it is not, and never has been, of the slightest use. The search for entities, whether vital, chemical, or physical, is of all quests the most hopeless. And it has now become so absurd that even Sir Oliver Lodge is forced to disown the name of "Vitalist," and to explain that to refer anything to "vital force" is a mere cover for ignorance. It tells us nothing, and leaves the whole problem exactly where it was, with the addition of having created an obstacle to future investigation.

Moreover, and this should never be overlooked in any discussion of the subject, Vitalism in any form is only primitive animism masquerading as science. Animism has it that the soul, or double, or life, of man is something dwelling within the body and directing its movements. This is the form taken by the vital principle in all ages; and between the primitive and the later form there is no substantial change. The "soul" of the modern is only the "double" or ghost of the savage refined and emasculated. But it is essentially the same thing, and ringing the changes on the name ought not to disguise the fact. Still further, the "soul" or the "vital force" would not be here at all but for the primitive ghost. When men in the position of Sir Oliver Lodge claim a place for a "directive force," or a "life force" working in conjunction with natural forces and yet distinct from them, they are not exhibiting the result of modern investigation; they are only exercising their ingenuity in devising formulas that will graft a primitive delusion on to ascertained facts. Behind the "directive force" of the modern is the "vital principle" of the mediæval metaphysician, and behind that again is the "ghost" of the primitive savage.

The extent to which the materialistic conception of nature dominates modern thought may be seen quite apart from the domain of pure science. Its influence is hardly less marked in the sphere of advanced religious thinking. In the first place, there is the general abandonment of the idea of a God who continuously interferes with natural operations. In place of a Deity who directly controls natural phenomena in the interests of man, we have a Deity who exists somewhere behind nature, responsible, it is said, for the existence of things, but, having created them, doing nothing but see them work. In practice, this reduces God to a negligible quantity. If things are what they are because of their inherent properties, it is not a matter of vital concern whether these inherent properties were originally called into existence by God or not. They are there, and affect all alike without distinction of person or creed. God does nothing now, and this conclusion is not in the least affected by the assumption that he once did everything in a supreme and final act of creation. It admits the first principle of Materialism that all phenomena are the resultant of a complex arrangement of natural forces. Materialism has always claimed that the closest scrutiny of the known world fails to reveal the slightest trace of superhuman or supernatural influence. It has nothing to do with a God who may exist at the back of everything—wherever that may be—and may leave the proof of his existence to those who make the assertion. If God is excluded from the world of natural phenomena, he has, for all practical purposes, ceased to exist.

The position is not improved for the Theist if, instead of a God at the back of nature, he assumes a Deity permeating nature. In the first place, a God who merely exists as something permeating everything is not a God at all. It is a mere conception, something in the nature of a universal ether, and lacks the essential characteristics of Deity—personality and intelligence. Some people seem to be under the curious delusion that God is to be saved by, so to speak, beating him out thin, just as others assume that the dignity of God is enhanced by his having nothing to do. To work for one's living used to be considered a sign of social inferiority, and is yet to a very considerable extent. "Gentleman" is still largely synonymous with one who doesn't work. But it is curious to find the same notion applied to a God whose claim to praise once rested upon his assumed care and watchfulness over all his creatures. An immanent God—to use the cant expression—is no more than an algebraic expression, but lacking the important function of utility.

In the second place, this does not escape the mechanistic principle, it rather asserts it. I have already pointed out that, so far as Materialism is concerned, it is a matter of indifference whether we call existence matter, or spirit, or merely X. The essential thing is that the resultant phenomena shall appear as the mathematical consequence of the workings of non-personal forces. Merely calling this substance—to use a technical term—God does not benefit supernaturalism and it does not injure naturalism. That is, in the minds of those who understand on what issue the dispute turns, although it may affect those who are influenced by mere phrases. To say that "matter" is neither ultimate nor omnipotent, but is the outcome of something still more ultimate, is only turning Materialism out by the door in order to readmit it by the window. What the Theist really does in these apologies is to bring his God within the materialistic category and treat it as a natural force operating in a fixed and definite manner.

In what has been said in these articles I have purposely stated the issue between Materialism and Spiritualism in the broadest terms, and have deliberately refrained from bringing forward a great deal of evidence in favor of scientific Materialism. The question of the origin of life, for example, by natural causation, is no longer a very serious subject of dispute in the scientific world. The vast majority of chemists and biologists agree on this as an inevitable assumption. All their researches are based upon it. The only question is, How did it occur? Under what conditions did the synthesis occur that brought this new factor into the world, and can we recreate these conditions for ourselves? Even though no success were ever met with in this direction, the origin of life by purely natural methods remains an inevitable assumption of all scientific thinking, and all we know is in favor of its accuracy.

I have also passed by the common assumption that the Materialist is called upon to prove in what way mind, or consciousness, is dependent upon material organisms. He is logically bound to do no such thing. We have not to find the connection between body and mind; that already exists as one of the indisputable facts of experience. What has to be found is the fact of their separateness, and that is wholly the work of the Anti-Materialist. The Supernaturalist first of all separates two things never found save in the closest possible connection, and then throws upon the Materialist the onus of saying how they can be connected. The real problem here is to discover in what way they can be separated.

What I have been, above all, trying to make plain, is that the materialistic or mechanistic conception of nature is an indispensable condition of sane, scientific, and profitable thinking. Until nature in any or all its phases is thought of as following a determinable order, human thought is little better than a chaos. If the determinable order is there, Supernaturalism—or its modern equivalent, Spiritualism—is doomed. If it is not there, sane science is impossible. This is the simple issue, and there is no logical half-way house. The ghosts of exploded theories linger, and recent events have shown, that even in the world of science, they are not without influence. But that influence is fortunately on the wane, and to-day the principles of the old Greek Materialists are triumphant all along the line. Time and labor, and a fuller knowledge have shown many of their speculations to be faulty, but experience has only justified the Lucretian claim that nature does all things of itself and without the aid of the gods.

The Cross.

IN modern speech the Cross means Christianity, just as the Crescent is often used as a synonym for Mohammedanism. More specifically the Cross signifies the death of Jesus Christ as a sacrifice of infinite merit, offered up on the Cross for the sins of the whole world.

The leading article in the British Weekly for Oct. 30 is devoted primarily to a discussion of it in this sense. The writer, presumably the editor, Sir William Robertson Nicoll, is severely orthodox, holding that Jesus, by dying a sacrificial death, made himself responsible for guilty mankind. He died that we might escape death by being saved from our sins. Jesus is not merely an admirable character, a leader of men, a prophet full of wisdom, or a philanthropist, brimming over with enthusiasm, but the Savior of the world, who laid down his life for our redemption. To believe this concerning him is supremely difficult, Sir William admits; "to come with empty hands and take, to put ourselves in his debt for all that is called salvation, this is hard, so hard that we are tempted to regard it as unnecessary." We look upon it not only as hard, but as fundamentally irrational, immoral, degrading, and bound to result in the loss of self-reliance and self-respect. We agree that "nothing is so fruitless as appeals to men not Christians themselves to Christianise the social order." Non-Christians are much too sensible to undertake so foolish and so injurious a task. Nothing worse could happen to the social order than to become Christianised; but, thanks to the underlying common sense of the community at large, there is no danger of so disastrous a revolution ever taking place. On this point Sir William is unintentionally on our side. He says:—

> "It has not infrequently been said, with great confidence, that belief in the Cross as a Divine Atonement is impossible and irrelevant for the characteristically modern mind, the unexpressed inference being that the sooner it is banished from the minds of religious people—and specially of preachers—the better. Its impossibility for the irreligious modern mind is very credible; nothing in the creed, now or at any period of the world's history, can be understood or apprehended without faith, since everything in the creed is supernatural. But impossible for the mind of modern Christians—so to describe the Cross of Jesus is false. If modesty forbids us to come forward ourselves as convincing types of modernity, we may take one or two examples."

We are amazed beyond measure at the damaging admission so naïvely made in the above extract, which is that in the twentieth century "belief in the Cross as a Divine Atonement is impossible" to all who are not already in possession of it. The lost sinners of to-day are absolutely beyond the reach of salvation. Belief in the Cross as a Divine Atonement is essential to the saving of the soul; but for the irreligious modern mind that belief is impossible. From Sir William's point of view "this is a hard saying; who can hear it?" Preaching the Gospel to the irreligious is a culpable waste of time and energy, because in order to understand or apprehend the message it brings they must have faith, and faith is by a Christian minister declared to be impossible to them. Surely so unfortunate a pronouncement never slipped from a divine's pen before, and for him the worst about it is that it is only too true. This is probably why a reverend gentleman said the other day that the Church's hope of winning converts from outside is now almost wholly vain; if she is to survive she must breed believers within her own borders. It was a realisation of this ugly fact, no doubt, that led to the formation, largely at the instigation of Sir William Robertson Nicoll, of what is called "The League of Worshipful Children." This is the last hope of a falling Church, the last straw at which she can catch. Poor, innocent children, before they learn to discern between their right hand and their left hand, so many supernatural beliefs are forced down their throats. "Everything in the creed is supernatural," exclaims Sir William, in which the irreligious modern adult cannot believe; therefore, we must use our authority as parents, guardians, and teachers, to make believers of our children before they learn to think for themselves.

That, we repeat, is the Church's very last hope, and even this is not going to avail her much. It is a notorious fact that only a small proportion of religiously trained children become Church members. In spite of the vigilance of the teachers, the majority of them drop out of the Sunday-school into the outside world, where early beliefs become inoperative, if not non-existent. Sir William is certainly wrong when he claims that belief in the Cross as a Divine Atonement is possible for all modern Christians. Are Unitarians not numbered among the Christians? Is that the reason why they are excluded from membership in the Council of Free Churches? What about the growing class of scholars who style themselves Liberal Christians? Are they also to be denied the right to use the name? Unfortunately for Sir William, among these is to be found the very first "example" cited by him for his case—"Harnack, the greatest living Church historian." This eminent scholar does not believe in the Deity of Jesus Christ, nor in the Cross as a Divine Atonement in the orthodox sense. On this point Sir William and he are as wide apart as the poles. Dr. Nicoll's doctrine of the Atonement gets no certificate from Harnack. He supplies a most lucid account of the rise and evolution of the dogma, but he never adopts it himself. His able work entitled What is Christianity? is decisive evidence against the claim made on his behalf in the British Weekly. It is absolutely undeniable, therefore, that the quotation given from his writings does not even tend to "dispose of one tolerably widespread and intimidating misconception, according to which the Atonement is obsolete for typically modern Christian thought"; and to affirm, on the ground of it, that "it is something to have this point settled," is to commit a serious blunder. Harnack's supreme emphasis is not laid on the death of Jesus, but on his life and teaching.

Sir William is of opinion that the future of the Atonement is safe, "if men will only preach with their eyes on the New Testament"; but we maintain that that is possible only when the eye is a blindly believing one. Professor Benjamin W. Bacon is in charge of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis at Yale University, and Sir William cannot deny but that he keeps his eye pretty closely upon the documents under his care, with the result that he has discovered two conflicting gospels therein, and that he himself has adopted the one in which the Cross does not count. It must be admitted that, at last, even preachers are beginning to look at the New Testament through a critical eye, and to discern in it a considerable amount of legend embarrassingly mixed up with what they still treat as genuine history. The truth is that to a rapidly growing number of preachers the New Testament is no longer authoritative.

Sir William furnishes another guarantee of safety, thus:—

> "The future is safe, again, if men preach with their eye upon the human conscience. Every minister knows there are men who passionately avow their need of a dying Redeemer, and have no rest till they have found him; every minister knows there are situations, penitences, deathbeds in presence of which a man who has nothing to say about vicarious Atonement must acknowledge himself dumb and baffled."

There is such a conscience, to be sure; but it has been produced by such preachers as those who preach with their eye upon it. It is an abnormal, diseased, and demoralising conscience, whose only mission is to make wretched cowards of its unfortunate possessors; but it is as rare as it is unnatural. To-day very few indeed are afflicted with it. Despite all the efforts of the evangelical pulpit to keep it alive, to develop it in the young, to appeal to it in those who still retain some remnants of it, it is steadily becoming a forgotten bugbear of a dead past. This is why churches and chapels are emptying.

It does not seem to occur to Sir William that the Cross is many thousands of years older than Christianity. We know that in ancient Mexico the sacred tree was made into a cross on which was suspended a substance representing the Savior-god, which was eventually taken down and sacramentally eaten by the faithful. For the Persians the Cross was a charm against evil and death, while to the ancient Gauls it was a solar emblem endowed with creative and fructifying power. Indeed, the Cross was used in nearly all parts of the ancient world as a religious symbol, and generally closely associated with the Deity. In Egypt it was a symbol of everlasting life. When Christianity came it found the Cross in universal use; and it so often signified the death of a god or a god-man that it was chosen as the supreme Christian symbol. Our point, therefore, is that the Christian Cross is an imitation of innumerable Pagan Crosses, and that there is no more reality behind it than behind the others. As regards objective truth, they are all on a perfect equality. Man's salvation depends, not upon the efficacy of a Divine Atonement; but upon the sincerity and uprightness of his own actions. What he needs is not entire trust in an atoning sacrifice beyond the stars, but a deep-seated and dominating sense of honor, dignity, justice, and comradeship in his own breast, bringing him into a state of joyous harmony with his environment. The myths, even the Christian, are passing, and we are engaged in learning the truth about ourselves. "Everything in the Christian creed," Sir William tells us, "is supernatural," which is its greatest condemnation; but everything in the creed of science is natural, and this is its highest commendation.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Ugliness of God's Earth.

GOD'S earth is an exceedingly popular phrase. Speakers of all kinds use it publicly; and all sorts of people use it privately, when they wish to strengthen their words. Perhaps the picturesqueness of the phrase tends somewhat towards the glibness of its usual utterance. God's earth sounds finely. It is an oratorical "take." There is a grand ring about it. It gives some warranty for the accusation of having a comprehensive mind, a broad conception, and a capability of carrying some weight. In fact, so popular and so picturesque is the phrase that we might prophesy it will become, in the shades of the future, an oath.

The character of God, as represented by his children, is very similar in many respects to God's earth. When a religionist refers to God, he means you to imagine everything that is bright and beautiful about God's reputed nature; and when he says God's earth, he means you to think about everything that is lovely in God's earth. But immediately you begin to divest God's character and God's earth of verbal superficiality, you find both are dirty and clean, beautiful and ugly, revolting and appealing; that, in short, both contain all the antitheses you can imagine without being mentally absurd.

There are repulsive things in God's earth that an ordinary man would not own as his handiwork; but we must not forget that God has never personally claimed to be the maker of them; nor should we forget that God has never personally claimed the earth as his. Even an Atheist may be pardoned wishing sometimes, in his more rebellious moods, that God would hurry up and take possession. Only God can prove the existence of God. We are so astoundingly lacking in spiritual vision that we cannot even observe him trying; and we are afraid it would require some bold, uncompromising, realisable campaign against Landlordism to satisfy the doubtings of our sceptical minds.

Whenever I see the ugly in God's earth these doubtings—perhaps I should say denials—come upon me with redoubled force. My logic may not be of the best; but, for me, if there is no God in the ugly, there is no God in the beautiful.

In these modern days there is as much futility in attempting to restrict God's activity and presence as there would have been at any time in the past, had our forefathers been so foolish as to try. God must be everywhere or nowhere. His activity must be universal or a dream. Omnipotence, omnipresence, and omniscience were straightforwardly acknowledged as essential to God's nature by the theologians of yesterday; and to-day God must possess these traits or be cleared from man's mind. There can be no half measures, no compromises, no arbitration on the matter. It is useless to turn upside down and tell us, in words spelled and pronounced backwards, that all God did was to set the universe going. Assuming that true, God would probably have found it a more serious task, notwithstanding his omnipotency, to get rid of himself.

Religious sophists might pile their printed sophistries around us till we imagined that God's earth had suddenly become conical in shape, and we were standing at the base; but the result would be nil when compared with the simple deductions from the inevitable inferences of God's existence. That Freethought has been compelled to go from simplicity to scientific complexity of warfare may be regrettable in one sense; but, as the attacking force, it had to follow the enemy of social progress.

Spiritual religion, the stuff of to-day, has no recognition, or, rather, deliberately neglects the recognition of the ugly in God's earth. It resembles too minutely the problem of evil. There are the same difficulties to be overcome; the same glaring and growling contradictions to be tackled; the same ditches to be traversed; and our spiritualistic pastors like it not.

Often the statement, that God made the evil to teach us to love the good, has been uttered in the pulpit; and the people of the pews were satisfied. But one cannot very well say that God made the ugly to teach us to love the beautiful, and be assured of Christian satisfaction. Not that there is any real difference between the two statements, as statements; but perhaps because the clerical ju-jitsu experts managed to enrobe evil in the garments of purity, fascination, delicacy, loveliness, etc., etc. They contrived to manipulate the existence of evil in a manner absolutely impossible with ugliness. It might be argued reasonably that their very treatment of evil made it more palatable to the delicate Christian constitution, and was, consequently, of great assistance in its fertilisation. Evil became possessed of a theological survival value that ugliness could not possibly contain.

Ugliness never taught anyone to love the beautiful. You can't clothe ugliness in purity, fascination, refinement, and the rest. It was always a blot, always something that repulsed you, something that stirred hatred within you. The theologians cannot adorn ugliness, as they can and do adorn evil. They cannot apologise for its reality with as much fluidity as they use with evil. Ugliness baffles their divine powers of apologetic pleading. Unable to render a well-balanced account of assets and debits on ugliness, and its silent but strong denial of God's existence, the ministerial marionettes completely neglect it; and ugliness, in the quietude of mind that characterises the lover of the beautiful, conquers the idea of God.

Extravagantly it is said that God's earth is full of beauty; but it is strange that you cannot go far afield without witnessing many, very many, examples of the ugly in nature. Let the mind but fall from the peaks it likes to gaze at, and there, at your feet, lies an ugliness that ruins your joy. To endeavor to transform what the mind revolts from into something that urges and forces it again to the heights, giving and sustaining a renewed and more vigorous enjoyment, is but to ask for cynical laughter even from the most bigoted religionist. A Christian, sincere in his beliefs, and with a sensitive appreciation of loveliness in nature, would never be dishonest enough to apologise for the ugliness, saying God created it with the beautiful that we might learn to love the beautiful more and more. It is simply impossible to harmonise the modern idea of God with the ugliness of God's earth. The two ideas cannot exist simultaneously in the mind. Ugliness evicts God from the earth; and if this world is not God's earth, well, perhaps he owns some of the other planets.

Acid Drops.

Florence Nightingale (what a lovely name!) was nominally a Christian, but actually a very unorthodox one. She said that Christ never mentioned what are now called "essential doctrines" of the Christian Church. Not even Dr. Clifford, with his Bible Syllabus for Children, could stand against this brave woman's censure of the lives of Bible Heroes. She wrote this in a letter to Jowett:—

> "The story of Achilles and his horses is far more fit for children than that of Balaam and his ass, which is only fit to be told to asses. The stories of Samson and of Jephthah are only fit to be told to bulldogs; and the story of Bathsheba to be told to Bathshebas. Yet we give all these stories to children as 'Holy Writ.' There are some things in Homer we might better call 'Holy' Writ—many, many in Sophocles and Æschylus. The stories about Andromache and Antigone are worth all the women in the Old Testament put together; nay, almost all the women in the Bible."

Bright little lady! We have said this hundreds of times. It is delightful to learn that Florence Nightingale was saying it too.

Bishop Welldon is at it again. He repeats—without a scrap of additional evidence, or indeed any evidence at all beyond his own uncorroborated assertions—that Christianity is the cause of the "elevation" of woman in Christian countries, though he admits that the said "elevation" has taken nearly two thousand years—as if some natural improvement might not be expected in that long tract of time! In India and China, he says, any advance in the status of woman has been recent, and is due to "contact with Christendom." But is not woman's advance in Christian countries as recent as recent can be? And is not all such recent legislation—as, for instance, the Married Women's Property Act—simply a return to the best days of Roman jurisprudence? Even in the matter of marriage and divorce English women are not yet on the level of the Roman women in the days of Marcus Aurelius. Husbands must be guilty of adultery and cruelty before innocent wives can divorce them. Adultery alone is not sufficient. But it was more than sufficient in Pagan Rome. Marcus Aurelius, in issuing a new decree against adulterous wives, provided that the husbands had shown them an example of fidelity, as it would be infamous to expect a fidelity which the complainants did not display themselves.

Bishop Welldon's reference to India is peculiarly unfortunate. He does not penetrate the veil of manners and customs. A good deal of what is called freedom in England deserves quite another name. Hindu parents certainly do not expose their young daughters to the gross eroticism displayed at what may be called crowding time in the principal streets of our great cities or on the promenades of seaside towns. Much of the seclusion of females in the East is due to affectionate guardianship, and not at all to oppression or contempt. Connubial affection, and reverence for motherhood, are at least as strong in India as they are in England. Architects are divided as to what is the most beautiful building in the world, but many would vote for the famous Taj Mahal at Agra. It was built by Shah Jehan out of love for his wife; a dead woman, but living still in his heart, and to live for centuries after him in a lovely memorial combining all that wealth and art could produce. Bishop Welldon looks round on the chimneys of Manchester, with all that they imply, and rebukes the country that boasts of the Taj Mahal for its want of respect for woman! Agra or Manchester—where would a woman prefer to live? The Jumna or the Irwell—in which river would she like to bathe?

The Bishop of Manchester (Dr. Knox: not to be confused with Bishop Welldon, the Dean of Manchester) has been protesting at a London meeting against the Church Pastoral Aid Society making grants to parishes where the eastward position was observed. This eastward position formed part of the Romeward drift. Is it so? Well, well! We are reminded of a saying of Sydney Smith's—who showed that he understood his "cloth" by referring to the three sexes—men, women, and clergymen. "Puseyism," said that witty parson, "consists of influxion and genuflexion, incense and nonsense, bowing to the East and curtseying to the West, posture and imposture."

Rev. William Edwards, Bangor, Carnarvon, left £4,033. Rev. Edmund Church Brace, St. Paul's Vicarage, Wimbledon, left £3,586. Not very large humps, but enough to keep the camel from threading the needle's eye.

Rev. Robert Chichester, of the Vicarage, Tamworth in Arden, left £4,830. As the landlady of a Southampton hotel said to us when we went down overnight to meet Samuel Putnam from America, "It is all I can make it"—as she finished adding up the bill. £4,830 is not a colossal fortune, but it was all the reverend gentleman could make it.

Mr. Dan Crawford, the African missionary, is lecturing in America, but likes life there as little as he did in England. He is longing to get back to Africa and the blacks. He thinks the life there is more wholesome. We daresay that in some respects this is true. Any way, Mr. Crawford's desire to get back is a commentary upon heroic sufferings described by other missionaries far away from home. The truth is that the vast majority of them have a far better time than they could ever hope for in their own country.

Mr. Percy Illingworth, the chief Liberal Whip, says he has not much patience with people who declare that the Christian faith is losing its hold over the people of these islands. After this we should not be surprised to hear that Mr. Illingworth is disgusted with those who believe that the dodo is extinct, or that Queen Anne is dead. If Mr. Illingworth's insight into the future of the Liberal Party is on all-fours with his expressed knowledge of the position of Christianity in this country, Mr. Asquith would do well to select a new officer. Mr. Illingworth calls himself an optimist. He evidently thinks that is synonymous with declining to recognise a wall, even when he has run his head against it.

Rev. Frank Swainson, Vicar of St. Barnabas, Hollowy, tells a different tale. He has been spending a holiday at Bexhill-on-Sea, and wearing undress uniform. He says:—

> "While dressed in flannels as a layman, and not as a parson, I have had an opportunity of talking to and hearing men. I find that men will talk far more freely to a man if they don't know he is a cleric. So I have been taking the opportunity, and, candidly, I have been shocked at the appalling indifference of men with regard to their souls. The vast majority seem concerned only about the things of the body. They will talk politics, grow enthusiastic over sport, tell questionable yarns, and all that sort of thing; but the moment a man introduces the real essential thing—religion—he is either boycotted or looked upon as daft by the 'man of the world.'"

This is a much more accurate view of the situation. People shun religion because they are not really interested in it. If they were, it would be as much a topic of conversation as anything else. And naturally, when a parson, or a religious crank, goes round, a great many either say nothing against religion, or they profess an interest they do not feel. It is only when the majority of people are off their guard that one gets their real opinions. If the world were suddenly attacked with an epidemic of outspokenness, men like Mr. Illingworth would receive the surprise of their lives.

There is a movement on foot in favor of what is called corporate prayer. Some clerical geniuses amongst the Nonconformists have conceived the idea that if people will only pray in groups some solid good may be achieved. Perhaps it is assumed that God must be approached in the same way as Parliament—by means of a monster petition. The old plan was for each one to pray "on his own," the new method is to inspire a kind of mock belief from the fact of numbers. The psychological point about it is that each one acquires a certain confidence in praying because he sees others around him doing the same thing. That, to some extent, guards the individual from recognising the folly of the practice. Only to some extent, however. The same forces that have broken down faith in individual prayers are still working, and are not likely to be checked by the new move. Collective folly is often easier than individual folly, but the same causes ultimately destroy both.

We are always learning. The Christian Commonwealth has discovered that the agreement between the preachers on "Citizen Sunday" is "significant of the deepening conviction that a spiritual revolution must accompany the swift changes now taking place in the environment." We have no objection to the word "spiritual" if it is taken to mean that considerations—other than those of cash or material—ought to govern human relationships. But that is not what the Christian Commonwealth means. What it means is that religion must accompany social change, and that is pure trade cant. And this is really all the preachers did say, apart from vague generalities with which everybody agrees, and which, therefore, neither helps nor injures anyone. They were agreed in their sermons, naturally, because they are all faced by the same danger—the escape of social affairs from the controlling influence of religion. And they naturally agreed that no social revolution was worth anything that left the clergy out of a job.

Professor Driesch has been in London lecturing on the subject of Vitalism. The Professor is a champion of this scientifically forlorn cause, and mentioned in the course of his lecture that the one man who has done anything of real value on the subject of instinct is Professor Lloyd Morgan. We do not wholly endorse this opinion, although we thoroughly endorse the value of Lloyd Morgan's work. His Habit and Instinct and Comparative Psychology are in every way two fine works. What we want to point out is that Professor Morgan is a thorough-going anti-Vitalist, and one who takes the absolute dependence of vital and mental phenomena on material conditions as an established fact.

Mr. Thomas Pratt, speaking at the Leeds meeting of the National Chamber of Trade, told those present of the unfair competition of the Salvation Army with ordinary traders. The annual turnover of the Salvation Army, in its trading department, was more than £200,000 annually, and Mr. Pratt said that some of the money contributed for spiritual work was turned over to the commercial side. In one year £36,333 of the money collected for religious work was put into the trading concern as capital advanced. He advised traders to refuse contributions to the Army so long as a religious organisation was used for trading purposes.

We are not surprised at Mr. Pratt's indignation, but we were under the impression that the general facts were pretty well known. The Salvation Army is, and has been for years, mainly a trading concern. Most of its so-called charities are run as a business, and its benevolence is mainly exercised in the shape of the voluntary work done by members of local bodies. Its emigration agency is a pure business concern from top to bottom. It yields a handsome profit, although, from the nature of its advertisements, the public are led to believe to the contrary. The one general rule in the Army is, "When a thing doesn't pay, drop it." That is why shelters that are opened are closed when they cease to pay their way. Mr. Manson's book thoroughly exposed the whole concern, and no reply from the Army was ever forthcoming. It would almost seem that a people who can be imposed upon by such an organisation as the Salvation Army are past saving.

Writing of the Ritual Murder trial at Kieff, Russia, the Evening News says "the gross ignorance of the Jewish faith displayed by people who might be supposed at least to have read the Old Testament is nothing short of wonderful." Nonsense! Numbers of people who believe the Bible have never read it. That is usually why they do believe it.

"Respectability in the Churches must go," said Mr. Harry Jeffs at a Brotherhood meeting at the Empire Theatre, Southend-on-Sea. If the worshipers of Mrs. Grundy leave the Churches, the other worshipers will be easily counted.

"If you ask the man in the street to tell you the names of any six pieces of literature which he remembers, it will be safe to wager four are in verse," says the San Francisco News Letter. Unhappily, they might include "There is a Fountain Filled with Blood" or "Snookey Ookums."

In a review in T. P.'s Weekly of a volume of minor verse, it is stated that the new author snatches at the hem of Swinburne's garment, which is frayed by this time. Frayed or not, it will outlast T. P.'s Weekly.

Mr. Stephen Walsh, M.P., denies that the Welsh Colliery disaster was due to a "visitation of God." So do we, but on different grounds. Mr. Walsh says there is no greater blasphemy than to ascribe to God acts that are done by man. Well, but Mr. Walsh believes that there is a God and that he created man, so the difficulty is only moved back a step. Besides, if the evil in life is not a visitation of God, neither is the good, by exactly the same reasoning, and God is ruled out altogether. Mr. Walsh is fond of addressing religious meetings, and so we would bid him remember that if some men were responsible for the disaster, other men risked their lives in the work of rescue. God alone did nothing. And the irony of the situation is that it is not the men whom Mr. Walsh believes were responsible for the disaster, but others who were quite innocent. If these things do not make Mr. Walsh reconsider his religious position, nothing will.

The Rev. F. Dormer Pierce, of Southend-on-Sea, has some quaint notions concerning the Christian God. Speaking at a recent meeting in that town, he said Southend was "a place where men not only took a holiday from work, but a holiday from God as well." We were not aware that the All-Seeing Eye could be dodged in that way.

We don't vouch for it, but the Daily Mail reports that "a woman's gold and ruby ring, a gold brooch, and a man's gold ring have been found in recent collections at Brentwood Parish Church. Brentwood has a flourishing lunatic asylum.

A detestable outrage on George Meredith appeared in the advertisement department of last week's issue of a Socialist contemporary—at the top of the first column of the front page. The Waverley Book Company were offering for sale, on what is now the good old instalment plan, a certain History of English Literature—which is well puffed in the editorial department, in addition to other "Testimony that carries Weight." One would think that the advertisers of such a book would show some respect for English literature themselves. They do not display it, however, in this advertisement, which is started in the following manner:—

> "OUR LANGUAGE AND GLORIOUS LITERATURE.
> "'It was not got by miracle nor rape;
> It is the offspring of the patient year,
> Bequeathed from sire to son.'"

What on earth could such words apply to the English language and English literature? The word "rape" is ludicrously inapplicable in such a matter. And in what sense can a year be "patient"? We might also ask what year is to be singled out for such praise—and why? Why likewise bequeathed? Bequeath is an external word; an innate possession is transmitted. The Waverley Book Company should really explain. Had they hired a literary decorator, and had he consumed too much ginger beer over the task? Or had he attempted something original?

We soon saw what had happened, though we are at a loss to understand how it happened. The lines were reminiscent of a noble passage in George Meredith's "Ode to France" written in 1870:—

> "Lo, strength is of the plain root-virtues born:
> Strength shall ye gain by service, prove in scorn,
> Train by endurance, by devotion shape.
> Strength is not won by miracle or rape.
> It is the offspring of the modest years,
> The gift of sire to son, through those firm laws
> Which we name Gods; which are the righteous cause,
> The cause of man, and manhoods ministers."

Read those fine lines carefully, and again and again, if necessary, until you grasp all their significance and beauty; and then turn back to the abortion in the previous paragraph—and realise an English publisher's respect for English literature. If the History is anything like the advertisement what is it worth?

Mr. Edwin C. Walker has been contributing some interesting articles on "The Old Guard" in the New York Truthseeker. He has mentioned all sorts of Freethinkers on this side of the Atlantic, as well as on the American side. Some mistakes are natural in such a wide review. Here is one:—

> "Edward Truelove, a veteran of the second generation back; by selling the Fruits of Philosophy he precipitated a conflict in which Bradlaugh, springing into the breach in a fight not his personally, overmatched the best professional legal talent of Great Britain and won a victory prodigious in its consequences of good for freedom of speech and publication."

This is all wrong. Bradlaugh sprang into the breach, it is true, but it was in connection with Charles Watts's prosecution—not Edward Truelove's. Watts retired from the defence of the Knowlton pamphlet by pleading guilty and accepting a nominal penalty. Bradlaugh then published the pamphlet himself and challenged another prosecution. He was tried, found guilty, and sentenced to imprisonment; but he succeeded in quashing the indictment on appeal, in consequence of an irregularity which his keen eye detected. Truelove was tried twice on one indictment for publishing Robert Dale Owen's Moral Philosophy, and, in spite of his age, was sentenced to four months' imprisonment. He stood firm, and upon his release was presented with a testimonial and a purse of 200 sovereigns. That was in 1878.

There is a reference to ourselves in Mr. Walker's fina article:—

> "George W. Foote, founder of the Freethinker, and its most able editor, victim of the blasphemy laws, President of the National Secular Society, untiring tractarian."

We suppose that "most able" means "very able" or something of the kind. But it may easily be read otherwise. We take the opportunity, therefore, of stating that the founder of the Freethinker has been its only editor. During his imprisonment Dr. Aveling acted as "interim" editor, and during more recent illnesses the same service has been rendered by Mr. Cohen.

Ingersoll's very clever Christian Catechism, embodying ironically the Presbyterian creed of the famous Rev. Dr. Talmage, is peculiarly clever in its ending. Christianity is represented as the only religion that gives man support and consolation in death. Then comes the question, "What were the last words of Jesus Christ?" And the shattering answer is, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Ingersoll ended at that. Further words would have been an anti-climax.

A few weeks ago we said that we had been turning over again the pages of old Bishop Latimer's sermons. He was a very outspoken preacher, even before nobles and royalty. Had he listened to Ingersoll he would probably have raised an objection as to the truth of a religion being proved by the support and consolation it gives a man in his last hours. In his fourth sermon before Edward the Sixth he oppugns the argument that a man's cause is good because "he seemeth not to fear death." Latimer proceeds as follows:—

> "The Anabaptists that were burnt here in divers towns in England (as I heard of credible men, I saw them not myself) went to their death even intrepide, as ye will say, without any fear in the world, cheerfully. Well, let them go. There was in the old doctors' times another kind of poisoned heretics, that were called Donatists; and these heretics went to their execution, as though they should have gone to some jolly recreation or banquet, to some belly-cheer, or to a play. And will ye argue, then, he goeth to his death boldly or cheerfully, ergo, he dieth in a just cause? Nay, that sequel followeth no more than this: A man seems to be afraid of death, ergo, he dieth evil. And yet our Savior Christ was afraid of death himself."

That is a clincher.

The Soul of a Doll is the alluring title of a book of verse. Souls are cheap to day.

"Thousands of children are damned for life during the first month of their existence," says an ex-police-court missionary. And millions are damned for ever after death, if Christianity be true.

"In the days to come music will be a department of the Government," prophesies Mrs. Katherine Tingley, a Theosophist. We hope that Salvation bands and bagpipes will be kept in their proper places.

Thomas Grant, a laborer, of County Armagh, has just died at the age of 108, and the editors are making headlines in the press about him. At that age Methuselah was still playing marbles.

"We all err, and it seems to me that a parson should err on the side of charity," says the Rev. A. J. Waldron. South London Freethinkers know how the reverend gentleman has followed his own advice.

"Should a Woman Tell?" is the title of Rev. A. J. Waldron's music-hall sketch. It might as well be called "Should a Parson Pry?"

We congratulate the Rev. A. J. Waldron on appearing in the Daily Mail picture gallery with Mlle. Gaby Deslys. According to the letterpress accompanying the block the reverend gentleman and his lady friend have had "some earnest conferences." She has certified his play to "have true Christian qualities." That settles it.

"Henry Smart, the mid-Victorian composer, whose centenary was celebrated yesterday at St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, and many London churches, by the performance of his melodious music, had a fantastic hatred of 'Gregorianism.' This was partly for æsthetic reasons, but partly based, also, on religious grounds, for Smart, unlike most musicians, was an extreme Low Churchman. To a High Churchman who championed the cause of Gregorian chants he exclaimed, 'God will some day rain fiery crotchets upon your heads, and prevent you from ever again chanting your Gregorian groans.' Reminded that Gregorian tones are ancient Oriental music such as David probably played before Saul, he replied, 'Ah, now I can quite understand why Saul threw that javelin at David.'"—Daily Chronicle.

The Wesley Bible Union has been formed to oppose the "heretical" movement in Wesleyanism represented by the Rev. G. Jackson, the now famous professor at Didsbury College. Sir William Smith is the president, and the Rev. W. Spiers, of Hayward's Heath, the secretary, of this new Society. They and their supporters declare that nothing but loss and trouble comes from deserting "the doctrines formulated by Wesley." They are specially indignant at "advanced interpretations of Scripture." They appear to be proud of having nothing "advanced" about them. We wish them all the success they deserve.

The Dean of Rochester complains that the fifth commandment is turned upside down nowadays, and reads "Honor thy sons and thy daughters." Perhaps the charge is going a bit too far, but it was time that some change took place, especially in religious households. We hope the Dean of Rochester will get over it.

Mr. Asquith says that his old chief, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, was a humorist, and adduces this as a sample:—

> "It was said that on the occasion of an election here Sir Henry was met in the street by a voter who came up to him and said, 'Sir Henry, I like you very much, but I would rather vote for the devil.' (Laughter.) Sir Henry at once replied, without turning a hair, 'As your friend is not a candidate you might just as well vote for me.' (Laughter and cheers.)"

How the thing is specialised! It was "here" and Sir Henry replied "without turning a hair." Somebody must have been pulling Mr. Asquith's leg. The story is far older than Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. It belongs to the John Wilkes budget. It has often been stolen and always spoiled in the stealing. Wilkes was a real wit—and the author of much wit in other men. And this devil story fits him to a t. We all know what his reputation was, and the voter's exclamation was not unnatural; but who would even think of talking in that way to the harmless necessary Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman? It takes a really dramatic narrator to tell the story, and that by word of mouth, for intonations are not printable. Wilkes's reply was swift and pointed. When the voter he was canvassing expressed a readiness to vote for the devil rather than for him, Wilkes replied "Yes, but in case your friend doesn't stand?" Only the human voice could do that full justice.

Mr. G. B. Shaw raised laughter at the Bradlaugh Dinner by stating that his next public engagement was at the City Temple. He addressed a "crowded congregation" there on October 31. Some of our readers will be interested in the following report which we take from the next morning's Daily Chronicle:—

> "Mr. G. Bernard Shaw informed a crowded congregation at the City Temple, representing the City Temple Literary Society, last night, that Christianity came to an end with the Crucifixion.
> "For that reason 'Christian Economics,' the subject of his lecture, did not concern them unless they had made up their mind to reintroduce Christianity into the world and into this country. At present all our institutions were deliberately organised for the prevention of Christianity. Was it worth while to undo the Crucifixion, to take up the tradition of Christianity again and see what we could do with it?
> "If we did, he recognised three main things to which we should stand committed as Christians. We should have to give up revenge and punishment completely and entirely: we should have to scrap the entire judicial and criminal system. We should have to stop putting people in prison, we should have to stop scolding and complaining and writing to the Times.
> "Then we should have to take, in a sense, no thought for the morrow—which would necessitate communism. And last, we should have to adopt the doctrine which was called the immanence of God, and believe that there was a divine spark in man.
> "But the only one of those doctrines which touched Christian economics, remarked Mr. Shaw, was that we should take no thought for the morrow. The weak point in communism was that it did not give the consumer any control over production. Therefore everybody must have an income, and naturally everybody must have an exactly equal income. What we had at present was not a distribution of income but absolute plunder. And in a Christian State, when a man was regarded as a bit of God, and his value was infinite, we could not buy him and sell him as we did now."

Laughter was also caused at the Bradlaugh Dinner by Mr. Foote's observing that if Mr. Campbell were to tire of his job Mr. Shaw might prove a competent successor. Mr. Foote's observation seems still more pertinent now.

Churches and chapels suffered severely during the late disastrous storm in South Wales. "Providence" doesn't recognise—certainly it doesn't spare—its own buildings on these occasions.

"Society is like a gigantic fat man troubled with all kinds of maladies and diseases in all parts of his enormous person." the Bishop of Oxford tells us. Just so. And Oxford mixture will not cure the complaints.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

December 7 and 14, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £241 11s. 11d. Received since :—N. Gould (S. Africa), £1 ; T. W. Key (S. Africa), £1 ; W. Fitzgerald, 10s. ; W. Dodd, 10s.

E. JACKSON asks for proofs of Mr. Lloyd's statement that Christ is "fully as mythical as Osiris, Adonis, Attis or Mithra, after whom he was modelled." We may save Mr. Lloyd some trouble by pointing our correspondent to two books—though we could point him to twenty : Frazer's Golden Bough and Robertson's Pagan Christs.

E. B.—Thanks for welcome cuttings.

GREEVZ FISHER.—You are mistaken. We didn't object to Mr. Shaw's fun. We enjoyed it and said so at the time. What we objected to was his bad arguments. We have done that before, and may do it again. If he replies to us our columns are at his service. But we cannot accept a proxy in such matters ; as, on second thoughts, you may perceive.

T. W. KEY AND N. GOULD, two South African subscribers, regret that the President's Honorarium Fund progresses so slowly (when they wrote) and hope to see it rally before the year is out.

TOM TAYLOR.—Much obliged for the book, and delighted to hear from one who has never missed a copy of the Freethinker from the first issue.

W. FITZGERALD.—Glad you still find this journal stimulating after all those years.

A. H. SMITH.—Mr. Foote is keeping fairly well, but wishes he could sleep better.

M. E. PROG.—We have strained a point for Mr. Lloyd's sake. How often we have printed that Tuesday is too late for paragraphs !

W. DODD.—We wish all were as considerate.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid :—One year, 10s. 6d. ; half year, 5s. 3d. ; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

London "saints" are reminded of Mr. Foote's two Sunday evening lectures at the Queen's (Minor) Hall (Dec. 7 and 14). Subjects will appear hereafter.

Mr. Lloyd had a large audience at the King's Hall, Birmingham, on Sunday evening. He lectures twice to-day (Nov. 9) at the Secular Hall, Rusholme-road, Manchester. District "saints" will please note.

We are asked from time to time for the addresses of contributors to our columns. The only reply we can make is a general one. It is against journalistic etiquette to do anything of the kind. Letters addressed to a contributor at our office will, of course, be forwarded to him. The rest is no concern of ours.

The Edinburgh magistrates issued a proclamation prohibiting open-air meetings at the Mound, an open-air space off Prince's-street adjoining the National Gallery, unless permits from the magistrates were obtained. They were resisted by Mr. John M'Ara, who was supported by a public committee, and the Courts declared that the proclamation was illegal in itself and that it was unconstitutional, in any case, to discriminate as to who should and who should not hold public meetings at given places. The latest news is that the magistrates have agreed to pay the pursuer £200 damages, while reserving his right to get his conviction for breach of the proclamation set aside by the High Court. Another lesson in the wisdom of defying local despots, who are generally local bigots.

It is worth paying a shilling for the November English Review if only to see the last of the book-reviews for the month appearing in such a publication. Not, of course, that there is nothing else worth paying for. Both the editor and the sub-editor come out—or should it be come in ?—well this month ; the former's "Editorial Amenities" being very amusing, and, alas, in some respects, only too true. There are some outspoken things in a Layman's article on the Church Congress. Aleister Crowley is just as outspoken on "Art in America." There is a sentence at the bottom of p. 587 which shows that Mr. Crowley has not forgotten the ignominious part that a certain Agnostic played in the Boulter case. All the worshipers of the late Mr. W. T. Stead will resent the estimate of his favorite poet, James Russell Lowell. They will think it little, if anything, short of blasphemy—or even that final blasphemy which is never forgiven, either in this world or in the next. Perhaps the most interesting thing in this number of the English Review is a small batch of "Letters on Napoleon's Last Days." They were written by Dr. Shortt and his wife at St. Helena. The English physician was not allowed to treat or see Napoleon, but he attended the autopsy, and he certifies that, while all the rest of the body was sound, the stomach was "a perfect mass of disease from cancer." "In death," Dr. Shortt says, "his countenance was the finest I ever saw, expressing the greatest softness and placidity that can be imagined." Dr. Shortt saw him immediately after he expired, before any material alteration could have taken place. We ought not to close without mentioning Mr. Israel Zangwill's article on "The Militant Suffragists." He seems to think that Mr. Asquith is much to blame, and deserves any sort of treatment—including, we suppose, dog-whips and cayenne pepper.

Mr. F. S. Marvin, in the November Positivist Review, replies briefly but admirably to Professor Murray's curious criticism of the former's book The Living Past, especially in relation to Shakespeare. Mr. Marvin is not at all angry at being classed as a Shakespeare "idolator." He smiles very cheerfully and takes it as rather a compliment.

The Pioneer Press has come into possession of a parcel of an old pamphlet by Charles Bradlaugh, which deals with "The Compulsory Cultivation of Land." Many of his admirers will be pleased to see how much he anticipated Mr. Lloyd George in the matter of Land Reform. The price is threepence, with a halfpenny extra for postage ; and orders should be sent direct to the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.

THE MIDNIGHT VISITOR.

Whose steps are those ? Who comes so late ?
Let me come in, the door unlock.
'Tis midnight now ; my lonely gate
I open to no stranger's knock.

Who art thou ? Speak ? Men call me Fame ;
To immortality I lead.
Pass, idle phantom of a name.
Listen again, and now take heed ;

'Twas false. My names are Song, Love, Art.
My poet, now unbar the door.
Art's dead, Song cannot touch my heart,
My once love's name I chant no more.

Open then now, for, see, I stand,
Riches my name, with endless gold,
Gold, and your wish in either hand.
Too late—my youth you still withhold.

Then if it must be, since the door
Stands shut, my last true name to know,
Men call me death. Delay no more ;
I bring the cure of every woe.

The door flies wide. Ah, guest so wan,
Forgive the poor place where I dwell ;
An ice cold hearth, a hearth-sick man,
Stand here to welcome thee full well.

Free-Will and Necessity.—II.

(Concluded from p. 700.)

WITH these facts and reflections in mind, let us examine the doctrine of free-will. What does this doctrine mean? How far does it extend? If it be asserted that the Will is fully or absolutely free, facts and arguments abound to show that this is a fallacy. A man cannot will or wish that of which he has no knowledge. The child's wishes cannot be so numerous as those of the man, for his knowledge and capacities are so very circumscribed. Nor can the mere savage feel the same range of desires as the civilised man. The former, no doubt, longs for his dinner, and devours it with as keen a relish as the latter; but is it possible the savage can wish or will the same variety, styles of cookery, the service, surroundings, elegance, the caprice, it may be, as the civilised epicure? He can have no conception of such adjuncts to a dinner. Here the Will can be free only to the extent of knowledge and taste possessed; and so in a thousand other cases that might be instanced. Civilisation and culture vastly extend the play of the Will; whether they render it more free, is quite another question.

But what is Will? Is there not a pitfall in the word? Some people seem almost to personify it, or else to treat it as a member, an organ, or a special faculty of the individual. To me it seems the Will is no more a part of man's constitution, mental or physical, than his seeing, walking, or thinking. When we walk, see, taste, sleep, think, it is not any particular part of us that does it; it is the person as a whole. No doubt we use our legs to walk and eyes to see; but it is the individual that walks and sees. The Will is not a part of us; it is merely a state or condition we are in, a mental act, a desire, a wish, a purpose, a resolve. What more it can be I know not. I have no doubt that all the mystification thrown around the subject by metaphysicians has risen from theological bias; they have, for the most part, endeavored to harmonise man with moral government conducted by means of rewards and punishments, and so have corrupted the philosophy of Willing in favor of essential barbarity admitted into the government of mankind. The moment theology is dispensed with and the Will is examined apart from all bias, the truth appears. The Will in its highest phases is nothing more than the best and highest wish we have, developed into resolve or determination—if, indeed, wish and will can be separated or distinguished, even so far as that.

We cannot help wishing whatever our nature, circumstances, and sentiments incline us to. But our wishes are many, our wants and desires often clash one with another; present pleasures compete with more lasting ones in the future. Often there is a struggle between our desires, a wild and passionate turmoil, and each in turn gains a temporary victory; till one is decidedly conqueror we must be passive. Some men spend years in suspense, their desires all the while struggling in a drawn and wearisome battle. If men possessed Wills that could decide offhand, they would never submit to suspense of this sort; they would finish the quarrel and act in a prompt and ready manner. No doubt, in this respect, men immensely differ from each other; though everyone must have experienced the conflict of opposing desires, and the suspense, more or less severe and continued, to which I refer.

Now, in a battle of this sort, what decides the issue? Not the Will, for a whole host of Wills or wishes are often struggling together. A judicious man will reflect, weigh, balance the pros and cons as best he can, and, as popular language puts it, decide or resolve upon a certain course. Like an honest and enlightened jury, his verdict goes with the strongest evidence. As in physics, so in morals, the greater force always conquers or sways the less. You cannot conceive of a pound weighing as much as two pounds, or of a steam-engine of 1,000 horse power having the force of one of 5,000. So in morals, we cannot act without motives; the motives we can neither create, shape, destroy, nor resist; in every case the strongest motive sways us and bears us on to the commission of crime or the performance of a virtuous deed. Sometimes the prevailing motive is so strong, or its counter-agents so few or weak, that the person rushes to the deed with the force of a stone falling to the ground; at others, the motives are so evenly balanced that the stronger but just wins the day, and the individual goes to his deed (good or bad) slowly, with reluctance, with "almost half a mind" not to go at all.

The subject of motives is an immense one, and as intricate as extensive. The motive which weighs with one man and decides him, will scarcely, or not at all, move another; the motive that hurls a youth into action with a bound fails to stir him when he is an old man. The sight of distress does not move the miser—it opens the heart and the purse of the philanthropist; the vision of a beautiful female face throws a youth into a fever of excitement, rouses all the chivalry of his nature—it does not affect the old man; a gorgeous landscape fills the poet with ecstatic musings, and the Will to linger in view of it—the merely business man regards it from the £ s. d. point of view, and wishes it his own for the wealth it would bring. Yet in one respect we are all alike, for throughout life we are the sport of motives which we never made; if we escape from one it is to fall a prey to another. We can no more escape these motives than we can jump off the earth into some other planet; they dominate us from cradle to grave; their tyranny is unbroken, unrelaxing. We are no more free to leave our natural path through life than a planet is to escape from the gravitating force of the sun. Our life is decided for us by our antecedents, constitution, education, and surroundings. Could all the elements that enter into our life be sifted out, fully estimated in all their complexity, the mathematician might predict our whole future course as correctly as that of a planet. Even as it is, we can often form more than a happy guess of the actions of one we well know in new circumstances. We know what motives are most likely to sway him, and to what extent; we know what motives the new conditions will supply, and hence the predictions we venture to utter.

If this doctrine be true, says the orthodox, it is fatal to morality. So much the worse for morality, then. Nothing can be good which is not founded on truth. Morality founded on false motives is not the sort we want. If necessity be true, and that it is "all nature cries aloud through all her works," morality must be adjusted to that truth, not that truth to a false morality. Do we not find the solution of the difficulty in the doctrine of reaction? Every planet is whirled round in its orbit by the superior force of the giant sun; but the very smallest planet sways the sun to some extent. In chemistry also, and throughout nature, every action is attended by a reaction; influence and counter-influence run through the universe and through society. "No man liveth unto himself; no man dieth unto himself." Each unit is a necessary phenomenon, but so are his neighbors; we are all, in the main, swayed by the same leading motives; hence we act and react upon each other incessantly. We are all struggling for the same goal—happiness—the minimum of pain, the maximum of pleasure; the mass, or society, forms a stream or river; the units must go the general way, they must adjust themselves to their surroundings; but in doing this they move more or less their nearest fellows; those who cannot adjust themselves must be got rid of in some way, not from revenge, but from necessity. Necessity is everywhere; it compels most people to live as their neighbors do; it compels society to check, or expel, or destroy, those who injure it or endanger its interests. In society, man is played upon by a host of motives; by education he learns to play them off one against the other; habit, self-interest, respect for others, self-respect, love, hatred, likes, dislikes, hopes, and fears, all tend to mould his character and develop his nature. The bad man is he who shows little or no regard for others, who seeks his own pleasure at the unfair cost and expense of his neighbors; the good man is he who seeks his own happiness conjointly with that of others. The true type of social man is he who enjoys life and does the least harm to his neighbors, but the utmost good in his power; and that society is the best and most enlightened which can prevent the evil of the vicious by the infliction of the least possible pain; that can reclaim and utilise the worst of characters; and, above all, that can prevent crime, by educating and training the young, and by preventing gigantic monopolies in the few and the consequent poverty in the many.

In a word, when we regard necessity as swaying all equally, we shall perceive that so far from destroying morality, it tends to increase and establish it, by giving us the certainty that a wrong once done can never be undone, never atoned for, never expiated; and therefore must be prevented by all the motives that can be focussed upon those likely to commit it. The doctrine also shows us the folly of driving young criminals more deeply into crime by mere punishment, instead of teaching and encouraging them to do better for the future. When once the true doctrine of motives has been fully mastered, society and reformers will do their utmost to place the best motives before the young, so as to induce them, independently of priestly threats and Tory oppression, to do what is right. When this has been properly done, the system of bribery and intimidation, which goes under the names of rewards and punishments, may be laid aside.

Necessity does not destroy the Will, it creates it; for in every case a man wills or wishes in the direction of the strongest motive. The only freedom we can rationally hope for is exemption from ghostly and political tyranny; and that is enough. That freedom can be won only by the spread of education and enlightenment; so that each man may freely understand both his rights and his duties.

JOSEPH SYMES.

Pioneers of Physiology.

THE intellectual unrest which led to the Protestant Reformation in Northern Europe manifested itself in more important ways. The outcome of the revival of learning, and the broadened human outlook which resulted, among other things, from geographical discovery, widened acquaintance with alien races and religions, and economic and commercial development; the revolt from Rome was accompanied by the re-birth of the spirit of inquiry into nature's secrets, which had for centuries languished under the iron hand of sacerdotal despotism.

The middle of the sixteenth century may be regarded as one of the most brilliant periods in the annals of the human race. The reign of Charles V. was nearing its end. Venice still proudly bore every outward appearance of splendor and prosperity, if internal decay had already set in. The Medici were reestablished at Florence, and that very remarkable monarch, Henry VIII., occupied the English throne. Twenty years had fled since the able, if cruel, Cortez had commenced the ruin of Mexico; Pizarro's later adventures had laid low the civilisation of Peru, and Europe was enjoying the proceeds of the plundered lands of the West.

Martin Luther was declining towards the grave; Calvin's baleful sceptre was in Geneva supreme; the Society of Jesus was come to check the heresies which abounded; the Inquisition was doing devil's work in Spain. Michael Angelo yet lived, and Titian's art was at the height of its glory. The old seats of learning were being humanised despite themselves, and new universities were everywhere arising. The study of Greek literature became fashionable; the printing presses of Venice and other cities were spreading books in every direction. The mighty Copernicus had prepared the way for the coming revolution of our concepts of the universe; the dirt and darkness of the Middle Ages disappeared in the dawn period of modern times.

In 1543 a Basel printer sent forth to the world a folio volume dealing with the structure of the human body, the work of one Andreas Vesalius. The publication of this book marks an epoch in the history of anatomy, as also in that of physiology and medicine. Under the benumbing hand of the Church, all inquiry had been stifled for a thousand years. The pioneer work of the ancients, when stamped with the authority of sacerdotalism, became the be-all and end-all of science. Woe was usually the lot of the man who dared to dissent from the dogmas to which the Church lent her countenance:—

> "As spiritual truths were learned from the study of the revealed word, so anatomical and medical truths were to be sought for, not by looking directly into the body of man, not by observing and thinking over the phenomena of disease, but by studying what had been revealed in the writings of Hippocrates and Galen. As the Holy Scriptures were the Bible for all men, so the works of the Greek and Latin writers became the bible for the anatomist and the doctor. Truth and science came to mean simply that which was written, and inquiry became mere interpretation."*

Against this state of things the mind of Vesalius arose in revolt. He dissected the human body, and described, not what he found in Galen, but what his own dissections disclosed. He placed fact above authority, never hesitated to point out where Galen was mistaken, although he insisted that the Roman physician must be followed when correct in his conclusions, for the very excellent reason that his conclusions were in harmony with demonstrable truth.

Vesalius' path was prepared by his few predecessors who had dared to depart with fear and trembling from the beaten track. In the fourteenth century, Mundinus risked the censure of the Church when he dissected the human corpse; but her power, as yet unshaken, was directed towards the prevention of the sacrilegious use of the anatomist's scalpel. As a result, Mundinus found no one venturesome enough to continue his work. In the sixteenth century, however, the Church had declined in power, and Carpi, another Italian, resumed the studies of the earlier anatomist. But his peace was of short duration; he was compelled to leave Bologna, which was the centre of his teaching, and live in a state of exile in Ferrara.

The next anatomist of importance was the celebrated Sylvius, and from him Vesalius received his first anatomical instruction. The young Vesalius, while quite a boy, had taken the keenest interest in dissection, and had seized every available opportunity to examine the structure of such animals as came his way. Although Sylvius was an anatomist of standing—the fissure of Sylvius being named in his honor—he was wedded to the old traditions in too great a degree for the liking of Vesalius. When the bodies of men and other animals were shown to the students, the barber servants clumsily dissected the corpses in a manner which excited the contempt of the newcomer. Possibly Vesalius thought it was the duty of the Professor to carry out the dissections himself. In any case,—

> "At the third dissection at which he was present, he, already well versed in the anatomy of the dog, irritated beyond control at the rude handling of the ignorant barbers, pushing them on one side, completed the dissection in the way he knew it ought to be done."

Besides attending the lectures of Sylvius, Vesalius became a pupil of Günther, but neither of these was able to afford him the opportunity of making a thorough dissection of the human body. It was only on rare occasions that a human corpse was exposed to the view of students. The great majority of the bodies shown were those of the lower animals. All that was then available for the study of human anatomy was a hurried, and sometimes secret, examination of the remains of a patient who had succumbed to disease.

Resurrection-men existed long before the time of Jerry Cruncher, and it was not supremely difficult even in the sixteenth century to gather up a skeleton in the burial-grounds of Paris. In many of the cemeteries the bones of the unhonored dead lay scattered about in all directions. Just as Hamlet meditated over the skull in the Elsinore graveyard, so Vesalius spent many days in studying the bones he picked up in the burial-ground adjoining the Church of the Innocents at Paris. And he has recorded how, in another graveyard, "he and a fellow-student nearly left their own bones, being on one occasion attacked and in great risk of being devoured by savage, hungry dogs, who had come there in search of bones." By such dangerous and awkward means the undaunted Vesalius collected the materials for a work which contains a full and accurate description of the human skeleton.

The wars which then raged drove Vesalius from Paris to Louvain, where he continued his anatomical researches with unflagging zeal. Leaving Louvain, he proceeded to Venice, where he crossed the path of one who bore the sinister name of Ignatius Loyola. Vesalius was a student, and Loyola was a monk, at the Hospital at Venice.

> "One was gathering a rich harvest of exact knowledge which six years later he was to embody and give to the world in a great book, the beginning of biologic science. The other was busy with a scheme for the spiritual welfare of mankind, which six years later took shape in the order of the Jesuits. The one with his eyes fixed on man's body brought forth a work the fruits of which have profoundly influenced, and are still profoundly influencing, men's minds. The other, with his eyes fixed only on truth and goodness, began that which, after him, became the incarnation of Authority; an engine powerful, it is true, for good, but often used for the support of lies and for the maintenance of evil."

In the Venetian republic Vesalius was free from molestation, as its enlightened rulers were not overburdened with orthodoxy. The young anatomist—he was only twenty-two—was in 1537 appointed to the Medical chair in the Venetian University of Padua, to which was subsequently added the professorship of Surgery with the care of Anatomy. Vesalius conducted his own demonstrations before the students with signal success, and his anatomical lectures were addressed to crowded and enthusiastic audiences. There were many difficulties in obtaining the materials he employed in his ocular demonstrations of anatomical truth. Vesalius therefore petitioned all the doctors to permit him to study the bodies of their fatal cases. He approached the judges for the purpose of employing the corpses of condemned criminals in his public dissections. Other methods were sometimes adopted, as the following curious episode proves. He himself has told us how, "learning of the death and hurried burial of the concubine of a monk, he got possession of the body, and proceeded at once to remove the whole of the skin, in order that the peccant holy man, who had got wind of the matter, might be unable to recognise his lost love."

It was only in the Freethinking Republic of Venice that such knowledge as that obtained by Vesalius was possible. Wherever the Church's power was unimpaired, every hindrance was offered to the advance of physiological and anatomical science. The strange devices to which Vesalius was compelled to resort become perfectly explicable when that circumstance is borne in mind. As a result of five years' unwearied toil, at the early age of twenty-eight, Vesalius, in 1543, brought forth his great work on the Structure of the Human Body. This work laid the foundations of modern morphology and modern physiology; and although Vesalius made no personal contributions of importance to the latter science, he made smoother the paths of the physiological pioneers who succeeded him. It was no mean task to convince the world that the old anatomical methods were wrong, and that the only rational way of determining the structure and functions of the living organisms was to abandon the truth of authority and to embrace the authority of truth. Vesalius insisted that a knowledge of the architecture of the animal frame was a necessary prelude to any real acquaintance with the activities of the living creature. Moreover, an understanding of the structure of the skeleton was by him regarded as the only real safeguard against physiological error.

Having reconstructed and reformed the science of human anatomy, Vesalius might, in a better world than ours, have entered into his just reward. But the crown of the reformer is ever the crown of thorns. While he was preparing his work for the press, some of his friends tried to persuade him not to publish it; they said that its appearance would ruin its author's career. And to some extent it did. After the completion of his book, Vesalius left Padua, with the consent of the senate, for the space of a year, his pupil, Realdus Columbus, becoming his temporary successor. With the appearance of his book arose a howl of anger. The powerful Sylvius and others stormed against him, "reviling him in a free flow of adjectives." Returning to Padua, Vesalius found his views unpopular even there; his pupil Columbus had deserted him, and gone over to the enemy. He vindicated the truth of his teachings in lectures at Padua, and asked his opponents to witness the evidences of his discoveries in the dissecting theatre itself. At Pisa, where the great Cosimo de' Medici of Florence was creating a University, Vesalius might have been installed as professor. But the friendliness of the Florentine ruler was insufficient to overcome the feelings of bitterness engendered by the bigoted conduct of the old-fashioned professors. The mighty work which Vesalius had built up with such infinite pains was treated as the product of a blasphemer's brain. Mortified beyond measure, the great anatomist consigned to the flames manuscripts of various kinds containing invaluable records of his observations and thoughts; and the Emperor Charles V. requesting him to accept the post of Court Physician, he turned his back on the University which he had adorned by his presence, and brought his brilliant scientific career to a premature close.

The remainder of Vesalius' life proved comparatively uneventful. When Charles V. sought repose in a cloister, the services of Vesalius were transferred to his son. But in the Spain of Philip II. the pursuit of science was impossible. As Sir Michael Foster truly says:—

> "The hand of the Church was heavy on the land; the dagger of the Inquisition was stabbing at all mental life, and its torch was a sterilising flame, sweeping over all intellectual activity. The pursuit of natural knowledge had become a crime, and to search with the scalpel into the secrets of the body of man was accounted sacrilege. It was for a life in priest-ridden, ignorant, superstitious Madrid that Vesalius had forsaken the freedom of the Venetian Republic and the bright academic circles of Padua."

In the withering atmosphere of Madrid, Vesalius cast many a wistful glance towards Italy. His old affection was deeply stirred when the anatomical writings of Falloppius, who now occupied Vesalius' former chair at Padua, came into his hands. Becoming more and more dissatisfied with his unproductive court life, he made a journey to the East for the purpose of escaping it. At this period Falloppius died, and Vesalius received an invitation, if we may trust to traditional statements, to return to the scene of his Paduan labors. But, on his return voyage from the East, he was seized with a serious illness, and died on the island of Zante in 1564.

Religion and Morality.—II.

THESE are real services; but, to say nothing of its anti-human and anti-social doctrines, they should not make us forget the frightful tyranny with which the religion of Jesus has burdened both spirit and body. The ancient world—above all, the Roman Empire, with its incongruous Pantheon—practised religious toleration until the day when Christianity came to sap the political constitution itself. The Christians had then their martyrs, and those martyrs were worthy of admiration. Nothing is finer than self-sacrifice for what is believed to be the truth. But the persecuted were scarcely in power before they surpassed their persecutors in cruelty. The rites of Pagan worship became high treason, which the Theodosian code unhesitatingly visited with capital punishment; the temples, even the finest, were demolished, and the idols destroyed. The Church haughtily arrogated the right of persecution, and used it largely from Constantine and Theodosius to the threshold of contemporary history.....

Here I end my exposition. As usual, I have let the facts speak for themselves. They are eloquent, and tell us loudly enough the good and evil that religions have done to morality. Doubtless they have contributed to tame man's evil passions, by adding to the curb of laws that of religious cruelty; but their special share consists above all, as we are coming to see, in a deviation of the moral sense. Religious morality does not test the value of actions according to their social utility, but according to priestly fancy or the apprehension of a beyond. In its eyes, to eat forbidden food is as grave, if not more so, as to commit a murder; asceticism is, in certain religions, the supreme virtue. Lastly, when morality becomes divine, not only is it regarded as immutable and beyond improvement, but a right is claimed to impose it, if necessary, by fire and sword.

In this last respect the palm belongs beyond question to Christianity. Without doubt she has had her martyrs, but she has made many more; glorifying her own, vilifying others, and thus habituating men to the idea that they should be ready to give their life for her faith. The teaching has its value, but not that of the seas of blood it has cost.....To resume, what arises above all from our inquiry is that we should not ask religious conceptions to regulate conduct. Amongst the gods of the great religions those of Epicurus have alone been wise. Their great business was to relish their nectar; they ignored the human animalculæ. But the other gods have been pesterers and despots; they have meddled at random with our affairs; and in the interest of social progress we should remind them that their kingdom is not of this world, and exclude them from it.

ATTACKING THE BIBLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Will you kindly give this letter room in your magazine? I am not a regular reader of the Freethinker, but a friend lent me a copy and I was much interested in your article "Bible Blunders." I agree most heartily with many of the things you say; we Christian Freethinkers are trying to say the same Sunday by Sunday, and we are with you absolutely in your work of smashing the old mechanical notion of "inspiration" in favor of something more natural and spiritual. Your words, "No one can be assured that God has spoken unless God speaks to him individually," and "Revelation must always be personal," are splendidly true. External authority, whether of Bible or Church, is no authority at all unless ratified by our own consciousness. Conscience is the only authority, the value of the Bible lies in the fact that so much in it appeals to our conscience.

The sentence in your article with which I cannot agree is the following: "Freethought must keep on attacking the Bible." Surely not? Is not your meaning rather this: "We must keep on attacking worn-out views about the Bible"? Because a few fanatics have made a fetish of the world's greatest book, are we therefore to tear it in pieces as an imposture? No; rather as true Freethinkers to separate the kernel from the husk, to destroy Bibliolatry but not the Bible, and so set it up once again in its true greatness, as a book like other books, the greatest and most useful of them all. All of us, Sir, are liable to prejudice one way or the other, but we must overcome it, as it is as culpable on our part as on that of the ignorant Bible-worshiper. We are out for truth and nothing else, you in the press and we in the pulpit, and may the spirit of truth guide us into all truth.

With many thanks to you for allowing me to express myself in your pages.

A CHRISTIAN FREETHINKER.

[This correspondent is a bona-fide clergyman of the Church of England, and there is a ring of sincerity in his letter. When the Bible is treated like other books our quarrel with it will be at an end. Meanwhile it occupies a false and usurped position, and we must continue our efforts to bring it down on what Thomas Paine called the democratic floor. Of course we don't want to destroy the Bible as a book; we want to destroy it as the Book of God.—EDITOR.]

National Secular Society.

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON OCT. 30

The President, Mr. G. W. Foote, in the chair. There were also present:—Messrs. Baker, Barry, Cohen, Cowell, Cunningham, Davey, Judge, Lazarnick, Neate, Nichols, Quinton, Roger, Rosetti, Samuels, Shore, Silverstein, Thurlow, and Miss Kough.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed.

The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were admitted for the Preston and West Ham Branches.

The action of Mr. J. W. Gott in connection with the unauthorised use of the Society's name was again discussed, and no reply having been received from Mr. Gott to the Executive's resolution, the following was carried unanimously:—

> "That, as Mr. Gott has not thought fit to reply to the Executive's letter of remonstrance as to the abuse of the Society's name, and has driven incivility to the point of insolence in refusing to send the Executive a direct answer to their request for an undertaking that he desist from the same, it is hereby resolved that his membership shall not be renewed at the expiration of the current year."

The recent prosecution at Bolton and its result was reported.

The Annual Dinner was discussed, and the Secretary instructed to arrange for the 1914 Dinner to be held on a day other than Tuesday, to enable provincial members to take advantage of the mid-week railway excursions to London.

E. M. VANCE, Secretary.

All the world over, savages and semi-civilised people are in the habit of sacrificing human victims, whose bodies are buried in the field with the seed of corn, or other bread stuffs. Often enough the victim's blood is mixed with grain in order to fertilise it. The most famous instance is that of the Khonds of Orissa, who chose special victims, known as Meriahs, and offered them up to ensure good harvests. The Meriah was often kept years before being sacrificed. He was regarded as a consecrated being, and treated with extreme affection, mingled with deference.—Grant Allen.

Obituary.

On Sunday, October 26, one of the old Secular brigade passed away in his eighty-fifth year. Our late friend, Mr. J. E. Schofield, of Oldham, had been a reader of the National Reformer in former days and continued a reader of it so long as it was issued. He afterwards took up with the Freethinker, and has purchased and read that journal up to the end. Mr. Pegg, of Manchester, kindly undertook the last offices in connection with his interment by giving a suitable rendering of Austin Holyoake's Secular Burial Service, which was well received by the relatives and friends at the graveside.—J. E. BROADBENT.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Half measures are always dangerous.—NAPOLEON.

The Revival of Faith.

WHEN Artemus Ward was asked to address a gathering of young men on "Science," he readily agreed, because, he said, he knew nothing whatever about the subject. And knowing nothing, he could "expatiate" with the utmost freedom. He knew of no facts that could get in his way, and so limit his oratorical flights; all he had to do was to talk, and talking was part of his professional duty. Next to talking on a subject of which one knows nothing, the next easiest thing is to talk about the future—not the immediate future, but a future that is a good convenient distance ahead. If it is far enough away, no one can contradict with authority; and if anyone does so, there are always plenty who will be in agreement with the "Futurist." Nature has thoughtfully provided fools enough, for there always appears to be enough on hand to provide a comfortable community. And if the future talked about has to do with another life and another world, the game is easier still. You may rest quite assured that you are as well informed on the topic as anyone; and with knowledge at a minimum, credulity always soars sky-high.

Almost, but not quite, of the same character is the current cant about the revival of faith. Here some few facts are available, but they are of the slenderest possible character. Every time a professional revivalist visits a neighborhood, and ropes in all revivalistic debauchees in the neighborhood, a great revival of faith is reported. If a clerical congress is held, the parsons present—drunk with their own eloquence, and bored with that of their fellow-speakers—report a great awakening of religion. Professional evangelists of the Gipsy Smith type send to the papers accounts of the number of souls saved—much like a Red Indian "brave" exhibiting the scalps of his victims; and once again religion is on the boom. Like a petrol engine, religion seems wholly dependent upon a series of explosions, although it differs from the machine in not getting any "forrader." When the explosion is done, religion is, at best, where it was, and at worst has progressed backward.

"J. B.," of the Christian World, discovers indications of a revival of religion in the fact that William Watson, in a recent sonnet, expresses his profound gratitude that he has recovered his faith in God. Not having read the sonnet, I can't say how far this description is justified; but if Mr. Watson is grateful for the recovery of his faith, no one need complain. We hope God—if there be one—is equally appreciative of William Watson. At any rate, if a ledger account is being kept by the recording angel, precious little profit will be shown. At best, it is only one strayed sheep recovered. And if one has returned, many others have gone astray. Mr. Watson has returned to God; but meanwhile a score have gone to the Devil. And the success of a business is determined, not by the profit on a single transaction, but by the profit or loss on the whole of the trading.

Of course, the address of Sir Oliver Lodge at the British Association comes in as another significant indication of the revival of religion. Until something new comes along, that address is a standing dish with the Churches. Sir Oliver Lodge knows better than this. He knows that he stands practically alone in the scientific world. He has, substantially, said as much. Moreover, he is not a convert. He has not, like William Watson, been wandering outside, and now returned to the fold. He was always within—in a sense; and even now one may seriously question whether his attachment to religion is at all greater than it was years ago. But the mass of scientific men are not with him. In public they listen decorously; in private they smile. And if few of them speak out, one has to just put their silence to the general timidity of English intellectual life.

Having discovered a non-existent revival, "J. B." next discusses the cause of its being. He says:—

> "We may first note the breakdown of all substitutes for religious faith. We have lived now through a tolerably long era of attacks on Christianity. England, the beginner of so many things, was the beginner here. It was from Bolingbroke and the English Deists of the eighteenth century that Voltaire got the lessons which he carried into France. Diderot and the Encyclopædists pushed from Deism to Atheism, and set the tone to generations of Continental thinking."

All except the last sentence is false, and that winds up with a piece of characteristic Christian dissimulation. On the Continent, Deism was pushed to Atheism. Of course, it would never do to point out that the same process of development took place in this country. At all costs the delusion that there are no Atheists in England must be maintained. As a matter of fact, Deism always holds within itself the possibility of Atheism, and the course of events in England offers no exception to the general rule. The struggle of eighteenth century Christianity against Deism was only an incident in the history of Freethought. Christians saw the weakness of the Deistic position clearly enough—none more so than Bishop Butler, one of the most acute minds on the Christian side. His attack helped materially to drive home the logic of the Deistic position. And, thanks largely to the attack on Deism, Freethought, which entered into it as Deistic, emerged purified, as Atheistic. True, it has never been as generally outspoken here as on the Continent, but reticence does not alter facts. Instead of Atheists we have crowds of Agnostics, and wherein lies the difference between the two, "no man knoweth unto this day."

It is easy enough to talk of Christianity having lived through a long era of attacks, but how far is this true? In what sense has Christianity lived through the storm? If anyone will contrast Christian doctrines now with what they were a century or so ago, he will realise that Christianity has really only saved itself in name. In essentials it has surrendered to the enemy. What has become of the orthodox Christian cosmology, of witchcraft, of miracles, of hell-fire, of Biblical inspiration, and of numerous other teachings? Suppose the current Christianity of Paine's day had been that of some of the "advanced" Christians of our own, would he have ever written the Age of Reason? It is hardly likely. Assuming Paine to be alive to-day, with his opinions unchanged, how much fault would he find with the teachings of some preachers? Very little, I fancy. But does this mean, or would it mean, that Paine had become converted to Christianity? Not a bit of it. It would only mean that Christianity had become converted to Paine. In its most advanced form to-day, Christianity is little more than the eighteenth century Deism it so bitterly opposed, with a liberal dash of the word "Christ." Amongst the bulk of liberal thinkers, even in this country, far from Christianity having lived through an era of attacks, the Christianity that was alive at the commencement of those attacks is now completely destroyed. Without the spoils of office it is questionable if even the name would have survived; but these have been weighty enough to secure the continuity of name if nothing else.

There is no revival of religious faith in any genuine sense of the term. There is only a continuous endeavor to state a number of beliefs in a way that will not offend advanced thought, and which may pass for Christianity. The use of even such an expression as "religious faith" is a proof of this. What is really meant is Christian faith. But this would be too precise, too definite, and would have roused uncomfortable reflections. So it is religious faith that survives—a vague, indefinite, comprehensive something or other, with a comforting dash of respectability about it. Once upon a time, the important question was, "Are you a member of the Church?" Then it was, "Are you a member of any Church?" Later, "Are you a Christian, even though of no Church at all?" And now it is a fearsome "Well, are you religious; do you believe in anything?" with a "For God's sake say you believe in a kind-of-a-sort-of-a-something somewhere or other." Anything will do so long as you can use the word "religion." One could really respect a Church that stood to its doctrine against the hosts of advanced thought. Even though destruction were certain, it would be honorable. But Christians who swallow defeat after defeat, and whose only concern appears to be that of exhibiting the excellence of their digestions, can arouse little else than contempt.

It is, indeed, one of the curiosities of the present position that the Freethinker who attacks Christianity is, as often as not, met with the defence that no one believes in it. If he argues that the affairs of the world do not exhibit the care of a benevolent Providence, he is told that this is an old-fashioned notion, and that Christians no longer believe in a particular Providence. If he asks for proofs of the power of prayer, he is told that these are not objective, but subjective—they exist only in the minds of believers. If he attacks the inspiration of the Bible, he is told that all books are inspired, and that the Bible has naturally the same faults that mark other writings. He denounces hell, and is laughed at for being old-fashioned. He criticises the orthodox conception of God, and is told that he is caricaturing Deity. The Bible is the same, the creeds are the same, and yet they mean something entirely different to what they have always been taken to mean. It is a convenient discovery—particularly as these new interpretations happen to represent the minimum of concessions to attacks that can no longer be warded off.

A genuine revival of religion is to-day next door to an impossibility. Certain backward sections of the community may be galvanised into activity, but the bulk of opinion is against them. The mass of people cannot escape the contagion of widespread knowledge and of progressive ideas. For knowledge is no longer the property of a few. General education and cheap publications give all who care to have it the rudiments of a genuine knowledge of nature and of life. And in the last resort these are the only safeguards against superstition. A civilisation may remain in the era of the stone age, but it does not advance to a knowledge of metals and then go backward. The Churches, however powerful they may be, cannot take away from us what we know; they can only strive to prevent our knowing more. But their main task is not even this. Their chief work is to strive by all sorts of fanciful and dishonest interpretations, by confusions of thought, and looseness of speech, to give an air of culture to a mass of superstitions that had their origin in the fear-haunted brain of the primitive savage.

C. COHEN.

Secularism Justified of Her Children.

AS a proof that religion is natural and necessary to man we are confidently assured that no sooner is he in trouble than he falls upon his knees in prayer. In health and prosperity his constant temptation is to forget God and eternity, and live as if the present were his all in all; but at the approach of sickness, failure, poverty, or some great calamity, he turns his eyes heavenwards and implores God to come to his aid. This may be perfectly true of many people, who, while neglecting religious practices, have not entirely lost their religious beliefs. When misfortune overtakes them those beliefs become active, and they experience a religious revival. We have no desire to throw any suspicion upon the statement that the cultivation of religion, especially in times of trial and sorrow, yields a certain amount of gladness and joy. There have been saints whose supposed communion with God in Christ filled their hearts, at times, with ineffable bliss. It was their lot, occasionally, to enjoy delicious foretastes of the blessedness of heaven. But the peace and rest which religion affords are painfully spasmodic; they come and go in the most tantalising fashion imaginable. Indeed, even at their best there is something uncanny and weird about them. What people call the consolations of the Gospel seem to be playing hide-and-seek with the most fervent believers; and in reality they are not consolations at all. We read: "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble"; but the sense of his helpful presence is the least dependable thing on earth. In another place we find this impassioned but hopeless cry, "Why standest thou afar off, O Lord; why hidest thou thyself in times of trouble?" Here is a more desperate outburst still: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Why art thou so far from helping me, and from the words of my roaring? O my God, I cry in the daytime, but thou answerest not; and in the night season, but find no rest." This is the commonest complaint made against the loving Heavenly Father in the Bible. Jesus is reported to have made it in his dying agony on the cross.

Thus the consolations of religion are most unreliable, being whimsically administered. Besides, the habit of depending upon them produces an extremely abnormal state of mind. The true disciple of the Galilean despises human comfort, in the belief that he has that which is Divine. Thomas à Kempis tells us that the "holy martyr Laurence with his priest overcame the world, because whatsoever seemed delightsome in the world he despised." Consolation is represented as a gift which God imparts or withholds just as he pleases. In the Imitation of Christ the believer is addressed thus:—

> "When therefore spiritual comfort is given thee from God, receive it with thankfulness; but understand that it is the gift of God, not any desert of thine.....When consolation is taken from thee, do not immediately despair; but with humility and patience wait for the heavenly visitation; for God is able to give thee back again more ample consolation."

Were we to examine the lives of some of the great saints of history we would learn that the consolations of religion failed them when most needed. St. Bernard, of Clairvaux, was one of the saddest of men. His anxieties were overwhelming, and to peace of mind he was a stranger. This world was the valley of desolation, and he passed through it suffering grief and pain, and longing for the rest that remaineth to the people of God beyond the tomb. During his last illness the sorrowing monks prayed earnestly for his recovery, and it was supposed that their prayers were partially answered in the prolonging of his life; but he remonstrated with them, saying, "Why do you thus detain a miserable man? Spare me. Spare me, and let me depart." Take another less known but more admirable character, Madame Desbordes Valmore, the pre-eminently pious French poetess. She was an exceptionally Godly woman; but the so-called consolations of religion availed her nothing. Bitter trial, poverty, and bereavement were her lot in life. She was alone, without brothers or sisters, alone and severed from all whom she had loved; and this is her sad plaint:—

> "What can one say in the presence of these decrees of Providence? If one has deserved them, the case is more sad. I often search my heart and try to find out what may have caused me to be so heavily smitten by our dear Creator; for it is impossible for his justice to punish thus without a cause, and that thought very often suffices to overwhelm me."

