Having now prepared the soil by thus paralysing the human spirit, he brings forth from his supernatural armory the "revealed" brand of protection, and in the name of the gods he flings around "the exposed and the helpless" the priestly mantle of invocation and prayer as a magic shield against the ruthless fury of the elements. That was the sole function of prayer in its origin, and that has been its essence at all times. In fact, it was revelation's panoply against all evils; the priest therefore bade man to pray devoutly and fervently to the demons or divinities hidden in the forces or powers of nature, or to the gods who controlled them, with a view to soothe their spirits and calm their rage.

We need not go to savage lands or sacred books or ancient times for exhibitions of this degrading superstition; it still survives in Catholic countries, as was pitifully displayed in South Italy in 1909, when that terrible earthquake occurred at Messina. The priest who preached in the Cathedral of Taormina on the day of the earthquake told a crowded congregation that it was sent by God because no preparations had been made for keeping the feast of St. Pancrazio on the next day! How dreadful! How infamous! Practically everybody throughout Calabria looked upon that catastrophe as a visitation from God, and the people flocked to the churches to pray. Yes, prayer was the only shield ever devised by the priesthood as a protection for impotent man against the deaf and pitiless powers of nature. Just think of the irony of it. Prayer to the inexorable, the immutable, and eternally deaf! as a safeguard against their ravages.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

CLAVIER HALL, PRINCES STREET, REGENT STREET,

London, W.

WHIT-SUNDAY, MAY 11, 1913.

Agenda.

1. Minutes of last Conference.
2. Executive's Annual Report. By PRESIDENT.
3. Reception of Report.
4. Financial Report.
5. Election of President.

   Motion by Bethnal Green, North London, and Kingsland Branches:—

   "That Mr. G. W. Foote be re-elected President."
6. Election of Vice-Presidents.

   (a) The following are nominated by the Executive for re-election: J. Barry, W. H. Baker, J. G. Bartram, E. Bowman, R. Chapman, Victor Charbonnel, E. A. Charlton, C. Cohen, W. W. Collins, H. Cowell, W. Davey, F. A. Davies, J. G. Dobson, R. G. Fathers, Léon Furnémont, T. Gorniot, John Grange, J. Hammond, W. Heaford, Eugene Hins, S. L. Hurd, R. Johnson, Miss Kathleen B. Kough, W. Loat, J. T. Lloyd, A. B. Moss, James McGlashen, G. B. H. McCluskey, J. Neate, R. T. Nichols, J. Partridge, S. M. Peacock, C. Pegg, Mrs. M. E. Pegg, W. T. Pitt, C. G. Quinton, J. T. Ross, Miss Mary Ross, G. Roleffs, Mrs. Roleffs, Thomas Robertson, Victor Roger, S. Samuels, T. Shore, H. Silverstein, W. H. Spivey, Miss Alma Stanley, Charles Steptoe, W. B. Thompson, T. J. Thurlow, John H. Turnbull, Miss E. M. Vance, F. E. Willis, C. J. Whitwell, Frederick Wood, G. White.

   (b) Proposed by Executive:—

   "That Mr. T. H. Elstob and Mr. W. Dodd be elected Vice-Presidents."

   (c) Proposed by Mr. F. Wood:—

   "That Mr. Louis Brandes be elected Vice-President."
7. Election of Auditors.
8. Motions by Birmingham Branch:—

   (a) "That one Sunday in the year be called the Charles Bradlaugh Sunday, and that all Branches be requested to arrange for lectures or readings to be given bearing on the life and teachings of Charles Bradlaugh, thus perpetuating the memory of our late great leader."

   (b) "That all motions carried at a Conference shall be dealt with in the course of the three months following the Conference, and a report stating the progress made be sent to the Branch responsible for the motion."
9. Motion by Executive:—

   "This Conference protests against the London County Council's deliberate and continuous effort to cripple, and if possible to destroy, the traditional right of public speech and discussion in all parts of the metropolis under its control; and the Conference protests especially against the mean attempt to injure advanced bodies generally by a perfectly uncalled-for attempt to deprive them of the immemorial right to make collections for their funds within the limits—and only within the limits—of their permitted meetings."
10. Motion by Mr. C. Cohen:—

    "This Conference deeply deplores the growing activity of the military spirit in Europe, and the ever-increasing expenditure on preparations for war, and calls upon Freethinkers everywhere—since the Christian Churches are so impotent in the cause of peace—to do all in their power to stem the tide of international envy, hatred, and malice, which is driving the so-called civilised nations on the abyss of mutual destruction."
11. Motion by Executive:—

    "This Conference calls upon the Liberal Government to countenance no more prosecutions for "blasphemy" or "profanity" (which are only persecutions of weak or friendless Freethinkers for the gratification of Christian bigotry), but to introduce, or allow time for, a short Bill abolishing the odious laws under which such proceedings are still possible in a country that boasts of its religious freedom."
12. Motion by Mr. J. T. Lloyd:—

    "The Liberal Government having declared its intention to deal with the Education question again in the early future, this Conference warns it that it has already failed three times in trying to settle the problem on Nonconformist instead of Church lines, and trusts that its next attempt will rise above all sectarian lines by proceeding upon the principle which is fair and just to all—the principle of Secular Education."
13. Motion by Mr. G. W. Foote:—

    "That the N. S. S. be represented as far as possible at the forthcoming International Freethought Congress at Lisbon, partly as an encouragement to the Portuguese Freethinkers who have taken such a great part in the recent work of progress in Portugal, and also as a protest against the malicious falsehoods so industriously circulated to their detriment by religious bigots and political schemers in England."
14. Motion by West Ham Branch:—

    "That, in pursuance of the declaration made in the Society's 'Immediate Practical Objects,' namely, 'The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinction,' this Conference recognises universal adult suffrage as the most effective method of abolishing sex disqualification and of placing all citizens on an equal footing at the poll. It therefore expresses its sympathy with that movement."
15. Motions by Kingsland Branch:—

    (a) "That an Organising Committee be appointed by the Executive, with power to confer with and advise London Branches when necessary."

    (b) "That all Branches of the National Secular Society be invited to issue an annual record of their income and expenditure, together with the number of meetings held during the year, and that the Executive be instructed to avail itself of the material for the purpose of publishing an Annual Report of the Society's work."
16. Motions by South Shields Branch:—

    (a) "That, in the opinion of this Conference, the Scholarship Scheme should be open to all bonâ fide members of the N. S. S. without regard to the length of time during which they have been members; and that all candidates shall pledge themselves to work for the objects and principles of the Society if successful."

    (b) "That public demonstrations be arranged in such places and districts where, from various local causes the Freethought movement is not making satisfactory progress."
17. Motion by Mr. W. Heaford:—

    "That this Conference welcomes the proposed exchange of visits between London and Paris Freethinkers, and instructs the Executive to take whatever steps it may find necessary to bring the proposal to a successful issue."

This Conference will sit in Clavier Hall, Princes-street, Regent-street; the morning session lasting from 10.30 to 12.30, and the afternoon session from 2 30 to 4 30. Both are purely business meetings. Only members of the N. S. S. can speak and vote. A public meeting will be held in the evening at 7 o'clock in the Queen's (Minor) Hall, Langham-place, W. The President will occupy the chair on all three occasions. A luncheon for delegates and visitors is in course of arrangement, particulars of which will be supplied at the Conference.

By order of the Executive,

G. W. FOOTE, President.
E. M. VANCE, Secretary.

AN EPITAPH ON THE TOMB OF DR. MESSENGER MONSEY.

CHELSEA HOSPITAL, 1778.

Here lies my old limbs, my vexation now ends,
For I've lived much too long for myself and my friends;
As for churchyards and grounds which the parsons call HOLY,
'Tis a rank piece of priestcraft and founded on folly;
In short, I despise them; and as for my soul,
Which may mount the last day with my bones from this HOLE,
I think that it really hath nothing to fear
From the God of mankind, whom I truly revere.
What the next world may be little troubles my pate;
If not better than this, I beseech thee, Oh! Fate,
When the bodies of millions fly up in a riot,
To let the old carcase of Monsey be quiet.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—No. 18 SUNDAY, MAY 4, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Whether there be one God or three—no God or ten thousand—children should have enough to eat, and their skins should be washed clean.—JOHN RUSKIN.

Secularism Justified of Her Children.

MANY people labor under the delusion that Secularism and Atheism are synonymous terms. It is perfectly true that the overwhelming majority of Secularists are convinced Atheists. Indeed, there seems to be no escape from the conclusion that Secularism logically implies Atheism. It is a certainty that no genuine believer in God can be an honest Secularist. The present point, however, is that Atheism is a purely negative term, while Secularism signifies a complete philosophy of human life, and is packed full with glorious affirmations. It would be correct to say that Atheism is not even an essential part of Secularism. We are Atheists simply because Theism has introduced a false and injurious philosophy of the life we live, and because we cannot get rid of the one without destroying the other. As long as the belief in God exists it is bound to exert a powerful influence upon its possessor's conception of life and its object; and we agree with D'Holbach, who pronounces it an entirely evil influence. The first step towards introducing the true view of life is to discredit and remove an existing false view of it; and this is the only sense in which Atheism is of service to Secularism. To confuse Secularism with Atheism is, therefore, to misrepresent both in the grossest manner possible. It is as great an error as to assert that Buddhism may be summed up in the word "renunciation," an assertion unblushingly made in the article on "Buddha and Buddhism" in the Everyman Encyclopædia. The word "renunciation" does occur in Buddhism; but it is merely an introductory word which is soon overshadowed by the greater and richer word, "acquisition." So, likewise, the word "Atheism" is but a preliminary term in Secularism, and we make use of it only because Theism stands in our way and must be thrown off. As in Buddhism renunciation is a condition of acquisition, so in Secularism, Atheism is the door through which alone we can enter into Nature's treasury. We ceased to be Theists in order to become Humanists; we renounced the supernatural that we might inherit all the wealth of the natural.

Because they have never taken the trouble to learn what Secularism really is Christians often taunt Secularists with the awful barrenness of their peculiar position. No taunt could be more unjust, because it mistakes a tiny part for an immense whole. It is usual to speak of Secularists as unbelievers, deniers, Atheists, or people who play the poor game of Pyrrhonism; but the truth is that they disbelieve and deny what is false in order to believe and affirm what is true. They pride themselves upon being the only true believers in the world. When a clergyman was told this the other day he expressed the utmost amazement. He had taken it for granted that the sole business of Freethinkers was to denounce the beliefs of their neighbors because they had none of their own. It had never occurred to him that they might be in possession of firm convictions in the interest of which they were attacking the popular religion with its God of love and Holy Writ. "True religion apart from dogma," says Professor Moore, of Liverpool, "is the sublimed essence of the knowledge of the highest things in the world, and in itself is never opposed to natural science" (The Origin and Nature of Life, p. 9). Professor Moore ought to know that there never has been and never can be a religion "apart from dogma." Every religious belief implies a dogma. "J. B.," of the Christian World, is always girding in eloquent style at the dogmas of the orthodox Church, heedless of the fact that he himself is, in his way, as great a dogmatist as Augustine or Aquinas. To Freethinkers all dogmas concerning the supernatural are essentially unbelievable, simply because the supernatural is not an object of knowledge. Then we would like Professor Moore to tell us what "the highest things in the world" are, of the knowledge of which "true religion apart from dogma is the sublimed essence." "The highest things in the world" known to us are justice and truth, sympathy and love, and these are, in reality, not things at all, but relations between man and man as members of society. Now, these are things in which Freethinkers are most ardent believers, and in the practice of which many of them have won distinction.

It is well known that Baron D'Holbach was an outspoken Atheist. He is often referred to as "a Materialist of the most material school," who in two great works, Christianisme Dévoilé and Le Système de la Nature openly attacked the Christian religion, characterising it as "a blind, superstitious bondage, maintained on men's minds by the self-interest of the priests, not only unnecessary but absolutely prejudicial to human morality." But the object of his vigorous attacks on Christianity was to emancipate morality from its supernatural entanglements. He constructed a system of morality without any reference to God and supernatural motives and sanctions. He pulled down dilapidated old structures in order to put up better and safer ones. In an article which pronounces his views "pernicious," the Encyclopædia Britannica makes the following significant admission:—

> "Although an Atheist, or at least a Materialist of the most material school, Holbach seems to have been endowed with a more than average share of virtue, and, whether by his courtesy, gentleness, or benevolence, inspired a warm affection in all he met. Even his failings, of which his simple credulity was perhaps the most prominent, were amiable. He was one of the best informed men of his day, and his excellent memory placed at his immediate disposal all the learning he had amassed" (vol. xii., p. 53).

It is a fundamental mistake to represent Secularism as a negative system. It is forsooth the most positive system known to us. It gives no uncertain sound on any of the subjects within its scope. Its message is always direct and clear, so that he who runs may understand it at a glance. There is never the slightest ambiguity about its language. On the subject of life, for example, its teaching is beautifully simple and to the point. Keeping clear of the endless and useless conjectures of the schools, it devotes itself to the elucidation of entirely practical questions. Instead of saying to a man, "Prepare to meet thy God," or "Get ready to die," it directs him as to the best way to meet his neighbor and enjoy his fellowship. The chief fact that matters is that every one of us has his or her own place in society, and certain duties to discharge while in it. Life in each case is an opportunity for making a contribution to the general welfare, and we have no data for stating that it is anything else. Man's chief end is to be of use to his fellows. We know nothing about the ultimate object of life, not even that it has such an object. We are what our ancestors have made us, and our descendants will be what we are now making them.

Equally positive is the teaching of Secularism concerning death. Religion has a great deal to say about "the dread of something after death," about a mysterious country which Shakespeare describes as "undiscovered," but which the divine treats with the familiarity of a traveller who has visited and studied every nook and corner in it, particularly the divisions known as heaven and hell. According to him, death means translation from this world to the next, believers in Christ entering heaven and unbelievers the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone. For the Secularist, however, death ends all. It is the termination of individual existence; and no fairy tales are told about the terrors that await the unbelieving soul in the Great Beyond. Lucretius makes fun of the man who fears death. When we are dead, he says,—

> "From sense of grief and pain we shall be free;
> We shall not feel because we shall not be."

To the man who dreads the event he simply says,—

> "The worst, that can befall thee, measured right,
> Is a sound slumber, and a long good night."

Immortality is a beautiful dream of the imagination, and, like all dreams, is true only to the dreamer. Secularism serves our race by delivering it from the tyranny of false hopes and false fears, and by enabling it to regard death as a servant of life.

What, then, is man according to Secularism? The highest, most perfectly developed animal, endowed with nothing that did not come to him naturally in the course of evolution. To the preacher this is a damnable heresy, for he treats man as a dual being, and attributes two different origins to him. He reluctantly admits that his body and its life may have been evolved from inorganic matter, as the biologist declares, or that "from the beginning of life up to life as we know it in a human person, there is an unbroken continuity, so close that it is even demonstrable that the highest form of life might arise from the lowest." The moment we reach man, however, we are in an entirely new world, a world that infinitely transcends the most complex of material processes and operations. When he became man there took place "an act of God, distinct from all other acts; an act by which he did, in the mystery of his wisdom and the operations of his might, differentiate by infinite distances between man and everything that lay beneath him in the scale of creation." In support of this strange doctrine not a single fact can be advanced. The soul, our "life's Star," as Wordsworth calls it, does not submit itself to any scientific experiment, nor do anything to justify the belief in its existence. Secularism can find no trace of it anywhere, and consequently takes no account of it in its philosophy of life. It recognises no duality in human nature, no two origins, and no kinship with any higher order of beings. We represent the summit of the present order of evolution, and our one business is to work for the betterment of the species to which we belong.

Thus Secularism justifies itself as a perfectly safe and reliable guide of life. It deals with facts and ignores metaphysical fancies. It looks at life from a purely natural point of view, and gives practical instructions as to the best methods of utilising it. As compared with Christianity, its superiority is beyond controversy. It teaches us to have faith in ourselves, and to despise the exhortation of self-depreciation. As Emerson says, it looks upon prayers offered to supernatural beings as "a disease of the will, and theological creeds as a disease of the intellect." What it says to all is, "Trust yourselves, and become Saviors one of another." This is positive teaching of the noblest kind. J. T. LLOYD.

The Nemesis of Faith.

IT is one of the ironies of history that, while Christianity has always avowed as one of its aims the purifying of sexual relations (with some of its earlier teachers purification assumed the form of absolute prohibition), it has from the earliest times been accompanied by varied forms of sexual extravagance, claiming a religious sanction for their existence. Something of this may have been due to reaction from a teaching of asceticism, but much more was due to the development of certain characteristics that were latent in Christianity, as in most other religions. At any rate, those whose minds are obsessed with the notion that those sexual extravagances which have from time to time broken out in the ranks of Christians were due to the intrusion of foreign elements, would do well to reflect on the Rev. S. Baring Gould's warning that criticism discloses to us "on the shining, remote face of primitive Christianity rents and craters undreamt of in our old simplicity," and also "That there was in the breast of the new-born Church an element of antinomianism, not latent, but in virulent activity, is a fact as capable of demonstration as any conclusion in a science which is not exact."*

In our own day, when we are faced with religio-erotic movements such as "The Abode of Love," and its kindred movements in America, Germany, and elsewhere, there is a tendency to look upon these as entirely due to the unprincipled erotic fervor of their promoters. Such a conclusion falls short of justice to the people concerned, and is quite lacking in historical perspective. As a matter of fact, those who have initiated these movements have not failed to propound a religious philosophy to justify their conduct, and, however much we may dissent from it, there is no good end served in refusing their arguments a hearing, or denying it to be in line with phenomena that has never been quite absent from the history of Christianity. Indeed, when we look closely into the very earliest records of the Christian Churches, it becomes fairly evident that we are face to face with more than the mere desire of a dominant religious organisation to regulate the morality of its followers. The conviction on the one side that certain things are unlawful is met with a conviction on the other side that the prescribed things are perfectly legitimate. And each side expresses itself, not in terms of ethics, but in terms of religion. It is a conflict of opposing religious convictions; and the fact that non-religious social opinion was on one side need not, and ought not, to blind us to the real nature of the conflict.

In the first Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians (v. 1) and in the Epistle of Jude there are indications that as early as the period during which these were written some Christian leaders were grappling with a tendency among believers that became still more pronounced as time passed. The example of Paul himself was, in fact, cited in justification of departure from the commonly accepted relations of the sexes. For Paul was himself accompanied in his wanderings by a woman variously referred to by different translators as a sister, "a sister to wife," "a believing wife," and "a Christian woman as a wife." At any rate, it is certain that Paul claimed the privilege of keeping the company of holy women and travelling about with them. What his precise relation was to them is not clear, nor have commentators ever made it clear. Their aim appears to have been rather to pass over the subject with as few words as possible. Nor was this practice of taking "sisters" with them on their travels confined to Paul. It was a custom that formed the subject of decrees in several Church Councils and Synods,† and numerous writings of the first three centuries refer to the practice. Nor did its practice cease with the earliest centuries of the Christian era. The doctrine of what is called "spiritual wifehood" persisted, and has formed the basis of many strange sects as late as the latter portion of the nineteenth century.*

Under a more secular form this doctrine of spiritual wives became known in modern times as "Free Love," but religiously it rested upon a two-fold basis. On the one side it was argued that, apart from a wife of the flesh, one might also have a wife of the spirit, and that this union of the spirit may exist side by side with a union of the flesh, and with different persons. On the other hand, it was held that a Christian who had been freed from the trammels of "the law" was by that fact raised above all law. His actions, whatever they were, no longer came under the categories of right or wrong; or, rather, as it was said, to one in a state of grace all things are lawful. Some even went so far as to teach that not only were all things lawful, but all things were desirable. It was openly taught by some of the early sects that, once in a state of grace, nothing that the body could do would corrupt the soul; and, reversing the order of asceticism which sought to crush the body by a process of starvation, they encouraged all kinds of conduct in order to demonstrate the soul's superiority. "The Church," says Baring Gould, "trembled on the verge of becoming an immoral sect." The same writer sums up the matter by saying:—

> "This teaching of immorality in the Church is a startling feature, and it seems to have been pursued by some who called themselves apostles as well as by those who assumed to be prophets. In the Corinthian Church even the elders encouraged incest. Now, it is not possible to explain this phenomenon except on the ground that Paul's argument as to the Law being over-ridden had been laid hold of and elevated into a principle. These teachers did not wink at lapses into immorality, but defiantly urged on the converts to the Gospel to commit adultery, fornication, and all uncleanness.....as a protest against those who contended that the moral law as given on the tables was still binding upon the Church."†

A certain detachment from modern conditions is essential to an adequate appreciation of the situation. Unquestionably, once the situation established itself, men of a lower and coarser nature seized the occasion for mere sensual gratification. But this would have been impossible on the scale indicated by Mr. Baring Gould had certain practices not ranked as the expression of a religious conviction. To assume otherwise is equal to assuming that, because men have entered the Church and used the Church from mere love of power or of wealth, there was nothing more than this in the establishment of the Church. Nor must the fact that the opponents of these teachers of a religio-erotic mysticism accused them of immorality and sensualism blind us to the truth of what has been said. Eroticism taught and practised as a religious conviction—that is the essential significance of the situation. To lose sight of this is to escape the vital truth embodied in the phenomena under consideration. We are not dealing with mere sensualists, although we may be dealing largely with an expression of sensualism. It is sensualism expressed as, and sanctioned by, religious conviction that is the peculiar character of the phenomena under investigation.

One of the earliest Christian institutions around which scandals gathered was that of the Agapæ, or love feasts. That they were, later, the occasion of much scandal is certain. That they were the subject of many grave accusations from the Pagans is also certain. On the other side, it is to be remembered that in the earliest period the Pagan accusations were indignantly repudiated by Christian writers, and the Agapæ represented as Feasts of Love and Feasts of Charity. Tertullian described them as gatherings in which each member, male and female, greet each other with a holy kiss, and the institution itself as "a support of love, a solace of purity, a check on riches, a discipline of weakness." From the Acts of the Apostles we learn that the Agapæ was carried on till midnight, even till daybreak; and it was only natural that assemblages of men and women in this fashion should attract notice and give rise to scandal. Further, as the Rev. S. Baring Gould points out, "At Corinth, and certainly elsewhere, among excitable people, the wine, the heat, the exaltation of emotions, led to orgiastic ravings, the jabbering of disconnected, unintelligible words, to fits, convulsions, pious exclamations, and incoherent ravings."‡

Generally, even by rationalistic writers, it has been assumed that the Agapæ commenced as a harmless institution, and afterwards degenerated, and gave good ground for scandal. But it is not easy to find adequate grounds for this belief. The Agapæ was not essentially a Christian institution. Similar assemblies existed amongst the Pagans, and were connected with orgiastic worship of various deities. And even though in its earlier appearance among Christians some of the more extreme forms were avoided, it is not, on the face of it, improbable that some kind of sexual extravagance appeared in connection therewith. At any rate, it is certain that charges were made, and that these were of the gravest character. In the first place they were made by the Roman writers, and the Roman government had been at considerable pains to suppress similar sects of Eastern origin. But afterwards they were brought by Christians themselves. Tertullian accused some of the sects of practising incestuous intercourse at the Agapæ. Ambrose compared the Agapæ to the Pagan Parentalia. The first epistle on Virginity by the pseudo-Clement (probably written in the second century) admits the immoralities committed at the Agapæ by saying: "Others eat and drink with them [i.e., the virgins] at feasts, and indulge in loose behavior and much uncleanness, such as ought not to be among those who have elected holiness for themselves." Justin Martyr more cautiously says, in referring to certain sects: "Whether or not these people commit these shameful acts, the putting out of lights, and indulging in promiscuous intercourse, I know not." Others of the early Christian writers are more precise and definite in their charges. And it is certain that the scandals of the Agapæ were so well known and so prolonged that they became the subject of legislation at several Church Councils, and were finally suppressed because of their licentious character.†

The whole subject is a little obscure, but the one certain and significant thing is that accusations of sexual irregularity were connected with the Agapæ from the outset. These may have been exaggerated, and at first unfounded; but they were certainly made on good grounds at a later stage in its history. And it is quite probable that just as Christianity continued Pagan ceremonies and ideas in other directions, so there were also here a carrying over of the sexual rites and ceremonies connected with earlier forms of religious worship.

The "Unspeakable" Turk.—II.

MR. SEPPINGS WRIGHT quotes further from that same Servian tribute to the Turk, and adds, "it is only one of many similar expressions of opinion made in my hearing":—

> "He is charitable, honest, trustworthy; he is modest, yet dignified; he is proud, but not vain; he is brave, but not boastful; he is sober, clean, polite; he is generally poor, but always hospitable; and he is patriotic, ready to starve and suffer and die, without a murmur, for his faith and the honor of his country."

With regard to the Turk's cleanliness, by the way, it is a fact that he always astonishes Western doctors and journalists by the rapidity with which his battle-wounds are healed. Mr. Wright was struck by the same phenomenon. "I marvelled," he says, "at the rapid manner in which the wounds of the soldiers were healing." A wound that keeps a Christian in hospital for weeks keeps a Turk there for only a few days. This is because the Christians of that part of the world are not clean-living persons, while the Turk is generally a teetotaler, according to the Mohammedan law, and almost fanatical in the matter of bodily cleanliness. His wounds heal quickly because his blood is pure.

Travellers praise the Turk as being usually a grave, polite, sociable gentleman. "The more I have seen of Turkey, and the more I know about her and her people," Mr. Wright says, "the more I am attached to her cause. Europe has treated this fine, generous race with a callous brutality that fills my soul with indignation. The Turks are being consistently and grossly misrepresented and maligned." Their very simplicity, no less than their pride and courage, makes them a too easy prey to the more cunning and unscrupulous Christians of south-eastern Europe. "The Balkan war," Mr. Wright says, "has been skilfully and shamefully engineered throughout by interested nations." The real motive of the "Liberators" in attacking Turkey has really become too obvious for discussion. They had no grievances themselves, and their passionate love of the liberty of others whom they were determined to free from the "intolerable tyranny of the Turk" was merely a pretence, as their actions and mutual quarrels have since sufficiently shown.

Mr. Wright quotes some excellent pages from another English war correspondent named Beevor. One of this writer's statements throws a flood of light on the "unspeakable" Turk's treatment of prisoners of war. "About thirty Bulgarian prisoners," he says, "were brought in and lodged in the house next door. They were well treated and supplied with food and warmth. In this bitter weather their lot was a happy one contrasted with most of their captors, who sat outside in the frosty biting wind." This correspondent shared Mr. Wright's view of the real character of the Balkan war. This is clearly shown in the following extract:—

> "For the first time we heard that King Ferdinand had declared a Holy War, and we wished at that moment he was with us. From a high hill which dominated the country we were able to realise the magnitude of the immigration, for the whole place seemed to be black with people, animals, and vehicles of all sorts and kinds. Many of the women were unveiled, but they hastily concealed their faces as we passed by. There was one exception—a most beautiful woman, almost white, evidently a Circassian, deathly pale from exposure and misery. She evidently cared not who saw her; indeed she was very like a handsome London lady of my acquaintance.
> "I realised the horrors of war, and it made my blood boil to see so much misery, caused by greed and selfishness, cloaked by the hypocritical pretence of reforms."

Mr. Wright represented the Central News at Tripoli as well as in the Balkans. He found the Turk the same character in both localities. And one thing is very noticeable now. The Turk has come to despise European "morality." A distinguished officer at Tripoli expressed the feeling in the following manner:—

> "The object-lesson which every child can see is that the Governments of the world to-day admit of no right, save one, and that is force. God has given us a country, a nationality; but unless that land is sown with guns, then the first European who is strong enough to do so can claim and take it."

"Herein," Mr. Wright remarks, "lies the puzzle to the Asiatic world."

One can read between the lines that Mr. Wright has a poor opinion of the Italians' humanity. He does not charge them with deliberate massacre, though other war correspondents have not hesitated to do so, but he hints pretty plainly that they were not very particular as to what they fired at or whom they killed. An Italian aeroplane circling over Garwia dropped a bomb into the town. Mr. Wright admits that the Italians are all bad marksmen, but they ought to have been able to drop that bomb somewhere else than in the Bazaar, where it was hoped that the women and children were perfectly safe, for it "was a long distance from the camp, and still farther away from the trenches." One victim of that wonderful display of "Christian Science" was innocent of all offence in the world from which it was so cruelly dispatched:—

> "One of the wounded was a dear little baby, and the poor mite presented a very dreadful sight. The stomach was ripped open as with a butcher's knife, exposing the lungs and entrails. It seemed from the first that nothing could help the poor child, but Besher Bey did his very best, and indeed told me he hoped to save its life. But when I went to the hospital tent to make inquiries the next morning, I found the poor little thing dead, and the mother very naturally distracted."

To the eyes of reason and humanity all the glories and conquests of all the wars in human history were ill-purchased at the price of that one baby's slaughter and that one mother's tortured heart. Mother and child! Behold the secret of all morality! Not man's worship of God, but woman's adoration of her babe, is the vital germ of ethical culture. Not in one age or one country, but in every time and every part of the world. The mothers and babes of the land of Tripoli are as the mothers and babes of the rest of the globe—even as the mothers and babes of the land of Italy. But out of Italy come armies and guns and battleships and aeroplanes, for no reason except greed and vanity; and out of one of the aeroplanes drops a bomb that kills six women and children, and amongst them this poor ripped-open baby, who had done no injury to anyone, and whose cost to the world was only a little milk, and a little air and sunshine, and a daily supply of inexpensive caresses; and this brutal business is called by Italian bishops "a Crusade of the Cross"—the carrying of Christian civilisation to a Heathen people; and Christian Europe spends four hundred millions a year in keeping itself ready for this brutal business; and Christianity is the religion of love and happiness, and peace and goodwill!

Why do we not have the real horrors of war presented to us? Euphemisms take the place of horrible facts. Five thousand were slain in a certain encounter! Yes, but they did not die collectively, they died singly,—every one with his separate share of wounds and agony; and if the tragic tale could be told in detail there would never be another battle within the limits of what is often so facetiously called "civilisation." But they are not recorded. They are too horrible for the correspondents' pen or the editor's taste or the readers' nerves. Mankind love to be deceived, and myriads of parasitic adventurers are interested in deceiving them. Mr. Wright confesses that men and women at home have not "the faintest conception of the unspeakable horrors of war." "To an alarming extent," he says, "human nature becomes human nature no longer; sexual distinctions, even the reverence and affection universally admitted to be due to old age and to youth, become temporarily obliterated from the brain, the senses of feeling of which are no longer under natural control." No indictment is drawn up by Mr. Wright against any particular people. All are "equally guilty of cruelties and outrages which," he says, "if I dared to relate them would appal the readers with their horrors."

We protest against this calculated reticence, which is really a policy of concealment. War correspondents should make an effort to tell the truth; that is, to state the facts. This has been left too much to the imagination of great poets, the splendor of whose art, by exciting our admiration, rather detracts from the horror of the frightful scenes they describe. Let us have a plain, prosaic narrative of the facts from the pens of careful and competent observers. This would put an end to war more speedily than anything else. The common citizen is not a bloody-minded person; he does not love cruelty, he simply fails to realise the hell of war from an abstract description; let the naked facts be pressed upon his mental vision, and he will revolt against the military spirit which sits like an incubus on modern civilisation. War is murder, war is agony, war is hatred, war is outrage on women, war is the slaughter of children, war is the massacre of the innocent and the helpless by slow starvation and misery,—to say nothing of the waste of human resources that might have been applied to human enlightenment and elevation. War is the worst of all social diseases—and it carries all other social diseases in its train. Civilisation must destroy it or it will destroy civilisation. That is why we implore publicists like Mr. Seppings Wright to tell the whole truth about war; to hide nothing, to let everything come into the light of day.

G. W. FOOTE.

The Irony of So-Called Revelations.—II.

8. There was yet another kind of protection of which man stood in need; he was surrounded by legions of wild beasts, which night and day prowled the jungles and forests in search of prey. Yet nature had left man the most defenceless of creatures. He possessed neither fleetness of foot nor strength of body. He was provided with no equipment either for defence or for attack. He was not covered with shield plates like those of the turtle, nor yet provided with horns, talons, claws, fangs, or tusks. Yet the gods maintained the strictest neutrality between the belligerents, and allowed the lethal struggle to go on apace for myriads of ages.

But revelation, as resourceful as ever, was not without a specific remedy to offer—and it is always in these specific brands that the irony of it all is seen. The revealed prescription given him against the ravages of wild beasts was—what think you? To worship them! Let wolf, tiger, or serpent be declared sacred. Let prayer and sacrifice be offered to them, and then they will cease to molest! A relic of this divine remedy we have in the brazen serpent which Moses raised up in the wilderness.

4. So much, then, for his wants in health. Let us now turn to those in sickness and disease. If ever there was given to supernatural powers an opportunity of conferring upon humanity blessings worthy to be called divine, this was one. A portion of mankind had at last so far vanquished its jungle foes as to be able to take up fixed abodes, and to dwell together in groups of huts and primitive dwellings. It was the beginning of a new era for the race of man.

To live in constructed shelters of any kind, grouped into villages and towns, was then as artificial a mode of life as flying is to-day a mode of locomotion. What an opportunity for an angel from heaven to appear, as in the legend of Hagar, and warn man of the dangers ahead! His new road led straight to disease, to pestilence, or to death. Why did not the shout of an archangel or the trump of God stop him on his way, and tell him that his shelter would be a poisoned cell and his dwelling a lethal chamber; that the air of his hut, his house, and his city would be laden with legions of invisible foes incomparably more deadly and unvanquishable than ever were those harbored in our earth's primeval forests? Would not such a warning be more merciful and divine than to allow him to proceed in purblind ignorance to be devoured of microbial pestilence and disease for millenniums and in countless myriads?

Or, indeed, revelation might take a different form. It might take the shape of a verbally inspired book on health—a Bible of sanitation and hygiene—which would, by revealing the ultimate secrets of health and life, teach mankind how at once to adjust his artificial shelter so as to make it conform with nature's stern laws and immutable conditions. If mankind had been given such a book, neither song of bard nor pen of historian could ever tell a million-millionth part of the blessings it would have conferred upon humanity. That would have been a Bible indeed—a book of books—a divine revelation that none could dispute.

Contrast with such a book the barbaric ignorance and the tragic teachings of the so-called revelations of the actual Bible. It everywhere declares or assumes that disease itself was not a natural but a supernatural phenomenon; that it was the work of malevolent spirits or a visitation from God, but never a natural occurrence. It declared that insanity is the result of being tenanted or infested by these spiritual parasites; that witches and sorcerers were their special agents to look after their business on earth and to execute their fell designs; and lastly, that cure was effected miraculously—by prayer, conjuration, ritual, and sacrifice—or through the magic virtue of holy relics, wells, and shrines. It is when we stand in the presence of this parade of ignorance, folly, and falsehood, naïvely put forth as divine knowledge, wisdom, and truth, that we are made to realise the irony of the so-called revelations.

Revelation said, "Disease is of God; go to the priest to be cured." That is the sum and substance of the medical science of revelation.

5. Man is, moreover, a social being. He is one of a herd, and his misery or happiness depends paramountly upon his relation to the rest of the herd. This relation is the ethical, and a consciousness of it makes him a moral being.

The darkness, however, is as intense in this sphere as elsewhere. In fact, his plight is even worse, for the pitfalls are numerous and less visible; the gins and the lures are more subtly laid than in the realm of either health or disease. But did ever the gods flash any light upon his path and take him by the hand and lead him to safety? There is no record; but their priests have ever been doing it in their name. If, however, we judge by the result of their "leading," we must conclude that either they were vile impostors who betrayed their gods or that the deities themselves were brutally callous, impotent, or non-existent. For man has received no light, and no hand has ever been reached out to save him. There is no possible escape from the horns of this dilemma.

Nowhere did the darkness brood more thickly than over man's social realm. Even now we should hail with infinite joy a few rays of supernatural light upon man's social destiny. Civilised humanity is, to-day, almost driven to distraction with problems—apparently as insoluble as ever—of its social well-being. Why do not the gods vouchsafe us with their divine counsel, and tell us, without further suffering, Whence is man's social salvation to come? Is it through the individual or through the herd? Through self-seeking or through compassion? Whether the just claims and needs of the All can ever be satisfied vid Self; or, vice versâ, that the inalienable rights of Self can be fully met through the all?

Who could estimate the value of supernatural light on the problem as to whether it is ever possible to obtain a state of social equilibrium between Self and Other so long as society is built on a foundation of private property; or, is it an essentially impossible dream? That is to say, can the millennium of peace and justice ever come, either through Individualism or through Socialism, as long as private wealth is the base and structure of the social fabric?

Or, finally, is trying to reconcile the interest of Self and of Other, like trying to harmonise two absolute incompatibles, an intrinsically insoluble problem; and that the future of society will, therefore, be a repetition of the past—a continuous tug of war between groups and classes of human beings, each inspired by self-seeking impulses and each having alternate periods of triumph and defeat? And though mankind seems thus, through want of this very knowledge, to be hurrying down at an ever-increasing pace to a catastrophic doom, yet no archangel appears on the social horizon, sent as the herald of God to deliver him from it.

Oh, revelation! was ever the need of humanity more dire of thy gifts than now?

But to return to our study of the past. The New Testament is a most ambiguous and indefinite guide. It is Communistic in one part and champions the order of private wealth and despotic government in another. Both parties appeal to it with equal confidence; and well they may, for evidently the gods had not made up their minds, when this revelation was given, which policy was best for mankind, and apparently they have not yet come to a decision.

The Sermon on the Mount, however, is universally claimed to be a divine revelation. But have not learned prelates and divines freely admitted that no State could outlive a month that was founded on its maxims?

An impracticable absurdity, however, is not irony. That is seen in how the divine maxims were realised in the life of the divine Church itself. In all soberness, may I ask, could ever ideals be more systematically and egregiously belied than have been those of the Sermon on the Mount by the Christian Church, from the first to the last of its career? When and where has it put into practice the maxims?—

"Turn to him the other cheek."
"Go with him twain."
"Lend him that asketh thee."
"Pray for them that despitefully use you."
"Forgive thine enemy—yea unto seventy times seven."

Yes; where and when were these put into practice by the very Church which brought them into being? History can point to long centuries during which it acted and lived on their opposites.

Nor is that all. It not only belied them in its own conduct, but betrayed them wherever it had a chance to exert its blighting influence.

Has the world ever witnessed despotisms more merciless, more bloodthirsty, than those established under the influence, or at the instigation, of the Church? Holy Russia and Catholic Spain to-day, though atrocious enough, in all conscience, are yet only tame specimens of its best handiwork.

Again, if we examine the institutions and the customs of the people we are impressed by the same truth—they are all characterised with the spirit of exploitation and of cruelty, which the humanism of the last hundred years has done much to alleviate and remove. It was, perhaps, only to be expected that the Church should systematically oppose this "movement of mercy," since most, if not all the barbarities which it sought to mitigate or abolish had their origin or sanction in divine revelation.

The history of modern industrialism supplies us with a painful object-lesson of how religion backed and encouraged the callous exploitation of human toil and human life. Child and female were freely sacrificed to the god of greed in the shambles of industry, with the connivance, or rather, with the approval, of the priests of religion, who generally tithed the spoil.

But the irony that attaches to the Christian civilisation comes to full sight only when its achievements are viewed in the light of its arrogant aims. It is probably a trait characteristic of every Monotheism, but it is in particular evidence in the Hebrew type of both the Jewish and the Christian variety.

Its priesthood claimed to have been specially commissioned by the Supreme Deity of the universe, with the establishment of a universal kingdom of God—a theocracy. The irony of this is seen when the grandeur of this sublime mission is contrasted with its woeful realisation in the history of the Western world. Of all the deceptions imposed by man upon his fellows in order to subject and enthral them to his will, the most shamefaced is that of theocracy. Nothing is comparable to it as an insolent imposture save the "divine right" of kings, which, in truth, is only a variant of the fraud.

The term "theocracy" was the mask; the face beneath it was hierocracy. God-rule was the surface guise; priest-rule was the reality beneath. In strict accordance with this aim and claim the priesthood of both the Jewish and Christian Churches fought long and bitterly to capture the political as well as the ecclesiastical sceptre. It was seized for short intervals before our era by the brave Maccabees; but anything approaching to realisation was achieved only by the Mediæval Church. For centuries a theocracy, i.e., a hierocracy, was established in Europe, for the priest ruled supreme; he either sat on the throne himself or placed his puppets thereon. He ruled the people with a rod of iron, he swamped them in intellectual darkness, and steeped them in moral corruption; but he filled them with faith. It was, therefore, to the Church, a full realisation of its ambitious scheme; it was its golden age, the theocratic millennium, the reign of God.

KERIDON.

Acid Drops.

We have been amused, but not surprised, at the way the religious papers in this country have dealt with China's Day of Prayer. It will be remembered that the Chinese Government decided on a day of universal prayer, and in a spirit of toleration which Christians seem quite incapable of appreciating, invited the Christian Churches in China to join. In England, this has been generally represented as an appeal of the Government to the Christian Churches alone to help by their prayers. The British Weekly, for instance, says: "The newly established Government proclaims.....its belief in the efficacy of Christian prayers." The Government does nothing of the kind. It invites everybody to pray, and does not proclaim its belief in anybody or anything. Bishop Montgomery, of the S. P. G., says we do not know "whether the Chinese authorities asked simultaneously for the prayers of Confucianists, Buddhists, and Taoists." If Bishop Montgomery does not know, we can only say that he is strangely lacking in information. Those who read the order intelligently cannot fail to know. We have no hesitation in saying that the Bishop does not want to know. It suits his game to pretend that the Chinese authorities are anxious for the prayers of Christians as being convinced of their unapproachable value.

In order to make as much as possible of the occasion, the Churches at home appointed April 27 as a day of prayer for China. And in the Evening News of April 24 this is announced as "the request of the Chinese Republic for prayers in all the British Churches next Sunday." Here we have the lie full grown. First, the request that everyone in China will pray, whatever be their religion; next, the conversion of this into a request for the prayers of Christians only; then, a day of prayer fixed on by English Churches, purely as a method of advertisement; and, finally, the statement that the Chinese Government has asked for prayers in all English churches and chapels. And some people wonder how it is that people come to believe in myths.

Alone among religious papers the Methodist Times has dealt honestly with the subject. That journal points out, "It should be borne in mind, of course, that the call to prayers is national and not merely Christian. It will be observed by all those who follow the ancestral and other religions of China." That is the plain truth; and we congratulate the Methodist Times writer on being the one truthful person among a crowd of religious liars.

And now what is it that lies behind this peculiar request. In the first place, there is little question that the bulk of the intellectual leaders in China are Agnostic. And even with others, the Rev. Dr. Beavan, just back from China, says that "translations of Carlyle, Spencer, and Huxley are being circulated, and crowds gather to listen to the reading of them at street corners." But the bulk of the people are still religious, and are still in the habit of praying. And in asking for an united endeavor to secure a good, stable Government, the authorities have naturally fallen back upon the habits and beliefs of the bulk of the population. Chinese tolerance included the Churches, and Christian leaders have replied by giving the Chinese an example of the superb manner in which they distort truth, and convert an act of courtesy into a religious surrender.

Finally there is the clause in the message "that the Government may be recognised by the Powers." Well, the Powers are Christian—at least in theory. And quite as much as anything, we fancy, the astute Chinese saw that by including the Churches in the request for prayer they would enlist on their side a body of advocates who, in return for a sectarian advertisement, might support the national desire for recognition. No one doubts that the Chinese are at least as intelligent as the people who are so anxious to convert them, and they are certainly not likely to overlook the material advantage of such a policy. For the rest, the belief that an educated China will accept beliefs that an educated Europe is steadily discarding, is one that can find permanent lodgment in the brains of none but fools or fanatics.

Mr. D'Eyncourt, the Clerkenwell Police-court magistrate, may not like Sunday bells in general, but he is going to deal with them impartially. He recently refused a summons against a muffin man for ringing his bell on a Sunday, on the ground that "the muffin bell is as much a part of Sunday as the church bell." Yes, and announces a more agreeable article.

"The Bill to permit the opening of saloons throughout the State of New York on Sunday from one o'clock in the afternoon until midnight, is favored by the legislative committee to whom it was referred. It is a poor Bill that divides Sunday between the Churches and the saloons, and awards no share of the day to amusements, sports, and industry."—Truthseeker (New York).

Dr. Horton is a great authority on the subject of Christian love. He is always talking about it, and on this, as on every theme, he speaks ex cathedra. Woe be to all who differ from him, for them he cannot love. When he was in India he occasionally met or saw people who were not Christians, and the best he could say about them was that they were loveless. The most conspicuous quality in the character of Hindus and Mohammedans is "lovelessness." But this is a gross libel on the non-Christian population of India. Does it never occur to the reverend gentleman that his attitude to non-Christians bears ample witness to his own "lovelessness"? But it is when he comes to depict non-Christian scientists that he lets his Christian lovelessness shine in all its native shamelessness. In this very discourse on love he forgets all about the emotion, and, in characterising the intellects of unbelieving scientists, employs these choice, eminently Christian adjectives, "blinded," "deadened," "dull," "stunted," "spiritually dead." Dr. Horton talks like that, "not because he is wiser than other men," but because he is under the dominion of invincible Christian prejudice, which incapacitates him for either understanding or being just to people of a different way of thinking from himself.

> "An ecclesiastical scandal is threatened owing to the action of St. Luke's Episcopal Church, one of New York's fashionable congregations, barring negroes from attending the services.
> "The edict was issued some time ago, and now attracts public notice for the first time because of anonymous threatening letters which are being received by the vicar, the Rev. G. A. Oldham. The vicar declines to call in the police, though a number of parishioners are urging him to do so.
> "The action of the vicar in forbidding negroes to attend the services was due to protests received from many of the congregation against mixing with blacks in Christian worship.
> "At first the vicar held out against the protests, but when a number of white parishioners threatened to leave the church he surrendered and informed the negroes they were not wanted in his church.
> "Most of the negroes obeyed the vicar's orders unquestioningly and joined a negro church near by. A few blacks, however, declined to obey, and they were consequently isolated in the church until they stopped attending.
> "Now the negroes have threatened to appeal to Bishop Greer, head of the New York diocese, but whether he will take any action is unknown."

The very people who are always boasting (falsely enough) how Christianity abolished negro slavery are the people who won't let a black man worship God in the same church with themselves. What hypocrites these people are! And what humbug is their faith!

The Irish Census report for 1911 contains an amount of what the Telegraph calls a "medley of sects." From this report it appears that Ireland can boast of no less than 305 different religious sects. One sect of thirty-nine calls itself the "Exclusive Brethren," and in a population of over four millions it is at least living up to its title. There are forty sects with only two members, so that they contain, at least, the potentialities of a split. On the other hand, there are ninety-one sects represented by a single adherent each. This batch of sects is well protected against divisions, although we should imagine that, with no fellow believer to quarrel with, sectarian life must be very tame. Still, these ninety-one sects can at least talk of the unity of faith without fear of contradiction.

In spite of the doctors' more favorable bulletins, the Rome correspondent of the Daily News says that "everything possible is being done, with the tacit co-operation of the Government, to conceal the unquestionable fact that the Pope's life is gradually ebbing away." The Catholic Church is conducted on business principles.

Rumors are circulating in Rome that the Pope has lost his senses. It would never do to admit this, if it were ever so true. Fancy "God's" vicegerent on earth in a state of imbecility! Perish the thought! It would throw discredit upon the whole Catholic business.

We cut the following from the Daily Chronicle of April 25:—

> "On the motion for the adjournment of the House of Commons last night, Mr. Aubrey Herbert drew attention to the condition of helplessness, destitution, and famine in Thrace, Macedonia, and Albania. People were dying in hundreds of thousands, he said, and, because they were inarticulate and we did not hear their cries, we did not think they were suffering."

Nobody contradicted or disputed this. People are dying in hundreds of thousands. People who have nothing whatever to do with the fighting. Such is one effect of this abominable Balkan war, waged without the slightest necessity by Christian nations against Turkey. Such is Christian "love" (heaven sake the mark!) after nearly two thousand years of the only true religion.

A suggestion has crept at last into a London morning newspaper that "Shakespeare Day" should take the place of "St. George's Day" on April 23. We have been advocating this for the last twenty years. The only offence ever committed in the "wicked" Freethinker was being in advance of the time.

"Blessed are ye poor." There seems no doubt whatever of the Christianity of the late Pierpont Morgan. Not alone was he a steady supporter of the Church, and responsible for the electric lighting bill for St. Paul's Cathedral, but his will bears ample testimony to his Christian convictions. In that document he commits his soul to the Savior "in the full confidence that, having redeemed it and washed it in his most precious blood, he will present it faultless before my Heavenly Father." It may perhaps be that the "Heavenly Father," on having the soul of a multi-millionaire placed before him, will treat it far more considerately than he would that of an ordinary mortal. Mr. Morgan, moreover, urges his children to maintain at all costs the "blessed doctrine of complete atonement for sin through the blood of Jesus Christ once offered, and through that alone." We have no doubt that Mr. Morgan found this belief comforting enough. At any rate, it did not prevent him piling up many millions by the usual methods of the American Dollar King. Judging from this confession of faith, we should say that it offers a striking proof of how little genuine mental ability is required for the piling up of a huge fortune.

The Bishop of Peterborough deeply regrets that many working men think more of the amount of wages they can earn than of the sources from which these wages come. This is, indeed, most depressing. If we found that Churches accepted money on this principle, the outlook would be very black indeed. As it is, the fact that the Churches are scrupulous in examining donations to see that their source is beyond suspicion, and that the clergy carefully refrain from investments in breweries, or in companies that are not run on strictly humanitarian principles, encourages us to look to the clergy for a shining example to these sordid working men.

The Roman Catholic Bishop of Troyes has issued a decree forbidding priests from riding or owning motor-cars, as such practices do not correspond with the modesty which ought to distinguish the priestly profession. Are the poor priests to imitate their Savior and ride donkeys?

tigate emigration problems. We thought the function of the Salvation Army was to prevent people emigrating to Hades, and not the Antipodes.

The "leavings" of professional Jesuites have been running smaller recently. We note the following:—Rev. Thomas Arnold Carr, of Tunbridge Wells, left £7,346. Rev. Thomas Espinell Espin, of Wolsingham Rectory, Durham, left £4,595. Rev. Robert Bennett Oliver, of Whitwell, Isle of Wight, left £4,092. Rev. Ernest Bellamy, curate of Richmond, Surrey, left £2,292. Rev. William Biggins, of Norfolk-street, Brighton, left £1,039. Canon John Walsh, of Ballymacarberry, Co. Waterford, left £2,283. The sum of £250 is devoted to an anniversary High Mass for the repose of his soul. Yet the law punishes common fortune telling.

An International Roman Catholic Club for London is projected. We suppose this organisation must be international on account of the scarcity of English Catholics.

Cultivated Kensington, says a musical critic, used to brandish a sword for Brahms, while Hampstead cried, "There is one god and one Wagner." Evidently, Hampstead was Unitarian as well as musical.

The Rev. Lord William Gascogne Cecil, in a statement explaining China's motives in asking for prayers in Christian churches, says the Chinese "are looking at a heavenly vision as it flits before their dazzled eyes." Maybe it is the vision of the Archbishop of Canterbury receiving £15,000 yearly for preaching the gospel of poverty that appeals to the Heathen Chinee, who, as Bret Harte has reminded us, is "childlike and bland."

Fifteen out of sixteen Chinamen in a police case at Manchester took the oath as Christians. It will not be long before we hear of the conversion of China.

The choirboys of Brompton and Snaenton Village Churches, near Scarborough, have gone on strike because they were not invited to a tea given to adult choristers and lady helpers. We wonder if it was the tea or the lady helpers that formed the attraction.

The bioscope film, "From Manger to Cross," recently made its appearance in Johannesburg. Acting on a petition, hurriedly secured and presented, the Administrator of the Cape Provinces, Sir Frederick de Waal, introduced a Draft Ordinance "to provide for the prohibition of certain performances and exhibitions of a religious character." The Bill was passed, and the Administrator has now the power to prohibit the performance of any form of entertainment which, in his opinion, is calculated to give offence to the religious convictions and feelings of any section of the public." The Cape Times remarks that in a few years this piece of legislation will be regarded as a curiosity of the Statute-book. Quite so; but meanwhile it is there. And any section of the religious public that doesn't care to go to a particular entertainment is given the power to prevent other sections attending. The freedom of all is placed at the mercy of the whim of a few. And, as usual, it is the feelings of the religious section that is to be protected. The feelings of other sections may be outraged with impunity.

Everyman must be gaining quite a reputation as a medium in which well-known mediocrities can champion Christianity. Several weeks ago we called attention to some absurdities by Mr. Hector Macpherson on the relation between Christianity and Paganism. And we were pleased to see recently in Everyman a letter from Mrs. J. Stark, in which she gives some well-deserved raps to the scribbling Scot. Mr. Macpherson had said that the ideal of the Greek was sensuous enjoyment, and Mrs. Stark aptly comments, "How the sides of the Athenians would have shook with laughter could Aristophanes or Euripides have known that some barbarians of a grossly materialistic age would have accused them of ennui or sensuous enjoyment. The Greeks were as far above us intellectually as we are above the negroes." Mrs. Stark has two or three telling quotations from Professors Murray and Bosanquet that should give Mr. Macpherson food for thought.

It is, perhaps, an illustration of the way in which association with Christianity corrupts sane thinking that Mrs. Stark should mar an otherwise able letter with the sentence, "The Greeks of the classical period were too busy working for posterity and preparing the way for Christianity to be troubled with ennui." We might paraphrase Mrs. Stark and say that the Athenians would have shrieked with disgust could they have known that their Pantheon would have been replaced by the Christian trinity and its crowd of saints, or that their own culture would be followed by the barbarism and savagery of the Dark Ages. Greek culture did not prepare the world for Christianity, it had to be suppressed before Christianity could firmly establish itself. And it was the revival of Pagan culture at the Renaissance that helped to break the power of the Church, just as the best ideals of to-day have a closer affinity with Paganism than with Christianity.

The patriarch Jacob had a whole night's wrestling match with Jehovah, and came out of it victorious. The victory was so complete that his name was changed into Israel, or, he who wrestleth with God. Unfortunately, however, he received a permanent injury to the sciatic muscle, which occasioned limping for the rest of his life. The curious thing is, that the divines take this old legend seriously, and deduce therefrom the lesson that there is a sense in which we must all wrestle with God before he admits us into his friendship. Professor Clow, of Glasgow, sees in it "a dim foreshadowing of the gospel of Christ." Amazing is the credulity of the men of God.

"For myself," says Mr. Justice Bailhache, "life would be hardly worth living if I did not feel sure that there is over it all the controlling and the guiding hand of God." Our own attitude is just the opposite. We should feel that life was not worth living if we believed that "God" was at the head of all the folly, wickedness, and suffering of this world. The problem of reform would then be hopeless. It would be opposing God.

The latest story about the Kaiser is that he has an electric sign bearing the words "God with us" attached to the imperial motor. It is only illuminated when his Majesty is in the car.

"An acquaintance of mine," a correspondent says, "tells me he visited the Leytonstone Rink Picture Palace during Easter week. The picture of the events of the week concluded with the murder of the King of Greece. This was immediately succeeded by a series, 'In the Flat Above.'"

A French workman woke up in the Cherbourg Hospital after being asleep for seventy-seven days. There are people who have been asleep, not for days but for years, and show no signs of waking up yet. Lots of the clergy, for instance.

Mr. Israel Zangwill, writing in the Daily Chronicle on "The War Devil," humorously suggests that one of the beatitudes has been altered to "Blessed are the pacemakers."

According to the New Theologians the Devil has disappeared; but from recent sermons by other distinguished divines we are inclined to think that a relative must have survived him and is carrying on the business.

Driving the devil out of human beings still lingers in the human mind and practice, even in what are called "civilised countries. A West Ham magistrate has ordered six strokes of the birch (foolish man!) to a small boy accused of theft. The juvenile culprit said that the devil had tempted him, and had tempted him four or five times before. "Then you will have six strokes of the birch," said the magistrate. "Perhaps that will knock the devil out of you." Perhaps the same treatment would knock the fool out of the magistrate. Suppose he tries it.

From the Observer of April 13: "The wise, humane, and Christian-like Bill of Sir S. Romilly, referring to the penalty of death against shop-lifting, after passing the House of Commons, has been lost in the Lords, by a majority of eleven only, five of whom were Bishops."—Drakards Paper, April 11, 1813.

A Somersetshire vicar, the Rev. Henry Arthur Daniel, has left an estate of £96,673. This clerical camel will have no little difficulty in getting through the needle's eye.

The ceremony of "Blessing the Sea" took place in connection with the Eucharistic Congress at Malta. The performers in that pious farce should read Byron's address to the ocean in Childe Harold. It would take some of the conceit out of them. At least it ought to.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £116 12s. 5d. Received since:—K. C. C., £1 1s.; Helena Parsons, £2 10s.; J. G. F., £1. Per Miss Vance: Harry Shaw, 5s.; W. Dodd, 10s.

J. STENNING GREENE.—The only part of your letter that we are able to understand is the statement that Catholic priests cannot hold private fortunes, and that is sheer nonsense. The wills of Catholic priests are proved, just like other people's, and appear in the ordinary lists of wills in the newspapers, with details of special bequests—often, we have noticed, to housekeepers.

K. C. C.—Balance passed over to N. S. S. Secretary. Thanks.

W. L. BUTCHER.—Mark Rutherford was an assumed name. The author of the powerful works bearing that signature was really William Hale White. There are one or two letters from him (we speak from memory) in Holyoake's Bygones Worth Remembering. He was intended for the pulpit, but he was expelled from a Congregational college for heterodoxy. He found refuge in the Civil Service. Some of his work is exquisite; in Pages From a Journal, for instance, and More Pages From a Journal. His six novels are replete with intellect and imagination, which are displayed not so much in the mere stories as in the character-drawing; and there is no posing or sentimentalism or "fine" writing—everything is honest and sincere.

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

J. BURRELL.—The facts you mention are fairly well known; all but the "illegitimate" part, anyhow.

E.B.—Your cuttings are always welcome. Thanks for your pleasant and encouraging letter. With a little continued care Mr. Foote will be "as fit as ever" for the "fight against superstition and bigotry." Creative energy is moving in him again, and work is becoming once more a pleasure. With regard to the proposed Box Hill memorial to George Meredith, we are not as fond as some are of dotting the country with memorials of great men—especially of great writers, who really live on in their writings, and do not live at all if they do not live there. This truth is finely expressed in Milton's epitaph on Shakespeare.

C. TAYLOR (Bloemfontein).—Mr. Foote will be glad to see you when you visit England. He will not be lecturing in August, but he probably will in September. You could get admittance to the Lisbon Congress on the usual terms of a few francs for a member's ticket. This could be managed for you by the N. S. S. secretary at headquarters in London. Glad to hear that your wife as well as yourself "takes a keen interest in the Freethinker."

T. F. GREENALL.—The Secular Education League's office is at 19 Buckingham-street, Strand, London, W.C.

R. NORTH.—Shall appear. Thanks for good wishes and congratulations on our recovery.

V. G.—Letters received with thanks.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

After the Whitsun holidays we shall be publishing some portraits of contributors to the Freethinker and other men and women connected with the National Secular Society or well known in the Freethought movement generally. The series will start with a rather striking portrait of Mr. Foote. It was mainly the result of an accident; those who have seen it say it is really characteristic.

Mr. Foote is contributing to the Freethinker again, but Mr. Cohen is still relieving him of the official duties of the editorship, including the regular Tuesday's task of seeing the paper through the press.

As previously announced, the business meetings of the Annual Conference of the N. S. S. on Whit-Sunday will be held in Clavier Hall, Princes-street, Regent-street. Princes-street is just at the back of Jay's well-known drapery establishment, and may be entered from either Oxford-street or Regent-street. A luncheon has been arranged at La Café Marguerite, 171 Oxford-street, which is within three minutes' walk of Oxford-circus. As the luncheon is for a limited number only, Miss Vance would be glad if those who intend sharing it will let her know as early as possible.

The evening (public) meeting will be in the Queen's (Minor) Hall, Langham-place. The speakers will include Messrs. Foote, Lloyd, Cohen, Moss, Heaford, Davies, and Miss Kough. Such an array of speakers ought to bring Freethinkers from all parts of London, and these may in turn do a little useful propaganda by bringing their Christian friends along with them. They can certainly assure them that at no church in London will they have the chance of listening to so much sense in so little time.

Mr. Foote will preside at the meetings of the N. S. S. Conference on Whit-Sunday and at the public meeting in Queen's (Minor) Hall in the evening. It will be his first public appearance since his severe illness, and a rally of his London friends is expected on this occasion.

Mrs. Helena Parsons, widow of the late Horace W. Parsons, one of the N. S. S. vice-presidents, in subscribing to the President's Honorarium Fund, asks us to give her the name and address of any "poor" member to whom she could pass on the Freethinker every week, as "it is too good to use as waste-paper." We are delighted to see our old friend's widow retaining her interest in "the cause." We too frequently find that the families of earnest Freethinkers forget the Freethought movement. Sometimes they go to the discreditable length of burying Freethinkers with orthodox rites. Ladies who are ladies by nature don't act in that way. They act as Mrs. Parsons has done.

We are pleased to be able to report that the presentation to Mr. J. Partridge, secretary to the Birmingham Branch of the N. S. S., came off with complete satisfaction to all concerned. Speeches were delivered by Mr. Clifford Williams, Mr. Joseph Bates, and the President of the Branch, Mr. Fathers. Letters were also read from the leading Freethought speakers and writers, expressing their appreciation of Mr. Partridge's services to Birmingham Freethought. The presentation itself took the form of a mahogany cabinet and bookcase, bearing a silver plate suitably inscribed, and a ladies' portmanteau to MRS. Partridge.

A special meeting of the Wood Green Branch of the N. S. S. will be held at Straker's Tea Rooms, 224 High-road, Tottenham, at 8 o'clock on Wednesday evening next (May 7). Freethinkers in the district who are not at present members of the Branch, are invited to attend. Miss Vance, as General Secretary of the National Secular Society, is to be present, and will have some important matters to place before the meeting.

The monthly meeting of the Croydon Branch of the N. S. S. will be held at Ruskin House, Station-road, West Croydon, to-day (May 4), at 7.30 p.m. All members and friends in the neighborhood who are interested are cordially invited.

North London Freethinkers are reminded that to-day (May 4) the North London (Parliament Hill), Finsbury Park, and Kingsland Branches commence their open-air work. We hope local "saints" will not fail to support these stations as they deserve.

"The British Missionary Society has received the following telegram from Yuan Shih-Kai:—'Thanks for kindly act. I pray prosperity for your religion. All the Chinese people are grateful to you.'"—Observer, April 27.

Clearly, Yuan Shih-Kai considers the British missionary has a different God from what he himself possesses. But if the President of the Chinese Republic can "pray" for the "prosperity" of the English missionary, why the dickens can't he pray for himself? Why employ an outsider if he can do the work for himself?—E. B.

Sir Hiram Maxim on Chinese Missions.

> "First the missionary, then the gunboat, then the land-grabbing—this is the procession of events in the Chinese mind." "The history of our intercourse with the East from beginning to end is the history of 'make face' with our conscience. Our whole intercourse with the Chinese has been neither honest, serious, nor reputable. It is only the slang word 'rot' that epitomises our pharisaical conduct."—GEORGE LYNCH, The War of the Civilisations, 1901; pp. 254-299.
> "I have wandered through the Imperial Treasure House at Mukden fingering rare draperies, handling beautifully worked specimens of old-time jewellery, poising priceless pieces of airy eggshell china on my palm, and I have asked what of civilisation the men could bring to the Orient whose guns I heard faintly booming in the distance."—DOUGLAS STORY, To-morrow in the East, 1907; pp. 244-5.

WE have to thank Sir Hiram Maxim for a copy of a book he has just completed, entitled Li Hung Chang's Scrap-book (Watts & Co., 7s. 6d). In a "Foreword" the distinguished author explains why he gave this seemingly strange title to his book, as follows:—

When his Excellency, the late Chinese statesman, Li Hung Chang, arrived at Dover in the course of making his grand tour of Europe in 1896, his first words when he stepped ashore were, "I should like to see Hiram Maxim." It appears that in 1895 Sir Hiram was invited to attend a meeting called in London to sympathise with the relatives of certain missionaries murdered in China. Sir Hiram took the opportunity to throw some much-needed light upon the subject, and, in a long speech, denounced the sending of missionaries to China at all. This speech was reported, and a copy was sent to the Chinese Minister in London, who forwarded it to Li Hung Chang, who, in turn, delivered it to the Chinese Emperor, and when Li Hung Chang came to England he was commissioned to confer upon Sir Hiram the much-sought decoration of the Double Dragon, which gives a high rank in China to those honored with it; at the same time Sir Hiram had several discussions with Li Hung Chang upon the missionary question, but found his Excellency hopelessly puzzled by the subject. In fact, he observes:—

> "The Chinese were greatly puzzled as to how it was possible for people who were able to build locomotives and steamships to have a religion based on a belief in devils, ghosts, impossible miracles, and all the other absurdities and impossibilities peculiar to the religion taught by the missionaries" (p. 10).

So, in order to present the facts in the strongest light, Sir Hiram prepared a large scrap-book and filled it with extracts and clippings from a great number of publications, accompanied with explanatory notes. It is this "scrap-book" which forms the foundation, and gives the title, to the volume we are now dealing with.

The work is divided into three sections—the first, consisting of fourteen chapters, entitled "The Nature of Christianity," is a terrible indictment of historical Christianity. It shows how that faith fought against science; how it murdered Hypatia and Bruno, and suppressed Galileo. It deals with the religious wars and massacres engineered by Christianity. Of the awful tortures and burnings of the Inquisition and the witch-finding mania, concluding with a description of the awful state of grossness and immorality which prevailed in Europe during the Middle Ages, the Ages of Faith, when Christianity — having crushed Paganism and Freethought—reigned alone, supreme and triumphant.

The second section consists of twelve chapters, entitled "Christianity in China," which, after showing—often from the testimony of the missionaries themselves—the superior morality, toleration, and politeness of the Chinese, things which they are, in many respects, in a better position to teach the population of this country than we are to teach them, goes on to show the uselessness and the actual harm done by missionaries in China. It also shows the terrible injuries inflicted, in blood and treasure, upon the Chinese by Christian nations.

The third section, or "Conclusion," consists of eight chapters, and is a general review of the subject. Sir Hiram gives a list of standard works, like those of Professors Draper and White, Buckle, Mosley, and Lecky, in history; and Giles, Edkins, Smith, Morrison, Parker, Little, Holcombe, Lynch, Norman, Davis, and others, all high authorities on things Chinese, several of whom are themselves missionaries. Sir Hiram gives chapter and verse from these authorities for every statement he makes; his book, therefore, forms a crushing indictment of Christian missions in China.

The facts cited by Sir Hiram in this book are well known to our consuls, diplomats, and, in fact, to anyone who has studied Chinese affairs; but, as Mr. George Lynch has observed, they are afraid to speak out. "I have seen," he says, "the subject gag the mouths of diplomats, politicians, prominent army officers, and men in all manner of high official positions," and he adds:—

> "It is curiously interesting what different opinions you hear expressed in private by sensible men throughout the East compared with those which appear in any of their public utterances, printed or otherwise." *

It is only from men like himself, who, as he remarks, have not to cultivate "the votes of any constituents" that we get the truth. Sir Hiram also very lucidly explained this point to Li Hung Chang. After pointing out that our governing class depend upon votes for their official positions, he observes:—

> "In many cases the parties are so evenly balanced that only a small percentage of the votes is necessary to turn the scale in either direction; therefore, both parties and all officials are bound to cater for the missionary propaganda, at least in the sense of not interfering with it. It is safe to say that not more than one per cent. of our official class is in favor of sending missionaries abroad; still, they dare not oppose it" (p. 5).

The first grave objection to preaching Christianity to the Chinese, observes Sir Hiram, "is that it consists of a series of statements about the world and man which are flagrantly inconsistent with modern knowledge, and disdainfully rejected by most of the leaders of thought in Europe." Moreover, he adds:—

> "We are sometimes told that when we criticise the statements of the Bible we are flogging a dead horse. The truth is that not only do missionaries offer the Bible to highly civilised people like the Chinese with an assurance that it is the gospel of progressive Europe, but we officially impose its discredited statements on all our school children in England. Millions of our less educated adults are encouraged to believe these statements literally, and even the alleged higher scheme of Christian belief is directly based on them" (p. 7).

But if the missionaries had to depend upon their teaching of religion alone for converts, they would get very few specimens to exhibit. They have to be attracted by other means, and the name "rice Christians" indicates one means of attraction. But this method has been so much exposed that it is now discredited, although Sir Hiram cites the testimony of Mr. J. F. Davis to the effect that—

> "A few Catholic missionaries still make converts of the lowest and poorest Chinese, who occasionally appear at the churches and receive each of them a small donation of rice, for which reason they are sometimes called, in Portuguese, 'rice Christians'" (J. F. Davis, The Chinese, p. 223).

The more modern method is to attract them by teaching them English, or by giving medical and surgical aid. "We hear much of the success of medical missions," says Sir Hiram, and he cites the following amusing testimony of Major H. Knollys, from his English Life in China (p. 180) as to the cause of their success:—

> "Thus far they had at all events preserved a semblance of attention, but at last nature asserts herself, and the undisguised sighings and naive yawnings are impressively portentious. Then empty medicine bottles and cups are held up to the light, and say as plainly as spoken words: 'About time to finish your harangue. Let us get on to the salves, the potions, and the boluses.' At the conclusion of service the patients flock into the surgery for treatment."

The same writer is indignant at "the glowing accounts of results and success" published by the missionaries, and declares:—

> "I have before me at this moment a flaming report on China missions—would that I might particularise its title!—the statements wherein have been concocted either by a knave or a fool, so grossly false are they."

In the chapter entitled "Europeans in China," Sir Hiram draws up a damning indictment of the Christian nations in their dealings with the Chinese; from the beginning to now it has been a policy of perfidy, robbery, and spoliation, punctuated by rapine and murder.

In an eloquent passage the author tells us his reason for publishing this work:—

> "I have had but one object in compiling this book, and that is to save human life and prevent human suffering. If this humble effort of mine saves one Chinaman from being killed, one Chinese girl from being outraged, one Chinese village from being looted and burned, or prevents one misguided man or woman of my own race from wasting his or her life in the vain and foolish attempt to make the Chinaman change the name of his religion, I shall be satisfied" (p. 22).

In a leaflet enclosed in the book he also expresses the wish: "If the book is read in England and the United States, I am hopeful that it will do something to cut off the supply of gold that enables the missionaries to inflict themselves upon the innocent Chinese." But the author knows too well the character of the apostles of the religion which exhorts us to love our enemies to have any delusions as to how they will receive his book, for he further observes:—

> "I venture to assert that the testimony of my many witnesses, together with my own remarks, are unanswerable. Superstition and falsehood are not able to meet the two-edged sword of Truth and Reason in a fair stand-up fight, and no recourse is left to the missionaries and their supporters except personal abuse. I have done my best to expose the wickedness and folly of the worst religious propaganda that we have on this earth to-day, and I must expect my share of abuse and falsehood, together with hundreds of abusive letters, the greater number of which will be unsigned, so as to make it impossible for me to strike back."

Sir Hiram, in this work, follows in the best traditions of the great Freethinkers of the past. Voltaire and Paine passionately protested against all cruelty and injustice. Charles Bradlaugh, in our own time, espoused the cause of the oppressed natives of India. And this work of Sir Hiram's will prove a more lasting monument to remembrance than any of bronze and marble that can be conceived, showing that the great inventor of the automatic gun and the pioneer of the aeroplane, was not only a great inventor, but was also a hater of injustice and a lover of mankind.

The book is lavishly illustrated, well indexed, and forms a very handsome volume.

W. MANN.

A Poet's Polemic.

The Muse in Exile, by William Watson. Herbert Jenkins, 1913.

IT is at once the privilege and the penalty of genius to receive the homage of appreciation and vivisection by contemporaries. That task in lesser cases is left for the professors and critics of a later age. Browning's vogue was the basis of many Browning societies, who explained to the master his own meaning when he had forgotten it. But Mr. Watson is not in need of interpretation like Browning. It is seldom that one finds a poet possessing such clarity of utterance. He has a fine tact of exclusion, and rejects all that is gusty, noisy, or unbecoming. The poetry of Mr. Watson has always seemed to us full of an austere beauty, and we think of him, not as we think of many poets, as merry minstrels singing in the guest hall, but as a ministrant to the Goddess of Liberty, burning, with a stately grace, the incense and the precious gums.

Looking back at the volumes he has already given us, with their fine music, we notice the growth of a greater dignity and a more majestic beauty. His "Lachrymæ Musarum," which made so notable a stir when Tennyson died, must rank as one of the finest poems we have had for many years. Mr. Watson handled the great theme of august death right worthily. In the picture of Tennyson's reception by his brother poets, Mr. Watson's language was exquisite:—

> "Keats, on his lips the eternal rose of youth,
> Doth in the name of beauty that is truth,
> A kinsman's love beseech."

The description of the dead poet is very fine:—

> "Master who crowned our immelodious days
> With flowers of perfect speech."

On the subject of death, indeed, Mr. Watson always writes with dignity. It is not too much to say that "Wordsworth's Grave," "The Tomb of Burns," "In Laleham Churchyard," and "Shelley's Centenary" will be linked indissolubly with the memory of those great writers they celebrate, so penetrating is the insight into the genius of each poet.

Mr. Watson is master of a magnificent vocabulary. His command of splendid and striking imagery is remarkable, and his poems are a golden treasury of jewelled aphorisms. Take, for instance, the following felicities:—

> "The mystery we make darker with a name."
> "Not in vague dreams of man forgetting men, > Nor in vast morrows losing the to-day."
> "Song is not truth, not wisdom, but the rose > Upon truth's lips, the light in wisdom's eyes."
> "And set his heart upon the goal,
> Not on the prize."
> "The august, inhospitable, inhuman night."

Mr. Watson's poetry is consecrated to the service of man. His "Purple East" and "A Year of Shame" are full of a noble humanity. He has never concealed his Freethought. It is apparent in "The Eloping Angels," a poem of which any man might be proud; but the splendid audacity in "The Unknown God" has not been surpassed by any living poet. The latest volume from his pen, The Muse in Exile, will flutter the literary dovecotes. For it is a poetic arraignment of contemporary literature, written with uncommon dignity, and reinforced with a critical essay. This prose introduction was delivered last year by its author to American audiences, and it must have given Transatlantic lovers of literature a very poor impression of English men of letters. For, according to Mr. Watson, England no longer cares for poetry, and, largely, this neglect is due to the wilful misrepresentations of the reviewers, who, in the noble pursuit of "log-rolling," distract and bewilder the reading public, so that they imagine that contemporary poetry has nothing to give them which can illustrate or clarify life.

Hence, the muse is in exile, and when Mr. Watson passes from critical argument to the happier expression of poetry, he brings the present generation to judgment:—

> "Let me do no wrong
> To her whose child I am: this giant age,
> Cumbered with her own hugeness, as is the wont
> Of giants. Yet too openly she herself
> Hath slighted one of Time's great offspring: she > Hath slighted Song; and Song will be revenged.
> Song will survive her: Song will follow her hearse,
> And either weep or dance upon her grave."

And, again, with more biting phrase, he imagines that Stupidity is enthroned as the monarch of all:—

> "The dullards of past generations, the undiscriminating crew
> That turned deaf ears to Shelley, that turned blind > eyes upon Keats,
> Unchangeably incarnate, invincibly born anew,
> Still buzz in the press and the salon, still lord it in > learning's seats.
> . . . . . .
> When all things else have perished, Stupidity shall remain
> And sit secure on the ruin of every star of the sky."

All this makes sad reading; but we are convinced that it is an over-statement, a poetic exaggeration.

The present age naturally suffers by the passing of such magnificent poets as Meredith and Swinburne; but the popularity of the poetry of Mr. John Masefield shows the reading public's interest in verse, while, if success upon higher levels be desired, the array of editions of Robert Bridges, Francis Thompson, and, we may add, Mr. Watson himself, are in themselves a refutation of the idea that true artistry in literature is no longer held at its proper valuation. The readers of Meredith and Swinburne, of Browning and Tennyson, were fond of real poetry, and that of the best, but they would not have troubled about the minor verse of uninspired nobodies. Let the modern poets give us as good poetry as the masters, and there will be an end of the slump in poetry.

"For in life's midmost chamber there still burns
Upon the ancient hearth the ancient fire,
Whence are all flamelike things, the unquenchable muse
Among them, who, though meanly lodged to-day,
In dreariest outlands of the world's regard
Foresees the hour when man shall once more feel
His need of her, and call the exile home."

MIMNERMUS.

Church and State in Portugal.

ON April 20 the Portuguese Republicans—in other words the Portuguese people, for with the exception of the defeated hangers-on to the Braganza brigade, and the Church and its dupes, the people of Portugal are heartily in sympathy with the new regime—celebrated the second anniversary of the proclamation of the law decreeing the separation of Church and State. This glorious date, which records the triumph of a great principle of democracy, was the crowning achievement of the long and devoted labors of the Association of Civil Registration founded at Lisbon eighteen years ago. That body, composed principally of Freethinkers, had Republicanism for its ideal, and the divorce of religion from politics and the complete secularisation of all the functions and attributes of corporate civil life, as its ultimate object. When Portugal got rid of the Monarchy the "grace of God," alias the Church, which maintained the Carlos regime with all its vileness and corruption, received its moral and political quietus; and there was no longer any necessity to put the State under the patronage of a mythical Deity. The natural result of the establishment of the Republic on a secular basis was to let loose upon the new regime all the monarchistic and aristocratic bandits of Portugal, who, from the vantage ground of reactionary Spain, made repeated inroads from across the frontier, and in England it inspired the journalistic duchesses to fill the columns of the Daily Mail with far-fetched extravagances of assertion and insinuation. The crimes of King Carlos and his satraps, the plunder by them of the national purse, and the reign of terror established by them under which the lives and liberties of the people were constantly assailed—all these highly favored abominations failed to stir the defeated rebels into martial activity, or stir up the disinterested duchesses of Old England to assume their time-honored rôle as heaven-appointed protectors of popular freedom. Happily, the genius of the Portuguese people can afford to smile upon these efforts to re-establish the reign of Humpty Dumpty.

While the Portuguese Republicans remain aloof from religion they are bound to receive the homage of these attacks. They are liberating themselves from a hateful yoke, and teaching Spain and other nations to follow in their footsteps: hence these ducal tears. Nothing, indeed, more heroic has been seen in the history of democracy than the revolt of the Portuguese people against the corrupt monarchy that had so long degraded and impoverished the nation, and against its faithful unscrupulous ally the Church, that great engine of moral corruption which for long and cruel centuries exploited the ignorance of the people. When, therefore, the long-suffering Portuguese nation rose against the Braganza dynasty and drove it into exile, the next, the inevitable, step to take was to capture that other citadel of tyranny, the Church, and reduce it to its proper position as an institution divorced from the State, and subject to it, like all other organisations, religious or secular, in the community. As a measure of national self-defence this was the true, the only, line of policy.

The soil of Portugal was for generations soaked with the blood of heretics, schismatics, and unbelievers, both of Gentile and Jewish blood; and if the Lusitanian Freethinkers and Radicals who, after incredible sacrifices, made the Republic on October 5, 1910, had allowed the Church and its ministers to continue in the enjoyment of their tyrannously unjust privileges over the public purse and over the private conscience of the citizen, the new regime would have deserved not only the contempt but the loathing of mankind.

In disestablishing and disendowing the Church, leaving only to the present hierophants, by a generous and almost excessive consideration of present occupants, a conditional life-interest in their existing sacerdotal functions and relative emoluments, the founders of the Portuguese Republic acted with statesmanlike promptitude, wisdom, and moderation.

First, as to its promptitude. The Lusitanian Republic did not foolishly waste precious time in Fabian delays, or in creating dilatory half-measures, prolonged during forty unnecessary, wasteful years of compromises and tergiversations, before grappling with the problem and dealing with the abuses that had grown up with and around the Church, as was the case of the French Republic. The Portuguese Republicans at once took their courage in both hands, and signalised the ratification of the new regime by a bold and statesmanlike scheme of disestablishment and disendowment. This much-needed reform—a lesson to England and other nations—destroyed at one blow the political and social status of the Church as the dominating moral organ of the nation, and established the principle of the laicisation of the functions and attributes of the State. This sound policy of rendering unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and leaving "God" to take care of himself and his ministers and devotees, will ultimately restore, in full, to the Portuguese people the rich patrimony (consisting of edifices, works of art, and ecclesiastical lands and revenues) from which the nation had too long been defrauded by the unholy complicity of the Altar and the Throne.

As to the wisdom of the reform, this is sufficiently indicated by the impotent rage of the Church and its reactionary partisans, and by the fact that the change effected by Portugal has won the admiring approval of all sound Radicals and consistent Rationalists throughout the world.

The moderation of the new law is evidenced by the crucial consideration that if justice had been rigorously applied to the Church after the fall of its ally, the Monarchy, not a single particle of its ancient patrimony, not a farthing of its revenues, would to-day be in its hands.

In all this work of regeneration Portugal has nobly redeemed its dignity and national greatness by a drastic cleansing of its augean stables. If, in the future, it spends its revenues in creating new schools that shall be temples of culture and refinement, where its rising generations will be taught the truths of science, the doctrine of human brotherhood, and the duty of thinking freely and of nobly living, the country will enter upon a new career of glory won on the fruitful fields of Peace and Progress.

WILLIAM HEAFORD.

By Suggestion.

THE kingdom of heaven is within you, say good people; and this morning I am inclined to agree with them. A substantial breakfast constitutes a considerable portion of the heavenly kingdom, taking it from a basely materialistic point of view; and a mind blessed with the prospect of a few days peace is another satisfactory allotment of Celestia, taking it from a sublimely spiritual point of view. Consequently, I may say, in all safety, that a soul-satisfying slice of heaven occupies me.

Add to that a fine warm sun, a freshness and clearness of atmosphere, the songs of hundreds of birds, and the sense that winter and its gloom are gone for another spell, and you will understand that the Christian's language has no powers to make me angry.

Even the remark, passed in my hearing, that "of all the peculiarities of humanity an Atheist was the most objectionable," simply served to put a human effervescence into the glass of happiness. A broad-brimmed feeling of toleration opens the gates to the fields of amusement; and I smiled.

But the remark set me thinking. The man, to whom we are so objectionable, belonged to the more-or-less-intelligent type. He read a little, thought a little, and spoke a lot. A cheery ring of infallibility gave all his utterances an optimistic tone. He made it quite clear he had thought deeply on whatever subject chanced to occasion his remarks; that he had not taken the slightest notice of other people's opinions; and that natural modesty restrained him so far as the publicity of his conclusions were concerned. He was too powerful and independent a thinker to trouble much about his own post-mortem safety. Christ came to save all sinners; but he was not very sure about the Atheist. His infallibility hesitated near the Atheist.

The more-or-less-intelligent resent that which they cannot label. Insecurity is always slippery; that is why Christians are so eager to be charitably disposed to Atheists, saying to themselves, "Poor fellows! they have no hope; nothing to hold on to!" And so it was that my friend, while he gratuitously pitied Atheists, found them objectionable. They were incomprehensible; and the Christian, though he swallows huge doses of supernatural incomprehensibility, is irritated by the slightest dose of the ununderstandable in human nature.

Why are we objectionable to the average religionist? Certainly not because of any mental antagonism, nor because we interfere, directly, with his beliefs, disturbing his equilibrium during his privacy; for the average Christian, in the first place, is quite incapable of real reasoning antagonism; and, in the second, Atheists, by their very training, are not likely to penetrate, without permission, into the sanctity of individual liberty of belief. We are objectionable because our morality is questionable.

With the average Christian, whether he be of the Salvation Army selection or of the middle class élite, there is, behind all the verbal trivialities he may eviscerate, the firm conviction that the Atheist's morality is suspicious enough to make it dangerous.

How long will it be before Christians will discover sufficient honesty in themselves to admit we Atheists are even judiciously inclined towards an acquaintanceship with decency of life? How long will they esteem themselves angels and regard us as incipient devils? How long do they intend to keep up the mental farce of imagining themselves the saintly custodians of morality? Just so long as Christianity is a subversive social force; so long as it lives.

The fastidious gentleman, who thought an Atheist's room better than his company, received his instruction in abhorrence of "infidelity" from the pulpit. Knowledge comes to the more-or-less-intelligent people in snatches. Oftener than otherwise it is of the spotted variety: diseased with prejudice. They get a lot of it from the pulpit; for the pulpit is the greatest purveyor of damp dough as wholemeal bread. It beats journalism in the lust for talk; and journalism is not at all stingy.

Nowadays the pulpit does not directly and dogmatically charge us with immorality. Its style is more corruptive. It deals in suggestions. A man is not wicked because he is an Atheist. No; but goodness depends on God's presence within man. God inspires, attracts, loves the best in his children; brings it out; fructifies it; blesses and multiplies it; makes it manifest. The man who has God in his heart possesses God's goodness in his heart also. His life irradiates it. All of which would be excessively pleasant, if it were true; but it is a lie, and a criminal one.

The more-or-less-intelligent listen. Characteristically, they are exceptionally keen at elucidating obvious suggestions; and their conclusions are more courageous than the pulpits' circumlocutions. Atheists are immoral dogs, plague spots; and for this estimation of our character we have to thank the morally superior sex that occupies pulpits, and gives instruction to their more-or-less-intelligent flock. Not that it bothers us; rather does it amuse; for the Christian, when he forgets his Christianity, which happens so frequently that we wonder what its value is at any time, also forgets our depravity. But this aspect of pulpitarianism shows Christianity in a green light.

Organised religion becomes little more than an organised distribution of falsehood, done up in gaudily colored tissue-papers, and sold as a free-will offering. Priests become the distributors of mental rubbish that would bring a blush of shame to the cheeks of a hardened shoddy manufacturer. Consistently and persistently, by suggestion, they instruct their sheep in the excellence of their goods over those of the Atheist; and if they timorously yield a grain of truth in their sermon, they joyfully—no, lugubriously—outweigh it by a ton of lying suggestion in their prayers.

But, enough! the hand that sows tares reaps tares, and the harvest time never passes under unmelting snow. And there is a blackie perched on a young elm, and his song would send the "soul" of a Shelley to the highest heights of poetry.

A Year's Work of the Humanitarian League.

THE Annual Report of the Humanitarian League, presented at the annual meeting at the Westminster Palace Hotel, deals with several subjects that have lately been before the public. Regret is expressed that the Government should have sanctioned flogging in the Criminal Law Amendment Bill; but in other respects a steady progress is noted, as in the growing demand for the reform of slaughter-house methods, and for the succoring of wounded horses on battle-fields—questions to which the League has specially called attention. The formation of local branches in Glasgow, Manchester, and other places has helped to extend humanitarian activities and influence.

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON APRIL 24.

Mr. Cohen was elected to the chair. There were also present: Messrs. Baker, Barry, Brandes, Cowell, Cunningham, Davey, Davies, Davidson, Heaford, Leat, Lloyd, Lazarnick, Moss, Roger, Rosetti, Samuels, Wood, J. W. Wood, and Miss Kough.

A letter was read from Mr. Foote explaining that, although better, care of his health was still necessary, especially in regard to night travelling. The Secretary was instructed to convey the congratulations of the Executive to the President, and their hopes of seeing him amongst them shortly.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed.

New members were admitted for the Parent Society and the Huddersfield Branch.

The Agenda was reported as complete, and further arrangements were made for the Conference.

The Chairman reported that another meeting of the deputation to the L.C.C. Parks Committee had taken place, and they were still without a definite reply.

Mr. Cohen further reported on the meetings of the Scholarship Management Committee, and read a draft syllabus shortly to be issued for the guidance of applicants.

Some correspondence with the Wood Green Branch was dealt with and other business having been transacted, the meeting adjourned.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Freethinker

All the sin of men I esteem as their disease, not their nature.—JOHN RUSKIN.

"The Boycott of Mr. Foote."

"Anyone who takes a chief part in the game we play, shall and must provoke all fools, knaves, and idiots to think and do their worst."—Carlo Ammiani in Vittoria (vol. i., p. 194) by GEORGE MEREDITH.

THE above quotation is very appropriate in leading off this article, the occasion for which arises out of the publication of my article on "George Meredith: Freethinker" in the March number of the English Review, and some excellent paragraphs on the matter from Mr. Cohen's pen in the Freethinker during the severest part of my recent illness. Mr. Cohen's paragraphs, in reply to an anonymous critic in an obscure orthodox periodical, together with other references to the subject in answers to correspondents, attracted the attention of my distant friend and colleague, Mr. George Macdonald, the editor of the New York Truthseeker, who wrote the following leaderette in his paper:—

> "The best and best advertised article in the English Review for March is entitled 'George Meredith: Freethinker,' and is by Mr. G. W. Foote. For many years Mr. Foote has been patiently doing some of the best writing that appears in English print. Had his pen been at the service of a more popular cause than Atheistic Freethought it must have brought him fame, for good writers are scarce. There is a mystery about what the Freethinker calls 'the boycott of Foote,' just ended by his appearance in the English Review. The former monk, Joseph McCabe, now a Rationalist, long since invaded standard publications, where he is accepted with all his heresies, while John M. Robertson has no trouble in achieving print in the most respectable places. Mr. Foote is not less scholarly if less involved in style than Robertson, and there is a "class" to his work that does not distinguish the admirable writings of McCabe. Mr. Foote has what on this side we crudely call the punch, and his restriction to the columns of the Freethinker has been a loss to that part of the English public who like trenchant prose but are unacquainted with that paper. We have no mate for him here unless it is Mangasarian, who, however, while unsurpassed for substance, may not always phrase with the same facility as his English compeer and admirer. The art and gift of writing well, or more than well, are shared without jealousy by those who have them; envy is inevitably felt by persons less favored."

I need not dwell upon the compliment that Mr. Macdonald pays me. I could not omit it without spoiling his leaderette, and I don't see why I should if I could. I have "suffered so much," as the phrase goes, from boycotting, misrepresentation, and downright slander and libel, in my already long public career, that I may as well let a compliment fall into the other scale now and then—when it happens to come along. Especially when the compliment is honestly written by a competent expert. For if I have been buried from the British public (just like my fellow-contributors, by the way, in the pages of the Freethinker), it is no less true that Mr. Macdonald has been similarly buried in the pages of the Truthseeker. I am not saying it for this occasion—I have always said it—that Mr. Macdonald has a very pretty natural gift with the pen and a faculty of sly ironic humor with which he might have coined (no, no, that won't do in America—let us say dollar-billed) his pockets and his bank account, if he had served his interests instead of his principles. Persons used to writing may note how well Mr. Macdonald's leaderette is written. There is terseness in it—honorable cunning, running past artfulness into art—strength and firmness of language—and the last sentence lifts the whole matter into a lofty moral atmosphere, in which the base and sordid perish of asphyxiation.

I had rather not have had to bring the names of other Freethought publicists into this complimenting of myself, but I cannot help that either; and Mr. Macdonald's last sentence must serve as the antiseptic to any abrasion of literary skin his criticism may have produced.

But to the point. Mr. Macdonald fails to understand why the boycott has been maintained so long against me when Mr. Robertson and Mr. McCabe have enjoyed the hospitality of highly respectable publications. But is this fact not partially explained, at any rate, by the very compliments he pays me? "Trenchant prose" is seldom enjoyed by those whose opinions are attacked—and they are the great majority when it comes to religious controversy in ordinary periodicals. What our American colleague calls "trenchant" they call by more violent adjectives, of which "ungentlemanly" is the mildest, and "vulgar" and "brutal" only half way up the scale. It is so difficult to reply to the editor of the Freethinker (and his staff—and his staff) and so easy to call him names and walk away full of "indignation," that one need not wonder, after all, that this old and effective trick is so constantly patronised. That "punch" too—borrowing Mr. Macdonald's forcible Americanism—is another explanation. If you have a bad case, and your adversary hits your weak points in every sentence, leaving no room for mental evasion or rhetorical sophistry, you will engage him as seldom as possible. Moreover, the toleration which Mr. Macdonald notes as extended to Mr. Robertson and Mr. McCabe is not what he thinks it. Mr. Robertson is a learned writer, and the critics, for the most part, praise his learning and say as little as possible about all the rest. Mr. McCabe gets a mere mention in the press when he writes a definitely Freethought book. Let him write on Secular Education, and the critics wink at each other with closed mouths. It is an expressive "Mum." Let him run down the Catholic Church, and the Protestant press—including nearly all the Liberal newspapers—applaud him vociferously. No doubt he is doing his own work in a way, but he is doing theirs too, and they know it.

For the forthright implacable style in Freethought—the style of Swift, if I may mention that great name in this connection—there is no more toleration than there ever was in England. "The boycott of Mr. Foote" is not done with because a liberal-minded editor saw that a certain article was desirable and that a certain man was the person to write it. "The boycott of Mr. Foote" is indeed broken down in the case of the English Review. But there are not many liberal-minded editors. A single swallow does not make a summer, and a single Mr. Austin Harrison does not make a tolerant English press.

THE full significance of the continuous emergence of Christian sects manifesting some form of sexual extravagance is obscured by the fact of their being relatively small bodies. This, however, is inevitable. The larger the Church, the more it becomes subject to the play of normal social forces, which tend to curb extravagance in all directions. And when a single Church includes the majority of a people, this tendency receives still more complete expression. In such cases the more extravagant developments are prevented. The Church then has to legislate, not for special tendencies and particular individuals, but for general tendencies and for humanity in the mass. The consequence of this is that certain expressions of the religious life can only be found with a few—with those whose perception of special features of religion is much more powerful than the pull of ordinary social life. With the mass of men the tendency is for the interpretation of religion to be determined by social considerations. It is only the few who really and genuinely try to mould society in accordance with the religious idea.

Rightly considered, the remarkable thing is, not that the dominant Church should have repeatedly tried to suppress these curious religio-sexual outbreaks, but that they should so continuously reappear in the history of Christianity, and that they have, moreover, claimed the strongest religious sanction for their existence. How many of these sects have existed it is impossible to say. Many must have disappeared, and left no trace of their existence. That they were very numerous is beyond question. Thus, in the second century we have the Adamites, an offshoot from the Gnostics. Their name was derived from the fact that on entering their place of worship both sexes stripped themselves naked, and went through the service in a state of nudity. The Adamites themselves claimed that the object of this was to familiarise the senses to strict self-control. The more orthodox writers give a vastly different account of the practice.* It is curious, by the way, how strong religious excitement seems to have often led people to avoid clothing. Thus, during the Crusade of 1209 1242, the women Crusaders rushed about the streets in a state of nudity.† During the wars of the League in France, men and women walked naked in processions, headed by the clergy.‡ Other examples of this curious practice might be cited.

Another second century sect, the Nicolaitianes, referred to in the New Testament (Rev. ii. 13-14), was accused of practising religious prostitution.§ So, also, were the Manichæans, a very numerous sect, concerning whom the charges are of a much more detailed character. With them the ceremonial violation of a virgin is said to have formed a part of the regular ritual, and that their meetings frequently ended in an orgy of promiscuous intercourse. As both these acts are found in connection with other religious gatherings, and, as will be seen later, is practised to-day, the story does not sound so incredible as might otherwise appear. The difficulty of deciding definitely is intensified by the fact that the Manichæans, being a very numerous body, were split into a number of sects, and that such charges, while being false concerning some, may have been true concerning others. At any rate, St. Augustine, who had been a Manichæan, says that if all did not lead a licentious life, one portion (the Catharists) abandoned themselves to it, believing they could mortify the flesh only by the practice of all bad instincts and lustful desires, since the flesh proceeded from the Devil.‖

The Carpocratians, who appear to have been a branch of the Gnostics, are said to have held that, as it was impossible to stain the soul by evil conduct, their leader—

> "not only allowed his disciples a full liberty to sin, but recommended a vicious course of life as a matter of both obligation and necessity; asserting that eternal salvation was only attainable by those who had committed all sorts of crimes.....It was the will of God that all things should be possessed in common, the female sex not excepted."*

A little later we have the sect of the Agapetæ also rejecting marriage as an institution, and allowing as a substitute unrestrained intercourse between the sexes, on the ground that "to the pure all things are pure." That some of the charges brought against these and other sects were false there is no doubt. That some were true is fairly certain. The error lies in accusing them, or in thinking of them, as being mere voluptuaries constantly seeking satisfaction for their desires. The truth is that the religious conviction of the propriety of both their teaching and conduct was quite as strong as the religious convictions of those who opposed them. It was this that made their eradication a matter of so great difficulty.

There is no need to go over even the names of all the other sects in the early centuries accused of similar practices to those already described. When suppressed in one form, some of these sects reappeared under another name. Their teachings reappear with the "Brethren of the Free Spirit" of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries. Taking their stand on St. Paul's "The law of the spirit of life in Jesus Christ hath made me free from the law of sin and death," they claimed freedom from sin no matter what their actions. They carried women about with them, held midnight assemblies, and, according to Mosheim, attended these meetings in a state of nudity. The Ranters, the Molinists, the Spirituels of Geneva, the Berghards, the Flagellants, with many others, were all said to have had abnormal sexual practices connected with their religious rites.

Naturally, the closer we get to our own day, and to a period when religious feeling is controlled by a more developed social sense, manifestations of sexuality become confined to revival outbursts, and are more transient in character. Still, they are always occurring. For reasons that do not concern us here, America has in more recent years been the chief ground for the development of sects of "spiritual free lovers." Our own sect of the Agapemonites, with their Abode of Love, received the original impetus from America. A sympathetic account of many of these sects is given by Hepworth Dixon in his Spiritual Wives, as well as of similar movements in Germany and England. In some cases the characteristics of the early Christian sects were imitated, even to the length of young women sharing the bedrooms of their spiritual guides. And all appear to have based themselves, as did the early sects, upon St. Paul. J. H. Noyes, himself a leader in some of these movements, in a letter to the author of Spiritual Wives, claims "the right of religious inspiration to shape society and dictate the form of family life," and with probable accuracy says that the origin of all these sects is found in revivals. The course of things, he says, may be thus stated:—

> "Revivals lead to religious love; religious love excites the passions; the converts, finding themselves in theocratic liberty, begin to look about for their mates and their Paradise.....Religious love is very near neighbor to sexual love, and they always get mixed in the intimacies and social excitement of Revivals. The next thing a man wants, after he has found the salvation of his soul, is to find his Eve and his Paradise."