It is incontrovertible that the consolations of religion are purely imaginary. The things which God is believed to have prepared for them that love him are not bestowed upon them in this world. What he gives them here is tribulation, to qualify them for the better life hereafter. They assemble in their churches and chapels and sing—

> "Brief life is here our portion:
> Brief sorrow, short-lived care:]
> The life that knows no ending,
> The tearless life is there.
> O happy retribution!
> Short toil, eternal rest,
> For mortals and for sinners
> A mansion with the blest."

This life, therefore, is to be endured as a much-needed discipline, not enjoyed as Nature's gift. It is of necessity a life of suffering and sorrow and disappointment, and we are to go through it as prisoners of hope. Now, a falser and more demoralising doctrine than this was never promulgated, and if people really believed it, which they do not, their existence would be infinitely more miserable than it is. We have just had the honor of an hour's interview with a great hero who manfully renounced such wretched teaching many years ago. We refer to Mr. Frederic William Walsh, of the Royal Midland Counties Home for Incurables, Leamington Spa, with whose history readers of this journal have been familiar for the last few years. It will be remembered that some seventeen years ago Mr. Walsh, working as a mechanic in Birmingham, met with an accident which resulted in serious spinal injuries. Paralysis ensued, depriving him of his speech and the use of all his limbs, and necessitating his lying flat on his back ever since. The head is the only part of the body over which he has the least control. For two or three years he had no means of communicating with those around him. One day a pencil was accidentally left on his bed, and he caught hold of it in his mouth. After long and laborious practice he learned to write, holding the pencil between his teeth. At the time of the accident he was an ardent believer, and the dogma he cherished most gratefully was that of immortality. He wrote an essay on "The Philosophy of Salvation," which was published. In this he expatiated on the Fatherhood of God, on love as the essence of his nature, and on humanity as the peculiar object of his boundless affection. But in proportion as he faced the facts of life, particularly the facts of his own history, the belief in a God of justice and love weakened within him, and finally became an utter impossibility to him. He studied science, philosophy, and history, with the result that he became a firmly convinced Freethinker. He is an honored member of the National Secular Society, and does his utmost to spread the principles of Secularism. He has no need of the consolations offered by supernatural religion, because he finds ample solace in the intellectual contemplation of Nature and her activities. He has periods of unconsciousness, when for a week or a fortnight he is dead to the world, and sometimes he suffers excruciating pain; but he remains bright and cheerful through it all. It does one good to see the sweet smile on his expressive countenance, and to read his intelligent and interesting contributions to the conversation. He is profoundly interested in all the political, social, literary, and religious movements of the day. Last April a Paper composed by him, on "Auguste Comte and the Religion of Humanity," was read before the Leamington Literary and Philosophical Society, and is now published as a pamphlet of thirty-four pages (Lyceum Press, 87 Hanover-street, Liverpool, price 3d.). As a sample of his style, which reveals his noble character, we quote the following extract. Having described the Positive religion, he says:—

> "Her priests are men of science, poets, artists, historians, teachers, and writers, guarding their sincerity as they guard their honor, each bringing his little to the Treasure House of Humanity; all gladly working for Humanity; all loving that for which they labor and offer themselves up as a daily sacrifice; and all helping the development of Altruism. I see politics being purified of self-interest and duly subordinated to morals; the social origin of wealth recognised and being socially applied to the amelioration of society; men working with heart and will at their daily avocations, with more leisure, a larger, richer, and fuller life. I see woman as man's true providence, consecrating the home with a larger love and deeper sympathy. I see the Religion of Humanity as a unifying force inspiring and enlarging unselfish affection, lifting man above himself into a communion with Humanity, through whom he lives and for whom he gladly works."

Here is a glowing optimist in a Home for Incurables, the whole of whose body is useless and an impediment, save the head, for whom Supernaturalism is non-existent, and who regards his life of intercourse with the great and noble of all ages well worth living.

J. T. LLOYD.

Freedom of Thought.—II.

A History of Freedom of Thought. By Prof. J. B. Bury, Litt.D., LL.D. (Home University Library, 74.) London: Williams & Norgate. 1s. net.

PROFESSOR BURY argues that reason was free in Greece and Rome. There were serious drawbacks, however, in the case of Greece. All the world remembers the martyrdom of Socrates. Several other distinguished Greeks met with a somewhat similar fate. With regard to the popular sentiment on such matters, it was pointed out by Leigh Hunt that most of the great poets, who were generally sceptical in relation to the orthodox religion, were reported to have come to a bad end. But persecution was not organised in the Greek states, neither was there any interference with literature. The latter is also true of Rome, and is worthy of special notice. For as soon as the Christians got into power they burnt pagan and heretical books, and in this they were wise with a sinister wisdom. To kill unbelievers, and to leave their writings to work mischief, was a policy that Christians never tolerated, even in their hours of greatest weakness.

"The general rule of Roman policy," Professor Bury says, "was to tolerate throughout the Empire all religions and all opinions. Blasphemy was not punished. The principle was expressed in the maxim of the Emperor Tiberius: 'If the gods are insulted, let them see to it themselves.'" Rome, indeed, in the matter of religion, was like England in India. The empire was bound to be neutral in the presence of a multitude of faiths, all of them right individually and all of them wrong collectively. One result, in the case of India, is that there is no Blasphemy Law protecting any particular religion; and another result is that Secular Education prevails throughout India, although it is not yet adopted in England, Scotland, Wales, or Ireland.

Christian historians, even in the earliest ages, were such frightful liars that it is unsafe to believe anything they say without corroborative evidence. They lied, in fact, on principle; and in some instances they not only confessed it but boasted of it. Eusebius himself owned to having related less what was true than what was edifying. Professor Bury, of course, knows this as well as we do; but we do not think he has made sufficient allowance for it. George Long, the classic translator of Marcus Aurelius, and historian of the Roman Republic, has dealt in his footnotes to the great Emperor's Meditations with the allegation that he punished the Christians. The allegation is left but just credible. Yet it was seized upon by John Stuart Mill to show how even the wisest and best of men may be led into evil policies which meaner and baser men escape. Renan knew what he was saying when he challenged anyone to produce a single law against freedom of thought in the whole of Roman jurisprudence before the days of Constantine,—who, it will be remembered, was the first Christian emperor. This challenge of Renan's is, or ought to be, well known. It should have made Professor Bury hesitate to speak in the following peremptory manner:—

> "Under Trajan we find that the principle had been laid down that to be a Christian is an offence punishable by death. Henceforward Christianity remained an illegal religion. But in practice the law was not applied rigorously or logically. The Emperors desired, if possible, to extirpate Christianity without shedding blood. Trajan laid down that Christians were not to be sought out, that no anonymous charges were to be noticed, and than an informer who failed to make good his charge should be liable to be punished under the laws against calumny. The Christians themselves recognised that this edict practically protected them."

We presume that Professor Bury is aware that the authenticity of this part of Pliny's correspondence has been challenged. It is certain that the Christians stuck at nothing in the way of forgery, and to forge this particular passage was not a very difficult accomplishment. Even if it be a genuine portion of the original text, it does not follow that the word "Christians" applies absolutely and exclusively to the worshipers of Jesus of Nazareth. In any case, the Christians were not punished for their religious beliefs, but for their religious practices, and for running amok, as it were, amongst other religionists in the Empire. This is conceded, it is indeed emphasised, by Professor Bury. The Roman tradition of toleration was broken, if it was broken, to check the intolerant; for the Christians boasted that, when they gained the upper hand, they would make their fellow citizens worship as they did. There would be no toleration of false gods when Christ's kingdom came on earth.

We are delighted to note that Professor Bury refers to the Christians as having "invented a whole mythology of martyrdoms." "Many cruelties," he adds, "were imputed to Emperors under whom we know that the Church enjoyed perfect peace."

The first thing the Christians did when they came into power, under Constantine and his successors, was to destroy the literature of their Pagan adversaries. The wily Paley blandly observed that "the writings of Celsus are lost." He did not tell his readers how they were lost. He could not afford to disclose the fact that they were destroyed by imperial edicts issued at the instigation of the Christian Church. The writings of Porphyry were destroyed in the same way. Not a single copy was allowed to survive. Far more than Strafford the Christian Church might have claimed the motto of "Thorough." Nothing of the kind had been attempted by the Pagan authorities. "It is particularly to be observed," Professor Bury says, "that no effort had been made to suppress Christian literature." Rome was not fighting against opinions; she was fighting against what she regarded as dangerous anti-social fanatics, who threatened the peace and prosperity of the Empire. And subsequent events showed that the Emperors were not far out in their calculation.

To the Dark and Middle Ages a brief chapter is devoted by Professor Bury. He heads it "Reason in Prison." It was during "the period in which the Church exercised its greatest influence" that "reason was enchained in the prison which Christianity had built around the human mind." The next chapter deals with the Renaissance and the Reformation. Let us take the latter first. We quoted last week a strong passage from Professor Bury's denunciation of the intolerance of the Protestant Churches. He adds that "Luther was quite opposed to liberty of conscience and worship, a doctrine which was inconsistent with the Scriptures as he read it." Calvin's "fame for intolerance" was still blacker. He established a theocracy at Geneva, where "liberty was completely crushed, and false doctrines were put down by imprisonment, exile, and death." One wishes that room had been found for Gibbon's noble passage on Calvin's hunting down of Servetus.

The vital movement of that age was not the Reformation but the Renaissance. Professor Bury writes eloquently on this topic—giving all honor to the science represented by Galileo, and the burning zeal of propaganda as represented by the martyr Giordano Bruno. Humanism had in it a principle of growth:—

> "We shall see how reason and the growth of knowledge undermined the bases of theological authority. At each step in this process, in which philosophical speculation, historical criticism, natural science, have all taken part, the opposition between reason and faith deepened; doubt, clear or vague, increased; and secularism, derived from the Humanists, whether latent or conscious, substituted an interest in the fortunes of the human race upon earth for the interest in a future world."

Professor Bury rightly mentions Montaigne, the first of the Humanists; and even Milton, for his splendid plea for unlicensed printing; but he omits one name—the greatest of all—that of Shakespeare; against whom he seems to have contracted a prejudice, if one may judge by a recent article of his in the Positivist Review, to which attention has already been called in our pages.

Passages in favor of freedom of thought abound in Shakespeare. He chose the beautiful lips of Portia to condemn the folly as well as the wickedness of torture, which was then common in the jurisprudence of Christendom. Where else may we find a similar protest in contemporary literature? In the really greatest of Hamlet's soliloquies, which therefore is never heard upon the stage, occurs the grand passage which made so deep an impression on the mind of Shelley:—

> "Sure, he that made us with such large discourse,
> Looking before and after, gave us not
> That capability and godlike reason
> To fust in us unused."

What reply had the priests and dogmatists to that challenge? Or what to the following challenge, written in language that only the Master could wield?—

> "What custom wills, in all things should we do't,
> The dust on antique time would lie unswept,
> And mountainous error be too highly heaped
> For truth to o'er-peer. —"Coriolanus," ii., 3.

Listen, finally, to this consummate utterance:—

> "For truth can never be confirmed enough,
> Though doubts did ever sleep. —"Pericles," v. 1.

It is impossible to go beyond that. And no one but Shakespeare ever reached it—in spite of certain pages in Mill's Liberty, echoed from Milton's Areopagitica.

Some Emotions and a Moral.

> "It is a lie—their priests, their pope,
> Their saints, their —— all they fear or hope
> Are lies, and lies." —BROWNING.

LOW burned the nursery lights. The little motherless girl had been tucked up cosily, and the kiss of good night was still moist upon her father's cheek. The father lingered near the child's bedstead, and stood looking out upon the star-lit sky. The tie between them was strangely close, and it had been drawn closer still by the death of the child's mother. He, a silent, reticent man, had been content to leave the child to the care of his wife, who was now no more. A convinced Freethinker, he had allowed perfect freedom in his home, and had not interfered. Now, "the poppied sleep, the end of all" had come to his wife, and he would have to look more closely to the little one.

As he stood gazing out upon the glories of the night, he was startled to hear sounds of partly repressed sobbing from the child's bed. The surprised man quickly and silently approached the child. There was something wrong, for the girl's head was feverish, and the large tears rolled down her cheeks.

The strong man stooped over the little girl, placing the small arms around his own neck, and clasped the terror-stricken child to his heart. There had never been any secrets between them. For a minute or two the frightened child sobbed in his arms, and then in whispering tones the father asked what was the trouble.

"Daddy, I don't want to go to hell."

The man was taken unawares, between the points of his armor. He had expected many things at the hands of Fate, but never this. Between the soothing caresses he said, "Girlie, who has been talking to you about hell?"

The answer came in a broken, confiding whisper, "The rector told me last Friday, and—he said you were a wicked man because you were an infidel, and you would go to hell, too."

To the man the issue was clear. The priest and the father were to battle for supremacy in the mind of the young child.

"Listen, girlie! the rector does not know any more of death than other people, and he has no right to frighten you. There is no hell, dear. It is all a mistake. Who would burn a little girl?"

As he spoke, the sobs ceased at the words. The child was listening, and soon the young thoughts forsook the nightmare inventions of the priests. Talking tenderly, almost like a mother, her father soon had her in conversation on other subjects, until sleep came and found her holding her father's hand. The man was driven back on his own thoughts. For the moment the victory was for Freethought, but what of the future. The shadow of Priestcraft had fallen upon his hearthstone. Would it return?

Leaving a kiss upon the lips of the sensitive, sleeping child, the father again took his silent post at the window. The sunset flared like a huge torch upon the far horizon. One could easily imagine the glare to be that of the fires of the Inquisition, lighting up the blackened limbs of heretics, who were being burned for the good of their souls. The mere thought made his heart thrill with a strange awe. As he watched the silent vanishing of the noiseless sunlight, the place became a sanctuary of dreams. What visions were those that floated before his eyes? What faces defiant of death! The pale face of Giordano Bruno, the mournful countenance of Lucilio Vanini, the sad features of Joan of Arc. He saw the flames licking round Michael Servetus; Galileo in his dungeon; and the erect figure of Francisco Ferrer fronting the rifles of the soldiers.

Dark Ages! Was not any age dark in which shadows of Priestcraft could fall, lessening, eclipsing, the little sum of human happiness, so hardly won for the race by centuries of striving.

The sun had now set and disappeared. Would that superstition had gone with it.

The next day the child was withdrawn from religious instruction in the school, and Priestcraft claimed one victim the less.

Many mediocre authors, exercising the most complete sincerity, find ample appreciation in the vast mediocrity of the public, and are never troubled by any problems.—Arnold Bennett.

Some Little-Known Freethinkers.

III.—EVAN POWELL MEREDITH.

I NEVER met the author of The Prophet of Nazareth, though I had the honor of eliciting some articles from him contributed to the National Reformer, on the subject of the early Christian love feasts and immorality. They were signed "Lucianus," a signature which, like those of "Julian" and "Celsus," has been taken by more than one writer in the Freethought ranks.

Evan Powell Meredith was born in Wales in 1811. He was educated for the ministry at Pontypool College, became a pastor in the Baptist connexion, and an eloquent preacher in the Welsh tongue. He made a translation of the Bible into Welsh. Study of the Scriptures led him to see through their pretensions, and about 1844, as he states in the preface to his largest work, he quietly withdrew from Christianity "whose doctrine, after considerable examination and research, he had ceased to believe, and, therefore, could no longer conscientiously preach." He adds that he had, ever since his secedure, almost daily pursued his researches after the real origin of the Christian religion. These studies he pursued to the last, and he had, I believe, prepared a work on the Gospels, which never appeared. What became of it on his death at Monmouth, July 23, 1889, I cannot say. Mr. Meredith lived a very secluded life. Probably he could have done much had he taken to Freethought advocacy in Wales; but he remained a Deist all his days, and possibly did not care to co-operate with Secularists. Mr. Meredith's Prophet of Nazareth was evoked by the offer by Mr. George Baillie, of Glasgow, of a prize for the best essay on the question whether Jesus predicted the last day of judgment, and the destruction of the world, as events inevitable during the then existent generation of men. The prize was only ten guineas, a sum which could never have compensated Mr. Meredith for a tithe of the labor he put into his performance. But his motive was not gain. As he states in his preface,—

> "He thought that thus to write on a given subject was an inoffensive and a favorable manner of making some of his theological views known to Christians generally, and particularly to those who had studied in the same college with him, and had taken so much pains to brand him as an infidel."

The Prophet of Nazareth is one of the most convincing works ever written. It thoroughly exhausts its subject, and the upholder of the supernatural character of Christianity is left without a leg to stand upon. Nor is it wanting in eloquence, as the following passage may testify:—

> "There is no man, however depraved, who is not more or less strongly prompted by his own feelings to be just, from a love of justice,—to be benevolent from a spontaneously kind emotion,—and to do good, in general, from a love of virtue. The threats of hell and the promises of heaven, as incentives to virtue, together with the whole tenor of the superstitious creeds prevalent in the world, have made man believe that he is much more immoral, and more helpless, than he really is. Free him from the trammels of book-revelations—let him study nature alone—and man will make rapid strides towards happiness. He has already discovered that his degree of enjoyment is in proportion to his moral and intellectual progress. He has learned that all his miseries arise from a violation of the natural laws—either by him, or by members of the community in which he lives—and that all his happiness is the result of obedience to these laws, in discovering which, and learning to obey them, he daily progresses, gathering a thousand facts from his own experience, as well as from that of others. When mankind, universally, will learn to obey these laws, each individual will feel intense pleasure in promoting the happiness of others, which cannot fail to secure the happiness of the whole race. Then will knowledge and benevolence be inseparably connected in each individual, and vice and misery accidents in human life—rarely witnessed. The progress in knowledge and happiness which man has already made, by studying nature, warrants this conclusion, and forbids us to prescribe limits either to the high degree of knowledge he is capable of acquiring, or the intensity of happiness he is capable of enjoying."

In 1865 Mr. Meredith entered into some correspondence with the Bishop of Llandaff, in consequence of his hearing that dignity deliver a sermon in which he advocated the utility and advantages of wealth. Our Freethinker strongly contrasted the preaching of the bishop with the doctrines of Jesus, as found in Matthew vi. 25-34, xix. 16; Mark x. 17; Luke xviii. 18; and John v. 27. At first his lordship fenced in his reply, stating that he had been misrepresented, and had not inculcated the pursuit of riches. Mr. Meredith produced a shorthand report bearing out his representations, and persisted in asking an explanation. The bishop now changed his tack, and said he had no time for correspondence. About the same time the Rev. J. F. Francklin, vicar of Whaplode, Spalding, having perused "some extracts from your horrible and blasphemous production, entitled The Prophet of Nazareth," addressed him an arrogant epistle against employing his "ungodly pen in the service of Satan." He was answered at length, and the letters to the bishop and the vicar were published under the title of Amphilogia.

To those who enjoy the sight of Christians squirming and wriggling in the grasp of a hard-fisted Freethinker, Amphilogia affords excellent reading. But, of course, Mr. Meredith's chief service to the cause was his great work on The Prophet of Nazareth. The world of letters was then giving much attention to Bishop Colenso's work on The Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua. But Mr. Meredith struck a blow, not at any outwork, but at the very citadel of Christianity; and, in dealing with the prophecies of the gospel, he hit the Christian superstition in its weakest part. As long as that superstition endures his work will retain its value, though in these days, when great books are felt to be more than ever great evils, it is to be wished that someone may condense its six hundred pages to sixty.

IV.—MYLES MCSWEENEY.

was but a lad when I first heard the rich brogue of this Irish advocate at the Brill, Somer's Town, adjacent to the spot now crossed by the Midland Arches. The humorous way in which he referred to the myths of "Jasus and the Vargin" was irresistibly funny. His pet subject was the non-historical character of these legendary personages, and he brought to bear on his topic intimacy with the rites and doctrines of the Roman Church, in which he was educated, and a wide acquaintance with mythological lore. Born at Enniskillen in 1814, he early migrated to London, and, hearing the Rev. Robert Taylor at the Rotunda in 1830, adopted the views of the "Devil's Chaplain." When I knew him he was a peripatetic stationer and book dealer, living in a very humble cottage down Westminster way. Yet his room was filled with books explaining "all the mythologies." Many of them were rare and valuable. There were the works of Drummond, Bryant, Maurice, Holwell, Pluché, Savory, Asiatic Researches, etc., mostly picked up secondhand during his peregrinations. Nor were later books wanting, such as those of Dr. Inman, presented by the author, whom McSweeney supplied with many books, as he did also Bishop Colenso.

He sold me some books, said to be "worth their weight in gold," and lent me others, from some of which I enlarged drawings for his lectures. Every Sunday he went from place to place discoursing on some phase of his constant theme. On one occasion I recollect that he took the chair for Mr. Bradlaugh at the Hall of Science, when our leader was lecturing on some similar topic to his own. I once accompanied McSweeney to a meeting of the old Anthropological Society to hear a paper by the Rev. Dunbar Heath. Myles opposed, and afforded much amusement by his rich brogue, and the Irish humor with which he satirised the lecture. At this meeting William Simpson — "Crimean Simpson," of the Illustrated London News, who was as good an antiquary as he was an artist—was present and spoke. Some years afterwards, under the pen-name of Phandye, Simpson contributed to the Secularist, when under the conduct of Mr. Foote, an amusing skit, entitled "Is Myles McSweeney a Man, a God, or a Myth?" applying his own principles to resolve the living man into a solar hero. Myles was a good-humored man, and took the skit well. For his plainness of language about "Jasus and Mary," and what he considered the remnants of phallic worship in Christianity, he was regarded as coarse. Essentially he was not so. I well remember the fatherly way in which he advised me, while in my teens, to abstain from all indulgences and adopt the Stoic philosophy, which he not only held, but acted up to. For drawing my attention to the noble counsels of Antoninus and Epictetus I owe a debt of gratitude to this self-taught Irishman.

"Larn abathinince," he said, "afore ye thry motheration." His information was good and extensive, and it was at his tongue's tip. But two things he lacked that were essential to his studies—a sound knowledge of languages and philological evolution, and a knowledge of "primitive culture" and evolution. His mind was formed in the pre-Darwinian era. His writings in the National Reformer and Secular Chronicle are only valuable for their out-of-way information, which some other might shape to better purpose. The same criticism may be passed on a pamphlet on Moses and Bacchus, which he published, and which he intended to follow by Biblical and Mythical Parallels, which he compiled. An American, Mr. T. W. Doane, has since carried out this project in a way which reminds me of McSweeney's idea, which never received sufficient encouragement to obtain book form.

(The late) J. M. WHEELER.

Acid Drops.

Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace's death was bound to be the occasion of an orgy of hypocrisy in the English newspapers. First of all, they praised him beyond his merits as a biologist, in order to set him up as a "spiritual" rival of the "Agnostic" Darwin. The idea of his equality with Darwin never occurred to Dr. Wallace himself; first, because he was a very modest man,—secondly, because he knew better. He recognised and confessed that, although he had conceived the idea of the struggle for existence, natural selection, and the survival of the fittest, at the same time that Darwin did, he had not the qualities which Darwin displayed in working out that great idea of evolution and establishing it to the satisfaction of the scientific world. We do not hesitate to say, either, that Dr. Wallace could never have written—no other man could have written—that magnificent chapter in the Descent of Man in which Darwin presented with masterly power, and astonishing brevity—the whole case for the natural development of man from a lower form of life, and his natural development from the moment when he might be called man up to the highest intellectual, moral, and æsthetic culture of modern civilisation.

Wallace was a great and good man, but he was not a Darwin, and it is no use pretending that he was. He was always under the dominion of preconceptions. He wanted to find that the truth corresponded with his religious beliefs, and he repelled it when it presented itself in opposition to his prejudices. In the early stages he refused to accept Darwin's view of the origin of man. He gave way at last, but it was when he would have been almost a laughing-stock if he had held out any longer. When he wrote Darwinism, which is a most admirable statement of the evolution theory, he had to give his adherence to what he had resisted in the interest of his religious faith. "I fully accept Mr. Darwin's conclusions," he wrote, "as to the essential identity of man's bodily structure with that of the higher mammalia, and his descent from some ancestral form common to man and the anthropoid apes. The evidence of such descent appears to me to be overwhelming and conclusive." This was clear enough, but Dr. Wallace's opposition to Darwinism did not cease. He carried it on on other grounds.

It was admitted by Dr. Wallace that the tendency of Darwinism was to "the conclusion that man's entire nature and all his faculties, whether moral, intellectual, or spiritual, have been derived from their rudiments in the lower animals, in the same manner and by the action of the same general laws as his physical structure has been derived." But this was sheer Materialism; so Dr. Wallace set about searching for something to support his spiritualistic philosophy. He had to bring "the spirit world" in somewhere, and he had gone wrong before. His new theory was that it intervened at three stages; first, when life appeared; second, when consciousness began; third, when man became possessed of "a number of his most characteristic and noblest faculties." It was all very ingenious, but also very fantastic. Moreover, the "spirit world" was an arbitrary assumption. It was not what the scientists call a vera causa —a true or real cause. Natural Selection, on the other hand, is a vera causa. Darwin did not invent it; he pointed to it as a recognised power which was plainly seen in operation; what he did was to extend it over the whole range of organic existence,—including, if we may say so, man's head as well as his feet, and his loves and hatreds as well as his mouth and stomach.

From the nature of the case there could be no disproofs of Dr. Wallace's moonshine theories of human evolution; but also, from the nature of the case, there could be no proofs. He was simply gratifying his own religious emotions. And he went on doing that to the end of the chapter. His arguments about this world being the centre of the visible universe, and the only one that could be inhabited, etc., did not convince the experts in astronomy or any other science; although they mightily pleased the champions of all forms of Christianity, which, whatever they differ about, agree at least in this, that man ("proud man" "most ignorant of what he's most assured") is the end and crown of creation.

Dr. Wallace was a god-send to the Christian theologians. They made the most of him; indeed, they made too much of him. For he was not with them, after all. He rejected all their doctrines, and, as far as we can see, their God.

Dr. Wallace's funeral was another outrage added to the long list of body-snatching performances by Christian Churches. The Bishop of Salisbury officiated at the service. But that was not enough. Rev. James Marchant (of all men!) was brought in to speak "the final words at the interment." We suggest that both these men of God should read the passage in Dr. Wallace's Autobiography in which he refers to the good that might have been done if the pulpits of England had, for the past hundred years, been devoted to useful secular subjects instead of to endless sermons on one monotonous topic. Besides, we repeat, Dr. Wallace was not a Christian, nor even a Theist, in the ordinary sense of the word.

We wish to pay a tribute to Dr. Wallace's simple and beautiful character. He always had the welfare of humanity at heart. His later sociological writings were sometimes self-contradictory, but they were animated by a high and noble spirit. It was elevating to come into contact with such a nature.

"God's Word has been translated into 500 languages and dialects," said the ex-Bishop of Tinnevelu, speaking at Southend-on-Sea. South Sea Islanders and Esquimaux must have quaint notions of the European "God" after reading of Ezekiel's celebrated banquet in the vernacular.

"God has so made the British Empire that it cannot be destroyed except by ourselves," says Mr. Norman Angell. Is John Bull to be the next deity?

The Bishop of Ripon has been presented with a pastoral staff which cost over £200. The "sheep" subscribed the amount.

"There is much less preaching of 'hell-fire' than there was," admits the Rev. John Collins, of Edgware, to a Christian Globe interviewer. An unsolicited testimonial to the work of the Freethinker.

When a Church of England candidate presents himself for ordination as deacon he must declare his "unfeigned belief in all the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments." This formula has been altered in the case of priests, and in the Lower House of Convocation an attempt was made to alter this also. The motion was defeated, so that the deacons will have to go on making false declarations, or the office will be limited to such as are silly enough to be telling the truth. The Guardian thinks that some way should be found by which the burden of conscience would be removed, and at the same time "the supremacy of Holy Scripture as the revelation of God and the final test of Christian truth" maintained. To one who isn't a theologian this looks very much like finding a plan whereby a man may swear to a lie while persuading himself it's the solemn truth.

We agree with Bishop Boyd Carpenter that the best protection against "evil publications" is a widespread, healthy public opinion. But we do not agree that this is being created, or is likely to be created, by the various religious bodies that exist for that purpose, or by the sermons of more or less prurient-minded parsons. We need not bother about the very obvious advertising of certain books given by these agitators, nor the equally obvious fact that ninety-nine per cent. of these self-constituted censors are totally unfitted by nature and education to tell a good book from a bad one. Their notion of literature is the Sunday-school tract, with a dash of Marie Corelli or Hall Caine. A greater evil of these societies for the suppression of undesirable books is that they do not suppress. Very largely they pander to the notion of obscenity, much as as a lecture on "Sex" to "men only" does. This disguised pruriency forms half the attraction of the propaganda. And they certainly do nothing to create a taste for healthy literature. You can't preach a healthy public opinion into existence, and you can't preach an unhealthy one out of existence. That is the long and the short of the whole matter. An unhealthy public opinion is not the result of bad literature being in existence, it is to a much greater extent its cause.

One of the speakers at the meeting deplored the sale of Boccaccio's Decameron, and said that it should only be permitted circulation in the original. How a book that is bad in English can become good in Italian is rather more than we can understand. This speaker said he quite agreed with a writer in the Times who said that the Decameron was "a thoroughly immoral book, and Boccaccio well knew it was immoral when he wrote it." The Times ought to have known better than to have printed such rubbish. The Decameron is one of the masterpieces of Renaissance literature, and is, as a matter of fact, a vast improvement in moral tone on much of the literature that preceded it and surrounded it. The licence it reflects is the licence of its day, and that belonged to a society that had been Christian for centuries, and in which the Christian Church was all-powerful. Anyway, we heartily pity the poor devil who can't read the Decameron without getting his morals corrupted. We should hesitate in leaving him alone with any female for whom we had regard.

In a religious contemporary we notice bold advertisements informing the readers how to make their fortunes from oil shares; how to avoid baldness; many patent medicine puffs, and several columns of fiction. That editor knows his public.

The Daily Chronicle tells us that Irish priests receive many gifts in kind from their people. So do the gentlemen in the same line of business on the Gold Coast.

Winds of God is the title of a new novel. A chilly subject.

The Bishop of London is convinced that "there is nothing like personal service among the poor to break down a man's disbelief and to lead him to adopt the Christian faith." If his Lordship turned the handle of a mangle for a year it would not prove that the whale swallowed Jonah—nor even that Jeshua of Nazareth rose from the dead.

Dr. Clifford has been helping a united mission in Paddington, and reports the results in the usual high-flown evangelistic style. The mission achieved the remarkable result of getting Christians of various denominations to work together—really a remarkable result considering all we hear about Christian love and brotherhood All the preachers had a good time, but when one looks for the important thing, a different note is struck. How many non-Christians were converted? None are reported, so we may safely assume none were caught. Dr. Clifford says that the outsider "has not been brought within our ecclesiastical edifices to the extent we had hoped. The hoary prejudice against the Churches is still operative." This is only Dr. Clifford's "slim" way of stating an unpleasant (to him) truth. Nearly every house in the district was visited, and the result has been—nothing. It is not a prejudice against the Churches that Dr. Clifford has to fight, it is unbelief in Christianity.

We are getting on. A candidate in the Manchester municipal election received, and published, a letter from Mr. Harry Lauder, strongly commending his candidature. The candidate was successful, too. Some time ago one of our daily papers consulted Mr. Lauder on the question of the number of battleships we ought to have. Now he issues commendatory letters to candidates for public office. The democracy should be grateful to Mr. Lauder. So far as we know, his sole qualifications are that he sings Scotch songs and draws more than a Scotch salary.

Dean Ring (Roman Catholic) has been complaining that in several Protestant wills lately it has been stipulated that any of the beneficiaries who embrace Roman Catholicism shall forfeit their legacies. Dean Ring regards this as an unjustifiable interference with liberty of conscience, and we agree with him that it is so. Only wills of a similar character are made on the Catholic side, and then it is left for Protestants to complain. The truth of the matter is that no Christian—Catholic or Protestant—really believes in a genuine liberty of conscience. He will place unfair obstacles to mental freedom while he is alive, and, if possible, after he is dead. Dean Ring asks whether Protestantism is so bankrupt in logic and reason as to require the support of penal enactments? We have often asked the same question; but so far as Dean Ring is concerned, we would remind him to look at Catholic Spain, and see what occurs there. And we have not heard of any vigorous protests against the Blasphemy Laws that exist in England. As a matter of fact, Christianity has always been propped up by the law, and with the full consent of all classes of Christians.

When one comes to look at the matter closely, making a legacy depend upon a certain profession is a superb piece of irony. It is putting a cash value on religious conviction. The dying man says, in effect, "Being Christians, my family are not likely to change their opinions if it means a loss of money." And events prove that he is usually right. Henri IV. said that Paris was well worth the price of a mass. The modern Christian says, in the same way, a good legacy is well worth a profession of religion.

Mr. Bernard Shaw says that his plays are performed in Germany "with the assistance of the Emperor, and the Imperial City, in a magnificent theatre, which is free of rent, and magnificently subsidised." This is quite a striking testimonial to the revolutionary character of Mr. Shaw's work.

"The entire social order of England as we have it at present is anti-Christian." This was one of the remarks made by Mr. Bernard Shaw at the City Temple, before an audience—to quote the Christian Commonwealth—"better prepared than any other audience in England to understand his message." This was one of the remarks that attracted great attention, and one would like to ask "When was there any social order genuinely Christian?" Let Mr. Shaw and his City Temple audience read their New Testament carefully and see if they can detect there even the framework of a social order that would be likely to endure for a single twelvemonth. As a matter of fact, the establishment of a social order of any kind was the last thing the New Testament writers had in their minds. They had rules for a select company of believers, but none for a general body of citizens of all tastes and capacities and opinions. How little they had the establishment of a social order in mind is shown by their striking neglect of family life. The need of a social order is not really Christianity's message. This has been forced upon Christian preachers by the march of events—much as Mr. Shaw himself has been forced upon a City Temple audience.

"If I had a neurotic daughter," Mr. Bernard Shaw writes to the Times, "I would rather risk taking her to the Palace Theatre than to a revival meeting." This will not sound strange to many of our readers who recollect some of Mr. Cohen's articles on sex and religion. "Nobody," Mr. Shaw adds, "has yet counted the homes and characters wrecked by intemperance in religious emotion." If such statistics were kept the chapel might find its attitude of moral superiority to the theatre "and even to the public-house" difficult to maintain.

That fatuous person, the Bishop of London, volunteers to "accept Mr. Shaw's challenge." Three hundred years ago he would have got Mr. Shaw sent out of the world with a solution of continuity between his shoulders and his ears, or dangling at the end of a rope. But the challenge cannot be accepted in that way nowadays. "I summon the Christian forces of London to my aid," he cries, "and I gladly take up the glove which is thrown down." Yes, but how does he take it up? Is he going to trust to his own natural faculties in an intellectual duel with "G. B. S."? We pity him if he is. We fancy, however, that he knows a game worth two (or twenty) of that. He boasts of having put down the living statue business some twenty years ago. Did he? We doubt it. Fashions in the "nude" change as in everything else. Besides, if it comes to that, one might ask the Bishop how much of the anatomy of "the Savior" is left to imagination as he hangs upon the cross.

Reynolds' published a snapshot of "Gaby Deslys off to America." We did not see Waldron in the group. What was the matter?

M. Pierre Loti bears a dignified attitude towards the Bulgarian bully who announced that he was coming to France to challenge the great French writer for stating the truth about the horrors of the war waged against the Turks by the Balkan (Christian) Allies. M. Loti kept silence until so many of his friends offered to accept the challenge for him—he himself being retired from the French naval service and over sixty years of age. He feels bound to speak publicly now. He begs his friends to let the Bulgarian challenger alone. "I am conscious," he says, "of having fulfilled a sacred duty in availing myself of the notoriety of my name to establish the true role during the war of the calumniated Turks and the so-called Christian allies. I confined myself to saying without hatred what I had seen, and especially to reproducing, after verification, more overwhelming testimony, which has since acquired the value of historic documents." M. Loti says that he did justice to the indisputable courage of Bulgarian officers. But it is necessary to discriminate. "Military courage," he continues, "is only truly sublime in the case of civilised men whose pity, whose very nerves, revolt against the necessity of wounds and blood; but in the case of the sanguinary soldiers, delighting afterwards in mutilating their prisoners, in having their hands red with blood, courage loses its value, and approximates closely to that of the mad bull in the ring."

Mr. J. M. Robertson, as President of the Rationalist Peace Society, delivered an address at Caxton Hall on Monday evening. The suffragettes paid him a visit there in order to show how little they cared for peace, reason, or anything else except their own object. They insisted on being ejected, and Peace and Rationalism were left in possession of the field.

Another mere man has tried the hunger-strike. It was Mr. James Byrne, of the Irish Transport Workers' Union. He was awaiting trial on a charge connected with the Dublin strike. He had a handsome public funeral. But he had better have kept alive. It is sometimes harder to live and fight for a cause than to die for it. His act was ill-advised—but he had the courage of his own convictions, and we take off our hat to his memory.

Annie Winifred Holman, of Bournemouth, three years of age, daughter of a licensed victualler, said her prayers one night and then slipped off the bed on the back of her head, and died soon afterwards. The jury returned a verdict of Accidental Death. But what was "Providence" doing?

In the recently published book, Shelley, Godwin, and their Circle, by Mr. H. N. Brailsford, the author refers to "Tom" Paine, but he never once makes the mistake of writing "Bill" Godwin.

"To grow to full stature we must imitate Christ," says a writer in a pious contemporary. Recruiting sergeants will find this recipe useful in dealing with undersized clients.

"Materialism is the danger of the age," says the Earl of Selborne. Yet the dear clergy are always informing us that Materialism is dead—though nobody ever heard of its funeral.

Undertakers' men have threatened to strike at Liverpool, and coffin-makers have promised to join them. We foresee a risk of the dead "speaking."

The Rt. Hon. H. H. Asquith, speaking at the Queen's Hall, London, last week, at a meeting in connection with the Cavendish Association, said "there was no evidence to show that Christian ideals had grown less powerful or more dim." Maybe! But they are not as fashionable as they used to be.

The Dean of Rochester has been advising girls to "never read novels in the morning." Does he include the Bible?

Bishop Boyd Carpenter, presiding at a conference of publishers, editors, newsagents, and librarians, at the Guildhall, London, recently, said a Government measure was in preparation regarding objectionable publications. Will the Old Testament be included?

In the latest report of the British and Foreign Bible Society, just issued, there is no mention of the success of the version of "God's Word" in the cannibal dialect, which was advertised some years ago. Have the cannibals eaten each other? Or have they eaten the missionaries?

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Adams, of Newton Longville, Bletchley, celebrated their diamond wedding on Nov. 6. The old gentleman has twenty-nine grandchildren, and he presented them with Bibles in honor of the event. Their religious education must have been very much neglected to make such a present desirable. For you can't realise on a Bible if you get hard up.

Father Bernard Vaughan deplores the apathy of Catholics in the matter of charity. There were only about a hundred present at the Catholic United Charities' sale of work which he opened in London recently. Yet there were from seven to eight million people living in Greater London. It was shameful. Father Vaughan said he felt his heart bleeding. He could go away in tears. But why on earth doesn't he think a little instead of jawing so much? Giving to the poor, as the Bible says, is lending to the Lord. Why then don't the rich Catholics shell out? Why do they neglect such a good investment? Is it (we ask with fear and trembling) that they mistrust the security?

Father Vaughan looks very like a failure. He has been trying to raise the birth-rate in England for years—and still it goes down. He should turn his attention to something else.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

December 7 and 14, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £244 11s. 1d. Received since :—H. Good, 6s.; C. Heaton, 5s.; Dovre, £2 2s.; H. Boll, 5s.; Pretoria Freethinker, 10s.; Robert Stirton and Friends, Dundee (quarterly), £1 4s.

C. HEATON.—Glad you still find the Freethinker both instructive and entertaining. The circular you refer to is "all right."

J. T. LLOYD.—You will see it was lucky that you wrote. We wish you first-rate audiences at Glasgow and freedom from the colds that are oftener caught in trains than got rid of there.

M. CLARK.—Pleased to hear from a twenty years' reader.

G. BRADY.—Thanks for your kind reply; also for the Freethinker volumes on the way.

J. B. IRVINE.—You have a legal right to withdraw your child from religious instruction in any elementary public school. In regard to private schools you have no legal right, but an arrangement is generally possible nowadays between parents and principals.

F. H. COPLAND.—Passed over to shop manager. Sorry the paper has not reached you lately. It has been sent regularly from our office. Will you make inquiries at your own end?

H. BOLL.—Thanks for good wishes with subscription.

R. STIRTON.—Glad your list is "on the up grade again." Accept our thanks for your generous service in the matter.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid :—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote lectures in London for the first time since his illness on the first Sunday in December at the Queen's (Minor) Hall. He will occupy the same platform on the following Sunday. He is devoting his time mainly to literary work at present, of which his friends will hear more in due course.

Mr. Lloyd lectures at Glasgow to-day (Nov. 16). Particulars of time and place will be found among "Lecture Notices." We do not know the subjects, as we have received no notice from Glasgow this week, but on any subjects Mr. Lloyd will be interesting and informing.

We beg to call our readers' attention again to the old pamphlet by Charles Bradlaugh on Compulsory Cultivation of the Land. It shows how far Mr. Lloyd George was anticipated by the wicked "Iconoclast." Admirers of Bradlaugh should order a copy of this pamphlet. They will find it very interesting from the personal point of view. Order of the Pioneer Press and send threepence-halfpenny.

We are trying to do the Rev. Joseph Hocking a good turn by supplying him with a little information, which he needs very badly. He told a London audience last week that Bradlaugh was dead, and Atheism was dead, and "There was not a man to stand up and proclaim a Godless life to-day." We beg pardon for correcting so great a man, but there are scores of Atheist speakers to-day. He might also find that a paper called the Freethinker publishes Atheism for thousands of readers every week. The Clarion publishes the same sort of thing, and only kicks at the word Atheism.

Ingersoll on Oratory.

"WHAT advice would you give to a young man who was ambitious to become a successful public speaker or orator?"

"In the first place," said Colonel Ingersoll, "I would advise him to have something to say—something worth saying—something that people would be glad to hear. This is the important thing. Back of the art of speaking must be the power to think. Without thoughts words are empty purses. Most people imagine that almost any words uttered in a loud voice and accompanied by appropriate gestures constitute an oration. I would advise the young man to study his subject, to find what others had thought, to look at it from all sides. Then I would tell him to write out his thoughts, or to arrange them in his mind, so that he would know exactly what he was going to say. Waste no time on the how until you are satisfied with the what. After you know what you are to say, then you can think of how it should be said. Then you can think about tone, emphasis, and gesture; but if you really understand what you say, emphasis, tone, and gesture will take care of themselves. All these should come from the inside. They should be in perfect harmony with the feelings. Voice and gesture should be governed by the emotions. They should unconsciously be in perfect agreement with the sentiments. The orator should be true to his subject, should avoid any reference to himself.

"The great column of his argument should be unbroken. He can adorn it with vines and flowers, but they should not be in such profusion as to hide the column. He should give variety of episode by illustrations, but they should be used only for the purpose of adding strength to the argument. The man who wishes to become an orator should study language. He should know the deeper meaning of words. He should understand the vigor and velocity of verbs and the color of adjectives. He should know how to sketch a scene, to paint a picture, to give life and action. He should be a poet and a dramatist, a painter and an actor. He should cultivate his imagination. He should become familiar with the great poetry and fiction, with splendid and heroic deeds. He should be a student of Shakespeare. He should read and devour the great plays. From Shakespeare he could learn the art of expression, of compression, and all the secrets of the head and heart.

"The great orator is full of variety—of surprises. Like a juggler, he keeps the colored balls in the air. He expresses himself in pictures. His speech is a panorama. By continued change he holds the attention. The interest does not flag. He does not allow himself to be anticipated. He is always in advance. He does not repeat himself. A picture is shown but once. So an orator should avoid the commonplace. There should be no stuffing, no filling. He should put no cotton with his silk, no common metals with his gold. He should remember that 'gilded dust is not as good as dusted gold.' The great orator is honest, sincere. He does not pretend. His brain and heart go together. Every drop of his blood is convinced. Nothing is forced. He knows exactly what he wishes to do—knows when he has finished it, and stops.

"Only a great orator knows when and how to close. Most speakers go on after they are through. They are satisfied only with a lame and impotent conclusion. Most speakers lack variety. They travel a straight and dusty road. The great orator is full of episode. He convinces and charms by indirection. He leaves the roads, visits the fields, wanders in the woods, listens to the murmurs of springs, the song of birds. He gathers flowers, scales the crags, and comes back to the highway refreshed and invigorated. He does not move in a straight line. He wanders and winds like a stream.

"Of course, no one can tell a man what to do to become an orator. The great orator has that wonderful thing called presence. He has the strange something known as magnetism. He must have a flexible, musical voice, capable of expressing the pathetic, the humorous, the heroic. His body must move in unison with his thought. He must be a reasoner, a logician. He must have a keen sense of humor—of the laughable. He must have wit, sharp and quick. He must have sympathy. His smiles should be the neighbors of his tears. He must have imagination. He should give eagles to the air, and painted moths should flutter in the sunlight.

"While I cannot tell a man what to do to become an orator, I can tell him a few things not to do. There should be no introduction to an oration. The orator should commence with his subject. There should be no prelude, no flourish, no apology, no explanation. He should say nothing about himself. Like a sculptor, he stands by his block of stone. Every stroke is for a purpose. As he works the form begins to appear. When the statue is finished the workman stops.

Gustave Courbet: Realist.

TIME is the great vindicator of all things. High and low, great and small, all must submit to her final ruling. You cannot escape her. Pæans of praise and crowns of laurels may be yours; torrents of abuse and the marks of insult may be another's. But Time alone can adjust these rights and wrongs. The poet Shelley, during his life and after, suffered all this abuse and insult. And so with the musician Wagner, and the painter Courbet. These great geniuses had to bear the vicious onslaught of those utter mediocrities, the puritans of art and society. It is the lot of everyone, as Murger says in La Bohème, who "dares to harness audacity to their talent." The audacity of Shelley, Wagner, and Courbet consisted in holding to, and practising, something more than the fatuous screed of "Art for Art's sake." They preferred the higher doctrine of "Art for Life's sake."

Shelley is one of the world's great poets; but he was an Atheist and a Republican, and he said so. It took the world half a century to get over his saying so. Wagner is one of the world's great musicians; but he was a Freethinker, a State-banned rebel, and a disturber of conventional art. It took the world almost as long to forgive him his heresies. Courbet is among the world's great painters (although not yet recognised); but he was an Atheist, an Anarchist, and a rebel in art, and although thirty years have passed since his death, yet abuse and insult still cling to his name. But Time's judgment is near at hand. Perhaps her voice may even now be heard.

I.

Last year a book was published, entitled Gustave Courbet, by Leonce Benedite. It is the first and only book in English on this great master. The author is a State curator—i.e., an "official"—and I suppose that is why the old abuse and insult has still to be maintained against the artist. But more of this presently. This year we have a work by one of our own art littérateurs—Sir Frederick Wedmore—entitled Painters and Painting, which contains a great pronouncement upon our subject. Courbet is here considered "a very giant of painting," and "the greatest master of la bonne peinture." It is surely the first words of Time's vindication.

II.

Courbet began his career in a revolution, and finished it in one. He came to Paris in 1839, at the age of twenty, to study law; but he soon abandoned books and briefs for the brush and palette. At twenty-two he was actually a painter. Two years later he exhibited, and won recognition with his Courbet with the Black Dog. It was the first "blow struck for realism," as he himself would say. The stormy days of '48 came, and with the triumph of the political rebels arose the success of the art rebels—the Romanticists. Courbet was with them in their revolt against "official art"; but he was naturally, as a realist, poles asunder from them in their conception of art. As he said in 1855, "I have not imitated the old, nor copied the new. I have simply sought to nurture my own intelligent and independent individuality." And thus it was that, in 1849, when his After Dinner at Ornans flashed upon the world of art, that both the arch-Romanticist, Delacroix, and the arch-Classicist, Ingres, looked with disfavor upon the work.

Whatever critics may attempt in classifying Courbet's art, we must remember that he himself wished to be called a "realist," believing, as he did, that "in pictorial design just as in literature, reality, the thing seen, and the emotion felt or witnessed or divined, must be the basis of the performance that is to last." Courbet's "realism" was, then, the thing seen. His art was based upon synthesis, not upon analysis. It was not the object in precise detail, but the object under the artist's sense of feeling, distance, movement, atmosphere, as he really saw it. That is what Courbet considered Truth in Art.

In judging art or literature, it is always interesting to seek the personality that is bound up causally with it. Courbet was an inherent rebel. His "rebellion" was part and parcel of his physical structure. No one who has ever seen his portrait could doubt that. It moulded not only his personal character, but his art also. His "realism" was nothing if not the result of sheer physiological necessity. Just as he was forced, by the very nature of his being, to take a stand for truth in art, so he was impelled towards truth in life. As a "realist," his view of the riddle of the universe led him to Atheism. As a "realist," his view of society led him to Anarchism. It was the one immutable physical law all round—necessity.

Few artists, not even Manet, have been subjected to such a vocabulary of abuse as Courbet and his realism. But the truth is, he had something more than mere art opposition to contend with. There were political and clerical enemies that worked behind the scenes; for Courbet was not content with holding the tenets of Anarchism and Atheism, but he must preach them, and, what is more, practise them. Courbet was a friend and disciple of Proudhon, the author of What is Property? They first met in 1848, and some years later collaborated in a work entitled The Principles of Art, and its Social Purpose. From the days of '48 to 1871, Courbet was an habitué of the revolutionary groups, and ever voicing the necessity for the "social revolution." This gave umbrage to the "respectable" folk. It is worthy of note that among his portraits are those of the rebels Henri Rochefort, Jules Vallès, and Cluseret, as well as Proudhon and his Family. There can be no doubt that many of his detractors were influenced more on account of his social and religious heresies than his art heresies. His "respectable" friends were continually urging him to keep solely to his art. It was either Baudelaire or Champfleury who said to Courbet one day: "You are talking too much and painting too little." To which Courbet replied: "Here's another fellow who has sold himself to the government!"

Courbet believed, as may be judged from his book just referred to, in a social purpose in art, both in the didactic and subjective sense, such as attracted G. F. Watts, and in the concrete and objective, which was the mission of William Morris. How much of the former he expressed in his works, we have subjects only to guide us, although Proudhon read a social moral in them all. Courbet loved "the people," and some of his finest studies are taken from them, which seems to bear out Mazzini's idea that the power of genius was strengthened by the sense of social aim. The Stonebreakers, The Poor of the Village, The Beggar's Charity, Peasants of Flagey, and Haymakers Nooning belong to this class. One of these, The Beggar's Charity, will one day be considered among the greatest creations of the painter of Ornans, although it is scarcely ever mentioned. The Stonebreakers has figures life-size, and you can almost feel the heavy toil. Proudhon called it "morality in action." One critic, attempting a sneer at the artist's creed, said it would make an excellent altar-piece in a church for Agnostics.

Courbet extended his humanity even to animals. Look at the dogs in At Bay (in the Louvre), hesitating between the antlers of the wounded stag and the huntsman's whip. I think it was Max Nordau who said that Courbet gave his animals souls. Another canvas of "pity" is Run Down in the Snow, where you see the poor hunted doe at the end of the chase, panting and helpless in the snow. He painted a good number of these subjects—The Fox Hunt, Dogs and the Hare, The Quarry, The Hunter by Water; and humanitarians will always reverence Courbet for them.

Over Courbet's studies from "the people" the critics had stormed and raved with such phrases as "painting dirt," "brutalising art," "reasoned ugliness," etc. They could scarcely adopt this language with his animal subjects; so they tried another tack. One critic defied the painter to specify the breed of his dogs. Edmond About was in great humor at the way Courbet's huntsmen held the horn. Maxime du Camp asked the artist if he was aware that hunting in the snow had been prohibited since 1844, and ended by saying: "It is of no great matter, but I understood that the realist only painted what he saw." And this was the stuff that passed for criticism, and the public accepted it as such. How foolish it all was, even in fact. We can now read in a letter of Courbet's (1853) where he actually relates his experience in following a chase over the countryside up to his thighs in snow. As for About's humor over the horn, Courbet was right. The cor de chasse is held as he depicts it. Of course, About had most likely only seen the cor chromatique, and imagined they were both held alike.

In 1868 Courbet produced a work entitled The Return from the Conference, which exasperated the critics more than ever, on account of its satire upon priests. Courbet, as I have said, was an Atheist, and an anti-clerical to boot.* He used to boast that he was "the pre-appointed historian of the priests," whom he hated. As early as 1850 his Funeral at Ornans, which Sir Frederick Wedmore considers "one of the great pictures of the world," gave offence by reason of its caricature of officials and priests. Chennevieres called it "impious." Gautier said the faces reminded him of a menagerie. But this work was respectability itself beside the Return from the Conference. Courbet was quite prepared for an "uproar" with this picture, and he got it. The Salon indignantly refused it as "an outrage on religion and morality," and even the Salon des Réfuses wouldn't touch it. Proudhon, of course, gave his benediction. He called it "an inevitable reaction of Nature against the Ideal." The picture represents several curés returning home from a conference. They have all dined well, if not wisely; and one, more tipsy than the rest, is astride a donkey, supported very indifferently by two others, who have also had more than sufficient of "the mellow." There are some half-dozen of these precious soul-savers, and a delicious piece of study they make. A peasant standing by is convulsed with laughter, though his wife, out of sheer habit, is on her knees in reverence.

On the refusal of the picture by the salons, Courbet threw his house open for the public to view it, and determined to paint companion pictures, one of which was to be La Coucher de la Conférence. Champfleury then wrote to Buchon (both friends of Courbet):—

> "Courbet has been telling Saint Beuve that he is going to paint another picture of the priests.....He is making a great mistake.....Whatever he may say—The Return from the Conference was a great setback. .....In Heaven's name keep him from symbolism and satire."

Well, it seems that friends finally dissuaded Courbet from his project, although La Coucher was not altogether forgotten, as it appeared in a series of vignettes in a pamphlet entitled Les Curés en goguette, published at Brussels in 1868. Champfleury uses a mild word when he says The Return was a "setback." It might have been that then, but the clericals bore that picture in mind when they took their revenge upon Courbet at the suppression of the Commune.

III.

Of Courbet's connection with the Paris Commune of 1871, M. Benedite, in his recent book, has repeated the old jargon about the Vendôme Column. Courbet, as is well known, took a prominent part in the Commune, and during its brief régime the well-known Vendôme Column was destroyed. Courbet has been charged with being the chief instigator of its destruction, and history has laid the sole blame upon him. M. Benedite says that Courbet had recommended its destruction even in the days of the Government of National Defence. This is not true. Courbet did not recommend its destruction, but suggested its removal to the Esplanade des Invalides. Its destruction had certainly been advocated, not by Courbet, but by no less a person than Auguste Comte, and a certain member of the government that afterwards sent Courbet to prison for "vandalism"—Ernest Picard. The decree for the demolition of the column was passed by the Communal Council on April 12, and as Courbet was not elected to the Council till April 16, he could not take any active part in the decrees. M. Benedite says further that Courbet "urged" the Commne to carry out the project. When and where was this urging? I have read every line of the sittings of the Commune in its Journal Officiel, but have seen nothing of this save one instance, which, M. Benedite must know, Courbet disclaimed.

Of course, this story has served for forty years an excellent purpose for all Courbet's art detractors, to say nothing of political and clerical enemies. But surely it is high time that we inquired a little further than from these. However, right or wrong, Courbet paid the penalty in full during his life. Arrested and tried by the Courts-Martial, he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment and a fine. That was not all. He was made a social outlaw, and his name and pictures were spat upon. In 1872, when he sent his picture Le Femme de Munich to the Salon, the jury rejected it, one of them—Messonier—saying they would not even look at it. "It is not a question of Art," he said, "but one of dignity." At Ornans, his native town, the municipal council actually removed his statue, a gift, of the Pêcheur de Chavots from the Iles-Basses fountain.

The heaviest blow came the following year, when the Chamber voted for the reconstruction of the Vendôme Column, and mulcted Courbet in its cost, over three hundred thousand francs. Poor Courbet fled to Switzerland, thinking to evade this cruel demand. But his property at Ornans and Paris was seized. The Prussians had already destroyed his studio at the former, and now the State despoiled his two in Paris. Pictures entrusted or lent to friends were seized, valuables and moneys at banks, all were impounded. And so Courbet went into exile, and in the little republic of the canton of de Vaud he found not only shelter but honor. But his art days were over. In November, 1877, came the news of the sale of his pictures, and they had gone for a pittance. A month later "amnesty" came, not from France, but from one who gave peace as well as pardon—Death!

IV.

Courbet's chef d'œuvre now hangs in the Louvre. It is called The Wave, and this is what Sir Frederick Wedmore says of it:—Courbet's "noble painting," says the writer, "is a new thing in painting: a piece than which no sea-piece by Turner or by Constable, by Cotman or by Boudin, can possibly be more expressive. Again it must be said quite plainly, The Wave is one of the world's masterpieces."

H. GEORGE FARMER.

* Among his most intimate friends, who were all militant Freethinkers, was Hippolyte Barnout, a well-known architect, editor of The Atheist, a Freethought journal of the 'sixties and 'seventies.

Pioneers of Physiology.—II.

(Concluded from p. 716.)

As we have seen, Vesalius established modern anatomical science on a purely inductive basis. Some of his conclusions were criticised, and in a few instances corrected, by his disciples; but these amendments were made in terms of observation and experiment. The truth was in each instance ascertained, not by an appeal to the written word of Galen or Vesalius, but by a further study of the facts themselves. Thus was the road made clearer for the even greater revolution which William Harvey was destined to accomplish.

Had the physician Michael Servetus devoted less attention to the barren fields of theology, and more attention to the productive pastures of science, his services to civilisation would have been far greater than they were. An early suspect, he was compelled to flee from Spain in order to escape the clutches of the Inquisition. He studied astronomy, geography, jurisprudence, meteorology, in turn, and strove to pierce the secrets of God through a knowledge of the human frame.

> "To know, said he, the spirit of God, we must know the spirit of man; and to truly know the spirit of man, we must know the structure and working of the body in which the spirit resides."

To this end he studied the human body, and passages in his Restitutio prove that he was well on the road towards an understanding of the true processes of the circulation of the blood. But his career was destined to be a short one. The father of Unitarianism refused to recant his anti-Trinitarian heresies, and was burnt alive by the command of that unbending upholder of the right of private judgment, John Calvin, at Geneva in 1553.

> "With him, or at the same time, there was burnt the whole edition of 1,000 copies of his book, the Restitutio, with the exception of some copies that had passed into the hands of friends."

Servetus was a martyr to the twin causes of Science and Freethought; but however much the enemies of enlightenment obstruct the paths of progress, they have never yet succeeded in permanently arresting the advance of the human spirit. At the time of Servetus' tragic death, Gabrielus Falloppius was teaching anatomy from the chair of his noble and approved good master, Vesalius, at Padua. The Falloppian tubes and the Falloppian canal perpetuate his name. But he made no particularly important contributions to the progress of physiology, and it is with the epoch-making demonstration of the processes of the blood that the remainder of this article is mainly concerned.

A more important link in the chain of physiological evolution is represented by another pupil of Vesalius—Realdus Columbus, the man who opposed, and as some think betrayed, his master. There seems little room for doubt that Columbus stole, and stole without the slightest compunction, not only from Vesalius, but from Servetus also. His posthumous work, De Re Anatomica, was modelled on Vesalius' Fabrica.

> "The frontispiece even, is a bad imitation of Vesalius' frontispiece, and the work ends as does Vesalius' with a chapter on vivisection, the one being little more than a varied repetition of the other."

His indebtedness to Servetus is plainly proved by the fact that in describing the pulmonary circulation, Columbus practically repeats the Spanish physician's statements.

Nevertheless, it is only just to remember that Columbus described, and correctly described, the pulmonary circulation. And he showed that all the blood vessels were filled with that ruddy liquid, and that the spirits and vapors with which the vitalists of that day peopled the arteries were entirely mythical.

A further advance was made by Caesalpinus of Pisa towards the solution of the blood's circulation. He discovered that—

> "the heart, at its systole, discharges it contents into the aorta (and pulmonary artery), and at its diastole receives blood from the vena cava (and pulmonary vein)."

Although the valves of the veins appear to have been known to earlier inquirers, Fabricius, a pupil of Falloppius, was the first to explain their structure. He clearly recognised that the valves of the veins, while in no way obstructing the flow of the venous blood towards the heart, would offer serious opposition to the flowing of blood from the heart. But Fabricius was too much under the influence of traditional doctrines to fully appreciate the true meaning of his discovery. He regarded the valves as regulating organs merely, and compares them with the mechanical appliances with which water is dammed up for future use.

It was reserved to William Harvey to gather together into one harmonic whole the discoveries of Fabricius and his forerunners, and to reveal to the world the real mechanism of the circulatory system which forms the foundation of modern physiology.

Harvey was born at Folkestone in 1578. His father was a yeoman, and his brothers were successful merchants in London City. After taking his Arts degree at Cambridge in 1579, he proceeded to Italy to study medicine under the celebrated Fabricius at Padua. In 1602 he received the Paduan degree of Doctor of Medicine, and returned to England in the same year.

Settling in London, he soon joined the Royal College of Physicians, and was appointed Physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital in 1608. Six years later he commenced his famous lectures on Anatomy at the College of Physicians, in which he propounded his theories concerning the heart and the blood. His written work, however, the Exercitatio, was not published until 1628.

Harvey's growing fame increased his medical practice, and he numbered Francis Bacon and the Earl of Arundel among his patients. He accompanied the latter on his embassy to Ferdinand II, and sometimes caused his patron considerable anxiety for his safety. Harvey wandered far in search of objects of natural history in a country overrun by robbers, who had been made what they were by the Thirty Years' War of religion. The country had been reduced to such a sorry state that Harvey tells us in a letter written at the time that—

> "By the way, we could scarce see a dogg, crow, kite, raven, or any bird, or anything to anatomise; only sum few miserable people, the reliques of the war and the plague whom famine had made anatomies before I came."

This, however, was not Harvey's only experience of the dire disasters of war. Physician to Charles I, he was naturally a cavalier, and was consequently regarded with disfavor by the Parliamentary Party. It appears that during the Civil War, "his lodgings at Whitehall were searched and not only the furniture seized but also invaluable manuscripts and anatomical preparations." To this exasperating destruction of precious scientific material, the poet Cowley thus refers:—

> "O cursed war! who can forgive thee this?
> Houses and towns may rise again,
> And ten times easier 'tis
> To rebuild Paul's than any work of his."

When Harvey first set his mind to master the motions and uses of the heart, the perplexities of the problem were so hard to overcome that he was inclined to abandon his search as hopeless. But patient study at last showed him that—

> "the motion of the heart consists in a certain universal tension.....that when the heart contracts it is emptied, that the motion which is in general regarded as the diastole of the heart is in truth its systole."

Stated in other words, the heart throbs, not when it sucks blood in, but when it drives blood out. From this discovery flowed important consequences. It was at once apparent that the blood which each systole discharges into the arteries sets up a pressure on its containing vessels which causes the pulses; the artery swells at different points of its course, not in order to suck blood into it, but simply because blood is driven into it by the pressure of the constricting systole of the heart.

Following this discovery, Harvey soon gained a clear conception of the working of the auricles and ventricles and valves of the central blood vessel. Every mystical element in the motions of the heart was now eliminated; the pulsations of that organ were fully interpreted in terms of stress and strain. And now, guided by the considerations which had led to a complete explanation of the circulation of the blood within the heart itself, and throughout its neighboring vessels, Harvey ventured to put forward a conception which—

> "was of so novel and unheard of a character that in putting it forward he not only feared injury to himself from the envy of a few, but trembled lest he should have mankind at large for his enemies."

Yet this startling departure merely consisted in applying to the circulation, as a whole, the self-same laws which governed the lesser circulation of the heart and its adjuncts.

In thus extending his principle, Harvey was guided by purely materialistic considerations. He argued that at every heart-beat a certain quantity of blood passes from the vena cava to the aorta, and that in a short space of time the heart derives from the veins and sends to the arteries all the blood that the human body contains. In the words of that eminent physiologist, the late Sir Michael Foster:—

> "It is obvious, therefore, that the blood which the heart sends along the arteries to the tissues cannot be supplied merely by that blood which exists in the veins as the result of the ingesta of food and drink; only a small part can be so accounted for; the greater part of that blood must be blood which has returned from the tissues to the veins; the blood in the tissues passes from the arteries to the veins, in some such way as in the lungs it passes from the veins (through the heart) to the arteries; the blood moves in a circle from the left side of the heart, through the arteries, the tissues and the veins to the right side of the heart, and from thence through the lungs to the left side of the heart."

Harvey's investigations showed clearly why the heart was emptied when the vena cava—the vein which fed it—was obstructed, and why it became swollen with blood when the aorta—the artery into which it discharged its blood—was tied. It was now obvious why a ligature which pressed on the veins, caused a limb to swell with blood, whereas a ligature which embraced an artery blocked its channel and made the limb pale for want of blood. Now was made plain the reason why the body could be drained of its entire blood supply by opening a single vein. And now became apparent the purpose which the valves of the veins served in the circulatory system, and the whole process of circulation became purely mechanical in its workings.

Harvey's demonstration was a great triumph for scientific Materialism. As Sir Michael Foster says:

> "Harvey's argument is essentially a physical mechanical argument; the problem which he puts before himself to solve is essentially a mechanical physical problem; the solution of that problem at which he arrived is essentially a mechanical solution of the phenomena of the circulation."

In our day paper psychologists, as Maudsley contemptuously calls them, continue to befog the problems of brain function with fancies and fictions. And in Harvey's time, the problems of blood circulation were obscured by theories concerning the existence of various kinds of spirits—natural, vital, and animal. Once only does Harvey condescend to notice these imaginary entities, and he then proceeds to demonstrate the truth of his discovery on purely mechanical principles. As a result, the "spirits" disappeared, and although their names lingered long afterwards, no physiologist of later times has ever regarded them seriously.

The main feature of Harvey's discovery was, that the blood which courses through the body is the same blood which again and again returns to the heart. It travels from the arteries to the veins in the tissues, and from the veins to the arteries through the lungs and heart, undergoing changes in the substance and pores of the tissues, and in the substance and pores of the lungs.

In the absence of the microscope, which came into use later, Harvey was unable to demonstrate the complete course of the circulation. He had no conception of the marvellous capillary system which unites the arteries with the veins. The capillaries were discovered by Malpighi some fifty years later, and the Italian physiologist actually showed them to the wondering eyes of the aged Harvey, who, in his declining days, was thus enabled to realise the complete circuit of the blood through the body.

The life and labors of William Harvey serve once again to illustrate the oft-urged verity that—

> "the greatness of all great men is partly built on the worth of those who have gone before. In science, no man's results are wholly his own; like living things, they come from something which lived before. Vesalius, Fabricius, and the rest led up to Harvey; but they were not Harvey. He was himself, and his greatness is in no wise lessened by its having come through them."

T. F. PALMER.

The Vultures of Faith.

WICKED, blatant infidel,
For Jesus caring naught,
Take this warning—cease your scorning,
Listen to be taught.

In the morning of your days
You may laugh at death;
But there'll come a time, my friend,
When you'll fight for breath.

When around your dying head
Things will fade to mist,
Will you then our faith despise,
Wicked Atheist?

Many such as you have laughed
At the thought of hell;
'Twas an easy thing to do—
Youthful, strong, and well.

But the reaper's shadow came,
Health fled from them fast,
Sight grew feeble, pulse grew slack,
They believed at last.

Wicked, blatant infidel,
Death may come to you,
Night or morning, without warning,
Hear the Gospel true.

. . . .

Puny little Christian soul,
Paltry little worm,
Maggot who infests the dead,
Cease awhile to squirm.

Keep your promises and threats,
And your craven fears,
For a muddy mind like yours
Or your dull compeers.

Many lies contain a germ
Of the precious truth;
Fear of death is rarely found
In healthy, lusty youth.

You do well to seek, my friend,
Moribund recruits;
For the crack-brained ranks of faith
Vigor little suits.

In the darkness of our days,
Like a hungry beast,
On the brain that now decays
Superstition feasts.

And for every falterer,
Through fear or feeble mind,
The fertile liars of your breed
A thousand "converts" find.

Christian vulture, hover on
At the feast of death,
Croak your warning night and morning
With your tainted breath.

Mental racks and moral cripples,
Minds in last decay,
You may keep—let cowards weep
And tremble while you bray.

Putrid soil belief may nourish,
Keep your barren ground;
Philosophy will only flourish
Where the sane abound.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 47 SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

He that would end his days well must spend them well.
—HENRY MONTAGU,
Earl of Manchester (seventeenth century).

From the Capitol Terrace.

THE day will surely come when high-spirited men will rejoice in the traditions of nations once opposed to their own;—rejoice, and not merely show respect. I dreamed of such a time when, one Sunday evening, in November, 1913, I walked slowly along the broad Pennsylvania Avenue towards the Capitol at Washington.

Only the day before, I had looked from a rising ground into the smoky valley of Monongahela at Pittsburg, Pa., and watched the gigantic steel-works making machinery for five continents. This was a throbbing representative of the industry of the American people, unresting, inventive, passionate. Now I had come to the serenity of the Federal City, where the genius of the Republic broods over the dominion that stretches from ocean to ocean, and from the lakes of the St. Lawrence to the tides of the Mexican Gulf. Daylight was gently lessening, and an orange glow brightened the West. The sunset rays sparkled on the glass in the windows of the dome which rose over a most glorious pillared building constructed of sandstone and marble. This was the Capitol, the corner-stone of which was laid by George Washington, September 18, 1793.

Open-air speaking is permitted at certain spots along the Pennsylvania Avenue, and I paused to hear what two small groups of citizens were listening to. One group were gathered about a wild-man-of-the-woods sort of orator (he said he lived with the eagles on the hills of California!), who had lifted on high a pole bearing a placard; and on the placard ran the inscription, "Did Adam belong to the Colored Race?" As it happened, the wild man's remarks were very irrelevant, and I had no time to wait for the development of the argument; and I am still unable to say whether there are good reasons for believing Adam to have been a negro. I suppose, but I am not sure, it would follow that Eve was a negress, since she evolved her beauty from a rib of her honored spouse. A negress, spectacled and anxious, stood among the crowd, and I could not help wishing she might be comforted by the lecturer's assurance that she and Eve had close resemblances.

The next group were somewhat listlessly attending to a band of Evangelical missioners, some white, and some mulatto. When a feeble hymn had creaked its last bar, an elderly colored preacher, whose grey hair and brown face were contrasted with a white tie and white collar, opened the Bible, and read the text "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me?" For various reasons, I felt melancholy myself as I hearkened; everybody else looked melancholy; and the good old evangelist (should he happen to read these lines!) may take it from me that his sermon quite distinctly affected a contributor to the Freethinker.

But the gold and crimson light on the dome of the Capitol drew me forward. I halted again when I saw the Peace Monument under the shadow of the trees at the entrance to the Grounds. It commemorates the close of the Civil War, 1861-5, and America weeps at the record of pain and death, and Victory upholds the wreath, and Peace offers the olive branch. Then I hastened up many steps to the noble terrace that extends along the western front. Here I meditated, while the crescent moon graced the twilight, and the lamps of the city flashed out along the avenues.

It seemed to me so natural that, when all humanity becomes consciously, as well as historically, one race, the generous heart should pass from land to land, and be glad impartially to recall the story of the struggles and achievements of each people. Wars and massacres we must everlastingly regret, and the act of disembowelling one's fellow-man can never become sacred in history or art. But, above all the lamentable brutalities which have accompanied the progress of civilisations and the strife for liberty, there soared the spirit,—pure relatively, and ever purer as the ages succeeded,—which aspired towards human idealisation. We can none of us work more devotedly for a cherished cause than did our forefathers; but we can work more intelligently, more wisely, and more fraternally. In other words, we shall learn how to improve the world without war, and reconcile conflicting interests without malice.

When that necessary qualification is made, however, I claim that we may honorably and joyfully sympathise with the valiant efforts of our ancestors and predecessors to break fetters, political or spiritual, under no matter what star, or on no matter what far shore. Willingly and patriotically, I render homage to the finer souls among our barbaric English fathers, the feudal baronage that aided in the establishment of our Parliament, the seventeenth-century Puritans who removed the bauble of Divine monarchic right, and the Radicals and Trade Unionists who laid the basis of the democracy that is not yet completed in our islands. With equal admiration, I salute the makers of the French Revolution,* and the initiators of that tremendous upheaval which introduced a new age, a new thought, and a new popular activity. In like manner, and without any national class-distinctions, —without, for instance, implying that Spain is decadent and the Turks moribund,—may we not be happy to greet every sign of growth, of spontaneity, enlightenment in Turk, Spaniard, Chinaman, or African; and every record of progress in the annals of the past in every quarter of the globe?

Hence, English of the English as I am, I do not see why I should not be proud in America's pride, and catch the inspiration of her dignified rebellion against the unreasoning demands of my own fatherland. On this terrace of the Capitol, and under this starry heaven (for night has now fallen on the pilgrim), I applaud the courage and resolution which nerved Washington, Adams, Hamilton, Paine, Franklin, to direct the destinies of the United States towards a glory that never could have been attained by a people that submitted to injustice. And, again, why should not I, English as I am, respond to the grandeur of Lincoln's consecration—with the exception of one phrase,—of the Gettysburg cemetery?—

* So much so, that I follow the Positivist plan of dating letters from the year 1789, this present year being the 125th.

> "The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather, to be dedicated here, to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause to which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

We will except the phrase under God, and the Gettysburg address has additional force; for it then expresses the self-reliance of the human heart, determined at all hazards to prove its power for heroism and an ever-enlarging co-operation.

What I have said comes to this, that we are approaching a stage of human thought at which, instead of studying the attributes of God, we shall contemplate the achievements of a civilisation that has incessantly struggled to purify itself, and that conducts this struggle in all peoples, and not merely in a nation here or a nation there. How rich is history in treasures of bravery and sincerity if only we searched its pages with a keener sense of human values! How rich is daily life all over the world, if we will but open our eyes to the endless creation of generous ideas and generous service! These riches are a universal heritage. The glory of one country is the glory of humanity, and he who acts finely does it for mankind.

Such were my thoughts on the esplanade of the Capitol of Washington.

As I returned along the Avenue, the ancient preacher was wearily terminating his sermon, and still he sighed,—"O wretched man that I am!"

Poor soul! The Nineteenth Century, in its more foolish moments, taught this negro mind a creed that was already declining. Education and the Twentieth Century will bring in music instead of this wheezy dirge.

F. J. GOULD.

Washington, D.C., U.S.A., November, 1913.

Nonconformist Cant.

OF all shams in the modern religious world, the sham of Nonconformity is about the worst. Nonconformists talk loudly about their having a "Free" Church, when as a matter of fact the average Nonconformist chapel is more hidebound by orthodox dogmas than any other. It is, indeed, one of their complaints against the Church of England that too much freedom is allowed its ministers, and more than once Nonconformists have urged the State to interfere and put down illegal religious practices. They denounce Churchmen for accepting State aid, and at the same time seek relief from taxation by every possible means. They denounce State patronage, and eagerly grasp and loudly demand official recognition at State and municipal functions. They talk about freedom of opinion, and meanwhile help to maintain Blasphemy Laws and Sunday laws specially intended to oppress one set of opinions and maintain another set. If Nonconformists were genuine in their talk, these laws would be swept away almost at once. As it is, they continue with their cant about freedom and equality until the very name of Nonconformist has become a synonym for deep-grained hypocrisy.

I am, of course, speaking of Nonconformists as a whole. There are exceptions to the general run, but these only serve to throw into greater relief the truth of what has just been said. Amongst these exceptions is Mr. Halley Stewart, a gentleman well known as a Nonconformist and for his lifelong devotion to principle. Mr. Halley Stewart was for several years President of the Secular Education League; he did valuable work while he held that office, and is still doing valuable work as a member of the League's Executive. He is also an ardent Liberationist, and, above all, he is one who, in whatever movement engages his services, never belies his principles. He is a Nonconformist in the fullest and truest sense of the word; denying the right of the State to patronise or support religious opinion with all the greater vehemence when, by a turn of the political wheel, the opinion receiving such support happens to be his own. Such devotion to principle is exceedingly rare in the Nonconformist world, and a recent occurrence shows how much Mr. Halley Stewart stands alone when he tries to induce his friends to act on their professed principles.

The Liberation Society is a body organised for the purpose of liberating religious opinion from State patronage and State control. So far—in theory—its program is wholly commendable. In practice the Society is not so commendable, as will be seen. On November 11 the Liberation Society held its Triennial Conference at the Holborn Hall. The Chairman said that 146 Free Church Councils and other organisations had sent delegates. So there was a good representation, and the delegates in their speeches breathed a whole-souled devotion to principle and religious liberty. Dr. Clifford wrote expressing "sorrow" at his inability to attend, accompanied by the characteristic expression—

> "We know our minds. We are convinced that anything short of the complete neutrality of Parliament towards Churches is unjust to the people, injurious to religion, a source of division among Christians, an obstacle to social progress, and confusion and weakening to the Church that accepts it."

Here is high principle for you! Here is a man who is evidently so wedded to principle that he would go to the stake sooner than surrender. At least it would seem so. When it is remembered, however, that Dr. Clifford regularly accepts State aid for his own church in the shape of relief from taxation, and quite as regularly upholds the State teaching religion in schools, one begins to be a little bit suspicious. We will return to Dr. Clifford in a moment.

At the Liberation Society's meeting, just towards its close—it was probably deferred as long as possible, Mr. Halley Stewart moved the following resolution:—

> "That, while regretting the difficulties which have so long prevented a settlement of the Education question, this conference renews and emphasises its conviction that no system of national education can be satisfactory unless it recognises that it is unjust for the State either to impart or pay for religious instruction, and that the entire responsibility for such instruction rests upon parents and Churches."

Now, this was a resolution that ought to have been carried unanimously. It was no more than a plain affirmation of the principles that all the speakers had been proclaiming with might and main. If that resolution was in place anywhere, it was in place at a Liberation Society's meeting. How was it received? The resolution, says the report before me, "met with considerable opposition on the ground that it was bad tactics to confuse the Disestablishment question on which they were agreed with the debatable question of Secular Education." The debatable question of Secular Education! In the name of all that is reasonable, what is in it debatable about among a body of men who really believe in the disestablishment of religion? Mr. Halley Stewart properly replied that the Liberation Society existed to propagate principles, not to support compromises. Perhaps he should have said ought to exist for that purpose. As a matter of fact, the overwhelming majority did not agree with him. Out of several hundred delegates, only twenty-one supported the resolution, probably not more than about four per cent. of those present. A more disgraceful exhibition could hardly have been given. And one's admiration for Mr. Halley Stewart's action is increased by the sweeping nature of his defeat.

What is the Liberation Society after? What is the world of Nonconformity after? A speaker who preceded Mr. Halley Stewart, the Rev. H. J. Taylor, said that the attitude of the State should be complete neutrality towards the Churches. Dr. Clifford, also, in his smug manner, wrote of the neutrality of Parliament toward Churches. What does it mean? What a great many simple souls imagine it means when they hear this protagonist of the Passive Resisters roll out the expression, is the neutrality of Parliament towards all opinion. That, however, is not what Dr. Clifford means, although it suits his game to let people think this is what he means. What he is fighting for, what evidently the Liberation Society is fighting for, is the equal patronage of all forms of religious opinion by the State. They practically say to the State:—

> "We do not ask you to cease making other people pay our rates, we do not ask you to cease to patronise religion, to give it official recognition on State occasions, or to repeal laws made for the protection of religious opinion. With all these things we are content. But we complain that this patronage is not equally distributed. You favor one Church more than another. When you plunder the general public, you give one Church more than others. We do not object to the plunder, we do not object to the patronage, all we ask for is equal shares."

That is really the attitude of the average Nonconformist. Analysed, it is the morality of the thieves' kitchen. The State is to treat all Churches alike. It is to be neutral towards them, but not towards those who do not belong to any of the Churches. They exist to be fleeced, and the Liberation Society, with Dr. Clifford, then appeals to those that are fleeced to see that what is taken from them is shared equally among those who take it. It reminds one of a couple of highwaymen compelling a coach full of victims to divide the "swag" equally between them.

Twenty-one people in an audience of several hundreds voted in favor of the State leaving religion alone. All honor to the twenty-one. All the rest voted in favor of the State disestablishing one Church, and establishing all the others. That is really what the vast majority of Nonconformists in this country want—equal establishment of all sects by the State. And for my part, I am convinced that the last state would be worse than the first. No more fatal blow to genuine progress in this country could be conceived than the equal establishment of all forms of religious opinion. Dr. Clifford may be right that the present form of establishment leads to division among Christians. That is one of the securities we have of at least the possibility of progress. And, contrariwise, he may be right that his form of establishment—which he facetiously calls disestablishment—would lead to greater unity among Christians. It would, in all probability. On the one side there would be greater union in making demands of the State; and on the other hand there would be greater unanimity in stifling all opinions that threatened the security of religious belief. And from both eventualities, in the words of the Litany, "Good Lord deliver us."

There is only one form of disestablishment that it is worth while any honest and intelligent person troubling about. That is a disestablishment of the Church that involves the disestablishment of religious opinion. To disestablish a Church and to establish the opinion for which the Church stands is securing by an act of hypocrisy what has been surrendered to the force of facts. The duty of the State is to ignore religious opinion altogether, and to treat Churches exactly as it treats other associations of men and women—protect them so long as they are exercising those legal rights that are possessed by all. A genuine propaganda of disestablishment would have supported Mr. Halley Stewart's resolution. It would also support the exclusion of religion from all State offices and municipal functions. It would decline a State subvention in the shape of either a direct money grant or of a remission of rates. It would ask no more for itself than it asks for every other form of opinion—and that is protection from direct aggression, and liberty to propagate itself by its own methods and at its own expense. A Liberation Society that aimed at this would command the respect of all. A Society that merely aims at securing equal patronage by the State deserves the contempt of all.

Above all, a Society that upholds the State teaching of religion to children, and opposes it being so taught to adults, only adds cowardice to its other qualities. The adult can resist where the child cannot. The child is helpless in the hands of its elders. It looks to them for protection and for guidance. And we protect it by exposing it to the assault of teachings that everyone knows and admits are of doubtful veracity. We guide it by leading it into paths out of which it must afterwards find its own way at the cost of much time and pain. That the State shall cease to force religion upon adults is an act of social and political justice. But that the State shall cease to exert its powers to force religion upon the child involves more than mere political and social justice, it touches upon some of the deeper aspects of human morality.

C. COHEN.

Reasons for Not Being a Christian.

THE Rev. G. Stanley Russell, M.A., minister of St. Anne's Congregational Church, has published four sermons the object of which is to inform his readers why he is a Christian, Protestant, Free Churchman, and Congregationalist. We are only concerned with his reasons for being a Christian. Mr. Russell confesses that in passing from youth to manhood he "had to fight his way through the deserts of intellectual doubt." In this connection he repeats the common but wholly inexcusable lie that "the old Atheist lecturer of the Charles Bradlaugh type was extinct as the dodo." If Mr. Russell does not know that such a statement is utterly false he must be going through the world with his eyes shut. "Atheist lecturers of the Charles Bradlaugh type" are more numerous to-day than ever, and several of them have recently been prosecuted under the odious Blasphemy Laws. The reverend gentleman falls into another grievous mistake when he says that "it is now generally admitted that if the mind that is abreast with modern thought and steeped in modern culture is to have a religion at all, the only possible one is Christianity." As a matter of fact, the mind so described has, as a rule, no religion at all, in the conventional sense. Ever since Huxley's day the adjective by which it generally qualifies itself is "Agnostic." But when such a mind has a religion, it is not necessarily Christianity. Is Mr. Russell aware how many hundreds of cultivated British people are avowed Buddhists, simply because they are convinced that Buddhism is a sounder philosophy of life than Christianity? If he were to make inquiry he would soon learn how untrue and absurd his assertion is. A third blunder committed by the preacher in his introduction is the statement that "those who to-day maintain aloofness from the faith do so not from motives of hostility, but from a sheer indifference which has either never given a consideration to its value, or which regards it as an idealistic teaching too high for a busy and complex world to attain." The majority of those who hold aloof from Christianity do so, not because they are indifferent and thoughtless, but because they are unable to believe in its truth, while some disbelieve it so thoroughly that they are bound to maintain an attitude of active hostility to it.

At this point Mr. Russell asks, "What is Christianity?" and declares that if we look around us on the Church of to-day we shall only be driven to bewilderment and despair by the many conflicting and sometimes degenerate conceptions of it which are offered for our acceptance, while if we consult the theological libraries we shall find not only conflict of opinions, "but also a degree of verbosity and juggling with words which may make us conclude" that the game is not worth the candle; but the curious thing is that the reverend gentleman, though himself a divine, answers the question thus: "Christianity is Jesus; the real Jesus, the human Jesus." The peculiarity of this answer is that it is no answer at all, because Jesus, the real Jesus, the human Jesus, is an unknown quantity, existing only in the imagination of the preacher. The Gospel Jesus was superhuman, and consequently unreal.

Now, strangely enough, Mr. Russell assigns the alleged historicity of the human Jesus as his first reason for being a Christian. In the most oracular manner possible he affirms that "the man of Galilee actually lived and moved and spoke and died," forgetting that the actuality of Jesus is the point in dispute. We repeat that the Gospel Jesus was super-human and supernatural, and therefore unhistorical. Such a being never lived, and so far as we know, never shall live. In each of the Four Gospels Jesus is "the Son of God." In two he is supernaturally born, in one he who is supernaturally born is the Word of God, who by means of that birth becomes flesh, while in the four he supernaturally rises from the dead and ascends to heaven. A being of whom such miracles are reported is not human and cannot be historical. Mr. Russell quotes Tacitus, John Stuart Mill, Lecky, and Morley as witnesses to his historicity; and yet he cannot but know that not one of these distinguished men can be claimed as a believer in the Gospel Jesus, or as a follower of the Christ. Assuming, without even attempting to establish, the actuality of "the sublime Mystic of the Galilean hills," the reverend gentleman proceeds to expatiate upon his perfect and compassionate humanity and his perfect purity, which is a very easy thing to do in the absence of knowledge. At some points, however, the panegyric touches historic ground, and we can challenge it. Take the following example:—

> "Hospitals are one of the results of the coming of Jesus; the great river of human philanthropy not only rose among the hills of God but rose from the fathomless well of the compassion of Christ. The leper, the lunatic, and the rest of the family of affliction who could render no service and represent no tangible value to the community were uncared for until Jesus came and imbued the world with a new and deeper spirit of compassion. Woman was a slave and a plaything until the Man of Nazareth by his own example inspired mankind with chivalry, and placed her not under man's feet but by his side."

We are surprised that a Master of Arts, who presumably has read history, should betray such gross ignorance and invincible prejudice. Possibly it is an instance of prejudice concealing knowledge that we have here. In any case, the preacher unblushingly contradicts the unanimous testimony of historians. In ancient Greece care for the weak was a duty universally imposed upon the strong. In a work often attributed to Aristotle we read: "What the strong may gain by their work for the weak, the weak in their old age receive from the strong." Plato describes honor to parents as "the first and greatest and oldest of all debts" (Laws, 717). Orphans were objects of great attention. Both Plato and Aristotle strongly insisted upon the duty of the State to provide for them. Poverty was relieved with the utmost scrupulosity. There was systematic poor relief for the infirm, and relief for the children of those fallen in war. While those who could but did not work were severely punished, yet for those who were unable to work on account of bodily defects and infirmities there was a system of public relief. We also read of mutual aid societies. Strangers and travellers were amply provided for at inns or resting-places in the temples. At the temples, too, the sick received free medical treatment. As Mr. C. S. Loch, Secretary of the Charity Organisation Society, London, well says, "the 'sons' of Asklepios became a profession, and the temple with its adjacent buildings a kind of hospital." Lecky informs us that Rome was not one whit behind Greece in the matter of private and public charities. While stating that "public hospitals were probably unknown in Europe before Christianity," he admits that medicines were distributed to the sick poor, that there were infirmaries for slaves, and military hospitals, under Paganism. Why, we know from the Edicts of King Asoka that two hundred years before Christ India was dotted with hospitals both for man and beast; and as there is no difficulty whatever in accumulating examples of the most tender charity practised by the much-maligned Romans, it is impossible to believe that, whereas the charitable institutions of the Emperors Nerva, Trajan, and Hadrian embraced all the orphans and the minor children of the whole Empire, the sick poor were neglected. The truth is that Christianity closed the Pagan hospitals by force. So strong was the prejudice against the Asklepian temples, which were also hospitals, that by the end of the fifth century not one of them remained.

The allusion to the position of woman in pre-Christian times is calculated to entirely mislead the thoughtless and unlearned among the readers of Mr. Russell's sermon. To say that woman was "a slave and a plaything" until Jesus came is to give expression to an unmitigated falsehood. In Rome, from the earliest times woman enjoyed greater independence and liberty than she has ever done, even to this day, under Christianity. On the woman question Jesus never uttered a word, nor left his disciples any example. This is what Mommsen says about woman under the original constitution of Rome:—

> "Woman did not indeed occupy a position inferior to man in the acquiring of property and money; on the contrary, the daughter inherited an equal share with her brother, and the mother an equal share with her children" (History of Rome, vol. i., p. 57).

By the year 169 B.C. the family jurisdiction over women was becoming practically more and more antiquated. As Mommsen says:—

> "Even in public matters women already began to have a will of their own and occasionally, as Cato thought, 'to rule the rulers of the world.' Their influence might be traced in the comitia, and already statues were erected in the provinces to Roman ladies" (vol. ii., p. 384).

At this time almost the only disability woman had to endure was that of perpetual guardianship by her family, her own son often becoming her guardian. Now, between the years A.D. 130 and 180 there flourished an exceptionally great jurist, called Gaius, who wrote a remarkable work, entitled Institutes, which was unfortunately lost. In 1816, however, Niebuhr had the good luck to find it at Verona; and, as Sir Henry Maine informs us, this is what it says about the law of Perpetual Guardianship, which from the mature Roman jurisprudence had entirely disappeared:—

> "The great jurisconsult himself scouts the popular apology offered for it in the mental inferiority of the female sex, and a considerable part of his volume is taken up with descriptions of the numerous expedients, some of them displaying extraordinary ingenuity, which the Roman lawyers had devised for enabling women to defeat the ancient rules. Led by their theory of Natural Law, the jurisconsults had evidently at this time assumed the equality of the sexes as a principle of their code of equity.....The consequence was that the situation of the Roman female, whether married or unmarried, became one of great personal and proprietary independence, for the tendency of the later law was to reduce the power of the guardian to a nullity, while the form of marriage in fashion conferred on the husband no compensating superiority" (Ancient Law, pp. 127, 129).

Sir Henry Maine does not hesitate to add (p. 129) that under the Christian emperors there took place "a reaction against the liberal doctrines of the great Antonine jurisconsults." We have fallen back upon these incontestable authorities to show the readers of Mr. Russell how unspeakably groundless and absurd his remark about woman is.

The Truth About the Holy Land.

"Within the walls and behind the door [of the Church of the Nativity at Bethlehem] there has been much fighting among the representatives of the Church of Christ: the result, at the moment, being a sullen truce which leaves the building in the joint occupation of the Greeks, and Latins, and the Armenians. As at any moment the ministers of God may be seized with a passion to murder their brethren in the faith, a Turkish soldier, fully armed, stands on duty in the little chapel which professes to be the actual place where Christ was born. This is a picture to contemplate—a Mohammedan soldier keeping watch over the spot where the shepherds found 'the babe lying in a manger.'"—SIR FREDERICK TREVES, The Land That is Desolate, p. 123.

"A Protestant, familiar with the Holy Scriptures, but ignorant of tradition and the geography of modern Jerusalem, finds himself a good deal 'mazed' when he first looks for the sacred sites. The Holy Sepulchre is not in a field without the walls, but in the midst and in the best part of the town, under the roof of the great church which I have been talking about. It is a handsome tomb of oblong form, partly subterranean, and partly above ground, and closed in on all sides except the one by which it is entered. You descend into the interior by a few steps, and there find an altar with burning tapers. This is the spot held in greater sanctity than any other in Jerusalem. When you have seen enough of it, you feel perhaps weary of the busy crowd, and inclined for a gallop; you ask your Dragoman whether there will be time before sunset to send for horses and take a ride to Mount Calvary. Mount Calvary, Signor? Eccolo! it is upstairs—on the first floor!"—A. W. KINGLAKE, Eothen (Nelson's edition), pp. 152-3.

THE average untravelled Englishman, who has been trained from earliest childhood to believe in the historical accuracy of the Bible, pictures to himself Palestine, the country of the Bible, as a land of ravishing beauty. He may hedge somewhat on Jonah in the whale's belly, or privately rationalise in the matter of Joshua commanding the sun to stand still. He may whittle away the Deluge until it is quite a private affair, extending only a hundred miles or so. He may extend the six days of creation into millions of years, and have his own opinion as to Balaam's talking ass; but no doubt has ever disturbed his mind as to the accuracy of the description drawn by the Hebrew prophets of the country in which they lived.

He reads of it as being a "land flowing with milk and honey," of the "Rose of Sharon," of the "Balm of Gilead"; and, from the sermons he has heard, he gathers that the life of Jesus was spent in an environment of lilies, cornfields, and vineyards. The picture is completed by the multitude of cheap prints and oleographs of picturesque shepherds and their flocks; or the shores of Galilee, dotted with the white sails of fishing boats in the distance.

This was the belief in which we ourselves were trained, helped by an immense Bible containing hundreds of illustrations bearing out this view of the Holy Land—a belief long since dissipated by true accounts of the country by modern travellers.

Sir Frederick Treves, the well-known surgeon to the late king, is the latest traveller to record his experience of a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, in a book entitled The Land That is Desolate (Smith Elder, 1912).

Sir Frederick Treves utterly demolishes the popular idea of Palestine as a land of plenty, and shows the country in all its natural desolation. Of the far-famed Sharon, he says:—

> "The Plain of Sharon is emphatically not beautiful, from its vastness and monotony it is very wearisome. It is as level as a billiard table and almost as smooth and as uniformly green. One thinks of the Rose of Sharon and imagines banks and terraces covered with some such transcendental crimson rambler as runs riot in old Persian embroideries, but the Rose of Sharon, the learned say, is no other than the sickly narcissus" (p. 22).

Of the hills of Judæa, where Samson lived, he observes:—

> "It cannot be claimed that the scenery of the country where the drama of Samson's life was played can add one single touch of vividness or of character to the familiar history. The background, indeed, is as negative as a bank of mist. Keith truly says, in his Land of Israel, that 'the rounded and rocky hills of Judæa swell out in empty, unattractiveness, with nothing to relieve the eye or capture the fancy.'"*

Of the valley of Sorek, where lived Delilah, the woman beloved by Samson, he remarks: "The fascination of Delilah must have been great indeed if she could attract any but a prospective stone merchant to this wizened place" (p. 31).

Of the road to Jerusalem, Sir Frederick says: "I know of no approach to any town that is quite so austere, or so haunting as this. The road toils ever upwards, hidden from the sight of the world, along an interminable valley of stones, along a melancholy ravine, sullen and secretive." At the end of this pass, open country is reached, and finally a place called Bittir, a dismal and barren place where goats and human beings search for a living among the rocks and stones.

Bittir stands at the entrance of the gorge which leads up to Jerusalem, and our author declares:—

> "Throughout Palestine I met with no spot which appeared to be so well fitted as this to be the scene of Ezekiel's vision of the Valley of Dry Bones, since the place is so unhappy-looking, so bleak, and so full of the shadow of death."

The train,—

> "after crawling out of Ezekiel's Valley of Dry Bones, loiters across a rock-strewn plain of unreasonable ugliness, and, finally, with every symptom of extreme exhaustion, staggers into the terminus of Jerusalem."

Jerusalem itself, within the walls, is described as—

> "made up of a tangle of lanes and byways of infinite and alarming complexity.....The traveller wanders to and fro expecting every moment to find himself in an honest roadway open to the sky, but such a fair street he will never find. Jerusalem appears to be composed wholly of intriguing, bewildering slums. Let the curious turn aside but a few paces from a known path, and he may be lost for hours. This is one of the most impressive and memory-haunting things in the sorrowful city—this human labyrinth, devilish in its ingenuity, baffling in its maniacal aimlessness, mocking in its elfish trickery."

Of the celebrated Via Dolorosa, the Path of Pain, along which Christ is reported to have walked to the place of crucifixion, we are told:—

> "The Via Dolorosa which pilgrims come thousands of miles to see is quite a modern lane. For some distance it is a paved passage between blank walls; it then changes to a mean street, and at last ends ignobly in the bazaar in a vaulted passage full of noisome shops. Along this dirty and callous street the Stations of the Cross are marked by inscribed stones let into the walls, or by other insignia. Here, for example, is indicated the exact spot where the cross was laid upon Jesus. Here is the place where He sank under the weight of His burden. Here is the point in the lane where He met His mother, and a little farther on is the spot where Veronica wiped the sweat from his brow. A picturesque mediæval house, projecting over the street, is pointed out as the house of the rich man Dives, while near the fifth station there is—built into the wall—a stone which has a hollow in it caused by the pressure of the hand of Christ. The Via Dolorosa is a mere fiction, a lane of lies, a path of fraud. The present road does not appear to have come into existence until the sixteenth century, and, according to Dr. Sanday, 'its course has been frequently changed.' It is a great commercial asset, however, so it can be understood that when next its direction is modified there will be keen competition to turn it to individual advantage" (p. 54).

The Church of the Holy Sepulchre is described as "a show-place full of objects of doubtful authenticity, and, in its dark alleys and deep crypts, a kind of necromancer's cavern." In the side wall of the Chapel of the Sepulchre is an oval opening which, says Sir Frederick, "suggests the orifice of a shooting gallery at a fair. Sir Rider Haggard compares it to a "hawse-pipe in the bows of a steamer." It is through this hole, on Easter Eve, that—

> "fire descends from Heaven to the Holy Sepulchre, where it is received by a minister of God, who passes it, in the form of a lighted taper, to the yelling multitude without. This Easter scene has been described by many with varying degrees of disgust. It is only to be equalled by those degrading religious orgies which are to be met within the forests of savage Africa" (p. 77).

He quotes Dean Stanley as speaking of it as "probably the most offensive imposture in the world."

The Pool of Bethesda, which, as our author points out, in the account in the Gospel of St. John, suggests a wide sheet of limpid water, surrounded by a cloister of some magnitude, "is far down at the bottom of a pit." And "In the cistern, which could not accommodate a larger multitude than five or six, is water which would probably be condemned by any medical officer of health. This is the Pool of Bethesda." The Pool of Siloam is no better, for we read, "The Pool of Siloam is described as 'an evil-smelling mud hole.' It is a wretched spot.....The village of Siloam is, I think, the most abject hamlet I can call to mind" (pp. 109-10).

Some five and a half miles south of Jerusalem lies the town of Bethlehem. Says Sir Frederick:—

> "Imagination has endowed this way with picturesqueness, but a chilled upland in Derbyshire, where stone walls and a thorn bush may be the only features in the landscape, is to be preferred to the country towards Bethlehem."

A little way beyond Jerusalem, on the Jericho road, lies Bethany. Sir Frederick describes the place and its inhabitants, as follows:—

> "It is now represented by a few wretched hovels, grey, filthy, and ruinous—a slum detached from a city, a pitiless man-hating spot. The houses piled up on the hill would seem to be as empty as a heap of skulls, their staring windows sightless as the eye sockets of the dead. The inhabitants are reputed to be the dirtiest and most importunate in Palestine. This reputation is maintained. The hamlet stands in all the effrontery of shameless squalor, at the head of a dejected valley. Being on the verge of the desert of Judæa, the view southward from poor Bethany is very grievous.
> "Accompanied by a yapping crowd of children, who are extravagantly unclean, the visitor is taken to the house of Martha and Mary. This is a mere penance observed by pilgrims and others, for the spacious building may as well be called the house of Ananias and Sapphira. He is finally invited by a dozen begrimed hands to enter the tomb of Lazarus, this sepulchre being the joy of Bethany. The children smile through their dirt as they reiterate the invitation, for, seemingly, they know that the burying-place of Martha's brother has changed its site from time to time. It is possible that at this point the tourist rebels, for there is little object in descending into a foul street cellar for the purpose of being shown a grave in which Lazarus did not lie" (p. 131).

The country between Jerusalem and Jericho is described as "a weary desert, grey with melancholy, bare to pitifulness, and silent as a land of the dead"; it is "a mean country, a waste of innumerable hills .....hills that are dead. Their bones, in the form of grey rocks, show through the tattered covering of threadbare grass and wiry shrub. The whole place is treeless.....The monotony of the way is unspeakable."

Sir Frederick, of course, visited the Sea of Galilee, only to sustain further disillusion, for we learn that the far-famed water of Galilee,—

> "On nearer view, fails to exhibit any hitherto undiscovered charm. It is still a lonely stretch of water, as monotonous and unsympathetic in its environment as the basin of a reservoir.....It may seem a sanctified experience to walk in meditative mood by the Sea of Galilee in the still of the evening, but when one has to pick one's way among aggressive filth, and to hold a handkerchief to one's nose all the while, even the enchanting story of the lake avails for little" (p. 194).

In fact, the Holy Land may be summed up in the writer's words as "A country of imposture and make-believe" (p. 23). And he warns "Those who find comfort in the belief that—

> 'There is a green hill far away,
> Without a city wall,'

And who would keep that vision clear and unspoiled, should never come nigh Jerusalem" (p. 84). Sir Frederick Treves appears to accept the Bible as substantially correct as an historical record. And to square the present desolate condition of the land with the Bible description, he suggests that in ancient times it was better cultivated and more thickly populated; but he produces no evidence in favor of this view, and, in fact, there is none to produce. In spite of the many years, and vast sums expended by the Palestine Exploration Fund, the results have been meagre in the extreme compared with the discoveries in Babylonia, Egypt, and Assyria, and shows that the land was most prosperous under the rule of the Romans.

Scientists are agreed that the geology and climate of the country have not changed since ancient times. It is a small country, about the size of Wales, and before its conquest by the Romans it was often the contending ground of the great empires of Babylonia, Egypt, and Assyria, to one or other of which the country was nearly always a vassal.

John Bright. By R. Barry O'Brien. London: Thomas Nelson. This is one of the volumes in Nelson's Shilling Library. We have looked into it to see what is said about Bright's attitude and speeches on the Bradlaugh question, and we have not been able to find a single word on the subject. We wonder if this omission was intended to please the Catholics. Whatever the author's motive, he has been guilty of a very disreputable proceeding. Biographers are under obligation to tell the truth about the men and women they undertake to present to the public. Partisanship of any kind is bad enough, but to select the facts is downright dishonesty. And in this instance the selection is a very foolish one. The Bradlaugh question cannot be suppressed. It has its indefeasable page in English history. And it is to John Bright's credit that he dealt with it, from first to last, in a lofty and generous spirit. Other men, even Mr. Gladstone, made mistakes in connection with it, but Bright never made one—he was right every time. And the explanation is that his public life, as well as his private life, was guided by principles. He consulted them, and them only, when he wanted to know what he ought to say. This also must be said. Bright was scrupulous in giving Bradlaugh credit for the most honorable intentions. He plainly told the bigots in the House of Commons that some of them had far less reason to talk about conscience and honor than Bradlaugh had. When this was laughed at Bright said something stronger. It was loftily said, and it was full of true humility. Only a fine nature could have said it as an impromptu in reply to an interruption. "I pretend," he retorted, "to have no conscience and honor superior to the conscience of Mr. Bradlaugh." He stuck to that. He meant it. And before he finished that speech he sent a still heavier explosive into the ranks of the "Christian gentlemen" who were baiting Bradlaugh. "To a large extent," he told them, "the working people of this country do not care any more for the dogmas of Christianity than the upper classes care for the practice of that religion."

John Bright's attitude on the Bradlaugh question did him infinite credit, for he had not only to fight his natural enemies but also to fight many of his natural friends; and that is the greatest test of a man's sincerity and courage. Yet this noble episode in Bright's career is carefully concealed by his biographer. What on earth is the reason? We have suggested one, but there may be another.

Bright was the greatest orator of his time (he preceded Bradlaugh). We heard him once at an open-air election meeting at Birmingham. Joseph Chamberlain spoke first, and was much applauded; but the speech was that of a smart commercial traveller of politics, with the inevitable reference to Pickwick, and we did not notice anyone shedding a tear at his departure. Chamberlain drove off to another meeting, and up came John Bright. No one could help noticing the leonine head and face, though it must be admitted that the nose was hardly in keeping with the other features. How the audience looked up to him! "Now," they seemed to be saying to each other, "we are going to hear something." And they did. The slow, low, sympathetic voice (all the poetry, pathos, and passion of the human voice are in the lower register) in six sentences made everybody forget Joseph Chamberlain and all his tribe, and "ah's" responded to the inspired and inspiring statement that failure was impossible in that contest because the soil of Birmingham had been consecrated and reconsecrated to the cause of freedom.

Who can ever forget, having once read it, that pathetic speech in which Bright told how Cobden came to see him and begged him to come out and fight the Corn Laws. Bright had just lost his young wife—her body was still unburied. "I was in the depth of grief," Bright said, "I might almost say of despair, for the light and sunshine of my house had been extinguished. All that was left on earth of my young wife, except the memory of a sainted life and of a too brief happiness, was lying still and cold in the chamber above us." Every man in that meeting who had lost a wife, every man who feared to lose a wife, was caught by the throat. One who was present told us years afterwards that the meeting was shaken by a great sob. But the orator retained command of himself and went on with his narrative.

The Rev. A. J. Waldron is in a fair way to be made a saint. A Daily Mail reporter thus describes him at the production of his sketch at a music-hall: "He sat full in the light, smiling at the painted lady in tights and on all generally, while the wreaths of smoke from his cigarette curled above, forming a kind of halo round his head." We hope Waldron will not have a set back. It would be sad to see his halo in the sale-room.

The worst thing said about Waldron's play appeared in the Daily Sketch (Nov. 12). Mr. W. R. Titterton, representing that journal, went to see "Should the Woman Tell?" He found that there was nothing indecent or suggestive in it, but —— "It is just the sort of thing clergymen would give us if they ran the halls. In which case I am sure I would not take my daughter there." The italics are Mr. Titterton's.

Mrs. Dan Crawford, wife of the African missionary, told the following story to an audience at Westminster Chapel. She was taken dangerously ill when visiting a native chief. There was no food suitable to her, and her native boy said, "Your God has forgotten; he is not a God of love." Just then an eagle carrying a fish in its mouth was seen flying high up in the sky. The bird was just over a broad river, and it suddenly dropped the fish. Even then this remarkable eagle took care not to drop the fish in the river. Right in the midst of the water was a little flat rock, and on "this the eagle dropped the fish." Mrs. Crawford "owed her recovery to the providential supply of food, and the faith of her companions was restored." Now, we like this story, but we suggest that the next time it is told it would be more effective if a bottle of quinine and a hammock chair were added. The Westminster Chapel congregation would not be at all alarmed. They would probably relish it the more.

Some of the comments on Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace's death are really funny. Here is one by "Historicus" of the Methodist Times. Wallace, we are told, "had none of the narrowness of outlook that blinds the vision of some great scientists." We do not wish it to be understood that we attribute narrowness of mind to Alfred Russel Wallace. But what is the matter with the other scientists? As a mere matter of fact, Wallace's scientific limitations were marked. And by the narrowness of other scientists one just has to understand scientists who refused to be caught by a disguised—or refined, if you will—animism.

The Guardian wishes that Wallace had "strengthened his religious belief with less questionable support than the phenomena of Spiritualism," but is thankful that he had some religion, even though, from its own point of view, it was quite wrong. And it adds, "It counts most of all that whatever may be said of the logical import of evolution, this famous exponent of the idea was no Materialist." That is a piece of true theological criticism. The only interest in the subject is so far as it supports religion. And even if the idea makes for the disentegration of religion, it is something a scientist declined to call himself a Materialist. Materialism, however, does not depend upon whether certain people choose to call themselves Materialists or not. It depends upon the sanity of its method and the fruitfulness of its principles. And Wallace lived to see these become the commonly accepted data of all scientific work—even of his own.

Leave it to the Bishop of London to say the silly thing when the time arrives—and often when it hasn't arrived. "Thank God," he says, on the question of music-hall sketches, "the Christian folk of London are in a vast majority, and the question we have to make up our minds about is: Are we going to be masters in our own home?" A little less silly, and the remark would be impertinent. "London is ours"—that is, it belongs to the Christians. Everybody else is here on sufferance. And we are convinced that the Bishop really thinks this to be the case. Years ago, when the Bishop was "spreading" himself in East London, and drawing meanwhile a large salary from a sinecure attached to St. Paul's, he asked Mr. Cohen why Secularists, if they were dissatisfied with this Christian country, didn't leave it and settle in some new land? The reply he got was that when one found rats in one's house one didn't sit on the doorstep waiting for them to leave. One bought vermin destroyer and cleared them out. The Bishop has yet to learn that none but a fool ventures to claim civilisation as the property of a sect.

We venture to say that the Bishop of London and his helpers offer more encouragement to indecency in the course of a week than the worst music-hall does in the course of a year. They incite people who go to music-halls to look for indecency. And nothing in the world could be worse than that.

The Bishop of London's secretary says that the morality of the music-hall stage is to be watched from the auditorium with even greater rigor than ever in the future. Are the pious "deadheads" going to use telescopes instead of opera glasses?

The Yellow Press editors have been manufacturing headlines concerning two men who ordered a £13 supper at a Paris restaurant, and then refused to pay. It is a lot of money for a meal, but the last supper mentioned in the Gospels has cost humanity more.

Beiliss, the Jew recently acquitted in the ritual murder trial at Kieff, has received an offer to appear on the stage in several European cities. If the Carpenter of Nazareth were alive to-day he would be similarly exploited by his wooden-headed followers.

A low class paper devoted to sporting interests is naturally Conservative and Christian, and perhaps we ought not to be surprised at its combining deep piety with excessive vulgarity. But it might as well pay a little regard to truth occasionally in order to prevent itself from becoming intolerably monotonous. It is a pure fiction, with reference to Bradlaugh and Northampton, that "there stands a statue of him in bronze, erected outside a public lavatory." We assisted and spoke at the unveiling of that statue; it was not in bronze, and we saw no public lavatory near it, though one may have been erected since. It was in the middle of a large square, and we suppose it has not removed to another spot since.

Evan Roberts has been figuring in the newspapers again. He is the most melancholy memento of the Welsh revival. The orgy of excitement was too much for him, and it appears that he will never recover from it. He has lately refused to visit his dying mother. In this he resembles another revivalist who would not go out from a meeting to see his mother and other members of the family. The revivalist species always have marked characteristics in common.

More trouble in Wales! It seems that railway companies are in the habit of running cheap Sunday excursion trains from English districts to popular places in Wales, with the result that the "Sunday calm" is rudely broken. There is "intense indignation," of course, and only "a degree less acute" is the annoyance of Sunday motor traffic and Sunday golf. This is all very distressing, and doubtless if these distressed Welsh people had their way they would erect a Sunday barricade all round the Principality, with "Abandon all enjoyment, ye who enter here," liberally displayed.

Mr. Bottomley narrowly escaped joining the train-wreck near Melun. The train he was travelling by was pulled up just in time to prevent it from dashing into the two trains already in collision. Mr. Bottomley speaks with horror of the "mass of burning wreckage and writhing humanity" he saw before him. "And in the midst of it all," he says, "priests prated of the love of God, whilst ordinary men and women flung themselves into the flames to rescue the sufferers—for love of mankind. Said a fellow-passenger to us, 'We have had a Providential escape.' We! Twenty honest postal clerks burnt to ashes! He, a wholesale jeweller—and we—well, never mind about ourselves. Verily, God 'moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform'! God! It was the work of the Devil!" It was the work of neither, Mr. Bottomley, though the sentiment does you credit. If it were the work of either it would be the work of both, for God and the Devil are the Siamese twins of theology, and, like Wordsworth's cropping sheep, they move altogether or not at all.

"G. B. S." is having a fine old time. Headlines—such as "Mr. Shaw on This," "Mr. Shaw on That," and "Mr. Shaw on the Other" are now of frequent appearance in the Daily News and other halfpenny papers. We shall come to "Mr. Shaw on Babies" presently. And when we do the Bishop of London and Father Vaughan will take a back seat.

The London Wesleyan Methodist Council has passed a resolution "welcoming the Bishop of London's attitude with reference to Mr. Bernard Shaw's recent pronouncement on the indeterminate standard of morality concerning music-hall performances, and heartily responds to his call for support in the matter." What composition! Before the Council takes up any more Godly resolutions it should learn to write English.

We referred last week to the author of the Age of Reason being called "Tom Paine" in one of the latest volumes of the "Home University Library" by H. N. Brailsford. We do not wish to suggest, however, that the author is in any other way unfair to Paine; on the contrary, he makes him the object of some very eloquent praise. The little book altogether is well-written, and rather more than that in several parts. It is entitled Shelley, Godwin, and Their Circle, the price is only one shilling, and the publishers are Williams and Norgate.

What we want to draw special attention to in Mr. Brailsford's book is an extraordinary misreading of a passage in Shelley's Prothemeus Unbound. The passage occurs at the soaring end of Act III.:—

> "The loathsome mask has fallen, the man remains
> Sceptreless, free, uncircumscribed, but man
> Equal, unclassed, tribeless, and nationless,
> Exempt from awe, worship, degree, the king
> Over himself; just, gentle, wise: but man
> Passionless."

That is how Mr. Brailsford reads it. And he waxes facetious over this "passionless" man of Shelley's fancy as a most uninteresting personage. We daresay he trusted to the old punctuation, which is very obviously wrong, making Shelley say the very opposite of what he means. A note of interrogation should follow "passionless":—

> "but man
> Passionless? no, yet free from guilt or pain,
> Which were, for his will made or suffered them,
> Nor yet exempt, though ruling them like slaves,
> From chance, and death, and mutability,
> The clogs of that which else might oversoar
> The loftiest star of unascended heaven,
> Pinnacled dim in the intense inane."

Mr. Brailsford should rectify his nasty blunder in the next edition of this volume—for we hope another edition, at least, will be called for.

The worst misreading of a great poet we remember is that of Mr. Hudson, who edits one of the numerous pocket editions of Shakespeare now on the market. He puts Hamlet's "The rest is silence" into the mouth of Horatio—and defends it! It is impossible to go beyond that.

Two hundred lives are already known to be lost in the Great Lakes storm in America, and the number is sure to be found much larger as the bodies get washed up on the shores. Altogether it was a fine effort on the part of "Providence."

An earthquake has destroyed ten small towns in Peru, and some hundreds of people have been killed and a greater number rendered homeless. "Our Heavenly Father" is somewhat careless of his children.

We have heard of men sinking with weights attached to them, but we never heard until just lately of a man sinking with a Bible in his hand. This was the case in the drowning of Roger Sowerbutts Cornall, the assistant scoutmaster, one of the victims of the Mirror disaster in the Thames. According to the report of the inquest in the Gravesend Standard (Nov. 11), Mr. Cornall, "who was a devout Wesleyan, was conducting prayers with the boys, and had an open Bible in his hands to read a passage of scripture, when the ketch was struck by the steamship Hogarth." What a testimony to Providence! It couldn't have been worse for the poor man if he had been reading the Age of Reason.

Rev. Philip Bernard Wingate, rector of Tarrant Keynston, Blandford, Dorset, left £16,919. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth."

John D. Rockefeller has given £75,000 towards the £800,000 cost of the new buildings in New York City connected with the Young Men's and Women's Christian Associations. Rockefeller knows what he's about.

The Rev. T. Simpson, of Brecon, suggests that ministers should witness football matches in order to cure their "mental disease." Coming from such a source, this is "the unkindest cut of all."

"A specialist" informs the Rev. F. B. Meyer that he must break off all engagements and take a complete rest for three months. The reverend gentleman obeys the medico's orders, and will doubtless find the prescription agreeable. But what will happen if Jack Johnson comes to London again during Mr. Meyer's absence? One shudders at the thought.

Dr. Headlam, late Principal of King's College, says that so long as Christianity is an unrecognised religion—unrecognised by the State, that is—its influence would never extend far. We are inclined to agree with Dr. Headlam on this point. A study of Christian history will show that in every country where it has established itself it has been by the aid of the State. First of all as the State Church, and afterwards by the creation of laws devised for the protection and propagation of Christianity. Wipe all these out to-day, leave Christianity absolutely unassisted by State power and prestige, and in the course of a generation or two its power would hardly be worth troubling about.

The Berlin police, instigated by the Emperor, are prohibiting meetings of the "General Church Strike" Committee on a day which is set aside for humiliation and prayer for the kingdom of Prussia. "The feelings of Church circles must not be wounded" by opposition on that day. Poor dear Church circles!

The late Mr. Justice North sent the editor of the Freethinker to prison for twelve months for "blasphemy"—that is, for attacking the Christian religion (as it were) without a permit from the police. Mr. Foote was, and is, an Atheist. Mr. Justice North was (we don't know what he is) a Christian. Christianity teaches "Blessed be ye poor." Mr. Justice North has left £87,986. Mr. Foote will be lucky to leave anything. Which is the more profitable, Christianity or Freethought? And which was the more honest man, the judge or the prisoner?

Mr. Steel Maitland, M.P., has been chaffing Mr. Lloyd George for likening himself to so many Biblical characters. Mr. Maitland likened him to Gehazi, the servant of Elisha, who took the gift which his master refused, and "was a leper ever afterwards," as the Conservative orator put it. How these Christians love one another!

The Catholic Universe breaks out in a fresh direction. A correspondent of that paper writes to know why the "lurid and luring" titles of "lower-class melodrama" are permitted, such as The Worst Woman in London, Her One False Step, etc. When pruriency sets out on a purity crusade, there is no telling where it will stop. We would like to suggest, on our own part, they should turn their attention to "lurid and luring" sermons "to men only," and congresses and meetings on "Social Purity," both of which attract "nice" people with "nasty" minds. And, above all, the editor of the Universe might start a crusade against the erotic hymns and manuals in use in his own Church.

An increase of the dog tax was contemplated at Hamburg. When it became known there was a great commotion amongst the dog owners, who threatened that they would leave the Church if the idea were not dropped. They appear to have thought that they couldn't pay more for dogs and keep the clergy too.

The silk hat is being displaced by the cloth cap, one of the most hideous and inartistic head coverings which the mind of man has devised. If this sort of thing continues people may yet return to the "blankets" and sandals of the twelve disciples, or even the more primitive clothing of Eden.

"Why not advertise the Army?" is a query in large type in a recent issue of the Daily Mail. If this refers to the Salvation Army, there is small need to ask the question.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

December 7 and 14, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1918.—Previously acknowledged, £249 3s. 1d. Received since:—R. Wood, 5s.; A. D. (Glasgow), 10s.; A. W. Coleman (Sydney), £2 2s.; F. E. Willis, 5s.

R. WOOD writes: "Every little helps. If only a considerable number of sympathisers got this well into their heads, the President's Honorarium Fund would grow more satisfactorily."

E. B.—Many thanks for cuttings.

T. NEWBURY.—Sorry cannot forward it in this case.

J. E. REMSBURG.—Very pleased to see your handwriting again. Order passed over to shop manager.

W. GARTON.—The Northern Tour, as it was called, lasted six months, and cost the Secular Society, Ltd., £180, to say nothing of Miss Vance's extra work at headquarters and unlimited gratuitous advertisements in this journal.

A. D.—Sorry it was omitted last week.

E. SCHMIDT.—See paragraph. Thanks.

J. TOMKINS.—Two have been dealt with. The other one is out of date now. Thanks all the same.

W. HIRD.—There is nothing new in charging Darwin with intellectual dishonesty. Christians have been doing that for fifty years. Very likely they will do it for another fifty years. But they cannot affect his place in the firmament of fame. They remind us of dogs howling at the moon.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for cuttings.

A. W. COLEMAN (Sydney).—The President's Honorarium Fund is not up to the best level this year. But it has suffered from the death of several generous subscribers. There is satisfaction in our having friends in all parts of the world. Thanks for your good wishes.

W. DAVIDSON.—Pleased to hear that everything went off well at Edmonton, and that our advice was found useful.

F. E. WILLIS.—We think there is a chance of your good wishes being realised.

S. A. COSCORN.—Draw up your own advertisement, and we will insert it gratuitously.

C. BRADY.—Arrived safely. Much obliged.

ANONYMOUS correspondents are once more warned that their letters cannot be attended to in this column.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Our London readers are reminded once more of Mr. Foote's two special lectures at Queen's (Minor) Hall on the first two Sundays in December. An advertisement of them appears on the last page of this week's Freethinker. Further details will be announced in our next issue.

We have to devote another (final) article to Professor Bury's book. It seems to us really necessary to do this, for reasons which will appear in the article itself.

We have had next to no intercourse of late years with J. H. Levy, whose death we see recorded in the newspapers. But we knew him rather intimately a good while ago, and we had a high opinion of his intellect and character. His articles signed "D." in the National Reformer were very able and well-written, and would have done credit to any journal. The Daily Chronicle says that Mr. Levy was "a very high-minded man and would never accept fee or reward for his services." The first statement is true; the latter statement is not true. We happen to know that Mr. Levy was paid for the "D." articles in Bradlaugh's paper. And why not? What is there discreditable in reasonable pay for good work?

Mr. Halley Stewart is one of the few public men we have come across who are as true as steel to their principles on all occasions. He is a real Radical stalwart. No one takes a more logical, or a bolder, view of Secular Education than he does. He is not frightened by the fact that this subject is one on which Freethinkers and Christians may agree together, and on the same grounds of honesty, equity, and good citizenship. Not an inch does he give way in order to please or flatter his Nonconformist brethren. He tells them plainly that it is their recreancy to the old Nonconformist ideal of the total separation between Religion and the State that is responsible for all the present trouble. We are delighted to see that he stood his ground bravely at the recent annual meeting of the Liberation Society, as appears by the following report from the Westminster Gazette (Nov. 12):—

> "On the subject of religious instruction in State-supported schools, Mr. Halley Stewart moved a resolution 'regretting the difficulties which have so long prevented a settlement of the education question,' and stating further that 'this conference renews and emphasises its conviction that no system of national education can be satisfactory unless it recognises that the State has no right either to impart or pay for religious instruction, and that the entire responsibility for such instruction rests upon parents and churches.' In a closely reasoned speech, Mr. Halley Stewart claimed that secular teaching in the schools was the only logical position of Liberationists. Where it had been tried a higher morality was to be found than in places where religious teaching was given at the expense of the State.
> "Mr. Charles Steele, C.B., seconded, and confessed that as a Passive Resister he objected to the intrusion of the State into the domain of conscience. They had not yet got a national system of education, and he was convinced that they could only give secular education in the schools and religious teaching outside the schools.
>
> "A speaker asked Dr. Massie whether the ideal of the society on the matter included the Lord's Prayer, the singing of a hymn, and the reading of a Bible lesson without exposition. In reply, the Chairman stated that he did not think the things mentioned were included in religious instruction, but he considered these to be a compromise. In the States they were allowed, though there was no law on the subject.
> "Lieut.-Colonel Seton Churchill was in favor of religious teaching, and questioned whether it was wise to weaken the cause of Disestablishment at the present time by suggesting secular education in the schools.
> "Some other speakers also took the same line, but the amendment was defeated, and the original resolution was carried by a large majority."

The following appears below a portrait of Mr. Foote in the New York Truthseeker (Nov. 1):—

> "One of the most brilliant writers of the English language is G. W. Foote, Editor of the London Freethinker, former associate of Charles Bradlaugh as publisher of the National Reformer, and Bradlaugh's successor as President of the National Secular Society. He started the Freethinker in 1881, and in point of years of service is the oldest of the Freethought editors. He is an orator of rare abilities. In 1883 he was prosecuted for Atheism, or blasphemy, and spent a year in the Holloway jail. His judge and sentencer, who is not remembered for anything else, was named North. At the age of 63 Mr. Foote retains the mental vigor and alertness of his prime, and remains the favorite writer and speaker of the English Freethinkers."

Our boots will fit us after this, but we are apprehensive about the hat. And it is not long since we bought a new one, which we provide ourselves with once a year, unless we can elude the wife's vigilance. We hope the Truthseeker's flattering notice won't result in a fatal shock to our hatter when we pay him our next annual visit.

Apart from whatever is wrong with the eulogy, there is one mistake to be corrected in the Truthseeker paragraph. Mr. Foote had no connection whatever with the publication of Bradlaugh's paper, but he was a well-known contributor to its columns.

Our portrait in the Truthseeker does us more or less than justice now. It appears to be derived from a photograph we had taken in America in 1896. We must send Mr. George Macdonald a photograph taken more recently, which has some artistic merit, and which most who have seen it call "good" and "satisfactory."

Dr. George Brandes, who is visiting England on his way to America, is to be entertained at a dinner at the Hotel Cecil, but as the tickets are one guinea each (including wine) the function will not be of much practical interest to the readers of the Freethinker. The reception committee have arranged for a lecture by Dr. Brandes on "Shakespeare." It will take place at Caxton Hall on Tuesday evening, November 25, at 8.45 p.m. Reserved seats are 7s. 6d. and 4s. Unreserved seats 2s. 6d. Obtainable from Chappell's Queen's Hall Box Office.

Mr. Thomas William Stewart's trial for "blasphemy" took place at the Staffordshire Assizes on Monday. He was charged with "committing blasphemy by attacking Christianity by ribaldry, profanity, and indecency." He elected to defend himself, and we do not know precisely the line he took, as we have only a brief report of the case before us as we are going to press. We are afraid, however, that justice was not done to the legal side of the case, which is now of the utmost importance. Mr. Justice Coleridge's summing up is far too brief in the summary report to authorise us in trusting to it in that form. We must wait till next week. Meanwhile we regret to say that the jury returned a verdict of Guilty. Sentence was deferred and the prisoner released on bail.

There is no end to the books published reconciling science with religion, and Professor Bonney has just added one more to the pile. He concludes that the recent advances in physics have in no way made Theism more difficult—rather they have produced the opposite effect. We quite agree that they have not made Theism more difficult. As the difficulties were already insuperable, it is not easy to see how they could become more so. But how have the advances in science made the approach to Theism easier? One would imagine that something had been discovered pointing to the existence of a God. Professor Bonney, as a man of science, knows that not only is this not the case, but also that it is impossible that it should be so. As a theologian, Professor Bonney forgets both his science and his caution. Such statements impose only on the unwary, and one suspects that very often they are deliberately concocted for their benefit.

The Great Iconoclast.

"THAT distinguished man," as Gladstone on more than one occasion called him, the illustrious Charles Bradlaugh, began his career as a Freethought lecturer under the name of "Iconoclast," a breaker of idols. His mission was to make men think. In order to effect his purpose, he found it necessary to destroy many of their objects of worship. With his great iconoclastic club he shattered their idols. He destroyed the Bible fetish, and convinced the crowds that flocked to hear him that the Bible was a human production, full of errors, absurdities, and anomalies, opposed alike to science, philosophy, and common sense. He shattered the old conception of the God of the Bible—old Jahveh—and trampled the fragments of the old god in the dust. Nor did he stop there. With tremendous force he brought his club down upon the Christian fetish—the supernatural Jesus of the Gospels. He showed that no such being ever lived—that a supernatural man-god was an absurdity. Nor was that all. When he had demolished the gods, he turned to priests and kings, and demonstrated the hollowness of their pretensions. He hated all shams, and ruthlessly tore the masks from the faces of charlatans. No wonder that the priests and the privileged of all sorts hated him; but the people who heard him gave heed to his teachings and followed him. And his teachings are bearing fruit day by day as the years roll on; and, personally, I feel proud of the fact that I lived in the age that produced Charles Bradlaugh—that I lived to see him and hear him many times, and that my life has been influenced in many ways by his mighty personality and his wise and practical teachings.

More than once I have heard it said by persons who never heard Bradlaugh that though he was a great orator and intensely earnest in all he did, he was deficient in humor. Only those who never knew Bradlaugh could make such a statement as that. How could he be a great orator unless he were also witty and humorous? An orator who was always grave, and never gay, would soon become tedious. To hear Bradlaugh lecture on the Bible, and point out the absurdities of it, or to hear him criticise the contradictory passages in the Gospel narratives, was to be convulsed with laughter by his native wit and humor. Indeed, he bubbled over with them both. More than once I have laughed till I cried over the grotesquely absurd position in which he placed the writers of the Gospels; how cleverly he pointed out their discrepancies and contradictions; how skilfully he examined the arguments of the theologians who tried to establish the inspiration of these writings and the divine character of Jesus, and tore them (their arguments, not the poor parsons) into very rags and tatters by the brilliancy of his wit and logic. Bradlaugh was great as a lecturer, but he was greater still as a debater. Nobody who ever heard him in debate would be ever likely to forget him. To have heard him, as I did on several occasions, in debate with the Rev. Brewin Grant and others, was to have heard speeches from Bradlaugh that were matchless for their eloquence, their logical force, and thrilling effect; and when Brewin Grant replied by making a number of malicious innuendoes and wicked slanders as the safest way of establishing the superiority of Christianity over Secularism, Bradlaugh rose to a height of eloquence and oratory that came like an avalanche upon his opponent, and overwhelmed and crushed him. Bradlaugh was not only great as a Freethought orator—he was great in many other respects; in fact, he was full of talent, from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot. Great orator, great debater, great thinker, great lawyer, great statesman. With all these great qualities in combination, what could not a man with his great physical and intellectual energy do? He seemed only to have to will to do a thing, and forthwith it was accomplished. The most distinguishing characteristic of Charles Bradlaugh was his intense earnestness. Some of the superfine people sneered at him, said that he was vulgar and unrefined, and tried to ridicule him; but all to no purpose. Bradlaugh pursued his course undismayed, and in time brushed aside every obstacle. And now, after he has been dead over twenty years, the result of his great work is beginning to be realised. The clergy of the Church of England are reluctantly constrained to admit that the old Hebrew God, Jahveh, is really shattered; that this old anthropomorphic conception of Deity can no longer hold the place it did in Christian theology; and that even the man-God, Jesus, has been effectively dislodged from his pedestal by Bradlaugh and other iconoclasts.

Bradlaugh unquestionably did a great work in this country as the champion of intellectual liberty, and his labors in this direction have inspired others to continue the great work which his indefatigable energy, his will-power, and his enthusiasm enabled him to accomplish.

According to Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. Bradlaugh did not take the rational course in knocking down the Christian idols. What he should have done was to have followed the line of least resistance, and when "he met one of these idols he should have taken off his hat and filled his pockets." Mr. Shaw did not say what with. Obviously, if Mr. Bradlaugh had followed the line of least resistance he would have done what other Freethinkers, unhappily, had done before him; and when he stood for Parliament in 1868, he would have let the people know nothing about his Freethought views; he would have kept them to himself, or written about them in expensive books, and then, perhaps, he would have got returned early in his career as Member of Parliament, and, no doubt, would have soon made his way to Cabinet rank and have become Prime Minister of this country. But the great Iconoclast was not built that way. He was not a man who could hide any of his views which he thought would benefit mankind any more than Mr. Shaw could hide his heretical views—as he demonstrates in his plays; for assuredly the author of Androcles and the Lion laughed consumedly over the childish ideas of the Christians in that clever play.

In Mr. Bradlaugh's day a frontal attack against all these primitive superstitions was the only effective method. A few eminent men of science, a few distinguished philosophers and thinkers, were doing useful work in the direction of undermining the very foundations of all religious superstitions; but their work was slow and unobserved by the masses of the people. Mr. Bradlaugh came out into the open, a physical and intellectual giant, and threw the weight of his great intellect and argumentative skill and wonderful eloquence into the work of shattering the edifice of superstition, section by section. I have said that one of the secrets of Mr. Bradlaugh's great success was his intense earnestness. If he had been constantly laughing and joking at the Christian doctrines, and not seriously examining them, people might have said, "this blasphemer is not to be taken seriously, he is only joking"; but when they saw what he did and how he went about his work, they said, "we had better be careful about this man for he means what he says and says what he means." The clergy felt that if they did not defend their creed their occupation, like Othello's, would soon be gone. And when he had shattered their idols one after the other they exclaimed "Great heavens! what will he do next?" His mental and physical activities were marvellous. He would be occupied all day in arguing a legal question, probably with three judges, and at night he would be found at the Hall of Science, fresh as a daisy, delighting his followers with a faithful description of his efforts to free the press from the tyranny of either a Liberal or Tory government. Or he would appear at the great St. James's Hall in Regent-street with a number of other speakers, mostly Members of Parliament, and after they had all spoken on the subject under consideration, he would be called upon to wind up the meeting, and do so in a brief, impassioned speech so full of cogent reasoning and mighty eloquence that would so stir his audience as to cause them to rise from their seats and wave their handkerchiefs and shout their approval in a way that would demonstrate beyond doubt that Bradlaugh was their great hero and a real savior of mankind.

And if the Jews claim that Moses, the Christians that Jesus, and the Mohammedans that Mohammed were inspired, Freethinkers can without irreverence claim that Charles Bradlaugh was equally inspired; for assuredly no man could move the people as he did in his day and generation. So self-reliant in all he did, so courageous, no man ever trusted reason more than he; and so we may say of him in the language of the poet—

> "Honor to him who, self-complete, if lone,
> Carves to the grave one pathway all his own,
> And heeding nought that men may think or say,
> Asks but his Soul [Reason] if doubtful of the way."

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Worrying Women!

FREQUENTLY in the columns of the Freethinker it has been asserted, and proved, that Religion attached itself to movements after they became sturdy of growth and showed ample evidence of their likelihood to survive. Different writers have given us many examples of this safe attitude of the Church to human progress. We are quite familiar with the historic treacherous knavery of an institution whose living pillars are capable of anything if only they can keep themselves firmly founded and erect; and to discover the Church doing something purely unselfish would, most certainly, occasion us great surprise.

Within comparatively modern times the Church has bitterly, but unsuccessfully, attacked at least three great human movements, and has turned sycophantically to admire them when it realised they were here to remain. The Rationalist—or, rather, the Freethought—movement, the Scientific movement, and the Humanist movement have all been vigorously assailed by Christianity during their infancy; and we have experienced the questionable pleasure of witnessing a complete reversal of the tactics used by the unscrupulous agents of a nefarious establishment.

These exhibitions of fawning imbecilic complacency would sicken a heart of adamant. There is a baseness about the mental manœuvrings of the Church that is sufficient, in itself, completely to nauseate the hardest stomach. The longer you study the cravings of the Church for power, the more repellant becomes the utter depravity of its methods. Ignominiously neglected by every movement that sought the emancipation of the mind and body from thraldom here upon earth, the Church, exercising a long-practised ingenuity, has tried to ally itself to those movements, after having opposed them tooth and nail.

Naturally you loathe a man who kicks you when you are down. Naturally you loathe him still more when he performs insincere genuflexions once you have gathered strength greater than his own. Your antipathy fills you with an uncontrollable disgust; and it may be enough to say that, if you turn from him, you act leniently and charitably.

The Church has treated those three movements in that detestable manner; and now the Feminist movement comes into parallelism, in this respect, with the others. Suddenly aware that there are possibilities in the Women's movement, that it shows traces of abiding power, the Church has turned one of those brilliant somersaults for which it has become infamous in the minds of unprejudiced people. It now fawns upon what it fought. It professes to admire what it certainly despised. It offers sympathy and encouragement to what it did most to handicap. It speaks of liberty to what it enslaved. It proffers bread to what it stoned. Another heavy, damning proof of the incorrigible hypocrisy of the Church has been laid, by itself, upon the crumbling walls of the religious edifice. Another occasion for laughter, and another occasion for unswerving enmity, have been afforded us.

The whole history of Christianity is bespattered with black stains; and nowhere, perhaps, are the evil influences of religion made so manifest as in its treatment of women. Socially and psychologically the utter perniciousness of Christianity may be authenticated beyond the least suspicion of doubt simply by studying the relationship between the Church and our womenkind.

Psychological science has grave tasks before it; and it may be that one of the gravest will be the tracing of the dastardly enslavement of the female mind by Religion.

Lacking the inventive faculty, we might even say with a close approximation to truth, lacking the spirit of revolt, which, after all, is but the inventive faculty used in the domain of ideas, the female mind has been, in the past, an easy prey to a circle of thought that enclosed conservatism and excluded change. Religion made the most of the inadaptability of the female mind to the rough ways of pioneering. The comparative, let us say, absence of intellectual revolt from the woman mind, no doubt due, if indirectly, like so many things, to the demands of the physical constitution, Religion made one of its principal supports. Without the assistance of that mental limitation or conservatism, engendered by the restrictions imposed upon women by nature's necessity for propagation, Religion might long since have disappeared. But, ever 'cute to the boons and blessings of expediency, it has deftly enwoven its polished tinsel threads of thought around the mother-mind. It has played upon the chords of motherhood with a minstrel's artistry, ay, even while it affected to despise the contact with a woman's body, alleging unholy such a union. With an albescent hypocrisy it has glorified maternity that it might obtain the child-mind as a reward for its adoration, even while it bedeviled the body of the woman. It hung a curtain of mysticism around the unborn child; and the mother-mind was within beside the child. It illumined the inseparable bonds with its soft seductive light, until the female mind became habitually religious.

Religion, as far back through the stages of social evolution as science can take us, has never given the denial to our indictments. From the religious mystification of barbaric procreation right down to the christening service of to-day, Religion has stood, with outstretched arms, beside mother and child. Anthropology is full of instances of the interfering power of Religion over the mother-mind at times when its encroachments were most selfishly opportunate.

Inevitably Religion waxed good of growth. It practically bent the female mind to its own wishes. The natural tenderness, the fear of danger, the inclemency of change, the projected hopes and swiftly fleeting joys and sorrows that are the mother-mind's nature, as sunlight makes the day, Religion transformed into the richest loam for the spread of its weeds.

The weeds are becoming, with the thinning of religious belief, more refined in texture of root, stem, and leaf; but the crop is still heavy, and the soil still retains much of the ancient fertiliser.

However, a new fear floats vaguely in the clerical atmosphere, irritating the Christian serenity afresh. Another problem worries the venerable dignity of the Church. The spirit of revolt animates the minds of women. A new consciousness of their individuality is springing up. The opening gates of the intellect are providing new avenues, giving rise to new desires, new wants, new longings. What though Freethought, the strongest enemy of the holders of the gate keys, the real opener of the gates of the mind, is forgotten in the new movement? That the first step in the work is accomplished is enough to warrant the claim to success, if it be true that Religion guarded the closed gates and Freethought shattered the locks.

The suspicious outlook of Religion upon the Feminist movement seems to corroborate what has been said. Where will these newly opened avenues of thought lead? Religion is asking itself. How far will the women-minds go? What strength will they attain? How much will their ideas change towards me? How will the results affect me? What attitude am I now to adopt?

Religion is worried. It feels insecure. This rebelliousness of the woman-mind is straightly antagonistic to all the teachings of the Church; and the Church experiences great mental discomfort at the incomprehensible revolt against all its most cherished beatitudes. The women-minds are apparently treating the instructions of the Church, nay, its commandments, with contempt. There is danger ahead.

At the recent congress, so deeply concerned were the pillars of the Church, it was said that the Church should support the Feminist movement; if it didn't, both the Feminist movement and the Church would be the losers. We agree. The Church would lose its life-blood. The Feminist movement would lose its irrationality.

Freedom of Thought.—III.

WE have to begin by offering a kind of apology to Professor Bury. We mixed him up with Professor Gilbert Murray in our last article. There was no insult in that, as it happens; but every man prefers his own identity to another's,—and in any case a mistake is a mistake, and is to be corrected. We suppose it arose from the fact of our reading a new book by Professor Murray in the same series at the same time. The reader will understand that it was not Professor Bury but Professor Murray who was responsible for the adverse remarks on Shakespeare in the Positivist Review. But all the rest of our criticism re Shakespeare applies to Professor Bury. We hope we have made this clear. But you never can tell. For a blunder is a good deal like a lie in this, that it often has a peculiarly malign power of longevity and reproduction.

We now resume our criticism of Professor Bury's book, starting with the fifth chapter, in which he traces the growth of toleration on the continent of Europe, in North America, and in Great Britain. "The Puritans who fled from the intolerance of the English Church and State and founded colonies in New England, were themselves equally intolerant," Professor Bury says, "not only to Anglicans and Catholics, but to Baptists and Quakers." This statement errs on the side of moderation. "Equally" might well be changed for "more." And this renders the conduct of those Puritan persecutors all the more detestable. Moreover the good Protestants were worse than the Catholics, as they usually have been wherever they have had the opportunity. Take the case of Maryland. Under the humane Lord Baltimore, this Catholic colony passed an Act of Toleration in 1649. No Christian was to be molested in regard to his religion. But the law was heavy on outsiders. "Anyone who blasphemed God or attacked the Trinity, or any member of the Trinity," Professor Bury says, "was threatened by the penalty of death." Tolerance amongst Christians, however, attracted Protestant settlers, until at last they became a majority, when they introduced (1654) another Toleration Act excluding Catholics and Episcopalians from legal protection. Six years afterwards the Baltimore régime was revived, but on the accession of William III., of ever blessed memory, the Protestants came into power again and once more excluded Catholics as well as other non-Protestants from toleration.

Justice is hardly done to Cromwell, who was far in advance of his time in the matter of religious freedom. It is easy to misunderstand his attitude towards the Catholics. They were a political party then, always ready to fight openly, as their leaders fought secretly, for the overthrow of the Commonwealth and the restoration of the Monarchy. Cromwell had no objection to the Catholic faith in itself. He allowed the banished Jews to return to England, he did his utmost to protect the Quakers, he appears to have had no animosity towards downright unbelievers. He had naturally what one may call a civilised mind. He was an Independent and more than an Independent. Party after party, sect after sect, found that he was too broad-minded for their shibboleths. The Scotch Presbyterians learnt this at a bitter cost. They thought that when the State Church fell with the Monarchy the religious life of England was to be organised on the Presbyterian model. But they got their lesson, and a grim one it was, at Preston, at Dunbar, and finally in Cromwell's "crowning mercy" at Worcester.

"The Presbyterians," as Professor Bury says, "regarded toleration as a work of the Devil, and would have persecuted the Independents if they could." But they had to reckon with the genius and the sword of Cromwell. He had not fought through a ten years' civil war to exchange one tyranny for another. And he was for a practical, statesmanlike settlement of the country. Anglicans were outlawed by the parliament, but Cromwell treated them as ordinary citizens as long as they kept from plotting against the established Government. His policy was to be at peace with every man who would be at peace with him.

Professor Bury devotes a careful paragraph to Milton's famous plea for the liberty of unlicensed printing—the Areopagitica. He does well to notice that Milton "places freedom of thought above civil liberty." John Locke's equally famous Letter Concerning Toleration receives a fuller treatment. Locke excluded Catholics from toleration on the ground that they are "in the service of a foreign prince—the Pope." He also excluded Atheists:—

> "Those are not at all to be tolerated who deny the being of God. Promises, covenants, and oaths, which are the bonds of human society, can have no hold upon an Atheist. The taking away of God, though but even in thought, dissolves all. Besides also, those that by their Atheism undermine and destroy all religion, can have no pretence of religion to challenge the privilege of a Toleration."

This was unworthy of the manly mind of John Locke, for he knew many virtuous Freethinkers (including Anthony Collins) who were to all practical intents and purposes Atheists. But he stated very clearly the sum and substance of English law on the subject. The only argument ever advanced in support of the Blasphemy Laws is that the very existence of human society rests upon the sanctity of the oath, and that the sanctity of the oath rests upon belief in God. But the oath is no longer necessary; in fact, it is destroyed by being made optional. Bradlaugh's Act makes one man's word as good as another man's oath. Belief in God is therefore no longer indispensable in courts of justice, and the whole foundation of the Blasphemy Laws is thus subverted. We should be glad of the opportunity of arguing that they have really been repealed by the march of events and the progress of legislation.

Some interesting and important pages are devoted to a very interesting and (in its time) important book—the once famous Dictionary of Peter Bayle. Bayle was very learned, very sceptical, and terribly ironical. His tributes to Christianity made the clergy mad. He was almost the equal of Gibbon in this respect. Professor Bury gives the following example of what a Scotsman would call his pawkiness:—

> "The Dictionary was also criticised for the justice done to the moral excellences of persons who denied the existence of God. Bayle replies that if he had been able to find any atheistical thinkers, who lived bad lives, he would have been delighted to dwell on their vices, but he knew of none such. As for the criminals you meet in history, whose abominable actions make you tremble, their impieties and blasphemies prove they believed in a Divinity. This is a natural consequence of the theological doctrine that the Devil, who is incapable of Atheism, is the instigator of all the sins of man. For man's wickedness must clearly resemble that of the Devil, and must therefore be joined to a belief in God's existence, since the Devil is not an Atheist. And is it not a proof of the infinite wisdom of God that the worst criminals are not Atheists, and that most of the Atheists whose names are recorded have been honest men? By this arrangement Providence sets bounds to the corruption of man; for if Atheism and moral wickedness were united in the same persons, the societies of earth would be exposed to a fatal inundation of sin."

It was an exquisite joke. And if, as Goldsmith said, there are two classes of people who dread ridicule—priests and fools—Bayle must have been a terror to both.

Voltaire's name naturally follows that of Bayle. This is what Professor Bury says of the great man whom Victor Hugo called "laughter incarnate for the salvation of mankind":—

> "Perhaps no writer has ever roused more hatred in Christendom than Voltaire. He was looked on as a sort of anti-Christ. That was natural; his attacks were so tremendously effectual at the time. But he has been sometimes decried on the ground that he only demolished and made no effort to build up where he had pulled down. This is a narrow complaint. It might be replied that when a sewer is spreading plague in a town, we cannot wait to remove it till we have a new system of drains, and it may fairly be said that religion as practised in contemporary France was a poisonous sewer. But the true answer is that knowledge, and therefore civilisation, are advanced by criticism and negation, as well as by construction and positive discovery."

This eulogy is on the lines of Buckle's. It is clear and uncompromising, and we are delighted to see it in a book for the people, who have mostly heard of Voltaire as a very subtle, insinuating, and malicious scoundrel, who held a very profitable working contract with the Devil.

(To be concluded.) G. W. FOOTE.

Ingersoll on Oratory.—II.

(Concluded from p. 729.

NOTHING is more difficult than a perfect close. Few poems, few pieces of music, few novels, end well. A good story, a great speech, a perfect poem, should end just at the proper point. The bud, the blossom, the fruit. No delay. A great speech is a crystallisation in its logic, an efflorescence in its poetry.

"I have not heard many speeches. Most of the great speakers in our country were before my time. I heard Beecher, and he was an orator. He had imagination, humor, and intensity. His brain was fertile as the valleys of the tropics. He was too broad, too philosophic, too poetic for the pulpit. Now and then he broke the fetters of his creed, escaped from his orthodox prison, and became sublime.

"Theodore Parker was an orator. He preached great sermons. His sermons on 'Old Age' and 'Webster' and his address on 'Liberty' were filled with great thoughts, marvellously expressed. When he dealt with human events, with realities, with things he knew, he was superb. When he spoke of freedom, of duty, of living to the ideal, of mental integrity, he seemed inspired.

"Webster I never heard. He had great qualities, force, dignity, clearness, grandeur; but, after all, he worshiped the past. He kept his back to the sunrise. There was no dawn in his brain. He was not creative. He had no spirit of prophecy. He lighted no torch. He was not true to his ideal. He talked sometimes as though his head was among the stars, but he stood in the gutter. In the name of religion he tried to break the will of Stephen Girard—to destroy the greatest charity in all the world; and in the name of the same religion he defended the fugitive slave law. His purpose was the same in both cases. He wanted office. Yet he uttered a few very great paragraphs, rich with thought, perfectly expressed.

"Clay I never heard, but he must have had a commanding presence, a chivalric bearing, a heroic voice. He cared little for the past. He was a natural leader, a wonderful talker—forcible, persuasive, convincing. He was not a poet, not a master of metaphor, but he was practical. He kept in view the end to be accomplished. He was the opposite of Webster. Clay was the morning, Webster the evening. Clay had large views, a wide horizon. He was ample, vigorous, and a little tyrannical.

"Benton was thoroughly commonplace. He never uttered an inspired word. He was an intense egotist. No subject was great enough to make him forget himself. Calhoun was a political Calvinist—narrow, logical, dogmatic. He was not an orator. He delivered essays, not orations. I think it was in 1851 that Kossuth visited this country. He was an orator. There was no man, at that time, under our flag who could speak English as well as he. In the first speech I read of Kossuth's was this: 'Russia is the rock against which the sigh for freedom breaks.' In this you see the poet, the painter, the orator.

"S. S. Prentiss was an orator; but, with the recklessness of a gamester, he threw his life away. He said profound and beautiful things, but he lacked application. He was uneven, disproportionate, saying ordinary things on great occasions, and now and then, without the slightest provocation, uttering the sublimest and most beautiful thoughts.

"In my judgment, Corwin was the greatest orator of them all. He had more arrows in his quiver. He had genius. He was full of humor, pathos, wit, and logic. He was an actor. His body talked. His meaning was in his eyes and lips. Governor O. P. Morton, of Indiana, had the greatest power of statement of any man I ever heard. All the argument was in his statement. The facts were perfectly grouped. The conclusion was a necessity.

"The best political speech I ever heard was made by Governor Richard J. Oglesby, of Illinois. It had every element of greatness, reason, humor, wit, pathos, imagination, and perfect naturalness. That was in the grand years, long ago. Lincoln had reason, wonderful humor and wit, but his presence was not good. His voice was poor, his gestures awkward; but his thoughts were profound. His speech at Gettysburg is one of the masterpieces of the world. The word 'here' is used four or five times too often. Leave the 'heres' out, and the speech is perfect.

"Of course I have heard a great many talkers, but orators are few and far between. They are produced by victorious nations—born in the midst of great events, of marvellous achievements. They utter the thoughts, the aspirations of their age. They clothe the children of the people in the gorgeous robes of genius. They interpret the dreams. With the poets they prophesy. They fill the future with heroic forms, with lofty deeds. They keep their faces towards the dawn—towards the ever-coming day."

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expresely provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 31 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 48 SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

There are two virtues which Christians have found it very hard to exemplify in practice. These are modesty and civility.—OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

Blasphemy.

WE have been reviewing Professor Bury's History of Freedom of Thought at some length, and this week's instalment was to be the conclusion of our criticism. We intended to point out that the worst part of the book—if we may use such an unpleasant word in this connection—is what he calls "The Progress of Rationalism" in the nineteenth century. His knowledge of the subject is inadequate. He almost appears to consider that the principal part of Freethought is the sixpenny reprints of the Rationalist Press Association. No doubt those reprints have done some good, but they frequently suggest funicular railways to extinct volcanoes. To take them as representing the main work of the Freethought movement in England is a most absurd mistake. Professor Bury is too fond, also, of taking academical gentlemen, like Leslie Stephen, as being the main moving agencies in Freethought propaganda. He evidently knows extremely little of the popular side of the movement—the great appeal to the people through a long succession of speakers and organisations from the days of Richard Carlile down through Taylor, Southwell, Watson, Holyoake, and Bradlaugh to the recent and present work of the Freethinker, the National Secular Society, and all sorts of "spurt" societies that come and go and leave some sort of impression behind them, however difficult it may be to estimate. Nor does he allow for the tremendous effect of Darwin's philosophy upon the minds of the more thoughtful multitude. Everybody is an evolutionist now, except the Salvation Army, the rural clergy, and the Christian Evidence Society. But in the sixties and seventies the great battle of evolution versus special creation raged in the streets as well as in the high places of "culture." There is nothing like it now, because the fight is over, and one side is victorious and the other side is defeated. But it is fair to say that it was the popular Freethought movement, after all, that caught the full significance of Darwinism and its inevitable effect upon the thought and life of future mankind.

Professor Bury does not recognise the vast importance of Lord Coleridge's judgment on the Blasphemy Laws—or rather the Common Law of Blasphemy—in 1883. We say this at the risk of being considered egotistical. We really cannot help being involved in the case. It is an undoubted fact that some of the old "blasphemers," such as Taylor and Southwell, made brilliant speeches against their indictments. Holyoake made a very able speech at his trial in 1842. But he spoke for nine hours, and he used to say, humorously, that he deserved the sentence for the length of his address. Those speeches, and many more, were worthy of considerable applause as oratorical efforts. But they were immethodical and even chaotic. Our own speech (we venture to say), before Lord Chief Justice Coleridge in the Court of Queen's (now King's) Bench in 1883, was the first scientific defence of "blasphemy." Mr. Atherley Jones, the leading counsel in the Boulter case, in handing us back the verbatim report, which he had borrowed, remarked: "You did it completely; there's nothing more to be said." It was that scientific presentation of the Freethought case and the right of free speech which arrested and maintained Lord Coleridge's attention. He saw the importance of the occasion; he prepared his own charge to the jury with great care—and he revised and published it in a separate form soon afterwards. That judgment of Lord Coleridge's—which might hardly have been delivered except for the character of our own speech—which forced consideration and argument from the court—marks an epoch in the history of the Blasphemy Laws. He did not meddle much with the Statute. That was only too clear and explicit. But all prosecutions had been under the Common Law—which, as we ourselves pointed out to the jury, is subject to change with the changes of human intelligence and human society. And what was the Common Law of Blasphemy? No matter what it had been, what was it then? Lord Coleridge laid it down that toleration had grown with the times, and that it had reached a stage where the very fundamentals of Christianity might be attacked, if only the decencies of controversy were respected. It was on that rock that we founded the Secular Society, Ltd., which became the model for succeeding organisations.

Attacking Christianity is, in itself, perfectly legal; although it may be done, as other things may be done, in an illegal way. Professor Bury does not quite see the scope and force of this dictum. "Some of the judges," he says, "seem to have taken the line that it is not blasphemy to attack the fundamental doctrines provided 'the decencies of controversy' are preserved, but that 'indecent' attacks constitute blasphemy. This implies a new definition of legal blasphemy, and is entirely contrary to the intention of the laws." But what is the good—we mean for practical purposes—in talking in this way? Sir J. F. Stephen objected to Lord Coleridge's new reading of the Common Law as illogical. It might be as full of illogicality as an egg is full of meat. But there it was. It occupied the field. It could not be exorcised by all the logic in the world. And it occupies the field still. It is not accurate to say that some judges accept it. All judges accept it. It has been accepted by every judge who has tried a "blasphemy" case since Lord Chief Justice Coleridge laid it down. It is too late to challenge it now.

It leaves the Christians, of course, in a very mean position. We do not dispute that. We rather enjoy contemplating it. They take down the old rod of persecution which still hangs behind their door, and which they refuse to dispense with altogether, as it reminds them of other and better days, but they find that they cannot beat an educated unbeliever with it. They can only beat the uneducated or half-educated; those who are reckless or unskilful in the use of language. They can no longer use their old rod upon the backs of leading Freethinkers; they can only use it upon the backs of commoner soldiers, and they are sometimes obliged to find victims amongst the very camp-followers of the Freethought army.

How is it then, it may be asked, that we have been constrained to observe that blasphemy prosecutions never fail. This is a simple question, and the answer is equally simple. The determining factor is the way in which "blasphemy" prosecutions are conducted. You take a Freethinker and put him in the dock. That is something against him to begin with. If he is not guilty what is he there for? You charge him with attacking Christianity in a vulgar, indecent manner. "Indecent" is one of the most elastic words in the English language. It usually means no more than "indecorous." But it is a good strong word, and is therefore in frequent request. You call a man's conduct "indecent" if he but picks his teeth with a match, or even a fork, at a Lord Mayor's dinner; and you would use the same word if he were guilty of personal exposure or of handling young persons improperly. A capable defendant would be able to point out the trickery of the word "indecent" and guard himself against it. But able defendants in the dock, especially for the first time, are not exactly frequent. The word is usually pressed for all it is worth upon the jury. Rhetorical exaggerations transform a mouse into a monster. And who are the jury? Twelve actual or professed Christians, most likely. And as "blasphemy" means attacking Christianity in a way distasteful to Christians, the jury are asked in effect, "Gentlemen, do you like that?" Of course they don't like it—and that means a verdict of Guilty. It is the greatest joke in the world since butchers got upon the bench to try sheep.

There is no positive guarantee for freedom of thought and speech until the Blasphemy Laws are repealed. Suppose the educated opponents of Christianity are safe now. "Can we be certain," Professor Bury rightly asks, "that there may not come a great set-back?" It came once and buried the civilisation of Greece and Rome. Will it never come again? Who knows? Let the friends of freedom be always on their guard. The wise old Greeks made the goddess of wisdom a goddess armed.

We shall deal with the Stewart case at length next week. Meanwhile we hasten to say that Lord Coleridge, the jury, and the prosecution are all to blame. If the sentence includes hard labor it is an illegal sentence. "Blasphemy" is a misdemeanor, not a felony, and cannot be punished in that way. And if the prisoner said nothing worse than the sentences which were quoted several weeks ago, we are ready to brand the trial as a travesty of law and justice.

We desire to close this article with an interesting quotation from Professor Bury on the subject of Atheism and Agnosticism:—

> "The Agnostic holds that there are limits to human reason, and that theology lies outside those limits. Within those limits lies the world with which science (including psychology) deals. Science deals entirely with phenomena, and has nothing to say to the nature of the ultimate reality which may lie beyond phenomena. There are four possible attitudes to this ultimate reality. There is the attitude of the metaphysician and theologian who are convinced not only that it exists but that it can be at least partly known. There is the attitude of the man who denies that it exists; but he must be also a metaphysician, for its existence can only be disproved by metaphysical arguments. Then there are those who assert that it exists but deny that we can know anything about it. And finally there are those who say that we cannot know whether it exists or not. These last are "Agnostics" in the strict sense of the term, men who profess not to know. The third class go beyond phenomena in so far as they assert that there is an ultimate though unknowable reality beneath phenomena. But Agnostic is commonly used in a wide sense so as to include the third as well as the fourth class—those who assume an unknowable, as well as those who do not know whether there is an unknowable or not. Comte and Spencer, for instance, who believed in an unknowable, are counted as Agnostics. The difference between an Agnostic and an Atheist is that an Atheist positively denies the existence of a personal God, the Agnostic does not believe in it."

We propose to discuss this hereafter.

G. W. FOOTE.

Reasons for Not Being a Christian.—II.

(Concluded from p. 740.)

WE have seen with what glaring effrontery the Rev. Mr. Stanley Russell, in his eagerness to exalt Jesus, falsifies history. There is no truth whatever in the assertion that the Galilean ever morally transformed the world, which is proved by the simple fact that the world never stood in greater need of moral regeneration than it does at this moment. Thus the reverend gentleman's first reason for being a Christian falls ignominiously to the ground, and rises again as a powerful reason for not being a Christian. Mr. Russell's second reason for believing in Jesus is even worse than the first. To hold the view that "the message of Jesus is the only one that can give the world and the soul progress, development, expansion, and expression" is to labor under the vainest of delusions. The preacher waxes hilariously sarcastic at the expense of a writer who thought he had made a tremendous discovery when he found the Golden Rule—"Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you"—among the sayings of Confucius. He replies to that writer only by complaining that "he does not tell us of the great thoughts that Jesus has given to the world which are not to be found in the writings of the Chinese philosopher." That is really too funny for words. Will the reverend gentleman mention a single thought expressed by the Gospel Jesus with which the world had not been familiar centuries before his time? He goes on to say that when a man imagines that Christianity is a competitor with Confucianism, Mohammedanism, or Buddhism, he only shows himself "woefully ignorant of the true character of these systems." We make bold to retort that, judging by the descriptive allusions to them in this sermon, Mr. Russell's ignorance of the three Pagan religions named is simply colossal. He dismisses the God of Mohammed as a hard and cruel being who produces "the isolation and almost slavery of the Eastern woman, the bloody wars of conquest—so-called religious, the stagnant, unprogressive life of the East," and who, consequently, "has no message for an age which is the most active and complex of all the world's history." This is a wicked caricature of the Mohammedan religion. The Koran represents Allah as merciful, admitting the doers of good works into Paradise; and as just, punishing the doers of evil. What about the Christian God who consigns, not doers of evil, but unbelievers in Christ, to endless torment in hell-fire? Jesus is made to say, "He that believeth and is baptised shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned," while Mohammed is represented as advising his followers thus: "Allah has given each of you intelligence and common sense. If you are in a difficulty or perplexed, do that which your mature judgment tells you is good and right, and that will be the voice of Allah speaking unto you."

The reference to religious wars shows how utterly blind prejudice is. It is a notorious fact that Christianity is the most warlike religion the world has ever seen. It has come down the ages swimming in the blood of Pagans and heretics. Has Mr. Russell never heard of the odious Crusades, themselves essentially criminal and opening the way to the commission of innumerable hideous offences, with a death-roll of nine millions? Has he never read the heart-breaking story of the Albigensian massacres which resulted in the extermination of tens of thousands of France's best citizens? This is Dean Milman's candid description:—

> "Never in the history of man were the great eternal principles of justice, the faith of treaties, common humanity so trampled under foot as in the Albigensian War. Never was a war waged in which ambition, the consciousness of strength, rapacity, implacable hatred, and pitiless cruelty played a greater part. And throughout the war it cannot be disguised that it was not merely the army of the Church, but the Church itself in arms. Papal legates and the greatest prelates headed the host, and mingled in all the horrors of the > battle and the siege. In no instance did they interfere to arrest the massacre, in some cases urged it on. 'Slay all, God will know his own,' was the boasted saying of Abbot Arnold, Legate of the Pope, before Beziers" (Latin Christianity, vol. iv., p. 208).

It would be difficult to find a parallel to this bloody war in history. At the taking of Beziers twenty thousand people were put to death, the faithful sharing the fate of the heretics. Is our friend ignorant of the Thirty Years' War, which was waged between Catholics and a militant union of Lutherans and Calvinists, and during which the population of Germany was diminished from twenty to fifty per cent? When it began there were 400,000 people in Würtemberg, but by 1641 only 48,000 were left. Can Mr. Russell contemplate the conquest of Mexico and Peru without blushing for very shame? Brutal in the extreme was the persecution of the Anabaptist movement at the time of the Protestant Reformation, and of the Huguenots, which brought about eight bloody civil wars, and which has for its high-water mark of inhumanity the massacre of St. Bartholomew. The truth is that Mohammedanism has no religious wars to compare either in number or in blood-thirstiness with those for which Christianity must be held responsible.