For an almost exact replica of some of the erotic extravagances of some of the early Christian sects one may turn to Russia. Here, amongst the many millions of dissenting sects, one meets with the strongest and wildest varieties of sexual teaching and practice. The nature of marriage, or the institution of marriage, forms one of the main causes of division. The Bezpopovtski, for instance, vary between holding marriage as a mere conventional institution and a denunciation of it as altogether sinful. "Between these two extremes," says a well-informed writer,

> "there is room for the wildest and most repulsive theories. Carnal sensuality is allied in monstrous union with religious mysticism. Free love, independence of the sexes, possession of women in common, have been preached and practised. Debauchery, as an incidental weakness of human nature, has been advocated as the lesser evil; libertinism as preferable to concubinage, and the latter as preferable to marriage."*

The Klysti, a sect which derives its name from the practice of flagellation, denounce marriage as unclean; but Baron Von Haxthausen, in his Visit to the Russian Empire (1856), describes them as practising ceremonies not dissimilar to those related of the Agapæ in its most decadent stages. An offshoot of the Klysti, the "Shakoumi" or "Jumpers," openly teach that the only way to conquer the temptations of the flesh is by unbridled satiety. The "Cupids" were so called from their custom of practising their religious dances completely naked. The "Skopski" take their stand on Matthew xix. 12, and practise emasculation. They say that man should be like the angels—without sex and without desire. With most of these sexes dancing is an important form of the ceremonial. The wild character of these dances remind one forcibly of what one reads of the dervishes of the East, and there is no doubt that they are provocative of strong sensual excitement. Heard, describing the dance of the "Shakoumi," after describing the performance of one of the leaders of an assembly, says:—

> "The audience, arranged in couples, engaged to each other in advance, imitate his example and join the strain; the bounds and the singing grow faster and louder as it spreads, until, at its height, the elder shouts that he hears the voices of angels; the lights are extinguished, the jumping ceases, and the scene that follows in the darkness defies description. Each one yields to his desires, born of inspiration, and therefore righteous, and to be gratified; all are brethren in Christ, all promptings of the inner spirit are holy; incest, even, is no sin. They repudiate marriage, and justify their abominations by the Biblical legends of Lot's daughters, Solomon's harem, and the like."

I have given but the barest of outlines of a subject that might easily fill a moderately sized volume. The association of these curious sexual aberrations with deep religious feeling is undeniable, and of peculiar significance. For it would be allowing sectarian prejudice to cloud one's understanding to assume that with religion in general, and with Christianity in particular, we are dealing merely with outbursts of crude sensualism. Sensualism may have been associated with these outbursts precisely as the loftiest of causes may gain adherents among those whose motives are of the meanest. But fundamentally they witness to two things. The first is the deep connection between religious and sexual feeling. This, as I have shown in previous articles, begins very early in the life of religion, and persists in a more or less marked manner through all subsequent stages of its history. The second fact is that this particular expression of religious opinion is only held in check as social forces assume control over religious ideas. The religious idea, unregulated, is capable of any extravagance. It is the restraining force of a secularised social consciousness that first of all checks the extravagances of religious belief, and subsequently finds a useful outlet for energies previously expended in its service.

Once More, Watchman, What of the Night?

IT is well-known that for many years the Churches of this country have been compelled to report a serious decrease in membership and in attendance at public worship and the Sunday-schools. In some instances the loss has been on an enormous scale, almost imperilling the very existence of the Churches concerned. This arrest of progress, this evident shrinkage, at home is beginning to have its proper effect on the work of the Churches on the foreign fields. The leading missionary societies appear to be in a most parlous condition financially, their deficits for the last year being exceedingly heavy, the Church Missionary Society reporting a deficit of £28,000, the London, £29,000, the Wesleyan, £11,000, and the Baptist, £10,000. The secretaries of these societies offer various explanations of their discouraging reports, but not one of them seems to realise that the real cause of the deficiencies is loss of faith in foreign missions, and that this loss is to be accounted for by a corresponding loss of faith in the value of the Christian religion to the world. To admit this in public would humiliate a Christian worker too much, and so he makes all sorts of vain excuses for the failure of the Gospel to convert the world. Of course, it is alleged, it is not the Gospel's fault. In fact, the Chairman of the Baptist Union has just declared that in the Gospel "we can tolerate no suggestion of change, though it present itself in the specious guise of a restatement, or of an adaptation to this wonderful age." It is "the everlasting Gospel, which we have received to deliver," not to amend, revise, or adapt. Principal Gould, while believing that the Gospel needs no revision, is indeed too sacred to be touched by the adapter's coarse hands, is yet of opinion that the methods of presenting it to the world require a scrutinisation of the most drastic nature. But we maintain that the Churches are declining not because of defective methods of presenting the Gospel, but because a scientific age is finding out that the Gospel itself is essentially false.

Instead of frankly acknowledging that Christianity has had its day, and is being driven out of the field by the growing enlightenment of the people generally, the Baptist Union urged the desirability of adopting improved methods of commending it to a sceptical age. Two years ago it appointed a special committee to consider the spiritual welfare of the Churches, and that committee has just submitted its report, which deals with "the causes of weakness in the Church life itself," and recommends certain measures for the general strengthening of "the body of Christ," but which contains not the least hint or suggestion that the Churches are weak and steadily getting weaker because the Gospel, which they exist to propagate, is itself a lie. And yet to observing minds nothing is more obvious than that the real cause of the weakness of the Churches is the very Christianity which they seek to perpetuate. It was candidly admitted by Dr. Newton Marshall that "the convictions of even their most intelligent young people were distressingly vague and fluid"; but it did not occur to him that the vagueness and fluidity of their convictions naturally resulted from their superior intelligence. Multitudes of people believe because they have not got brains enough to doubt. The most devout Christians are generally to be found among ignorant peasants. This is a fact that cannot honestly be gainsaid. The more intelligent a man is, the fewer are his beliefs, and the less firmly held. Speaking of the most intelligent young people in the Churches, Dr. Marshall said:—

> "How little equipped they are for conflict with the anti-Christian notions so readily and indeed confidently held by many of their companions, and expressed as though they were themselves inspired in many modern books. The way to defend our youth from the contagion of unbelief is not to keep them in ignorance, but to feed their minds, to make them understand that the robust intelligence is not the one that capitulates to the challenge of Scepticism, but rather that which is strong in faith—as the old heroes of knowledge and progress were strong in faith."

Dr. Marshall would have been wiser had he paid closer attention to his logic. Having admitted that the convictions of their most intelligent young people were extremely vague and fluid, he proceeded to show that the best way to safeguard them against infidel attacks was to "feed their minds"; but it is perfectly clear from the context that, in the reverend gentleman's estimation, the suitable food for such minds is not natural knowledge, but that pseudo-knowledge which cajoles people into the belief that the highest intelligence is that which is strong in faith. Does not Dr. Marshall know that the overwhelming majority of the most intelligent people in Great Britain to-day are unbelievers in Christianity? Why is it that the bulk of our scientists have neither part nor lot in the Christian Church? Is it because they are lacking in robust intelligence that Professor Schafer and Dr. Chalmers Mitchell, for example, champion the mechanistic conception of life? Is it as a result of his ignorance that Sir Ray Lankester advocates the same view in his famous work, The Kingdom of Man? Has Dr. Marshall the temerity to come forward and publicly affirm that the most intelligent people in our land are active members of Baptist and other churches? Surely not, for he has already exclaimed, "Alas, how vague and fluid are the convictions of our most intelligent youth." Consequently, without fear of well-considered contradiction, we assert that it is the steady growth of intelligence that is so ominously threatening the lives of the Churches.

Principal Gould styled himself a "revolutionary" Chairman of the Baptist Union; but we fail to see where the "revolutionary" element is to be found in his address as published. We are persuaded that, like Dr. Marshall, he gave his case away. Take the following quotation which he makes from Dr. Jefferson:—

> "The problem of developing new converts is even more perplexing than that of retaining the allegiance of old ones. It is easier to convert men than it is to educate them. The converts are many, but the developed workers are few. Only a small proportion of those who start the Christian life ever reach spiritual maturity."

The undeniable truth of that extract carries with it the equally incontrovertible disproof of the truth of Christianity. Converts are so easily made because they are made in childhood and youth. Principal Gould says:—

> "It is a matter of notoriety that our Churches are recruited almost exclusively from the young. Particular and exact inquiry invariably confirms the vague impression that so it is. Take such results as those which Mr. Carey Bonner tabulates in his volume of Ridley Lectures. He tells us that of 800 ministers who were asked to state at what period they made the great decision, 270 answered that it was before they were eighteen years of age. When the same 800 ministers were asked: 'What, in your experience, is the general age for religious decision?' 212 definitely gave the age as under twenty. A wider inquiry addressed to 3,500 professing Christians yielded this notable result, that 75 per cent. of the males and 85 per cent. of the females assigned their decision to years between ten and eighteen."

No wonder that "it is easier to convert men than it is to educate them." But the whole truth on the subject of conversion is not told in the above extract. By "conversion" is meant of making of a public profession of faith in Christ. As a rule the children who get converted between ten and eighteen are believers in Christ almost from infancy. Almost as soon as they acquire the art of talking they are taught to sing,—

> "Jesus loves me. This I know,
> For the Bible tells me so,"

—and to say prayers in which they beseech "Jesus, meek and mild," to "look upon a little child." Their conversion is, therefore, merely the giving outward expression to the faith mechanically instilled into them before they could think at all. This is true of practically all conversions, even of those so-called conversions which take place in mature years at revival meetings. Almost without a single exception converts are believers prior to their conversion. Now, who is the alleged author of conversion? When the definite decision for Christ is made, what, according to Christian teaching, is supposed to happen? If the conversion is genuine God is its author, and he brings it about in order that his Spirit may enter the convert's heart and sanctify it, making it his home, his temple wherein ever to dwell. Do you not now see how utterly absurd the saying is that "it is easier to convert men than it is to educate them"? If the Gospel is true all converts are pupils of the Holy Ghost. They have received a new, Divine nature, a nature full of docility, even eager to be led by the indwelling Spirit. What need can they have of human educators, or, in any case, how can it be difficult to educate God's own children who have undergone two distinct births? Does it never occur to the men of God that they are guilty of high treason against the Savior of the world when they say that "only a small proportion of those who start the Christian life ever reach spiritual maturity"? It is he, the Eternal Christ, the Spirit of all grace, who is at once the Savior and Sanctifier of his people; it is he who is responsible for the failure of most of his own converts to reach spiritual maturity. And to say this is equivalent to affirming that Christianity is the most gigantic fraud in history. Indeed, such it is on Principal Gould's own showing. The failure of conversion is God's failure. A dying Church is a veritable witness to a dead Deity; and men and women are abandoning the former because her whole history bears such eloquent testimony to the latter.

After all, it is neither Freethought nor Science, but the Church that is killing Christianity. It is not Freethinking lectures, but the discourses of representative Christian teachers, that are bringing about the downfall of the Christian Church. The deadliest enemies of Christianity are professing Christians. Ministers of the Gospel constitute the strongest and most unanswerable argument against its truth. Churches are declining in the exact proportion in which people are finding this out. The consequence is that unbelief is in the air and must prevail. Our comfort lies in the undoubted fact that in the ratio in which faith in God and the Church goes out faith in man and his kingdom comes in.

IT is certainly of some concern to us to know the meaning of "theocracy" in action, when the Romish Church strains, at the present moment, every sinew in its mammoth body to regain its hold upon political power—to become once again a "holy theocracy," a true "kingdom of God"; and woe to humanity if it ever succeeds; it will be the signal for rekindling the fires of Smithfield and for recalling the rack and thumbscrew from their long exile and make them resume their divine duties upon the bodies of sentient beings, for the special gratification and glory of the supreme God of the universe. Of all the bad governments set up by man to rule his fellows, that established by the priesthood, in the name of its God, was the most execrable.

Religion, however, has another representative on earth beside the priest in the person of the prophet, and I wish, before I conclude this section, to bring my modicum of "gold, frankincense, and myrrh," and lay it as a devout offering at his feet. For the prophet, especially for the Hebrew prophet, I have an esteem that approaches to reverence. Words cannot convey my unbounded admiration of his lofty morality, spiritual fervor, and righteous indignation. He, also, spoke in the name of his God; whether it be from a customary mode of expression, a desire to secure for his arrows and shafts a divine impulse to speed them on their flight—or was it sincere self-deception as the result of transports of delirium as is ordinarily experienced by epileptic and neurotic subjects?—which it be I care not, I reverence him still. It is also true that the prophet, like the priest, is in the service of religion—a medium of divine revelation—but there is a fact which separates them as widely as the poles asunder; the priest is always on the side of the gods, the despots, the exploiters, and against man. Whereas the prophet is invariably on the side of humanity, of right, of justice, and of mercy. He pleads for the wronged, the weak, the widow, and the downtrodden.

It is the voice of the prophet that I hear ring out so silvery from the pulpit of the New Theology, and which compels me to wish it god-speed; for it is a voice often raised on behalf of afflicted humanity and against the gilded, the glorified, and worshiped molochs—the vampires which drain the very life-blood of the modern world.

PART II.

1. Let us now leave the body, with its physical and social needs, and turn to those which belong more strictly to the mind. As man's intellect developed, and as the resources of civilisation multiplied, there awoke within the mind new voids, gnawing, irritating, and painful. Man was seized with the passion to know. Not now, as means to relieve his physical wants, but to know for knowing's sake. Events and phenomena puzzled and annoyed him. He craved for explanations; he demanded to know the How, the Why, and the What of every experience. It was emphatically a human want; no animal had ever felt its bite. Man had partaken of the fobidden fruit, and the fatal apple had opened his eyes to a self-conscious existence. This had flung open the portals of his mind, through which were admitted the germs of a new disease. The microbe of knowledge entered his soul and filled it with a new anguish which nothing on earth could immediately satisfy. Superior and omniscient intelligences, however, could have relieved him at once. What an opportunity for the gods! Did they ever avail themselves of it? Search the history of human knowledge for a record and I venture to predict that you will search in vain.

Every page of its annals will bear indisputable evidence that, in whatever direction he moved, man had to hew his way, alone and unaided, out of the jungles and thickets of ignorance before ever a gleam flushed the Eastern sky with the faint first promise of either day or of dawn.

If we examine the entire field of civilised knowledge, we shall find that in every department of science, theoretic or applied, man had to clear out a path through the dense thickets of ignorance with the axe of his own reason. Nowhere can we find any trace of assistance or of a ray of light ever vouchsafed to him from on high. What inspired Bible contains a statement of the fundamental generalisations of science? In which can we find embodied the principle of universal causation, of the uniformity of nature, of the correlation of forces, of the indestructibility of matter, or of the conservation of energy? These are the foundation and pillars of the temple of knowledge, and yet revelation has never made the remotest allusion to their existence. Nor, indeed, is this rigid silence in respect to essential knowledge the worst part of the indictment against it. The irony of it all is seen in the bogus instruction offered to appease this craving for knowledge. In place of facts to explain the How, the Why, and the What, revelation supplies us with legend and with myth.

And yet we have not sounded the bottom of its guilt; for revelation tells us that the direct opposite—the very antipodals—of the foregoing principles obtained in nature, viz, that caprice is more characteristic of her method than uniformity, that magic is a principle of causation, and that all events were explained by regarding them as the doings of spirits, either friendly or hostile.

2. Lastly, let us inquire what light has come to us from the supernatural in regard to itself. What positive knowledge has man ever received about matters alleged to exist beyond the pale of phenomena? Nothing could be more appropriate than for the unseen world to divulge some of its own secrets, especially since man was declared to have vital interest in them. Besides, man's craving for knowledge has never been confined to phenomena; for milleniums he has been burning to know what is beyond the veil—what is the ultimate reality. His plight, however, in this case, is more pitiable than in respect to any of the others, for it is beyond his power ever to satisfy this yearning by his own resources. He has found out means to appease, more or less effectually, all his other longings; but at the confines of phenomena he has reached the length of his tether. Just as the eagle cannot soar above and beyond the atmosphere which supports and buoys it upwards, so the human intellect cannot transcend phenomena—the vital element in which it lives and floats. Man can extend his vision with the microscope to any extent he likes and then speed away on the wings of his imagination to any further extent, and yet he has not crossed the frontier—he is still in the realm of phenomena. Nevertheless, he has always yearned to know what is beyond them, and his ravenous impatience drove him to guess, and guessing he has been ever since. But there is no intrinsic harm in guessings; they serve their due season as balls for a mental game, and so soon as they burst they vanish, to give place to others apparently as lasting but equally as perishable and hollow. The mental exercise tends to keep the human mind vigorous and healthy. It verges on the harmful only when, like cricket and football, the game is adopted as a professional vocation.

But when speculation is taken under the ægis of religion then guessing becomes a positive evil, for theology instantly petrifies the guess into a "revealed truth," which acts thenceforth as a sprag amid the pinions of the intellect and locks the free motion of its wheels. It is when the guess is stereotyped as an eternal verity that it arrests all mental growth by acting as a barrier to the origination and flow of ideas. But what adds irony to it all is the fact that the sanity of guessings even bears a direct relation to man's degree of intelligence and culture, that is, to the stage of his mental development and civilisation. The guessings of primitive man were accordingly barbaric and grotesque, and yet it is these which we find incorporated in sacred books as divine revelations of eternal truths. Let us then see what are the cardinal tenets among these petrified speculations.

(a) The premier article of faith in all religious creeds is God as a revealed existence. It is the fundamental assumption of all religions. But the mental and moral contents of this notion are as diversified as the landscape of the earth from the pole to the equator. Only to a wholly imaginary conception could the same word be applied to so heterogeneous a crowd. The common elements which string them together are nebulous, elusive, and fleeting. They would instantly fall to pieces but for the class word, "God." That alone keeps together, in the semblance of unity, the multitudinous forms of a conception which is ever changing like the forms of a cloud, and has been doing so from that early dawn when man's fear first projected it, huge and threatening, on the vast screen of his ignorance.

Now, what is important to observe is that the types of God revealed in the Bible are not in the least possible degree any exception to this universal law. They are neither unique nor constant. Nothing could be more false or ludicrous than to imagine that the Bible, because it denounces Polytheism, is itself monotheistic. We are presented with at least two types of God differing essentially from one another. In the earlier portions of the Bible we get revealed to us a fully anthropomorphic Deity, one with an individual name like all the other gods. Later on this turns into a metaphysical one, retaining of its human model only man's faculties and affections. Jahveh, as you know, was man-like in all essential features. He walked in the Garden of Eden, he talked with Adam and Eve, with the serpent, and with the patriarchs. He differed from the Hebrews themselves only by being a more powerful magician than they were. In intelligence, in knowledge, and in moral qualities he was exactly on a par with the semi-barbarians who presumed to reveal him.

When the Hebrew people, however, had developed the resources of their language so as to include a wealth of abstract terms, the God Jahveh entered the chrysalis state and underwent a complete metamorphosis. His various attributes, mental and moral, stood out as separate existences which the vivid Hebrew imagination soon endowed with personalities, and lo presto! out of the pupa case emerged the metaphysical Trinity.

I wish, however, in passing to make a comment or two upon these different conceptions of God. Firstly, that they are absolutely incongruous with each other as well as with the knowledge and conscience of the twentieth century. For fully nineteen centuries have the talent and genius of Christendom incessantly toiled at the impossible task of trying to fuse incompatibles—the finite and the infinite, the wise and the ignorant, the cruel and the merciful, and the malicious and the loving—into unity and harmony. This attempt led to opening the sluices and floodgates to all kinds of subtleties in thought and speech; so much so that it threatened to overwhelm the human intellect and swamp it in a deluge of metaphysics—a catastrophe only narrowly averted through the intervention of a few valiant heretical pilots who braved the surging flood, though in battered arks.

No less remarkable is the fact that, notwithstanding the palpable incongruity between the images of Jahveh and the Trinity-God, they are both alike products of the human mind—every item in both has been quarried in human experience. The only difference is this—that in one the stones are left in their naked crudity and ruggedness, while in the other they are metaphysically chiselled and trimmed. Neither conception possesses a single attribute, power, faculty, or affection which is not originally human; and this is tantamount to saying that they are no revelations at all.

But what touches the hollow claim with bitter irony is not its falsity or its arrogance, but the fact that the modern apologist is literally ashamed of his revealed God, either anthropomorhic or metaphysical. To the New Theologian the moral attributes of either Jahveh or the Trinity are as abhorrent as their mental qualities and powers are unworthy. He does his level best to empty the word of its revealed contents and to refill it with the products of reason! Can there be anything more humiliating to God-given revelation than to empty the very word of its revealed and original meanings and then to try and replace them with avowedly human conceptions? I can think of none.

PANAMA.

"The San Blas Indians are a remarkable people. They live close to the works of the Panama Canal, occupying a narrow strip of territory along the shores of the Caribbean Sea.....They know that the white man would come into their country only to exploit them, and they therefore keep him out.....From early days, they have been able to keep their women free from contamination with white men, and to-day they will not permit a white man to sleep in their country if they can readily get him out of it by sunset..... At various periods missionaries have attempted to evangelise in the San Blas territory, but few Indians would listen to them. Apparently, they object to save their souls at the cost of their lands."—Chambers's Journal, May, 1913.

What a significant condemnation of Christians! Evidently the San Blas Indians diagnose character better than the Chinese officials who ask the Christian Churches to pray for them.

Acid Drops.

The Daily Mirror, of April 18, devoted half a column, with a portrait, to the case of Helena Gunning, a learned housemaid, who has been for some eight years in the service of Mrs. Walter Wright, 8 Henderson-road, Wandsworth. Her "cooking, sweeping, and dusting" are none the worse for her attention to serious studies. The reporter sings the young lady's praises from all points of view. He even mentions some learned sceptical works that he saw upon the shelves in her "orderly little room," one being Thomas Paine's masterpiece and another Grant Allen's Evolution of the Idea of God. Miss Gunning's name was not unknown to us. We have several times heard from her as a reader of the Freethinker. We are not surprised, therefore, that amongst the letters the Daily Mirror notice has brought her is one from a Christian bigot of the first water. Miss Gunning sends it to us to do what we like with; and we extend the privilege to our readers. Here is the body of the letter:—

> "If we are to judge you by the rags you read I take it that you are a follower of the ex-convict Foote. Well, follow him to hell if you like, but, if you take the advice of one who has found Christ you will stop reading such blasphemous books, which should not be put on the market, and study God's word. What does a babe like you want to know about paganism and evolution? Study your household duties and leave such things to the blaspheming infidels. Stop before it is too late."

The writer of this letter is a man; we mean that he is of the male sex; witness his insolence about the young lady's "household duties"—which, by the way, she performs to her employer's satisfaction. Another thing about this writer is that he has forgotten his manners, if he ever had any. He has also forgotten his name and address; which is a pity, for we would have immortalised him without charging for the advertisement. But this sort of correspondent generally does forget his name and address, especially when he not only indulges in rudeness towards the person he addresses, but also in libels on other objects of his spite. Mr. Foote, of course, is not an "ex-convict." "Blasphemy" is only a misdemeanor—and a convict is one sentenced to penal servitude for felony.

This insulter of Miss Gunning and libeller of Mr. Foote states that he has found Christ. What we should like to know is, whether Christ has "found him"? We hope not. It would be a poor compliment to Christ.

"Western Christendom," says the Christian World, "responded with fine unanimity to the appeal of the Chinese Cabinet for the prayers of Christian people on behalf of the new Government." So this particular lie has passed into history—Christian history, that is, and it will be circulated along with the other pious "yarn" about Queen Victoria delivering a Bible to a colored chief, and declaring it to be the source of England's greatness. The Chinese Cabinet made no appeal for the prayers of Christians. It merely fixed a day for prayer, and invited Christians to join in the scramble. Meanwhile, it is worth noting that since the prayers were offered the condition of things has grown worse in China. Some provinces, dissatisfied with the proceedings of the Cabinet, have threatened revolt and asserted their intention to set up an autonomous Government. There is evidently a story to be told about the invitation to the Chinese Christians to pray for the welfare of the Cabinet. We do not know what this story is, although we have a strong suspicion as to its character. All we do know is that British Christians have not missed the opportunity for self-advertisement and some pretty tall lying.

Amidst all the hypocritical blather in England over the Chinese "day of prayer"—as if it were got up solely for the Christians, instead of being extended to them as an act of politeness—a word of sense and honesty came from the lips of the Rev. Cyril Bardsley, honorary secretary of the Church Missionary Society. Being interviewed by a Daily Chronicle representative, this gentleman expressed the view that Christianity had a fine prospect of success in China. But there was a serious danger which could not be ignored. It is the one "already experienced in Japan—the educated may easily become Atheists." That is more than a danger in every "heathen" country that feels the ferment of Western ideas. It is quite evident to people of the intellectual calibre of Japs and Chinamen that the Christianity of the Western nations is all humbug. They boast of it, they spend vast sums of money on missionaries to spread it over the globe, but they do not believe in it for they make no attempt to practise it—at least as it is set forth in the New Testament. It is not Christianity that gives Great Britain, for instance, its world-wide power; no, it is material wealth and naval and military strength,—the very things, in fact, which the New Testament most severely condemns. Intelligent "heathen" see the real "secret of England's greatness" and are acute enough to practise her example rather than her teaching. Japan is herself a world-power now, and has not only beaten Russia in a stand-up fight but has shown that she does not mean to stand insults even from the United States. And how did she reach that position? Was it by accepting Christianity? No. She tested it and found it wanting. She accepted Western science, but not Western religion. She saw that Christian nations paid no respect to the law of right unless they had more to lose than to gain by doing so. The law of might was the guide of every Christian nation, not only in its dealings with "heathen" countries, but even in its dealings with fellow Christians. Japan recognised that the respect of Christian nations was not to be gained by honor but by strength. So she made herself strong in what that great Christian statesman, William Ewart Gladstone, called "the resources of civilisation." She raised and trained large armies, she provided herself with the most powerful, up-to-date battleships, she studied the art of war, she prepared herself for a struggle against a Christian adversary ever so many times bigger than herself; and when the hour struck she defeated that gigantic braggart on land and sea. That is how Japan won the respect of the Christian world. Her art, her literature, her social discipline, all the things that make a nation intrinsically great, counted for nothing; her power to kill her enemies with A 1 rapidity was her passport to the comity of nations. And that fact alone is decisive as to the real influence of Christianity upon the world.

We understand that there are three thousand Christian missionaries now working—perhaps we should say operating—in China. But this shows the weakness rather than the strength of Christianity. If its boasts were true, if it were a divine religion, founded by God himself and upheld and promoted by God ever since, it would not need three thousand missionaries, nor three hundred, in China. God would convert the Chinese in his own good time. He would not need the help and encouragement of the Archbishop of Canterbury and Lord Robert Cecil. We suggest that he might even dispense with the help and encouragement of the Rev. Dr. Clifford and the Rev. F. B. Meyer.

We invite these pious gentlemen who have been contributing their prayers (and deuced little else, we guess) to the progress of China, to tell us what good their prayers have ever done for England. Certainly the Chinese do not need to borrow anything from us in the way of morality. They would be doing nothing outré if they sent some of their own missionaries over here. They might teach Englishmen politeness, veracity, and honesty. These virtues may not be as necessary to salvation in the next world as belief in the Trinity, in the inspiration of the Bible, and in Heaven and Hell. But they are necessary to salvation in this world. They are very useful and pleasant here, whatever they may do for us hereafter.

"Father" Stanton is said to have taken no salary for his services at St. Alban's, Holborn. His estate has been valued at £26,186. It was easy to do without a salary on a fortune like that.

Rev. R. E. St. Aubyn Arkwright, vicar of St. Chad's, Shrewsbury, inflicted dreadful wounds upon his neck with a razor, and was found dead in his bedroom. He had suffered severely from insomnia. One is sorry to hear it. But how is it that Christians find these troubles as hard to bear as Atheists do? Where does the "consolation" of religion come in?

Fifteen hundred young men, members of the Drexel Biddle Bible Classes, assembled at the First Methodist Church, Camden, New Jersey (Walt Whitman's old residence!) to hear Mr. E. P. Stotesbury, the wealthy Philadelphia partner in Pierpont Morgan and Company, deliver an address designed "to awaken in the audience a desire to save money" by "exhibiting to them several hundred thousands' worth of gold bonds." Jesus Christ never had a chance of illustrating his Sermon on the Mount in that way. He probably never saw a gold coin, he certainly had no bonds, and his price, when Judas "sold" him, was thirty pieces of silver (shekels)—about £3 15s. Mr. Stotesbury's economics are no less peculiar than his piety. He preaches the virtue of "saving" and he spent £25,000 on a dinner and dance. He also confuses saving with acquisition. Saving is the surplus of what a man earns over what he spends. Acquisition is diverting other people's savings (or earnings) into your own pockets or somewhere under your own control. Millionaires like Mr. Stotesbury are not savers but acquisitors. And the virtue of saving easily becomes a vice. Trade depends on spending, not on saving. This is true both in production and distribution. A little money put by for an emergency is a very good thing; but the emergencies that are certain, such as death, or nearly certain, such as illness, accident, and want of employment, should be provided against by insurance, and not by miserly habits of life. Undue saving makes capital too cheap to the millionaires, and at the same time lowers wages for the workers. Mr. Stotesbury may feel this if he does not know it, and his preaching is on the line of his interests.

The Philadelphia millionaire was good enough to tell his audience that he started making his fortune with £10. No doubt he thought that was a bedrock minimum. But there was one person who began with less. He started with nothing, he made everything, and his name is "God." This is not our own announcement. It is what Mr. Stotesbury teaches himself. We remind him of it charitably—to save his head from bursting.

Walter Thomas Young, a youthful Englishman, who has been arrested at New York, was an insurance solicitor six days a week and a Sunday-school teacher on the seventh day—and a burglar every night. He also attended a fashionable Brooklyn church. He is now paying his devotions in the prison chapel.

The Bishop of Southwark has found a boy who recognises "sense" in the episcopal outfit, including the gaiters and the apron. Had the right reverend father in God caught the boy a bit younger he might have recognised "sense" in bishops. "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings" one has been told to expect praise of ridiculous things.

The Bishop of Oxford declares that the principle of Trades Unionism is thoroughly Christian. Organists and vergers of parish churches will read this statement with pleasure.

Rev. W. H. Bridges, of Edinburgh, writes to the Guardian that "the call of China for the prayers of the Christian Church inevitably arouses a sense of wonder.....A so-called heathen nation has taken us at our word. We said we believed in prayer, and they have believed us." And now Mr. Bridges asks, very pertinently, why not use the instrument of prayer concerning questions of national defence? Mr. Bridges must really be very simple if he seriously thinks the Chinese believe that we are likely to depend on prayer in any genuine emergency. The Chinese have had too many bitter experiences of Christian dealing to harbor any such stupidity. Of course, if we really placed any dependence on prayer, there is no reason why we should not make the question of national defence a subject of prayer. But what effect would it have? Would it be likely to affect votes in the House of Commons? Would it stop Churches playing the part of recruiting sergeants? Or does Mr. Bridges mean that the form of national attack and defence is to be that of an army of parsons, on either side, praying against each other? That would certainly provide a use for the clergy, and if out of earshot of the rest of the population the suggestion might be worth considering.

It is part of a carefully fostered superstition that those who write on behalf of militant Freethought are ignorant, illiterate, and may be profitably ignored. Many of the religious writers who are busy circulating this legend must know how untrue it is, although they receive a certain countenance from those timid Freethinkers who long for the heaven of respectability, and seek to get there by assisting this slander on their more mentally robust fellow heretics. To say that an opponent is ignorant is a very easy retort; it gives those who use it an air of authority, and it "warns off" that large class who are only too ready to take their opinions at second hand. We were not at all surprised, therefore, to find a reviewer in the Manchester Guardian describing Sir Hiram Maxim's book, Li Hung Chang's Scrap Book, as exhibiting "great ignorance," "violence of language," etc., and that the result is "painful." We do not doubt the last part. Whether a thing is painful or pleasant is a quite personal matter. It entirely depends upon what it is that is affected. No one will deny that to clear out a nest of vermin, for instance, is very painful—to the vermin

The curious thing is that Sir Hiram's book does not claim to be more than a compilation. And it represents a thoroughgoing attack on Christian belief and practices, with special reference to the foreign missionary movement. This attack is conducted, in the main, by a series of quotations from writers mostly of admitted standing and authority. Consequently, the charge of ignorance really lies against them, and not against the compiler and editor. It is true that the reviewer says that Sir Hiram does not know how to use his material, but that only means that he does not use it in a way that suits the reviewer. Had he quoted writers of similar calibre in favor of Christianity, it would have been well done. As it is quoted against Christianity, it is ill done. That is all there is in the matter. We cannot retort that the reviewer betrays his ignorance, as his review is too petty to need so powerful a word. But it does betray both his temper and his partisanship, and those who can read between the lines of his review will take his disparagement of the work as an incentive to purchase.

The reviewer seems particularly annoyed with Sir Hiram's confession that he found himself able, at the age of thirty, to discomfort a roomful of parsons, and "After this occurrence I made a point of going very thoroughly into history, philosophy, and religion, especially the religion of the East. I read everything I could find, fully determined to make myself able to meet all comers; and I think I have succeeded." It doubtless seems very monstrous to an orthodox reviewer that a single Freethinker should discomfort a roomful of parsons, or that he should be able to meet all comers on Christian claims; but is this such a colossal feat, after all? For our part, we confess that we should not be stricken with astonishment at the ability of a Freethinker who was able to silence orthodox Christians, but we should feel a little disgusted if he failed at the task. The "trickiness" of Christian disputants in riding away on false issues might call for a display of greater mental agility on the part of the Freethinker; but the disproof of Christian claims is child's play to a man of fair knowledge and ordinary ability. The substantial doctrines of religion are very few, very simple, and very ridiculous. They are on precisely the same level as a host of universally discredited religious beliefs; and if the Manchester Guardian reviewer is not aware of this, it is only because he does not really understand religion, and exercises his paid impertinence on those who do.

The German papers state that the Kaiser has opened a factory for the manufacture of margarine. We are not surprised, for, as an amateur preacher, His Imperial Majesty has already churned out a lot of oleaginous stuff.

According to a wealthy contemporary, the King has twenty-five morning suits, about twenty shooting outfits, besides uniforms and evening dress. Well, well! "The King of Kings" only wore a mackintosh and a halo.

Recently a provincial Methodist preacher was summoned for stealing gas by tapping the main. We never heard of parsons stealing gas before. It is an article in which they are generally well provided.

A young girl was recently convicted for stealing handbags from worshipers at Church. The deterrent effects of religion are not very marked in this instance. We remember a story of a churchwarden, on a rainy Sunday, stalking down the aisle with three umbrellas under his arm, for the use of his friends. At the door a stranger remarked, "Had a good day, I see."

The Rev. Lord William Gascoyne Cecil is evidently a Christian fanatic. In an article in the Daily Mail for May 5, he says that "non-Christian races are treacherous." Does not the noble Lord know that treachery is a human, not a Heathen, weakness? Is he not aware that the Great European Powers have been guilty of treachery in their recent treatment of Turkey? Has not the British Empire been treacherous in its subjection and government of aboriginal races in India and Africa? Are we in Christendom strangers to "the treacherous smile, a mask for secret hate"? Why should the reverend lord go out of his way to insolently slander non-Christian races?

Lord William falls into other deplorable errors. He speaks of "the absolute failure of the native religions" of China. As a matter of fact, Confucianism and Buddhism have conferred moral greatness upon the Chinese people, and there is no sign whatever that they are now disowning and abandoning the sources of their strength. Lord William has visited China and imagines that he knows both it and its inhabitants; but we much prefer to listen to the testimony of such high authorities as Professor H. A. Giles, Mr. Chester Holcome, and M. Eugene Simon, who, having spent years in China, give the direct lie to Lord William's estimate of the non-Christian Chinese character. His lordship is equally wide of the truth in the statement that China "is becoming Christian." The native Christians are but a handful, and, with very few exceptions, belong to the most ignorant classes. China will doubtless adopt Western science; but she is surely too wise to take over the religion which has been and is such a stupendous failure in the West.

Believing that they are the salt of the earth and the light of the world, Christians are resolved to do everything within their power to convert the rest of the world to their way of thinking on every subject. In particular they persist in vigorous though futile attempts to force their own religion upon all Heathen nations. In Buddhist countries such attempts are good-naturedly tolerated, but scarcely ever prove successful. In picturesque Ceylon, for example, Catholic and Protestant missionaries experience no opposition on the part of either Buddhist priests or the laity; but all the Christians on the resplendent isle number only 360,000, in spite of the fact that 10,000 of the inhabitants are Europeans, and 23,000 Eurasians (descendants of Europeans and Singhalese). For the lack of Christian progress the missionaries blame the Portuguese and Dutch Governments, and partly the British authorities; but the truth is that the people value their own system far too much to exchange it for an inferior one. Latterly there has been a great revival of Buddhism throughout the island, and numerous schools have been opened after Western models. Why cannot Christians stay at home, where there is much more of immorality, degradation, and misery than in beautiful Ceylon?

"J. B.," of the Christian World, is an evolutionist, and, being a supernaturalist as well, imagines he can see the next step in evolution. The last step was from animal to human, but the next will be from human to divine. This is a highly interesting item of information; but will "J. B." be good enough to tell us where, when, and how he acquired it? Did the animal that became man know what the next step would be before it was taken? It is self-evident that "J. B." is as yet only human—how on earth does he know that he is going to step into divinity, or what divinity is? He does not know, any more than he knows that "big as the physical universe is, the spiritual one is vastly bigger." Only a theologian would venture to talk such arrant nonsense.

Lord Morley, in his Life of Gladstone, plainly says that the Education Question in England has been from the very first a quarrel between "Church" and "Chapel." It is evidently nothing more now. Witness the letter recently addressed to the Prime Minister by the National Free Church Council and the Nonconformist members of Parliament. What they demand in the projected new Education Bill is a remedy of "the injustice to Nonconformists." Injustice to them, forsooth! At present they control the religion taught in half the elementary schools, and the "injustice" they complain of is that they are not allowed to control the religious teaching in the other half,—which is controlled by the Church of England. The truth is that both these religious bodies should be turned out of the schools. No one has any right in the public schools as an Anglican, a Nonconformist, a Catholic, or a Jew. He has a right there only as a citizen. That is really the whole case for Secular Education in a nutshell.

Lamentation fills the offices of the leading missionary societies, instead of the customary hallelujahs, because the public no longer subscribes for the propagation of pious tarradiddles in foreign places. The London Missionary Society has a deficit of £29,000, while the Church Missionary Society has a shortage of £28,000. Yet they are sure of converting China.

The newspapers have been making a fuss over two aged persons, a brother and sister, who lived on only one old-age pension. What would the journalists have said had they been present when Elijah was fed by a raven, or when five thousand persons were surfeited with three sardines and two buns?

The Bishop of Birmingham, Dr. Wakefield, recently descended a coal pit, provided with a miner's coat and lamp, and spending about an hour in the mine. Was his lordship trying to emulate the poor founder of his religion, who worked at a carpenter's bench with a jackplane?

"Christ and Patriotism," runs the title of a letter in a recent issue of the Labor Leader. Surely "God" should be a cosmopolitan rather than a patriot; but so many people from Palestine are "patriots" nowadays.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £123 18s. 5d. Received since:—Mr. Harrison (per H. Saill), 2s. 6d.; Three Birmingham Saints (per H. Saill), 17s. 6d.; C. J., £3; Mrs. Alice Lee, 4s; C. H. Shepherd, 10s.; Wm. Broadbent, 10s.; J. Tomkins, 2s. 6d.; A. Vickers, £1; J. E. Stapleton, 2s. 6d.

W. P. BALL.—Thanks for batch of cuttings.

J. B.—You will let us hear further if you have fresh news of the Comte article you mention. Thanks for your letter. Mr. Foote is making steady and sure progress.

E. B.—Your cuttings are useful and welcome.

J. C. MAAGARD.—Surely you don't imagine that the writer of the paragraph meant what you ascribe to him. The first half of the paragraph negatives the idea. Perhaps you are joking. Eleven o'clock at night is a suspicious hour for finding Christ.

J. TOMKINS.—Thanks for cuttings, subscription, and good wishes. The cuttings are interesting, and may be useful later, but are crowded out this week.

(MRS.) A. LEE.—P.O. allocated as desired. We, too, are proud to learn that the daughter of an ardent Freethinker is not only treading in her father's footsteps, but bringing her children up to march along the same road. It is the adherence of such as yourself that makes the work easier for the next generation. Sorry you cannot get to the Conference on Sunday. Another year, perhaps.

D. MAPP.—We sympathise fully with the spirit of your resolution, but notices of motion for the Conference must appear on the printed Agenda.

BERTHA WORRELL.—Save for accidents—against which none are secure—there is no doubt that Mr. Foote will be present at the Conference meetings on Whit-Sunday. Great truths find strong men, and they become still stronger by expressing them. Mr. Foote will doubtless feel flattered at your very high opinion of his work, and we can say on his behalf that the approval of those who are with him in his life's work is the only approval he desires. He will be pleased to learn that his lectures and writings have been "a very great help" to you in your pilgrimage from falsehood to truth.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

This notice will be just in time to remind some of those who have decided to attend the Annual Conference of the arrangements already made. The two meetings in Clavier Hall, Prince's-street, Regent-street—morning and afternoon are business meetings, and for N. S. S. members only. The evening meeting in Queen's (Minor) Hall, at 7, is open to the public, and we hope that Freethinkers will see that the hall is well filled. All the leading speakers of the N. S. S. will be present, with the President in the chair. Moreover, admission is free, and this gives an extra opportunity for London Freethinkers to do a little propaganda work by bringing along their more orthodox friends. Freethinkers who arrive in London from the provinces on Saturday evening will find the Secretary and members of the Executive ready to receive them at the Bay Malton Hotel, 160 Great Portland-street, W.

"Literary Gossip" will be resumed in the Freethinker shortly. Meanwhile we call attention in this column to the English Review for May. Its contents are as varied and interesting as usual. Poetry is represented by ten sonnets by different writers. We hesitate to award the palm where the themes and treatment are so diverse. Mr. Bernard Shaw's "Overruled: a Dramatic Story" is clever, like all his work, but it has little substance: it is, indeed, a farce, and reads a good deal like a satire on Mr. Shaw's weaknesses and limitations. Henri Fabre's "The Pond" and Walter Raleigh's "Boccaccio" are perhaps the best things in the present number. Mr. Normon Douglas's "Blind Guides," dealing mainly with Nelson from an adverse point of view, is strongly written and has some vivid ironical flashes at the expense of religion. There is much suggestion (we are not punning) in the anonymous article on "Synthetic Man." "Be Hard, my Friends" is the title of several pages of stimulating paragraphs by the editor, Mr. Austin Harrison. The concluding sentence is worth pondering: "To be strong it is necessary to be hard—to oneself first and always." We should add that the book-reviews fill many pages, and are well written in a liberal spirit. Altogether the English Review may be recommended to men and women who want to face facts and find the truth.

Chicago seems to be a flourishing centre of Freethought activity. Mr. Mangasarian, Mr. Roberts, and Mr. H. Percy Ward (late of Liverpool) discourse there to large and different audiences every Sunday. We have just received a letter from the last of these propagandists:—

"1209 Ashland Block, Chicago,
April 21, 1913.

Dear Mr. Foote,—

I am very sorry to read in the Freethinker of your serious illness. I trust that you are now well on the way to complete recovery; and I hope that for many years to come you will be able to fight the good fight of Freedom.

I am, with best wishes,
Sincerely yours,
H. PERCY WARD."

Many in America will share Mr. Ward's hope.

The Bethnal Green Branch was wrongly announced in our last issue as starting its open-air lectures in Victoria Park on May 4. The Branch's outdoor propaganda does not start till May 18, when Mr. Davidson lectures in the afternoon and Miss Kough in the evening.

A meeting to consider the formation of a Wolverhampton Branch of the N. S. S. will be held in the I. L. P. Rooms, Dudley-street, Wolverhampton, to-day (May 11), at 3 o'clock. Local Freethinkers are earnestly invited to be present.

The Humanitarian (organ of the Humanitarian League) for May gives on its front page two notices of Mr. H. S. Salt's new pamphlet, Fallacies of Flagellants." One is from the Freethinker the other from "a certain Recorder," who calls the Humanitarian League's publications "irritating trash." The juxtaposition of the two notices is rough on the Recorder. Feeling, sense, and style are on the heretical side this time.

We don't wish to join in any local dispute between the Rev. Forbes Phillips, of Gorleston, and his adversaries. But we are sorry that trouble is made over our recent reference to him in the Freethinker. He was unconventional enough to hope that Mr. Foote would soon recover from his recent severe illness. There doesn't seem much harm in that—unless those who think there is believe that it would show a better heart and better manners to hope that Mr. Foote would not recover. It appears, however, that he has been taken to task for his simple act of courtesy. Mr. Phillips hits out as follows in last week's Yarmouth Mercury:—

> "Mr. Microbe waxes furious over the fact that I had ventured to write to express my sympathy with Mr. Foote in his recent illness. I always admire honest thinkers, and Mr. Foote is one, and I have merely contempt for the trickster who is hiccoughing blatant blasphemy one day and shedding salt tears on the penitent form next day—who sniffles with piety while selling a cheap-jack watch, and the same night in his club makes gibes about sacred things. Give me the honest Atheist before the sloppy Christian, even when he has a score of conversions to his credit or discredit."

Mr. Phillips doesn't want our aid in such a matter as this, nor do we proffer it, for he is well able to take care of himself. All we do is to note that he is not to be frightened out of his tolerance of difference of opinion on the part of those who want to find the truth.

O Mundo of April 27 publishes as a leader Mr. Heaford's article entitled "The Clamor Against Portugal." The Freethinker is duly acknowledged as "the splendid Freethought review which is published in London," and Mr. Heaford is greeted as "a great friend of Portugal."

Portugal and Its Traducers.

THE Daily Mail editorial of April 23 pins its faith to the statement that "the prisons [in Portugal] are worthy of the Middle Ages." On that point I might content myself with the statement that the imaginative editor has evidently not made himself acquainted with the Christian cruelties which abounded in the prisons of the Portuguese Inquisition, with the smiling approval of kings, priests, duchesses, and literary "gents." But there is no need for the editor of the Daily Mail to transport himself into the dead past towards which the priests, his protégés, look back with longing eyes. The Daily Mail's special correspondent at Lisbon might have told him of the report published in O Mundo of April 15, of Mr. Swinny's visit to the Penitenciary, at Lisbon, where many of the political prisoners are lodged over whose lot the Duchess of Bedford shed such eloquent but ineffectual tears. Mr. Swinny, as our readers are aware, is the learned and respected president of the London Positivist Society, and his stay in Lisbon synchronised with the publication of the sensational emanations of the Duchess's pen. On his visit to the Penitenciary, he was received by the director, Dr. Caldeira Queiroz, and inspected all the dependencies of the prison—the cells, the offices, the hospital, the pharmacy, the cuisine, etc. He found that corporal punishment was unknown. Mr. Swinny also ascertained that the prisoners are engaged in associated labor; that they enjoy the privilege of conversation during their labor; and that they are permitted to receive visits once a week (think of it, ye English prisoners for blasphemy, and all ye tribes of Suffragettes!) Mr. Swinny was surprised to find that the prisoners are permitted to write to their families and friends at will, and to receive presents of food, etc., from outside. O Mundo concludes its report (of which the foregoing is only a brief abstract) by stating that Mr. Swinny was much impressed by the humane system of treatment in the prison, and that, before leaving, he inscribed these words in the visitor's book:—

> "I find the installation and functioning in this prison are excellent. From many points of view the prisoners are better treated here than in similar institutions in England."

Since the publication of Mr. Swinny's report in O Mundo, Dr. Caldeira Queiroz has himself replied to the calumnious statements which have been published in this country as to the way in which political prisoners in Portugal are treated. According to the Star of April 23, Dr. Queiroz's statement is as under:—

> "Political prisoners work as skilled laborers, or as clerks, librarians, assistant chemists, and so on. They receive visitors every week, and, moreover, they are authorised to receive now and then persons who call on them.
> "They have the right to use their private linen from home. They receive books, reviews, flowers, fruits, sweets, etc. They may have a safety razor and a spirit lamp, which are kept by the warders at their disposal.
> "The prisoners may thus have boiling water, or hot milk and tea. Meals may come from outside twice a day in the quantities they like, and what they please. They can write and receive letters, they can bathe every day if they like, and they are treated with attention and consideration, as are all other prisoners. They are granted all possible concessions within the boundaries of discipline and order.
> "None of the political prisoners has yet been punished. It is true that they behave very correctly and express their satisfaction towards the personnel and the way they are treated. They are the first to protest against the accusations relative to the treatment of the prisoners in this prison.
> "It must be added that all prisoners are allowed to submit any claims they have to the director, who attends to them whenever he can."

This statement, combined with the independent testimony of Mr. Swinny and the authoritative denials and counter declarations of Dr. Affonso Costa (the Portuguese Premier) in O Mundo of April 19, and the detailed reply in O Seculo of April 22, must for ever resolve into myth and fancy the primâ facie absurdities and far-fetched exaggerations of the ducal diatribes, which seem to be inspired by the pious and reactionary enemies of a Freethought Republic.

Happily, on two crucial and typical matters in this dispute the veracity of the Daily Mail asseverations can be checked and very seriously called in question. First, as to the Duchess's "awful" disclosures. O Mundo of April 19 reports a speech of Dr. Affonso Costa in the Chamber of Deputies in which, after referring to the campaign of calumny which the Monarchists organised against the Republican regime, the Premier stated:—

> "To-day, the campaign revived with the visit of the Duchess of Bedford to the prisons of Lisbon. This lady was received with every deference, and after having stated here that she found everything in order, she went home to her own country and stated the contrary."

Perhaps the Duchess sees visions, like the prophets of old, and, like them, being of a literary turn of mind, converts them into narratives. At any rate, she evidently has a wondrous gift of seeing the thing that is not, or divorcing the reality from its context. This fact is clear from the second item of her Æolian Hall impeachment, with its extraordinary declaration that "the Portuguese Minister, in an interview, asked 'What is a Carbonario?' and answered himself by saying 'There is no such thing!'" Like all these ducal utterances, no references enabling one to check or verify the statement are given, but apart from the self-evident absurdity of the citation, with its gratuitous addendum later on, suggesting that the Prime Minister "may be" a Carbonario himself, Senhor Affonso Costa, the devoted Freethinker on whose head the vials of the ducal wrath are poured forth, supplied in anticipation the refutation of these extravagances when he stated a few days before, in the Chamber of Deputies (O Mundo, April 19), first, that he never belonged to the Carbonario; and, secondly, when, so far from regarding the Carbonarios as non-existent, he avowed that—

> "Although I am of opinion that the Society should have disappeared with the advent of the new regime, I do not cease to consider the Carbonarios as the finest type of Republicans and excellent Portuguese citizens."

The ultimate object of this campaign of calumny is the restoration of the Monarchy, the re-establishment of the Church, the disruption of the elements of social reform on the basis of scientific Rationalism, and the return of the community into the fold of the faith. With this ulterior program in view, the cry is made for the amnesty both of the prisoners within and the exiled and defeated bandits across the frontier. In a general way, amnesty is the right thing to plead for and the generous thing to concede in all cases of domestic discord, but a policy of amnesty dictated from Æolian Hall platforms to the sweet accompaniment of international intervention, is one which the Portuguese Prime Minister will, I hope, resist to the uttermost. I am convinced from a fairly wide reading of the facts—partly of those distorted in the present campaign, and partly of those carefully excluded from the organs of ducal publicity in this country—that the prisons in Portugal are, at least, no worse than our own; that the treatment of the prisoners there is more generous than that which our own politicals have immemorially received, with the sublime approval of the monarchical and religious censors of Republican and Rationalist Portugal, and that no English Ministry, in similar circumstances, would yield to threats organised in the Portuguese press. And while this campaign of threat and vilification goes on, my advice to the Republican party in Portugal will be to keep the prisoners safe and comfortable behind bolt and bar, and wipe the word "amnesty" for the time being off the political slate.

The mode of trial of existing political prisoners has formed one of the counts in the ducal fulmina-

tions. The sure and certain conviction of the prisoners was asserted, but the many acquittals that have taken place reduce that absurdity into pulp. In this connection it may be useful to quote the crushing statement of O Seculo (April 22) :—

> "The form of trial [of political prisoners] does not differ from that under which the Republicans engaged in the revolt of January 21, 1891, were tried by Council of War and under worse conditions of defence."

Of course, two wrongs do not make a right, but the hypothetical wrongs of to-day are not proper to be redressed by the aristocratic hands that were never upheld to defend Freethinkers and Republicans who suffered under the odious regime of the lamented Carlos.

One of the items of complaint against the Republic is the alleged banishment of God and religion from the schools. On this point my friend Vieira, one of the most distinguished writers on O Mundo, and a leader of Portuguese Freethought, triumphantly points out, in his article of April 15, that—

> "The schools are without God and without religion because they are not for, or against, any kind of God, nor for, or against, any kind of religion. No one has been sent to tear down the crosses in the cemeteries, as the Duchess pretends. The crosses are there still in all the cemeteries; they have only been withdrawn from the establishments that were chapels, but which ought not to be so, because as they belonged to all, Catholics or non-Catholics, in no form or guise should they be employed exclusively by citizens of a particular belief. We believe that nothing was ever more just than this."

I heartily agree with the distinguished writer above cited, and I think, too, that the policy of the Republic in depriving the Catholics of the exclusive use of the cemetery chapel, and opening to Catholics the doors of these sad vestibules to the tomb on a footing of absolute equality with Protestants, Freethinkers, Jews, or Spiritualists, is a sound policy of justice and common sense. In monarchical Portugal, as in monarchical England, the hall of Death, the great leveller and democrat, was made the camping-ground of religious privilege, and the last solemn, consoling words of commemoration and parting had to be made not under the dome of some neutral undenominational building, but, if at all, at the open grave, with all its distressing and non-hygienic associations. In this reform, Portugal sets England a salutary lesson. The cross stuck on the cemetery chapels is a theological battle-sign, and should be buried in the dust of oblivion; and the cemetery chapels, in having a common, unrestricted use by men of all persuasions, should serve to unite the living with the bonds of a generous sympathy and toleration.

The Portuguese papers are naturally a little sarcastic in their references to the ducal campaigner. O Mundo, in its leader of April 17, very neatly turns the tables on the perfervid enemy of the Republic :—

> "When the widow of the Duke of Bedford appeared in Lisbon [I translate from our esteemed contemporary], the journals were informed that this lady came here with the intention of visiting our prisons. The public asked : 'But what has the Duchess got to do with this? Why does she not spend her time in investigating the things that take place in the prisons of her own country?' The Portuguese public were quite right. In truth, the prisons, the disciplinary and penal regime of our country are, as every properly cultivated person knows, an open sky as compared with the prisons or the disciplinary and penal regime prevailing in England."

The writer goes on to say that in Portugal the dungeon fetters and the hard labor and other penitential afflictions characteristic of English penology do not exist. The actual treatment of the conspirators is, as far as possible, good, and generally their treatment is much better than that of common prisoners, many of whom are in "durance vile" for offences involving less social evil and less moral turpitude than the marauding reactionaries who have fallen under the protecting wing of the Daily Mail. It is important to remember, as O Seculo says in its address to the English people (fourteen columns of reply to the Duchess, in Portuguese and English, published April 22) that the prisons complained of are "the prisons that we inherited from the monarchy, the very prisons in which the Republican propagators were detained at various times!" The Daily Mail dismisses O Seculo's refutation of its romantic flights of fancy in about fourteen lines! This may be wisdom, but it is not fair journalism. The reproduction of O Seculo's smashing reply would have crushed the mountain of calumnies in the dust and destroyed the credit of the Rev. R. J. Campbell's pious impeachment of the Republic. Saul amongst the prophets was not a more affecting spectacle than that of Campbell among the duchesses. At the Æolian Hall meeting he moved a resolution of "strong and indignant protest," but one doubts whether its "strength" was fortified with an adequate knowledge of the facts. Probably the "indignation" of the emotional mystic of the City Temple will sweep him past the evidence in favor of the Republic which he assails.

I hope that the readers of the Freethinker and the friends of fairplay to the Republic will get O Seculo and read and circulate it. To Freethinkers, too, in the States I make a special appeal to spread the light. The pictures given of the saloons occupied by the Visconde de Ervideira, one of the maltreated politicals, and of the rooms of some of the other prisoners, which are samples of the rest, are enough to make the mouths of the Suffragettes water with envy. The treatment of the politicals, as here disclosed, places the penal system of Portugal on a high level of humanity and generous consideration for the prisoners who have fallen into the Republic's hands as the legitimate spoils of a desperate war of self-defence waged by the new regime of liberty against the cruel and unscrupulous enemies of social reform and political and intellectual freedom. I do not pretend that even in Portugal the existing prison system fulfils the highest ideal of an enlightened penology (what can a Republic fighting for its life against enemies within and without do in three years?) but I am convinced, after an ample survey of the ground of attack and defence, that the present campaign of calumny has hatred of Freethought and a malevolent desire to crush the nascent Republic as its mainspring.

I am glad that the advice which I tendered to my friend Vieira in my long letter of appeal, dated April 19 (since reproduced in O Mundo of April 28) has been taken seriously to heart, and that he was able to prevail upon O Seculo to undertake its splendid and convincing vindication of the Republic. It is to be hoped that the titular representatives of the Republic will take care that the widest publicity be given in the press of this country to the true statement of facts as affecting the aristocratic crusade against the fair fame of an honored and chivalrous race nobly struggling to be free from the twin tyrants of throne and altar.

WILLIAM HEAFORD.

A Laughing Philosopher.

> "Rabelais laughing in his easy chair."—POPE.
> "I class Rabelais with the great creative minds of the world."—COLERIDGE.
> "Le rire c'est le propre de l'homme."—RABELAIS.

IN a recent trial, the details of which were sufficiently Rabelaisian to satisfy the most exacting, the learned judge complained that to read Rabelais was a cause of boredom. That is not the general view, and the popular idea of Rabelais coincides with Pope's famous line. He is pictured as one who laughs and mocks at all things; a hog for appetite, a monkey for tricks. His genius had many facets, and he has been described as a great moral teacher, a grossly obscene writer, a reckless buffoon, a Catholic, a Protestant, and a Freethinker. To paint him as an ethical teacher alone is to ignore the innate drollery of his character. To set him up a mere mountebank is to forget the stern reality which underlies his writing. Other unconscious ironists would turn the first of French humorists into an ecclesiastical historian.

To treat Rabelais as destitute of all serious purpose in art or life is even a greater error. Whatever Rabelais may have been, he was not a trifler. He had seen ecclesiastical life from the inside, and he hated priests with every drop of his blood. He studied Greek when it was a forbidden language, and he was an enthusiastic disciple of the new learning when scholars carried their lives in their hands. His zeal for intellectual freedom, untrammelled by priestcraft, entitles him to rank with Erasmus and Von Hutten as an apostle of humanism.

Of middle-class parentage, Francois Rabelais was born in 1483 near the lovely little city of Chinon, on the Vienne, where Henry II. cursed his sons and died. He always regarded Touraine, its cities, rivers, and vineyards, with affectionate admiration. "Noble, ancient, the first in the world," so he called it in the fullness of his heart. His father, an innkeeper, wished to make him a priest. Accordingly, little Francois was sent at nine years of age to the Benedictine monks of Seully, so young that the white shirt was put over the child's frock. Later, he was removed to the Franciscan Monastery of Fontenoy le Comte. The Franciscan vows included ignorance as well as celibacy and poverty. For fifteen years he remained there, taking priest's orders in 1511, at the age of twenty-eight. Always inquisitive, he amassed that encyclopædic knowledge which he put to so good a use in his immortal book, Gargantua and Pantagruel. It is to this long period spent among the bigoted, narrow, intolerant sons of the great lying Catholic Church that we owe his undying hatred of priestcraft. It breaks out in nearly every page of his writings, here passionately, there sorrowfully, with a cry of rage, a sob of pain, or a mocking laugh of "sanglante derision." He hated the "monk-birds" more bitterly than even Erasmus, for his nature was stronger.

At the age of forty he came into the world a free man, at liberty to follow his studies, burning with a pathetic enthusiasm for the new learning. He threw aside the loathed monastic garb, and became secretary to the Bishop of Maillezais. About 1530 he went to the University of Montpelier with the intention of getting a medical degree. When he attended the lectures he was within sight of his fiftieth year, and he sat by the side of men young enough to be his sons. Two years later he went to Lyons, where he held an appointment as physician to the hospital. His friend, Etienne Dolet, was already established as a printer in the place.

Rabelais's connection with the first reformers of France is certain; the extent difficult to determine. He had no desire for the martyr's crown, and he never contemplated following Calvin into exile, or Berquin to the stake. As he humorously explained, he was "too thirsty to like fire." His sympathies, too, were antagonistic to all dogmas. Luther and Calvin were as abhorrent to him as the priests. The society of Des Perriers, Dolet, and the Lyonnais Freethinkers was more congenial to his habits of thought. Moreover, he had an inside knowledge of the power of the Church and of the malignity of her hired assassins.

Heretics were then handed over to the secular arm to be burnt for the good of their souls and the greater glory of God; and Rabelais did not intend, if he could help it, to be butchered to make a Roman holiday. When he was denounced as a heretic, he challenged his enemies to produce a heretical proposition from his writing. They were unequal to the task; but, none the less, they were there. Rabelais's caution was necessary if he wished to live. Some of his contemporaries suffered for heresy. Dolet was burnt, Des Perriers was driven to suicide, Marot was a half-starved wanderer in Piedmont. Giordano Bruno, whom he had met in Rome, was also done to death. Rabelais may be excused for not wishing to be "saved by fire."

His writings, Gargantua and Pantagruel, which have immortalised his name, were commenced at Lyons and finished when he was curé of Meudon. They form a series of satires in a vein of riotous and uproarious mirth on monks, priests, pedants, and all the solecisms of his time, yet with all their licentiousness revealing a heart aflame with love for mankind, and a passionate desire for the triumph of truth and justice.

It has been said that Rabelais despised women. He did not write till an age when the passion of youth had consumed itself to ashes. Love was killed in Rabelais by that hateful system of monkery which has filled Christendom with unspeakable horrors. Poor Rabelais! Half of humanity absent from his mind. Love, the central fire of the universe, the source of all human joys and sympathies, the bond of society, appears in the accursed monastic system in which he was trained as corruption and depravity. The damnable discipline surrounded Rabelais from the time he wore a child's frock till he was a man of forty, and the best side of his nature was strangled. He never loved; never even thought of loving. He had no more respect for women than a eunuch in an Eastern seraglio. Nay, more, there had even been crushed out of him that love for his mother which characterises every Frenchman worthy of the name. Alone among French writers he has no filial piety. As the old galley slave used to be known by the dragging foot, on which was once the heavy fetter, so when the unlovely years had eaten away manhood, imprisoned with its blind instincts and objectless passions, the ex-monk is known by his sexless mind. Thrice poor Rabelais! the monkish devils spoiled his life. The robe he wore was to him like a bodily deformity, narrowing his view, corrupting his mind. Originally, his nature must have been lofty and beautiful; witness those exquisite chapters in which he describes the monks of Thelema, whose motto was "Liberty."

Tradition has it that he died saying, "I go to seek the great perhaps." We may picture the rage of the Christians when their old enemy slipped quietly out of their eager clutches. The Catholic Church never forgets and priests never forgive. It was well for the old man that his life was not prolonged. Rabelais went further than contempt for the trappings of Christianity, and he rejected it altogether. He hoped to cure the evil of religion by spreading knowledge, by bringing priestcraft into contempt, by widening the boundaries of thought. It was his desire that his writings should be read. To read rationalistic thought is to think rationally, and is the first step towards Freethought. He knew as much as any man of his time; but he carried his weight of learning with a smile. He was acquainted with the book of the world, and not merely with the world of books. Liberty was Rabelais's sovereign specific for the ills of his time. Finding his contemporaries bound with chains of their own manufacture, it was his life purpose to break the fetters and set them free.

Worship and Finance.

THE Church Treasurer was standing outside his shop, with both hands in his pockets and his back to the street, evidently in a contemplative mood. I had heard that the pastor of his church was leaving, and I had not yet had an opportunity of expressing my regrets to him. I decided to do so now.

"So your pastor is leaving," I said, after we had exchanged the customary civilities.

"Um—yes," he replied, hesitatingly.

"You will miss him," I said. "He has served you many years."

The Treasurer made no reply, so I asked, "How are you faring in your search for a successor?"

"I might as well tell you straight," said the Treasurer, with an air of abandon. "Fact is, I don't go to 'is church now. Ain't bin there for months."

Digitized by Google

I was genuinely surprised, though my previous experiences of the domestic storms which sweep across the tabernacles of the faithful ought to have prepared me for this sort of division. Peace, among Nonconformists, I ought to have known, usually exists only as a theoretical hypothesis and seldom as a present experience. I told the Treasurer I was sorry to hear of the separation, especially as he was an office-bearer in the church, and I asked him to tell me the cause of it.

"Can't keep on lendin' 'em money," he said. "I've financed 'em for years, and I thought 'twas about time I 'ad some o' me money back."

"Yes," I said. "I understand that you have been rather generous to the church. But were they really in a position to pay you back any of your loans?"

"Could if they wanted to," said the Treasurer, with a suggestion of a snap in his manner. "We 'ad a sale of work and raised about £40, and I asked for some of it. We called a church meetin' to settle what should be done with the proceeds, and it was agreed to give me £20. But the pastor wanted it for new Sunday-school 'ymn-books and organ repairs, so 'e persuaded some of 'is pet lambs to call another church meetin', and it was then decided to do as the pastor said. Talked 'em round 'andsome, 'e did."

I knew the Treasurer was a hard-working man. The premises outside which we were now standing consisted of a small butcher's establishment, and the street upon which the "best" of two bedrooms above looked out was a frousy business thoroughfare. The Church Treasurer, assisted by his wife as cashier, and an errand boy under the age for insurance, slew and sold animals for bread, and doubtless not an ox fell under his axe without his Heavenly Father's knowledge. He was by no means rich, and probably could ill afford the numerous advances he had made to the church, upon whose accounts Providence continually permitted tiresome deficits to arise. I could not but sympathise with his request for repayment, and I told him so.

"Business is pressin' nowadays," he said. "Gets 'arder and 'arder to make a livin'."

"Exactly," said I. "And 'tis the same with the churches. Gets harder and harder to make a congregation."

But the Treasurer was out for narrative, and not for argument. Having got well started, he wasn't to be switched off.

"I couldn't feel comfortable," he continued, "at the Baptist church after that. I told 'em straight that they'd lose one family through it, and me and me wife and children changed over to the Wesleyans. You can't get no good from a man who tells you not to do a thing 'e's doin' 'isself, can you?"

"What are you referring to?" I asked.

"Why," said the Treasurer, "wasn't 'e lookin' out for a bigger church all the time 'e was tellin' me not to ask for me money back? I couldn't get no good from 'im after that. 'E didn't 'elp me spiritual life.' After a pause he added, sadly: "I know I didn't ought to look to man for 'elp in me worship. I ought to look 'igher, I know. But some'ow I didn't feel meself, if you can understand. I wasn't comfortable, and sich things didn't ought to be in a church. So I thought it best to leave."

The vacating pastor had undoubtedly done his best to satisfy the Almighty in at least one respect, for, in obedience to the divine command, "Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth," he had filled his quiver with a baker's dozen of youngsters. I could not justly criticise his desire to obtain what he described as a larger "sphere," knowing quite well that by "sphere" he meant something else. When a "call" from heaven is accompanied by a prospective increase of £50 a year in salary, thirteen children are apt to bias a man's decision.

I said as much to the Treasurer, but just then a female entered his shop with the evident intention of making a purchase. She delivered her order to the butcher's wife (sitting in the cash desk), who transferred it to her husband through the open window in the words, "Forward for sossidges." The Treasurer skipped into the shop, and I lifted my hat to the cashier and passed on down the street, musing upon the wondrous power of Christianity to allay petty bickerings and to unite men in the pursuit of one grand and noble purpose.

The Life Beyond.

THERE is a land, though none knows where,
But all may go who pay their fare.
The boat which takes you, so 'tis said,
Is timed to do so—when you're dead.
The agents for this happy land
Describe the place as simply grand.
No work is done there all day long,
But all sing one eternal song;
A million million voices blend
To sing this song, which cannot end,
Which has no chorus, verse, or rhyme,
But just one sentence all the time.
A pleasant program, is it not?
And pious folk, who know what's what,
Will book their places in advance,
While fools and sinners miss their chance.
The streets, they say, are paved with pearls
(A detail which will please the girls).
The company is quite select,
And strictly choice and circumspect.
There good old Adam will be found
And other folk long underground.
There Moses and his rod will be (An entertaining sight to see).
Saints by the ton will swell the fun,
And kings and emperors, many a one,
Who've made fair lands a dreary waste,
The pleasures of this land will taste.
Converted murderers, whom the cord
Has jerked to see their own dear Lord,
Inquisitors who plied the rack,
And loved their victims' bones to crack.
John Calvin, who betrayed his friend,
Eternity in bliss will spend.
Good old King Hall, for his defence
Of Christian faith, his recompense
In this fair region will enjoy;
While with his golden harp will toy
King David, who seduced the wife
And took, by treachery, the life
Of one he counted as his friend.
And there, in holy joy, will spend
Eternity, the sacred shade
Of Rahab, she who once betrayed
Her city to the Hebrew band,
The devastators of her land.
This whore, for treachery renowned,
Among the angels will be found,
If Dante's verse describes aright
The land above so fair and bright.

. . . . .

What say you, Sir; you'd rather go
Among the damned in hell below,
For ever there to boil and fry?
Well, now you say so, so would I!

Obituary.

We regret to hear, just as we are going to press, of the death of Professor Thaddeus Burr Wakeman, a distinguished American Freethinker, whose personal acquaintance we had the honor and pleasure of making when we were at New York in 1896. Professor Wakeman was seventy-eight years old. He died of heart failure on April 28, without an hour of sickness or a moment's pain. The remains were cremated on the following Saturday. A memorial meeting was to take place later. We shall probably see it reported in the Truthseeker. We owe the present announcement to Mr. Theodore Schroeder, secretary of the Free Speech League.

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 20 SUNDAY, MAY 18, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

We cannot make true things false, or false things true, by choosing to think them so.—J. A. FROUDE.

Religious Epidemics.

IMITATION and suggestion represent two of the most powerful forces in the associated life of man. Both are forces that are essential to an orderly, and even a progressive, social life; but they may as easily become the cause of movements that are retrogressive, and even anti-social in character. Given a favorable environment, and there is hardly an idea that is too outrageous to become the immediately impelling power of masses of people. Under certain circumstances a crowd of people manifest all the characteristic features of a psychological entity. As Le Bon has pointed out, a crowd will do collectively what none of its constituent individuals would ever dream of doing singly.* It becomes capable of deeds of heroism or of savage cruelty. It will sacrifice itself or others with absolute indifference. Above all, the mere fact of moving in a mass gives the individual a power, a certainty of being in the right, that he can—so far as the mass of people are concerned—never acquire by himself. The intellect is subdued, the instincts are given a freer play, and their movement is determined in turn by suggestions not unlike those with which a trained hypnotist operates on his subject.

In all contagious phenomena mere words or symbols play a powerful part. They serve as a rallying cry for the emotions of the crowd. These words or symbols may be wholly incongruous when taken in connection with the real needs of a people; but, provided they are sufficiently familiar, they serve their purpose. And the more primitive the type of mind represented by the mass of the people, the more powerfully these symbols operate. Shakespeare's portrayal of the crowd in Julius Cæsar is eternally true. The skilled orator, playing on old feelings, using familiar terms, and invoking familiar ideas, finds a crowd quite plastic to his hands. It is for these reasons, often perhaps unconsciously, that there is such a keen struggle for a monopoly of good rallying cries by political and social parties, and a readiness to affix certain objectionable names to their opponents. Patriotism, The Church in Danger, Godless Education, Little Englander, are all so many causes that are materially helped or hindered, not by their essential justice or reasonableness, but by the mere verbal images with which they become associated.

In some cases epidemics may be called normal in character—that is, they depend for their existence upon factors that are always operative in society, and utilise that power of suggestion and imitation which is an essential part of the social structure. In other instances they depend upon the workings of obscure mental diseases, and are of a pathological character. In yet other instances they represent a mixture of both. In such cases, for instance, as the mediæval Flagellants, or the Dancing Mania, the presence of pathological elements is unmistakable. Yet they could never have spread as they did unless they had called into operation those principles of crowd psychology to which science has only within recent years turned its attention, and which are normal factors in every human society. At present I am concerned only with epidemics as they occur in connection with religion, and in showing how, in spite of their admittedly pathologic or undesirable character, they have yet served to keep religious belief alive and active. The two epidemics above mentioned furnish good examples of what has been said.

We may start with the once numerous sect of the Flagellants. Commencing in Italy about the middle of the thirteenth century, this sect continued in existence for at least 150 years; it maintained itself in various parts of Europe, England and Scotland appearing to be the only countries in which the sect failed to establish itself. As a religious penance, whipping antedates the outbreak of the flagellation mania, as it has survived its disappearance. In Spain, until quite recently, there existed a religious order, the "Brotherhood of the Cave," which established itself in cellars, where the faithful resorted to have themselves whipped. Flogging has also formed an important part in both conventual and monastic discipline. The pathological aspect of the subject is too unsavory to enter into at any length; it is enough to say that the connection between the whipping of certain parts of the body, and the production of intense sexual pleasure, is now an established fact, and it is clear that the anti-social life of monks and nuns would easily lend itself to the development of the practice. On the other hand, when this practice assumed an epidemic form, mere imitation, combined with intense religious faith, would act as a potent cause for its extension.

The pictures of the flagellants in all countries were very similar. They marched from town to town, men and women, and even children, stripped to the waist—sometimes entirely naked, praying, and whipping each other incessantly. "Not only during the day, but even by night, and in the severest winter, they traversed the cities with torches and banners, in thousands and ten of thousands, headed by their priests, and prostrated themselves before the altars." At other times they proceeded to the market-place, arranged themselves on the ground in large circles, taking up various positions in accordance with their real or supposed crimes. After each had been whipped, a letter was read, which it was said an angel had brought to St. Peter's Church, at Jerusalem, stating that Christ had granted, at the intercession of the saints and of the Virgin, pardon for all who should wander about for thirty-four days and scourge themselves. A large number of women joined these flagellants. It is said that 25,000 marched from Modena and over 20,000 from Florence. In Germany, also, the crowds assumed large dimensions. In the end the Church and the secular powers joined forces for their suppression.

Of much greater significance in the history of religion is the Dancing Mania, which broke out as the craze for flagellation was subsiding. I have pointed out in previous articles the significance of the practice of dancing in the early history of religion. In primitive religion dancing is one of the commonest means adopted to produce ecstasy, usually helped by the taking of some vegetable drug. In more civilised times the phenomena takes on more of a hypnotic character, and it is easy to see the play of suggestion when dealing with the various dancing manias of the Christian period. A people subject to the social disorganisations of the mediæval period, and living in an environment saturated with supernaturalism, are peculiarly susceptible to such an influence as that which expressed itself in the Dancing Mania of the fourteenth century. Hecker, who gives a very elaborate account of the epidemic as it appeared in different countries,* describes it thus :—

> "They formed circles, hand in hand, and, appearing to have lost control over their senses, continued dancing, regardless of all bystanders, for hours together, in wild delirium, until at length they fell to the ground in a state of exhaustion.....While dancing they neither saw nor heard, being insensible to external impressions, but were haunted by visions, their fancies conjuring up spirits whose names they shrieked out; and some of them afterwards asserted that they felt as if they had been immersed in a stream of blood, which obliged them to leap so high. Others, during the paroxysm, saw the heavens open and the Savior enthroned with the Virgin Mary."

At Aix-la-Chapelle, Cologne, and Metz, says the same writer :—

> "Peasants left their ploughs, mechanics their workshops, housewives their domestic duties, to join the wild revels. Secret desires were excited, and but too often found opportunities for wild enjoyment; and numerous beggars, stimulated by vice and misery, availed themselves of this new complaint to gain a temporary livelihood. Girls and boys quitted their parents, and servants their masters, to amuse themselves at the dances of those possessed, and greedily imbibed the poison of mental infection. Above a hundred unmarried women were seen raving about in consecrated and unconsecrated places, and the consequences were soon perceived."

Hecker rightly says that the influence of the Roman Catholic religion, connected as it was with processions, public penances, and other practices likely to excite the mind of an excited populace, reduced the mind to a very favorable state for the outbreak of a nervous disorder. It is significant to note in this connection that one of these outbreaks occurred immediately after the revels of St. John's Day, a Christianised Pagan festival, and that the name of St. John was frequently in the mouths of the dancers. Once attacked, the hypnotic character of the complaint showed itself by its annual recurrence. To again cite Hecker :—

> "Most of those affected were only annually visited by attacks; and the occasion of them was so manifestly referable to the prevailing notions of that period that, if the unqualified belief in the agency of saints could have been abolished, they would not have had any return of the complaint. Throughout the whole of June, prior to the festival of St. John, patients felt a disquietude and restlessness which they were unable to overcome. They were dejected, timid, and anxious; wandered about in an unsettled state, being tormented with twitching pains, which seized them suddenly in different parts, and eagerly expected the eve of St. John's Day, in the confident hope that by dancing at the altars of this saint they would be freed from all their sufferings. This hope was not disappointed; and they remained, for the rest of the year, exempt from any further attack."

The connection of St. Vitus with the Dancing Mania is accounted for by the legend that St. Vitus, said to have been martyred in 303, just before his death prayed that he might protect from the Dancing Mania all who solemnised his death, and that a voice from heaven was heard to say, "Vitus, thy prayer is accepted." The fact that the prayer was offered over a thousand years before the disease appeared, and that there is no proof that St. Vitus ever existed, are difficulties too microscopical for the eye of faith to discern.

The Maligned Non-Believer.

SEVERAL years ago the Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon went to Manchester to deliver a lecture on "Atheism and Faith," which was afterwards published. In that lecture the reverend gentleman made a peculiar statement, namely, that "religion resting upon reason is a house founded upon sand." As a matter of fact, no religion does rest, no religion ever did rest, upon reason, simply because every religion is contrary to reason. The only exception is Buddhism, which in the usual acceptation of the word is not a religion at all. What Mr. Gibbon meant to convey by the statement was the false notion that religion is not contrary to, but above reason, for in the same discourse he nicknamed reason "a farthing guttering candle." Mr. Gibbon is the present Chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, the Spring meeting of which has just been held in London. In his address from the chair Mr. Gibbon returned to the subject of his Manchester lecture, and talked at length, in a superficial, flippant, and misleading manner, about "the non-believer of our time." He was candid enough to place this wicked character "prominent in the forefront," and to allow that he is a messenger of God to this generation. He is "a significant and somewhat ominous figure," challenging "whatever of human worth and Christian faith survives among us." We wonder how many of our readers will be able to recognise him from the following description :—

> "I see a youth, English, Welsh, Irish, or Scotch, of decent upbringing, of average education, with good, not brilliant faculties, of naturally clean instincts and wholesome habits, interested in sport, not deeply interested in anything of an ideal order, rather bored by business, keen on his own pet hobby, football, cycling, photography, and such-like, while as for religion, he has just let it go. That's all. Once it was in his bag, but it fell out and he never troubled about it any more; he went on without it, and has never felt the loss of it."

With all due deference to so exalted a functionary, we pronounce the above a miserable caricature. In reality, it is an accurate portrait of multitudes of people who, though utterly uninterested in churches and chapels and unintelligently sceptical as to many things in the Bible, are yet at heart believers in God and a future life. We have met hundreds, if not thousands, of them ourselves, and know the breed quite well. They are not the typical unbelievers of our time at all, but rather the indifferentists or nothingarians, over whom neither Freethought nor the Christian faith can exert any moulding influence.

Possibly Mr. Gibbon has never met a genuine non-believer; indeed, from his description one naturally infers that he has not. If he had ever come into direct contact with a veritable Atheist he would have been absolutely incapable of delivering the greater part of his address. The Atheist is a person profoundly interested in all the things that matter, and distinguished for his close, hard, logical thinking. He has the courage to face the facts and to reject conventional explanations. Mr. Gibbon made feeling allusions to social problems; to "the underworld of poverty, and all that goes on there"; to the girl who is "forced to sell her labor for a living," whose innocence, youth, and fairness "are all bait to the enemy"; but the Atheist knows that if Christianity were true such distressing problems would not exist. Indeed, Mr. Gibbons cannot but be aware that for the existing state of things the Churches themselves are very largely responsible. The Churches are mainly supported by the middle class, and in Widowers' Houses Mr. Bernard Shaw describes "middle-class respectability and younger-son gentility as fattening on the poverty of the slum as flies fatten on filth." Mr. Gibbon says that "Atheism unites all our creeds"; but, unfortunately, it unites them only for the heartless persecution of Atheists. Is it conceivable that God raises the Atheist on purpose to challenge the Churches to prove their piety by putting the wretch to death, or clapping him into prison?

According to Mr. Gibbon the non-believer is one who has consciously or otherwise "absorbed the negative results of modern criticism":—

> "His common sense always strained at Balaam and Jonah, and his moral sense, sharpened by his love of sport, which serves him as a conscience, stuck at many things said of God—and so, not being deeply interested, he let the whole thing go.....So there he is, millions of him. According to the old logic, he ought to be an exceedingly bad man; but not a week, scarcely a day, passes without some heroic deed flashing out of the mass of life about us, showing what fine metal men are made of; God being with them, though they know him not."

If Atheists are good it is a sign that God is with them without their knowing it. That is to say, nobody can be good unless God makes him so. Such is Mr. Gibbon's teaching; but does he not see what dreadful implications it contains? Here, for example, is an extremely awkward question which we are obliged to put to the Chairman of the Congregational Union. If God is infinitely powerful, good, and loving, how is it that there are any wicked people in the world? In other words, why is God with some Atheists, inspiring them to deeds of heroic excellence, and absent from many Theists, who, in consequence, grow rich by grinding the faces of the poor and devouring widows' houses? We exhort Mr. Gibbon to pay serious heed to this question, and answer it if he can. We honestly confess that we regard it as of much greater importance than any of the matters discussed by him in his long address. The God he believes in is, on his own showing, guilty of the cruellest partiality and injustice. All the awful evils so rightly deplored in the address thrive simply because God is not with all people alike, because he is a despicable respecter of persons. If he can be with some people who disown him and cause them to appear as great luminaries in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, why does he not dwell with all alike, and so make "a crooked and perverse generation" an impossibility?

Mr. Gibbon wants to know how the non-believers can be reached by the Churches. We beg to inform him that thousands of those whom he looks upon as non-believers could easily be reached and won back by scientifically planned revivals conducted by specially qualified evangelists. Why, Gipsy Smith is reaching and winning back such people by the thousand wherever he goes; only they backslide again almost as soon as the artificial excitement dies down. But the genuine non-believers are beyond the reach of the Churches altogether. The following is what Mr. Gibbon thinks on the point:—

> "Such a dogged attempt to deal with the social question as would give religion an edge and the semblance of a real fight would reach great multitudes of them. They have no use for a disguised Buddhism that in hymn and prayer offers rest to people who are not tired, but they would flock to the colors if there was a declaration of war against the Devil and his angels."

We absolutely dissent from the reverend Chairman's opinion. Conscientious unbelievers are convinced that all Churches are, consciously or unconsciously, fraudulent institutions. Our opposition to them is not based upon their inefficiency, but upon their falseness. We have turned our backs upon them not because their accomplishments are few and ineffective, but because their claims are baseless; not because they sail so unskilfully, but because they sail under false colors. In other words, the supreme fault we find with them is that they pretend to be what they are not, and to do what is impossible. They pretend to be Divine institutions, indwelt by the infinite and almighty God who is justice and love, to constitute the body of which the Eternal Christ is the head, or to form the temple which the Holy Ghost fills with his glory; but they have never furnished the least verification of such august pretensions. Throughout their whole history they have given innumerable demonstrations of their exclusively human origin and character. Their differences, their bitter wrangles, their cruel persecution of one another and of all outsiders, bear ample witness to their non-Divine connections. But the absurdest of all their claims is that they can actually limit the activity of the Supreme Being, or that the Savior of the world has seen fit to do his saving work through them, and through them alone, and through them only within the bounds of their own capacities. And yet they wonder why we do not believe in such a God, who can do nothing for China or Japan except through Christian missionaries specially sent out from Christendom, and scarcely anything even through them. We have the testimony of such unquestioned authorities as Dr. H. A. Giles, Professor of Chinese at Cambridge, Mr. Chester Holcombe, and Mr. Eugene Simon, who have spent many years in China, that the Chinese compare most favorably with the best Christian nation. Mr. Gibbon has never lived in China or Japan, and yet he has the audacity to apply the following language to all Heathen people alike:—

> "They are souls in exile. They are earth's disinherited. In them the human spirit is humiliated. They have no share in the things that belong to man's life,.....no place in the work of civilisation."

He calls them all "these entombed races." This is blind prejudice in its full, irresponsible swing. And yet a man who can talk such lying nonsense imagines that if the Churches were on fire with such irrational zeal Atheists would flock to their colors in their thousands. It was empty twaddle of that sort that first drove them to Atheism, and certainly such egotistical attitude and activity on the part of the Churches as Mr. Gibbon recommends is not likely to decoy them back to Theism. The Chairman of the Union says that they have no use for "a disguised Buddhism." True; but they have very considerable use for the real Buddhist system, because it is practically identical with their own. Buddhism does not offer rest to people who are not tired, but it does promise deliverance from suffering and sorrow to people who are prepared to follow the path pointed out by Nature, a deliverance which will not be possible in Christendom until Christianity has died out of it.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Irony of So-Called Revelations.—IV.

(b) According to revelation, however, the unseen world is tenanted not only by Gods, but by legions of angels, good and bad. But I am not going to waste your time with a dissection of the anatomy of these crude hybrid creations of primitive man. They are not worthy of any attention save to remark that, according to revelation, they are all, bad and good, true existences. The treatment, however, that is now generally accorded to his Seraphic Majesty—the supreme head of the legions of darkness—puts the religionists in a sad dilemma. The Bible, as you well know, reveals a Satan as well as a God. Its sacred pages are as replete with his unwearied attentions to mankind as they are with those of God. The Devil and his host play not only a very conspicuous rôle, but a most fundamental one, in the revealed scheme of salvation. The effect of their doings, in fact, forms the very foil in which the deeds of God and his angels are set. By every canon of reason and logic, Satan is as veritable an object of revelation as God is.

But oh! what revenges time had in store for revealed supernatural secrets. For now good theologians and devout religionists are actually ashamed of him, and even take pleasure in ignoring his very existence, despite his immortal nature! Some go to the extent of writing books which openly repudiate his ancient claim to a suzerainty over our lives. He is actually exiled from the halls of learning and culture, and is obliged to take refuge in Salvation Army barracks, Gospel halls, and revival meetings.

All this is done in apparent oblivion of the ludicrous predicament they put themselves into. If you accept the Bible as an inspired revelation, you have to accept both God and Satan as real existences. If you deny the reality of one, you cast your revelation to the four winds. You are bound to retain both, or let go your authority. Satan and God must stand together, or foreswear your Bible. There is no escape from this dilemma.

(c) The inspired Bible makes a further disclosure in respect to the inhabitants of that far country—that it is also inhabited by another spiritual genus, the souls of homo sapiens, or the spirits of men; and further, that at a future date it will be tenanted by their bodies as well. That is to say, that man is immortal both in soul and in body.

The dogma that man has an immortal soul is common to practically all religions. But the announcement of a day of resurrection on which the body will return from the grave in an immortal form is a revelation which Christianity can practically claim as its own. But how cruelly fate deals with revelations! This special tenet of the New Testament was about the first to partake of the fate of Jonah and to go by the board to save the Christian vessel, with its cargo of creed, from being irretrievably lost. To attract, however, no attention to its fate, it has been lowered with deathlike silence; and it is a sad calamity that the missionary enterprise should play the part of the whale and bear it to distant shores to disturb anew the peaceful Ninevehs of Pagan lands.

Nor can even the immortal soul put in any legitimate claim to belong to the spiritual world. It is a crude semi-material ghost, which, but for recent sublimations, would have had to follow the "immortal" body over bulwarks to save the good ship from sinking.

(d) We are favored, moreover, not only with revealed information about the inhabitants of that elusive country, but also with a blurred summary sketch of its physical geography. Briefly, it is divided into two great regions, heaven and hell. Neither of them, however, has a particle of a claim to be called spiritual.

Its hell was a lake of fire, in which the souls and the bodies of men burned for ever without being consumed. The only revelation here is that of the crassest ignorance as to the nature of the process of burning. This revealed "spiritual" hell is virtually as material as the stones and the mortar with which our houses are built. It is no wonder, therefore, that it has disappeared from the map of the spiritual world of the twentieth century—its "everlasting fires" were altogether too revolting for the more refined and humanised conscience of the last fifty years.

But heaven's title deeds are no sounder than are those of Gehenna. The logic and the reason that would demolish the gates and the bastions of the one would have precisely the same effect upon the thrones and the harps of the other. But, as I have just said, the portals of hell were closed by our emotions and not the hydraulic machinery of our logic. The doors of heaven are left open simply because the visions within are not abhorrent to our nobler feelings and humanity. It was our awakened conscience and not our enlightened reason that put out the "unquenchable fires." Moreover, the heaven now standing is not at all the paradise of revelation, but a delocalised sublimed abstraction of the human intellect—a kind of Nirvana from which the harps, the thrones, and streets of gold have all been dissolved away in the vat of human reason.

We have now traversed the whole domain of human wants and desires—bodily, mental, moral, and speculative—and we have seen that at every plane of his nature the priest answered man's cry for bread by giving him a stone. Man groaned for light, and the priest, in the name of his gods, mocked him with a "will-o'-the-wisp." In brief, we may say that it is impossible to conceive of a being in a more direful need of a revelation than man; nor is it possible to imagine one who has been more tragically left without any.

It is no wonder, then, that divines and apologists, on realising that revelation is a house built on the quicksands, and is in danger of collapsing when assaulted by the batteries of reason, take alarm, and seek to wall it up and prevent it from coming down with a crash.

The most ingenious, and probably the most disingenuous also, of the sophistic buttresses reared to prop up its tottering walls is that known as "progressive revelation." It is an attempt to save the situation by admitting the fact that it is no revelation at all. In effect it says, "I admit that all you say is true; that man has slowly, laboriously, and tragically acquired by his own efforts every particle of the knowledge and wisdom he now possesses; I know, moreover, that he succeeded only after infinite stumblings, failures, and mistakes. I admit all that; but let me call it 'revelation.' Then I need not close my shop or change the name and sign of my establishment."

When, however, the speaker is fully conscious of the sophistic nature of the quibble, it is a modern form of the ancient ruse of "pious fraud" so much practised by the early Christian Fathers. For in itself it is a piece of imbecility on a par with contending that the image in a mirror is not a reflection due to the rays of light falling on it, but a supernatural revelation manifesting itself behind the glass. Primitive people and savages have always reasoned in that very manner; and it was certainly less irrational of them than it is of modern apologists. For surely, if a God of all wisdom and goodness desired to reveal himself to ignorant, credulous, and helpless humanity, he would not do so by means of such frightful and repulsive caricatures of himself as we have in sacred books and revealed religions. Nor would he falsely picture the workings of his universe and represent the world as if it were a stage for magicians to perform their antics upon.

It is a strange use of language to call what you have found out yourself with difficulty a revelation. If anyone used similar reasoning in the ordinary affairs of life he would be considered dishonest or demented. Let us take an example. Suppose a person was bent upon solving a new problem—one of a practical kind, say, in industrial chemistry. For months, and perhaps for years, he devotes all his time and energy to an apparently fruitless task—reasoning and experimenting, experimenting and reasoning; often thinking he has found a clue, and eagerly following it up, until repeated trials prove it to be a "will-o'-the-wisp." But, nothing daunted, he tries and tries again, until, after scores of failures, he at last succeeds; and away he runs to a friend and shouts, "Eureka, eureka! I have found it, I have found it." "What have you found?" coolly queries the friend. "What a question from you, who know all about my long, painful struggle. Why, it is how to manufacture synthetically that new dye you know I was working for years and years upon, and which you also know has cost me the use of my arm and of my eye, and which has undermined my health." "Oh, you say you have found it," says the friend. "My dear fellow, how blind and conceited you are; you did not find it—it was only 'progressively revealed' to you, that is all!" Such is literally the story of humanity in respect to all it knows, and such are the delightful methods of reasoning espoused by the advocates of revelation. Revelation has invariably belied its professed function. It professes to bring us light, but what it has invariably done is to intercept the light. From first to last, religion has enclosed our one source of light—the human intellect—in a vitreous globe of superstition, which, by being so opaque and colored, has always dimmed, deflected, or tinted the few rays that have struggled through it from time to time. In all the intellectual effulgence which now illumines our civilised world, there is not one single ray but which can be traced directly to its one fountain head in intelligence and the reason of man.

A Daydream.

DREAMS are quite unknown to me during the hours of sleep. Perhaps that is why my mind, thinking it misses something, takes temporary leave of absence when the circumstances are suitable enough and goes wandering away along paths that, often, have neither beginning nor end. My book slips to my knees; my pipe goes out; and, hey, presto! I become a dweller in dreamland.

In this manner of transit I discovered myself in a room. Although but a second before I had been sitting under the budding branches of a lithe young beech, and watching the swinging fingers form themselves into fantastic, kaleidoscopic pictures, I was not in the least surprised at my change of environment. Although but the quiver of an eyelid before, so to say, I had been breathing deep breaths of an atmosphere scented by lily perfume, I experienced no astonishment at the "closeness" of the air in which I now found myself. It seemed natural enough.

The room was destitute of any furniture. In the centre, directly under a stained-glass dome, stood a solid plinth-like mass of cunningly carved wood, similar in appearance to the resting-places of the sculptured likenesses of departed murderers and other heroic men. Upon its cushioned surface lay a woman, clothed in a long, loose white robe, her dark brown hair lying thickly around her shoulders. The face was turned from me; but the beauty and grace and delicacy that seemed to be exhaled from the figure were so exquisite that I marvelled at my own calmness, at my lack of appreciation.

The walls of the room were of mahogany panels, every alternate panel forming a frame for a picture, painted in vivid colors, each representative of a certain phase of woman's life. These pictures were suggestive rather than deliberately instructive. They might embody a particular mental attitude to certain questions, leaving the onlooker to agree or disagree as he felt inclined. To me they presented, in pictorial art, many thoughts that had long been hung in the gallery of my mind. Astonishment at seeing them realised in form and color did not dawn upon me. This, too, seemed natural enough.

Directly opposite me, in the dark frame that gave it such peculiar effect, I saw a picture of a kitchen, flooded with brilliant sunrays. The mother had sunk listless, weary, into an old leather armchair; and six children were playing pranks with the results of her morning's work. Their mother, too tired to trouble, seemed to be dreaming. Before her eyes was a visioned bookcase. Her whole desire yearned for it. But the front of the case was of glass fitted into the sides: there was no entrance to the books.

Children, I thought, may be the crystallisation of a woman's duty; but, if they mean more pain and more unhappiness for her than pleasure, then the fewer children the better. There are greater duties than that of bringing children into the world; and one of them is the recognition by man that happiness is as much a woman's right as his.

Alongside, perhaps meant to precede the other, the panel showed a woman in the midst of a mental conflict. One hand shaded her brow and eyes; but not so much as to hide that sad beseechment, so full of knowledge of its feebleness, that makes the strong heart quail, and feel criminal. With the other hand she gently pushed away from her a child. Before her, in the dimness of the picture, stood the outline of a man. His eyes were observant, interested even; but a hateful smile of superiority hung around his lips. I could nearly hear him sarcastically saying, "Instinct, madam, the strongest instinct we, you and I, possess! And you fight, or would fight, against it. H'm!"

On the other side was depicted a moonlight scene. Into a dense forest of fir twined a pathway. My eyes seemed to follow it in its pilgrimage among the trees. No sensitive mind could have resisted its loveliness, you would have thought; and yet, one of the two girls who stood in the foreground was afraid. Notwithstanding the other's courage, she would not go. She was afraid.

Another picture showed a thin, white-faced woman, sick unto death, gazing with startled eyes at an infant lying upon her breast. In the little hands was a wreath with the inscription, "From Baby."

All the panel pictures facing me dealt with the question of sex, as if the artist had considered that here, if anywhere, could be found the key to the problems of the rights and wrongs of women.

I had begun to ask myself if a woman's intellect, her mind, were not of more importance than her genitive powers, if her desires should not constitute duties to man, where this was concerned, when the figure on the plinth moved uneasily, and then struggled. Her breath soon came in convulsive gasps, and her whole body seemed to be toiling against some form of restriction. Her robe opened at the foot; and I noticed her limbs were tied with soft, silky material to the couch.

She turned her head towards me, revealing a face whose features were set in determination. As the struggle became more and more intensified, her robe became more and more disarrayed, and I saw she was bound from feet to neck by innumerable strands of the same silky material.

Unaccountably, I was utterly unable to help; nor did she seem to wish assistance; she did not seem to be aware of my presence.

The face hardened without relinquishment of its beauty. The muscles worked nervously, but without cessation. "Freedom or Death," the closely pressed, motionless lips had carved upon them. In the eyes shone the look that quails at nought, the look that puts the cowards of weakness to flight.

One by one the silken bands were all rent, and the robe torn off. She leapt from her resting-place of centuries, and quickly she turned round, searching for a door. There was none. A window? None, but the stained glass roof, with its scriptural representations of woman's duties.

Strength, courage, hope, dissolved in the tears of disappointment; and she leaned against the wall, burying her face in her arms. Her labors had been expended in vain. She had toiled for freedom, and its breath was poisoned. This was her reward.

My eyes searched the room for an opening: I felt my first strong twinge of human sympathy; and I observed that, on one side of the room, there were four alternate panels blank. I walked up to them, and discovered that they had, at one time, been pictures; but, obviously, a process of erasion had taken place.

"Blank picture the first," I said to myself, "woman's natural periodic weakness, entailing cave-residence while man hunted. Blank the second, woman the keeper of the hut of the gods, while man eased his mind from them while hunting, etc. Blank the third, phallus worship by the woman, while the men battled with and killed each other. Blank the fourth, an assemblage of gods, from a chunk of clay smeared with blood to the interrogation mark of the modern Christian; a bevy of priests, from the incarnardined devil of the dead days, who was on familiar terms with the awesome occupant of the holy hut, to the modern portly and saintly collector of pew-rents; and a crowd of women in the foreground."