Mr. Russell is equally mistaken about Buddhism. Fancy a Master of Arts in the twentieth century defining Nirvana as "that cessation of all activity which was the only cure for sin." Every scholar knows that Nirvana "is the realisation of the final culminating stage in a single stream of life evolving from eternity. The victim of that stream's current has now become the master. The plant, to shift the metaphor, that takes years to reach florescence has burst into flower, and tastes its 'crowded hour of glorious life'" (Mrs. Rhys-Davids, M.A., Buddhism, p. 170). It is quite as great an error to declare that "Christ is the source and inspiration of all the new-found liberty" of China under the recently established Republic. There are a few Christians in the country, but it is a monstrous falsehood to assert that China turns to Christ to-day, rather than to Confucius or Buddha. China is not a Christian country, nor do its inhabitants show the least tendency to adopt the religion of the West.

Mr. Russell's third and last reason for being a Christian is a purely sentimental one. "I am a Christian," he says, "because of living and personal experience of the redemptive grace and power of Christ." We do not doubt the reality of the feeling, or the sincerity of the experience; but we do not only doubt, but deny, its evidential value; and our denial of its evidential value is based upon the fact that its effect upon character and conduct is more injurious than beneficial. One of the fruits of Christian experience is overweening egotism, proud arrogance, or haughtiness. Shakespeare speaks of "arrogant Winchester, that haughty prelate," and the same adjectives can be applied to every earnest Christian everywhere. Even Mr. Russell is so anxious to depreciate non-Christian religions that he fails to be just to them. They all "lay over the lands and hearts of those who profess them a great dark pall of pessimism, stagnation, and bondage." They are so imperfect and corrupt that it would degrade Christianity to enter into competition with them. In other words, Christians are the only sane, wise, and good people on the face of the earth. A religion that engenders such hateful arrogance is self-condemned. Another fruit of Christian experience is hypocrisy. Hypocrisy is a feigning to be what one is not, a fault of which every zealous Christian cannot help being guilty. To be in Christ is to be a citizen of the heavenly Jerusalem, and, consequently, a stranger and pilgrim upon the earth. Listen to the heavenly citizen's wail:—

> "'Tis weary waiting here;
> I long to be where Jesus is,
> To feel, to see him near."
>
> "Here in the body pent,
> Absent from him I roam,
> Yet nightly pitch my moving tent,
> A day's march nearer home."

How often have we heard a congregation sing such hymns with a fervor that could be justified only by an unspeakable longing for immediate translation into the glory land. Emotionally, for the time being, the singers no doubt did yearn indescribably for the "blessed home beyond this land of woe, where trials never come, nor tears of sorrow flow"; but the so-called happy experience was an emotional disease. It was a longing that did violence to the nature of those who cherished it. In sane moments even the greatest saints do not wish to leave the earth that gave them birth. When sickness assails them, instead of shouting "Hallelujah! the glorious change is at hand," they send for the doctor and do everything within their power to keep out of Paradise. "The desire to depart and be with Christ, for it is very far better" than to remain here, is unnatural and essentially hypocritical, and its influence upon character cannot be wholesome. It is well-known that as members of society, the most emotional disciples of the Lamb are in no sense superior, if equal, to other people.

Mr. Russell's reasons for being a Christian impel us to reject Christ altogether. We reject him because he never lived, because the claims made on his behalf are discredited by all history, because faith in him produces hypocrites and persecutors, and because the religion that bears his name has always been, and is, pre-eminently a religion of the sword. Mr. Russell calls him "the one Man amongst men," and "the incomparable Master in insight and in purity," and then admits that—

> "The love of Jesus, what it is, > None but his loved ones know."

We maintain that if what the Bible and Mr. Russell say about him were true, "his loved ones" would include the entire human race, and pain, sorrow, evil, vice, dissention, and wrangling would be unknown. Instead of that happy state of things, we have Christendom, which is an armed camp, and Christians who are perpetually crucifying one another and looking down with disdain or feigned pity upon all outsiders.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Purity Crusade.

JUST at present the British Public is passing through one of its periodic attacks of aggressive morality. Meetings are being held all over the country, new societies are being formed, books are being published—the inevitable Harold Begbie has, of course, issued a shilling shocker packed with extravagant verbiage—and all sorts of things are being denounced. Music-halls, picture palaces, advertisement hoardings, books, are being attacked in a frenzy of purifying zeal. And with Mr. Begbie as fugleman—his pamphlet was written at the request of the Free Church Council—we are warned that bad as things are, they will become much worse unless something drastic is done. Hence the societies, meetings, books, and general furore in the name of morality and religion.

Putting on one side the immense amount of exaggeration involved in this agitation, it may be admitted there is room and need for improvement. But was there ever a time when there was not? Things are not worse than they were; they are, I believe, better. The tendency is to improvement, not to deterioration. And, after all, it is not fundamentally a question of how bad things are, but of the methods employed to make them better, and of the cause of their being as bad as they are. As things go at present, I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that whatever improvement occurs will not happen as the consequence of what is being done by this shrieking community of puritan reformers, but will transpire in spite of their efforts. The utmost effect of their conduct will be to change the form of the particular vice attacked, and that may easily be a change for the worse instead of for the better.

Digitized by Google

The clergy are, of course, taking an active part in this agitation, and there are several reasons for this. It is a safe occupation in this country. Agitation concerning other subjects soon brings a clergyman into conflict with some of his congregation. If the clergy were to make a united attack, say, upon the ground landlords of London, and show that responsibility for overcrowding, with its consequent ill-health and ill-conduct, rests largely with them, there would be trouble. So would a general campaign on the housing question, or on the conditions under which labor is employed. But music hall managers, lessees of dancing academies, variety artistes—we except Harry Lauder—are not, one may assume, great patrons of the Churches, and it is quite safe to attack them. The occupation gives the minimum of risk with the maximum of profit. And where a licence is involved it is tolerably easy for people in position to bring effective pressure to their aid.

And it is safe from another point of view. There is no more elastic word in the English language than "indecent." It may mean anything, from the color of a necktie to positive obscenity. But while it may be applied to anything, it almost invariably suggests impurity. And that suggestion does the trick. The man who raises the cry feels himself surrounded with a halo of virtue. Those who listen are afraid, for the most part, to demur, because there is the easy retort that it involves the support of immorality. And the general lack of moral courage is such that once a thing is labelled indecent most people will refuse to have anything to do with its defence. More than that, they are often impelled to take a hand on behalf of the "Moral Crusade" in order to vindicate their reputation—and for other reasons.

These other reasons are important. Those who have watched this agitation, and others of a similar character, cannot have failed to observe that the subject has, for a large number of people, a very strong and a very unhealthy attraction. They attend meetings and they read the literature published because they anticipate revelations of a very peculiar character. The pornographic taste that in some people is gratified by the reading of "suggestive" books, is in other people gratified by hearing these things denounced on the public platform. The gross exaggerations concerning the "White Slave" traffic, so cleverly and so clearly exposed, from official information, by Mrs. Billington Greig, is a case in point. The speakers simply allowed their minds to run riot. A single case became thousands! "I have heard" became "I have known." And the audience was in no mood to cavil at statements, no matter how extravagant. Mr. Harold Begbie follows the same line. He tells of a child of four years of age kept in a house of ill-fame for an immoral purpose. The baby was rescued by a lady, but was kidnapped again, and has never been heard of since. Such a statement should either not be made at all, or, if made, should be accompanied by the fullest proof. At least, we should have been told what steps the police took in the matter.

And one great consequence of these agitations—so long as they remain in the hands of this class—is not hard to foresee. People are taught to look for indecency, and to find it, either where it does not exist or where it would remain unnoticed. The Bishop of London boasted the other day that he and other Christians put down the Living Pictures a few years ago. Does that mean that London became purer afterwards? According to the mouthpieces of the present purity crusade, London was never so impure as at present. What did the Bishop and his helpers actually achieve? This: they made the exhibition of living pictures indecent to nearly everybody that saw them. People who went to the music-halls could not help looking for the indecencies the Bishop had so kindly pointed out to them. Whether the exhibitions were indecent before the Bishop's crusade is a matter of opinion. That they were so afterwards is certain. They were made so by the prurient parsonic mind. If the Bishop had been present at the Crucifixion, no doubt his chief complaint would have been that Jesus lacked sufficient clothing to appear before a mixed multitude.

A little while before this we had the row over the nude statuary outside the offices of the British Medical Association. For weeks men and women were incited and invited to go and look at these statues, which were declared to be too indecent to be tolerated in a Christian country. And thousands of Christians went—most of them appeared to suffer gladly—and examined through opera-glasses the "indecent" statuary. The same thing over again. But for the religious crusaders no one would have thought them indecent. But they were made indecent for a time, until these pious hunters had found some fresh and more timid quarry. For the statues were not removed; they were not even draped. The British Medical Association had no licence that was at the mercy of these people, and it treated them with contempt. No one calls these statues indecent now. They have been rescued from indecency by being left alone.

So, also, Mr. Harold Begbie refers to a picture that for some years has shocked his pure soul. It is a commercial advertisement in the shape of a poster "which represents the kiss of a man and woman—a kiss of surrender and abandonment." I don't know the picture, and am not aware of ever having seen it. But it is quite possible that I may look for it now, and try to find the indecency that has shocked so pure a mind. And I will undertake to say that no class of the population will look out more eagerly for this picture than Mr. Begbie's readers. If the publishers of the book—the National Council of Evangelical Churches—wish to raise money, I would advise them to reprint and sell this particular poster as a picture postcard. There is no fear of its having a good sale among their clientèle.

There are two types of men that trouble the world. One man runs to uncleanness of action. He is a bad enough type, and the proper subject for police attention. But he is, after all, comparatively harmless. His character marks him as one to be avoided, and generally he is avoided. The other type offers a much more serious problem. It runs to uncleanness of mind. This kind of individual is difficult to shun, and, under the guise of a super-sensitive purity, an air of impurity is spread over the whole of life. Nothing is safe from him, and his purity of mind is such that a woman's ankles or an undraped statue throws him into a perfect quiver of unexpressed sensualism. At a meeting the other day some of the speakers took it into their heads to advocate the suppression of certain books. Among others, the Decameron of Boccaccio. What is it that has made the Decameron a pornographic work? The vast majority of readers who came to the book without any such suggestion would not find it so. The truth is that the Decameron is a pornographic book chiefly because the unclean Puritans have for years advertised it as such. I only had the pleasure of hearing the late M. D. Conway on two or three occasions. But on one of these he earned my admiration by advising everyone of his audience to read the Decameron. To give that advice in England argued courage.

For myself, I question whether people are ever made worse by reading any book; or if they are, then I should place the demoralisation caused by so-called "good" books as much greater than that by books classed as bad. In reading, as in life, what one gets out of a book is mainly what one puts into it. A natural taste for the vicious and for the depraved will poison a book as it will poison social intercourse. And the remedy in either case is not suppression, but education. Not the policeman, but the tutor. Or, if one has to attribute evil to the reading of a book, then a conclusive case could be made out for the statement that no book in the world is responsible for so much, and so widespread, harm as the Christian's fetish—the Bible.

I am happy to conclude with something from a Bishop. At one of these "purity" meetings Bishop Boyd Carpenter said that the real cure was not to suppress literature, but to elevate public opinion. That is the whole truth in a nutshell. Do that, and the work is accomplished. Without that, nothing is of avail. But to do that the work must be taken out of the hands of journalists and parsons who fatten on the tastes they denounce. We are dealing with a public opinion that has been demoralised by Christian training and Christian tradition. It has narrowed the very conception of morality until it has come to mean little else than sexual relationships. How to overcome the essential ill-health of the Puritan mind is the vital problem. In his book on Woman the Rev. Principal Donaldson relates the well-known story of Phrynne, whose lawyer won her case by suddenly exhibiting her nude body to the jury. But he properly reminds his readers that this was no appeal to their sensual passions. On the contrary, it was an appeal to their highest artistic instincts. What would have happened at any time had something of the same kind been tried before a Christian jury? Which would it have appealed to in their case—the artistic or the sensual? On the answer to that question hinges one's judgment of the real influence of Christian Puritanism on human life.

C. COHEN.

The Genesis of the New Spirit.

Shelley, Godwin, and their Circle. By H. N. Brailsford. (Home University Press.) 1913.

SOME great Freethinkers have been once more brought to the notice of the general reader by the publication of Mr. H. N. Brailsford's book, Shelley, Godwin, and their Circle; and their admirers have reason to be grateful for this illuminative volume which has been issued in the "Home University Series" by the famous firm of Williams & Norgate.

The great poet and his guide, philosopher, and friend, William Godwin, died so long ago that one would have thought that the facts concerning their lives were well known to every lover of literature. Yet Christian writers have ever been loth to admit Shelley's Freethought, and Godwin has been treated with the scantiest courtesy, and his action presented in the worst possible light. Being religious themselves, orthodox critics have pretended that men of genius cannot be Freethinkers; and so they tell lies, and strain their faculties to disprove what these men asserted all through their lives.

The fact has so often been ignored, but Shelley was in the direct line of succession of the great Freethinkers. He really belonged to an order of writers of which Rousseau and Voltaire are the best-known representatives. They all wrote, not merely for artistic, but for propagandist ends, to impress their ideas upon others by force of eloquence. In the last analysis they are alike in their Freethought. Shelley did not originate the philosophy in his poetry; he merely adopted it directly from Godwin and indirectly from the great French iconoclasts. As Mr. Brailsford points out acutely, "Godwin in short explains Shelley, and it is equally true that Shelley is the indispensable commentary to Godwin." It would be no paradox to add that Godwin formed Shelley's mind, and that Prometheus Unbound and Hellas were the greatest of Godwin's works. With the proud record of half a century's work for Freethought, William Godwin could at least claim that he had done a man's part in purging the veins of men of the subtle poisons which dwarf them.

Literature was not merely a pastime to Shelley and Godwin, and Shelley in particular was ever a pioneer. From the days of Queen Mab to his latest poem, he was fighting for Liberty. Except that the later works strike deeper notes than those he had used with such exuberant resonance in his youth, there is no change. He died, so to speak, sword in hand, and his epitaph is in our hearts.

Yet there is another man who has, and deserves, a place in this most interesting volume; a man who has written his name for all time to see, and that is Thomas Paine. In a generation of brave men, he was the boldest and noblest. No wrong found him indifferent; and he used his pen not only for the democracy which might reward him, but for animals and slaves. Poverty never left him, yet he made fortunes and gave them to the cause he loved. The Age of Reason was the bravest thing he did, for it threatened his name with an immortality of lying abuse. "Where Liberty is, there is my country," said Franklin; and Paine's magnificent answer was, "Where is not Liberty, there is mine." It is the watchword of the soldiers of Freethought, the marching music that sent Paine himself forth as a knight-errant, that sent Lafayette to America, and Byron to Greece, and inspired so many poets from Shelley to Swinburne.

Full justice is done to these men in Mr. Brailsford's admirable book. He starts with an account of the effect of the French Revolution in England, and shows clearly and distinctly the connection between the French and the English Freethinkers; and one of the most delightful chapters deals with the work of Mary Wollstonecraft.

It is greatly to Mr. Brailsford's credit that he does not slur over Shelley's Freethought. He tells us plainly that Shelley was an Atheist, and adds: "Like Godwin, he felt that the God of orthodoxy was a tyrant, and he revolted against Him, because He condemned the world which He had made." And, again, he points out that "Nothing could be more absurd than to call Shelley a Pantheist. Pantheism is the creed of conservatism and resignation, but Shelley felt the world as struggle and revolt." After this tribute, it is the more to be regretted that Mr. Brailsford allows himself to lapse into writing of "Tom" Paine instead of Thomas Paine, a palpable form of insolence. The obvious admiration of Mr. Brailsford for the great Freethinker does not minimise the offence, for the effect upon the popular mind is to range Paine among men who are patronised—a perfectly intolerable suggestion.

The scope of Mr. Brailsford's volume is very wide, for one may regard the period from Paine to Shelley as the beginning of the new era. Out of the charnel-vault of Kingcraft and Priestcraft, Rousseau and the other great French Freethinkers saw in vision the ideal society of the future. Of this new evangel Paine was the prophet and Shelley was the poet. It was precisely because their hearts were aflame with human sympathy that their works have vital and permanent effect. They both devoted themselves to the idea of the perfectibility of human nature. It is the very mainspring of their prose and poetry. In the Rights of Man and the Age of Reason, no less than in the Revolt of Islam and Prometheus Unbound, its expression glows with the solemn and majestic inspiration of prophecy. Liberty is yet to be won; may it be our task to hasten the coming of that glorious day when the world will be one country and to do good will be the only religion.

MIMNERMUS.

MIRACLES.

Of all the modes of evidence which ever were invented to obtain belief to any system or opinion to which the name of religion has been given, that of miracle, however successful the imposition may have been, is the most inconsistent. For, in the first place, whenever recourse is had to show for the purpose of procuring that belief (for a miracle, under any idea of the word, is a show), it implies a lameness or a weakness in the doctrine which is preached. And, in the second place, it is degrading the Almighty into the character of a showman, playing tricks to amuse and make the people stare and wonder. It is also the most equivocal sort of evidence which can be set up; for the belief is not to depend upon the thing called a miracle, but upon the credit of the reporter who says that he saw it; and, therefore, the thing, were it true, would have no better chance of being believed than if it were a lie.—Thomas Paine.

Acid Drops.

The following appeared in the Daily Citizen of Thursday, November 20:—

> "Refusal by the chairman of the Bench to take the word of a man who said he did not believe in God led to the adjournment of a case of alleged trespassing in search of game at Morpeth Police Court yesterday.
>
> The defendant, a Longhurst miner named William Snowball, elected to give evidence, but refused to be sworn on the Testament, saying he was a Secularist.
> Captain Mitford (the chairman): Don't you believe in God?
>
> The Defendant: I don't know what God is.
> Captain Mitford: Miserable man! I refuse to take the word of a man who does not believe in God.
>
> Mr. Shaw (solicitor for the defendant): Do your worships think he is not capable of speaking the truth?
>
> Captain Mitford: I don't believe him.
>
> Mr. Shaw: Snowball does not believe in the Testament.
> Captain Mitford: No man is capable of speaking the truth who is such a fool as not to believe in God.
>
> Mr. Shaw indignantly objected to the position taken up by the Bench, and asked for the case to be adjourned until the next court.
> Captain Mitford: The case will be adjourned. We cannot believe the word of a man like that."

One expects to meet insufferable fools on the magistrates' bench in country places, and Captain Mitford evidently belongs to a well-known species. But what was the clerk of the court doing that he did not tell this impudent bigot that the witness was entitled to affirm, and on the very ground on which he was rejected and insulted, namely, that he had no religious belief?

Captain Mitford's dictum is that "No man is capable of speaking the truth who is such a fool as not to believe in God." We always thought it was rather rogues than fools who were incapable of telling the truth. Rogues, of course, are usually Christians. And the fact is not surprising. There is a personage called the father of lies in the Bible. It is the clergy's old friend the Devil. Yet he would be a most eligible witness in Captain Mitford's court. He is not a fool—he is not an Atheist, never was, and never will be—he has a most satisfactory belief in God. He would suit Captain Mitford down to the ground.

Bradlaugh's "Oaths Act" is some twenty-seven years old and apparently it hasn't reached Morpeth yet. We have again and again suggested that the Lord Chancellor should circularise the Police and other courts on this matter. Nothing, however, has been done. Lord Chancellors are high and mighty persons; far too big for their boots, and far too lazy for their salary—which is £10,000 a year.

Jim Larkin may be all right from other points of view, but he talks too much about "God" for our taste. At the Albert Hall meeting he brought in "the living God." Perhaps it was only sonorous verbiage. We hope it was. For the help that "God" (living or dead) has rendered the strikers at Dublin is easily measured. Mr. Larkin seems grateful for very small mercies.

We have heard that God doesn't understand Welsh. At least an old Englishwoman is reported to have said so when she heard the prayers going on in a Welsh chapel. It now appears that there are other languages not understood by the same personage. There was a gipsy funeral at St. Mary's Cemetery, Ilford, recently, and the short service included the pouring of wine over the coffin. A Catholic priest asked the parents why they did not attend mass. "We can only pray in Romany," the father replied, "and God does not understand the language."

There is a great Protestant eruption in the town of Hawick just now. The leader of the Protestant mob is Mr. James Macdonald, who titles himself "pastor." He has been having packed "houses" at all his meetings—at which he takes "silver collections." The "pastor" denies that he is married, but admits having had an illegitimate daughter when he was younger. Two local ministers investigated his career, and afterwards issued a pamphlet denouncing him as unworthy to represent any good cause. They suggest that if he isn't married he ought to be. It must be said that the Roman Catholics of the town have behaved like intelligent and law-abiding citizens; against abuse hurled at them from every quarter, they have not retaliated, and the rabid clamoring of the vulgar mob they have treated with silent contempt. At the commencement of the eruption, the fight was between the Protestants and the Romanists. Now, as can be seen from the leaflet, the camp of the Protestants is divided. "After 1900 years' profession of the gospel of love your neighbor as yourself, Christendom is an armed camp."

Mr. Thomas Hardy, whose humaneness is known to all his readers, is not often moved to public speech outside his novels. But he has been so moved lately by the opposition offered on Wareham Town Council to a proposal to establish a system of painless slaughtering of animals for food. In a letter to the Dorset County Chronicle he says: "I regret to see that the excellent movement for the painless slaughtering of animals for food should be obstructed in any way. The movement is belated enough already in not having been reached until after twenty centuries of what is supposed to be a humane religion." The sting of Mr. Hardy's letter is in the tail. The sarcasm should make the Christians blush—if they have a blush left in stock, which seems rather doubtful.

The Middlesex Licensing Committee have prohibited all picture shows on Sundays. They have no legal right to do anything of the kind. Why don't the picture show managers defy this usurpation?

The Archbishop of Canterbury presided at a convention last week for the closing of publichouses on Sunday, and was supported by two bishops, a Jewish rabbi, and representatives of the Salvation Army and other fancy religions. The Archbishop based part of his appeal on behalf of the 300,000 people engaged in publichouses. We shall believe in his Grace's disinterestedness for the working classes when he sees that organists, choir boys, vergers, and church cleaners are paid adequate wages.

The bishops are engineering a crusade against the music-halls, and seem to be as zealous as the old-time Puritans. How is it that these prelates are so much less sensitive when they read the lurid pages of the Old Testament?

The clergy are making a great outcry against the tango and other popular dances. Perhaps they prefer David's famous dance. It was an active performance, and the man after God's own heart wasn't hampered with much clothes.

The Bishop of Bristol has been appealing for sympathy—and contributions—for the "poor" clergy. He says that, unlike the rest of the world, when he wakes on Sunday there is no day of rest for him. On the contrary, his Sunday is "the most onerous, the most trying of all the days of the week." Shame! The public should insist on the clergyman having his day of rest—and let him take it on Sunday. When Sabbatarianism is the question, the clergy ought to set a good example.

I believe, says the Bishop, as an inducement to subscribe, that no clergyman should receive less than £200 a year, that if all care and financial anxiety were removed from the clergy they would do their work better and with a lighter heart. We do not doubt it for a moment, but the statement holds good no more for the clergy than for other people. Everyone would go about his or her work if the financial anxiety of making ends meet were removed. The statement is really a truism; and we do not see why public appeals should be made on behalf of the clergy more than on behalf of all other people. We believe in a "living wage" for everyone, but other people do not first of all make a talk about their being "called" to their vocation, and then appeal to the charity of the general public to raise their wages. Besides, the proper people to raise the salary to £200 a year are the better-paid clergy. Let the bishops set the example of "shelling out."

Commenting on the latest "blasphemy" case, the Christian World says:—

> "No man has a right, whether talking on religion or on any other question in public, deliberately to use language that deeply hurts the feelings of the average listener. If a Christian speaker used unpardonably vulgar and violently provocative language, calculated to cause a breach of the peace, against a denomination other than his own, or against agnostics or atheists, he would have no reason to complain if the law stopped him."

We are sorry to say this superficially fair comment rings very hollow. In the first place, the Freethinker must not hurt the feelings of his listeners. The Christian must be so violent as to threaten an immediate breach of the peace before action is justified. And we would like to know whether the Christian World has ever even heard of a Christian speaker being threatened by the police because he used vulgar and abusive language concerning non-Christians? Week by week in the London parks some of the vilest abuse and slander is showered upon Freethinkers by paid Christian speakers. When have the police interfered? Would any magistrate grant a warrant against such a speaker if a Freethinker applied for one? The notion is so absurd that no one would dream of making such an application. It is neither the abusive nor the provocative language that is objected to. It is the attack on Christianity that is resented; and the Christian World knows that as well as we do. And the peculiar feature of the present situation is the aggravated cowardice of the Christian world. Once upon a time Christians had at least the courage to attack the leaders. Now they dare not fly higher than the rank and file.

Bishop Welldon's letter in the Manchester Guardian on the Stewart case is characteristic of the writer. He has apparently but one objection to "blasphemy" prosecutions, and that is that the victim is apt to regard himself, and to be regarded by others, as "a martyr for his religious opinions." In other words, Christianity stands to lose more than "Infidelity" from such prosecutions. Were it the other way about Bishop Welldon would find no fault with them. It is not a question of principle, but a question of profit and loss.

We quite follow Bishop Welldon's conclusion. "Christianity," he says, "is not unable to defend itself against all reasonable attacks, and persons who attack Christianity with the poisoned weapons of indecency should be punished, not as infidels, but as evil-doers." Quite so. It is Bishop Welldon's religion that must not be attacked except with the greatest care and solemnity. It is Bishop Welldon's religion, in attacking which a disputant who commits the slightest indiscretion is in danger of imprisonment. It is Bishop Welldon and his fellow-religionists who are to decide what is indiscreet and even what is "indecent." The Christians are the upper-dog in this game all along. They complain, they prosecute, they try, they give the verdict, they sentence, and they imprison. The "infidel's" role is to grin if he can and bear it as he must.

What is "indecency" in the discussion of Christianity? We challenge Bishop Welldon to give a straight answer to this question. Taking the word in its natural sense, we challenge him to find any "indecency" whatever in the words alleged to have been uttered by this Wolverhampton "blasphemer." The word "indecency" is a trick word. It is used in one sense with a hope, and indeed a knowledge, that it will be understood in another. You may say that a man's conduct at a dinner-table was positively indecent, and lead people to think that he was filthy in act or speech, whereas all he really did was to eat peas with a knife.

When a man's honor and liberty are at stake, Bishop Welldon, you should speak of him with some degree of accuracy—that is, honesty. We do not appeal to you as a Christian. That would be a waste of words. We appeal to you as a human being. It is you, sir, and not the "blasphemer" in prison, who has used "poisoned weapons." At the worst he has only used the common language of the man in the street. You have used words so as to cover a crime with a lie.

We are pleased to see the following from Mr. H. W. Massingham in reference to the many free speech prosecutions of recent years:—

> "The Larkin trial was no worse than the Crowsley trial, or the Bowman trial, or the Mann trial, or the blasphemy prosecutions. These things seem right enough to officials, advised by officials; they seem wrong to the man who breathes the comparatively free air of the street. He knows that if he is a Liberal or a Labor man, or even an average good-tempered Briton, with a Christian bias, that the men who talk 'blasphemy' are not the worst, but sometimes the best of citizens."

Mr. Massingham has been a long time coming to it, but it is something that he has at last arrived. We warned the public, at the first of the "blasphemy" trials, that there was more in the matter than what merely affected Freethinkers; and the present Government, thanks probably to its Nonconformist leaven, has all along been seeing how far it could curtail the most dreaded enemy of all governments—Free Speech. Some of those who stood idly by while Freethinkers were being prosecuted, because they did not agree with the opinions persecuted, have now reaped their reward in the persecution of opinions with which they had some sort of sympathy. We hope that by now these people will have fully realised the folly of their conduct, and bear the lesson in mind on future occasions. Freedom is the proper concern of all, and all should rally when it is attacked in any direction.

It is very difficult for a Christian to do justice to another religion—sometimes impossible. Professor Margoliouth has at times written very sympathetically of Mohammedanism, but he has just fallen into a very serious blunder. Writing an account of Mohammedanism for the benefit of the Church Family Newspaper, he points out that the Mohammedan identifies the State with his Church, and finds it difficult to separate religion from politics. In neither of these particulars does Mohammedanism differ much from Christian practice; but the remarkable statement follows that the Balkan States, when attacking the Ottoman Empire, were believed to be engaged on Crusades. Now, as a matter of fact, the Turks deliberately refrained from any appeal to religious feeling during the war. It was not they who believed the attack to be a Crusade, it was the Christians themselves who called it so. More than that, the constant appeal to the country was to Christian feeling as against Mohammedan domination. The Cross against the Crescent was the great rallying cry, and the whole of the religious press of the country openly, and indirectly, exulted in the prospect of the Turks being driven out of Constantinople and Santa Sophia reconverted to Christian worship. It is really very soon—too soon—to write that the religious feeling in the Balkan War was imported by Mohammedans.

The Catholic Times is highly indignant because the French Government gave the railway servants who were killed in the recent disaster what it calls a "Pagan funeral." The Government did not, of course, prevent the relatives of the men taking the bodies and giving them a religious funeral; and as this was not done, one must assume that those chiefly concerned were content. The Government did all it could properly be expected to do. It saw to the funeral; there were wreaths of flowers sent; and the Presidents of the Senate and the Chamber, with other Ministers, delivered addresses. Nothing else was possible or proper. The State did not employ these men as Catholics, but as citizens, and as citizens killed in the discharge of their duty it paid them civic honor. Suppose some of these men had been Jews. Would the Catholic Times advise that the representatives of the Government should have arranged a Jewish funeral? The French Government acted in a perfectly dignified manner; although one need not expect Catholics to appreciate a policy that aims at remaining neutral towards all forms of religious opinion. Neutrality is, to them, only another name for persecution.

The same journal points out that "it would not be easy to find in Europe another city where the toiling classes frequent the churches so regularly and in such large numbers." Perhaps not; but if reports are to be trusted, it would not be easy to find another city in Europe where the conditions under which people live are so utterly demoralising. Perhaps there is a very close connection between the two things. For our part, we believe there is; and we also believe that one result of the present trouble will be that a great many will have this connection brought home to them.

Fifteen tons of Bibles were sent out in two days lately from the famous House in Queen Victoria-street. It was a great weight. But theological literature is generally heavy.

Canon O. P. Wardell-Yerburgh, vicar of Tewkesbury, went hunting with the Ledbury hounds. He had better have resembled Jacob than Esau. It was his last hunt. He was taken ill on the way home and died in a cottage to which he was carried. His complaint is said to have been "overwork." Some people will be apt to think it was "overriding."

Rev. C. G. Duperier, Eyre Lodge, Portobello, left £7,753. Poor clergy!

Rev. Benjamin Watkins, vicar of Little Aston, Staffordshire, left £11,230. Oh those "poor clergy"!

Rev. Robert Jackson, of Buckingham-place, Clifton, left £30,735. "Woe unto you rich!" Quite so. The reverend gentleman took the risk.

"It is a great error of modern times to mistake erudition for education," says Mr. M. E. Sadler. It is a mistake much fostered by the clergy of all denominations.

The Archbishop of Canterbury says that he never envies young men. Are they becoming scarce in the Church?

Mr. E. O'Donnell, lecturing at Chelsea recently, proclaimed his belief in a future life for the "animal creation." In which case we hope that fleas and bugs will be self-supporting.

The Rev. F. Dormer Pierce, of Southend-on-Sea, has raised an outcry about a theatrical poster, which he considers harmful to the young people. Yet he belongs to a profession which forces Biblical nastiness into the hands of little children. Some of these clergymen will get into trouble. They denounce pictures and performances until people fancy there must be something really spicy in them; but they turn out to be by no means indecent, and the pious patrons are proportionately disappointed, and full of moral indignation at being deceived.

The near approach of the merry birthday of the Man of Sorrows reminds us of the close association of godliness with gluttony. Pudding and piety seems to be the recipe for the great festival.

John Belsham, aged thirty-four, residing in Hackney, was a printer. After being confined to his room for eight weeks suffering from consumption of the throat, he was told on November 14 that he could not live through the day. His wife brought in a clergyman and Holy Communion was celebrated at the house. Soon afterwards he was found with his throat cut. Such is the bracing and consoling effect of religion! It may be, however, that the poor fellow thought that, being prepared for heaven, he might as well go there at once, and thus avoid the many a slip which the proverb says is met between the cup and the lip. The coroner's jury returned a verdict of "Suicide by cut throat"—which was short and sweet. It left all other questions open.

Ten towns have been wrecked by earthquake in Peru. Over 200 persons were killed in one town—Abancay. More credit to "Providence"!

The new super-Dreadnought, the Iron Duke, went faster than was expected on her trial trip. Make-believe gave way to real earnest. The great battleship, warned by "wireless," raced for all she was worth to the relief of a burning steamer, the Scotsdyke. She arrived just in time to save everybody on board. It was done so nicely, neatly, and calmly that the pet dog was the first to enter the life-boat. Après vous, monsieur! The Iron Duke will never do a better deed than she did that day.

Monsignor Benson says he saw seven miracles at Lourdes one afternoon. Very likely. Some people always see what they want to. But did other people see them too? Ay, there's the rub.

"There have of recent years been some black deeds done in China, but it is pleasant to note that Mr. Ernest H. Wilson, V.M.H., whose book, A Naturalist in Western China, has just been published (Methuen, 30s. net), bears testimony in his Preface to the kind treatment which he always received in the course of his various travels in the Middle Kingdom. He has made four different expeditions to the country, covering in all nearly eleven years, but in all his wanderings he has been singularly fortunate. 'The Chinese,' he says, 'treated me always with kindly courtesy and respect. I was in interior China during the Boxer outbreak and the Russo-Japanese war, and visited places shortly before or after anti-foreign riots, but never experienced any incivility meriting the name.' This testimony from such a quarter is very interesting."—Westminster Gazette (Nov. 19).

There is an increasing scarcity of choir boys, and at a Harrow church women have replaced the boys. If this state of affairs continues, there will not be any male persons in the churches with the exception of the parsons. And did not Sidney Smith say that they were a third sex?

The Sunday School Union has a musical instrument department, and they supply articles on the easy payment system. Probably this is to prepare the scholars for the heavenly choir.

Rev. W. J. Cunningham Pike, of Chelsea Congregational Church, explains that the walls of Jericho did not fall down flat, but sank into the earth until the top of the walls were flush with the ground, so that "Rahab and her house" (that is, her brothel) were comfortably on the ground floor, and very accessible, we presume, to business visitors. Some people will say they understand it now. Others will say that all lunatics are not in asylums.

Rev. Thomas Ghent, curate of St. Andrew's, Stockwell, could not induce a special jury to give him a verdict and damages in his action for slander against Mr. Arthur Fitzgerald, a police-sergeant. It was alleged that the man of God had been too familiar with the man in blue's wife. After nine days' trial the jury disagreed. The reverend gentleman is either fortunate or unfortunate. We don't know which.

"Vanoc" in the Referee finds that the saddest event of 1913 is "the silence of the clergy on things that count." By this he means that they are silent on the most important social problems. But why should they be otherwise? All social problems pertain to this world. All religious problems pertain to another world. Why should not the clergy attend to their own problems? You reply that these problems are no longer of any importance. Very well, then; let the clergy engage in some better occupation. Their opinion on secular problems is of no more value, and often less, than the opinion of laymen.

Our old friend Mr. J. Barry—an N. S. S. vice-president and a member of the board of directors of the Secular Society, Ltd.—wonders why the Tory sporting paper referred to in last week's "Acid Drops" thinks it witty to remark that the Bradlaugh statue at Northampton is situated near a public lavatory. Mr. Barry points out that the late King Edward's statue on the best spot that could be selected on Tooting Broadway is similarly situated. And in this case the lavatory preceded the statue. So that the insult, if it is an insult, was absolutely premeditated.

Harry Lauder's motto should be "This way to the stars!" He was in the pulpit again last Sunday—at Anerley Congregational Church. It was the afternoon meeting for men, but the ladies were admitted "on this occasion only" to the galleries, the men being on the ground floor, so that the place must have looked a good deal like a Jews' synagogue. Harry has only one subject, "Pit Ponies." But he opened the ball with "Annie Laurie," and he finished with, not the "Rock of Ages" but "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep." Some of his hearers, perhaps, felt like that on the Saturday night. Of course we exclude the ladies.

Soon after the death of Ingersoll we remember reading some pious vulgarity from the pen of a professional Christian about the bearing of the women of the Ingersoll household when they had to part for ever from the body of the dear husband, the dear father, the dear head of the family. That was what you might expect, the wretched bigot said, in the bereavement of "infidels." The body is all, and they cling to it with wonderful tenacity, and at the final parting they refuse to be comforted. Whereas a Christian's thoughts are all about the soul on these occasions, and they accept the balm of consolation. Mrs. Ingersoll had to be led away from her husband's corpse when they took it to the crematorium. Well, was that never done for a bereaved Christian man? Let us see.

We have lately been reading again the Life of Edmund Burke. A man of genius, a great writer, the assailant of the French Revolution, the champion of Church and State, the apologist of Christianity. Burke stood as the representative of religion, not only for England, but for the whole of Europe. Now, Burke was wrapped up in his only son, for whose future he had formed the highest expectations. The young man was his father's pride, joy, and hope. But he was cut off in the bloom of his promise, and Burke abandoned himself to the very desperation of sorrow. His was "a grief that would not be comforted." Let us hear his biographer:—

> "The grief of Burke was appalling. He would now sit in that unnatural calmness of despair, which is yet more terrible than the most stormy displays of passion, and now bursting into a frenzy of grief, would rush into the chamber where his son lay, and throwing himself on the body, call in accents of the most fearful anguish for 'the hope of his age, the stay of his life, the only comfort of his declining and now joyless years.'"

Burke was a Christian, Mrs. Ingersoll is a Freethinker. Both acted alike in a sudden bereavement. Why? Because both were human, both natural, both sincere, and both loved. The orthodox ruffian referred to in the previous paragraph resembled them in none of these things. Therefore he did not understand.

A Yankee millionaire has raised a costly monument to "the memory of Adam, the first man." We hope the "grand old gardener" is duly grateful.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

December 7 and 14, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £252 5s. 1d. Received since:—W. J. Conroy, 10s.; B. N. Kotaka (India), 3s.; R. Young, 10s.; (Mrs.) A. Brooks, 2s. 6d.; S. Valentine Caunter, £1 1s.; D. J. D., £5.

W. J. CONROY.—You wish us "good health and general happiness." Thanks. But the two things are practically identical in our case. We live, and want to live, for "the best of causes."

D. DAWSON.—The extract you send us from Dr. C. W. Saleeby in the Harmsworth Self Educator is good (not special) English, but from a ratiocinative point of view it is about worthy of an errand-boy who has just begun attending Sunday-school. His first two sentences are enough to settle his position as a thinker. "Purpose is an attribute of mind," he says. Yes, but what is mind? The real question is evaded. "A man's body," he says, "is a machine and so is a motor-car." A man's body is not a machine. It evolves from a living germ. Did anybody ever see a motor-car growing from an egg? A motor-car is put together; all its parts, too, can be renewed if necessary. Dr. Saleeby might tell us where a man can get a new heart, new kidneys, a new liver, new lungs, or a new head. If the last were possible, we could name a good many people who should make an early application.

FRED COLLINS.—You will see by advertisement and paragraph that we have decided to do so.

E. W. COX.—(1) Our shop manager has written you to the effect that we don't do any outside printing. We wish we did no inside printing either. But we are forced into it by the insecurity of the Freethinker, which we will never place at the mercy of others while the Blasphemy Laws exist. (2) There is absolutely no contemporary evidence of the historicity of the Jesus of the Gospels. A passage exists in Josephus, but it is a patent forgery, and as De Quincey said, has "long been abandoned by all men not lunatic." Bishop Warburton called it "a forgery, and a very clumsy forgery too." (3) Glad to hear you distribute two copies of the Bible Handbook every week, and hope the fact will encourage others to do similar missionary work for Freethought.

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

E. B.—Your weekly cuttings are always welcome.

G. W. S.—We had already referred to Captain Mitford, the Morpeth magistrate. Thanks all the same. We wonder what Thomas Burt would think of this religious fossil. Perhaps as we do, that he is only fit for a museum of antiquities.

J. BARRY.—We have used your letter as material for an "Acid Drop." Thanks.

T. E. MILLER.—It is as Heine said,—the fool crop is perennial.

H. J. SMITH.—Memorials to the Home Office have only once succeeded in getting the sentence of a prisoner for "blasphemy" remitted, and that was when Mr. Gott's wife died suddenly while he was in Armley Gaol. The memorial effort is really antediluvian. There is now a criminal Court of Appeal, which did not exist in 1883, and an application to that Court is the proper procedure now. We are quite ready to assist in that line of action, or even to take the full responsibility of it, provided we are allowed full control. Neither Mr. Stewart nor any of his friends seems capable of managing it. There is no time for beating about the bush.

R. N. M. N.—We have made use of it. Of course we have to be very cautious. The Freethinker would get no mercy in a libel action.

J. B.—We had already written on the matter. Thanks all the same. A question might be put to the Lord Chancellor if Parliament were sitting—if any "noble lord" had the courage to do it. We are keeping fairly well and fit for work.

A. C. WELLS.—They would look funnier in the paper you cut them from than they would in our columns. Force of contrast, you know.

T. M.—We don't print your name in full as it may do you an injury. Pleased to have your letter and the cuttings.

A. HOLLINSON.—See paragraphs. Thanks.

H. J. HASTINGS.—May find it useful.

G. CROOKSON.—Mr. Manning Foster is wrong in calling those alleged verses of Robert Burns's in the Daily Citizen "An Unpublished Poem." They have been printed scores of times, in newspapers and separately. They are no more Burns's than they are ours—and we wouldn't own them. They are the work of an imitator. Let any real admirer of Burns read the fourth verse, for instance, and see if he can find any touch of "Rab's" fire, humor, and felicity in it. It is easy to imitate Burns's versification, but not his genius.—With regard to the other matter, you are quite right; we know all the facts.

W. W. KENNETT.—See our front-page article. The value of a "flood of lecturers" depends a lot upon the lecturers. The late methods of defence rather multiply than diminish "blasphemy" prosecutions. Nobody is bound to take our advice, but those who choose to disregard it must take the moral as well as the personal responsibility for the consequences.

J. H. B.—Such cuttings are always handy.

THOMAS FOWLER.—Thanks, though the matter has been dealt with. See "Acid Drop."

CONNIE BROOKS.—"Demagogue" doesn't necessarily mean anything offensive, though as a matter of fact it does in common usage. Don't be hurt about "the dismal doctrines which Bradlaugh taught." Adjectives are handy when arguments cannot be answered.

D. J. D.—Thanks also for your pleasant letter.

J. HALLIDAY.—Professor Loeb's experiments with the eggs of sea-urchins were made in 1890, and may be found fully described in the lectures of the Marine Biological Laboratory (U.S.A.) delivered in 1893. The essence of the experiment consisted in taking the unfecundated eggs of sea-urchins and fertilising them with prepared sea-water. The experiments proved the possibility of substituting physico-chemical agencies for living ones. When placed back in sea-water the chemically fertilised eggs developed into free-swimming larvæ.

MARK MELFORD.—Received. Will have attention as soon as possible.

R. YOUNG.—If all Freethinkers subscribed according to their means there would be plenty of money for all legitimate party objects.

H. BLACK.—Thanks for your trouble. It was good of the Manchester Guardian to print those extracts from our defence before Lord Coleridge in 1883.

W. DODD.—We offered help before, and it was rudely repelled. We are not repeating the performance. At the same time, we shall be quite willing to see that those dependent on Mr. Stewart are properly cared for during his imprisonment. Everybody who knows us knows that, we believe.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Mr. Foote has been pressed to give his lecture on "Shakespeare's Humanism in the Merchant of Venice" at the Queen's (Minor) Hall next Sunday (Dec. 7), and he has agreed to do so His subject on the following Sunday will be "Shaw Among the Prophets"—in allusion, of course, to "G. B. S.'s" recent religious developments, especially in connection with the City Temple.

Mr. Cohen lectures at the King's Hall, Corporation-street, Birmingham, this evening (Nov. 30) There should be a crowded meeting, and no doubt there will be if the weather behaves decently.

Mr. Foote has promised to pay Glasgow a lecturing visit early in March. It is not so much the lecturing as the travelling that has given him pause hitherto. He has always been glad to see the Glasgow "saints" and they have to all appearance been glad to see him. But he really wishes Glasgow were nearer. He has to leave home at 9 30 a.m. on Saturday to get to Glasgow at 10 30 p.m., and the long journey home again has to be negotiated on Monday. But what is the use of talking? Glasgow won't come nearer. And one has to fall back on the spirit of the old saying that "if the mountain won't go to Mohammed, Mohammed must go to the mountain."

We repeat that it is not so much the lecturing in itself that is burdensome in Mr. Foote's case. He got through his lecture in the big Birmingham Town Hall comfortably enough; a few weeks later he lectured in the fine Stratford Town Hall without turning a hair. No doubt the Queen's Hall lectures will be quite successful from that point of view.

The November number of the Humanitarian, edited by Mr. H. S. Salt, contains a long and excellent article by Edward Carpenter on "Sport and Agriculture." There is also a firm reply by Mr. Salt to a writer in the New Age who contends that care for the lower animals should be dropped in order that all reforming energy may be concentrated on man. Mr. Salt's reply seems unanswerable. His replies usually are of that character.

The Manchester Guardian also published a special article on "The Blasphemy Laws: their Origin and Present Scope" from a legal correspondent. This writer contends, as we did at our trial in 1883, that it is only the "feelings of members of the Church of England that are to this day protected by special and exclusive criminal sanctions." It is the State establishment of religion that is the real ground of the Blasphemy Laws.

Under the heading of "The Blasphemy Laws" the Manchester Guardian published the following leaderette on the Stewart case:—

> "Mr. Stewart was sentenced at the Staffordshire Assizes yesterday to three months' imprisonment for blasphemy. A man of the same name was sentenced at Leeds two years ago for the same offence, and the sentence will confirm the doubts so widely expressed then about the wisdom of these blasphemy laws. The summing-up of Mr. Justice Coleridge seems to have been quite admirable in its clearness. The question, he said, was whether the lecture complained of was an honest discussion of the fundamentals of religion—in which case there was no offence,—or whether it was meant merely 'to outrage, insult, or ridicule' the feelings of Christians, 'to scandalise, not to prove false' the doctrines attacked. The jury found for the second alternative, and the prisoner was condemned. Such passages as were cited from the lecture were pointless, vulgar, and irreverent, and amply justified what the Judge said about them. We may agree about that and still regret the legal anomaly which treats lapses from good taste in these matters as a crime. If the blasphemy laws were abolished, there would still be ample protection against the grosser kind of offences. If the lecturer used foul language, he could be prosecuted as hundreds of men are every Monday morning; or, again, if his language was such as to threaten a breach of the peace, the powers of the police are ample. Public decency and religious sensibilities, we think, would actually be safer from offence under the ordinary law than under the special protection of the blasphemy laws."

This is as much as one could expect from an English newspaper, and more than one could expect from most of them.

We are pleased to see a column devoted to the new "blasphemy" case in the Inquirer—an organ of the Unitarian Church in England. Our contemporary is as fair, we suppose, as any religious paper will ever be on this subject. One thing, of course, it never alludes to, and does not even appear to see; namely, that the "blasphemer" has moral rights of his own, no less than his fellow citizens have. The Inquirer argues the question almost entirely from the religious point of view. Prosecutions are bad because they tend to injure Christianity; not because they violate the liberty of the persons who are attacked. Still, it is something, nay, it is a good deal, that the Unitarian organ is in favor of abolishing the Blasphemy Laws altogether. We have pleasure in quoting the following passages:—

> "What we desire to protest against is the revival from time to time of an obsolete crime called blasphemy.....
> "In prosecutions for blasphemy it is not what a man says that matters, but the way in which he says it. It would be recognised as intolerable if a scholar of distinction were sent to prison because he arrives at conclusions destructive of the fundamentals of Christianity, and possibly sins against good taste by barbing his criticism with unpleasant sarcasm. But as soon as the same conclusions are translated into the language of the street corner or the secular hall, it is pounced upon by the law as a criminal outrage against the Christian faith. In other words, 'blasphemy' in the modern world is a matter of manners rather than opinions, and as a crime it quite eludes definition. In any case, if the law is set in motion, we should like to ask why the offender is not simply bound over to keep the peace instead of being sent to prison with hard labor?"

Blasphemy as a crime "quite eludes definition." That is true and well said. Yet the same writer says that he is prepared to take the judge's description of the "blasphemer's" coarseness and vulgarity, without a moment's inquiry as to what the man actually said. We are bound to say that this is a shocking blunder. No man's liberty is safe if he may be prosecuted and imprisoned for the use of words as to which the public is not allowed information. We put it to the Inquirer seriously. Would this amiable trust in the judge be displayed in the case of any other crime?

In reply to a brief and pointed letter from Mr. Ewart Hopper, of Jarrow-on-Tyne—a well-known Secularist, by the way—on the Stewart case, the editor of the Daily Chronicle appends the following note: "We have no sympathy with any prosecution for opinion, and think that these blasphemy cases are a great mistake."

The Protagonist of Greek Materialism.

ALL forms of faith and philosophy are the outcome of evolution. To this rule modern scientific Materialism strictly conforms. In ancient Greece, the materialistic philosophy found its first recorded exponents. Leucippus, the pioneer of the atomic school of Greek philosophy and forerunner of the greater Democritus, was born at Abdera somewhere about 500 B.C. Thirty or forty years later, Democritus first saw the light in the self-same city. Abdera was the wealthy and cultured centre of an Ionian colony on the Thracian coast. The father of Democritus was a man of substance, and we have every reason to believe that his son received an excellent education. His home instruction completed, Democritus travelled widely in the East in search for knowledge, and studied diligently in Egypt for seven years. He returned to his native land rich in information, though poor in pocket, but quickly secured a high reputation for goodness and wisdom. By almost universal consent he was the greatest physical philosopher and the most cultured thinker of his age. Of his voluminous writings, mathematical, physical, ethical, and musical, the merest fragments survive, and these were collected with loving and patient industry by Mullach, and published at Berlin in 1843.

The works of Democritus, according to Diogenes Laertius, were seventy-two in number, and for purity of style, compared favorably with that of Plato:—

> "The absurd epithet, the 'laughing philosopher,' applied to him by some unknown and very superficial thinker, may possibly in some measure have contributed to the fact that for centuries his importance was overlooked.....In the variety of his knowledge, and in the importance of his influence on both Greek and modern speculation he was the Aristotle of the fifth century, while the sanity of his metaphysical theory has led many to regard him as the equal, if not the superior, of Plato."*

The year in which Democritus died is uncertain, but his life was useful and blameless, and it ended at an advanced age. A clever pen-picture of the sage is to be found in Burton's inimitable Anatomy of Melancholy. In the Reader's preface of that learned and instructive book, occurs the following quaint passage:—

> "Democritus, as he is described by Hippocrates, and Laertius, was a little, wearish old man, very melancholy by nature, averse from company in his latter dayes, and much given to solitariness, a famous philosopher in his age, coaevous with Socrates, wholly addicted to his studies at the last, and to a private life; writ many excellent works, a great divine, according to the divinity of those times, an expert physician, a politician, an excellent mathematician, as Diacosmus and the rest of his works do witness. He was much delighted with the study of husbandry.....He knew the natures, differences of all beasts, plants, fishes, birds; and as some say, could understand the tunes and voices of them. In a word, he was omnifariam doctus, a general scholar, a great student; and, to the end that he might better contemplate, I find it related by some, that he put out his eyes, and was in his old age voluntarily blind, yet saw more than all Greece besides.....Such a one was Democritus."

On the authority of Shelley, Liberty spake, and like a sunrise on the sea, Athens arose. But although the intellectual indebtedness of modern Europe to classic Greece is almost incredibly great, and although a free spirit pervaded Attic life, we must remember that the mass of the population, then, as now, was sunk in superstition. And interested parties could always inflame the spirit of religious intolerance against the reformers of the time. Socrates drank the bitter cup of poison and Aristotle fled from Athens when the charge of Atheism threatened his life. The philosopher, Protagoras, was also obliged to flee; and his work upon the gods was publicly burnt. Anaxagoras was arrested and took to flight. Theodorus, and very probably Diogenes of Appolonia, were persecuted for their anti-theistic heresies. "And all this happened in humane and enlightened Athens."

Small wonder, then, that Democritus made contemptuous concessions to the superstitions of the hour. Not that these were very great: the wonder really is that they were so small. His system is consistently anti-theistic so far as its science and philosophy are concerned. But while he dismissed the notion of the interference of the gods in the creation and regulation of the universe, he yielded to vulgar prejudice so far as to allow the existence of an order of beings of human form, who were grander, less liable to dissolution, and with greater length of life than ordinary men possess. These divinities dwelt in the upper regions of the air, and the popular faith in their existence was accounted for by Democritus as resulting from a general desire to explain the phenomena of thunder, lightning, and earthquakes. Writes Lange, in his famous History of Materialism:—

> "With few great men of antiquity can history have dealt so despitefully as with Democritus. In the distorted picture of unscientific tradition almost nothing appears of him except the name of the 'laughing philosopher,' while figures of incomparably less importance extend themselves at full length. So much the more may we admire the tact with which Bacon, ordinarily no great hero in historical learning, chose exactly Democritus out of all the philosophers of antiquity, and awarded him the premium for true investigation, whilst he considers Aristotle, the philosophical idol of the Middle Ages, only as the originator of an injurious appearance of knowledge.....In Democritus he found a kindred spirit, and judged him across the chasm of two thousand years, much as a man of his own age."

Dr. Spedding, the great Baconian expert, fully subscribed to Lange's estimate, and proved to Professor Tyndall that the mighty Francis looked upon Democritus as a man of weightier metal than either Plato or Aristotle.

In his attitude towards Nature, Democritus displayed an essentially modern mind. Like contemporary men of science, the sage of Abdera never allowed the gods to participate in the laws which govern natural phenomena. Briefly stated, the Atomic Philosophy consists in the following propositions:—

> "1. From nothing comes nothing. Nothing that exists can be destroyed. All changes are due to the combination and separation of molecules.
> "2. Nothing happens by chance; every occurrence has its cause, from which it follows by logical necessity. The common notion of chance is merely a cloak for human ignorance.
>
> "3. The sole existing things are atoms and empty space; all else is mere opinion.
>
> "4. The atoms are infinite in number and infinitely various in form; they clash together, and the lateral motions and whirlings which thus arise are the beginnings of worlds.
> "5. The varieties of all things depend upon the varieties of their atoms, in number, size, and aggregation.
> "6. The soul consists of fine, smooth, round atoms, like those of fire. These are the most mobile of all: they interpenetrate the whole body, and in their motions the phenomena of life arise." *

The first five propositions practically represent the atomic theory of modern physics. A slight change in terminology is almost all that is necessary to bring them into line with the best-established results of the most recent science. The final proposition enunciates the existence of finer atoms which occupy the office of the nervous system, whose functions were unknown to the ancient world. Although they were pictured as individually without sensation, the phenomena of life and mind were regarded as the consequence of the combination of the atoms into groups.

The ethical teachings of Democritus were also of a high order. The acquisition of peace of mind he considered as the chief aim of life. The purest joy and the truest happiness are only to be reached through the exercise of the higher mental activity when this is exerted in the endeavor to understand the world in which we live. The blessedest peace of mind is his whose conduct is exemplary and whose conscience is clear.

That such a man as this should have been dubbed the "laughing philosopher" seems supremely ridiculous, if by such a nickname was meant a man to whom nothing was really solemn or profound. The stories which make Democritus a mere dabbler in mystic and secret doctrines are equally absurd. Out of the multitudinous medley of fables and fancies which surround his name, the certainty emerges that his life was devoted to scientific researches which were as serious and practical as they were extensive. Mullach, after a careful study of the whole case, came to the conclusion that Democritus possessed the greatest culture and displayed the deepest philosophical insight of all the pre-Aristotelian thinkers. And he more than hints that the Stagirite sage was materially indebted to the study of Democritus's writings for that wealth of knowledge which has compelled the wonder and admiration of all the modern world.

In more than one respect, the atomic philosopher bears a striking resemblance to our own master-thinker, Herbert Spencer. The philosopher of evolution rated the thinking power far above that of mere erudition. And, in speaking of the Greek sage, Lange justly says, "It is significant that a man of such extensive attainments has said that 'we should strive not after fullness of knowledge, but fullness of understanding.'" And when Democritus refers to his achievements, he appears to attach more importance to his mathematical method, the benefits he had derived from his intercourse with thoughtful men, and the enlarged outlook upon life which a critical study of foreign races and countries helps to confer on the reflective observer, than to all his written works.

The circumstance that the man and his labors have been recognised and vindicated by thinkers of the calibre of Bacon, Lange, Lewes, and Tyndall, and that his pioneer work is now adequately acknowledged by our leading physical philosophers, must not blind us to the fact that for more than two thousand years the star of Democritus was eclipsed by lesser lights. Religious prejudice was doubtless in a great degree responsible for this. But Democritus' distaste for dialectical display, and his constitutional indifference to fame, were certainly contributory causes of the neglect into which he fell. He visited Athens without making his presence known to its numerous philosophers. That he was a scorner of mere word-spinning, an art in which the Sophists excelled, and in which even Socrates and Plato took the keenest delight, is amply evidenced in his works. Democritus was of opinion that truth is more readily extracted from error, than sifted from confusion. One of his moral aphorisms declares that "He who is fond of contradiction and makes many words is incapable of learning anything that is right."

Materialistic views concerning Nature dominated the philosophy of Greece in the fifth century before Christ, when Democritus and Hippocrates were exercising their greatest influence. The immediately succeeding period, which was that of Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle, was marked by a metaphysical reaction. But from the school of Aristotle proceeded men who returned to more rational modes of thought.

There can be little doubt that the main doctrines of Democritus were adopted by Epicurus, and incorporated with his philosophy; and, in the noble poem of the later Roman, Lucretius, has been preserved for all time the speculations of the two Greek sages, in the form of a stately literary masterpiece.

Thus, in the case of Democritus, we possess a fuller knowledge of his doctrines than of those of many old-time thinkers whose writings have survived in less fragmentary form. It is no longer disputed that the philosophy of Democritus was clear and consecutive. His doctrines followed through logical necessity from his atomistic postulates. Subjected to revision with the expansion of the human understanding, and the extension of knowledge, the leading principles of the ancient Greek Materialist still form the foundation stones of the many-winged mansion of modern physical science.

The Garden of God.

WE were sitting on an old seat in a garden. A lilac tree, heavily laden with bunches of white flourish, screened us from the sun-rays. Before us, stretching out on a southern declivity, lay the garden, full of flowers of all colors, resplendently dressed in the glory the sunlight gives them. The air was fragrant with their rich breathings, and the only fault of the picture was that it did not belong to us.

Conversation lagged and finally became tedious and dropped off to sleep. Our pipes went quietly, glad to escape from the application of matches, and we slipped into peaceful harmony with the garden.

Being Sunday, it was more or less natural that my thoughts should take to themselves a religious coloring, and that they should choose to go roaming along the bordered walks of a garden was, in the environment, also more or less natural.

Some time before I had read a sermon entitled the Garden of God. Although, like many people, I love gardens, that sermon did not awaken in me any longing to get there. I disposed of both sermon and garden with a grunt of disgust. He was an inefficient assistant gardener, the fellow who wrote that sermon. I wondered why he did not get the sack. His tools were badly made, and his style of showing a visitor round was most deplorable for one who received a training in the part from so marvellous a master gardener as God. The assistant's sermon wearied me before the amen; but the phrase remained in my memory.

And so it was that, on a lovely Sunday forenoon, in ideal surroundings, when the peacefulness and stillness that have characterised the Lord's Day since the very dawning of time, hung like an invisible but golden mantle of divine grace around my soul, my thoughts, after many wanderings, became entangled in some briar bushes growing in the Garden of God.

The Garden of God is, strangely enough, divided into two; and as I slowly walked along the broad, bordered path that separates the parts, I noticed that the older gardeners lived in the old, and the younger ones in the new. In the former the flowers were all of the Scots thistle type, dogmatically assertive, so to speak, and were labelled in a manner to suggest various ideas still to be found in all church catechisms, prayer-books, hymnaries, and permanent things like those. The flowers, undoubtedly, were born in the open, reared in it, and died in it. They were "everlasters," and looked such, if you deliberately disregarded the inevitability of death.

Some young genius from the other side had managed to perform a bit of audacious vandalism, I thought; for above every label was another bearing the words, "of the species, Churchianity."

On the other side of God's Garden the flowers were very tender, very beautiful. Their tints were innumerable. Delicacy of nuance, apparently, had been made a fine art in their cultivation. Langorous odors pervaded the atmosphere. Soil, flowers, colors, air were all ultra-refined. Nothing harshly antagonistic to this excellence of refinement brutalised one's artistic temperament. Everything was exquisitely lovely. Most of the flowers were unnamed, probably because of their novelty. Some varieties had labels, but it was impossible to discover the appellations owing to the number of corrections on the labels. Seemingly the different assistant gardeners had quarrelled over the nomenclature, and, consequently, nothing definite had been decided.

In the old garden, scattered here and there, the eyes found relief in resting upon an unassuming bunch of quietly colored and lowly little flowers; but in the new garden the very delicacy of every kind of flower possessed an assumption that plainly asserted superiority. They forced their refinement upon you till it became intrusion. Their spirituality oppressed you. You began to rebel against the affectation of their elegance and purity. Their charming tenderness nauseated you. They were all too etherealised; and this esemplastic nature of theirs grated on your nerves till you thought the Devil was in it and you asked him peremptorily to keep it and take it home.

Traversing the intricate design of paths that formed the garden plots into grotesque shapes, this riotous objection became more powerful than restraint within me. Heedless of the many assistants effeminately pottering about, I deliberately kicked down a languid rose-tree. Immediately I felt relieved; and proceeded to continue the nerve-enlivening process; but in a second the Philistines were upon me, their emasculation having been roused to the anger of a tigress, and I was unceremoniously pitched into a huge clump of briars that suddenly and mysteriously grew out of the earth to receive me. The atmosphere around me changed in temperature. It was chilly and bracing, lifegiving; and the sweet perfume of the briars was delightfully pleasant and fresh after the erotic sensuality of the hothouse flowers.

Rapidly I disentangled myself from this uncanny growth in the Garden of God, and as rapidly I endeavored to pick out the thorns from my clothing. Then, after pulling off a small branch which I rammed in my pocket, I made a bee-line for escape.

Perhaps the thorn-pricks irritated me; perhaps the sickening spirituality of God's new garden still annoyed my rebellious mind; at any rate, my condemnations of the conjuring tricks of those assistant gardeners were rather bitter as I wended my way up the glen to the hill, where I would be completely purged by the wind. It was all very well for those insipid assistants to prate about the improvement of their flowers over the neglected occupants of the old garden; but the briar bushes they kept in reserve up their wide sleeves, tended, I thought, rather to negate the much-beloved advance in the art of religious horticulture. Besides, I thought, hothouse flowers are rubbishy things at the best; likewise the people who dote on them. There's too much of the nursery about God's modern garden; it requires too much attention, too much care; and the flowers demand too much fondling. This striving after spirituality ——

"Coo-oo-ee! Dinner-time." The voice echoed away up the glen I imagined I was climbing, and forced me to leave the hill-top for the afternoon. We rose from the seat, and, as I knocked the ashes from my pipe, I surprised my companion by saying, "There go the remains of the Garden of God."

ROBERT MORELAND.

SELECTIONS FROM INGERSOLL.

Give me the storm and tempest of thought and action, rather than the dead calm of ignorance and faith.

If the people were a little more ignorant, astrology would flourish; if a little more enlightened, religion would perish.

I want no heaven for which I must give up my reason, no happiness in exchange for my liberty, and no immortality that demands the surrender of my individuality.

Arguments cannot be answered with insults. Kindness is strength. Anger blows out the lamp of the mind. In the examination of great questions every one should be serene, slow-pulsed, and calm. Intelligence is not the foundation of arrogance. Insolence is not logic. Epithets are the arguments of malice.

Across the highway of progress the Church has always been building breastplates of Bibles, tracts, commentaries, prayer-books, creeds, dogmas, and platforms; and at every advance the Christians have gathered behind these heaps of rubbish and shot the poisoned arrows of malice at the soldiers of freedom.

Some Little-Known Freethinkers.

V.—JULIAN HIBBERT.

ON November 28, 1833, a scene was enacted at the Old Bailey which may serve to measure the distance from that time to this. It was deemed worthy of some prominence in the papers, and is thus reported in the Annual Register for that year (p. 159). It was in the case of a young man named Berthold, who was tried for stealing a boa:—

> "The first witness who presented himself for the prisoner gave his name as Julian Hibbert, but, on being tendered the book to be sworn, he said he had no belief in its contents. The Recorder: 'Is it the Old or New Testament?' Witness: 'It does not matter; I have no belief in either. I made the same objection here two years ago, and was rejected.' Mr. Phillips: 'Then, sir, why do you come here now?' Witness: 'Because I was subpœnaed.' Mr. Phillips: 'Are you of any creed at all, sir?' Witness: 'No, sir.' Mr. Phillips: 'Are you a Deist?' Witness: 'No, sir.' Mr. Phillips: 'Are you an Atheist?' Witness: 'Yes, sir, I am.' (Strong marks of disapprobation and disgust from all parts of the court followed this declaration.) Mr. Phillips (to witness): 'Go down, sir; I will not ask you a single question.' Witness, with the most perfect nonchalance, replied, 'Very well, sir,' and descended from the witness-box amidst loud hisses. Mr. C. Phillips, however, called him back, and, addressing him, said: 'Perhaps, sir, you misunderstand the question, or we have mistaken or misunderstood you; I hope you did not mean to say that you are an Atheist?' Witness: 'Yes, sir, I do.' Mr. Phillips: 'Do you know what an Atheist is?' Witness: 'It is a negative term.' Mr. Phillips: 'What does it mean, sir?' Witness: 'It means a man that does not believe in the existence of a God.' Mr. Phillips: 'And do you mean to say, sir, that you are such a person?' Witness: 'Yes, sir.' (Disapprobation manifested by every individual in court.) Mr. Phillips: 'Witness, I will not disgrace myself by asking you another question.' The witness then retired amidst the strongest manifestation of disgust and execration from all present."

Within two months of this scene, on January 23, 1834, the execrated Atheist was dead. He was but thirty-three years of age. Richard Carlile, who knew him well, and who at that time did not call himself an Atheist, wrote of him in the Gauntlet: "Though avowedly an Atheist, he was the best specimen of human nature that I have seen, read, heard, or thought of." Julian Hibbert came of a wealthy family, whose fortune had been made in the West Indies. He was a second son. Educated at Eton and Cambridge, he closely pursued studies all his life. This, possibly, acting on a delicate constitution, may have contributed to his early death.

Hibbert probably was attracted to Freethought by the prosecutions of Richard Carlile and his shopmen. Of Carlile he was a munificent supporter. Learning that a distinguished political prisoner had received a gift of £1,000, he remarked that a Freethinking prisoner should not want equal friends, and gave Carlile a cheque for the same amount. Julian Hibbert also spent nearly £1,000 in fitting up Carlile's shop in Fleet-street. Mr. G. J. Holyoake says: "Mr. Carlile said to us on one occasion, that Mr. Hibbert, from first to last, gave £7,000 in furtherance of his advocacy of free discussion in religion." He contributed "Theological Dialogues" to the Republican, and of these articles I possess the original MSS. In some sort also I may, perhaps, consider myself as having inherited his work, inasmuch as he commenced and published in 1826 A Dictionary of Modern Anti-Superstitionists, or "an account, arranged alphabetically, of those who, whether called Atheists, Sceptics, Latitudinarians, Religious Reformers, etc., have, during the last ten centuries, contributed towards the diminution of superstition. Compiled by a searcher after truth." He refrained from giving his name through modesty, and the philosophy which loses the individual in his work; for we have seen he was ready enough to expose himself to execration when he thought the interests of justice demanded it. The Dictionary evinced great scholarship and research. It was, however, conceived on too extensive a scale, and in 128 pages, all that was issued, it only reached to the name of Annet.

Julian Hibbert also compiled "Chronological Tables of English Freethinkers," which were published in the Reasoner for 1855. In my Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers of all Ages and Nations I have expressed my acknowledgments to Hibbert, whose idea I carried out on a more modest scale, and I only hope that in another fifty years my own work will be superseded by a better. Julian Hibbert set up a private printing-press at No. 1 Fitzroy-place, Kentish Town, and had, at great trouble and expense, special founts of type cast in uncial Greek, with which he was never satisfied. He was, indeed, as Carlile wrote, "as scrupulous and accurate as a classical scholar as he was noble in nature, punctual in morals, and amiable in manners." In his preface to The Book of the Orphic Hymns, the first work published in this type, he thus humorously defends his fad, not only as a matter of taste, but also as a matter of religion:—

> "If orthodoxy or heterodoxy (salvation or perdition) depend upon the appearance of part of a single Greek character in the faded writing of some half-a-dozen mutilated old books, surely every true believer ought to devote a considerable portion of his mortal existence to the study of those letters, the right or wrong understanding of which will, no doubt, equally open to him the gates of Heaven or of Hades."

We may be quite sure the book of Orphic hymns, though now valuable, never paid for the type-founding. His next work in uncial Greek was of more general interest, being the treatises of Plutarch and Theophrastus on Superstition, which he edited with notes, a life of Plutarch, and learned appendices "On the Supposed Necessity of Deceiving the Vulgar," "Of Persons Falsely entitled Atheists," "Various Definitions of an Important Word"—viz., the word "God," and a catalogue of the principal modern works against Atheism.

In 1831, Julian Hibbert, being in ill-health, gave his press and types to James Watson, who had been his printer. James Watson, while working on Carlile's Republican, was attacked by cholera, which terminated in typhus and brain fever. He said:—

> "I owe my life to the late Julian Hibbert. He took me from my lodgings to his own house at Kentish Town, nursed me and doctored me for eight weeks, and made a man of me again. After my recovery Mr. Hibbert got a printing press put up in his house and employed me in composing, under his directions, two volumes, one in Greek and the other in Greek and English" (W. J. Linton, Memoir, p. 31).

Hibbert also wrote in, and helped to sustain, Hetherington's Poor Man's Guardian, taking much interest in the fight for an unstamped free press up to the month of his untimely death. His will was proved, and the personal effects sworn under £8,000 by his executors, two good Freethinkers—William Devonshire Saul, of Aldersgate-street, wine merchant; and J. Brooks, of Oxford-street, bookseller. He directed his body to be given to an anatomical school, and requested that no person should wear mourning for him, or take any further notice of his memory. He bequeathed £492 to Carlile's printers, being the sum Carlile was indebted to them, in place of a legacy. To Henry Hetherington and James Watson he left £500. He had bequeathed a like sum to the Rev. Robert Taylor, but this he revoked by a codicil, in consequence, as he states, of Taylor having married a lady of large fortune.

The obituary notice in the Annual Register (p. 217) says: "Hibbert never partook of animal food, but lived in a rigid and abstemious manner. He had some landed property, and the residue of his estates becomes the property of his sister." A portrait of him is extant, and was engraved in the Reasoner for July 1, 1855. His face is a very attractive and sweet one, closely resembling that of the poet Percy Bysshe Shelley.

(The late) J. M. WHEELER.

CONSCIENCE.

Men speak of conscience as an inward guide
Intelligence possessing, to decide What's right, what's wrong, what's false, and what is true;
What they ought not, and what they ought to do.
He has done right, 'tis said, who has obeyed it;
Yet conscience is but that which man has made it;
'Tis educated with us, and we find
Its teachings but the echo of the mind.
"Do as your conscience teaches you to do"
Is not the maxim to adhere to.
A better one would be, "Do as you ought";
For conscience only teaches what it's taught.

CARLOS.

She attended a spiritist séance
  Soon after her poor husband died,
And to find out if he were in heaven
  She called on his spirit and cried,
"Oh, John! are you here, John?" "I am, Jane,"
  A voice that she knew well replied.

"Dear John, I've a question to ask you,
  Say—if you're permitted to tell—
Are you happier now where you are, John,
  Than when upon earth you did dwell?"
"Yes, Jane, I am happier far, Jane."
  "In heaven, John?" "No, Jane, in hell."

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 12 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 49 SUNDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Grammars of rhetoric and grammars of logic are among the most useless furniture of a shelf. Give a boy "Robinson Crusoe." That is worth all the grammars of rhetoric and logic in the world—MACAULAY.

Milton's Plea for Liberty.

LIBERTY was not utterly unknown in England before the age of Milton. Not only was it frequently claimed by Wicklif and his followers in religion, and by the popular party in rebellion after rebellion against royal and aristocratic tyranny, but the House of Commons itself, notwithstanding the restricted suffrage and the high-handed methods of Feudalism, was always a citadel of freedom, as far as it was then capable of being understood. During the reign of the Tudors, English liberty was at a low ebb; yet there was great intellectual movement in that fateful period, and the seeds were then sown of the epoch-marking revolution of the seventeenth century, which saw the beginning of all the liberties we now enjoy. From the moment the Long Parliament met, the fate of kingcraft and priestcraft was sealed. Religion itself was, it is true, only tentatively and hesitatingly discussed by a few bold spirits; but the principle of authority was everywhere challenged, and in that principle lay the secret strength of every form of despotism. There could not be a fitter moment for a vindication of liberty, not in the style of apology, but in the lofty manner of a prophet. Fortunately, the hour had found its man. The greatest genius in England, he who is reckoned with Shakespeare a twin pillar of the mighty temple of English poetry, sprang to fulfil the task. What could be better than that the noblest of causes should be championed by the noblest of men? Milton's Areopagitica was the first set defence of liberty in our English tongue, and, although it has been supplemented, it can never be superseded. It is a splendid arsenal from which whole generations of the soldiers of freedom have selected their choicest weapons; Damascene blades of rhetoric that flash gloriously as they cut and parry, exquisitely fashioned stilettos of sarcasm for close thrusts, superb long-range rifles of argument, and mighty artillery of sonorous and majestic eloquence.

Old Henry More, the Platonist, who wrote many a bulky volume himself, described his own time with disgust as "this scripturient age." The sneer is common, and it always comes from the greatest sinners. Carlyle expressed a wish that the tongues of one whole generation might be cut out, and all printing suspended, to give an age "run to tongue" an opportunity of digesting its knowledge in silence. Yet the Sage of Chelsea himself, in less splenetic moments, when the hag dyspepsia relaxed her hold upon him, allowed that "of the things which man can do or make here below, by far the most momentous, wonderful, and worthy are the things called Books," and that the noble art of printing "is like an infinitely intensated organ of speech, whereby the voice of a small transitory man may reach not only through all earthly space, but through all earthly time." Ephemeral literature may be superabundant, but every good thing has its price. How many ephemeral lives are there for one immortal? How many myriad miles of flats and bogs and swamps for a Mont Blanc or a Chimborazo? Why complain, then, if a myriad commonplace men scribble for every man of genius? It is nature's method. Enough that the better does exist! The trashy books, like the trashy lives, pass and perish; but a good book, as Milton finely says, "is the precious life-blood of a master spirit, embalmed and treasured up to a life beyond life."

Yet all books were once treated as interlopers, or like foreigners in a despotic country. They had to carry a passport, and conform to the most rigorous conditions on pain of capital punishment, without a trial by judge and jury. Church and State looked upon them as the chiefs of a black tribe might look upon a casual white man straying in Central Africa. They were to be closely watched, if not suppressed, and care was to be taken that they did not multiply. They only existed on sufferance, and the men who wrote them were regarded as pestilent busybodies or imps of Satan, born disturbers of the peace, and natural enemies of "the powers that be." While custom kept men placid it was easy to govern them, but who could rule them when they were set thinking? It was like sailing a ship in the Maelstrom.

As the venerable and sagacious Blackstone tells us in his Commentaries:—

> "In England, as in other countries, the art of printing soon after its introduction, was looked upon as merely a matter of State, and subject to the coercion of the Crown. It was therefore regulated with us by the King's proclamations, prohibitions, charters of privilege, and of licence, and finally by the decrees of the Court of Star Chamber, which limited the number of printers and of presses which each should employ, and prohibited new publications unless previously approved by proper licensers."

Henry VIII., as head of the Church as well as the State, assumed absolute control over all printing, both lay and ecclesiastic. Letters Patent were at first granted for the exclusive right of printing the Bible, and to this day the Authorised Version is only issued by the King's printers. In the reign of Mary (1555) the Stationers' Company was established, with a monopoly of printing presses, but subject to the regulations of the Star Chamber. The number of men and presses was strictly limited, and nothing was to be printed without the licenser's approval. In 1585 the Star Chamber restricted all presses to London, Oxford, and Cambridge, and undertook to examine all manuscripts that were candidates for publication. Archbishop Laud is said to have instigated the first establishment of regular licensers, a trick of tyranny borrowed from the Inquisition. According to the decree of the Star Chamber in 1637, all books were to be examined before being entered with the Stationers' Company, by some of the following officials: the Lord Chief Baron or one of the Chief Justices for law, the principal Secretaries of State for history and politics, and the Archbishop of Canterbury (that is, the noble Laud himself) for divinity, physic, philosophy, and poetry. The number of master printers was limited to twenty, and of printing presses to forty; and restrictions were put upon type-founding. Laud was evidently resolved that the flock God had given him should not suffer from book-headache.

The Natural History of Religion.

The Divine Mystery. By Allen Upward. (Garden City Press.) 10s. 6d.

IT is unquestionable that there is a strong spirit of religious reaction abroad. It is just as certain that the naturalistic study of religion is everywhere making headway. Nor need the two things be unconnected. The reaction may be largely due to the best brains leaving the old creed, and so giving the intolerant elements always present a chance of activity. And at the same time this would give the more scientific mind a freer chance of following its bent. However that may be, a great number of works are now being published on the subject of religion that clearly advocate the naturalistic point of view. They accept religion as a natural fact, but not an eternal one. It is associated with human nature, but it is not essential to it. The whole of the mental attitude of these writers is governed by the conclusion that the study of religion is the study of an illusion—an illusion that is universal in its extent, important in its consequences, but none the less an illusion. They do not inquire whether religion is true; they take for granted that it is not. They merely inquire how it is that people came to have religious beliefs, and what were the conditions that determined their perpetuation. Explanation has become synonymous with annihilation.

A year or so ago I noticed in these columns a very striking work by Mr. Allen Upward called The New Word. That work was a very strong appeal on behalf of truth, with a powerful indictment of religion in general and of Christianity in particular, in cultivating its opposite. Mr. Upward has now issued a volume planned to form the first of a series of three, intended to elucidate the history and significance of Christianity, which he calls "the greatest revolution in history." There is a sense in which this description might pass, but I do not think that this is Mr. Upward's meaning. Christians are fond of using this expression because it gives to their creed an increased importance. But in reality the revolution effected by Christianity, as such, was very slight. All the elements of the Christian superstition were present in the old Pagan Empire, and these slowly gained in strength during many centuries. Christianity did not so much effect a revolution as it marked the culmination of a series of changes that had been long in progress. The study of this "revolution" consequently becomes a study in sociology. It is a study of those social conditions that gave to certain slowly developing ideas an ultimately commanding influence.

Apart from this criticism, one may say that Mr. Upward has written an extremely suggestive work. And it is not the less valuable because he so often suggests a difference of opinion—at least in my own case—on the minor details of a thesis with which one is, in the main, in agreement. For instance, Mr. Upward finds—as do all other serious investigators—the origin of religious ideas in the ignorance of primitive mankind. And it may also be accepted that the origin of a special religious caste—wizards, priests, or prophets—began in certain individuals being credited with greater influence over natural or supernatural forces. But I do not know that this will justify Mr. Upward's conclusion that the wizard was originally a weather-wizard. There is no evidence that primitive man is much more concerned with the weather than with other things. It is true that in course of time the function of a weather prophet becomes a very general one, but that is mainly because human ignorance concerning the weather is more persistent than his ignorance concerning other things. Even among ourselves we continue with prayer for a good harvest, long after we have dropped all faith in prayer as affecting a number of other things. The truth is that in the history of man religious ideas are associated longest with just those things concerning which it is difficult to get precise knowledge. They die soonest where knowledge is most easily available. That is why we pray that a man may be cured of a fever, but never that a severed leg may be restored.

The worship of the living, says Mr. Upward, is older than the worship of the dead. This is quite true, although it may easily be that we should have no worship of the living had it not been for the dead. It seems beyond reasonable question that the idea of a "soul" animating the body was first suggested to man by the phenomena of dreaming, and received powerful enforcement by the fact of death with its close superficial resemblance to sleep. Once this notion is abroad, it receives, naturally, all sorts of queer developments. Moreover, Mr. Upward is departing a little from the evidence when he says that "the spirits of cowards and fools did not receive worship, but only the spirits of the brave and wise." There is no evidence that I know of to support this view. The fact seems to be that primitive man worships almost anything without special regard to moral or mental qualities. A crocodile or the spirit that is supposed to send a disease will receive the same homage as agencies of a more benevolent character. What does impress primitive man is power. Anything that affects him, that has power to injure him or help him, may become an object of worship. It is only later, with a greater degree of moral and social development, that the good and the wise become specially selected as objects of religious worship. Religion is not only deeply rooted in fear, but when the element of fear weakens, religious beliefs usually lose their force.

One very pleasing feature of Mr. Upward's book is that it does not hesitate to affiliate the Christian theology to early and contemporary savage practices. The chief interest of research in this direction lies in showing how the Christian theology has its origin in savagery, and is, in fact, a mere continuation of savage beliefs under other names and forms. The vast majority of writers, while pointing to this conclusion, for various reasons, fail to state it explicitly. They stop short at the very point where their studies become of the greatest value. Of course, informed readers draw the inevitable moral, but they are, unfortunately, few. Mr. Upward escapes this reproach. He points out, for example, how the Christian doctrine of the Eucharist is no more than a form of the ancient ceremony of god-eating, and that the words, "This is my body" and "This is my blood," might have been spoken, and probably were spoken, over many ancient religious ceremonies that Christians now call "savage" or "heathen." And, taking the old folk-poem of John Barleycorn—too lengthy to quote here—he shows how, verse by verse, the visit of the three kings, the killing of John, his burial, and resurrection, with the drinking of his blood, repeats the legend that thousands of Churches retain as a veritable historic fact. Mr. Upward well says:—

> "There is an awful instinct inherited from thousands of years of Pagan Culture behind the gruesome phrases of our popular hymns: 'The water and the blood from thy wounded side which flowed,' and 'There is a fountain filled with blood drawn from Emmanuel's veins.' When we hear language like that smiting the walls of glorious cathedrals, the Gothic walls seem to melt away, and we stand once more on the Pictish hillside among the ring of naked savages who strike their knives into the dying Genius (God) and smear themselves with the red ooze. The civilised conscience must not be expected to share this joy."

Behind every religion the savage; behind every priest the medicine-man. That is the true lesson of anthropology.

Mr. Upward is also well advised in bringing back the doctrine of the Divine Birth to its roots in savage belief. Carefully analysed the doctrine of the divine birth of Jesus is only a survival from the time when all birth was divine—that is, when all children were believed to be the incarnation of the tribal ghosts. Mr. E. S. Hartland has shown that even to-day there are still existing tribes of people who have only the vaguest idea as to the father's share in the procreation of children. There has never been a doctrine of a divine mother, because a woman's share in the birth of a child was obvious. But the man's share—owing to the intervening period of gestation—was a slow discovery. It is a trifle far-fetched to say, as Mr. Upward does, that "Heredity first presented itself to the savage mind as a form of resurrection"; but it may be taken for granted that the belief of the Australian blacks, that the new-born child is the "avatar" of one of the tribal ghosts, represents a once common frame of mind. On this basis is built both the general doctrine of reincarnation and the Christian doctrine of the divine birth of Jesus—the latter being far nearer the savage prototype than the former. And as it is common for deposed gods to become demons, so we find in mediæval Christendom numerous stories of demons begetting children on the bodies of witches. Between the child who is the product of a demon and a witch, and the one who results from intercourse between woman and a deity, the distinction, from the point of view of a scientific anthropology, is unimportant.

I do not agree with Mr. Upward that the simplest origin to ascribe to asceticism is "the practice of putting to death the aged members of the clan." The religious origin of this practice is clear. It is connected with the notion of the ghost world, the object being to send one's relatives into the next world before reaching a state of decrepitude. Asceticism in origin is part of the practice noted by Mr. Upward in the earlier portion of his book, namely, the practice of producing abnormal states of mind as a means of intercourse with the supernatural. Of this practice, fasting and self-torture are the most common and the most persistent form. It is at the root of the world-wide opposition between "worldly" pleasure and "spiritual" development. The ascetic is everywhere credited with a closer communion with the supernatural. His is the one prominent form of the religious ideal, because the ascetic has been a powerful cause in the perpetuation of religious belief.

I have been dwelling more on points of disagreement than I had intended when I began, but it ought to be said in justice to the author that these disagreements do not affect the main thesis of the book. Mr. Upward's work is of the best kind, because it not only suggests many agreements, but also awakens almost innumerable lines of inquiry. In his main object Mr. Upward has undoubtedly succeeded—and that is to provide a synopsis of those fundamental conceptions upon which Christianity, as a distinct religion, is built. In the two volumes that are to succeed The Divine Mystery, Mr. Upward will, I presume, be concerned with the actual formation of the Christian religion. And the affiliation of Christian doctrines to primitive religious ideas is exactly what the world now needs most. The spade work has been well done and the ground well prepared. Substantially, we know the origin of religious ideas. We know how they originated in the fear-haunted brain of the primitive savage. The pressing need to-day is for a clear and explicit description of the way in which these took shape as Christian teaching, and of the sociological causes that enabled that religion to rule the Western world.

C. COHEN.

The Alleged Manliness of Jesus.

EXTRAVAGANCE is one of the most prominent characteristics of the Christian pulpit. This is to be accounted for by the fact that most of the subjects discussed by the preacher are of such a nature as to render a moderate treatment of them extremely difficult, if not impossible. They are chiefly subjects concerning which absolutely nothing is known. There is no theme on which the pulpit speaks with such glowing eloquence and offers such endless information as on that of the existence, character, and works of God, simply because there is no other theme about which it is so profoundly ignorant. The preacher would never dream of talking about a brother man whom he knows in the intimate, familiar fashion in which he talks about God whom he does not know. He undertakes to tell us, not only what the Divine Being is doing to-day, but also what he did in eternity, before the Universe was created; not only what he does and has done, but also what he thinks and feels about everything both under and above the sun. He never hesitates to assure his hearers that he is in possession of all the Divine counsels and knows exactly what the Lord thinks of dancing, theatre-going, card-playing, and Sunday golf. Indeed, he has the audacity to call himself God's man, God's spokesman, or God's vicegerent; and whenever he enters the pulpit he pretends to deliver God's message. We read the other day of a man who had been pastor of one church for the space of forty years; and during that period he had given his people between four and five thousand messages from God, which means that for forty years he had played the liar, speaking familiarly and fulsomely about and in the name of a being concerning whom he knew nothing at all.

The extravagance of the pulpit extends to all subjects. In the Christian World Pulpit for November 26 there is a sermon by the Rev. H. J. Nicholas, an American divine, on "The Manliness of Christ," which bristles from beginning to end with wild, whimsical, irresponsible statements. The very text chosen betrays the reverend gentleman's lack of sound judgment: "I find no fault in him.....Behold the man" (John xix. 4, 5). There is no allusion to manliness in those words, nor to anything else upon which a discourse on character could legitimately be based. We are not surprised, therefore, to find the whole sermon heavy-laden with unfounded and unverifiable assumptions. The central assumption is that "we go for the highest type of manhood to Jesus Christ, for he was at once God and man." We do nothing of the kind, for the simple reason that a God-man is a mythological being, for whom history has no place. It is perfectly absurd to say that the Gospel Jesus "represented manhood in its ideal condition realised." It is equally silly to assert that "he was the highest type of manhood physically," or that "he must have been of a perfect physical nature." As to his physical constitution, the Gospels furnish no information whatever. The words usually regarded as having been fulfilled in him describe him as having neither "form nor comeliness," so that when "we see him there is no beauty that we should desire him," and "as one from whom men hide their face, he was despised, and we esteemed him not." We admit that there is no warrant whatever for applying such terms to him; but there is even less foundation for Mr. Nicholas's assumption that he was physically perfect.

Equally groundless is the claim that Jesus "was the highest type of manhood in his manner." Mr. Nicholas describes his manner thus:—

> "Bold without being brazen; humble, but not servile; gentle, but not given to weakness; strong without being tyrannical; helpful, but not intrusive; religious, without hypocrisy; devout, but not gloomy; social, without frivolity; firm, but not unreasonable; chivalrous, but not self-seeking; submissive without compromise; righteous, but not rigorous; truthful, but not blunt; optimistic, but not obsessed."

Words, words, nothing but words. As a matter of fact, the Gospel Jesus often showed exceedingly bad manners. His treatment of his mother as a boy of twelve, and again as an adult was so unfilial, and his conduct generally so wayward as to drive his relations to the conclusion that he was insane. Mr. Nicholas affirms that he was charitable with charlatans and fair with foes. We ask, on what occasions? Where are the instances? We know that in controversy the Gospel Jesus was much given to cursing and swearing. Read Matthew xxiii. and you will see him in a temper, calling the Scribes and Pharisees all sorts of offensive names, such as "serpents," "offspring of vipers," "hypocrites," "blind guides." You cannot conceive of a fair-minded debater saying to his opponents: "Ye are from beneath; I am from above; ye are of this world; I am not of this world" (John viii. 23). It is impossible to read such passages impartially without arriving at the conviction that Jesus was by no means the highest type of manhood in his manners. A loving son and brother would not have refused to see his mother and brethren who had probably come a long way with the object of getting into affectionate converse with him for a few moments. Jesus not only declined to receive them but cruelly denied the relationship between him and them. He was above all earthly ties and bonds, being the second man from heaven.

It is instructive to note that Mr. Nicholas, while claiming Jesus as the highest type of manhood the world has ever seen, fails to show us that ideal manhood in contact with the world. Nothing is easier than to paint an ideal character, but what we want to see is character in action. Up to his thirtieth year, with one doubtful exception, we know nothing of Jesus of Nazareth. When Mr. Nicholas declares that "he was a craftsman continually following the trade of his father and helping him in his shop," he is merely drawing upon his imagination. History there is none to attest his statement. The story of Jesus' home life at Nazareth is not told. What his parents, brothers and sisters, and neighbors thought of him, we have no means of ascertaining. Do we know much more about him during his public ministry? The Gospels deal with him only in his capacities as teacher, miracle-worker, and healer; on the subject of his private life and character they are entirely silent. Mr. Nicholas does not even attempt to analyse his manhood, though he talks grandiloquently about its being developed in the home, the shop, in teaching and in service, and tested in the wilderness by Satan, when craving food for body and mind, and particularly when cruelly persecuted and misrepresented by his enemies; but he deliberately ignores certain expressions in the Gospels, because they belie his picture of Jesus. He quotes the words, "Who, when he was reviled, reviled not again." If to revile signifies to address people with abusive, opprobrious, scandalous, and contemptuous language, Jesus was certainly guilty of reviling. He reviled the lawyers; he reviled the national leaders; he reviled the rich, though he often dined with them; and he reviled all who did not believe in him. His passiveness was purely an imaginary virtue. Mr. Nicholas alleges that his manhood was gloriously triumphant to the very last; but surely the reverend gentleman forgets the Garden of Gethsemane. His courage completely deserted him there, and he whimpered like a coward as he contemplated what lay before him. He shrank from his fate, and besought his Father to relieve him of the necessity of meeting it. The author of Hebrews states that he "offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death." Mr. Nicholas observes that "he is the Divine square and compass for the measurement of every other character"; but that is not true. As we watch him in the garden, his sweat like great drops of blood falling to the ground, in an agony unspeakable imploring for a door of escape, we are reminded of Xenophon's description of the courage of Socrates after the sentence of death had been passed upon him:—

> "It is indeed acknowledged that no man, of all that are remembered, ever endured death with greater glory; for he was obliged to live thirty days after his sentence, because the Delian festival happened in that month, and the law allowed no one to be publicly put to death until the sacred deputation should return from Delos; and during that time he was seen by all his friends living in no other way than at any preceding period; and, let it be observed, throughout all the former part of his life he had been admired beyond all men for the cheerfulness and tranquillity with which he lived. How could anyone have died more nobly than thus? Or what death could be more honorable than that which any man might most honorably undergo? Or what death could be happier than the most honorable?" (Memorabilia, p. 149).

Jesus' courage failed him, not only in Gethsemane, but also on the cross, as is testified by the cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Socrates was a much greater and stronger man than Jesus, though he never claimed to be more than a man. Of course, the Jesus Christ portrayed by Mr. Nicholas never lived at all. He is a theological creation, and nothing more. But though the Gospel Jesus is represented as being the Word of God become flesh, he is anything but a perfect character. Whenever he comes to a trying pass in his career he utterly breaks down, crying; and whenever opponents stand in his way, his wrath kindles, and he curses them saying, "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" The divines have made an idol of him, and our business is to smash the idol, and make its worship impossible.

J. T. LLOYD.

"Wait Till You Come to Die."

> "Why does not God give me the evidence? They say he has. In what? In an inspired book. But I do not understand it as they do. Must I be false to my understanding? They say: 'When you come to die you will be sorry you did not.' Will I be sorry when I come to die that I did not live a hypocrite? Will I be sorry I did not say I was a Christian when I was not? Will the fact that I was honest put a thorn in the pillow of death? God cannot forgive me for that. They say when he was in Jerusalem he forgave his murderers. Now he won't forgive an honest man for differing with him on the subject of the Trinity. They say that God says to me, 'Forgive your enemies.' I say, 'All right, I do'; but he says 'I will damn mine.' God should be consistent. If he wants me to forgive my enemies, he should forgive his."—COLONEL INGERSOLL, The Dying Creed, p. 24.

> "Cases of recantation, if they were ever common, which does not appear to be true, are now exceedingly rare; so rare, indeed, that they are never heard of except in anonymous tracts, which are evidently concocted for the glory of God rather than for the edification of Man. Sceptics are at present numbered by thousands, and they can nearly always secure at their bedsides the presence of friends who share their unbelief. Every week the Freethought journals report quietly and as a matter of course, the peaceful end of 'infidels' who, having lived without hypocrisy, have died without fear. They are frequently buried by their heterodox friends, and never a week passes without the Secular Burial Service, or some other appropriate words, being read by sceptics over a sceptic's grave."—G. W. FOOTE, Infidel Death Beds (1888), pp. 6-7.

> "These their idle tales of dying horrors."—T. CARLYLE, Essay on Voltaire.

IT has been my lot, upon several occasions, to be told—to the accompaniment of a warning finger—that it was all very well for me to oppose the belief in God and the Bible now, but my sentiments would be very different when I came to die. It is the sort of thing one expects to hear, and does hear, from Salvation Army orators. But the people we are speaking of are not Salvationists, neither are they conspicuous for religious fervor; they attend no place of worship, and in the ordinary affairs of life are shrewd and capable, quick to grasp a fact, and see through a fallacy.

This groundless belief is more widely held than many Freethinkers are aware of; courtesy restrains many from giving utterance to the belief; fear of ridicule restrains others. I have been acquainted with men for years before discovering they held it.

It is worth while to examine the cause of this belief in the miserable end of infidels and unbelievers. There is no need to go into the facts of the matter; that has already been done by our Editor, in his admirable Infidel Death-Beds, in which the true facts as to the dying moments of all the best-known unbelievers are given from the best authorities.

Before proceeding to dissect this ancient belief, it will be as well to analyse the meaning and application of the word "Infidel."

Dr. Wace—a Doctor of Theology and the head of a college for training clergy for the Church—once told the late Professor Huxley that, instead of calling himself an Agnostic, he ought to use the older and more "unpleasant" name of "Infidel." The Professor, in declining to adopt Dr. Wace's suggestion, caustically remarked that—

Digitized by Google

> "'Infidel' is a term of reproach, which Christians and Mohammedans, in their modesty, agree to apply to those who differ from them. If he had only thought of it, Dr. Wace might have said 'miscreant,' which, with the same etymological signification, has the advantage of being still more 'unpleasant' to the persons to whom it is applied. But why should a man be expected to call himself a 'miscreant' or an 'infidel'?" *

He goes on to remark that the earliest Christians, up to twenty or thirty years after the Crucifixion, would have considered Dr. Wace himself an infidel. Professor Huxley relates how, when visiting the Hazar Mosque in Cairo—in ignorance that he should have been provided with proper authority—he was surrounded by a swarm of angry Mohammedan students, and he observes:—

> "If I had known Arabic, I suspect that 'dog of an infidel' would have been by no means the most 'unpleasant of the epithets showered upon me, before I could explain and apologise for the mistake. If I had had the pleasure of Dr. Wace's company on that occasion, the undiscriminating followers of the Prophet would, I am afraid, have made no difference between us; not even if they had known that he was the head of an orthodox Christian seminary" (p. 234).

Moreover, says Huxley:—

> "I do not care much what I am called by other people, and if I had by my side all those who since the Christian era have been called infidels by other folk, I could not desire better company. If these are my ancestors, I prefer, with the old Frank, to be with them wherever they are." †

The reason why Freethinkers object to the term "Infidel" is because Christians have attached a sinister meaning to the word which it did not originally possess. Any etymological dictionary will give the derivation of the word, from fides—faith, and in—not, meaning not of the orthodox, or prevailing faith. But, like the word "Miscreant," which originally only meant "misbeliever," it has come, in popular estimation, to mean one who rejects the moral law with the divine law; and, as the Freethinker does not reject the moral law, and, in fact, rejects the divine law in the name of the moral law, he naturally objects to the name of "Infidel" for the same reason that he would object to the name "Miscreant."

But, to return to our subject, why should the Freethinker be afraid to die? If he does not believe in the continuation of his existence in another life, what has he to be afraid of? Again, if he does not believe in the existence of an angry God who invented a hell to put him into, how can he be afraid of him?

The fact is, it is the Christian who has every reason to fear death; for him it means the continuance of his existence either in heaven or hell, and he can never be certain which. His Savior is reported to have explicitly declared, "Straight is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it" (Matthew vii. 14). And, again, "So the last shall be first, and the first last: for many be called, but few chosen" (Matthew xx. 16). According to this deliverance, we may expect, at the judgment day, to see Voltaire and Paine leading the way, while the Pope and the Archbishop of Canterbury will come under the heading "also ran." It is the universal teaching of all Christian sects and Churches that if a man is sure of his own salvation, he is in a very parlous state. He is declared to be a Pharisee, accused of spiritual pride, and generally considered to be on the broad road to destruction.

Some of the greatest believers have had the gravest doubt of their own salvation, and the thought has embittered their last hours. Poor Cowper, the Christian poet, who led a most blameless life, upon being asked how he felt, is said to have replied, "Feel? I feel unutterable despair." Dr. Johnson feared he might be damned. "What do you mean by damned?" was the soothing question of a bystander. "Sent to hell and punished everlastingly" † was the grim answer of the dying man. The great Cromwell was harassed by similar doubts and fears.

It is one of the worst features of this creed that the fear of eternal punishment has poisoned the lives and embittered the deaths of multitudes of tender and sensitive men and women, whose moral conduct has been beyond reproach, while the real criminals suffer nothing from these terrors which are supposed to deter them from their crimes. As Colonel Ingersoll, with mordant irony, has remarked:—

> "All kinds of criminals, except infidels, meet death with reasonable serenity. As a rule, there is nothing in the death of a pirate to cast any discredit on his profession. The murderer on the scaffold, with a priest on either side, smilingly exhorts the multitude to meet him in heaven. The man who has succeeded in making his home a hell meets death without a quiver, provided he has never expressed any doubt as to the divinity of Christ or the eternal 'procession' of the Holy Ghost." ‡

Compare the edifying end of Peter Smith, a murderer, as described by a New York paper, against the end of the other eminent and pious Christians we have quoted. It is as follows:—

> "Deep from the heart of this noble priest prayers kept wending their way up to the throne of grace. Frequently the voice of Smith blended with that of his spiritual adviser as he joined him in asking for the mercy of God on the sins of his past life. When not listening to the consolations that the prayer-book and ritual of the Catholic Church afforded, Smith paced up and down the corridor with the death-watch, smoking cigars furnished by these kind-hearted deputy sheriffs. The smoke of their havanas united with his and formed, as it were, an incense that wafted the religious words that he not infrequently uttered to the great beyond." ‡

This murderer died in the odor of sanctity, peacefully, quite easy in his mind; confident in the declaration of his Savior that there is more rejoicing in heaven over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine just men,§ and looking forward with joyous anticipation to a triumphant reception in Abraham's bosom.

What a beautiful religion! A religion which brings torment to the last moments of the tender and sensitive Cowper, who could not hurt a fly or a worm, and yet brings comfort, solace, and assured salvation to the wretch whose life has been a curse to everyone connected with him, and who, after a life of debauchery and crime, at last pays the penalty on the scaffold, from which he generally forgives his enemies, beseeches everyone to embrace the religion in which he finds so much joy, and invites them to meet him in the kingdom of heaven.

Surely the corrosive acid of Swift, in his most man-hating moments, never penned a more biting satire of human imbecility, not even in that horrible satire on the human race, the Voyage to the Houyhnhnms.

Science knows nothing of personal immortality, or of a future life beyond the grave. The belief arose in the dreams and illusions of primitive man during the ages of deepest ignorance. It was easy to believe in heaven, where the gods dwelt, when the sky was believed to be a solid blue vault, with little holes in it for the stars to shine through, and windows through which the gods let the rain come down.

It was easy to believe in hell, when it was believed that the earth was flat, like a table; that hell was underneath, and that volcanoes were openings into the infernal regions. One of the questions recorded in a school-book of the Middle Ages runs,

"Why is the sun red at its going down?" the answer being "Because it looketh down into hell."

But science has destroyed the crystal vault, and all the gods have fallen into the void. Science has demonstrated that the earth, instead of being flat, is a ball travelling in an orbit, and that there is no room for hell or the Devil and his angels. Science, by destroying the belief in a future life, and in gods and devils, has robbed death of its terrors.

Sir Oliver Lodge on "Continuity."

If the address delivered by Sir Oliver Lodge before the British Association for the Advancement of Science is carefully studied, it will be observed that the distinguished physicist, instead of presenting proofs to show that science had finally succumbed to metaphysics, was simply asking for a hearing from his colleagues.

His words, "Allow us, anyhow, to make the attempt; give us a fair field; let us try what we can do in the psychic regions, etc.," is the language of one who is pleading for sympathy rather than of one who thinks he has humbled science at the feet of theology. His distinguished colleagues gave Sir Oliver Lodge not only a fair but also an earnest hearing.

But the consensus of opinion was that the address contained nothing that was in any way new or startling. "Sensational disclosures expected in some quarters were not forthcoming," writes the London Times. One of the scientists present at the meeting characterised the address of Sir Oliver as "a rhapsody on faith."

Sir Oliver himself, in stating the position of the men of science on the value of psychical research, said that "scientific men have not universally accepted any conclusions—not even telepathy." Again, Sir Oliver speaks of running "the risk of annoying my present hearers."

Let me say a word about Sir Oliver, and then about what I regard as the reasonable attitude on the interesting question of a life beyond the grave. Sir Oliver Lodge is a distinguished physicist. In his own department he has no superiors. It is admitted also that Sir Oliver is a confirmed Darwinian, and, though he leans toward the supernatural, he is by no means an orthodox believer. There is not an evangelical church that could consistently admit him into its fellowship.

Between the "God" advocated by Sir Oliver and that of the Bible or the creeds there is absolutely no resemblance. Yet a pinch of incense he occasionally throws upon the old altars.

Sir Oliver has been a member of the Psychical Research Society for thirty years, and has been converted to the belief in the spirit world. He thinks that a communication between the living and the dead has been established. This is also the claim of the Spiritualists. Spiritualism is nothing new.

But did the distinguished scientist present a single fact about discarnate intelligence which could be considered adequate? Speaking for myself, I cannot affirm immortality or eternal life.

But not to affirm it does not mean to deny it. To be able to deny it I must understand what I am denying. But I cannot understand eternal life; therefore I refrain from either affirming or denying it. In the meantime I am more than willing to listen to arguments from those who think they are equal to the task of solving the problem. But will there be any morality in the world if we leave the question of a hereafter undecided? Well, whether there will be or not has nothing to do with our ability or inability to prove an eternal hereafter.

One of the points in Sir Oliver's address which seems to have given great comfort to the metaphysicians was the difference between appearance and the reality.

The world appears to be flat, but it is not; the sun appears to set, but it does not; the planets appear like points of fire—twinkling candles—but they are vast bodies. In the same way death appears to be the end of life, but it is not—there is no end to life. But this is defective reasoning.

We know the world is not flat by actual demonstration. We know the truth about the stars by the help of the telescope and mathematics.

Death appears to be the end of life, and it is, until Sir Oliver Lodge or the clergy shall prove that it is not.

It has been demonstrated that the loss through disease of certain cerebral cells would destroy memory and affection, as well as thought. Is the "soul" then a cell of the brain? But whatever our guesses about the life beyond the grave, it is in our power to pitch the life that now is to the height of our ideals.—M. Mangasarian: Truthseeker (New York).

Acid Drops.

Mr. Lloyd George, in his "Holloway Empire" speech, sounded the praises of Nonconformists for their love of religious liberty. We deny, however, that they ever had any such affection. They object to persecution, it is true, when they are the sufferers. Not otherwise. Hardly a whisper is raised amongst them against the late epidemic revival of the Blasphemy Laws. It is nothing to them that Freethinkers go to prison for "offences" against Christianity. What they love is not liberty but self-assertion.

We beg to ask Mr. Lloyd George a serious question. How is it that "blasphemy" prosecutions always occur under Liberal governments? We are not carrying on a discussion. We state a fact, and ask a question. And all we desire is a plain answer.

The Blasphemy Laws ought long ago to have been treated as obsolete. The late Mr. Justice Stephen said that they probably were so, in his Digest of the Criminal Law before the epoch-marking events of 1883. But our own prosecution and imprisonment for "blasphemy" undeceived him on this point. The fact is that laws which can be used against unpopular principles and unpopular men can never be regarded as obsolete until they are repealed—if we may be permitted that Hibernicism. There are scores of old laws which really are obsolete, because nobody ever thinks of invoking them, but this obsolescence is easily explained. They are not laws which one class of people could use to the detriment of another class. Such laws are no use to anybody—not even bigots. But the Blasphemy Laws are a perpetual appeal to Christian fanaticism and malice against Freethinkers. That is why they should and must be abolished altogether. The only remedy is "Repeal."

Abraham Arthur Ascoli, a pensioned policeman, committed suicide by hanging at St. George's Church, Westcombe Park, East Greenwich, where he was employed as verger. Of course the "sacred edifice" had to be reconsecrated. But as there was no money in it, being a purely domestic affair, the Bishop of Southwark did not officiate personally, but sent the Archdeacon of Lewisham as his proxy.

God was cleared out of that church by one man and brought back by another. And the people who believe, and practise that, put other people in prison for "blasphemy"! A mad world, my masters!

The National Church League, with Sir Edward Clarke at its head, calls upon the Archbishops and Bishops of the Church of England to save it from the Romanising party who are placing a volume called St. Swithun's Prayer Book in the hands of candidates for confirmation. This book is said to contain devotions "involving invocation of and confession to the Blessed Virgin Mary and the saints; teaches the doctrine of the Mass; enforces the duty of private confession to a priest; and contains suggestions as to topics of confession calculated to defile the minds of children." If all this is true, why are "blasphemy" prosecutions confined to Freethinkers?

"To be or not to be?" Shall the "Tango" be prohibited or not? is being debated at the Vatican. What a question to trouble the Pope's head with at his time of life and in his state of health! But nothing has ever been too large or too small for the Papacy. It is like the trunk of an elephant, which pulls down trees and picks up pins.

The German Emperor has given three thousand marks to the London Missionary Society. It is not an open gift. The Kaiser knows his business too well for that. It is towards the work of two of the Society's missionaries (Germans, of course) in Samoa.

In a letter to the Times lately, Dr. Clifford sought to reconcile his opposition to Catholicism with his advocacy of Home Rule. His argument is perfectly sound. He states that the liberty of political action which he demands for himself he claims also for all his fellow-citizens, "irrespective of their religious faith and ecclesiastical associations." But what Dr. Clifford rightly concedes to Catholics he would unjustly withhold from Freethinkers. To the latter he persistently opposes the giving of political justice. If there were a grain of consistency in his constitution, he would be as zealous an advocate of Secular Education as he now is of Irish Home Rule. He has been a great leader in the movement for the Disestablishment of the Church; but he is cowardly afraid of identifying himself with the principle of the disestablishment of religion in State-aided schools. Consistency is not Dr. Clifford's jewel.

The Rev. H. B. Freeman, of Burton-on-Trent, told the Church Lads' Brigade, the other day, that God is an object of fear, and that brave soldiers always owe their heroism to their fear of the Almighty. There were signs that this wholesome fear of God was declining to-day. This the reverend gentleman greatly deplored. Naturally, for in proportion as the fear of God dies down, reverence for the parson vanishes. So long as the Heavenly Judge is feared, his earthly representatives will be held in some degree of awe. Mr. Freeman need not lose heart, however, because superstition dies hard; but, hallelujah, it is dying.

Apropos of our note last week on the conditions of Dublin and the religion of the people, here is a further word worth bearing in mind. It comes from a religious writer in the Church Family Newspaper. He says: "It was assumed that nothing could shake the faith of the Dublin laborers in their Church and its ministers. Industries were raised on this staple fact." Quite so; and what the conditions were under which these people lived the world has only just learned. Those interested knew that things would be all right so long as the people could be kept devoted to their "Church and its ministers." It is when the alliance is broken that people ask themselves whether social conditions are all they ought to be. Some of our ardent social reformers will yet be forced to recognise that all attempted social reform will fall short of effectiveness so long as the "great lying creed" is left dominating the minds of large masses of people.

While on her way to church, Ellen Good, of Hackney, fell from a tram and died from a fractured skull. Probably "Providence" was too busy calculating the number of idle words being used, not to mention the fall of the sparrows.

"Some of the world's rulers could make bread and butter by mechanical toil if the necessity arose," says the Daily Mirror. Very likely. But how many of them could earn more? The "Lord's anointed ones" do better to rely on a Civil List, with every item payable in advance.

In view of the sudden interest of the clergy in economics, it is interesting to find a writer in a recent issue of the Referee calling attention to the miserable wages paid to church organists, which, he says, is "an insult to the profession," and he calls upon the Incorporated Society of Musicians to interfere on behalf of the organists.

England has probably the most disgusting, lickspittle press in the world. There are papers that encourage "King" Carson in his impudent preparations for flat rebellion, and others that encourage Mrs. Pankhurst in instigating her amazons to burn down the property of their fellow-citizens for "political" reasons, but none of them has a word to say in protest against the imprisonment of poor sceptics for discussing Christianity in the language of their class, without annoyance to anyone except super-sensitive policemen. These journals pander to all superstitions, social as well as religious, and especially to the monarchical superstition, under which the King is fairly on a level with the Deity, and all royal persons whatsoever are above archangels, principalities, and powers. There was a very pretty sample of this in the Daily Mirror the other day (Nov. 28). The front page contained an alleged "new and beautiful birthday portrait of Queen Alexandra." It represented a tall, slim lady, a little, if at all, over twenty years of age. A fake photograph, of course, designed to show that royal ladies never grow old, but always retain "enduring youth and grace." This nauseous sycophancy was accompanied by the statement that the Dowager Queen was celebrating "her birthday" on the following Monday. No allusion was made to the number of the said birthday. It would never do to print such semi-blasphemous figures.

The Mirror went on to quote the "memorable poem" in which Tennyson welcomed the Princess Alexandra, as she then was, to England as the bride of the then Prince of Wales, who died as King Edward the Seventh. The "Welcome to Alexandra" is dated March 7, 1863. Tennyson welcomed her as "the sea-kings' daughter" coming to marry "the heir of the kings of the sea." But the Mirror must print it in the singular, and with capital letters, as "the Sea-King's" daughter—as though Tennyson were referring to her father, the King of Denmark, instead of to the old Vikings. What can be expected, however, but mental sloppiness of the "loyal" fakers of Queen Alexandra's portrait?

Rev. James Orr, Professor of Theology in the United Free Church College, Glasgow, left £4,284 7s. 1d. Not a big fortune, but a fair-sized one for Scotland where even the godly are thrifty.

£800,000 has been collected in fifteen days in the United States for the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations. The success of the effort is said to be due to "organisation." The begging was comprehensive and pertinacious. It appears to have been directed by millionaires, including Mr. George Perkins, formerly partner of the late Pierpont Morgan. Millionaires know the value of Christianity. They patronise it for the same reason that Constantine made it the religion of the Roman Empire.

Christianity is the only religion that gives a man fortitude in trouble and consolation in suffering. Yet the Rev. William Charles, a retired Nonconformist minister of Hawthorn House, Ravenhill, near Swansea, was found hanging from a rope in the bathroom.

Bramwell Booth has made it up with his brother Ballington Booth. The family quarrel lasted seventeen years. How these godly people do keep it up!

Evan Roberts's old father has been to Leicester, but he failed to obtain an interview with his son, who is either a lunatic or worse. Nor even the cry of his sick mother to see her boy before she dies makes any impression upon him. He seems to be following Jesus Christ literally by hating his father and mother.

We are glad to find the Christian Commonwealth pointing out, in the course of an interview with Professor Gilbert Murray, that the great master of Greek literature "acknowledges himself a Freethinker." Those who are acquainted with Professor Murray's writings—including, of course, his wonderful translation of Euripides—hardly needed this assurance. We may say that none but a Freethinker could have given these translations of one of the greatest of the Greek Freethinkers. On his own account the Christian Commonwealth reviewer adds: "I gathered that this meant that he had not become associated with any organised form of religion. He stands, indeed, for freedom in thought much as the makers of the French Revolution—Condorcet and the rest—claimed of thought." We do not know how the interviewer gathered that Professor Murray's freethinking only meant that he was not attached to any Church; there is nothing in the reported interview that would give one that impression, and one may safely say that if anything had been said to that end it would not have been omitted.

Professor Murray pointed out that the golden age of Athens was a period of extraordinary vitality, and mentioned as an illustration that their books of science remained the chief text-books for some 1,500 years. This is true, with slight modifications, but it is quite as much a condemnation of the influence of Christianity as it is of the power of Greek thinking. The truth is that with the advance made by Greek science, and the fruitful speculations bequeathed to the world, there was no reason why their writings should not have been superseded in a couple of centuries. But superstition, as usual, blocked the way. And later Christian superstition very effectively perpetuated these text-books by imprisoning or killing all who attempted an improvement. Preserved some of these books, that is; for it must be remembered that the Church selected not the best, but those that suited its own teaching best. It sanctioned the Ptolemaic astronomy, and damned the Pythagorean, for example. And when the study of science revived, it was to the Greeks that earnest students, treating the Christian centuries between as a negligible quantity, turned. There is small need for wonder that Christian apologists have systematically slandered both the Greek and the Roman civilisations. The only chance of making their own dingy history bright was to completely blacken that of other peoples.

A discussion is going on in the Guardian concerning fox-hunting parsons. And one writer opines that a parson in the saddle with the hounds in full cry is a preferable sight to a parson playing croquet with the neighboring spinsters. So far as spinsters are concerned, we should say very much preferable.

A manifesto, signed by a number of prominent clergymen, dealing with the question of "The Living Wage," has just been issued. It refers to "the failure of our almsgiving to provide any real remedy for social ills," and "the actually demoralising effect of so much that is done in response to the cry of need." Both these aspects of the matter have been dealt with for years by Freethinking reformers, and the clergy are, as usual, only reaching a conclusion that others have reached long before. For the rest, the manifesto makes the usual appeal to the "Christian conscience," which is about as helpful as the lamb's appeal to the wolf in the old fable. The "Christian conscience" has allowed all our present evil social conditions to accumulate, and it will rest content with their existence just so long as the non-Christian conscience tolerates them. It would be well if the clergy would make a start with the living wage on many of the industries closely connected with the propaganda of religion itself.

Lord Headley has become a Mohammedan. We congratulate him on getting rid of two gods out of three. We hope he will get rid of the other one also in the course of time.

Mr. Israel Zangwill is a born optimist. He is always hoping something impossible—such as the return of the Jews to Palestine. His latest hope is for "one universal religion." The idea is like that of co-operation amongst tigers and sharks.

Really, one might very easily compile a volume on the silly things said by the Bishop of London. We do not mean things that only those holding different beliefs to the Bishop would consider silly, but which would be admitted as such by most people not qualifying for an idiot asylum. Here is a sample. To an audience gathered in the Guildhall he said everyone present should thank God "for the purity of his daughters, and the honor of his home, and the chastity of his wife, for he owes all that to living in a Christian country." Really, an educated rabbit that had been taught to speak might well be ashamed to talk in this strain. Does the poor man really think there were no honorable homes, pure daughters, or chaste wives before Christianity appeared? And the man who says this one day will on the next be shrieking about the "White Slave Traffic," immoral plays, and obscene literature, all in this Christian country. We hesitate somewhat at frequent reference to such a person as Bishop Ingram; but he is one of the leading dignitaries of the English Church, and as he is there we may as well utilise his existence to point out what an intellectually decrepit thing Christianity has become.

The Bishop of London is not only a fool, he is something worse (if possible) than that. He continues his talking crusade against the stage, on account of what he calls its indecency and suggestiveness. He scorns the suggestion that he and his likes need not go to theatres unless they choose; and why should the views of Bishops be made a criterion for other people? Well now, we put it to his thin-nosed lordship, whether it is not his first duty to attend to his own business first? There is a book called the Bible which is placed in the hands of children in the elementary public schools of England, as the basis of religious and moral instruction. That Book contains passages of most infamous filth; passages that could never be uttered on any stage or printed in any other form. It ought to be kicked out of all schools for children; yet is kept in them, and the children are bound by law to attend them. We say this dirty book should be kicked out, but if it can't be done yet it should at least be subjected to a drastic spring-cleaning. This is what the Bishop of London should be doing, if he had any sense and honesty. Surely a man holding one of the dirtiest books in the world in his hands, while railing at the plays put upon the stage in theatres doubly licensed—first by the public authorities and then by the Lord Chamberlain—is an impudent jackass, whose braying ought to be suppressed as a public nuisance.

Another of the Bishop of London's delusions (or pretences) is that people who go to church are more able to control their passions than those who don't. We should hardly have thought his lordship was so ignorant of the police and legal news in the daily press.

The Bishop of London says that he had Christian opinion behind him in his crusade against Living Pictures some years ago. Exactly! All the clergy were in that demonstration: priests, parsons, preachers, rabbis, and Boothites. What noses these people have?

Three centenarians died last week, and the newspapers are jubilant. They have given up crowing over the Biblical patriarchs who were trundling hoops at the age when our long-livers are carried to the cemetery.

"Youth is the time to lay the foundations of wide knowledge," sagely remarks Lord Haldane. That is the time when the clergy love to impress the "truth" of the Bible stories, such as "Balaam's Ass" and "Noah's Ark," borrowed from a book which sceptics are liable to imprisonment for criticising.

T. P.'s Weekly quotes a saying that "David's wife was an elderly Puritan." Her husband was earlier, especially when he had an appointment with Bathsheba after the "Splash me" business.

The British Weekly says that women are long-winded. Yet Solomon was more loquacious than all his wives. And nearly, if not quite, all the editors of religious periodicals are men.

Signor Marinetti, the leader of the Futurists, says that the adjective must be abolished. In that case the peripatetic patterers of the Christian Evidence Society will be unable to follow their noble employment. And "blasphemy," which is now a matter of adjectives, will die a natural death.

Tennyson had a "double" in Leslie Stephen, and Professor Schrader was very like Huxley, says the Daily Chronicle, whilst Alma Tadema was scarcely distinguishable from Du Maurier. The Chronicle forgot to mention the Christian Trinity, which Matthew Arnold said resembled three Lord Shaftesburys.

The Archbishop of Canterbury says that Disestablishment is essentially a layman's question, because if the Church is "despoiled" of its property laymen will have to make good the deficiency. But suppose they don't? If the clergy really thought that the laymen would make good the deficiency, we don't believe the clergy would bother much. But they know they won't. And there is small chance nowadays of Parliament imposing a new tax for the upkeep of religion—that is, unless the Church offered to go halves with the Nonconformists.

We quite envy the information some people have at their disposal. Here is a clergyman's—the Rev. H. J. Nicholas—description of Jesus Christ, as given in a recent sermon:—

> "Not only was he a perfect specimen of manhood, physically, but he was the highest type of manhood, in his manner: Bold without being brazen; humble, but not servile; gentle, but not given to weakness; strong without being tyrannical; helpful, but not intrusive; religious without hypocrisy; devout, but not gloomy; social without frivolity; firm, but not unreasonable; chivalrous, but not self-seeking; submissive without compromise; righteous, but not rigorous; truthful, but not blunt; optimistic and not obsessed; helpful according to reason; and just according to reasonableness."

That's all. Presumably, the preacher's vocabulary ran short at this point, or he would have mentioned other things. He might have easily claimed him as a pioneer in aviation. All that is puzzling us is, How did Mr. Nicholas come to know all this?

"In the last analysis," says Mr. R. J. Campbell, "all our scientific facts are inconceivable." Rubbish! How can a fact be inconceivable? To call a thing a fact is evidence that we have a conception of it. If we cannot conceive a "fact," it is not only not a fact, but we do not even know there is a fact to be known. Stupidity in the pulpit ought to rank as a fine art.

Even the convicts at the prison "hotel," Camp Hill, Isle of Wight, are divided up by sectarian feelings. The more notorious criminals have set up a caste system; they won't consort, or talk at the dinner-table, with criminals of less repute. There are also sharp cleavages of opinion. Home Rulers and Ulsterites are at daggers drawn. Religion, of course, is the greatest divider of all. It is true of prisons, as of all other places, that (as Swift said) most men have religion enough to make them hate each other.

"There's life in the old boy yet." Bishop Samuel Thornton, D.D., who is 78 years of age, has just married a second wife, the first one having died in 1909. The reverend gentleman is almost a second Moses.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, December 7, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London, W.; at 7.30, "Shakespeare's Humanism in the Merchant of Venice."

December 14, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £260 11s. 7d. Received since:—Harry Shaw, 10s.; Joseph Bryce, 10s.; George Brittain, 2s. 6d.

W. O. KELLERMAN.—You have filled in our address carefully with your order, but you have omitted your own. Please send it at once.

C. S. WORMALD.—The Fighting Fund closed long ago, so the balance is placed to your credit. We don't wonder that you find you cannot do without the Freethinker although you have left the old country for Canada. We have known several subscribers like you in that respect.

E. GWINNELL.—The second volume has not been published.

E. B.—Many thanks for cuttings.

JOSEPH BRYCE.—Pleased to see your handwriting again.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are always welcome.

A. A. WELLS.—We are afraid you will never find wit or humor in that pious journal. Your excuse is that you did not buy it.

INQUIRING CHRISTIAN.—The earliest manuscripts of the Gospels are claimed to belong to the second half of the fourth century.

W. T. NEWMAN.—Yes, we shall be happy to "name" your little boy at Queen's Hall on the second Sunday evening (Dec. 14). Please supply Miss Vance, the N. S. S. general secretary, with full particulars. We are delighted to hear of your wife's attachment to the Freethinker, as well as your own, and of the sympathetic newsagent's remarks upon it as containing "something to think about and remember."

W. PHILLIPS.—We are having it seen to.

LORENZA GARREAU.—Glad to have your thanks for our paragraph on the death of your father, the late J. H. Levy. You say well that the Chronicle need not have resorted to untruth about him, while there was "so much good and true to be said." Do not miss the notice of your father in the December Humanitarian, concluding "He will be greatly missed in the fight for freedom and humanity."

EWART HOPPER.—Thanks for your interesting letter. We note that you are a son of the Mr. Hopper we alluded to. Never mind the anonymous postcard. The writers of such things are vermin, and there is pretty sure to be more stink than profit in hunting them down.

J. PARTRIDGE (Birmingham).—Glad to hear Mr. Cohen had so good an audience, in spite of many counter attractions.

S. MOSCOU.—Send along your advertisement. We will insert it gratuitously, but we cannot undertake to draw such things up.

M. CLARK.—We have no recollection of the H. R. Elliot who says he "lectured ten years ago in Hyde Park from the infidel platform under G. W. Foote."

J. HARRISON MAXWELL.—(1) "Vote early for the Protestant and Temperance Candidates" is indeed rich. Evidently the two species must not be confused. The joke is richly completed by the protest in the address against "the introduction of Sectarian candidates." (2) We hope to resume writing on Shakespeare in the new year. It is surprising to find so many readers interested in what we have to say on that subject.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

London "saints" are reminded of Mr. Foote's two Sunday evening lectures at the Queen's (Minor) Hall. Some of them may be able to help in the advertising of this effort. Small, neat bills, easily pocketed and easily distributed, can be obtained of Miss Vance, at 2 Newcastle-street, E.C., or at our publishing office on the ground floor of the same building. We hope a good many will take a hand in this easy missionary work. It is quite impossible to advertise these lectures all over London commercially. The area is too vast—the expense is too great. We simply must rely to a great extent on the goodwill of our friends in this matter.

Lancashire and Yorkshire "saints" should note that Mr. Cohen lectures to-day (Dec. 7), afternoon and evening, at the Secular Hall, Rusholme-road, Manchester. We hope the audiences will be worthy of the lectures. That will mean a crowd.

There was a very interesting article in a late number of Harper's New Magazine by Vilhjálmur Stefánsson on "Christianising the Eskimos." The writer evidently thinks that the Eskimos were very good people when they were "heathen" and that Christianising them has done them more injury than benefit. The conclusion is a conversation between Mr. Stefánsson and his native servant. The latter admitted the Eskimos tell as many lies now as they ever did, and steal just as frequently. But they don't work on Sunday. Which is about the only difference—for the better; for a lazy Sunday suits the Eskimos capitally, and they regard the Christians as very clever to think of such a thing.

The following is from last week's Truth:—

> "While Mr. Justice Coleridge has been on circuit the name of his father, the Lord Chief Justice, has been curiously brought before him twice. In one case counsel referred to the story of Constance Kent as being almost exactly similar. The first Lord Coleridge's defence of Constance Kent is famous in criminal annals. In the trial for blasphemy at Staffordshire Assizes the defendant Stewart referred to Lord Coleridge's views in the Bradlaugh case. Mr. Justice Coleridge has not followed in his father's steps in giving four months to Stewart. The law as to blasphemy is an antiquarian curiosity, and prosecutions for witchcraft would hardly be more out of date and oppressive. A sober controversialist to-day can argue the subject in print or on platform without let or hindrance, and to prosecute a corner man because he does so in the style of the mob orator is to declare that bad taste is a crime. To deal with obscene language, or language calculated to bring about a breach of the peace, the common law is quite strong enough."

We suppose "the Bradlaugh case" was the Foote case. It was in connection with the Freethinker prosecution that Lord Chief Justice Coleridge delivered his famous summing-up.

Mr. John Masefield is returning to his old love, the English Review. A new poem of his, "The River," appears in the December number.

The London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner, under the auspices of the N. S. S. Executive, will be held at Frascati's on January 28. This is later than usual, but it will be specially associated with the birthday of Thomas Paine (Jan. 29) and the deathday of Charles Bradlaugh (Jan. 30). The Chairman's address will take the form of a critical eulogy of both those great men.

We were going to write this week on the Stewart (Blasphemy) case, but the paucity of information we have been able to obtain is such that writing an article on the subject in these circumstances is like making bricks without clay. The difficulty in obtaining information is extraordinary. Stewart seems to have let himself be surrounded by people who could not possibly be of any particular use from any point of view. We must let the whole matter stand over till next week. Meanwhile we may say that we have signed the petition for Stewart's release, or his better treatment in prison, by making him a first-class misdemeanant. We have tried to find out whether Lord Coleridge did, as the newspapers reported, add "hard labor" to Stewart's sentence, but we have failed. If "hard labor" was added it was an illegal sentence. The case should have been carried to the Court of Appeal, and we offered to see to that being done. But nothing was done—except begging for money. We never know anything so badly bungled. We suppose it is the natural result of very common soldiers posing as generals of army divisions.

Animal-Eating Plants.

AMONG the many marvels of the vegetable world there is probably none more remarkable than the story of the carnivorous plants. Widely distributed throughout the world, some five hundred species of dicotyledonous plants are to be met with which, in some way or other capture insects and similar animals, whose bodies they digest or absorb.

It was in the summer of the year 1860 that the attention of the great Charles Darwin was drawn to the insect-catching habits of the common sundew. He noticed that a surprisingly large number of insects were captured by the leaves of this plant, which was growing on a Sussex heath. "I gathered by chance a dozen plants," he says in his famous work on Insectivorous Plants,

> "bearing fifty-six fully expanded leaves, and on thirty-one of these dead insects or remnants of them adhered; and, no doubt, many more would have been caught afterwards by these same leaves, and still more by those as yet not expanded. On one plant all six leaves had caught their prey; and on several other plants very many leaves had caught more than a single insect. On one large leaf I found the remains of thirteen distinct insects. Flies (Diptera) are captured much oftener than other insects. The largest kind which I have seen caught was a small butterfly; but the Rev. H. M. Wilkinson informs me that he found a large living dragon-fly with its body firmly held by two leaves. As this plant is extremely common in some districts, the number of insects thus annually slaughtered must be prodigious."

Darwin then began a profound and prolonged study of this plant, the common sundew (Drosera rotundifolia), as also of other insectivorous plants; and, notwithstanding the researches of innumerable subsequent investigators, the Newton of Biology remains our leading authority on animal-feeding vegetable organisms.

Darwin's experiments on the sundew yielded highly remarkable results. But before dealing with these it will be well to pen a description of this remarkable carnivorous plant. In Professor Anton Kerner's important Natural History of Plants is to be found a fine colored plate depicting the sundew in company with another insectivorous plant, natural size, growing amongst sedges on an upland moor. The most striking feature of the plant consists in its rounded leaves surmounted by delicate red filaments, provided at their tip with a glistening droplet of liquid. These filaments are formed on the upper surface and margin of the sundew leaf. These filaments or tentacles, as Kerner says, look like pins stuck in a flat cushion, and are unequal in size. The longest filaments are ranged round the outermost edge of the leaf, and gradually become shorter as they approach the centre. Each leaf is furnished on an average with about two hundred of these filaments. The free extremities or heads of these filaments are glandular in nature. Each of them secretes a transparent, thick, sticky substance, and this substance shines and glistens in the sunlight much after the manner of a dewdrop; and to this circumstance is due the name of the plant. Stimuli occasioned by falling rain or the blowing wind excite no answering movements in the sensitive filaments. But if grains of sand, bits of coal, particles of paste, drops of wine, or any other non-nitrogenous matter be brought into contact with the enlarged extremities of the filaments, an augmented supply of the sticky substance arises and the secretion assumes an acid form, but the sensitive tentacles make no response, and no other change of importance takes place. The result is far different when an insect mistakes the glittering liquid on the tip of the tentacles for honey. If an insect alights on a leaf and in so doing touches the glands, or even if a piece of meat or other nitrogenous substance be artificially placed on the filament heads, the discharge of acid juice increases and a ferment also makes its appearance. "The action of this ferment on compounds is entirely similar to that of pepsin, and we may even go so far as to speak of it as pepsin."

The winged creatures that are lured to the leaves are soon enmeshed in the sticky liquid and endeavor to release themselves from its unpleasant embrace. But the harder they struggle the more they besmear themselves, and become more and more at the mercy of the treacherous fluid. The fight for freedom is very transient; their breathing organs are choked with juice, and they are quickly suffocated.

A few minutes after a gland of one of the sensitive filaments has been stimulated through the attachment to it of a dead or living animal organism, the entire system of filaments undergoes a change. In the first place, the tentacle bearing the gland originally irritated by the presence of the captured animal begins to bend inwards. About ten minutes after the first tentacle or filament commences to move, those nearest to it follow its example. Ten minutes later, those next in succession bend likewise until, in the course of from one to three hours, all the tentacles are inflected and converge upon the unfortunate insect. It may be remarked that the insect or other captured creature does not necessarily alight on any particular part of the leaf's surface. But wherever the prey is deposited, in that direction the filaments always bend. It has been proved experimentally that when morsels of meat are placed one on the right, and the other on the left half of the same leaf, the two hundred tentacles form into two groups, and each group gathers round one of the fragments of meat. This phenomenon also occurs if two insects become entangled on a leaf simultaneously, one on one side and one on the other. But when all the tentacles converge towards the centre of the leaf, as soon as this convergence has reached its maximum, the leaf strongly resembles a clenched fist.

As Darwin points out, the sundew gathers most of its nutriment from the animal substances it captures and digests. The plant flourishes on poverty stricken soil where hardly anything but moss—a plant which derives nearly all its nourishment from the atmosphere—can exist. The roots of the sundew are, in consequence, remarkably small. And this adaptability to poor soil may be said to characterise the entire group of insectivorous plants. In whatever continent these carnivorous plants are found they all agree in inhabiting damp spots such as heaths, the banks of brooks, bogs, marshes, and moors where water is abundant but where the barren earth is unable to yield those inorganic nitrogenous substances which are essential to the well-being of ordinary vegetable life.

Reference has already been made to the intense irritability of the sundew's tentacles. Darwin discovered that a bit of thin human hair 8-1,000ths of an inch in length, and weighing merely 1-78,740ths of a grain when placed on the sensitive tentacle, though largely supported by the secretion, is sufficient to cause the tentacle to move. "It is not probable," he writes,

> "that the pressure in this case could have amounted to that from the millionth of a grain. Even smaller particles cause a slight movement, as could be seen through a lens. Larger particles than those of which the measurements have been given cause no sensation when placed on the tongue, one of the most sensitive parts of the human body."*

The sundew's responses to stimuli set up by nitrogenous and non-nitrogenous fluids and solids are also well worthy of notice. Darwin's researches proved that the sundew's leaves "detect with almost unerring certainty the presence of nitrogen. A decoction of green peas or of fresh cabbage-leaves made by keeping them for a long time in merely warm water is far less efficient."

These remarkable results led Darwin to study the plant's powers of digestion. His experiments demonstrated that its leaves carry on the functions of true digestion, and he proved in detail that the glands absorb the digested substances. These researches fully established for the first time the existence in the vegetable kingdom of a function which had been previously regarded as special to the animal world. The intimate primal relationship of the botanical and zoological provinces of the kingdom of life was further evidenced by the study of the acids and ferments which enable carnivorous plants to assimilate their animal food. "The gastric juice of animals contains, as is well known, an acid and a ferment, both of which are indispensable for digestion, and so it is with the secretion of the sundew." Darwin was forced to conclude, from experiments conducted with a great variety of substances, that those substances which the secretion of the sundew digests completely, partially, or not at all, are acted on in precisely the same manner by the gastric juice of an animal stomach.

In another interesting carnivorous plant, Dionæa muscipula, commonly known as the Venus' flytrap, the late Professor Burdon Sanderson detected a resting and an action current of electricity, and was of opinion that "the property by which the excitable structures of the leaf respond to stimulation is of the same nature as that possessed by the similarly endowed structures of animals." Professor Kerner arrived at a similar conclusion, and says that "The analogy existing between these processes, especially the conduction and liberation of a stimulus, and similar phenomena of the muscles and nerves of an animal organism" is as complete as in the case of the sundew. And he goes on to state that—

> "It is a noteworthy fact that, in the flytraps, actual electric currents have been observed, which prove that the greatest resemblance exists to muscles and nerves as regards electro-motor action also."*

The range of this plant is restricted to a narrow strip of country in the east of North America (from Long Island to Florida) wherever peat bogs abound. The blossoms rise on a long stalk in the centre of the plant, and the leaves are arranged in circular form, their under surfaces resting more or less on the earth. These leaves are about four inches in length, and the two halves of the leaf are movable on one another along the midrib, and, when irritated, close together just as a book would close if provided with an automatic closing-spring. Each edge of the leaf is furnished with from twelve to twenty long teeth "which interlock in rat-trap fashion with those on the other side." The leaf-centre carries numerous digestive glands, and each half of the leaf-blade possesses three highly sensitive hairs which bend down when the leaf closes over its prey. If one of these sensitive hairs be irritated by an insect settling on the leaf, in eight or ten seconds the leaf shuts up. The glands rapidly exude their digestive juice, and the digestion of the insect occupies a week or a fortnight, according to the size of the prey. When the meal is completely absorbed the leaf is reopened, and is ready to receive the next insect visitor.

Doubt was at one time thrown on the utility of the insectivorous habit to the Venus' flytrap and other carnivorous plants. Certain of these plants that were kept in greenhouses were thought to flourish better without animal food than with it. But careful experiment has since proved that when the plants which are provided with moderate supplies of meat and other nitrogenous matter are compared with those that are denied flesh food, the former are unquestionably the larger and healthier plants. The earlier observations and experiments were vitiated by the fact that the plants were overfed, and in consequence suffered, and in some instances died, from indigestion.

Another insectivorous plant of rare occurrence is found in Portugal and Morocco. It appears to flourish more extensively on the Oporto hillsides than elsewhere, and numerous observers have noted that immense numbers of flies become attached to the leaves. The insect-catching merits of the plant —Drosophyllum lusitanicum, as it is termed—are well known to the peasants, who keep it in their cottages for the purpose of catching flies.

> "A plant in my hothouse caught so many insects during the early part of April," writes Darwin, "although the weather was cold and insects scarce, that it must have been in some manner strongly attractive to them. On four leaves of a young and small plant, 8, 10, 14, and 16 minute insects, chiefly Diptera, were found in the autumn adhering to them."*

The butterworts and the various species of the genus Nepenthes are all carnivorous in habit. The thirty-six species of Nepenthes, or pitcher plants, unlike the common butterwort, are all confined to the tropics. They are distributed from New Caledonia and New Guinea over tropical Australia to Madagascar, and through the Sunda and Philippine Islands to Ceylon, Bengal, and Cochin China.

Varying as the carnivorous plants do in their methods of capture, they all agree in assimilating animal food. The pitcher plants are provided with pitfalls which ensnare insect prey; others, such as the sundew and Venus' flytrap, exhibit movements in securing their victims. And among the various lessons these plants teach is the lesson that a beautiful and harmless leaf may in the course of evolution become changed into a death-trap which is fatal to vast numbers of ants, beetles, butterflies, tiny crustaceans, flies, and other living creatures.

Some Little-Known Freethinkers.

VI.—WILLIAM JOHN BIRCH.

IT was only in his old age that I had the pleasure of knowing Mr. Birch. His appearance was truly venerable, and his portrait (which adorns my room) is always remarked as that of an extremely fine-looking old man. Mr. Birch was born of a well-to-do family on January 4, 1811. He was educated at Baliol College, Oxford, and graduated M.A. at New Inn Hall. He became a barrister-at-law, but was never under the necessity of practising for a livelihood.

During the prosecution of the Oracle of Reason, in 1842, Mr. Birch came forward as a generous supporter of that paper and of the Anti-Persecution Union. He contributed to C. Southwell's Investigator valuable articles on "The Blasphemy Laws" and on "Money the Motive in the History of England." He also wrote in the Movement, the Reasoner, and the National Reformer. To him Mr. Holyoake dedicated his Last Trial for Atheism, as "a friend who was twice a friend, who helped us when we were unknown and struggling." Through his liberality "The Library of Reason"—a valuable set of reprints from Hume, Spinoza, Hibbert, Ensor, Burdon, Southwell, Strauss, Lyell, etc.—was issued, edited by W. Chilton. The Reasoner and the publications of the Fleet-street House, under Mr. Holyoake, were also aided by his ever generous assistance. On one occasion he gave Mr. Holyoake 600 acres of land in Canada, with the purpose of forwarding Secularism; but when the bulk of Mr. Birch's large fortune was lost Mr. Holyoake returned the land-script.

In 1848 Mr. Birch published his principal work, An Inquiry into the Philosophy and Religion of Shakespeare. Mr. Birch held that Shakespeare was a sceptic in regard to a future life, and devoid of reverence for the fundamental dogmas of religion. This position he endeavors to substantiate by a thorough examination both of his dramas and poems. He also wrote a work on The Real and the Ideal; and in a pamphlet, Paulan Idea not a Fact, first questioned the existence of the Apostles to the Gentiles. In 1856, he published An Inquiry into the Philosophy and Religion of the Bible. In his preface he states:—

> "The principal inquiries in this book are the sum of what is taught in the Bible about a God, a Providence, and a future state; the Messianic idea, religion, and morality; the nature of things and of men. We shall inquire whether God and Christ are ideas or facts; or, in other words, whether they personally existed. We shall inquire whether the Bible is a revelation of a God, or a revelation that we know nothing about him."

In this book Mr. Birch strongly contended that education should be in morality, and not in religion. He says:—

> "Nothing creates such a difference between mankind as religion. There often would be nothing but love between individuals, arising from their natural disposition, if they were not severed by religion. As there is said to be no morality without religion, unbelievers are treated as having no morality, and believers are absolved from morality towards them. We believe there can be no morality with religion."

Digitized by Google

Mr. Birch published through Mr. Truelove, in 1870, The Jesus Christ of John Stuart Mill, by "Antichrist," quoting on the title-page, "He is Antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son, and confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh" (1 John ii. 22, iv. 2, 3, and 2 John 7). This showed his standpoint. Like all Mr. Birch's productions, it was somewhat desultory. He wrote, like St. Paul, in an unconnected way, but he culled good things from all quarters. The work was adversely criticised in the National Reformer, and did not sell well. He also published anonymously Bible Bestiality and Filth from the Fathers, and a little book with much information on nicknames, entitled Tom Paine, Charlie Bradlaugh, and Bob Ingersoll.

Mr. Birch had a fine library and was a voluminous reader. He carried to excess the good habit of taking notes of what he read. To this I ascribe the fact that, although reading and writing all his long life, he never attained concise statement. He was always reminded of what others had said, and this led to over-much quotation and digression. Every theme elaborated itself to huge dimensions. To me he confided, when he went to Italy, the whole of his manuscripts, weighing many hundredweight. They are full of rare information; yet no publisher would venture to print them.

As a gentleman of means and leisure, Mr. Birch collected, read, and made notes upon, I think, every work on the subject of Christian origins and early Christianity, published either in English, French, or Italian. His conclusions, though expressed on many points with the caution of one who had a legal training, was emphatic on the crucial question. He held that no such person as the Jesus Christ of the Gospels ever lived. He thought the character an ideal, amalgamating Pagan myths on a Jewish basis. To the subject of the existence of Jesus, and cognate questions of Pagan religion and mythology, Josephus, Philo, the early Christian Fathers, etc., he devoted immense research, to which at least one individual (and that the present writer) is much indebted.

Mr. Birch, in the days of Garibaldi and Mazzini, had been a generous supporter of the cause of Italian freedom. He usually spent the winter in Florence, where he was well known both to the English colony and to the leading Italian Freethinkers and men of letters, such as Count Ricciardi and Angelo de Gubernatis. His wide reading was always at the service of others; and several of the Freethinking writers who gathered round Thomas Scott were indebted to him for assistance with their works. He died at Florence on April 4, 1891; and it is simple truth to say he was deeply lamented by all who knew him.

(The late) J. M. WHEELER.

Benedict Spinoza.

THE fame of Spinoza, like that of so many of the world's teachers, has undergone remarkable changes. For many generations after his death he was the object of almost universal execration; Spinozism and Atheism were identical terms; to express any sympathy with the spirit or admiration for the intellect and life of the outcast philosopher was to incur the certainty of being regarded as a wilful child of the Devil. Now, however, the poor Amsterdam Jew is elevated to the metaphysical throne, and before him loyal subjects bow. "The Systematic Atheist" of Bayle is the "God-intoxicated man" of Novalis; since the time of Lessing and Mendelssohn he has profoundly influenced Germany's noblest minds, in particular that of her greatest poet, Goethe; in France he has extorted the homage of the subtlest thinkers; and even in England, averse from ontological speculation as our best intellect is, his rigorous logic and supreme mental grasp and spiritual insight have won high and intense admiration. The grand simplicity of his life, too, has been fully recognised, and no longer are senseless accusations hurled at his memory. Even the most determined opponents acknowledge that his character was free from meanness, egotism, baseness, and chicane; nay, they are compelled to admit his claim to rank among the few combinations of sublime genius and heroic fortitude of which the human race can boast. Every one, agreeing or disagreeing intellectually, must feel when perusing his works that they are in the clear air of a great man's presence.

Baruch Despinosa, or, to use the Latin equivalent, Benedictus, was born at Amsterdam on November 24, 1632. He was the eldest of three children—himself, and two sisters, Miriam and Rebecca. His father, one of the Jewish fugitives from Spain, who settled in the Netherlands to avoid their Christian persecutors, was in comfortable, if not affluent circumstances, and derived his income probably from trade. He is reputed to have been a man of excellent understanding, and of this he gave evidence in the care he took to secure to his son the best education the Jewish schools of Amsterdam afforded. The classical languages of Greece and Rome had no place in the curriculum of the Jewish seminaries, but evidently the study of Latin was not interdicted, as Greek was by the Christian hierarchy, for amongst the Jews physicians and naturalists abounded. The Law and the Prophets were expounded by the rabbis, and diligently studied by the scholars, and the pupils who evinced extraordinary aptitude were selected for study in higher branches of education, with a view to becoming teachers themselves. Young Baruch, a remarkably quick and inquisitive boy, found means to supply himself with Latin, by aid of a German teacher, and afterwards with Greek. The boys on the upper form had the use of a well-furnished library, in which, probably, Spinoza pastured; at least, we know that at a very early age he became acquainted with the writings of Descartes. Pollock says that his use of Latin in his principal writings is not exactly classical, although it shows a perfect command over the language. His knowledge of Greek "was more limited, and by his own account not critical. Of modern languages he knew French, German, and Italian, besides Portuguese and Spanish, one or both of which were native to him. It appears from evidence made public early in the last century, but afterwards lost sight of until quite recently, that he always regarded Dutch as a foreign language, and wrote it only with difficulty."

In his fifteenth year Baruch was already remarkable for Biblical and Talmudic lore. The Rabbi, Saul Levi Morteira, superintendent and occasional teacher of the upper division of the school, had noticed his great promise, and is said to have taken unusual pains in aiding and directing his studies, flattering himself, doubtless, with the hope that his young pupil would some day occupy a distinguished place among Jewish teachers. But, alas for his preceptors, the curious and eager mind of the boy shot ahead of their limits; doubts, which if they entered his tutors' minds had entered only to be stifled, were to him the unsuspicious dawnings of intellectual life. His questions perplexed and annoyed Morteira, who found here material that could not be fashioned into orthodox shape. For awhile, doubtless, no open profession of heresy was made, but the strife within him must have been intense and distressing. At first he endeavored to find some ground of reconcilement between Reason and Scripture, but in vain. "I aver," he says in the "Tractatus," "that, though I long sought for something of the sort, I could never find it. And although nurtured in the current views of the sacred Scriptures, and my mind filled with their teachings, I was nevertheless compelled at length to break with my early beliefs."

His hesitating answers to delicate questions from those who sought him because of his scholarly reputation soon made him an object of suspicion. He became cautious and reticent in his intercourse with the elders of the congregation; he abandoned regular attendance at the Synagogue, and, indeed, gave good cause for being regarded as a very perverse youth. Whether propensely or from instigation, two young men of his own age, amongst others who sought his assistance in the tangled mazes of theology, pressed him on some of the most delicate topics of their faith. His cautious replies roused their anger, and excited them to revenge. At first they spread disadvantageous rumors against him, and then denounced him to the heads of the Jewish Synagogue as an apostate from the true faith. Cited before the elders, he indignantly denied having uttered some of the statements imputed to him. He was reprimanded, and ordered to make instant submission and acknowledgment of wickedness. This he refused to do; such procedure was insufferable to his proud nature. Threat of excommunication was then made, but without effect, and the contumacious youth retired from the presence of his judges.

On July 6, 1656, the Jewish synagogue at Amsterdam was crowded with excited men of Israel, assembled there to witness the excommunication of the recusant Spinoza. Angry frowning faces, and lurid dark eyes, told more eloquently than any words how enraged the faithful were, and how absorbed in the zeal of persecution. What mercy could be shown to a perverse youth who deliberately forsook the religion of his own people and forefathers, and opposed himself to the matchless wisdom of all their rabbis? While the anathema was being pronounced, the long, wailing note of a great horn occasionally sounded; the lights, seen brightly burning at the beginning of the ceremony, were extinguished one by one as it proceeded, till at the end the last went out, and the congregation were left in total darkness, and in the solemn, mysterious gloom the faithful responded with fervid Amens!

Dr. Van Vloten fortunately, obtained a copy of the curse against Spinoza from the then secretary of the Portuguese Jewish Church at Amsterdam. It is in the Spanish language, and is thus rendered into English by Pollock:—

> "With the judgment of the angels and of the saints we excommunicate, cut off, curse, and anathematise Baruch de Espinoza, with the consent of the elders and of all this holy congregation, in the presence of the holy books; by the 613 precepts which are written therein, with the anathema wherewith Joshua cursed Jericho, with the curse which Elisha laid upon the children, and with all the curses which are written in the law. Cursed be he by day and cursed be he by night. Cursed be he in sleeping and cursed be he in waking, cursed in going out and cursed in coming in. The Lord shall not pardon him, the wrath and fury of the Lord shall henceforth be kindled against this man, and shall lay upon him all the curses which are written in the book of the law. The Lord shall destroy his name under the sun, and cut him off for his undoing from all the tribes of Israel, with all the curses of the firmament which are written in the book of the law. But ye that cleave unto the Lord your God, live all of you this day.
> "And we warn you that none may speak with him by word of mouth nor by writing, nor show any favor to him, nor be under one roof with him, nor come within four cubits of him, nor read any paper composed or written by him."

"With these amenities, the current compliments of theological parting," says Matthew Arnold, with delicious humor, "the Jews of the Portuguese Synagogue at Amsterdam took, in 1656, their leave of their erring brother, Baruch or Benedict Spinoza. They remained children of Israel, and he became a child of modern Europe."

Amsterdam, at least the Jewish part of it, was in an uproar; but the innocent cause of the commotion was probably not much disturbed. Excommunication from one church in the midst of many others was not fraught with such dreadful consequences as followed excommunication where but one church existed; there was a great world outside the Jewish fold affording ample space for movement. He is said to have sent a reply in Spanish to the anathema, but Van Vloten in vain, though eagerly and industriously, searched for it. When informed of the excommunication, he is said to have replied: "Well and good; but this will force me to nothing I should not have been ready to do without it." The greatest trial of all was yet to come. No orthodox Jew could shelter beneath his roof one under the ban of excommunication, even though his own son. Spinoza had, therefore, to quit his home for ever.

Spinoza's classical acquirements stood him now in good stead. He at once found an engagement in the educational establishment of Dr. Francis Van den Ende, amongst whose pupils were the sons of some of the wealthiest and most distinguished citizens. Van den Ende was skilful, accomplished, and, in private, of irreproachable character, but was suspected of adding a grain of Atheism to every dose of Latin. At the doctor's school commenced also the one romance of the outcast's life. Van den Ende's daughter, a charming girl of twelve or thirteen, assisted in the tuition of the younger pupils; indeed, it is said (and upon its possible truth Lewes draws a very pretty picture of dawning love) that she aided Spinoza in his Latin studies. This, however, is highly improbable. That he became deeply attached to her is, nevertheless, certain; and he seems to have cherished the hope of one day being able to make her his wife. He is reported to have said to one of his friends that "he had made up his mind to ask Mdlle. Van den Ende in marriage, not carried away by her charms as one of the most beautiful or faultlessly formed of women, but admiring her, loving her because she was rarely gifted with understanding, possessed of much good sense, and, moreover, of a pleasant and lively disposition." When the maiden grew to womanhood years after, poor Spinoza was not the only suitor; he had a rival in a certain Dietrich Kerckkrink, a much wealthier man than himself. The rival's attentions were backed with costly presents, and finally the fair one consented to become his wife.

Such is the old story of Spinoza's love affair. "But here romance," says Martineau, "not the first time, gets itself into a scrape by neglect of dates. Dr. Van Vloten, provokingly turning to the register of this marriage on February 5, 1671, finds that the bride was then 27 years of age, and could not have been more than twelve in 1655, the reputed time of the rivalry for her hand." Despite the facts, however, Martineau clings to the old story as highly probable; and something of the same disposition is shown by Pollock, who remarks that Beatrice was only nine years old when she showed herself to the eyes of Dante and became immortally the "glorious lady of his soul."

National Secular Society.

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON NOV. 27.

The President, Mr. G. W. Foote, in the chair. There were also present:—Messrs. Baker, Barry, Bowman, Cohen, Cowell, Cunningham, Davey, Davidson, Judge, Moss, Nichols, Quinton, Roger, Rosetti, Samuels, Thurlow, Miss Kough and Miss Stanley.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed.

The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were received for the Birmingham and West Ham Branches and the Parent Society.

The Secretary reported the result of her inquiries from the various restaurants re the Annual Dinner, and it was resolved:—

> "That the 1914 Dinner take place at the Restaurant Frascati, Oxford-street, on Wednesday, January 28."

The Morpeth Police Court case, in which Captain Mitford, J.P., recently refused to take the word of William Snowball, who, being a Secularist, refused to be sworn on the Testament, as he did not believe in God, was reported by the Secretary, who had also written to Snowball's solicitor, Mr. Shaw. The matter was fully discussed, and the Secretary was instructed:—

> "(1) To write officially to the Lord Chancellor, calling his attention to the case.
> "(2) To suggest to Snowball, through his solicitor, that a mandamus should be obtained to compel the J.P. to hear the case without comments of an insulting nature; and, further, to inform him that if this course becomes necessary, and the defendant is unable to bear the cost, the Executive will render him reasonable support."

The conviction of T. W. Stewart for blasphemy was discussed, and the President informed the meeting that he was making personal investigation as to the legality of the sentence, and a petition for Stewart's release was signed by all present, as a protest against blasphemy prosecutions.

A resolution submitted by the Kingsland Branch, was adjourned for consideration until the next meeting.

E. M. VANCE, Secretary.

JAHVEH AND JESUS.

While, however, there is an enormous improvement, if we compare the administration of human affairs by Jehovah (i.e., the Old Testament God) and by God (i.e., the God of the New Testament), there is nevertheless a blot upon the character of God (i.e., the God of the New Testament) which suffices, if rigorously balanced against the failings of Jehovah, to outweigh them all. It is the eternity of the punishment which he inflicts in a future life. No amount of sophistry can ever justify the creation of beings whose lives are to terminate in endless suffering.—Viscount Amberley, "Analysis of Religious Belief," vol. ii., p. 371.

Inquiry into the evidence of a doctrine is not to be made once for all, and then taken as finally settled. It is never lawful to stifle a doubt; for either it can be honestly answered by means of the inquiry already made, or else it proves that the inquiry was not complete. "But," says one, "I am a busy man; I have no time for the long course of study which would be necessary to make me in any degree a competent judge of certain questions, or even able to understand the nature of the arguments." Then he should have no time to believe.—W. K. Clifford.

Man is by birth so poor a creature that he is good only when he dreams. He needs illusions to make him do what he ought to do for the love of good. This slave has need of fear and of lies to perform his duty. You get the mass of men to make sacrifices only by giving them assurances that they will be paid back. The self-denial of the Christian is only a shrewd calculation, an investment for the sake of the kingdom of God.—Renan.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 11 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Liberty is the air of the soul, the sunshine of life.

Feelings and Opinions.

IN discussion it is almost inevitable that things will be said which are likely to make supersensitive people wince. An expression thoughtlessly uttered may touch some among one's hearers upon a tender spot, or disturb an idea that one is in the habit of regarding as worthy of a special measure of respect. Or certain associations may have gathered round some special belief, and a brusquely spoken sentence may produce the sudden reaction of an electric shock. Such occurrences are almost inevitable; and it is surprising how anxious the average Christian is to avoid this happening. His concern for these tender associations is such that he never ceases to demand that in discussion beliefs shall be treated with the greatest possible respect. Not a sentence, not a word, must be uttered that is likely to wound the feelings of the most sensitive. If one does not agree with the opinions of one's hearers, nevertheless one must refrain from saying anything that they will consider unpleasant. Sentiments must be respected; feelings must not be lacerated.

I have omitted to say that the sentiments and feelings that are to be so carefully respected and so tenderly treated are the Christian's own. Where the opinions of other people are concerned, he shows no such concern. He does not hesitate to attack the opinions of others with the ferocity of a savage, and the language of a thorough-paced hooligan. He will use ridicule or sarcasm, slander or abuse, just as it suits his case or pleases his humor. If the Freethinker ventures to retort in kind, he will be solemnly reminded that religion is a sacred subject, and he has no right to outrage people's feelings by attacking it. And, apparently, he has a genuine belief to this effect. More, he not only believes it himself, but has somehow managed to make a great many who are intellectually opposed to him believe it also. There are scores of people who seem to have the belief that if a man does not believe in religion or in Christianity, he ought to either keep his opinions to himself, or express them in a very deferential manner. The social opposition to Freethought rests not so much upon the opinions held by Freethinkers, as upon the fact that some of them are so ill-bred and so inconsiderate as to openly express them. If they would only keep quiet, they might be forgiven. But they will speak out, and that appears to embody the undescribed but unforgivable sin against the Holy Ghost.

Now, I am not going to argue that the Freethinker wounds the feelings of Christians as a kind of payment for the Christian having wounded his. Nor am I suggesting that in future discussion should be conducted so that neither party feels his sentiments shocked. That would really mean an end to discussion altogether. Everyone in discussion says things about his opponent's opinions that his opponent would not say about them himself, and I do not see how this is to be avoided so long as conflicting opinions are brought to the point of open opposition. What I am going to submit is the simple proposition that whether my feelings are hurt or not in the course of a discussion is entirely my own concern—not that of my opponent's. His duty is to say exactly what he believes to be true, and while avoiding all personal abuse, to say it in the manner best calculated to carry conviction to my mind. My duty towards him is of precisely the same kind. If by some means or other I have got it into my head that certain of my own opinions must be treated with a special measure of tenderness or consideration, the responsibility is mine, not my opponent's. The opinions are not his, he does not regard them as either true or valuable; he may even believe them to be false and mischievous, and he is in no way bound to deal with them save in the way that one usually deals with what one regards as false and dangerous things.

It must be observed that this solicitude concerning people's feelings only arises in connection with religion. In politics or in other matters feelings are left to take care of themselves. In the political world members of the Conservative party are not over careful whether or no they wound the feelings of Mr. Lloyd George. And Mr. Lloyd George is certainly not in the habit of treating the feelings of Conservatives with very great consideration. Even within the religious world the same thing obtains. Consider the language of Protestants concerning Roman Catholics, of Churchmen about Nonconformists, and of Nonconformists about Churchmen. The plea is raised not only in connection with religion alone, but solely as concerns the relations of unbelief with religion. The Freethinker is asked to observe towards religion a degree of solicitude and carefulness that no one else is asked to observe towards any opinion whatever. And he is asked to do this on a ground that every Freethinker is bound to challenge—namely, that religious opinions are concerned with things of great and even transcendent value.

Well, I deny this altogether. I deny that religious beliefs—the belief in a God, or a soul, or a future life, or the divinity of Jesus, or similar beliefs—are in themselves of the slightest value to anybody. There are a thousand and one things concerning which our opinions are of infinitely greater consequence. For instance, our opinion about Mr. Churchill's increased armament crusade, or Mr. Lloyd George's land campaign, or the Government Home Rule Bill, are of infinitely greater consequence than opinions concerning God and the soul. (In themselves, that is, because circumstances may arise that would make our opinion of even the habitableness of Mars of very great consequence indeed.) What we believe about militarism and various legislative proposals must profoundly affect the lives of every one of our fellow-citizens. But believing in a God or a soul may leave our relations to our fellows quite unaffected. The varieties and contradictions of religious opinions and doctrines are in themselves evidence of their small value. Were religion really of vital concern to life it could not be set on one side, as it is set on one side by a growing number of people. There is no natural, vital fact that can be ignored as religion is ignored. And this setting on one side of religion proves that the value of religion is purely adventitious. It is something we import into religion, not something that naturally belongs to it.

There is no more mischievous maxim current than the one that we ought to respect one another's opinions. We ought to do nothing of the kind. Opinion deserves our respect only in proportion as we believe it to be true. In proportion as we believe it to be false, it deserves nothing but contempt and exposure. Whether the opinion be connected with "sacred" or secular subjects makes not the slightest difference. No man has the right to demand that I shall respect his opinion so long as I believe it to be false. What he is entitled to demand is that I shall respect his right to express whatever opinion he believes to be true. There is a clear justification in social utility for this, but there is neither sense nor social utility in respecting opinions merely because they are called religious. Moreover, it is exactly the right to express opinion that the Christian most strenuously resents. His opinion that a Freethinker is a source of moral and "spiritual" corruption may be shouted from the housetop and treated with all deference. My opinion that I am at least as good as a Christian must be expressed with all due regard to the tender feelings of the Christian advocate—if, indeed, I am allowed to express it at all. The feelings of Christians are outraged because picture shows or concert-halls are open on Sunday. They are not forced to attend either; but it is enough they are open, and in the name of their outraged feelings they demand that they be closed. But Freethinkers may be debarred from all sorts of pleasure on Sunday; their "day of rest" may be made hideous by church bells, Salvation Army bands, and street-corner preaching, without their feelings being considered in any way whatever.