Suddenly there was a harsh grating noise; and blank panel the third moved up. The woman eagerly darted to the aperture; but before reaching the apparent way of escape there issued from it a black, loathesome snake, that drew itself slowly over the polished floor. Repulsive, with eyes glinting greenly even in the subdued light of the room, its long sinuous, detestable body covered with a moisture that impregnated the close air with mustiness, like mildew, the creature awakened within me all my hatred of the ugly. My human emotions were thoroughly aroused at last.

And the woman? Did she feel as I felt? She was bending down caressing the ugly brute, and whispering to it. Then she stood erect, while it slowly circled her limbs, her waist, her shoulders, imprisoning her in its folds. She stroked the ugly hooded head nestling on her bosom. She spoke lovingly to it; and I shivered.

That was all. I picked up my book; inhaled some big breaths of the fresh, sweetly perfumed air; relit my pipe; and found myself saying silently, "Women still worship two men and a splash of formless masculinity above the bright blue skies. They object to man-made laws, man-made restrictions of many kinds. They are fighting against some of the deepest rooted prejudices of the male mind. If it be not a sex war, it is perilously like it. And yet they still worship these, to them, real men, whose masculine characteristics they attempt to smother in Godism. Let woman continue to bow down even before a dream picture of man, and she will never achieve the freedom for which she longs; for worship means slavery of body and mind. When she shatters that dream picture the snake encircling her mind will uncoil itself, and fall dead. Only then will she be free from the insidiously base influence of that which has, more than anything else, in the past, kept her enslaved—Religion."

Acid Drops.

A correspondent of the Daily Citizen lately put in a plea for the Bishops. He said that they must not be supposed to spend all their salaries upon themselves. They have to keep motor-cars, they have to give subscriptions to this, that, and the other cause. Quite true. But these expenses have to be met by laymen with similar incomes. We all know, without being told, that Bishops cannot spend four, five, or ten thousand a year on eating, drinking, and clothes—even including gaiters and shovel hats. Millionaires cannot spend their money in that way either. The navvy who said he had a bigger belly than the then Duke of Marlborough was not such a fool, after all; he was thinking of actual consumption—the consumption of food—at which game he could beat his lordship hollow. It is not even the luxuries of life that run away with big incomes; it is the conventions of life that do it. In a certain position you are expected to live in a certain way—and "there you are, don't you know."

That correspondent's letter in the Daily Citizen reminds us of a case that came before a Royal Commission some seventy years ago. A parson well known to have fat livings returned his income as £150 a year. Being asked to explain this, he replied that his income was nominally £1,500 a year; but his two livings were far apart, and he was obliged to keep a horse to travel to and fro; then his wife had very delicate health, and was unable to walk much, so she required a carriage and pair; besides, he had a large family, all sons, who went to college and received an expensive education; and by the time he had paid for these and other expenses, he had only £150 a year left for himself! By which method of calculation wealthy men might show a small return to the Income Tax Commissioners. The reverend gentleman, indeed, was not returning his income but his pocket money.

Mrs. Besant had a boy that she was training for "the spiritual leadership of the world." The boy's father, by the aid of the law, took his son back out of Mrs. Besant's hands. What is to become of the spiritual leadership of the world now? Fancy one Hindu parent being able to upset such a great and glorious arrangement. The person really responsible for this unhappy miscarriage is a well-known Theosophist called Leadbeater. Mrs. Besant regards this gentleman as "a man on the threshold of divinity," and he alleges of himself that he stood face to face with "the Supreme Director of Evolution." Mr. Justice Bakewell, however, held that "Mr. Leadbeater was certainly an immoral person, and was highly unfit to be in charge of boys." But the holy men of all religions are so liable to slander!

Some of the newspaper reviewers were annoyed because Sir Hiram Maxim said that missionaries were the greatest liars in the world. But what is one to make of the following. One of the speakers at the annual meeting of the London Missionary Society, the Rev. Edgar Dewstoe, of South China, said that the trouble in China was that the people had no ethics. A prominent Chinese had said to him, "Unless we can get some ethics there would be terrible trouble." This, doubtless, impressed many of those present, for a great number of Christians have so little knowledge of ethics that they seriously believe that morality is a Christian invention and a Christian monopoly. But imagine talking of a nation which contains millions upon millions of people who are Confucians and Buddhists as having no ethics! There is no need to give Mr. Dewstoe's statement a name—everyone will be able to give it a suitable one. The surprising thing is that anyone should have the impertinence to make such a statement, or that others should be found ignorant enough to believe it.

Mr. R. J. Campbell has been complaining that the "soul of man" is being crushed by Materialism. Millions of people exhibit no interest in anything "outside material categories." They are being whirled along by the momentum of their Materialism, and there is no prospect of a slackening of the pace—with much more to the same end. All of which is true enough, although it is intended to convey a lesson that is the very opposite of the truth. The moral intended to be drawn is that this state of things is due to neglect of Christianity, and that a cure is to be found in a return to its teachings. And that is simply untrue. Historically, Christianity has not only shown itself powerless to arrest the growth of ethical Materialism, it has always flourished most where Christianity is strongest. There are no two countries in the world where the craze for material possessions is greater, or the worship of mere wealth stronger, than in England and America—two countries which ostentatiously flaunt their Christianity in the face of the world. England and America set the pace of the world in money-making, and measure other nations' greatness by this single test. England and America are mainly instrumental in impressing upon other nations the need for economic and industrial development. They decline to even recognise them as civilised until they have done this—this and one other thing.

The other thing is the power to wield brute force over a physically weaker people. It is a mere truism to say that the peace of the world is threatened by Christian nations only. Non-Christian nations—Turkey, China, Japan—are powerless to do this, even were they so inclined. Moreover, these nations are being forced into courses of military development in order to protect themselves against the brigandage of Christian nations. Japan has already made itself a military Power. China will be forced to follow suit. And recent events in the Near East have shown Turkey that if it is to live as a nation it must be strong enough, in a military sense, to hold Christian cupidity at bay. In this country it is Christians that laugh loudest when it is said that reason and not rifles should settle differences of opinion between nations. They say that other nations—Christian, like themselves—will be guided solely by considerations of material self-interest. If we have anything worth taking, they will take it, given the strength and opportunity. Other nations say the same of us. Money and muscle are the two things which, on their own confessions, the Christian nations of the world are ready to respect.

Mr. Dan Crawford is an African missionary, and has just published a book on Central Africa, entitled Thinking Black. In it occurs the following passage:—

> "Christ's cause in Africa is often wounded in the house of its friends, but never so grievously or gratuitously as when a missionary of the Cross beats all his fellow-Europeans in the matter of first-class get-up. The best houses, best furniture, best eating, all at 'The Mission.'"

Other missionaries express their resentment in long and angry letters to religious journals.

During an amateur performance at a provincial theatre recently the public was absent from the gallery. A young lady sitting in the stalls remarked, "No gods! Even the theatres are atheistic, nowadays."

A doctor has discovered no less than 9,000 microbes on a razor taken from a barber's shop. We commend this to the attention of the Christian Evidence Society—or what is left of it—as a fine illustration of the Design Argument.

The New York papers tell us that a Harlem firm is making one of the largest candles, which will be lighted to the memory of the late Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan. The candle, which is sixteen feet in height, cost £300, and will burn for nine years. It would burn a lot quicker at Mr. Morgan's present address.

Many months ago that peripatetic parson, the Rev. F. B. Meyer, assured a Newcastle audience that we were on the eve of the mightiest revival of religion ever witnessed, that very soon churches and chapels would be thronged with people convicted of sin and crying out for salvation, and that the Gospel nets would be so crowded with human fish that they would actually burst. The reverend gentleman knew that the glorious time was close at hand; but after nearly six months the predicted revival is apparently as far off as ever. The Baptist Union has just reported a decrease of 2 231 members and of 4 924 Sunday-school scholars during 1912. Even the Presbyterian Church of England, for the first time in its history, mourns the loss of 65 members and 2,252 Sunday-school scholars. A revival of religion is doubtless a possibility, but at present it is anything but a probability. At any rate, Mr. Meyer is certainly a false prophet.

Is there any greater simpleton in England than the Bishop of London? What better-informed and more sensible members of his profession keep as quiet about as possible he delights in pressing upon public attention. All the exploded blunders and follies of the Bible and Christianity he rejoices in holding up to public derision. The poor creature doesn't recognise what a spectacle he is making of himself. He doesn't see, for instance, that the doctrine of Providence—the honest doctrine of Providence—the doctrine of special Providence—is already on its last legs. Clergymen with brains in their heads fight shy of it; they leave it, as far as they are concerned, on its sick bed; but the Bishop of London takes it out for a walk, stands it up on its tottering legs, dresses its shrunken figure in its ample old clothes, and is positively proud to see himself parading arm in arm with it in places of public resort. On the evening of the day when the Suffragette bomb was cut short in its destructive career in St. Paul's Cathedral, Dr. Ingram was the chief performer at a Church Army service there, and he took the opportunity (of course!) of putting Providence in a corner before the whole world. This is how he was reported in the Daily News:—

> "It would be sheer want of gratitude, he said, if they did not first stand up and utter their thanks to God for taking care of his own Cathedral—(loud cries of 'Amen')—against the machinations of the miscreant who tried to wreck it.
> "We say in our way, in the human way, that it was only an accident that the lever was turned by mistake to the right instead of to the left, or the chancel would have been a wreck to-day, and therefore we know that those who set themselves to do the Devil's work often even cannot do that right.
> "But we ought to look away from that, to leave that to the judgment of God, and render thanks to him for his overruling Providence in saving the Cathedral and preventing, perhaps, many innocent lives being sacrificed.
> "Band, strike up, 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow,' said the Bishop in conclusion. Without giving the band time to respond to the Bishop's call, the men and women comprising the huge congregation sprang to their feet and sang the Doxology with overwhelming depth of feeling."

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow." Indeed! Then who is responsible for the "flow" of events that are not "blessings"? In answering this question Dr. Ingram would in all probability introduce that comical figure Old Nick. What else could he do? In his theology it is a case of pull Devil pull baker—with "God" as the baker; with the Devil mostly getting the "pull" his way, and "God" getting only an occasional advantage. "God" must have exerted himself in a very special manner to overmatch the Devil by saving "his own Cathedral." Other churches have been burnt down without any successful providential interference. The Suffragettes managed to burn down a London church only a few days before their abortive attack on St. Paul's. "God" could not or did not prevent that conflagration. Why should he save one church and not another? Are they not all "his own" houses? The only answer we can see is that "God" saved St. Paul's by way of compliment to that great and good man, the Bishop of London. In which case we suppose we ought to congratulate the Bishop. But we would rather not say all that this would justify us in saying of his "God."

"Many innocent lives" were saved by the act of Providence at St. Paul's. It must be equally true that "many innocent lives" are lost elsewhere by the want of an act of Providence. Is it conceivable that any "God," not fit for a prison or a lunatic asylum, would follow such a partial and cruel policy? And if such a Being is entitled to an overwhelming hymn of "praise" and "thanks," is he not also entitled to a still more overwhelming hymn of dispraise and denunciation? If saving a few is put to his credit, should not the other side of his moral account be relatively increased when he leaves crowds to perish?

God does everything or nothing. There is no escape from that logic. And if the Bishop of London cannot see it, it only shows what a shallow and feeble intelligence may sit on an episcopal bench. But that is not fresh news.

A tussle between two tiny children at Gillingham, Kent, led to one being scalded to death in a bowl of hot water. Apparently, Providence was too busy watching over the Bishop of London's joss-house to trouble about the fate of helpless "little ones" of the human race.

The Victoria Institute is a favorite place for scientific men to talk nonsense in the name of science. Professor Sims Woodhead cheered a religious audience there the other day by remarking, "My experience leads me to think that however life came into the world, however life and matter came to be associated, there must be a great Cause, a great Ruler, a great Regulator." Capital letters turn nonsense into sense for many people, but others recognise it as nonsense all the same. Professor Woodhead's "experience" cannot possibly give him any greater right to dogmatise on the matter than the experience of the man in the street. He might as reasonably talk about his experience of what exists on the other side of the moon. Lord Halsbury, who presided, summed up the matter very well by saying, "I am not certain that I understood the subject before I came here, and I am not certain that I am in a better position now." Quite a compliment to the lecturer.

The sex of the third member of the trinity has always been a matter of doubt. There was no trouble about God the Father and God the Son. They were males, sure enough. But what of the Holy Ghost? The matter has been cleared up by the Rev. David Smith. He preached the other day to a City Temple audience on "The Motherhood of God." In the course of his sermon, he said that the motherhood of God "provided the explanation of the Trinity." So the Holy Ghost is, after all, a woman. Father, Mother, and Son; the family is complete. May we also take this as a vindication of the character of Mary.

A venerable "chestnut" is doing the grand tour in clerical circles. Some time ago a Bishop laid claim to it. He was asked (so he said) whether Jonah was really swallowed by the whale, and he replied that he would put the question to Jonah when he met him in heaven. "But suppose you don't find him in heaven?" the sceptic queried. "Why then," the Bishop retorted, "you can ask him yourself." This ancient story, and all its variants, probably grew out of the words passed between Hamlet and his uncle over the dead body of Polonius. According to the Rev. A. J. Waldron, as reported in one of Monday's newspapers, the incident only happened the other day, and the credit of the witticism belonged to a Salvation lass. We should not be surprised if Mr. Waldron eventually takes the credit of it himself. We know of no one with a more imaginative memory.

Rev. Canon Joyce says that "the mere scientist found nothing in miracle but a fact which he found it impossible to fit into his scheme of cause and effect." The "mere scientist" is in no such predicament. The miracles of religion fit well enough into his scheme of things, and he is at no loss to explain them. It is not at all a question of harmonising them with the world of physical phenomena, but simply one of explaining the psychological conditions that originate them. The question of miracle is wholly a psychological one. As psychological facts every scientist accepts miracles; as physical occurrences they are so palpably ridiculous that none but a congress of clergymen would waste time over their discussion. And their acceptance as psychological facts only means that in its immature state the mind sees supernatural happenings where none really exist.

That after death ghosts of people try to play tennis, if they were interested in it during life, was the assertion made recently by Mr. Henry Hotchner, a Yankee Theosophist, at the headquarters of the Theosophical Society. If people cannot play tennis properly after two lifetimes of preparation, they had better give the game up.

Is Truth accurate in stating that children in Portugal going to school are compelled to wear a badge with "No God; no religion"? Our contemporary is a very alert paper, but we believe somebody has been pulling its leg on this occasion.

A well-advertised meeting of the Todmorden Branch of the British and Foreign Bible Society consisted of the chairman, the speaker, a reporter, and one other person. The chairman took the chair, the speaker delivered the address, the one other person formed the audience, and the reporter did his share of the business with professional equanimity. We congratulate the lecturer. He is a hero. Jesus Christ said that where two or three were gathered together he was in the midst of them to bless them, but he never said he would preach to them. The lecturer sighed his sorrow at such a small attendance, but then "the attendance at meetings at Todmorden had never been good."

Rev. Dr. Cairns says it is a fact that "in Japan the educated classes are already, in the main, Agnostic. The kind of thing that has been happening in Japan is the kind of thing that is going to happen in China, unless the Christian Church intervenes." But how is the Christian Church going to intervene in China? And what prevented their succeeding in Japan? There are plenty of missionaries among the Japanese. The Government places no obstacle to their progress. They have a fair field, and the result is, as Dr. Cairns confesses, the educated classes are mainly Freethinkers. What different result does any person of judgment expect in China? The Chinese are not less intelligent than the Japanese, and is it likely that educated Chinamen are going to accept a creed that educated Japanese have rejected? The Chinese will act exactly as the Japanese have acted—they will take from the Western world anything it has to offer in the shape of scientific knowledge, and hand back its superstitions with a polite reminder that they have as much of that kind of article, home-made, as they need.

Lord Mayors talk a lot of nonsense in the course of a year. The Lord Mayor of London, the other day, speaking as chairman at a meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association, Tottenham-court-road, said that "he noticed that no less than twenty-one nationalities were represented at their tea-table one Sunday afternoon. Their work was, therefore, Imperial in character." We did not know that Imperialism meant the co-operation of twenty different nationalities. But one lives and learns.

Those clergymen who are always girding at science would do well to ponder some of the facts given in Sir E. Ray Lankester's recent book, Science from an Easy Chair. It is stated that science has reduced the death-rate of our great cities in fifty years by more than one-third. It has also conquered small-pox, typhus, and yellow fever, and has also reduced the deaths under operations from 1 in 3 to 1 in 30.

The Nonconformist Churches, according to Dr. Clifford, were never richer than they are now. In this respect the fancy religionists pay the Government theologians the sincere flattery of imitation.

In a recent literary supplement of the Times appeared a malicious attack on Auguste Comte, in which that great man was accused of very many shortcomings. No one will attack or defend the memory of the Times' scribe half a century after his death.

An illiterate East London shopkeeper has a notice in his window, "Competition deified." This is not the only place where "God" and "Mammon" are interchangeable terms.

A ghost has been seen at a house at Whitehead's-grove, Chelsea. According to a person in the house, it appeared like a dark face and neck hanging from the ceiling. Perhaps it was a cherub soiled with the London smoke.

The Kaiser's son seems to be as impulsive as his royal papa. In his book, Germany in Arms, just published, he asks the German people to give their lives joyfully for the Fatherland, "though the world be full of devils." We thought it was the function of the Black Army to fight "devils"; real soldiers never waste their time attacking phantoms.

The word "Atheist" seems to act on some intellectual innocents much as a red rag does on a bull. Recently, the Bishop of Peterborough, preaching at Westminster Abbey, referred to "Atheistic Socialism," and Mr. Keir Hardie replied in an open letter, published in the Labor Leader, saying that the system of society upheld by the Bishop was "atheistic and unchristian, and an outrage upon the teachings of Jesus." Real Atheists need not worry about simple opponents whose whose only idea of the "retort discourteous" is to say, "You're another!"

The Rev. R. W. Thompson, M.A., B.D., has undertaken, in the columns of the British Congregationalist, the task of guiding doubting minds into a state of religious certainty. In the issue for May 8, a correspondent declares that he has never read in a book nor "heard in any sermon a convincing statement of the necessity of the death of our Lord as atonement for the sins of the race." Mr. Thompson expresses his great desire to help this anxious inquirer; but the assistance he actually offers is of a most extraordinary character. "Sin," he says, "is personal self-assertion as against God." This "personal self-assertion" on man's part is offensive to God, and produces a reaction in him. This reaction, however, God wants to check, and in checking it he repudiates himself. Now, that is what God did in the death of his son—check his reaction against sin, repudiate himself, in the most dramatic manner possible. Such is the atonement, according to this man of God; and we are not at all surprised that thoughtful people cannot believe in it. A God who repudiates himself, and in doing so murders his only begotten Son, richly deserves to be utterly and finally repudiated by all sensible, self-respecting people. Mr. Thompson's theology is the silliest we have ever come across.

The Nottingham District of the Primitive Methodist Church, with its 264 churches, 59 ministers, 938 local preachers, and 41,000 members, was obliged to report, at its annual Synod held a fortnight ago, a loss during last year of 900 members. This is one more proof, added to innumerable others, that Christianity is visibly passing, in spite of the frantic declaration made by its representatives that it is really coming. It is a method of coming that we thoroughly enjoy.

Sixty-nine nationalities were represented in the 42,000 visitors, who, according to a return made recently, visited Shakespeare's birthplace last year. Gentle Shakespeare's influence is more humane than that of "Gentle" Jesus, for soldiers are not required to keep the visitors at Stratford from murdering each other, as is the case in the Holy Land.

Rev. J. F. Roberts, of Manchester, has discovered that "the years that follow marriage are the happy hunting-ground of the spirit of indifference." In other words, a man thinks more of a living Englishwoman than of a dead Jew; which, after all, seems natural.

After a long appeal for funds, the editor of a Christian paper, having to insert a two-line fill-up at the bottom of the column, worked in the following:—"If we got everything we prayed for, even God himself couldn't satisfy us."

"Bill to choke the Smoke Fiend," read a headline in a daily paper recently. This did not relate to Satan, who has been called the fourth person of the Deity, but to the reduction of smoke from fires and furnaces.

A tract, written by a person innocent of humor, bears the title, "Shall I go to Hell?" If an answer is wanted, we give it cheerfully in the affirmative.

ANECDOTE.

My little nephew, aged four, was saying his prayers, kneeling on his bed, and resting against his nurse. Suddenly he stopped.

Nurse: "Go on, dear."

Small Boy: "I can't."

Nurse: "Go on, dear."

Small Boy: "I'm switched off, Dod's talking to someone else."

Naturally, nurse's breath was somewhat taken away, and she did not know what to answer, when suddenly reassurance came from the small boy. "It is all right. We are connected again now," and he began again.—Mrs. Alec Tweedie, "Thirteen Years of a Busy Woman's Life."

"Don't you threaten me, or I'll have the law of you," answered the old man....." And it don't make it no better, but a damned sight worse, that you do it in the name of the Lord. You'm a lot too fond of dragging in the name of the Lord, and you may find some day that your fine friendship with the Lord be all o' one side, and He ain't got so much use for you as you fancy."—Eden Phillpotts "Widecombe Fair."

Mr. Foote's Engagements

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £130 7s. 5d. Received since:—R. Stirton and Friends (Dundee), £1 5s.; J. Brodie, 3s.; "Henchman Mac," 10s.; J. G. Dobson, 5s.; "Ernest," 5s.; D. Mapp, 2s. 6d. Per F. Rose (Bloemfontein): A. S., 10s.; L. L., 5s.

INGERSOLLITE.—We agree with you. The "Higher Critics" are very well in their way, but they only go safely, leisurely, and learnedly over the ground that Freethought pioneer critics traversed more or less hastily in the midst of grave dangers and the exacting labors of a popular propaganda, and with no means of livelihood except what they could "make" as they went along. There is nothing new in smashing the authority of the Christ passages in Josephus and Tacitus, for instance. The former, at any rate, was settled by the semi-orthodox Lardner in the eighteenth century, and the latter was done—not tediously, but briefly and effectively—by Robert Taylor in 1828, when he wrote his Diegesis in Oakham Gaol, where he was suffering imprisonment for "blasphemy." Dr. W. B. Smith's is a very able book, but the really original work of both Old and New Testament criticism was, in its main features, done long ago.

E. RAGGETT.—The idea of Freethinker postcards has been mooted before. We may take it up one of these days. Pleased to hear of your letters in the local press. They cannot fail to do good if they bring replies and lead to public controversy.

J. HEWITT.—See paragraph. Thanks. It was outside our province to say anything about the reporter.

C. F. BUDGE.—The Herald and the Freethinker don't cover the same ground. What good would be done if they did amalgamate, according to your suggestion?

J. H. LANGFORD.—We don't suppose you will get any reply from the Bishop of London. We had already dealt with the matter in "Acid Drops."

J. E. LING (Canada).—Pleased to hear from you, and hope to hear again.

AVON DALE.—We are not surprised at the course of events. But don't be weak enough to let yourself be made miserable by bigots.

A. H. TABRUM.—We have printed "Meredith's last letter" to us. You can print yours—if it concerns anything of importance. You say it was not written by Meredith himself, but for him. Ours was written entirely by himself, letter, address, and all; and it showed him to be a supporter of the Freethinker. What does your letter show? Or does it show anything?

HELENA GUNNING.—We don't think we confused you with your sister. We are glad there are two of you. So you have had other letters from vulgar Christians! Well, it is only what you might expect. Mr. Foote is recovering his old form, but is not quite up to concert pitch yet.

R. STIRTON.—Acknowledged, as you will see. In such matters we take the will for the deed, although for the sake of your friends we wish their desire could have been realised. It is the nature of a journal like the Freethinker to set up relations of a personal kind between the editor and his readers. This does not arise in the course of an ordinary newspaper, where the relations are of a more commercial character. But the Freethinker is not run for commercial purposes, and does not appeal to the commercial instinct in its readers.

W. W. HANCOCK.—We were under the impression that people had ceased to trouble about this particular person. The only distinguished thing about him is the name, and that was made so by his Atheist brother. Certainly Mr. Foote holds that a man who believes government to be an evil has a right to be heard. And all reasonable people would take up the same attitude as Mr. Foote. But to claim the right for an opinion to be heard is not in itself an expression of either approval or disapproval of the opinion held.

R. STEVENSON.—Your letter is interesting, but not surprising. Mr. J. M. Robertson's Atheism is, we think, too well known to need any verification. He has taken no pains to hide it, and you should refer your friend to Mr. Robertson himself.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Personal.

I AM sorry that my voice failed me on Sunday night. I knew there was a risk of that, but I had determined to go through as far as possible with my duty. Some men might have been deterred by personal considerations; by the feeling, for instance, that no one should see them in public except in their best form. But I am not built in that way, and I hope I have done enough platform work in my time to sustain any reputation I might desire in that direction. Anyhow, I care very little for "reputation"; I have always tried to do my duty first and last. The cause is great—the cause is all; what are you or I in comparison? Had I cared for anything but the cause I should have reserved all my energy, such as it was after my recent severe illness, for the evening meeting. I could have got through that all right with perfect éclat, and my mere selfhood would have been gratified. But my presence was indispensable in the presidential chair at the Conference. I saw special reasons for that, though I don't want to discuss them now. So I took both Conference meetings, lasting altogether nearly five hours; and as I was not only Chairman of the Conference, but also President of the National Secular Society, I had a great deal of quite unavoidable talking to do. The result was that I was unable to finish the speech I meant to give as Chairman of the Queen's Hall evening public meeting,—which, by the way, was worth seeing. I sat for two hours listening to my colleagues, and enjoying their speeches, for I am happy to say they were all in their best forms. I arrived home at a quarter to twelve, I left home at nine in the morning; I had been more or less on the stretch all the time; and those who know what such work is will also know that it was a pretty good record for a man who had so recently been in the doctor's hands, with only strength enough left to hope for the best.

My friends need not be alarmed. I am going on all right. Sunday's work did me no harm. I think it rather did me good. And my throat is in really good condition again.

But I am not going to the Freethinker office to-day (Tuesday). Mr. Cohen is still there, doing the official part of the work for me, and I have to thank him once more.

G. W. FOOTE.

Sugar Plums.

With the one great drawback of the President's ill-health, everything went off quite satisfactorily at the Annual Conference last Sunday. Mr. Foote took the chair at both the business meetings and again at the evening meeting in the Queen's Hall, but it was quite plain that his doing so involved no small amount of courage and resolution. As readers of the Freethinker are aware, his illness has been a severe one, and to spend some seven hours in the chair in the course of a single day is not at all an easy task. If anything can compensate for the strain, we feel sure it will be the warm feeling of personal attachment displayed by those present. Mr. Foote's re-election to the Presidency was, in one sense, a mere formality. It was more in the nature of a vote of confidence in one who has steered the party well for so long and often over some very troubled waters.

The Conference Agenda gave rise to a deal of animated and interesting discussion, as was anticipated. But Freethinkers know at least how to differ, and a difference of opinion on certain motions left those present none the less united on the Society's work. One resolution, carried with a slight and unimportant verbal alteration, arranged for the institution of a Bradlaugh Sunday, and it has since been suggested that the Sunday nearest to Bradlaugh's birthday would be the most suitable. If that suggestion is adopted by the Executive, the date this year would be September 28. Amongst the provincial members present, apart from delegates, we noticed Mr. S. M. Peacock (South Shields), Mrs. Bolt and Miss Underwood (Birmingham), Messrs. W.

Dodd and J. Williams (Cannock), Mr. J. Ross and daughter (Liverpool), and Mr. and Mrs. Sanders (Manchester). The absence of Mr. Johnson, a very welcome and familiar figure on these occasions, was noticed and commented on, but he had written a letter expressing his sorrow at an enforced absence owing to ill-health. He appeared, however, to have bequeathed the mantle of his amiability to another well-known Manchester Freethinker who was present, Mr. W. Bailey.

The Annual Report of the Society, together with an account of the Conference proceedings will appear next week. We had arranged for a report of the evening speeches at the Queen's Hall meeting this week, but the transcription of the shorthand reporter's notes has not reached us in time for publication; in fact, it has not reached us at all. We do not know who is to blame—the reporter or the postal authorities. All we know is that it is not to hand. So, for the present, we content ourselves with saying that the public meeting was a good one from all points of view. The Hall was well filled, and the speeches of the President, Miss Kough, and Messrs. Cohen, Heaford, Moss, Davies, and Lloyd were thoroughly enjoyed by the audience—that is, if close attention and unstinted applause are safe guides.

On Monday the delegates—divided into two parties, one under the guidance of Mr. Victor Roger, the other in the care of Mr. Harry Jones—spent the day visiting places of interest in and around London. Both gentlemen proved themselves very efficient guides, and the delegates fully appreciated their freely given services. Unfortunately, some places of interest were closed owing to Suffragette activity, but more than enough remained open. In the evening the two parties gathered at the Bay Malton Hotel, with Miss Vance and a number of the members of the Executive. Singing, conversation, and a little dancing filled up the remainder of the evening until such time as some delegates left to catch their trains home and others returned to their respective hotels. The only drawback to the day was the weather—and for that, of course, the National Secular Society disclaims all responsibility.

The long-talked-of new Bill for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws has been introduced in the House of Commons, and is by the usual order of the House printed—at a cost of one halfpenny to the purchaser. Mr. Foote will give it special attention in our next issue.

Why Be Good? is the title given by the late Dr. E. B. Foote, of New York, to a piece of writing by Mr. G. W. Foote, which came from his pen some thirty-five years ago. Under this popular title it started the publications of the American Freethought Society, of which Dr. Foote was treasurer. Two issues of this tract have been printed in three years, we think; one issue comprising 30,000 copies. The Truthseeker does not state the number of the other issue.

"Mr. Foote may be gratified to know," the Truthseeker says, "that a half-column selection from his English Review article on 'George Meredith: Freethinker,' has appeared in the Evening Sun, one of New York's stablest and most widely circulated newspapers."

One of our French subscribers, living at Paris, sending a new year's subscription, writes: "I enjoy its [the Freethinker's] courageous and clever articles immensely. They contain many interesting ideas and good documents which may be of great use in debating religious questions, and strong weapons for the struggle against the bigotry, the falsehood, the hypocrisy and the bad faith of all religions, and especially of the Christian one."

The General Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, reports a very successful meeting on Wednesday last at Wood Green. A new secretary, Mr. G. Wraight, 109 Kimberley-road, Edmonton, was appointed. The young bloods of the Edmonton Branch have joined hands with the Wood Green Branch, and there is every promise of a successful outdoor season. Literature will be on sale at all meetings, and local Freethinkers are invited to join the Branch. Mr. W. Davidson opens the campaign this (Sunday) evening at 7.30.

A CONUNDRUM.

Who is one of the most immoral men in England to-day? The celibate Rector who has a large family living.

Christianity and the Chinese.

"In China, after centuries of missions, the very name of Christianity is detested,—and not without cause, since no small number of aggressions upon China have been made in the name of Western religion. Nearer home, we have made even less progress in our efforts to convert Oriental races. There is not a ghost of a hope for the conversion of the Turks, the Arabs, the Moors, or of any Islamic people; and the memory of the Society for the Conversion of the Jews only serves to create a smile. But, even leaving the Oriental races out of the question, we have no conversions whatever to boast of. Never within modern history has Christendom been able to force the acceptance of its dogmas upon a people able to maintain any hope of national existence. The nominal success of missions among a few savage tribes, or the vanishing Maori races, only proves the rule; and unless we accept the rather sinister declaration of Napoleon that missionaries may have great political usefulness, it is not easy to escape the conclusion that the whole work of the foreign mission societies has been little more than a vast expenditure of energy, time, and money, to no real purpose." —LAFCADIO HEARN, Out of the East, pp. 205-6.

"Moreover, when firmly established, and after having obtained considerable prestige and powers through his influence with the kings and chiefs, by methods the righteousness of which has been very often open to grave suspicion, the missionary then, in accordance with the frailties of human nature, has become intolerant, and instead of looking upon himself, as formerly he did, as a Divine instrument with a Divine mission to advance the native materially, morally, and spiritually, and, seeing and deeming himself superior in every respect to his charge, considers that he is entitled to live a life of ease, at the expense of the native, and of the mission funds in Europe and America, the contributors to the latter being kept in a state of felicitous delusion as to the real conditions by the circulation through the medium of the Religious Press of unverified and highly tinged reports." —FRANK BURNETT, Through Tropic Seas; 1910; p. 163.

THE reformed Chinese Government telegraphed to all the provincial governments in China that April 27 was to be observed as a day of prayer for the nation, and they were also requested to notify the fact to all Christian Churches in their provinces. This message has set the Christian world agog; it already—in its mind's eye—sees China at the foot of the Cross. The Daily Chronicle (April 18), in announcing the news, says "it has given extraordinary satisfaction to the Christian communities" in China. On the following day, under the heading "Christianity in China—Spread of the Faith in Recent Years," we are told that "During the last six years Christianity has made enormous strides in China, more especially among the official and influential classes"; and further it cited the testimony of a prominent missionary official that—

> "The majority of intellectual Chinese incline to-day either towards Christianity or Freethought.....Many members of the newly elected National Assembly, both in the Senate and House of Representatives, are Christians, and there is every indication that Christianity will spread still more rapidly when the new Government has got its educational and social projects into working order."

It is a rosy picture, from the Christian point of view; but let us examine it a little closer. To begin with, we are told that the "intellectual Chinese incline to-day either towards Christianity or Freethought." It would be more accurate to say that the intellectual Chinese who has made acquaintance with Western science generally discards religion altogether. It is, in the great majority of cases, not a choice between Christianity and Freethought, but between the religion he has been trained to believe in and Freethought. Why should an educated Chinese discard his native superstitions to assume worse ones of foreign manufacture?

The truth appears to be that the recognition of the existence of Christian Churches in China thus made by the Chinese Government is merely a move to ingratiate themselves with the Christian Powers until the new Government becomes firmly established.

We had strong doubts, in spite of the statement in the Chronicle to the contrary, as to this day of prayer emanating from the reform party in China, and our doubts were amply justified; for we read in the Daily Chronicle of May 3 a long and impassioned letter from Dr. Sun Yet Sen, the leader of the reformers, denouncing the new Government for "its wicked betrayal of the trust reposed in it," and declaring "the fury of the people is worked up to white heat, and a terrible convulsion appears almost inevitable."

In considering the probability of the Christianisation of China in the immediate future, it should be remembered that twice during its history China has been within measurable distance of Christianisation —once by the Jesuits, under the patronage of the Chinese Emperor, and again during the terrible Taiping rebellion, a Christian movement, which was crushed, after enormous bloodshed, by that good Christian, General Gordon.

With these two movements we shall deal later, for the present merely expressing our belief that the conditions under which these movements arose are not likely to occur again. In fact, the golden opportunity of the Jesuits will never occur again.

Now, let us consider some of the difficulties the missionaries have to contend with in their attempts to Christianise the Chinese.

To begin with, it has been justly observed that—

> "Bringing the beauties of Christianity to the heart of a Chinese is a vastly different matter from bringing the same to, let us say, a South Sea Islander. In the one instance you have a gross and idolatrous savage, who more often than not has a feeling of admiration for a white man, provided he is not a trader; when you have gained that savage's goodwill, half the battle for Christianity has been won. In China you have a people whose settled conviction it is that the ultimate purpose of your presence there is to kill them off and confiscate their property." *

Similarly, Mr. George Lynch remarks:—

> "Chinese civilisation is such a mass of complicated and intricate manners, customs, and prejudices that the average man is really like a bull in an intellectual china shop with regard to them. The most intellectual and cultivated missionaries commit many mistakes in this direction; but a large number of doubtless well-intentioned people, men and women, go out who are neither intellectual nor cultivated. It cannot be too often insisted upon, and must be constantly borne in mind, that the Chinese are not savages. They cannot be dealt with as we would deal with the South African natives. However we may trample on and disregard their feelings in dealing with them politically, as the heavy boot of a soldier might tread down the complicated structure of an ant-hill, yet in missionary work their sentiments must be treated with consideration if any progress is to be made." †

Mr. Lynch points out that native Chinese missionaries, sufficiently educated and intellectual, would be more in touch with native feelings and prejudices. But, as he further observes:—

> "It is a curious commentary on the actual success of missionary labor in China that so few native Chinese have been ordained into the priesthood of any of the various forms of Christianity which for so long have been preached to them. Socially and intellectually it seems to be only the lowest classes of the adult community that, apart from children, become converts to Christianity" (p. 260).

And of the children brought up by the missionaries in the Christian faith, "they have only succeeded in very few cases in educating them up to the standard of fitness for ordination."

But there is one drawback inseparable to the employment of native missionaries, as Dr. Morrison has pointed out, for, after observing that "the Chinaman is as difficult to lead into the true pathway as any Jew," he goes on to point out that:—

> "A native preacher can never be so successful as the foreign missionary. The Chinese listen to him with complacency. 'You eat Jesus's rice and, of course, you speak his words,' they say. The attitude of the Chinese in Tongchuan towards the Christian missionary is one of perfect friendliness towards the missionary, combined with perfect apathy towards his religion. Like any other trader, the missionary has a perfect right to offer his goods, but he must not be surprised, the Chinese thinks, if he finds difficulty in securing a purchaser for his wares as much inferior to the home production as is the foreign barbarian to the subject of the Son of Heaven." ‡

Then, again, the average Chinese convert expects to make a living by his change of faith. Dr. Morrison tells us that at the Inland Mission at Wanhsien, which had been established since 1887, there were no converts, but there were three hopeful "inquirers," whose conversion would be more speedy the more likely they were to obtain employment afterwards. Dr. Morrison says:—

> "They argue in this way; they say, to quote the words used by the Rev. G. L. Mason at the Shanghai Missionary Conference of 1890, 'If the foreign teacher will take care of our bodies, we will do him the favor to seek the salvation of our souls' This question of the employment of converts is one of the chief difficulties of the missionary in China. 'The idea (derived from Buddhism) is universally prevalent in China,' says the Rev. C. W. Mateer, 'that everyone who enters any sect should live by it.....When a Chinaman becomes a Christian he expects to live by his Christianity'" (p. 28).

Then there is the difficulty of making the Chinese realise their need of religion, as we understand it. The Rev. E. J. Hardy—for some years chaplain to our forces at Hong Kong—says:—

> "And in proportion to the need in which China stands of the Gospel is the difficulty of making her comprehend and appreciate its message. To the Greeks of old the sublime self-sacrifice of the Cross of Christ seemed foolishness, and to the Chinese now it has, when first they hear it, the same appearance. To a missionary who had described the death of our Savior, a Chinese remarked, 'That Jesus Christ plenty big fool.'" †

The same writer observes:—

> "These two sayings are current amongst the Chinese: 'Worship the gods as if they came, and if you don't it is all the same.' 'Worship the gods as if they were there, but if you worship not the gods don't care.' People so indifferent to their own religion are not likely to be much prejudiced against another one. On the subject of religion China is perfectly tolerant. Missionaries are not disliked because they preach Christianity, but because they are foreigners or suspected of being political agents. The people often say 'We have no objection to Jesus; doubtless he was good. Make an image of Him and put it by the side of our god's, and we will knock our heads before Him as well as before them. Some advantage may come from so doing'" (p. 313).

The Catholic priest at Chaotong told Dr. Morrison: "Talk to the Chinese of a God, of Heaven or Hell, and they yawn; speak to them of business, and they are all attention" ‡ And, as the Rev. E. J. Hardy further remarks:—

> "That a missionary should come so far for no other reason than to teach a new religion is unintelligible to them. Surely, they think, behind what seems only a harmless craze there lurks a sinister design. To many, a Chinese missionary appears as an advance agent of the gunboat. Missionaries come, territory goes, and it is little wonder if the Cross has come to be thought of as the pioneer of the sword" (p. 315-6).

These are only a few of the difficulties the missionary in China has to contend with. There are many others, as we shall see.

Allan Ramsay and the "Unco' Guid."

WE are now in the days of Stage Guilds and Actors' Church Unions, when special services are held for "the profession," and pastoral letters are sent them; when sermons are preached upon the moral influence of the stage, and the player and cleric may be found tête-a-tête. Yet it was not ever thus. Once upon a time it brought anathema from the Church to all and sundry who followed the calling of player and minstrel. Once upon a time they were denied the rites of the Church and the law of the land. The Church called them "heretics," and banned them even from its precincts; whilst the State classed them with "rogues and vagabonds," and refused them the common law of the land.

And why did all this come to pass in "Once upon a time"? Because the "player" and the "minstrel" taught the people the joys and pleasures of life. "Look you!" cried the player, "I have jokes to humor you, riddles to puzzle you, and antics to amaze you!" "Listen, too," cried the minstrel, "here is a drink-song for the lads, and a love-ditty for the lasses, and a jig-time for both!" And the people laughed, and sang, and danced, and were merry. But men in sober habit, and long visages, watched these gaily attired and merry-faced bohemians, and frowned. "Jokes, antics, songs, jigs. Sancta Maria! Had not the Holy Church forbade such things; had it not enjoined all to prepare themselves in prayer, penance, and humility during this life that they might be worthy for the life to come?"

And in those days of "Once upon a time," the men in sober habit had power in the land, and they said to the men in gay attire, "Upon you and all your class we pronounce anathema!"

Generations were born and died, but the world had moved but slowly. For it seems that even at the beginning of the eighteenth century, which was many centuries after "Once upon a time," there lived a certain Allan Ramsay, poet and bookseller, of Edinburgh, who wondered why such excellent people as "players" and "minstrels" had no place in his city where they might follow their vocation. He determined to build a theatre for such as these; but alas! he had reckoned without the men in sober habit. They, too, like the men in sober habit in "Once upon a time," said such things were contrary to the Church. But first let me tell you something about Allan Ramsay.

Allan Ramsay is, perhaps, the best known among the poets of Scotland after Robert Burns. Yet few are really so conversant with his life-work as with his name. Ramsay lived at a time (1686-1758) when the rule of the men in sober habit was still powerful. Logie Robertson gives us a glimpse of their rule and power in the Edinburgh of Ramsay's day. He says:—

> "There was no theatre or place of amusement anywhere in the town. Dancing was immoral, and an institution of the devil—or at least of Herodias, and was therefore to be put down. We are told of an organised attack with red-hot spits being made upon the door of a room in which dancing was being peacefully practised, to the great terror and danger of the dancers.....The Sunday, or the Sabbath as it was quite appropriately called, was kept in the letter of the Mosaic law. There were pious prowlers to scout the streets and pounce upon breakers of their version of the fourth Command. Their records tell of the rigidity of their righteousness. On one occasion.....they silenced a whistling bird in a cage; on another they confiscated a hot roast to which they were nose-led from the street!"

Into such a world came "the joyous Ramsay," as Sir Walter Scott calls him; but he had little sympathy with this narrow and bigoted rule of the men in sober habit, who are known in the North Countrie as the "Unco' Guid." In truth, he was somewhat of a Freethinker. At least, he avows himself "not tether'd to connection," as he says to James Arbuckle:—

> "Pray tak heed,
> Ye's get a short swatch o' my creed:
> Weel then, I'm nowther Whig nor Tory,
> Nor credit gie to purgatory;
> Neist Anti-Toland, Blunt, or Whiston,
> Know positively, I'm a Christian
> Believing truths an' thinking free,
> Wishing thrawn parties wad agree."

But he had little of Orthodox Christianity in him, as we shall see.

Even in his delightful pastoral, The Gentle Shepherd, we see something of his "thinking free." Here Ramsay makes the "larn'd gentry" reprove the ignorant shepherd folk for their superstitions. To give credence to dreams rouses Pattie's laughter, whilst the good Sir William says of witches, ghosts, and devils,—

> "What silly notions crowd the clouded mind,
> That is, thro' want of education, blind?"

Ramsay was certainly against the Kirk, as he says in his versified epistle to James Clerk:—

> "I have it even within my power
> The very Kirk itself to scower—
> And that you'll say's a brag richt bauld;
> But did'na Lindsay this of auld?
> Sir David's satires helped our nation
> To carry on the Reformation,
> And gave the scarlet dame a box
> Mair snell than all the pelts of Knox."

Although he did not attempt the Kirk-scouring process with any such power as Burns did later, yet he gave a goodly hand in the work. Save for an occasional satire, Ramsay preferred ignoring the Kirk to attacking it, certainly a much safer course in those days.

In a religion of happiness in this life, he asked the people to believe, assuring them that—

> "a sour face
> Is not the truest mark of grace."

This life was the one Ramsay was sure of, and knew most about:—

> "That ill-bred death has nae regard
> To king, or cottar, or a laird;
> As soon a castle he'll attack,
> As wa's o' divots roof'd wi' thack,
> Immediately we'll a' tak flight
> Unto the mirky realms o' night,
> As stories gang, wi' ghaists to roam
> In glomie Pluto's gousty dome."
> —Imit. Hor.

His creed was: "Here and Now":—

> "Leave to the Gods your ilka care;
> If that they think us worth their while,
> They can a rowth o' blessings spare
> Which will our fashious fears beguile.
> For what they hae a mind to do,
> That will they do, shou'd we gang wud
> If they command the storms to blaw,
> Then upo' sight the hailstanes thud.
> Let neist day come as it thinks fit,
> The present minutes' only ours;
> On pleasure let's employ our wit,
> An' laugh at fortune's feckless pow'rs.
> Be sure ye dinna great the grip
> O' ilka joy whan ye are young,
> Before auld age your vitals nip,
> An' lay ye twafold o'er a rung.
> These bennisons, I'm very sure,
> Are o' the God's indulgent grant;
> Then, surly carles, whisht, forbear
> To plague us wi' your whining cant."
> —Imit. Hor.

Ramsay failed to see any sin in "wine, woman, and song":—

> "As lang as reason guides the wheel
> Desires, tho' ardent, are nae crime,
> When they harmoniously keep time;
> But when they sprang o'er reason's fence,
> We smart for 't at our ain expence."
> Epist. to Rob. Yarde.

This is Secularist teaching every line. He also clearly saw how the Church had "hedged" in the joys and pleasures of life for its own purpose:—

> "Lang syne, when love an' innocence
> Were human nature's best defence,
> Ere party jars made lawteth less
> By cloathing 't in a monkish dress."
> —Epist. to Rob. Yarde.

At such revolté verses as these the "unco' guid" were alarmed, and quite a bitter faction arose against Ramsay in the country, and he began to be looked upon as a sort of Antichrist. Yet the Epicurean and Rationalist trend of his verses was not the only offence to the "unco' guid," for it appears that the poet, wanting the people to read and take delight in art and literature as he did, instituted a circulating library, in connection with the bookselling business, which I believe was one of the first of its kind. The "unco' guid" were in rampant fury at this innovation, and openly charged him with "debauching the faculties of the soul with lewd books." But these angry cries and menaces scarcely disturbed Ramsay for a moment; he simply smiled, took up his pen again, and went on

"Sousing sonnets on the lasses, Hounding satires at the asses."

It was fortunate for the poet that he was successful in business, as it enabled him to sustain himself against the onslaughts of his enemies. Only once did they gain a victory over him, and it cost him a considerable part of his fortune. As we remarked at the outset, Ramsay had decided to build a theatre for his city, which he considered "a maist rational diversion." The place was erected, and everything was ready for the opening; but the "unco' guid" had been at work, and the "authorities" refused him a licence. Ramsay fought hard against their ruling, and the Lord President of the Supreme Court was petitioned, but to no avail; the "unco' guid" had triumphed. The poet went sadly back to his book-store to retrieve his fortune, that it might also help him to retrieve his defeat. But, although the former he accomplished in full, the latter was denied him.

Yet the whirligig of time brings its own revenge. To-day, Ramsay's city boasts four large and prosperous theatres, and recently the writer of this article had the honor of appearing at one of them before crowded audiences. He also happened to make one of a very sparse congregation in a kirk—the tabernacle of the "unco' guid." Then he saw and understood that Allan Ramsay had retrieved his defeat after all.

And now, why is it that the Church to-day is so amicably inclined towards the stage? To tell the truth, there is much common ground between them, as Sarah Bernhardt once pointedly remarked to an insolent cleric who had reproved her, that "people in the same line of business should never fall out." In short, the time has come when the Church knows full well that the curtain is about to be rung down upon its miserable scena of humanity's tears and weaknesses, to make room for a nobler and healthier art where humanity's smiles and strength are given full rein. And so the actors of the old scena, anxious to keep the curtain up a little while longer, extend the fraternal hand (so long withheld) to the actors of the new scena. But we of the latter must not forget the past. We must not forget how long they have kept the curtain up and had the stage to themselves. And finally, we must not forget those who have rung down the curtain upon them, especially "the joyous Allan Ramsay."

H. GEORGE FARMER.

Lester F. Ward.

OBITUARY.

IN the death of Lester Frank Ward, on April 18, at the age of 72, the United States has lost one of the most—if not the most—comprehensive thinkers it has produced, and the world one of its most ardent scientific reformers. It is characteristic of the quality of the English Press that while devoting much space to the death of men like Pierpont Morgan, who contributed nothing whatever to the world's development, the death of Professor Ward passed quite unnoticed. It is only from a paragraph in the New York Truthseeker that we became acquainted with the fact. This silence is not, perhaps, due to conscious neglect; it is more likely the result of sheer lack of interest on the part of the English newspapers in the higher branches of intellectual life. Had Professor Ward been a noisy American politician, or one of the group of "Dollar Kings," his death would, without doubt, have received wide publicity in the British Press.

As a young man, Lester Ward served through the Civil War, afterwards graduating at Columbia University. In 1879, after contributing to various magazines, he published Haeckel's Genesis of Man, in which the evolutionary account of man's origin is fully accepted. As Assistant Geologist to the United States Geological Survey, his publications included, the Flora of Washington, Flora of the Lamaric Group, Geographical Distribution of Fossil Plants, etc., etc. His great work, however, was Dynamic Sociology, in two volumes, covering over 13,000 pages, and published in 1883. This work is nothing less than a complete system of social science in the most comprehensive sense of that expression. This work had the honor of being condemned by the Russian Government, and an edition of 1,200 copies ordered to be burnt. Apart from other things, the Russian censor appeared to have feared from the title that the work was an encouragement to Socialism and Dynamite. Since 1883, other editions of the work have been called for in America, and it has been translated into several European languages.

It must be confessed that the title, Dynamic Sociology, is rather a forbidding one, but it exactly expresses the spirit of the work. Although availing himself of the labors of Spencer, and paying generous acknowledgment to him, Ward's work is really more in the line of Comte—a fact not to be obscured by the statement that, along with fundamental truths, Comte's work expressed "the greatest possible number of only less fundamental errors." Had Spencer not taken up a negative attitude toward social organisation, the relation of Ward to Spencer might have been different. As it is, Spencer's attitude is completely expressed in the title of one of his earliest books, Social Statics, just as Ward's attitude was expressed in the title of Dynamic Sociology. Those who desire a brief summary of the relations between Spencer and Ward on this point should read an article by the latter in the American Academy of Social and Political Science for January, 1894, a journal to which Ward was a frequent contributor. More clearly than either Comte or Spencer, Ward saw, both in the Dynamic Sociology and in Psychic Factors of Civilisation (written to specially emphasise this point) as well as in the Outlines of Sociology, and other writings, the importance of the active operation of mind in shaping human society. And unquestionably the growing recognition amongst scientific sociologists of the nature of the true social force as a psychic force is largely due to the work of Lester Ward.

If there is one fault in Professor Ward's writings it is a fondness for detailed classification—a probable result of his early scientific work. Apart from this, his writings have the advantages for the general reader of being clear from the intricacy of Comte and the technicalities of Spencer. No reader of average intelligence and education can fail to understand Professor Ward's meaning. And, more important still, he never appears to have lacked courage in dealing with religion. The naturalistic attitude is fully accepted in the Dynamic Sociology, and the author neither insults his readers nor degrades himself by inventing apologies for religion or for Christianity among civilised people. "Religion," he says, "is joined to error at its trunk, and none but errors grew out of it." This is a genuine scientific position, and stands out well from the absurdity of those who admit that religion began in error, but claim that in some miraculous way the elaboration of this error developed truth. Nothing is left, he also says, "but to regard the advent of Christianity as a calamity." Even the belief in immortality, he claims, has exerted a demoralising influence, and properly distinguishes between the moral elements which are associated with religion and religion itself. "They exist independently of religion, and their connection with religion is only apparent."

One would like to quote at length from Professor Ward's works, but space forbids. I have written the above as a slight mark of admiration and gratitude to one who was a great humanist, a capable and comprehensive thinker, and a great sociologist. Above all, he was a great Freethinker, and it may easily be that his greatness in other directions owed not a little to his possessing a mind in which superstition had no place.—C.

The Breakers.

To George William Foote and all his Fellow-Workers for Secularism.

As the wave in thunder rages
'Gainst the hard and sullen rock,
While throughout eternal ages
Futile seems its ceaseless shock;
So the mighty waves of Reason
Seem to smite the callous soul,
So, from season unto season,
Spurned, the living waters roll.

Yet the task an end is making;
Every billow dashed to spray—
Every surge, in splendor breaking,
Sweeps some tiny grain away;
So, 'neath Reason's sure attrition,
Working on through ages vast,
Densest rocks of superstition
Shall be worn away at last.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 21 SUNDAY, MAY 25, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Those who speak of the profit of wisdom are never so wise as when they admit, without pride or heart-burning, that wisdom grants scarcely a boon to her faithful that the foolish or wicked would prize.—MAETERLINCK.

The Death of Prayer.

WE wrote several articles formerly on cases of Peculiar People who had to appear at coroners' inquests on the dead bodies of their children. The father of one of these deceased children was committed for trial on the extremely serious charge of manslaughter. Another was severely censured, after the style of the old magistrate whose judgment was "Not guilty; but don't do it again." A further case occurred. That time a juryman wanted to have a Biblical discussion with the Peculiar father, but was checked by the coroner, who did not care to have his court turned into an arena of theological debate.

Another fact which we desire to notice is this. The medical witness in the last instance was asked whether a doctor would have prolonged the child's life, and he was unable to answer the question. It was an ordinary case of pneumonia, yet it was impossible to say whether a doctor would have done any good or not. Could there be a more striking illustration of the empirical character of the "art of healing"? Does it not warrant a strong opposition to the overweening pretensions of the medical profession? Does it not justify us in refusing to be ruled by so-called experts? Does it not warrant us in declining to invest their nostrums with any sort of privilege. The medical art is in many ways a noble one. Its object is, or should be, the alleviation of human suffering, and the prolongation of human life. But when the doctor seeks to invade our homes with compulsory powers we have a right to investigate his scientific credentials; and when we find that doctors are very much at variance with each other, that fundamental points of treatment are still in dispute, and that a medical dogma like vaccination is easily riddled by evidence, and especially by statistics, we have a clear right to ask these gentlemen to be more modest, and to fall into a line with the general body of their fellow citizens.

The point, however, is collateral. Our primary object is to deal with the doctrine of prayer. And we venture to assert that this doctrine is practically dead. It has a semblance of life, but no reality; and the committal of those Peculiar People on a charge of manslaughter was the stroke of the bell at its funeral.

For a long time the clergy who come into contact with thinking people, and have to face an educated opinion, have been very chary about pressing the doctrine of prayer in the good old-fashioned style. When the late Professor Tyndall suggested that the efficacy of prayer should be submitted to a scientific test, a wily clergyman replied that it was absurd to expect God Almighty to let himself be made the subject of an experiment. And when Mr. Galton investigated backwards, in the region of the unalterable past, and proved by statistics that the efficacy of prayer was absolutely imperceptible, the clergy took shelter behind a dignified silence. We know of ministers like the late Mr. Price Hughes successfully praying for the exact sum of one thousand pounds; and Muller's orphanage is still supported by the wide and constant advertisement that it relies entirely upon the Lord. But every man of the world smiles at such equivocal simplicities. They are relics of a bygone age of credulity. The general tendency of the age is to ignore prayer altogether, except in the perfunctory rites of "divine worship." Insurance companies treat it with quiet disdain. Christians have to pay the same life-policy premiums as infidels, and churches have to be protected by lightning conductors. Underwriters never trouble themselves about the religious or irreligious habits of the captain of a ship, or whether his list of passengers is hallowed by the presence of a bishop or damnified by the presence of an Atheist lecturer. The rate of insurance depends entirely upon secular considerations. When a town is visited by an epidemic fever, the citizens know very well that the remedy must be found in improved sanitation, and they look upon church prayers as a harmless ceremony of the time-honored clerical profession. The town councillor who proposed a religious procession, and general supplication to God, would be laughed at as an old fogey. That sort of thing has been impossible ever since Lord Palmerston told the Town Council of Edinburgh to try whitewash instead of prayer against the cholera.

The Church of England has forms of prayer for rain and fine weather, but it rarely uses them, and some day or other they will be dropped out of the Prayer Book. The most thick-headed farmer, in these days of scientific agriculture, and international competition in the food market, is quite aware that it is no use relying upon the parson. Thanksgiving services are still held; but they are regarded as routine ceremonies, without any real relation of the character of the harvest.

The scientific spirit is gradually but surely permeating the public mind; and science knows nothing of miracle, and every answer to prayer is a miracle.

The clergy who try to reconcile science with miracle only do so metaphysically. All they urge at bottom is this, that if there be a God he can work miracles if he chooses. No one denies this hypothetical proposition. The only practical question is this: If there be a God, does he work miracles? In other words, do miracles occur? That question is to be settled by evidence, and all the evidence we have points to the negative. Every man of science believes in natural causation and the unbroken order of nature.

Prayer is now generally recommended as a pious exercise. But whoever prays to God without expecting an answer is, as Coleridge said, indulging in a species of self-magnetism. It is like any other kind of dram or drug. A Christian soldier might fight better after a prayer, but so he might after a glass of brandy. It may be said that prayer is at least a conscious communion with one's ideal, but that is possible without simulation and self-deception.

THE only direct survival of the Dancing Mania of the fourteenth century appears to be the "Jumping Dance of Echternach," in Luxembourg. This is an annual Whit-Tuesday festival, and existed as late as twenty years ago; but I am not certain whether it has by now disappeared or not. Some thousands of persons take part in this procession, the method being that of gaining the church by a series of jumps, forward and backward, when all who have taken part in it fall on their faces and pray. High Mass is at once celebrated. There is no indication that this is epidemic in character; it seems rather the celebration of a past epidemic.

In modern times epidemics of dancing have been more local and less persistent than was the case in the Middle Ages, but whenever they have occurred it has always been in connection with religion. In most cases the dancing has tended more to resemble "jumping," and—although this may be due to more careful observation—has been accompanied by convulsive actions of a clearly epileptoid nature. One of the most famous of these instances was that of the French Convulsionaires, from 1727 to the period of the Revolution. A well-known but not very famous preacher, Deacon Paris, died in that year. Very shortly after his death it was declared that miracles took place at his grave in the cemetery of St. Medard. So large a number of people gathered round the grave in expectation of the reported miracles, that eventually Louis XV. ordered the cemetery to be closed. But by this the work had been done. As usual, the expected miracle occurred. The very earth from the grave, when sent to persons at a distance, produced the anticipated miraculous results. Sometimes, we are told, those seized > "bounded from the ground like fish out of water; and this was so frequently imitated at a later period that the women and girls, when they expected such violent contortions, not wishing to appear indecent, put on gowns made like sacks, closed at the feet. If they received any bruises by falling down, they were healed with earth from the grave of the uncanonised saint. They usually, however, showed great agility in this respect; and it is scarcely necessary to remark that the female sex especially was distinguished by all kinds of leaping, and almost inconceivable contortions of body. Some spun round on their feet with incredible rapidity, as is related of the dervishes. Others ran with their heads against walls, or curved their bodies like rope-dancers, so that their heels touched their shoulders."

As usual, women played a large part in this movement; while many of the phenomena described, such as the insensibility to pain inflicted in the course of these religious seizures, reminds one of more recent hypnotic phenomena. The way in which suggestion operates among people has been illustrated over and over again in the history of Methodism. Soon after the introduction of Methodism into Wales, for example, there arose the sect of the "Jumpers." The chief peculiarity of this sect was expressed in the name, and consisted in wild dances and convulsive leaps in the air until the performers fell down exhausted. The various epidemics of religious dancing in America appear to have originated from the Welsh outbreak, although assuming even more extravagant forms, and, when connected with "camp meetings," leading to a great amount of immorality. The dancing sects of Russia have already been described; and in such movements as the "Pentecostal Dancers" and the half-insane proceedings of revivals in recent years we have little more than the shadow of those mediæval movements from which they descend.

Another epidemic of the Christian period of European history, far more important than any yet noticed because of its indirect consequences, was monasticism. It cannot, of course, be claimed that Christianity originated monasticism; but it has been one of the characteristics of Christianity to take certain repellant features of religion in general and give them a still more virulent expression. This was notably so in this case. In the East the figure of the monk had been a familiar sight long before Christianity, but the main current of social life flowed on with the minimum of disturbance from it. The social and domestic virtues received adequate, if not full, recognition from the upholders of the monastic life. It was left for the Christian Church to give monasticism the character of an epidemic, to denounce purely social and domestic virtues as a positive hindrance to the religious life, and to thus come perilously near destroying civilisation altogether.

It was argued by Bingham, a learned seventeenth century ecclesiastical historian, that although asceticism was known in the earliest period of Christian history, monasticism did not originate within the Church until the fourth century. It is not a matter of great importance whether this be so or not; it is, however, certain that with no other religion has monasticism ever created such a vogue, or proved itself so grave a social danger. The mere number of monks and nuns was enough to threaten social security. Allowing for what Lecky calls the "glaring mendacity" of the Lives of the Saints, a description that applies to all ecclesiastical writings to a greater or smaller extent, it is evident that their number must have been very great. It is said that St. Pachomius had 7,000 monks under his direct rule; that in the time of Jerome 50,000 monks gathered together at the Easter festival; that one Egyptian city mustered 20,000 nuns and 10,000 monks, and that the monastic population of Egypt at one time equalled the rest of the population. In less than fifty years after the foundation of the Franciscan Order it possessed 8,000 houses, with 200,000 members. In the twelfth century the Cluniacs had 2,000 monasteries in France. In England, as late as 1546, Hooper, afterwards Bishop of Gloucester, declared that there were no less than 10,000 nuns in England. Every country in Christendom possessed a huge army of men and women whose ideals involved a more or less complete negation of all that makes a people sanely happy and progressive.

The character of the monk during the height of the monastic epidemic has been well sketched by Lecky. Its presentation here will save a more lengthy description*:—

> "A hideous, sordid, and emaciated maniac, without knowledge, without patriotism, without natural affection, passing his life in a long routine of useless and atrocious self-torture, and quailing before the ghastly phantoms of his delirious brain, had become the ideal of the nations which had known the writings of Plato and Cicero and the lives of Socrates and Cato. For about two centuries, the hideous maceration of the body was regarded as the highest proof of excellence. St. Jerome declares, with a thrill of admiration, how he had seen a monk, who for thirty years had lived exclusively on a small portion of barley bread and muddy water; another who lived in a hole and never ate more than five figs for his daily repast; a third who cut his hair only on Easter Sunday, who never washed his clothes, who never changed his tunic till it fell to pieces, who starved himself till his eyes grew dim, and his skin like a pumice stone.....Some saints, like St. Marcian, restricted themselves to one meal a day, so small that they continually suffered the pangs of hunger.....Some of the hermits lived in deserted dens of wild beasts, others in dried-up wells, while others found a congenial resting-place among the tombs. Some disdained all clothes, and crawled about like wild beasts, covered only by their matted hair.....The cleanliness of the body was regarded as a pollution of the soul, and the saints who were most admired were one mass of clotted filth. St. Athanasius relates with enthusiasm how St. Anthony, the patriarch of monarchism, had never, to extreme old age, been guilty of > washing his feet.....St. Abraham, the hermit, who lived for fifty years after his conversion, rigidly refused from that date to wash either his face or his feet.....St. Eupraxia joined a convent of one hundred and thirty nuns, who never washed their feet, and who shuddered at the mention of a bath."

It is apart from my present purpose to give anything like a full description of the monastic life; but the consequences of this epidemic on general social life, and on the life of religion, are too important to pass without observation. And, first, in relation to religion itself. That it served to strengthen and perpetuate the life of religion there can be little doubt. However much some people may have revolted against the monastic ideal, it nevertheless strengthened immensely the religious idea. The sight of monarch and noble yielding homage to the monk, acknowledging his supremacy in what was declared to be the supreme interest in life, the interference of the monk in every department of life, saturated society, so to speak, with religion; and although at a later period the growing rapacity, tyranny, and dissoluteness of the monkish orders led to a revolt against their rule, the imagination of all must by that time have been thoroughly impressed with the power and importance of religion. Most people fear ghosts long after they have ceased to believe in them; they pay homage to a crown long after intellectual development has robbed that symbol of all its original significance, and there is little doubt that even after the arrest of the epidemic, the virus of the disease still made itself felt. In spite of their absurd ideals and disgusting penances, later generations have not failed to hold up the saints of the Church as ideals of the religious life. They have been used to impress the imagination of their successors as they were used to impress the imagination of their contemporaries. The picture of Thomas à Beckett, with a hair shirt running with vermin may disgust, but this has not served to prevent his being held up as an example of the uplifting power of religion.

This, then, was one great consequence of the ascetic epidemic. It kept religion alive, it held at bay those social forces that normally make for its disintegration, it saturated society with the feeling for religion, and made it less able to resist religion in after generations. For religion does not, if one may use the language of medical science, deposit an anti-toxin that protects against further attacks; it belongs to that class which, once a successful assault has been made, prepares the way for still further onslaughts.

C. COHEN.

"The Observance of the Lord's Day."

READERS of this journal may remember that the Gravesend Sabbatarians recently suffered a signal defeat. They made a vigorous attempt to induce the Town Council to refuse a seven days' license to the picture palaces, but the Council turned a deaf ear to their petition and granted the license by the handsome majority of fourteen votes to four. Naturally the local clergy and their followers angrily resent this strong rebuff, and the churches and chapels resound with bitter denunciations of the powerful anti-Sabbatarian spirit rampant in the community. The Reporter for May 10 contains a remarkable sermon, with the heading of this article for its title, by the Rev. S. J. Poole, M.A., Vicar of St. James's Church. Because of certain serious allegations which it makes, this discourse calls, in the interest of truth and justice, for a careful and critical examination. Now, there are a few points on which we are glad to find ourselves in agreement with Mr. Poole. He quotes two eminent statesmen, Beaconsfield and Gladstone; and we are at one with the latter in the statement that "the religious observance of Sunday is a main prop of the religious character of the country," and with the former in the assertion that a day of rest is a prime necessity of mankind. We almost approve of Mr. Poole's following remark:—

> "'The Sabbath was made for man,' that is, for man in the whole of his make, body, mind, and spirit—and man in the whole of his range, for mankind, for every man, no matter what part of the globe he inhabits. And hence its observance dates back as far as history takes us in the development of man. It is coeval with man. From the very dawn of history we note the Sabbath, one day's rest after six days' labor, has been the charta of spiritual, mental, and bodily refreshment."

But the mischief with Mr. Poole is that to him a day of rest means a day of worship; not a day of physical recreation, but of spiritual renewal; a day on which he opens his shop and exhibits his wares; not a holiday, but a holy day. He tells us plainly that he wants to preserve Sunday as a day of worship in order to safeguard Christianity. It is not Sunday, as such, that he is so profoundly concerned about, but Sunday as the Lord's Day. Without Sunday and without Christianity there would be no use for parsons.

Such, in a nutshell, is Mr. Poole's case, though he does not put it that way. Indeed, he puts it in an entirely different way. Instead of saying that in the absence of Sunday and Christianity there would be no clergymen, he declares that the loss of the former two would result in the disappearance of morality. He says:—

> "When we speak of safeguarding Christianity we speak, ipso facto, of safeguarding the highest code of morals. For a really high code of morals does not exist outside Judaism and Christianity. We hear of the high morality of other religions. We admit there are precepts of great value in them. But there are so many foul accretions connected with all these religions, such a cargo of dross and base metal, that we may not for one moment compare them with Christianity as the model and lever for high moral living. Nay! outside Christianity you are on a quicksand when trying to walk steadily in search of a safe code of moral living."

A man who can talk like that is the victim of one or more of three things—abysmal ignorance, stone-blind prejudice, or professional mendacity. Can Mr. Poole conscientiously characterise the Chinese, Japanese, or the Burmese as morally our inferiors? Has he really read the Buddhist Scriptures, which are about four times as long as the Bible, and which contain a system of morality which, in the opinion of many competent judges, is second to none in the world? The reverend gentleman alludes to Portugal as a most distracted and unhappy country, but he forgets that less than five years ago Christianity was supreme there, and that its yoke was so galling that the people, unable to endure it any longer, resolved to fling it off, which they did with magnificent success; and the present troubles of the country are almost exclusively the outcome of the devilish but so far futile machinations of the fallen monarchy and priesthood, which are hand and glove. The truth is that Portugal is releasing herself from the cruel shackles of her superstitious, priest-ridden, and king-devoured past, and that the process would be much smoother and swifter if her Christian enemies would only give her simple justice and fair play. Mr. Poole also refers to the increase of juvenile crime in France under secular education. But if he had taken the trouble to consult the latest official statistics before speaking he would have seen how contrary to the truth his information was. For the last twenty-four years crime of all kinds in the French Republic has been steadily on the decrease.

Happily, our opposition to Mr. Poole ends just here. He either ignorantly or deliberately lies when he exclaims, "Kill Christianity, and you will kill morality." Millions of the most moral people on the planet to-day are non-Christians and non-Theists. We challenge him to cite unquestioned facts in disproof of this statement. But he is quite right when he cries, "Kill the Sunday, and you will kill Christianity." Christianity has subsisted on its Book and its Day; deprived of them it would speedily die. In theory man is described as being by nature religious, as having within him an instinctive hunger for God, which God alone can allay. Again and again are we told that it is quite impossible to rob him of religion, or to prevent him from seeking food for his spiritual nature. In practice, however, the flattest contradiction is given to that theoretical teaching. The whole argument against secular education hinges upon the positive assurance that if the Bible were excluded from the day-schools religion would be doomed. Catholics, Anglicans, and Nonconformists are all agreed on this point. Those three main divisions of the Christian Church unchurch one another with marvellous celerity, and they cannot meet one another on any point. Hence the never-ceasing warfare between them over religious education; but there is no division among them on the fatal character of the secular solution. Listen to Mr. Poole:—

> "I have in my mind a certain grammar school of great repute as a public school. At that school religious instruction is given one solitary half-hour each week. Most of the boys come from homes where the Sunday is little revered, and Christianity little taught. When these boys grow up, what will they be? Baptised Heathens!—little more." (The italics are our own.)

Quite right, Mr. Poole. The secular principle alone is fair and just, but it will certainly breed Freethinkers by the thousand. A half-hour dose of religion per week is not enough, and fails to keep the spiritual instinct alive. Listen once more:—

> "And so we come, step by step, to this staggering truth, uttered by one of the world's greatest Sceptics, Voltaire: 'Kill the Sunday, and you will kill Christianity.' This is said to have been his answer when asked how to stamp out Christianity in France. And his words are tragically, fearfully true. Unless there is a day specially set apart for the Church to do her work, the principles and morals of Christianity simply cannot be taught."

What a complete surrender of the case for Christianity. Here, again, theoretically, the future of the Cross is absolutely secure. The Gospel Jesus proudly predicts that against his Church not even the gates of hell can ever prevail. You remember the martial strains of the famous hymn:—

> "The Son of God goes forth to war,
> A Kingly crown to gain;
> His blood-red banner streams afar!
> Who follows in his train?"

In theology, both of the New Testament and the Church Christ is a king who "must reign till he hath put all his enemies under his feet." He is the irresistible, all-conquering Redeemer, endowed with all power in heaven and on earth, concerning whom great voices in heaven were heard saying, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ; and he shall reign for ever and ever." And yet Mr. Poole tells us that we can steal the Sunday from this mighty monarch by opening theatres and picture palaces and absenting ourselves from church and chapel, and that if we do rob him of his own field day, we shall thereby hurl him headlong from his throne down to the bottomless pit of eternal oblivion. What a compliment is this that a servant pays to his own Master whom in theory he holds to be absolutely invincible! What a puerile giving away of the Christian case is this whole sermon which is ostensibly in defence of Christ and his Day!

Yes, Christianity is a house founded upon the sand, destined to fall when the winds of criticism begin to blow; but it is not every day that an apologist of that religion tells you so with his own lips, as Mr. Poole does in this amazing discourse. The truth is not that the kingdoms of this world are likely ever to become the kingdoms of "our Lord, and of his Christ," but that the imaginary kingdom of "our Lord, and of his Christ" is gradually making room for the real kingdom of man, in which he shall reign to the end of days.

> "From their [the Chinese] point of view it goes without saying that all foreigners are enormously rich, and that there are no poor in our favored lands, or we should not have money to spend in maintaining corps of missionaries nearly as numerous as our merchants, and in subsidising outcast Chinese to forsake the family altars to 'feng chiao,' or be 'sealed' to a doctrine strange and incredible."—ARCHIBALD LITTLE, Through the Yang-tse Gorges, p 256.
> "From old time these attacks upon the domestic faith of docile and peaceful communities have provoked massacres, and if persisted in they will continue to provoke massacres while the people have strength left to strike. How foreign religious aggression is answered by native religious aggression, and how Christian military power avenges the foreign victims with tenfold slaughter and strong robbery, need not be here recorded. It has not been in these years only that ancestor-worshiping peoples have been slaughtered, impoverished, or subjugated in revenge for the uprisings that missionary intolerance provokes."—LAFCADIO HEARN, Japan: An Attempt at Interpretation, p. 519.

ANOTHER great obstacle the missionary to the Chinese has to surmount is that of the language. Mr. Chester Holcombe, in his valuable work The Real Chinaman (p. 49), says "a barrier far more serious than the Great Wall to any intimate acquaintance with the Chinese is found in their language." The Chinese language has no alphabet. Each character represents in itself a complete idea, and practically corresponds to a syllable in our language.

> "The lack of any alphabet and the enormous number of characters make the labor of learning to read Chinese burdensome in the extreme. Each character must be learned by itself; and when the student has mastered a thousand or five thousand, the succeeding thousands must be learned in the same way" (p. 53).

Such are the difficulties of learning Chinese. Miss C. F. Gordon Cumming, after observing that forty thousand different characters are used in the classics of Confucius, says:—

> "Happily a knowledge of four thousand suffices to enable a student to read such a book as our Bible; but to acquire even these takes an average student about six years, and even when he has attained some skill in reading he has not begun to learn to write."*

Which requires a rare proficiency and skill in drawing.

These difficulties, great as they are, dwindle into comparative insignificance before the obstacles in the way of learning to speak Chinese. Mr. Chester Holcombe, who was for many years interpreter to the United States Legation at Pekin, says that the really serious difficulties inherent in learning to speak Chinese render it an almost insurmountable barrier to any thorough knowledge of the people. He tells us:—

> "No amount of book study will enable a person to speak it. It must be learned from the lips of a living teacher. With any amount of drill it requires a quick ear and great flexibility of the vocal organs to acquire accurate pronunciation. So serious is the difficulty, that it may be accepted as a rule that no person over thirty years of age can learn to speak Chinese correctly, as the vocal organs, after that period, appear to have lost a portion of their flexibility. Many persons under that age fail to acquire a command of the language, even with the most faithful effort. Not one foreign speaker of Chinese in ten can make the ordinary Chinese cat-call. Although I accomplished this feat, I failed, after seventeen years of patient effort, to produce a certain sound with which the donkey-driver urges his long-eared beast about the streets of Pekin. My only consolation in the failure is that no other foreigner has been known to master it."†

The same writer further tells us that the most expert foreign authorities disagree as to the best representation in any European language of many of these sounds. For instance, he observes:—

> "It probably will never be settled whether the Chinese word for 'man' should begin with j or r; the fact being that the exact sound is an intermediate one, almost impossible to any foreigner, between the two."

* C. F. Gordon Cumming, Memories; 1904; p. 352.
† Chester Holcombe, The Real Chinaman; 1895; pp. 62-63.

Mr. Holcombe once asked several American and European scholars learned in the Chinese language, who were guests at his table, how the Chinese word for "porridge" should be represented in English. He received seven different combinations of letters.

Another peculiarity of the Chinese language, and one which is responsible for more blunders than all the others put together, is that the tone in which a word is uttered changes the meaning of the word itself. For instance, in English a word conveys a single idea to the person to whom it is spoken. Thus the word "man" always means a man in our language, although the word may be uttered in a tone to indicate inquiry, contempt, sarcasm, surprise, anger, or any other emotion. In Chinese this is all changed; the tone in which a word is uttered affects the meaning of the word as much as the sound does. Thus, says Mr. Holcombe, "In Chinese a man ceases to be a man the instant you change the tone of your voice in uttering the word. He may be a disease, a nightingale, or a carrot, but he can be a man in only one tone of voice." And, as he further remarks—

> "It is no easy matter to speak a single word of Chinese correctly. A long and steady drill of the vocal organs is necessary to the accurate and ready pronunciation of each separate character. At the outset of his Chinese studies the author devoted four hours each day for eight weary months to a drill on the tone table" (pp. 66-7-8).

Chinese, as the same writer remarks, is undoubtedly the most difficult language on earth to master. He says a volume might be filled with the most annoying blunders committed by foreign students of Chinese. For instance:—

> "A missionary once informed his audience that the Savior, when on earth, 'went about eating cake.' He intended to say 'healing the sick'; but an aspirate wrongly placed changed healing into eating, while an error in tone made cakes out of those who were ill" (pp. 68-9).

On another occasion—

> "The writer once heard a venerable missionary address the Deity in prayer, before a crowded Chinese audience, as 'O Thou Omniverous God.' He meant to say 'omniscient,' but used an aspirated ch when the other would have better served his purpose. On another occasion a missionary saw with astonishment an audience hurriedly leave his chapel in response to what he supposed was a courteous invitation from his lips to be seated. In point of fact, however, he was not giving them a welcome, but assuring them that they had made a mistake in entering. An aspirated t caused all the misunderstanding."*

The Rev. Wm. Milne, the colleague of the missionary, Dr. Morrison, declared that "To acquire Chinese is a work for men with bodies of brass, lungs of steel, heads of oak, hands of spring steel, eyes of eagles, hearts of apostles, memories of angels, and lives of Methuselah."†

Even when the foreigner, after herculean struggles during a series of years, has learned to read and speak Chinese, he will still be unable to make himself understood. He will now have to cope with what that great authority on things Chinese, Mr. Arthur H. Smith—who spent twenty-two years in China as a missionary—calls the Chinese "talent for misunderstanding." This arises through their different mode of thought. We pride ourselves on going directly to the marrow of the subject, and, having reached it, saying exactly what we mean; but, says Mr. Arthur Smith, "The whole Chinese system of thinking is based on a line of assumptions different from those to which we are accustomed." In fact, our modes of thought and the Chinese are at opposite poles. It has been said that we think in straight lines, but the Oriental thinks in curves; and however proficient the foreigner may become in the language, so that he could write down every character spoken by a Chinese, yet, says Mr. Smith, it would still be "impossible, from merely hearing what a Chinese says, to tell what he means"; and he declares that anyone who can read a copy of the Pekin Gazette, and form a correct notion as to what is behind it, "knows more of China than can be learned from all the works on this Empire that ever were written." And he adds: "Is there not reason to fear that by the time any outside barbarian shall have reached such a pitch of comprehension as this implies, we shall be as much at a loss to know what he meant by what he said as if he were really Chinese."

So the student of Chinese, having, as he thinks, mastered the language, finds, to his pained surprise, that he is not understood. He therefore, says Mr. Smith, "returns to his studies with augmented diligence, and at the end of a series of years is able to venture with confidence to accost the public, or any individual thereof, on miscellaneous subjects." But with no better results.

> "The speaker will have opportunity for the same pained surprise as when he made his maiden speech in this tongue. The auditor evidently does not understand. He as evidently does not expect to understand. He visibly pays no attention to what is said, makes no effort whatever to follow it, but simply interrupts you to observe, 'When you speak we do not understand.' He has a smile of superiority, as of one contemplating the struggles of a deaf-mute to utter articulate speech, and as if he would say, 'Who supposed that you could be understood? It may be your misfortune and not your fault that you were not born with a Chinese tongue, but you should bear your disabilities, and not worry us with them, for when you speak we do not understand you.' It is impossible to retain at all times an unruffled serenity in situations like this, and it is natural to turn fiercely on your adversary, and inquire, 'Do you understand what I am saying at this moment?' 'No,' he replies, 'I do not understand you.'"*

Bearing these facts in mind, we can appreciate the miraculous character of some of the conversions recorded in the missionary magazines. For instance, Mr. Stanley P. Smith

> "had been only seven months in China when he performed that wonderful conversion, so applauded at the Missionary Conference of 1888, of 'a young Chinaman, a learned man, a B.A. of his University, who had heard Mr. Smith speak in the Chinese that can be acquired in seven months, and accepted Him there and then (Records of the Missionary Conference; 1888; i., p. 46). Indeed, the earlier the new missionaries in China begin to preach, the more rapid are the conversions they make."†

Dr. Morrison—the Australian medical man who travelled in China, not Dr. Morrison the missionary—the author of the last quotation, also sarcastically remarks:—

> "The Chinaman is rarely carried away by his feelings at the theatre; indeed it may be questioned if strong emotion is ever aroused in his breast, except by the first addresses of the junior members of the China Inland Mission, the thrilling effects of whose Chinese exhortations is recorded every month in [the missionary magazine] China's Millions."‡

National Secular Society's Annual Conference.

THE business meetings of the Conference were held in Clavier Hall, Princes-street, Regent-street, London, on Whit Sunday, May 11.

The following Vice-Presidents attended: — Messrs. J. Barry, E. Bowman, R. Chapman, H. Cowell, C. Cohen, F. A. Davies, W. Davey, W. Heaford, J. T. Lloyd, W. Leat, A. B. Moss, J. Neat, R. T. Nichols, S. M. Peacock, J. Ross, G. Roleffs, V. Roger, F. Schindle, S. Samuels, H. Silverstein, T. J. Thurlow, F. Wood, and Miss Stanley.

The delegates from Branches were as follows:—J. Lazarnick, W. R. Brooks (Bethnal Green); E. Clifford Williams, J. W. Hackett (Birmingham); J. W. Gott (Bolton); H. R. Clifton, S. Soddy (Croydon); W. Davidson, J. Hecht (Edmonton); C. Cohen (Glasgow); A. S. Collinson, Miss How (Islington); E. Bellamy, S. B. Savill (Kingsland); J. G. Dobson (Manchester); D. Mapp, M. J. Charter, T. H. Elstob (Newcastle-on-Tyne); W. J. Lloyd, Miss Kough, Miss Stanley (North London); R. Chapman, J. T. Horsman, T. Fothergill (South Shields); R. H. Rosetti, Miss Pankhurst (West Ham).

The Minutes of last Conference were taken as read.

The Executive's Annual Report was submitted orally by the President, who was very warmly welcomed after his long and severe illness.

The Financial Report was unanimously adopted.

Election of President: During this function the chair was occupied by Mr. C. Cohen. On the motion of the Bethnal Green and Kingsland Branches, Mr. G. W. Foote was unanimously and enthusiastically re-elected. On resuming the chair the President acknowledged the honor that had been paid him once more by the Conference. He knew that, as their leader, he possessed their confidence, and this he fully appreciated. He coveted no higher, and there could be no more honorable, position. Had he wished it, no doubt he might have entered Parliament; but he considered it a much greater honor to be President of the National Secular Society. The Press had always boycotted him most assiduously. When it became his turn to speak at a public meeting the reporters either went out in a body or closed their note-books. It was no egotism to say he could write; but the prizes of literature never fell to his lot. He did not complain. His one business in life was to carry on the fight for Freethought—the grandest of all causes. His remarks were received with great applause.

Election of Vice-Presidents.—On the nomination of the Executive the following were re-elected:—J. Barry, W. H. Baker, J. G. Bartram, E. Bowman, R. Chapman, Victor Charbonnel, E. A. Charlton, C. Cohen, W. W. Collins, H. Cowell, W. Davey, F. A. Davies, J. G. Dobson, R. G. Fathers, Léon Furnémont, T. Gorniot, John Grange, J. Hammond, W. Heaford, Eugene Hins, S. L. Hurd, R. Johnson, Miss Kathleen B. Kough, W. Leat, J. T. Lloyd, A. B. Moss, James McGlashen, G. B. H. McCluskey, J. Neate, R. T. Nichols, J. Partridge, S. M. Peacock, C. Pegg, Mrs. M. E. Pegg, W. T. Pitt, C. G. Quinton, J. T. Ross, Miss Mary Ross, G. Roleffs, Mrs. Roleffs, Thomas Robertson, Victor Roger, S. Samuels, T. Shore, H. Silverstein, W. H. Spivey, Miss Alma Stanley, W. B. Thompson, T. J. Thurlow, John H. Turnbull, Miss E. M. Vance, F. E. Willis, C. J. Whitwell, Frederick Wood, G. White.

Mr. T. H. Elstob and Mr. W. Dodd were also elected Vice-Presidents, both being well-known as zealous and able workers of long standing in the Freethought movement.

Mr. Harry Jones and Mr. S. B. Savill were elected auditors.

Mr. Clifford Williams (Birmingham) moved: "That one Sunday in the year be called the Charles Bradlaugh Sunday, and that all Branches be requested to arrange for lectures or readings to be given bearing on the life and teachings of Charles Bradlaugh, thus perpetuating the memory of our late great leader." Mr. Williams dwelt, with suitable emphasis, upon the desirability of frequently recalling the splendid services which Mr. Bradlaugh had rendered to the world as founder and first President of the National Secular Society. He alluded to the great man's magnetic, dominating personality. Mr. Hackett seconded, speaking in glowing terms of the magic influence that lies in Charles Bradlaugh's name. He stated that the Birmingham Branch wished to suggest to the President that the Bradlaugh Sunday should be followed by a special number of the Freethinker, containing, on the front page, a portrait of Bradlaugh, with an article by the Editor on some feature of his life and work, or a summary of the lectures delivered. He felt confident that of such a number of the journal they would be able, at Birmingham, to sell from 200 to 500 extra copies. Messrs. Peacock, Chapman, Hecht, Davidson, and Thurlow spoke against the motion, their chief objection to it being that the setting apart of a day for the perpetuation of the memory of anyone, however great, would or might engender a species of fetishism; but Messrs. Silverstein, Heaford, Ross, and the President saw no such danger in the proposal. The President recommended the striking out of the words "thus perpetuating the memory of," which the mover and seconder readily consented to do; and thus amended the motion was carried.

There was another motion from Birmingham, moved and seconded by the same gentlemen, namely, "That all motions carried at a Conference shall be dealt with in the course of the three months following the Conference, and a report stating the progress made be sent to the Branch responsible for the motion." After considerable discussion, and the substitution of "as soon as possible" for "in the course of three months," the motion was carried.

The following motion was formally moved, seconded, and carried: "This Conference protests against the London County Council's deliberate and continuous effort to cripple, and if possible to destroy, the traditional right of public speech and discussion in all parts of the metropolis under its control; and the Conference protests especially against the mean attempt to injure advanced bodies generally by a perfectly uncalled-for attempt to deprive them of the immemorial right to make collections for their funds within the limits—and only within the limits—of their permitted meetings." The hope was expressed that the newly elected Council would see the wisdom of pursuing a more liberal and rational policy.

Mr. Cohen moved that: "This Conference deeply deplores the growing activity of the military spirit in Europe, and the ever-increasing expenditure on preparations for war, and calls upon Freethinkers everywhere—since the Christian Churches are so impotent in the cause of peace—to do all in their power to stem the tide of international envy, hatred, and malice, which is driving the so-called civilised nations on the abyss of mutual destruction." The mover called attention to the fact that the Christian Churches had never been hostile to war, but have often instigated wars and taken an active part in them. With the exception of the Quakers, Christians generally have approved of war. Freethinkers are almost the only people who are, on principle, advocates of peace. Mr. Moss, who seconded, denounced the boy and girl scouts movement as calculated to develop a warlike disposition in the young. The motion was unanimously carried.

The President moved: "This Conference calls upon the Liberal Government to countenance no more prosecutions for 'blasphemy' or 'profanity' (which are only persecutions of weak or friendless Freethinkers for the gratification of Christian bigotry), but to introduce, or allow time for, a short Bill abolishing the odious laws under which such proceedings are still possible in a country that boasts of its religious freedom." The President rejoiced that now at last a Bill for the repeal of those inhuman enactments had been introduced in the House of Commons, and that every possible influence should be brought to bear upon the members to secure their support to such a Bill. He referred to the work of the Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws, and to the splendid public meeting held under its auspices at the Essex Hall. It was agreed to delete the words "introduce or," so that the motion reads, after "bigotry," "but to allow time for the short Bill before the House abolishing," etc.; and with that alteration it was carried.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd moved for the Executive the following: "The Liberal Government having declared its intention to deal with the Education question again in the early future, this Conference warns it that it has already failed three times in trying to settle the problem on Nonconformist rather than Church lines, and trusts that its next attempt will rise above all sectarian lines by proceeding upon the principle which is fair and just to all—the principle of Secular Education." This was seconded by Mr. A. B. Moss. Upon this subject the Conference was of one mind, and the motion was carried unanimously.

It was heartily agreed: "That the N. S. S. be represented as far as possible at the forthcoming International Freethought Congress at Lisbon, partly as an encouragement to the Portuguese Freethinkers who have taken such a great part in the recent work of progress in Portugal, and also as a protest against the malicious falsehoods so industriously circulated to their detriment by religious bigots and political schemers in England."

Miss H. Pankhurst moved the following motion from the West Ham Branch: "That, in pursuance of the declaration made in the Society's 'Immediate Practical Objects,' namely, 'The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinction,' this Conference recognises universal adult suffrage as the most effective method of abolishing sex disqualification and of placing all citizens on an equal footing at the poll. Acid Drops.

We believe in the freedom of the press as much as anybody, and we have given pledges of our attachment to that policy. We feel towards it like the good lad in Meredith's Egoist felt towards his dear Miss Middleton; he did not mind how many loved her,—he only objected to anybody's wanting to hurt her. In the same way, we extend the hand of welcome to any person who is really fighting for freedom. We were delighted to see that Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, on behalf of the Labor Party and the National Labor Press, had offered to publish the Suffragette, which the Government is trying to suppress. It is both against English law and English tradition that a periodical should be suppressed before it is published. Nex week's Suffragette is not yet in existence, and to say that it shall not appear is tyranny of the worst description. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald would do a chivalrous thing if he opposed this Government despotism. But what he offered to do, if you look into it closely, does not amount to much. Nothing that could possibly be prosecuted with success is to be allowed to go into the paper. It is to be rigorously censored and absolutely harmless. Hadn't the women better look after their own paper? It may be ungracious, but it is generally advisable, to look a gift horse in the mouth.

The militant suffragettes seem well supplied with piety. The extracts read by Detective Beazley from speeches by Miss Barrett included this one:—"When we hear of a bomb being thrown, we say, 'Thank God for that!'"

When the Christian Bulgarians and the Christian Greeks took to fighting each other it was time to reckon up the cost of the Balkan war. The Bulgarian returns are available already. The number of officers killed is 330, and the number of men 29,711. The number of officers wounded is 950, and the number of men 52,550. The number of missing is 3,193. Making a grand total of 86,734. All this price of blood and wounds is paid for what? For a crusade of the Cross against the Crescent, as King Ferdinand was indiscreet enough to call it at the outset of the war.

Those dear good Christians, the Bulgars and the Greeks, took to fighting each other over the possession of places that did not belong to either of them. A neutral zone had to be established to prevent further fighting. "How they love one another!"

From the report of a public meeting, held in the Council Chamber, Kimberley, in the Diamond Fields Advertiser for April 18, we see that the question of religious instruction in the public schools there is following much the same course as at home. A movement is on foot to introduce dogmatic religious instruction in the schools, and the meeting was called to protest against this being done. At present the law allows for the usual Bible reading and the Lord's Prayer. It is also competent for ministers of religion to utilise the half-hour allowed for Biblical instruction by giving dogmatic religious lessons. But this means, of course, the clergy themselves have to do the work, and that is not at all to their taste. The mover of the resolution of protest, and in favor of the status quo, said this power had been in the hands of the clergy for many years, but so few had availed themselves of it that it had been allowed to lapse. So much for right of entry. In itself, it is a vicious principle, and one fatal to school discipline and development; but it will never work, because, as a late Bishop of London said, the best of the clergy are too busy, and the rest are too lazy. Their desire is to use State-paid teachers to do their work for them.

In this connection, we were glad to see that a letter was received from the Diamond Fields Teachers' Association stating that it "had on two occasions protested against teachers being employed to instruct in religious subjects." This is the right kind of spirit, and we should wish to see the same temper amongst teachers in this country. A very large section of them are in favor of the abolition of religious instruction in State schools, but it is almost impossible to get any number of them to publicly say so. And yet, in the present state of English public opinion, an open expression on the part of the teacher might well become a decisive factor in settling the question. The reason given, privately, of course, for their silence, is that open speech would lead to their victimisation, and would in any case hinder their promotion—a plea which shows that whether we are dealing with Churchmen or Dissenters, religious government means tyranny on the one side and hypocrisy on the other.

It was a good omen that the principle of Secular Education was not left without its spokesman at this meeting. Mr. Zeiss moved an amendment to the effect that all religious instruction, including special Bible reading, should be discontinued in public schools. The amendment was lost, but its being moved gave an opportunity for the expression of some home-truths, and, judging from the report, evoked a fair amount of sympathy. It was also remarkable in drawing from a clerical speaker, named Lillie, the statement that, having lived for some years in England, he repudiated the suggestion that the religious question gave rise to any bitterness there. He had, he said, heard no murmurs there. Mr. Lillie must have a remarkable power of non-observation. With passive resisters declining to pay rates and going to prison, Nonconformists threatening to turn out the Government unless their "grievances" are remedied, and Churchmen clamoring for more dogmatic instruction, we congratulate Mr. Lillie on possessing a serenity of disposition that prevented him hearing even "murmurs" on the question of religious instruction in public schools.

The Christian World notes the issue of a new manifesto by the Secular Education League, and curtly adds, "that solution will be the policy of despair." It may be, so far as some people are concerned; but we fancy many a highwayman must have forsaken his profession in "despair" at safely pursuing it longer. Some people act justly because they prefer it; others because they are prevented acting otherwise. That is all there is in the matter; and we are quite prepared to admit that the bulk of religionists will not act justly in this matter until they are forced.

The Rev. R. S. King, Rector of Leigh-on-Sea, has a protest in this month's local Parish Magazine against the "spread of anti-religious teaching." He adds that "It is not we older ones, perhaps, who will be much disturbed by such frothy teaching, but we must remember that it is our children who will have to bear the brunt of it." We can assure the rector that Freethought audiences are not so largely composed of children under the age of eleven as the congregations he is accustomed to.

Baron Paterno, the cavalry lieutenant, who murdered the Countess Trigona, a lady-in-waiting to the Queen of Italy, was sentenced to lifelong imprisonment, beginning with six years' solitary confinement—which appears to be driving him mad. He has made several attempts at suicide, and he has been placed in a padded cell and securely bound in a strait-jacket. He is also watched day and night. What, we ask, could be more horrible? If this is the alternative to capital punishment, we prefer capital punishment. To kill a man is merciful compared with torturing him as long as nature holds out against death.

Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon has been trying to describe what Christian Churches will be like 250 years hence. But will there be any Christian Churches left by that time? No doubt Dr. Gibbon is sure of it. We are not. And our anticipation may be quite as good as his.

There is a professional servant of Christ called Stanley Parker—once, we believe, of Woolwich, then of Brighton, afterwards of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and now of York—who has lately been "going for" Spiritualism in a local newspaper. In one of his letters he describes himself as an old debater, having "debated with Mr. G. W. Foote and Mr. Percy Ward." We are asked if this is true. Mr. James Lawrence, who is connected with the Spiritualist movement at Newcastle-on-Tyne, put the question to us in a letter on the subject. Our reply is that we never debated with Mr. Stanley Parker—or any other Parker. We are not aware that we ever saw him. He may, of course, have got up after one of our lectures—in the open discussion which is always invited—and asked a question or offered criticism; but even if this be true, it is far-fetched to call it debating with Mr. Foote. With regard to Mr. Percy Ward we can say nothing. He has been out of England for some time, and is now stationed at Chicago. We admit that Mr. Stanley Parker has been referred to several times in the Freethinker on account of fantastic statements of his reported utterances in the public press. We have always found him a person of romantic memory, and he seems to retain that characteristic unimpaired.

John Carrington, a Sunday-school teacher and local preacher, died suddenly during a service at Eld-lane Baptist Chapel, Colchester. There is no moral. Had it been the case of a Freethought lecturer dying at a Secular meeting the moral would have been a mile long.

At the annual meeting of the Chief Constables' Association held at the Westminster Palace Hotel recently, the Bishop of Wakefield greeted the chief constables as "brother bishops." It is not often that an ecclesiastic is so frank concerning the real duties of the "Black Army."

A pilgrimage of members of Suffrage Societies from all parts of the country to London is being arranged for July, and Mrs. Fawcett has expressed the hope that the processionists will attend a service at St. Paul's Cathedral. Had not the passive Suffragettes better ascertain the intentions of their active sisters with regard to this building?

The Rev. D. Ewart James, of Southend, compares the Christian Church to a sailing ship; but, for some reason or other, she has stopped. She has got organisation, men, money, learning, and machinery, but she has been in the doldrums for some time now. The curious thing is that the wind of God is always blowing, and it is always an entirely favorable wind; but the vessel refuses to go. Nay, she moves backwards, right against God's wind, which is certainly a great miracle. Who ever heard of a sailing ship travelling against the wind? The truth is that the wind of God is purely imaginary, while the wind of science is a stupendous reality, and is driving the Church on the rocks. We rejoice to know that in proportion as the wind of knowledge increases in strength the wind of superstition dies down.

Bishop Weldon, Dean of Manchester, has just been saying that "a Democratic Government is the only possible government to-day, and the only one that is in keeping with the will of God." Poor God! He is very rarely able to get his will carried out in this world. Democratic Government has only existed occasionally, and within small limits, in the history of mankind. That is how "thy will be done on earth" has been fulfilled. In the same way, the Christians amongst the Land Nationalisers assert that God intended the land for the people, but the landlords got in front of him and "collared the blooming lot." And he can't shift them.

The Protestant ministers of Indianopolis have refused to have any dealings with Billy Sunday, the converted prize-fighter and evangelist, on account of his vulgarity and crude methods. Meanwhile Sunday goes on drawing the "gate money," which he probably finds pays better than pugilism. He is said to be making £12,000 a year.

Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, the well-known dramatist, says that "the crying defect of Dissenters to-day is an inability to discern when their leaders and pastors are talking solemn nonsense." The justice of the statement cannot be denied; but it applies to a much larger class than the Nonconformists. It is true of all religious leaders. Solemn nonsense is the principle thing with which they deal, which is one of the reasons why they object to ridicule, or to what they please to call irreverence. Could there be a finer example of "solemn nonsense" than a congress of mature individuals—physically mature, that is—discussing such absurd questions as the Virgin Birth or the Resurrection? It is only because there is a kind of hereditary solemnity around these topics that people can discuss them with a straight face. What is called the cultivation of a reverential attitude towards religion means no more than a training that will enable one to treat ridiculous things seriously. History shows that nothing is too absurd to be religious, and nothing should be too religious to be recognised as absurd.

Christian prayers did no more good than other prayers for the benefit of China. The political situation has been more strained ever since they were offered up. Another day's prayer might shatter the Chinese Republic to pieces.

The Church in Essex is deteriorating in culture. In the Southend Church Chronicle there is a vulgar request asking the readers to "buck up and take all the tickets" for an entertainment, whilst in the Leigh Parish Magazine a note on a garden party reads: "We are unable either to supply any information or to do our bit in booming the fête." A Salvation Army officer could do no worse.

On Sunday, May 11, a severe thunderstorm visited Ware, and damaged Christ Church in that town. Hunsdon Church, about nine miles from Ware, was also struck by lightning while the celebration of Holy Communion was in progress. Fortunately, no one was injured, but the church was so filled with fragments from the tower that the service had to be stopped and the evening service could not be held. This church was not fitted with a lightning conductor. This is only yet one more case going to prove that the Almighty takes no more care of his holy buildings than he does of a public-house when neither is protected by science.

"Owe no man anything," the New Testament says. How far Christians have heeded this text may be seen by the announcement that there is £16,000 owing on Primitive Methodist chapels in East Lancashire. There is to be a three years' campaign to clear off this indebtedness—starting with the aid of Sir W. P. Hartley, whom the Methodists find "real jam."

Sir A. Conan Doyle has made a very feeble reply to Mr. S. H. Swinny with respect to the treatment of the "politicals," that is "royalists," in the Portuguese prisons. Sir Conan actually urged the withdrawal of the British Minister from Lisbon by way of protest. Mr. Swinny has been to Lisbon, and seen the prisons and prisoners for himself, and he reports that there is nothing special to complain about. One prison, which was said to be infested with vermin, he found "appallingly clean." Prisons, of course, are prisons; and it is idle to expect that the Portuguese Republic is suddenly going to turn them into Carlton Hotels for the sake of the Duchess of Bedford and her royalist friends, who insist on attempting petty revolutions and wailing over the consequences. Sir Conan Doyle knows nothing personally of the subject he writes so dogmatically upon. Mr. Swinny is a first-hand witness, and his competence is beyond challenge. On the whole, it seems that the noise made over the Portuguese prisons is due to two causes; first, because the country is small and can therefore be bullied with impunity,—second, because the upper-class people are the principal sufferers.

Father Bernard Vaughan, the celibate gentleman who is perpetually preaching the gospel of large families, has been telling a Liverpool meeting of Catholic young men that the Separation Law in France has proved the greatest of blessings to the Church. It had freed her from her thraldom to the State, and she had increased in strength and prosperity ever since. Supposing that this is true—and we dare say there is some truth in it, as we predicted at the time—it seems fair to ask Father Vaughan to explain why the Catholic Church, with the Pope at its head, fought tooth and nail against the Separation which was a blessing in disguise. The infallible Church turned out to be utterly wrong—God's vicegerent on earth showed a want of common sagacity. What becomes of the Papal claims after such wretched blundering?

After all, it appears that what religion has gained in France during the last ten years has been lost in England. Father Vaughan, in that same speech, said: "There seems to be almost a revolt here against the supernatural. Instead of churches filling, I find them emptying. Some have been converted into mansions for the rich, while not a few chapels have been changed into theatres or music-halls." So that's all right.

The Dean of Worcester, the Very Rev. Moore Ede, told the Congregational Union, the other day, that one of the most pithy and effective sermons he ever read was as follows:—

> "The world is wrong-side up. The world must be put right-side up. We are the men to do it."

That sermon may be pithy and a in certain sense effective; but it is not true. Christians have been trying to set the world right for nigh two thousand years, and they are as far from doing so now as they were at the beginning.

American society is polo crazy, says the Evening News. In the old country some are cracked on religion.

The Daily Mirror recently had a picture of an open-air preacher with an audience composed entirely of children. Has it come to this? A little time ago preachers used to count women among their auditors.

The Rev. A. J. Waldron, Vicar of St. Matthew's Church, Brixton, is announced to speak at the forthcoming annual meeting in connection with the Preventive and Rescue Shelter for Fallen Women at Southend-on-Sea. Is the reverend gentleman an authority on the subject?

"Smoked before Suicide"! ran the headline in a daily paper. Pious people think this is done afterwards.

A minister was saying his prayers aloud when his wife entered the room. "You get out," said the parson; "this is a monologue, not a catalogue!"

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £133 12s. 11d. Received since :—Mrs. Brooks, 2s. 6d.; Miss Brooks, 2s. 6d.; Maurice Abrahams, 3s.; G. F. Dixon (West Africa), £2; John Scott, 2s. 6d.; E. V. G., 10s.

CONNIE BROOKS.—We note that you are looking forward to the resumption of "Literary Gossip," and that you like our articles on literature so much that you wish we would "let us have as much as you can of them." Pleased you thought the Meredith article "splendid."

T. H. HOW.—We can't see any harm in it. If the late King Edward told the chauffeur, and peremptorily too, to take a turning that proved to be the wrong one, and called himself "a damned fool" for interfering—it was a gentlemanly action on his part, and in a sense the swearing only made it more so.

R. SPIERS.—Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence is a wealthy man, and is able to force his nonsense on the public. Only the ignorant could be impressed by his ridiculous statements and foolish reasoning. To answer him is like refuting the contention that the moon is made of green cheese.

A. WYCHERLEY.—Your letter in the local press is anything but "uninteresting." Such contributions do good in many ways, and we wish that all Freethinkers would, whenever possible, avail themselves of this channel of publicity.

A. PHILLIPS (S. Africa).—We have regular readers in all parts of the world.

T. HOPKINS.—Actions can only be immoral as far as they affect others. Robinson Crusoe, alone upon his island, could not act immorally (except to lower animals). Excess in eating and drinking, in such circumstances, could be only a matter of taste. But the moment Man Friday appeared upon the scene moral relationships commenced. Of course it may be urged that Robinson Crusoe was bound not to injure or make a beast of himself, if he had any hope of being rescued and returning to human society. But that is only another proof that it is human society that gives the word "morality" all its meaning. —We will notice the other matter in your letter next week. In the meanwhile, will you try to obtain further particulars, such as the lecturer's name? And do you know anyone who could corroborate your statements? Not that we doubt them in any way.

R. STEVENSON.—The oath of allegiance to the Crown does not appear to have been touched by Bradlaugh's Oaths Act. Presumably, therefore, Ministers of the Crown have to take that oath still. We do not make any reference, as you do, to particular persons. Bradlaugh took the oath himself. That is how he entered the House of Commons under the ruling of Mr. Speaker Peel. It was part of the Christian misrepresentation of Bradlaugh that he had refused the oath at first, and afterwards wanted to take it. He never did anything of the kind. He kept on saying so, but he couldn't kill the falsehood.

H. MONTGOMERY.—We do not undertake to answer such letters by post, but we have strained a point in your case. For the sake of others, we may repeat here that marriage before a registrar is perfectly secular. No religious words of any kind are used. Glad to hear that you and your fiancée are both Freethinkers now, in spite of your religious training, and that you read this journal "greedily" every Thursday.

G. F. DIXON.—We shall be printing a photograph of Mr. Foote in the Freethinker shortly. We cannot say anything at the moment about special copies for sale in the ordinary way. You are right about our editor being "not over keen to face the camera." He would as soon face a battery of guns. We have sent you the publication you want.

V. SPRAGUE (U. S. A.).—We answer No to all your questions but one. Such statements about Huxley, Darwin, etc., are pure (that is, impure) Christian inventions—with the exception of the last. Mrs. Huxley's verse was cut upon Huxley's tombstone, but he was dead when it was done, and it is difficult to see how he is committed by it.

JOHN SCOTT.—Yours is a touching letter. One is glad, however, that your Atheist wife bore herself so bravely at the last in presence of the pious harpies who beset her deathbed.

JOHN CLARK.—The matter shall be seen to. Accept our sympathy.

A. H. TABRUM.—Please try an orthodox journal. That seems a more suitable medium for your communication. Mr. Foote is quite prepared to defend his own statements concerning Meredith's relation to Freethought; he is not bound to prove or disprove statements made by others.

T. J.—The first of your quotations is from Swinburne. We do not identify the others. We are not quite sure how long ago it is since Freethought lectures have been delivered in Cardiff, but there was at one time a fair amount of activity in that city. Mr. Foote debated there with Mr. W. T. Lee, and Mr. Cohen and others have lectured there. We see no reason why there should not be more work in the near future.

J. P. (Newtown).—We do not think your edition of Bayle has any particular market value—probably not more than 10s. It is more useful than valuable in a commercial sense. It had a great influence in its day, and is still of use to students. We appreciate the good wishes of yourself and wife, and your opinion of what you are good enough to call our "great work."

C. A. TURNER.—Thanks for your letter re Mr. Tabrum's "Meredith letter." It seems a mare's-nest.

R. S. P.—The matter was dealt with in the Preface to our Jewish Life of Christ. Thanks, all the same; and the cutting may yet be useful.

J. B.—Such letters to the local newspapers must do a great deal of good. Your pious adviser was wrong. Shelley did not write Frankenstein. His wife (Mary) wrote it.

A. J. MARRIOTT.—We don't think Bradlaugh's Impeachment of the House of Brunswick is in print now, but you might inquire of Bonner & Co., 38 Cursitor-street, London, E.C. We will look at the Sabbatarian Bill you mention. It is, of course, absurd to suppose that all workers must rest on the same day. They couldn't do it. Preachers couldn't rest on Sunday, anyhow, to begin with.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid :—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The present issue of the Freethinker is almost a Conference number. The majority of our readers will, we think, appreciate even a summarised report of the proceedings of the Conference, since, thanks to the way in which our glorious English press is conducted, there is no other medium in which this can appear. We also give a lengthy, although not a verbatim, report of the speeches delivered at the public meeting in the Queen's Hall. Here, again, many of our readers will be brought into touch with many of our speakers whom they have little or no opportunity of meeting otherwise. Those who do have opportunities of hearing them on the platform will doubtless be glad of reading their speeches. It is not every group of speakers who are worth reading. Speeches may sound well, but read badly. In this respect the N. S. S. has a certain tradition to maintain, and on this occasion it has been done. Space prevents our publishing this week the (official) Annual Report. That will appear next week.

What we have done in keeping the Freethinker alive for so many years, without capital save our own earnings from other sources, and without any kind of subvention, will be understood by those acquainted with such matters. But they are very few. The bulk of our readers may form some idea from the disclosures in connection with the prosecution of the leaders of the Women's Political and Social Union. It appears that over £4,000 was lost on their paper, the Suffragette, in a period of fourteen months. Yet the paper represented what seemed to be a very considerable movement, it was sold by women at meetings all over the country, and one time it enjoyed a good circulation. Yet the £4,000 went. There never was any £4,000 to drop on the Freethinker. It has had to be sustained by our own exertions—for thirty-two years.

Perhaps the foregoing statement will prompt our friends to a greater activity in pushing the circulation of this journal. The great thing is to get it into fresh hands. We beg our friends to introduce it to their friends or acquaintances. A little missionary work in this way is easily done and is sure to be effectual. Many people who would become regular readers of the Freethinker if they knew of it have never seen a copy of it; others have never even heard of it. Here is an excellent chance for our readers to help us in a way that is not costly, and involves very little trouble. We shall also be glad to send a post-free gratuitous copy for six consecutive weeks to any name and address forwarded to us as that of a person likely to become a regular subscriber. We have gained many new readers in this way.

The Observer of May 11 reproduced a paragraph from its issue of Wednesday, May 5, 1813. Here it is:—

"HOUSE OF COMMONS.

RELIEF TO PERSONS DENYING THE TRINITY.

"Mr. W. Smith moved for leave to bring in a Bill to exempt from certain penalties persons not acknowledging the doctrine of the Trinity.—Leave was given in a Committee, which sat upon the proposition to bring in the Bill, which was accordingly brought in.—Bell's Weekly Messenger."

The result of that Bill was the relief of the Unitarians from the Act of William III. and from the Common Law of Blasphemy as far as the doctrine of the Trinity was concerned. Exactly a hundred years have rolled by since then, and on the same date in 1913 a Bill is introduced to repeal the Blasphemy Laws altogether. Yes, the world does move, however slowly. What the great Galileo said of the physical world, in spite of the terrorism of the Inquisition, is just as true of the intellectual and moral world.

O Mundo, of May 14, publishes a translation of Mr. W. Heaford's Freethinker article of May 11 on "Portugal and its Traducers." Mr. Heaford's article is given the place of honor on the front page of our Lisbon contemporary, which duly acknowledges its indebtedness to the pages of the Freethinker.

Freethinkers residing in or near Wolverhampton, who do not already know, will be pleased to learn that they now have an opportunity of joining a Branch of the N. S. S. in Wolverhampton. Mr. Joseph Bates, who lectured every night last week on Snow Hill to large and attentive audiences, held a meeting at the I. L. P. room in Dudley-street and invited all those present wishing to join the N. S. S. to tender their names to Mr. Wainwright, the secretary pro tem. Twenty-two applications were received, which will doubtless be increased when those in sympathy, who are away on their holidays, return. An offer of a room for meetings has been received and there is every prospect of a strong and useful Branch being formed.

N. S S. Annual Conference.

therefore expresses its sympathy with that movement." In an excellent speech Miss Pankhurst enlarged upon the humiliating subjection of woman under Christianity, upon the disabilities from which she still suffers, upon her beneficent influence in the home and in society, and upon the duty of Freethinkers to do their utmost to secure her emancipation. Mr. R. H. Rosetti seconded the motion, emphasising the fundamental principle of the equality of the sexes before the law. The Conference was in substantial agreement with this motion. Several slight alterations were recommended, and a highly interesting and lively discussion ensued, in which Messrs. Davies, Cowell, Bellamy, Savill, and others took part. Then Mr. V. Roger moved the previous question, and this, being duly seconded and supported, was carried. The feeling was that, in existing circumstances, it was not expedient that the Conference should commit itself on the subject.

Two motions by the Kingsland Branch were as follows: (a) "That an Organiser, or an Organising Committee, be appointed by the Executive, with power to confer with and advise London Branches when necessary." (b) "That all Branches of the National Secular Society be invited to issue an annual record of their income and expenditure, together with the number of meetings held during the year, and that the Executive be instructed to avail itself of the material for the purpose of publishing an Annual Report of the Society's work." These motions were duly moved and seconded by the delegates of the Kingsland Branch; but, after perfectly friendly questions were asked and satisfactorily answered, they were dropped.

On behalf of the South Shields Branch, Mr. R. Chapman moved: (a) "That, in the opinion of this Conference, the Scholarship Scheme should be open to all bonâ fide members of the N. S. S. without regard to the length of time during which they have been members; and that all candidates shall pledge themselves to work for the objects and principles of the Society if successful." Duly seconded, this motion was subjected to a lively discussion. Messrs. Heaford, Davidson, Soddy, Thurlow, and the President strongly advocated adherence to the rule already adopted by the Executive, namely, that the Scheme be open only to those who have been members of the N. S. S. for twelve months. Messrs. Bellamy, Cohen, Hecht, and others were of opinion that no such safeguard was necessary. When put to the vote the motion was lost.

Mr. Chapman, representing his Branch, moved: (b) "That public demonstrations be arranged in such places and districts where, from various local causes the Freethought movement is not making satisfactory progress." After a brief discussion this was remitted to the Executive to take such action as may be deemed advisable.

At this stage the President had to leave, and Mr. Cohen was requested to take the chair. Mr. Heaford moved: "That this Conference welcomes the proposed exchange of visits between London and Paris Freethinkers, and instructs the Executive to take whatever steps it may find necessary to bring the proposal to a successful issue." Mr. Heaford spoke with his usual fervor of the desirability of cultivating a feeling of comradeship between Freethinkers of different nationalities, in order to break down all national and international barriers. The motion was seconded, supported, and carried.

Mr. Cohen now pronounced this very pleasant and successful Conference at an end. There was great rejoicing that the President had been sufficiently recovered to occupy the chair at both meetings, and to guide the discussions with his usual tact and sound judgment.

J. T. L.

PUBLIC MEETING AT THE QUEEN'S HALL.

Mr. Foote, who was received with loud applause and a a voice "Bravo, General!" said: After all, there was something, he supposed, in military language, for the last time he appeared in public at Essex Hall he did not break down from any independent action of his own; he was like a soldier who went out on duty and got shot, though not fatally. He was wondering at one time whether he should be there that night at all, but while there was any force left in him he hoped to be able to use it for the great, good, old cause. (Applause.) Every time he occupied the chair at these Conference evening meetings, he asked the audience to recollect that the National Secular Society was established, led, and inspired by one of the greatest Englishmen who ever lived—Charles Bradlaugh. A great many people fancied Charles Bradlaugh was gone for ever. No man who lived a useful, strong, unselfish life went for ever. Charles Bradlaugh at least lived while his memory kept alight in the heart of any man who knew what he was. It devolved upon them to carry on as best they could the work which he carried on with greater strength than they; but not, they might say without boasting, with greater love of the cause than they themselves possessed. For, after all, he did not see why an obscure man, who had kept his heart bound to the cause, who had lived without advertisement and without notice, might not stand up at last, even with the General himself, and say, "I also loved." And if there should be a meeting beyond the grave, any one of them who loved the cause might feel sure that Charles Bradlaugh would be the very first to acknowledge the claim. But their work was their own in the sense that they had to deal with the problems of to-day with regard to their principles. It was useless for folk to go about saying that Bradlaugh would have done this or that. How did they know? They were only making his dead voice the echo of themselves. If Bradlaugh could advise them from the grave, they would willingly listen, but intermediaries were of no use to them. They had to think and decide for themselves. Fortunately, Freethinkers were never lacking in courage to do that. Courage was a great word. Christianity had been the religion of cringing. Freethought had been the philosophy of courage. What they felt ought to be done, they had always striven to do. Their men and their women went to prison in the old days and suffered persecution gladly. Why? Because they too loved a great cause. They were pioneers of its progress, and although some of them were now forgotten, and some of them could not be remembered because they would not give their names, their courage had lived in their work and made that work easier for them to-day. They stood there, firstly, for the duty to think; secondly, for the right of thought; for duties did not naturally spring out of rights, rights sprang out of duties, and anyone who fancied that he had a right which was not the counterpart of some duty, was mistaken. They held that every section of the community should enjoy the same right in order to fulfil the same duty. He had a right to think for himself; so had everyone; and one man's right could not possibly be greater than another's. As much as he differed from them they differed from him, and he had as much right to stop them as they had to stop him. Bradlaugh was prosecuted for blasphemy. He (Mr. Foote) was not only prosecuted, but he paid the penalty, and now, he was glad to say, that after the agitation of all those years, a Bill had recently been brought before the House of Commons for the total repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. (Sustained Applause.)

He had not quite recovered his voice yet from his illness, but he was glad, even as the case stood, to be able from that platform to tell them that. (Renewed applause.) That was the only revenge he wanted. He had no quarrel with Christians; he had quarrelled only with their creed. They had been in the wrong path; he was glad to see they were turning in the right. They (the Christians) were beginning to be ashamed of their intolerance. It was high time they were! The world could never again be subjected to such intolerance as Christianity had inflicted upon it. And who had won that great result? The men and women of their cause and platform, who had challenged tyranny, plucked its beard, defied it in every way, and who would at the finish feel that their sacrifice and sufferings were all compensated for by the glorious victory of liberty and truth. (Loud and continued applause.)

Miss K. B. Kough: As the Annual Conference marked the beginning of the business year of the National Secular Society, so it could also be said to mark the new year in the activities of that body, and she thought it would be as well if all of them would look around and ask themselves what was the work that lay more immediately in front of them. They knew that Freethought was spreading by leaps and bounds, and that the Churches were becoming emptier every day; and she thought they could take credit for the fact that it wat almost completely due to the work of Freethinkers. It was, at any rate, the Freethinkers who began it; they had done the spade work, and Christians were beginning to see that a little Freethought must be allowed in to leaven their own principles, and they were accordingly becoming a little more reasonable every day. They had to remember that to bring that struggle to a successful issue they still needed militant Freethought propaganda. Militancy was the outcome of intense enthusiasm, and it was the note of more enthusiasm that she wanted to strike that night. She really thought that Freethinkers might make themselves a little more heard. None of the Freethought leaders, past and present, had been millionaires; and while scrupulously fulfilling their various duties, and being most excellent citizens, they had always had the courage of their convictions, and had never forsaken their Freethought principles. It was their duty to sacrifice, and not develop, such sensitiveness for the feelings of their next-door neighbor or their fellow-workman. Freethinkers who take the comfortable path should think of Mr. Foote's twelve months' imprisonment. They should think of the sacrifice Mr. Lloyd made when he left the Presbyterian Church for them. Besides, many of the evils that would follow greater outspokenness exist only in their imagination. If they were only to open their mouths, it would surprise them to find how many people there were holding precisely the same opinions. What would happen to the Christian Churches if every Freethinker were to stand up and declare his Freethought principles, and allowed it to be understood that he was proud of them? It was not for all to sacrifice themselves as their greatest men had done, but much could be done in a quieter way. Circulating Freethought literature and wearing the Freethought badge were simple methods of that character. Women could be very strenuous indeed in working for any cause which had once fired their enthusiasm. (Laughter and applause.) Her regret was that they did not advocate the cause which would get them all so much forward. If they would only realise that it was religion that was woman's worst enemy, they would not only help on their own cause most wonderfully, but they would help on also the liberation of mankind. More specific objects for the immediate future were the abolition of the State Church, the passing of the Bill for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws, and the seeing to it that their children should receive simple justice by a system of Secular Education in the State schools. Let all sympathisers join their ranks and stand shoulder to shoulder in the warfare that aims at saving, not slaying. It was the fight between reason and superstition, knowledge and ignorance, and they took their stand in that battle, zealous only in the cause of truth. (Loud applause.)

Mr. C. Cohen, in the course of an effective speech, liberally punctuated with laughter and applause, said he was not going to endorse Miss Kough's appeal to the Freethinkers to sacrifice. He was going to ask them to enjoy themselves. He preferred to think that all those men who fought for Freethought, and who really believed in it and appreciated it, were not people who sacrified themselves, but people who went in for a deep and genuine enjoyment. Personally, at any rate, he had never sacrificed himself—he enjoyed himself. (A Voice: Victoria Park.) Victoria Park! He had never enjoyed himself more in his life. (Loud laughter.) And he meant to keep on. He couldn't imagine himself getting any enjoyment out of the Salvation Army, for instance, but to realise all that was best and noblest in oneself was not to sacrifice oneself, it was to realise oneself. The trouble was that there were so few people who had found out in what direction real enjoyment lay. Some of them had been half their lives playing the humbug for the benefit of others who were busily engaged playing the humbug for their benefit. (Laughter.) Let them try to be honest and see how much they would enjoy it. When they looked around and saw how some of them were allowed to enjoy themselves without being interfered with, they were inclined to overlook another important fact, and that was that if religion was no longer actively engaged in fighting them in an open, honest, admirable way, it was none the less engaged in fighting them in an underhand, dishonorable, discreditable manner. In England, religion controlled almost all the great events of life. It prepared for you before you were born; it got ready for you in the institution of marriage, so that you might be born in a properly religious atmosphere. The Divorce Commission expressed its fear that religion would lose its hold on marriage. They consulted the Bishop of London, a celibate deeply interested in large families, as to his views on the Divorce Question. (Laughter.) The whole secret of their anxiety was that they dare not lose their grip on marriage. If that went, they lost their hold on the family; if that went, they lost their hold on the children; and if that went, how on earth could they make a man believe in religion unless they started early enough? Do not let them lose sight of the important fact that the idea of keeping religion in the schools is to turn the schools into places for breeding believers. It was purely an economic question. It was a question of providing customers for a class of goods that they would not purchase if allowed to grow up with a natural, unperverted taste. (Applause.) Another point was the Sunday question. If you once gave the people an opportunity for rational, cleanly, decent enjoyment on Sunday, how, the clergy ask, can they expect anyone to go to church? They don't. (Laughter.) But by what right should the religious world prevent the other section from having such enjoyment on Sunday in the interests of Church and Chapel. He did not believe in a one day a week morality. Nothing that was good for Monday was bad for Sunday. If a man had got any villainy in him, he thought it was better for society that he should get rid of it on Sunday, and be decent on the other six days, than that he should keep it quiet on Sundays and let it run loose the rest of the week. If Christians confined their misdemeanors to the seventh day, they would all be much better off. It was just the same in the outside avenues of life. True, the penalty for non-belief nowadays was not burning. The Church had learned that often the only man they silenced by killing was the actual man killed. The rest went on talking. The more modern method has been to insidiously discourage plain speaking. Many a man would stand out against an open bribe in money who would succumb to the insidious bribe of social position. Just as the world suffers in not realising that self-expression is enjoyment, and self-repression is the only real sacrifice, so the world fails to recognise the extent of the amount of hypocrisy, humbug, and artificiality in which religion has plunged it. What was wanted was freedom in thinking, naturalism in morals, and rationalism in social life. They did not believe that a man needed a religion in order to prevent him murdering his next-door neighbor. Whenever a man told him it was necessary to be religious to be moral, he felt inclined to tell him he was a liar. Freethinkers could be fairly decent without religion, and he did not believe they were so morally superior to Christians as Christians made out. He believed that a Christian could be, if he tried, as good as any Freethinker. He thought that thousands of their own preachers had been slandering them for thousands of years. They did not want to revolutionise moral practice. It could not be done. They could create a revolution in moral theory, but they could not affect moral practice at any rapid rate. They wanted people to look at life from a perfectly rational point of view. They wanted them to realise that it really didn't matter whether there was a God or not. Christians said the same—in practice. It didn't matter whether there was a future life or not; if it were there they would get it. There would be enough to go round. It was not a British possession —(laughter)—at least, not yet. (Renewed laughter.) He did not object to having mansions in the skies; he objected to paying rent in advance. And he objected to a people calling itself practical keeping 40,000 men to preach to them about a land of which they knew nothing. This practical people was withdrawing from active productive work, mental and physical, that huge body of men with the necessary huge amount of money, and subsidising this force to work against themselves. The ignorant South African native was laughed at because, when there was a plague of locusts, he knelt down before his joss and burnt incense to clear away the plague. At the same time, the clergy of the Church of England were offering up prayers to get rid of the floods in Norwich. What was the mental difference? (Applause.) Who had the greater excuse? The South African savage or the English savage, with every opportunity for knowing better? Religion was a barbarous, brutalising thing. Circumstances did not at present allow it to express itself in full. Give it the chance and its vile symptoms were always shown. And give Freethought the chance of rearing a single generation from childhood to maturity, and religion, as a whole, would become a memory of the past. (Loud applause.)

Mr. W. Heaford: Brutality and rapacity belonged naturally to religion—belonged to it in the past, and belonged to it to-day to the fullest extent that the Church was able to exercise. Two hundred years ago it burnt the scientist and the philosopher, and it terrorised the great leaders of human thought. A few decades ago it was satisfied to play the part of a body-snatcher, and seized the corpse of a Darwin, after it had done its best during his lifetime to capture his magnificent intellect. The Church to-day was, after all, but the ghost of its former self. It was a ghost that hankered after the old fleshly realities that it once possessed. It still acted the part of a body-snatcher. There recently died in Madrid a great leader of Spanish Freethought, a leader of the anti-clericals, who had been excommunicated by the Church; and yet the Church was mean enough to snatch the body of that dead Freethinker in order that it might have the satisfaction of burying him in consecrated ground. He wished them joy of their victim. He believed the last stronghold of religion would be amongst the English people in these two little islands, and the inhabitants of the United States of North America. Religion was visibly dying. The democracy all over the world was slipping through the fingers of the priest, and was beginning to work out its own destiny without the help of Holy Mother Church. In Portugal, they had both disestablished and disendowed the Church,—hence the ducal tears—(laughter)—hence the reaction against the "wicked" Republic. The Portuguese democracy would not be tied to the apron-strings of the Church, and was determined to give in the schools a rational secular education to every boy and girl, and leave the priest severely outside. (Applause.) If England were to be great, if its politics were to be purified, and if its character were to be dignified by love of truth, that same process must go on here. Theirs was the noblest gospel ever preached to mankind. It was a gospel in the sense of its being true; it was a gospel in the sense of its being good news. There was no angry God to torture and torment his creatures for ever and ever in an unmentionable place which used to be called hell. The Church had invented fresh names; but the old humbug was there, the old priestcraft was there. Until man rose above these superstitions, until he was determined to look with serious eyes upon these traditions of the past, until he was courageous enough to look facts in the face, until that day he would be in bondage to that institution which for two thousand years had been a scourge to mankind. From that day forward, if they had not the mighty intellect of a Bradlaugh, if they were not called upon to make the great sacrifice of a Ferrer or to be burnt at the stake like a Bruno, at any rate they could let their light so shine before the whole world that they would see that, as far as their personal example was concerned, the principles of Freethought would be illustrated and vindicated in their lives, and they would thus do what lay in their power to leave the world better, brighter, and clearer from superstition than when they entered it. (Loud applause.)

Mr. A. B. Moss said: He remembered Charles Bradlaugh winding up a magnificent meeting many years ago at the Hall of Science by saying that no man ever lived to see a religion die. Whilst that was perfectly true, he (the speaker) had lived to see a religion undergo great changes. He was old enough to remember a time when people really believed that Christianity was true; when people really believed there was a burning hell awaiting humanity. On one occasion he had heard Charles Haddon Spurgeon give a very vivid description of hell, and seen him hold his audience spellbound by his exposition. He remembered him pointing into the arena and saying in thrilling tones, "That old man over there with the bald head is damned." (Loud laughter.) They were taught then that all were inherently depraved, and that all their good works were as filthy rags. Of course, that belief was only held inside the church; outside they didn't believe it. And he remembered when people were so ignorant as to believe that the Bible was God's inspired Word—every line, every syllable. They had changed since then. No clergyman nowadays could draw an audience who gave such teaching as that. The people were growing too intelligent. The Christian still thinks he follows Christ. He did not do anything of the kind. It was a good job he didn't, as if the teaching of Jesus was practised, society would fall to pieces. "Resist not evil," "Take no thought for the morrow," "Lay not up for yourselves treasure on earth," "Blessed be ye poor"—he did not blame Christians for not practising such teachings, but he could hardly imagine greater insincerity. Christianity had undergone such a transformation as to be almost unrecognisable. And as knowledge grew, they, as Freethinkers, knew that the changes would become completer still. The forces against Christianity, and which would ultimately destroy it, were the forces towards education. Science, art, music, all the great civilising influences were against Christianity. Christians themselves had come to see that the ground was crumbling beneath them. They were practically admitting it in many ways. They scented a real danger in the humble picture palace. The cinema show was proving a greater attraction than the Church. Some up-to-date churches, in fact, were so awake to this that they were introducing the pictures into their services, and he had even heard of one church in London which was charging one penny extra for admission by the early door. (Loud laughter.) On their side were science, philosophy, and reason, and these would lead to the ultimate triumph of their cause. They cared little about a heaven in the skies, they cared much more about a heaven on earth. They wanted to make it possible for man to lead a full life, with both happiness and health; they wanted to bring about a race with purified ideals and a glorified humanity. (Applause.)

Mr. F. A. Davies: He agreed with Mr. Moss that the old religion was dying, and that the old dogmatic beliefs were intellectually dead. One example Mr. Moss had given of the Christian neglect of the teaching of Jesus, namely, "Blessed be ye poor," was a crumb—a substantial crumb—he had let fall, which would serve him as a text to base his few remarks upon. In this doctrine Christianity presented its most striking feature. Prior to Christianity, the view of real wellbeing that was entertained by the old Jewish people was frankly materialistic. Solomon was a wise man—but he was also a wealthy man. The teaching of Christianity on this point was quite revolutionary. If you were rich, you were poor. If you were poor, you were rich. In a mass of doubtful doctrine there was nothing that stood out so clearly. The poor would be saved; the rich would be damned. Lazarus was poor and Dives was rich. That was all we know about them; yet it was sufficient to send one to heaven and the other to hell. Now, this one fact was a quite sufficient indictment of Christianity. They needed nothing else to show the essential hypocrisy of the whole thing to find a people professing a religion whose main doctrine was poverty, when no one practised it unless he was compelled to. No one dreamt of practising it. Why, one of the religious bodies had put aside a sum of £250,000 so that all their parsons might have a minimum wage of £120 per year. This may seem little enough, but it was more than ever Jesus had. (Laughter.) The newspapers had been engaged on one of their periodic fits of British hypocrisy over the Marconi Commission. We had Mr. Lloyd George, a sincerely religious man, a follower of Jesus, the representative of Welsh Nonconformity in the Government, a man so imbued with the Christ idea that he supported the Evan Roberts revival in Wales—we have him trying to "make a bit" over stocks and shares. But it was not only Lloyd George. "Everybody's doing it." (Laughter.) Mr. Garvin, a Roman Catholic, is unmerciful in his castigation of Mr. George in his endeavors to make money. He is the servant of two millionaire newspaper owners, both Christians. All were Christians, and all were following Jesus in the only real social doctrine Jesus ever tried. His one essential doctrine was poverty. They (the Christians) were following Jesus as far behind him as they could possibly keep. So ingrained was this hypocrisy that they never imagined themselves to be saying or doing anything incongruous. In fact, the easiest way to enter Christian society was to set at naught the Master's command in that way. There was not a single Christian sect who had ever tried it. The Society of Friends had made itself unique; it had tried to follow Jesus in one respect—the doctrine of non-resistance. For this partial consistency their Christian friends gave them a warm time, and taunted them with the name of "Quakers." But even the Quakers drew the line at following Christ on the "Blessed be ye poor" principle. If there were no other argument against Christianity, it would be sufficient to point to the reckless struggle for wealth which goes on in all Christian communities, and the absolute ignoring of this commandment of Jesus Christ. (Applause.)

Mr. J. T. Lloyd: At a recent Conference of the Congregational Union of England and Wales there was passed a eulogium of the Higher Criticism of the Bible without a dissentient voice. A layman was responsible for this, but the Conference cordially endorsed it. The gains secured by the Higher Criticism, they were told, greatly exceeded the losses; in fact, there were no losses. The gains were: a new vision, a new Bible, a new God, a new Jesus Christ, a new Savior of the world. One was justified in exclaiming, "All things are past; we behold all things are becoming new." There was every reason for rejoicing. He was delighted to hear from so many reverent lips that the great Freethinkers of a hundred years ago had not lived and labored in vain; that the Bible which Paine, Voltaire, and many others denounced so scathingly, and that the God believed in and worshiped so implicitly, were dead. So far the Conference deserved their praise. But from many things which were said there he, for one, most emphatically dissented. This new vision had, they were told, completely taken the wind out of the sails of the sceptical controversialists. Nothing of the sort. Their new Bible was just as vulnerable as the old one. It was not so long since Gladstone wrote The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scriptures. That Conference had declared the old impregnable rock to be shattered into millions of fragments, and the same doom would overtake the new. Their (the Freethought) position was that the "Holy Bible" was an exclusively human document, bearing innumerable, unmistakable marks of the ignorance, the credulity, the moral elevation (in the best portions) of its several authors and compilers, and yielding not the least sign of the superhuman. That was the position they held to-day, and the position they held yesterday, and not one incontrovertible fact had ever been adduced by the champions of the old Bible or the new Bible to the discredit. They could look these men in the face and say, so far from their statement being true, it is their own position that has had the wind taken out of its sails. (Applause.) The layman let the cat out of the bag. He said he wished the New Theology had a High Court of Appeal to which they could take all points of dispute, and take from it the decision as to whether these things were settled or not. That was just the trouble. The New Theologians, with their new this, that, and the other had no Court to take disputable questions to. They (the Freethinkers) had one, and to that Court of Appeal they had given the short, sweet, simple name of "Reason." One great poet had called "Reason" a "monarch." They were proud to be known as the subjects of that great potentate, the only power in heaven and earth to whom they knelt. They were assured that this new deity was not revengeful like the old, but tender and patient. They were all his children, and they lived in his house; in fact, they constituted his family, and of this family he was the all-loving head. A perfect father should have perfect children, who held together in harmony, fellowship, and love. One set of the divine family, about forty-one millions, occupied an island called Great Britain, and another set numbering fifty-seven millions were to be found in the country called Germany. Now mark; the inhabitants of these two countries were all children of the same Heavenly Father, who leads them, watches them, and guards them all alike. Now, in order to see the true absurdity of such a doctrine as that, one had only to bear in mind that these two sets of God's children were armed to the teeth against one another, and that peace between them was only preserved by a vast preparation for war. Two other sets of God's children, the Mohammedans and Christians, had devoted many months to the work of killing one another by the thousand. Did they not see how tragic a farce, how stupendous a failure, it was if there were any Heavenly Father? And how had it fared with Jesus? We had lost sight of him until criticism came along and showed him to us afresh. The Savior-God, the God-man, who undertook the delivery of mankind by dying on the cross, this chimeric, impossible being, criticism had lifted bodily out of the New Testament and thrown headlong into the outer darkness; and it had left—a mere man, who was specially called to inform us that we had a living Heavenly Father up in the skies who would truly pardon us for being what he himself had made us, if we truly repented. Here we were confronted with economic injustice, the curse of poverty, and the thousand-and-one wrongs and evils of the world; and the question naturally arose, What could we do? An eminent divine had said last week that there were in God three elements—fatherhood, motherhood, brotherhood—of which the human counterparts were but "shadows." He preferred the "shadows" to these so-called realities. The Holy Trinity was a dream which had never come true. The only trinity worth troubling about was the human trinity of father, mother, and child; and in that trinity lay all the transcendently glorious possibilities for the future of the world. (Loud applause.)

Mr. Foote, in dismissing the meeting, said he had been glad to have listened to his colleagues—he did not often have that pleasure—and in the name of the audience he thanked them for the treat they had provided.

T. H. E.

"Him! The scum, the dirt!" responded Mr. Glubb. "You wait! I'll be upsides with him, if it ban't till we meet in a Better Land. And when the day comes, if I find him up there, I'll break his damned harp over his head as sure as my name is Glubb. Ess, I will, but he won't be there thank the Lord; his goose be cooked for that. So I'll have it out in this world, for, my eyes won't never see that dog in the next."—Eden Phillpotts, "Widecombe Fair."

A Bill to Amend the Blasphemy Laws.

Be it enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

1. After the passing of this Act no criminal proceedings shall be instituted in any court against any person for schism, heresy, blasphemy, blasphemous libel, or atheism.

2. The enactments specified in the schedule of this Act are hereby repealed to the extent specified in the third column thereof.

3. This Act may be cited as the Blasphemy Laws (Amendment) Act, 1913.

SCHEDULE.

Session and Chapter.	Title or Short Title.	Extent of Repeal.
1 Edw. 6. c. 1	An Act against such Persons as shall irreverently speak against the Sacrament of the Altar.	The preamble and sections one to six inclusive.
1 Eliz. c. 1 -	An Act restoring to the Crown the ancient jurisdiction over the State Ecclesiastic and Spiritual, and abolishing all foreign power repugnant to the same.	Section fourteen so far as it revives any enactment repealed by this Act.
1 Eliz. c. 2. -	An Act for the uniformity of Common Prayer and Divine Service in the Church, and the administration of the Sacraments.	Section nine.
14 Car. 2. c. 4.	An Act for the uniformity of Public Prayer and administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies.	Section twenty-four.
9 Will. 3. c. 35 (9 & 10 Will. 3. c. 32. in Ruffhead's Edition).	An Act for the more effectual suppressing of Blasphemy and Profaneness.	The whole Act so far as unrepealed.
60 Geo. 3. & 1 Geo. 4. c. 8.	The Criminal Libel Act, 1819.	In the preamble the words "blasphemous and"; in section one the words "any blasphemous libel or"; in sections three, four, seven, and ten the words "blasphemous or."
2 & 3 Vict. c. 47.	Metropolitan Police Act, 1839.	In section fifty-four, sub-section (12), the word "profane" wherever it occurs.
10 & 11 Vict. c. 89.	Town Police Clauses Act, 1847.	In section twenty-eight the word "profane" wherever it occurs.
51 & 52 Vict. c. 64.	The Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888.	In sections three and four the words "blasphemous or."

This Bill is introduced by Mr. Holt, Mr. Atherley-Jones, Sir William Bylee, Mr. Chancellor, Mr. George Greenwood, and Mr. Radford, and is printed by order of the House of Commons.

A young man presented himself at an oral examination for the position of electrical engineer. To test his shrewdness, the examiner propounded the following question:—

"What is electricity composed of?"

The candidate looked confused, but not wishing to appear too ignorant of the subject, he replied:—

"I am afraid I have forgotten. I used to know the formula, but it has quite slipped my memory."

The examiner smiled.

"That is a great pity," he said. "There are only two people in the universe who ever possessed that particular piece of information. God won't tell, and now you've been and forgotten!"

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 22 SUNDAY, JUNE 1, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Our missionary offices to America as to Africa, consist I believe principally in the stealing of land, and the extermination of its proprietors by intoxication.

—JOHN RUSKIN.

The Dead Jew.

THE ancient Jews occupied an insignificant place in the world's history. The land they inhabited, as Gibbon says, was of the size and fertility of Wales. Yet the chosen people described it as a land flowing with milk and honey. In the same way, they made themselves out to be the most important nation on this globe—which they regarded as flat, as we should be if we believed in their nonsense. God Almighty was always thinking about them. Even when they got into trouble it was only his way of showing his concern about them. Their chastisements were a sign of his love.

The plain truth is the opposite of their patriotic boastings. The Jewish nation simply existed on sufferance. Its existence as an independent kingdom was remarkably brief. It disappeared as soon as one of the great empires stretched out its paw for the mouse of Palestine.

What did the Jew contribute to the world's civilisation? In science, art, and philosophy he was absolutely barren. But he was a fierce religionist. He clung to his god Jahveh with invincible tenacity. His god was himself, immensely magnified; and he was therefore worshiping himself in disguise. His religion was patriotism, as his patriotism was egotism. It was the Jew against the world, and of course the world got the best of it.

Nevertheless, the Jew had his revenge. He imposed himself on the modern world by proxy. As luck would have it, his prophetical Scriptures were the starting point of the new universal religion which arose out of the wreck of the old national religions of the Roman Empire; and the Jewish spirit of fanaticism was necessary in the apostles of a faith which was to triumph over civilisation as well as the imperial authority.

Christianity bound up its own Scriptures with those of Judaism, and is only now, after a lapse of nearly two thousand years, beginning to make a separation, through what is called "The Higher Criticism." Christian "scholars" took Hebrew as the centre of learning, Palestine as the centre of the world, and the petty squabbles of Jewish tribes as the centre of universal history. But all this has been changing since oriental studies, scientific researches, geographical exploration, and world-wide intercommunication, have broadened our minds and enlightened our conceptions of the past. Not to put too fine a point upon it, the ancient Jew is played out. He is a detected fraud. He lied himself into a fine reputation, and Christianity, for reasons of its own, supported him in the imposture. Wider knowledge has exposed his pretensions. When we were shut up, century after century, to slender sources of information, it was easy to deceive us. We were like the boy, who thinks a lot of his village pond, until he gazes on the mighty ocean.

Yes, we are getting over that Jewish delusion. We have studied ourselves out of its history and science, but there still remains a final act of emancipation. Christianity goes on worshiping a dead Jew. It adores him as a veritable god; it also affects to regard him as a transcendent man. It makes him the be-all and the end-all of humanity. The thought of going beyond him is blasphemy. He is first and last, and there is none beside him. Salvation is still of the Jews, through the worship of Jesus Christ. They are dead in everything else, but they live in this, little as their modern descendants suspect the fact.

The godhead of Christ is at its last gasp. The reactionaries see that it can only be perpetuated by a tyrannous abuse of our system of national education. If the child be not captured the man is lost. This is the admission of the Trinitarians. Nor is this all. God the Father is once more asserting his predominance in Christian theology, and the Son is falling into a place of subordination. By this means he will pass out of godship altogether. It is only a question of time. Will it indeed be very long before Christendom exclaims—Great Christ is Dead!

We know how mythical is the "history" of Christ. His career is a plagiarism of that of the old sun-gods. His very crucifixion is a shifting anniversary, with the sun and moon; and his resurrection marks the real birth of the year at the vernal equinox. And thus, if Judaism has survived in Christian teaching, Paganism has survived in Christian rites and ceremonies. The old nature-gods are hard to kill. They have a deeper life than the gods of yesterday. Men will bask in the sunshine and cry "Hail!" to the "god of day" after Christ is swept down to oblivion.

What remains when Christ is gone? The man Jesus. And what is he? A dead Jew? Simply this and nothing more. And why is a dead Jew better than a dead Greek, a dead Roman, a dead Hindu, a dead Chinee, a dead Egyptian, or even a dead Englishman? It was once asked, Can any good come out of Nazareth? It is greater folly to ask, Can any good come except out of Nazareth? Such narrow parochialism is unworthy of the human spirit. The world is greater than Nazareth, and Humanity is greater than Jesus. We will not bend for ever over the tomb of the Nazarene. It is a slavery to keep us there. We will be eclectic. What good Jesus taught (if he ever really lived) we will accept. But we will also reject the rest. We will not worship a dead Jew.

ONE enduring and inevitable consequence of the prevalence of monasticism has not, I think, been sufficiently noticed by many writers. That is, its influence on the ideal of marriage, on the family, and on the domestic virtues generally. Gibbon said that the Pagan world regarded with astonishment a society that perpetuated itself without marriage. Unfortunately, this perpetuation was only secured by the sacrifice of some of the dearest interests of the race. For in general one may say that any appeal to the idealistic aspect of human nature affects precisely the class that are in least need of such a stimulus. The world would indeed lose little, and might possibly gain something, if many who become parents died without leaving descendants. But there is no evidence that monasticism, with its preaching of celibacy, ever attracted this class. The safe assumption lies in quite the opposite direction. Monastic Christianity made its appeal for celibacy on behalf of purity and religion. The sexual relations of men and women were deliberately labelled as "unclean." Married persons had undergone "defilement." Neither the social nor individual value of marriage and the family were recognised, but were at best permitted as inescapable evils.

Hardly any movement ever struck so hard and so disastrously at social wellbeing as did monasticism. Wives were encouraged to desert their husbands, husbands to desert their wives, children their parents. Parents, in turn, were exhorted to devote their children to the monastic life; and although, at first, those who had been condemned to monasteries by their parents were allowed to return to the world on reaching maturity, this liberty was taken from them by the Fourth Council of Toledo in 633.* Some few of the Christian writers of this period protested against children forsaking their parents; but, in general, to trample upon affections of this kind, was treated as the supreme proof of excellence. St. Jerome fully expressed this in the following passage:—

> "Though your little nephew twine his arms around your neck; though your mother with dishevelled hair, and tearing her robes asunder, point to the breast with which she suckled you; though your father fall down on the threshold before you, pass on over your father's body. Fly with tearless eyes to the shadow of the cross. In this matter cruelty is the only piety.....Your widowed sister may throw her gentle arms around you. .....Your father may implore you to wait but a short time to bury those near to you, who will soon be no more; your weeping mother may recall your childish days, and may point to her shrunken breasts and to her wrinkled brow. Those around you may tell you that all the household rests upon you. Such chains as these, the love of God and the fear of hell can easily break. You say that Scripture orders you to obey your parents, but he who loves them more than Christ loses his own soul. The enemy brandishes a sword to slay me. Shall I think of a mother's tears?"†

The consequences of such teachings are not difficult to forecast. Marriage as an institution became coarsened and brutalised. Dean Milman said that in all the discussions concerning marriage and celibacy he could not recall a single instance where the social aspect appears to have occurred to the disputants. Children are rarely mentioned except as an illustration of some point, as one might use any other natural object. Dean Milman's remark is not only true of early Christian literature; to some extent it holds of Christian literature as a whole. That much-admired evangelical classic, for example, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, shows a curious obliviousness to the value of family and social life. Individual salvation is its keynote. Nothing is to be allowed to stand in the way of that. But neglect of the social and humanising aspects of family life inevitably lead to a hardening of character and brutalising of social relationships. The brutal ferocity of the theological disputes of this period has never failed to arouse the comments of historians. But there was nothing to soften and humanise them. Everything was dominated by the theological interest. Next to the sin of heresy in oneself was the tolerance of heresy in others. And we owe it in no small measure to monkish activity that the tolerance of Pagan times, with the widespread respect for truth-seeking, was replaced by the narrow intolerance of the Christian ages, and which has never been eradicated in Christian Europe.

Following upon this influence was the almost total extinction of the civic life and civic virtues that had been so striking a feature of the old Roman Empire. "A candid examination," says Lecky, "will show that the Christian civilisation has been as inferior to the Pagan ones in civic and intellectual virtues as they have been superior to them in the virtues of humanity and chastity." One may justifiably question the accuracy of the concluding part of this statement, but the opening portion admits of overwhelming proof. Celibacy is not chastity, and the reduction of sexual relationships to mere animalism does not result in purity. And it is difficult to see how the coarsening of character that Lecky himself describes can be consistent with a heightened humanity. But there is no question that the growth of humanity spelt disaster to the civic life and institutions of the Empire. Nothing the Romans did was more admirable than their organisation and development of municipal life. They made no attempt at a uniform organisation, but gave as much free play to local feeling and liberty as was consistent with imperial order and peace.* Civic life became, in consequence, well ordered and persistent. It was far less corrupt than administration in the capital, and freedom persisted in the towns for long after it had practically disappeared in Rome. Indeed, but for the influence of Christianity it is not improbable that the urban municipalities might have provided the impetus for the rejuvenation of the Empire.

Against this, however, monastic Christianity was in antagonism from the outset. To begin with, its object was individual salvation, not social development. And to this social activities presented themselves as a decided hindrance. People were exhorted to the monastic life, and praised because of their neglect of civic duties. And as this exhortation naturally affected the more thoughtful and the more conscientious, the immediate consequence was to lower the character of municipal life by throwing its direction into the hands of a less worthy class. Next, the frenzy for individual salvation, and the growing influence of monasticism, made even association with non-Christians, if not a sin, at least in the highest degree undesirable. Theology became the one absorbing and the one important topic. The figure of the monk becomes supreme, and his ideal infects and paralyses the healthful activities of the mass of the people. The Pagans would have understood by a "good man" one who spent himself in the interests of his country. The Christian understood by it one who succeeded in saving his own soul by the sacrifice of all family and social affections. Monasticism, vampire-like, fed itself upon the life blood of the empire, and the civic life and ideals of Rome sank into a mere tradition, to inspire long after such men as Rienzi and those of the French Revolution.

I have no space to more than notice another religious epidemic, also of great significance in the history of both religion and civilisation. This is the various crusades for the recovery of the Holy Land. Pilgrimages to the burial places of saints and other sacred spots connected with Christian history had long been in vogue, and had formed both a source of revenue to the Church and of inspiration to the faithful. Among these places of pilgrimage, Jerusalem held a prominent place, and for purposes of protection and comfort, the pilgrimage usually included a large number of people. Towards the end of the eleventh century, pilgrims who returned home complained of ill-treatment by the Mohammedans. Recent events in Europe have shown how easy it is even to-day to rouse Christian feeling against a Mohammedan power, and it was considerably easier to do so in the eleventh century, and with a people only just recovering from such an epidemic as monasticism. Between them, Pope Urban II. and Peter the Hermit—the former from political reasons, and the latter from sheer fanaticism—succeeded in rousing Europe to a maniacal desire for a recovery of the Holy Land. And for nearly two hundred years the world saw a series of crusades on as absurd an errand as ever engaged the energies of mankind.

Ordinary histories lean to representing the Crusades as a series of armed expeditions, led by princes, nobles, and kings. This gives a quite inaccurate conception of the movement during its most virulent stages. It was, in reality, a psychological epidemic. No custom, howsoever ancient, no duty, no law, was allowed to stand before the crusading mania. Peter himself led a huge concourse of people, ill-armed, and including a large number of sick, aged, and even children. Some of the bands were led by a goose and a goat—a curious felicity in selecting symbols. Although on a religious expedition, small regard was paid to humanity or decency. Defenceless cities en route were sacked, women outraged, and men and children murdered. The Jews were murdered wholesale. Generally, the slaughter of Jews at home was preparatory to crusading abroad. Germany, Hungary, Bulgaria, although themselves providing contingents for the crusading army, suffered heavily by the passage of these undisciplined, lawless crowds.

The most remarkable of all the Crusades, and one which well shows the character of the epidemic, was the Children's Crusade of 1212. It was said that the sins of the Crusaders had caused their failure, and priests went about France and Germany calling upon children to do what the wickedness of their fathers had prevented their doing. The children were told that the sea would dry up to give them a passage, and the Mohammedans stricken by the Lord on their approach. A peasant lad, twelve years of age, Stephen of Cloyes, received the usual vision, and was ordered to lead the Crusade. Commencing with the children around Paris, he collected 30,000 children, without money or food, and commenced the march. A German army of 40,000 children was also mustered, led by a boy of ten years of age. The result of this Crusade may be told in a few words. About 6,000 of the French contingent, having reached Marseilles, were offered a passage by some shipowners, and were sold into slavery. Many others met the same fate, the girls being reserved for a more sinister traffic. Thousands died on the march over the Alps. Some succeeded in getting home again, ruined in both mind and body.

Probably about 5,000,000 lives were lost during the period of the Crusades. And what were the results? First, there is no question that the religious feeling was strengthened. Persecution of heretics and unbelievers assumed almost a mania. Crusades were initiated in other directions—against the Moors in Spain, against the Albigenses, and against other heretics. Failure did not cure fanaticism—it fed it; the returned Crusaders brought their religious intolerance home with them, and it was not the policy of the Church to allow this intolerance to remain idle. This is one side of the picture. The other side is a more favorable one, although it did not immediately show itself. But the Crusades, for the first time, brought the uncivilised Christian West into intimate contact with the civilised Mohammedan East. Large bodies of people had met a people with a courage equal to their own, and with a humanity that was greater, and possessing a culture and a civilisation to which they could lay no claim. Hitherto, Mohammedan culture had only influenced Christendom through the medium of the Spanish schools and universities. Now, the influence became more general. A taste for greater comfort began, literature began to improve. We approach the period of the Renaissance, and to that new birth the indirect influences of the Crusades, despite their religious intolerance, and cruelty, and fanaticism, offered a contribution of no small value.

God and Nature.

IT is a remarkable and highly significant fact that every fairly old church or chapel is surrounded by a graveyard. The popular impression is that the church or chapel antedates the graveyard; or, in fact, that the graveyard is there because it is, in a sense, subservient to church or chapel. Indeed, it is generally taken for granted that a church is a place of worship, and that the dead are buried in its vicinity because it is customary to hold a Divine Service prior to interment. Only the other day a clergyman asserted that "the ancient Britons built Stonehenge because they were awed by the terrors of the Universe and sought to propitiate the sun-god with human blood." The truth is, however, that the graveyard is older than the church, and that the latter owes its origin to the former. There is abundant evidence to show that, originally, what we call a church was not a place of worship at all, but a slab to mark the place of burial, a heavy stone laid on the grave to prevent the dead from rising, or a heap of stones supposed, in many instances, to be inhabited by the ghosts of the deceased. Major Conder (quoted by Grant Allen in his Evolution of the Idea of God, p. 41) describes the various stones employed in the following manner:—

> "Rude stone monuments, bearing a strong family resemblance in their mode of construction and dimensions, have been found distributed over all parts of Europe and Western Asia, and occur also in India..... They include maenhirs, or standing stones, which were erected as memorials, and worshiped as deities, with libations of blood, milk, honey, or water poured upon the stones; dolmaens, or stone-tables, free standing—that is, not covered by any mound or superstructure—which may be considered, without doubt, to have been used as altars on which victims (often human) were immolated; cairns, also memorial, and sometimes surrounding maenhirs; these were made by the contributions of numerous visitors or pilgrims, each adding a stone as witness of his presence; finally, cromlechs, or stone circles, used as sacred enclosures of early hypaithral temples, often with a central maenhir or dolmaen as statue or altar."

There was no unanimity of belief as to where the souls or ghosts of the dead dwelt. Many imagined that they lived on with the bodies in the tombs. Professor Flinders Petrie says:—

> "In Upper Egypt at present a hole is left at the top of the tomb-chamber; and I have seen a woman remove the covering of the hole and talk down to her deceased husband. Also funeral offerings of food and drink, and even beds, are still placed in the tombs" (Religion of Ancient Egypt, p. 12).

Others believed that the ghosts of the dead were in the stone or stones on the top of the tombs, and the living came and feasted with them there. According to another system, all the dead belonged to Osiris, whose kingdom was thought at first to lie in the marshlands of the delta, then somewhere in Syria, and last of all in the Milky Way, which was devoutly sung as the heavenly Nile. According to another system still, the soul at death entered the sun in the west, and was taken along in everlasting light.

Thus we learn that churches were not originally places of worship, but places sometimes of entertainment, and sometimes, alas, of bloody sacrifices, offered to conciliate departed spirits. Such, in brief, was the starting point of the evolution of God and his worship. This was a personally guided evolution, an evolution of which the priests of the different religions have had full charge. The ancient Britons did not build Stonehenge "because they were awed by the terrors of the Universe," but because they were anxious to honor and, perhaps, solicit the favor of, their heroic dead. Nennius, who flourished in the ninth century, and who is the first writer to mention Stonehenge, assures us that "it was erected in commemoration of the 400 nobles who were treacherously slain near the spot by Hengist in the year 472." The Welsh Triads furnish a similar account of the object of its erection. It is an incontrovertible fact that around it there is a ring of nearly three hundred barrows. Even those who regard it as a temple, in which the men of the Bronze Age met to worship the sun, candidly admit that most of the old circles mark out burying places. It is true enough that our far-off ancestors were often "awed by the terrors of the Universe," but that was not because they believed in supernatural powers which were hostile to them, but because they were ignorant and took it for granted that all natural forces were living beings, capable of smiling or frowning upon them. It was Nature of which they stood in such unspeakable awe; and it was this awe, rooted in primal stupidity, that gradually led to the inference of a Super-nature, of a something behind and above Nature which was the cause of all her activities. And so people were found thinking and talking about Nature plus God, or about Nature as a sort of machine worked by a Supreme Being. Curiously enough, from the very first, this Supreme Being, who ran the Universe, was believed to cherish some spite against mankind, and to take delight in doing it almost all the harm he could. He was a Being who needed to be wheedled, cajoled, bribed into something like friendship, or whose placation could be effected only by the costliest sacrifices conceivable. That is to say, God was interpreted in terms of Nature; and, ignorant as these ancestors of ours must have been, their account of God was perfectly rational. If God exists, and inanimate Nature is his instrument, his attitude to the human race, and, indeed, to all other races of living beings, is undoubtedly that of an enemy, or, at least, an indifferentist who cares not what happens.

In the Christian World for May 22, "J. B." quotes Proudhon thus:—

> "God is evil. If God exists he is essentially hostile to our nature. We attain to science in spite of him; to society in spite of him. Every step forward is a victory in which we crush the Deity."

Proudhon was a man who devoted his whole life to the service of oppressed and suffering humanity, and who found it impossible to believe in a good God while face-to-face with such oppression and suffering. Of the Being so violently anathematised by the great revolutionary writer, "J. B." says: "Assuredly, it is not the God we know." But just as assuredly the God "J. B." claims to know permits all the cruel wrongs and evils the contemplation of which filled Proudhon with such infinite disgust. It is amazingly easy to charge orthodoxy with misrepresenting religion, with being an influence that denied justice and fought against it; but the fact remains that if God exists he not only permits injustice to prevail, but actually employs lightning, flood, earthquake, and volcano as instruments of the most cruel and wanton destruction. The God of the Christian World is not one whit better than the God of the Christian or the British Weekly. The truth is that Theism in all its forms is an utterly discredited, self-condemned system. "The Something Behind" has completely failed to justify the belief in it. Justice simply means right relations between man and man and between the human race and the rest of the kingdom of life; and these can be secured alone as the result of our own exertions. "J. B." speaks of a Divine anxiety for the worst sinners living; but the continued existence of the sinners proves the perfect futility of the Divine anxiety.

"The Something Behind" is a metaphysical speculation of the flimsiest character. It can be talked and written about to any extent, but bring it to the touchstone of actual life and its absolute unreality becomes instantly established. Nature and Life we know, but "the Something Behind" is wholly without witness. Take the question of beauty, which "J. B." uses as an illustration, and you will realise the force of the argument. "And what is beauty?" he asks. "It is a question which Materialism can never answer. It is so essentially an affair of the soul." This he says after giving a very eloquent description of the inimitable beauty of Spring—"the trees clothing themselves—the oak, the ash, the elm putting on their dainty attire, the chestnut throwing up its milk-white cones, the laburnum with its golden gleam, the meadows pied with daisies, the bluebells showing as though the heavens were coming up through the earth." "This is beauty, so essentially an affair of the soul," he then exclaims. We maintain, on the contrary, that the beauty so well portrayed is essentially an affair of the material eye transmitted from the material world without to the material brain within. This is not explaining beauty, we admit, but neither does saying that it is "so essentially an affair of the soul" tell us what it is. "J. B." is an Idealist who does not believe in a material existence at all, who has the temerity to assure us that a stone is nothing "but a mass of congested thoughts," and who coolly asserts that the stone's existence, its present, past, and future, its shape, coherency, weight, color, divisibility—that "all these things are ideas, and have no meaning except as appeals, signals from one mind to another." Well, if we were to take that stone and fling it with all our might at "J. B.'s" face, we incline to the opinion that it would impress him as something more substantial than "a mass of congested thoughts."

We are firm believers in Nature, but not in Nature and God. We accept the Universe, but reject, with thanks, "the Something Behind," it. And we must add that it is quite unfair, on "J. B.'s" part, to claim Huxley as an ally. That great scientist was certainly not an Idealist of the "J. B." type; nor was he a Theist of any type. The Prologue to Controverted Questions makes it sufficiently clear that he was not a supernaturalist. He resented being called an Atheist, but he was without God; he repudiated Materialism; and yet invariably spoke of life in terms of Matter.

"All the societies of the Far East are founded, like that of Japan, upon ancestor-worship. This ancient religion, in various forms, represents their normal experience, and it offers everywhere to the introduction of Christianity, as now intolerantly preached, obstacles of the most serious kind. Attacks upon it must seem, to those whose lives are directed by it, the greatest of outrages and the most unpardonable of crimes."—LAFCADIO HEARN, Japan: An Attempt at Interpretation, 1905, p. 517.

"I am aware of a so-called English missionary who rampages about Central Asia with the funds supplied by societies at home, and who, taking with him a portmanteau full of Bibles, thinks that by dropping its contents here and there, he is winning recruits to the fold of Christ. What is the educated Chinaman likely to think, for instance, of Samuel hewing Agag in pieces before the Lord, or of David setting Uriah in the forefront of the battle, and commissioning Solomon to slay Shimei, whose life he had himself sworn to spare, or of Solomon exchanging love-lyrics with the Shulamite woman? Even in the New Testament, the bidding to forsake father and mother for the sake of Christ must to the Chinaman's eyes be the height of profanity, whilst if he can follow the logic of St. Paul, he accomplishes that which is beyond the power of many educated Christians."—LORD CURZON, Problems of the Far East, 1896, pp. 290-1.

"Nowhere is missionary work as difficult as in China. Think, for instance, of the difficulty of explaining to an ancestor-worshiper such words as, 'If any man come to Me and hate not his father, he cannot be my disciple. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father.'"—REV. E. J. HANDY, John Chinaman at Home, 1905, p. 317.

EVEN if, after enormous labor, the missionary masters the Chinese language, his pathway is still beset with difficulties. As Dr. Morrison observes:—

> "I believe that it is now universally recognised that the most difficult of all missionary fields—incomparably the most difficult—is China. Difficulties assail the missionary at every step; and every honest man, whether his views be broad, or high, or low, must sympathise with the earnest efforts the missionaries are making for the good and advancement of the Chinese. Look, for example, at the difficulty there is in telling a Chinese, who has been taught to regard the love of his parents as his chief duty, as his forefathers have been taught for hundreds of generations before him—the difficulty there is in explaining to him, in his own language, the words of Christ, 'If any man come to Me and hate not his father, he cannot be my disciple. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father.'" *

We have noticed the apathy displayed by the Chinese regarding the existence of a God, of a soul, or of heaven and hell. This, combined with their ancestor-worship, forms an almost insurmountable obstacle to their conversion to Christianity. Mr. A. H. Smith, who was himself for many years a missionary in China, tells us that: "The Polytheism and Pantheism of the lower classes of Chinese are matched in the upper classes by what appears to be pure Atheism." And "there never was on this earth a body of educated men so thoroughly agnostic and atheistic as the mass of Confucian scholars."† And, further, the same author declares:—

> "It is frequently quite impossible to interest a Chinese in the question whether he has three souls, one soul, or no soul at all.....he is very likely to care nothing either about his 'souls' (if he has any) or about theirs, unless it can be shown that the matter is in some way connected with the price of grain" (p. 308).

Moreover, he adds, "the idea of solemnity appears to be foreign to the Chinese mind." But "this does not prevent his conformity to the rite. The ancients did so, and he does as they did. Whether it is of any use 'who knows'" (p. 300). Just as among our upper classes they attend church as a social function and because it is the thing to do.

It must be confessed that the Chinese character provides very unpromising material for Christianity to work upon. But the rock against which the waves of missionary enthusiasm beat in vain is ancestor-worship.

To quote Mr. A. H. Smith again, whose work, Chinese Characteristics, is acknowledged to be the best and most authoritative work dealing with things Chinese:—

> "It is a melancholy comment upon the exaggerated Chinese doctrine of piety that it not only embodies no reference to a Supreme Being, but that it does not in any way lead up to a recognition of His existence. Ancestral worship, which is the most complete and ultimate expression of this filial piety, is perfectly consistent with Polytheism, with Agnosticism, and with Atheism. It makes dead men into gods, and its only gods are dead men. Its love, its gratitude, and its fears are for earthly parents only. It has no conception of a Heavenly Father, and has no interest in such a being when He is made known. Either Christianity will never be introduced into China, or the ancestral worship will be given up, for they are contradictories. In the death struggle between them the fittest only will survive" (Chinese Characteristics, p. 185).

We do not believe that in that struggle Christianity will emerge victorious, unless by altering its creeds and dogmas it accommodates itself to the spirit of ancestor-worship, and then it will not be Christianity but something else.

Let us try to realise the strength and vitality of the cult of ancestor-worship as practised in the Far East. Says Lafcadio Hearn:—

> "By aid of that cult have been evolved all ideas of duty to the living as well as to the dead—the sentiment of loyalty, the spirit of self-sacrifice, and the spirit of patriotism. What filial piety signifies as a religious force can best be imagined from the fact that you can buy life in the East—that it has its price in the market. This religion is the religion of China, and of countries adjacent; and life is for sale in China." *

When the Panama railroad was being constructed—many years ago, before science rendered the place healthy and habitable—the laborers, black and white, died off like flies before the unhealthy conditions then prevailing, until not sufficient could be procured for the work. Says Hearn:—

> "But labor could be obtained from China—any amount of labor at the cost of life; and the cost was paid; and multitudes of men came from the East to toil and die, in order that the price of their lives might be sent to their families.....Where this religion prevails, the individual is ready to give his life, in a majority of cases, for the family, the home, the ancestors.....Out of filial piety, indeed, has been developed the whole moral power that protects the State—the power also that has seldom failed to impose the rightful restraints upon official despotism whenever that despotism grew dangerous to the common weal" (p. 58).

The Chinese, the Japanese, and the Korean, says Mr. Arthur Diosy in his fine work, The New Far East:—

> "has ever present to his mind the thought of his forefathers. He lives surrounded, as it were, by a crowd of ghostly relatives, eagerly scanning his every action. With the Japanese, racial instincts cause the feeling to predominate that prompts them to add fresh lustre to the ancestral roll of honor by valiant deeds in war, or by acquiring civic fame in times of peace" (p. 231).

To the Chinese it seems to have been narrowed down in the majority of cases, says the same writer, "to a slavish adherence to the ways that commended themselves to his forefathers, and an intense dread of offending them by any departure therefrom."

A Chinaman may be a Buddhist, a follower of Confucius, or a Taoist, but before and above all, he is an ancestor-worshiper. Ancestor-worship is older than any of these systems, which only obtained a footing in China by accepting it as it stood. Mr. Chester Holcombe says:—

> "The worship of ancestors is literally universal in China. There are no exceptions to the practice, except in the case of Christianised Chinese, and on no other ground do these receive so much criticism and abuse, amounting in individual cases to persecution, as for the neglect of this solemn duty. So far as can be discovered, the worship is as old as the race. It is the most deeply rooted of all forms of religion in the very fibre of the Chinese character, and, beyond all question, it will be the last of all forms of false faith to die out among them."‡

As is well known, China, at the end of the seventeenth century, came within measurable distance of being Christianised by the Jesuits. Under their influence, "Christianity," says Mr. Arthur Diosy, "flourished for a time to a remarkable degree, numbering its churches by hundreds, and its adherents by hundreds of thousands." ‡

Mr. Davonport says it "progressed by leaps and bounds, extending over all Northern China, even beyond the Great Wall into the old Chinese province now called Shing King, in Manchuria." And, further on, he remarks: "The progress of Christianity was, perhaps, more rapid than has ever been known in any other part of the world."§

How is the remarkable success of the Jesuits in the seventeenth century, and the undeniable failure of the hundred-fold more numerous missionaries of to-day, to be accounted for? There are several reasons.

In the first place, the Jesuits had the field to themselves. There were not a multitude of Christian sects contending with one another for converts, each sect being regarded by the Chinese as a different religion.

Then, as Mr. Diosy points out, the modern preachers began "their labors at the wrong end"; they "devoted their attention almost exclusively to the lower strata,"* the corresponding class from which the Salvation Army recruit their ranks in this country. The Jesuits, on the other hand, says the same author, "wasted no time, but proceeded straight to the fountain-head of local authority; they—

> "ingratiated themselves with the highest in the land .....established themselves in the Palace at Peking, erecting their church within its pink ramparts, and became the trusted high officials and intimate friends of at least three of China's greatest Manchu Emperors."

But, then, these Jesuits were learned men, conversant with Western science, who made themselves very useful to the Emperors as mechanicians, astronomers, and in the practice of medicine. Matthew Ricci, the Jesuit missionary, says Professor Parker in his China and Religion (p. 191), was "a profound mathematician, very erudite, and also patient and courteous to boot, he greatly impressed the educated natives." Of Verbiest, another of them, the same authority observes, "He was all the more able to obtain good terms by his readiness to cast brass guns of large calibre.....and by his handiness in arranging diplomatic difficulties with the Russians" (p. 197).

Then, again, the Jesuits saw that it would be useless to contend against ancestor-worship, so they incorporated it in their own faith. Says Lafcadio Hearn:—

> "In China, the Jesuits were quick to perceive that the power of resistance to proselytism lay in ancestor-worship; and they shrewdly endeavored to tolerate it, somewhat as Buddhism before them had been obliged to do. Had the Papacy supported their policy, the Jesuits might have changed the history of China; but other religious orders fiercely opposed the compromise, and the chance was lost."†

It was the Dominicans and Franciscans who—attracted to China by the success of the Jesuits—acquainted the Pope with the heretical proceedings of the Jesuits, and they were formally condemned by the Holy See:—

> "The worship of Confucius and of ancestors was condemned as pagan, so that missionaries were not allowed to attend any festivals or sacrifices connected therewith; Chinese philosophy was deemed to be altogether heretical, and even Chinese books were not to be admitted into the missionary schools, because they contained superstitious and atheistic matter."‡

This practically put an end to the Christian propaganda in China. The Emperor Kanghsi was highly offended; "he was justly incensed at the assumption of the Pope in issuing edicts and interfering in the internal affairs of the Chinese Empire,"§ and forbade any missionary to remain in the country without his permission. His son and successor, in the year 1724, issued an edict strictly prohibiting the propagation of Christianity.

The Resurrection of the Dead.

THE Christian Burial Service is based on the fifteenth chapter of the first Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, notwithstanding that its teaching respecting the resurrection of the dead is contrary to that of Jesus Christ. Is it not so? Well, let us consider the point.

Paul, the self-styled apostle, was a conceited bigot, who claimed to understand "those mysterious points which are inscrutable to man." Said he: "For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day according to the scriptures" (v. 3, 4).

"According to the scriptures"! What scriptures? They could not have been the New Testament, for not a line of it had then been written. They must, therefore, have been those Hebrew writings part of which now form the Old Testament. But where in the Old Testament is there the slightest allusion to a Christ who should "die for our sins," and be "buried and rise again the third day"? There is not one. The only so-called prophecies regarding a Ruler in Israel speaks of him as being a man, and not a supernatural being; as one who should be a powerful potentate, not a spiritual myth—a barbarian conqueror like unto Joshua, who should exalt the Jewish nation above all the other nations of the earth. Paul, therefore, was either ignorant of the "scriptures," or he deliberately told an untruth respecting them. What a pity it was that he did not, as he suggested others should do, "awake to righteousness and sin not" (v. 34).

Having spoken thus, to the "shame" of those whom he was addressing, he proceeded thus:—

> "But some man will say, How are the dead raised up? And with what body do they come? Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die; and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or some other grain; but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him; and to every seed his own body" (v. 35-38).

Was ever a more nonsensical statement made? And yet Paul calls the man to whom he is addressing himself a "fool"!

Says Paul: "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die." Does not common sense teach us that dead seed does not quicken, and that it is only living seed which germinates and produces a living plant?

Says Paul: "That which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or some other grain." Is not such so-called reasoning simply pitiful? The dead body of a human being when placed (that is, sown) in the grave is not "grain" of any kind, and, being dead, cannot reproduce itself. To liken it to, or to compare it with, "wheat," which it "may chance" to be, "or some other grain," is mere silliness. Animal life—and physically man is an animal—is absolutely different from, and can have no affinity with, vegetable life.

Then we are told that "God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him; and to every seed his own body." There is no "chance" here. But how can a dead body, whether in or out of the grave, be given a body? And, were it "wheat or some other grain," God could not—as is proved by the words "to every seed his own body"—give it any other body than that which naturally belongs to it; for does not common sense teach us that "every tree is known by his fruit. For of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble bush gather they grapes" (Luke vi. 43).

Paul endeavors to cover up his blunder by perpetrating another, for he says: "It is sown a natural body, and is raised a spiritual body." But on what fact does he base such an assumption? Is not this unsupported assertion plain proof that "on those mysterious points which are inscrutable to man" he was as ignorant as all other human beings are? If the body raised be not the body that was placed in the grave, no resurrection can have taken place; for resurrection means, and means only, the rising again of the dead body that had been buried in the grave!

Paul's assertion that "this mortal must put on immortality" (v. 53) is equally absurd. Immortality is not a garment that can be put on and off. That which is immortal never had a beginning, as it shall never have an ending; and, therefore, the being who possesses it must have possessed it from all eternity.

This, then, is the teaching of Paul. What is the teaching of Jesus Christ? Here it is:—

> "If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee; for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into Hell. And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee; for it is profitable that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into Hell" (Matt. v. 29, 30).

These were the words which Christ spake in his Sermon on the Mount, and what could they mean but that the corpses of all human beings will, at the Judgment Day, be raised from the dead even as, at his crucifixion, "many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of their graves, and went into the holy city and appeared unto many" (Matt. xxvii. 52, 53). And that he meant what he said is proved by the fact that, on a subsequent occasion, he reiterated his statement, saying:—

> "Wherefore, if thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut them off, and cast them from thee: it is better for thee to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into everlasting fire. And if thine eye offend thee pluck it out, and cast it from thee: it is better for thee to enter into life with one eye, rather than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire" (Matt. xviii. 8, 9).

And, mirabile dictu, Paul, when writing to the Thessalonians, contradicted the assertions he had made to the Corinthians. For, when speaking of the Last Day resurrection, he said: "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air" (1 Thes. iv. 16, 17).

Acid Drops.

Edward Clodd is surely rather "previous" in saying, as he does in a recent letter to the Daily Chronicle, that—"If the vicar of Great Clacton and all other ministers of religion would agree that the Bible should be included in the curriculum of public elementary (and other schools) as literature (than which there can be no greater and nobler) they would carry the whole country with them." We hope the Association of which Edward Clodd is Chairman would not endorse this utterance. Nor did we think that their Chairman was so "childlike and bland." Keeping the Bible in the schools as "the highest literature" is the game of the Rev. Dr. Clifford and similar representatives of the Nonconformist Conscience—which, by the way, is no conscience at all. These gentlemen know very well that the Bible may be kept in the schools as a book of literature, and used there as a book of religion. That is what it is used there for. It cannot possibly be used as a book of literature until it is dead as a book of religion. We venture to suggest, also, that when it is dead as a book of religion it will be much less praised as a book of literature. What remains to be said is that Edward Clodd appears to be only half emancipated. He sees through religion—yet he trusts the clergy. George Meredith knew better. That is why he preferred our methods of attacking Christianity to Edward Clodd's.

As we expected, there was more in the Chinese Government's request for prayers in the Christian Churches than met the eye. No one but a fool or a fanatic could have imagined for a moment that the Chinese authorities were really convinced of the value of the prayers of its Christian subjects. We said at the time that it was a political dodge, although it suited the game of the missionaries to take the appeal at its face value. Now we see that the advanced Republicans in China are asserting that the call to prayer was nothing more than a move to gain support, at home and abroad, for one political party. The internal condition of China is very unsettled, and the Government appears to be putting down opposition in a very high-handed manner. The Chinese Republican (Shanghai) accuses the Government of resorting to assassination, and publishes documents in support of its statements. Christians at home may yet regret that they permitted themselves to be so easily fooled by their leaders, whose chief concern appears to have been to raise more funds.

It is amusing to note how widely the men of God differ on the most important subjects. The annual breakfast meeting of the Lord's Day Observance Society was recently held under the chairmanship of the Dean of Canterbury. Dr. Wace held that the fourth commandment is still in force; that is to say, that we are under a moral obligation to keep the Sabbath Day holy. Archbishop Whateley, however, pronounced such an idea "utterly unintelligible"; and surely the Archbishop was as competent to judge as is Dean Wace. The truth is that for the religious sanctity of Sunday there is not one sound argument.

The Rev. S. J. Poole, vicar of St. James's Church, Gravesend, is determined to do his very utmost to preserve the sanctity of the Sunday. A second sermon by him appears in the Reporter for March 17. In the first, he argued quite rightly, that the existence of Christianity depends upon the preservation of the sacred character of the Day of Rest. In the second he contends, erroneously, that the preservation of the weekly rest-day is conditional on its perpetuation as a day of worship. In this he is certainly wrong. Is he not aware that the State is continually providing additional days of rest for the people? Has he not heard of the Shops Act of 1912? There is absolutely nothing to indicate that if Sunday ceased to be a sacred day it would be lost as a public holiday.

The remedy for the "evil" of Sunday secularisation, says the Church Family Newspaper, lies in the hands of the people themselves. We do not agree in the "evil," but otherwise we concur in the sentiment expressed. If people do not want Sunday entertainments, let them stay away. They may be assured that none will be kept going if an audience is not forthcoming. But it is wholly vicious to ask the State to stop people attending because others desire to stay away. And it is stupid to ask for them to be closed lest people should be tempted to enter. The Freethinker asks for no more than that the matter should be left in the hands of the people themselves. Let those who wish to go do so. Let the others stay at home, or go to church. There will then be perfect liberty all round in a matter which permits absolute freedom without injuring anyone.

The Evangelical Union of South America held its annual meeting a few days ago. The Rev. C. Inwood is a missionary recently returned from South America, and although he has lived and labored there, he calls it "a continent of dead souls." In a leaflet issued by the Union the question is asked, "Do you know that it is a continent without Christianity and without God, and that its people have never heard of a Savior from sin, but are in utter darkness?" Speaking at the aforesaid meeting, Mr. Inwood, referring to Argentina, said that "unless something special happened in a few years, they would have a civilised and a degraded Heathenism rampant in their midst."

Now, what are the facts? Take the Argentine Republic, to which Mr. Inwood alluded in such disparaging terms, and you will find that 991 per 1,000 of the population are Catholics, while only 7 per 1,000 are Protestants. We have no faith in the moralising influence of any form of Christianity, but we are convinced that the missionaries misrepresent Catholic South America quite as grossly as they misrepresent Pagan China. Is Protestant Britain free from corruption, immorality, illegitimacy, and crime? Does not Mr. Inwood know that we require 68 722 policemen to render life fairly safe in the United Kingdom? We boldly affirm that, morally, Protestantism is every bit as big a failure as Catholicism, or that Christianity is everywhere a wholly discredited religion.

Warriors of the Cross again! Look at the following passage from the Daily Chronicle of May 24, in the course of a telegram from its Vienna correspondent, dated May 23:—

> "A Sofia report describes the exasperated feeling prevailing there at the Servian outrages committed at the Bulgarian village of Zagra. The report throws particular light on the morals and behavior of the Servians. Servian officers were assaulting girls, and the indignant villagers shot the officers, whereupon Servian soldiers burnt the village. Six Bulgarians were killed and 80 wounded."

Onward Christian soldiers!

A missionary, writing to the Guardian from South Africa, says that Christianity altogether fails there to hold its own against Mohammedanism. He says there is scarcely a town in South Africa where Mohammedanism is not daily making converts, not only from the natives, but from the mixed races. In Capetown he refers to three whole streets that have now become Mohammedan which formerly were Christian. His conclusion is that "Instead of winning Mohammedans to Christianity, we cannot even win back our own who have become Mohammedan."

A model of the skull of the "oldest woman in the world," which was found at Piltdown Common, Sussex, by Mr. Charles Dawson, F.S.A., has been added to the collection at the Natural History Museum. Scientists consider that the original lived about 50,000 years ago. This was long before the time of old Father Adam.

The London Budget, in a recent issue, contains an account of a new manuscript of the Bible, stated to have been found in Egypt. By a singular coincidence, the same number of the periodical also contains an article, "Antiquities Made to Order."

Royal personages learn nothing and forget nothing. The procession through the streets of Berlin, in which the "God-anointed" monarchs journeyed, with soldiers all around and the despised populace at a very respectful distance, might easily have been paralleled in the days of the first Pharaoh.

The Rev. Prebendary F. S. Webster advises open-air preachers to avoid argument. We can assure him that all we have heard usually do so. If he could only induce them to avoid misrepresentation, the manufacturing of fictitious experiences, and cultivate truth-speaking, it would be a move in the right direction.

Seven offertory boxes in Brighton churches have been rifled in the course of a single week. A case of "Let us Prey."

The Guardian heads its report of the East London Fund for the Jews Annual Meeting, "The Appeal of the Jew." We are not aware that the Jews have been appealing to Christians to come and convert them, and certainly the results do not lead one to believe that they are anxious to "come in." It is rather the appeal of impertinent Christians for funds to carry on a work that is without even the apparent justification of ordinary missionary labors. No Jew is made better by becoming a Christian, and, although we should like to see the whole Jewish race merged in the populations amid which they reside, it is absurd to expect that they would be benefited by becoming Christians. The natural growth of the Jew is not from Judaism to Christianity—that is certainly not an advance, and it might be plausibly argued that it is a distinct retrogression. His line of growth is from Judaism to Freethought. And that is the line that is actually followed all over the civilised world.

Miss Evelyn Underhill, authoress of The Mystic Way, believes that there are two Christianities taught in the New Testament, one for "the many," the other for "the few"—the one exoteric, the other esoteric. Miss Underhill is in error. There are three Christianities in the New Testament—the Jerusalem, the Pauline, and the Johannean—and each one is a complete negation of the other two. Yes, even at the very beginning, three distinct Gospels were preached—The Gospel of Jesus, the Gospel about Jesus, and an attempted combination of the two. Paul's was the Gospel about Jesus; and in the Billingsgate of his day he vigorously cursed every other, by whomsoever preached.

The Christian Church is nineteen hundred years old, but we learn from the organ of the New Theology that up to the present moment she has not evolved "a positive message." "The conviction is deepening that the time has arrived when" she should do so. We are told that there is great need for it, and that there are "provided indications of the awakening of the religious mind"; but so far the "positive message" is conspicuous only by its absence. The truth is that the Church delivers innumerable positive messages, every one of which contradicts all the others; and this is one reason why she is dying.

The increase of the expenditure on armaments between 1905 and 1912 was as follows:—

Russia	from	51	to 76	millions
Germany	,,	50	,, 71	,,
France	,,	43	,, 59	,,
United States	,,	42	,, 65	,,
Austria-Hungary...	,,	18	,, 32	,,
Italy	,,	16	,, 25	,,
Great Britain	,,	61	,, 73	,,

The total increase between 1905 and 1912 was from 281 millions to 400 millions. Such is the upshot of the Gospel of the Prince of Peace! That 400 millions, wisely spent, would soon redeem the world.

That women will in time take the place of men as parsons is the belief expressed by the Rev. Anna Shaw, who, with Mrs. Charlotte Gilman, occupied the pulpit at the Ethical Church, Bayswater, on a recent Sunday. In America there are already 3,000 women in the pulpit, while the number of men is decreasing. As the congregations of all churches are largely composed of women, this irruption of women in the pulpit promises to make religion purely a Feminist movement.

Drapers have declared war upon the farthing rates which figure so prominently in retail drapery transactions. The last refuge of this despised coin will be, in all probability the collection bag at churches.

Dr. Len Broughton is an exceedingly popular preacher, and preaches every Sunday to crowded congregations at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, London. As is well known, he is an American who settled in this country a year ago. The following extract from a sermon preached in his own church on Sunday evening, May 18, is, therefore, eminently significant:—

> "Everywhere I go I hear the wail of the loss in membership and of the shrinkage in congregations. The great rank and file of the world, say what we please, is moving away from the Church of Christ. And if this present moving of the masses of men from the Church of Christ continues at the present rate, it does not take a prophet to say that the day will come when the Church is doomed.....Something is radically wrong, and it behoves us to cease our bragging, and our fear of being charged as pessimistic, to face honestly the situation, and, if possible, find out for ourselves what the trouble is."

"Zoo in hysterics," runs a headline in an evening contemporary. Perhaps it is the arrival of a crowd of those little creatures which showed the magicians of Egypt "the finger of God."

Replying to a correspondent, who suggests the closing of churches during a portion of the week, as protection against militant Suffragettes, the Guardian thinks that with police outside and watchers inside the danger may be minimised. But what is the matter with God? One would think it was his business to guard the churches against attack. They are all solemnly consecrated to him, and the least he could do would be to look after his own property. To fall back upon policemen and volunteer watchers seems an awfully common, secular way of doing business.

The Dean of St. Paul's thinks that the special task of the next generation ought to be "the promotion of a better understanding between religion and science in all matters of social life." Immediately after expressing that opinion the Very Rev. Dr. Inge went on to say that already in this country religion is almost a thing of the past. On his own showing, Christianity has been and is a colossal failure amongst us. The following are his words:—

> "Never before in our history has there been such a throwing off of all restraint, and all reverence—such contempt for rule and custom—such greedy pleasure-seeking in all classes. I fear we are rapidly becoming the least industrious, as we have long been the most wasteful, of the nations of Europe."

What a sad, humiliating confession for an ambassador of the infinite, omnipotent, and all-loving Christ to make!

In a non-stop piano-playing feat a Manchester clerk rendered 1,400 pieces of music from memory. He was fed, washed, and shaved while playing. Was he practising for the eternal Hallelujah Chorus in heaven?

"Any contribution to funds such as the South London Church Fund," says the Duke of Devonshire, "ought to be regarded as an insurance." Precisely! A fire insurance.

"Many preachers," says the Christian Commonwealth, "faced by the fact that the old certitudes and convictions are irretrievably gone, make no attempt to replace them with new." This is a fair sample of the kind of thing that passes muster with some people for sound thinking. How on earth can a certitude ever go? A conviction may disappear, but a certitude remains such to the end of the chapter. What people took for certitudes in the field of religion are now to all capable minds exploded fallacies. And there is really more to admire in the preacher who sees this much, and says so, than in the one who is looking about for new ones—which in practice means a more or less conscious misinterpretation of acknowledged facts, or a building up of new beliefs on a basis of sheer ignorance. There are no certitudes to-day in the field of religion. There are certitudes in science, and in morals, and in life in general; but these have nothing to do with religion. Secular science provides the only possible clues to an understanding of man and the world; and there is no need whatever for a religion that, if honest, can only re-echo its teachings, and, if otherwise, can only serve as an obstruction to rational life.

"The Perfect Three" is a Daily Mail heading. It does not refer to the Christian Trinity.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £136 13s. 5d. Received since:—Mr. and Mrs. Deakin £5 5s.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for cuttings.

G. THACKRAY.—We cannot act as a medium of book loans and book exchanges between our readers. If we took the first step, how could we resist the second?

E. B.—Your cuttings are always welcome.

J. BROOKBANK.—We appreciate your feelings in the matter, but it is quite impossible for us to send competent Freethought speakers to Dr. Saleeby's meetings to deal with his vagaries. It is possible, also, to attach over-much importance to an alleged "Rediscovery of Design in Nature." The myth of design in nature was exploded long since for all with intelligence enough to discern its character, and we are not afraid of its re-establishment at the hands of Dr. Saleeby. Neither he nor anyone else can discover what does not exist; but for minds that are only partly freed from superstition there is a natural fascination in unscientific ideas, and speakers of that class will always succeed in attracting their like.

J. WILLIAMS.—The Welsh pastor you quote may be quite correct in saying that some pitboys' wages are more than those of some Congregational ministers. We do not know if this be the case, but we feel pretty certain that the pitboy who does his work well deserves more. And, after all, these ministers do not take the low wages from choice. Their wages are low for the same reason that another person's wages is not high. We do not agree with sweating in any direction, and those who engage ministers ought to pay them. But there is something profoundly insincere in this cry about the poorly paid clergy, as though it were due to conscious forbearance on their part. If more was offered them they would take it. And we do not know that many of them would be earning more in any other profession, and some would certainly be earning less.

W. AINSLEY.—Thanks. We are always pleased to receive cuttings or items of news that correspondents think will be likely to prove of service.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

A special meeting of the Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws, of which Mr. Foote is a member, was held on Tuesday evening, May 20, to consider the Bill for Amending the Blasphemy Laws that we reproduced in extenso in last week's Freethinker. It was decided to give a general support to the Bill at once, but to approach the introducers with a view to certain improvements. Another committee meeting will be held soon to consider the introducers' reply. Mr. Foote will therefore reserve his editorial criticism of the Bill until that committee meeting has been held, as he wishes to act loyally with his fellow members. There is no need, of course, for any hurry.

On Mr. Foote's suggestion and motion a copy of Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner's excellent little book on the Blasphemy Laws is being sent to every member of the House of Commons, with a covering letter drawing special attention to its value and importance.

We congratulate the Glasgow Corporation on exhibiting a little common sense (under pressure) in connection with Sunday closing. The Council had decided to close all ice-cream shops, restaurants, fried-fish shops, etc., on Sundays, besides insisting on 10 o'clock closing during the week. The Sheriff Principal, however, refused to confirm these bye-laws, with the result that the Council has now passed bye-laws allowing Sunday opening from 10 to 8, closing at 10.45 on week-night and 11 on Saturdays.

There seems quite an epidemic of common sense in Glasgow—we mean so far as Sunday is concerned, for we do not believe there is any lack of it in other connections. The Caledonian Railway Company continues its Sunday excursions to pleasure resorts, and has even promised an enlargement. The Southern Presbytery of the Free Presbyterian Church has observed this "with pain," and "respectfully warns" the railway company that "God will certainly punish transgressors for this form of iniquity either in this world or that which is to come." Meanwhile the company is content to risk punishment in the world to come for the sake of better dividends here. We congratulate them on their decision.

The Wood Green Branch is holding some very successful open-air meetings at its old station on Jolly Butchers Hill. Miss Kough had a large meeting there on Sunday last, and Mr. Davidson on the Sunday previous. What the Branch needs most at present is more local help. If some of the sympathisers who attend the meetings, and who are willing to help in the actual work of the meetings, will give their names and addresses to the chairman, their services will be much appreciated.

A special meeting of the Kingsland Branch will be held to-day (June 1) at 7.30 p.m. at Mr. Davy's, 21 Castle-street, Stoke Newington. Important business has to be considered.

Mr. E. Torday, in his Camp and Tramps in African Wilds, gives an interesting comment on the supposed danger to white women amongst natives. He does not profess an acquaintance with the "half-civilised" natives of the coast, but as they are under European influences one ought not, in any case, permit their conduct to influence our judgment of other Africans. So far as the natives of the interior are concerned, he says emphatically that they are "utterly unlikely" to insult white women. "Even in the most dangerous parts of the Congo, where a man would require a strong military escort, a white woman would always be able to pass unmolested." But, he says, "the natives respect the white man, and expect you to respect their wives and sisters." Unfortunately, that, we expect, is precisely what the white man often fails to do. He goes out with certain notions as to the character and morality of the natives, and, once among them, thinks any conduct good enough. And it is just a question how far missionary activity is responsible for this. Missionary societies have flooded the world with accounts of native life that are to a large extent prepared with an eye to creating support for missionary work. The natives are represented as little better than animals, plunged in all sorts of degradation, and because their customs are different to ours, regarded as being destitute of morality. The consequence is, that the white man starts off with an utterly erroneous notion of the character of the native, and thinks any kind of treatment good enough for him. Then when misconduct brings reprisals, there is an outcry; and this still further confirms, to superficial onlookers, the gross inferiority of the native races.

Mr. Torday says he has twice crossed the Congo Free State and has never come across a tribe that was not naturally good tempered. This quite bears out what many other travellers have said. More than one has expressed the opinion, based on actual experience, that the white man who deals with the natives fairly and honestly, respects their customs, and treats them as human beings, is quite safe. Exceptions to this rule arise usually when the natives are smarting from wrongs inflicted by other white men. And in such cases their action is as indiscriminate and on the same level as the treatment of an English crowd to a foreigner because Great Britain has trouble with the country from which he comes. Mr. Torday says that all the natives ask is to live in peace themselves, and let everyone else do likewise. Unfortunately, this is what the white races will not permit. The trader exploits them in the interests of profit, and the missionary in the interests of religion. And often the latter, with his "Industrial Mission" and private trading, combines both.

Rudyard Kipling.

"Amid littleness and detail he detected the genius of life, the old cunning Proteus, nestling close beside us."—EMERSON.

THERE has been, perhaps, something of a slackening of public interest in the works of Mr. Rudyard Kipling during the past few years; but the production of an edition-de luxe of his writings, a rare compliment to a living author, has met with so ready an appreciation that it augurs well for a revival of his fame.

Few writers ever took the field with so instant and signal a success. Emphatic, impetuous, audacious, he voiced contemporary passion and sentiment with no uncertain sound. Its possibilities and dangers were both mirrored in his stirring talent. First came the rumor of a new genius from the Orient, after the manner of creeds from time immemorial. Then "Plain Tales from the Hills" put many of us in an uncritical stage of admiration, "Soldiers Three" and "In Black and White" completed the conquest, and subsequent works in prose and verse caused the reading public, like Oliver Twist, to ask for more.

After centuries of the religion of the "Man of Sorrows," it is good to think that Mr. Kipling is a power. Since Dickens few English authors have roused so much hearty laughter. "The Taking of Lungtungpen" and "The Incarnation of Krishna Mulvaney" recall the open-air humor of Marryat and the animal spirits of Fielding and Smollett.

To have made India a reality to dwellers in the United Kingdom is, in itself, no mean achievement. Meadows Taylor, Marion Crawford, and other novelists had reminded us that there was such a place. Phil Robinson humorously discussed the beasts and birds, but Kipling awoke the stay-at-homes to the real India, including the places—

"Where the best is like the worst—
Where there aren't no Ten Commandments,
An' a man can raise a thirst."

The studies of native life collected under various titles have importance far beyond their relative size. Mr. Kipling's versatility is unquestioned; but few were prepared to find that the hand that sketched "In Black and White" should also have produced the far more subtle "Jungle Books." "Without Benefit of Clergy," "The Man Who Was," "The Drums of the Fore and Aft," and a dozen other short stories are little masterpieces. With De Maupassant, his aim is for color, air, and light, with his eyes on the supreme moment only. His art is as modern as Maeterlinck in its breadth, and as classical in its restraint as the pages of old-world Homer.

Like Meissonier, Mr. Kipling succeeds best on a small canvas. "The Light that Failed," "Stalky & Co.," and "Captains Courageous" are magnificent failures; but the short stories are in every way admirable. Despite his limitations, he is one of the most popular writers of the day. With Bret Harte he presents us with infinite riches in a little room. The best of his work would hardly bulk more largely than one of the novels of old Samuel Richardson, which used to draw tears from the eyes of our great grandmothers. For readers of to-day like their sensations brief and pungent. Realism and romance meet within the covers of Mr. Kipling's books. The art which conceals art is made subservient to the human nature of his characters. In their warm-blooded, and often lawless, natures we feel no shackles of convention cramping their actions, or rendering them less true to life as we know it. Had his stories been told in the manner of the "penny-dreadful," devoid alike of grace and grammar, we had yet read them with pleasure, so vital are they in essentials.

Mr. Kipling possesses other gifts, and he has sought the bay leaves of the poet. Although lauded extravagantly as a singer, it must be admitted that he is seldom other than a brilliant and spirited rhymester. "Departmental Ditties" are clever society verses; "Barrack-Room Ballads," "The Seven Seas," and "The Five Nations" are more evidence of a poet in heart than of an artist in expression. They are stirring, these clever metrical and verbal effects, but they are not the "linked sweetness" of real poetry. The golden music of Swinburne or the quiet dignity of William Watson is never paralleled in Mr. Kipling's pages. The exquisite audacity of "Tomlinson" serves only to remind us what such a theme might be in the hands of a great master of melody. The "Recessional," if we have any canons to measure it, must show cleverality rather than poetry as the result; but we dare not dwell too closely upon Mr. Kipling's rhymes. To the great public, to the people who admire the verses of Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Mr. Kipling may seem a poet; but to the lovers of real literature he is first and foremost a romancer, who can hold his audience surely with his stories.