It is not because the Freethinker sets a smaller value upon opinion than the Christian, but because he prizes it higher, that he so often "outrages" religious feeling by his speech. He is really moving upon a quite higher moral plane than that upon which the Christian habitually lives. To him opinion is something that counts for too much in the history of progress to be set on one side as of small consequence. Every opinion carries with it certain social responsibilities, and the responsibilities of unbelief are at least as important as those of belief. No Freethinker objects to a Christian preaching his opinions; he would say it was the Christian's duty to do so. But it is not a duty confined to Christians. It is the duty of everyone to proclaim an opinion as false when it is seen to be so. The plea that the time is not ripe for speech is the plea of a coward. If no one spoke the time never would be ripe. "Not ripe" only means not quite safe; nothing more. Really, the proper time to call a lie a lie is when it is seen to be a lie; not to wait until there are enough singers to make a respectable chorus. Truth often suffers more from the timidity of its friends than from the malignity of its enemies.

In practice the claim that religious feelings must be protected from assault, involves, if necessary, more or less persecution. And it means persecution in its most cowardly form. To say that an opinion is false and shall be suppressed by the simple process of imprisoning or killing those who entertain it, is a straightforward and intelligible proposition. But to grant the right to express that opinion, and yet to say that it shall be expressed in a manner agreeable to the feelings of those who do not agree with it, is persecution plus cowardice. In either case, whether the direct and more courageous plan, or the indirect and more cowardly method is followed, opinion can only be sheltered from attack at the cost of cultivating cowardice and hypocrisy. Conformity is secured by robbing the nation of that which is vital to genuine progress. Error is more firmly established, and religious health becomes the equivalent of social disease. Hypocrisy becomes a marked social characteristic. It is not even the hypocrisy of conscious dissimulation. That is a comparatively healthy form, because it evidences the capacity for seeing the real thing. The hypocrisy generated is of the kind that, although there is a total divorce between theory and practice, there is a curious unconsciousness that we are all the time living a lie. It is an hypocrisy that is ingrained, organic, and secured by a process of elimination that has been at work for generations. Religious opinion has been protected from attack by a lowering of the intellectual values. And when the history of religion is closed, this may well stand out as its greatest crime against the progress of humanity.

C. COHEN.

The Holy Ghost.

THE Third Person of the Trinity has played a most conspicuous and tragical part in the history of Christendom. In the Nicene Creed he is defined as "the Lord, the Giver of Life, who proceedeth from the Father and the Son, who, with the Father and the Son together is worshiped and glorified, who spake by the prophets." Like the Second Person, he is from the First, but in a different way. The Son is begotten, while the Spirit proceedeth, though both are said to be of the substance of the Father. In the Athanasian Creed we find the following illuminating sentences:—

> "The Father is made of none; neither created, nor begotten. The Son is of the Father alone; not made nor created, but begotten. The Holy Ghost is of the Father and of the Son; neither made, nor created, nor begotten, but proceeding."

The Arians did not accept that teaching, but they were not to be listened to, being, as the godly Athanasius politely called them, "Devils, Antichrists, maniacs, Jews, Polytheists, Atheists, dogs, wolves, lions, hares, chameleons, hydras, eels, cuttle-fish, gnats, beetles, leeches." In the use of such elegant invectives against opponents, theological controversialists have never been surpassed. What was meant by proceeding no human being could tell, though we are assured by a twentieth-century divine that "the procession of the Spirit from the Son is not to be understood in precisely the same sense as the procession from the Father." The Eastern Church rejects the doctrine that the Spirit proceeds from the Son, declaring that the procession is from the Father alone. Some theologians have advocated the view that the Holy Ghost is the maternal principle in the Godhead and as such shared with the Father in the generation of the Son, just as Isis shared with Osiris in the generation of Horus.

In the Trinity there are three persons, Father, Son, and Spirit, the Father being the fountain-head of the strange union; but the curious thing is that neither Father nor Son is known except through the Holy Ghost. Does it not follow that the Holy Ghost works exclusively through Nature and through man? The Bible furnishes several striking instances of his ceaseless activity. In Joel i. 3, 4, we read thus:—

> "Tell ye your children of it, and let your children tell their children, and their children another generation. That which the palmerworm hath left hath the locust eaten; and that which the locust hath left hath the cankerworm eaten; and that which the cankerworm hath left hath the caterpillar eaten."

In verses 15-20 of the same chapter we find this appalling picture:—

> "Alas for the day! for the day of the Lord is at hand, and as destruction from the Lord shall it come. Is not the meat cut off before our eyes, yea, joy and gladness from the house of our God? The seeds rot under their clods; the garners are laid desolate, the barns are broken down, for the corn is withered. How do the beasts groan! the herds of cattle are perplexed, because they have no pasture; yea, the flocks of sheep are made desolate. O Lord, to thee do I cry; for the fire hath devoured the pastures of the wilderness, and the flame hath burned all the trees of the field. Yea, the beasts of the field pant unto thee; for the water-brooks are dried up, and the fire hath devoured the pastures of the wilderness."

The day of the Lord was thus "a day of darkness and gloominess, a day of clouds and thick darkness, as the dawn spread upon the mountains." Then follows a vivid and accurate description of a terrible visitation of locusts :—

> "A fire devoureth before them, and behind them a flame burneth, the land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness; yea, and none hath escaped them.....They leap upon the city; they run upon the wall; they climb up into the houses; they enter in at the windows, like a thief. The earth quaketh before them; the heavens tremble; the sun and the moon are darkened, and the stars withdraw their shining" (ii. 3-10).

The prophet calls the locusts an army of the Lord, who utters his voice before it, and whose camp is very great. The horrors of such a visitation only show that "the day of the Lord is great and very terrible." The Rev. Dr. Simpson, Canon of St. Paul's, London, tells us, in a sermon upon "The Outpouring of the Spirit," which appears in the Christian World Pulpit for December 3, that "the Christian believes that the Divine Spirit operates as certainly in the falling rain, in the succession of the seasons, in the courses of the stars, as in the prayer of the contrite, the mediation of the saint, the redemption of mankind"; but does the Christian believe, like Joel and, apparently, like Dr. Simpson himself, that the same being operates with equal certainty in the devastating earthquake, the devouring locusts, and the all-destroying volcanic eruptions? Does he believe that the Holy Ghost visits the beasts of the field and the birds of the air with famine because he is angry with mankind, or that he gives cleanness of teeth and want of bread to all who forget him, that he withholds the rain from a godless city and grants it to a pious one? Of course, if the rain comes from God, so does the drought; if the thunder is his voice, so is the earthquake his servant.

We maintain that if a spirit operates in all the activities of Nature it would be a horrible lie to call it the Holy Ghost. Nature is heartless, cruel, unmoral, neither rewarding virtue nor punishing vice. In her sight saint and sinner are alike. The Psalmist says that "the Lord is mindful of his own," but Nature shows them no favor whatever. When the earth quakes they perish like the others. No Elijah is fed by ravens when famine haunts the land. No man of God is favored when the ship goes down, or when the red-hot lava overwhelms the city. Many Christian believers now admit this without hesitation, but, at the same time, hold the view that the Holy Ghost is all-powerful in the world of mind. Dr. Simpson expresses himself with great clearness and vehemence on this point. He says :—

> "It is a not infrequent charge against the clergy of the modern age that they are exchanging a spiritual for a material Gospel, and proclaiming a social rather than a Divine Christ. Now, I protest from the bottom of my heart that it is the duty of the Christian minister to preach the forgiveness of sins and not the reconstruction of society. Eternal salvation, not economic revolution, is now as it has ever been, the hope of a sinful race. Nothing short of the outpouring of the Spirit in its fullest Pentecostal form is the promise which alone can satisfy the needs and longings of mankind."

That is no doubt orthodox, evangelical teaching; but the reverend gentleman will surely admit that no such outpouring of a supernatural spirit has ever taken place. It has never come to pass, as predicted by Joel, that the Lord has poured out his Spirit upon all flesh. The story of Pentecost in the Acts is plainly a legend. The Holy Ghost has never done a single thing to justify the Church's faith in him. The people who are spoken of as being filled with the Spirit are as fallible and weak as others. Ministers of the Gospel are successes or failures for precisely the same reasons as members of other professions. The power to draw and keep a congregation is entirely human. When an exceptionally clever and powerful discourse has been delivered the remark is generally made that it was a special exhibition of the Holy Spirit's presence. It is never anything of the sort. The effectiveness of a sermon is dependent upon the preacher's ability, intellectual and emotional preparation, the state of his health, and the degree of receptiveness on the part of his hearers. The best oration ever composed falls flat if the human conditions are not favorable. The Church differs in no sense whatever from any other human organisation except in the silly, supernatural claims it makes on its own behalf, not one of which has been established by a single well-attested fact. It prospers or languishes according to the nature and efficient or inefficient working of its machinery. It has never furnished the smallest iota of evidence of the presence within it of a superhuman spirit or power. The Church is, therefore, of necessity a lying institution, with no truth in it. The Holy Ghost, described in the New Testament, has always been conspicuous only by his absence and inactivity; and if there be no Holy Ghost the blessed Trinity disappears, its complete illusoriness being an established fact.

The only conclusion to which we can reasonably come is that the belief in the Holy Ghost is and has always been a great obstacle to human progress. Dependence upon him is fatal to the growth of self-reliance, which is an essential condition of genuine reform. The supernatural must be completely dropped before we can really begin to set the world right; and it is highly comforting to know that it is being abandoned now by ever-growing numbers of our fellow-beings. That is why there are so many prosecutions for blasphemy just now; and even these do their share in accelerating the departure of the Holy Ghost.

J. T. LLOYD.

"Wait Till You Come to Die."—II.

> "Where, among the educated and refined, much less among the masses, do we find any ardent desire for a future life? It is not a subject of drawing-room conversation, and the man whose habit it is to buttonhole his acquaintances and inquire earnestly after their souls is shunned like the Ancient Mariner. Among the clergy it is not thought polite to refer to so delicate a topic except officially from the pulpit. Most ominous of all, as indicating the utter absence of interest on the part of the public, is the silence of the press, in the columns of which are manifested daily the works of the flesh."—PROFESSOR WILLIAM OSLER, Science and Immortality, pp. 22-23.

> "I find that when a Christian loses a friend the tears spring from his eyes as quickly as from the eyes of others. Their tears are as bitter as ours. Why? The echo of the promises spoken eighteen hundred years ago is so low, and the sound of the clods upon the coffin so loud, the promises are so far away, and the dead so near."—COLONEL INGERSOLL, The Dying Creed, p. 31.

> "The proper study of a wise man is not how to die, but how to live."—SPINOZA, Ethics, iv., 67.

IT was reserved for Christianity to surround death with supernatural terrors. To the Pagan philosophers these terrors were of the very essence of superstition, the doctrine, says Lecky, "that he who has earnestly, though no doubt imperfectly, tried to do his duty has nothing to fear beyond the grave, had been the consoling faith of all the best minds of antiquity."*

To the ancient Greeks, says a competent authority,—

> "there are none of the haunting uncertainties of modern religion about the Greek view of life; no dark corners, no likelihood of skeletons in the cupboard. It is a clear air, and in it we are not baffled by mists, which rise and fall, but never lift; and which hold behind them endless possibilities that can never be quite brought to the test."†

"He was waiting for no glory to be revealed," says the same writer, "with which the sufferings of this present time were not worthy to be compared. The glory was already present to his eyes"‡ in that splendid civilisation, in some respects so far ahead of our own.

As Goethe observed of the sepulchres of Athens:—

> "The wind which blows from the tombs of the ancients comes with gentle breath as over a mound of roses. The reliefs are touching and pathetic, and always represent life. There stand father and mother, their son between them, gazing at one another with unspeakable truth to nature. Here a pair clasp hands. Here a father seems to rest on his couch and wait to be entertained by his family. To me the presence of these scenes was very touching. Their art is of a late period, yet are they simple, natural, and of universal interest. Here there is no knight in harness on his knees awaiting a joyful resurrection. The artist has with more or less skill presented to us only the persons themselves, and so made their existence lasting and perpetual. They fold not their hands, gaze not into heaven; they are on earth, what they were and what they are. They stand side by side, take interest in one another; and that is what is in the stone, even though somewhat unskilfully, yet most pleasingly depicted." *

As Lessing observes in his essay on this subject:—

> "Revelation has made Death the 'King of Terrors,' the awful offspring of sin and the dread way to its punishment; though to the imagination of the ancient heathen world, Greek or Etrurian, he was a youthful genius—the twin brother of Sleep, or a lusty boy with a torch held downwards." †

Among the greatest of the Romans the same opinion prevailed. Says Lecky:—

> "Cæsar could assert in the Senate, without scandal and almost without dissent, that death was the end of all things. Pliny, perhaps the greatest of all Roman scholars, adopting the sentiment of all the school of Epicurus, describes the belief in a future life as a form of madness, a puerile and a pernicious illusion.....That the sleep of annihilation is the happiest end of man is a favorite thought of Lucretius." ‡

Says the same historian:—

> "Panætius, the founder of Roman stoicism, maintained that the soul perished with the body, and his opinion was followed by Epictetus and Cornutus. Seneca contradicted himself on the subject. Marcus Aurelius never rose above a vague and mournful aspiration. Those who believed in a future world believed in it faintly and uncertainly, and even when they accepted it as a fact, they shrank from proposing it as a motive. The whole system of stoical ethics, which carried self-sacrifice to a point that has scarcely been equalled, and exercised an influence which has rarely been surpassed, was evolved without any assistance from the doctrine of a future life." §

The Pagan philosophers taught that death is "a law not a punishment"; while Christianity taught that death was introduced into the world as a punishment inflicted for the sin of Adam:—

> "The first taught that death was the end of suffering; they ridiculed as the extreme of folly the notion that physical evils could await those whose bodies had been reduced to ashes, and they dwelt with emphatic eloquence upon the approaching, and, as they believed, final extinction of superstitious terrors. The second taught that death to the vast majority of the human race is but the beginning of endless and excruciating tortures—tortures before which the most ghastly of terrestrial sufferings dwindle into insignificance—tortures which no courage could defy—which none but an immortal being could endure."‖

Lecky says:—

> "By the philosophers the ascription of anger and vengeance to the Deity, and the apprehension of future torture at His hands, were unanimously repudiated; by the priests the opposite opinion was deemed equally censurable."

And he further observes:—

> "The main object of the Pagan philosophers was to dispel the terrors the imagination had cast around death, and by destroying this last cause of fear to secure the liberty of man. The main object of the Catholic priests has been to make death in itself as revolting and appalling as possible, and by representing escape from its terrors as hopeless, except by complete subjection to their rule, to convert it into an instrument of government. By multiplying the dancing or warning skeletons, and other sepulchral images representing the loathsomeness of death without its repose; by substituting inhumation for incremation, and concentrating the imagination on the ghastliness of decay; above all, by peopling the unseen world with demon phantoms and with excruciating tortures, the Catholic Church succeeded in making death in itself unspeakably terrible, and in thus preparing men for the consolations it could offer." *

The same historian observes:—

> "The Catholic priests resolved to base their power upon the nerves; and as they long exercised an absolute control over education, literature, and art, they succeeded in completely reversing the teaching of ancient philosophy, and in making the terrors of death for centuries the nightmare of the imagination" (p. 211).

So omnipotent did the idea of death become, that the people of the Middle Ages actually began to represent life as a dance of death. Death was represented as a grisly skeleton, armed with a dart or a bow and arrow. In these gruesome illustrations of the dance of death, familiar to all students of those times, death leads his victims to an untimely grave; he plays the fiddle at weddings, he beats the drum for soldiers in battle, he bears the priest's bell when the priest carries the sacrament, he plays the flute for the dancers, he throws the dice for the gamblers. With bow and arrow he is seen hunting the hunter; with dart poised to strike he stands over the miser; he is seen standing beside the scholar, the sculptor, and the painter; he is shown in every conceivable phase of life, beside the baby in the cradle to the man in the decrepitude of old age. Holbein's "Dance of Death" is the best known to our generation. Holbein executed a series of woodcuts for this, which were published in book form, with explanatory verses, in 1538. It became the most famous work of his life, and appeared in many hundred editions in French, Latin, Italian, and German.† And Holbein, it should be recollected, was a Protestant.

Nothing illustrates more vividly the contrast between the Middle Ages—the Ages of Faith—and our own time than the difference in the treatment of death. There is a million-fold more reading matter issued to-day than during those ages; but there are no dances of death published now, except, maybe, a reproduction of some of the old ones as an antiquarian curiosity. The present generation are more intent upon making the best of this world; in striving for better conditions in this life than in concentrating their attention upon a mythical life to come. We are returning, after nearly two thousand years of madness, to the sane and healthy view of death held by the ancient Greeks and Romans.

Martin Luther himself remarked upon the different view taken of death by the ancients, before the advent of Christianity. He says:—

> "If it were a light and easy matter for a Christian to overcome death, if he knew it was not God's wrath; that quality makes death bitter to us. But a heathen dies securely; he neither sees nor feels that it is God's wrath, but thinks it is merely the end of nature. The epicurean says: 'Tis but to endure one evil hour." ‡

Lecky said that he knew nothing in the world sadder than this saying of Luther's on the matter.§

"Wait till you come to die." When the Freethinker hears these words, he knows that he is confronted by a survivor from the Dark Ages. That, in the speaker's mind, is a vision of the infidel stretched on a bed of sickness, thinking despairingly of the wrath to come, of the angry Judge, of the devils waiting to bear his soul to the infernal regions. This is what he learned from his grandmother, and does not doubt it, and he cannot understand that anyone else can have the temerity to dismiss these tales of devils and hells as so many old wives' fables, of no more reality than the tales in the Arabian Nights. He thinks that the sceptic is not sincere in his disbelief; that his unbelief is a pretence born of bravado, which, in the hour of death will desert him—hence his miserable end. As Colonel Ingersoll has well remarked:—

> "For many centuries the theologians have taught that an unbeliever—an infidel—one who spoke or wrote against their creed, could not meet death with composure; that in his last moment God would fill his conscience with the serpents of remorse. For a thousand years the clergy have manufactured the facts to fit this theory—this infamous conception of the deity of man and the justice of God." *

Mr. Bernard Shaw once remarked that most people believed in God, because they were afraid that if they did not he would strike them dead. The person who tells you to "Wait till you come to die" may be safely classed among this kind of believer.

Christianity and the Mailed Fist.

> "If Christians would teach infidels to be just to Christianity, they should themselves be just to infidelity."
> —JOHN STUART MILL.

CHRISTIAN apologists are never tired of boasting of the tolerance of the religion they profess. At the present moment, when a Freethinker is in prison because of his Freethought, it is well to attempt to dispel the gross ignorance everywhere displayed as to the persecution of "infidels" by their orthodox opponents. Curiously, although trials for blasphemy have been numerous, the comparatively enlightened nineteenth century holds the record for the number of blasphemy and free speech convictions, and the early years of the present century bid fair to rival the record of its predecessor. The reason is not far to seek. The working classes have woke to intellectual issues, and Church and State have united in an unholy alliance to strangle Freedom.

A hundred years ago Thomas Paine was dead, but his books were alive and were being circulated. This was one of the earliest efforts to rouse the workers with the Freethought evangel, and the Freethinkers suffered terribly for publishing that thunderous engine of revolt, the Age of Reason. There were critics of the Bible, it is true, before Paine's day, but they were mainly scholars, whose works were not easily understood by ordinary folk. Paine himself, a man of genius, had sprung from the people, and he spoke their tongue and made their thoughts articulate. But boldly as Paine might write, his books would never have been read at all but for the courage of the Freethinkers. Richard Carlile, the lion-hearted, endured over nine years' imprisonment. The clergy were aroused by so determined a resistance, and hesitated at nothing. They even attacked women, and Carlile's brave wife and sister were dragged to gaol for two years each. His shopmen divided among them about forty years' imprisonment. Think of it! One small circle of Freethinkers serving between them over fifty years in prison for the right of free speech.

The example of Paine was soon emulated. Haslam's Letters to the Clergy put the absurdities of Christianity in plain fashion before the people, and this was followed by Clarke's Critical Life of Jesus. Robert Cooper's Holy Scriptures Analysed was another powerful attack on Bibliolatry. Thoroughly alarmed, Phillpotts, Bishop of Exeter, voiced the terror with no uncertain sound in the House of Lords. Great excitement followed, and the State clergy and Dissenting ministers for the first time joined hands, and started many new prosecutions against the Freethinkers. John Cleave and Henry Hetherington were both prosecuted and sentenced. The Freethinkers were in a fighting mood, and they tested the law to see if it could reach high-class culprits. A prosecution was commenced against Moxon and other publishers for selling Shelley's Queen Mab, for which so many infidels had suffered. The ruse succeeded, and Freethought won a step forward.

The first distinctive Freethought periodical, the Oracle of Reason, edited by the brilliant and audacious Charles Southwell, was the next storm-centre. Before many issues had been published the editor was prosecuted, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a fine of £100. Holyoake, the second editor of the paper, was the next victim. For a blasphemous remark after a lecture he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment.

Thomas Paterson, the third editor, shared the fate of his predecessors. His defence, published under the caustic title of God versus Paterson, was astounding in its audacity, and earned for its author the title of "Bulldog." Up in Scotland two Freethinkers, Robinson and Finlay, were sentenced for selling blasphemous works. Then a Freethought heroine, Matilda Roalfe, stepped into the breach, and was sentenced for selling the Age of Reason. Her sacrifice was not in vain, and the hydra of clericalism was forced to recoil by the sheer courage of the blasphemers.

There was rest for a few years; but in 1857 a poor Cornish well-sinker was sentenced to nearly two years' imprisonment for chalking blasphemous words on a parson's gate. Happily, this case attracted the attention of two Freethinkers of European reputation, Henry Thomas Buckle and John Stuart Mill, who stirred the intellectual world by denouncing such abominable persecution. The prosecuting counsel was John Duke Coleridge, afterwards Lord Chief Justice, and, by the irony of events, the judge in the memorable blasphemy trial of 1883. It was in that year that the Freethinker trials took place, when Mr. G. W. Foote was sentenced to a year's imprisonment, and his two colleagues, Ramsey and Kemp, to nine and three months' respectively. Petitions for release were signed by almost everybody of intellectual eminence in England. An agitation was commenced against the Blasphemy Laws, which Judge Stephen well described as "ferocious," but which yet disgrace the Statute Book of a civilised country. The prosecution of 1883, indeed, elicited such widespread condemnation that for some years the law fell into abeyance; but during the past few years there has been a revival of persecution, directed against isolated and unimportant Freethinkers.

Imprisonment was by no means the only indignity imposed. Daniel Eaton, besides being prosecuted seven times, had the pillory inflicted and £2,500 worth of literature destroyed. The poet Shelley was deprived of the custody of his children, and a similar dishonor was inflicted on Mrs. Besant many years later. A large number of the prosecutions of the unstamped press were simply disguised blasphemy trials. The authorities covered the odiousness of their acts under cover of proceedings against unstamped papers or pamphlets. Bradlaugh had to win his seat at Northampton in the face of awful opposition, and only his alertness prevented his imprisonment for blasphemy. The late Marquis of Queensberry was deprived of his seat in the House of Lords on account of his infidelity. Last, but not least, thousands of pounds bequeathed for Freethought purposes in the past were devoted to other channels; but happily Mr. Foote has stopped this highway robbery. In addition, our leader, in his attempts to free us from our fetters, has been involved in constant lawsuits, personal abuse, and has been the victim of a concerted press boycott.

Never in the whole course of its contest with other religions or ideas has Christianity turned its lying face to be smitten. Not once in the realities of its evolution has it manifested even "goodwill to men" opposed to its own creed. In the past, the Church of Christ bribed the weak and murdered the strong among her opponents. In the twentieth century she is buying apostates all over the non-Christian world by means of medical missionaries, and in England venting her spleen on unfortunate stragglers and camp followers of the army of Freethought. O Religion of Love! How many crimes have been committed in thy name.

MIMNERMUS.

The "Blasphemy" Case.

SOME years ago there was a swarm of prosecutions for what may be called "blaspheming" the German Emperor. They were worked down so fine at last that even good monarchists were obliged to lift their eyebrows. One worthy citizen had to do time for suggesting that a musical composition of William's, of which he was very proud just then, was not quite equal to Beethoven; another was imprisoned for suggesting that the Emperor's personal beauty was a shade less than Apollo's; and another suffered for the opinion that the Emperor's sermons on board his yacht were not equal to Luther's. Nobody knew where this deification of William was going to end. It threatened to go beyond the "Me and God" of the versified satire. So the good sense of the nation cried "Halt!" And the lèse-majesté business has been worked more temperately ever since.

Now just as lèse-majesté may be called "blaspheming" a sovereign, so may "blasphemy" be called lèse-majesté against God. No particular God, but any God that happens to rule the roost at a certain time and place. In England, of course, the matter is rather complicated. There seems to be a syndicate of deities in this country. You have to deal respectfully and tenderly with God the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Ghost, and even God the Devil, who is quite a respectable character now, and plays the part of leader of the opposition, standing towards the Trinity very much as Mr. Bonar Law stands towards Mr. Asquith. There is also a female Deity worshiped by the Catholics, who stands closely related to the Trinity and in a certain way with their friendly adversary.

You are to deal tenderly and respectfully with these personages, not for their own sake, but for the sake of their worshipers. These people have exquisitely sensitive feelings. You would not think so if you judged by their own language in religious controversy. You have to take their word for it. If you hesitate to do so they are able to provide you with much stronger reasons than logic and sense could supply. They have the argument of prosecution and imprisonment at their command. You had better admit that their feelings are of the very highest sensibility. Contradiction gives them shocking pain. Opposition drives them mad with agony. Even the slightest sign of dissent throws them into a fever.

We understand that Stewart is not a very persuasive speaker, but we cannot ascertain that he said anything worse than the half-dozen sentences we quoted some weeks ago. Lord Coleridge must have been playing to the gallery in declaring that he could conceive of nothing "more coarse, vulgar, or more distasteful." He also showed that there is nothing in heredity to secure that a wise and tolerant father shall have a wise and tolerant son.

It was on this basis that Thomas William Stewart (we will drop the ridiculous "Nikola") was tried for "blasphemy" at the Stafford Assizes, found guilty, and sentenced to four months' imprisonment. Had he spoken of Conservatism, Liberalism, Socialism, Anarchism, or any other "ism" of that kind, he would have committed no crime. His offence was speaking of Christianity in a way that Christians dislike. Just as if any Freethinker had ever been able to speak of Christianity in a way that Christians liked.

(To be concluded.)

Acid Drops.

The Bishop of London has been explaining the action of the ecclesiastics concerning metropolitan amusements. "We do not even attack mere vulgarity. All we attack is indecency and suggestiveness." Dr. Ingram should apply the same treatment to his own Book—first of all. And if "vulgarity" is not attacked in London why is it made the ground of a Blasphemy prosecution at Wolverhampton and the Stafford Assizes?

The Bishop of London says that God made the world, and it is a beautiful world. Man himself is the author of all the evil in the world. All the Bishop has to do now is to tell us who made man?

The following lovely cutting is from a leading article in the Daily Chronicle on "The Balkan Tangle":—

> "It is reported that Servia and Montenegro have agreed on their new frontier in the Sandjak of Novibazar, but similar reports have before proved premature. Of the misery in the conquered regions, especially those under Servian sway, there is unhappily much evidence. Albania and Bulgaria both swarm with refugees. The Albanians come mostly from the Diakova district, where the notorious Servian regicide, General Popovitch, is in command, and bring terrible tales of extermination and village-burning, men, women, and children perishing without respect to age or sex. Against the Macedonian Bulgars Servia has enacted what is probably the harshest coercion Act of modern times. Under it any Servian district police officer may proclaim any resident in his district guilty of treason. There is no trial; the officer merely pronounces sentence; the maximum is death, the minimum five years' imprisonment. If a proclaimed man absconds, he becomes at once liable to the maximum penalty, and if anybody harbors him, they share his guilt."

We prefer to add nothing. The cutting tells its own story.

James Murray Bett, in the London Bankruptcy Court, pleaded that his failure was due to the "Act of God," as most of his assets were destroyed by a hurricane. His argument was not refuted, but his discharge was suspended for two years—which is scarcely fair.

Should a Woman Tell? is the title of the Rev. A. J. Waldron's playlet. It is a question in which the clergy are developing a serious interest, if we may judge by the recent newspaper reports of clerical misdoings.

We were unable to attend the lecture by Georg Brandes on Nietzsche. We therefore turned to the next morning's newspapers for what we hoped would be a good report. We found the longest in the Daily Chronicle. But it was not a report of the lecture, to which only a few lines were devoted. It was mainly a report of the remarks of the chairman, Mr. G. B. Shaw, who introduced the lecturer with one speech and buried him under another. It was a great pity that Shaw acted in this grotesque way. To be always talking, and generally about yourself, is sometimes not an entertainment but an affliction to your audience; especially when it is not your audience at all but another man's. Unfortunately, it is a besetting sin of too many chairmen to mistake themselves for the lecturer. But a man of Mr. Shaw's sagacity ought to have seen that all he was required to do was to welcome M. Brandes, and to keep order if necessary.

It may be, of course, that the Chronicle made Mr. Shaw's offence worse than it was. He was not responsible for the unmannerly brevity of the report of M. Brandes' lecture. He is responsible, however, for playing up to the policy of certain newspapers to report clowning rather than philosophy—what is merely amusing instead of what instructs and elevates. And he pays the penalty of this—for many people have long ceased to take him seriously, which is, in its way, a misfortune. At the Essex Hall meeting in favor of the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws, in March last, there were men on the platform who had fought hard for many years for that object, whereas it was about the first meeting of that kind which Mr. Shaw had ever attended. Some of those men represented important sections of the "advanced" community. But they and their object were nothing. The newspaper men were instructed to "report Shaw." Which they did. And the result was that the public were practically informed that the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws was necessary in order that Mr. Shaw might write a play on Mohammed. It was not known, or not remembered, that Voltaire had written a play on that subject, that it had been translated into English, and put upon the stage in London. The courage required to write another play on Mohammed in the twentieth century, instead of the eighteenth, does not seem quite supernatural. The Blasphemy Laws, at least, are hardly a sufficient deterrent. It is to be hoped, therefore, that Mr. Shaw may yet pluck up courage for the great attempt.

An article in the Christian World for December 4 bears the title "Old Testament Medicine," and one would naturally expect that it would deal with the medical knowledge displayed in the Bible. Not a bit of it, however. The article describes the knowledge of drugs and maladies possessed by the ancient Egyptians, Assyrians, and Babylonians. All students are aware that these peoples had a very considerable body of solid knowledge at their disposal, and although in no case had they quite freed themselves from the primitive animistic theory of disease, still many of the things were known to them that the modern world has rediscovered within recent times. The peculiarity of the Christian World article, however, is that, having pointed out how much the ancient peoples knew about drugs and disease, it quietly assumes that this was "Old Testament Medicine." This is, of course, wide of the truth. Old Testament "medicine" represents a much lower level of culture than that enjoyed by the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Babylonians, just as the civilisation of the Biblical Jews was upon a much lower level. In the Bible the cure for disease is almost invariably of a supernatural kind, and disease is nearly always supernaturally cured. Recent discoveries concerning the civilisations of remote antiquity only prove that in dealing with the early Biblical Jews we are dealing with a people only a degree removed from savagery.

The Christian World writer also refers to "the medical world of the New Testament, which owed its success to the advances of the Greek practitioners." This is a quite gratuitous piece of "bluff." There is not the slightest trace in the New Testament of any influence of Greek medical science. Comparing Galen or Hippocrates with the New Testament theory of diseases is exactly on a level with comparing our own medical science with African fetish worship. Faith and prayer are the stock-in-trade of the New Testament healer. Disease is caused by demons and cured by religious incantation. If there is one thing clear to demonstration, it is that in the sphere of disease and its treatment the New Testament represents a reversion from a fairly advanced state of knowledge to a condition of primitive savagery. And, more than anything else, the New Testament was responsible for the eclipse of ancient medical learning and long sway of curing disease by prayer, by relics, and by the casting out of demons. These things are so obvious and so easily demonstrated that one would have thought Christians would at least have had the sense to be silent on the subject. But pious impudence seems without bounds, and pious credulity to be without limits.

"I heard a clergyman tell a rather good story the other day. Two spiders met in a church. 'Hullo,' said one to the other, 'I hope you've got comfortable quarters?' 'No,' was the reply; 'I haven't. I'm in the churchwarden's pew, and he's always jumping up and bobbing in and out and disturbing me.' 'Oh,' said the spider who had made the inquiry, 'I'm much better off. I've been here three months and I haven't been disturbed once. I'm in the Poor Box.'" Referee.

Clerical jobs go begging in Shakespeare's county. Canon F. R. Evans, rector of Bedworth, Warwickshire, has advertised six weeks for a curate without getting a single answer. All we can suggest is raising the salary.

What humbug there is in English religion,—which is supposed, we understand, to be a species of Christianity. God is said to be no respecter of persons. That is the pious theory, but it is very different in practice. A deputation to the Dean of Exeter persuaded him to add the name of a very well-known "person" to one of the set prayers in the Church service. "God" was asked to pity "all those who are any way afflicted or distressed in mind, body, or estate" —and "especially Emiline Pankhurst." Why especially to her? Would her name have been introduced to the Almighty in that fashion if she had been a distressed washerwoman? The explanation of the Dean's action is to be found in the thousands of pounds subscribed to the Pankhurst organisation on Sunday evening. It is not the lower orders who can give two subscriptions of £1,000 each on one evening—to say nothing of five hundreds, two hundreds, and one hundreds. Evidently all you want to command the clergy is plenty of cash. They'll arrange with God for all you want for a sufficient consideration.

More floods in Texas. Many persons have perished through the rising of the Brazos River. No doubt their relatives are bursting to cry "Three cheers for Providence!"

Dr. C. E. Jefferson has a lengthy article in the Constructive Quarterly on "The Church and World Brotherhood." He says that the two principal problems before the world are "How to federate the nations, and how to federate the Churches." We quite agree in the importance of the first, but the second is neither important, desirable, nor possible. It is not important, because the doctrines of the Churches play a steadily decreasing part in the life of the world. It is not desirable, because, were it possible, it would mean the creation of a power operating with the single regard to the welfare of its own organisation. A federation of Churches would mean, for aggressive purposes, the recreation of a universal Catholic Church, and what that meant the history of Europe tells plainly enough. The welfare of the world has been negatively dependent upon the fact that a universal Church did not exist except in name. And, on a smaller area, the welfare of that country has been most assured where the divisions among Churches have been the most numerous. Where the Churches can unite, the result is disaster. Fortunately, such a union is not possible. The doctrines of the Churches are too discordant, and their aims too conflicting. And if they drop the doctrines, forgo their aims, and unite in preaching the doctrine of "social service," they are helping to strengthen the very cause that is largely responsible for the contempt in which they are now held.

Dr. Jefferson does, in fact, fall back upon this last line. He says, "It is a striking fact that men will work together long before they are willing to worship together." This is quite true, as we have often pointed out, and its truth arises from the fact that while social life is an essentially unifying force, religion is a naturally disruptive one. Place a number of men together in any kind of social life, and sooner or later they will establish some sort of a working agreement. They will learn to maximise their agreements and minimise their disagreements. Put a number of men together in a religious relationship and the reverse will happen. Differences, slight at first, will gradually assume mountainous proportions. The whole history of religion is a history of disunion. Religion begins everywhere in agreement and ends in disagreement. It is only the compelling force of social life that secures the measure of agreement that actually exists.

Dr. Jefferson sees this—in a way—in the sentence above quoted, but he adds, "The modern emphasis on social service is a mighty forwarder of Christian union," and his advice to the Churches is to utilise this in their own interests. The advice was not needed. The Churches have always done this, and are doing it still. The exploitation of the social side of human nature in the interests of supernaturalism is one of the most important facts in European history, even in human history. But why should this phase of human nature be utilised to advance the welfare of the Churches? Social effort is an end in itself—or, at least, it is directed towards its own specific object. To use this in order to advance the welfare of the Churches is to divert it from its proper purpose, to stunt the development of social life, and to foster the growth of vested interests and unscientific beliefs. If the Churches have anything vital in them they should be able to live without attaching themselves, parasite-like, to something outside themselves. If they cannot do this, the sensible course is to sweep them out of the road.

In the Berlin districts covered by the (State) Church Synod there are sixty-eight State churches, with accommodation for 86,000 persons. A church census was taken on a recent Sunday, and it was found that 11,252 were present. A great many reasons are given for this abstention of so large a number of people, but none of them hit the mark. Comparing these figures with those supplied by the church census taken in various parts of England, they are not very dissimilar, and so general a result argues an equally general cause. And when all other reasons have been examined, only one remains of any value—that is, the general decline of religious belief all over the civilised world. People cease to attend church because they are ceasing to believe in Christianity. That is the only theory that covers the facts. And against this decay of belief the Churches, singly or collectively, are powerless. It is possible for a powerful organisation to fight and crush an individual; but against the slow, but steady, development of the race the most powerful organisation is ultimately powerless.

A wonderful old man is Mr. Moses, a retired barrister, of Slough, who sings in public at the age of eighty-four. A still more wonderful man was the Mr. Moses mentioned in the Bible, who wrote an account of his own funeral.

Mr. A. G. Hales has written to the Daily Sketch suggesting that music-hall artistes should hold an inquiry into the morals of the clergy, in view of the large number of cases in which vicars and curates have been before the courts. He adds, "I consider it much safer to send my children to a music-hall than to church."

The Dean of Durham has been condemning the miserable rule of compulsory celibacy which still binds so many Christian priests. Alas! so many "sons of God" give the glad eye to the daughters of men.

Dr. Marie C. Stopes, who has been appointed Professor of Palæobotany at London University, says that until she studied, it had never dawned upon her that Noah's Ark only contained animals and that the plants would have been destroyed. The realisation that science leads to questioning the truth of the Christian superstition accounts for the undying hostility of the clergy against ordered knowledge. "There is no darkness but ignorance."

"Our knowledge merely helps us to die a more painful death than the animals that know nothing," says M. Maurice Maeterlinck. Priestly lies have turned death into the King of Terrors for believers.

When the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Pope get their copies of Old Moore's Almanac, they will suffer from "cold feet," as our American friends express it, for the prophet forecasts "religious scandals" for 1914 on a larger scale than usual. These distinguished ecclesiastics ought to be used to such troubles by this time.

The Tango dance has found a eulogistic patron in the Rev. Thomas Hannan, rector of St. Peter's Episcopal church, Musselburgh, near Edinburgh. It was danced at a concert in aid of the church funds. The reverend gentleman said it was graceful and dignified. King David's performance takes a back seat.

Mr. Lloyd George's notions of "religious equality" are strictly limited to Christians. Paradise exists as long as no Christian denomination has any advantage over any other Christian denomination. This kind of equality is not extended to Freethinkers. Whether they are in prison or out of it does not trouble Mr. Lloyd George in the slightest degree. This is shown clearly enough in his letter to the Liberal candidate at the Wick by-election. Nonconformists and Episcopalians are all he recognises as having any practical interest in what is rather facetiously called "toleration." He is comparatively a young man yet, though, and he may live to find that he will have to say "Yes" or "No" to the Freethinkers' demand for "religious equality" as against the Christian sects who monopolise it at present.

Mrs. Florence L. Barclay, the authoress of several sentimental novels, including The Broken Halo, contributed a column headed "Scripture and Life" to Monday's Daily Chronicle. We never read greater trash on the subject, but we dare say it was highly relished by the bulk of the lady's readers. She indulged in one of the cheapest tricks of Christian controversy; a trick that requires no brains, but only a large supply of impudence. It consists in quoting Christian testimony to the matchless beauty and benign influence of the Bible. Even this is done with the maximum of unfairness by Mrs. Barclay. The use she makes of Ruskin shows inexcusable ignorance or reckless untruthfulness. She entirely misrepresents what Ruskin really says about his mother's making him read the Bible with her when he was a child. It was not reading the Bible as the Bible, but reading it closely and carefully under his mother's keen supervision, that gave Ruskin (as he says) his chief skill in the weight and value of words.

Mrs. Barclay appears to think that Abraham Lincoln and George Eliot were Christians. It is a pity that her education on these matters has been so sadly neglected. She makes a great deal of Sir Walter Scott's calling for the Bible to read on his death-bed. She might also have mentioned if she knew it—that Tennyson did not call for the Bible. He called for Shakespeare. And he died with his finger in the pages of "Cymbeline." Moreover that volume was placed in his coffin and buried with him in Westminster Abbey. We don't recollect hearing of any explosion in consequence.

Two or three weeks ago it was announced that Lord Headley had been converted to Mohammedanism. It is now stated that several other people of note have followed his example. It is very much like the case of the man who gave up the errors of the Church of Rome in order to embrace those of the Church of England, but if Mohammedans were to carry on a really active propaganda in England we see no reason why they should not gain converts. In Africa, Mohammedanism can beat Christianity easily, and there are plenty of people in this country on the look out for a new religious sensation.

Bishop Gailor says the negro needs something "that will make religion and morality identical." The New York World suggests that if the negro ever finds it he should pass it along to the whites.

Rev. Haurnett Mason, of 6 Brookside, Cambridge, left £18,880. He might be forgiven, on the ground that he had been for fifty years Hebrew Lecturer at St. John's College.

We take the following from the Daily Mirror (Dec. 5):—

> "Mr. George Lansbury, who is off to America, is, unlike many of his Socialist colleagues, a devout High Churchman. Formerly a Freethinker, he attended, some years ago, a mission service in the East End which was conducted by the Rev. Basil W. Maturin. Before he left the mission he was converted."

We should like to see a few more details of that sudden conversion; although, it must be admitted it is a good deal like Mr. Lansbury. We should also like to hear from anyone who ever knew Mr. Lansbury when he was a Freethinker as alleged. Not that we dispute the allegation. Oh dear no! But we are fond of certitude in these matters—which the Christians never are. Anything that pleases them satisfies them. They are so plentifully supplied with "the will to believe."

More "Providence." Canon Ross-Lewin, vicar of Benfieldside, after addressing a missionary meeting at Consett, Durham, dropped dead upon the platform. We are told that not a sparrow falls without God's permission. Is it the same with clergymen?

We wonder how many of our readers could say straight off if the word India occurs in the Bible, and if so, whether they could quote chapter and verse where it is mentioned. To save them time in solving the problem, we annex the passage:—

> "Now it came to pass in the days of Ahasuerus [this is Ahasuerus which reigned, from India even unto Ethiopia, over one hundred and seven and twenty provinces] that in those days....." (Esther i. 1).

A similar passage occurs in Esther viii. 9. Crudeu, with the delightful vagueness dear to ignorance, describes India as "A considerable country in the East." Shakespeare did better than that: "Her bed is India, there she lies a pearl."

Some of our special "saints" hardly realise the power and privileges their position carries with it; so, for their benefit, the scriptural authority for it is annexed:—

> "Dare any of you, having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust, and not before the saints? Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that ye shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life?" (1 Cor. v. 1-3).

Thus spake the Apostle Paul, and our "saints" should ever bear in mind the responsibilities attaching to their high office, for shall not even the angels stand up before them for judgment?

Sir Charles H. Hawtrey cites Moses against the clergy in the Church and Theatre controversy:—"Ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi."

The Jews were taught to honor their fathers and mothers. Jesus Christ, being a Jew himself, improved on that. He taught that no man could be his disciple who did not hate his father and mother. On this basis we must hold that Evan Roberts is a very good Christian. He refuses to see his parents. He tells them plainly, "Your own sins have separated you from me." When he condescends to particulars it appears that their "sin" consists in "unbelief" in him. He has the impudence to call unbelief "persecution." He calls himself "a man of God" and he dogmatises—like all the rest of them. One has only to look at his portrait to see that his chief disease is personal vanity.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, December 14, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London, W.; at 7.30, "Shaw Among the Prophets."

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £261 14s. 1d. Received since:—W. P. Adamson, £1 1s.; J. de B. and Wife (S. Africa), £10; T. W. Wickes, 5s.; "Starshine," 10s.; J. Pendlebury, £1.

DISGUSTED (Newcastle).—You or anybody can answer the question as well as we can. Many of the clergy are more orthodox in the pulpit than they are outside it.

E. B.—Much obliged for the budget.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are always very welcome.

J. DE B. (S. Africa) sends a generous subscription for himself and wife for the President's Honorarium Fund. They have increased the amount this year on account of the insufficient response to the appeal for this Fund, which, however, has progressed rather more rapidly during the last few weeks. "We were much concerned," our correspondents write, "to hear of Mr. Foote's illness, but hope that he has quite recovered." They add "best wishes for the Freethinker."

G. E. FRANCIS.—See paragraph. Thanks.

L. GENTLE.—We had seen it. Thanks all the same. We wanted a longer report of Lord Coleridge's speech.

W. GREGORY.—We don't feel sure of the point. All we can say is that we are sorry the two dates clashed, but ours had long been announced, and a little respect to the Queen's Hall meetings might not have been out of place.

T. M. MAILEY.—Mr. Cohen's book on Determinism deserves all your praises. We agree with most of what you say about the other.

J. JORTRAN.—You can't expect military and clerical men at Conservative meetings to take an interest in the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws, or any other kind of justice to Freethinkers. We should also like to see some propaganda at Oxford.

J. PENDLEBURY.—Thanks for letter as well as cheque.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.—Miss Vance, general secretary, acknowledges: M. Morris, 10s. 6d.

SOME correspondence stands over unavoidably till next week.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

There was a capital audience at Queen's (Minor) Hall on Sunday evening, including a goodly number of ladies, and Mr. Foote's lecture on "Shakespeare's Humanism in the Merchant of Venice" was followed with the keenest attention and greatly applauded. Mr. A. B. Moss was, of course, an excellent chairman. Several questions were asked and answered, and the meeting then dispersed with every mark of satisfaction.

"Shaw Among the Prophets" is the title of Mr. Foote's second (and, for the present, last) lecture at Queen's Hall this evening (Dec. 14). The Shaw is our only Shaw, the great "G. B. S.," who declared himself a "mystic" at the Bradlaugh Dinner and a believer in some sort of a God. Mr. Shaw's religious developments during the past eight or nine years are amusing as well as instructive—as we think the audience will find; and a good many people, besides avowed Freethinkers, should be interested in what Mr. Foote has to say upon the subject.

Arley Lane, of the Birmingham Weekly Mercury, devotes two columns to Mr. Cohen's recent lecture at the King's Hall, Corporation-street, on "The Challenge of Unbelief." He complains of the paucity of ladies in the audience, but he says that they always prefer emotion to intellect—which, if not altogether true, may account for some of them practising arson as a policy of social progress. Arley Lane hints, of course, that if Mr. Cohen wants to fill the King's Hall with ladies he will have to take a leaf from the book of Jim Larkin, Gipsy Smith, or Evan Roberts. Which is very likely true, only Mr. Cohen isn't likely to take the "tip." The size of his audience is not the sole consideration in his propaganda. With regard to the opposition after Mr. Cohen's lecture, Arley Lane remarks that the man who undertook the job was not fit for it. "To deal adequately," he says, "with trained and educated speakers of Mr. Cohen's ability, specially trained Christian workers are needed." Of course they are. But one is obliged to smile at Arley Lane's suggestion that the Bishop of Birmingham should raise "an army of able volunteers." Birmingham isn't Belfast.

We don't want to be mistaken. In the reference to the size of Mr. Cohen's audience we don't mean that it was a small one. We have already reported that it was a large one.

We hope our readers keep an eye on the English Review. It is one of the very best of the monthlies, and its energies are not overlaid with any cowardly worship of the respectabilities—which is so common in latter-day English literature. The December number only lacks one thing: an article on something very special and specially well written, standing out above the crowd. Mr. John Masefield opens with a poem called "The River," which, in our opinion, contains more vigor than poetry. One thinks of what Crabbe might have made of such a theme. Mr. Wells starts a new prophetic sketch of "The World Set Free," depicting a state of society that is going to be highly interesting if we ever reach it; but who knows whether it will be any happier than what we are used to? Mr. Frank Harris contributes a powerful short story called "The Yellow Ticket," dealing with some strange aspects of Russian life. Mr. L. March Phillips writes agreeably and ably on "Modern Thought and the Renaissance." There is food for thought in Mr. Holbrook Jackson's "The Creation of Taste"—in spite of his endorsement of the hackneyed praise of the Bible as literature. The other contents include a good article by Mr. E. S. Haynes on "The Taboos of the British Museum Library"—a subject which really demands attention. The editor's monthly notes are on "Albert Hall Revolutions." He does not consider them dangerous. His comments on them are vividly written.

Mr. Foote will probably contribute again to the English Review in the new year. He received a flattering invitation to do so after his Meredith article in the March number. But he found, after all, that it would be more prudent to act on medical advice for the rest of the year by going more slowly, doing only what had to be done, and letting the rest slide. The year is now nearly out, and Mr. Foote's pen, at least, will be wielded more actively when the Christmas holidays are over.

Raymond A. Coulson's article in the Sunday Chronicle will do good, inasmuch as it will set many readers of that journal thinking. But why does he deal with Atheism without trying to understand it? He fancies that the Atheist is a person who "sets up another dogma" in place of the dogmas of Theism or Christianity. Probably he has heard that Atheism says "there is no God." He is mistaken. We advise him to study the subject a little further.

The Westminster Gazette is responsible for the following paragraph on the latest "blasphemy" case:—

> "The recent imprisonment of a man in Staffordshire for breaking the Blasphemy Laws has raised once again the whole question of whether at this time of day these laws ought to be allowed to remain on the Statute-book. As a fact there are a good many Acts still on the Statute-book which are by this time obsolete or out of date. It does not always follow that they should be repealed without anything being put in their place, but in this matter of the Blasphemy Laws we certainly support any movement which aims at making it impossible to punish a man for his opinions. That he should remain under an obligation to express his opinions in such a way as not to lead to disorder is reasonable enough. We hope that the Government will look into the matter, and in this matter of the Blasphemy Laws, as a start at any rate, set to work to make the Statute-book more consonant with present day ideas."

We are afraid that our contemporary doesn't see that the mere retention of the word "blasphemy"—which is inseparably connected with religion—would make the alteration of the law it suggests impossible. Persecution still remains while it is only Freethinkers who are prosecutable and punishable for using "undesirable" language in religious discussion.

Austrian Bigotry at Prague.

AT the recent International Freethought Congress at Lisbon the choice was made of Prague as the seat of the next International Congress, which is fixed for the autumn of 1915. The Bohemian Freethinkers have for a long time been actively preparing the ground for this important event by an intensive cultivation of Freethought, and during the last few weeks the Clericalist Government at Vienna took alarm and wreaked cowardly revenge upon the organisers of the phenomenally successful movement of Freethought which has its seat at Prague. As this outbreak synchronises with the incarceration of a blasphemer in free England for speaking disrespectfully of "the Deity," and with the race hatred against the Jews in Russia, it may be taken as symptomatic of a general wave of reaction which, in France as in Spain, in Italy as in the Balkans, is visibly threatening the cardinal principles of civic progress and intellectual liberty throughout the world. In these matters the Freethinkers of one country cannot afford to isolate themselves within a ring fence of selfish indifference to the problems of propaganda and persecution affecting their fellow-workers and intellectual congeners in other lands. The hand that throttles the Freethinkers at Prague represents the same constrictive force of bigotry which murdered Hypatia and Bruno and Ferrer, and which only sentences Stewart to hard labor because the thumbscrew is unknown to modern English legislation.

On November 18 of this year all the journals at Prague connected with the Czech Freethought movement were seized by the police. The offices of the various Rationalist societies were closed and placed under official seals. The property of the two Freethought societies—the "Demosthenes" Society and the "Krematorium" Society—has also been confiscated. Veritable ghouls for the glory of God, the police have not even deigned to spare the funeral urns in which were deposited the ashes of the deceased members of the Cremation Society! In addition, the fortune of the editors of the Czech Rationalist societies has been sequestrated. As my friend Dr. Otto Karmin* very properly remarks, this arbitrary act of bigotry and theft is the answer of the clericals to the progress made by the Rationalist movement in Bohemia, and, particularly, to the legacy of 100,000 crowns which a Czech citizen of Vienna, M. Lustig, bequeathed to the Austrian Freethought societies. The gentle reader who may be curious to know more about the character and achievements of the Freethought movement in Bohemia, which is now the victim of these abominable outrages, is referred to my article in the Freethinker of January 7, 1912.

The police authorities in Prague have been careful to seize the lists of the members composing the German and Czech Freethought societies in Bohemia. Their object is quite obvious—to harass the members by vexatious prosecutions and to tear up the organisations by fines, imprisonment, and the wholesale terrorisation or ruin of the university professors, schoolmasters, and public functionaries of all kinds connected with the movement.

This prosecution is the third outbreak of the kind to which the cause in Bohemia has been subjected. Some rather full details of the two earlier prosecutions were given in my above-mentioned Freethinker article. In 1909, the Augustus Smetana Society—a philosophic society founded by a Catholic priest who left the Church—having been dissolved on the pretext that in protesting against the murder of Ferrer it had entered upon the domain of politics, a new society was formed bearing the title of "The Political Freethought Club." In May, 1911, the Minister of the Interior having interdicted the formation of this group, the high tribunal of the Empire declared that this interdict constituted a violation of the right of association as recognised by the Constitution. The bigots have accordingly renewed the charge, with all the forces of law, religion, and order at their disposal, for the purpose of crushing out of existence all liberty of thought and speech in that anachronistic Papal fief, the clericalist Austrian Empire. An international protest is being organised at Brussels against these high-handed proceedings, and it is hoped that all Freethought or Rationalist societies in England and America will send their protests to our dear friend Eugène Hins at Brussels, and will follow the example of Geneva, which, under the able leadership of Dr. Karmin, has issued its protest in the name of the French, German, and Italian-speaking Freethought societies in Switzerland.

Prague has already received in its hospitality an International Freethought Congress—that of 1907, where Ferrer's presence did so much to awaken an intense enthusiasm for Rationalism in the Bohemian people. In 1915 the Czech nation will celebrate the five hundredth anniversary of the martyrdom of John Huss, and the Czech Freethinkers are anxious that the Freethinkers of every country will assemble that year at Prague, in order that the celebration of the memory of the martyr of Constance may signalise a new stage in the renaissance of the national and intellectual life of the Czech people. If in other countries Freethought springs from the conflict on the one side between the Roman Catholic Church and its rival religions, and on the other side between religion and the spirit of liberty and science, in Bohemia Czech Freethought, besides these resources of inspiration, has others which are racy of its heroic soil, on which the blood of martyrs innumerable has been spilt in the name of God and his Christ. Freethought amongst the Czechs springs directly from the national traditions and from the history of the Czech people in the course of her long and ensanguined conflict with the all-devouring aggressions of Rome. The philosophic consecration of the memory of John Huss is to be found in the vindication and triumph of the Freethought principles of Rationalism.

Milton's Plea for Liberty.—II.

(Concluded from p. 769.)

LAUD being settled, and the Star Chamber itself abolished, the English press burst into the most exuberant freedom. The licensers were disregarded, the Stationers' Company treated with disdain, and illicit publishers openly put their imprint on works that stooped to no tribunal but the public. Among these were Milton's two Tractates on Divorce, which roused the ire of the Westminster Assembly, who named him in a batch of eleven "sectaries and heretics." On August 13, 1644, Mr. Herbert Palmer, preaching to the two Houses of Parliament, denounced Milton's second Tractate as "a wicked book abroad and uncensured, though deserving to be burnt." Following this, the Stationers' Company, egged on by the Presbyterian divines, petitioned the House of Commons to put a stop to such flagrant violations of the law, and of their trade privileges, as were involved in the wholesale circulation of unlicensed books. Milton was particularly mentioned as a peccant author. The House referred the matter to the Committee of Printing, and they judiciously let Milton alone.

The Committee of Printing were, in fact, a new censorship. This novel licensing board was appointed by Parliament in June, 1643, to "prevent and suppress the license of printing"; in other words, to prevent the diffusion of Royalist tracts and journals. The Ordinance declared that no—

> "Book, Pamphlet, Paper, nor part of any such Book, Pamphlet, or Paper, shall from henceforth be printed, bound, stitched, or put to sale by any person or persons whatsoever, unless the same be first approved of and licensed under the hand of such person or persons as both or either of the said Houses shall appoint for the licensing of the same, and entered in the Register Book of the Company of Stationers according to ancient custom."

The Wardens of that Company, and certain officers of Parliament, were ordered to ferret out contraband literature, and to bring the writers, printers, publishers, and dispersers before either of the Houses or the Committee of Examinations. Justices of the Peace, Captains, and Constables were to assist in this laudable work, to apprehend offenders, and, in cases of opposition, to break open doors and locks.

Within a week after the passing of this Ordinance the licensers were appointed. Divinity, being a burning question, was thought to need the service of twelve examiners. Seven of them, if not eight, were members of the Westminster Assembly, and all the rest were parish ministers in or near London. These were good securities for orthodoxy, and Milton had excellent reason for thinking that "New presbyter is but old priest writ large." Miscellaneous literature was handed over to three other licensers; law-books to certain Judges and the Serjeants-at-Law; mathematical books, almanacks, and prognostications to a Reader of Gresham College, or a certain Mr. Booker, who was perhaps thought to be skilled in the black art; and "small pamphlets, portraitures, pictures, and the like" to the Clerk of the Stationers' Company.

These licensers went to work, and the result was that, while only 85 books were registered in the first half of 1643, no less than 333 were registered in the second half. Yet the new law was defied by several publishers, and among them Milton's. After the petition of the Stationers' Company in 1644, both Houses of Parliament assisted in strengthening the law, but prosecutions were stayed by Cromwell's great Toleration motion which passed the Commons on September 18, and "caused a sudden pause among the Presbyterian zealots," being, indeed, "a demand generally for clearer air and breathing-room for everybody, more of English freedom and less of Scottish inquisitorship." The Scotch were, in fact, carrying their "guid conceit o' theirsels" too far. They joined England in the revolt against their Stuart king, but fancied they could bind England afresh in their Presbyterian chains. Eventually, they saw their mistake, but it was not until Oliver Cromwell had frightfully pounded them at Preston, Dunbar, and Worcester.

Milton's natural bent was "beholding the bright countenance of truth in the quiet and still air of delightful studies," but he loved liberty sincerely, and knew that she and truth were inseparable twins. For this reason he had avoided the Church, for which his parents destined him, perceiving that "he who would take orders must subscribe slave," and preferring "a blameless silence before the sacred office of speaking bought and begun with servitude and forswearing." For this reason also he had joined in the controversial fray, forsaking poetry for the "cool element of prose," and undertaking tasks wherein, as he himself says, he had the use but of his "left hand." And now for the same reason Milton forged on the strong anvil of his mind a new thunderbolt of freedom. Utterly repellent to his broad spirit was the notion of handing all the wits and thinkers in England over to the tutelage of a body of orthodox gentlemen, who were empowered to stifle the offspring of laborious brains, and to act as mental abortionists. On November 24, 1644, appeared his Areopagitica, "A Speech of Mr. John Milton for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing, to the Parliament of England." The book bore the name of no printer or publisher; in defiance of old laws and new, it was unregistered and unlicensed. The title-page bore four lines from Milton's favorite "Euripides," which he rendered into English as follows:—

> "This is true Liberty, when free-born men
> Having to advise the public may speak free,
> Which he who can, and will, deserves high praise,
> Who neither can, nor will, may hold his peace;
> What can be juster in a state than this?"

It was a fashion of that time to give Greek names to books. Milton's title was borrowed from an oration of Isocrates, addressed to the Areopagus of Athens.

Professor Masson says he has "sometimes been angry" at the public choice of the Areopagitica as the one of Milton's pamphlets "by which to recollect him as an English prose-writer." Yet, if a choice must be made, how could there be a better? It is, as Professor Masson allows, "the most skilful of all Milton's prose-writings, the most equable and sustained, the easiest to be read straight through at once, the fittest to leave one glowing sensation of the power of the author's genius." Certainly it is the Areopagitica which most fully justifies Macaulay's eulogy of Milton's prose-writings. "As compositions," he says, "they deserve the attention of every man who wishes to become acquainted with the full power of the English language. They abound with passages compared with which the finest declamations of Burke sink into insignificance. They are a perfect field of cloth of gold. The style is stiff with gorgeous embroidery."

Milton opens with a handsomely turned compliment to the Parliament. Allowing that the Commonwealth ought to have a vigilant eye on books—of which more anon—he recommends wariness, for "as good almost kill a man as kill a good book." True, no age can restore a life, yet "revolutions of ages do not often recover the loss of a rejected truth." Readers of Mill's Essay on Liberty may remember how he elaborates this striking truth.

Next, an appeal is made to history. Licensing was unknown to the ancients, and even Constantine and his successors only condemned books to be burnt after they were "examined, refuted, and condemned in the general councils'" According to Milton, this discipline was not more severe than what was formerly in practice; but the voice of history is against him on this point. When he rushes on to the policy of the Popes he reaches firmer ground. The Papacy and the Inquisition were safer objects of attack than the early Church, and Milton baits them mercilessly, laughing at their "purgatory of an index," and mocking their last invention of ordaining that no book should be printed "unless it were approved and licensed under the hands of two or three glutttonous friars." This is followed by a specimen of their imprimatur. "Sometimes," says Milton in a rollicking vein, "five imprimaturs are seen together, dialogue wise, in the piazza of one title-page, complimenting and ducking to each other with their shaven reverences, whether the author, who stands by in perplexity at the foot of his epistle, shall to the press or to the sponge."

Knowing his audience, and having a personal inclination that way, Milton quotes from Scripture, dwelling especially on Paul's "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good," and "To the pure all things are pure." Knowledge cannot defile unless the will and conscience are defiled already. Besides, good and evil grow up inseparably in the field of this world. Virtue consists in seeing and knowing, and yet abstaining. Ignorance is not innocence. "I cannot praise," he exclaims, "a fugitive and cloistered virtue unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and seeks her adversary, but slinks out of the race, where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat."

Milton then proceeds to examine the alleged mischiefs of free printing and free reading. If the spread of infection be feared, the censorship will have to be very drastic; the Bible itself will have to be removed, "for that ofttimes relates blasphemy not nicely, it describes the carnal sense of wicked men not unelegantly, it brings in holiest men passionately murmuring against Providence through all the arguments of Epicurus"; and for these causes the Bible was put by the Papists in the first rank of prohibited books. Besides, if the English press be gagged, objectionable foreign books will creep in, and these will be read by the learned, who will distil their poison for the illiterate. Learned men must therefore be most closely fenced round, and to do this the licensers must assume "the grace of infallibility." This capital point has also been enforced by Mill. Further, such restraint will lead to "the fall of learning and of all ability in disputation." This is obviously unjust. Why should one man wear a strait waistcoat because another is mad? "If it be true," says Milton, "that a wise man, like a good refiner, can gather gold out of the drossiest volume, and that a fool will be a fool with the best book, yea, or without a book; there is no reason that we should deprive a wise man of any advantage to his wisdom, while we seek to restrain from a fool that which, being restrained, will be no hindrance to his folly."

Why also, Milton asks, should we stop at books? All our surroundings influence us, and to be consistent the State must meddle everywhere

> "If we think to regulate printing, thereby to rectify manners, we must regulate all recreations and pastimes, all that is delightful to man. No music must be heard, no song must be set or sung, but what is grave and Doric. There must be licensing dancers, that no gestures, motion or deportment be taught our youth, but what by their allowance shall be thought honest; for such Plato was provided of. It will task more than the work of twenty licensers to examine all the lutes, the violins, and the guitars in every house; they must not be suffered to prattle as they do, but must be licensed what they may say. And who shall silence all the airs and madrigals that whisper softness in chambers?"

And so on for a couple of pages. "Reason is but choosing," Milton finely says, and you cannot remove more than a fraction of life's temptations by the most rigid censorship. Besides, virtue consists in motive, and depriving men of all opportunity of evil would not rob them of their evil inclinations. "Though ye take from a covetous man all his treasure," says Milton, "he has yet one jewel left; ye cannot bereave him of his covetousness."

As for the "preventing of schism," Milton reminds the Parliament that Christianity itself was once a schism, and the licenser who is "to sit upon the birth or death of books" needs more than human wisdom never to suppress the truth in his prevention of error. Ten to one he will stifle all novelties, and every truth is a novelty at first. "The hide-bound humor which he calls his judgment" will let him pass nothing but "what is vulgarly received already." For this reason Sir Francis Bacon said that "such authorised books are but the language of the times." Licensing treats learned men like children; it is a burden on "the hapless race of men whose misfortune it is to have understanding," and it is also "an undervaluing and vilifying of the whole nation."

Milton beautifully says that truth is like a streaming fountain; "if her waters flow not in a perpetual progression, they sicken into a muddy pool of conformity and tradition." A man may be a heretic in the truth. How many Protestants, who rely upon their pastors, show as much "implicit faith as any lay papist of Loretto":—

> "A wealthy man, addicted to his pleasure and his profits, finds religion to be a traffic so entangled, and of so many piddling accounts, that of all mysteries he cannot skill to keep a stock going upon that trade. What should he do? Fain he would have the name to be religious, fain he would bear up with his neighbors in that. What does he, therefore, but resolves to give over toiling, and to find himself out some factor to whose care and credit he may commit the whole managing of his religious affairs; some divine of note and estimation that must be. To him he adheres, resigns the whole warehouse of his religion, with all the locks and keys, into his custody; and indeed makes the very person of that man his religion; esteems his associating with him a sufficient evidence and commendatory of his own piety. So that a man may say his religion is now no more within himself, but is become a dividual movable, and goes and comes near him according as that good man frequents the house. He entertains him, gives him gifts, feasts him, lodges him; his religion comes home at night, prays, is liberally supped, and sumptuously laid to sleep; rises, is saluted, and, after the malmsey or some well-spiced bruage, and better breakfasted than He whose morning appetite would have gladly fed on green figs between Bethany and Jerusalem, his religion walks abroad at eight, and leaves his kind entertainer in the shop trading all day without his religion."

This capital passage is one of the few in which Milton displays a sense of humor. The climax is especially shrewd.

Milton has another gird at the Presbyterian divines, and twits them with being blinded by the blaze of Calvin's beacon. "The light which we have gained," he says, "was given us, not to be ever staring on, but by it to discover onward things more remote from our knowledge." He protests against "the forced and outward union of cold and neutral and inwardly divided minds," and warns the new tyrants that it is necessary to reform even the reformation itself. After a noble apostrophe to London, then the vital centre of the new freedom, he argues that differences are a good sign of health and vigor, and utters the fine aphorism that "opinion in good men is but knowledge in the making." He is dull-witted who groans over "parties and partitions." "Fool!" exclaims Milton, "he sees not the firm root out of which we all grow, though into branches." England is not decaying, but casting off the old skin of corruption:—

> "Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks. Methinks I see her as an eagle mewing her mighty youth, and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full mid-day beam, purging and unsealing her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about, amazed at what she means, and in their envious gabble would prognosticate a year of sects and schisms."

This magnificent passage is one of the ultimate glories of our literature. Surely the man who wrote it deserves a niche in the sanctuary of every English heart.

The rest of the Areopagitica is a direct and noble appeal to the Parliament to abolish the licensing system, to let books enjoy the same freedom as men, to give them liberty, and punish them only when they have sinned. "Liberty is the nurse of all great wits," says Milton. "Give me," he exclaims, "the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties." Aye, and "though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licensing and prohibiting to misdoubt her strength. Let her and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the worst in a free and open encounter?"

Unfortunately, Milton himself halted in sight of the goal; he hesitated to run the whole course, and fight the good fight to the end. At the very outset he seems to approve the Grecian laws for the suppression of "atheistical and blasphemous" books, and at the conclusion he will not hear of tolerating "popery and open superstition," still less what is "impious" and "against faith." He only pleaded for charity and peace among dissentient Protestants. Great as was his genius, noble as was his nature, he could not absolutely free himself from the prejudices of his age. He showed that the horizon of the very loftiest is bounded. Yet in pleading for such liberty as he thought desirable he was obliged to maintain principles that overshot the mark he aimed at. The full meaning of a great idea cannot be perceived at once. Milton saw deeper than most of his contemporaries, though his vision was still limited; he felt more than they of the spirit of liberty, though it did not animate his whole nature. Sufficient unto the day was the service he performed. Other ages brought other tasks. The time came when other hands hurled the thunderbolts he forged at other barriers to freedom than those he assailed, when his own lightnings were darted to every point of the compass; for at last Liberty, like Wisdom, is justified of all her children.

Some Little-Known Freethinkers.

VII.—JAMES WATSON.

THE subject of my present sketch was one of those quiet, unassuming, unobtrusive workers whose services to the good old cause are too little known, but, where known, should be highly appreciated. Born of poor parents in an obscure town, Malton, in Yorkshire, September 21, 1799, a taste for reading led him in a Freethought direction. Employed at Leeds, he became acquainted with such Radical works as Wooler's Black Dwarf, Cobbett's Register, and Carlile's Republican. When Carlile was imprisoned with his wife and sister for selling blasphemous publications, he appealed to lovers of free discussion to serve in the shop. Humphrey Boyle was the first volunteer from Leeds. He was arrested, tried, and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment. When sentenced, May 27, 1822, Boyle remarked: "I have a mind, my lord, that can bear such a sentence with fortitude." Of similar stuff was James Watson, the second volunteer from Leeds. He, too, was arrested in February, 1823, for selling Palmer's Principles of Nature. His trial took place on April 23. In his defence he endeavored to prove from the Bible that Palmer was justified in what he had written, but the judge told him he "might quote from the Bible, but not comment upon it." He was convicted and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment in Coldbath Fields Prison, and to find bail for good behavior for two years. In prison Watson read Hume, Gibbon, and Mosheim, which he said "would have made me a Freethinker if I had not been one before." He afterwards conducted Richard Carlile's business until Carlile's liberation from Dorchester Gaol in November, 1825, and then became a compositor on Carlile's Republican. Attacked by cholera, he was nursed by Julian Hibbert, who employed him on his own projects, giving him his own type and presses, and at his death leaving him a legacy of £500. In the meantime Watson suffered another six months' imprisonment for selling Hetherington's unstamped Poor Man's Guardian. With the legacy from Hibbert, James Watson constituted himself a sort of society for promoting useful knowledge. He set up as bookseller and publisher, issued many Freethought works, such as D'Holbach's System of Nature, Volney's Ruins of Empires, Paine's Age of Reason and Common Sense, Palmer's Principles of Nature, Frances Wright's Few Days in Athens and her Lectures, R. D. Owen's discussions and pamphlets, Shelley's Queen Mab and Masque of Anarchy, Byron's Cain and Vision of Judgment, J. Clarke's Letters to Adam Clarke, Godwin's Political Justice, Lamennais' Modern Slavery, Evans Bell's Task of To-day, Powell's Bible of Reason, Yahoo, Ecce Homo, Human Origin of Christianity, Hume's Miracles, Diderot's Thoughts on Religion, Lawrence's Lectures on Man, Engledue's Physiology, Dr. T. Cooper's Rights of Free Discussion, T. Cooper's (the Chartist) Purgatory of Suicides, Southwell's Impossibility of Atheism, Holyoake's Rationalism, Logic of Facts, etc.

The list is a goodly one, though far from complete. It represents valuable works, tending in the direction of mental emancipation and of political and social reform; works tabooed by the privileged classes, and many of which they had sought to suppress. Let it be remembered, too, that the cheap publication of such works was the direct incentive to that rivalry of new cheap literature intended to counteract the supposed pernicious effect of the dissemination of "infidelity and sedition." I do not scruple to say that, by his publications, James Watson did more for the real education of the people than some vaunted societies and wealthy firms with all the influence of respectability at their backs. His publications, though cheap, were not of the "cheap and nasty" order. They were neat, well printed, and showed throughout a publisher who loved sound thought and sound work in every department. Mr. W. J. Linton, his friend for forty years, says:—

> "There was no mistaking an edition by J. Watson. To him life and all its circumstances were to be kept in wholesomeness, though means of beautifying might fail him. The pride of the poor man was his. His honesty should be clean skinned and pure, if his clothes were threadbare; his public appearance, as his home, ever dignified, made worthy of respect. Serving in his shop, he had pleasant and informing words for all who sought his wares; the character of this or that book about which you asked might be trusted to his judgment. His conversation, if you cared to make acquaintance with it, supplemented what he sold—what he had given, if apostles in his day had been able to print and live without death.....He was of the stuff of those old martyrs who smiled when they were flayed alive; who thrust their hands into fire to pluck out unharmed their more tender souls. For the respect in which his probity and his business qualities were held, his name as treasurer of subscriptions in aid of political sufferers may be voucher enough. He was one to whom you might have trusted untold gold; he could not have wronged you of the smallest coin."

Mr. Linton gives a pleasant instance of how principle was more than profit with Watson. In '38 Linton projected a cheap library, for the people, of extracts from works beyond the purchasing reach of working men. Watson laid before him the difficulties, and, finding him resolute, offered him (a nameless stranger) his books and services. When the account was made up he found there was no charge for folding and stitching. Watson had been sure the book could not pay, and he and his wife had folded and stitched every copy to save Linton so much expense.

By judicious investments in works of solid value, James Watson served the cause in perhaps the most effective way in which it can be served—by the spread of its literature. He did this more for the sake of propaganda than for profit, but by economy he was able to retire when between fifty and sixty. On January 23 1854 a public tribute was paid to him at the Literary Institution, John-street, Fitzroy-square, at which Mr. W. D. Saull presided, and Messrs. T. Cooper, R. Moore, W. J. Birch, R. Le Blond, and G. J. Holyoake testified to his great services to the Freethought cause. He lived at Norwood until November 29, 1874, and in Norwood Cemetery a plain granite obelisk bears the following inscription: "James Watson, 1874. Erected by a few friends as a token of regard for his integrity of character and his brave efforts to secure the right of free speech and a free and unstamped press." A Memoir, by his friend, W. J. Linton, to which I am indebted for most of these particulars, has a copy of Watson's photograph as frontispiece, and is a modest, yet not unworthy, memorial of a sterling though little-known Freethinker.

LIBERATION SOCIETY AND SECULAR EDUCATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—My attention has been called to an article on "Nonconformist Cant" in your issue of November 28. Mr. Cohen says in the course of the article that "out of several hundred delegates only twenty-one supported the resolution"—i.e., the resolution in favor of Secular Education which Mr. Halley Stewart submitted to the Triennial Conference of the Liberation Society. The fact, of course, is that only twenty-one voted against the resolution.

DAVID CAIRD, Secretary.
Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control.

Mr. Cohen writes:—"Unfortunately, I cannot now say on which paper's report I depended for the figures concerning the Secular Education vote at the Liberation Society's meeting. I see so many papers during the week, and, of course, do not preserve them all. It is, therefore, impossible for me to say definitely whether I misread the report or the report misled me; but as I am usually very careful in such matters, I cannot help thinking that it was the latter. Still, whatever the cause, the fact remains that my article converted a majority of twenty-one into a minority of twenty-one, and for that I must express sincere regret. It would have given me much greater pleasure to have chronicled a victory for Secular Education than to have recorded its defeat, and the Liberation Society is entitled to my apologies for having, quite innocently, misrepresented its proceedings."

"WAIT TILL YOU COME TO DIE."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—The article of Mr. Mann in this week's Freethinker reminds me of an incident in which I was involved a few years ago. Whilst cycling in the traffic, I was knocked under a pair of horses, and, being unable to free myself from the machine, I had to be dragged out. Probably I was not under the horses for long; but both horses were kicking out continuously, with the result that my machine was bent into all shapes by the horses' hoofs, and made useless. I was underneath all the time, expecting the next blow would be on my head, and I had no doubt whatever in my own mind that my "hour had almost come." Did I turn my thoughts to Jesus? No; I simply thought it was all over with me, and my only desire was to say Good-bye to my wife and children before I "passed away." Of course, it is very absurd to say that an Atheist cannot face death. Only a very ignorant Christian could be guilty of such a blunder.

Probably very few people have been so near death, and perhaps my experience will interest you, and also your readers, if you think it worth printing.

I may say that the cause of my "downfall" on this occasion was a clergyman (also cycling), who rode out of a side street on his wrong side, and cleared off without speaking to me. Peradventure he was praying for my life to be saved? I never thought of it in this light before! In any case, I should have appreciated a few kind words, or a cheque for the cost of a new machine much more.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 51 SUNDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

There are in nature neither rewards nor punishments; there are consequences.—INGERSOLL.

The Message of Christmas.

THE Rev. Dr. Orchard frankly admits that "we can be almost certain that December the 25th was not the birthday of Christ." "Early tradition," he adds, "is quite ambiguous. It is much more likely that the date was chosen because it would help to replace the Roman Saturnalia which was celebrated at that time." According to the reverend gentleman, it is immaterial on what day Jesus was born, "for his birth has made every day sacred to his name." We are called upon to celebrate his birth because he brought something new into the world, or because he himself was something new. But we deny that he either brought or was something new, and challenge Dr. Orchard to prove his statement. We are convinced that the Christian religion does not contain a single original idea, and that not one of the alleged facts upon which it is claimed to be founded can legitimately be regarded as unique. In his article on "The Christianising of Christmas" in the Christian World for December 4, Dr. Orchard says:—

> "It is indisputable that at the time of Christ the Roman Empire was flooded with myths which have resemblances to the story of Christ's life and death, and these resemblances, although they have been unwarrantably exaggerated, are in their general outlines sufficiently remarkable. These myths were not only floating about as stories, but were dramatised, and their presentation was made the chief object of certain mystery cults."

While making that admission, however, he ridicules the contention that Christianity had a mythical origin. He asserts that "it is certainly a curious example of literary criticism to suggest that the extraordinarily vital atmosphere of our Gospels can have had any such origin." But surely the reverend gentleman must be aware that the Christianity of the Pauline epistles is not to be found in the Gospels. The Pauline Christ is a radically different person from the Synoptic Jesus. In the Gospels baptism is not described as a sacrament, nor is the eucharist represented as mystic communion with a crucified and resuscitated Christ. Whatever his motive may have been, Paul made Christ exceedingly like Osiris and Mythra. Why was such a resemblance established by the Apostle to the Gentiles, rather than by James, a pillar of the Jerusalem Church?

Dr. Orchard imagines that Christianity conquered "a world deluged with myth and mysteries" simply because it was something greater than a myth. He asks derisively, "Did one myth eat up all the others miraculously, like Moses' serpent?" Certainly not; the triumph of the Christian myth over all the others was perfectly natural, and, in the circumstances, inevitable; but Dr. Orchard does not play the part of an impartial historian when he declares that with its conquest faith, hope, and love came to a great renaissance. As a matter of fact Christianity did not win Europe by merit, but by force; not by love, but by the sword. The Pagan myths were suppressed by law, not superseded by a nobler and more acceptable evangel; destroyed by the civil arm under Theodosius the Great, not outgrown by a truer and more virile faith. Dr. Orchard's account of it is false to history:—

> "Jesus brought what the myths had created a desire for, and answered the fevered yearnings that they expressed. It was this which laid the train for the new fire to run through the Empire, and, because a real life had come, wiped out all the mysteries."

The mysteries were wiped out not because a real life had come, but because the head of the Empire adopted the Christian myth and made it his business to stamp out all rival cults. Theodosius prohibited every portion of the Pagan worship, and razed to the ground all the Pagan temples.

In our day even the historicity of a merely human Jesus is either denied or doubted by many first-class scholars; while the belief in an incarnate Christ is quite impossible to the bulk of thinking people. Dr. Orchard maintains that a proper contemplation of Christmas will give us "the realisation that God has been revealed in all his glory within human personality, and on the plane of this mortal life." "Only this," he continues, "can make us sure that at the heart of things there is a Spirit of the same nature as Jesus, warm with our humanity, glorifying in having lived our life and tasted our death." Listen to this:—

> "The answer which Jesus brings to our longing for a friendship at once personal and infinite, the reality and certainty which he gives to ideals that are otherwise only torturing dreams of the impossible, the shock and challenge that crucifies the world for which we have lived, and which no imaginative biography could ever administer: this is what Christmas means in its Christian sense."

Then the meaning of Christmas in its Christian sense is a vain and mischievous delusion. There is no evidence whatever of the presence of a tender and loving Spirit at the heart of things, we do not naturally long for an infinite friendship, we can testify that high and beautiful ideals are not "torturing dreams of the impossible" apart from Christ, and it is an undeniable fact that there are thousands of men and women of the purest motives and cleanest lives who have never come within the sphere of Christian influence. They have a deep sense of the absolute nobility of motherhood, and of the absolute purity of everything connected with our entrance into life, as well of the glorious possibilities of the life we all live, though they have never heard of Dr. Orchard's great Revealer and infinite Friend. According to Dr. Orchard, Christians need to be driven "back to the supreme joys which are to be found in family life, and which gather round the cradle," and nothing can do that but a realisation of the revelation of God which Christmas embodies; but the supreme joys of home-life are experienced by the ordinary Chinaman, who says, "Every day is happy at home, every moment miserable abroad." It is the general feeling throughout China that there is no place like home. It is the emptiest cant to describe all the good things of life as gifts brought to us by Christ. They are possessed and enjoyed by all who cheerfully obey Nature's laws, and the intensity of their enjoyment is determined by temperament, not by belief or unbelief in Christ.

The world has hailed innumerable virgin-born Saviors. Has Dr. Orchard forgotten the Inscription from Halicarnassus in which the praises of Augustus are so sweetly sung? It is worth giving in full:—

> "When the eternal and immortal Power which generated the world had added to all other abundant blessings the greatest good by granting to men, to our real good fortune, Cæsar Augustus, the father of his native town the divine Rome, the indigenous Jupiter, and at the same time the Savior of the whole human race, for the sake of which Providence, paying regard to the prayers of all, has not only fulfilled but also surpassed them; for peace prevails on earth and sea; the cities flourish; law and harmony and peaceableness are found; there is a fine abundance of all good things; men are filled with the best hopes for the future, and joyful courage for the present: therefore should [the birthday of Augustus be celebrated] with games and contests, with sacrifices and songs."