Much has been made of Mr. Kipling's piety. The young lions of the Tory press proudly acclaim him as the most religious poet since Dryden, and the Nonconformist journalists sorrowfully retort that he has no "soul." This, however, is the merest partisanship. Of all the gods created by men in their own likeness, the Anglo-Indian deity of Mr. Kipling is the most astonishing. Such sentiments as those expressed in "The Young British Soldier" ought to make the pious penmen shy of claiming Mr. Kipling as a lineal literary descendant of Dr. Watts:—

"When you're wounded and left on Afghanistan's plains,
An' the women come out to cut up your remains,
Just roll to your rifle, and blow out your brains,
And go to your Gawd like a soldier."

He uses Biblical illustrations with a freedom which reminds one of Sir John Falstaff:—

"Said England unto Pharaoh, 'You've had miracles
When Aaron struck your rivers into blood; [before,
But if you watch the serjeant he can show you something
He's a charm for making riflemen from mud! [more,
It was neither Hindustani, French, nor Coptic,
It was odds and ends and leavings of the same,
Translated by a stick (which is really half the trick)
And Pharaoh harked to Serjeant Whatsisname."

Now and again Mr. Kipling leaves this fluent fingering of the keys and strikes a deeper note. He has reproduced in most startling fashion the wondering amazement of the Hindoo brought face to face with the Christian religion:—

"Look, you have cast out love! What gods are these
You bid me please?
The Three in One, the One in Three? Not so!
To my own Gods I go.
It may be they shall give me greater ease
Than your cold Christ and tangled Trinities."

In "White Horses" the piety has become tinged with patriotism, and he hints that the very sea is bestowed by the Almighty for the purpose of destroying the enemies of England. In the "Recessional" our wonderment is by no means lessened. The second verse, if it stood alone, might pass, though its best line, "An humble and a contrite heart," is by no means novel. How curious is the association of the reference just quoted to that other sentiment:—

"Such boasting as the Gentiles use,
Or lesser breeds without the law."

We would not close upon this note. Writing at a time when so much of contemporary literature is neurotic and "tommyrotic," Mr. Kipling has kept always to the white road of pure fancy, the path that winds between fragrant hedgerows and leads into the shadowy woods. How fresh it seems, how young, how invigorating, to take the old road with Mr. Kipling, and walk once more with the soldiers three into the beckoning forest of romance. We never grow too tired or too old for that quest and that recompense. Read with admiration to-day, we wonder if the charm of Kipling's witchery will last. It matters little, perhaps. He has an audience, and in the future the secret of immortality is beyond us, as the greater secret was alike to old Omar and his lustrous lover. To discover how much choice of subject and novelty of incident has prejudiced us in his favor is not worth trying. "Nature's infinite book" is open to all. If Rodyard Kipling finds themes to move his readers to laughter or to tears where others had but found poor material for dreary books of travel, so far from decrying such talent, ought we not to yield him praise for the pleasure he has given the English-speaking world?

MIMNERMUS.

The Co-operative Habits of Animals.

PITILESS as the eastern blast which sweeps earth and sky in the early days of spring, the processes of nature have, nevertheless, been materially tempered by the co-operative devices incidental to plant and animal life. Vegetable organisms club together for strength and security, and in the animal kingdom various ingenious contrivances have been evolved which soften the harsh influences of frigid unemotional nature. The social instinct has worked wondrous benefits to those creatures which associate for mutual aid and support. And the crowning product of evolution, the human family, has profited immensely through the shielding influences of social solidarity. What the most earnest and heartfelt supplication to the gods has failed most utterly to accomplish has been achieved through that social instinct which animates the world of life as a whole. A thousand and one instances might be recorded in which solitary animals would readily succumb to the unfavorable factors that environ their lives, but which are enabled to multiply and replenish the earth as a result of their gregarious habits and instincts.

The social insects such as ants and bees have risen in consequence of their co-operative habits to a very advanced stage of social and intellectual evolution. They, at least, have learned the lesson which mankind has so far failed to master, that those members of the community that render no service to the State are merely a burden upon the working population. They who produce nothing, either mentally or physically, are relegated to their proper position in a commonwealth whose existence is dependent upon the mutual benefits rendered by those who form its social and economic assets.

Travellers and naturalists have often remarked upon the extreme friendliness which the fiercest birds of prey manifest among themselves. The co-operation of all kinds of aquatic and terrestrial birds against carnivorous enemies is also well attested by careful and competent observers. Among migratory birds the co-operative spirit attains a high degree of development. Birds which were previously scattered over a wide range of territory assemble in the spring and autumn at appointed places before proceeding upon their perilous journeys over land and sea. And if we may judge from the deluge of talk in which they indulge, they seem to be debating as to the ways and means of their projected travels. Those very eminent authorities, Seebohm and Dixon, fully corroborate the accounts of earlier ornithologists concerning the animated discussions of migratory birds when they return to their northern resting stations in spring. "For many days in succession," says Prince Kropotkin, "sometimes one month, they will come together every morning for one hour before flying in search of food—perhaps discussing the spot where they are going to build their nests."

Ascending to mammalian life, we find that social species are far more numerous than those few unsocial carnivorous quadrupeds which still maintain their position in places where man's influences have as yet little force. The far spread herds of antelopes, buffaloes, gazelles, and deer; the immense flocks of undomesticated goats and sheep, are all social creatures. Vast congregations of squirrels formerly abounded in Siberia, and the grass-lands of Eastern Africa are still the pasture places of immense herds of zebras and antelopes. The intensely social beaver was abundant in all the running waters of Northern America and the Siberian streams until man waged a war of wholesale destruction upon these highly intelligent rodents. Such markedly colonial rodents as marmots, ground-squirrels, mice, and other animals continue to flourish in almost incredible profusion in favorable habitats in all the mainland masses of the earth's surface. In the tropics troops of sagacious elephants still survive, and the most numerous monkeys belong to species which are most distinctly social in habit. The social reindeer is the outstanding feature of the sub-Arctic regions, and the leading animals of the Polar areas are the gregarious musk oxen and Arctic foxes. The seals and cetaceans are mainly fraternal animals, and, despite their unrelenting persecution by man, they still survive in large numbers. All the wild horses, camels, and asses are in their natural state markedly social, and immense herds of these organisms still pasture in the great plateau of Central Asia. The gregarious creatures, when totalled, number very many millions, while the unsocial or solitary carnivores are, in comparison, very few.

Among the more numerous flesh-eating mammals, however, the social instinct is more pronounced. Nor are the lions, tigers, and other large cats quite so unsocial as was formerly supposed. Chalmers Mitchell has given us a very pleasing picture of the family life of the lion. Sir Samuel Baker noted the co-operation of the king of beasts when seeking for prey. Another characteristically carnivorous class—the entire dog family—is notoriously sociable. All the wolves appear to hunt in packs, as also that other member of the dog family, the jackal. Even the surly bear is not indifferent to the society of his fellows. As a matter of fact, social desires dominate the world of life in general, although they exist in various degrees of development.

It is a noticeable circumstance that social solidarity is most highly evolved among animals who would be comparatively defenceless if they stood singly and alone. Co-operative phenomena are most elaborate among social insects, birds, rodents, herbivorous mammals, and our monkey cousins. Hundreds of species of monkeys are known to science, and the co-operative factor varies very considerably among them. We possess little knowledge of the habits of nocturnal apes, but they appear to prefer a secluded and isolated life. Small family groups are formed by the howling monkeys, and among the man-like apes the orang-utan has always been seen alone or in small troops, while the gorilla appears strictly as a strong family man. But all the other members of the monkey tribe, the mandrills, chimpanzees, baboons, and the rest associate in large groups on the friendliest footing, and even strange species are sometimes permitted to enter their congregations. Most monkeys become melancholy in solitude, and their poor health and high mortality in captivity is often solely attributable to this cause. In their native forests, when beset by enemies, the cries of those who have wandered from the main body cause the other animals to rush to their assistance. They co-operate when attacked, and are frequently successful in beating off their enemies, particularly the smaller beasts of prey and carnivorous birds. Even the imperial eagle considers discretion the better part of valor where a band of monkeys is concerned. The devoted love of the female for her offspring is well known to all students of natural history. One of the fine plates in Chalmers Mitchell's recent work, The Childhood of Animals, represents a monkey fondling and suckling her young. This illustration was taken in the Zoological Gardens, and the whole attitude of the mother and babe is most remarkably human in appearance. The most trustworthy eye-witnesses affirm that several species of monkeys manifest the deepest concern for their wounded companions, and refuse to leave them until they are certain that they are past recovery. James Forbes and his fellow-hunters were so much impressed by the grief of some monkeys at the sight of a dying comrade—a victim of one of their guns—that they solemnly resolved "never again to fire at one of the monkey race."

Herbert Spencer, the greatest of all modern philosophers, has shown us that the primitive association of living cells into colonial groups laid the firm foundations for all subsequent evolution. In a steadily developing degree, this co-operative organisation most certainly distinguishes every ascending rung in the ladder of evolution. Therefore Prince Kropotkin is fully entitled to assert that in the course of this evolutionary advance the social trend becomes more and more conscious.

> "It loses its purely physical character, it ceases to be purely instinctive, it becomes reasoned. With the higher vertebrates it is periodical, or it is resorted to for the satisfaction of a given want—propagation of the species, migration, hunting, or mutual defence. It even becomes occasional, when birds associate against a robber, or mammals combine, under pressure of exceptional circumstances, to emigrate. In this last case, it becomes a voluntary deviation from habitual modes of life.....It also takes higher forms, guaranteeing more independence to the individual without depriving it of the benefits of social life. With most rodents the individual has its own dwelling, which it can retire to when it prefers being left alone; but the dwellings are laid out in villages and cities, so as to guarantee to all inhabitants the benefits and joys of social life."*

It appears a self-evident proposition that the protective factors bound up with corporate life constitute a powerful instrument in the struggle for existence. Communal life fortifies weak insects, puny birds, and defenceless mammals from the assaults of their foes. Other things equal, the gregarious mode of life secures greater longevity and promotes the maturity of sufficient offspring to maintain, at least, the average number of the species. It is fully realised that numerous other factors are involved in the maintenance of the race. But it will be conceded by those best acquainted with the complex conditions which govern animal life, that the immense importance of the social factor is hard to overrate. Intelligence, for instance, is of inestimable value to the organisms which possess it in any high degree. But mental faculty is probably more largely indebted to the social factor than it is to any other. It has been said that "Language, imitation, and accumulated experience are so many elements of growing intelligence of which the unsocial animal is deprived." Given highly evolved organs of touch, and combine such organs with an environment in which facilities are constantly afforded for gaining new experiences, and we find such eminently sociable animals as ants, parrots, elephants, monkeys, and men which combine the greatest gregariousness with the most highly evolved mental powers.

Against the elements the social factor is practically powerless amongst most organisms below man. Bird life in Britain is always more richly represented after a succession of mild winters. A hard and prolonged frost usually takes a terrible toll of bird and insect life. In Sussex, after the severe winter of 1885-6, the skeletons and feathers of what once had been plump blackbirds, were quite numerous near the farms and hamlets. A dozen dead birds might have been picked up in one orchard alone. Sir George Trevelyan mentions an outstanding American instance of a similar kind. He writes:—

> "January, 1779, was the coldest month recorded in a series of observations which had been carefully and continuously noted down in Pennsylvania over a space of nearly two centuries.....The snow lay from four to six feet deep over the whole country. Wild animals were almost exterminated, from deer and turkeys down to squirrels and partridges."†

When, however, the fullest allowance is made for the survival value of strength, swiftness, protective and warning coloration, cunning, and power of endurance in the brute battle of life, the fact remains that the nobler qualities of reason, justice, sympathy, and love find their fitter nurseries among those organisms whose social proclivities serve to evolve a state of existence in which the weak and helpless are to some extent guarded from danger. Society life helps to limit the physical struggle, and thus assists the evolution of the higher æsthetic and moral emotions and desires. The securer the social structure, the greater the amplitude and duration of human life. With the deepening of life's processes thus rendered possible, we may confidently anticipate a future of sublimer artistic, literary, and ethical achievement than any the world has so far witnessed. For whereas in past ages the advantages conferred by culture have been almost entirely confined to a favored few, the day is now dawning when the higher things of life will become so democratised that they will be placed within the reach of all who care to cultivate, create, or enjoy them.

Another Lie Nailed Down.

I SEEM to have a nose for a lie. I suppose it is because I have spent so much of my life in attacking Christianity—which is the most lying religion on earth. The German historian and philosopher, Herder, who was not a fanatic nor even a partisan, went to the length of saying that "Christian veracity" deserved to rank with "Punic faith."

What a lot of Christian lies I have nailed down in the pages of the Freethinker! To enumerate them all would take a good deal of space. I must leave them, therefore, at present, to the memory of my readers.

Some of the lies I have run down were big ones—such as the Torrey lies about Paine and Ingersoll. Others were of a middling size, and others again were small ones—hardly big enough for a Freethinker to refute or a Christian to invent. I leave my readers to determine the size of the one I am now bringing to their attention.

An old reader of this journal, Mr. A. Hopkins, in the course of a letter I received from him dated May 15, wrote as follows:—

> "Last Sunday week I heard a Christian Evidence lecturer reading extracts from a letter in Hyde Park. I neither heard the commencement nor the end, but the letter had to do with the close of the late Mr. Wheeler's life. So much as I heard showed how the Christians had cared for him, and how, at a meeting in a small attic in Judd-street, Euston-road, the sick man had ordered Mrs. Foote and others out of his room because they were not converted or saved. All this and more was read from a many-paged letter by the lecturer. Unfortunately I could not stop to challenge the speaker; for I was with friends from the country and could not stop till the end."

Mr. Hopkins has made inquiries at my request, and the lecturer appears to have been a Mr. H. A. Marsh. I think I have heard that name before. Was it not the name of the Christian gentleman who, with the aid of a Christian local newspaper, gave such a brilliant exhibition of Christian charity at Streatham Common a few years ago? An exhibition which ended with a threat of bringing up three hundred Billingsgate porters and King's College divinity students to drive one poor Atheist speaker off the field; thus showing that the friends of Christ were many as well as select.

I have heard again from Mr. Hopkins. He attended the Christian Evidence meeting in Hyde Park last Sunday (May 25) and questioned the chairman, a Mr. Allen, about the letter from which Mr. Marsh had been reading.

> "He was quite familiar with the matter, and said that as far as his recollection served the writer of the letter was a sister of Mr. Wheeler. He further told me that the letter was in possession of Mr. Richards, who lived in Tramway-avenue, Lower Edmonton. It appears that Mr. Allen is in regular attendance at Hyde Park on Sunday mornings, and he told me that he will be pleased to be seen any time to give further information on the matter."

Digitized by Google

But there is no need for Mr. Allen to concern himself about "further information." I will supply it myself, and I am a better authority than he is on this subject. Mr. Wheeler was my oldest and dearest friend. I loved him while he lived; I have never ceased to love him since he died. He has been dead for fifteen years, and for fifteen years he was my sub-editor on the Freethinker, and my comrade in many other Freethought enterprises. He was a vice-president of the National Secular Society to the last breath he drew. That Society paid the cost of his funeral, and I, as its President, delivered an address at his graveside. And I found that he had appointed me executor to his will. Yes, I think I ought to know something about the last days and hours of Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. And I say that the statements now made in this precious letter read at Hyde Park are absolute lies,—as I will prove in next week's Freethinker.

(To be concluded.)

The Coming Education Bill.

MANIFESTO BY THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE SECULAR EDUCATION LEAGUE.

DURING the past few years it has been repeatedly declared by supporters of the Government that certain political questions must, as far as possible, be dealt with and settled in order to give time and opportunities for the consideration of other matters affecting the welfare of the people at large. The speech of Lord Haldane at Manchester on January 10, made on behalf of the Cabinet, intimated that chief among those important subjects will be the ever-recurring question of National Education. It is evident from Lord Haldane's speech on that occasion, amplified on various occasions since by other members of the Government, that an effort will be made to deal with the question in a more comprehensive and systematic way than has hitherto been attempted. Such a settlement would probably fix the conditions of our educational system for a considerable time.

There is one aspect of the question—that of religious education in State-supported colleges and schools—on which it is quite hopeless to expect a satisfactory settlement except on the lines of the fundamental principle that the State, composed as it is of citizens of all creeds and no creed, should have nothing whatever to do with the teaching of religion in any of its educational institutions. It is inevitable that in any proposed new legislation on this subject attention will be directed largely to the proposal for eliminating the religious difficulty by the adoption of the Secular Solution; and it is of the highest importance that the most careful thought should be given to it by every citizen, in order that, if possible, the divisions among educationalists which have so long obtained on this particular subject shall be permanently removed and the ground cleared for united effort for the real educational progress of the nation at large.

It is a lamentable, but acknowledged, fact that for many years the controversies that have arisen on this subject of religious teaching in the State Schools have markedly hindered the cause of true education. Time and energy that should have been devoted to the physical training and mental culture of the children of the nation have been diverted to unprofitable discussions as to what religious dogmas should or should not be taught in the schools, and real education has continually suffered in consequence. In spite of carefully prepared syllabuses, the children have been taught, as was inevitable under the circumstances, dogmas on which neither the sects nor the nation were agreed; while unfair religious tests, expressed or unexpressed, have been imposed on the teachers, who have suffered accordingly. It is incumbent on all those who have the cause of true education at heart to use every effort to ensure that, whatever the new proposals may be, this old ground of contention shall once and for ever be removed, and the way made clear for the working out of those wide and far-reaching principles on which all citizens, whatever their private or personal beliefs, can unite and harmoniously work together for the common good.

It is unnecessary to enter here on the controversies of the last two or three generations. It is sufficient to point out that the Education Act of 1870, which, with its Cowper-Temple compromise, was supposed to bring peace on this vexed question, brought on the contrary a sword, which up to the present day has continually been sharpened by the sectarian controversialists. Since 1870 every effort to settle the question in the various Education Bills which have been introduced by both the great political parties has broken down, by reason of the continual clinging to illogical and unjust compromises, which have satisfied no one, but have actually increased the confusion, both of thought and attempted action. This has again and again been acknowledged by the great political leaders on both sides. Mr. Gladstone stated that he had never been strong against secular education. He said: "It seems to me impartial, and not, if fairly worked, in any degree unfriendly to religion." Mr. John Morley said that on this question the Act of 1870 was a most "deplorable illustration of refusing to examine ideas alleged to be impracticable." As lately as 1906 Mr. Joseph Chamberlain said: "There are only two means of settling this question. One is that the State should pay for no religious teaching, and the other is that the State should pay for all religious teaching." He had always given his support to the first. And the late Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman stated that in his opinion nine-tenths of the Liberals, if they had their own way, would ask for the Secular Solution.

What is the Secular Solution? Not that the State in its schools should be hostile to religion, but that it should simply be neutral. The secular position is that the State, which, in its collective capacity, is the custodian and expender of the taxes that are drawn from all citizens, irrespective of their religious opinions, should refrain from supporting any such opinions through its educational institutions. The believer in Secular Education would object as much to State support of Secularism or Atheism as he would to the support of Roman Catholicism, Anglicanism, or Nonconformity. The advocate of Secular Education holds that the responsibility for providing religious teaching rests with the parents and the churches, and that with it the State, as such, should have nothing to do.

The present system of illogical compromise and injustice satisfies neither parent nor teacher. The time has come when it should be swept away in favor of a system which, besides being perfectly logical, is also—which is even more important—perfectly just. The only system which meets these necessary requirements is Secular Education. The Secular Education League confidently appeals to all citizens to use their utmost endeavors in the coming educational campaign to determine that once and for all the nation's schools shall be freed from sectarian controversies and religious disputes, so that National Education may be promoted in harmony with those humane principles on which all citizens are agreed.

These are the principles on which the new measure must be framed, if it is to produce harmony and lasting peace.

"The Miracle" is the title of a remarkable film now being shown at various cinematograph halls through the country. Since the good old Bible days it appears to be the only miracle which has attracted general attention.

According to the Evening News, a Liberal candidate "hopes to attend one service in every place of worship in the City." This proposed increase in the congregations of the derelict churches will, if carried out, cause great joy in ecclesiastical circles; but politicians will not be likely to accept it as a precedent.

Dr. Herbert Gray, writing in the Evening News, says that the football captain is "a demi-god." Why demi? Is it because he does not make it so hot for his opponents as the more popular deities?

The clergy have made begging a fine art. Recently the personal column of a daily paper contained an appeal by a vicar who wished to take his wife abroad "free from cost." Another advertisement was from a young Anglican clergyman who desired "adoption," and still another from a parson's widow who asked for help to educate her boy. Why do these people advertise instead of praying?

A peeress has been writing to the Times in indignant tones concerning such dances as "Turkey Trot" and "Tango," which she describes as "horrors of Negroid origin." What would the titled lady have said of David's demure dance before the ark, described in the Bible? That dance would make any turkey trot.

In the course of a recent action to determine the copyright of a dramatic sketch, the author stated that he was not indebted to anybody for his plot, and added that "the incidents were as old as Adam, perhaps a little older."

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st., London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Intellectual cowardice is quite as disreputable as physical cowardice.
—W. R. PATERSON (Benjamin Swift).

The Witch Mania.

WITHOUT discussing whether magic precedes religion or not, it is plain that the practice of magic belongs to the very earliest ages of human culture. The witch and the wizard are familiar figures in all stages of religious history. Not only are their figures familiar, but their method of operation remains substantially constant. The methods of bewitching people or things described in European witch trials of the seventeenth century are precisely those practised by savages all over the world. A Fijian would have felt quite at home sitting on the judicial bench with Sir Mathew Hale condemning poor half-insane women for magical practices. To bewitch a person by securing a few hairs belonging to him, or to cause his death by manufacturing a lay figure and driving pins into it, are plans pursued by savages to-day, just as they were followed by the more civilised savages of these islands little more than two centuries ago.

In subscribing to the belief in witchcraft, Christianity only fell into line with other forms of religious belief. Its peculiarity is that, coming into existence when it did, it gave to the belief an authority that it was fast losing, while its intolerance of opposition prevented criticism doing the natural work of purification. The primitive theory of things, which holds that man is surrounded by spiritual agencies, mostly of a malevolent description, was fully endorsed by the early Christians. In the commonest as well as in the rarest events of life demoniacal agency was to be seen. The suppression of witchcraft had been ordered in the Old Testament, and demoniacal activity endorsed by the New. Moreover, the fact that Christianity, for long after its establishment as the religion of the Empire, was struggling with earlier forms of faith, gave further impetus to this belief. An easy explanation for miracles and marvels that occurred in connection with non-Christian beliefs was that they were the work of demons. And in all probability much that went on under the form of witch assemblies, up to a comparatively late date, a more detailed knowledge than we possess would show to be the exercise of prescribed forms of faith. The old saying, "The sin of witchcraft is as the sin of rebellion," has in it more than meets the eye. There is little real difference between the magic that appears as piety and the magic that is denounced as sorcery, save that one is permitted and the other is not. The gods of one religion become the demons of its successor; and the same rule applies to the practice of successive faiths.

But while witchcraft exists in all ages, it exists in a way quite different to that which presents itself from the fifteenth to the end of the seventeenth century. For centuries the attention of the vast majority of people had been directed and centred on questions of theological interest. Every branch of culture was under the control of the Church, and no explanation was tolerated that conflicted with its teaching. The general mind was saturated with supernaturalism to an almost incredible degree. The wildest tale of witchcraft was suitable to such an environment, and there is no question that many of those who were tried and executed for sorcery actually believed the things they were accused of doing to be within their power. The fifteenth century saw, too, a rising tide of heresy against which the Church was forced to do battle, and to ascribe this to the agency of Satan was an easy plan to pursue—just as the heretics attributed the power of the Church itself to the same source. Social conditions were also favorable. Moral ties were as loose as they could reasonably be, and the attitude of the Church towards the sexual relation had forced the religious mind into wholly unhealthy directions. This aspect of the witch epidemic has been but little dealt with, but it is undoubtedly a very real one. A German writer says:—

> "Whilst in the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth centuries, as those well acquainted with the state of morals during this period can all confirm, a most unbounded freedom was dominant in sexual relations, the State and the Church were desirous of compelling the people to keep better order by the use of actual force, and by religious compulsion. As forced a transformation in so vital a matter necessarily resulted in a reaction of the worst kind, and forced into secret channels the impulse which it had attempted to suppress. This reaction occurred, moreover, with an elemental force. There resulted widespread sexual violence and seduction, hesitating at nothing, often divinely daring, in which everywhere the devil was supposed to help; everyone's head was turned in this way, the uncontrolled lust of debauchees found vent in secret bacchanalian associations and orgies, wherein many without masquerade played the part of Satan; shameful deeds were perpetrated by excited women and by procuresses and prostitutes ready for any kind of immoral abomination; add to these sexual orgies the most widely diffused web of a completely developed theory of witchcraft, and the sympathetic strengthening by the clergy of the widely prevalent belief in the devil—all these things, woven in a labyrinthine connection, made it possible for thousands upon thousands to be murdered by a disordered justice and to be sacrificed to delusion."*

That there was a very strong sexual element in mediæval witchcraft is undeniable. When we examine the stories current of the "Sabbath" of the witches, we find that a large part of the proceedings are of a strongly marked erotic character. The figure of Satan often enough reminds one of the old Pagan deity, Priapus, and it is possible that the "Sabbath" itself was little more than a carrying out of the old priapic ceremonies, with the mixture of Christian language and symbolism made inevitable by time and other circumstances.†

Universal as has been the belief in witchcraft, it was not until the end of the fifteenth century that it justly assumed what may be called an epidemic form. Then a fatal impetus was given by the issue of a Bull by Pope Innocent VIII. This precious document declares:—

> "In truth, it has come to our ears that very many persons of both sexes, deviating from the Catholic > Faith, abuse themselves with the demons, Incubus and Succubus; and by incantations, charms, and conjurations, and other wicked superstitions, by criminal acts and offences have caused the offspring of women and of the lower animals, the fruits of the earth, the grape, and the products of various plants, men, women, and other animals of different kinds, vineyards, meadows, pasture land, corn, and other vegetables of the earth to perish, be oppressed, and utterly destroyed; that they hinder the proper intercourse of the sexes, and the propagation of the human species."

It was this Pope who commissioned the inquisitor, Sprenger, to root out witches. Sprenger's book on the subject remained for long the guide for all those engaged in the work.

Almost at once the mania for witch-finding and witch-burning, and one may also assume the belief of people that they could secure and utilise satanic power against others, assumed alarming dimensions. The number given as executed is so great that one would hesitate to accept them as genuine if the statements were not well authenticated. Says Lecky:—

> "In almost every province of Germany, but especially in those where clerical influence predominated, the persecution raged with a fearful intensity. Seven thousand witches are said to have been burned at Treves, six hundred by a single bishop in Bamberg, and nine hundred in a single year in the bishopric of Wurtzburg. .....At Toulouse, the seat of the Inquisition, four hundred persons perished for sorcery at a single execution, and fifty at Douay in a single year. Remy, a judge of Nancy, boasted that he had put to death eight hundred witches in sixteen years.....In Italy a thousand persons were executed in a single year in the province of Como. .....In Geneva, which was then ruled by a bishop, five hundred alleged witches were executed in three months; forty-eight were burnt at Constance or Ravensburg, and eighty in the little town of Valery in Savoy."*

In England, from 1603 to 1680 it is estimated that seventy thousand persons were put to death for sorcery.† Grey, the editor of Hudibras, says that he had himself seen a list of three thousand persons who were put to death during the life of the Long Parliament. The celebrated witch-finder, Hopkins, hung sixty in one year in the county of Suffolk. In Scotland, for thirty-nine years, the number killed annually averaged two hundred. The most remarkable, and the most horrible executions of all were those that took place in Wurtzburg in February, 1629. No less than one hundred and sixty-two alleged witches were burned in batches. Among these were actually no less than thirty-four children. The following details give the actual ages of most of them:—

Burning.	Numbered.	Among Them.
7th ...	7 ...	1 girl aged 12.
13th ...	4 ...	Girl of 10 and young mother.
15th ...	3 ...	Boy of 12.
18th ...	6 ...	2 boys of 10, girl of 14.
19th ...	6 ...	2 boys of 10 and 12.
20th ...	6 ...	2 boys.
23rd ...	9 ...	3 boys, 9, 10, and 14.
24th ...	7 ...	2 boys brought from hospital.
26th ...	8 ...	Little boy and girl.
26th ...	7 ...	2 boys, 8 and 9.
28th ...	6 ...	Blind girl and infant.‡

Partial Knowledge.

THE Rev. F. C. Spurr, of Melbourne, assures us, in a sermon published in the Christian World Pulpit for May 28, that the confession that the supernatural can only be known in part in this life, constitutes what he calls Courageous Agnosticism, while the denial of the possibility of knowing it at all must be characterised as Cowardly Agnosticism. It is not our good fortune to have seen the reverend gentleman's discourse upon Cowardly Agnosticism, though we can easily infer what it was like. His deliverance on Courageous Agnosticism lies before us, and we proceed to examine it. The relativity of knowledge is a scientific truism and almost a truism in philosophy. This being the case, where does the courage of Agnosticism come in? Surely it requires no courage to acknowledge an undeniable fact. If God and the theological unseen world are known at all, it is a foregone conclusion that they are known only in part. To say, "We know in part," or "We see in a mirror darkly," is simply to state a fact, even on the assumption that the subjects under consideration are in any sense or degree objects of knowledge. To break the force of this undoubted truth, Mr. Spurr disparages knowledge. "Knowledge is good and great," he says, "but there is something better and greater," even love. But what is love without knowledge? At bottom, knowledge and love are one, as they also are in their highest and noblest development. To know the truth is to love it, and to love is to know it.

In his championship of the relativity of all knowledge, Mr. Spurr falls into several grievous errors. Speaking of the progressiveness of scientific knowledge, he says, "No longer dare any scientific man repeat the confident declaration of Professor Tyndall in his famous Belfast address. The day has passed for that kind of thing." Evidently the reverend gentleman is not up-to-date in his scientific information. He makes that assertion in the teeth of the fact that from the platform of the British Association at Dundee, last September, Tyndall's theory of matter, so beautifully expressed from the Association's chair at Belfast forty years ago, was clearly and vigorously reaffirmed both by the President and several distinguished members. Has not Mr. Spurr read Professor Schafer's Presidential Address on "The Nature, Origin, and Maintenance of Life," and the report of the subsequent discussion on the subject, in the course of which, Professor McCallum and Dr. Chalmers Mitchell, among others, declared themselves "in agreement with Tyndall that matter is imbued with the potentiality of life"? "I have heard nothing," concluded Dr. Mitchell, "which makes it not possible to accept the exposition of our President in the fullest possible way." Equally inaccurate is the reverend gentleman's statement that "in one day" the scientific world's faith in the indivisibility of the atom "was shaken to pieces by the discovery of radium." Writing twenty years prior to the discovery of radium, Professor Buchner used the following language:—

> "In fact the unlimited divisibility of atoms or of the molecules built up from them can be doubted when looked at either from a theoretical, a metaphysical, or an empirical point of view, and it can only be maintained that we are not in a position to divide them further by the chemical and physical forces known to us.....It has also become very probable through recent investigations that the substances heretofore regarded by us as elements or original bodies are nothing of the kind, but are themselves compounds, and that the so-called atoms therefore consist of units of a higher grade, as the molecule does of atoms" (Force and Matter, pp. 48, 49).

Ten years before the breaking up of the atom actually took place, Professor Haeckel wrote:—

> "We may conclude that the empirical elements we now know are not really simple, ultimate, and unchangeable forms of matter, but compounds of homogeneous, simple, primitive atoms, variously distributed as to number and grouping" (The Riddle of the Universe, p. 79).

It is perfectly true that we know Nature only in part, and see her marvellous operations only as if in a mirror darkly; but is there any evidence that we know Supernature even in part, or see it even in a mirror darkly? Mr. Spurr admits that "there are over-confident Christians who make unjustifiable claims to knowledge," but instead of expatiating upon this important admission the reverend gentleman forgets his manners and goes off at a tangent to deliver a violent and vituperative tirade against "overconfident unbelievers." These vile wretches are thus portrayed :—

> "Inspired by vanity, they forget that they know only in part, hence they commit the indiscretion and the impertinence of challenging what others know. Wise men will ever be modest, remembering that the field of truth is so vast that it cannot be compassed by any human mind."

This is rudeness, and we beg to remind the reverend gentleman that rudeness is not argument. There are not a few in Melbourne who perceive the folly and futility of dubbing Freethought writers "hackmen," rather than "scholars." To abuse an enemy is to increase the momentum of his arrows. Mr. Spurr is apparently ignorant of the fact that this style of attack only weakens his own case. He does not even know what the object of his attack really is. He speaks as if Agnosticism really meant a claim to superior knowledge, rather than a confession of complete ignorance. Agnostics are not people who cherish the belief that they "know all," but, on the contrary, people who humbly bow their heads before the majesty and grandeur of the Universe and admit their inability to explain it. Mr. Spurr is radically mistaken when he charges them with the indiscretion and the impertinences of "challenging what others know." They are not foolish enough to do anything of the kind. What they challenge is what others imagine they know. We wish to refresh his memory with the following famous utterance by Huxley :—

> "When I reached intellectual maturity and began to ask myself whether I was an Atheist, a Theist, or a Pantheist; a Materialist or an Idealist; a Christian or a Freethinker; I found that the more I learned and reflected, the less ready was the answer; until at last I came to the conclusion that I had neither art nor part with any of these denominations, except the last. The one thing in which most of these good people were agreed was the one thing in which I differed from them. They were quite sure that they had attained to a certain 'gnosis' (knowledge),—had more or less successfully solved the problem of existence, while I was quite sure I had not, and had a pretty strong conviction that the problem was insoluble. And, with Hume and Kant on my side, I could not think myself presumptuous in holding fast by that opinion" (Controverted Questions, pp. 354-5).

We are neither Theists, Pantheists, nor Idealists, but simply Atheists, in precisely the same sense as that in which Huxley called himself an Agnostic, and what we challenge is, not what Mr. Spurr knows, but what he believes he knows. We venture to address him thus: "You make a claim to a true though imperfect knowledge of God and the spiritual world; you affirm that this knowledge comes to you by Jesus Christ, whom you proclaim as the Savior of mankind; and this knowledge thus gained you describe as saving, uplifting, ennobling; but we utterly fail to find anything in you or about you, as a member of society, to justify such a claim. You are neither better nor worse, in moral character, than millions of others in all parts of the world who pretend to possess no such knowledge." In thus addressing the reverend gentleman, we assure him that we are inspired neither by vanity nor by the belief that we know all, but by the honest conviction that Christians are in reality quite as ignorant as ourselves. We do not question their supernatural beliefs, nor those ecstatic experiences which naturally spring from them; but we do earnestly contend that such beliefs are so many illusions, or rather perhaps, that their objects are purely illusory.

At this point we come face to face with a most curious phenomenon. Mr. Spurr denounces Mr. McCabe, Mr. Robertson, and Mr. Vivian as charlatans. He accuses them of writing, "with assumed authority, on all kinds of subjects, many of which demand years of patient study"; but we submit that this accusation is much more applicable to members of his own profession than to the advocates of Freethought. Rightly or wrongly, we speak in the name of, and make all our appeals to, our own reason, while the theologians base all their utterances upon an alleged revelation from above, conveyed to them indirectly in a book, or specially and directly communicated to every one of them by an alleged Holy Spirit. They speak in the name of the Lord and appeal to the authority of Heaven; but the Lord is eternally silent and Heaven's seal is lacking. That is to say, they hold an imaginary Heaven responsible for all their own blind prejudices and strange vagaries. What we challenge is their right to assume heavenly authority for their various and conflicting deliverances. The sincerity of many of them is beyond doubt; but, then, a man can so easily play the hypocrite unconsciously to himself.

With all due deference, we hold that in this discourse which has come to us from the Antipodes, Mr. Spurr adduces not a single proof that Christians possess even a partial knowledge of the supernatural; he merely contents himself with asserting that they do. He plays the dogmatist from beginning to end. We are aware that "intellectual vanity is a stupid and offensive thing," and we hope never to be guilty of it; but we are convinced that the numerous assumptions of the men of God are more stupid and offensive still, because not one of them has ever been or ever can be verified.

> "The East has been tolerant of all creeds which do not assault the foundations of its societies.....The hatred of Western religion in China and adjacent countries is undoubtedly due to the needless and implacable attacks which have been made upon the ancestor-cult. To demand of a Chinese or an Annamese that he cast away or destroy his ancestral tablets is not less irrational and inhuman than it would be to demand of an Englishman that he destroy his mother's tombstone in proof of his devotion to Christianity. Nay, it is much more inhuman,—for the European attaches to the funeral monument no such idea of sacredness as that which attaches, in Eastern belief, to the simple tablet inscribed with the name of the dead parent."—LAFCADIO HEARN, Japan, p. 518-9.

> "The Chinaman, who is entirely content with his own religion, and only asks to be left alone, is assailed by a propaganda that commences with an attack upon all that he holds most dear. To him the ethics of Confucius sum up the whole duty of man to the family and the State; while the payment of homage to the higher powers is provided for by the polytheistic conceptions of the Buddhist cult. He hears the former disparaged, the latter derided. He is invited to become a convert at the cost of ceasing to be a citizen; to tear up the sheet-anchor of all morality as the first condition of moral regeneration. Small wonder that a propaganda, which thus lays the axe to the very root of the tree, should encounter the stubborn resistance of all those who have been accustomed to seek shelter under its branches."—LORD CURZON, Problems of the Far East, p. 288.

ANCESTOR-WORSHIP is so bound up with the national life and traditions of the Chinese that it is the opinion of those most conversant with Chinese manners, customs, and modes of thought that to destroy belief in it would be to undermine the moral basis which constitutes the Chinese the most peaceful, law-abiding, and industrious nation in the world.

Mr. R. F. Johnston, who served as District Officer and Magistrate at Wei-hai-wei in China, and, therefore, has an intimate knowledge of the Chinese, observes :—

> "Most of my readers are doubtless aware that it has been, and perhaps still is, the custom of many missionaries to require their converts to surrender their ancestral tablets, or to destroy them, as a proof of their sincerity before baptism. There are many sad stories connected with this cruel proceeding, and it is refreshing to listen to the frank confession of so experienced and fair-minded a missionary as Dr. Martin, who admits that he himself once insisted on a convert giving up his ancestral tablets, and has ever since regarded this as one of the mistakes of his life, and looks back upon it with 'poignant grief.' As he adds decisively, 'I had no right to impose such a test.' It is to be hoped that his words have served as a warning to some, at least, of his successors in the missionary field." *

He also believes, with other high authorities, that "If Christianity is to win its way to the hearts of the Chinese people, it will probably have to condescend to a compromise on the question of ancestor-worship."

The Jesuits, in the sixteenth century, as we have seen, made their compromise with ancestor-worship; Father Ricci professing to believe that the ancestral functions were merely civil and commemoration rites, and allowing the converts to continue their practice. But the Jesuits have always followed the practice of St. Paul in making themselves "all things to all men," holding that "the end justifies the means."

As Professor Giles points out, in reference to the ancestral spirits:—

> "These offerings are made for the special purpose of conciliating the spirit, and of obtaining in return a liberal share of the blessings and good things of this life. This is the essential feature of the rite, and this it is which makes the rite an act of worship pure and simple, so that only superficial observers could make the mistake of classifying ancestral-worship, as practised in China, with such acts as laying wreaths upon the tombs of deceased friends and relatives."*

The Emperor of China, K'ang Hsi, being appealed to by the Jesuits, decided in their favor. The Pope, on the contrary, influenced by the jealous Dominicans, declared the rites to be rank idolatry:—

> "The fact that several Pontiffs had successively boxed the compass on this point did not in the least mend the matter; the essential consideration was that an Italian gentleman assumed, and successfully assumed, to tell the subjects of the Emperor of China that the Emperor was wrong on a technical matter of Chinese interpretation." †

Then the great Emperor became aware that behind these wonderful men from the West "there was a mysterious foreign Power actively controlling the millions of all races who entered the fold of the Church." ‡ He, therefore, forbade any missionary to remain in the country without his permission. After his death his son and successor issued an edict in the year 1724 prohibiting the propagation of Christianity; all missionaries not required for scientific purposes at Peking being ordered to leave the country. The Emperor condescended to state his views to three members of the Society of Jesus, as follows:—

> "You wish to make the Chinese Christians, and this is what your law demands, I know very well. But what in that case would become of us? [We should become] the subjects of your kings. The Christians whom you make recognise no authority but you; in times of trouble they would listen to no other voice. I know well enough that there is nothing to fear at present; but when your ships shall be coming by thousands and tens of thousands, then, indeed, we may have some disturbances." §

This put a stop to the influx of missionaries, who reappeared to the sound of foreign cannon breaching the Wall of China.

Ancestor-worship was the stumbling-block which brought about the fall of Christianity in the eighteenth century. It is ancestor-worship that still bars the way to-day. To cite again from the work of Mr. Arthur Smith, the missionary:—

> "Everywhere the critical question is, What shall be done with regard to ancestral-worship? And upon this point the rigid demands of custom and the verdict of the enlightened Chinese conscience remain at variance."

The same writer thinks that perhaps the best way to treat the subject would be the historical one, of showing that the rites and usages were neither ancient nor authoritative, and that the underlying idea in ancestral-worship can be expressed in Christianity without violation of conscience. This seems to us a confession of the hopelessness of fighting this cult, and a recommendation of the very methods of compromise which proved so disastrous to their Jesuit forerunners. However, as he admits, that method is not applicable in this case. For he observes:—

> "But to this method of procedure there are serious if not fatal obstacles. The mass of those who can be induced to listen to the claims of Christianity are not those with whom the historical method is possible, since the greater part of them have no education and many of them cannot read. With such it is literally indispensable to deal with as with children." *

As we have remarked, the opposition of the missionaries to ancestor-worship is a principal cause of the hatred entertained by the average Chinese towards the Christian converts. When a Chinese becomes a Christian, he severs himself, or, rather, he is discarded, by his family, his relatives, and his friends. He becomes an outcast. Says Mr. Smith:—

> "The refusal of the Christians to perform ceremonies which they regard as idolatrous at the New Year season, at the Spring festival when the sacrifices are offered at the graves, at weddings, and especially at funerals, render them liable to severe persecution, sometimes to the extent of being driven from their homes, deprived of all rights of property, and expelled from the clan to which they belong, and from the district in which they were born. It is hard for those who are their shepherds to witness such occurrences (which, with varying degrees of severity, are of constant occurrence) without endeavoring to rectify matters in accordance with the rights expressly guaranteed to Chinese Christians by treaty. In many instances this is accomplished after a more or less severe struggle, and a measure of liberty for the Church as a result. In many other cases, however, the best that can be obtained is a cessation of acute hostilities, with a threat of renewal whenever it suits the convenience of the anti-Christian party" (China in Convulsion, pp. 36-37).

Of these Christian treaty rights above-mentioned, we shall have something to say later on, merely remarking here that these rights are founded upon one of the blackest pieces of forgery and fraud—the work of a French Catholic priest—ever recorded in history.

Again, the theatrical performances, of which the Chinese are so fond, are also banned, and this is the cause of another grievance. The same writer tells us:—

> "Persistent resistance to demands for pro rata contributions to the fund for holding theatrical exhibitions or the performance of the Taoist high mass necessarily irritates a wide circle of Chinese. Should the proposed celebration be given up for this reason, the animosity felt toward the cause of this undesirable result is shared by the main participants, and also by the public, which is always athirst for some excitement in the dead level of the monotonous Chinese daily life. If the Christians stand aloof and withhold their quota, others must pay so much the more; and as the passion for theatricals is such that a Chinese as a rule can no more withstand the temptation to witness a performance than he can help shaking when set upon an insulating stool with a stream of electricity pouring through his body, it will be singular if his presence even on the outskirts of the crowd does not lead to trouble. That the Buddhist and Taoist priests have not sooner and more generally recognised the 'divisive and perversive' nature of Christianity in relation to those religions, only displays the intellectual imbecility of those who are thought sufficient to represent these faiths in the care of the temples and the public ceremonies. It has been generally noticed that during the Boxer disturbances priests have often been prominent, sometimes as leaders. The only wonder is that this has not happened long ago" (China in Convulsion, pp. 39-40).

The tolerance of the Buddhist and Taoist priests is not due to "intellectual imbecility," as this missionary suggests, for, as we shall see, the Chinese have always been tolerant in matters of religion. Notice, by the way, the testimony to the dividing and perverting nature of Christianity, which has always carried out the teachings of its founder, who declared, "I have come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her

"Portuguese Political Prisoners."

(Gill & Son, Ltd. London: 1913.)

PUBLIC opinion in Portugal has been irritated and outraged by the publication of an audacious pamphlet in this country bearing the above title. The pamphlet is the more astonishing from its lachrymose but misleading sub-title, "A British National Protest." As a matter of fact, there is no evidence at all that (with the exception of the "Foreword," of which more anon) the "Protest" is either British or national, unless the "nationality" be Portuguese; and the "Protest" seems none other than that of some anonymous and inventive exile. All the magniloquent fustian in the first three pages about the glories of "the Portugal of old" (which was also the Portugal of the Inquisition and the wholesale murder or robbery of heretics and Jews), betrays the hand of the unrepentant partisan of the ancient regime as it triumphed in the days of the late pious and lamented Carlos. The cloven hoof of the vexed and defeated exile shows itself, too, in the sentence (p. 11) which refers to:—

> "A Republic which for over two years has perpetuated oppression and injustice such as no country would endure for one single week were it inflicted under monarchical rule instead of in the sacred name of freedom."

No Englishman who knows what unparalleled abominations have gone on, not merely "for one single week," but for decade after decade, and generation after generation, "under monarchical rule" of the holy Tears, could possibly put pen to paper and write this stupid and astonishing declaration. We have heard often enough of "British" goods produced in Germany, but we were scarcely prepared for "British National Protests" made in Portugal.

Now about the "Foreword." This is a short and sweet production of eleven lines, by Adeline, Duchess of Bedford, the distinguished writer whose inflamed impeachment of Portugal coruscated recently in the columns of the Daily Mail. The "Foreword" is a surprisingly cautious commendation of "the writer of the following pages," whose name is discreetly withheld, and concerning whom we are offered the non-committal statement that our Great Unknown "had exceptional opportunities of collecting information concerning the sufferings," etc., of the prisoners—all of which, of course, one readily accepts, subject to the observation that the art of "collecting information" does not always imply the faculty of checking and verifying it when received, or collating it with the necessary relative facts for the formation of a sound judgment. The Pentateuch is a classic case in point, with its fantastic mosaic of "collected information."

In this same "Foreword" the revealing sentence is found that: "During my recent visit to Lisbon I was able to learn the opinions of many people in very varying conditions of life, and their testimonies were all entirely in harmony with the standpoint set forth in this pamphlet." All this is quite beside the question. The opinions of "many people," qua opinions, are, in fact, worth nothing; and testimony, even when it descends in cataracts, is clearly not evidence. All depends upon the competency of the witnesses, and the scientific validity of their testimony. Opinions can be freely and copiously gathered from all sorts and conditions of men for the most outrageous nonsense under the sun, as witness the lives of the saints, where biography rhymes with lie. After reading this "Foreword," one has an uneasy feeling that the basis of the Duchess's Daily Mail impeachment of the Portuguese Government was built only on the multitudinous tongue-wagging of irresponsible slanderers.

I observe in O Mundo that public opinion has been unduly perturbed by the issue of this precious pamphlet. I hope that the Portuguese Republicans will not be frightened by this nightmare of a bogus "British National Protest." No Briton to-day, not even the editor of the Daily Mail itself, would go out of his way, as this pamphlet does, to speak of the Portugal of to-day (page 1) as "ground down by tyranny and oppression, depopulated by emigration, bereft alike of freedom, credit, honor, law, and order." If British public opinion formed such an erroneous view of the Portuguese nation, the Republicans would, indeed, have cause for grave regret and anxiety. But the voice of the Portuguese monarchist simulating the bluff growl of John Bull is distinctly audible in the theatrical palaverings of this "National Protest," and this fact discounts the value of the ducally applauded incubration.

On page 3 mention is made of certain mythical "32,000 Carbonarios, who, as they draw a handsome wage for denouncing to the State supposed 'conspirators,' are naturally much enamored of a system which gives good financial profit in exchange for small exertions!" It is a pity that the writer did not embellish the narrative by "collecting information" as to the amount of the "handsome wage," or attempt to ascertain why a naturally wicked regime is lavish enough to pay so dearly for "small exertions." The slime of exaggeration which settles thick on this beautiful accusation makes it too incredible for serious consideration. A rationalist Republic which disestablishes and disendows the Church and secularises the schools may be sinful, according to ducal codes, without necessarily being stupid.

Burke stated that it is impossible to impeach a nation. Our writer transcends Burke and all possibility, human or divine, by offering a solemn impeachment of the Portuguese people. We shall see that his statement is one the ridiculousness of which is only equalled by its monstrosity. For instance, on page 18 he actually dares to tell us, with evident marks of acceptance and approval, that—

> "Another informant relates that on one of the occasions when the prison van was stormed by the Lisbon mob, and the Royalist occupants dragged out and brutally attacked with knives and whips, a prisoner exclaimed, 'Do not beat me, I am not a Royalist, but a thief.' Whereupon the mob welcomed him as a brother."

The British nation will want evidence more trustworthy than that of "another informant," vouched by an unknown writer, before it will accept such an evident fable as "gospel" truth. The coda of the sentence, about Lisbon revolutionaries welcoming a thief as a brother, is one of those artistic embellishments that befit the novelist rather than the dispassionate historian. The writer had evidently taken his cue from the theatrical story of the Jewish mob clamoring for the release of Barabbas.

Another graphic touch, which certainly was not laid on by a native "British" artist, but by some Portuguese dauber, is the fine story, on pages 23-24, that in February this year Dr. Affonso Costa, Senhor Alvaro de Castro, and Dr. Rodrigues, and their secretaries, visited the Penitenciaria; that the political prisoners and the lowest criminals being assembled in the disused chapel, they were all ordered to remove their hoods at the sound of Dr. Rodrigues' whistle; and when the miraculous whistle whistled the Doctor delivered an oration to them, which was greeted with applause from murderers and thieves." An excellent theme for comic opera, but quite alien to the sober genius of history.

On page 34 our Portuguese Briton talks dramatically about the "active" volcano of English adverse criticism—"that criticism will grow to such proportions that there will be no restraining it"! After this alarming diagnosis, the "informed" writer—who is an optimist by nature—talks on in the dark and mysterious Guy Fawkes style of melodrama:—

> "The time has long gone by [so he writes] when national opinion was controlled or led by diplomats [Great Jupiter! how I admire his sweet simplicity and childlike innocence!—W. H.]; and the English Foreign Office, however anxious to look leniently upon the difficulties of a friendly Power, is utterly unable to dominate popular feeling in a country where free writing and free speech are the hereditary birthright even of the humblest."

All this is the wildest nonsense out of Bedlam—it takes such little account of the omnipotence of diplomats and the serious limitations of speech and writing in this country! No Government in so-called Christian England would dare to affront the conscience of civilisation by strangling the Portuguese Republic. Governments to-day go to war, not for ideals, but for new markets; for goldfields and diamonds, and not to restore exiled monarchs or rehabilitate effete regimes, however pious they may be. When, therefore, we are told, on page 38, that "unless the Carbonaria assassins" are disbanded and the other ferocious ultimata of this fervid writer conceded, "it will no longer be within the bounds of possibility to stem the rising tide of British public wrath," the only thing I can say to Portugal, as a Briton myself, and living on the spot where "the tide" is supposed to be rising, is that not a ripple of wrath has yet appeared on the frothy waves of ink poured out from the indignant pen of our excited scribe, and that the only ebullition that sentiments of this fantastic kind are likely to excite in the British people is a contemptuous outburst of incredulous hilarity.

Portuguese public opinion can afford to disdain the hectoring threats of a writer who concludes his thirty-nine pages of rhodomontade by branding England's "ancient ally," as he calls Portugal, "as the shame, the scandal, and the plague spot which united Europe cannot but condemn." My final word to this writer is to convert his screed into a ragtime revue, with a coryphantic spectacle of exiled kings, disendowed bishops, and sour-faced patron saints.

WILLIAM HEAFORD.

Acid Drops.

The truth is coming out at last about the war of the Balkan allies against the "unspeakable" Turk. Even the Daily Chronicle is beginning to let the cat out of the bag. In its issue for May 30 there was an outspoken letter from a "Correspondent lately returned from Montenegro." In a general way this writer says, "The Allies, there is, alas, no doubt, have often out-Turked the Turk.....Whole tribes have been exterminated, if the boasts of Serb and Montenegrin are to be believed." The capture of Scutari was at once a farce and a tragedy. It was not captured by Montenegrin valor at all. It was reduced by starvation, and by a deliberate policy in direct defiance of the rules of civilised warfare. "The trenches were safer than the town. The fire of the siege guns was "directed on the civil population" to force the town's surrender:—

> "All the while, in defiance of Europe, the Montenegrins rained shells and shrapnel into the best quarter of the town. Every church, school, convent, and hospital was a mark. Two thousand wretched refugees were sheltered in the cathedral, believing it would be safe. But the guns of the Orthodox sought specially each Catholic building. A searchlight turned on the cathedral at night enabled the gunners finally to get the range, and 40 shells in and near it completely wrecked the finest building in these lands."

This is what pious King Nicholas called "fighting for the independence of Montenegro." The Christian old savage.

The Guardian, which was, like other Christian papers, rabidly anti-Turkish at the outbreak of the Balkan War, now confesses that unless the Allies show more honesty and common sense, "the condition of the Balkans, Slav and Hellenic, will be worse than under the unspeakable Turk." Those not blinded by Christian prejudice are not at all surprised at the present state of affairs. When a party of thieves set out for plunder, a quarrel about its division is not unusual. We venture to say that unless outside pressure is effectively employed the lot of many in the Balkans will be worse under the Cross than it was under the Crescent.

Mrs. Besant is in London again. A number of her English supporters met her at Victoria Station. "She was attired," the Chronicle reporter said, "in a tussore silk costume of flowing Oriental lines and a kind of turban, in the front of which a jewelled brooch glittered." This get-up reminds us of Gerald Massey's lines to Annie Besant, when she left her work on the London School Board to run about the world for the Mahatmas. The last of Massey's stanzas were these:—

> "Now there's woe and wail for her,
> True hearts ache and ail for her,
> Poor wee faces pale for her.
> And the deeds she might have done,
> Not as Sophist, but as one
> Worker in a Million.
> Ignis Fatuii of the fog,
> Lured and led her all agog
> Into the Blavatsky bog.
> Cursèd fraud that could entice
> Her to that great Sacrifice!
> Priceless SOUL without her price.
> Is she dreaming? Let us make
> One more call for Love's dear sake;
> Annie Besant, won't you wake?"

Gerald Massey's appeal fell upon deaf ears. Annie Besant did not wake. She will dream to the end now.

The Hindu boys, whom Mrs. Besant was ordered to restore to their father, were brought to London with her. They prefer being with her to living in their own home. No doubt. It is far more comfortable for their bodies, and far more flattering to their minds.

Shakespeare has been interviewed at last; this time on "the astral plane" by a Theosophist. An account was given at the headquarters of the Theosophical Society at Charing Cross. It appears that Shakespeare admitted that Bacon wrote the plays; but, added the poet, "I edited them." Shakespeare also remarked that "up there" they did not take much interest in the controversies "down here." From this we imagine Shakespeare to be in "heaven"; but may we assume that Bacon is "down under"?

Souls in Pawn is the title of a book. The "next world" has been often described as "the New Jerusalem"; but we did not know its business included pawnbroking.

The Assembly of the Scottish United Free Church reports a serious shortage of ministers. We do not know that anyone is complaining except the ministers themselves; the rest of the people seem to be bearing up well in the circumstances. The Rev. J. R. Sclater says that a commonly given reason is that payment in the ministry does not compare favorably with payment in other professions. At present the stipend of half the ministers of the Free Church does not amount to more than £160 per year. This, of course, is not a great salary for men of real ability, but it is quite as much as many thousands of people get in other walks of life who make no pretence to self-sacrifice, spiritual election, etc., etc. It may be that the Church cannot get men of ability and honesty at this figure, but can they get them at any figure? Suppose the Church could raise salaries to £500, or even £1,000 a year all round. It might then be able to purchase ability, but could it purchase honesty and character? We very much doubt it. There is always a certain amount of ability in the market ready to sell itself to the highest bidder, but the ability that goes with genuine conviction is not for the Church. That finds a more useful and more congenial outlet in other directions.

This is the real crux of the situation. Mr. Sclater says that "a proportion of the possible candidates does not think that the pecular opportunity of Christian service afforded by the ministry overbalances the narrowing of life" involved in a ministerial career. This is only saying in a confused fashion what has been said above. The pull of life is away from the Church. Science and literature and art and social life all open up avenues of employment that a man can take up without a keen sense of self-stultification. He does not have to spend the rest of his life explaining away or apologising for the beliefs he is paid to defend. Given a belief worth defending, and there will not be lacking defenders. But given beliefs such as are enshrined in the doctrines of the Churches, and generation after generation a lower degree of ability and character is attracted by them. It is this, and not salaries, that is at the bottom of the trouble over both the quantity and quality of the clergy. It may still command ability without honesty or honesty without ability, but it cannot, to any considerable degree, command both.

Rev. R. H. Armitage, of St. Mary's Vicarage, Whittlesey, suggests that every person ordained should be compelled to spend five or six years out of the country. The suggestion strikes us as a good one, and we should favor a very liberal extension of the time during which the newly fledged parson should be kept abroad.

Father O' Halloran, rector of a Roman Catholic church at Ealing, borrowed £76 from a poor old Miss Mary Hynes, who was left £400 by the late Lord Kilmorey, in whose service she had been. When the reverend gentleman was invited to refund he set up the plea that the money was a gift. The jury, however, held that the transaction was a loan—the defendant exercising a dominant religious influence over the plaintiff, who had received no independent advice. The man of God has to shell out both cash and costs.

They have been holding a Missionary Exhibition at Leeds and the Rev. J. Hinton Knowles has made it the occasion of denouncing the religion and morals of the "heathen," particularly in India. Local circumstances might surely have made Mr. Knowles more modest on this point. He is the new vicar of Christ Church, Hunslet. His predecessor left the Lord's Vineyard some time ago—leaving his wife and family behind and taking with him a younger piece of what the Bible calls "flesh."

Another poor Christite! Rev. Thomas Samuel Curteis, of 93 Philbeach-gardens, London, S.W., for many years rector of Sevenoaks, Kent, left £29,508. "Blessed be ye poor!" "Woe unto you rich!" "Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth." And more to the same effect.

The Methodist Times asks the question: "Are the Gospel Records Reliable?" and in reply admits that many blunders may have been made by the New Testament writers. But, it says, the Gospels do not rely for their validity upon "mere historical tests," but upon "the spiritual sense of the man who honestly reads the narratives and lets them make their natural impression upon him." Well, for our part we should not be seriously disturbed if it were shown that the four Gospels were actually written by Jesus Christ himself, and that they have descended to us unaltered. To have the actual narrative in our hands would not prove the story to be credible; it would only show, at most, that the writer or writers believed it to be true. But why go back two thousand years for this kind of testimony? Thousands of people, since the time of Jesus, have witnessed to their sense of supernatural possession and illumination, and others have endorsed their testimony. But this does not make the stories themselves a bit more believable. It only throws us back upon the task of explaining how they came to have such a conviction. Instead of exposing a deliberately concocted falsehood, we have to explain the genesis of a psychological delusion. That is all there is in the matter.

As to the "spiritual sense" of the man who reads the Gospels deciding whether they are reliable or not, that is sheer verbiage. The faculty invoked is itself pure myth. There is no such thing as a "spiritual sense"; there are only the normal qualities of the mind which judges so-called spiritual things. Anyway, the spiritual sense judges as it been taught to judge. The Christian decides, on appealing to his "spiritual sense," that the picture of Jesus Christ is authentic. The non-Christian decides in quite the opposite direction. Why should we accept one more than the other? As mere impressions, both are equal. As a matter of fact, the writer deserts his "spiritual sense" as soon as he has utilised it. He appeals to the influence of the life of Jesus on the world. And, again, we ask, How do you know? Has a mere reading of the life of Jesus ever affected anybody? Has the reading not always been accompanied by suggestions that the life would produce certain consequences? And if the consequences occasionally follow, to what are we to attribute them—to the reading or to the suggestion? How often have people discovered an aperient in bread pills, or a narcotic in cold water? The psychology of the religious process is quite simple, as simple as that of advertising a patent medicine.

Canon Masterman says that "after all, it is not much good trying to prove the Virgin Birth to men who don't believe in God." True; but how does the Canon propose to deal with unbelievers in God? He clearly discerns the futility of arguments based on the external world, because the external world is itself an unanswerable argument against the Divine existence; but is it, can it, be much good appealing to human consciousness? Leave human consciousness alone and it never knows anything of God. The belief in God is not an inheritance, but an acquirement, made only by a limited number of mankind, and made by these not spontaneously from within, but artificially, under pressure from without.

We now learn that the second person in the Holy Trinity lost his self-consciousness for the space of twelve years. During the period between his birth as the "Holy Thing" from Mary's womb and his appearance in the Temple as a boy of twelve, he was not aware that he was in existence. For this most marvellous information we are indebted to the Rev. Dr. David Smith, who, in the British Weekly for May 22, tells a correspondent that, while meditating in the sacred building and arguing with the doctors, in the twinkling of an eye he remembered, or, as Dr. Smith puts it, "discovered," who he was. Subsequent to the re-awakening of his self-consciousness, he worked for eighteen years at his father's trade at Nazareth, making carts and chairs and tables and such things. Then at his baptism he was formally called to begin his ministry as Incarnate God. And yet some people pretend to be surprised to find that supernatural belief is dying throughout Christendom.

An American divine tells us that "God is like Christ"; but what is Christ like? Nobody knows. There are at least a thousand Christs on earth to-day, and they are all different. If it be said that Christ is like the Gospel Jesus, and God like Christ, then we are bound to declare that we will have none of God. The Gospel Jesus was rude to his mother, disowned his family, cursed his enemies, enjoined non-resistance to evil, pronounced beatitudes on poverty, blessed the sword, and depreciated the present life; and if God is like him we are glad that we have no dealings whatever with him.

Rev. A. Huntley, vicar of Christ Church, Hull, deplores the growing desecration of the Sabbath. He says that the leisured classes show a bad example. He knows of a church in the South of England where all the choirboys have left in order to earn money as golf caddies on Sundays. Very sad, no doubt, from the reverend gentleman's point of view. But most people will sympathise with the boys; for a little money is acceptable, and the air is fresher on the golf links than it is in the average stuffy Bethel.

Dare to be a Daniel! But don't try it on with a sledge-hammer. The Chancery Court has had to teach this to the Rev. Daniel Hughes, of the Crane-street Baptist Chapel, Pontypool, who has been using that instrument to settle a legal question between the trustees and himself.

Dr. Horton's manners are not improving. However much he may have grown "in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" during recent years, it is clear that growth does not include a corresponding progress in charity and toleration. It is quite impossible for the reverend gentleman to make the slightest allusion to opponents without losing his temper and resorting to bad language. In one of his latest sermons, he admits "that the great majority of people to-day, as in the time of Jesus, deliberately and defiantly shut God out of their lives." This fact makes him angry, and "the great majority of people" are set down as the dupes of "puerile—yes, it is very puerile—self-confidence." The man who overturns the Bible is "a feeble critic"; he who denies that Jesus can save is "stupid and ignorant"; while the rejecter of the historicity of Jesus is the victim of hopeless infatuation and ignorance. What makes him wild is the fact that "the great majority of people" hail such "feeble critics," "stupid and ignorant" deniers, "infatuated and ignorant" rejecters, with boundless delight, and turn a deaf ear to him and his message. And yet, "in spite of the fact that never was there a time when unbelief was so hardened, so infatuated, so ignorant, so daring, and so destructive—in spite of all that," the reverend gentleman assures his hearers that they who do believe shall certainly be saved. Now, on the assumption that "the great majority of people" are on the wrong road, are Dr. Horton's hostile attitude and abusive language likely ever to bring them to the feet of him who died for their redemption? Is it really true that the more pious and devout a man becomes the less of a gentleman he is?

The Bishop of London is constantly treating the world to a fresh imbecility. His latest outbreak is to the effect that he knows East London and its misery more than most people, and even there for every miserable person that could be produced he had got nine happy ones up his sleeve. We dare say he could find them there—and nowhere else.

In his presidential address to the London Diocesan Conference, the Bishop of London, made some pungent remarks on the report of the Divorce Commission, in the course of which he told an anecdote. "Charlie and I," he was told a girl said the other day, "are going to be married, and if we don't get on, we can always be divorced!" Did his lordship hear this yarn from the lips of Charley's Aunt?

Dr. Dixon, of Spurgeon's Tabernacle, says that "men to-day exalt human nature and reject the Deity of Christ." That shows their superior wisdom. The men of yesterday exalted Christ and belittled, maligned human nature. That is what the Church has always done. The present revolt from her is our most hopeful omen.

According to a weekly contemporary, the King is a great reader, and keeps in touch with modern literature, particularly historical and sociological works, besides the best fiction. As the King also reads a chapter of the Bible daily, if the religious papers are to be believed, he must be quite a bookworm.

Speaking at Mansfield Hall, Canning Town, on a recent Sunday afternoon, Dr. Massie said that Christianity has conferred dignity upon labor. Sentimentally, this may be true, but actually it is the very reverse of true. "Amongst Christians," he is reported to have said, "the man who worked for his living was respected, and the man who did not work was condemned." Is not Dr. Massie aware that the man to whom the greatest deference is paid and the highest respect shown in Great Britain to-day, is not the man who works for his living, but the man who lives upon the labor of others? The Church is fully as culpable in this respect as the world. Are not all her seats of honor occupied by the rich? When a wealthy Christian gentleman gives a dinner party, are carpenters and masons and unskilled laborers found among their guests? No, Christ has never done anything for labor save keep it in subjection. Labor is at last waking up, however, and beginning to do a little for itself.

The Rev. J. T. Forbes, M.A., of Glasgow, is an exceptionally wise man. He is able to compare man's knowledge with that of angels, and to declare that, in some respects, man's is the greater of the two. Angels "cannot know the conditions of a tempted, tried, delivered man," though they experience a vast amount of curiosity regarding them. As a matter of fact, Mr. Forbes knows absolutely nothing about angels, not even that they exist. It may sound exceedingly ridiculous, but there is no denying the fact that pulpit eloquence is always at its best when dealing with subjects on which no knowledge is obtainable on any terms.

Mr. Dan Crawford, the much-talked-of African missionary, is returning to Africa. He finds Western civilisation very disappointing. Western civilisation will doubtless survive Mr. Crawford's disapproval; all the same, it is curious that he should prefer the country where is so little of Christianity to the country where there is so much of it. If Mr. Crawford were not in the missionary business himself, one might expect him to be less ardent as to the necessity of Christianising the natives. We understand that Mr. Crawford originally took up with missionary work for the benefit of his health.

The Canadian Government census gives details of the religious opinions of the population, which numbers seven and a quarter millions. These profess seventy-nine religions, including 15,971 Mormons, and various other fancy theologies. The non-religious total 29,161. Canada is being dechristianised at a greater rate than China is being converted.

The Times says that Canada is a country of religious liberty because no one Church dominates. That is very good so far as it goes, but it needs more than this to make a country a land of religious liberty. All that the Times understands by the expression, apparently, is that all the Churches are on a legal equality. That may be so, but it is, after all, a domestic concern. That the State should not favor any one Church is good, but if it ceases to favor one because it favors all, then we do not know that there is very much in it. It is liberty of opinion that is needed, and this is only secured when the State definitely declines to consider religion as coming within its province, either to attack or defend.

The Church of Scotland is in the doleful dumps. Her mission funds are reduced, the Jewish mission groaning under a deficit of £1,300. Her communicants decreased during last year by 1,066, the first decrease within living memory. The number of her baptisms has decreased by 2 per cent. in sixteen years. Scotland is at last beginning to emancipate herself from her long-continued bondage to credulity and superstition. Buckle's picture of her during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries is no longer true.

A baby shirt worn by Nelson on the occasion of his christening is to be sold at Sotheby's Sale-rooms, and is expected to fetch a high price. Priests sell relics at higher prices of persons who never existed.

The Christian Commonwealth is ostensibly a Christian journal issued for the purpose of furthering the interests of the Christian religion. Yet for some years it has been loudly singing the praises of Mrs. Besant, and publishing full reports of her London lectures on Theosophy. To this we have no objection whatever; but we wish to call attention to the fact that Mrs. Besant, not only is not a Christian in any accepted sense of the word, but is pronounced by the Rev. Dr. Horton to be "by far the most formidable opponent of Christianity in India." Furthermore, in any accepted definition of the term, Mrs. Besant is not even a Theist. Dr. Horton candidly admits that she is doing an enormous amount of good in India, but "feels that to the chief opponent of missionary work in India a Christian can only say, 'You go that way, I go this, for I am on Christ's side for his glory, and he is Lord of all.'" So far good; but why does our contemporary so energetically "boom" in England one who is said to be in India "by far the most formidable opponent of Christianity"?

We welcome the Rev. S. J. Poole, vicar of St. James's Church, Gravesend, as a valuable ally. In his series of sermons on "The Observance of the Lord's Day," he has been unconsciously fighting our battle. His plea for the observance of the Lord's Day has exposed the essential falseness and impotence of Christianity. Its hold upon mankind is so slender that if Sunday loses its religious character it will certainly drop off. Thank you, Mr. Poole, you have rendered us splendid services. You are quite right. A secularised Sunday will infallibly result in—Godlessness.

"Couple's appeal to Washington," runs a scare line in a newspaper. Dear old George died over a century ago, and he won't hear. The clergy constantly appeal to another "gentleman," who has been "dead" twenty centuries.

An article in a weekly contemporary is headed "Why We Need Not Sneeze in Church." It is a snuffy subject; but Freethinkers sneeze at the Church.

The Union Government Native Affairs Department (South Africa) draws attention to the increase of consumption among the natives, chiefly due, it is said, to the infection spread by those who return from the mines. There is also great difficulty in combating the "fearful ravages of syphilis." The natives are evidently in for the usual consequences of Christian civilisation. The report also says that South Africa "appears to suffer from a superabundance of denominations." Increase of consumption, ravages of syphilis, and an overdose of religious denominations. Quite a pretty trinity!

A circular issued at Wibaux, Ill., U.S.A., in connection with a crusade to increase church attendance, characterises Sunday papers as being full of "so-called funny pictures and lurid sensationalism." The Bible, which is considered suitable reading on that day, contains such serious and non-sensational stories as those of Noah's Flood, Jonah and the Whale, and Balaam's Ass.

At a recent sale at Christie's 155 guineas were paid for six dessert plates, and 58 guineas for two other plates. The price makes us think they were used at the Last Supper.

A cynic might suggest that there were no plates at the Last Supper, but only a common dish into which each guest plunged his hand and took out what he fancied. "He that dippeth his hand in the dish with me," said Jesus, "the same shall betray me."

"Clever Stage Clergyman" is the heading of a paragraph in an evening contemporary. The parsons are not so brilliant in ordinary life.

The late Lord Avebury, formerly Sir John Lubbock, who created two new holidays, was termed admiringly, "Saint Lubbock." He did more for the working classes of this country than all the "saints" in the Calendar.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £141 18s. 5d. Received since:—R. Wood, 5s.; H. Wyllie, £1 1s.; L. Martin (West Australia), 5s.; J. Wordhough, 13s. 6d.

E. B.—Thanks for welcome cuttings.

D. R. WILLIAMS.—A very good letter. No wonder the preacher did not reply. Thanks for your good wishes.

R. WOOD.—Mr. Foote steadily improves, but the last screwings up to concert pitch are slower than he anticipated.

ELIZABETH LECHMERE.—Duly attended to. Thanks.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for cuttings.

S. FERRIDAY.—Sent as desired. Pleased to know you value the Freethinker so highly.

C. W. CHRISTIE.—We are obliged to you for your long account of the career of the Rev. Stanley Parker, but he is not worth so much of our space or your trouble. What really interests us is the fact that you despise the Wesleyan Methodist Church, and all it stands for, as much as you were once attached to it and preached its doctrines.

H. V. S.—Under consideration. Sorry to hear of your illness, and hope you are quite yourself again now.

JOSEPH CLOSE.—It is not necessary for Freethinkers, when affirming, to hold up their hands—or their feet. Pardon the joke. But the whole matter, thanks to the good Christians, is so funny. We will take your hint, and call attention to Bradlaugh's Oaths Act from time to time. Glad you held out and set the Court right.

R. M.—We cannot express a dogmatic opinion about a particular occurrence within your own experience—it would have to occur within ours in order to justify an attempt at explanation. So much depends upon the person influenced, the character of the product, and many other circumstances. All we can say here is that the marvels related as having occurred at Spiritualistic meetings have never been verified in a way that was satisfactory to a committee of scientific experts and trained observers. You would probably find Abnormal Psychology, by I. Corint, and Evidence for the Supernatural, by J. L. Tuckett, of value to you as aids to understanding what you have witnessed.

J. E. FYSH (Santo, New Hebrides).—Pleased to hear from one who was an ardent worker in the N. S. S. ranks in this country, also to learn that your enthusiasm for the good old cause still lives. Unfortunately, there is need for this in all parts of the globe. Superstition is world-wide, and the antidote must be world-wide also. Your desire to do more than you are doing is laudable and natural, and none of us are too great to be without the same kind of feeling. The best way is to do what we can, when we can, and rest content. Miss Vance is attending to the other matters mentioned in your letter. The new edition of Frazer's Golden Bough has reached its seventh volume. Each vol. is published at 10s. net.

E. DALES.—We note your delight at our exposure of the Wheeler slander; and, as you will see, we are dealing with the matter at length in the present issue. You say you have "heard it read many times," and we wish we could feel sure that after our exposure you will not hear it again. A lengthy experience, however, has convinced us that a certain type of Christians will repeat a lie just so long as it pays them to do so. All we can do is to supply the matter for its refutation.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We are devoting a little extra space this week to our exposure of the latest Christian Evidence lie concerning the late J. M. Wheeler, but we believe that most Freethinkers will consider the space well used. Apart from our own personal interest in the matter, the party as a whole owes a duty to the memory of its writers and speakers, and attack should be met with a prompt defence. A lie about a living person is bad enough, but a lie concerning a dead one carries with it something specially contemptible. We have done our best to make the exposure of this particular slander complete and final, and we hope that Freethinkers will bear the facts in mind so that they may meet the statement, whenever and wherever made, with a prompt contradiction.

We believe our readers find extracts from correspondents' letters interesting. Here is one which expresses rather a fresh view:—

> "The thanks of the readers of the Freethinker are due to you, not only for your own work, but also for that of the remarkably able body of writers your personal qualities have drawn to co-operate with you during so many years. I am only looking at it from the standpoint of an ordinary reader, and it impresses me; but I am confident that the strength of this impression deepens upon those who know the difficulties of editorial work, to say nothing of the special circumstances of the case."

There is discrimination in this eulogy—whether it is deserved or not.

Mr. T. Martin, an old-time London Freethinker, now of Perth, Western Australia, writes us that he is commissioned "to convey to Mr. Foote and staff of the Freethinker the compliments of the Right Hon. T. Walker, Attorney-General of this State, and to wish them every success in their propaganda." Mr. Walker is an old associate of Sir Robert Stout, whose Freethought opinions are well known. Both were also associated with Mr. Joseph Symes in the earlier portion of his activities in Australia, and we are glad to learn from Mr. Martin that our old friend's work in the colony is still bearing fruit. We are not surprised at this being so. Joseph Symes was a born fighter, and the memory and work of such live on long after the names of more timid souls are forgotten.

From the last number of the New York Truthseeker to hand, we see that Dr. Jacques Loeb has been refused membership of the New York Century Association. Dr. Loeb is among the world's greatest living biologists, and many of his investigations into the reactions of the nervous system of the lower organisms have become classics. Several reasons are given for rejecting his membership. One, that he is of Jewish descent; another, that he has strong predelictions for Socialism; a third, that he is erratic in his views. The first reason is ruled out by the fact that the club already has a number of Jewish members. The second also rings hollow. We believe the third is nearer the truth. Dr. Loeb's views are erratic. By that is meant, we presume, that he has not scrupled to express his antagonism to the religious interpretation of nature, and to avow a thoroughgoing scientific Materialism. We question whether America holds a dozen men of greater or more daring scientific genius. We decline to condole with him on his rejection from the Century Association. He would have conferred honor by his presence. The Association alone loses by his absence.

"Mr. Dunnybrig has terrible coorious ideas, I warn 'ee. He says the Almighty lets us see more and more of Him as the world goes on, and that God larns from his creatures, just like we larn from our dogs and cattle.

"In a word, he declares that God be improving," said young Harry Hawke. "I've heard him tell it at the meeting-house where we go. And many suchlike things he'll dart out in the fury of prayer as comes over him."

"Should you say that was true, or be it just a pinch of madness in the man?" asked Pancras. "Do God Almighty change, or be it blaspheemious to think so? I should reckon it was, for 'tis as much as to say He ban't up to His high-water mark."—Eden Phillpotts, "Widecombe Fair."

If we believe the language of the devout, we must admit that the most spiritual of men hide in their heart thoughts of which they are heartily ashamed. It is not into the mouth of the reprobate, but into the mouth of her devoted members, as they enter upon their sacramental service, that the Church puts the significant prayer—"Almighty God, unto whom all hearts be open, all desires known, and from whom no secrets are hid; cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of thy Holy Spirit." Inconsistency in adults is far too well recognised to need proof.—F. A. Sibly, "Youth and Sex."

Another Lie Nailed Down.—II.

AFTER writing the first part of this article, which appeared in last week's Freethinker, it occurred to me that the Christian bigots might say, "Oh, yes! What you are writing now is all made up for the occasion. You can say anything you like fifteen years after the event." Consequently I decided to start by reprinting what I wrote immediately after Mr. Wheeler's death. The following is reproduced verbatim from the Freethinker of May 15, 1898.

JOSEPH MAZZINI WHEELER.

For thirty years he and I were close friends; for twenty years we were close co-workers. We were so much to each other personally, so intimate in every respect, that with his death a certain savor has gone from my own life. We worked together for Freethought—I nominally his chief, he nominally my subordinate, but with no thought of anything but absolute equality and brotherhood ever entering into our actual relationships. We had the same essential interests, hopes, and aspirations. We communed in spirit—if I may say so without being misunderstood. Our thoughts were as open as daylight to each other. No reticence but that of self-respect stood between us. He influenced me, as I influenced him; and sometimes his thought passed into my work, as my thought passed into his. Rarely, I imagine, are two men so associated as we were. And then we had passed through the fire of affliction together. A common suffering lent a final tenderness to our friendship, and gave it a special sacredness.

I must go back over a long tract of years to make the reader understand my dead friend's story. It was in 1868 that I made his acquaintance in London. We were both eighteen; I his elder by a fortnight—a difference I used sometimes to tell him he could never reduce. We were both Freethinkers, both fond of good reading, both full of young enthusiasm for the triumph of our ideas. I think he contributed to the National Reformer a little before I did. For a short time I lost sight of him, though we corresponded, when he went with his family to live at Glasgow. I met him there when I went to deliver my first lectures in Scotland. It is all as fresh as yesterday. We talked and talked and talked, especially about poetry, capping quotations from Shelley and Swinburne, and always recurring to Shakespeare, who was ever the supreme god with us. As we said good-night one evening, he put his hand on my shoulder in his impulsive way, and said: "George, you must be the leader of the Freethought party." I laughed; it seemed so absurd. Neither of us foresaw how we should one day be fighting at the front together.

Those were the golden days of bateless hope and tireless energy. He went over with me once when I had to lecture at Edinburgh. We climbed Arthur's Seat, on the abrupt side, before breakfast; and while he sat down on the summit I stood up at his desire and recited Swinburne's "Song in Time of Order" as though I were addressing an audience on the other side of the Firth of Forth. When I was last at Edinburgh, only a few months ago, he wrote to me on business matters, and ended by saying he wished he was there with me, and would go up Arthur's Seat once more in my company, if I would only recite that poem again for him at the top.

I think it was after the death of his father that Mr. Wheeler removed to Edinburgh, following his profession as a lithographer in a publishing house there. Mr. Wheeler, senior, was a man of liberal opinions. He had a great affection for the noble Italian liberator, Mazzini, and named his eldest son after him.

When I started the Secularist in conjunction with Mr. Holyoake, in 1876, Mr. Wheeler became a regular contributor. Some of his articles were extremely valuable, particularly those on Buddhism, which he had studied profoundly. He wrote gratuitously and ungrudgingly till the paper was merged in the Secular Review. This was in the summer of 1877. I was in the midst of great personal trouble at the time, and his loving sympathy was a stedfast star in my night.

When I felt equal to fresh labors, and started a monthly magazine called the Liberal, Mr. Wheeler once more gave his ready co-operation. Good reading from his pen appeared in nearly every number. We were both, as it were, feeling for our way in the Freethought movement, and at last we found it definitely. Mr. Bradlaugh's brutal treatment by the bigots of England opened our eyes to the real nature of modern Christianity. Previously we had thought it to be nearer death than it was. We knew it had no power left for good, but we learnt it had still much power left for mischief, and we changed our policy accordingly. He was with me in heart and head when I started the Freethinker in 1882, and when the paper began to make its way he threw up his employment at Edinburgh and came up to London to take his chance with me. I was only able to guarantee him £1 per week then, but we could both work hard and live on little. As soon as possible, of course, I paid him more. The amount was further increased after my imprisonment, and from that time, until his death, the sub-editorship was the principal source of his income.

Delicate as his organisation was, with an overplus of nervous susceptibility, and an exquisite sympathy that made him feel too acutely the sufferings of others, he had, nevertheless, a dauntless courage. There was not a shadow of fear about him. He would have done his duty, and stood for his convictions, in the face of any danger. I always knew that if I had to go to the pass of Thermopylæ he would go cheerfully with me. When he praised me for the way in which I had faced prosecution, knowing as I did all the time that I was pretty sure to go to prison, I laughed and said, "Nonsense, Joe; I'm not braver than you, only a bit bigger." When peril is really near you don't find courage universal. I did not find it so. But I knew my old friend would never quail. The Freethinker was left in his hands when I went to Holloway Gaol for twelve months as a "blasphemer." Not to lay too great a burden upon him, however, I forbade him, in black on white, to publish any illustrations during my absence.

Weeks rolled by, and I knew nothing of what was going on in the world outside my prison. But one day Mr. Bradlaugh came to tell me that the trial of the other indictment, in which he was included, was coming on before Lord Coleridge in the Court of Queen's Bench. I asked him about Mr. Wheeler, and was told that he had "gone mad." Mr. Bradlaugh put it too abruptly; he did not know how dearly we loved each other. The news stunned me. When I got back to my prison cell I walked up and down like a caged animal. The word "mad" was burning in my brain. It was long before I felt the relief of tears, but at last they came in a deluge. This was the only blow that wrung them from me. I had nothing but a lofty scorn for my enemies, but the fate of my friend was too terrible. It was worse than mine, and I could not foresee the end of it.

Mr. Wheeler had to be placed in an asylum. He got better, but he was liberated too soon. He came back to work and broke down again. Once more he recovered and resumed writing for the paper. When I was released from prison at the end of February, 1884, he was reasonably well, and I hoped he was as free from his trouble as I was from mine. But less than three months afterwards he broke down again. It was a very bad attack, but I was able to look after him myself. I kept him in the asylum until he was quite fit to leave, then I sent him for weeks to the seaside, and his residence was changed so that he might return to new surroundings. He had fourteen years before him of happy, useful life; and now the end has come he has left behind him a host of friends, without a single enemy, and hundreds of men and women whose intellectual life-blood has been enriched by the fruit of his studies. Surely he did not live in vain. More than most men he deserved to live longer, and death should have come to him more gently. As I knelt down and kissed his brow in death—for I was too late to see him living—I could only say "Poor Joe!" And as I rose to my feet again and looked down on him, and around at the strange place in which he died, I could only think: "Is this Nature's last boon to a good man? Is this her only laurel for a noble head?" In the light of the doctrine of Theism such a spectacle was a ghastly mockery.

I only learnt that Mr. Wheeler was dying after five o'clock on Thursday, May 5. I drove to the asylum as fast as I could, but I was too late to look for the last time into his eyes and perhaps catch a last word from his lips. It was all over when I arrived. He died at half-past five. Fortunately, Mrs. Wheeler was summoned earlier. She exchanged a word or two with her dear husband. He tried to say more, but failed. She asked him if she should send for me, and she tells me that a beautiful smile spread all over his face. I shall think of it as long as I live.

The acute mania, lasting for ten days, had completely worn him out. His recuperative power was gone. All that was possible was done for him. He was treated with kindness and attention and medical skill, but he could not be saved. We wish he could have died in more pleasant surroundings, but it was impossible. It was necessary to remove him from his home to the asylum; indeed, it was his only chance of recovery, and that was the supreme consideration. The decision, of course, rested with Mrs. Wheeler. It was not my doing, though I should have done the same. All who know the facts are perfectly satisfied that everything was done for the best.

Had I known this trouble was coming I would have dragged my friend away from his work and his books to the country or the seaside. Perhaps it would have saved him. But one cannot tell. I did not know there was anything wrong until the Monday morning, May 2, when he sent a note round to my house saying that he had no sleep and was unfit for work, and asking me to call round. I advised him to potter about in his little garden while I attended to the paper. In the evening when I called again he was much worse. There were clear symptoms of the old disorder. Medical and other help was obtained, but the malady developed rapidly, and on the Thursday he was removed. He was just a week in the asylum. The doctor said a change would probably take place at the end of that period—for better or worse. When the end came it was without suffering. The mania subsided. He was quite calm. His wife found him quiet and rational. He dozed away into his final rest.

On the Saturday morning before he was taken ill I met him as usual at business. He seemed a little flurried at first, and I looked at him keenly; but the agitation disappeared, and I felt no apprehension. We disposed of business, and had a delightful talk about Shakespeare. There could be no better topic, and it was the last rational conversation I had with him. He mentioned it to Mrs. Wheeler when he got home. She tells me he was so pleased, and apparently happy. And I am pleased to know that our last communion was in the great serene depths of thought—soul to soul.

I have neither time nor space to write now of Mr. Wheeler's great intellectual gifts, his wonderfully wide reading, his profound acquaintance with the whole subject of the evolution of human society, and his minute knowledge of religion, from Christianity down to the most savage superstitions. At such a moment it is character more than intellect that claims our attention. He was brave, gentle, pure, loving, and benevolent; full of kindness towards his fellows, and all dumb animals. His nature had no stain of malignity. He loathed cruelty of every kind. He was as honest as truth, as veracious as daylight. He did whatever he undertook with a whole-hearted devotion. He was true to others, and true to himself. He knew and felt that philosophy is barren without the fertilisation of love. He was one of the heralds of a new and more glorious day for humanity.

Mr. Wheeler has left a will, bequeathing all he dies possessed of to his dear wife, and appointing her executrix and me executor. As soon as possible I shall estimate the value of his small estate—of course it is comparatively trifling. I shall also have a talk with Mrs. Wheeler about the future, and with something definite before me I shall make whatever appeal I may think necessary for the widow of this dead soldier of the army of human liberation. Meanwhile I shall see to what is requisite.

All this is necessary to be said in view of the reference to how the Christians "cared for" Mr. Wheeler.

I will state the precise facts. The National Secular Society paid the expenses of Mr. Wheeler's funeral. I myself paid the expenses of his removal to the asylum and his expenses there for the week. I also paid Mrs. Wheeler her husband's salary in full for six weeks, and half that amount for another six weeks. She also received money from another source, the details of which I did not trouble to ascertain, although it was referred to as follows in the Freethinker for May 29:—

> "I also venture to refer, in passing, to another matter. I have been told that some who are not very friendly to the National Secular Society mean to do something for Mrs. Wheeler. By all means let them do so. I should be sorry to divert a single penny from her pocket, although I think a common effort on such an occasion is in every way desirable. But in order that I may not be misunderstood—and it seems so easy to misunderstand me—I deem it advisable to say that Mrs. Wheeler is not in immediate want of anything. I have paid her Mr. Wheeler's salary in full since he was taken ill, besides defraying other (not large) expenses; and although I cannot go on at this rate—and indeed it will not be necessary—I shall continue to provide her with a sufficiency until her affairs are settled. It is not very pleasant to mention these things, but one has sometimes to choose the lesser of two evils."

Mr. Wheeler's estate was soon wound up. It included his library, the house he had lived in for many years, and a little money in the Birkbeck Bank. Mrs. Wheeler was thus in possession of some £400. In addition to that I raised a "Wheeler Memorial Fund" for her through the Freethinker, which amounted to nearly £150. Mr. George Ward, acting on her behalf, checked the total of the weekly acknowledgments, and Mr. S. Hartmann, the N. S. S. Treasurer, who acted as treasurer to this Fund, paid over the amount by cheque to Mrs. Wheeler in the presence of Mr. Ward and myself. Mr. Hartmann is dead—Mr. Ward is still living. I mention these details for the sake of accuracy.

It will be seen, then, that there was no room for the Christians to "care for" Mr. Wheeler. He was well cared for without them. I am not surprised, however, that they boast of what they never did.

The house that belonged to Mr. Wheeler was a small one in Enkel-street, near the "Nag's Head," Holloway. I believe he became possessed of it through the kindness of Mr. W. J. Birch. He had lived in it for many years, he was taken ill in it, he was removed from it to the asylum. Judd-street, Euston-road, is therefore somewhat cryptic.

There never was any suggestion at the time that Mr. Wheeler had in the slightest degree reverted to Christianity. His utterances while in a state of acute mania (for he died in a padded room) count, of course, for nothing. I was told that his ravings were largely about the Devil; but it is easy to understand that, for he had been collecting materials for a "History of the Devil." Mr. Wheeler's funeral was thus described by Mr. H. Clifton—who reported my address at the graveside, a report which I may reproduce for the newer readers of this journal:—

> "The funeral of the late Joseph Mazzini Wheeler took place at Finchley Cemetery on Saturday afternoon, May 14, at four o'clock. Beautiful wreaths covered the coffin from Mrs. Wheeler, Mr. and Mrs. Foote, Mr.

Graham, the Misses Bell (Glasgow), Mr. and Mrs. Pilcher, the N. S. S. Executive, and Edith Vance and Annie Brown. A large number of London Freethinkers were gathered round the open grave. There were also Captain Adams (of Montreal), Mr. Pinder (Leicester), and Mr. W. B. Thompson (Chatham). The N. S. S. Executive was represented by G. W. Foote, Charles Watts, R. Forder, E. M. Vance, Annie Brown, E. Truelove, S. Hartmann, P. Sabine, W. Heaford, A. B. Moss, E. Bater, W. Leat, T. Gorniot, and F. Schaller. Among the crowd of mourners were Toby King, Miss Truelove, Mr. and Mrs. Bonner, Mrs. Forder, Mr. G. Bedborough, Mr. and Mrs. Chilperic Edwards, Mr. Tom Shore, Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Watts, Mr. C. Herbert, Mr. and Mrs. Standring, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, Mr. Fagan, Mr. and Mrs. Caisey, Mr. W. J. Ramsey, Mr. H. R. Clifton, Mr. W. P. Ball, Mr. Pitt (Birmingham), and many other ladies and gentlemen whom we have not space to enumerate. The beautiful weather gave the fullest opportunity to Freethinkers from all parts of London of paying the last sad mark of respect to the deceased, who was respected and loved by all. When the coffin was lowered into the grave Mr. Foote delivered a brief address. He spoke under great emotion and with much difficulty."

While I am on this subject I venture to reproduce Mr. Holyoake's tribute to Mr. Wheeler shortly after his death:—

"A LOST WORKER.

"Few men to whom a great name has been given have better illustrated it in their lives than Joseph Mazzini Wheeler did in his. He had much of the silent devotion, disinterestedness, and incessant effort associated with that name. I often think children should have the right of two names—the one given by parents in honor of someone whose career has great value in their eyes, and a second name which should be the child's right of selection when he comes of age and is able to decide for himself under what name he will be known. Mr. Wilks, an editor of the Morning Star, had been more fortunate had he not borne the great name of 'Washington.'

"Mr. Wheeler was happier in his name, as he really had qualities which illustrated it. He gave all his days and more than all his strength to the service of Freethought. He was the most painstaking of all those who have written on the careers of heretical thinkers. He was the biographer of the soldiers of the cause of unfriended progress. He took unstinted pains to find out the facts. He wrote books himself which could be trusted for substantial accuracy. He was more than a historian; he was himself a thinker. In reviewing Grant Allen's notable book on the Idea of God, Mr. Wheeler wrote this memorable sentence: 'To me, it appears that the necessity man is under of interpreting things outside himself in terms of his own consciousness is a sufficient explanation of the origin of all theistic beliefs.' He who could write this was an authority in thought. There is a campaign in the sentence; there is a volume in it. I know of no sentence on the subject so simple, so comprehensive.

"Behind the veil of Mr. Wheeler's modesty there were usefulness and power of no ordinary kind. It may be truly said of him, his life helped to shorten the days of superstition and to lengthen the days of reason.

"G. J. HOLYOAKE."

There are reasons for the special pleasure I have in reproducing this eulogy.

I think I have nailed down this lie about Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. I have shown that the Christians had nothing whatever to do with "the close of the late Mr. Wheeler's life." He was in my employment, as sub-editor of the Freethinker, up to the last moment of his sanity. Secularists gave him a public funeral. The President of the National Secular Society delivered the valedictory speech over his coffin. Mrs. Wheeler (he had no children) was treated with every kindness and consideration by the Secular party. Christians did not "care for" her any more than for him. I never heard that one of them contributed to any fund raised for her advantage. It was her misfortune that she fell into the hands of designing persons, who had no relation whatever to the Secular party, who relieved her of her money, and shortened her life. I do not say they were Christians. I know they were not Freethinkers.

G. W. FOOTE.

The Life and Labors of Haeckel.

THOMAS HOOD once referred to the musical, mystical Germans. But although modern Germany has been wonderfully prolific in musical genius, and has mystified the world with the most cloud-creating, metaphysical systems, it has also given birth to some of the very greatest of nature's students and interpreters. Among these, Ernst Haeckel, the Darwin of Germany, occupies a pre-eminent position. This distinguished Naturalist was born at Potsdam on February 16, 1834. The child was father to the man. As a boy, the great biologist was instinctively attracted by living nature. He revelled in light, color, and beauty. He adored the sun and the wondrous blue of the heavenly vault. He was fascinated by trees, butterflies, and blossoms. Although the fair-haired, blue-eyed boy would sit silently for hours and pull a daisy to pieces, and then triumphantly restore the florets to their original place in the flower disc, he nevertheless displayed that sturdy independence and thoughtful originality which were destined to characterise him through life. Both parents of Haeckel were of cultured stock. The father was a man of considerable ability, and the mother helped to deepen her son's loving interest in the wonders of nature. The lad's inclinations were strengthened as he came under the influence of the writings of the great Pantheistic poet and philosopher, Goethe. The famous traveller, Humboldt, likewise helped to deepen Haeckel's desire to study and understand nature and nature's laws. Then Darwin's Voyage of a Naturalist Round the World set the lad's brain aflame, although as Bölsche truly says, at this early period no one could have foreseen what the celebrated English naturalist was to mean to him through the coming years. While still a higher form schoolboy at Merseburg, Haeckel elected to make the study of the vegetable kingdom his life's work.

At this time, the immortal Schleiden was teaching botany at the University of Jena, and the young Haeckel regarded him as the teacher of teachers in all matters that related to plants and plant life. The young botanist was about to begin his studies under Schleiden when a serious attack of rheumatism necessitated his return to his parents, who were now domiciled in Berlin. This incident to some extent determined Haeckel's career, as his studies shortly afterwards recommenced under Dr. Alexander Braun in the Prussian capital. Braun was a close friend of the Haeckel family, and the pupil was brought into friendly personal touch with that progressive man of science. Haeckel's enthusiasm for botany was boundless, but his matter-of-fact father could not be persuaded to regard its serious study as in any way appertaining to the practical. He therefore decided that his son should embark on a medical career; and it was during his medical course that Haeckel came under the influence of such celebrated professors as Leydig, Kölliker, and Virchow. From their teachings he derived the ideas which afterwards created such a sensation throughout the world of science. Another eminent man who played an important part in the fashioning of Haeckel's ideas was Professor Johannes Müller, the Berlin physiologist and anatomist. Müller encouraged his promising pupil to accompany him when, during the summer vacations, the master studied the marvels of aquatic life along the shores of the lakes and seas.

Having taken his medical degree, Haeckel was sent to Vienna to walk the hospitals, and although his old love for botany revived, he soon passed the State examination, and, in 1858, became fully qualified as a practising physician. His patients reached the magnificent number of three; but as his hours of consultation were fixed at from five to six in the morning, his slender success need not awaken much astonishment. The elder Haeckel was now fully satisfied that his son was not cut out for a successful doctor, and, in these circumstances, he consented to furnish the funds for a twelve months' tour in sunny Italy, and to the garden of Europe the young physician journeyed in 1859. The marked artistic tendency of Haeckel's nature now for a time asserted itself. In Sicily, he tells us, "I was nearly thrown out of my line and made a landscape painter." He possessed a positive genius for painting, but this special passion for art proved but a transient phase of his career. In the waters of the sunlit Italian sea Haeckel commenced the loving and patient study of minute marine organisms, which laid the foundations of his subsequent scientific fame. With the aid afforded by his microscope and fishing-net, he made the acquaintance of a world of wondrous living creatures previously undreamed of. His newly discovered treasures served the double purpose of ministering to his love for the beautiful while materially assisting him in mastering an important province of zoological science. Out of these investigations arose his monumental monograph on the Radiolaria, which is undeniably one of the most elaborate contributions to biological science ever written.

Haeckel returned to Germany in 1860. In Berlin he heard for the first time that the Englishman, Darwin, had published a preposterous book, entitled The Origin of Species. Darwin, it seemed, dismissed the then almost universally accepted dogma of the fixity of species with scant ceremony. This revolutionary thinker had undertaken in his book to prove that plant and animal species had arisen through the agency of natural selection. All living things vary, and those that fluctuate in a favorable direction become the winners in life's race, while those that vary in an unfavorable manner or fail to adapt themselves to a modified environment are sooner or later destined to perish. In the light of the innumerable facts and arguments resistlessly arrayed in Darwin's masterpiece, the current theory that the world of life existed just as it came from the Creator's hand was no longer tenable. Haeckel immediately plunged into the pages of this amazing book, and became deeply impressed by its teaching.

"It profoundly moved me," he wrote to Professor Bölsche, "at the first reading. But as all the Berlin magnates (with the single exception of Alexander Braun) were against it, I could make no headway in my defence of it." It was not until Haeckel had debated the matter in lengthy conversations with his friend Gegenbaur at Jena that all doubts disappeared, and Haeckel became a firm adherent of Darwin's philosophy.

Many able men who might at that time have embraced the evolutionary gospel were held back by the benumbing influences of traditional doctrine. But Haeckel had already outgrown the theology of his childhood. The man-like god of the Churches had been displaced and dethroned for the all-pervading deity of Spinoza and Goethe. The utter spiritual degradation which Haeckel had recently encountered in Naples and Sicily among a so-called Christian population made him realise that an anthropomorphic divinity is but one step removed from the miracle-working saints and madonnas of Roman Catholicism. He was, therefore, disposed at the commencement of his career to look to the powers inherent in nature as affording the only possible explanation of the phenomena of living matter. In this frame of mind, he discarded his earlier prejudice against the probability of spontaneous generation, and completely abandoned his faith in the existence of a special vital force.

Haeckel was at this time a private teacher at Jena, but became Extraordinary Professor of Zoology and Director of the Zoological Museum shortly afterwards. And now this new professor published his work on the Radiolaria, in which the doctrine of descent was unreservedly accepted. The book and its author caused much searching of heart among such authority-bound biologists as Giebel and Agassiz. Haeckel had now definitely thrown all theological preconceptions to the winds, and in this early work he wrote in a vein which plainly indicated that he regarded Darwin's politic reference to the "Creator" as a concession "not "consistent, and, I think, not quite sincere." That this surmise was well warranted, is, of course, sufficiently obvious to every candid reader of Darwin's Life and Letters.

In the second decade of the nineteenth century, the evolutionary philosopher, Oken, was inspired with a desire to spread the light of science among the people. He scorned the then fashionable doctrine that science could never enter into the lives of common men. Largely owing to Oken's influence, scientific congresses were occasionally held, and the utterances of the more democratic and progressive scientists thus reached a wider public through the powerful medium of the press. One of these gatherings took place at Stettin in September, 1863. Haeckel led off as first speaker, and in a brilliant address he carried Darwin's views to their logical conclusion. In the Origin of Species Darwin had avoided all definite allusion to the human race, and had patiently awaited the publication of his epoch-making Descent of Man. But the younger and more impetuous Haeckel refused to wait, and at the Stettin Congress he declared that—

> "as regards man himself, if we are consistent we must recognise his immediate ancestors in ape-like mammals; earlier still in kangaroo-shaped marsupials; beyond these, in the secondary period, in lizard-like reptiles; and finally, at a yet earlier stage, the primary period, in lowly organised fishes."

Bold as this utterance was, it was at the time fully supported by Virchow, who was present when Haeckel's speech was delivered. But upon the old school of scientists, who struggled under the disadvantages imposed by traditional dogmas, it descended like a bolt from the blue. All things that live or have ever lived, Haeckel assured his auditors, were the outcome of orderly natural evolution.

Haeckel pictured the world of life in the form of an all-embracing genealogical tree.

> "The thousands of green leaves on the tree that clothe the younger and fresher twigs, and differ in their height and breadth from the trunk, correspond to the living species of animals and plants; these are the more advanced, the further they are removed from the primeval stem. The withered and faded leaves that we see on the older and dead twigs represent the many extinct species that dwelt on the earth in the earlier geological ages, and come closer to the primeval stem-form the more remote they are from us."

This remarkably realistic conception may be phrased in a slightly different way. If we examine an aged elm, we may notice the evidences of growth and decay which have characterised its development. There are many dead boughs and branches, and, although the trunk may be hollow, the stately tree goes on spreading its branches in the light and air. New trees are born from its seeds, and its far-extending roots may give rise to saplings in the vicinity of the parent plant. And so in the organic kingdom when regarded as a whole. Despite the fact that multitudinous species have disappeared during the course of organic development, countless new forms have arisen to carry on the vital processes of nature. For this assertion there is absolutely conclusive evidence. Having made a very critical and conservative estimate of the palæontological discoveries of the previous century, Huxley was ultimately compelled to conclude that, even if the evolutionary theory had not existed, the striking testimony to its truth furnished by the fossil remains which had been found in the rocks would have forced men of science to invent it.

SNUBBED.

Several medical men and a newspaper man were visiting an insane asylum. The employee who was showing them about pointed out a man who considered himself the Lord.

The newspaper man, true to his instincts, seeking to have an interview, asked the insane one whether he really made the earth in seven days.

The latter gave him a look of utter contempt, and said as he passed on, "I'm not in the mood to talk shop!"

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st., London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 24 SUNDAY, JUNE 15, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

When men will not be reasoned out of a vanity they must be ridiculed out of it.—L'ESTRANGE.

To the Rescue.

SOME years ago the English newspapers contained reports for a whole week of seven explorers who were accidentally imprisoned in a cave in Austria. The unfortunate men were known to have some food and some candles, but the extent of their supply was uncertain, and their condition was suspected to be desperate. Extraordinary efforts were made to effect their release, the Government even sending engineers to assist in the undertaking. It may be said that the whole of Europe was interested in their fate. Many people in England looked anxiously at the morning and evening papers for tidings from Gratz; and when at length, after eight days of entombment, the seven explorers were released, a sigh of satisfaction was breathed by millions of men and women who never saw them, and never would see them, and who would soon, perhaps, forget or half forget that incident in the bustle of our eager civilisation.

While those seven imprisoned explorers were, so to speak, in the very shadow of death, thousands of other persons were passing out of existence. But they were expiring in the "ordinary course of nature." Familiar things do not strike the imagination. Old soldiers on the battle-field see comrades fall around them with absolute unconcern. Undertakers lose all sense of the solemnity of funerals. And in the same way we do not shudder at the ordinary bills of mortality. But in circumstances of exceptional peril a fresh appeal is made to our sympathies. Thus it was that thousands of men, women, and children died of all sorts of painful or loathsome diseases, while the fate of those seven explorers trembled in the balance, without causing a single pang to the general heart of the community.

It is not our object, however, to write an essay on sympathy and imagination. What we really want to do is to indicate the religious moral of this episode.

Seven men were in peril of death—a horrible slow death from starvation in utter darkness. The world at large knew nothing of them but their danger. It was ignorant whether (as men) they were good, bad, or indifferent. Whatever their characters, it was impossible to leave them to such a terrible fate. Society insisted on every effort, at any cost, being made for their release. Many persons near at hand—not relatives, nor even friends—could scarcely sleep for thinking about them in the lone still night with its "giant heart of memory and tears."

Now all this is something new in the world. Not that sympathy is new, not that there is anything novel in help between man and man. The novelty is in the scope of the emotion. A cosmopolitan humanity is growing up which realises the sentiment of the Roman poet who made a stage character exclaim that, as a man, nothing human was alien to him. The world is becoming more sensitive. It shivers at the thought of suffering which, hundreds of years ago, it would have regarded with sheer indifference. And this intensity, this expansion, of the sympathetic emotions, is not due to any religious causes. It is due entirely to the progress of science, which has brought about a rapid intercommunication between different parts of the world, multiplied interests and attachments, and quickened all the springs of life.

Directly, this progress is material; indirectly, it is ethical; still more indirectly, it is religious. It is a fond conceit of the theologian that religion is a cause of progress. Religion is a purely conservative agency. It stereotypes what it finds. Always the last to move, it brings up the rear of the great procession of humanity. The gods of to-day reflect the ideas and characters of the men of a thousand years ago.

Still, religion does move, however slowly; though it only moves because it must, because it cannot afford to be left utterly behind. In an age of humanity, the brutal old doctrines of divine caprice, holy vengeance, and heavenly malignity, die a natural death. Yet they are not buried; they become transformed. The old words are retained with new meanings. Some little adjective, adverb, or preposition is seized upon, and magnified into infinite meaning; and thus, by changing the proportion of the ingredients, the compound is totally changed in its character. Once it was taught that most men went to hell; now it is taught that most men go to heaven. There has been no alteration in the "inspired" text, only a change in its interpretation. The Word of God is compelled to follow the growth of the Spirit of Man.

How is it possible for men and women who are wretched at the thought of the peril of seven men they never heard of before—how is it possible for men and women who make frantic efforts to save them—to believe in their heart of hearts that the Creator of all men and women will thrust the majority of them into hell, and hold in his untrembling hands for ever the key of their dungeon of torture? Hell is doomed when the very worst of men would shrink from keeping their enemies in it for a single hour. Cruel lynchings and other atrocities may be wrought by "civilised" men in moments of fierce passion, when the beast within them leaps through the restraints of civilisation. But cruelty is no longer inflicted deliberately in cold blood. How then can we go on worshiping a God who coolly plans, and remorselessly carries out, the wholesale damnation of his own creatures?

Gradually, but surely, generation after generation, the world is growing sweeter, purer, and brighter. The barbarous ideas of the old theology are fatally discredited. A new religion is springing up—the Religion of Humanity. Rescuing souls from hell is a decaying employment. Science and brotherhood are striving to rescue the poor, the downtrodden and the wretched. The policy of the new reformation is to make the most of this life. The promises of bliss in another life begin to fall upon the people's ears as idly as the threats of future pain. Man is entering upon his heritage of comfort, hope, and dignity in this world—which is the world of all of us, and where, in the end (as the poet says), we find our happiness, or not at all.

The Witch Mania.—II.

THE vast majority of those executed for witchcraft were women. At all times witches appear to have been more numerous than wizards, owing, one may assume, to their closer connection with the world of supernatural or ghostly beings. It was said "For one sorcerer, ten thousand sorceresses," and Christian writers were ready to explain why. Woman had a greater affinity with the Devil from the outset. It was through the woman that Satan had seduced Adam, and it was only to be expected that he would utilise the same instrument on subsequent occasions. James I., Macaulay's "wisest fool in Christendom," writes in his Demonologie that it is easy to account for the greater number of witches, "For, as that sex is frailer than man is, so it is easier to be entrapped in the gross snares of the Devil, as was over-well proved to be true by the serpent's deceiving of Eve at the beginning, which makes him the homelier with that sex sensine." To be old, or ugly, or unpopular was to invite persecution, and in an overwhelming majority of instances to be accused meant conviction. It was said that it was common with women of the lower classes, during the height of this mania, to pray that they might never grow old.

Upon the most trivial signs, women were accused of dealings with the Devil. If the crops failed, or the milk turned sour; if the head of a local magnate ached, or a minister of the gospel fell sick; if a woman was childless, or a child taken with convulsions; if a cow sickened or a sheep died suddenly, some poor woman was charged with witchcraft, and tortured until she confessed her alleged crime. A mole or wart on any part of the body was a sure sign of commerce with the Devil. Every such woman was believed to have one part of the body that was insensible to pain. To discover this, she was stripped and long pins run into her body. If a suspected witch kept a black cat, could not shed tears, or failed to repeat the Lord's Prayer correctly, these were all so many signs of guilt. More serious tests were the following: A woman's legs were tied across, and she was so seated on them that they bore the entire weight of her body. In this position she was kept for twenty-four hours, and on the first sign of pain condemned as a witch. There was the torture of the boot—a frame in which the leg was placed and wedges driven in until the limb was smashed. A variation of this was to place the leg in an iron boot and slowly heat it over the fire. There was also the thumbscrew, an instrument which smashed the thumb to pulp by turning a screw. More barbarous still was the bridle. This was an iron hoop, passing over the head with four prongs, two pointing to the tongue and palate and one to each cheek. The suspected witch was then chained to the wall, and watchers appointed to keep her from sleeping. The slightest movement caused great torture, and in the majority of cases a confession was secured. The favorite and most general test, however, was by water. The right hand was tied to the left foot, the right foot to the left hand. She was then thrown into a pond. If she sank, and drowned, she was innocent. If she floated, she was guilty, and was burned.

This water test was a favorite of Matthew Hopkins the celebrated witch-finder, appointed to the work by Parliament during the Commonwealth. Hopkins travelled up and down the country, much like an assize judge, putting up at the principal inns, and at the expense of the local authorities. He charged twenty shillings a visit, whether he found witches or not. If he discovered any, he charged twenty shillings for every witch brought to execution. In addition to the water test the following was practised. The witch was placed crosslegged on a stool in the centre of the room. Doors and windows were kept open to watch for the entrance of some of the Devil's imps. These imps might come in the form of a fly, a wasp, a moth, or other insect. If the watchers failed to kill any insect that came into the room, it was clear evidence that this was a demon, and the proof of guilt was established. Hopkins was responsible for the death of a large number of people, and it is comforting to know that he eventually fell under suspicion of witchcraft himself. His success in discovering witches led to the accusation that he was in league with Satan, who provided him with a list of witches. He was seized, tried by his own favorite water test—and floated.

It is hard to realise, nowadays, the gravity with which these trials were undertaken. An outline of a very famous witch-trial will best bring this home, and which I take from the report published in 1682, at the sign of the Bible, Duck-lane, London. The trial was that of Rose Callender and Amy Duny, before Sir Mathew Hale, "Lord Chief Baron of His Majesties Court of Exchequer." The two women, both widows, were charged with bewitching Anne Durent, Jane Bocking, Susan Chandler, William Durent, and Elizabeth and Deborah Tracey. William Durent was an infant, left in charge of Duny. For some fault the mother reprimanded Duny, who, in reply, threatened her. The same night the child was taken with fits, and on consulting a Dr. Jacob, of Yarmouth, was told to hang up the child's blanket at night and see if anything was therein. A great toad was found, which, on being thrown into the fire, "made a great and horrible noise," and was no more seen. Stranger and more conclusive still, the next day, Amy Duny was found to have her face "all scorched with fire."

Elizabeth and Deborah Tracey, aged nine and eleven, were also bewitched by Duny. They were seized with lameness, fits, and extreme pain in the stomach. Upon recovery they "would cough extremely, and bring up much phlegm and crooked pins, and one time a twopenny nail." These pins and nail were produced in court as evidence. The children's aunt also declared that she saw flies, bearing crooked pins in their mouth, come to the children. The father tried to cure them by reading the New Testament. This would proceed well enough until they came to the name of Lord or Jesus or Christ, whereupon they would suddenly fall into fits. The other charges and evidence followed in precisely similar lines.

Quite a number of eminent persons were present in court, among them being Sir Thomas Browne, the author of Religio Medici. The latter being "desired to give his opinion what he did conceive of him; was clearly of opinion that the persons were bewitched, and said that in Denmark there had been lately a great discovery of witches, who used the very same way of afflicting persons by conveying pins into them, and, crooked as these pins were, with needles and nails." The judge, Sir Matthew Hale, in directing the jury, said "that there were such creatures as witches he made no doubt at all. For, first, the Scriptures had affirmed so much. Secondly, the wisdom of all nations had provided laws against such persons, which is an argument of their confidence of such a crime." He also "desired the great God of Heaven to direct their hearts in this weighty thing they had in hand; for to condemn the innocent and let the guilty go free were both an abomination to the Lord." The jury duly returned a verdict of Guilty, and they were executed four days later.

There is not much variety in the numerous reports of witch trials. I have cited this one because it is among the most famous in English history, and because of the eminence of the men who testified their belief in the reality of the offence. There has, indeed, never been a delusion that could call a more numerous array of great names to its assistance than this one. Sir Thomas Browne, whose testimony at the trial of the two widows has already been cited, said in the most famous of his writings, "For my part I have ever believed, and do now know, that there are witches. They that doubt of these do not only deny them, but spirits; and are obliquely, and upon consequence, a sort, not of infidels, but atheists."* Henry More, the great Platonist, asserted that they who deny the agency of witches are "puffed up with nothing but ignorance, vanity, and stupid infidelity." Ralph Cudworth, one of the greatest scholars of the latter half of the seventeenth century, said that they who denied the possibility of intercourse between Satan and human beings "can hardly escape the suspicion of having some hankering towards Atheism."† Writing nearly a century later, when the English law merely prosecuted as rogues and vagabonds those who pretended to witchcraft, Blackstone thought it necessary to point out that this alteration did not deny the possibility of the offence, and added :—

> "To deny this, would be to contradict the revealed word of God in various passages both of the Old and New Testament; and the thing itself is a truth in which every nation in the world hath in its turn borne testimony; either by examples seemingly well attested, or by prohibitory laws, which at least suppose the possibility of a commerce with evil spirits."‡

About the same time Wesley gave utterance to his famous declaration on the subject :—

> "It is true likewise that the English in general, and indeed most of the men of learning in Europe, have given up all accounts of witches and apparitions as mere old wives' fables. I am sorry for it, and I willingly take this opportunity of entering my solemn protest against this violent compliment which so many that believe the Bible pay to those who do not believe it. I owe them no such service. I take knowledge that these are at the bottom of the outcry which has been raised and with such insolence spread through the land in direct opposition, not only to the Bible, but to the suffrage of the wisest and best of men in all ages and nations. They well know (whether Christians know it or not) that the giving up witchcraft is in effect giving up the Bible."§

This was written at a time when, as Wesley says, the educated European mind was beginning to reject tales of witchcraft as mere fables, although as late as 1778, the "Associated Presbytery" passed a resolution deploring the fact that witchcraft was dropping into disrepute. At the commencement of the witch epidemic, Montaigne had written :—

> "How much more natural and more likely do I find it that two men should lie than one in twelve hours should pass with the winds from east to west? How much more natural that our understanding may, by the volubility of our loose, capering mind, be transported from his place, than one of us should, flesh and bones as we are, by a strange spirit be carried upon a broom through a tunnel or a chimney."‖

Montaigne's voice was quite unable to arrest the development of the epidemic. Against his influence were the many centuries during which people's minds had been saturated in superstition, and which had created an atmosphere favorable to all kinds of delusion. Fortunately, other forces were set in operation. The growth of physical science, and the weakening of direct theological influence in social affairs, gave rise to a temper of mind fatal to the continuance on a large scale of such a belief as that of witchcraft. To-day it has ceased to interest the world except as a problem of historical psychology.

Weighed in the Balances.

Father Ralph. By Gerald O'Donovan. (Macmillan; 1903. 6s.)

THIS is a book which Catholics dare not read. From their point of view its rightful place is on the Index Prohibitorius. It constitutes a terrible indictment of the Irish Catholic Church. Her motives, methods, and aims are weighed in the balances and found wanting. She contains many thoroughly sincere and noble characters who, though as a rule extremely ignorant and superstitious, love what they believe to be the truth better than life; but the priests rule the people with a rod of iron, which is bound to be bad for both. Such is the Irish Church as depicted by Mr. O'Donovan in this fascinating though painful story. From his mother's womb Ralph O'Brien was set apart for the priesthood. His mother had prayed for a son, solemnly promising that if the Lord gave her one he should be a priest. He came in answer to her prayer and promise. She was a fanatic to whom the Church was everything, and in whose sight a priest was holy and could do no wrong. Major O'Brien thought that his wife was more or less mad and took her religion much too seriously; but he allowed her to have her way with Ralph. Brought up in a convent, she had been taught to hate the world because of its extreme wickedness, and she was determined that her son should grow up unspotted from it. Her supreme care was to guard him from the slightest worldly contamination. In providing a permanent nurse for him, her first concern was that she should be decidedly religious. On the advice of her confessor, Father Eusebius, a Carmelite friar, Mrs. O'Brien engaged Ann Carty, a member of the third order of Mount Carmel, who made it a condition of service that she was allowed to attend mass daily, and a number of sodalities several times a week. Formerly her religiosity had made it difficult for Ann to get or keep a place, but Mrs. O'Brien regarded it as her highest recommendation.

Inniscar, his family place, being let on a long lease, Major O'Brien had settled down in Dublin; and after his marriage he took a house in Harcourt-terrace, in which Ralph was born. To his mother Ralph was the child of miracle. When Ann Carty arrived she was informed that her charge was a dedicated vessel, holy unto the Lord; and it was as such that Ann always looked upon him. Every day she took him in his pram to the Carmelite church, and then, lifting him out of the pram, she bore him in her arms to the rails of the high altar, where she knelt and prayed. As the boy grew older he began to take notice of his surroundings and to ask questions. Ann was as ignorant as she was devout, and her answers to his questions were not convincing, except when heaven and hell were concerned. At breakfast one morning the following dialogue occurred :—

> "What is heaven like, Ann?" he asked, as he ate his porridge.
> "Oh, it's a grand place entirely. There's God sitting on a throne of gold, and the Blessed Mother near him on another throne, and all the angels playing on harps and fiddles."
> "Is it as fine as the altar in Clarendon-street when the candles are lit?"
> "Oh! it's more beautiful than anything you could think of."
> "Will we go there, Ann?"
> "If we are good, dear."
> "And why don't we go there now, this very day?"
> Ann busied herself for a minute buttering some bread, while he waited, spoon poised in the air, eagerly watching her.
> "Why, we'd be only paving stones in heaven if we went now, but when you are a priest and have done a lot of good things, you'll be high up in heaven, with maybe a harp of your own."
> He sighed, ate his porridge in silence, and then said: "I suppose we couldn't go to hell either?"
> "What put that into your head?" Ann said, startled. "Of course we won't go to hell. Hell is a bad place, and no one that says their prayers, and does what they are told, will go there."
> "But there are lots and lots of people there."
> "Only the wicked, darling."
> "Tell me some."
> "Oh, there's Cromwell, and Henry the Eighth, and millions more."
> "Were they wicked?"
> "You'll learn all about them when you grow up."

Ralph turned out a splendid learner. At eight years of age he knew the whole Catechism by heart, and was being prepared for his first confession. He now discovered that he was a great sinner, and the place he was most familiar with was hell. He thought about it by day and dreamed about it by night. He read and re-read again and again, with avidity, that most horribly wicked book, Hell Opened to Christians. He went to his first confession, and later to his first communion. He attended a Jesuit school, and soon won an exhibition and a gold medal for Latin. He loved Latin because it was the language of the Church, but was greatly puzzled when he found that the Jesuits and the Carmelites held opposite views on the subject of Pagan learning. Many other questions troubled him, such as the idea of Oliver Goldsmith being in hell, as well as many other Pagan and Protestant writers, whom he so greatly admired.

After twenty-seven years' absence Major O'Brien returned to Inniscar, and Ralph entered the Bunnahone Seminary, still believing he had a vocation and always worrying about his soul. This Seminary was a preparatory school for Maynooth, and its speciality was spiritual training. The President, Father Phil Doyle, was neither a scholar nor a saint, but a man of the world who loved night parties and playing nap. French was taught by a man named Nolan who was nearly always drunk. He was late for his class one day, and the boys sat waiting. At last the door opened and closed, and Mr. Nolan was seen, hat on head, walking cautiously towards the desk, touching the wall with his left hand and leaning heavily on the stick in his other hand. Halfway he stopped, keeping one hand on the wall and one on the stick, glared at the boys, and said in measured tones—"What are you looking at, you country bumpkins? Have you never seen a gentleman before?" At last, he reached the desk, took off his hat, overcoat, and gloves very slowly, and sat down with difficulty. "I have to apologise, gentlemen, for being so late," he said suavely, "my rheumatism is very bad to-day." "He has been oiling it with Pat Darcy's rum," said one of the boys; "I smelled it the moment he came in the door." Such was the Bunnahone Seminary for spiritual training. Ralph's mental eyes were being slowly opened; but he still believed he had a vocation, and was anxious about his soul.

After six months at Bunnahone Seminary, Ralph went to Maynooth, and soon learned that the latter was not much of an improvement upon the former. There was scarcely one Professor who could be pronounced a genuine scholar, or who had mastered the branch of learning committed to his care; and the majority of students left the College almost as ignorant as when they entered it. Ralph worked hard, however, and was amazed at the incompetence of so many of the teachers. Doubt now assailed him; but he still believed in his vocation. In due course, he was ordained and obtained a curacy under Father Molloy at Bunnahone. Father Molloy was a drunkard and lacked principles. The Bishop of Bunnahone had the reputation of being an exceptionally holy man. Mrs. O'Brien half worshiped him. Major O'Brien had always disapproved of the choice of the priesthood for his son; and when Ralph was appointed a curate at Bunnahone, close to his home, his resentment rose to such a height that it upset his mental balance. His anger against him was so strong that he made a new will, leaving his entire property to his wife. He indignantly refused to see his son whenever he called; and in this frame of mind he died. The Bishop was now his mother's sole consolation. His lordship was never absent from Inniscar, and Mrs. O'Brien responded to his every whim. He wheedled her money out of her by the thousand; and last of all she made everything over to him and entered a convent. Other rich women in the diocese had done the same before her.

Father Ralph became a popular favorite; but his intercourse with the people soon convinced him of the fact that, as a class, the priests were universally hated. The people submitted to their rule simply because they feared them. Here and there a priest was to be found who was a good man, such as Father Duff, who confessed that he never gave ten minutes to thinking about his soul in his whole life, and that if the Catechism didn't tell him he had one he wouldn't know it, and Father Sheldon, who was obliged to admit that doing any thinking on his own account was "a dangerous occupation for a priest"; but being good men they made bad priests. Father Molloy was declared to be the typical priest, and he was a heartless tyrant in his parish. Father Ralph established a club for working-men which proved a great boon to many of them. Father Molloy frowned on that club from the beginning. When three of the members were nominated to fill half of the six vacancies for the office of Town Commissioners, Father Molloy and his friends canvassed the town against them with complete success, and the club itself was smashed up. "One by one half-a-dozen workmen were dropped by their employers, and found it impossible to get work elsewhere." This was done out of spite because they had ventured "to set themselves up against the respectable shopkeepers of this ancient town." Father Ralph did his utmost to find employment for them, but he "could get no one to take them." When he asked Father Molloy to get them work his reverence, pursing his lips and frowning, said, "A little starvation will do them good and bring 'em to their senses." Eventually he promised to think about it, but he added:—

> "I won't lift a finger though for Byrne and Dunne. They may go to hell for all I care. I wish to God they were out of the town. I'll have no man in the parish that won't go my way. I met that little Dunne yesterday and he had the impudence to cheek me. I'll make mincemeat of him yet."

Father Ralph became a Modernist, and the present Pope's Encyclical against Modernism compelled him to renounce his Orders. No one can honestly peruse this book without coming to the conclusion that the curse of Ireland is priestcraft, and that the Irish nation cannot possibly prosper as long as this curse remains. There are many thousands who do not believe in the Church, but they are afraid to say so openly. In every parish the priest is supreme. When Monarch Reason awakes in Ireland the Fathers Molloy will have to flit, and Mr. O'Donovan's book will do much to accelerate the advent of that happy time.

> "I am fully aware of the delicacy of the subject of which I write. It is hedged around by a curiously impalpable barrier. Men in certain positions dare not speak their minds openly about it for fear of their words being misconstrued at home. The power behind the missionaries in America especially, and also in England, is great. The brand of 'Atheist' or 'Unbeliever' can easily be attached to a [Cabinet] Minister, so it comes to pass that one hears opinions in private that they dare not imperil their position by expressing openly."—GEORGE LYNCH, The Path of Empire (1903), p. 47.

> "The Boxer patriot of the future will possess the best weapons money can buy, and then the 'Yellow Peril' will be beyond ignoring. Wên Hsiang, the celebrated Prime Minister of China, during the minority of Tung Chih in the early 'sixties, often said, 'You are all too anxious to awake us and start us on a new road, and you will do it; but you will all regret it, for, once awaking and started, we shall go fast and far—farther than you think—much farther than you want!' His words are very true."—SIR ROBERT HART, These from the Land of Sinim (1901), pp. 52-53.

BEFORE proceeding further, it will be as well to clear up one or two popular misconceptions—due to the wholesale misrepresentation and downright lying of missionary propagandists. To hear some missionaries, over here for a six months' holiday, discourse at the annual missionary meetings held in our churches and chapels, one would think that the only recreations of the Chinese consisted in smoking opium and murdering their female infants; or, if they permit them to live, to torment them by binding their feet; added to which they worship idols and are immersed in the most degrading superstitions. The opposition encountered by these great and good men in China is accounted for by the "opium war," by which Indian opium was forced upon the unwilling Chinese at the point of the bayonet, and to the intolerance of the Chinese religions.

As a matter of fact, the Chinese are, of all nations, the most tolerant in matters of religion. Professor Parker, in his China and Religion, observes:—

> "It is surely very much to China's credit that at no period of her history have the ruling powers 'in being' ever for one instant refused hospitality and consideration to any religion recommended to them as such. If there has been hostility, it has always sprung up from political and economical causes" (p. 2).

And the same author declares:—

> "That the Chinese Government has always been one of the broadest-minded and the most liberally inclined towards pure religion; that it has never persecuted to the merciless and cruel extent once so common all over Europe, and that when it has seemed to persecute at all, it has really only defended what it honestly believed to be its own political rights; it has never encouraged religious spite, mental tyranny, or the stifling of any free opinion that keeps clear of State policy, scandal, or libel" (pp. 6-7).

To make this point clearer, says the Professor:—

> "If we put it in another way, suppose the 2,500 missionaries of innumerable Protestant sects now in China applied for passports to go about the same work in Russia, what would be their reception? How would their rights compare with those they enjoy in China?" (p. 8).

And, as he further points out, we know nothing of "final causes" or of a man-like "Supreme Ruler":—

> "Why, then, should the odium theologicum be so persistent except on the hypothesis that no one possesses the least knowledge about either life or soul, and therefore each apostle feels angry at being driven into a corner when pressed for demonstration? Such, at least, is the tolerant view the best rulers of China have always taken of religion" (p. 15).

This toleration is the outcome of that natural and ingrained scepticism which we have seen to be characteristic of the Chinese mind. We could give many more citations as to the toleration of the Chinese in matters of religion, but it will suffice to give the testimony of Mr. Alexander Michie, whose work, The Englishman in China during the Victorian Age, is the standard book on the subject. He says:—

> "One trait in the national character was highly favorable to the reception of a foreign religion. The Chinese were of all nations the most tolerant of opinion. They had already accepted and assimilated two foreign religions—Buddhism and Mohammedanism; indeed, they had also, two hundred years before, accepted and retained Christianity until it was expelled in convulsions provoked by the foreign missionaries themselves. Its second advent need not have caused convulsions had it come as the others had done, with clean hands, as a religion and nothing else." *

So much for the missionary charges of intolerance. Now for the charges of infanticide so boldly and repeatedly brought against the Chinese by the missionaries.

Dr. Morrison, who says that this subject, of the prevalence of infanticide in China, has been discussed by a legion of writers and observers, and the conclusion generally arrived at is—the prevalence of the crime has been enormously overstated. He goes on to observe:—

> "The prevalent idea with us Westerns appears to be that the murder of their female children is a kind of national pastime with the Chinese, or, at the best, a national peculiarity. Yet it is open to question whether the crime, excepting in seasons of famine is, in proportion to the population, more common in China than it is in England. H. A. Giles, of H. B. M. Chinese Consular Service, one of the greatest living authorities on China, says: 'I am unable to believe that infanticide prevails to any great extent in China.....In times of famine or rebellion, under stress of exceptional circumstances, infanticide may possibly cast its shadow over the empire, but as a general rule I believe it to be no more practised in China than in England, France, the United States, and elsewhere' (Journal, China Branch R. A. S. (1885), p. 88). G. Eugène Simon, formerly French Consul in China, declares that 'infanticide is a good deal less frequent in China than in Europe generally, and particularly in France,' a statement that inferentially receives the support of Dr. E. J. Eitel (China Review, xvi., 189). The prevailing impression as to the frequency of infanticide in China is derived from the statements of missionaries, who, no doubt unintentionally, exaggerate the prevalence of the crime in order to bring home to us Westerns the deplorable condition of the heathen among whom they are laboring. But even among the missionaries the statements are as divergent as they are on almost every other subject relating to China."*

After citing several of these contradictory statements, Dr. Morrison observes:—

> "One of the best known Consuls in China, who lately retired from the service, told the writer that in all his thirty years' experience of China he had only had personal knowledge of one authentic case of infanticide. 'Exaggerated estimates respecting the frequency of infanticide,' says the Rev. Dr. D. J. MacGowan, 'are formed owing to the withholding interment from children who died in infancy.' And he adds that 'opinions of careful observers will be found to vary with fields of observation'" (China Review, xiv., 206). †

Of the love of the Chinese for their children, we have ample testimony. Miss Elizabeth Kendall, in her recently published book, A Wayfarer in China, tells us:—

> "The way to the heart of the Chinese is not far to seek. They dote on children, and children the world over are much alike. More than once I have solved an awkward situation by ignoring the inhospitable or unwilling elders and devoting myself to the little ones, always at hand. Please the children and you have won the parents" (p. 56).

Mr. George Lynch observes:—

> "As to the love of the Chinese and Japanese for their children, it has to be seen to be appreciated. Those wise-eyed little mites, who before they can walk sit perpetually enthroned upon their mothers' backs throughout the live-long day, are a source of so much joy and adoration to their parents that one feels no surprise not to hear them cry as other children do." ‡

And these are the people who, according to some missionaries, practice wholesale murder of their helpless infants!

As for the practice of foot-binding, it is indeed a barbarous custom. It has been condemned by the reform party now in power in China, and is well on the road to extinction. Mr. R. F. Johnston, in his valuable work on the Chinese, says:—

> "In spite of the cruelty involved in foot-binding, the rather common impression that the Chinese have no affection for their daughters or regard the birth of a girl as a domestic calamity is very far from correct. That a son is welcomed with greater joy than a daughter is true, but that a daughter is not welcomed at all is a view which is daily contradicted by experience. Mothers especially are often as devoted to their girls as they are to their boys. In the autumn of 1909 a headman reported to me that a woman of his village had killed herself because she was distracted with grief on account of the death of her child. The child in question was a girl, fourteen years of age. 'Her mother,' said the headman, 'begged Heaven [Lao T'ien-yeh] to bring her daughter back to life, and she declared that she would willingly give her life in exchange for that of her daughter.' It is erroneous to suppose that the old loving relations between mother and daughter are necessarily severed on the daughter's marriage. It is often the case that a young married woman's happiness consists in periodical visits to her old home." §

Moreover, it should be carefully remembered, says Professor Giles, that Manchu women do not compress their feet, and the Empresses of modern times—who belong to the Manchu race—have feet of the natural size. Neither is the practice in force among the Hakkas, nor among the hill tribes, nor among the boating population of Canton and elsewhere. The same authority observes: "Neither is there any foundation for the generally received opinion that

Acid Drops.

We have received a long, chaotic letter from Mr. H. A. Marsh, which he rightly surmises will not be printed in the Freethinker. The only relevant statement he makes is that his contemptible babblings about the late J. M. Wheeler—who died fifteen years ago, and might have been left, as the saying is, to rest peacefully in his grave—did not refer to anything that occurred during his last illness, in 1898, but to something that occurred during his first illness, in 1883—at which time, we believe, Mr. Marsh was either very young or unborn. His own authority on the matter may be treated as negligible. The authority he advances is that of a Mr. Richards, who states, in a letter to Mr. Marsh, dated March 26, 1913—that is, thirty years after the event—that he heard Mr. Wheeler utter certain words as to whether blasphemers could be saved, etc., etc. We have no room for more of such nonsense. For its importance to the lower sort of Christians depends upon that word "illness." They take it to have been a common illness, whereas it was mental illness. Mr. Wheeler broke down after our imprisonment, and had to be placed in an asylum. Surely every sensible person will excuse us from discussing samples of his ravings while in that condition. We may add that Mr. Wheeler's illnesses were always mental. His body was frail, but not unhealthy; he ate well and slept well; it was brain trouble every time that he broke down. He was in three asylums in 1883—the year of my imprisonment; he was in another asylum in 1884—after my release; and he died in another asylum in 1898. We did our utmost for him during that fourteen years. We had been warned that another attack would probably be fatal.

We decline to consider the ravings of a madman—for such Mr. Wheeler was during every recurrence of his malady. We heard plenty of them one Sunday afternoon in 1884, when we had to rope him (with the assistance of Mr. W. J. Ramsey) and take him to a lunatic asylum ourselves. That horrible performance just left us time to swallow a cup of tea and step upon the Hall of Science platform.

The greater part of Mr. Marsh's letter is occupied with an invitation to us to go to Hyde Park and hold a public discussion with him. On what? Why, on whether Mr. Wheeler was fair to the Rev. Z. B. Woffendale in an article in the Freethinker in 1893—twenty years ago! What on earth has Mr. Marsh to do with that article? What has anybody to do with it at this time of day? We don't remember what the article was, and we decline to take the trouble to refer to it. Any mistake, misrepresentation, or injustice it might have contained should have been corrected or challenged at the time. It is not going to be discussed by us, or in these columns, to-day. Only born fools—or designing persons trading on the folly of born fools—would quarrel with our decision.

A word in conclusion. Is it not, perhaps, the most decisive condemnation of Christianity that the champions of its "Evidences" have always devoted most of their time to raking over the muck-heap of personalities. We never knew them to do anything else. We never heard of their doing anything else. Were we to imitate them we could fill whole Freethinkers with similar cackle about Christians. But we decline to follow their disgusting example and sink to their ignominious level.

Since writing the foregoing paragraphs we have received a most amusing letter from Mr. W. Davidson, a member of the N. S. S. Executive, residing at 131 Warwick-road, Edmonton. The opening paragraph of this letter shows what sort of stuff the latest yarn about a distinguished dead Freethinker is made of. Mr. Davidson writes:—

> "Inquirers are referred to Mr. Allen, and we are informed that a letter exists written, it is supposed, by a sister of Mr. Wheeler's; the letter being in the possession of a Mr. Richards, of Edmonton. Mr. Allen lives three doors from me, but I was so unkind as to pass his door, and seek out Mr. Richards who holds 'the original letter.' He received me with a courtesy that is very rare among the elect and placed the whole case before me. To come to the point. There is no letter from Mr. Wheeler's sister; in fact, there is no letter at all. To cap it all, Mr. Richards knows nothing about the sister; he does not know if there is one."

Mr. Richards tells his own story and seems to be his own witness. He repeats to Mr. Davidson, with several fresh decorations, what he has already said to Mr. Marsh and others. He admits that Mr. Wheeler, on the night of March 9, 1883, was "off his head." Why, then, go further? How on earth can it matter what poor Wheeler said? We don't care a straw what he said. It cannot be of the slightest interest or importance to any sensible person in the world. And we repeat that we decline to cumber our pages with it.

Mr. Davidson goes on (Mr. Richards took him there) to that wicked article of Mr. Wheeler's in the Freethinker of January 29, 1893. This part of Mr. Davidson's letter is extremely funny, and we would print some passages if we had not already given the matter too much space. "The whole thing," Mr. Davidson concludes, "is an escape of Marsh gas, which has produced the usual will-o'-the-wisp."

A protest against the use of religious terms in business advertising has been made in a new direction and in rather a novel manner. The Annual Convention of the Society of Friends, held recently in New York, protested strongly against the use of the word "Quaker" for advertising articles of commerce. The committee asks, if "Quaker Whisky," and similar expressions, why not permit the following?—

> "Baptist beer is the best booze."
> "Congregational cocktails makes multitudes marry."
> "Episcopalian paint covers a multitude of sins."
> "Catholic cocktails are a cure for all cases."
> "Presbyterian purses for plethoric pockets."
> "Lutheran looking-glasses give pious reflections."

The committee appointed to consider the matter invites the co-operation of other religious bodies for their mutual protection. Perhaps, if this invitation meets with no response, Quaker business men may contemplate reprisals. The subject opens up almost infinite possibilities.

Dr. Campbell Morgan says he only really believed in the Bible when he put all other books on religion aside and said, "I will read it without prejudice and without pride, as every man should. I will let it make its own appeal to my soul. And it did." Of course it did. So would any other book read in the same circumstances. It is as plain as it can be that Dr. Morgan expected that it would appeal to him, and, in such cases, the expected usually happens. That is not reading the Bible without prejudice; it is commencing with a prejudice of a very strong and definite character. Dr. Morgan is either deliberately fooling himself or fooling other people.

A new novel bears the title The Naked Soul. The very essence of nudity! And no doubt full of piety.

A woman named Kate Martin was charged recently with riotous behavior in a church. As she wanted to see "God," and not the clergy, she was committed to an asylum.

The Church Times professes itself greatly disappointed at the outcome of the Balkan war. So, we imagine, are many others. These others who may have pictured the Allies as undertaking a war in the interests of freedom and brotherhood will have had a rude awakening on finding the movement disclosed as a mere piratical enterprise, with the Christian Allies ready to fly at each other's throats over the plunder. The regret of the Church Times is not, however, on this score. Its grievance is that the "hope of December"—"the entire destruction of the Ottoman Empire"—is not to be realised. It is not content for that Empire "to continue another day." We do not imagine that it matters much whether the Church Times is content or not. Its shriekings are only noteworthy as showing how far Christian bigotry will carry some people. The Church Times has never raised a word of protest against the now admitted barbarities of the Christian Allies. It is a case of the Cross against the Crescent, and anything the former may do in such a contest is wholly justifiable.

Only a week or so ago this same very Christian journal was indulging in another shriek in favor of conscription—we beg pardon, compulsory military discipline, which is a new name for the old thing. It laughed at those who thought a military training injurious to character, an incentive to militarism, or economically wasteful. As though any form of compulsory military training could avoid producing all these effects. It argues that many would be better off

* H. A. Giles, The Civilisation of China; 1911; p. 105.

Digitized by Google

under military training than they are at present. Very likely; but that is an argument for better social organisation, not for conscription. And how is it possible to maintain a large army of men in a wholly non-productive pursuit without saddling the rest of the community with their support? Even though it be necessary, it is economically disastrous.

The Christian Church, says the Church Times, holds it not merely permissible, but even laudable, to bear arms at the bidding of lawful authority, and that without questioning the fundamental justice of the conflict. That is the proper spirit of militarism. Fight on order, whether the conflict be just or unjust, and without even inquiring whether it be one or the other. And that, we are asked to believe, is not detrimental to character? If such a course means anything at all, it means the entire abrogation of a sense of right and wrong. And how can we expect men trained in that school to become as useful citizens as they might otherwise be? The Church Times also reflects that a nation that relies on a voluntary army may rush light-heartedly into war, but a nation in arms will act differently. It is "precisely the obligation of military service" that has "turned France from drunken dreams of glory to become the most stable upholder of European peace." We welcome this good opinion of France, which has disestablished religion, and which contains so large a leaven of Freethought in its councils. But the reasons upon which the good opinion is based are simply idiotic. France had its "drunken dreams of glory" under conscription, not under voluntaryism, which never existed in modern France. And, if conscription leads countries to become powerful factors for peace, are we to conclude that it is England—Christian England, with its voluntaryism—that is ready to rush light-heartedly into war, and is the storm centre of European life? Really, the Church Times is getting on dangerous ground. Its theology is stupid enough, but its sociology is even worse.

Mr. Balfour has been repeating his attachment to "religious education." Who doubted it? That is the "ticket" of his party, and it was his party he was addressing. Of course he talked with his tongue in his cheek. On other platforms, and on other subjects, he would never dare to say that "no thinking man" could differ from the views he was expressing. He knows very well that "thinking men" differ from him on all sorts of subjects. Perhaps it only needs to be said that the Archbishop of Canterbury (Chairman of the Church of England, Limited) presided at the meeting.

The Rev. David Barron is greatly mistaken when he says that it is "a certificate of character to be attached to a Church." It used to be a certificate of respectability, but never of character. It is a notorious fact that the biggest scoundrels in history were professing Christians. In many centres now, however, to be attached to a Church is not looked upon even as a sign of respectability, the Churches having completely lost the place they once held in the estimation of the public.

Mrs. Besant has been addressing big meetings at Queen's Hall. This is not surprising when we consider her natural gift of speech, the way in which she dresses herself now she is a Theosophic high priestess, the large amount of money spent on advertising her lectures, and the tomfoolery she pours forth in a flood. Talk sense—and how few will listen! Talk nonsense—and what a crowd will hang upon your lips! Mrs. Besant has learnt the truth of this by joyful experience. The moment she left Atheism and embraced one of the most foolish and pretentious superstitions in the world, she found that she had combined "conviction" with "respectability." People could go and hear her without loss of social dignity. There was a rush of disciples (we should call them by a harder name) who were tired of Christianity, and many of whom saw through it, but were naturally of a religious temperament, and dying for something to take the place of the faith they had abandoned. They had to have some faith, and Mrs. Besant supplied it. Moreover there was a special business advantage in Theosophy. You could make it up as you went along—on the principle of the American political candidate who ended an eloquent speech by saying, "Well, gentlemen, those are my sentiments; and if they don't suit—they can be altered." The very advertisements of Mrs. Besant's recent Queen's Hall lectures hold out a bait to every variety of superstitionists. Catholics, Protestants, Buddhists, Hindus, Mohammedans, Jews, Salvationists, Mormons, are all invited to walk into the Theosophic Annex and enjoy themselves. Mrs. Besant is working the "happy family" arrangement in religion. That is all she does. It would be a waste of time to discuss anything she says. She does not discuss nowadays; she delivers oracles. She knows no more than she did when she was an Atheist. She asserts a great deal more, but it is all about the unknown. Some day or other (after death) you may find that Mrs. Besant's assertions are true; meanwhile you give her unlimited credit for the cheques she draws upon your credulity. It is by this that all the religious charlatans in the world succeed in their operations. They supply you with information about the next life, and you supply them with position, comfort, and cash in this life. We are sorry that Mrs. Besant has joined that tribe, but there is no shirking the fact. Don Quixote told Sancho Panza that there never were but two parties in the world—the Haves and the Have-Nots. Just in the same way there never were but two mental camps in the world—the camp of Faith and the camp of Reason; and Mrs. Besant is in the wrong one.

The Rev. Dr. Meyer told his congregation at Regent's Park Chapel that he delighted in the posters on the hoardings. Did he include the pictures of the musical comedy girls?

Theologically speaking, the Rev. H. S. McClelland, B.D., of Finchley, is clearly a coming man. At present he has charge of the Correspondent Column in the Christian Commonwealth. He is exceedingly ingenious and very well versed in the art of playing with words. An anxious inquirer asks, "Can any cultured mind believe any longer in the Genesis stories of the Creation and the Flood, or the Nativity stories in certain of the Gospels?" Mr. McClelland answers thus: "Certainly, my friend. My difficulty is to understand how they can be believed by any except the cultured mind." This may strike the thoughtless as an extremely smart answer, but in reality it is no answer at all. It is rather an instance of verbal jugglery.

By a cultured mind, the reverend gentleman tells us, he means "the mind that has learned to distinguish actual truth from ideal truth, and has realised that ideal truth is nearer reality than any cumbrous happening of history." If he is right it follows that the cultured mind is only about fifty years old. The stories referred to had always been regarded as actual "cumbrous happenings of history" until scientific criticism rendered it quite impossible to treat them as such any longer. So great a man as Gladstone had not a cultured mind, for he strenuously argued that the stories under consideration were actual truths; and the same may be said of a vast number of divines at the present moment. The fact is, that the New Theologians imagine that the cultured mind belongs exclusively to themselves.

Take the story of the Virgin Birth as an example. If it is not actually true, if it never happened, how on earth can it be ideally true? Mr. McClelland is perfectly right when he says that to regard "these statements as the record of actual facts is to deprive them at once of their spiritual significance for thousands of devout and holy men who simply cannot believe they ever took place." If the Virgin Birth never took place, what "spiritual significance" can it possibly have? Certainly no more in the case of Jesus than in that of Gotama, Plato, Alexander the Great, Scipio Africanus, Augustus, or any other person whom the ignorance and credulity of admirers deified after he was dead. Such juggling tricks will save neither the Bible nor Christianity.

The Rev. John Appleyard, of Burnley, says that "when Jesus encountered social evils he promptly sought a remedy." On what authority does the reverend gentleman make such a statement? Can he name one social evil which Jesus attacked and sought to remove? Was he not known as "the friend of publicans and sinners [harlots]?" What help did the poor ever get from him? Did he not rather mock them, saying "Blessed are ye poor"?

The Dean of Norwich and Mrs. Florence Barclay are at loggerheads about the Bible. Dean Beeching is to some extent a Higher Critic, but Mrs. Barclay, with greater consistency, holds that God's Word must be characterised by absolute infallibility. We agree with the lady. The Word of God must be infallible. The Bible is fallible; therefore it cannot be the Word of God. As a scholar the Dean admits its fallibility, while as a clergyman he treats it as the Word of God, which is the very acme of inconsistency.

The usually well-informed correspondent of the Christian World has a remarkable article in that paper of June 5, on the state of religion in Germany. He says that about 40,000 persons left the State Church during the first four months of this year. In 1905 the number of seceders was 12,000; in 1911, 60,000; in 1912, 100,000; and this year the number is expected to reach 200,000. In the official papers they are compelled to fill up, stating their opinions, they describe themselves as Free-religious, Freethinkers, Monists, Atheists, Pantheists, Humanists, Theosophists, Gnostics, and no religion at all. English religious leaders, with that ingrained duplicity which seems inseparable from British Christianity, are in the habit of referring to such movements as losses that affect the Roman Catholic Church or the Lutheran Church alone, and leaving it to be inferred that evangelical Protestantism is the gainer. On this point the Christian World correspondent is most explicit. He says:—

> "Observe, this is not a movement from one Christian denomination to another. It is not a movement against Episcopacy as such, against Presbytery as such, against State connection as such. Unbelief is at the bottom of it, and the men who secede, save in a very limited number of cases, are not ridden by any principles of State policy or dogma. They care for none of these things. The seceders reason thus: 'I do not believe any longer in the Church or its dogmas. I regard the Christian Church as an absurd and antiquated institution, which may have played a useful part in the past, but has no longer any reason for its existence. Its Bible, its creeds and confessions, have been shown by science to be untenable things to which no modern and educated man can consent.'"

"Unbelief is at the bottom of it." That, we believe, is a perfectly honest and accurate summary of the situation.

Rev. David Smith, who runs a correspondence column in the British Weekly, was trying last week to cheer up a mother who had lost a girl of nineteen years of age. He tells her that the mother's revolt against God is a "heathenish attitude." When pagans did not get their desires they blamed their gods, and "What better are we than those dark pagans if, when sorrow comes, we cry out against God and charge him with cruelty?" Personally, we should say that Christians are in this respect decidedly worse than "these dark pagans." It may be all right praising one's God for doing well, when he does well, but it shows a lack of courage and intelligence not to tell him he does badly when things are done ill. Paganism, in this respect, left a man a man, with enough courage to resent ill-treatment and impeach its author. Christianity taught man to keep on its knees and return thanks to the hand that flogged him. For our part, we prefer to see one stand up to whatever he has to face—God or man.

Mr. Smith gives the mother two grains of consolation, after administering the rebuke. He tells her that sorrow is the universal lot, and if she looks around she will "find others whose case is far worse." Maybe; but that really does not affect the issue. Each one's sorrow is one's own, and one's grief at the loss of a child is not really lessened because someone else has lost two children. It is an old piece of religious consolation, "Thank God, there are many worse off than I," but those worse off have their grievance increased, if possible, by the fact of others being better off. God may hit some people harder than others, but the real question is, "Why should he hit anyone?" The second crumb of comfort is that "there are sadder places on earth than the grave," and "Taken away from the evil to come" might be written on every child's grave, for "what the evil would have been God only knows." Well, that is a pretty way to compliment God! The "dark pagans" stood up to their gods and told them what they thought about their conduct. The Christian, lacking the courage of plain speech, tells God, by way of praising him, he has arranged the world so well that every person born is lucky who dies young. The difference between pagan and Christian does not, after all, seem to be in a difference of perception of the facts, but in strength of mind and honesty of expression. Dr. Smith is evidently a very bad case.

Mr. Blatchford denies a statement "said to have been made at a public meeting in America by Mr. Mangasarian" that he had abandoned rationalism and declared himself a Christian. "I think," he adds, that "someone has been pulling Mr. Mangasarian's leg." Perhaps so. But isn't it possible that someone has been pulling Mr. Blatchford's leg?

Mr. Blatchford is further concerned about another report that has reached him,—namely, that "Mr. Mangasarian prophesies an alliance between the Roman Catholics and the Socialists against Freethought." "What strange bees some men do get into their bonnets," Mr. Blatchford exclaims. True; the German invasion of England, for instance; which as the comic song says "hasn't come off up to yet."

"That, by God, we can't stand," exclaims Mr. A. M. Thompson. Never mind what it is that the stout knight and his friends can't stand—though they know quite well that they have got to stand it. Why does Mr. Thompson take the name of God in vain? We understood that he (Mr. Thompson, not God) was an Agnostic, a Rationalist, or something of that sort—not an Atheist, of course; perish the thought! Why does he cry "by God"? If a Theist cries it he may be sincere. It is by no means a proof of sincerity in a Non-Theist. Mr. Thompson should try to recover his sense of humor.

Mr. Silas Hocking says that if the Church is in a decline, Christianity is not. "Christianity was gaining ground, but—it might as well be said first as last—it was outside the Church." We have heard this many times before; but it is sheer nonsense. Christianity and the Church are identical. They have never existed, they never can exist, apart. We do not know what Mr. Hocking means by Christianity, but we should be very glad to learn exactly where and in what manner it is gaining ground outside the Church. If he understands by it the teaching of Jesus, as Professor Harnack does, he knows as well as we do that in that sense it has always been a dead letter.

The Christian Pulpit is the strangest institution in the whole world. In proportion as the tide of its power recedes the tide of its audacity rises. The latter was never higher than it is at this moment, and the former never quite so low. The consequence is that it does not matter in the least what the Pulpit says on any subject, because nobody takes its utterances seriously. Like the clever writer of "The Office Window" in the Daily Chronicle, the great majority of people seldom hear a sermon, and rather than read one would play with Bradshaw. But as there are a few who still both hear and read sermons it may be useful to call attention to the fact whilst the influence of sermons is at ebb-tide, their extravagance is at flood-tide.

In the Christian World Pulpit for June 4 there is a sermon by the Rev. Dr. Newton Marshall which abounds in the wildest, most extravagant statements. One is that we know more about the man Jesus than we do about almost any other man who ever lived, and that we of to-day know more about him than any people in the past knew about him, except his personal friends. This statement is absurdly untrue. Why, there are scholars among us who deny his historicity, many more who doubt it, while theologians not a few regard him as largely a legendary character. Dr. Marshall is, therefore, talking sheer nonsense when he says that Jesus is almost the best known man that has ever lived. Greater scholars than he, who proudly call themselves Christians, such as Professors Schmiedel, Harnack, and Bacon, though believing in the historic Jesus, frankly admit that it is extremely difficult to extricate him from the webs of legend in which he is entangled in the Gospels.

But Dr. Marshall waxes more extravagant still. He goes on to assert that the historic Jesus is the Eternal and Universal Christ. That we may do him no injustice we give his own words:—

> "Christ is the light of the world. By that we do not mean that he may be the light of the world, or that when missionaries have carried the Gospel everywhere he will be the light of the world—no, we mean that he is the light of the world. We mean that all the real light that men have had has been Christ. Edwin Arnold wrote a poem about Buddha and called it The Light of Asia. Students of non-Christian religions tell us of much light for the soul that those religions possess. And it is all Christ. Is this too daring?"

No; nothing is too daring for the Pulpit; but we are obliged to pronounce it frothy cant and twaddle, of which a man of Dr. Marshall's intelligence ought to be incapable. If such a Christ existed and beheld even London, he would shed tears of blood at the thought of his own infinite failure.

Rev. A. J. Waldron says he is ready to "back Disraeli any day against Jack Johnson." Very likely. It's easy odds on the ghost in such an encounter. Few blacks, or whites either, would stand up long to such an adversary. But that is not the end of Mr. Waldron's wisdom. "Don't spoil everything on the wedding day," he told the same Brockwell Park audience, "by telling your wife what ripping tarts your mother makes. Swallow the bride's pie, tell her it's a dream of delight, and then take a pill on the sly." This beats Confucius hollow. Jesus Christ did not die in vain. Without his sufferings on the cross the world would never have had Mr. Waldron playing the Christian philosopher in Tit-Bits.

M. Bertillon, the eminent French criminologist, says the gentleman robber is found only in fiction. Evidently he does not regard priests as gentlemen.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £144 2s. 11d. Received since:—J. Barry, £1; Bogey, 15s.; J. N. V., 2s. 6d.; T. M. Mosley, 2s.

W. KENT.—The "twaddle" you send us from the British Weekly is too tiresome for criticism. We don't know where to begin and should never know where to end. Rev. Dr. Forsyth may take his verses for poetry, but it is rather odd that the editor should agree with him.

M. J. LEWIS.—We do not see what there is "to throw some light" on in the printed tract you send us. These stories of unnamed converted Atheists are manufactured by the dozen. They are mostly written by people of poor character for readers of weak brains. The only thing that needs explaining is the quantity of deliberate lying that goes on in connection with Christianity. We are glad to have your appreciation of the articles printed in the Freethinker.

T. M. MOSLEY.—We will glance through Mr. Ballard's production and see if there is anything in it that merits criticism. We are aware that Mr. Ballard has a vogue in certain circles, but we do not think any serious thinker is likely to be affected by what he says. We can quite understand that Mr. Ballard feels neglected when Freethought writers of repute ignore him, but as they invariably direct their criticism against writers of much better standing, their consciences are clear.

A. HOPKINS.—We note your opinion that our Wheeler articles "have given the C. E. people a nasty jar." Also, that you will expect them to lie low for the future. We feel more sanguine about their low lying.

E. B.—Many thanks for cuttings.

F. COLLINS.—We do not undertake to hunt up books and report prices for our readers. All we can tell you is that Holyoake's Bygones Worth Remembering was published in two volumes by T. Fisher Unwin.

SYDNEY SMITH.—Shall be sent as desired. We wish you good luck in the New World.

J. BARRY, sending his annual subscription to the President's Honorarium Fund, writes: "Allow me to express the hope that by this time you have entirely recovered from your late illness, and that for many years yet you will be able to preside at the Annual Conference in the efficient manner that you did at the one recently held." Mr. Barry is a vice-president of the N. S. S. and a Director of the Secular Society, Ltd.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are always welcome.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Personal.

I AM in the Freethinker editorial chair again. It is not fair to leave a responsibility to others when I feel able to bear it myself. Moreover, there are serious reasons why I should attack various arrears of work. Work, I mean, which cannot very well be delegated, but must be done by myself.

My pen has not been absent from the Freethinker for some time, as readers will have seen. In resuming the editorship I do not suddenly undertake a too heavy task. I am taking this step with my eyes perfectly open.

There are a few things I want to say to the party in general, and to my friends in particular. This I will do next week. Meanwhile, I beg to tender hearty thanks to Mr. Cohen for doing the duties of the editorial chair so long and so well, and to Mr. Lloyd and "Mimnermus," and other contributors for special help.

G. W. FOOTE.

Sugar Plums.

The following paragraph is from the editorial "Notes" of the June number of the Humanitarian, the organ of the Humanitarian League, edited by the League's honorary secretary, Mr. H. S. Salt:—

> "We are extremely glad to hear of the recovery of Mr. G. W. Foote, the President of the National Secular Society, from a recent serious illness. There are but few public men who have given such unwavering support to humanitarian principles—not merely to this principle or that, but to the movement as a whole. As editor of the Freethinker, Mr. Foote has again and again made courageous and powerful protest against the various forms of brutality with which the Humanitarian League has to deal. We say 'courageous' because it does require courage to speak freely (when one is not obliged to speak at all) on such subjects as flogging and vivisection, and 'powerful' because we know of no writer of the present day who goes to the root of a question with a keener and more unerring logical instinct than Mr. Foote. And in an age when there is so much flabby sentiment and slovenly writing, what better help can humanitarianism receive than the tribute of a clear and cogent mind?"

This is a very handsome compliment—no doubt too handsome; but the writer's discrimination makes it valuable. We have never had any inclination to "gush over scoundrels," as Carlyle would have put it; yet we would rather do them good than harm, and whoever feels otherwise is something less than a man. Our chief objection to brutal punishments, for instance, is that they not only brutalise brutes still further, but impair the dignity and self-respect of those who inflict them. Mr. Salt puts this aspect of the matter as well as it could be put in the present number of the Humanitarian, in reply to Canon Horsley, who had been talking nonsense about the "theorist humanitarian" who points to the hooligan and says "Love him!" Mr. Salt—unlike Canon Horsley, by the way—does not belong to the "love your enemies" faith, and does not "cant about 'loving' a peculiarly unlovable type." "We approve," he says, "of discipline for the hooligan; and the reason we oppose flogging him is not because we are under any sentimental illusions as to his qualities, but because we regard judicial flogging as a loathsome and useless practice, quite incompatible not only with any 'love' for the person subjected to it, but with any intelligent self-respect." That is the great point. Let us keep our self-respect, even if the hooligan has lost his. Surely that is a wise, dignified, modest, and unassailable position. Heroics are not wanted in the case; only steady common sense.

It would seem that Alfred Austin, the late poet laureate, was more heterodox than was supposed. His remains were cremated at Golder's Green on June 5. No funeral service was held, and no members of the family attended. A memorial service was held the next morning in the Chapel Royal, St. James's Palace, and another at the crematorium. Evidently there was a "rift within the lute" somewhere.

We are glad to say that patience has not been wasted, after all, with regard to the London County Council's attitude towards public meetings in the Parks and other open spaces. The Council has agreed at last that collections may be taken up at meetings held by bonâ fide Societies. We are able to announce that the N. S. S. "permits" are on their way to the General Secretary (Miss Vance). There is something more to be said, but it will keep till next week.

An anonymous reader, signing himself "Bogey," sends a subscription to the President's Honorarium Fund. If all the "bogies" of the world subscribed as much, in person or proxy (we guess it would have to be the latter), we should never have to make another appeal.

The Independent Religious Society (Rationalist) holds Sunday morning meetings in the Studebaker Theatre, Chicago—which it was fortunate enough to secure after being driven out of a larger hall by Christian bigotry. We are very glad to see by the brief official report on the front of the last Sunday Program (May 18) that "The Society has had a healthy growth this winter, and is now more firmly established than ever. This is a great tribute to the ideas and the ideals which command our loyalty and service. Our audiences have frequently taxed the capacity of the theatre and hundreds have been unable to gain admission." Chicago, of course, does not present the same difficulties that colossal London does; nevertheless the difficulties there are great enough, and Mr. Mangasarian performs a fine achievement in holding his audience together Sunday after Sunday for eight months in every year. We are sure he must feel the strain of such a task, and look forward eagerly to his annual holiday.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Mangasarian has favored us with copies of his two recent books—The Bible Unveiled and The Truth About Jesus. We have only had time to turn over the pages yet, but that assures us of a treat in store,—and as far as possible we will share the treat with our readers. We may add that Mr. Mangasarian has also favored us with a more than friendly letter, which many of our friends would very much like to read, but which we can hardly subject to the light of publication. The last sentence of all may perhaps be excepted. "I hope to be in England," Mr. Mangasarian says, "during the coming summer, and it goes without saying that you will be the first man that I shall look for."

The formation of the Secular Society, Limited, by Mr. Foote—a constructive achievement which those who call him a "destructive" have been able to imitate but not to equal—has settled the question as to whether funds can be received, held, and expended securely for the promotion of Freethought. We are not, surprised, however, that Mr. Will Crooks, who would be a wiser man if he played the buffoon less, is not aware of the fact. We may tell him at once that the help he seems now to proffer is not needed. Freethinkers have maintained their rights without his assistance and may continue to do so on the same conditions. Speaking at an Upper Holloway chapel on Sunday, Mr. Crooks was good enough to say (see Monday's Daily News) that "If a man wishes to leave his money for the propagation of Freethought he should be allowed to do so. He will regret it as soon as he's dead." Freethinkers are already allowed to leave their money in that way and for that object. Thank you for nothing, Mr. Will Crooks! You are not up to date in that matter. Neither is your humor very fresh. Charles Lamb asked Coleridge whether a man might not be damned without knowing it. Suppose you find yourself in the wrong box hereafter. There's no certainty, you know, until you get your ticket and address.

The most striking article in the June number of the English Review is Mrs. Billington-Greig's "The Truth About the White Slave Traffic." Like the good Freethinker and wholesome sensible woman that she is, with a natural revulsion against lies and wrong-doing, Mrs. Billington-Greig determined to see for herself what truth there was in the stories of the trappings of girls on which the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1912 was founded. She discovered—and she produces her detailed evidence in support of the statement—that those stories were very bad maresnests; that the people who solemnly told them back out of their responsibility when properly challenged; that official persons "in the know" flatly deny that any such White Slave Traffic existed; and that, as far as all the obtainable evidence goes, this new Bill, with its reintroduction of flogging, is simply hysterical legislation, brought about by "Parliament, the pulpit, and the press, the three chief public agents of irrational emotion." "The Fathers of the old Church," Mrs. Billington-Greig concludes, "made a mess of the world by teaching the Adam story and classing women as unclean; the Mothers of the new Church are threatening the future by the whitewashing of women and the doctrine of the uncleanness of men." This article should be read by everyone who cares for right and just relations between the sexes. For what is all the good intention in the world worth without thinking? Mrs. Billington-Greig's word to her own sex may be summed up as "Let us think."

A lively article in the English Review is Professor Rouse's on "Our 'Melancholy' Hymnal." Dr. H. Charlton Bastian contributes an important article on "Spontaneous Generation," ending with the statement that "For the Evolutionist the metaphysical conception of mind as an entity should disappear, and with it all forms of 'spiritualism.'.....To speak of 'mind acting directly upon mind,' by way of so-called telepathy and other communications from the 'Spirit' world, must be for him a barren form of words." Mr. Arnold Bennett continues his articles on "The Story Teller's Craft." We differ from some things he says on Writing Novels, but we gladly endorse his fine tribute to Henry Fielding—one of the healthiest as well as strongest of writers, in spite of Charlotte Bronte.

The Edmonton Branch of the N. S. S. takes its annual outing on Sunday, June 22. The place selected is Loughton, and friends in the district who desire to join the party will meet on Edmonton Green at 9 o'clock on the morning of the above date. Those desirous of joining the party later may do so at the "Robin Hood" Hotel, Loughton, at 12 o'clock. Tickets for the excursion are 1s. each, from the Branch Secretary, or from Mr. Hecht, 34 Chiswick-road, Lower Edmonton.

The Life and Labors of Haeckel.—II.

IN 1866 Haeckel published his General Morphology, a two-volumed book running to twelve hundred pages of printed matter. This proved a work of the very first importance, which displayed a wonderful knowledge of organic nature. It marked an epoch in the science of animal classification. Huxley hailed it as one of the most solid scientific works ever written, and the eminent German zoologist, Richard Hertwig, has recently said that "Few works have done as much towards raising the intellectual level of zoology." Our own distinguished biologist, Professor J. A. Thomson, has spoken of it in the highest terms of praise. Nevertheless, despite its acknowledged value and importance, it fell practically still-born from the press. Its few readers were confined to the higher and more advanced students of the natural history sciences.

The term "morphology" now embraces the entire science of organic form. The generalisations of this science, like those of every other, are the outcome of a lengthy evolutionary development. Morphology commences with Aristotle, and that great Greek philosopher's contributions to the science were elaborated and extended among others by Linnæus and Ray. At a later date, Cuvier, Lamarck, Hilaire, and Goethe deepened and broadened its study. In 1865, quite independently of Haeckel, Herbert Spencer devoted special attention to the relation of morphology to physiology. His wonderfully fruitful discussion of the problems relating to the shapes of organic structures, which forms part of the Principles of Biology, is one that no reader who desires to master the philosophy of evolution can afford to neglect.

But the two thinkers who influenced Haeckel most profoundly were Oken and Goethe. He accepted Oken's main principles without repeating the few blunders which that philosopher admittedly made. But the author of Faust was the guiding star of Haeckel's philosophical and ethical system. From first to last Haeckel has unfalteringly claimed the "physician of an iron age," as Arnold called Goethe, as a consciously consistent evolutionist. In the writer's opinion there can be no doubt that this judgment is just. As Geddes and Mitchell have put it,—

> "Goethe lived for forty years after the publication of his Metamorphosis of Plants, was familiar with the whole scientific movement, and warmly sympathised with the evolutionary views of Lamarck and Geoffroy St. Hilaire. Independently of Vicq d'Azyr, he discovered the human pre-maxillary bone; independently of Lorenz Oken he proposed the vertebral theory of the skull; and before Savigny he discerned that the jaws of insects were the limbs of the head."

Haeckel's General Morphology of Organisms, with the sub-title, General Elements of the Science of Organic Forms, mechanically grounded on the theory of descent as reformed by Charles Darwin, contains in embryo practically all the doctrines subsequently expounded in a score or so of important scientific works. The main contentions of the Evolution of Man and the Riddle of the Universe alike lie latent in the earlier work. The gastræa theory and the doctrine of recapitulation are both to be traced to the pages of the General Morphology.

The two succeeding years were divided between his professorial duties at Jena University and his happy and fruitful journeyings to various parts of the world in search of further materials for his biological studies. In 1868 Haeckel determined to popularise his magnus opus, the General Morphology, and the university lectures he had just delivered on this subject were published in a small, plainly bound volume. This was the first edition of The Natural History of Creation. Its success was instantaneous. Although it is but an abstract from the great Morphology, it is, perhaps, the most vivid description of the genesis and development of life ever penned.

This is certainly true of its later editions, containing, as these do, so many amplifications and improvements. The tenth edition is a handsome and splendidly illustrated production.

But the first edition, issued as it was when its author was a poor, ostracised, and comparatively unknown man, contained but a few crude woodcuts, entirely different to the fine plates and figures which now adorn the work. In comparing the embryos of different animals, the same blocks were sometimes employed, and this has led to a considerable amount of vindictive misrepresentation, both in reactionary circles in Germany and elsewhere. The facts have been very temperately stated by Professor Bölsche, himself a biologist of considerable standing. He writes:—

> "For instance, there was the question of demonstrating that certain objects, such as the human ovum and the ovum of some of the related higher mammals, were just the same in their external outlines. The fact is quite correct and established to-day. If I draw the outline, and write underneath it that as a type it is applicable to all known ova of the higher mammals, including man, there is no possibility of misunderstanding. But if I print the same illustration three times with the suggestion that they are three different mammal-ova, the general reader is easily apt to think, not only that they are identical in the general scheme of this outline, but also in internal structure. He imagines that the ova of man and the ape are just the same, even in their microscopic and chemical features. This leads to a contradiction between the illustration and what Haeckel expressly says in the text. We read that there is, indeed, an external resemblance in shape between these ova, but that there is bound to be a great difference in internal structure, since an ape is developed from the one and a human being developed from the other. It would have been better if the general reader, who is not familiar with these outline pictures, had been more emphatically informed in the text below the illustration that even the outline is to be taken as a general and ideal scheme. In this sense we must certainly admit that the illustration was bad, since it might lead to a misunderstanding of the clear words of the text. But what are we to say when the opponents of Haeckel's views viciously raise the cry of 'bad faith' on the ground of a few little slips like this, and suggest that he deliberately tried to mislead his readers with false illustrations?.....All these wild charges are of no avail. The human ovum, which corresponds entirely in its general scheme to that of the other higher mammals, was not discovered in 1868 by the wicked Haeckel, but in 1827 by the great master of embryological research, Carl Ernst von Baer. The considerable external resemblance, at certain stages of development, between the embryos of reptiles, birds, and mammals, including man, was decisively established by the same great scientist. These really remarkable stages in the development of the human embryo, during which, in accordance with the biogenetic law, it shows clear traces of the gill-slits of its fish-ancestors, and has a corresponding fin-like structure of the four limbs and a very considerable tail, can be seen by the general reader at any time in the illustrated works of His, Ecker, and Kölliker (Haeckel's chief opponents), or in any illustrated manual of embryology, and their full force as evolutionary evidence can be appreciated." *

Another outstanding masterpiece is the Evolution of Man, in which, with great wealth of embryological detail, the origin and growth of the human race is elaborately traced from the primal protoplasmic speck. No contemporary biologist disputes the facts presented in this work, although some naturalists still hold out against Haeckel's deductions from the facts. The Evolution of Man continues the story of life's development as narrated in the earlier History of Creation, and was the first, and still remains the ablest and most successful, attempt to popularise the main discoveries in embryology on broad philosophic lines.

The great works above considered served to render Haeckel's celebrated Gastræa Theory familiar to the educated world. This theory was no wild speculation, but was based on a secure foundation of demonstrable fact. As is well known, the fertilised ovum from which all animals are developed consists of a single cell. This divides into two cells, and cellular cleavage proceeds until a whole cluster is formed. In this cluster the cells arrange themselves at the surface, thus leaving a hollow cavity within. This stage is succeeded by the formation of two layers of cells, which arrange themselves like a double skin in the walls of the cell cluster, thus leaving an opening at one spot in the walls of the cell colony. This is now a free-swimming embryo with a mouth—the opening just mentioned—an outer skin, and an internal digestive skin. A creature such as this attaches itself to the floor of the sea and develops into a sponge. It is important to notice that this mode of development is common to corals and jelly-fishes as well as sponges. Moreover, this identical process is found among all orders of animal existence, including the very highest, man himself. But in the case of the lowly sponge the gastræa stage represents its full maturity. With the higher animals, however, the gastræa stage is merely an early embryonic condition which is quickly passed through and left behind. Hence Haeckel was constrained to conclude that the gastræa stage stands for a form of life which constituted the adult condition of the common ancestors of fishes, amphibians, reptiles, birds, and mammals, including man. This seemingly far-fetched theory was once laughed to scorn, but is now frankly accepted by the majority of biologists throughout the world.

Another theory which is closely associated with the one just outlined is known as the Doctrine of Recapitulation. The underlying principle of this doctrine had long commended itself to philosophical naturalists. The pioneer embryologists were both puzzled and surprised at the phenomena which their studies revealed. Among these pioneers Oken occupies a high place, and to him the idea occurred that the caterpillar represents the worm-like stage of the ancestors of butterflies and moths. For instance, he says: "There is no doubt that we have here a striking resemblance, and one that justifies us in thinking that the development in the ovum is merely a repetition of the story of the creation of the animal groups."

Oken's theory that the embryological development of animals represents in reality a record of their past evolutionary history was received with ridicule. To some extent he was himself to blame for this, as his assumptions were not always accordant with anatomical and palæontological science. Haeckel, however, reformed all this; and in framing his generalisation he made the necessary modifications demanded by the sciences in question. Instead of discovering an unblurred record of life's development in the phenomena presented during the ascending stages of embryological growth, Haeckel discovered a condensed, abbreviated, and to some degree modified, epitome of the evolutionary history of animal forms. These qualifications and reservations amply suffice to account for the gaps and leaps which the developing embryo displays.

The law, then, that the numerous phases presented by the embryo or fœtus—the unborn animal or child—more or less correspond to the stages through which its ancestors have slowly ascended in the course of their evolutionary development offers the only conceivable explanation of the facts. This explanation is now almost universally accepted by biological experts, and it certainly seems a remarkable coincidence that the history of organic evolution which has been preserved in the rocks completely corroborates the picture of life's development which embryological science presents to all who care to ponder the marvels which that fascinating branch of natural study has brought to light.

Division of Labor in Reform Work.

OUR idea of a Freethought society is a society of Freethinkers, with a meeting-place and a platform upon which, by means of lectures and discussions, Freethought may be voiced in harmony with its advocacy in a Freethought paper. We once had an opportunity to name a weekly paper, and we called it Freethought, and if we were to name another we should choose the same title. For a society what better word can be selected? It is good English, being the term applied to the rise of scepticism in England in the seventeenth century. The original Freethinkers were Deists, as some are to-day, but there was agreement among them, as the dictionary puts it, in rejecting the "authority of inspiration in religion, especially that of the Bible." After three hundred years of accepted use, it is too late now to begin analysing the word and raising the objection that thought is not and cannot be free, since one must think as circumstances compel. It is admitted there is not absolute freedom in thought more than in action, but we do not boggle over the word "free" in that other respect. Refining on the ultimate meaning of a word is a waste of time, and there is no point in the sarcasm about a free platform and free speech when these are denied to the invader of a meeting held for a specific purpose. One who does not know the historic significance of Freethought may learn it from a dictionary. He will find there no justification for the idea that it means the rejection of all things established by law and custom. A Freethought society demands no qualification of a member except that he shall be a Freethinker in the dictionary sense, and a member should be equally generous in asking only that the society shall in the same sense be true to its name.

There are occasions when, in vindication of the principles of free speech, which are vital to Freethought, a society must offer hospitality to advocates of unpopular reforms, as occurred when Abner Kneeland, founder of the Boston Investigator, invited William Lloyd Garrison to his platform because all others were closed to the Abolitionist. It was so in the early days of the New York Liberal Club, when there was hardly another place in the city where a Socialist could be heard, or where any other form of Radicalism could find an audience. The multiplication of Liberal platforms, the parentage of which the late Dr. Foote traced to the old Liberal Club, has provided the economic reformers with plenty of stage room, and they have their own audiences. It is the same with other radicalisms, so that the duty of setting aside their own advocacy to listen to that of Socialism, Suffragism, Eugenics, with solvents of the social question, does not now devolve upon the Freethought society or its speakers and supporters as such.

For the first time in a number of years the Freethinkers of New York have this winter had a society of their own, projected, according to our understanding, with a view to doing exclusively Freethought work. From the lectures printed in the Truthseeker, readers will judge how closely this program has been followed. While notices of meetings held for other and allied purposes have been read at the hall, the distribution of circulars has not been encouraged, and only Freethought literature has been offered for sale. The character of the society has, in this way, been clearly defined—it has aimed to be nothing else than a Freethought society; and yet we may note here, as a curious illustration of the difficulty of making people understand, that when on a recent Sunday steps were taken toward a permanent organisation, and a committee chosen to name it and outline its purposes, there was an inquiry from an auditor as to whether the society proposed to extend its discussions over the various problems engaging the attention of the community, and two or three names, with Freethought left out, were suggested. As though the first thing to do in the advocacy of Freethought were to call it something else!

It is pretty near the universal experience of our societies that they have been most injured by the speakers' forgetting or ignoring the object of the organisation and what the audiences had come for. In our years of attendance at the Manhattan Liberal Club, we saw scores who went away dissatisfied and not to return because, having come to hear one sort of a lecture and discussion, they were obliged to listen to another kind. They ask what that has to do with Liberalism? and there is no answer. A divisive issue, or an issue in which no interest is felt by many, must be as productive of dissatisfaction and indifference among Freethinkers as elsewhere. Varieties of viewpoint are undoubtedly diverting, but can a society any more than an individual make diversion the main business of existence and continue to live? A man must have a pursuit and follow it in order to subsist, and the more steadily he adheres to his purpose the better his chances to succeed. If the same is not true of an organisation, we can only express our regret at not seeing why.

We have been told that a semi-literary society cannot get along nowadays unless it takes up the "sex" and "economic" questions. We wish sex and economics success in all their worthy undertakings, but to succeed with them would not be exactly to succeed with the Freethought question, which is our purpose.

There may not be everything in a name, but there is a great deal in the meaning of it. For what may be accomplished in the spread of Freethought ideas, Freethought should have the credit by name.

It is assumed that all secular reforms are moving in the same direction, or toward the same far-off event that will never happen—that is, the complete happiness of the race. In making the journey it is a reasonable supposition that the way will be pleasanter and progress accelerated if there is not too much straggling from road to road by the travellers, and too much strength wasted by some in trying to convince the rest that after all there is only one way to approach the goal, or by others in trying to travel all the roads at once. Freethinkers have been the starters of about all the reform movements we see. We can think of none with any promise in it that was not cranked at the outset by some religious heretic. They have since acquired motive power of their own. When Freethought holds a campfire it will welcome them as intelligent and appreciative auditors, and as contributors when the hat goes round, and will return their visits. If they are not always invited to address the gathering, and to elucidate their views at large, they must not regard the circumstance as unfriendly, but lay it to the adage that there is a place for everything, and accept the principle of division of labor.

Freethought in Latin America.

THE South American Republic of Chili is, perhaps, little known to the readers of this journal, and has not figured largely in the Freethought movement. Bordered on the one side by the Pacific, and on the other by the Andes, Chili has been called the last corner of the world. Nevertheless, the seed of Freethought finds here a virgin soil, and for this reason a few words may not be out of place, the immediate motive being that at the time of writing a vigorous Freethought campaign is being carried on by that powerful and passionate speaker, yet withal tender and winsome daughter of Spain, Senora Belen de Sárraga.

Those who took part in the Freethought Conference at Rome may remember the delirious manifestation made at the close of one of her imposing speeches, and she was amongst those who carried an offering of flowers to lay at the foot of Giordano Bruno's statue. Later, she attended the Freethought Conference at Buenos Aires; and it was while there that she saw the need of her propaganda in the Republics of South America.

The present campaign has not been confined to Chili, but has extended to the Argentine, Uruguay, Brazil, Venezuela, Mexico, Columbia, Ecuador, and Peru.

At Valparaiso, huge crowds flocked to hear her, and waited on her words with expectancy to drink in the New Evangel. All seats were taken up days beforehand, and at the close of each lecture huge crowds accompanied her to the hotel, with shouts of "Long live Freethought," and she was obliged to speak again from the balcony before the crowd went away. For a wonder, the press has been fair, though the ostensibly Catholic organs, when not violently attacking her, have kept a profound silence. The characteristic of her meetings was the large number of well-dressed ladies and young men, and one feels that the rising generation can be easily won to Freethought when it is lucidly placed before them. Said the distinguished lecturer to an interviewer:—

> "My mission is to preach the Gospel of Freethought to Latin America, and the only enemy of Freethought is religion, with its mysterious doctrines, inscrutable to human reason. Seeing the need of our propaganda in America, I have undertaken this mission, which I intend to repeat as long as my physical condition will permit. I come to preach the truth; to emancipate the woman, the worker, and the student; to make possible the ideal of Freethought."

Such, in brief, are the sentiments which are finding a ready echo in the hearts of the Chilian people, and one can only hope that this outburst of enthusiasm will be wisely organised and directed, so that it may become a potent fighting force in this intensely Catholic country.

PERCY S. BOWEN.

Effect of Christianity on the Incas of Peru, South America.

BEFORE the year 1532 the natives of Peru lived under an ideal government. The laws by which they were governed—thou shalt not steal, thou shalt not lie, thou shalt not be idle—and which were rigidly enforced, resulted in a condition of social purity never equalled in history. "The land was divided among the people, all were provided for, and their State-provided land sown and harvested for them by the community, the result being that while none of the common people could become rich, neither could they descend to poverty and want." In 1532, Pizarro, the Christian conqueror, and his men, descended on this wonderful land, with a message from the Pope to Atahualpa, the Inca king. Peru was doomed. Her delicate system of government, her architectural monuments, whose ruins are still the wonder of the world, were ruthlessly destroyed by the "ignorant bigotry of fanatical priests." The nameless horrors perpetrated upon these people in the name of Christ form one of the many bloody monuments which, standing in silent array in the pathway of history, testify to the truth of the text, "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword" (Matt. x. 34). At a meeting arranged by Pizarro between the Inca king and himself, the Christian conqueror laid an ambush for the Indians, and made Atahualpa prisoner. After promising to release the monarch on paying several millions of money, and while that money was being brought, the Inca king was butchered. Why? Because he would not accept Christianity. To-day, as a result of the introduction of that religion, the social life of Peru is as debased and degraded as it was lofty and pure in the absence of Christianity.

A Letter to Sir Hiram Maxim

From Mr. George Roberts, a Celebrated American Lawyer on Patent Cases.

MY DEAR SIR HIRAM,—

I have read your work, Li Hung Chang's Scrap Book, through from cover to cover, and have thoroughly enjoyed it all. It is very concentrated food, owing to the fact that you have extracted the meat out of the authoritative sources quoted without requiring the reader to digest the less nutritious parts with which they were originally accompanied. On that account your work is much more forceful than any one author, however learned and widely travelled, could have made it. Think of the progress that the civilised world has made in a century since those who sold or circulated Paine's relatively mild treatise were punished so barbarously! I shall look, however, for a great row in certain sections of the Christian community over your blasphemies; but the bulk of the conventional crowd will boycott the whole thing with studied silence, as is done in the case of most of the anti-Christian literature.

The Churchmen of all sects go on repeating their old mummeries without paying the slightest attention to the fact that the most advanced scholars, even of their own denominations, have become satisfied that more or less of the fundamentals on which their professional predecessors insisted has sunk into the bottomless morass on which they originally rested. What can you expect? The libraries and booksellers will not handle the publications of the R. P. A. or other similarly liberal publishers, and the people at large have no chance for becoming enlightened upon subjects which all should be familiar with. Huxley expressed himself despairingly of the prospect of enlightenment in the near future, and his pessimistic attitude would seem to be justified. There is one subject that ought to be treated in a more rational way by thinkers and writers who are competent to deal with it; and that is the incompatibility of the morality taught by the New Testament (not to speak of the Old Testament) with the obvious and generally accepted principles of secular morals. Most of the critics who destroy the credibility of the mythical and miraculous parts of the narrative, end by paying tribute to what they are pleased to style "the noble and lofty moral character of the teachings of Jesus." That is mere pious cant! The morality of the New Testament is at the best of an inferior sort, and much of it wholly impracticable and vicious. I have seen it urged many times that Jesus was the great originator of the doctrines of the fatherhood of God and of the brotherhood of man. No doubt, certain general phraseology can be quoted in support of this proposition; but when it is brought down to concrete examples the assertion fails.

Take, for instance Luke xvii. 7-10. The word "servant" which there appears is the Greek doulos, defined by Liddell and Scott's lexicon as "a slave, bondman, strictly, one born so." Now, Jesus is represented as accepting the view that such a person is one who has no rights which his master is bound to respect, and who is not entitled even to sympathetic consideration. He is merely a "nigger"! The brotherhood of man, indeed! And as for the relation of God to man, the latter is simply the same sort of slave—God's nigger. That is the alleged fatherhood. The glamor remains even after the reason is convinced that there are no facts upon which to base it. The training received in youth is very hard to overcome, in spite of its having been wholly outgrown. I confess to you that your characterisation of the ark of the tabernacle as "a very fine god-box" gave me a little shiver, although I laughed. The shock was of long outgrown inculcations; but the remnants of the old emotion still manifested their traces involuntarily. We can then well understand how hard it must be for the majority of our Christian fellow citizens to be reformed by the utterances of the Freethinkers.—Cordially and sincerely yours, (Signed) G. L. ROBERTS.

THE RABBI'S REPLY.

A good story is told of a Jewish rabbi. He was riding in a street car, and rose to offer his seat to a lady. Before she could take it a young man plumped himself down in the vacated seat. The rabbi said nothing, but gazed at him in disgusted silence.

"What's the matter?" suddenly demanded the young man in a gruff voice. "What are you glaring at me for like that? You look as if you would like to eat me."

"I am forbidden to eat you," answered the rabbi. "I am a Jew."

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st., London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 25 SUNDAY, JUNE 22, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Compassion is the master feeling of all great souls.
—W. R. PATERSON (Benjamin Swift).

Where is God?

IT is one of the most common commonplaces of old age, and even of advanced life, that the world is neither as wise, as good, nor as happy as it was some thirty, forty, or fifty years ago. Men speak too much from their own feelings. They are the victims of their own personal equations. They attach too much importance to their own real or fancied experience. And when the pessimistic mood is upon them a slight earthquake portends the approaching end of the world, or a war between two countries is the last herald of the universal Armageddon. The truth is that human progress is definitely perceptible only by comparing different stages of society separated by considerable intervals of time. You cannot see a plant growing by watching it. Strangers perceive the growth of children more clearly than their parents. And husband and wife who love each other, spending their lives in intimate intercourse, fail to notice as others do the traces of the hand of time upon each other's face and form. How, then, is a man who knows only his own age, and that chiefly from the newspapers, which are read to-day and forgotten to-morrow, to tell whether the world is improving or deteriorating? What he has to say can only serve as ballast for newspapers that are short of cargo, and almost anything does in the "silly season."

A correspondent in a certain discussion managed, however, to ask a very serious and pertinent question. Seeing, as he thought, that things were going from bad to worse on this distracted planet, he put the query, "Where is God?" Now a brisk debate on that question would be worthy of a better time than the "silly season." It would brighten up the pages of a common newspaper. But what newspaper would admit it?

Where is God? He does not seem to be discoverable for love or money. The clergy talk about him a great deal, but that is a trick of their trade. What they know about him would not fill a volume; no, nor even a sheet of note paper, and probably not the space of two lines. They pretend to know what he is, they set forth his attributes, they ticket him, so to speak, like an exhibit in a museum. They say he is this, that, and the other. They tell us he is all-wise, all-good, and all-powerful; also that he is omnipresent, which means that he is everywhere, and what is everywhere must be everything—a Pantheistic conclusion that is enough to make the ordinary man of God stand aghast and throw up his hands as if in presence of the abomination of desolation. Yet how can that conclusion be resisted? If the alleged Deity is everywhere, then God is all, and all is God.

But the gentleman who put that pertinent question did not mean, we take it, to ask where God is, but rather what he is doing. If he created the world, why did he not make a better job of it? If he rules the world, why does he not regulate its affairs more wisely and benevolently? If he watches over the world, why does he not interfere on behalf of justice and humanity? That seems to be the gentleman's idea, and we defy all the ministers of religion to give these questions a satisfactory answer.

Thomas Carlyle, in his old age, said despondingly to Mr. Froude that "God does nothing now." The philosopher of Chelsea need not have taken so long to discover this truth. He might have perceived it fifty years sooner if he had not been blinded by the religious prejudices—or, as they are generally called, the religious principles—of his early training.

It is perfectly idle to try to burke this question. The people are going a good deal further on the road of scepticism than the clergy imagine. Besides the men who go to church, there are the men who do not go, and never will go; and they have their thoughts on the subject of religion, although they do not confide them to the ears of the professional soul-savers. Many years ago, on the top of an omnibus, we overheard a couple of men talking about a shocking murder. They were rough fellows with honest instincts, and, without being able to use fine language, they could see a point as well as a clergyman. "Well," said one of them, "they may talk about religion, but I don't see why somebody or something didn't chip in when a poor innocent girl was being trapped to her death. I wish I'd been behind the blackguard." It was a natural wish, and a sensible reflection. God was behind the blackguard, if we are to believe the clergy; yes, and beside him and before him, and under him and above him. God was with him when he fetched the poor girl from her home, God was with him when he went into the chemists' shops and bought the ounces of oxalic acid, God was with him when he took his intended victim into the parlor of his father's house, God was with him when he went out to the scullery to fetch the coal hammer, God was with him when he tore the clothes from the poor girl's body in his brutal and insane lust, God was with him when he forced her raiment down her throat, God was with him when he hammered her head into bloody ruin. God was there all the time. Yes, but how much better for her if a policeman had been about, or any other man with a heart and hand to interfere.

We do not deny, we are not concerned to deny, the Pantheism of a Spinoza, or the idea of God as a vast irresponsible power, governing the universe by general and unchangeable laws, and working out far-distant ends without a special attention to the individual happiness or misery of his sentient creatures. Such was the deity of Pope, who sneeringly asked "Shall gravitation cease as you go by?" He overlooked the fact that the constancy of gravitation is a poor relief to the man whose head is broken by a falling chimney-pot. He also overlooked the fact that the God behind such a law does not come into any sort of moral relationship to his "children." Indeed, it is nonsense to call them his children. He is not even their step-father. To call him "Our Father" is a wretched abuse of language. But the other God, the God of the clergy, the God who sees and hears and notices all that happens—that God is fairly entitled to be called a Devil. To know that outrage and murder are to be committed, and not to move a finger to prevent them, is the sublimation of infamy. The outrager is inspired by his lust, the murderer by his passion, but the callous onlooker is the lowest of the three in the sink of degradation.

The Witch Mania.—III.

IT is a significant comment upon the belief that Protestantism, as a form of religious belief, was the product of a more enlightened rational life, that it was only with its rise that witchcraft assumed an epidemic form. Partly this may have been due to the greater direct dependence on the Bible, which is simply saturated with the belief in Satanic intercourse—the New Testament even more so than the Old. The position taken up by the Roman Catholic Church did, in a way, bring it into more direct contact with life, and thus while the practice of exorcism continued as a regular part of the offices of the Church, sorcery was, so to speak, a normal factor of the religious environment. Protestantism, apart from other things, brought people into direct contact with Biblical teachings, and Satanic agency became an obsession. Wherever Protestantism established itself there was an immediate and marked increase in the number of prosecutions for witchcraft. In England, if we except a law passed in the tenth century, and upon which some doubt has been cast, there was no regular law against witchcraft until 1541. From that date until the last judicial execution in 1712, it is computed that nearly 50,000 persons, mostly women, were put to death for this offence. Seventeen years after the first-named date, the famous Bishop Jewell, preaching before Queen Elizabeth, lamented,—

> "that witches and sorcerers within these few years are marvellously increased within your Grace's realm. Your Grace's subjects pine away even unto the death; their color fadeth, their flesh rotteth, their speech is benumbed, their senses are bereft. I pray God they never practice further than upon the subject."

A further measure was passed through Parliament in the same year, making enchantments and witchcraft felony.

With scarce an exception, the leaders of Protestantism encouraged the belief in witches and urged their extermination. Luther was obsessed by the idea of the Devil. He saw him everywhere, in everything. The Devil disturbed him at night by rattling pans, appeared to him while writing, and was received by Luther throwing an inkpot at his head—the mark made on the wall by which, was, until recently, shown as a corroboration of the story. When a storm arose Luther declared "'Tis the Devil who has done this; the winds are nothing else but good or bad spirits." Suicides, he said, were often those strangled by the Devil. Moreover, "The Devil can so completely assume the human woman when he wants to deceive us, that we may very well lie with what seems a woman of real flesh and blood, and yet all the while 'tis only the Devil in the shape of a woman." The Devil could also become the father of children. Luther asserts that he knew one such case, and added, "I would have that child thrown into the Moldan at the risk of being held its murderer."*

The influence of Protestantism in America was of the same character as elsewhere. Increase Mather and his celebrated son, Cotton Mather, were the principal agents in stirring up the belief to frenzy point, and a commission was appointed to rout out witches and suppress their practices. One woman was charged with "giving a look towards the great meeting-house of Salem, and immediately a demon entered the house and tore down part of it." It seems that a bit of the wooden wainscoting had fallen down. In the case of Giles Corey, who refused to plead guilty, torture was used. He was pressed to death, and when his tongue was pressed out of his mouth the sheriff thrust it back with his walking stick. Many people were executed, and the ministers of Boston and Charlestown drew up an address warmly thanking the Commission for their zeal, and expressing the hope that it would never be relaxed.

Certainly the commission worked hard enough while it lasted. A shipmaster coming to Maryland with emigrants encountered unusual strong weather. An old woman, one Mary Lee, was drowned as a witch in consequence. One woman walked a long distance over muddy roads without her dress being dirty. "I scorn to be drabbled," she said, and was rewarded by being hanged. George Burroughes could lift a barrel by inserting his fingers in the bung-hole. He was hanged as a wizard. Bridget Bishop was charged with appearing before John Louder at midnight and grievously oppressing him. Louder also saw a black pig approach his door, and when he went to kick it the pig vanished. He was also tempted by a black thing with the body of a monkey, the feet of a cock, and the face of a man. On going out of the back door, the said Bridget Bishop was seen going towards her house. Another witness said that, being in bed on the Lord's Day, he saw a woman, Susanna Martin, come in at the window and jump down on the floor. She took hold of the witness's foot, and drawing his body into a heap, lay upon him for nearly two hours, so that he could neither move nor stir. Eventually, they not only confessed, under torture, their intercourse with Satan, but also accused others of being their associates. As these were men in high places, and even ministers of religion, the need for discrimination was realised. Once a critical judgment was aroused, the mania died down—Cotton Mather fighting manfully for the belief to the end.

The impetus given to witch-hunting is nowhere more clearly seen than in Scotland. Scotch witchcraft, says Lecky, was the offspring of Scotch Puritanism, and faithfully reflected the character of its parent. The clergy nowhere possessed greater power, and nowhere used it more assiduously to fan the flame against witchcraft. Says Buckle:—

> "Of all the means of intimidation employed by the Scotch clergy, none was more efficacious than the doctrines they propounded respecting evil spirits and future punishments. On these subjects they constantly uttered the most appalling threats. The language which they used was calculated to madden men with fear, and to drive them to the depths of despair.....It was generally believed that the world was overrun by evil spirits, who not only went up and down the earth, but also lived in the air, and whose business it was to tempt mankind. Their number was infinite, and they were to be found in all places, and in all seasons. At their head was Satan himself, whose delight it was to appear in person, ensnaring or terrifying everyone he met. With this object he assumed various forms. One day he would visit the earth as a black dog; another day, as a raven; on another, he would be heard in the distance roaring like a bull. He appeared sometimes as a white man in black clothes, and sometimes he came as a black man in black clothes, when it was remarked that his voice was ghostly, and that one of his feet was cloven. His stratagems were endless. For, in the opinion of divines, his cunning increased with his age: and having been studying for more than 5,000 years, he had now attained to unexampled dexterity."*

Having thus sown the seed, the clergy were not long in reaping the harvest. As in England, a special body of men, "Prickers," sprang into existence, whose business it was to detect witches. Anonymous accusations were invited, the clergy "placing an empty box in church, to receive a billet with the sorcerer's name, and the date and description of his deeds."† The lives of thousands of people were rendered unbearable, and the complaint of one Margaret Miall that "she desyres not to live, because nobody will converse with her, seeing she is under the reputation of a witch," must have been common. Nothing that could whet the appetite for witch-hunting was neglected. William Johnston, baron, bailie, "of the regalitie and baronie of Broughton," was granted the goods of all who should be "lawfullie convict be assyses as notorious and common witches, haunting and resorting devilles and witches."‡

The following bill of costs for burning two women, Jane Wischert and Isabel Cooker, in Aberdeen, has a certain melancholy interest :—

With the last quarter of the seventeenth century witchcraft as an epidemic came to an end. The last witch in England was burned in 1682, although the last one actually condemned was in 1712. But in this case, on the representation of the judge who tried the case, the verdict was set aside. It was not, however, until 1736 that the Witch Act of 1604 was formally repealed. In Scotland the last witch legally executed was in 1722. Captain Ross, Sheriff of Sutherland, has the doubtful honor of having condemned her to the stake. In Germany the last witch executed, by beheading, was in 1749. The last legal case of witchcraft in America was in Massachusetts, in 1793. After that date trials for witchcraft in America were abolished. These dates refer, of course, to the legal abolition of the offence only. Every now and again a case crops up of old women who are accused, and sometimes maltreated in consequence, of sorcery. But these are mere reminiscences of a mania that was responsible for some of the darkest and most degrading chapters of European history.