Augustus never became the Savior of the whole human race, any more than anybody else; but under him Rome became pre-eminently powerful and prosperous, and enjoyed many years of perfect peace. While he lived the Gospel Jesus was an agitator. His advent did not secure peace on earth and goodwill toward men. After a short period of popularity he became a thorn in his country's side; and the hatred against him grew into such a passion that in his thirty-second year he was put to death as an enemy of his nation. Ere long the belief arose that he was still alive, and his disciples began to declare that he was the Savior of his people Israel. Then Paul came along and proclaimed him the Savior of the world, the only one who could deliver mankind from all the evils through which they suffered; and now every Christmas Day his advent as such is celebrated in mawkish hymns and carols. But he is no more the Savior of the world than was Cæsar Augustus. The Savior of the world is non-existent. The Christian message of Christmas, therefore, has not a word of truth in it, and a lying message cannot possibly be morally elevating.

That being so, we firmly hold that the Saturnalia, which Christmas was intended to replace, was a much wholesomer festival, being originally, no doubt, in celebration of the winter solstice. At Christmas winter receives notice to quit, and all life experiences a potential renewal. It was the turn of the year that people hailed during the Saturnalia, which lasted nearly a week. They gave themselves up to joy and merriment. All schools were closed; no war could be declared or battle fought. Distinctions of rank vanished, masters and slaves sat at the same table, the latter being waited upon by the former. There was a universal exchange of gifts, and all classes mingled freely, the word having gone forth that all men were brothers. The beauty of that ancient festival is gone, and with it the visible tokens of universal brotherhood. To us, however, the twenty-fifth of December comes, not as a Christian festival, but as the day on which we merrily welcome the renewed promise of life.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Failure of Faith.

IT is really not a difficult thing to find out what Atheism is. Nor does it require a superhuman degree of intelligence to understand it. Half an hour's careful study of anything written by a representative Atheist would enable any person of normal education and brains to know precisely what is the Atheistic position. He might not agree with it when he does understand it. He would be quite within his rights in calling it stupid, or inconclusive, or to assert that it was less satisfactory than the position of the Theist. All these things are matters of opinion, and in such respects each individual must decide for himself. But what Atheism is, is hardly more a matter of opinion that what natural selection is, or what is meant by radio-active matter. It is primarily a question of fact; and every writer owes it to himself, to his readers, and to those whom he criticises, to set himself right in this direction—even if it delays his writing.

Mr. Raymond Coulson's article in a recent issue of the Sunday Chronicle on "The Failure of the Churches," is a case in point. It is all the more regrettable because, in the course of his article, Mr. Coulson has a good many things to say to the Churches that are well worth the saying. He points out how critical the position of the Churches is, and that their vitality to-day consists almost entirely in making themselves centres of social activity. They are, he says, "little more than politico-ethical organisations, and they are all wobbly at the edges," while their efforts "to Bowdlerise science and misinterpret the Bible in order to make the two things fit, demonstrate nothing but the extremely parlous state of modern theology."

There are many other good things in Mr. Coulson's article, but his remarks about Atheism might have been made by the most commonplace pulpiteer, and his view of the function of reason in relation to religion is highly fallacious. To take the case of Atheism first. Probably as an apologetic foil to his attack on the Churches, Mr. Coulson posits a dogmatic Atheism in opposition to a dogmatic Christianity, and so succeeds in demonstrating that one is as bad as the other. We no longer, he says:—

> "Talk about the 'dark-souled Atheist,' with a capital A. We do not regard him as a sort of intellectual Lucifer, a fallen angel of the mind. We recognise him, on the contrary, as a conscientious but rather stupid person. Having denied one dogma it seems merely silly to take the trouble to set up another on no better evidence."

There is an air of superiority about this passage that might be annoying if it were not so common. The "blindness" and the "folly" of Atheism have been very often in the mouths of religious people, and as they have naturally done most of the talking, they have succeeded in infecting the rest of the world with the notion that there really is a degree of stupidity associated with the Atheistic position. But I can assure Mr. Coulson—as one whose business in life it is to understand Atheism—that Atheism does not purpose merely putting one dogma in the place of another. What is a dogma? Mr. Coulson seems to be under the impression that a dogma is something that has nothing whatever to do with reason. This is quite a vulgar fallacy. A dogma, as Newman pointed out, is no more than a proposition. It is not reached independently of reason, it is reached by reasoning, whether the reasoning be sound or unsound. The notion—to use another of Newman's terms—only becomes a dogma when we decline to reason further concerning it, and declare that other people must accept it on our authority. That is the way in which all religious dogmas have taken shape. First a proposition established upon what was believed to be a rational basis, and then its creation as a dogma by forbidding people to rationally examine it.

This point is worth bearing in mind, in view of what Mr. Coulson has to say of the functions of reason and religion. For the moment I only wish to point out that there are no dogmas associated with Atheism, and cannot be, for the simple reason that the very kernel of the Atheistic position is a reasoned attack on Theistic beliefs. The Theist comes forward with a belief in God which he declares to be either superior to or independent of reason, or which he forbids us to critically examine. The Atheist declines to be warned off examination, he denies that it is either superior to or independent of reason, and he demonstrates—to his own satisfaction, at least—that the existence of the God posited in unproved and inconceivable. Now, you may say that the Atheist has or has not made his case good. But you cannot, in common sense or justice, say that he desires to merely replace one dogma with another. To make such a statement passes, usually, without comment, only because it falls in with the unthinking humor of the crowd.

Having said this, I can now turn to Mr. Coulson's conception of the part played by reason in relation to religion. "The conflict of religion and science," he says, "began as a misunderstanding, and is ending as a farce." Ending as a farce, yes; because nothing could be more absurd than the antics of those who are trying to reconcile the irreconcilable. But the conflict did not begin as a misunderstanding; were if so, it might have been brought to an end long ago. The conflict began, and is rooted, in two fundamentally opposed modes of thinking. The religious conception is, in itself, quite as truly due to a process of reasoning as is any later scientific conception. The fault in it is due to the fact that it blunders as to the nature of the forces at work. It conceives natural phenomena as due to the action of beings similar in nature to man himself. On the other hand, pure science commences just so soon as the conception is formed of a force operating that is determinable and knowable, and quite insensible to human cajolery and blind to human hopes and fears. The conflict does not begin in misunderstanding; it begins because the two conceptions are radically opposed, and it is perpetuated simply because religion cannot grant all that science assumes without signing its own death-warrant, just as science cannot admit what religion claims without surrendering its character as science. The struggle is fiercest precisely when each side has the clearest comprehension of all that it stands for.

"Pure human reason," says Mr. Coulson, "can never by any possibility produce a theory to explain the reason." It is very difficult to say just what pure reason can or cannot do, but I am quite certain of this—if human reason cannot do it nothing else can. How does Mr. Coulson imagine that even a religious theory appeals to man except through his reason? Evidently he thinks that religion is concerned with the emotions only. This is not true; but even then you can't, so long as you indulge in any form of teaching, appeal to emotion except through reason. Purely sensuous surroundings, such as one might meet in a play of color or perfume or sound, might appeal direct to the emotions; but exhortations to do or to abstain, the presentation of God as a creator or a governor or a parent, must be an appeal to reason primarily. If Mr. Coulson will ponder the first half-dozen chapters of Newman's Grammar of Assent, he will discover what an unreasonable position he has taken up on this question.

Mr. Coulson is quite correct when he says that if you do not accept the religious theory you cannot be argued into it, and also that "when religion condescends to reason she steps down from her impregnable fortress into a field where she must inevitably go down." I should query "impregnable," but otherwise I agree with him. But this is not because religion is in "its essence independent of all processes of human reason," but really because the reasons it adduces no longer appeal to an educated mind. When, for instance, a preacher gives a recovery from sickness as a reason for believing in prayer, he is arguing in a way that makes no appeal to one who has even a moderate acquaintance with modern scientific thought. Religious reasoning did once appeal very powerfully to people, and does so still when it can strike a sufficiently primitive type of mind. It fails more easily now, and bids fair to fail still more decisively in the future, because the general mental environment has undergone a profound alteration. It is for this reason that, as Mr. Coulson says, argument rarely converts a man. This is because the moment you set him reasoning—and you necessarily do this so soon as you start arguing—you bring into operation the power of the mental environment in which he lives. You set the better knowledge of the present at work upon the imperfect knowledge of the past. And inevitably the later knowledge—given time—triumphs.

The difficulty before the Churches is not at all due to their endeavoring to reason. They have always reasoned, and always will reason. Their difficulty centres in the fact that their reasoning rests on premises that no longer appeal to people with any force. They can no longer use the argument of a future life with any effect. If they utilise hell, they disgust; if they utilise heaven, they weary. They cannot reason upon a basis of miracle; a diffused scientific knowledge causes people to laugh at such primitive arguments. It is no use claiming a supernatural origin for the Bible; the world is aware of many other writings with a similar claim, and the blunders of each are fairly well known. In desperation, the Churches resort to a "social preaching"; convert themselves into "Institutional Churches" in which the claims of religion are based on a billiard-room or a smoking concert, or a free-and-easy musical evening. And this only makes matters worse; for it means the encouragement of a way of looking at life that has already robbed the Churches of best part of their congregations.

The choice before the Churches is plain: either a quick dispatch or a lingering death. To oppose wholeheartedly the non-religious spirit of the time means the former; to compromise with it, to meet it half way, means the latter. It might set itself in stern opposition to modern thought and die with honor. It prefers to compromise and live a little longer, even though it dies finally covered with contempt.

The whole of the failure of the Churches is due to the fact that people have ceased to believe. Every other reason advanced is no more than an excuse. Fundamentally it is not the Atheist, or the Agnostic, or the Secularist that religion is fighting; it is civilisation that is attacking it. Human life begins under the dominance of religious beliefs. Religion shapes to a very considerable degree the beginnings of all human institutions. All human culture, once we emerge from the very primitive type, becomes consequently a fight against the tremendous influence of religion. The fight is of necessity a long one, but time is on the side of civilisation. It is often said that the Catholic Church is the only dangerous Church, because it can afford to wait. That is true. It can wait longer than any individual. But there is one thing that can wait longer even than the Catholic Church. The race can outlast the Church, and against the slow but ceaseless movement of human development the gods themselves are ultimately powerless.

C. COHEN.

Anatole France.

M. ANATOLE FRANCE, the foremost figure in European literature, was entertained royally in his seventieth year at the Savoy Hotel recently by a representative gathering of English writers. The act conferred credit upon all present, for they were paying their respects to one of the greatest masters of literature, and a very eminent Freethinker.

Of all the notable Continental writers, M. Anatole France is the most Voltairian, for he carries on the same splendid tradition. As he so wittily expressed himself at the banquet, he is a symbol, as the citizen Momoro represented the Goddess of Reason at the festivals of the French Revolution. The word Voltairian means also something of tone and character, something of an alert but indulgent regard, a delicacy of touch, a subtle irony which immediately suggests the very ideal of the French intellect:—

> "Ravishing as red wine in woman's form,
> A splendid Maenad, she of the delirious laugh,
> Her body twisted flames with the smoke cap crowned."

Seventy years of age by the book, M. Anatole France has built up a splendid reputation, not only as a writer but also as a humanitarian. A convinced Freethinker, it was only natural that he should take up the brilliant sword of his wit by the side of the Atheist, Zola, in the terrible days of the Dreyfus struggle, when the heroic Zola championed truth and justice in the supreme hour of danger. It was an example of magnificent courage. Honest to their own injury, brave against the enmity of tens of thousands, these Freethinkers raised the world's opinion of human nature.

M. France's literary forefathers are Rabelais, Swift, and Voltaire, three of the most virile names in literature. Yet he is no copyist, but strikingly original, modern, and Parisian. The thing he has in common with these great men is his whole-hearted hatred of injustice and his power over language. Although a master of the lash, he uses his whip caressingly. He does not cut his subject to ribbons like Swift; nor, like Voltaire, overflow with an adroit and subtle humor which stings like a thousand wasps. Rather is he like Rabelais, who shifts satire into the realm of imaginative comedy, and pities while he smiles.

Rabelais was so much more tolerant than Swift, who, writing in the shadow of the Christian superstition, found all the world a dunghill and man the most loathsome thing that squatted upon it. But Rabelais, out in the open, with all the winds of the renaissance blowing upon him, was more than a mere satirist. Under the motley of the buffoon beat as generous and as kindly a heart as ever throbbed in the service of humanity. M. France possesses no small share of the tolerant humor of Rabelais, and at a distance of several centuries carries on the same intellectual tradition.

Although M. France has written quite a number of books, his works have a uniform excellence, and it is difficult to pick out any representative masterpieces. He has written no Candide, no Les Miserables, those seminal masterpieces which represent the sum total of their authors' genius. Like his illustrious countryman, Montaigne, he is not to be judged by a single essay. And, like Montaigne, he is a philosopher in disguise. He has used the novel as a medium of expression, personal and intellectual. In those charming pages of La Vie Litteraire he has smilingly told us that he is not speaking pontifically, but only talking of himself; sending his mind adventuring among the masterpieces. Similarly in his novels, he is always as personal and as intimate as Charles Lamb. In his Isle of the Penguins he puts modern society under the microscope, and in The Gods Athirst he unfolds himself on the subject of the French Revolution. Yet this genial satirist can, in another mood, give us delightful glimpses of his own childhood. My Friend's Book is as tender, delightful, and trifling as heart could desire, and in that perfect chapter, "The Hermitage of the Jardin des Plantes," he describes Pierre Noziere's childish passion towards saintship with inimitable grace and irony:—

> "My sole idea was to live the life of an ascetic.....In order to lose no time in putting my ideas in operation, I refused to eat my breakfast. My mother, who knew nothing of my new vocation, thought I was ill, and looked at me with an anxiety that it pained me to behold. Nevertheless, I persevered with my fasting, and then, remembering the example of Saint Simeon Stylites, who spent his life on a pillar, I climbed up on to the kitchen cistern, but it was impossible to live there, for Julie, our cook, promptly dislodged me. Though I had thus been ousted from the cistern, I pursued with undiminished ardor the way of perfection, and next decided to imitate Saint Nicholas of Patras, who gave all his riches to the poor. My father's study window looked out on to the quay, and from it I proceeded to fling down a dozen coppers or so which had been presented to me because they were new and bright. These I followed up with marbles, humming-tops, whip-top, and eelskin whip.
> "'The child is crazy,' exclaimed my father, as he shut the window.
> "I felt angry and mortified at hearing this judgment passed upon me, but I remembered that my father, not being a saint like myself, would not share with me in the glories of the blessed, a reflection from which I derived great consolation."

No one but a Frenchman could have written this passage, and of this delicate and delightful stuff is woven the golden fabric of his genius. So original, so modern, is this great author who, among other names, has been called the pope of Freethought.

To this most distinguished of living Continental writers we owe much of the present proud position of Freethought—for scepticism is nothing if not intellectual. In the far-off days, Francois Rabelais caught a glimpse of the dawn of liberty, and largely through his magnificent genius it has now permeated all classes of society. M. Anatole France stands for the liberation of the intellect no less than Rabelais. He is like his illustrious predecessor, first and last a Freethinker, and has the same abiding faith in the triumph of what our own George Meredith calls "the best of causes."

MIMNERMUS.

"Wait Till You Come to Die."—III.

> "He [Voltaire at 84] was an intellectual monarch—one who had built his own throne and woven the purple of his power. He was a man of genius. The Catholic God had allowed him the appearance of success. His last years were filled with the intoxication of flattery—of almost worship. He stood at the summit of his age. The priests became anxious. They began to fear that God would forget, in a multiplicity of business, to make a terrible example of Voltaire. Towards the last of May, 1778, it was whispered in Paris that Voltaire was dying. Upon the fences of expectation gathered the unclean birds of superstition, impatiently waiting for their prey."—COLONEL INGERSOLL, Oration on Voltaire, p. 26.

> "I have often thought upon death, and I find it the least of all evils."—FRANCIS BACON, Essays (Bohn's Edition), p. 159.

> "Lord Playfair asked every doctor he met, for nearly twenty years, if he ever knew a patient afraid to die; and except in two cases the answer was 'No.'"—Daily Express (June 2, 1900).

> "Let us never forget that it was Christianity which turned the death-bed into a 'bed of agonies,' and that, by the scenes which since then have been enacted thereon, and the terrible sounds which here, for the first time, appeared possible, the senses and the blood of posterity were poisoned for a lifetime."—NIETZSCHE, The Dawn of Day.

RELIGIOUS people think that the last moments of a dying person are the most momentous in all the years of life. This is an entirely artificial sentiment, due to the idea that the last moments on earth are the prelude to an eternal life—either of joy or pain—elsewhere. That this is true may be observed by the difference with which they regard the last moments of a faithful dog, or other animal, not furnished with an immortal soul.

This belief in the enormous value attached to the last words of the dying has been responsible for the fabrication of those pious lies about infidel death-beds. It has also been responsible for the production of a still larger number of pious death-beds, where the dying see the heavens opened, hear angel voices, and so on. Doubtless, in the state of physical and mental weakness to which the dying are reduced, and after they have been properly "prepared" by the priest and coached by pious friends, some hysterical Christians have seen what they have been told others have seen in like circumstances.

The power of suggestion over the human mind is now recognised by all psychologists as enormous; and no doubt the followers of other religions, such as Mohammedanism, also occasionally see such things, but in such cases they only see what they have been taught to believe they ought to see.

Dr. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, of New York, says:—

> "During the past thirty years I have seen many die, and many who thought themselves to be dying who afterwards recovered, but I have no ground to suppose any of the visions supernatural, nor have I seen any indication of the development of a faculty of cognising another world."

Mr. Buckley says devout and consistent Christians sometimes die in great agony of spirit, while total unbelievers pass calmly away, their minds unruffled by apprehension or remorse. The fact, as stated, is that "when the dying appear to see anything, it is in harmony with the traditions they have received." Thus, dying Catholics may have visions of the Virgin Mary, because they have been trained to supplicate her, and have had her image before them in the church; but she never appears to Protestants who have not been trained in their youth as

Catholics, and "Where wicked persons see fiends and evil spirits, they harmonise with the descriptions which have been given in their sermons, poems, and supernatural narrations with which they have been familiar."*

But a very large discount must be made from these death-bed tales, which, if not altogether false, are highly embellished. Medical testimony is altogether against them. Dr. Cyrus Edson, writing on the subject, says:—

> "Nothing is more common than to hear from the pulpit pictures in words of excitement, of alarm, of terror, of the death-beds of those who have not lived religious lives, yet, as a rule, if these pictures are supposed to be those of the unfortunates at the moment of death, they are utterly false. In point of fact, ninety-nine of every hundred beings are unconscious for several hours before death comes to them; all the majesty of intellect, the tender beauty of thought or sympathy or charity, the very love for those for whom love has filled all waking thoughts, disappear. As a little baby just born into the world is but a little animal, so the sage, the philosopher, the hero, or the statesman, he whose thoughts or deeds have writ themselves large in the history of the world, become but dying animals at the last. A merciful unconsciousness sets in as the mysterious force we call life slowly takes leave of its last citadel, the heart, and what is has become what was. This is death."†

A greater authority than Dr. Edson gives a similar testimony. Sir William Osler, the Oxford Professor of Medicine, gives the result of his experience during a long life devoted to the practice of medicine. He says:—

> "The popular belief that however careless a man may be while in health, at least on the 'low, dark verge of life,' he is appalled at the prospect of leaving these warm precincts to go he knows not where—this popular belief is erroneous. As a rule, man dies as he has lived, uninfluenced practically by the thought of a future life. Bunyan could not understand the quiet, easy death of Mr. Badman, and took it as an incontestable sign of his damnation. The ideal death of Cornelius, so beautifully described by Erasmus, is rarely seen. In our modern life the educated man dies usually as did Mr. Denner in Margaret Deland's story (John Ward, Preacher), wondering, but uncertain, generally unconscious and unconcerned. I have careful records of about five hundred death-beds, studied particularly with reference to the modes of death and the sensations of the dying. The latter alone concerns us here. Ninety suffered bodily pain or distress of one sort or another, eleven showed mental apprehension, two positive terror, one expressed spiritual exaltation, one bitter remorse. The great majority gave no sign one way or the other; like their birth, their death was a sleep and a forgetting. The Preacher was right; in this matter man hath no pre-eminence over the beast—'as the one dieth so dieth the other' (Ecclesiastes iii. 19)."‡

Out of five hundred deaths, only two showed terror and one spiritual exaltation! Both, probably, due to religion. Under the light thrown upon the subject by these statistics, these tales of infidel, and pious, death-beds begin to wilt. They are seen to be the pious fictions which they are; at any rate, the infidel variety, which is now almost exclusively confined to the death-beds of Voltaire and Thomas Paine, which we will, for that reason, shortly examine.

The common fable as to Voltaire's death, runs, that the doctor found Voltaire in great agony, exclaiming, "I am abandoned by God and man," and offering him half his wealth for six months of life; the doctor answering, "Sir, you cannot live six weeks"; and Voltaire replying, "Then I shall go to hell and you will go with me!" and soon after expired. Another account pretends that Voltaire died raving, and that Marshal Richelieu was horrified by the scene and obliged to leave the chamber; as if it were possible for an old man of nearly 84, at the point of death, to die raving!

Carlyle, the historian, in his Essays, and Parton, in his monumental Life of Voltaire, are agreed as to the facts regarding Voltaire's death. Parton says:—

> "Belle-et-Bonne, who never left his bedside during these last days, said to Lady Morgan in Paris, forty years afterwards, as she did to everyone with whom she ever conversed on the subject, 'To his last moment everything he said and did breathed the benevolence and goodness of his character; all announced in him tranquillity, peace, resignation, except a little movement of ill-humor which he showed to the curé [parson] of Saint-Sulpice, when he begged him to withdraw, and said, "Let me die in peace."'
> "He lingered until late in the evening. Ten minutes before he breathed his last, he roused from his slumber, took the hand of his valet, pressed it, and said to him, 'Adieu, my dear Morand; I am dying.' These were his last words. He died peacefully and without pain, at a quarter past eleven, on Saturday evening, May 30, 1778, aged eighty-three years, six months, and nine days. This last incident Wagnière reports upon the authority of Morand, who was watching with his master that night."*

Such was the calm and serene end of the man whom Lord Morley speaks of as "the very eye of modern illumination."

The testimony of the domestics of the household in immediate attendance on Voltaire is clinched by the testimony of Dr. Burard, who attended Voltaire through the whole course of his illness, and who says: "I feel happy in being able, while paying homage to truth, to destroy the effects of the lying stories which have been told respecting the last moments of Mons. de Voltaire." He declares that Voltaire "retained his faculties up to the last moment, and the fooleries which have been attributed to him are deserving of the greatest contempt." The tale attributed to Marshal Richelieu, he says, "is as unfounded as the rest."

Further details may be found in Mr. G. W. Foote's valuable Infidel Death-Beds, where Dr. Burard's signed testimony may be found.

The ignorance of the purveyors of these malicious stories is well illustrated in an incident recorded at a lecture given by Mr. Bradlaugh at Wigan in October, 1860: After a lecture, a reverend gentleman—Mr. Woodville Woodman, of Bolton—told the audience that the triumph of Atheism in the French Revolution had produced such disastrous results that Voltaire, when he returned to France after the Revolution was over, expressed his regret for what he had done!

Mr. Bradlaugh, in reply, said:—

> "This is, I suppose, another case of the resurrection of the dead! Our friend tells us what Voltaire said after the Revolution was over. Now, as Voltaire died ten years before the Revolution began, he has given us some information that is somewhat startling!"†

Catholic and Protestant.

SPAIN is the victim of Christianity. Catholicism is Christianity to the evolutionist, and Spain is the typical Catholic country. Shut out by the solid barrier of the Pyrenees from free intercourse with the rest of Europe, and imbued with the belief that the greatest of all earthly objects is the maintenance of the Catholic religion, she has been a standing object-lesson in the blessings of Christianity when unchecked by other influences. To the Spaniard religion is not an amusement, or a social decoration, or an artificial aid to morality; to him it is a passion that inflames his whole nature, and makes all other things look comparatively trivial; all other things, that is, but the lust after ill-gotten wealth, which somehow or other has always been singularly compatible with the strongest faith and the most ardent devotion.

Protestants will of course deny that Roman Catholicism is Christianity. They have the real article themselves. But if there had been no Catholicism there would have been no Protestantism. Historically, as Michelet observed, Protestantism is an estuary, and Catholicism as the main sea. It is from the Catholic Church that every Protestant sect derives its doctrines, and from the same Church that all Protestant sects derive their Bible. Christianity contains certain fundamental ideas, and it is these, and not selected texts from a large and self-contradictory Scripture, that the evolutionist and the historian have to deal with. These ideas, in the course of ages, found practical expression in certain institutions, and those institutions are all marshalled under the Catholic Church. Nor is Protestantism, as some Rationalists affirm, a better religion than Catholicism. There is less of it—that is all. It is only better as a mild attack of fever is better than a severe attack of fever. And many Protestants have it very mildly. With hosts of them it is a slight recurrent disorder, coming on once a week. Others have just enough religion to amuse them, and get a little æsthetic tittilation at church or chapel instead of at the theatre or the music-hall.

Protestantism with supreme power would make as great a desolation as Catholicism with supreme power. Scotland under the Presbyterian yoke was as ugly a place to live in as Spain under the Catholic yoke—in some respects far uglier. Give the clergy power, and it doesn't matter whether their dogmas are fifty or a hundred; their tyranny is just the same, they hate and persecute science and Freethought, and make their teaching the alpha and omega of human wisdom. Those who think that Protestantism, in itself, was more favorable than Catholicism to the growth of natural knowledge and the free play of the human mind are simply ignorant of the facts of history. All the early Protestant "reformers" were absolutely opposed to any freedom of travel beyond the point they had reached themselves. They imprisoned, tortured, and burnt heretics with the greatest alacrity. Only by a kind of accident did freethinking creep upon the scene. The appeal to a multifarious book like the Bible divided Protestants among themselves. They kept each other in check, and made a ring which bolder spirits gradually entered. Equilibrium, so to speak, was maintained by antagonistic forces that could not destroy each other. Was it not Voltaire who complained that in England he found twenty religions, but only one sauce? But did he not soon perceive that this was the secret of English freedom? In France there was one church big enough to swallow all others, and it did so; while in England there were twenty churches, all hating each other, but all obliged to keep a certain measure of peace and toleration. And in the midst of that peace and toleration there was a chance for a more daring originality.

G. W. FOOTE.

Acid Drops.

Lord Radstock, who died recently in Paris at the age of eighty, had "devoted the last half of his life with fine enthusiasm to Christian evangelisation." So says a well-known morning newspaper. The truth is that the man was an arid, barren bigot. His way to heaven was the only way. And what a way it was! The final display of its spirit was in the Torrey-Alexander mission; which, by the way, was an ignominious failure. Mr. G. W. Foote and the late Mr. W. T. Stead, working in loyal co-operation, settled its hash in London by settling Torrey's hash as a reckless slanderer of historic Freethinkers, such as Voltaire, Paine, and Ingersoll. Lord Radstock dropped a lot of money over "the conversion of London," which the Torrey-Alexander mission impudently undertook. The mission itself broke up soon after. Torrey left England fatally discredited, and he has never returned to the scene of his conviction as a malignant liar.

A sentimental semi-Christian paper, which mainly relies on the Rev. R. J. Campbell's commercial value, but does not disdain other lines of business, has been publishing notes of the "Faith that I live by" elicited from a number of more or less distinguished people. Madame Albani, who was once a great singer, says, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." That is what Job is made to say and Handel sang. But if the lady will take the trouble to look into the matter she will see that the English Bible text is all wrong. Job said nothing about a redeemer. He did not live in a pawnbroker's shop. What he really said was that his avenger (goel) lived; meaning that his candid friends were wrong in representing his sufferings as the result of his sins, that his innocence would yet be established, and that he would live in health and wealth again and triumph over his accusers. This proper reading of the text was always known to scholars. It is now acknowledged by common-garden divines. We are sorry to spoil Madame Albani's dream; but, after all, truth is truth—though it was a Roman, not a Christian proverb, that said it should prevail.

Mrs. Besant's answer is characteristic. She starts with "I believe." What on earth does it matter what she believes? There are thousands of beliefs in the world, and hers is only one of them. What does she know? That is the question. She has never answered that since she left Atheism (and logic) for Theosophy (and imagination). It shows a kind nature, of course, to believe that we are all going to glory. "Travelling towards perfection," as Mrs. Besant calls it. Florence Nightingale and Jack the Ripper travel together, though they don't know it. Such a delightful gospel, and so easy to understand! No wonder some people pay five shillings to hear it. They must find it very reassuring.

Georg Brandes interposes a word of sense:—

> "We must build upon something sure. But under all the uncertainty and doubt which surrounds us one thing is certain and is not to be argued away; it is the pain. All human beings know that it is highly unpleasant to suffer and a great refreshment to be healed, to be unbound, to have the doors of our prison opened, to attain justice. And there is no other healing nor enfranchisement nor justice on earth than that which is carried into effect by us, there is no doubt what we have to do."

Presumably this is a translation of what Georg Brandes wrote. It is not the best of English, but it is intelligible. And it means this—joy and sorrow, pleasure and pain, are the great facts in life. And the great truth is that man has no other "Providence" than himself.

Mr. W. J. Bryan, the U.S.A. orator, who nearly gained the presidency once under the rotten flag of a double currency—which was handsomely supported, of course, by all the silver mine owners—has not kissed the blarney stone, for he was born with all its traditional virtues as an innate possession. The one noticeable sentence he ever uttered was that "Mankind should not be crucified on a cross of gold." It was at a political convention, and the "blasphemy" of the utterance should have been shocking to any believer in Christ and the crucifixion. But politicians make anything subserve their purposes. Statesmen do not. That is the difference. Ingersoll, the "infidel," talked common sense and common honesty on the subject. He was in favor of the dollar coinage, but he wanted it to be an honest dollar, even if it were three feet in diameter! The logic and humor of the argument made it irresistible. It sank into people's minds, while Bryan and his clap-trap "cross of gold"—as the event proved—were soon discredited and forgotten. Bryan, however, still works religion for all it is worth. He has even grown familiar with God. He is ready to give the Almighty a testimonial or "character" at any moment. One feels that the Deity ought to be very much obliged. It must be very consoling to feel that you have an eloquent and influential friend like Mr. Bryan when you need one. Just listen to the God-comforting Bryan:—

> "Man needs faith in God to strengthen him in his hours of trial, and he needs it to give him courage to do the work of life. How can one fight for the principle unless he believes in the triumph of the right? How can he believe in the triumph of the right if he does not believe that God stands back of the truth, and that God is able to bring victory to truth?"

Speak for yourself, Mr. Bryan. You have a right to do that. But don't arrogate the right to speak for everybody else. When were you elected the representative of "man"? Plenty of men find themselves quite able to do "the work of life" without "faith in God"—quite as able as you are with it. These men smile at your assurance that "God stands back of the truth," and would like to know why he so seldom pushes it forward.

Mr. Maarten Maartens, the Dutch novelist, says he is of the same faith as Abraham and Goethe (what a collocation!) of Michael Angelo and Shakespeare; namely, the faith expressed in the sentence "Thou doest all things." There is no law against using Shakespeare's name in this way, but intellectually and morally speaking it is a crime. Mr. Stopford Brooke has lately confessed, in his new book, that Shakespeare progressed in scepticism throughout his tragedies, and that the culmination was reached in King Lear, where divine justice was not only doubted but denied.

We won't trouble about the "faith" of several pious ladies such as Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler and Katherine Tynan, but pass on to other repliers, at least to one—Sir Hiram Maxim, who declares that he was miserable in believing that "angry and bloodthirsty gods, and innumerable devils and ghosts roamed about the earth making it very hot for mankind"—and that the faith in which he is happy and prosperous now is in the non-existence of these beings.

Lord Redesdale, speaking at the dinner given in honor of M. Anatole France at the Savoy Hotel, said that we owed champagne and the novel to the Church. Was he alluding to the Bible?

To add to the solemnity of "God's birthday," shopkeepers are advertising chalk eggs and indiarubber Gorgonzola. Appropriate diet for the "birthday" of a mythical personage.

The celebration of the Mohammedan festival of the Moharrum at Agra, India, resulted in a series of rows between the processionists and the Hindus. A number of persons were seriously injured and one killed. Yet the clergy are always assuring us that religion has a civilising influence.

The "waits" have been celebrating the merry birthday of the Man of Sorrows. A contemporary mentions a juvenile troup who sang "Christians Awake" outside a Jewish gentleman's residence. Those "waits" did not wait long.

A new star in London, runs a placard. Not the "star" of Bethlehem.

"Flight into Egypt—New Style" is the profane headline in the Daily News and Leader, concerning an aeroplane trip. Naughty! Naughty! That pious journalist may yet find himself in that place so often referred to in sermons.

It is announced that the English press has reached the unanimous decision not to publish any newspapers on Christmas Day. We are greatly impressed with the Christ-like character of this resolve—particularly when we remember that, owing to the absence of a travelling public and other prevailing conditions, newspapers are generally published on that day at a loss. Once again do we see that the path of godliness alone profiteth man.

Mr. Ramsay Macdonald is appealing for more sympathy towards the working classes from the Church, and is "afraid" that unless it is forthcoming the Labor movement may develop anti-religious tendencies. We are afraid the Labor movement is not the place for a man with strong "spiritual" yearnings such as Mr. Macdonald possesses. For our part, we are convinced that the less the Labor movement, or any other movement, has to do with the clergy as an organised body the better. What any movement needs that is worthy of living is, first of all, self-respect. And no party and no leader that possesses this would go round snivelling to the clergy to be more sympathetic towards them. It is curious that just at the time when other forms of thought have ceased to appeal to the Churches for either support or patronage, the leaders of the Labor movement—or some of them—should be taking up this elsewhere discarded attitude. It is often said that many of the Labor leaders are Sunday-school teachers. It may be that the wisest of those in the Labor movement will yet live to trace their greatest disasters to that circumstance.

A curious and, from one point of view, interesting leading article appears in the Church Times on "Blasphemy Prosecutions." It points out that the tendency is now to convict for nuisance rather than impiety, and that this bids fair to become the rule in the future. This may be true enough so far as the alleged reason for prosecution is concerned, although the introduction of the word "blasphemy" shows there is more than this in it. The Church Times obviously favors a genuine prosecution for blasphemy, although it lacks the courage to say so. It says that if we are content to regard blasphemy prosecutions as prosecutions for nuisance, or outraging people's feelings, "one rule must be applied to all religions alike, and the Christian lecturer in Hyde Park will no more be able to describe Mohammed as the false prophet, or the god Krishna as a filthy and licentious deity.....Are we prepared for this?.....It seems impossible to lay down the broad ethical rule that no one shall say anything publicly about the religion of others which shall not wound their feelings."

There is much in this with which we agree—much that we have already said. If Christians are really honest in their desire that religious subjects shall be treated "reverently," and so as not to wound the feelings of those who believe in the religion attacked, the rule should apply all round. It should be as binding on Christians as on Freethinkers. But that, we know, is not the case. No judge in England would protect a Mohammedan, or a Parsee, or a Brahmin against the coarsest of abuse from a Christian. It is the Christian only who prosecutes, and that fact alone stamps these prosecutions as religious. Besides, if protection from indecency and abuse is sought for, the ordinary police laws are quite adequate.

The Church Times touches the root of the subject when it says, "Our own view is that the abrogation of civil penalties for blasphemy should only be part of a complete and entire renunciation by the State of all responsibility in respect of religious truth. Such a radical revolution, however, is indeed remote." This is really touching bottom. So long as the State makes itself responsible for the teaching of religion, it does stand as a protector of religion, although it need not be that the State should punish with imprisonment one who speaks disrespectfully of a subject it teaches. It is not so, for instance, with regard to education. Religion, however, is in a slightly different category, and there is connected with it the evil tradition that they who hold religion up to contempt must be punished. Therefore, the secularisation of the State is the only way out. And the completion of this is not by any means so remote—of necessity—as the Church Times thinks. The State has already declined to say what religion individuals shall profess, or whether they shall have any religion at all. It leaves the relation of a God entirely to the individual's own choice, and treats it as a matter that concerns only the man and God—if there is one. And it is only a step further for the State to leave the gods to look after their own. The Church Times says the law punishes defamation of the King or Queen, and "it cannot adopt a lower attitude in respect of blasphemy against Almighty God." To this the reply is simple. King and Queen are portions of the British State, so far as we are aware; "Almighty God" is not. Besides, the King and Queen could hardly be expected to go into the courts of law to defend their characters against every rogue or fool who chose to advertise himself by uttering reckless statements about them. This applies, of course, to all heads of states, whatever the form of government may be.

Rev. Robert J. Roberts, rector of Hopesay, Shropshire, left £20,630. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth."

Rev. John Bush Early, of 73 Crouch-street, Colchester, for thirty-three years rector of Holy Trinity Church, left £12,373 18s. 2d. It was all bequeathed to his housekeeper, Mrs. Emily Jane Cartaar. No doubt it was the proper thing to do.

The estates of professional Jesuites don't figure as large in Scotland as they do in England. Naturally. But we note that the Rev. Adam Scott Matheson, and the Rev. James Black, both of Glasgow, left £6,923 7s. 11d. and £6,746 1s. 9d. respectively.

James Phillips, a young man of Cowley-road, Ilford, being summoned for travelling on the Great Eastern Railway without paying his fare, was fined 20s. and 4s. costs. The plea that he "attended a church and bore a very good character" was of no avail. This sort of thing is always pleaded when fraudulent travellers are found out.

A Christian Yahoo is once more repeating the libel that we were sent to prison in 1883 for "obscenity" in the Freethinker. Now there never has been anything of that kind in our pages. We have been far more careful than any other paper we know of to avoid anything that malice could possibly twist into an improper meaning. We have even refused to print a dirty text from the Bible, although it might have been legitimately used in furtherance of our purpose or our argument. And this general reply to the said Christian Yahoo may be supplemented by a particular. No such word as "obscene" or "indecent" occurred in our indictment; no such word was whispered or suggested in the course of our trials. Such words were more than whispered out of doors in bigoted and malignant journals. We drew the jury's attention to this abuse of language in the course of our address at the third trial; and we were generously aided by Lord Chief Justice Coleridge in his summing up. This is what he said to the jury:—

> "Mr. Foote is anxious to have it impressed on your minds that he is not a licentious writer, and that this word does not fairly apply to his publications. You will have the documents before you, and you must judge for yourselves. I should say that he is right. He may be blasphemous, but he certainly is not licentious, in the ordinary sense of the word; and you do not find him pandering to the bad passions of mankind."

There you are, you Christian Yahoo! You knew all about this yourself, but you were careful to hide it. And now you had better tell the handful of silly dupes left you what you went to prison for some ten years before. We think it was in 1878, but no doubt you will recollect the date better than we do.

Another Yahoo—unfortunately not a Christian—is throwing out what he knows to be lying insinuations about our use of money in "blasphemy" cases. The only "blasphemy" case we ever took up was Mr. Harry Boulter's. It was at his own request, we had full freedom of action, and full responsibility. But we stood throughout the fight not as Mr. G. W. Foote but first as Chairman of the Secular Society, Ltd., which guaranteed the sum of £200, and secondly as President of the National Secular Society. The public subscription was opened in that Society's name; every penny acknowledged by us in the Freethinker went through the Society's bank account; every penny expended was on the order of the Society's Executive, by means of its cheques, and through the hands of its Secretary. This was stated publicly at the time. It should not need to be stated again. How the case was fought is a matter of history. Everything was done in a business-like way, including a verbatim report of the trial, which was published in the Freethinker. And our own share of the work, gratuitously rendered, is best known to those who were behind the scenes. Not a single farthing's advantage accrued to any member of the National Secular Society.

We see the suggestion that we did not take the trouble to obtain information about the Stewart trial. We think our readers will prefer to believe us on a matter of this sort. We applied to Mr. Pack by letter for such information. He kindly replied that he was not present at the trial, as we supposed he had been, and that he had not seen Stewart at any time during the "blasphemy" proceedings. But he had sent on our letter to someone else, who took no notice. And the someone else happens to be the author of the false suggestion.

Rev. C. Lea-Wilson, who has been doing missionary work in a district of the White Nile, a thousand miles south of Khartoum, being interviewed by a Reuter correspondent, gives a good account of the natives there. "They are jet black, typical negroes," he says, "and do not practise either cannibalism or human sacrifices. They have admirable qualities, and I have never seen among them a case of cruelty to women or children." He couldn't say that of England, or any other Christian country.

Thanks are owing to Mr. John Benson, of South Woodham, Essex, who drew attention to the falsity of the suggestion in the Daily Chronicle by Mrs. Barclay that George Eliot was a "conventional Christian" and believed that "the Bible was of more than divine origin." Mr. Benson points out that in her early womanhood she ceased to attend any place of worship, and that Herbert Spencer recorded that her summary of religious belief was "God is inconceivable, immortality is unbelievable."

There was some humbug, at least, about the dinner at the Savoy to Anatole France. Marie Corelli helping to honor such a man is really a joke of the first water. Nor did many of the other diners belong to the intellectual circles that Anatole France represents in his own country and in its literature. The guests speech was full of beauty and courtesy, but it sustained the character he claimed for himself of "never having dissembled his thoughts." He told his auditors that "the great, the true France" was "the France of the eighteenth century, the France of Montesquieu and Voltaire." Some of those present need to be told that truth often—although they were honoring Anatole France.

A letter reached the Savoy dinner from Dorchester. It was one Freethinker greeting another. Thomas Hardy's tribute to Anatole France was a gem. It threw all the rest into the shade.

The newspaper comments on the Anatole France dinner were flabby and foolish. The utmost care was taken to hide the fact that the great Frenchman was a thinker as well as a novelist. What a press we have in England! Full of cowardice and hypocrisy.

"Wanted a new head," runs an advertisement. It does not refer to the Bishop of London.

In a letter from the Gold Coast by a missionary, quoted by the Evening News, it was stated that when he went to find a case of Bibles at the Customs he was informed that there were 16,000 cases of gin and some hundreds of whisky waiting to be delivered. The Gold Coasters are well supplied with the means of spiritual and spirituous intoxication.

"Mythical Policeman" reads a scare-line in the Yellow Press. It won't attract Christian readers, for they pin their faith to a mythical Carpenter.

"Burned to death at 83" is the cheerful headline in a daily paper concerning a Kensington woman. If she had been a Freethinker, the treatment would have been continued in another place.

The Daily Mail recently asserted that Shakespeare "never once attempted to anticipate the drab heresies of Tom Paine." The youthful scribes of the yellow press are too young to have read Shakespeare or Paine, and when they grow up they will know better.

Do people read Shakespeare? We often wonder. There was a note in the Star the other night about the expression "There's hair, like wire," and its age was proved by a quotation from Spenser's "Epithalamiam," in which the bride's hair is likened to "golden wire"—which is not very flattering, although it is evidently meant to be so. A more apposite quotation might have been found in Shakespeare's hundred-and-thirtieth sonnet:—

> "My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun;
> Coral is far more red than her lips' red;
> If snow be white, why then her breasts are dun;
> If hairs be wire, black wires grow on her head."

The matter is not one of much importance. But it is enough to make us repeat the question, Do people really read Shakespeare?

When we say that the matter is not one of much importance, we mean the simile and not the sonnet. The sonnet itself is of great importance in relation to the problem of the sonnets—if, after all, there is such a problem.

A writer in the Daily Mail says that the vast majority of the congregations in the Churches consists of old ladies with a sprinkling of old gentlemen. He has overlooked the sprinkling of the very young people, which is charged for at the usual rates.

"That cheap American platitudinarian, Ingersoll." We were rather surprised to see this silly insolence in the Sunday Chronicle. Is it due to the Roman Catholic influence on that journal? Anyhow, the writer might try his hand at a few Ingersollian platitudes. Some of us could anticipate the result.

Rev. Hyman Redgrave, vicar of St. Paul's, Burslem, who was found guilty by the chancellor of the diocese, and five assessors, of immoral conduct with Hannah Gater, the twenty-two year old daughter of a potter of Burslem, has been deprived of his living by the Bishop. What hugging, kissing, etc., the reverend gentleman (for he is still that) does in future will no doubt be done less publicly. It is fair to say that the Consistory Court did not go to the length of finding him guilty of adultery, but they declared that there was "the gravest suspicion" of it.

"The birthplace of the novel was the Garden of Eden," says the Daily Mail. Freethinkers have always insisted that it was fiction.

The Daily Mail Year Book devotes four pages to flying in 1913, and gives records in airmanship. There is no mention of the record trip made by the hero of the Four Gospels.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £274 10s. 1d. Received since:—Mrs. B. Siger. 2s. 6d.; George Lunn, 10r.; One of the Old School. 10s.; Ernest, 2s.; T. Margerston, 5s.; T. W. Hicks, 5s.; N. Jacobson (S. Africa), 17s. 6d. Per N. Jacobson: Barney Kouler (S. Africa), £1 1s.; Jacob Kouler (S. Africa), £1 1s.

B. SIGER.—We have passed over what was meant for Miss Vance. Thanks for good wishes.

AUSTIN RUSSELL.—See paragraph. It is not worth more attention. Thanks.

R. BENNETT.—Three officers, and one person, are quite a new sort of a trinity; and the one appointing them all, including himself, who is two, railing at the N. S. S., with its representative Executive and Annual Conference, as a wicked autocracy, is certainly, as you say, an extraordinary joke. The thing itself has been dead, buried, and resurrected more times than Lazarus.

GEORGE LUNN.—Pleased you think this journal gets better as it gets older; also that you speak so highly of our colleagues' contributions as well as our own. We should relish no praise in which they were not included. Your connection with the Freethought movement dates from 1876. It is a good spell of time. Our own is even longer. We smile sometimes at the thought that we have been speaking and writing for Freethought ever since 1869—nearly forty five years, with the exception of the one year that we were fastened up by the Philistines—With regard to your question, you appear to want an encyclopædia rather than a dictionary. But good encyclopædias are expensive, and bad ones are worthless. We should say that Chambers' large single-volume Dictionary is about as good as you could obtain.

C. J. P.—We were present too at the Shelley Society meeting you refer to. As a matter of fact, we opened the discussion, and can corroborate your statement as to Mr. Shaw's declaration. Thanks for the Brough extract. Is your new address the permanent one?

S. V. G.—Much obliged, but we will not pursue the matter, at least as far as the family are concerned.

R. H. ROSETTI.—See paragraph. Thanks.

E. B.—Much obliged for cuttings.

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks.

ETHEL BRABY.—We answered your question before. The writer is unable to help you in locating the reference. We may as well state, with regard to one passage in your letter, that Mr. Foote does not write pseudonymous articles in the Freethinker—or anywhere else, for that matter. Neither is he in any way connected with the other journal you mention. We cannot answer letters like yours by post.

ERNEST.—The matter is being inquired into.

OLD FREETHINKER (Barnsley).—We are fully acquainted with all the facts you refer to, and they may have to be faced later on. But you are mistaken in supposing that Stewart has any connection whatever with the N. S. S., nor should his record, whatever it is, stand in the way of the strongest opposition to his prosecution and imprisonment for "blasphemy." What we do is always thought out, and there is sure to be a lot to be said for it.

N. JACOBSON (S. Africa).—Thanks for your successful efforts to promote the President's Honorarium Fund. The annual subscription to the journal is placed to your credit.

WILLIAM OWEN.—All right. The difference is slender, and your date is booked.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote's two Sunday evening lectures at Queen's (Minor) Hall have been gratifyingly successful. The first audience was very good, and the second was considerably better,—in fact, it frightened the little boy that Mr. Foote "named" (Raymond William Newman), who looked upon that sea of faces, and then upon the "namer's" mouth, and proceeded to open his own. But things went a bit smoother when he got hold of a beard with one hand and an eyeglass chain with the other. It is pleasant to add that the fine audience included a really large proportion of ladies. Their faces are more mobile than men's, and it is encouraging to see their appreciation of a good point or their recognition of a good joke. Besides, they represent the future through their maternity,—for the mother means the children in the long run; and when Mr. Foote has so many ladies listening to him he says to himself, alluding to the priests, "Now we are getting at you. We are spoiling your abominable business at its source." But to return to the lecture. Mr. Foote felt in excellent form, and the meeting appreciated the fact, judging by the laughter and applause, and by the way in which his answers to an uncommon number of questions were cheered. Mr. Jones made a capital chairman, and we are glad to hear that his announcement of Mr. Walsh's pamphlet cleared out every copy on the bookstall—and would have cleared out many more.

By a process of exhaustion the conclusion reached with regard to Queen's Hall is that regular Sunday evening Freethought meetings there will always be too expensive. Mr. Foote's two recent meetings have been eminently successful, the second being some twenty-five per cent. larger than the first. But after another lecture or two the cost begins to tell—not upon the business of management, but upon the pockets of the audience. The audience is drawn from all parts of Greater London, and the total expense of travelling, refreshment, and the price of a seat, may easily reach 2s. or 2s. 6d.—and more than that if a man brings his wife or daughter, or other persons in whom he may be interested, with him to the lecture. Few can afford this Sunday after Sunday, so that only a percentage of the potential Freethought audience manages to reach Queen's Hall on any particular evening,—a rally taking place only when there is something special.

Mr. Foote's friends throughout the country will be glad of the assurance that his general health is a good deal improved. The proceedings at Queen's Hall on Sunday evening lasted nearly two hours, and what with the lecture and the answers to questions he must have been on his legs for quite an hour and a half; but he was not particularly tired at the end, and his voice gave him no trouble at all. And though he had to travel before the meeting and travel after it—leaving home at 4 15 and arriving there again at 12.15—he was no worse than just a little flat on the Monday morning.

Thanks are due to the Star (London) for its friendly announcement of Mr. Foote's lecture on "Shaw Amongst the Prophets." It was a gleam of light in the darkness of the press conspiracy of silence against the President of the National Secular Society.

Mr. Cohen lectured to an excellent audience at the Leicester Secular Hall on Sunday evening. We are glad to hear that this deserving institution is maintaining its own so well in the midst of multiplying counter attractions.

The conclusion of our article on "Benedict Spinoza" stands over until next week. It is in type, but cannot be fitted into this week's make-up.

We are not adding much to what we wrote last week on "The 'Blasphemy' Case." What we desire to say for the present is contained in this paragraph. First of all, we wish to correct the idea that going to prison is the way to abolish the Blasphemy Laws. It simply whets the orthodox appetite for more victims. It was not our own imprisonment in 1883, but the defence we made, happily before Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, that stopped "blasphemy" prosecutions for twenty-five years. Unfortunately the men attacked now are incapable of making a proper defence. No doubt that is why they are attacked. What is wanted, we repeat, is to frustrate every application of the Blasphemy Laws by rendering a conviction extremely difficult, if not impossible. That is the only way. With regard to the Stewart case itself, there should have been a concerted meeting of protest in London and the case should have been carried to the Court of Appeal. Both proceedings would have been simple enough; the latter might have succeeded,—at any rate, it would have meant a splendid advertisement for the cause of "repeal." But as Stewart apparently chose to leave his case in utterly incompetent hands, everybody else was rendered helpless for want of a status in the matter. In a soft moment—all of us have such—we signed the "Humble Petition" got up so rapidly by the Rationalist Press Association; and if such documents were any good the names upon it should have secured Stewart's immediate release; but as it is nothing has occurred up to the present—just as we expected.

The Inverness Library Committee has decided, though only by the narrow majority of 7 to 6, to open the reading-room during certain hours on Sunday. All the stock arguments were used against it in the discussion, including that hardy veteran "the thin end of the wedge." We are glad to note that the lady members voted with the majority.

The Story of the Squirrel.

THE common European squirrel is one of the most interesting and attractive of our native animals. It is a sharp-toothed, active creature, provided with a tail very nearly as long as its body. From the tip of its nose to the base of its tail the average sized squirrel measures just over eight inches, while its caudal appendage from its base to its termination measures seven inches. The tail is remarkably bushy, but the hair is thicker in winter than in the warmer season of the year. When reposing on its hind legs, its appearance is suggestive of that of a miniature kangaroo; but the arched nose and alert eye betoken more intelligence than that well-known Australian animal seems to possess. In company with many other mammals, the color of the squirrel's fur varies considerably with the season's changes. During the dark and dismal winter the rodent's fur becomes of a sombre brown on the head, along the back, and down the middle of the tail, while the sides of its body assume a distinctly grey color. Its limbs vary from bright red to chestnut, and its throat, chest, stomach, and the inner sides of the limbs turn white. Towards the end of April the winter dress is discarded, and in the early summer the frolicsome squirrel darts and leaps in his arboreal habitat in a mantle of bright chestnut, red above and beautiful white below. In winter the dense plumes which adorn the sides of the animal's tail are dark reddish brown, but as the summer advances these plumes incline towards a buff color, and examples are sometimes encountered in August in which the sides of the tail are of the color of cream. The fur of the squirrel is also of economic importance. Russia and Siberia yield six or seven million skins every season, and on the Lena alone, squirrel-trapping is an extensive business. It provides an occupation for large numbers of people, some of the hunters having as many as a thousand snares.

As a rule, squirrels are strictly monogamous and pair for life. They breed once, and occasionally, in exceptional circumstances, twice a year. When the young are expected, a nest is constructed of moss, leaves, dried grass, and similar materials, in a hollow tree or on a forked bough. The nest is provided with a cover to protect the young from the rain. The offspring usually appear in June, and a litter generally consists of four or five; but although the young seem fully able to support themselves by the time they are six or eight weeks' old, they remain with their parents until the following spring. Family quarrels then arise; the children are driven away, and the old animals repair their nest for the coming litter.

When eating, the rodent reclines on its hind legs, with its handsome tail coiled over its back, and grasps its food with its forefeet, or what are practically its hands. Its powers of locomotion are very considerable, as its limbs possess great pliability. When on terra firma, it leaps rather than runs, and when it is in its native element among the trees it bounds from bough to bough, its well-proportioned tail aiding its rapid flight as it moves through the air with its outspread limbs.

The squirrel's diet is a varied one. Its chief food is nuts, seeds, and fruit, but it easily accommodates itself to flesh foods, and in the absence of its ordinary nutriment would soon adapt itself to carnivorous habits. In the spring, when nuts are scarcely obtainable, the animal varies its diet of bark and tender leaves by sucking the eggs of thrushes, robins, and wood pigeons, and even devouring the newly hatched birds.

"The squirrel," says Sir Harry Johnston, in his British Mammals,

> "destroys large quantities of pine cones, and as its attitude towards mankind is very monkey-like and 'cheeky,' it seems to take a pleasure in attacking these pine cones immediately over the head of one who has retired to the forest to paint, or to meditate over a book. In tearing away the segments of the pine cone to get at the pith of the interior and the seeds, the squirrel showers down these rather moist and sappy fragments on the human being beneath, accompanying this inconvenient action with spitting and swearing sounds, or else conducting this mischievous operation in profound silence, and thereby startling one all the more by raining down unexpectedly a mass of half-chewed débris."*

Where squirrels abound they are regarded with a frosty eye by the forester, who is more concerned with the well-being of his young and struggling trees than with the whimsicalities and æsthetic charms of this destructive rodent. For the squirrel is capable of doing considerable damage to plantations of young trees. The animals tear away the bark and impede the flow of sap, and when this happens to young larches the tops of the trees wither and die. The pretty and playful squirrel is welcome, and more than welcome, to the beech mast, pine cones, acorns, and hedge nuts which he devours; but his destruction of saplings and his growing fondness for the eggs of birds, as well as their young ones, are more serious offences.

But these little shortcomings seem to Sir Harry Johnston to be fully atoned for by the squirrel's undeniable beauty and irresistible fascination. Still, one is inclined to pardon the woodman's anger, and to think that the introduction of this lively rodent into Regent's Park was a grave blunder. To the Londoner, his feathered songsters are much more valuable than squirrels; and the bird's-nesting fraternity among ourselves plunder the nurseries of birds almost everywhere with impunity. The birds of London are to many thousands of people the greatest treasure which our parks contain.

In the autumn the squirrel makes preparation for the impending winter, and gathers together considerable quantities of acorns, hazel nuts, and other nutritious foods. The most surprising places are selected for the granaries, and each pair of animals provides itself with one or more stores. Mr. W. S. Dallas, in speaking of a pair of squirrels kept under observation in a Berkshire garden, referred to the very improvident habits of these animals. They concealed their fruit kernels, horse-chestnuts, crocus-bulbs, potatoes, and other treasures in all sorts of queer places, and then forgot them. When the snow covered the ground, the animals were to be seen scampering about and peering into every nook and cranny to discover their hidden stores. Much of their hoard was buried among the roots of trees and shrubs, and was almost inaccessible when the snow had fallen.

But this detracts very little from the undoubted intelligence of these rodents. All it proves is that they have hardly adapted themselves as yet to an active winter life. It is extremely probable that in quite recent times the hibernating habits of the squirrel were of general occurrence. The animal's skill in cracking and paring nuts has reached a high state of efficiency. When the wild wood-nut is brown and hard, as it becomes when fully ripe, the squirrel makes a circular cut round the shell with his incisor teeth, so that it splits in half and leaves the kernel clear. The nut is then eaten, but every particle of skin is carefully removed before the rodent will deign to devour it.

In the southern counties of England, more especially during the genial winters of the past twenty years, the thrifty hoarding habit has been less and less observed. The squirrel's winter sleeping arrangements have also undergone some modification.

> "In bleak districts with a poor food supply during the winter, the squirrel curls itself up in some sheltered hole or cranny in a tree trunk and passes into a torpid condition, only reviving when the sun shines brightly. During these spells of warmer weather in the winter it leaves its hiding-place and searches for hoarded nuts, returning to sleep again after a good meal."

But in the neighborhood of Bournemouth and other southern stations the squirrel is as frequently met with in winter as in summer, particularly where it is fed

Sir Harry Johnston is not far wrong in thinking that this interesting vertebrate has "all the impudence and much of the fascination of the monkey, whom it imitates also in its wastefulness and its chattering cries." The animal's voice varies considerably; it will give vent to a succession of metallic sounds, which it follows with a rapid series of spitting squeaks. It has a positive passion for indulging in these vocal performances in the presence of the human biped who has invaded its woodland home. At the sight of a man the animal will simulate the greatest indignation, while half mockingly leaping among the branches or running round the trunk of some forest tree. Inquisitive as a monkey, the animal is in reality rather fond of man's society—of course, at a reasonable distance. This is soon made manifest to anyone reading or sketching amid the woodland wilds. The furry rodents will chase one another with the most awful curses, as if they were scornfully indifferent to the presence of so strange an animal as man.

> "Then they will affect to be excessively frightened at their own audacity, and hide palpitating round a tree trunk, scrambling round, however, in a minute or two to gaze at you with their large liquid eyes and to spit and swear from their open mouth, with the points of their little brown teeth just showing."

Although it is practically useless to attempt to tame the adult animal, the young are easily domesticated, and are among the most adorable and even affectionate of our pets. The squirrel is one of the most picturesque of our native creatures as it gambols among the boughs, and within reasonable limits it should be cherished and enabled to propagate its kind. Its nest is the best made by any mammal, and, apart from human intervention, it has little to fear save its inveterate enemy, the marten, which is much more powerful, and climbs equally well.

The squirrel is to be found at the present day throughout the entire Palæarctic region, from Ireland to Japan and from Northern Italy to Lapland, and its fossil remains have been traced as far back as the Cromer Forest Bed. It has lived in England since the Pleistocene period, and is now abundant everywhere in this country and in the woodland areas of Wales. It is rather scarce in Ireland, and there exists a tradition of its having been introduced there. It has had a chequered career both in Northern England and in Scotland, and, indeed, in the latter country bade fair to become extinct. But with the extensive tree planting in Scotland in the eighteenth century it again spread rapidly, and is now by some regarded as a positive nuisance.

Probably as late as a century ago it was quite unknown in the Lake Districts, but is now fairly abundant through Cumberland and Westmoreland. It appears to have been a common animal throughout the Scandinavian peninsula since the advent of man. In the Northern mythology the squirrel appears as the messenger of the gods, who carried to the other animals the news of the world's doings.

Extinct members of the squirrel family are fairly numerous. The genus Sciurus, to which the animal belongs, is an ancient mammalian form. Its fossil remains have been found in the Miocene and even in the Upper Eocene formations of Europe.

T. F. PALMER.

Angels of Dispeace.

MILITANT Atheism is dead. Publicly we are informed of its decease; but privately the informers know and say that it is energetically alive.

The compartment was occupied by four pastors and myself. Being unprepossessing in appearance, the black-frocked gentlemen did not deign to notice me. My presence was insignificant. They were well-fed, very respectable representatives of the cloth; and the miner who looked through the window, grimaced, spat, and passed on. Obviously, he did not envy them their cigars; but he might have concealed his contempt just a little. His uncultured rudeness removed him a degree farther from Paradise.

Conversation at first ran along trivial lines. They interchanged pastoral confidences, sympathised with each other, enjoyed the human weakness of airing grievances, and spoke without restraint concerning the things of their hearts. But their hearts were empty of God, or their mouths would have been full of him.

One does not like to be too severe; but commandments are commandments. Pastors will tell you that because certain commandments came from the Lord God, they are even something more for which no word is available. Deliberately to disobey the heavenly mandate constitutes a fault that merits the superlative measure of divine wrath, you will be told. Even to allow worldly things, like cigars and confidences, however pleasurable and innocent, to cast the charm of distance upon God is a grievous error. According to pastors, God comes first. He should occupy our thoughts always. We should never lose sight of him. To live the Christ-life should be our all-consuming desire. God must ever be our guiding star, our heavenly flame, our permanent companion, our one hope in this world, our only hope in the next.

No wonder the dirty, ill-clad, unhumanlike miner passed by.

To disobey God is to blaspheme; and where is the Christian who does not blaspheme? Not a day is sent into the past but Christians send with it God and his commandments. The positiveness of the Diety is as a feeble flickering of the last of a weary life compared with the steady glare of the never-absent negativeness of it.

If God is God, if his commandments are to be considered such, then the first people to actualise them should be his earthly apostles, even if it mean breaking every human law, neglecting every human conventionality, disregarding every human instinct, personal and social, and drawing near unto the liberating gates of death itself.

Should God's commandments be limited by custom and environment? Are they not the only thing of importance here, there, anywhere? Has God to take a back seat to human triviality? Must his voice be drowned in the clamor of the commonplace? Perish the thoughts! And then, even if the practice of these imperishable commandments means death, does not death mean the glorious entrance to the home of the blessed and the everlasting life?

In this frame of mind I settled myself behind a paper to listen to the ministerial conversation; and to extract some information from it. One of them bewailed the gradual decrease, within recent years, of the number of attenders at his weekly prayer-meeting. So heart-breaking had the attendance become that he had found it expedient to cancel the meeting altogether. After spending much time in careful study, it was very discouraging to witness the few people who assembled to hear him. ("Where two or three are gathered together," etc.) Another poured oil on the troubled waters by remarking that his morning meeting for young folk had recently been abandoned for the same reason. And so, for a while, the tale went on uninterruptedly. Church membership was falling off; church enterprises were being sadly neglected; interest in the welfare of the church was on the wane; fewer children were to be seen in the Sunday-schools, and fewer people in the pews; and all this despite the carefulness of preparation, the devotion to the work, and the self-sacrifice of ministers.

One of the holy quartet struck rather a pathetic note. His pastorate was in a little mining town. During the last few years a great change had slowly taken place in the attitude of the people to their minister, causing him to suffer much mental anguish. Once he had been the well-beloved shepherd. Now he was only a sheep like themselves. No longer was he welcomed at the house doors. In fact, so disagreeably conscious of the "Hallo! here-ye-are-again-damned-nuisance" attitude of the people was he, that he had been forced to forgo visitation for quite some time back. He felt as if something were slipping away from him; as if the dignity of the church were being, if not despised, at least disregarded.

He was perfectly convinced the change had begun after the visit of an agitator, who, apparently, had poisoned the minds of the flock on the matters of religion and churchgoing; and he bitterly resented the intrusion of these free-speaking, bombastic representatives of a quiet, orderly Trades-Unionism.

Another gentleman, who bossed a city church, volunteered the suggestion that they should be pleased they had provincial charges. These things were nothing, absolutely nothing, compared with the awful difficulties with which city ministers had to contend. Agitators! Why there were Atheists actually fighting them at street corners! Picture palaces and secular meetings of all kinds had robbed the Sabbath of all its holiness.

But he didn't get far in his tirade against Secularism; for the meek-looking member of the party interjected something about the Materialism of villages and provincial towns being as great, comparatively, as that of cities nowadays. Gambling, drinking, whippet-racing, and the rest of the people's rough pleasures, were dragged in to support the statement. It was a great wild sea of Materialism, and on the froth of the waves were agitators and Atheists, Angels of Dispeace that they were, as the meek man thought.

It was a meaty bone thrown to starving dogs, except that there was sufficient meat to prevent them bickering over its disposal. After a spate of quite illogical and uninteresting opinions, the unanimous conclusions were that the people were going to the Devil; that only a soul-stirring revival could avert the catastrophe; and—wonder of wonders!—that such a reawakening of religious beliefs was farther off now than ever; that, in fact, it was impossible, owing to the increasing number of agitators and Atheists, and their cheap publications.

Coming from the adversely affected side, this recognition of defeat was interesting. Another step was required to complete the journey. It was left for the meek man to accomplish. After a short silence, he said: "Well, what are we gentlemen doing, or going to do, in the circumstances? Are we going to shirk the bitter end, to be honest or dishonest? Are we to continue telling lessening congregations that the hope of the world is religion, when the hope is hopeless? for that is the position our conversation has led us into. Must we continue making claims for Christianity in the face of an all-powerful Devil? Religion may remain with the individual few; but our conclusions tell us that the Church's day is done. It has become a torn page of history, existing in the book of life because bound with it; and the hands that would ruthlessly tear it out altogether are doing so gradually with stern resolve. What must we do?"

The meek man's questions remained unanswered; for the train stopped, and a ticket-collector entered to save the situation from its awkwardness. The compartment filled up; and from the faces of the meek man's companions I noticed they, at least, were not sorry the conversation had been providentially brought to an end.

There are some men who give of the strength of their minds for the betterment of man, and their reward comes as the bitter-sweet. They are the Angels of Dispeace.

ROBERT MORELAND.

It isn't true that the laws of nature have been capriciously disturbed; that snakes have talked; that women have been turned to salt; that rods have brought water out of rocks. You must in honesty confess that, if these things were presented to us for the first time, we should smile at them. —Dr. Conan Doyle, "The Stark-Munro Letters," p. 43.

Some Little-Known Freethinkers.

VIII.—DR. THOMAS INMAN.

IT was through Myles McSweeney that I became epistolarily acquainted with the author of Ancient Faiths Embodied in Ancient Names. Myles recommended me to the Doctor to make some drawings to illustrate his works; and this led to a good deal of frank correspondence, in which the Doctor treated me as one very much older than I then was. All bore on his discoveries of the evidences of phallic worship, which, as is often the case with discoverers, Dr. Inman pressed beyond their real importance. I have since learned that neither McSweeney nor Dr. Inman was original in the detection of phallicism as underlying Christianity. Earlier even than Payne Knight, Higgins, or Dulaure, was a Kabbalist crank in the last century, a Frenchman, whose work on Les Mystères du Christianisme, published in 1771, is certainly one of the most curious volumes it has ever been my lot to look into. The Old and the New Testaments, and the seven sacraments of the Romish Church, are interpreted phallically. Dr. Inman had, however, arrived at his view independently, though he doubtless derived some hints from the Anacalypsis of Godfrey Higgins. His researches were originally into the meanings of names, and the mere inquiry why John was convertible into Jack led to some extraordinary results.

Dr. Inman was a Liverpool physician of high standing. He was born at Leicester, January 27, 1820, and his father became director of the Bank of Liverpool, and his brother founded the famous shipping firm of that port. Educated at King's College and London University, he took the degrees of B.A. and M.D., settling at Liverpool, where he became lecturer on botany, medical jurisprudence, therapeutics, and the principles and practice of medicine. He was for some time President of the Liverpool Literary and Philosophical Society, and was physician to the Royal Infirmary of that city. He wrote several medical works, and his volumes on The Preservation of Health and The Restoration of Health are still worth reading. Dr. Inman was original-minded in his profession. He published a work, entitled Foundation for a New Theory of Medicine (1861), in which he regarded all disease as arising from a deficiency of vital force; and in his treatment he frankly placed dietetics before drugs, which, he pointed out, were chiefly respected because they deranged the vital force. He stated, as the conclusion of his large medical experience, that "the physician could do harm, but that his power for good was limited." But it was chiefly as an archæologist that his Freethought manifested itself. In his principal work, Ancient Faiths Embodied in Ancient Names, he examines all the cognomens in the Bible, eliciting many curious facts that lie behind those names, and showing there was no essential difference between the faith of the Hebrews and that of other Semites. Incidentally he notices that the alleged sojourn in Egypt left no evidence of having modified Israelitish languages, names, or faith. He held that Biblical testimony itself disproved the story of the sojourn in Egypt.

In my essay on "Phallic Worship Among the Jews," in Bible Studies, I have given my opinion on the views of Dr. Inman more fully than is possible here; and I shall therefore at once pass to his less known Freethought work, Ancient Faiths and Modern, which was published at New York, though printed at Edinburgh, in the year of his death (1876). In the preface he tells how he came to doubt the nostrums both of physical and spiritual doctors. He says:—

> "The physician, when professing to cure, has too often assisted disease to kill; and he who has the cure of souls has invented plans to make believers in his doctrine miserable. The first fills his coffers proportionately to the extent to which he can protract recovery; the second becomes rich in proportion to the success with which he multiplies mental terrors, and then sells repose. The one enfeebles the body, the other cripples the intellect, and aggravates envy, hatred, and malice."

On examination, he says:—

> "I found that in every nation there have been, and still are, good men and bad, gentle and brutal, thoughtful and ignorant; that the best men of Paganism—Buddha, for example—did not lose by comparison with the brightest lights of Christianity; and that such large cities as London and Paris have as much vice within them as ancient Rome or modern Calcutta. I found, moreover, that there is a culpable coloring in the accounts given by Christian travellers of Pagan countries. The clerical pen rests invariably and strongly upon the bad points of every heathen cult, and contrasts them with the best elements of Christianity."

Dr. Inman entered considerably into the question of the rival merits of Christianity and Buddhism, and gave his preference to the latter as a non-persecuting system, and as containing no obscene stories such as those of the Bible. He says:—

> "If we now ask ourselves what parts of the Bible most offend the sense of propriety, we should answer that they are its untenable cosmogony; its preposterous accounts of the longevity of the men reported as being the earliest formed; the legend of the flood; the origin of the rainbow; the tales of Moses, Pharaoh, the plagues of Egypt, the sojourn in the desert, the capture of Canaan, the miraculous battles. We would wholly expunge the fabulous account of Elijah and Elisha; the ravings after vengeance uttered by the prophets; the apocryphal episodes described in the books of Jonah and Daniel; every obscene story and disgusting speech or writing, whether uttered as a threat against Israel or his enemies. In like manner, we would wish to expunge from the teaching of Jesus everything relating to the immediate destruction of the world, everything connected with community of goods, the advantages of beggary, and the potency of faith and prayer. We would suppress every miracle, and say nothing of a resurrection of the dead Jesus. We would equally abandon any attempt to describe Heaven or Hell or any immediate state. When all these were removed from the Bible, we positively should have very little left, except a certain amount of morality which is sound, and a large portion which is radically bad."

Ancient Faiths and Modern, like all of Dr. Inman's works, abounds in a variety of learning culled from all quarters. He concludes the book with a challenge to the champions of orthodoxy. He says:—

"I defy scholars to prove that the Israelites were ever, as a body, in Egypt; that they were delivered therefrom by Moses; that the people wandered during forty years 'in the desert,' received a code of laws from Jehovah on Sinai, and were, in any sense whatever of the words, 'the chosen people of God.'

"I assert that the whole history of the Old Testament is untrue, with the exception of a few parts which tell of unimportant events—e.g., it is probable that the Jews fought with their neighbors, as the Swiss have done in modern days; but I do not believe the tale about Samson, any more than that of William Tell.

"I assert that there is not a single true prophecy in the whole Bible which can be proved to have been written before the event to which it is assumed to point, or which is superior, in any way, to the oracles delivered in various ancient lands.

"I assert that the whole of what is called the Mosaic law had no existence in the days of David, Solomon, and the early Hebrew chieftains or kings, if they are thought to deserve the title."

This was plain and to the point, and I am not aware of any orthodox champion who has successfully taken up his challenge on these topics.

In 1871 Dr. Inman retired from practice, and resided at Clifton, near Bristol, where he died on May 3, 1876. He was a man of handsome presence, and his genial temperament made him generally popular, despite his outspoken heresy. His antiquarian works will long hold a distinguished place in the cabinets of the curious.

(The late) J. M. WHEELER.

"Shaw Among the Prophets."

MR. BERNARD SHAW has often been witty at the expense of other people, but he has never been exposed to such a fusillade of wit as at the meeting on Sunday at the Queen's Hall, London, when Mr. G. W. Foote lectured on "Shaw Among the Prophets."

Mr. Collette Jones presided, and prior to the address Mr. Foote performed the pleasing ceremony of naming Raymond William Newman, the infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Newman, who were both present.

The lecture, which dealt with Mr. Shaw's opinions on religion, was in Mr. Foote's happiest vein. It was, the lecturer said, to be regarded as a polite duel, and not so bad as a match at the National Sporting Club. Mr. Shaw was a wit and humorist, and must make allowance for the possibility of those faculties in other persons.

In the old days of the Shelley Society—which Mr. Foote said was defunct, but Shelley was not—Mr. Shaw declared himself a Republican, a Vegetarian, and an Atheist; a proceeding which nearly broke up the society. When Man and Superman was published in 1903, he was still an Atheist. In the following ten years, however, he had become more orthodox on the subject of marriage and religion. The import of Man and Superman was that we shall never have real progress in the world until we breed the right kind of children. We come from lowly origin, and our object should be to breed only what is human, and to leave the tigerish element behind. The present habit of allowing lunatics on holiday to increase the population was wicked. If the Bishop of London wanted to marry, he would say to him, My dear sir, don't.

Mr. Shaw regarded Man and Superman as a Bible, a sixpenny book of religion; but this was not a new idea, for more than a hundred years before Thomas Paine wrote a sixpenny book on religion. In Mr. Shaw's lecture on "Modern Religion" he seemed to have a poor idea of any other religion than his own, which was a characteristic of pious people generally—say, for instance, the Christians in Belfast, who without religion would be a happy family. Mr. Shaw also contended that men must have a religion if they were to do anything; and religion just meant having convictions and being in earnest about them; so the question to ask was, whether a man was serious? Fancy Mr. Shaw asking such a question.

Mr. Shaw stated that he was very active in preventing people baiting Bradlaugh in the days of the Parliamentary struggle. But Bradlaugh was first elected in 1880, and at that time Mr. Shaw was a youth. He did not become prominent until the nineties. Mr. Shaw says he has never been a Materialist, but this is a quarrel over words. Bradlaugh himself was a Monist. Mr. Shaw says that he went to the Hall of Science after Bradlaugh's death, when the Secularists were looking for another leader, and his address there threw the audience into transports of rage. But this was not the case, for Mr. Shaw was merely invited to lecture to fill a vacancy on the platform. Mr. Bradlaugh was recently dead, Mrs. Besant was chasing will-o'-the-wisps, Mr. Symes was in Australia, Mr. Collins in New Zealand, and Mr. Aveling had taken up with Socialism.

Mr. Shaw contended that he was religious, and says he believes in the dogmas of the Immaculate Conception and the Trinity; but, unless he meant what the Christians do, he was merely playing with words. The Rev. R. J. Campbell appears to have converted Mr. Shaw to the view that Jesus had actually existed, whereas modern scholarship showed that the Christ of the Gospels had no more real existence than the Knights of the Round Table or William Tell.

Mr. Shaw was severe on the Methodists, and had a great hatred of the doctrine of the Atonement, but there was nothing novel in this, for Thomas Paine was ashamed of it at eight years of age, and all decent people had left it behind.

Mr. Shaw claimed that he had taken out his watch and challenged the Deity to strike him dead. People had stated that they had actually seen Bradlaugh do the same thing. God never did it, nor did Bradlaugh, for he was not an ass. If Mr. Shaw ever did it, he was more foolish than he has ever been taken for. Mr. Shaw admits his deity has no existence, for he says his god is only coming into existence. Sir Oliver Lodge says the same thing in other words. He says to the Deity, "Don't despair. Help is coming—from Birmingham."

Mr. Shaw says he is a mystic—that is, a man in a mist—"the most unkindest cut of all." There is something impish in his genius. There is no new religion, for superstition is as old as man's ignorance, solid as his credulity, and lasting as his weakness. Are we to think that this new profession is the result of keeping bad company at the City Temple? Or is it the result of caring more for the applause of society than for the welfare of ordinary men?

Obituary.

We regret to record the death of Mr. Alfred Clarke, of Birmingham, at the age of sixty-two. He was an old friend of ours, and a close friend of the late Mr. Horace W. Parsons. They used to attend our Birmingham lectures together, and it was usual for them to spend some time with us at our hotel when we visited the city for the purpose of the Town Hall meetings. Mr. Clarke called on us the last time we lectured there. He was suffering from an internal complaint, and he did not expect to meet us again. His death took place at Selby Oak Infirmary, and his relatives gave him a Christian burial, though it is difficult to believe they did not know that this was against his wishes. They even followed it up with a pious mourning card, which would be a source of amusement to him if he could read it. Mr. Clarke's resources were sadly diminished by long illness and indifferent business (he was a dentist), but what little is left is willed to the Freethought movement.—G. W. F.

With dramatic suddenness Mr. Walter Russell Juler, whose account of his friend Cossey's death appeared in these columns only a few weeks ago, died, in his fifty-eight year, at his residence, 10 Locomotive-terrace, Tudhuls, near Willington, Durham, on the 10th inst. Mr. Juler was an enthusiastic convert, and a warm-hearted admirer of Mr. G. W. Foote and the Freethinker. The remains were interred in the presence of his sorrowing family, his fellow-workmen, and a few representative Secularists from Newcastle and South Shields, at Newfield Churchyard, on Saturday, December 13. Mr. Juler's decease is a decided loss to the Freethought movement in Bishop Auckland district, where he was an active and zealous worker for the cause.—R. C.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 31 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE

Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 52 SUNDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

The community which dares not protect its humblest and most hated member in the free utterance of his opinions, no matter how false or hateful, is only a gang of slaves.—WENDELL PHILLIPS.

A God in a Cradle.

NEARLY two thousand years ago a young Jewess was married to an elderly Jew. Her name was Mary and his was Joseph. Two commoner names could not be found, nor probably two commoner people. They discovered nothing, wrote nothing, said nothing, and did nothing of any importance. Their sole achievement was producing children, of whom they had about a dozen. But producing children is a very ordinary feat, especially among Jews, who have always been notably prolific since the days of Pharaoh. Where Joseph and Mary were born nobody knows, and the date of their birth is equally obscure.

We possess just as much information about the time and place of their death. Nothing is known as to where they were buried, or what inscription was cut on their tombstones. History is silent as to what undertaker carried out the funeral arrangements. Their biographies might be written in twenty lines without containing twenty facts.

Joseph and Mary were, according to custom, betrothed before marriage. No doubt they had a pleasant time. Joseph adjourned to the old people's house at the close of his day's work, after a good wash and a brush-up, and took Mary for a walk in the gloaming. They chattered as lovers have always done, Joseph's arm slipped round her waist, she leaned her head on his shoulder, and they kissed each other under the winking stars. When they returned Joseph looked as though he had never been within ten feet of the girl, and Mary's aspect would have defied the innuendoes of a Mephistopheles.

But one night poor Joseph's felicity was, unconsciously to himself, invaded by a stranger. After he had gone home to dream of his sweetheart, and Mary had retired to her maiden pillow, she received an unexpected visit from a handsome young archangel, named Gabriel. His features were inexpressibly beautiful, his form was more perfect than Apollo's, his brown locks hung in graceful curls about his ivory neck, and his splendid wings glowed with all the colors of the rainbow. Had he been an ugly burglar, Mary would have hidden her head under the clothes; but she was so fascinated by his immortal loveliness and his seraphic smile that she sat up and stared at him with mingled alarm and admiration.

Gracefully bowing his graceful head, Gabriel stated that he was sent from heaven to inform her that she should have a child without Joseph's assistance. She was naturally startled at this intelligence, but Gabriel assured her that with God nothing was impossible, and before he left she was fully persuaded that his prophecy would be fulfilled.

Mary hid all these things in her heart. She said not a word to Joseph or the old people, until her condition could no longer be concealed, when she told them everything. Her parents laughed at her story, and it was with great difficulty that her mother was restrained from giving her a bald head. As it was, she gave her an illuminated face. Joseph swore that her story was a flam, and walked out of the house, vowing never to see her again. He then went home, drowned his sorrows in three bottles of wine, and fell dead—asleep.