In what has gone before I have given little more than a mere description of the witch mania. A scientific history of European witchcraft, one that will make plain all the factors and circumstances that led to its outbreak, and favored its development, has yet to be written. One thing is certain. Such an epidemic could not occur save among a people whose minds were saturated with superstition. Thanks to the long reign of Christianity, the mass of the people of Europe were in such a condition. And access to the Bible only worsened the disease. My point has been to drive home the lesson that it is precisely such outbreaks as these that favor the perpetuation of religious beliefs as a whole. The particular form of a belief that is prevalent for a period may disappear, but the temper of mind remains. Whether we see the Devil on all hands, or God on all hands, is, after all, a mere question of terminology. It is the supernatural that is the raw material of both ; and the belief in witches capering through the air on a broom handle, or changing themselves into black cats or lean dogs, absurd though these and similar stories may be, they have yet played their part in strengthening and perpetuating the frame of mind on which religion lives.

C. COHEN.

The Scientific Chart.

EIGHT years ago the omniscient Daily Mail declared that science is a failure, that after destroying "the faith in Christianity of countless souls" it has absolutely nothing to offer them in its place, and that, in fact, one of its chief exponents had just admitted this by saying that "the mystery of life remains as impenetrable as ever." The writer was the well-known journalist whose initials are "H. H. F.," and the article showed conclusively either that he knew practically nothing about science, or that he was deliberately playing to the Daily Mail gallery. He exclaimed lachrymosely : "At the door of science and her votaries thousands among us lay the bitter complaint of Mary at the sepulchre, 'They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him.'" He concluded thus :—

> "The Huxleys and Renans of the Universe can get on without having a complete scheme of life, past, present, and future, handed to them as a whole to be kept intact and followed throughout existence. They make their own schemes. The mass of the people cannot do this. They have neither the time nor the brains. If they have no chart provided for them, they roam hither and thither like a ship without a steersman ; they are at the mercy of every shifting wind. Science has a vast responsibility to bear. It has thrown so much doubt on the existing charts that numbers of people have come to count them valueless. Yet it supplies no chart of its own."

The chief feature of the Daily Mail article was its complete ignorance, real or assumed, of the nature and aims of science. Every honest thinker knows that science has not failed, and everyone who says that it has is, in Scripture language, "a liar, and the truth is not in him." In the May number of the Forum there is an article by Dr. Hellems which gives the lie direct to the Daily Mail's silly production. Dr. Hellems, in eloquent and well-informed terms, proclaims the triumph of science, and asserts that it does provide for the people the only sane and safe chart of life. He entitles his article "The Serene Evangel of Science," and he justifies the bold title in the following bold and true manner :—

> "If my ears have heard aright, science is standing before the congregation of combined mankind and declaring this gospel : 'Come unto me, and ye shall not labor with wrung hands unto bitterness, nor be heavy laden unto faintness. Come unto me, and for the peace which passeth understanding I will give you the peace that is based upon reason and knowledge. Come unto me, and for the inveterate hope of a life to be, ye shall learn the glorious meaning of the life that is."

That is also the evangel of Freethought, for Freethought is nothing but applied science. To us there is nothing new in Dr. Hellem's article, the only thing new about it being its appearance in the Forum.

Naturally, the Christians are in a state of consternation. The purport of the Forum article is that science teaches people to get on quite well without God and without the hope of immortality. Science says, "Come unto me, and for your need of an Omnipotent Kindness to save you from sin and shame, I will teach you the beauty and dignity of human nature." "Man will find under the new regime all he needs for happiness." To break the force of this new attack upon religion "J. B.," in the Christian World for June 12, reminds his fellow-believers that similar onslaughts have always been made, and have always failed to rid the world of it. He even admits, in opposition to the late Professor Blackie's interpretation of it, that "it is impossible to read the Prometheus of Æschylus without seeing in it a veiled attack upon the popular religion." He also alludes to the De Rerum Natura of Lucretius, in which religion is cursed as man's worst enemy and this life treated as man's all in all. But it is idle to argue that the people who assail religion as such, and not merely the popular religion of their day, have a certain part of their nature in a state of atrophy, and are therefore incompetent to judge rightly. "J. B." is a minister of religion, and one does not expect him to attack it ; but does this entitle him to ask, "Does anyone, who has really looked into life, believe that the carrying out, to its utmost success, of a program of this sort, will secure to man his ultimate satisfaction"? The cruel implication here is that Dr. Hellems and the thousands who agree with him have not "really looked into life," which is equivalent to saying that those who differ from "J. B." and his fellow-believers lack something in the absence of which they cannot arrive at a sound judgment on religion. He contends that Gotama, the founder of Buddhism, began his career in the midst of all the conditions of human welfare laid down by Dr. Hellems. As a matter of fact, Gotama did nothing of the kind. For one thing, he was not "a royal prince," and to call him such betrays a lamentable lack of up-to-date knowledge of the most authentic Buddhist literature. There is nothing to show that he "possessed everything that riches could secure." He lived, rather, in the midst of suffering and sorrow, and the object of his renunciation and retirement was to seek a remedy for all the ills of life. And what remedy did he find? The very one recommended by Dr. Hellems in the Forum—science. Early Buddhism was a wholly Godless religion, and taking Buddhists as a class they are a Godless people. It is certainly a mistake to imagine that the Buddha spoke of poverty as a condition of human welfare. "J. B." speaks in glowing terms of the renunciations practised by Bernard, Ignatius, and Loyola; but does he think that those men made any serious contribution to human wellbeing?

It almost looks as if "J. B." is bent on misrepresenting Dr. Hellem's teaching. Sarcastically he says:—

> "To-day we have the vast spectacle of 'the comfortable classes.' There is a whole world of well-to-do people. For them the hunger and poverty, the abolition of which, according to our prophet, will make religion superfluous, have been non-existent. What science is to do for the race has here already been done. Has it proved for them the full satisfying Gospel of which we hear?"

That is a deliberate travesty of the article under consideration. Hunger and poverty are only two out of the innumerable ills of life. The rich are indeed free from those two scourges; but if they did their duty, if they obeyed the dictates of scientific philosophy, poverty and hunger would be non-existent in all the land. It is culpably false to represent science as teaching that "human happiness is to be obtained by a supply of bodily necessaries, by the provision of physical comfort and security; but "J. B." will surely agree with the statement that in the absence of "bodily necessaries" and "physical comfort and security" there cannot be full happiness. No Freethinker has ever dreamed that happiness is to be obtained by material supplies alone. We believe in art, poetry, music, friendship, social intercourse, and love, and "J. B." himself mentions the fact that Dr. Hellems advocates their cultivation as indispensable conditions of happiness. We agree with Emile Souvestre when he says that "the world is full of peoples without agriculture, without commerce or manufacture, but you will never find one without its singers, its poet"; but we totally disagree with "J. B.'s" addition that "you will never find one without its religion." Taking the word "religion" in its ordinarily accepted meaning, we affirm that the world is full of people without it. It is true that science at its highest achievement gives us law and force, and offers us ourselves, but it is not true that it introduces us to "a lonely, voiceless world." No, the world revealed to us by science is a strange mixture of beauty and ugliness, of music and discord, of harmonies and disharmonies; but it is neither lonely nor silent, and we are in it to conquer and make it our servant, abounding in beauty and poetry.

"J. B." is perfectly justified in saying that "man's supreme need is companionship, the sense of personality, of something, of someone who cares, who has love to answer his own craving for love"; but he goes seriously, hopelessly astray when he asserts that this need can be adequately supplied only from a supernatural source. We hold, on the contrary, that the belief in supernaturalism has engendered in man many false or abnormal needs, and that the attention given to the task of satisfying these has resulted in a serious warping and twisting of his nature. The search for God and his companionship has been so assiduously pursued that the search for man has scarcely yet begun. "J. B." quotes from Wundt, who until very recently was a Materialist, from Kepler and Copernicus, who flourished in the red dawn of modern science, and from Michelet and Hugo, both of whom were Freethinkers, and who, like all Freethinkers, enthrone love, human love; and the quotations are not arguments, nor does a single one of them even attempt to prove that the belief in God is good for man. It is a belief that has caused the bitterest of controversies, the bloodiest of wars, the cruellest of persecutions, and the worst of corruptions in all the walks of life. We conclude, therefore, that Dr. Hellems has made good his thesis that "we can know our duty, and live our life without the help of voices heard so faintly that we cannot be sure whether they belong to truth or to hope"—voices which many of us firmly believe are never heard at all except in fancy.

Christianity and the Chinese.—VI.

> "The Chinese think that Europeans have neither religion nor morals nor manners, and only worship force as represented by big armies and navies. They say that, while we profess Christianity, its spirit influences our actions far less than do economic considerations; that Christianity is even less to us than is Confucianism to them; and that it is like our impertinence to send missionaries to China."—REV. E. J. HARDY, Chambers' Journal, April, 1912.

> "I believe it to be strictly within the limits of truth to say that foreign missionary effort in China has been productive of far more harm than good. Instead of serving as a link between Chinese and foreigners, the missionaries have formed a growing obstacle. As travellers in the East well know, Oriental peoples are especially susceptible upon two points, of which their religion is the chief. We have forced the inculcation of an alien and a detested creed upon the Chinese, literally at the point of the bayonet."—SIR HENRY NORMAN, Peoples and Politics of the Far East (1900), p. 304.

WE have just seen a notice of a book, entitled How England Saved China—we shall see, later on, how England came within measurable distance of ruining China—by Mr. J. Macgowan (probably the Chinese missionary of that name), in which he discourses at large, in the well-known missionary style, upon the "Horrors of Foot-binding" and "Child Murder in China." As we have stated, foot-binding is discountenanced by the Reform party now ruling in China, and is rapidly dying out. Mr. Macgowan declares that the destruction of baby girls is "widely practised by every class of society," and is even more common in the homes of the well-to-do than among the very poor. We have seen, in our previous article, that, as a matter of fact, infanticide is no more prevalent in China than in England. We now add the testimony of Mr. H. A. Giles, Professor of Chinese at Cambridge University, who for some time acted as our Consul at Ningpo, in China, and, therefore, has a first-hand knowledge of the subject, and who says emphatically:—

> "Among other atrocious libels which have fastened upon the fair fame of the Chinese people, first and foremost stands the charge of female infanticide, now happily, though slowly, fading from the calculations of those who seek the truth. Fifty years ago it was generally believed that the Chinese hated their female children, and got rid of them in early infancy by wholesale murder."

The Professor goes on to observe that it may be admitted that boys are preferred to girls, because they carry on the family line and see that the worship of ancestors is regularly performed; also because girls require dowries. The term, "lose-money goods," as jestingly applied to girls—against which may be set another term, "a thousand ounces of gold"—is commonly used of a daughter:—

> "To return to the belief formerly held that female infanticide was rampant all over China. The next step was for the honest observer to admit that it was not known in his own particular district, but to declare that it was largely practised elsewhere. This view, however, lost its validity when residents 'elsewhere' had to allow that no traces of infanticide could be found in their neighborhood; and so on. Luckily, still greater comfort is to be found in the following argument,—a rare exception of proving a negative—from which it will be readily seen that female infanticide on any abnormal scale is quite beyond the bounds of the possible. Those who have even a bowing acquaintance with Chinese social life will grant that every boy, at about the age of eighteen, is provided by his parents with a wife. They must also concede the notorious fact that many well-to-do Chinese take one or more concubines. The Emperor, indeed, is allowed seventy; but this number exists only on paper as a regulation maximum. Now, if every Chinaman has one wife, and many have two, over and above the host of girls said to be annually sacrificed as worthless babies, it must follow that the proportion of girls born in China enormously outnumbers the proportion of boys, whereas in the rest of the world boys are well known to be always in the majority" (H. A. Giles, The Civilisation of China, pp. 96-98).

In Christian England we are obliged to have a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, "the very name of which," says Professor Giles, "would make an ordinary unsophisticated Chinaman stare. Chinese parents are, if anything, over-indulgent to their children" (p. 96).

If more proof is needed, it will be found in the chapter on "Infanticide" in Sir Hiram Maxim's drastic exposure of Chinese missions, entitled Li Hung Chang's Scrap Book, where it is well said:—

> "The almost generally accepted belief in the West that there is a vast amount of infanticide in China is as untrue as the old story of the vices of Babylon or the more recent legend of the murderous Juggernaut-car in India" (p. 219).

Another subject upon which the missionary waxes eloquent is the opium question. He finds it useful in two ways. First, as an excuse for his presence in China, where he is required to combat the awful effects of this baneful drug by inoculating the sufferer with the germs of Christianity; and, secondly, he explains that the reason the poor missionary is so disliked by the mass of the Chinese people is because our Government have forced the unwilling people of China to accept our Indian opium by force of arms. In fact, our wars with China have been dubbed "Opium Wars." Both these statements are grotesquely untrue. Lord Curzon has observed of the latter:—

> "The pretence that China is hostile to the British people or to Christian missions because we introduced to her the opium habit (which she had already practised for centuries) is about as rational as to say that the national soreness that sometimes arises between England and France is due to our resentment at having to cross the Channel for our best brandy." *

Although it is popularly believed—thanks mainly to missionary propaganda—that opium is a most pernicious drug, yet there is no such unanimity among those who are entitled to hold an opinion. Even experts differ upon the subject, as any one may see who has studied the Report of the Royal Commission appointed by the Government to investigate the subject. Some high authorities are of the opinion that, so far from being harmful, it is beneficial. Mr. A. H. Smith, the missionary, speaks of it as "a foe to the Chinese race, as deadly as war, famine, or pestilence combined." † Dr. Morrison, the Australian medical man, on the other hand, declares:—

> "During the nine months that I was in China I saw thousands of opium-smokers, but I never saw one to whom could be applied that description by Lay (of the British and Foreign Bible Society), so often quoted, of the typical opium-smoker in China 'with his lank and shrivelled limbs, tottering gait, sallow visage, feeble voice, and death-boding glance of eye, proclaiming him the most forlorn creature that treads upon the ground.' This fantastic description, paraded for years past for our sympathy, can be only applied to an infinitesimal number of the millions in China who smoke opium. It is a well-known fact that should a Chinese, suffering extreme emaciation of disease, be also in the habit of using the opium-pipe, it is the pipe and not the disease that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred will be wrongly blamed as the cause of the emaciation" ‡

Dr. Morrison gives us a specimen, from personal experience, of what the opium-smoking Chinese coolie is capable of in the way of work. Twenty-three and a-third miles may be accounted a good, stiff walk for one day, and that was the distance covered to Tak-wan-hsien on March 30. Says Dr. Morrison:—

> "I was carried all the way by three chair-coolies in a heavy chair in steady rain that made the unpaved track as slippery as ice—and this over the dizzy heights of a mountain pathway of extraordinary irregularity. Never slipping, never making a mistake, the three coolies bore the chair, with my thirteen stone, easily and without straining. From time to time they rested a minute or two to take a whiff of tobacco; they were always in good humor, and finished the day as strong and fresh as when they began it. Within an hour of their arrival, all these three men were lying on their sides in the room opposite to mine, with their opium-pipes and little wooden vials of opium before them, all three engaged in rolling and heating in their opium-lamps treacly pellets of opium."

Two of the men were past middle age and the third was twenty-five:—

> "All three men were physically well-developed, with large frames, showing unusual muscular strength and endurance, and differed, indeed, from those resurrected corpses whose fleshless figures, drawn by imaginative Chinese artists, we have known for years to be typical of our poor lost brothers—the opium-smoking millions of China. For their work to-day, work that few men out of China would be capable of attempting, the three coolies were paid sevenpence each, out of which they found themselves, and had to pay as well one penny each for the loan of the chair." *

At Tali the landlord of the inn introduced Mr. Morrison, with much pride, to his aged father. The old man was eighty years of age:—

> "He had smoked opium, he told Mr. Smith, the missionary, for fifty years, but always in moderation. His daily allowance was two chien of raw opium, rather more than two-fifths of an ounce; but he know many Chinese, he told the missionary, who smoked daily five times as much opium as he did without apparent injury" (p. 208).

These are the sort of facts you do not get from the missionary platform in this country.

To speak of an opium-smoker as a worthless and degraded creature, as the missionaries are in the habit of doing, is as untrue as it would be to denounce every man as a drunkard who drank a glass of ale with his dinner or supper. And as for over-indulgence in the opium habit, the vast majority of the millions of China could not afford to over-indulge themselves, even if they had the wish. As we have seen, one smoke, after a hard day's labor, seems the general rule, and there is not the least doubt that, taken under those conditions, the drug is not harmful, but very beneficial.

FLASHES FROM NIETZSCHE.

What? A God who loves men, provided that they believe in him, and who hurls frightful glances and threatenings at him who does not believe in this love! What? A conditioned love as the feeling of an almighty God! A love which has not even become master of the sentiment of honor and of the irritable desire for vengeance! How Oriental is all that! "If I love thee, what does it concern thee?" is already a sufficient criticism of the whole of Christianity.

Christianity made use of the excessive longing for suicide at the time of its origin as a lever for its power; it left only two forms of suicide, invested them with the highest dignity and the highest hopes, and forbade all others in a dreadful manner. But martyrdom and the slow self-annihilation of the ascetic were permitted.

After Buddha was dead people showed his shadow for centuries afterwards in a cave,—an immense frightful shadow. God is dead: but as the human race is constituted, there will perhaps be caves for millenniums yet, in which people will show his shadow. And we—we have still to overcome his shadow!

"God himself cannot subsist without wise men," said Luther, and with good reason; but "God can still less subsist without unwise men,"—good Luther did not say that.

Acid Drops.

Mrs. Besant, like Saul, is among the prophets. She has been prophesying at Queen's Hall the early restoration of "the mysteries." Perhaps she is right. She is one of "the mysteries" herself.

One of the Rev. Dr. Horton's objections to Theosophy strikes us as rather odd. He says that although Theosophist leaders know everything they do not agree; indeed, they often quarrel, and sometimes very bitterly. Well, didn't Christian leaders know all, when they burnt each other to death—to say nothing of still worse heretics? Nothing less than omniscience was involved in such proceedings. As for the Christian know-alls ever agreeing, they have offered the world the spectacle of a bear-garden in every age of their history. They only begin to agree a little now, when they are finding out that their Churches are all doomed.

Dr. Horton's diatribe against the doctrine of reincarnation is extremely unfortunate. That doctrine was quite common even amongst the Jews in the time of Jesus—who, by the way, never said a word against it. When the miracles of Jesus attracted attention, and "his name was spread abroad," and Herod heard of it, the monarch said "it is John whom I beheaded: he is risen from the dead." This may be thought to extend to no more than resurrection, but another verse (Mark vi. 15) clearly goes further:—

> "Others said, That is Elias. And others said, That is a prophet, or as one of the prophets."

Here were the countrymen of Jesus believing that he was a reincarnation of Elijah or some other ancient prophet. Dr. Horton's surprise at the doctrine, from a Christian or New New Testament point of view is somewhat surprising. It provokes the question, Do these Christians really read their own Scriptures?

The cheek of these Christians! The National Free Church Council, the other day, entertained the Chiefs from Nigeria to breakfast at the Memorial Hall. The dusky visitors were plied with all sorts of questions. One was with reference to the large importation of spirits into the colony. The hypocrisy of this question could hardly be beaten. No wonder the black chiefs answered—"Your people are primarily responsible; until Europeans introduced spirits, our people were unacquainted with them." With regard to polygamy, high ground was taken in some of the replies. It appears that the orthodox churches insist on native converts putting away all their wives but one, and the native argues "Am I to give up my wives whom I have legally bought, and who have borne me children—to save my own soul?" This is a very pointed reply. But the cream of the joke is that the Bible does not contain a single word against polygamy. African natives can be thoroughly sound Bible Christians while keeping as many wives as they can afford.

The progress of Mohammedanism in Africa is "attributed chiefly to the fact that, while acknowledging the one God it permits polygamy." Christianity allows only one wife, but several gods—at least three. And the African likes the Mohammedan arithmetic best.

At the annual meeting of the Christian Evidence Society it was stated that the aim of this organisation "is to provide a Christian platform wherever Secularists are attacking Christianity," and that "last year over a thousand open-air lectures were delivered under its auspices." The main subject discussed at the meeting was "Some Aspects of Contemporary Unbelief." Canon Masterman was of opinion that it is "much less aggressive, and much more open to conviction than formerly." The Rev. C. L. Drawbridge differed from the Canon, and maintained that "Materialism was by no means a back number." Mr. Drawbridge was right. What is called Materialism is steadily spreading, a process which, in our opinion, the Christian Evidence Society is, unintentionally, doing very much to assist. Its defensive policy is thoroughly corrupt, and the more intelligent hearers, on finding this out, are both intellectually and emotionally shoved towards unbelief.

Some days ago the Burton-on-Trent railwaymen had their annual parade, which culminated in a religious service at St. Paul's Church. The preacher was the Rev. Dr. Temple, Headmaster of Repton School, whose subject was the Bible. According to a report in the Burton Evening Gazette, Dr. Temple is a well-informed Higher Critic, who contends that the Bible, though containing many grave discrepancies and mistakes, historical and otherwise, is yet God's Book, and should be studied devoutly. But while making that highly irrational claim for Holy Writ, the reverend gentleman was sorrowfully obliged to admit that the great writers of the present day are devoid of religious convictions and ideals. Faith, confidence, and hope seemed to have gone out of their minds. Knowing far more than their fathers did of the horrors of life, of the savagery of Nature, the struggle for existence, and the survival of the fittest, they found it difficult, if not impossible, to believe in a good and loving God. Of course, Dr. Temple himself was fully convinced that the only remedy for the mental disease of the age was Jesus Christ.

Dr. Temple knows very little about Rationalism and Rationalists. He is reported to have said that "there was nothing to be afraid of in Rationalism, if it would only go on long enough, for at the close the Rationalist would find himself repeating the Christian creed." Will the reverend gentleman be good enough to name six genuine Rationalists who ended their lives as Christian believers? In a matter of this kind we demand verified facts, not general assertions. We never knew before that Rationalism was only a roundabout road to the bosom of the all-loving Redeemer, and we are not convinced of it now.

Sir Edward Carson and his Ulster colleagues have taken "O God, our help in ages past" as their battle hymn. They are not only going to govern Ireland on their own, but to nobble "God" as well. What a poor puppet this "God" is to be sure!

The amount of interest the Churches have in the labor movement when they have no ulterior purpose to serve was illustrated at a meeting of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland the other day. The meeting was held in the pious city of Belfast, and a Mr. Hamilton tried to get the Assembly to give an expression on the conditions of labor. It seems from published reports that some women in Belfast are engaged in labor for which they receive a penny or a halfpenny per hour. Children of eight and ten years of age are employed at an even lower wage. After a little discussion, and on its being pointed out by the Rev. Dr. McKean that women "welcomed the labor as a means of adding to their husbands' earnings," it was unanimously resolved that the Assembly pass to the next business. Thereupon the gathering of divines proceeded to discuss the necessity for a revival of religion in Ireland. The wholesale sweating of women and children can, apparently, take care of itself. That is, unless it will be attended to when King Carson comes into his own.

In the latter portion of the eighteenth century, when attention was being directed to the discovery of fossil remains of extinct animals, a favorite religious explanation was that God had manufactured imitations of genuine animals, and buried them, in order to deceive the geologists. Something of the same kind of apology has been put forward by the Catholic Times with a view to destroying the anthropological attack on religious beliefs. There is to be a "Week of Ethnology" at Louvain, conducted by Catholics, when the real truth of the subject will be explained. Meanwhile, the Catholic Times demolishes "the pestilent rubbish which disfigures the pages of Mr. Grant Allen, Mr. Edward Clodd, and Mr. J. M. Robertson" by the naïve method of pointing out that the information on which anthropologists base their theories is quite untrustworthy. Missionaries, it appears, are the only reliable witnesses as to what uncivilised peoples really believe, and a very fancy picture is drawn of the "scientific expert, who sails serenely from Europe to catechise—often through interpreters—the natives of savage countries." The consequence is that the natives invariably amuse themselves by "pulling the white man's leg, and the white man gravely publishes the fantastic stories told him."

Now, this is very, very thin. As a matter of fact, a great many of the customs and beliefs with which anthropologists deal are furnished by missionaries, who are often good enough observers of the people among whom they dwell. In the next place, to assume that natives in all parts of the world are miraculously inspired—for nothing short of a miracle would do it—to tell substantially identical stories to travellers should be too much for even Catholics to believe. Finally, the beliefs of savages often enough receive illustration from customs and beliefs that still exist in civilised countries, many cherished in the Catholic Church itself. There is really little need to marvel at the superstitions of savages when we have similar superstitions among ourselves. The truth is that the Catholic Church is recognising that it is from anthropology that the greatest blow to religion has come. That kills religion by explaining it. Above all, it proves that there is no such thing as a civilised religion. Religion may exist in a civilised country, but it is alien to civilisation. It begins with savages; its true nature is only to be discovered by studying savages, and its perpetuation among civilised peoples is as reminiscent of a lower phase of culture as rudimentary ear muscles are of our animal ancestry.

It seems as difficult to keep people in the Churches as it is to keep lunatics in an asylum or criminals in prison. If they leave England for the Colonies, and are not carefully watched on arrival, there is a complaint that they are lost to Church or Chapel. Accordingly, arrangements are made to keep an eye on them until they embark, and also when they disembark. But one would imagine that they were quite safe between ports. This, however, it seems, is not the case. So the Nonconformist Churches are arranging for "pastoral oversight" of emigrants while they are on board ship. Ministers will accompany them and see that the religious habits contracted at home are not broken. The moral seems to be that religion is such an essential part of human nature, and people crave so for it, that if the slightest opportunity presents itself they throw it overboard altogether.

The Bishop of Southwark told an audience the other day that he believed the next fifteen years would settle once for all whether or not Church schools were to be a permanent and abiding part of the educational machinery of the country. Maybe; but if the next fifteen years does settle the question, it can only be in the negative. In no other way could the settlement be permanent. Once the people of this country, whether it be fifteen or fifty years hence, decide on keeping religion out of the recognised educational establishments, we have no fear of that being reversed. It is too much in line with the whole tendency of European civilisation. There are some things that a people never go back on, and this question will be one of them.

The Bishop also said that the English people as a whole were determined that whatever educational system was ultimately devised it should have a religious basis. This is sheer professional humbug. The Bishop does not know, no one knows, that the English people have come to any such conclusion. They have never been asked. People in Church and Chapel may so decide, but they do not number the whole of the people by a very long way. The largest body of organised opinion in this country, the Trades Union Congress, has over and over again definitely decided in favor of Secular Education. It is part of the impertinence of Christians to hold a church meeting, and then take its decision as the voice of the people. There were once three tailors of Tooley-street—but we daresay our readers know that story.

In spite of a strong trade protest from the clergy and ministers of the town, Blackpool has decided to allow picture shows to open on Sunday. But they are to be open from 8 to 10 o'clock only, so that they will not enter into competition with the Churches. It was pointed out on the Watch Committee that some of the chapels had musical entertainments on Sunday evenings, and one of the artistes at the Winter Gardens had been engaged to sing at one of them. The clergy point out that this is only the thin end of the wedge. Of course it is. But people do not usually become rational all at once. They proceed by degrees; and we hope that Blackpool will go on improving.

A quarrel over Sunday pictures is going on in Lincoln. We are glad to see the Trade and Labor Council on the right side. The Church of England and the Free Church are acting together (professionally, of course) against Sunday freedom and innocent recreation.

The Rev. Dr. Dixon, of Spurgeon's Tabernacle, went to the Derby, but not to witness the races. He went there to preach against racing. "In that awful crowd he saw no happy face outside the party that was with him." A happy face among racing people would have belied his narrow Gospel; therefore he saw none. He and his friends were the only happy people present. This is absolutely false, but it doesn't matter; it is orthodox Christian teaching. A man who believes in a material hell-fire in the next world is bound to be a kill-joy in this.

A writer in the British Congregationalist for June 12, in attempting to justify Foreign Missions, falls into several grievous errors. He says that "missionaries introduce neither rifles nor spirits"; but both rifles and spirits follow them as surely as echo follows song. The writer admits that there is a grain of truth in this, but we contend that it is composed of nothing but truth. Furthermore, all missionaries represent countries in which rifles and spirits are in full and constant evidence. This writer also avers that the missionary "stands for a higher and better civilisation than could otherwise be initiated." We do not know what he means by civilisation; but we have it on the authority of the President of the Free Church Council that European civilisation is antagonistic to the Christian religion, and we believe he is right. We are prepared to go to the length of saying that civilisation is steadily killing Christianity in the West; and in proportion as the East adopts Western civilisation, its own religions die. These two facts are really beyond dispute.

The most disastrous blunder in the article just mentioned is the statement that "missionary work is not only a success, but a triumphant vindication of the power of the Gospel and the teaching and example of Christ." So far is this from being true that it is frankly admitted by many zealous Christians that missions have been, and are, a conspicuous failure; and there is no exception. Besides, nothing short of the complete conversion and transformation of every country in which they are at work would constitute "a triumphant vindication of the power of the Gospel." Such a glorious consummation is a thing utterly unknown even where Christianity has achieved its greatest successes, and even there Christianity is now in the interesting process of passing away.

A Bangor (North Wales) preacher has been complaining about people grumbling at the weather. He told his hearers that the weather was a heavenly gift. We have very often heard people describe it as "hellish."

Lord Haldane says he does not believe that there is indifference to-day to religion. We wonder what rational explanation he has to give of the decline in Church attendance. His reason for his belief is given, apparently, in the statement that there is the same intensity to-day as ever, and the same obstinate questioning of what Wordsworth called "things of sense and outward things." But this is a mere trick of language, suitable to the pulpit but quite unworthy of Lord Haldane's intelligence. Intensity of thought, the sincere questioning of things, the search for "reality," is, as Lord Haldane well knows, characteristic of some of the greatest of non-religious thinkers. And, we repeat, it is a mere trick to use religious thinking as synonymous with earnest and serious thinking. We do not say that religious thinking may not be both; but we do deny that religion monopolises them. Lord Haldane knows this as well as we do. If directly challenged he would probably admit its truth. Why, then, should he imply otherwise? The way in which our prominent public men pander to the prejudices of a comparatively unintelligent clergy is one of the saddest features of English public life.

Sir William Robertson Nicoll delivered a pietistic speech at a missionary meeting recently held at the Queen's Hall, London, the substance of which appeared in the British Weekly. The reverend knight enlarges upon two points which loudly contradict each other. The first is that the task of converting the world to Christ is entrusted to Christians. It is infinitely beyond them in their own strength; but the omnipotence of God is at their disposal. "We are called upon to do impossible things," Sir William says, "to solve problems that are beyond us, to undertake labors and sacrifices that are infinitely beyond our strength. What then? We are driven back on a strength not our own, on the power of the risen Christ, the power of the Holy Ghost." We venture to affirm that Christians have never done anything of a superhuman character. It is a well-known fact that Foreign Missions are palpable failures. Unquestionably missionaries are not "reinforced by the Holy Spirit." Has anybody the hardihood to assert that Home-ministers are Divinely equipped when their Churches are dying in spite of all their labors on their behalf? The Christian claim to almighty power is laughed to scorn by all the facts of life.

Sir William's second point is that the task of saving the world is God's, not ours. He is out in the wilderness seeking his lost sheep. "Christ is the great Seeker," the reverend gentleman exclaims. "We may fail, but he will not fail, and if he cannot work through us he will work over us." If Sir William's God exists, is he not an infinite criminal? He redeems the world—finds his lost sheep—neither "through" Christians, nor "over" them, and thereby proves his non-existence.

From the beginning Christians have been notorious for their bitter wrangles and useless contentions. Even at Corinth, under Paul, they were divided into four irreconcilable parties, and the bone of contention between them was the Gospel. They are at it still. There is an acrimonious controversy in progress in the Wesleyan Methodist Church over the appointment of the Rev. George Jackson to the principalship of Didsbury College, because he has ventured to introduce a little common sense into his talks about the Bible. Nothing can be more scandalous than the violent hatred which Catholics and Protestants cherish and express towards one another, especially in Ireland at this moment; and everybody is familiar with the humiliating fact of the mutual mud-throwing indulged in by Church and Dissent in Wales over the contemplated disestablishment of the former. Religious squabbles are, of all squabbles, at once the most heated and the most contemptible. And yet, in spite of all this, ministers and others persist in the claim that Christianity is pre-eminently a religion of love.

Some statements made about missionary work are too strong for even some of the missionaries themselves. A returned missionary from India, the Rev. W. E. S. Holland, published an account of the work in India in which he said of the "out-castes" of India that "any missionary working among them will tell you he can baptise as many thousands as he likes; the only limit is the number he can teach and pastor." This is quite an affecting picture of thousands of Hindoos waiting to be baptised, the only difficulty being the need for more missionaries, which means, of course, more subscriptions. As we said, the dose is too strong even for some missionaries, and one of them, writing to the Church Times from St. Boniface College, Warminster, says that, having been thirty years among these people, he has no hesitation in saying that such statements "convey an utterly wrong impression." He says that the poor people of India are willing to listen because "they hope to gain material advantages." That is, they come to to the missionary for what they can get, and if nothing is forthcoming they, presumably, leave again. Each real conversion, he says, "is a miraculous display of the Holy Ghost." That settles it. Every conversion is a miracle, and miracles, by their very nature, are rare occurrences.

The Actors' Church Union held its annual meeting the other day, with the Bishop of Winchester presiding and Sir Herbert Tree as one of the speakers. The Bishop of Winchester made the usual unctuous, patronising speech, and said that the Church, which was responsible for the higher ideals of mankind, should be able to raise the actors' profession accordingly. His principal suggestion towards this was securing the right kind of lodgings for actors on tour. Perhaps his lordship contemplates utilising the curates for convoying actors and actresses to their lodgings—and it is far from unlikely that the curates would enjoy the job. Seriously, we are astonished that self-respecting actors and actresses do not resent the fussy and impertinent patronage of churchmen. The general attitude taken up is that while those in the "profession" are not such a bad lot as some people think, still they require a good deal of "uplifting," and the clergy are the ones cut out for the work. We should have thought that actors were old enough to look out their own lodgings, and, in any case, would resent the air of moral superiority assumed towards them by such persons as the Bishop of Winchester. Sir Herbert Tree professed himself delighted to find that Church and Stage went hand in hand. Perhaps he recognised the clergy as brother performers. And we were not aware that Sir Herbert's religious opinions were of such a "churchy" character.

Reports from Macao show that there was much havoc wrought by the recent whirlwind. Numerous junks and sampans foundered, and over a hundred people were drowned. The Chinese boatmen fired bombs and let off crackers to avert the anger of the gods. Terribly silly, of course; but much thriftier than the English method of doing the same business. A few bombs and crackers, when the need arises, don't cost as much as our huge religious establishments—Anglican, Catholic, Wesleyan, Presbyterian, etc., etc.—with their vast armies of well-paid intermediaries between God and Man. These gentlemen are that or nothing. If they are of no use for that purpose they are certainly of no use for anything else. We decidedly prefer the Chinese plan.

We have heard a vast deal lately about what is called the Eternal and Universal Christ; and because they know absolutely nothing about such a being preachers, wax exceptionally brilliant in their descriptions of him. Mr. R. J. Campbell has just taken a step in advance of all others by asserting that Christianity itself is eternal, and that the living and the dead are most deeply indebted one to another. His utter lack of knowledge of the dead only adds to the eloquence of his delineation of their enjoyments and expectations.

"There are more ways of destroying a book than burning it. The old monks were adepts at another form of destruction with what they considered laudable motives. Vellum was costly, and they were indefatigable in erasing the best works of the Greek and Latin to make room for a life of some saint or other on the same sheet. In the Vatican, one of the books of Livy can be faintly discerned beneath a missal, and Cicero's De Republica was lost to the world for centuries underneath a mass of monkish writing. And the quality of the monk's composition was seldom comparable with what he destroyed."—Daily Chronicle.

The following is from Mrs. Archibald Little's article in the Daily Chronicle on "The State of Misrule in the Balkans" (not under the Turk this time):—

> "The one great work the Greeks have undertaken in Salonica has been a census, having previously driven out all Bulgarians as far as possible. This census will probably show surprising results.....The Servians started by expelling Roman Catholics as well as American missionaries. Yet they pride themselves upon their religious tolerance..... At Monastir a Bulgarian map may not be sold, and the position of the Bulgarians they nominally came to deliver is worse under the Servians than under Turkish oppression."

We prophesied all this at the beginning.

The Church Missionary Society is not going to stand its financial deficit in a meek and lowly temper. It is going to make a big effort to raise a special fund of £100,000. We hope it will fail in this godly enterprise—for the sake of the poor heathen. Why should they be worried?

Dr. Havelock, medical superintendent of Sunnyside Asylum, Montrose, flattered the Managers lately by telling them that "the victims of so-called religious mania were becoming less numerous," and that "the intensity of religious emotion, and its influence on daily life and character, had been steadily diminishing since the creed of a personal Devil, with its accompaniment of perpetual hell-fire, was discredited." One or two reverend gentlemen couldn't agree with Dr. Havelock. They appeared to think that he should keep such things to himself. Very likely! He was giving their game away.

What Biblical character ought to have been an aviator? Aaron ought. But he wasn't. We recollect but two aviators in the Bible,—Elijah in the Old Testament and Jesus in the New.

The Canterbury Diocesan Conference, under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury, has been discussing whether the English nation is declining in the sense of moral obligation. Mr. Ian Malcolm, M.P., bewailed the disregard of the sanctity of marriage; meaning, apparently, that people marry according to the law of the State instead of the counter prescriptions of the Church. The same speaker deplored "the appalling decrease in the birth-rate." What the remedy is for this "appalling" evil he did not say. We fancy there are several. First, let the working classes have higher wages and better conditions of life generally. They'll keep up the population right enough then; at least as high as it should be kept. Secondly, when we get rid of the war fever and all its follies, there will be myriads of able-bodied men in the very prime of life available as husbands for some of the million women who have to go without husbands now. Thirdly, there are thousands of celibate clergy who ought to be looking after the shortage of population of which their Church is always complaining. High Church curates are much to blame in this respect. So are Catholic priests. Father Vaughan is always preaching the virtue of large families. But he does nothing to help. We suggest that the Pope should grant the priests a dispensation from their vows for one generation. Or he might revive the old priestly privilege of keeping concubines.

King George's private secretary, Lord Stamford, informs the editor of the Church Family Newspaper that his Majesty has made a rule (as reported) never to travel on Sundays unless it is "absolutely necessary"? But what is absolutely necessary? "Ay, there's the rub."

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £146 2s. 5d. Received since:—A. J. Fincken, £5; Mrs. Ellery, 2s. 6d.

E. BURKE.—Thanks for your appreciative and encouraging letter. Your surmise is correct. We would rather edit the Freethinker than have all the honors and wealth in the world. We agree in a general way with what you say in the Sentinel about gambling. Its greatest condemnation is that one man's gain is another man's loss under it. But the gambling instinct seems very deep and very strong, and it is at least arguable that a public lottery is the best (that is, the least harmful) way of providing for it. Lotteries are illegal in England, and there is probably far more gambling here than in any other part of the globe.

E. B.—Thanks for drawing our attention to the printer's slip of magnus opus (instead of magnum opus) in the article on Haeckel in last week's Freethinker. These blunders will occur. Publications without printer's errors do not exist. You will recollect that a Bible was once published—and by the King's printers too—omitting the negative from the seventh commandment, and thus making it read "Thou shalt commit adultery." Much obliged for cuttings.

H. E. TURNER.—Glad your curiosity has been whetted by "picking up a copy of the Freethinker the other evening in the train."

C. E. HEARSON.—See "Acid Drops." Thanks.

J. ALWARD.—Theoretically, the answer to your question is in the affirmative; practically, we believe, the answer is in the negative.

F. PRAWETZ.—Always glad to receive useful cuttings.

W. J. MOLINEUX.—Thanks for your good wishes. We shall try not to overdo it this time.

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

R. CARTER.—We have given Mr. Marsh all the attention we intend to, and more than he deserves. If Miss Vance wishes to pursue him further, we leave her on the warpath—with our usual good wishes.

THE new secretary of the Edmonton Branch is Mr. James Wraight, 100 Kimberley-road, Upper Edmonton, N.

A. DAVIDSON.—Too stale let us have something fresher.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

There has been some serious talk amongst Mr. Foote's provincial friends, who saw him at the Whit-Sunday Conference, about inducing him to take a long holiday, perhaps a long sea voyage, and dropping work altogether for say three months; and it was thought that the money for this object could be raised privately, one friend promising £20 to start with. Mr. Foote was sorry to disappoint these generous friends, but he was obliged to say "No" to them—at least for the present. It is simply imperative that he should be working on the Freethinker, and in the business connected with it, at present. He really cannot afford to go away. Advice to the contrary only breaks against an adamantine wall of inevitable facts. This is all Mr. Foote can say this week,—except that he is getting stronger and stronger, and that he is holidaying all he can consistently with the minimum instead of the maximum of work.

We stated last week that the London County Council had come to a just and wise decision at last with regard to the matter of collections at meetings in the Parks and other open spaces under the Council's control. Bonâ-fide societies are to have "permits" as before for making such collections, and that is all that the friends of freedom demanded. We may say that all's well that ends well. But it is necessary to add, without laboring the matter, that the attitude and action of the National Secular Society, with the aid of the Freethinker, were the governing factors on the public side of the dispute. Raising money for a legal fight, if necessary, gave a greater seriousness to the whole quarrel. We suggest that the balance in hand (that is, in our hands) should be handed over to the National Secular Society. We shall, indeed, do this, unless we hear from any subscribers to the "Fighting Fund" to the contrary.

The Bradlaugh Fellowship makes its sixth annual visit to Charles Bradlaugh's grave at Brookwood Cemetery on Sunday, July 6. Details will be found in our advertising columns. The railway fare is 2s. 6d., but tickets will be supplied at half that price to those applying, not later than Monday, June 30, to W. J. Ramsey, 146 Lansdowne-road, Hackney, N.E., or to H. Reeve, 107 Green-street, Bethnal Green, N.E.

Mr. H. G. Farmer, whose name will be remembered by many of our readers, writes to us as follows:—"Dear Mr. Foote,—Looking through one of Dobell's catalogues of manuscripts, autograph letters, etc., I came across an interesting extract which may not have come to your notice. It is contained in a letter of George Meredith's to a well-known London publisher (Dec., 1900), which runs as follows:—

> 'Frank Harris is one of the men who can stand on their merits. It would be absurd for me to appear as an indicator to them in his case. I cannot consent to have my privately expressed opinion serve as an advertisement.'

I think this extract ought to be a final answer to some of your critics (re Meredith), as from this it would appear, that in ordinary circumstances, Meredith refused his name and opinion as an advertisement. Yet where you, the Freethinker, and the best of causes were concerned, he had no such reserve, as may be seen from his letter to you."

We wish to congratulate most heartily Mr. F. W. Walsh upon the exceedingly lucid and exhaustive paper which he has written on "Auguste Comte and the Religion of Humanity," which was recently read before the Leamington Literary and Philosophical Society, and afterward published in full in the Leamington, Warwick, Rugby and County Chronicle. Excellent as the paper itself was, the author's reply to a criticism of it by the Rev. L. G. Berrington was more brilliant and effective still, extending to two-and-a-half closely printed columns in the journal just mentioned. As most of our readers are aware, Mr. Walsh has for many years been an inmate of the Leamington Home for Incurables, and is paralysed to such an extent that he can use neither hands nor feet. He often suffers excruciating pain, and loses consciousness for many hours at a time. Yet he is a veritable student, science and philosophy being his favorite subjects. He writes and paints amazingly well, though he has to guide both pen and brush with his teeth. He is a strong Freethinker and a member of the National Secular Society; and we consider it a great privilege to cry "Bravo!" at his marvellous literary achievements last month.

We are always glad to hear of, and especially to hear from, Freethought advocates in other parts of the British Empire. Mr. H. Scott Bennett, who writes to us from Auckland, New Zealand, dating from the Working Men's Club and Mechanics' Institute there, carries a good introduction in his face, which is printed on the back of one of his lecture bills enclosed with his letter. The letter itself runs as follows:—

> "My Dear Sir,—I have just finished reading your most excellent article on the late George Meredith, and cannot refrain from writing you in order to express my thanks, not only for a further great service to the 'good old cause,' but also for the intellectual delight it has given me and, I feel quite sure, hundreds of other people.
> "You will be pleased to hear that the Freethinker finds a ready sale at my lectures, and that its contents are as much admired here as they are in England. The lectures, I might add, are attended very well, audiences of one thousand being the average.
> "Again most heartily thanking you for the article and your really great work in the cause of mental freedom,—I am, dear Sir, yours very truly, H. SCOTT BENNETT."

Mr. Bennett's photograph shows him to be a young man of energy and ability. There should be a fine future for him in the work of intellectual freedom and progress. We congratulate him on his good audiences, which argue that he is a good speaker. We congratulate him particularly on his appreciation of George Meredith, which opens up for him a perpetual fountain of pleasure and inspiration.

Christians and the Old Testament.

CHRISTIANS do not like the idea of repudiating the Old Testament as part of the Christian faith, but sometimes they seem to be heartily ashamed of it. When the clergy are making a present of the Holy Bible to a young Christian, they will say:—

> "This book is God's most Holy Word; read a chapter from it every day; ponder over it; treasure all that you read in the inmost region of your soul; you will find the memory of it most precious to you in your daily life, and a great comfort and solace to you in the hour of death."

But if you ask this same clergyman to defend some of the passages from this precious document, in debate with the unbeliever, he will nod his head and say:—

> "No, I cannot do that. I do not feel myself called upon to defend everything that appears in the pages of the Bible—especially in the Old Testament. I know that some of the passages are hard to explain in the light of modern knowledge, and some appear to be quite indefensible when viewed as the utterances of a wise and good and powerful God. But then we Christians have faith, and everything will be plain in God's good time."

The question is: Are we to consider the Old Testament as the Word of God at all? If "Yes," how are we to discriminate as to what is true and what false, if we are not allowed to use our own reason?

On the other hand, if the Old Testament is not intended for our acceptance, why is it preached and enforced as God's Word? Only a few weeks ago a representative of the Young Men's Christian Association wrote to the Daily Telegraph and said that Christians, at least, had not ceased to read the Bible regularly and diligently. In fact, in every bedroom in their great buildings all over the country there was a Bible, and there was plenty of evidence that the Holy Scriptures, contained within this precious volume, were read by their members. But the question is, were these members told that they must accept the whole of it as equal in authority and value, or that they could reject any part of it that seemed to them to be unreasonable—and still remain Christian? And if they were free to discriminate about passages in the Old Testament, were they equally free in respect to passages in the New?

Suppose Christians were allowed to eliminate from the pages of the Old Testament all that the most enlightened among them considered unreasonable, or all that they considered repugnant to their moral sense, a great deal of what they formerly held as necessary parts of the Christian faith would have to be unceremoniously taken out, or expunged from the pages of this so-called holy volume. First of all, Jahveh—the old tribal God of the Jews—would have to go. Many of the clergy of the Established Church would be glad to get rid of him; for they know that he is described in the Pentateuch as a most vacillating, petulant, and revengeful God, unworthy of the esteem of honest men. The Rev. R. J. Campbell is not only disgusted with old Jahveh, but he says that in the Old Testament—

> "they seem to have two Gods—whom we call one, but who, by no possible stretch of the imagination, could be combined in one person.
> "The first is a sort of old woman, who made the world and man as though he expected everything to go right and no evil or mischief to mar the work of his hands. But he laid his plans so badly that the whole scheme went awry and heaven has been mourning ever since.
> "Poor God! He is not to blame, the theologians tell us; it is wicked man, more especially woman, who has put everything wrong. God has done his best, and the result has been untold ages of chaos and unimaginable suffering. All God can do is to provide a Redeemer and save a few out of the wreck, and so keep on pleading with humanity: 'O prodigal child, come home.' You will, I am sure, forgive me the seeming irreverence of saying that that kind of God is a fool. And the other God, or God with the other face, is not much better.
> "This other God has prepared a hell for his poor, helpless victims of what is called his righteous wrath. He has made it big enough to contain the whole race, and into it the whole race will have to go unless they repent in time and avail themselves of the sufferings which he has graciously inflicted upon somebody else for their benefit. He has been sitting up there in heaven ever since creation first went wrong brooding darkly over what he means to do to perverse and rebellious man when the time comes" (Daily Chronicle, January 10, 1908).

There; that is as strong an indictment of the Hebrew God as any Freethinker has written in prose; but Shelley's indictment in Queen Mab is more powerful.

Who wrote the books containing the description of the character and conduct of the God of the Jews? Freethinkers do not know; Jews do not know; even Christians do not know, although they say they do. They say it was Moses, although there is not an atom of evidence in support of their statement, and there is plenty of evidence to the contrary. Thomas Paine, more than a hundred years ago, established the fact that Moses could not have been the author of the Pentateuch; and Bishop Colenso showed that more than one author must have been responsible for the early chapters of the Book of Genesis—to say nothing of Exodus, Leviticus, Deuteronomy, and Numbers. There is a good deal of controversy to-day on the question of the authorship of the plays attributed to Shakespeare—plays that have thrilled so many thousands by reason of the human interest that pervades every scene, and which have commanded the admiration of the greatest thinkers and philosophers, as well as the applause of the masses. Frankly, I confess that I do not know who wrote those wonderful plays. I believe, upon what seems to me sufficient evidence, that Shakespeare wrote them; but I dare not dogmatise upon the subject. But whoever wrote them must have been a man with a great intellect, a commanding personality—a man swayed by human sympathies, understanding human frailties, painting virtue in the purest and most beautiful colors, describing vice and all its attendant horrors with vivid power and marvellous skill, and causing the profoundly wise to bow their heads in humble reverence before the greatest dramatic genius England, and probably the world, has ever known. But can we admire or reverence the writings of the authors of the Pentateuch in the same way? Certainly not.

I will not dispute that many pure, high-minded persons who call themselves Christians still regard the Bible as the greatest and best book that has ever been written. They think it so, not because Moses or any other of its numerous authors contributed to its pages, but because they believe it to be God's inspired word. And they would believe in the Koran or any other so-called sacred book if they happened to be born in the country in which such book or books formed the subject-matter of the religion of that country.

Christians are now aware that the Bible gives a description of God which not only cannot be defended, but which is an insult to their noblest thoughts and purest aspirations. If the Bible is God's inspired word, may we not ask if God has inspired men to write a wicked libel concerning his nature and his conduct? Would God instruct men to say that he was of a jealous disposition, visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children, if he wished us to understand that he was a God of love? Would he instruct the Israelites to make slaves of the heathen round about them if he wished us to believe that he was the Father of us all, and that all men were brothers? Would he command the Jews to slaughter inoffensive and undefended people if he intended us to regard him as supremely just and good? And would he expect us to regard him as infinitely wise if he destroyed all the human beings that did not go into the ark, and the animals also, because they possessed qualities of nature with which he endowed them, and which he must have known, if he were all-wise, would lead them into the course of conduct that would lead to their destruction?

Many Christians would like to expunge from the pages of the Bible the horrible tales of slaughter that are narrated therein (see Exodus xxxii. 26-28; Numbers xxxi. 7-18); but, though the Old Testament has undergone several revisions, the revolting passages still remain. Throughout the whole of Judges, Samuel, and Kings stories of bloody deeds perpetrated in the name of the Lord abound—stories in which men and women, and even children, are cruelly murdered. Christians know of these passages, but they cannot cut them out: for if they once begin the process of weeding out all that is untrue, all that is wicked, all that is atrocious, where will they end? Shelley truly said:—

> "Barbarous and uncivilised nations have uniformly adored, under various names, a God of which they themselves were the model—revengeful, bloodthirsty, grovelling, and capricious. The idol of the savage is a demon that delights in carnage. The steam of slaughter, the dissonance of groans, the flames of a desolate land, are the offerings which he deems acceptable, and his innumerable votaries throughout the world have made it a point of duty to worship him to his taste."

How long will the multitude of Christians continue to worship the savage Deity of the Bible? Until the Freethinkers of the world have made them ashamed of such a God—and then they will abandon Jahveh as other nations have abandoned their gods; for they will have no further use for him, nor for the book in which his character and conduct are so faithfully described.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Mr. Foote's Address at the Funeral of Joseph Mazzini Wheeler.

Sub-Editor of the "Freethinker" and a Vice-President of the National Secular Society. Interred at Finchley Cemetery on Saturday afternoon, May 14, 1898.

Verbatim Report by Mr. H. CLIFTON.

(Reprinted by Request.)

JOSEPH MAZZINI WHEELER is dead. To those who knew him, especially to those who knew him well, that single sentence involves everything. There is no necessity for more to be said. Yet we feel on these occasions that there is a relief to the living in giving some kind of articulate expression of our respect for the dead, and of our thoughts in the presence of death. Mr. Wheeler would have been the very last to sanction any cowardice. There are those who, when they have emancipated themselves from the thraldom of superstition, still shrink with perhaps an old inherited instinct of awe from Death. But our friend knew that death is as natural as birth. He would have thought it cowardice to hide from, and shudder at, what is inevitable, and is also connected with all our sympathies and affections. For death is the lot of all, and as we enter life we must leave it. The sun which is shining upon us now might, if we had a darker philosophy, seem a solemn mockery of our grief. He whose mortal remains we here consign to earth would have felt that this was something morbid. It is the duty of all of us to live our lives with the utmost usefulness to Humanity, and that cannot be done except by discarding useless, however natural, grief for the dead, by refraining from indulgence in the luxury of woe. Mr. Wheeler would have thought more of any grief for him that expressed itself in loving service to the living he left behind him, than of the grief which shed an ocean of tears at his death.

Our friend was as good a man as ever breathed. The frailties of mortality clung to him as to all of us; but in his case they were never dark frailties, they were only the frailties of our common imperfection. There was nothing malignant about him. He had no taste for cruelty. He was full of loving kindness. He was always ready to sympathise with another's trouble, and to help where help could be given. He was gentle. There was a certain delicacy about his mind as there was about his physical constitution. Nothing impure—certainly nothing approaching to baseness—could ever have found a harbor in his mind. I speak from a full knowledge. He was my friend of thirty years. I knew him almost from boyhood. I speak from knowledge and long experience, and I say that no gentler or more beautiful spirit inhabited the earth. He was also a brave man. He had the soul of a hero. It was enshrined in a frail casket, and yet I am sure that if it had ever fallen to his lot to meet the martyr's doom, he would never have quailed. In a sense he has met a martyr's doom, for undoubtedly what strength he had was sorely smitten by the sad events of fourteen or fifteen years ago. It is not pleasant to open recollections of bigotry and fanaticism on such an occasion as this, but we who know how he suffered, and what dealt the blow, will feel that his life was shortened by his devotion to principle in the hour of danger.

I can say from intimate knowledge of him that there was not a shadow of cowardice about his nature. His intellectual gifts, his wonderfully wide reading, his large powers of work, would in all probability have gained for him a wider distinction and a higher pecuniary reward in the great world of literature at large. But he preferred to devote all his gifts—without himself recognising that he had many—to a poor, unpopular cause. In serving it, he asked for no more, he expected no more, than a soldier's wages and rations, so that at least he might continue living to do his work. He wanted no more; he got no more. And when one thinks of men without a tithe of his knowledge and capacity who earn large incomes by flattering all the vested interests of society and pandering to ancient superstitions which they do not themselves believe, one feels that the loss of such a warrior for freedom as this was a terrible one to the cause which had the devotion of his life. There is no one to fill his place. He was unique. Yet, at such a moment, he would have been the first to recognise that intellectual gifts are as nothing compared with character; with strength, devotion, and loyalty to one's convictions. In all that he excelled—not so much in a popular way, because he wielded the pen and not the tongue. But thousands of readers, I should imagine, will recollect his writings for many, many years. And as he always said what he thought, and as what he thought was always the result of profound research and long meditation, he has enriched the intellectual life-blood of a large number of his fellow men and women. And in that he would feel—notwithstanding all the painful circumstances of his death, and the other painful circumstances that long ago preceded them—that he had his reward. He wanted no other reward than the soldier's acclaim of "Well done!"

We shall never see him again, but it will be long before we shall cease to think of him. So beautiful a mind, so gentle a character, will be a delightful memory with us as long as we live. We shall forget this coffin and this heaped earth, and all the adjuncts of his burial. We shall think of him as he was. What we leave in the grave is, as I said, but the mortal part of him. The immortal part of him is the word and deed that have entered into the general life of humanity. Death comes with its final consecration, and all that is mean and poor and petty falls away, and only that which is eternal remains. And the eternal part of him—his work for the world, his fine example—remains with us. If ever we are tempted to shirk our duty, to mask our principles, to hide our convictions, it would shame us to think that one who had so many difficulties in life to face, one who was not altogether treated kindly by nature or the world, nevertheless acted so bravely. If he was brave, should we be cowardly and weak? Let us leave this place feeling that we have buried the mortal part of a true warrior of progress, a valiant soldier in the great army of human liberation. All of them fall in time. He has fallen; but he was fighting to the end. He met, so to speak, a soldier's death. We may say that he died upon the battle-field. He was fighting to the very last for the highest interests of mankind.

We shall always think of him, the beautiful, the gentle man whom we have all lost, as the loving friend. He will linger in our minds as long as memory lasts. To me this duty is painful, but it must be fulfilled. I know how, with that modesty of his, he would have been glad to think that the one whom, by mere accident of fortune he called his chief, should speak the word of fond farewell at his grave. I was not his chief in any other sense. He was not my subordinate in any other sense. He was my brother soldier, and he has fallen. And I stand, and you stand. And our highest duty is to pledge ourselves by his open grave to be as brave and true as he was, to emulate his fine, generous, and noble example. When our time comes may those we leave behind us be able to say that we did so.

But perhaps that is too personal a note to depart from this grave with. Over us all—the dead and the living—is the great Humanity, like the sky which is stretched over our heads. It is in that we live, and move, and have our being. And just as birth and fatherhood and motherhood touch us at life-points with the sense of human fellowship, so death touches us at the last point, and gives a solemn consecration to all the rest. It is just now that our dead brother has entered finally into communion with that great Humanity. In Shakespeare we read:—

> "The evil that men do lives after them;
> The good is oft interred with their bones."

But that is not so, and probably Shakespeare himself did not think so. Just as Nature takes all corruption and covers it in and works her beautiful green grass over it, so in the course of time all vile and evil things get covered in and forgotten, except by the student of the past. It is only the true and the good which live on for ever and ever. And in that eternal existence our friend is now sharing. He will live in our recollections. We shall speak of him to others who never saw him. Something of him will pass, perhaps, into the recognition of future history. And even if his name should be utterly forgotten, as most names must be, nevertheless the good he did, the beautiful life he led, will have influenced all who knew him, and through them it will influence all whom they affect until the end of time. Therefore, in the name, not only of Freethought—for which our brother lived and died—but in the name of Humanity, I say:—Farewell here, but your life still lives in us, and the thought of you will always be with us as a benediction.

The Life and Labors of Haeckel.—III.

THE literary output of this noble and courageous, but still greatly abused and misrepresented, man is imposing in its magnitude. Nearly twenty years ago, when Haeckel's sixtieth birthday was celebrated at Jena, he had written forty-two works, which consisted of 18 000 pages, besides numerous scientific memoirs. His contributions to the Zoology of the Voyage of H.M.S. Challenger, which were undertaken at the request of the leading representatives of British science, comprehend four volumes of that magnificent work, enriched with 230 splendid plates. This natural philosopher, who has been pictured as a completely isolated speculator by various ignorant and spiteful persons, is in reality surrounded and supported by practically all the younger and more enlightened students of organic existence. The name of Haeckel is now better known throughout the entire civilised world than that of any other living man of science. In 1900 he was acclaimed as one of the glories of nineteenth century humanism by a few thousand thoughtful men and women in Europe, Australia, America, and the Far East. The Riddle of the Universe—a popular summary of his scientific and philosophical achievements—has since carried his name and fame to every class of society in all parts of the civilised globe. At the close of the nineteenth century Haeckel, like Herbert Spencer, thought that the world was declining towards reaction. Impelled by a passionate desire to do something which might help to stem this retrogressive tendency, Haeckel penned what he then regarded as his last will and testament. The success of the Riddle of the Universe is without parallel in the history of science. Its circulation among the German-speaking peoples ran into hundreds of thousands. Fourteen translations into as many languages were in eager demand, and it carried a plain account of the doctrine of Evolution to the minds of millions to whom that doctrine was previously little more than a name. "Answers" to this iconoclastic work appeared in profusion, but all of them are either dying or dead. The Riddle remains, and still finds purchasers and readers, and is likely to be treasured and remembered when its enemies have been long forgotten.

In certain obscurantist circles much spiteful capital has been made of the fact that Haeckel, in an early edition of this book, mentioned an English journalist as an authority on Biblical criticism. One might have imagined that a busy man of science, who has discovered and described thousands of new species of Radiolaria—all representing separate acts of special creation, according to the theological legend—the man who produces monumental monographs on sponges and corals, who teaches for forty-three years in a German university, and who replies personally to thousands of correspondents, in addition to travelling extensively in Europe and Asia in search of new forms of life, cannot reasonably be expected to possess an encyclopædic knowledge of all the innumerable dwellers in Fleet-street.

Knowing only too well that the religious beliefs of the human race have ever been a standing menace to science, Haeckel made a strong attack in the Riddle upon what he regarded as the leading, and, therefore, most dangerous aspects of superstition. These are, in his opinion, represented by the quite unscientific view of the earth as the centre of the material universe; the belief in a personal God, and a faith in the continuance of life after death. The earth is merely a fifth-rate planet of a tenth-rate sun. Man paints himself in his gods, and the divinity of the average believer is likened unto a "gaseous vertebrate." Haeckel regards death as a transformation of matter. And he thus urges his objections to the theory of immortality:—

> "The physiological argument shows that the human soul is not an independent, immaterial substance, but, like the soul of all the higher animals, merely a collective title for the sum total of man's cerebral functions; and these are just as much determined by physical and chemical processes as any of the other vital functions, and just as amenable to the law of substance. The histological argument is based on the extremely complicated microscopic structure of the brain; it shows us the true 'elementary organs of the soul' in the ganglionic cells. The experimental argument proves that the various functions of the soul are bound up with certain special parts of the brain, and cannot be exercised unless these are in a normal condition; if the areas are destroyed, their function is extinguished; and this is especially applicable to the 'organs of thought,' the four central instruments of mental activity. The pathological argument is the complement of the physiological; when certain parts of the brain (the centres of speech, sight, hearing, etc.) are destroyed by sickness, their activity (speech, vision, hearing, etc.) disappears; in this way Nature herself makes the decisive physiological experiment. The ontogenetic argument puts before us the facts of the development of the soul in the individual; we see how the child-soul gradually unfolds its various powers; the youth presents them in full bloom, the mature man shows their ripe fruit; in old age we see the gradual decay of the psychic powers, corresponding to the senile degeneration of the brain. The phylogenetic argument derives its strength from palæontology, and the comparative anatomy and physiology of the brain; co-operating with and completing each other, these sciences prove to the hilt that the human brain (and, consequently, its function—the soul) has been evolved step by step from that of the mammal, and still further back from that of the lower vertebrates."

This certainly seems a formidable list of arguments against the theory of a future state. And what is, perhaps, equally obvious, each argument is securely entrenched in ascertained scientific fact. It may also be observed that none of Haeckel's sacerdotal or metaphysical antagonists has so far succeeded in invalidating any of his contentions in favor of the mortality of man.

It is constantly asserted that the facts and principles with which the name of Haeckel is associated are bywords in Germany. Yet we find that when the great Bismarck visited Jena in 1892, he treated its most famous professor with every mark of admiring respect. The name of Ernst Haeckel Strasse has been given to one of the finest thoroughfares in Jena. When Haeckel's sixtieth birthday was commemorated, Professor Oscar Hertwig, Germany's greatest contemporary biologist, unveiled a marble bust of the veteran evolutionist. Among the contributors to the fund raised for the purchase of this bust to Haeckel are to be found the names of five hundred university professors and heads of academic institutions in every part of the world. In their name Oscar Hertwig greeted his master as one "who had written his name in letters of light in the history of science."

Bitterly reviled as he has been, and is, by the clergy and metaphysicians, Ernst Haeckel shines forth as one of the outstanding intellectual glories of modern times. Ever a fighter, he never bowed nor desired to bow before the altar of authority. But he was a permanent and loving worshiper in the temple of truth. He recognised no revelation save that vouchsafed by nature when we woo her secrets from her. Although Wordsworth's wonderful pantheistic outpouring in Tintern Abbey was made to serve as a motto to the English edition of Haeckel's History of Creation, the greater lines of Shakespeare's Winter's Tale probably more fitly represent the eminent evolutionist's attitude towards nature. Haeckel's monistic philosophy most certainly does not embrace a belief in a special power whose "dwelling is the light of setting suns." But the following passage is in the completest harmony with his philosophy:—

> "Yet nature is made better by no mean,
> But nature makes that mean: so, o'er that art,
> Which, you say, adds to nature, is an art
> That nature makes. You see, sweet maid, we marry
> A gentler scion to the wildest stock;
> And make conceive a bark of baser kind
> By bud of nobler race; this is an art
> Which does mend nature,—change it rather; but
> The art itself is nature."

In great evolving nature we live and move and have our being, and in Haeckel's theosophy the one and only divinity is that which permeates the manifold modes of substance to which we give the name of universal existence. Substance is the all-pervading reality of which organic and inorganic nature are alike composed. Haeckel writes:—

> "Our monistic view that the great cosmic law applies throughout the whole of nature is of the highest moment. For it not only involves, on its positive side, the essential unity of the cosmos and the causal connection of all phenomena that come within our cognizance, but it also, in a negative way, makes the highest intellectual progress, in that it definitely rules out the three central dogmas of metaphysics—God, freedom (of the will), and immortality. In assigning mechanical causes to phenomena everywhere, the law of substance comes into line with the universal law of causality."

In terms dictated by ignorance or malice—very probably a sinister combination of each of these bad qualities — a more or less orthodox writer in a recent number of the Nineteenth Century has delivered judgment on the "exploded" doctrines of Spencer and Haeckel. What first-hand information this Solomon possesses of the work accomplished by these outstanding modern humanists seems difficult to discover. But that aside, when we remember that all that matters in modern science and philosophy is thoroughly permeated with the spirit of evolution, we can afford to smile and pass on. When Congreve's play was hissed, he appeared on the stage before his demonstrative critics and contemptuously told them that "This play will be a play when you're all dead and damned." And in much the same manner, when the names of most of his critics have descended to the dust, the name of Ernst Haeckel is certain to remain as that of a brilliant and scientific genius who, being mortal, made slight mistakes here and there, but was, nevertheless, more largely instrumental in carrying the message of Darwinian evolution through the world than any other disciple of the English naturalist; he was also a great independent pioneer in realms that Darwin scarcely entered.

The concept of evolution has put fresh life into every department of human endeavor. All branches of physical science, every aspect of fruitful social change, all successful attempts to remedy economic ills, each of the various departments of sociological and historical inquiry are already largely, and are destined in the long run, to be completely dominated by the all-embracing principle of evolutionary growth. And this principle is slowly familiarising the general public with the idea of natural causation in every terrestrial occurrence. Supernaturalism in all its forms is being reduced to its proper position of insignificance.

In coming years, when the immense implications of evolution will be more generally understood, men will realise to a fuller extent than is at present possible the indebtedness of the human race to scientists of Haeckel's calibre. This man, despite all calumny and discouragement, unfalteringly pursued an encumbered path towards what he cherished as the good, the beautiful, and the true. In the stormy 'sixties opposition to Haeckel's teachings was so bitterly unrelenting that he offered to resign his professorship. But Professor Seebeck, at that time head of the governing body of Jena University, refused to listen when Haeckel intimated that he was better prepared to sacrifice his career than to recant his dearly held principles. The old professor humorously waved Haeckel's offer aside. "My dear Haeckel," he told him, "you are still young, and you will come to have more mature views of life. After all, you will do less harm here than elsewhere, so here you had better remain."

Whether Haeckel's views became "more mature" is a matter of opinion. But the little university town of Jena was his first and last love. Although Haeckel received pressing invitations to larger, more important, and better-paid University Chairs, he steadily refused to desert his heart's choice. Under the influence exerted by Haeckel, the comparatively small University of Jena rapidly rose in importance. Students of the natural-history sciences flocked to Jena from all parts of Europe and America. Many of the leading zoologists of the day were trained by Haeckel, and when the master is numbered with the mighty dead, his spirit will continue to speak and act in the persons of Oscar Hertwig, J. A. Thomson, Bölsche, Plate, and the other numerous distinguished naturalists who are engaged in spreading the glad tidings of evolution among the sons of men.

"Stop there!" said Mr. Dunnybrig. "Don't say the sins of the fathers should not be visited on the children, because that's to be like all those other slovenly, impious people who want to change the unchangeable.....God has made this view on the subject very clear, and so sure as a father eats sour grapes, so sure will his children's teeth be set on edge, sooner or late. As to marriage—cleaving as I do to the Book, and being an Old Testament man—I go with Jehovah there, through thick and thin, and have the courage of my opinions."—Eden Phillpotts, "Widecombe Fair."

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st., London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 26 SUNDAY, JUNE 29, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

The orthodox person puts his intelligence in handcuffs.
—W. R PATERSON (Benjamin Swift).

Mrs. Besant's Confidence Trick.

[The foregoing article was written and published at the end of 1894. It is reproduced now as some check on the ready acceptance of Mrs. Besant's "messages" to the world. She did not go back to the Hall of Science. She did not undeceive the people she had duped.]

MRS. BESANT'S conversion to Theosophy, under the personal influence of Madame Blavatsky, necessitated my telling her publicly that, in my judgment, she was no longer a Secularist, and that her proper place was outside the National Secular Society. Having said this, I left it to her own sense and honesty to determine her procedure, and it was not long before she found her position in our party untenable.

On looking back over this episode I am entirely satisfied with the course I pursued. Many persons were dissatisfied at the time, but they did not understand the situation as I did, and I believe there are few Secularists at present who do not believe that I was in the right. You cannot have a strong and stable Society composed of persons of diverse and even hostile opinions in regard to what is ostensibly their bond of union. It is impossible for a sensible man to quarrel with the Church on account of "excommunication." Every organisation has the right to say who shall and who shall not belong to it. The mischief began when the Church, after excommunicating one of its members, proceeded to inflict upon him every possible suffering and degradation.

Before leaving us, however, Mrs. Besant elected to give a farewell address at the Hall of Science, which, of course, was crowded to suffocation. By this time she had assumed all the airs of a high priestess, who had inherited by a sort of divine right the mantle of Helena Blavatsky. The tradition of the Hall of Science, where she had lectured for many years, was thrown to the winds. Mrs. Besant walked off the platform after her address without waiting for a single question or a moment's discussion.

Throughout that address Mrs. Besant maintained the attitude she had adopted from the beginning. To her old Freethought associates she said: "Did you ever know me to tell you a lie?" Of course they did not, and the impulsive lady took that as a guarantee that all she told them was absolutely true. He logic allowed of no distinction between lies and inaccuracy.

I said at the time that this was a form of the confidence trick. No person had a right to demand such implicit credence. A man in a public-house said to a greenhorn: "Let me hold your purse while you go round the corner." Mrs. Besant said: "Let me hold your mind while you go out of it." The motives might be different, but the methods were the same.

Mrs. Besant created a profound "sensation"—as the Chronicle put it—by stating that, since Madame Blavatsky's death, she had received letters from the Mahatma who had been in communication with that lady. They might not believe her, but then the old question arose again, "Did they ever know her to tell a lie?" And this dispensed with all necessity for evidence.

Mrs. Besant would say that too much importance should not be attached to these "miracles" of precipitated letters. At the same time she was wise enough to see that they were her trump card with the gaping mob of superstitionists. It is a way they have. Jesus Christ himself is reported to have made light, occasionally, of his "miracles," telling persons who profited by them to "tell no man," with the dead certainty that the advice would only make them more zealous advertisers.

"Did you ever know me to tell you a lie?" was an awkward question, especially when asked by a lady. Mrs. Besant might have got an answer if she had asked, "Did you ever know me to be deceived?" Several persons could have said, "Yes."

It now appears that Mrs. Besant was deceived. The oracle was under the influence of mechanical inspiration. The afflatus of the god was simply the breath of Mr. W. Q. Judge. This gentleman has since been accused of forging the Mahatma letters in question, with others of the same kidney. A "Judicial Committee" was appointed by the Theosophical Society to investigate the charges, and the farce of this "investigation" has been fully exposed in the Westminster Gazette. The Committee sagely found that the rules of the Society did not permit them to try Mr. Judge. After this grave hocus-pocus, Mr. Judge and Mrs. Besant came to an agreement. Each made a statement which has been printed for circulation among the "genuine brotherhood." Mr. Judge's statement is a rigmarole worthy of Pecksniff. Mrs. Besant's contains the following passage:—

> "I do not charge, and have not charged, Mr. Judge with forgery in the ordinary sense of the term, but with giving a misleading form to messages received psychically from the Master in various ways.....Personally, I hold that this method is illegitimate.....I believe that Mr. Judge wrote with his own hand, consciously or automatically I do not know, in the script adopted as that of the Master, messages which he received from the Master, or from chelas; and I know that in my own case I believed that the messages he gave me in the well-known script were messages directly precipitated or directly written by the Master. When I publicly said that I received, after H. P. Blavatsky's death, letters in the writing that H. P. Blavatsky had been accused of forging, I referred to letters given to me by Mr. Judge, and as they were in the well-known script I never dreamt of challenging their source. I know now that they were not written or precipitated by the Master, and that they were done by Mr. Judge; but I also believe that the gist of these messages were psychically received, and that Mr. Judge's error lay in giving them to me in a script written by himself and not saying so.....Having been myself mistaken, I in turn misled the public."

Mrs. Besant was "mistaken," and she "misled" others. After all her posing I was right; it was a form of the confidence trick. What will she do now? This is what she ought to do. She should visit the Hall of Science again and confess that she was duped. She owes the people she "misled" this act of reparation. But I scarcely believe she will make it. The public admission of fallibility is fatal to those who trade on mystery.

Medical Materialism and Faith.

THE study of religion falls easily and naturally into two parts. The first is a question of origin. What were the conditions that suggested the hypothesis of supernatural powers dominating or creating the world of man and nature? The answer to this question has now been furnished by numerous writers, and there can be no doubt that whatever modifications of that answer may be demanded by more extended knowledge, its outline has been accurately drawn. All the religions of the world rest on a basis of ignorance. Civilised man does not create his religion, he inherits it. Religions belong to a time when man, unaware of his own nature or the nature of the universe, formulates answers to problems that are presented to him, as they are to us. Life propounds the same questions to all, savage or civilised, but the answer given depends upon the knowledge possessed by those who furnish the reply. The variation is not in nature but in man. The untrained mind sees a spiritual power as the cause of a disease, and seeks escape by magic and prayer. The scientific mind takes test-tube and microscope, hunts for the malignant germ, and provides an antidote. If by some miracle the scientist could have been first in the field, the supernatural would never have existed. As he comes last, religion has a long start, and by the time he arrives it has bitten so deeply into human institutions, and so permeated habits of thought, that its complete eradication is the most difficult of tasks.

The second half of the study of religion is concerned with its perpetuation. Granted that religion is rooted in delusion, how comes it that this delusion has lasted so long? Freethinkers, at least, believe that all actual knowledge, all real verifiable knowledge, counts as an asset for naturalism, and is, so far, antagonistic to supernaturalism. At any rate, we do not believe that there exists a single fact that does not admit, ultimately, of a perfectly rational explanation — an explanation that dispenses with supernaturalism in any form. Why, then, has religion not disappeared? For religion cannot exist, even to the most uncultured mind, without evidence of some sort. The evidence may be irrelevant or inconclusive to a better trained intelligence, but evidence of some sort there must have been, and must be. The savage may have created religion; but that is not the sole reason why, thousands of years after, his descendants continue to believe in it. "Our fathers have told us," constitutes a strong appeal; but the children also will require proof. What kind of proof is it that religious people have, in all ages, taken as confirmation of their beliefs? A study of savage life shows us clearly enough how the religious idea vitalised the facts. We must study after ages to find what class of experiences have vitalised the idea.

It is this question I have been dealing with in the Freethinker under different titles. I commenced the series by taking the almost farcical attempt of the late Professor William James to deal with what he called "Medical Materialism." Under this term he classed all those who hold that a great deal of what passes with the world as religious feeling is either masked sexual feeling or due to abnormal nervous conditions. Unconnected with religion, Professor James would, in all probability, have been the first to recognise that "Medical Materialism" amply covered the majority of the cases cited in his "Varieties of Religious Experience," but connected with religion, he—although his own religious belief appears to have been of a very nebulous character—forgot his scientific caution in the endeavor to place religious experience in a category of its own. My articles, consequently, took the form of supplying the evidence, or some of it, in support of the view of the "Medical Materialist." So far as I am aware, this ground has never been systematically worked, although numerous writers have touched on it more or less incidentally. And even now, at the end of a lengthy series of articles, little more than an outline has been presented.

The lines of evidence are threefold. First, there is the fact that diseases, bodily and mental, are in the lower stages of culture universally attributed to spiritual agency. This explanation holds the field, and is not replaced until a comparatively late period of human history. But of special importance to our inquiry is the fact that this belief does not disappear suddenly. Even after the facts upon which the belief is based are otherwise interpreted, the frame of mind induced by the long reign of such a conviction persists. Supernatural and mystical cures persist, and are still used to an extent that only those accustomed to collect the beliefs of villagers and the less educated among townsmen are acquainted with. To take only one example: saffron tea is still very widely used as a cure for measles. All medical men know that it is not of the slightest value, and students of folklore can trace its origin in the theory of sympathetic cures. So with the fact of disease in general, and the persistence of religious belief. The conclusion that disease is caused by spirits is one suggested by the religious belief, but in turn the observed facts react on and strengthen religious belief. Every case of disease is a fresh proof, an unanswerable piece of evidence. And all the time religion as a social fact is becoming more firmly established.

The next line of evidence is that furnished by what I have called the culture of the supernatural. By some means or other—probably by accident in the first instance—it is discovered that certain herbs and vegetable drugs have a peculiar effect on the human mind. Those who use them see things that people do not normally see, or hear things unheard by others. Abstention from food and other bodily privations produce similar results. What is the inevitable conclusion? The only one possible is that the subject is in communication with a spiritual world from which he is excluded under normal conditions. From this to the next step is obvious and easy. To repeat the experience, one has only to repeat the conditions. And repeated they are, in all religions, with at most a modification rendered necessary by changed times and circumstances. That is why fasting and other methods of "fleshly mortification" have played so large a part in religious ceremonies. The savage medicine-man, the Hindoo fakir, the mediæval saint created their visions and ecstasies by the simple plan of a derangement of the nervous system. Of course, they did not know what they were doing. To them the derangement was the condition of ecstasy or intercourse, not the cause of its existence.

The third line of experience is connected with the phenomena of sexuality. From the earliest times man has associated the procreation of his species with the existence of a supernatural world. This is seen in the magical devices of early and mediæval times to obtain children, and in prayers and other customs connected with childbirth that still exist. But more important than this in later periods is the fact that a great deal of expressed religious feeling is little more than masked sexuality. As has been noted over and over again by medical observers, the connection between excessive piety and eroticism in the insane is most marked. And in normal cases we see the phenomenon of childless women and unmarried men expressing themselves towards Jesus and the Virgin in language which, when diverted of its religious glamor, leaves no doubt as to the real nature of its origin. The visions described, the feelings experienced during ecstasy, are unmistakably due to strong, unsatisfied sexual feeling. In these cases we are dealing with a mere perversion of the sexual instinct.

When we have not perversion, we have misinterpretation. This occurs, as I have shown, during the period of adolescence. The primary and significant features of adolescence are a development of the sexual nature and an awakening of a consciousness of race kinship. Connected with these and flowing from them, there is a rapid development of what are called the altruistic feelings, the individual becoming less self-centred and more concerned for the well-being of others. These things are, of course, merely so many devices of nature for the perpetuation of the race, although in the course of social development the primary features become overlaid with a number of secondary characteristics. In a society fully conscious of the nature of the forces at work, these developments would be reckoned at their true value, and wisely directed to the furtherance of a healthy social life. In a society more or less saturated with supernaturalism, a different policy is pursued. Following the customs of our remote savage ancestors, who naturally take the development of sex life as a striking evidence of supernaturalism, the modern Christian preacher seizes the opportunity of exploiting youth in the interests of religion. The vague, but none the less powerful feelings associated with sex are interpreted as the "strivings of God in the human soul," precisely as the savage associates the sexual phenomena of womanhood with the agency of the tribal ghosts. The distinction between the savage and the Christian here is verbal only. Mentally, they move on the same plane. The growth of the social feelings is given a religious covering, with the result that instead of youth being, as it should be, the period of conscious entry into the larger social life, in only too many cases it is no more than the beginning of a life-long servitude to retrogressive religious influences.

This is, of course, not the only way in which religion exploits man to-day. As supernaturalism gets more and more discredited by modern life and modern knowledge, preachers are driven further in their course of exploitation. Older generations frankly set the world against the spirit, life against religion, and treated the advance of one as involving the retreat of the other. This was a plain policy, and an honest policy, but it could not be maintained. Contemporary preachers adopt the bolder, but less honest, policy of claiming the whole of life for religion. The instinct for truth, right, justice, the love of the beautiful, the desire for social intercourse, with the comfort and assistance that comes from it, are all referred to the influence of religion. All this is sheer exploitation of human nature by a religion no longer honest enough or bold enough to avow its real nature. And, unfortunately, the early education of the vast majority of people prepares them, easy victims, for such a policy.

In these articles I have been trying to furnish evidence of the way in which this misunderstanding, misinterpretation, and exploitation of human nature, in both its normal and abnormal aspects, has gone on. I am convinced that it is these factors that have chiefly contributed to the perpetuation of religious beliefs, and that they still form the strongest obstacles to their disappearance. For wild and absurd as some of these beliefs have been, their influence does not disappear with their rejection. They leave behind a psychological residuum fatal to positive or scientific thinking. It is like a man who has been long in slavery, but is now free. He may no longer be in real danger of the lash, but the fear of the whip has become part of his mental life and cannot be eradicated. So with all the admitted delusions that have gone to keep religion alive. Generation after generation saw proofs of religious agency that now impose upon no one in a civilised country. But the effects have bitten deeply into the social life, a temper of mind favorable to supernaturalism has become part of our social heritage. If one can imagine the course of human history to have been different; if, directly men emerged from the savage culture stage, disease had been recognised for what it is; if hallucination, delusion, hysteria, and insanity had been seen in their true nature; if emotional and intellectual qualities had always been properly understood; if these things had transpired, it is no more than a statement of the plainest of truths that religion would have died with those primitive social conditions that gave it birth.

Criticism and the Christian Faith.

IT is now beyond all controversy that criticism has come to stay and to do a mighty work, and of necessity to subject anything to criticism is inferentially to regard it as open to question. Criticism implies doubt, and doubt is the half-way house between belief and unbelief. Tennyson teaches that doubt is an enemy to be fought and conquered; but we maintain that our first duty in regard to doubt is to sit in judgment upon it, or, in other words, to examine it with calm and dispassionate care. It is by no means a foregone conclusion that it must eventuate in a stronger and brighter faith. Of course, to a fanatical believer doubt is an evil to be resisted and laid at all cost, because he is convinced that unbelief damns a man to all eternity; but criticism begins its work in doubt, and it depends entirely on the evidence at its disposal whether it ends in belief or unbelief. When the critic first laid his hands upon the Bible he did not look upon it as an infallible book, but treated the claims made for it as highly debatable; and already the result of his work is that the old doctrine of inspiration and infallibility has generally been abandoned. Professor Peake frankly admits that criticism has produced a great deal of change in the popular mind in regard to Biblical and theological questions. The change is on a much larger scale than the Professor imagines. He is primarily a theologian, and his theology hamstrings his criticism; but even he, evangelical divine though he be, is critically forced to state that "the reconstruction of the life of Jesus, the course of his ministry, and the purposes which animated him, are subjects of very keen debate." It is no longer possible to declare, as our fathers confidently did, that Christianity is rooted in history, or that the Four Gospels are literally true. Indeed, Dr. Peake himself believes that "you cannot base Christianity upon history alone," because the alleged historical facts are called in question by so many eminent scholars. "It must be confessed," he says, "that the disadvantages of our alliance with history are no figment of the imagination," which means that the history concerned is, more or less, of a doubtful character. He grants that there are elements in the Gospel story which Christianity has no vital interest in asserting, and these may be allowed to go; "but there are some things which lie at the very centre of the Christian position; cut those out, and Christianity has been eviscerated"; and therefore they must be retained whatever criticism may say.

Thus the theologian and the critic are bound to reach a point at which they must part company. Sooner or later the critic lays his axe unto the root of the Christian tree, and then the theologian cries out, "Halt! This tree must stand. It is the tree of life, whose leaves are for the healing of the nations." If the critic responds to that appeal, the adjective "reverent" qualifies him; but if not he is denounced as an enemy of the truth, and the adjectives "negative," "destructive," "irresponsible," and "irreverent" are attached to him. The critic may do what he likes as long as he refrains from touching anything that is considered of "vital interest" to Christianity. If he keeps within the bounds of reverence he is welcomed as a strong ally, and nothing but good is said of him. "You must give up that negative attitude of yours," says the Rev. H. S. M'Clelland to an inquirer with whom he deals in the Christian Commonwealth for June 18. This inquirer had only asked the following fair question: "How many of the old landmarks will remain when the devastating tide of modern criticism and scientific inquiry has reached its height?" This is the reverend gentleman's answer:—

> "All you will ever require, my friend, for the safe pilotage of your soul to its eternal haven. But don't you think it is time you began to ask a new kind of question concerning that 'devastating' tide? For there is one thing about that flood upon which we are both certain to agree—it is running too strongly now to be stemmed by any human power. Why go on assuming that this tide is a devastating thing? Are you sure that it is not bringing new spiritual life to the dry and barren soil of an irreligious age?"

This answer misses the inquirer's point altogether, and must be condemned as an offhand and cruel trifling with his case. By "landmarks" was clearly meant distinctive Christian doctrines; and it cannot be doubted but that many of these have been given up or modified out of recognition under the pressure of modern criticism and scientific discoveries. Less than fifty years ago the doctrine of the verbal inspiration and infallibility of the Bible occupied an essential place in the Christian creed; but to-day it is rarely we come across anyone who still holds it. The historicity of man's fall in the Garden of Eden upon which Paul built his curious theory of redemption, the view that it was Adam's sin that brought death into the world, the doctrine that Christ bore the punishment of the sins of the world—all these used to be held universally as essential tenets of the Christian religion, but one by one they have been dropped. Now, where and when is this devastating process going to stop? This question Mr. M'Clelland deliberately evaded, and took to bantering his questioner about his negative attitude and his not facing the facts as they are. We invite Mr. M'Clelland to "face the facts as they are," which he fails to do in his Correspondence Column in the Christian Commonwealth.

It is easy enough for an able and successful minister to give the names of at least fifty young people whom he has won over to his way of looking at things, and whom he may rhetorically describe as having been "carried forward on that life-giving sea [modern criticism and scientific inquiry!] to the shores of a new world of spiritual promise and moral enthusiasm." The reverend gentleman tells us himself that there is in some of his answers "an element of exaggeration," and surely that element is not wanting in that now under consideration. Yes, he exaggerates, rhetorises, plays with words. Modern criticism and scientific inquiry bring us no information concerning the "soul" and its "eternal haven," and they are equally ignorant of God, whom Mr. M'Clelland rhetorically describes as "manifest in varying degree in every throb of his creation." We are not one whit behind the reverend gentleman in admiration of all noble literature and all noble life, but to us they are the media, not of God's revelation, but of humanity's self-expression; not of the descent of Deity, but of the ascent of man. No one has ever been borne on the rising tide of modern criticism to a knowledge of God in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, or to a knowledge of the man Jesus as the perfect revealer of the Father, in whom we see life at its fullest and best. The soul, the eternal haven, God, Christ, and the better land—these are all theological or metaphysical assumptions, unverified and unverifiable, for not one of which can criticism be held responsible. We congratulate Mr. M'Clelland upon his repudiation of the "'inspired' passage as something altogether distinct from the results of normal human intelligence," and marvel at his simplicity and inconsistency in looking upon not only all noble literature but all noble life as the media of God's revelation. Is all noble literature "something distinct from the results of normal human intelligence"? If not, how on earth does Mr. M'Clelland know that it is a medium of God's revelation? He does not know, but theologically imagines it, and then uncritically asserts it as a fact. We do not regard the noblest life as in any sense or degree beyond a normally endowed human being, and certainly we can see nothing in it suggestive of its being the medium of the revelation of a superhuman person.

We do not insinuate that Mr. M'Clelland has not been greatly influenced by modern criticism. It is very probable that it led him to throw the Old Theology overboard and adopt the New; but we hold that the New Theology is no more the child of criticism than the Old. It is wholly uncritical to say that criticism has given us a new conception of God. It may sound better to describe the new conception of God, not as "the special contribution of any single race or tribe," but as "a slowly developing revelation in the soul of humanity"; but the one description is not one jot or tittle more believable than the other, because neither is realisable. But our main point is that criticism is no more favorable to the one conception than to the other, because both represent a frame of mind in which criticism has absolutely no place. The whole tendency of criticism is to eliminate the supernatural. It found the Bible the work of God and left it a purely human product. In the exact proportion in which criticism and scientific inquiry gain, supernaturalism loses. The Gospel Jesus is a fine example of this principle. No accredited New Testament critic regards him as a God-man. It is all very well for Dr. Peake to assert that "no one who accepts the authenticity of any of the Pauline epistles has any right to deny the historicity of Jesus"; but Professor Drews, who is quite as competent to judge, asserts the very opposite, and we agree with him.

Criticism has only just started on its momentous career; but already it has rid the world of huge masses of theological rubbish. We are persuaded that its triumph will mean the complete downfall of superstition. To the question, "How many of the old landmarks will remain when the devastating tide of modern criticism and scientific inquiry has reached its height?" we would therefore answer, NONE. Every one of them is doomed, and so many of them have already disappeared. These are irreparably lost, and the rest are in the process of evanishment. The world will be all the richer when they shall all have gone. We lose them because we are gaining wisdom; and wisdom is the offspring of reason; and reason is the supreme critic of life and all its interests.

"Do not dream of a life beyond this, for you will find no other, nor of a heaven beyond the universe, for beyond the infinite universe there is nothing. Earth is heaven, and paradise is on earth; it is for you to realise it. Cultivate your mind, honor your ancestors, respect your traditions, let the past and the future be both a living present to your mind. Identify yourself with one and the other through humanity. Never forget that you are one with the earth, with the universe, and take care no act of yours offends against this unity.....Such, in brief, is the catechism or religious code of China, and it has so far entered the hearts and practice of the population that the civil code is not much longer."—E. Edo. SIMON, China—its Social, Political, and Religious Life (1887), pp. 95-6.

"We have no wish to exalt China at the expense of European civilisation, but we cannot blind ourselves to the fact that her vices have been exaggerated and her virtues overlooked. Only the bigoted or ignorant could condemn with sweeping assertions of immorality a nation of many millions absolutely free, as the Chinese are, from such vices as drunkenness; in whose cities may be seen—what all our legislative and executive skill cannot secure—streets quiet and deserted after nine or ten o'clock at night. Add to this industry, frugality, patriotism, and a boundless respect for the majesty of office; it then only remains for us to acknowledge that China is, after all, 'a nation of much talent, and, in some respects, even wisdom.'"—H. A. GILES, Chinese Sketches, pp. 201-2.

IN considering the effect of opium upon the Chinese, there are other factors to be taken into consideration. For instance, it is well known that the Chinese are less sensitive to pain than Europeans are. "Chinese children," says a good authority, "bear illness and pain like little heroes."* And European medical men have observed that once a Chinese has placed himself under the surgeon's hands, he will, without the aid of chloroform, undergo the most painful operations without flinching. May it not follow that the nervous system that is less susceptible to pain is also less susceptible to injury from opium than our own more sensitive nervous apparatus? Another application of the proverb that "one man's meat is another man's poison."

Then, again, it must be remembered that the Chinese have been in the habit of taking opium for hundreds of years, and as Dr. Archdall Reid has shown in his ingenious work, The Present Evolution of Man, that races who have had the most extended experience of these drugs and poisons are the most temperate in their use of them, because those individuals who are most intemperate in the use of them perish, leaving behind the temperate and those who have no craving for them.

However that may be, the Chinese Government—who seem to have been imposed upon in this matter by the European outcry against opium—have now taken in hand the task of altogether suppressing the trade. When they have succeeded in doing that, if they ever do succeed, they will probably find themselves in a worse position than ever. For a stimulant of some kind is essential to relieve the monotonous character of their lives, and if opium is suppressed, they will undoubtedly introduce something worse to take its place. As Professor Giles says of the Chinese:—

> "In centuries past a drunken nation, some two or three hundred years ago they began to come under the influence of opium, and the abuse of alcohol dropped to a minimum. Opium-smoking, less harmful a great deal than opium-eating, took the place of drink, and became a national vice; but the extent of its injury to the people has been much exaggerated, and is not to be compared with that of alcohol in the West. It is now, in consequence of recent legislation, likely to disappear, on which result there could be nothing but the warmest congratulations to offer, but for the fact that something else more insidious, and more deadly still, is rapidly taking its place. For a time, it was thought that alcohol might recover its sway, and it is still quite probable that human cravings for stimulant of some kind will find a partial relief in that direction. The present enemy, however, and one that demands serious and immediate attention, is morphia, which is being largely imported into China in the shape of a variety of preparations suitable to the public demand. A passage from opium to morphia would be worse, if possible, than from the frying-pan into the fire."*

Dr. Morrison declares that to convert a desire for opium into a taste for morphia is analogous to changing one's stimulant from beer to methylated spirits,† a most vile and maddening stimulant.

Probably the Chinese Government will also suppress the trade in morphia when they discover their mistake. As Mr. Arthur Davenport observes:—

> "There is no civilised nation in the world which does not indulge in a narcotic of some kind or other. Should the Chinese abandon opium, they will infallibly fall back on their old, but now happily vanquished enemy, alcohol, when their last state will be worse than their first." ‡

When we reflect upon the ravages caused by drink in this country; that for every hundred injured by over-indulgence in opium in China, a thousand are ruined by drink in our own country; that drink turns people into madmen, capable of the most devilish cruelty and brutality, as our papers daily testify; while the opium pipe, in moderation, soothes the weary brain to sweet dreams and invigorates the tired body, how impudent and hypocritical the missionary campaign against opium sounds.

As we have said, the missionaries wax very eloquent over the sin of Great Britain in forcing our Indian opium upon the unwilling Chinese, and describe our wars with China as "Opium Wars." Now, we hold that our wars with China have been wholly unjustifiable, but they were not undertaken with the purpose of forcing opium upon China. For, as the historian, Stanley Lane-Poole, observes:—

> "Opium is an ingrained habit of the Chinese people, and was in use long before the East Indian Company came into existence. In the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries opium was a recognised import in Chinese tariffs. In 1799 the drain of silver from the country in payment for foreign imports alarmed the Chinese Government, and the principal article of trade, opium, was prohibited, not because it was injurious in itself, but because it took away too much specie."*

This decree, however, remained a dead letter for forty years, and the trade went on as though it had never been issued. As the same writer says:—

> "The people liked opium, the Chinese officials liked opium, large crops of the poppy were grown in China, and costly cargoes of opium were cheerfully imported from India. Opium was no more 'forced' upon the Chinese than brandy upon England; nor have the Chinese authorities ever charged us with compelling the importation. They even proposed (in 1837) to re-legalise the opium trade in the hope of checking the drain of silver, and this by itself is proof enough that the difficulty was one of finance, not of morals" (p. 9).

This is also the opinion of Mr. Eames in his history of The English in China, where he declares that it was "the economic side" of the opium question "to which the Chinese Government mainly devoted its attention when the opium traffic first became a subject of contention between England and China" (p. 229). Before 1828 the balance of trade had always been in favor of China, large quantities of silver being imported, a result very pleasing to them, and which lasted up to 1829, when, for the first time, the volume of imports exceeded exports, so that, instead of silver coming into the country in return for goods going out, silver began to go out of China for goods coming in, and the Chinese Government began to look forward with alarm to the time when the country would be depleted of the whole of its stock of silver. Says Mr. Eames:—

> "In all the documents contributed to the controversy by Chinese writers, the main theme was how to prevent the impoverishment of the people due to the loss of wealth arising from the opium trade, whether manifested in the export of silver, or in the diversion of agricultural resources to the production of a noxious luxury in the place of products of lasting value. Though the reasoning employed and the principles relied on were not always economically sound, yet it is evident that the economic evil was considered by the Chinese the most important. The Viceroy said in terms that the object in proposing to repeal the interdict on opium was to prevent the loss of specie occasioned by the sale of the drug for money. The regulations which he recommended were aimed chiefly at preventing this loss."†

It is true, says Mr. Lane-Poole,—

> "we may read eloquent Chinese diatribes on the sin of opium-smoking, for the argument of immorality began to be advanced as soon as it was discovered that public opinion among the English was sharply divided on the subject.....But the same people who expressed the finest sentiments on the subject in public were found to indulge in the practice in private, and the official class generally throughout China were passionately addicted to opium-smoking. The habit had become national long before England had anything to do with China, and it would have continued had there never been any British trade."‡

One of these Chinese indictments of opium, widely circulated in this country, was by no less a person than the late Li Hung Chang, in which that wily statesman observes: "The poppy is certainly surreptitiously grown in some parts of China, notwithstanding the laws and frequent imperial edicts prohibiting its cultivation." Upon which Dr. Morrison observes:—

> "'Surreptitiously grown in some parts of China!' Why from the time I left Hupeh till I reached the boundary of Burma, a distance of 1,700 miles, I never remember to have been out of sight of the poppy. Li Hung Chang continues, 'I earnestly hope that your Society, and all right-minded men of your country, will support the efforts China is now making to escape from the thraldom of opium.' And yet you are told in China that the largest growers of the poppy in China are the family of Li Hung Chang." *

Dr. Morrison, who travelled in China in 1894, observed :—

"Edicts are still issued against the use of opium. They are drawn up by Chinese philanthropists over a quiet pipe of opium, signed by opium-smoking officials, whose revenues are derived from the poppy, and posted near the fields of poppy by the opium-smoking magistrates who own them." †

Naturally, it was the producers of opium in China who were most interested in suppressing the supply of foreign opium, which entered into competition with the home-grown produce.

Acid Drops.

"Thoughts have gone forth whose power can sleep no more." This was the motto on one of the Suffragette banners at the funeral of Miss Emily Wilding Davison, the lady who tried to stop the Derby as an advertisement of her "cause." It is a pity that Shelley's words did not receive a better all-round study. No one deprecated violence more than he did; no one gave less quarter to hatred and revenge. To try to cure evil with more evil he saw was sad, mad, and bad together.

Fight on. God will give the victory." These words were on Miss Davison's coffin. Religious people are so often guilty of nonsense and bad taste. We do not dispute that God gives the victory. We know nothing at all on that point,—and we suspect that the ladies know just as much as we do. But we regard it as perfectly certain that if God does give the victory he always gives it to those who win it. What a curious exhibition of human vanity it is that God is claimed to be on all sides—before the event! "Me and God" is the commonest partnership.

Rev. C. Hinscliffe, who took the funeral service at St. George's, Hart-street, Bloomsbury, talked the greatest nonsense over Miss Davison's coffin. First of all, he begged the supporters of the Woman Suffrage cause not to make her death a matter of party propaganda; which, of course, was precisely what they were making of it all the time. In the second place he told them that "The whole thing was in God's hands, and God always made exactly the right use of everything." So, so? Well, in that case God made exactly the right use of the 1913 Derby. And since then he has made exactly the right use of the Ascot. Thus all is for the best in the best of all possible worlds.

Now that the original General Booth is dead Mr. Bernard Shaw remains the greatest self-advertiser in England. But swelled-head is liable to develop in this sort of business. Mr. Shaw's latest letter to the Times on the treatment of Mrs. Pankhurst and other Suffragette prisoners, with its reference to Mr. Asquith ("I cannot persuade him") is really colossal. We saw symptoms of this coming on at the Essex Hall meeting in favor of the total repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. The one thing that loomed large to Mr. Shaw's mental vision was that the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws would enable him to write a play on Mohammed. The cream of the joke is that anybody can write as many plays as he pleases on Mohammed. Voltaire wrote one in pre-revolutionary France, and it was translated into English and staged in London. Mr. Shaw perhaps thinks himself so great a writer that a play on Mohammed from his pen would alarm the Sultan of Turkey, the Khedive of Egypt, the Shah of Persia, and all the Mohammedan rulers.

Mr. Shaw is an industrious letter-writer to the Times, and he is willing to tackle almost any subject. He has lately been dealing with the Suffragette question, with special relation to the Liberal Government. We must conclude that he is inspired, for he certainly utters anything but sense. One of his proposals was that the Suffragette prisoners should be allowed to commit suicide in their cells by self-starvation. This is what he offered as just and merciful in comparison with forcible feeding. Yet he has the calm assurance to declare that Mr. Asquith cares no more for the lives of Suffragette prisoners than he does for those of rabbits. After all, perhaps, Mr. Shaw made that proposal with his tongue in his cheek. He must surely have known that it could not be carried out in any prison that had a doctor amongst its officials. The fact is, we believe, that Mr. Shaw (like most politicians, for that matter) thinks any stick good enough to beat his political adversaries with. The Suffragette prisoners have cornered the Liberal Government, as they would corner Mr. Shaw's or anybody else's Government—in the way that women can always corner men if they choose to do so. Mr. Shaw knows this quite well—he must know it—and before he denounces and derides poor distracted McKenna's fluctuating policy he is bound to state what would be his own. Up to the present his only proposal is to let the ladies commit suicide. We repeat this could not be carried out; but supposing it could, we fail to see how it entitles Mr. Shaw to assume such lordly airs of moral superiority over the authors of other proposals—especially over those who have to deal with this baffling problem in a practical manner of some kind.

Mr. Shaw's last letter to the Times on the rearrest of Mrs. Pankhurst on the day of Miss Davison's funeral was perfectly fantastic. His enemies might even call it dishonest. The argument was based upon a suppression of the facts. Mrs. Pankhurst boasts that she has declared war against society as at present constituted; not a defensive war, but an aggressive war,—and not even an open war, but a surreptitious war, in which the aggressor inflicts injury without facing responsibility, and even claims and enjoys the protection and all other advantages derived from a supposed peaceful association with the very people it injures. Mrs. Pankhurst boasts that she commands the female soldiers in this war; inspires them, plans for them (in person or by proxy), and finds the money for the campaign. Let us suppose for a moment that she has a right to burn down public and private property, in order to frighten society into capitulating to her demands. Let us suppose this. What, then, about the other people—the people attacked? Have they no rights? Haven't they equal rights with Mrs. Pankhurst? If she tries to destroy their property haven't they the right to try to preserve it? Is it reasonable to expect that the Government which represents the general community is going to give Mrs. Pankhurst and her Amazons a free fling? Is it reasonable to expect that they will, in consideration of her illness, brought about by her own deliberate personal act, not only let her out of prison in order that she may recover, but also allow her to attend meetings and funeral processions in aid of the very policy for which she was incarcerated? Is she to be considered to be too ill to be in prison, yet well enough to participate in public propaganda? The idea is utterly absurd. We deny that this part of the Suffragette question is a political one at all. Whether women should have the parliamentary vote is a political question. (Heaps of men, by the way, haven't got it yet.) But whether rival political parties should be allowed any weapons but persuasion—whether they should be allowed to commit, and to commit as a deliberate policy, acts which from any other point of view would be regarded as abominable crimes,—this is not a political question; it is a question of the elementary social and moral principles of human society. Mr. Shaw knows all this as well as we do. But he is a Janus-faced controversialist. He defends order or disorder as it serves the turn. But it is noticeable that he never gets in the way of danger himself.

Is it not time to say that the "militant" Suffrage movement is a middle and upper-class movement, and is therefore rather privileged than otherwise? Had it been a working-class movement the Government would have been far less embarrassed by its prisoners. It would have put their food within their reach and said, "There you are; eat it or not, as you please. There are plenty of cemeteries."

Dr. Ethel Smyth reproaches the Archbishop of Canterbury for declining to "invite prayer in our churches for guidance in the woman's question." She reminds him that women are the Church's "mainstay." That is true, anyhow; and we are sorry for it. It is lamentable to see a woman like Dr. Ethel Smyth still clinging to the faith that has been her sex's worst enemy—the faith based on the language of Jesus expanded by the teaching of Paul. Even learned ladies are foolish enough to cling to the old faith. They help the Archbishop to cling to his old salary. That is all.

Like all other sects the Primitive Methodists are far on in decay. At their recent Conference at Derby it was stated that during last year they lost 405 members and 7,081 Sunday-school scholars. During seven years there has been a decrease of 20,000 scholars and over 2,000 teachers. Tearful regrets were expressed by many in the face of these great losses, but nobody could tell how to prevent them for the future. The irresistible power of the Holy Ghost no longer counts. "Sir W. P. Hartley declared his faith in the financial self-sacrifices of wealthy men," as if abundance of cash could save the situation. The one fact that looms large is that the false pretences of the Christian Church are fast losing their hold of the masses of the people, or that, at last, she is beginning to be seen as she really is.

A Berlin correspondent to the Christian World for June 19 informs us that in all parts of Germany religion is visibly dying. Sunday is rapidly ceasing to be regarded as the Lord's Day. "The majority of the churches are more than half empty—at least in Protestant districts," and the few who do attend are mostly women and children. "Even the Kaiser sees nothing inconsistent in attending church on Sunday morning and spending the rest of the day on the racecourse." The correspondent's conclusion is that "as matters are at present in Germany, Sunday is not a day for religious observances so much as a day for recreation, amusement, sport, and theatre-going." As Dr. Horton admitted, not long ago, the trend of things—the spirit of the age—is everywhere distinctly and irrevocably anti-Christian; and this, in our opinion, is one of the most hopeful and encouraging signs of the times.

The Rev. Dr. Jowett, late of this country, but now of New York, has expressed his entire satisfaction with his ministry at Fifth Avenue Church. Why not? The church is a fashionable one, the congregation is wealthy, the minister is well paid. What more could any preacher desire? Naturally, Dr. Jowett finds that "in every direction religious life in America is proving itself a great and powerful factor in the cause of social regeneration." Rev. Mr. Aked, once of Liverpool, said exactly the same under similar conditions. And plenty more evidence of the same kind is procurable on the same terms.

Dr. Clifford has been at it again—not this time in connection with education. The other day he gave figures showing the exodus of people from the Roman Catholic Church. We do not question the figures, we have no need to, only Dr. Clifford's inference that the exodus is from Romanism to Protestantism. What we do challenge him to prove is this: "The cry of Europe," says Dr. Clifford, "now was, 'Sir, we would see Jesus.' We are tired of ikons and images and all the masses and pomp of the Catholic Church." Dr. Clifford's hearing must be defective. The cry of Europe, as other people hear it, is that it is equally tired of the pomp of the Catholic Church and the pettifogging hypocrisies of the Protestant one. The decline of church attendance in England and Germany, with the course of affairs in France, Italy, and Portugal, are quite enough to show what a romantic imagination Dr. Clifford has.

"The majority of the Churches are more than half empty—at least in Protestant districts. There are hundreds of congregations where one seldom sees more than an occasional man. There are crowds of women and children, but the men are thronging the beerhouses and cafes or are scouring the fields and woods." This is what the Christian World Berlin correspondent writes on June 19. It is a fine comment on Dr. Clifford's romantic description of the exodus from Roman Catholicism to Protestantism and the cry of Europe, "We would see Jesus."

Rev. Charles Brent, Bishop of the Philippines is to be congratulated. Crossing the Atlantic from Liverpool, the Bishop travelled steerage. His reason was that "a Bishop's place is among the common people." When the ship's officers found him out—which was not, we think, a very difficult thing—the only concession to his comfort the Bishop would make was to have a cabin to himself and have his meals served there. This strikes us as not at all a bad way to travel steerage, and many others must have envied him. If we want to go to New York, we expect that if we pay steerage rates we shall have to put up with steerage accommodation. But we are not envious. On the contrary, we admire Bishop Brent's plan of campaign. That is why we congratulate him.

Why do judges persist in utilising the privileged position of the Bench to indulge in statements quite irrelevant to what is before them, and to which no reply is possible at the time—or, indeed, at any time, in the same court? In summing up the case for the jury in the late Suffragist trial for conspiracy—which made the matter more offensive than if it had been introduced after the verdict had been given—Mr. Justice Phillimore took occasion to introduce, apropos of nothing in particular, some remarks on the relative merits of Christianity and Mohammedanism in relation to women. We do not know what this had to do with the case before him. The Suffragists were not avowed Mohammedans, nor had their offence any immediate connection with Christianity. We can only assume that the occasion presented itself as one in which Mr. Justice Phillimore could vent his own religious opinions, attack a rival creed, and prove that, able as he may be as a judge, he has much to learn both as regards the character of Christianity and of Mohammedanism.

Here is Mr. Justice Phillimore's deliverance, as reported in the Daily Telegraph of June 18:—

> "The religion of the world which had done most to elevate the position of women was Christianity. The religion which had probably done most to repress them was Mohammedanism.....Mohammedanism was a religion which had always been propagated by the sword."

Now we would suggest that in the England of to-day Mr. Justice Phillimore's religious opinions are his own personal possession, and that he is no more justified in crying up their value while in the discharge of his judicial duties than he would be justified in advertising the value of pictures that hang on the walls of his house. We admit that there is nothing to prevent him advertising his personal opinions on matters outside the case before him, but a nicer sense of personal responsibility than Christianity seems to develop would suggest that when one is a judge in a community which comprises all varieties of religious opinion, and a considerable bulk of no religion at all, the strictly honorable course would be to keep one's own religious opinions out of sight. A due sense of discrimination between one's public duties and one's personal opinions is always advisable, and in no case more so than when one occupies so important a position as the one filled by Justice Phillimore.

The remarks made were not merely injudicious; they were untrue. The statement that Christianity had elevated the position of woman is one that could only be made in the tone and manner in which it was made because we are living in a Christian country. It is the rule to picture Christianity as all that is good, whether facts justify the picture or not. As a matter of fact, it was Christianity that reduced woman in Europe to political and social servitude, and it is against Christian feeling that women have always had chiefly to contend. Mr. Justice Phillimore, we believe, is acquainted with the writings of the early Christians, and we defy him to find any other literature in the world in which woman is treated to so much abuse, and often abuse of such a character that it is simply untranslatable. The whole influence of Christianity for centuries was in the direction of robbing woman, while single, of all legal rights, and of making her, when married, a mere article of property belonging to her husband. In saying this we are not expressing a mere prejudice; we could cite the evidence of lawyers and historians of unquestioned eminence to prove it, were it necessary.

In saying that Mohammedanism is a religion propagated by the sword, Justice Phillimore is simply propagating a vulgar Christian slander. At any rate, it is not truer of Mohammedanism than of Christianity; and on the whole, force has never been employed against rival religious opinions by the former in the same brutal and relentless manner as it was used by the latter. No religion has used the sword more frequently or more ruthlessly than has Christianity. And the worst of European wars, since the decline of the old Roman Empire, have been either waged directly in the interests of Christianity or inspired by Christian feeling. The Crusades and the Thirty Years' War are sufficient proofs of this. It is true that Mohammedanism has used the sword also, but it at least has not used force in the interests of religion as Christianity has done. A conquered people were admitted liberty of worship by them at a time when such freedom was unknown in Christendom. Jew and Christian were allowed to follow their religions in Mohammedan Spain. How much liberty were either given when Spain became Christian? There is not, in fact, a country in the world, in which Christianity has not been established and maintained by force; and whatever the faults of Mohammedanism may be, the Christian, at any rate, is in no position to cast stones.

An inquest was held at Braintree on John Thomas Gilbey, farmer, Thomas Peter Gilbey, his son, and Arthur Smith, laborer, who were struck by lightning in a heavy thunderstorm. The jury returned a verdict of death by the act of God. Why is not that personage indicted for murder or manslaughter? Are the police unable or afraid to serve the summons or execute the warrant?

There has been a correspondence in the Observer lately about the curious epithets applied by Catholics and Protestants to each other. This is a subject that was thoroughly worked out in one of our speeches to the jury before Mr. Justice North in 1883, when we were defending ourselves against an indictment for "blasphemy." Our old friend and sub-editor, Mr. J. M. Wheeler, going no further than the pages of Mosheim, collected a long catalogue of abusive epithets applied by Christian disputants to each other—especially during the period of the so-called Reformation. He supplied them to us—for we were in Newgate Prison at the time—and we fired them at the Roman Catholic judge on the bench, who was so eloquent on the subject of how "infidels" should attack Christianity, how polite they should be, how tender towards the feelings of the poor sensitive Christians. "Just listen to this," we said, "and hear how polite and tender the Christians have been to each other in their mutual controversies." Judge North squirmed under that catalogue of abusive epithets. It contained nearly everything that envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness could suggest. We rather think of reprinting it from the verbatim report of our speech.

We haven't been looking for rich dead disciples of the "blessed be ye poor" Nazarene for the last week or two. We have just lighted upon one—the Rev. Thomas Marsden, vicar of Chigwell, Essex, who left £18,557. Rather a big hump to go through that needle's eye.

Rev. Dr. C. F. Aked, formerly of Liverpool, since of New York, and now of San Francisco, whose salary is not less than £2,000 a year, has renounced his English citizenship and naturalised himself as an American. It can't make much difference now. The reverend gentleman has been six years absent from his native land. We guess the old country will survive the bereavement.

Mr. Aked explains that he favors America with his patronage because he is Republican and hates monarchy. But how does he reconcile that with the Christian Scriptures? How about the text "Fear God and honor the King"?

The great Anti-Home Rule meeting recently held at the Albert Hall was described in the Daily Mail report as "representative of all branches of Protestant Christians." "Brief religious exercises" were indulged in, and the principal speakers were clerical gentlemen. Canon Stephenson, of Belfast, repeated, amidst great applause, the foolish old epigram that "Home Rule and Rome Rule were synonymous." Rev. W. Dudley Fletcher, of Coolbanagher, Queen's County, talked about the Ne Temere decree, by way of showing how Roman Catholic Church law would override the law of the land. We suppose he doesn't know that this same game is openly played by the Protestant Church of England, whose clergy defy the marriage laws of the State by refusing to celebrate the marriage of divorced persons or marriage with a deceased wife's sister. There is no need to go to Ireland to find insolent priests.

Mr. H. W. Nevinson is reporting to the Daily Chronicle on the present situation in Albania. His first letter appeared in the issue for June 21. It was dated from "Scutari, June 14." The following extract will interest our readers:

> "I need not describe the ruin that its heroic defence has brought upon the city. The centre of the bazaar (the most beautiful in the near East next to Constantinople and Prisrend) has been burnt to the ground. But that happened after the surrender, and is attributed only to the Montenegrin's ancestral instinct for loot. The destruction of the cathedral by the forty large bombs fired into it was more wanton, for some 2,000 women and children had taken refuge there, supposing it to be absolutely safe. They forgot that Montenegrins and Serbs are orthodox, but the Cathedral Catholic, and that Christians do not necessarily love each other."

After describing the Montenegrins' savage defiance of the Hague conventions, Mr. Nevinson adds that the experiences inside Scutari, terrible as they were, "appear slight misfortunes compared with the slaughter and utter ruin in the surrounding villages. For the greater number of these villages have been devastated, burnt, and wiped out." Such are the sublime achievements of these soldiers of the Cross, who started out on the hypocritical pretence of "liberating their fellow Christians." They have liberated nobody. They have simply played the part of brigands — Christian brigands.

Thousands of Church of England people met in Hyde Park on Saturday (June 21) to protest against the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Welsh Church. The Bishop of London and other speakers were loud in their indignation. But they had better save their breath to protest against the attack on their own Church—which will come next. Meanwhile the Bishop of London's question "Why Rob God?" will make many people laugh. They know that robbing God only means robbing the priests, and that robbing the priests means leaving them to live on their own earnings instead of other people's money.

A lady correspondent of the Daily Sketch refers to Jesus as "crucified between two thieves as a malefactor convicted of blasphemy." This is incorrect. Pilate refused to hear the charge of blasphemy; Jesus was then accused of sedition, found guilty, and sentenced to execution.

Mr. Harry Lauder occupied the pulpit at the Castle Green Congregational Church, Bristol, on Sunday afternoon. It was "free seats," of course, and a big crowd went to hear him at the price. He was helping a brother Scot in the person of the regular parson, the Rev. George Adams. He reminds us of the 'bus-driver who spent his day off in driving another man's 'bus.

It is curious to find the leading article in the Methodist Times headed "Beware of Heresy-Hunting!" It is rather late in the day for a Christian paper to issue the warning, and it looks as though the Rev. Scott Lidgett realises that to hunt heretics to-day in the Christian Churches is far more dangerous than leaving them to pursue their own road. For we do not imagine for a moment that the warning is based upon recognition of the truth that the heretic should be given the right to say what he pleases. We believe it is due to two things: First, because if all the heretics were turned out there would be few, and they the less intelligent section, left; and, second, that heresy-hunting involves acquainting many of the laity with truths that leaders of the Churches think had better be kept from them. "We will not," says the Methodist Times, "place a premium on the economy of truth, or on the cowardice of mediocrity." But that is precisely what all forms of Christianity have done, are doing, and will keep on doing. You cannot shut men out of office, or oppose them in public, or boycott them in business on account of their hostility to Christianity, without giving the coward or the hypocrite an advantage over the brave and honest man. You cannot even favor a Christian in public life, because he is a Christian, without doing this. And, on the other hand, to encourage all to express their opinions, without imposing social penalties upon them, would be to bring about such an exodus from the Churches as would make them a negligible factor in social life. This is really the dilemma of the Churches, although many of the leaders have not wit enough to see it.

The Rev. F. C. Spurr, of Melbourne, is a typical minister of the Gospel. He is brimful of prejudices, and expresses them without hesitation. In a letter published in the Christian World for June 19, he belauds two new evangelists who had just tried their hands at converting Melbourne, and are about to visit this country with a similar object in view. He praises them simply because they belong to his school of religious thought. Messrs. Smith and Robins are Americans, and represent the latest brand of evangelism, and Mr. Spurr calls them "these two great men." Now, Freethought has no great men under its banner. All its advocates are conspicuous only by their inferiority. In Melbourne it is professed by "a few brainy men," but their "ignorance of Christianity is colossal," and "a few students who studiously avoid all books on evolution that emphasise its spiritual value and implication." The Freethinkers of Melbourne will appreciate his classification of them into "some Athenians who ever run after new things, and some Yarra Bankers who hail every Rationalist as a god." This is nothing but coarse, vulgar abuse, the employment of which only shows that Mr. Spurr is anything but a great man, and that his ignorance and prejudice are simply colossal. His insulting allusions to Mr. McCabe are quite worthy of his profession.

Our correspondent "E. B." sends us the following "with reference to Mr. Foote's article on 'Where is God?'"—

> "What mortals think they know of God,
> A thousand tomes rehearse.
> What mortals do not know of God,
> Fills all the universe.
> —ANON."

> "God is a blank sheet, on which nothing is found but what we ourselves have written.—MARTIN LUTHER."

Perhaps "E. B.," who has leisure as well as culture, will collect more of these epigrams.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £151 4s. 11d. Received since:—J. W. O'Leary, 10s.; O. N. Beagley and Friends, 8s.: F. M. A., £3.

H. P. MARRITT.—(1) Glad to hear that the friend who presented you with a year's issue of the Freethinker has conferred upon you so much benefit. Ease and satisfaction of mind must be very welcome to one who has spent so much of a long life in a state of distraction through the dogmas and controversies of theology. (2) The Jews and Caffres have no special connection. Their national rite, the sign of their covenant with their god Yahveh, has been found in many different parts of the world, including the new world. Thanks for your good wishes. Our shop manager will attend to the rest of your letter.

C. H. M. GROM.—We note your opinion that Mr. Foote's lectures would cause still more excitement at Melbourne, if he could only be persuaded to visit it,—which, however, is not very likely now.

E. B.—Your cuttings are very welcome.

J. PARTRIDGE.—We hope the Birmingham Branch will have good weather and a successful picnic next Sunday. We should like to join it ourselves—if it were possible. We remember that golden day at Stratford-on-Avon. This may satisfy you that our health is improving.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for your weekly batches of cuttings.

J. SMITH.—There is an excellent volume on Evolution by Professors J. A. Thomson and P. Geddes, in the (shilling) "Home University Library" (Williams & Norgate).

W. JAMESON.—The first of sixpenny reprints was Paine's Age of Reason, issued by the Secular Society, Ltd., and edited by Mr. Foote, with some thirty pages of Notes and a Biographical Preface, which the late G. J. Holyoake called "masterly." Pioneer work is more easily followed than initiated.

J. W. O'LEARY.—Thanks for your letter as well as the enclosure.

J. D. HARDING.—See "Acid Drops." Thanks.

C. BOURCHIER.—Sorry we cannot inform you. Try the Theosophical Society.

H. SMALLWOOD.—It is only a common case of clerical begging, and does not seem to call for any special comment.

J. B.—See paragraph. Pleased to hear from you. Enclosure returned. Glad to have your "congratulations on returning health."

O. N. BEAGLEY, forwarding subscription to the President's Honorarium Fund, says: "It is sent by a few working men in appreciation of your long and plucky fight for freedom of thought, and as a slight acknowledgment of the pleasure and enlightenment they have derived from the pages of the Freethinker."

F. M. A., subscribing to the President's Fund, does so "with a wish that you may do all possible to husband your health and strength, and that you may long be spared to so ably lead 'the best of causes.'"

BOLTON BRANCH.—Miss Vance will lay it first before the N. S. S. Executive.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The Birmingham Branch holds its annual picnic next Sunday (July 6). Members and friends take train from Snow Hill Station at 10.5 a.m. for Warwick. Hot luncheon will be served at the Eastgate Restaurant, 15 Smith-street, Warwick, at 12.30. Tickets, including train fare and luncheon, are 4s. each. Applications to be addressed to the secretary, Mr. J. Partridge, 245 Shenstone-road, Rotton Park, Birmingham. "Saints" from Coventry, Rugby, Leamington, and the district are cordially invited to join the party.

The Liverpool Branch has its annual picnic to-day (June 29) to Thurstaston. Waggonettes leave Woodside Station at 10.15 a.m. Local Freethinkers will all be welcome. Tickets—3s. 6d., including tea; 2s. 3d. for cyclists—can be obtained of the Branch secretary, Mr. W. McKelvie, 57 Penrose-street, Everton, Liverpool.

The Croydon Branch's Sunday evening lectures now begin at 7. We are glad to hear these meetings are so successful.

"F. M. A.," whose initials appear elsewhere in our columns this week, writes:—

> "Here is a point about the word Atheist that I have never seen dealt with, showing what a grand example of the genuine Christian lie it is. In our language there are many words beginning with the Greek prefix a = without, but not one which denies the existence of the subject-matter of the word. Apathy, Anodyne, Anhydrous, do not deny the existence of Feeling, Pain, or Water."

We have often dealt with this point, though not lately. It is indeed a very important one. It is raised, with other important points, in our pamphlet What is Agnosticism?

Mr. Philip G. Peabody, of Boston—the subscriber who made up the balance of some £20 to complete the full £300 of the President's Honorarium Fund for 1912—has been travelling a great deal since then. In his last letter to us he makes an important statement. "I have been eleven times in Turkey," he says, "and the Turks deserve all the good things you say of them. The whole truth of their treatment by Christians is hopelessly unspeakable and almost unbelievable." Mr. Peabody is quite in love with the Russian people; they are naturally gentle, generous, and kind, and their cruelty to the Jews is "the most marvellous proof of the cruelty-breeding influence of the Christian religion."

We do not regard it exactly as a "Sugar Plum" that Mr. Justice Neville has made an order for the compulsory winding up of the "Daily Herald" Printing and Publishing Society, Ltd. But there is no other part of the Freethinker in which we can very well notice the matter. To tell the truth, we are sorry to see the Daily Herald going under. It seems to have made a bad mistake in supposing that Mr. G. K. Chesterton was going to save it; just as, at the first, it made a bad mistake in supposing that the working-classes cared what the Bishop of This and the Bishop of That thought about social questions. After all, however, there is no use in crying over spilt milk. Our object is rather to draw attention to the way in which the Freethinker has been kept in active existence for thirty-two years, during which time all sorts of advanced papers have come and gone. Our readers in general, and our friends in particular, if they think the subject over, will probably see that ours has been no light achievement. Not that we want to take all the credit to ourselves. We have had the ungrudging and unstinted assistance of a body of contributors, who, while not disdaining wages when obtainable, are (and have been) animated first of all by the soldier spirit in fighting for "the best of causes." (That phrase of Meredith's shall not die.) But that very fact helps to make the maintenance of the Freethinker not only an achievement but a triumph.

A good deal of money appears to have been dropped in the Daily Herald. The Company was incorporated in September, 1912, with a nominal capital of £50,000, of which 19,036 Preference shares and 171,000 Ordinary shares of 1s. each had been subscribed. Judgment creditors for £3,488 petitioned for the compulsory winding-up in the bankruptcy court. We do not know how this will work out, but obviously a lot of money has been lost, which may run to under or over £10,000. That sum spent upon the Freethinker might have made it a good property—or "a paying concern"—for so much depends on the editorship of any journal, the larger part of its value at any moment consisting of "goodwill."

The Gospel History a Fabrication.

A CONSIDERABLE time has now elapsed since I first heard of "the passing of Jesus"; but in looking around for signs of the event, I can see little to indicate that "the passing" has gone beyond the initial stage: and this small result is due mainly to "Biblical criticism" chiefly from the pens of a few scholars amongst the advanced clergy.

There is a falling off, certainly, in the attendance at places of worship; but the causes which operate in this matter are manifold, and do not, I think, often include the belief that the Gospel "history" is untrue. Yet, until the latter fact has become widely known, "the passing of Jesus" will not be realised. At a recent Conference, it is true, the Congregational Union passed a resolution in favor of the "higher criticism"; but I am quite sure that the representatives who so voted had no idea what those critical results are. Neither, again, has the great apostle of the New Theology; for that preacher, in his published sermons, refers again and again to the Gospel narratives as historic events. In the Religious Press the results of Biblical criticism are minimised or misrepresented, and only one, here and there, studies the subject with an eye to truth. To the vast majority of Christians the New Testament is "the word of God" from cover to cover. They have no idea that the Gospels contain within themselves sufficient evidence to prove to any unprejudiced reader that they are merely a collection of fictitious stories written originally by nobody knows whom. In the present series of papers, I propose simply to make a selection from those narratives, and show, as I have just stated, that they are one and all ancient Christian fabrications.

OLD TESTAMENT PROPHECY.

By the above heading is meant the deliberate misrepresentations made by the Gospel writers that Jesus Christ was the subject of Old Testament "prophecy." Over and over again, throughout the four Gospels, the teacher Jesus is represented as doing this, that, or the other, in order that "the scripture might be fulfilled, which saith," etc.; and in every instance, without a single exception, the Old Testament passage which is quoted had no more reference to the Christian Savior than to the man in the moon. The following are a few examples.

1. The Virgin Mary, we are told, "was found with child by the Holy Ghost.....that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophet, saying, Behold a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel" (Matt. i. 18—23).

This quotation is correct so far as it goes, save that the Hebrew word translated "virgin" denotes nothing more than "young woman." Turning now to the Old Testament narrative, we find that when Rezin king of Damascus and Pekah king of Samaria were about to unite their forces against Ahaz king of Judah, Isaiah appeared before the last-named king, and told him to have no fear, for the designs of the two hostile kings would come to naught, after which he gave him a sign. This was: that a "young woman" should conceive, and bear a son, and that before the child should be of an age to discern good from evil, or even to say "my father" and "my mother," the countries ruled over by the allied kings should be over-run by the Assyrians, and the "riches of Damascus and the spoil of Samaria" should be carried away by the king of Assyria. This child, as the context shows, was the prophet's own son, whose name, upon second thoughts, Yahweh decided should be "speed spoil, hasten prey." "Immanuel" was a pet name for the people of Judah (Isaiah vii. 14—16; viii. 3, 4, 8).

2. Jesus was to be born in Bethlehem because "it was written by the prophet" that out of Bethlehem should come a governor who should rule over Israel (Matt. ii. 6). Just so; and it was further predicted that this ruler—like a second David, "from of old, from ancient days"—should deliver the Israelites of that day from the Assyrians, when the latter invaded Judæa (Micah v. 2—7).

3. The child Jesus was taken by his parents to Egypt "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophet, saying, Out of Egypt did I call my son" (Matt. ii. 14—15). The quotation is taken from Hosea xi. 1, and reads:—

> "When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt."

The reference, it is scarcely necessary to say, is to the people of Israel, who, when young as a nation, were called by the god, Yahweh, out of the bondage of Egypt.

4. A massacre of babies, it is stated, took place in Bethlehem in fulfilment of "that which was spoken by Jeremiah the prophet, saying, A voice was heard in Ramah, weeping and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children; and she would not be comforted, because they are not" (Matt. ii. 17—18). The quotation is correct; though how "Ramah" could mean "Bethlehem" it would puzzle anyone save a Christian reconciler to say. Turning now to the passage in the Book of Jeremiah, we see that the reference in that book is not to a massacre of infants, but to sons and daughters who had been carried away into captivity. Of this fact the Gospel writer was perfectly aware; for Jeremiah, to comfort the mothers of Israel, goes on to say:—

> "Thus saith the Lord: Refrain thy voice from weeping, and thine eyes from tears;.....they shall come again from the land of the enemy.....thy children shall come again to their own border" (Jer. xxxi. 15—17).

Further examples of these so-called "prophecies" are unnecessary. Similar misrepresentations, numbering perhaps forty or more, are to be found in the Gospels and the Book of the Acts, though in some three or four cases the same quotations are repeated in a second or third Gospel. In every case these pseudo-prophecies are declared to have received their fulfilment in Jesus Christ, or his apostles, or people in his days; but, needless to say, not one of the whole batch has the smallest reference to Jesus or to his time.

Looking, now, at the examples just cited, there cannot, I think, be the slightest doubt but that the Gospel writers knew perfectly well that they were perpetrating an atrocious fraud, and did so deliberately. This kind of deceit these pious Christian teachers doubtless believed they could practise with impunity, for very few of the common people had any acquaintance with Greek letters, and fewer still had access to MSS. of the Greek Septuagint. Even if the worst happened, the passages quoted in the Gospels could be found in the book named; so the fraudulent writers had no fear as to the result.

Setting aside, however, for the moment this misrepresentation, the question to be considered is: Are the incidents already noticed historical? Is it a fact of history that a virgin "was found with child" by no other agency than that of the Holy Ghost? Were a number of babies massacred at Bethlehem by order of Herod the Great? And did the parents of Jesus go to Egypt to escape this massacre? Now, if the alleged Gospel events are strictly historical, one might easily imagine the writer selecting certain Old Testament passages, and saying that these were fulfilled by Jesus Christ. But, if the Gospel stories are pure fiction (as they can be shown to be), those stories must have been suggested to the writer by something. Now, what could be more likely to do so than the passages which the Gospel writer had noticed in the Old Testament, and copied out as predictions to be fulfilled in the history of the Christian Savior? To further illustrate this point I must take another example from the Gospels.

Psalm xxii. was regarded by all the early Christians as referring to Jesus Christ. Verse 18 reads: "They part my garments among them, and upon my vesture do they cast lots." Now this having been predicted of Jesus (from the evangelistic point of view), it is interesting to note that Matthew, Mark, and Luke, in their accounts of the Crucifixion, say of the Roman soldiers, "they parted his garments among them, casting lots." I have no hesitation in saying that this statement would never have appeared in the Gospels but for its presence in Psalm xxii. I will now go a step farther. The two sentences—"They part my garments among them"—"upon my vesture do they cast lots"—form an example of synonymous parallelism peculiar to Hebrew poetry. This consists of two sentences which express the same ideas in slightly different terms. In the present example, the second sentence—"upon my vesture do they cast lots"—is but a repetition in a varied form of the first—"They part my garments among them"—the "vesture" being but another name for the "garments," and the "parting" or division being made by "casting lots."

Now the writer of the Fourth Gospel took the "vesture" to be distinct from the "garments," and the "parting" and "casting lots" to be separate acts. Hence, in accordance with this erroneous view, he completely alters the narrative. He says (John xix. 23—24):—

> "The soldiers, therefore, when they had crucified Jesus, took his garments, and made four parts, to every soldier a part; and also the coat: now the coat was without seam, woven from the top throughout. They said therefore one to another, Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it, whose it shall be: that the scripture might be fulfilled which saith, They parted my garments among them, and upon my vesture did they cast lots. These things therefore the soldiers did."

Here, I think, we can safely say, "These things therefore the soldiers did not." The other three evangelists took their accounts from an older Gospel, and simply followed their copy, which said nothing of the fulfilment of prophecy in this case. The writer of the Fourth Gospel, however, happened to know the Old Testament source of the "parting of the garments," and he piously fabricated an incident which he considered a better fulfilment of the passage, as he understood it. The giving Jesus a seamless coat that could not be divided was certainly ingenious, as was also the giving his Savior so many garments. A complete suit in that day comprised but two—an outer garment and an under one. Peter, and probably Jesus also, only wore one (Matt. x. 10; John xxi. 7)—and no shoes.

My theory respecting the origin of a large number of the Gospel narratives does not, of course, in any way affect the fraud of the original Gospel writers, in falsely representing alleged events in the life of Jesus Christ as fulfilling Old Testament prophecies. These systematic frauds are incontrovertible, and show, amongst other matters, the immoral and untrustworthy character of those writers, as well as completely disproving, once for all, the claim so often made for them by ignorant Christian advocates—that of writing their narratives under the influence of the "spirit of God."

Herbert Spencer.

> "Who saw life steadily and saw it whole."
> —MATTHEW ARNOLD.
> "This man decided not to live, but know."
> —BROWNING.
> "Without fears, without desires, without ceremonies, he has used sheer reason, and played the philosopher."
> VOLTAIRE on "Confucius."

HERBERT SPENCER was a world-figure. Long before his death men had come to think of him with Plato, with Bacon, with Kant, with Comte, and with Mill, as one of the great men who mark an era. To the great mass of people, it is true, he was only a great name; but to the world of intellect he ranked with the highest minds, with those who open up new vistas to men's eyes and widen the horizon of knowledge.

He was not born, like Darwin, to ease and affluence. He had his own way to make in the world; but for what is commonly meant by success he cared nothing. To spurn delights and live laborious days for the sake of ambition and its rewards is comparatively easy. Spencer belonged to the few great men who have sunk their personality in their cause, and without thinking of fortune or fame. To his system of Synthetic Philosophy, which puts things together and does not pull to pieces, he devoted his genius, his energies, and his patience. Struggling for years against poverty, against obscurity, against the indifference of the general public to philosophy, he persevered to the end. For forty years of his life he was perfecting the details of his philosophical scheme. There has been no grander intellectual achievement since Edward Gibbon took his memorable walk under the acacias at Lausanne. Spencer never startled the world, and his utter want of orthodoxy was not fully realised until his Data of Ethics appeared in 1879. Then Christians were annoyed to find that the man who had quietly taken his place as the leading English philosopher was a thorough Freethinker. Standing outside all Churches and creeds, he built up his own philosophy by science alone.

Herbert Spencer, in his writings, sought to show that all phenomena, physical and psychical, are the natural products of elementary matter and its laws, these being modes of operation of the primal law of what he calls the "persistence of force." His scheme, probably the vastest ever conceived by the human mind, embraced the story of the evolution of the universe from formless stuff into solar systems, the process being advance from the simple to the complex, from the indefinite to the coherent. This same process from the like to the unlike was shown to be in operation in the life history of the earth. No break between things inanimate and animate being assumed, life, mind in the lower animals and man, man's social and intellectual development, are in unbroken sequence shown to be parts of the eternal order. The Synthetic Philosophy, as the author chose to call it, is nothing more or less than the law of evolution, as exemplified in nature and in man, in the animal realm and the vegetable and human, the sphere of sense, and the sphere of conscious and moral aspiration.

Spencer's literary style was austere, and he deliberately stripped his writing of all embellishment. He never chose to ornament the expression of his thought by surface graces. If he did not display the element of fancy, he had the larger gift of imagination, for, in a sense, the Synthetic Philosophy, as a whole, is as truly imaginative as the tragedies of Shakespeare or the pictures of Michael Angelo. To whom, Spencer asks in one of his essays, will a piece of Alpine scenery more powerfully appeal, "to an ignorant mind, or to the mind of a philosopher who knows that over that mountain a glacier slid a million years ago?"

The glory and the triumph of Herbert Spencer is that his philosophy rests on ascertained knowledge. While other philosophers have evoked various extraneous agencies to account for the difference between man and the rest of the world, he preferred to trust to evolution, the law which connects the thoughts of a Shakespeare with the obscure movements of an ascidian on the rocks. Spencer had a harder task than any of his predecessors, because the product of science has become so much more extensive, and because he took all knowledge to be his province.

Living to a patriarchal age, Spencer long outlived his associates in his early days of fame, Mill, "George Eliot," Lewes, Darwin, and Huxley. It is strange to think that Spencer's friends might well have reckoned him the least likely of their circle to survive to an extreme age. For, like Voltaire, he had a frail constitution. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that he never knew what health was, so fragile was his body. For the greater part of his life he was an invalid, a victim of dyspepsia and insomnia. What courage he displayed through it all?

Digitized by Google

The quantity and quality of his work would have put an extremely strong man to shame. As the product of an invalid, it is marvellous. He was a hero as well as a philosopher.

For nearly half a century his authority has been unquestioned, not merely in his own country, but in every part of the civilised world. His works are read not only throughout Europe, but in India, America, and Australasia. In the far East the principles of the philosopher of evolution are better known than those of any other English thinker. He belongs to that rare company to whom may be applied the supreme tribute, "Others abide our question; thou art free." Spencer was not merely an academic philosopher. His love for liberty was as worthy a feature of his life as his enthusiasm for knowledge. He was not loved by priests, ever the hindmost of the thinkers, and he suffered many of the whips and scorns of clerical animosity. But Freethinkers have to endure that sort of thing. Few men, indeed, were more sober or temperate in their expressions, or more just to opponents, than Herbert Spencer.

His was a life of sacrifice. The tremendous intellectual labors which Spencer carried on brought him neither wealth nor comfort. He was unable to find a publisher for his Social Statics in 1850, and he had to print and sell it on commission. A small edition took over fourteen years to sell, and the Principles of Psychology sold almost as slowly. Again and again he found he was losing money by his writings. Once he would have had to stop his great work but for a timely legacy. After a quarter of a century's work, the sales of his works just paid the publishing expenses. All his labor had gone for nothing, and his health had broken down from the constant strain of his studies. We can but admire the singular devotion, completeness, and dignity of the philosopher's life. Seeking no honor nor applause, he made an imperishable name. No philosopher, ancient or modern, held up a higher standard of conduct, none illustrated it by a purer or more unselfish life. At a time when commercialism was rampant, the pursuit of study for its own sake, and not for any base or ulterior object, was an exception so rare as to be scarcely credible. In an age of compromise Herbert Spencer remained ever faithful to first principles; in an age of ostentation he cared only for truth.

Tales of Our Times.

BY A CYNIC.

THE manager of a large metal manufactory in a Midland city was talking to his assistant.

"Our managing director, Sir Brummagem Brass, has just telephoned to me that the Right Reverend Dr. Pontifex, Bishop of Dulchester, wishes to go over the works this afternoon."

"Funny taste for a Bishop," said the assistant manager. "I should have thought that some of the articles we turn out would scarcely have interested a man of his profession."

"Well, I believe he is one of our largest shareholders," said the manager, with a smile.

"Oh, that would fully account for it," observed the other, drily.

"Sir Brummagem says he hopes we will give the Bishop every facility for seeing the works; indeed, he asked me to take him round them myself, but unfortunately I have a most important engagement this afternoon, so I must ask you to do the honors of our little shop. Hope you don't mind?"

"Not at all. Shall be delighted," replied the assistant manager.

So when the Bishop's magnificent motor-car drew up at the entrance of the great metal works, the assistant manager was there to give him a polite but far from obsequious reception. In fact, the assistant manager was blessed with a fairly keen sense of humor, and promised himself quite a pleasant half hour.

The prelate was conducted through a number of busy workshops, full of the unceasing hum of rushing machinery operating under the unceasing care and vigilance of human beings scarcely less mechanical in their movements. And all the while the assistant manager was giving the visitor rapid explanations of all salient features.

Presently, as they were entering yet another workshop, the assistant manager said:

"This is the small arms factory, your lordship. The machine you see here is turning the grooves of rifle barrels. As I daresay you are aware, we hold all patent rights in the well-known Swift-Dedley magazine rifle—which you now see in process of manufacture. It is sighted to three thousand seven hundred and fifty yards, has a muzzle velocity (with cordite charge) of two thousand five hundred foot-seconds, and a remarkably flat trajectory, thus ensuring wonderful precision at long ranges; indeed, we claim that it is the most perfect military rifle yet produced in England, and the War Office is now considering the question of adopting it for the British Army. We executed large orders for this rifle from the Argentine Republic just before the commencement of their present war with Bolivia and Paraguay, and the military authorities of the Argentine attribute their remarkable successes in the field entirely to its use—the percentage of killed among the Bolivian and Paraguayan troops being greater than that of any war of modern times.

"Here," continued the assistant manager, when they reached another part of the workshop, "we turn out the new infantry machine guns which did such useful work during the recent British expedition to the Hullabaloo Hills on the Indian frontier. These little machines are so light that they can be hauled by a couple of soldiers up the steepest hillsides; and as they fire from six to seven hundred shots per minute, they are most effective against the wild rushes of fanatical tribesmen. The half-naked Hullabaloochis, with all their magnificent bravery, could do nothing against these guns, and were mown down in thousands. In fact, as your lordship is aware, the expedition proved eminently successful from a military point of view, and settled the Hullabaloo business in a few weeks."

"Ah," observed the Bishop solemnly, "it is sad, indeed, that such things should be, even though they form part of the unavoidable duties of imperial dominion. We can only hope that the ultimate advantage may outweigh the temporary evil by conferring on these poor people the great moral benefits of British rule."

"And that, I am sure, we can safely leave in the hands of your lordship's department," replied the assistant manager with a curious smile. "For us, of course, it wouldn't do to lay much stress on the moral aspect of the question. All we are concerned with is to make our business pay the largest possible dividends."

They moved on to another great workshop, and the assistant manager's face again wore the curious smile, and there was almost a twinkle in his eye as he said:—

"This is what we familiarly call our toy department, your lordship. Here we turn out enormous quantities of religious accessories—ornaments, charms, idols, and so on, for the East Indian and African trade."

"Dear me," observed the Bishop in a dubious tone.

"Yes. And it is gratifying to feel that here at least there can be no moral scruples in our business, for it must surely be one of the duties of imperial dominion to satisfy the religious requirements of subject races. This great gold-plated pinnacle is intended to surmount a Burmese pagoda, and these brass Buddhas mostly go to Burma, too, though a fairly good trade is also done with Ceylon and Siam. There is also a large business done in West Africa with these idols in britannia metal and bronze, and since the opening up of Northern Nigeria a large exporting firm has found it worth while to establish a business at Bonny, on the Calabar coast, mainly for the trade in idols. Hundreds are sent into the interior every month, and we have been assured on good authority that deities manufactured by us are being regularly worshiped from the Kameruns to Dahomey and from Sokoto to Lake Chad. Your lordship will observe that the idols we turn out, though far from beautiful according to our artistic standards, wear a more benevolent expression than one is accustomed to find on the countenance of an African god, and this cannot fail to have an elevating and refining influence on their worshipers. We can congratulate ourselves, therefore, that while still in pursuit of dividends as our main object, we are at the same time doing our humble share in conferring those moral benefits which your lordship has just referred to."

The right reverend gentleman, who was by this time openly frowning, looked hurriedly at his watch. "Dear me," he said, "I was not aware it was so late. I am afraid I must be getting away. Much obliged to you for a very interesting visit."

But as he drove away in his motor-car he said to himself, "Rather disagreeable young man that. I believe he was laughing at me all the time."

When the manager inquired about the Bishop's visit, the assistant manager said, "Oh, yes, quite a success. His lordship seemed deeply interested in the military small arms factory, and even more so in the toy department."

"What! Did you actually show him all those African idols and things?" asked the manager, laughing. "That should be almost enough to make him sell out of the company."

But the Bishop didn't sell a single share. On the contrary, he bought some more at the first opportunity.

THE MONTREAL RELIGIOUS CENSUS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—As you will gather, the enclosed item, clipped from the Gazette (Friday, May 30), the various Protestant and the Jewish sects have united their forces to obtain a religious census of the City of Montreal:—

> "Nearly eighty per cent. [I quote from the item enclosed] of the city, it is said, was visited yesterday, and on the basis of the results obtained, it is calculated that roughly ninety-five per cent. of the population will be found to lay claim to some church affiliation or connection."

We may safely conjecture from the above that within a short while the daily papers will be bristling with unctuous headlines to the effect that "The blood of Christ has washed us clean," or "Christianity dead," etc. Foreseeing this, I hasten to acquaint you with the true state of affairs.

The census, so far, has been undertaken exclusively by members of some Christian or Jewish organisation, by aid of a door-to-door canvass. The whole scheme, of course, is utterly silly; but, as the thing was to be done, it should have been done fairly. It was not.

We are five in our family—my mother, two sisters, my brother, and myself. My mother does not attend any church; my elder sister is an orthodox Roman Catholic; the younger (twenty), Agnostic; and my brother and myself, both over twenty, are Atheists (and readers of the Freethinker). Thus we have one Christian out of a family of five, yet we have been booked in the census lists as a Roman Catholic family!

I have not spoken to my friends who are freethinking, but I have no doubt that the same system has prevailed throughout the city. And, as many boarding-house ladies are Christian, a house will be dubbed Catholic or Protestant, though half the inmates may be Rational.

I hope you will give this letter prominence in your columns, as there are a number of your Montreal readers who will have some interesting information to offer.

PORTUGUESE POLITICAL PRISONERS: A FREETHINKER'S PROTEST.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In your paper of June 8 a correspondent, Mr. William Heaford, states that the pamphlet, Portuguese Political Prisoners: a British National Protest (L. Upcott Gill, Bazaar-buildings, Drury-lane), was written by a Portuguese Royalist. Mr. Heaford has been misled by an assertion to this effect in the Mundo. As honorary secretary to the Committee of the British Protest I am able to inform him that an English author is responsible for the pamphlet, which was submitted to the Committee before being offered for sale at the Æolian Hall meeting on April 22. Mr. Heaford was evidently not present at this meeting, or he would not be sceptical as to the keen and strenuous interest which is taken by the British public on the subject of the Portuguese political prisoners. The speakers were representative of all shades of opinion, and amongst them was Mr. George Macaulay Trevelyan, who spoke as a Liberal and a Freethinker. I quote Mr. Trevelyan's words, as they afford the clearest estimate of the motives and ideas which inspired the British Protest:—

> "We have not assembled here to indulge in hysteria over doubtful and exaggerated reports. We have come still less to grind the axe of any party or any person, or any group of persons, or of any Church in Portugal or in England. This meeting over which Lord Lytton has so ably presided represents a union for one purpose of persons of very different political and very different religious opinions, which taken together go a long way to make England. The Conservative and Progressive tendencies in politics have been represented in this movement, on the platform; the Protestant, Catholic, and the Freethinking tendencies in religion have all been represented this afternoon. For my part I stand here as a Liberal who is also a Freethinker,.....and I would especially appeal to Liberals, and especially appeal to Freethinkers, not to wink the eye at crime and injustice because it happens to be committed in the name of an anti-clerical Republic......It is not merely a question of the state of the prisons and the treatment of the prisoners; there is the question of why they got there. Many of them have not been tried, and those who have been tried have in many cases been tried with grave injustice. They are put there because of their opinions, not because of their acts. That is not Liberalism or Socialism, but Jacobinism, and that is as much opposed to Liberal principles as despotism. These men are not Freethinkers. They indulge in the persecution of opinion, and that is the opposite of free thought."

Mr. Trevelyan went on to say that he was one of those who had protested against the execution of Ferrer, and had protested against the state of the prisons in Russia, but that this was not the time or place to discuss either. The question at the moment was to see what would be the effect upon "our ancient ally," Portugal, of the expression of British public opinion in favor of "justice, humanity, and law." The concluding phrases of Mr. Trevelyan's speech sum up the convictions of which the meeting was the outward sign:—

> "Those who know Portugal best believe that there are innumerable breasts in Portugal that beat to this same sentiment, not only Royalists but Republicans also. If it be thought we are asking for something which Portugal cannot grant, when we ask for an amnesty, there is the fact that an Amnesty Bill has actually been presented to Parliament in Portugal, and it is the opinion of many experienced persons that the great majority of the nation is in favor of it."

I may add that one of those most strongly in favor of it is the President of the Republic.

Since the Æolian Hall meeting, over 200 Republicans and Socialists have joined their Royalist compatriots in prison, and there can be little doubt in the minds of dispassionate observers that the granting of a general amnesty would allay the discontent and widespread resentment which has been aroused by the despotism of Affonsa Costa.

Self-Mutilation.

> "And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell" (Matthew v. 30).

A RECENT occurrence in India shows that the sources from which the above teaching of Jesus were derived still survive in the East. The following is a summary of the account, given in the Pioneer (India) of May 11, of the incident:—

Three years ago an illiterate peasant named Lachman settled down as a sadhu in a temple in Mortakka in the Central Provinces. He was full of religious fervor, had done the Parkrama of the Nerbudda, and listened attentively to readings from the Ramayana and the Mahabharata. These referred mostly to the offerings of different parts of the body as sacrifices to Shiva, and Lachman was so impressed by them that he resolved to experiment on himself. So, on March 20, he cut off his hand with a hatchet, put it in front of the image of Rama, and then went to Appaji, the pujari of the temple, and showed him his bleeding stump, which he declared gave him no pain. Appaji called up some other priests, and they applied ligatures, and also informed the village police.

Fortunately, that same evening, Captain Tarr, civil surgeon, arrived at the village, and, finding that the arm had been very roughly hacked, decided on operating. Lachman refused to take chloroform, and watched quite calmly the surgeon's work. A second operation was necessary before the hæmorrhage could be stopped.

Next morning the patient expressed no surprise that the hand had not rejoined the wrist, but he declined to remain in the village to have his wound dressed daily, so he departed on his way fully confident that no harm would befall him, as he was under the protection of Rama. Nothing has been heard of Lachman since, so probably the wound may have healed. If he is alive, he will assuredly acquire supreme merit among other sadhus. He is about forty years of age, and, though unable to read or write, yet has been, since boyhood, deeply religious.

E. B.

He was a curate and he came up from the country to try his luck at the Adelphi Theatre voice trials recently. He explained that things were very quiet in the country, and now that the theatre had improved so much he felt that he could adopt the career without loss of dignity. Then he sang "There is a green hill far away." And the audience wished him there. One verse was enough. He tried another, but was conducted out into the daylight. No doubt his next song was "Home, sweet home."

Dr. Foote's books have been the popular instructors of the masses in America for fifty years (often re-written, enlarged) and always kept up-to-date). For twenty years they have sold largely (from London) to all countries where English is spoken, and everywhere highly praised. Last editions are best, largest, and most for the price. You may save the price by not buying, and you may lose your life (or your wife or child) by not knowing some of the vitally important truths it tells.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st., London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Brockwell Park Theology.

UNDER the heading of "Park Theology," a Brixton paper devotes a column to the report of a lecture in Brockwell Park by the Rev. A. J. Waldron. The ostensible subject was the Resurrection, but Mr. Waldron is not a logical speaker, and he appears to have talked a great deal at random. He seems to have made a number of old-fashioned statements, which show that he has not got beyond the Paleyan criticism of the New Testament, and a number of foolish observations which show that nature has fairly well fitted him for his present occupation. We say this quite advisedly,—for it has been held that to call a parson a fool is not libellous as it is no detriment to him in his profession. It would be impossible, we imagine, to improve Mr. Waldron's brains at his time of life, but it should still be possible to improve his knowledge; and we suggest that his friends—or perhaps his congregation—should buy him a few pounds' worth of up-to-date Biblical literature, beginning with (say) the Encyclopædia Biblica,—if that is not too dry and wearisome for Mr. Waldron's intellectuals; which is a point on which, perhaps, the donors might consult him beforehand.

Mr. Waldron has just been reading Quo Vadis? He appears to have got to know of it through a picture show advertisement. He speaks of it as though it were not a novel but a work of great historical importance. There was a passage in it which hit what passes as Mr. Waldron's mind right in the bull's-eye. A converted Roman said he believed that Christ rose from the dead because people who knew him said so, and these people spoke the truth, and he must believe them. Mr. Waldron does not see any logical hiatus between "they said so" and "they speak the truth," whereas the two propositions may be as far asunder as the poles. Nor does Mr. Waldron see that Quo Vadis? is founded on the New Testament, and that the New Testament cannot be quoted in support of itself. But even if we waived that canon of criticism, what would become of the argument in question? People who knew Jesus believed that he rose from the dead; yes, and more people who knew him disbelieved that he rose from the dead. It is a curious thing that all the early Christian documents, including the Gospels, were written in Greek, and none of them belong to the first century. They were written, also, in all parts of the eastern Roman Empire. It was not at Jerusalem, where it was said to have happened, that the resurrection of Jesus found any great number of believers. The descendants of the Jews of that day deny the Resurrection still; it is affirmed by the descendants of people who lived hundreds and thousands of miles from the spot. Which, by the way, is the common law of supernatural stories. Inquire about a ghost at the house which it is said to haunt, and the people turn up their noses at you; inquire in the next street, and people shake their heads,—with all that is in them; inquire a mile off, and people know all about old Jack-in-the-Box, and are nearly ready to secure you an appointment with him. We may, indeed, end this paragraph by reminding Mr. Waldron—though it is probably not reminding but informing him—that much greater Christian apologists than he is, both by nature and attainments, have remarked on the curious dispensation of providence that Christianity was rejected in the land of its birth, and was only embraced in distant countries. We refer, in particular, to Cardinal Newman and Mr. W. E. Gladstone.

"The Jews," Mr. Waldron says, "are the cleverest people in the world." But it does not follow that they were so in the time of Jesus. Their financial aptitude in our age is largely the result of centuries of Christian persecution. The Jews used to be confined to their own districts in Christian cities, they were compelled to wear a special garb, they were prohibited from engaging in "lawful" occupations,—but, as being damned already, and incapable of further damnation, they were allowed to lend money on interest, which the Catholic Church regarded as a deadly sin,—as indeed it is, according to the Bible. Natural selection, therefore, under the animus of Christian persecution, bred a race of "business" men. The result is that in "business" countries you find no Jew farmers but plenty of Jew financiers. In any case, it would not follow that even if the Jew were the cleverest man on earth in money matters he would be the cleverest man on earth at everything or anything else. He might be a poor historian and a bad judge of evidence. But suppose we unreservedly grant that the Jews are the cleverest people in the world. What then? Mr. Waldron doesn't see that he has digged a pit for himself. We have simply to pitch him into it. The cleverest people in the world have, for eighteen hundred years, rejected Christianity. They reject it still. They show not the slightest inclination to accept it. It costs about seven thousand pounds to convert one of them, and the character of the convert nearly always justifies the taunt that a bad Jew is turned into a worse Christian.

Turning from Mr. Waldron's silliest of silly arguments relating to the Jews, we note his statement that "the greatest of German historians said a man who had any reputation to lose could not doubt the history of the New Testament." What is the name of this greatest of German historians? And while Mr. Waldron is getting it ready we leave him to settle the rest of the sentence with (say) the Rev. R. J. Campbell.

"Let us," Mr. Waldron said, "take the four books of St. Paul. No one challenged that Paul lived, and they all admitted that these books were written within twenty-eight years of the death of Christ." Now if this were true it would not prove the Resurrection. Paul did not witness it himself. All that he wrote was hearsay. He says that he saw Jesus, but it was in a vision, several years afterwards. He expressly says that the vision was quite enough for him—as it ought to have been for everybody else. He did not commune with flesh and blood about the matter; that is, he attached more importance to his own subjective experience than to the objective testimony of actual witnesses; which shows an utterly hopeless state of mind as to the nature and value of evidence. But let all that pass for the sake of argument, what of the rest of Mr. Waldron's statement? He speaks of four epistles of Paul. There were fourteen when Paley wrote. What has become of the other ten? They have been rejected: ten out of fourteen in a hundred years! And it is not true that the four are not challenged. There is a large literature on the subject. Neither is Paul himself unchallenged. His very existence is called in question. The Acts of the Apostles is widely considered as an early Christian romance, and may be called the Pauliad. But we have neither time nor space to attend any further to Mr. Waldron's neglected education. We refer him to an accessible book already mentioned, the Encyclopædia Biblica. We dare say he will find it in some local Free Library; if not, there is the British Museum, or even that friendly presentation we have already suggested.

Mr. Waldron has not the remotest idea of the sceptics' real position. "The Secularists," he says, "ask you to believe that the first Christians preached the biggest lie in the world. They say Christ lent himself to the biggest fraud on the human race." They ask, and they say, nothing of the kind. Their position is that the Christ story is a product of the early Christian mind through several generations. It is a work of imagination; it is not history, but romance; it is not true, yet it is not a lie, any more than the Morte Darthur or Don Quixote, or Hamlet, or Robinson Crusoe is a lie. Whatever lying—that is, conscious falsehood—there was in the matter, was about Christ and not by him,—by his followers (if he ever lived at all) and not by himself.

We will not waste space, at this time of day, in dealing with Mr. Waldron's pitiful nonsense about the "Romans" not producing the corpse of Jesus, when, according even to the story, it was handed over to one of his disciples. The Romans never saw it afterwards, and were naturally as indifferent to its fate as to that of any other executed malefactor. Mr. Waldron's final argument for the historicity of the Resurrection is that he communes with Christ, like all "the best people in London." That modest argument is powerful enough to dispose of every sceptical objection to the story of the risen Christ. A man so great and so good as Mr. Waldron could hardly exist if the Resurrection were not a fact. He is really inexplicable without it. And it is out of such rich hearts and brilliant brains that music comes. There is no poetry and no music, Mr. Waldron says, in scepticism. We don't quite see what this has to do with the Resurrection. But we do see that Mr. Waldron's impudence is a good match for his ignorance. He overlooks Shelley and Swinburne, and Beethoven and Wagner, to begin with—and a further list is unnecessary.

G. W. FOOTE.

Dr. Hollander on Atheism.

IT is a safe game to misrepresent Atheism. Comparatively speaking, it has few friends, and it is blessed with a large number of active enemies. Hardly one in a hundred of its enemies are scrupulous in finding out what Atheism really is, and the remaining ninety-nine are only too anxious to discover occasions for misrepresentations. And these misrepresentations are not easy to correct. There is seldom opportunity given to correct them in the places where they occur; a paper such as the Freethinker is the only channel of correction open, and this reaches but few of those who read the original misrepresentation. It is, thus, a safe game. It is also a cowardly game. To misstate an opinion that enjoys popular favor is wrong; but the wrong is soon righted, and one runs the risk of exposure. But there is no risk in misstating Atheism. You may deny it every decent quality, endow it with the capacity for producing every conceivable vice, and make it as mentally stupid as it is made morally obnoxious. The overwhelming majority of those who read will either agree with it as a statement of fact, or feel that Atheism deserves all that has been said. That is why it is a cowardly game. A sense of chivalry might lead one to refrain from throwing a brick at an unpopular opinion. A nice sense of honor would insist upon careful examination before attack.

This is not an appeal ad misericordiam. I am not asking that people should not attack Atheism, or suggesting that it cannot survive misrepresentation. Atheism has always been subject to both, and has survived. It has more than survived; it has grown. Its position to-day is not reminiscent of past greatness; it is pregnant with the possibilities of assured growth. I have written the above in consequence of a passage in Dr. Hollander's recently issued work on The First Signs of Insanity. To the higher sentiments belong, says Dr. Hollander—

> "The feelings of wonder and awe aroused by the sublime and vast in nature, the feeling of veneration and reverence awakened by the recognition of the exalted influence of authority, faith and belief aroused by appearances for which the intellect can find no natural causes, and the spiritual feeling arising from appearances which suggest another life existing besides that known to us.....In some men these, which may be termed religious feelings, are all-powerful. Such are given to contemplating the spiritual state, and seldom turn their attention to gross matters and mere animal pleasures. Men in whom these feelings are lacking tend to be sceptical. They have faith only in their own experience, and think more of an animal existence than of spiritual life. However much the modern intellect trained in strictly scientific pursuits may try to curb the spiritual inclinations, there can be no doubt that the religious sentiment through long generations has become an element of our nature. Even the Atheist, as a rule, experiences its emotions when circumstances arise which appeal to his feelings rather than to his intellect—that is, when he allows his nature free play."

Here in a few sentences are all the time-honored, vulgar misconceptions, or misstatements, connected with Atheism. We have the religious man endowed with qualities of mind or nature that is denied the Atheist. The former seldom bothers with "gross matters and mere animal pleasures"; the latter, because of the assumed deficiency of nature, "tends to be sceptical." "The religious sentiment" has become an "element" of our nature; and finally the unhappy Atheist, when he is off his guard and gives vent to his nature, experiences religious feelings "allee samee Clistian." A larger number of demonstrable fallacies has never been crammed into a smaller compass in a presumably scientific work. The religious professor who could discern "on the untrodden paths of the past the footprints of an unseen hand" was an amateur at the side of Dr. Hollander.

Let us examine them very briefly. First, "There can be no doubt that the religious sentiment.....has become an element of our nature." I deny it absolutely. I deny it, for the simple and sufficient reason that there is no such element in our nature. Wonder and awe and veneration and faith and belief are not religious qualities, they never were religious qualities, and they can never become so. They may be exercised in connection with religion, but so may love and hatred and cruelty and kindness and cleverness and stupidity. Human qualities are human qualities, and their nature is quite unaffected by the object in connection with which they find expression. A sunrise on the Alps, or a storm at sea, may awaken all the veneration and awe that a mystically drunken godite feels at the contemplation of the character of his incomprehensible deity. Religion does not initiate a single feeling, it does not absolutely control a single feeling. It only utilises feelings developed apart altogether from religion.

There is no religious sentiment, there is only a religious idea. And even that has not become an "element of our nature." Dr. Hollander ought really to know better than talk in this loose, unscientific manner. There is a religious idea because, as he says, "Surrounded by the forces of nature which he could neither comprehend nor control," natural forces "became for uncritical man superior animate beings whom he endowed with qualities like his own, whose favor was to be courted and whose wrath appeased." It is this idea, born of primitive ignorance, that is perpetuated by primitive fear and subsequent cunning. It has persisted through the ages, but even as an idea it has not become an element of our nature—ideas never do become that. What has happened is that it has become a permanent factor—up to the present—in the social environment. It is there when each newcomer arrives, and each newcomer is taught to express his feelings in a form consonant with the religious idea. The perpetuation of religion is a phenomenon of social heredity. So is the phenomenon of loyalty to a king. And Dr. Hollander might, with just as much scientific warranty, when he sees a crowd cheering the passage of the king, say that loyalty to the king has become an element of nature, and that cosmic evolution had as one of its supreme objects the creation of a feeling of devotion to George the Fifth. It is the social environment that perpetuates the religious idea, and it is the gradual weakening of the religious idea that is steadily bringing about such a modification of the environment as makes Atheism practically inevitable.

Dr. Hollander's remark that the Atheist experiences emotions usually characterised as religious, when he lets himself go, is very ingenuous. It reminds one of Artemus Ward's description of the English innkeeper's surprise on finding than an American could be trusted with a knife and fork. If my assurance is worth anything to Dr. Hollander, I may comfort him by saying that all the Atheists of my acquaintance are quite normal. They get pleased or angry, they laugh or cry, they have faith—of a sensible kind — belief, reverence for greatness in human nature, and a feeling of awe in face of natural phenomena. The Atheist differs from the Theist in no quality of mind or body; the difference lies in the way in which the nature of each is expressed. Belief is not a consequence of inability of the intellect to find natural causes, it is rather a degree of knowledge that falls short of absolute certitude. And it is common to both Theist and Atheist. The difference, again, lies in the object of belief. The Theist posits a God as the cause of natural happenings. The Atheist declines to use such a synonym for ignorance, and prefers to believe that, as natural causes have explained all the phenomena, the conditions of which we know, the same will be found true of phenomena whose conditions are unknown.

Of course, it is flattering to the vanity of the believer in God to assume that the Atheist is one whose finer qualities and perceptions are either undeveloped or atrophied. It enables any Bible-banging, microcephalous local preacher to feel exalted without undergoing the toil and discipline to become genuinely so. In moments of compassion they will pity the poor Atheist, and, when specially sympathetic, will condole with him on his spiritual blindness. But there is really nothing in it. The Atheist laughs at both the pity and the condolence. It is not worth while being angry. He knows that the belief in God is not a frame of mind that people grow toward, it is a frame of mind they outgrow. The Atheist knows this, because he has been there. He sees in every believer a picture of himself in an earlier and less complete state of development. The sympathy of the believer with the Atheist is that of the blind man for the one who is put to the trouble of wearing spectacles. The Atheist has lost nothing of his human qualities in growing out of them. He has merely learned to look at things with a clearer and truer gaze, and face facts with a courage born of undimmed vision.

Lastly, there is Dr. Hollander's antithesis of the sceptical character which is concerned with "gross matters and mere animal pleasures." If Dr. Hollander meant here by "spiritual" supernatural, and by animal existence, natural existence, the statement might pass. But he clearly does not mean this. The words carry, and I fancy are intended to carry, an ethical implication. And this implication is altogether false. If I may use the word without being misunderstood, the Atheist is more concerned with spiritual matters than the Theist. To begin with, his whole life is devoted to an idea. He cannot hope to gain the material for "animal pleasures" by professing Atheism. If he thought that, he would be too stupid to ever leave church or chapel. He is daily made aware of paying some price for the rejection of religion, and his only consolation is found in the enjoyment of a feeling of mental integrity that is as far as possible removed from close attention to "gross matters." If Atheism were of no other value to the world than this, the possession of a body of men who yield devotion to an idea, without any possibility of material gain, is a social asset of the greatest possible value. And what Dr. Hollander means by "spiritual" matters—that is, supernatural matters—has always tended to the encouragement of a decided, ethical Materialism. It has taught men to estimate the value of truth in terms of material loss and gain. If the personal gain was not here, it was hereafter. And when, as was inevitable, faith in the hereafter began to waver, the same standard was applied to the life here. This is one reason why the most "materialistic" people in the civilised world are Christian. That is one reason why we in this country are so given to measure our greatness in terms of fighting strength or trading aptitude. A nation is great because it sells or slaughters, or sells and slaughters, not because it thinks and lives. That is why the millionaire is idealised and the thinker ignored; the dead plutocrat loaded with columns of an admiring obituary, and the dead philosopher dismissed with a contemptuous sneer. It is also why Dr. Hollander, a man with no very definite or strong religious beliefs himself, is so affected by the prevailing religious cant as to write disparagingly of a frame of mind that Samuel Taylor Coleridge said not one man in ten thousand had either the strength of mind or goodness of heart to possess.

C. COHEN.

The Morality of Jesus.

ONE is astounded beyond measure to find it deliberately stated in cold print, at this time of day, that "the ascendant morality in our land has been the morality of Jesus," and that "indeed, it has been regarded as the only morality." No one can make such a statement unless he is the victim of "a kind of ethical lunacy," which, of course, disqualifies him both intellectually and morally from setting himself up as a teacher of morals. The guilty party, on the present occasion, is the Rev. Dr. Newton Marshall, a Baptist minister, who is just now publishing a series of sermons on "Christ in the New Times" in the Christian World Pulpit. This reverend gentleman quotes from a certain magistrate to the effect that "the law of England bases itself upon the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ." Whether made by a magistrate or by a clergyman, the statement is totally erroneous. The morality of Jesus is a figment of the Christian imagination, and what is popularly known as Christian morality, or the morality which is supposed to be binding upon Christians, does by no means emanate from the Gospel Jesus. Dr. Marshall contends that much of our law "has been built up in the conscious effort to embody the will of Christ in legal enactments." It is reasonable to assume that the will of Christ is expressed in the alleged words of Jesus. Well, Jesus pronounced a beatitude upon the meek, promising them the inheritance of the earth. Will anybody aver that our law "has been built up in the conscious effort to embody" that beatitude in a legal enactment? Jesus prohibits the laying up of treasures upon the earth—is this prohibition embodied in any legal enactment of Great Britain? Jesus enjoins non-resistance to evil or the evil one—does the law of England endorse that commandment in a single legal enactment? Jesus forbids his disciples to go to law, to swear by anything whatsoever, to bear the sword, to kill or even get angry with one another, and recommends indiscriminate giving and lending to all that ask—has British "law been built up in the conscious effort to embody" his will in regard to all such things "in legal enactments"?

Dr. Marshall is extremely irrelevant in his examples, which number only two, the one being Sunday observance and the other marriage. We have never come across anything more inept than the following extract from his discourse reported in the Christian World Pulpit for June 25:—

> "Sunday is an institution which we owe wholly to Christ; not that he actually imposed it. He himself accepted the Jewish Sabbath, but he changed the Jewish Sabbath by his teaching and conduct. But the Spirit of Christ led his followers to adopt the first day of the week, the day of our Lord's resurrection, as the Christian Sabbath. The result was that in due course Sunday became, as the Lord's day, a legal holiday in England."

As a matter of fact we owe Sunday, neither wholly nor yet in part, to Jesus of Nazareth. He did not accept the Jewish Sabbath, but publicly broke it. There is nothing in the Four Gospels to indicate that Jesus contemplated, however remotely, the setting apart of a day to commemorate his own resurrection, and that this day should be adopted as a substitute for the Jewish Sabbath. It is a remarkable fact, which Dr. Marshall discreetly ignores, that Paul, who made so much of Christ's resurrection and claimed to be in possession of his mind, was on principle a vigorous opponent of Sabbath and Sunday observance. To him all days were alike. Equally irrelevant is the reverend gentleman's allusion to marriage. We know that under Jewish law the wife was owned by her husband, who enjoyed certain cruel rights over her person and property. The ancient Roman law was similar, the main difference being that under this the husband's rights over his wife were conferred on him, not as husband, but as father. She was his daughter, and all her property became absolutely his. But during Rome's period of greatest splendor the position of woman vastly improved. Whether married or single, her state was one of great personal and proprietary independence. But, as Sir Henry Maine points out (Ancient Law, p. 129), "Christianity tended somewhat from the very first to narrow this remarkable liberty"; and we know that under Christian rule the condition of woman, whether as wife or spinster, worsened rather than improved, and was superior in Egypt, Greece, and Rome, in pre-Christian times, to what it is under Christianity even to-day. Touching marriage, Dr. Marshall takes sides with those who signed the Minority Report of the Royal Commission on Divorce, forgetting that such a view on the marital tie is directly responsible for an infinite amount of unnecessary suffering in Christendom.

Now, on the assumption that Jesus did institute the puritanical Sunday, and utter the words attributed to him about divorce, we maintain that the attack now being made upon both is justifiable on the highest moral grounds, and that, if successful, as it is bound to be, it will inevitably result in a decided betterment of social conditions. If these were fair samples of the morality of Jesus we would have no hesitation in declaring that such a morality, so far from being the way of life, is "inevitably the way of loss and death." The Bishop of Oxford admits that the indissolubility of marriage, as he believes it to have been taught by Christ, "may press hard on individuals in exceptional cases"; but, he adds, "press it hard or softly, the words of our Lord are quite unmistakable." But these two unfortunate samples apart, we assert that the so-called morality of Jesus does not exist. The Sermon on the Mount might as well have never been delivered so far as its effect on Christendom is concerned. It is a back number, and as dead as Queen Anne. Its commandments are embodied neither in the law of the land nor in the life and character of the people. It is highly amusing, however, to note how Dr. Marshall takes war as "one instance in which Christ is habitually and arrogantly disobeyed." He says that "no one will deny," while we do positively deny, "that the rule of Christ would mean the adoption of a policy of international peace." Look at the past, we reply, and see what the rule of Christ has ever meant. The Gospel Jesus is many-sided, and so we are not surprised to see the following barbarous utterances ascribed to him:—

> "I came to cast fire upon the earth, and what will I if it is already kindled?.....Think ye that I come to give peace in the earth? I tell you, Nay; but rather division; for there shall be from henceforth five in one house divided, three against two and two against three. They shall be divided, father against son, and son against father; mother against daughter, and daughter against mother; mother-in-law against daughter-in-law, and daughter-in-law against mother-in-law" (Luke xii. 49-53).

From such a passage, and there are others like it, the sentiment of the popular hymn is a natural deduction:—

> "The Son of God goes forth to war,
> A kingly crown to gain;
> His blood-red banner streams afar!
> Who follows in his train?"

Surely, then, there was nothing unchristian about the Balkan war. So far were the Christian allies from wantonly disobeying Christ that they were literally fulfilling his own prophecy. It was the Cross against the Crescent, and the Cross has won because it was more efficiently equipped. You remember the story of Constantine's conversion? He was on the march, approaching Rome for the first time. Being a devout Pagan, he was in prayer, when, "about noon, as the day was declining," a fiery cross appeared in the sky with the words, "In this Conquer," and the following night the figure of Christ appeared to him in a dream bearing a standard. No wonder, then, that he and his successors were such fierce fighters, and won such countless recruits to the army of the Cross at the edge of the sword. Such has been the so-called morality of Jesus in active operation in the history of the West.

What is the ideal of Christian morality? Saintliness; and of saintliness the world has had enough and to spare. The saintliest century was the wickedest. Saintliness has often developed into a dangerous form of insanity, especially in women like Madame de Guyon. The tenderness of it is beautiful, but through the tenderness there usually runs a strong vein of sensuality, a half modest and half unconscious longing for a unio mystica et physica.

> "In many cases it appears, curiously enough, as the the disguise of a girl's or youth's puberty, here and there even as the hysteria of an old maid, also, as her last ambition. The Church has frequently canonised the woman in such a case" (Nietzsche, Beyond Good and Evil, p. 70).

Over against this pretty sentiment and useless ideal of the Church, and in vigorous opposition thereto, is set the modern, scientific, or as some prefer to call it, Hellenistic ideal, intelligence, prudence, sagacity, or wisdom, the well-known Greek for which is phronima. In the Dark Ages you had saintliness in great profusion, but the Hellenistic phronima was conspicuous by its absence. You had faith luxuriating like a green baytree under summer sun and rain, but the sane and cheerful outlook on life of "fugitive and exiled Greece" was lacking. "Fugitive and exiled Greece" had not where to lay down its foot until, in the fifteenth century, "it found a refuge beyond the Alps," where Hellenism and Teutonism joined hands, and gradually delivered Europe from the cruel clutch of priestly rule. Well, it is Western intelligence, Hellenism revitalised by the Teutonic spirit, or born again in modern science and philosophy, that is working all the "havoc," of which Dr. Marshall so sorrowfully, if not angrily, complains. He wants the Sunday all to himself, free from pleasure, free from theatres, restaurants, hairdressers, and every form of trade, and he wants the three toll-bars—birth, marriage, and death—kept under the thumb of the all-grasping Church; but the whole lot is slipping from him, and the tide of phronima is flowing too strongly to be stemmed by any human power, while the supernatural supply of power can no longer be drawn upon. Christianity and the Chinese.—VIII.

> "Seeing that the only bond-fide convert to Protestantism, certainly made, devastated thirteen out of the eighteen provinces in his endeavors to Christianise his fellow-countrymen a little more rapidly than the missionaries were doing, the Chinese may deem it fortunate that not more enthusiastic converts are made. 'Hung-shui-shuen,' the Taiping king, accepted the example and teachings of the old Jewish captains, in all their literal ghastliness, and slew the idolators without mercy. Sixteen years of desperate fighting (1848-64) passed away before his bandit hordes were broken up, and his capital, Nanking, given to the flames, in which he and all his household perished."—ARCHIBALD LITTLE, Through the Yang-tse Gorges (1888), pp. 308-9.

> "From the sociological point of view, the whole missionary system, irrespective of sect and creed, represents the skirmishing-force of Western civilisation in its general attack upon all civilisations of the ancient type,—the first line in the forward movement of the strongest and most highly evolved societies upon the weaker and less evolved. The conscious work of these fighters is that of preachers and teachers; their unconscious work is that of sappers and destroyers. The subjugations of weak races has been aided by their work to a degree little imagined; and by no other conceivable means could it have been accomplished so quickly and so surely. For destruction they labor unknowingly, like a force of nature. Yet Christianity does not appreciably expand."—LAFCADIO HEARN, Japan, p. 519-20.

THE fact which arises from a consideration of the authorities we have cited on the opium question is, that what the Chinese objected to was not so much the injurious character of the opium—for, as we have seen, they cultivated vast quantities of it themselves—but the officials feared the competition of the foreign opium with the home produce; while the Government feared the depletion of the silver currency in payment for the imported article.

Another reason why the Chinese singled out opium for attack was because opium was the main staple of the foreign trade. For when Commissioner Lin—acting under orders from the Chinese Government—required "'every particle of opium' to be surrendered, he adduced the loss of silver by exportation as the ground of his 'commands,'"* and not because it was a noxious drug. But when Captain Elliot, the representative of the Queen, ordered the British merchants to surrender their opium, and over 20,000 chests—valued at two million pounds—were delivered over to the Chinese, and the merchants had pledged themselves to deal no further in opium, it was found, to their pained surprise, "that the suppression of the opium trade was but a fraction of Lin's policy: he aimed at the total expulsion of Europeans from China and the closing of foreign trade." And when, in attempting to carry out these orders, twenty-nine war-junks were sunk by two British men-of-war, the Chinese declared all trade at an end, and called upon every British subject to leave the country. War was declared on December 6, 1839, says Lane-Poole, "not because England insisted on 'forcing' opium upon the innocent natives, but because China resolved to rid herself for ever, 'bag and baggage,' of the hated barbarian." †

Mr. Lane-Poole, who shows no sympathy for the Chinese, observes that the only alternative to a declaration of war by the British "was to accept our dismissal humbly and leave China alone for all time." Such a policy, he adds, "has been seriously argued," and he admits that there is no reason in the abstract order of things why a nation should not so isolate itself, but, he objects,—

> "put in practice, such isolation is never permitted, and it would be bad for the world at large if it were. Had it been attempted, the needs both of the Chinese and of the English would have soon broken the artificial barrier, and an unauthorised trade would have surely led to international difficulties" (p. 12).

In reply to this, it may be observed that none of these Oriental nations have been permitted to isolate themselves, simply because they have not possessed the military power with which to assert their independence. As a matter of fact, Japan—after a terrible experience of the evil wrought by Jesuit missionaries—expelled all foreigners from Japan and remained a closed country for two hundred years; no Japanese was allowed to leave, no foreigner to land; any person attempting to do so were either put to death or imprisoned. Fundamentally—as Mr. Michie, the historian of The Englishman in China, has observed—the international problem was identical in Japan and China, for Japan was forced to sign a treaty of commerce under the guns of the American fleet; it was a conflict between aggression and resistance:—

> "Rational dread of, and natural repulsion to foreigners, inspired alike the policies of both countries. Where they differed was in the manner of meeting the invasion. Japan braced herself nervously to the effort, and, distinguishing between what was feasible and what was not, organised a counter-invasion unsuspected by foreign nations, whom she subdued by her own strength. China, on the other hand, opposed a fatalistic and unreasoning resistance, making no intelligent counter-stroke and showing no true anticipation of the issues of the struggle." ‡

If China had possessed the arms and fighting capacity of modern Japan, along with her own enormous population, Britain would have thought twice before declaring war, even to please her merchant princes. And as for Mr. Lane-Poole's contention that the needs of the Chinese and the English would have made the carrying out of the isolation impracticable, the Chinese had no need to go outside their own country for anything. As Sir Robert Hart, the famous Inspector-General of Chinese Customs, has remarked:—

> "Many regard China as a far-distant land, with an immense population, but so wanting in all that others possess as to be ready to purchase, in unlimited quantities, whatever is offered for sale; whereas, what is true is this: China needs neither import nor export, and can do without foreign intercourse."

And although trade with China has grown, yet "The sanguine expectations which were expressed when treaties first regulated intercourse, a cycle back, have never been realised." The truth is that the Chinese did not require our trade. As Sir Robert Hart further remarks:—

> "Chinese have the best food in the world, rice; the best drink, tea; and the best clothing, cotton, silk, and fur. Possessing these staples, and their innumerable native adjuncts, they do not need to buy a penny's worth elsewhere; whilst their Empire is in itself so great, and they themselves so numerous, that sales to each other make up an enormous and sufficient trade, and export to foreign countries is unnecessary. This explains why sixty years of treaty trade have failed to reach the point the first treaty framers prophesied for it." †

The fact is we forced our trade upon China at the mouth of the cannon; the only need recognised being the need for our merchants to make money. If China had been allowed, or had been strong enough, to sever all connection with the outer world, many millions of Chinese lives and untold treasure would have been saved, as we shall see.

War being declared—by the British Government—troops were landed, Chusan captured, several cities stormed, finally Nanking being threatened, a treaty was signed there, by which five ports, Canton, Amoy, Fouchou, Ning-po, and Shanghai, were opened to British trade.

Before this—in 1808—Dr. Morrison, the missionary—not the Dr. Morrison who supplied such a powerful antidote to missionary enthusiasm in his book, An Australian in China—had founded the first Protestant mission in China, and gathered a small band of assistants around him, some of whom made journeys along the coast attempting mission work at various places east of Canton, where they always found themselves received with disfavor, and often with active opposition. Says Mr. Eames, the historian of the English in China:—

> "Now that Five Ports had been thrown open to trade, the supporters of missions in England expected that a much wider field would be available for missionary operations, and that an entrance would soon be gained in the interior itself. Their joy was unbounded and unconcealed. One school of philanthropists showed what can only be described as unseemly delight, that any cause, even one so intimately connected with the opium trade as the warlike operations of 1841 and 1842, should have given them an opportunity to send out a larger number of mission workers. At a meeting held at Exeter Hall in 1843 by the London Missionary Society, one of the largest of its kind that had ever assembled, Dr. Liefchild moved a resolution 'expressive of thanksgiving to God for the war between China and Great Britain, and for the greatly enlarged facilities secured by the treaty of peace for the introduction of Christianity into that empire.' This resolution was seconded by the Rev. Dr. Adler, and carried unanimously." *

The history of Christianity shows that war has always been sanctified by the Church when it has had for its object the advancement of the Christian faith.

Lord Curzon, in his Problems of the Far East, tells us that a friend of his, an eminent divine in the English Church, speaking at Exeter Hall in answer to some observations of his upon Christian Missions, thus stated the case from the Church's point of view:—

> "The gain or loss to civilisation from Christianity is not the question for the missionary. He is subject to a Master higher than any statesman or diplomatist of this world. It is not the missionary who has to reckon with the diplomatist, but the diplomatist with the missionary."

Lord Curzon remarks upon this:—

> "That governments should fight, or that international relations should be imperilled over his [the missionary's] wrecked house or insulted person, would strike him as but a feather's weight in the scale compared with the great final issue at stake—viz., the spiritual regeneration of a vast country and a mighty population plunged in heathenism and sin." †

Yes, as Lord Curzon's eminent divine stated, the ultimate object of Christian missions to the heathen is not civilisation, but conversion; and, if a few millions are swept off the face of the earth by fire and sword, what does it matter, provided the remainder are brought into the fold? Civilisation, the welfare of the body, is nothing compared with the soul in the eyes of these fanatics.

If instead of the "glad tidings" that there exists a being in whom all the excellences which the highest human mind can conceive exist in a degree inconceivable to us, I am informed that the world is ruled by a being whose attributes are infinite, but what they are we cannot learn, nor what are the principles of his government, except that "the highest human morality which we are capable of conceiving" does not sanction them, convince me of it, and I will bear my fate as I may. But when I am told that I must believe this, and at the same time call this being by the names which express and affirm the highest human morality, I say, in plain terms, that I will not. Whatever power such a being may have over me, there is one thing which he shall not do—he shall not compel me to worship him. I will call no being good who is not what I mean when I apply that epithet to my fellow-creatures; and if such a being can sentence me to hell for not so calling him, to hell I will go.—J. S. Mill.

Acid Drops.

You never know what the Bishop of London will say, except that it will be something foolish. Speaking the other day at the Mansion House, on behalf of the British Columbia Church Aid Society, and rambling about as usual, his lordship (according to the Daily Mail) came to what Carlyle used to call "the condition of England question," and stated that "the great cure for our ills at home was a properly arranged and properly assisted scheme of emigration." This is presumably the other side of his lordship's policy of stimulating the birth-rate. "Get plenty of babies" is the Bishop's motto. When they grow to maturity his motto is "export them." We shouldn't object to the exportation if it began with the episcopal superfluities, and then went on to the clerical parasites generally. It would be a great relief to England. But we are afraid it would be a great calamity to the dumping grounds.

"The popular idea," the Bishop of London says, "is that you have only to put threepence in the slot—or, rather, in the offertory—and you get a handsome vicar, two good-looking curates, and a peal of bells." Carlyle said that the people of England were mostly fools, but are they fools enough for that? Handsome vicars and good-looking curates are not so plentiful. And who wants any more church bells? Heaven save the mark!

"As I live in the West End I am suspicious of everybody," said the Rev. W. H. Gibbons, senior curate of St. Paul's Church, Knightsbridge, in an action at the West London County Court. We presume he includes the clergy.

The Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, Mr. Campbell's successor at Brighton, is at his old game again. In the Christian World for June 26, he repeats once more what he has been persistently asserting for the last fifteen years or more, namely, that "in the world of culture to-day the Agnostic attitude is giving way." In the past, when asked for his authorities for such a statement, he used to name Lord Kelvin, Sir William Crookes, Sir Oliver Lodge, and Dr. Russel Wallace. His present appeal is to Professors Eucken and Bergson, who seem to have strong leanings towards the religious position, though neither of them can be claimed as a Christian, even of Mr. Williams's ambiguous type. But there have always been writers of that nebulous, metaphysical order, who weave their strange illusions out of their own brains, and they were much more numerous yesterday than they are to-day; but two or three swallows don't make a summer. Mr. Williams pretends to speak for "the world of culture," and gives us only two names as his authority. Eucken and Bergson represent, not the world of culture, but merely a comparatively small coterie of metaphysical Idealists. The biologists are almost to a man against them, and so are the great bulk of psychologists, while among physicists it would be difficult to mention anyone in the front rank, besides Sir Oliver Lodge, who supports them. If the world of culture signifies the scientific world, it is a black lie to say that its Agnostic attitude is giving way. The truth is that Agnosticism is more general and more pronounced now than it ever was, as was abundantly shown at the last meeting of the British Association. Why does Mr. Williams persist in rehashing his hoary-headed old lie? Surely, he doesn't do it for the glory of his God?

The most interesting fact in this connection is that Professor Eucken, for one, does not agree with Mr. Williams. According to the President of the Free Church Council, the Rev. Mr. Connel, Professor Eucken "deserves well of all the Christian Churches for his gallant effort to recall the modern mind to a spiritual interpretation of life"; but the distinguished savant assures us, in his Main Currents of Modern Thought, that, "from the beginning of the seventeenth century, forces have been at work creating a new type of life which is fundamentally different from the Christian type, a type according to which the direction and control of individual and social life are in the hands of man alone." Dr. Russel Wallace testified to the same effect in an interview granted a few years ago to the editor of the Christian Commonwealth. In reply to a question he stated, with deep regret, that the overwhelming majority of scientists were strongly opposed to a spiritual interpretation of the Universe. Clearly, then, by "the world of culture" Mr. Williams must mean the circle in which he happens to turn, which, in relation to the subject under consideration, was never other than it is now, and which certainly does not constitute "the world of culture" in any intelligent sense of the terms.

The Rev. Rhondda Williams says that the religion needed "is a religion that will establish practical righteousness in life." The only possible inference from such a statement is that Christianity is not the religion that is needed, because, though it has been in existence for nineteen hundred years, "practical righteousness in life" is yet to be secured. Indeed, no religion has ever succeeded in bringing about so desirable a consummation; and whatever approximation to such a state of things has been made in recent years is solely due to the spread of scientific knowledge.

We cannot confess to feeling a very keen interest in the proposed Disestablishment of the Church in Wales. On principle we are against the State subsidising or patronising religion in any form, and so far the Bill has our best wishes. But the Bill really disestablishes a Church only, and still leaves religion where it was. It is really a Bill to place Nonconformists and Episcopalians on an equality, and is, therefore, more or less of a domestic controversy. But religious ceremonies will still continue in connection with State and municipal functions in Wales, and none would howl louder than Nonconformists were it proposed to abolish them. When Nonconformists say, "We object to the State patronage of religion," what they really have in mind is the State patronage of one sect to the detriment or disparagement of other sects. Which is, we repeat, a question in which we are not keenly interested. We want to see the State leave all sects severely alone. And not only leave the sects alone, but their opinions likewise. A favor conferred upon all sects equally is as much an infringement of the principle of genuine Disestablishment as is a favor conferred only upon one.

Will those who are clamoring for the Disestablishment of the Church in Wales advocate, or even agree to, the abolition of religious ceremonies in State functions and municipal affairs? Far from being in agreement with this, they clamor for recognition, and complain if they do not get it. But instead of resenting non-recognition by the State, they ought, if consistent, to reject its offer as an insult to their principles. Wherein lies the distinction between using the prestige and money of the State in aid of the opinions of a sect, and using the same in aid of a number of sects? The distinction is one that affects sectarian prejudice alone, and leaves those who put the rights of rational citizenship above the interests of a sect quite unaffected. That is why (we are really replying to a query put by a correspondent) we have shown so little interest in the Disestablishment of the Church in Wales. To disestablish one Church in order to establish all, seems to us to be progress of a very doubtful kind.

As reported in the Catholic Herald—

> "Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P., told a capital story at the Scottish Liberal Club, Edinburgh. He said: 'Mrs. M'Gerraghty, of Belfast, was asked recently why her son had emigrated, and she said—Poor Hughie worked on the Island, and when he was going to his work one day he met one of them Papists, and he knocked him down, and then he kicked him, and after that a big policeman came along and arrested poor Hughie, and he was sentenced to thirty days' imprisonment, and when he came out he said he was d——d if he would live in a country where he had to suffer for his religion.'"

Comment, even by Shakespeare himself, would spoil that.

Mr. Harry Lauder says that the training of the Sunday-school is invaluable. He says he is sure of this because he went to Sunday-school himself. Would it be unkind to suggest that this evidence may be taken by some to fall a little short of a complete demonstration?

We are not surprised to learn from the correspondent of the Daily Telegraph that "Christian Science" is now one of the most influential religious bodies in America. Mark Twain prophesied that this would be so in his book on Christian Science, although those who could see nothing in Twain but a mere humorist failed to take him seriously. Christian Science has seized—accidentally, we believe—on just that amount of sense sufficient to float a colossal absurdity. No small proportion of our complaints are nervous in origin, and all are more or less affected by our mental condition. Consequently, all are benefited by a discipline that teaches them to preserve a serene disposition not to take their ailments too seriously, and when they are ill to keep cheerful and hope for the best. However this discipline is enforced, the results are almost certain to be beneficial. But between this and what is called the philosophy of Christian Science there is a wide difference. The first is sound sense, admitted by all who think about the subject, and ignored by Christian Scientists. The second is sheer absurdity, and the one topic on which Christian Scientists love to dwell.

At present, however, there appears to be a split in the ranks of the Christian Scientists. A Mrs. Augusta Stetson claims to be the spiritual successor of Mrs. Eddy, and from the Telegraph account it appears that she pretends to be a reincarnation of Mrs. Eddy. Mrs. Stetson asserts that the people who have gained control of the finances and machinery of the movement have grown terribly heterodox, and have made one concession after another to Rationalist criticism, until at present Christian Science is hardly distinguishable from a belief in mental healing. One thing seems plain; which is, that although Christian Science has a firm disbelief in the non-existence of evil, it has a firm faith in the intense reality of hard cash.

One consequence of the Balkan War was the conversion of the Monastery of Mount Athos into an independent republic—the smallest republic in the world. As the monks cannot very well go to war with any other community, they have started a little war amongst themselves. Some of its members have been proclaiming views which the Synod declares to be heretical. The heresy consists in some fantastic idiocy about the "name of God," not worth the trouble of explaining. The consequence is that one half the republic is keeping the other half in a state of siege, and seeking to bring it to submission by famine. Christian brotherhood is a hardy plant, and thrives under the most unfavorable circumstances.

A Hull chemist has just invented a new gun to be loaded with a chemical substance that is warranted to set fire to whatever it strikes, nor can the flames be extinguished with water. We suggest that a fitting reward would be take the inventor, his plans, and chemical formulæ, and drown the lot. The inventor would probably plead in extenuation that inventive genius applied to weapons of destruction is more certain of reward than if applied in other directions. We believe this is to a large extent true, and it is a grim satire upon our Christian civilisation that it should be so. The Government showed little concern over aeroplanes until it was seen that they might be useful in warfare. And the Christian Governments of Europe make military charges the first call on the pockets of the people. And meanwhile we have dinned into our ears the teaching that Christianity and peace and brotherhood go hand in hand.

Lord Roberts, whom we saw described the other day as a type of the Christian soldier, is still busily pursuing his campaign in favor of conscription. The position is a curious one. On the one hand, we are told we must keep a colossal Navy in order to prevent an enemy landing on these shores. On the other hand, Lord Roberts assures us we must have a huge Army ready to destroy the invading armies that our battleships have prevented landing. The position is one of sheer insanity, and is again an illustration of how sane and humane Christianity makes men.

Here is one more instance of the value of Christianity as a civilising factor. Mr. Seebohm Rowntree, in his book, just published, on How the Laborer Lives, says, as the result of personal observation, that a large proportion of our agricultural laborers are receiving "not much more than three-fourths of the nourishment necessary for the maintenance of physical health." And the same may be said of too large a proportion of the population of our towns and cities. One might well question whether any nation has the right to call itself civilised so long as such a condition of things exists. But when that country parades its Christianity as the cause of its progress and humanity, we simply have the snuffle of hypocritical piety added to the tragedy of social injustice.

Even theologians confess that they are sick and tired of sermons. Professor Peake, who is a trainer of candidates for the pulpit, admits, in the Christian Commonwealth for June 18, that he scarcely ever reads them, and rarely hears them except in the church he attends. The fact is that sermons are simply relics of the times of ignorance and superstition, upon which the more intelligent folk of the present day are rapidly turning their backs. A popular preacher sorrowfully acknowledged quite lately that the pulpit of to-day has to address itself to deaf ears; but he would have been nearer the truth had he stated that preachers are humiliated in having, every year, to confront a growing number of empty pews.

Professor Peake makes the further depressing confession that even church and chapel-goers are now woefully ignorant of the very text of Scripture. It appears that the only people who really know the Bible are those who reject it as a revelation from God, and treat it simply as an interesting mythological document.

Mr. Harold Shepheard says, in a valuable paper on "The Higher Criticisms," that "the preacher must be honest in all that he says"; but where will you find an honest preacher? Is not preaching the art of lying to the glory of God? Having read an official sermon which had been delivered before the Synod, a friend said to the preacher, "Surely, you don't believe all this awful stuff?" "No, I don't," he answered; "but, you know, the Synod is composed of extremely narrow-minded men, and I could not afford to displease them." As they are always talking about things concerning which they have no knowledge, it is almost impossible for preachers to be honest even with themselves, not to mention their hearers.

Canon Hartley Carnegie solemnly announced, in a recent sermon, that "1900 years ago God himself came down and lived as a man among men"; but if he "lived as a man among men," how did anybody find out that he was God? The Canon forgets that, if the Four Gospels are true, Jesus did not so live. He lived as one who was in possession of all power in heaven and on earth. No man ever lived as he is reported to have lived. If he was not a God-man, nobody can ever tell what he was, or whether he was at all or not. In other words, if the Four Gospels, in the form in which we know them, are not historically true, it inevitably follows that, historically considered, they are of all documents the most unreliable. In any case, the Canon's idea of God coming down and living as a man among men strikes us as extremely irrational and ludicrous.

The British Museum authorities have just published a translation of a Book of the Resurrection, the authorship of which is attributed to the Apostle Bartholomew. The book gives a detailed account of the descent of Jesus into hell, his conflict with Satan, his enthronement in heaven, etc., etc. The work, says the Christian World, illustrates the extraordinary activity of the imagination of the early