While in this condition he had a dream. Gabriel appeared to him, stated that Mary's baby was "of the Holy Ghost," and warned him against treating her with any cruelty or disrespect. When he awoke he believed it all, and soon afterwards he married his young woman, much to the delight of the old people, who had anticipated a frightful scandal.

Some profane persons say that Joseph was easily satisfied. They doubt whether any young fellow courting a girl nowadays would believe such a story on the same evidence. They object that a dream is a shadowy basis for the doctrine of the incarnation. They assert that if Jesus wanted to prove his divine origin beyond all dispute he should have dispensed with a mother as well as a father. That, they say, would have been a miracle; but there is no miracle in a child being born without a father, for it happens every day. Let the reader, however, pay no heed to these sceptical wretches, as he values the salvation of his immortal soul. Belief is easy, and hell is hot.

In due course (reader, you must believe it) Mary's miraculous baby came to light. Raphael's pictures, which were painted from original photographs, give us an idea of his beauty. And this beautiful baby was God. His name was Jesus (or Joshua), but he was really God.

God cried, and screamed and kicked. God flung about his little legs, God made aimless dashes into space with his little arms. God stared foolishly at his own little toes. God smiled when he was comfortable, and howled when pricked by a nasty pin. God was suckled at Mary's breast. God lay in a cradle and was rocked asleep. God had the measles, and perhaps the whooping-cough and scarletina. Eighteen centuries later God would have been vaccinated. God learned to walk by the family furniture. God often tumbled down on his nose or on the broader part he once displayed to Moses. God was taught his letters. God got spanked when he misbehaved, and, as soon as he was big enough, God went out and played at marbles and mud-pies with other boys, some of whom he thrashed, and some of whom thrashed him.

P S.—We do not believe a word of the foregoing narrative. It is not our "blasphemy"—it is Bible "blasphemy." And if justice were done the publishers and vendors of that book would take the place of the "blasphemer" who is now studying "Christian charity" in Stafford Prison. The above article is taken from a longer one which we wrote and published in the first Christmas Number of the Freethinker, within a year of our own imprisonment for "blasphemy" in 1883-84. It was our answer, as it were, to our prosecutors. It showed how little they had intimidated us by twelve months' imprisonment. Its reproduction shows how unrepentant we are after the lapse of thirty years. It will also show whether they have the courage to attack those who are not helpless.

The Forlorn Atheist.

IN dealing with Mr. Coulson's article on "The Failure of the Churches," there was one point that I left untouched, but which is well worth a word of criticism. This was concerned with the assumed forlorn state of those who have rejected religious beliefs, and who are supposed to be drifting about in a more or less miserable condition, casting envious looks towards those who are still within the ranks of the faithful. Mr. Coulson speaks of the Agnostic with his "chilly and negative creed," just as many other writers depict the Atheist having given up religion with much heartburning, and living in a constant state of regret that he is not as others are. For much of this talk many Freethinkers—of a kind—are themselves to blame. In the issue of the Sunday Chronicle, for example, following that in which Mr. Coulson's article appeared, a correspondent writes from Manchester:—

> "It must not be forgotten that thousands of Agnostics were once among the 'faithful'; that they reluctantly left the fold because they could not reconcile the teachings of the Church with their notions of truth.....
> "It need hardly be stated that the Agnostic is never up against genuine Christianity (some of us are bold enough to declare we have that), but against 'Churchianity' and shams."

I cannot say what some "Agnostics" do or do not believe—that species is divided into so many varieties that it is difficult to be certain on this point—but I can say that every Freethinker who understands Freethought is "up against" genuine Christianity with much greater vigor than he opposes the adulterated article. For the adulteration consists in mixing up with Christianity a number of social and ethical teachings to which it can lay no exclusive claim. Genuine Christianity is orthodox Christianity, and the more orthodox the more genuine. It embraces the belief in miracles, in prayer, in possession, in hell and heaven, in angels and in devils, and in other things that modern thought unhesitatingly condemns. The Christianity that is popular is not genuine; it is a hotch-potch of ideals and teachings to which Christianity can lay no real claim. My own complaint is, not that I disagree with current Christianity because it is not pure, but because it offers people what is not Christianity—because it gets them to support Christianity under false pretences. A Freethinker ought to be a clear thinker; and it is hardly clear thinking to talk about Agnostics or Atheists claiming to have a "genuine Christianity," as though that were a valuable article. Christianity is bad when it is genuine; it is also bad when it annexes good humanitarian teachings and robs these of much of their force by the association.

This talk of Agnostics being genuine Christians belongs to the same class as references to a man like Bradlaugh being a real Christian, or a Christian without knowing it. It is an insult disguised as a compliment. Bradlaugh was not a Christian, consciously or unconsciously. If Christians mean that he was a better man than the vast majority of Christians, they will be saying nothing but the truth. But his superiority was not due to his having "genuine Christianity," but to selecting the humanitarian elements from current life, and leaving the Christian ones rigorously alone.

So much by the way. Now let us get back to the unhappy Agnostic—or Atheist. Mr. Coulson most probably knows a number of Agnostics. I daresay he also numbers Atheists among his acquaintance. How many of them does he find in urgent need of consolation, or living in a state of regret that they are no longer Christians? After an experience of nearly a quarter of a century among them, I have failed to discover any of this particular type. On the contrary, the invariable testimony is that they are happier as Atheists than they were as Christians, and that their outlook on life is more cheerful and inspiring. And when they say this, their testimony is final. You cannot go behind it and prove that they are less happy than they were, or that they do regret their lost beliefs without knowing it? Why, then, is there this constant talk about the disconsolate unbeliever? Really it is all a pose with the ordinary journalist. He does not know these miserable Freethinkers; he has only heard about them from religious sources, and he repeats the legend as a concession to orthodox feelings.

I have the greatest possible difficulty in realising how anyone could regret a discarded belief. Like most people, I have shed a few in the course of my life, but I cannot honestly say that I ever experienced any sorrow or looked back upon them regretfully. I can quite appreciate the fact that the surrender of beliefs may be the occasion of a great deal of pain and discomfort. But this arises from quite other causes. Let us take a common case. A man moving in Christian circles, with his family and friends and business associates all Christians, finds his belief in Christianity slipping from him. He sees that to take the honest course and to openly avow his altered convictions means loss of position and friends, and a rupture of family ties. If his friends were not Christians, and had been brought up in a mentally healthy manner, these circumstances would not arise. Being what they are, neither appreciating the nature of intellectual processes, nor of mental honesty, unpleasantness is certain. The man feels keenly the rupture of old associations, the more keenly because the change of mental attitude implies the possession of a rather more sensitive organisation than is common. The result is a period of stress and storm—not due to the loss of a belief, but to the loss of all that intolerance says shall be its consequence.

Assume another set of conditions. Suppose that the man's friends said no more about his change of opinion or religion than they would if he changed his opinion as to the nature of gravitation. How much of this greatly talked-of mental regret and pain would be experienced? Evidently none at all. It is not, then, the belief that one surrenders with reluctance; it is not the lost belief that anyone wishes he still had; it is wholly a question of social and domestic relations broken as a consequence of the dehumanising tendency of a religious education.

Let us take a further step. I have often been asked whether Atheism could ever satisfy human nature, and sometimes have been told that it would not do so. I have invariably replied that Atheism satisfied me, and so far as I represented human nature the answer always seemed conclusive. At all events, what we are satisfied with will be largely determined by what we are looking for, and to a smaller degree by the kind of human nature we are endowed with. A whisky-soddened organisation will not be content with lemonade, and a constitutionally unreflective and superstitious character will not be satisfied with Atheism. All he can do is to say that, as a religious person, he would not be an Atheist. That seems rather a silly thing to say, but it is really what the religious person does say, and a great many religious sayings are silly when we analyse them. And if, after a long course of mental development, the religious man outgrows his beliefs and arrives at Atheism, he can quite as truthfully say that religious beliefs would not satisfy him. And the one statement is as true as the other. Of course, Atheism will not satisfy the religious person. Equally, of course, religion will not satisfy the Atheist. Both are content where they are, and when they arrive anywhere else, they will experience the same mental contentment—that is, so long as the change is not accompanied with social or domestic penalties.

Why on earth should the convinced Agnostic or Atheist feel his position chilly or comfortless, or leave his religion reluctantly, or look back upon it regretfully? As an Atheist, one lacks none of the qualities of mind or nature that one possesses as a Christian. It is a crude and utterly false notion that as a religionist certain qualities are exercised, that atrophy through disuse when one becomes an Atheist. This notion belongs to the crude psychology of the City Temple. All the qualities of mind exercised in connection with religion are exercised in connection with non-religious subjects. The strength of religion really lies in giving our normal, human, and social feelings a religious interpretation. One does not cease to admire, to love, to venerate, to praise honesty and truthfulness and cleanliness because one has ceased to use the traditional jargon. But one does these things in the name of humanity, not in the name of God. There are, as I have often had to point out, no such things as religious feelings, there are only religious beliefs and ideas, and the exercise of ordinary human feelings in connection therewith.

That being so, all that Atheism does is to strip these feelings of their religious disguise and make plain their real nature. It leaves all the legitimate avenues for their exercise and gratification absolutely untouched. It does not deny the reality or value of a single human quality; on the contrary, it emphasises their significance. It is true that the Atheist would arrange human qualities in accord with a different scale of values to that adopted by Christians, but that is about all. He would place more reliance upon reason and less upon mere faith. He would place less emphasis upon self-sacrifice and more upon self-development. He would have less to say on the charity of mere alms-giving, and more on the charity of sympathy and intellectual hospitality. He does not talk about our "poor, weak, human nature," and he does not go about fearing lest each new advance in knowledge should bring the social structure about his ears. Wrong the Atheist may be; cheerful and hopeful the Atheistic position unquestionably is. And it is one of the curiosities of the situation that they who proclaim human nature too poor and too weak to stand alone, should charge those who take the opposite view with having a cold and cheerless philosophy to offer the world.

It is too much to expect that religious preachers will drop this kind of chatter. It is a profitable line and they will work it as long as they can. The only time when a preacher talks sense is when his congregation refuses to listen to nonsense. But it is time, now that Atheism is so common, that journalists and others made themselves better acquainted with the subject. Above all, it is distressing to find Freethinkers acquiescing in this half-sorrowful pose, and speaking as though their surrender of the religious idea involves great heart-burnings, and leaves them to dolefully wander through life as they best know how. The Atheist has nothing to regret because he has left nothing behind him worth regretting; and to many, the losing of religion brought positive relief. It is strange, that having nearly killed the legend of the dying Atheist shrieking out for forgiveness for his unbelief, we should be confronted with living ones stalking through life miserable and depressed because they have a little more common sense than their fellows. Sterne thought but poorly of the man who could travel the world from Dan to Beersheba and cry "all is barren," and it would be equally surprising to find the Atheist, with the whole world of nature and of human nature before him, regretting the childish trumpery of the Christian creed.

C. COHEN.

What a Century Has Done.

AT this season of the year we naturally indulge, as Freethinkers, in more or less edifying comparisons between the present and the past, and examine the prospects of our propaganda. Of course, we must judge to-day in the light of yesterday, and appraise the future by the help of that judgment. Our first question is, Has "the best of causes" made any substantial progress during, say, the last hundred and twenty years? Are we nearer the goal now than we were then? It is well known that the French Revolution of 1789 was, at first, enthusiastically welcomed by the majority of thoughtful people in this country. There was already in existence here a Society for the express purpose of commemorating the English Revolution of 1688. On November 4, 1789, this Society observed its anniversary at the meeting-house in the Old Jewry, when a celebrated Welshman by the name of Richard Price, a Unitarian clergyman, preached a remarkably bold sermon on the "Love of our Country," in which he maintained that "ignorance is the parent of bigotry, intolerance, persecution, and slavery." Eloquently he sang the praises of three great principles, liberty of conscience, the right to resist power when it is arbitrary and oppressive, and the right to choose our own rulers and to depose them when they misbehave. His peroration was a magnificent prophecy in the following grand style:—

> "I have lived to see thirty millions of people indignant and resolute, spurning at slavery and demanding liberty with an irresistible voice, their king led in triumph, and an arbitrary monarch surrendering himself to his subjects. And now methinks I see the ardor for liberty catching and spreading, a general amendment beginning in human affairs; the dominion of kings changed for the dominion of laws, and the dominion of priests giving way to the dominion of reason and conscience."

The sermon was followed by a stirring speech delivered at a public dinner at the London Tavern. The result of these two audacious deliverances was that the preacher from Newington-square shot at once into front-rank popularity, and the cause of the Revolution became a passion throughout the length and breadth of the land. The fire burned fast and furious, the temperature rose to a great height, and societies sprang up at various centres to supply the requisite fuel.

Ere long, however, two formidable obstacles blocked the way to victory—Burke and the French Terror. Burke was a great statesman, and his opposition to the Revolution, though for a time unavailing, was bound, in the long run, to exert a tremendous influence upon British thought. He saw fit to reply to Dr. Price's utterances, who readily returned the compliment. Meanwhile, the statesman stood practically alone, his party being almost to a man against him. His appeal was to the order of the world which was pre-ordained and sacred, and with which we had no right to interfere. Parliament as then composed was in his estimation a complete representation of the commoners of Great Britain, though Old Sarum, without constituents, had two members, while Birmingham, Manchester, Leeds, Sheffield, and Bradford, with their teeming thousands, had not one among them. The existing order was an inheritance from Providence, which it was the imperative duty of statesmen to safeguard at whatever cost. It was the shallowest and most fallacious of arguments, and Paine, in his Rights of Man, smashed it to smithereens. But the inhuman excesses of the Terror yielded it an apparently irrefutable confirmation, and the British people rallied to its support. Though Burke despised the common people, calling them in his wrath the "swinish multitude," there took place a wonderful reaction against the Revolution. There was quite a revolution going on, the object of which was to put down the Revolution; and it succeeded to an amazing extent. The friends of the Revolution were marvellously courageous and energetic. The Corresponding Society boasted of thirty thousand members in London alone, all of whom cried aloud for Parliamentary reform. Thomas Hardy, its founder, William Godwin, its philosophical defender, Thomas Holcroft, Horne Tooke, and many others of the leaders, were strong, brave men, who loved righteousness and truth, and fearlessly fought for what they believed to be the right; but against Burke and the Terror they could not possibly succeed. In May, 1794, the Corresponding Society held its anniversary dinner at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, when the band played "Ca ira," the "Carmagnole," and the "Marseillaise." Speaking of this occasion Mr. Brailsford says:—

> "That dinner must have marked the height of the revolutionary tide in England. The reaction was already rampant and vindictive, and before the year 1794 was out it had crushed the progressive movement and postponed for thirty-eight years the triumph of Parliamentary Reform. It requires a strenuous exercise of the imagination to conceive the panic which swept over England as the news of the French Terror circulated. It fastened impartially on every class of the community, and destroyed the emotional balance no less of Pitt and his colleagues than of the working men who formed the Church and King mobs. Proclamations were issued to quell insurrections which never had been planned, and the militia called out when not a hand had been raised against the King throughout Great Britain.....A mob burned Dr. Priestley's home near Birmingham for no better reason than because he was supposed to have attended a Reform dinner, which he in fact did not attend. Hardy's bookshop in Piccadilly was rushed by a mob, and his wife, about to be confined, was injured in her efforts to escape, and died a few hours afterwards. A hunt went on all over the kingdom for booksellers and printers to prosecute, and when Thomas Paine was prosecuted in his absence for publishing the Rights of Man, the jury was so determined to find him guilty that they would not trouble to hear the case for the Crown" (Shelley, Godwin, and Their Circle, pp. 38, 39).

The spirit of persecution now mercilessly stalked along from end to end of the land, and no lover of truth and freedom was safe. At Essex a dissenting minister named Winterbotham preached a sermon somewhat resembling, but of a milder character than the one alluded to by Dr. Price; but the poor fellow was tried for it and sentenced to four years' imprisonment and a fine of £200. Mr. Brailsford mentions an attorney, one John Frost, who for casually saying that in his opinion we could manage very well without kings was imprisoned, set in the pillory, and struck off the rolls. In the year 1793 the Reformers of Scotland arranged to hold a Convention at Edinburgh to advocate shorter Parliaments and universal suffrage. The idea of uttering sedition in any shape or form was entirely foreign to its promoters. The Convention met and held several perfectly orderly sessions, but one day the magistrates entered and had five of the delegates arrested without rhyme or reason. They were tried before a judge and sentenced to fourteen years' exile at Botany Bay, of whom only one lived to return to his native land.

At this period religious persecution flourished abundantly. Burke declared that Atheists were "infidels or outlaws of the constitution, not of this country, but of the human race." In 1797 a man called Thomas Williams, a poor bookseller, sold one copy of the second part of the Age of Reason, and a society sometimes known as the "Proclamation Society," and sometimes as the "Vice Society," undertook his prosecution. He was tried before Lord Kenyon, who pompously announced that the Christian religion was part of the law of the land, and the jury brought in a verdict of "Guilty." Sentence was postponed, and the wretched man had to languish in gaol from June, 1797, till April 28, 1798, when he was sentenced to one year's imprisonment, and to be bound over in his own recognizances for £1,000. Williams humbly begged that he might be supplied with a bed, but Lord Kenyon said sternly: "I cannot order that. I daresay you will be treated properly. I wish to have it understood that this statement is a very great abatement of the punishment, as in modern times, within the period I have sat in Westminster Hall, three years' imprisonment has been ordered for an offence of much less enormity than this, for this publication is horrible to the ears of a Christian" (Mrs. B. Bonner's Penalties upon Opinions, pp. 31-34). And all this cruel, inhuman treatment for selling a single copy of the second part of the Age of Reason!

Well, we have made considerable progress since then. We are still objects of ostracism, calumny, even black lying, and sometimes of prosecution and imprisonment under the odious Blasphemy Laws; but an impartial student of history must admit that our present treatment, even at its very worst, is enormously humaner than it was a century, even a quarter of a century, ago. There is still much room for improvement, and we must keep on agitating and educating public opinion until the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws and of the various Lord's Day Observance Acts has become an accomplished fact. As we are about to commence another year of service in the cause of freedom, let us fill our minds with the absolute conviction that Truth is mighty and must prevail and completely shatter the grievous yoke of superstition; and while cherishing and acting upon this rational conviction, may we all have A HAPPY NEW YEAR.

J. T. LLOYD.

"Wait Till You Come to Die."—IV.

> "The Church has taken great pains to show that the last moments of all infidels—that Christians did not succeed in burning—were infinitely wretched and despairing. It was alleged that words could not paint the horrors that were endured by a dying infidel. Every good Christian was expected to, and generally did, believe these accounts. They have been told and retold in every pulpit of the world. Protestant ministers have repeated the lies invented by Catholic priests; and Catholics, by a kind of theological comity, have sworn to the lies told by the Protestants. Upon this point they have always stood together, and will as long as the same falsehood can be used by both. Upon the death-bed subject the clergy grow eloquent. When describing the shudderings and shrieks of the dying unbeliever, their eyes glitter with delight. It is a festival. They are no longer men; they become hyenas; they dig open graves; they devour the dead. It is a banquet. Unsatisfied still, they paint the terrors of hell. They gaze at the souls of the infidels writhing in the coils of the worm that never dies. They see them in flames—in oceans of fire—in abysses of despair. They shout with joy; they applaud. It is an auto-da-fé, presided over by God."—COLONEL INGERSOLL, Oration on Voltaire, pp 25-26.

WE will now deal briefly with Thomas Paine, whose death-bed is generally coupled with that of Voltaire as dreadful examples of infidel wretchedness at the moment of death.

The first part of the Age of Reason, in which Paine attacked the inspiration of the Bible, was written in Paris during the French Revolution, while he was in momentary fear of arrest by the Revolutionary Tribunal. His friends were falling fast under the guillotine. To quote his own words, "I appeared to myself to be on my death-bed, for death was on every side of me, and I had no time to lose. This accounts for my writing at the time."* He had not finished this first part more than six hours before he was arrested and taken to prison. The guard, however—whose kindness Paine acknowledges—allowed him to hand the manuscript to Joel Barlow to be conveyed to the printer.

The second part of the Age of Reason was actually written while Paine was in prison. Rickman says:—

> "Paine, while in the Luxembourg prison and expecting to die hourly, read to Mr. Bond (surgeon, of Brighton, from whom this anecdote came) parts of his Age of Reason; and every night when Mr. Bond left him, to be separately locked up, and expecting not to see Paine alive in the morning, he [Paine] always expressed his firm belief in the principles of that book, and begged Mr. Bond should tell the world such were his dying sentiments. Paine further said, if he lived he should further prosecute the work and print it. Bond added, Paine was the most conscientious man he ever knew." †

There is not much resemblance here to the orthodox picture of the terror-stricken infidel faced with death. Paine's only anxiety was lest he might be executed before the Age of Reason was finished, and its so-called blasphemies printed and given to the public.

His escape from the guillotine—if it had happened to a believer—would have been cited as a miraculous interposition of Providence. For when the fatal chalk mark, which denoted that he was to be executed in the morning, was placed on his cell door, it was inadvertently placed inside the door instead of outside; so that, on the following morning, the door being closed, the guards passed it by. This saved his life until his enemies, in their turn, perished under the guillotine, and he was liberated.*

In a pious work, entitled the Life and Gospel Labors of Stephen Grellet, there is a most circumstantial account, given by a certain Mary Hinsdale, that she heard Paine, on his death-bed, cry, "Lord Jesus, have mercy upon me"; she also heard him declare, "If the Devil has ever had any agency in any work, he has had it in my writing that book [the Age of Reason]." This statement has been the foundation for all the lying fables circulated about Paine's death-bed. But, fortunately, we have the best of evidence as to the falsity of this statement.

Sturdy old Cobbett, who, from being one of Paine's most violent assailants, became converted, through Paine's political writings, into one of his most eloquent defenders, investigated this story on the spot—in America, where Paine died.

Paine died at the house of Madame Bonneville, a French lady who fled to America from the French Revolution. The true account of his death is given by Moncure Conway in his standard Life of Thomas Paine, a work which cost him many years of patient research. It runs as follows:—

> "After the years in which the stories of Paine's wretched end have been accumulating, now appears the testimony of the Catholic lady,—persons who remember Madame Bonneville assure me that she was a perfect lady,—that Paine's mind was active to the last, that shortly before death he made a humorous retort to Dr. Romaine, that he died after a tranquil night.
> "Paine died at eight o'clock on the morning of June 8, 1809. Shortly before, two clergymen had invaded his room, and so soon as they spoke about his opinions Paine said: 'Let me alone; good morning!' Madame Bonneville asked if he was satisfied with the treatment he had received in her house, and he said 'Oh yes.' These were the last words of Thomas Paine" (p. 322).

During Paine's last days, he received many visits from Mr. Willett Hicks, a broad-minded Quaker, who visited Paine as a friend, and without any objective religious design. Willett Hicks told Gilbert Vale—the author of a Life of Paine—that after Paine's death he was beset by pleading questions from his Quaker brethren, "Did thee never hear him call on Christ?" "As for money," said Hicks, "I could have had any sum."

It was Willett Hicks who—when following the funeral of Paine—being told by a Christian gentleman that Paine would get a good share of purgatory before the Devil would let him go, replied that "he would sooner take his chance with Paine than any man in New York on that score."†

Now, the Mary Hinsdale (then known by her maiden name, Mary Roscoe) who floated the pious fable of Paine's death-bed recantation, was a servant in Willett Hicks's house, and ten years after Paine's death she pretended that she had been sent with some delicacy to Paine, and had heard him say the words we have before quoted.

Willett Hicks "declared she never saw Paine at all."‡ When she was hunted out by Cobbett, "she shuffled, she evaded, she affected not to understand," says Cobbett, and finally said she had "no recollection of any person or thing she saw at Thomas Paine's house."§ Cobbett declared the whole story of Paine's recantation to be "a lie from beginning to end." Finally, the same Mary Hinsdale afterwards "reported," says Moncure Conway,—

> "that a distinguished member of the Hicksite Society, Mary Lockwood, had recanted in the same way as Paine. This being proved false, the hysterical Mary sank and remained in oblivion, from which she is recalled only by the Rev. Rip Van Winkle."*

Thomas Paine never altered his opinions. Willett Hicks, the Quaker, says so. Madame Bonneville, the Roman Catholic, says so. So do the numerous clergymen and others who pestered Paine's last days by beseeching him to repent. The evidence is overwhelming.

These death-bed lies are easy to concoct, but not easy to disprove; we commend to the evangelical clergy who are so fond of using the "Infidel Death-bed" argument the following Roman Catholic account of the deaths of Luther and Calvin, the founders of the Protestant Churches. It is taken from a book written by Mgr. Segur, published in Boston by T. B. Noonan & Co., entitled Plain Talk About the Protestantism of To-day, where we are told:—

> "Luther died forlorn of God, blaspheming to the very end. His last word was an attestation of impenitence. His eldest son, who had doubts both about the reformation and the reform, asked him for a last time whether he persevered in the doctrine he preached. 'Yes,' replied a gurgling sound from the old sinner's throat—and Luther was before his God" (p. 225).

Calvin, continues this Christian priest, died of scarlet fever, devoured by vermin, and eaten up by an ulcerous abscess, the stench whereof drove away every person. In great misery he gave up his rascally ghost, despairing of salvation, evoking the devils from the abyss, and uttering oaths most horrible and blasphemies most frightful (p. 225) †

Do we believe these "idle tales of dying horrors," as Carlyle called them? No, we do not; they are Lies, Lies, Lies. But they illustrate the power of religion in making men bear false witness when it tends to the glory of God. We do not believe that any other motive but religion would induce anyone to such wickedness as putting lies into the mouth of a man after he is past the power of contradicting them. Sir Richard Burton, the famous traveller and linguist, was a well-known Freethinker, but when he was lying unconscious on the verge of death, his Roman Catholic wife called in a priest, who administered the sacrament to the unconscious body, and Burton was claimed as "reconciled" to the Catholic Church. The same farce was played over the body of Littré, the great French Atheist.

During Charles Bradlaugh's last illness, his daughter—knowing the manners and customs of Christians in the matter of dying Freethinkers—took the precaution to get the signed testimony of the doctor and nurses who attended her father's last illness. It was well she did so, for the usual batch of lies appeared. Even such well-known public people as the late Mr. Charles Cooper, editor of the Scotsman, the late Sir Isaac Holden, and the Countess Wachtmeister declared that Mr. Bradlaugh changed his opinions before he died.

Mr. Bradlaugh's daughter says:—

> "The very last words I heard him utter during the night of his death were reminiscent of his voyage to India. Never throughout the whole time did he by sign or sound indicate that there was the smallest change in his opinions."‡ superstition. It is that Christ was never seen to smile, but often to weep. This does not concern Freethinkers overmuch, for those unrepentant sinners do not think it likely that the "Man of Sorrows" would, as Shakespeare puts it, "laugh mortal." Man is, however, a laughing animal, and in this he is superior, if in nothing else. To be ashamed of laughter, to hold back merriment and mirth; to live in gloom and seriousness may suit the ascetics, but is unworthy of men, who love sunshine and the song of children, and the open breezy day, rather than the spectral quiet and gloom of the cloister.

Hence the convivial nature of Christmas Day, alleged to be the birthday of Christ, has frequently been noted to the discomfiture of theologians, who object to the rationalistic explanation of Christianity. "God's birthday" is an orgy of gluttony and godliness, and the reason for this is an excellent piece of Christian evidence, for it plucks the heart out of the orthodox superstition.

Christmas Day was not kept regularly until many generations after the alleged birth of Christ. When first observed, it was kept on varying dates. The precise time of Jesus' birth, like that of James de la Pluche, was "wropt in mystery"; but it certainly was not in December. Why, then, do Christians observe Christmas Day on December 25, and why is the birthday of the ascetic "Man of Sorrows" a veritable carnival of conviviality?

Like all human institutions, the Christian Churches and their feast days have had to contend in open warfare for survival. The festivals of Pagan Rome were numerous, and it was in competition with the feast of the Saturnalia, one of the principal Roman festivals, that Christmas Day came to be instituted by the Christians, and the date fixed as December 25. The anniversary of Saturn was an old-established institution, and the propensity of converts from Paganism to cling to custom proved invincible. If the apostates were to be retained in the folds of the new religion, it was imperative for the Christians to incorporate the old under the mask of the new.

This struggle for survival has been maintained ever since. In the past the Church sought for adherents by increasing her festal days, and she crushed opposition by bribing the weak and murdering the strong. In the twentieth century she is cajoling apostates all over the non-Christian world by means of medical missionaries, and at home by instituting Pleasant Sunday Afternoons in the place of painful Sabbaths, and by hypocritically identifying herself with social measures which appeal to the working classes.

Even the Christian festival itself, with all its hypocritical profession of goodwill, is largely pretence and make-believe. Not once in its persecuting history has the Christian Church manifested "goodwill to men" when those men were opposed to its own creed. The nations which worship the Prince of Peace keep millions in the grasp of militarism from the Elbe to the Spree, from the Seine to the Neva. Whether the nation be England, America, France, Russia, or Germany, the fact is the same. With the gospels on their tables and the creeds on their lying lips, the nations have priestly blessings on their warfare, and invoke Christ before launching their battleships.

Slum landlords, the employers of sweated labor, dealers in adulterated goods, see no inconsistency in murmuring in their seats at worship, "Return good for evil," "Blessed be ye poor," and the rest of the parrot recitative of peace and forbearance. When Freethinkers point out the inconsistency of such conduct, they are regarded as madmen, and insulted and imprisoned. Yet who can deny that, if Christ's commands had any power, it would be viewed as a frightful crime to make weapons of murder or to grind the faces of the poor. The old jest that "singing hymns never prevented a grocer from sanding his sugar" expresses in a sentence what may be said in all seriousness of the powerlessness of Christianity to affect daily life and conduct.

For of all powerless things on earth, Christianity is the feeblest, even though sovereigns are still consecrated, multitudes still baptised, parliaments and tribunals still opened, and myriads of churches and chapels still built in its name. It has become a hollow make-believe, a robe with a corpse hidden within it. There is no Devil there at all except the men who make money out of this sham, and who hiss at the thinkers who would free mankind from their influence.

The Freethinkers are not frightened by bugbears of ignorance and superstition. They stand calmly where they have arrived, knowing that in the fulness of time the altar of Christ will be superseded by the altar of Truth. Even the festival of Yuletide will gain by the change, for no longer will it be associated with an organised hypocrisy, nor will it be a pretended celebration of an event that never happened.

The Daily Mirror struts and brags as if it had saved the life of Mrs. Williams, who was sentenced to death for the murder of her little boy. What saved her was the fact that she was going to be a mother again. Her sentence is commuted to penal servitude for life; which, by the way, does not necessarily mean that she will be imprisoned for any great length of time. Of course the Daily Mirror printed a few more final letters on the matter, and naturally there was one from Bishop Welldon, the Dean of Manchester. Look at this as a sample of the reverend gentleman's wisdom. After remarking that the hanging of a woman would be a departure from general usage, he continued:—

> "I approve that usage of a humane instance of the privileges accorded to women, just because they are women. I hope that women will not forfeit their privileged position."

Does he approve it? But the non-execution of female murderers in no way depends upon his approval. And how on earth could women forfeit their privileged position, when it is theirs merely as women? Can they unsex themselves? The Bishop is in a sad muddle.

The principal business streets in the borough of Southend-on-Sea, which includes the "aristocratic" Westcliff-on-Sea—have been decorated for the Christmas holiday at the expense of the local tradesmen, who want to bring people from far and near outside their shops, where, like the good Christians they are, they labor not for meat which perisheth. (N.B.—The "meat" in this case applies to everything eatable.) The decorations are not exactly artistic, but there is an attempt at something beyond red, white, and blue electric lights here and there. King George's crown is not forgotten; in fact, he seems to be the presiding genius of the show. We do not notice a single religious element; it is the display of a secular festival throughout; and Jesus Christ has not so much as a look in the celebration. Yet there are a lot of bigoted Christians in Southend and Westcliff; and, with the aid of the county licensing magistrates, they have closed the Sunday picture shows for a good many years. Why then is poor Jesus Christ treated in this insulting manner? It is done, of course, in the name of business, which is now the most sacred word in the English dictionary—beating "God," "Christ," the "Holy Mother," ay, and the "Holy Father" into fits. Moreover, it is sad to say, that the "Let us pray!" in the Lord's house on Sunday is too often translated into "Let us prey" on the Monday morning.

One of life's little ironies is displayed in the fact that the Southend Municipal Cemetery is under the control of the local Entertainments Committee. They might plead that some of their clients join the "heavenly choir."

Lord Haldane has been telling Anglicans and Nonconformists that if they don't agree—and he is afraid they won't—on the subject of religious instruction, they will both be put out of the elementary schools in England. It is their quarreling, he says, which is making it impossible to do anything like justice to Education in this country. Is this a foreshadowing of Secular Education. We hope so. But you can never be sure of these slippery politicians.

Mr. Asquith received a Nonconformist deputation on the educational question. Dr. Clifford was the chief speaker, and was assisted by Rev. F. B. Meyer and Rev. J. Scott Lidgett. Who wants to know any more? These Nonconformists know their book. They are not the three blind mice.

Sir Edward Grey states plainly that the sole cause of the Home Rule quarrel is religion. Belfast would be a happy family if it were not for the mutual hatred of Catholic and Protestant. Perhaps the Bishop of London will remember this when he turns his attention to Ireland again.

The Bishop of London is a sad nincompoop, and there are a great many clergymen in his diocese to match him. No less than 452 of them have signed a request for public prayer on the Irish question. The idea is that the supporters and opponents of Home Rule may gather up under the banner of the Church, who will say, "Bless you, my children!" Then the wisdom of the Lord will descend upon them, they will agree with each other at once, and a settlement of the Irish question pleasing to all parties will take place immediately. Carson and Redmond, Asquith and Bonar Law, Sir Edward Grey and Austen Chamberlain, Lloyd George and F. E. Smith, will fall upon each other's necks and weep for joy. And all will be for the best in the best of all possible worlds. What a lovely picture! And what a lovely lot of fools believe it will be realised.

"Artifex," in the Manchester Guardian, falls foul of Mr. Hugh S. Elliott for some of his remarks concerning the relation of neural states to neural processes. He says, by way of introduction, that Mr. Elliott is the author of "a remarkably poor book on M. Bergson." Of course, one way of meeting sneers of this kind is to reply in directly opposite terms. As a matter of fact, Mr. Elliott's criticism of Bergson is anything but a "poor book." So far as it goes, it is remarkably well done; and Mr. Elliott went the right way to work when he reduced the position of M. Bergson to plain language. In the long run, this is the most effective way of dealing with one who deals very largely in words. "Artifex" would doubtless have been better pleased if Mr. Elliott had indulged in page after page of metaphysics on the opposite side, but the result would not have been nearly so conclusive. Mr. Elliott's was one of the few pieces of writing on the subject that really pricked the bubble of Bergsonism.

The particular statement that "Artifex" falls foul of is this: Mr. Elliott, he says, writes that—

> "Physiology has proved beyond any power of doubt that all our acts, all our thoughts, and all our emotions are dependent purely and exclusively on material events proceeding in the brain, and that these material events are set going by the ordinary laws of matter and motion. A human being, like all other animals, is an excessively complex organism, of which every movement is a necessary consequence of some previous arrangement of material particles. The whole is susceptible of complete explanation in terms of physics and chemistry; there is unquestionably no such thing as a vital force, nor is there the least rag of evidence in favor of the existence of a soul."

"Of course," says "Artifex," "this is pure nonsense."

It is easy enough to polish off a statement that one doesn't like with an "Of course"; but, with the exception of two or three words in Mr. Elliott's summary, all he says is the commonly accepted ground of all scientific investigation. There is not a physiologist or psychologist of any authority who does not assume in all his investigations that neural processes do provide the equivalent of mental states. How they do this is quite another question; and while there is a wide divergence of opinion on this second question, there is a fairly general agreement on the first. "Artifex" says "we are no nearer an explanation to-day of how a series of chemical changes and molecular movements in the brain issue in a fact of consciousness than we were a century ago." "Artifex" invites plain speaking, and so we beg to say that if he really understood what he was talking about he would not make much of this. The only kind of explanation here or elsewhere is the establishment of equivalents. How a union of oxygen and hydrogen issues in water we do not know, and we do not know because the "how" is meaningless. All we do know is that one is the equivalent of the other. And it is the same with psychology. When it has been shown that neural processes always accompany mental states, we have laid the foundations of a science of physiological psychology. When we are able to show how these neural states vary with given mental states, our science will be complete. That is as far as we can ever get—either in this or in any other matter. A complete scientific explanation is the demonstration that, in the case of any two series, one is the equivalent of the other; and that, given one, the other invariably follows. What "Artifex" and his kind lack is a little acquaintance with scientific method.

One other point in conclusion. It is generally thought by writers like "Artifex" that it is the duty of the Materialist to point out in what way body and mind are connected. This is not the case. The connection of the two is axiomatic; it is an everyday experience. What has to be shown is how they can be disconnected. In what way can the one exist apart from the other? Mr. Elliott is quite right in saying that there is not a shred of evidence in support of the existence of a "soul."

The Poor Clergy Relief Corporation advertises the fact that it has relieved no less than 32,000 cases of clerical distress. The glorious Gospel does not appear to prevent the clergy's sweating one another.

The London Missionary Society has an accumulated deficiency of over £100,000. Some of the aborigines may breathe again, for the European capitalist soon follows the colporteurs.

"We can only express our gratitude in symbols," says a writer in a church magazine. The clergy see to it that those symbols are £ s. d.

Why is it that theatrical people are made so much of by the newspapers? One would think, from the interviews they undergo, that they were of great authority in all departments of human life and thought; whereas, on the whole, it is notorious that they are very much the contrary. Sir Herbert Tree, for instance, having arrived at the age of sixty, was interviewed by a representative of the Daily Chronicle. Amongst the views he expressed was one on books and reading. There were rows of books on the wall of the room he was sitting in, but "he declared that he had not read more than ten books in twenty years. The neglect of books is Sir Herbert's prescription for retaining youth. 'Otherwise,' he says, 'you think in quotations.'" Now is not this ridiculous? And is it not entirely false? The most original minded men, of course, are the great poets, and great poets have always been great readers. Emerson justly notes that Shakespeare was a great reader. Did he think in quotations? Other people think in quotations from him. Ben Jonson, of course, was an extremely learned person. Spenser was learned too, though not quite a rival to Ben. Milton's choice erudition is proverbial. Dryden read extensively. Pope was probably less so, but many good books passed through his hands. When we come to later English poets, such as Cowper, Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Shelley, we find that they were all great readers. Shelley was hardly ever without a book. Coleridge read everything. His annotations enriched the margins of half the world's literature. Tennyson was well read; one scarcely knows what Browning had not read; and George Meredith's reading was evidently wide and deep. Macaulay was not much of a poet; but he was reckoned amongst the great prose writers; he was an insatiable reader, he had also a marvellous memory, yet the books he perused did not impair the value of the books he wrote himself. Sir Herbert Tree was clearly talking nonsense. All men do that at times, but their is no reason why their absurdities should be paraded as wisdom.

The Rev. Albert Swift fell dead from his bicycle last week. As he was not a Freethinker, there is no moral.

"Providence" has been active through the volcano in Ambrym Island in the New Hebrides. Six new craters were formed. Large portions of the island have been devastated by fire, lava, and cinders, and most of the inhabitants had to be rescued by boats and ships. "He doeth all things well."

The Bible God's first commandment was "Be ye fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth." It was given a long time ago, but it has never lost its power, especially with the clergy, who are amongst the foremost promoters of the population. Here is the Rev. J. Carden, for instance, who has just been ordered by the Brentford magistrates to pay towards the upbringing of a child. The mother, who is only nineteen years of age, was formerly a domestic servant in the reverend gentleman's employ. Such patriarchal morality is not unnatural in devout readers of the Old Testament.

"Studies of Men Mended" is the title of a Religious Tract Society publication. It sounds cracked.

Dean Inge explains the presence of pain in the world in this way. God, he says, "wished us to find out all his laws, so far as they concerned us, and he would go on punishing our ignorance until we did find them out." "God," we should imagine, will not feel flattered by the apology. If he wanted us to find out all his laws, there seems an obvious way in which this could have been done. But man was not told what the "laws" were; he was not even told he had to find out. Nay, one of the earliest offences of man, according to the Bible, was that of seeking to know too much. God doesn't tell man what these laws are; he fashions him in ignorance, allows him to grope about in ignorance, and all the time punishes him for not having knowledge. The stupidity of clerical apologies almost passes comprehension. And yet some of these clergymen are intelligent enough in other directions. It is when they turn on the religious tap that they become supernaturally silly.

"Vanoc," in the Referee, wants to know why we cannot agree upon a "unit of happiness," and says "that once we establish the principle that all legislation increasing unhappiness, no matter by what fine names it may be called, is bad legislation, we shall be on the road to secure the continuity of policy that we now lack, and that alone can save us." This is hardly a "unit of happiness"; it is rather a test of conduct, in legislation and elsewhere. And it is the one that Bentham, and Mill, and Spencer, and Freethinkers generally have always insisted is the only rational one. Freethinkers have a habit of "getting there" first, not because they are blessed with a superhuman degree of intelligence, but mainly because they look at life without their vision being blurred by a fog of superstition.

Apropos of nothing very pertinent, "Vanoc" remarks "Mr. Bradlaugh was regarded by those who professed and called themselves Christians as an extremely wicked man, instead of what he really was—a good man with extremely bad taste." Comment of this kind is really impertinent, and the less excusable because it so wholly unnecessary. Bradlaugh fought the allied forces of vested interest, tyranny, and superstition, and in the end won the respect and admiration of the best of his enemies. We are not aware that "Vanoc" has ever attempted a task of this kind, and if he did attempt it, we have little evidence to believe that his efforts would meet with any measure of success. All the bad taste we know of concerning Bradlaugh is that he declined the cowardly policy of refusing to call a lie a probable truth, and expressed his opinions in plain, unmistakable English. And that is the kind of "bad taste" that a Christian community never forgives.

Speaking at a Labor gathering, Mr. John Hill, Secretary of the Boilermakers' Union, said that the Labor movement was not prepared to shed any members to secure alliance with the Church. We were pleased to notice this observation, and should be better pleased to see leaders of the Labor movement spending less time on the impossible task of placating and capturing the Churches. They might just as well appeal to the capitalists right off to join the Labor movement. It should be plain to the dullest that the clergy are coquetting with the Labor movement only because of what they can get out of it. Their interest is wholly a professional interest, and a great many very earnest spirits among the rank and file are more than disgusted at some of the leaders so openly playing into their hands. The report before us says that it is impossible to forecast what the result of this conference between the Churches and Labor (held at Newcastle) will be, but the tone and temper of the Labor speakers displayed little readiness to recognise any good in what the Churches are trying to do. That is, to our mind, the most cheering feature of the gathering. It shows that some are beginning to see through the vague amiabilities of a handful of clergymen, and are a little alive to the dangers of the proposed alliance.

The Bedford family never did a single stroke of work to earn their immense wealth. It all came to them as a gift from Kings who robbed the nation. Their high and mighty lives have always been parasitic. One of them had the impudence—and, as it turned out, the imprudence—to twit Edmund Burke with his pension. Burke's reply was that he himself was but a minnow while the Duke of Bedford was a huge whale disporting himself in an ocean of royal bounty. Burke's pension, too, died with him, while the Duke of Bedford's went on from generation to generation. It goes on still. The present holder of the title (and the plunder) has just sold a portion of his London estates for a sum said to run into millions. What is sold is the right to levy rent, market tolls, etc., etc., on the traders and inhabitants who operate or reside in that part of London. And the value of that right goes on increasing under the pressure of business and population. Nor is that all. The holders of that right are able to banish anybody they please from the most desirable district in London. Many years ago negotiations were carried on for a vacant shop in Chandos-street; everything was satisfactory on both sides, and the agreement was just going to be signed, when a notification came from the Duke of Bedford's agent that the transfer of the lease would not be sanctioned, as a Freethought publishing business could not allowed on the Bedford estate. Material property and moral despotism went together. And they go together still.

In an article on "Black Magic," by a "Psychical Expert," in a morning newspaper, it is stated that "Among the 'intellectuals' there are thousands of men and women who, after abandoning Christianity, have, in the search for some kind of spiritual life which is an essential craving of the human heart, plunged into the dark labyrinths of occult science." Essential craving of the human heart! Is it not a high-faultin' equivalent for an Ancient habit of the human system?

Hans Schmidt, the priest who murdered Anna Annuller last August, and threw portions of the dismembered body into the Hudson River, was hunted down by a clever detective whose only clue was the tag of a pillow-case in one of the parcels. The priest confessed his guilt on being arrested, and declared that he was commanded by his patron saint, Elizabeth of Hungary, to offer up a sacrifice which was to be consummated by his drinking the blood of the offering. The trial is now proceeding, and the holy priest seems likely to die in a chair. No doubt he will go to glory after a little purgatorial cleansing. Where his victim has gone is unknown.

Two nude figures in bronze representing, Adam and Eve, at Potsdam, were flung into a ditch by some pious inhabitants who were shocked at the absence of clothing in the statues. Piety and pornography go together in Germany as elsewhere.

The cost of living is going up, and, owing to the unrest among undertakers, it looks as if the cost of dying were going up too. Perhaps the dear clergy may join in, and want heavier fees for post-mortem rites.

Things one might have said otherwise are only too common. Everybody knows the scriptural one: "And he said unto them saddle the ass, and they saddled him." Here is a trade advertisement now in use: "Why wait for indigestion? Take Beecham's Pills." Here is a dairy advertisement in South Essex: "The only firm that keep cows in the borough." Meaning, "The only firm in the borough that keep cows."

We saw one of our most "blasphemous" old jokes reprinted (slightly spoiled, of course) in a London evening paper lately. It was about the nigger preacher who, when he stated that the Lord made the first man out of clay and stuck him up against the palings to dry, was asked by one of his congregation, "Who made de palins?" Whereupon the preacher complained that such questions would upset any system of theology.

A few years ago Rev. C. F. Spurr went to Melbourne, Australia, one of his objects being—as was generally stated at the time—to overthrow the system of Secular Education as it exists in some of the colonies. He is now returning, and the Secular Education question is where it was, while Freethought generally is more advanced than when he arrived in the country. The Christian World says that the Australian Government has recognised the value of Mr. Spurr's work by presenting him with a set of 200 slides for lecturing purposes. The recognition is rather amusing. We believe the Australian Government will present slides to any likely person who cares to convert himself into an emigration agent by lecturing on Australia. We have no doubt that the wine-growing firms in Australia would also be pleased to show their appreciation of Mr. Spurr's services by presenting him with a few hundred thousand circulars for distribution at the lectures on Australia.

At the London County Council Education Committee meeting, the Rev. U. J. Somerville objected to Meredith's Ordeal of Richard Feverel as unsuitable for use in women's institutes, but afterwards withdrew his opposition. Was he afraid of being confronted with the Bible?

We have great pleasure in reproducing the following leaderette on the Stewart case from the Manchester Guardian:—

"THE BLASPHEMY CASE.

"Exactly a month ago on Monday last a Mr. T. W. Stewart was sentenced at the Staffordshire Assizes to four months' imprisonment for 'committing blasphemy by attacking the truth of the Christian religion.' At the time we commented on the sentence, but it then seemed possible, if not likely, that the Home Secretary might see his way to advise the exercise of the prerogative of pardon, and that in a few days' time the convicted man would be free. Nothing of the kind has happened; Mr. Stewart seems to have been forgotten both by the public and by the authorities, and there seems every reason to believe that unless his case is strongly taken up he will have to serve out his sentence. We publish to-day an article by Professor Gilbert Murray calling public attention to the subject. The arguments which he brings forward will, we are convinced, commend themselves to all fair-minded and thinking people. The punishment inflicted is indeed indefensible, bearing in mind the latitude allowed, and rightly allowed, to learned persons whose offence is, essentially, the same, but who are protected by the freedom to express any opinion which is in this country permitted to people who expound their views either in print or the lecture-room. It cannot be right that professors and learned writers should go free and an itinerant lecturer be convicted simply because the former know the canons of good taste better than the latter, or are more moderate in their statements of the same views. There ought not to be one law for the educated and another for the ignorant or half-educated. 'Coarseness,' 'bad taste,' and 'speaking so as to excite ridicule' cannot surely be attributes converting the permissible into the criminal in public debate. If Mr. Stewart was obscene he could have been summoned and punished for obscenity; if he incited people to break the peace, he could have been dealt with for that too. But to put into action against him, and for the second time, so rusty and questionable a weapon as the Blasphemy Law is a disgrace to the legal system. We hope Mr. McKenna will look into the case."

Stewart's case has not been "forgotten" in the Freethinker. We are now considering whether some more effective public action cannot be taken.

Professor Gilbert Murray's letter referred to in the previous cutting from the Manchester Guardian deserves the thanks of every friend of liberty and justice. The following passage will be of considerable interest to our readers:—

"Mr. T. W. Stewart is quietly left to serve out his sentence in Stafford Gaol. No responsible person seems to be stirring on his behalf; yet I have the greatest difficulty in finding anyone who seriously approves of his prosecution or defends the Blasphemy Acts. The Judge who sentenced him seems to have carefully guarded himself against expressing any approval of the law which, as he explained to the jury, he had to administer. The present Prime Minister as long ago as 1889 voted for a Bill providing that 'after the passing of this Act no criminal proceedings shall be instituted in any court against any person for schism heresy, blasphemous libel, blasphemy at common law, or Atheism.' The present Lord Chancellor voted with him. The present Law Officers of the Crown have expressed no public or official opinion on the question, but I do not think that any person who knows either Sir John Simon's or Sir Stanley Buckmaster's record can suppose that on this point they are less liberal than Mr. Asquith and Lord Haldane. I have made a point of consulting some Liberal divines of high authority in the Church, and find them speaking with the same voice. They do not differ from the opinion of the Blasphemy Law expressed by Sir James Fitzjames Stephen in the Fortnightly Review for March, 1884: 'No one can be more convinced of its utter unfitness for these times, if indeed it was ever fit for any times.' Yet no one moves for the alteration of the law; and the Home Secretary does not let Mr. Stewart out of prison."

Professor Murray points out that the alteration made by Lord Chief Justice Coleridge in 1883 in the Common Law of Blasphemy simply comes to this that "working men and imperfectly educated speakers are punished" while "highly educated sceptics can say or write what they like." The offence of "blasphemy" becomes merely a matter of taste.

We are extremely pleased to quote Professor Murray's statement as to the real extent of Stewart's "offence."

"But the cynical man of the world has another argument. 'It is all very well,' he sagely suggests, 'to say that it is only a question of bad taste. But a jury would never convict a man unless he had said something frightfully obscene.' The answer is simple. If Stewart is to be punished for obscene language, let him be charged with it and defend himself. Do not charge him with one offence and condemn him on another, of which not a word has been said. But there is also in this case another answer. Through the kindness of Lord Coleridge I have been allowed to see the shorthand report of the two lectures on which Stewart was condemned, and though I do not for a moment agree with their opinions or admire their style, they certainly afford no foundation for any charge of foul language or obscenity."

Our readers will recollect that we have repeatedly written to the same effect. We reprinted the "blasphemy" alleged against Stewart at his first appearance before the Wolverhampton magistrates, and we declared that if the worst sentences had appeared in the local press, from which we borrowed, the prosecution was ridiculous even under the existing law, and the motive of it nothing but sheer malignant bigotry. Professor Murray's testimony as to the peccant parts of Stewart's lectures is extremely valuable.

The Young Liberal for November (we regret we have only just seen it) had a strong editorial paragraph in favor of Secular Education. Incidentally it asked "what sort of Nonconformists are those who believe that the State should teach 'religion'—save the mark!—at public expense in the public elementary schools?" A jesuitical letter from the Rev. Dr. Clifford appears in the December number. Dr. Clifford is in favor of Secular Education plus the Bible; which is like being in favor of Teetotalism plus Whiskey. We are delighted to see that the Young Liberal takes him to task and leaves him in a sad state of delapidation.

A lady, giving no address, and no other name than "Constance," sends a subscription to the President's Honorarium Fund. The handwriting is not that of a young person; it is even a little shaky; but it shows character and refinement, and an open, liberal nature. Constance! What a lovely name! It combines every grace with every dignity. And what a woman Shakespeare depicted under that name in the play which holy motherhood and divine childhood render so supernally sacred. There are no perfect masculine names, but how many perfect female names may be found in the pages of Shakespeare, without going any further. Portia, Desdemona, Cordelia, Ophelia, Imogen, and the rest. "One of Shakespeare's women" was the highest praise Shelley could give to a lady friend. And the Bible is woman's best friend—is it? Nonsense. Besides it is too late. The place is already filled by Shakespeare.

We have received an offer from an old member of the N. S. S. and reader of the Freethinker in Burmah to make up the deficiency on the President's Honorarium Fund for 1913—that is, to make up the round figure of £300. We go to press too early to deal with this communication further this week. We shall have something to say about it in our next issue. Meanwhile those who intended to be in the subscribers' list should not hold back. That wouldn't be fair.

Christmas.

AT the present time we have many holidays in the year; the greatest of them all is Christmas, and there is every reason in the world why Christmas should be the greatest holiday to the inhabitants of the northern temperate zone.

Many thousands of years ago the people did not have fine and comfortable houses to protect them from the inclemency of the weather; they lived very much the same as the birds do at the present time; they had a comfortable and joyous time of it during the warm months of the year, and then suffered and died in the cold months. The increase of both men and beasts was retarded by the same cause—cold winters and the absence of food.

As man advanced a little in civilisation he became aware of the fact that the sun was the most important thing in existence. The sun was the god of light and warmth. It was the sun that caused vegetation to grow; in fact, the sun did everything, and was therefore worshiped. They noticed, however, that the demon of cold and darkness ruled the world for a portion of the year, and as the sun appeared to travel to the south, to rise later and set earlier each day, it appeared to them that the demon of darkness was getting the better of the god of light. They observed that this went on for some time, until the god of light resumed his power; when the god of light would for a time again triumph over the demon of cold and darkness. With the crude instruments at their disposal, they were not able to determine the exact day that the sun commenced its northern march. It really commenced between December 21 and 22, but it only showed on their instruments on the 25th. Therefore, December 25 became a day of rejoicing and merry-making, their prayers had been answered, the god of light and warmth had overcome the demon of darkness and cold.

Not only was this day fixed as being the holiday of the year in Asia, Europe, and a part of Africa, but it was observed in the same manner in Mexico long before there was any communication between the eastern and the western world.

For a time, the Christian Church attempted to suppress this day as a Pagan institution; but it had been observed for so many thousand years that this was found impossible. The people would not give up their holiday. A very brilliant idea then occurred to the high officials of the Roman Church; so, in the fourth century, they got over the trouble by announcing that one of their principal gods was born on December 25, and by this wise action the old Pagan holiday became the principal Christian holiday of the world.

(SIR) HIRAM S. MAXIM.

The Protestants Protest.

FROM a Secular and even Protestant view the ostentatious attendance of the President at the annual Thanksgiving Mass, held in St. Patrick's Cathedral (Catholic) in Washington, accompanied by members of his Cabinet, justices of the Supreme Court, the diplomatic dignitaries, congressmen, and senators, is a national scandal. How far back the custom extends we are not prepared to say, but it seems to have come in with the Roman Catholic regime under McKinley. President Taft's flagrant disregard of the proprieties in this respect was the most conspicuous. The preparations made at the cathedral for receiving the President and his train have each year increased in pomp and show. Last year, as described by the press, they were "on a grander scale than ever before. Cardinal Gibbons sat on a scarlet throne on the right of the altar," and about him were his clergy and his chaplains. Only cardinals have thrones in this country. The President and his escort sit humbly in seats ten feet below.

The news that President Wilson has accepted an invitation to attend Thanksgiving Mass this year, and that there will be added millinery and magnificence, arouses the Protestants of Washington to protest. On November 18 resolutions prepared by the Rev. Dr. Randolph H. McKim, former president of the Episcopal House of Deputies, were adopted by the clergy of Episcopal, Lutheran, Baptist, and Disciples of Christ Churches, expressing their indignation at this favoritism shown the Church of Rome by the President of the United States. The resolutions read:—

> "The attendance of our Chief Magistrate and members of his Cabinet, year after year, has been made use of to give color to the Roman claim that the service is now the official celebration of Thanksgiving Day in our national capital.
> "This fact has been understood in the United States and abroad to give the Roman Catholic Church a prestige and pre-eminence over all other Churches. Every effort is made by the Roman hierarchy to give this Roman Mass the color of an official function.
> "We protest against the attempt to convert our national Thanksgiving Day into a Roman Catholic festival in a service entirely out of harmony with the history of the genius of our country and the spirit and purpose of the day.
> "We desire to give voice to the widespread feeling of indignation among millions of Protestants of America against the efforts of the Roman press and the Roman hierarchy to exploit the presence of our Chief Magistrate and some of his Cabinet (which we are convinced has only been intended as an act of courtesy and goodwill) for the purpose of glorifying the Roman Catholic Church and giving this service an official characterisation it does not and cannot possess."

These Thanksgiving Masses, called Pan-American or All-American, are said to have been worked up by Monsignor Russell, of Washington. We may assume that Russell proceeded under the direction of his superior, Cardinal Gibbons, who got the idea from Rome. The Pan-American Mass is held in Washington instead of some other American capital in order to get the President of the United States, for the other countries of America are Catholic and their officials go to Mass without special invitation.

While the Protestant protest is welcomed as bringing the sectarian aspect of the President's offence up for comment and criticism, it is, after all, something of a joke. The Thanksgiving proclamation, without which there would be no Thanksgiving Mass on Thursday, is a Protestant affair. It is the Protestants who have mocked the secular theory of our government with their religious fasts and feasts, their sabbaths and holy days. The Catholics, in seizing upon Thanksgiving Day to make capital for their Church, are using Protestant material. Protestants feathered the shaft that now penetrates their gizzards. They are glad enough to have the Presidents attend their churches, as all our Chief Magistrates of late years have done, because the attendance of a President means prosperity of a parish. The Rev. Mr. McKim's denomination has nothing to complain of. When the Episcopal clergy assembled in Washington during Taft's administration, Taft gave them a room in the White House for a meeting-place, and made them a speech. The Catholic Church, very likely, is entirely satisfied with the precedents for official recognition of the Church that have been established by Protestants. Protestants are the stair-builders for the ascent of the Catholic prelates to a place above the President.

A Catholic President, were one to be elected, could not by the rules of his Church worship with a Protestant congregation, and in attending St. Patrick's Cathedral he would not be open to unfavorable comment. Should he, however, invite a gathering of Catholic bishops to meet in the White House, as Taft invited the Episcopalians, every other denomination would rightfully "put up a holler." And yet we heard no objection from Roman prelates when the clergy of the Rev. Randolph McKim's communion occupied the Blue Room, although protest was certainly justified. Who but the Episcopal prelate has assumed the title of "Bishop of Washington"?

When the Episcopalians, Lutherans, Baptists, and Disciples of Christ place themselves squarely on Secular ground, and, affirming the Nine Demands of Liberalism, utter a protest whenever any denomination or any religion receives the patronage of the State or the favor of any law, and resent the proclaiming of religious holidays or the enforcement of religious holy days, the appointment of chaplains of any sect whatsoever, or any religious services in political assemblages—when they all agree to this, their criticism of the Catholic Church will at least be consistent. Until then, in the scramble for recognition, it will be each sect for itself and the Devil take the hindmost. And the hindmost will not be the Roman Catholic denomination.

Benedict Spinoza.—II.

(Concluded from p. 781.)

SPINOZA never felt his vocation to be that of an instructor of youth, as indeed he subsequently confessed on being offered a professorship in the University of Heidelberg, and the drudgery of an usher's place was extremely distasteful. He, therefore, remained but a brief period with Van den Ende. Fortunately, there were other means open of earning bread. It was the custom for the youths in Jewish schools to be prepared for professional life, or initiated into some handicraft, as well as instructed in book-lore. Spinoza had acquired the art of grinding and polishing lenses for optical purposes—spectacles, reading glasses, microscopes, and telescopes—and had attained to such proficiency in the business that his manufactures were readily disposed of, their sale producing sufficient to supply his modest wants.

Naturally, while he remained in Amsterdam, he had to brook the scowls of his former co-religionists, which perhaps he soon learned to bear with equanimity. But he had yet to experience to what lengths fanaticism would go. A hot blooded fanatic waylaid him one night, and attempted his assassination. Happily the intended victim perceived the gesture of the villain as he raised his arm to strike, and foiled him by a rapid movement. The dagger thrust was received through the coat collar, and Spinoza escaped with a slight wound on the neck.

The chiefs of the synagogue, sensible of Spinoza's magnificent intellectual gifts, were still anxious to secure his service, notwithstanding the terrible excommunication they had themselves pronounced. Intimidation had signally failed to induce submission; might not some more successful method be adopted for the recovery of the precious lost sheep? Might not a pecuniary bribe affect what threats had failed to achieve? They offered to remove the ban of excommunication, and to guarantee to him for the rest of his life a pension of 1 000 florins per annum, if he would acknowledge his error and submit to the mildest censures of the Church. Egregiously had they mistaken the character of the man. He had no error to acknowledge, and money was the last thing for which he cared.

Censure, excommunication, attempted assassination, flattery, and bribes, all had failed to move the obstinate heretic; if not to be won, he must somehow be removed. As a last resource they petitioned for his expulsion from the city. But there was no precedent for such banishment. Amsterdam was a free city, where all religious denominations were tolerated. Nevertheless the magistrates, unwilling to disoblige a powerful section of the community, referred the case to the Synod of the Reform Church, for their advice and opinion. With characteristic intolerance the Synod recommended a temporary banishment at least. Whether the authorities acted on this advice or not is unknown; but it is certain that for some reason Spinoza left Amsterdam towards the close of 1656. He was yet only twenty-four years old, and the events recorded since the excommunication had all occurred within the space of a few months. He found shelter with a Christian friend, whose hospitality overleapt the narrow bounds of sectarian intolerance. The name of this good man is unrecorded, but his house still remains, and the lane in which it stands is still known under the name of Spinoza-lane.

We lose sight of Spinoza for some years until 1660, when he was still residing at Rhynsburg; but in all probability a portion of the interval was spent at Amsterdam. He still practised his handicraft of glass-polishing, and earned an independent livelihood, asking gifts of no man. Those four years were as important as any of his life, for during that time there dawned on his mind those great principles which were to be indelibly stamped with his name. He had also formed many valuable friendships with Dr. Louis Meyer; Drs. Bresser and Shaller, physicians; Simon de Fries, a young gentleman of fortune, of whom we shall hereafter hear good account; and, above all, Henry Oldenburg, with whom throughout his lifetime he maintained correspondence. Oldenburg was the intimate friend of Robert Boyle, and helped in the foundation of the Royal Society of Great Britain. He was also the Hague Consul in London when Cromwell was Protector, and distinguished himself by highly commendable efforts to secure toleration for the Jews in England.

Spinoza appears to have quitted Rhynsburg in 1664 for Voorburg, within about a league of the Hague. His exposition of the Cartesian philosophy had brought celebrity, and he found himself obliged to intermit his studies and meditations to receive friends, and sometimes curious strangers. About two years after his arrival at Voorburg he settled finally at the Hague, boarding at first with the widow Van Velden, in a house on the Veerkay, and occupying the rooms in which Dr. Colerus, his biographer, afterwards lodged; but subsequently, finding the cost of living with Madam Van Velden too great for his means, removing to fresh quarters in the house of Henry Van den Spyck, a painter, which overlooked the Pavilion Canal; and here it was that he passed the rest of his days.

Among Spinoza's warmest friends at the Hague was the unfortunate Grand Pensioner, Jean de Witt, who was, in 1672, literally torn to pieces by an infuriated mob, who baselessly suspected him of complicity with the hated French. The philosopher himself, it may here be remarked, narrowly escaped the same fate a little later, and under the following circumstances:—Lieutenant-Colonel Stoupe, commander of a Swiss regiment in the service of France, being a man of intellectual mark, and anxious to converse with Spinoza, induced the Prince de Condé, Generalissimo of the French Army, to invite the renowned philosopher to their headquarters. The invitation was accepted, but, Condé being suddenly summoned to Paris, his guest waited a week or ten days at Utrecht in hope of his speedy return; then, as much delay occurred, Spinoza took his way back to his home at the Hague. The populace, ignorant of literary or scientific curiosity, could only interpret the visit as treason to the State. They must have made some threatening demonstrations against the philosopher, for poor Van den Spyck became greatly alarmed, and besought his lodger to quit the house. Spinoza, disdaining flight, assured the timid man, and bade him fear nothing; "for," said he, "I can easily clear myself of all suspicion of treason. There are persons enow at the Hague who know the motive of my journey, and who will right me with my townsmen. But be this as it may, should the people show the slightest disposition to molest you, should they even assemble or make a noise before your house, I will go down to them though it should be to meet the fate of the De Witts." Fortunately, the popular fury subsided, and Spinoza and his host suffered no further molestation.

Jean De Witt was leader of the Republican party, and it was by his strenuous opposition that the Prince of Orange failed in his purpose of having himself elected Stadt-holder for life. Spinoza was Republican on principle and from impulse, feeling the dignity of independence himself, and anxious also to secure it for his fellows. A brotherly affection sprang up between these men. "In all Holland," says Froude, "there were none like these two; they had found each other now, and they loved each other as only good men love. From him Spinoza accepted a pension, not a very enormous one—some thirty-five pounds a year; the only thing of the kind he ever did accept. Perhaps because De Witt was the only person he had met who exactly understood what it was, and weighed such favors at their exact worth, neither less nor more." This pension was not, however, the only thing of the kind Spinoza ever accepted. Simon de Vries, later in life, brought him a thousand florins as a gift, or rather as a meagre instalment of a heavy debt owing by the pupil to the teacher. Spinoza "laughingly assured him that he was in no need of money, and that such a sum would turn his head. Simon then made a will, bequeathing the whole of his property to Spinoza, who, on hearing of it, at once set off for Amsterdam to remonstrate against such an act so unjust to Simon's brother. His arguments prevailed. The will was destroyed, and the brother finally inherited. Now came a struggle of generosity. The heir protested that he could not accept the property unless he were allowed to settle five hundred florins a year on the disinterested friend; and, after some debate, Spinoza agreed to accept three hundred."

These windfalls made no difference, however, in his mode of life; he was as abstemious as ever, even to the verge of indiscretion. "It approaches the incredible," says Colerus,

Digitized by Google

"with how little in the shape of meat and drink he appears to have been satisfied; and it was from no necessity that he was constrained to live so poorly, but he was by nature abstemious." His ordinary daily diet consisted of a basin of milk porridge, with a little butter, costing about three-halfpence, and a draught of beer costing an additional penny. Occasionally he indulged in wine, but his consumption of that luxury never exceeded two pints a month. Once a quarter he regularly settled his accounts, "to make both ends meet, like the snake that forms a circle with its tale in its mouth," as he playfully said. "Though often invited to dinner," says pastor Colerus, "he preferred the scanty meal that he found at home to dining sumptuously at the expense of another." Yet against this man, for generations, vulgar pretenders to philosophy cast the epithets of "immoral" and "epicurean." His epicureanism stands confest to gods and men at the rate of twopence-halfpenny a day.

It must not to be supposed that Spinoza was in any way parsimonious. On the contrary, he was ever liberal to the full extent of his scanty means, affording willing aid to the suffering or needy. Once, at least, he shows himself in the prominent light of a lender; for one to whom he had lent two hundred florins, as we learn, became a bankrupt; whereupon the philosopher calmly remarked, "Well, I must economise, and so make up the loss; at this cost I preserve my equanimity."

Spinoza's fame continued to extend. Early in 1673 he received an invitation, through the learned Fabricius, from the Prince Palatine, Charles Louis, to fill the vacant Chair of Philosophy in the University of Heidelburg, a lucrative and honorable post. After some hesitation, probably to avoid hurting the susceptibilities of his friend, the philosopher declined the chair, "not knowing," as he says in his answer to Fabricius, "within what precise limits the liberty of philosophising would have to be restricted." Louis XIV offered him a pension if he would dedicate his next work to him; this also he refused, "having no intention of dedicating anything to that monarch."

Spinoza's personal appearance is described by Colerus, in whose days there were many persons living at the Hague who had been well acquainted with the great man. He was of middling height and slenderly built; with regular features, forehead broad and high, large eyes dark and lustrous, full dark eyebrows, and hair of the same hue, long and curling. The prevailing expression of the face was that of thought overcast with melancholy. He was never seen either sorely depressed or greatly elated. His dress was that of a sober citizen, plain yet scrupulously neat, for he despised a disorderly and slovenly carriage as a sign of affectation or of a mean spirit. He mostly spent his time in his own room, engaged in his handiwork (at which he continued to labor), in meditation, or in writing. When wearied with these he would join Van den Spyck and his family in the evening, smoke a pipe of tobacco, and take part in their ordinary chat.

Towards the end of his life Spinoza appears to have been affected with a chronic form of pulmonary consumption. He complains frequently to correspondents of not feeling well. With the coming of 1677 he grew more seriously indisposed. On Saturday, February 20, he wrote to his friend, Dr. Louis Meyer, requesting a visit, but was still able in the evening to join the family circle and enjoy his pipe. Early the next morning Dr. Meyer arrived, and found his patient worse than was imagined. The philosopher partook of a little chicken broth, and the worthy doctor remained in attendance with him. The painter and his family went to church, and never saw their friend in life again; he had been seized with a sudden difficulty in breathing, and passed peacefully away about three o'clock in the afternoon of Sunday, February 21, 1677, aged forty-four years and three months. The funeral took place on February 25, the remains of the philosopher being followed to the grave by a numerous train of respectful inhabitants of the Hague.

Malevolent rumors were circulated as to the manner of Spinoza's death. It was reported by some that he had taken drugs and unconsciously slid into death: by others that he had been heard to exclaim: O God, have mercy on me, a miserable sinner! Colerus made inquiries concerning these rumors, which, of course, proved baseless. A sale of the philosopher's effects realised 400 florins (about £40). Rebecca Spinoza appeared on the scene, but swiftly retreated on finding no spoil. A desk, containing the immortal "Ethics" in MS., was forwarded by Van den Spyck to Jan Reiuwertz a publisher in Amsterdam.

W. Frederic Pollock's work on Spinoza is a monument of learning and criticism, and Dr James Martineau's Study of Spinoza is worthy to rank beside it. Dr. Willis's Life, Correspondence, and Ethics of Spinoza is worth consulting, although it is said by very good authorities to be exceedingly untrustworthy. Readers of French will find an admirable translation of Spinoza's principal writings by Emile Saisset. Froude has an article on Spinoza in his Short Studies, and G. H. Lewes devotes to the subject a chapter of his Biographical History of Philosophy and an article in the Fortnightly Review of April 1, 1866. Matthew Arnold's essay on Spinoza and the Bible is written in his finest vein.

We conclude with a parting advice. Let the curious reader not be deterred by the rigorous metaphysical system of Spinoza. All such constructions are arbitrary, and of little value except as an exercise for the intellect. They are merely the forms into which a man puts such genius as he has, and that is what the earnest student will seek to discover. In Spinoza's works he will find a rich reward; for his great thoughts on religion, morals, and philosophy are like perfectly wrought statues, which every one may place in the sanctuary of his life.

Some Little-Known Freethinkers.

IX.—JUDGE STRANGE.

THOMAS LUMISDEN STRANGE was one of the most earnest of the band of Freethinkers who gathered round Thomas Scott. He was an illustration that a good Christian makes a good Freethinker. When a young man he experienced "conversion," and, belonging to the straitest sect of religionists, the Plymouth Brethren, it is almost a wonder that he ever got outside the wall of that exclusive body. But he was ever an earnest truthseeker, and his very earnestness brought him to the light. Educated as a barrister, he threw himself into evangelical work, and so set was his mind to religious subjects that in 1852 he published a work entitled The Light of Prophecy: Being an Attempt to Trace out thereby the Coming Judgments and the Promised Glory. There was also published extracts from this work, entitled Light on the Future. The publisher says that, some time ago, his brother gave him the work, printed at the Wesleyan Mission Press, Bangalore, 1852, and adds: "I cannot find out who T. L. Strange was, or if he is at present alive; but I have little doubt he would be well pleased to find in England an echo of his wonderful work." The curious thing is that the publisher lived at Malvern, where Judge Strange resided during the latter part of his life. He also wrote Observations on Mr. Elliott's "Horæ Apocalypticæ," in which he sought to refute the historical system of interpreting the Apocalypse. Mr. Strange was in the Indian Civil Service, and was animated by a desire to bring the natives to his own faith. He obtained a judgeship in the High Court at Madras, which he occupied about thirty years, and he published a Manual of Hindoo Law, Madras, 1856 and 1863.

Among the natives of India he was bound to receive some impressions adverse to the exclusive claims of his own faith. He found a people essentially moral and religious, yet moved by an ancient faith different from his own. In the preface to his work on the Sources and Development of Christianity he says:—

> "At one time my duties in India involved the charge of a jail and attendance at the execution of criminals. Trials calling for the sentence of death had to be referred to the superior court at Madras, for whose benefit the whole of the examinations had to be translated. There was always time in these cases a considerable interval between the trial and the sentence and its execution. I was then a devout Christian, and used to take advantages of my opportunities to 'bring' the prisoners who were in these risks 'to Jesus.' They were ordinarily of the uneducated class; but one was otherwise, having been a servitor in a pagoda. He had professed himself influenced by what I had put before him; but when we met at the gallows he proclaimed his trust to be in Rama, and not in Christ. He died earnestly, calling upon his fancied mediator and savior."

This set the judge thinking. He continues:—

> "What are we to say to such a phenomenon? Rama's character is painted in the most exalted colors, and is described in a history considered to be an embodiment of divine truth. Rama was a god incarnate, devoting himself for the good of mankind. What is there to induce a follower of his to relinquish him for just such another form, presented to him from a foreign quarter? And do a man's eternal prospects depend upon his critical selection of the true history? Happily, the means are ample for our extrication from any such dilemma, and, as I may acknowledge to have been the case in my own instance when I was involved in these meshes, it is simply ignorance of the true character of the materials before us, coupled with a vein of superstition, inherited, working round us, and cultivated in us from early youth, that forges those bonds in which mankind are held to the prevailing baseless expressions of belief."

The complete breakdown of Mr. Strange's faith occurred from reading, in an orthodox work, an attempt to reconcile the facts of palæontology with the Bible statement that death came into the world through the sin of Adam.

Digitized by Google

Looking into the matter, he learnt that the earth's strata also contained evidences of man's existence for some immeasurable time before the period assigned to Adam. The fall of the first Adam necessarily shook the position attributed to the second Adam. He says, in his introduction to Contributions to a Series of Controversial Writings, issued by the late Mr. Thomas Scott (1881):—

> "I proceeded to make as close and as full study as my opportunities gave me of the Biblical statements, and especially of the representations of Christ as a real personage; and, as I proceeded, every figuration broke down before me, and appeared even traceable to remote Oriental heathen sources."

He closely examined the alleged evidences, and came to the conclusion that:—

> "There is a very decided gap between the occurrence of Christianity and the era asserted for the facts alleged as those on which the system has its foundations. It follows that the facts themselves, so bound in an historical expression of them at a particular period, cannot have been enacted, and that the creed has otherwise to be accounted for."

Truth thus discovered, Judge Strange was not slow in communicating it to others. For Mr. Scott's series he wrote a number of tracts, afterwards collected as Contributions to a Series of Controversial Writings. This volume contains "How I Became, and Ceased to be, a Christian," "A Critical Catechism," "The Bennett Judgment," "Clerical Integrity," "Communion with God," "The Exercise of Prayer," "The Christian Evidence Society," "An Address to all Earnest Christians," "The Portraiture and Mission of Jesus," "The Christian Evidences," "The Pauline Epistles," "Scripture and Science," and "The Supreme Power in the Universe." His larger and more important works are The Speaker's Commentary Reviewed, a criticism of dishonest orthodox defences; The Bible: Is it the Word of God? a valuable and an extended examination of the fetish books in the form of a dialogue between a pundit and a student; The Legends of the Old Testament, in which their similarity to Hindu and other legends is pointed out; The Sources and Development of Christianity, in which he traces the era of Christianity, its constituents, its phases, the construction and integrity of the Christian records, and the Gentile moulds of Christianity; The Development of Creation on the Earth, in which the teachings of science are contrasted with those of Scripture; and What is Christianity? an historical sketch embellished with a chart illustrating the interval between the alleged time of Christ and that of the alleged evidence. His opposition was not only to the miracles and alleged facts of Christianity, but also to its principles. In regard to its central doctrine of atonement, he said:—

> "It is impossible that the sin of one man can be imposed upon another. It is by a fiction, not to be realised by the mind, that the transference is to be. Can blood of any sort wipe away sin? Sin has to be repented of and turned from, and can be got rid of in no other manner."

Judge Strange was a diligent student and writer, and ever an earnest advocate of practical piety in life and conduct. He died at Norwood on September 4, 1884, at the age of seventy-five. Major-General Forlong was appointed his literary executor.

The Missing Link

ONE of the Chicago physicians who attended the recent Medical Congress in London is a prominent Catholic. He is in charge of a Catholic hospital in this city. He returned from the Congress fully convinced of the truth of Darwinism. He said so in print over his own signature. Of course, if Darwinism is true the Catholic Church is lost. Honest people who believe in Darwinism will sooner or later stop repeating in church on Sundays "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth and all that in them is," etc., when on every other day they shout from the housetops that the world was not created in six days, nor was it created at all.

Curiously enough, a few days after the physician's declaration of faith in evolution, Bishop McGavick, auxiliary bishop of the Chicago archdiocese, denounced Darwinism and declared that it was "a passing phase of scientific thought." He also said that "the proofs thus far advanced in its favor are trifling and wholly inconclusive." Which of the two is telling the truth about evolution?

Father Kelly, another priest, says that the position of the Catholic Church on evolution can be expressed in two words—"not proven." We suppose this gentleman believes in the infallibility of the Pope, the miraculous birth of the Virgin, the transubstantiation of the wafer, and in the annual liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius, because they "are proven." And what is the evidence that evolution is "not proven"? The Catholic Church says so. What is the evidence that the doctrine of creation is proven? Again, the Catholic Church says so. "How easy is't then," to quote Shakespeare.

Another divine calls attention to the missing link. Let the scientists first find the missing link before they try to convert him. But what about the missing links in theology? Where are the originals of the Gospels? If one link is all that is missing to complete the chain of evidence in favor of Darwinism, how many links are missing to prove Supernaturalism? The priest who has unbounded faith in the mysteries of his Church insists on seeing all the "links" before he will accept evolution. Unwittingly, he pays a great compliment to science. In religion one does not have to be particular, but in science the evidence must be convincing. It all shows how very much more conscientious even the priests are with science than they are with theology.

THE FAITH-HAG.

And third came she who gives dark creeds their power,
Silabbat-Paramasa, sorceress,
Draped fair in many lands as lowly Faith,
But ever juggling souls with rites and prayers;
The keeper of those keys which lock up Hells
And open Heavens. "Wilt thou dare," she said,
"Put by our sacred books, dethrone our gods,
Unpeople all the temples, shaking down realms"
The law which feeds the priests and props the
But Buddha answered: "What thou bidd'st me keep
Is form which passes, but the free truth stands:
Get thee unto thy darkness!"

—Sir E. Arnold, "Light of Asia."

That which mankind needs most is to secure standing room for his genuine convictions. He must be true to himself and sincere with others. We must strive to remove all artificial hindrances to the progress of civilised communities. There are certain institutions, habits, and customs which have been outgrown by the more civilised of the human race, and which cannot be protected from eventual destruction, and it would surely be a blessing to have such things removed at once, and thus shorten the period of transition always so inconvenient and distressing. We are now in the midst of a period of demolition and suffering. Perhaps several generations of our race will have to endure this dreary sojourn amid ruins. But sooner or later men will find out how to secure their own comfort and convenience, and coming generations will attain to a peaceful happiness far beyond anything yet experienced by their race.—Max Nordau.

The first use of all knowledge is the right ordering of al actions.—Herbert Spencer.

My task is to destroy old and wrong notions and shame their vendors out of circulating them. Religious notions and practices are all wrong, most of them as false as possible. And if truth is a benefit to man, and falsehood an injury, no work could be greater or more useful than mine. Let those who think otherwise enjoy their own opinions; that is nothing to me. I follow my own leading. Let others do as they can.—Joseph Symes.

I am just and honest, not because I expect to live in another world, but because, having felt the pain of injustice and dishonesty towards myself, I have a fellow feeling with other men who would suffer the same pains if I were unjust or dishonest towards them. Why should I give my neighbor short weight in this world because there is not another world in which I should have nothing to weigh out to him? I am honest because I don't like to inflict evil on others in this life, not because I am afraid of evil to myself in another. It is a pang to me to witness the suffering of a fellow being, and I feel his suffering the more because he is mortal, because his life is so short, and I would have it, if possible, filled with happiness, and not misery.—George Eliot.

I would rather know that all the earth,
That every source of joy, of lov , or mirth,
And everything of live that loved the light,
Would sleep forever in eternal night, fell
Than think one soul on which the light of reason
Should suffer torment in a Christian hell.—Anon.

Many men believe not themselves what they would persuade others.—Ben Jonson.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCH.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Bathcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.
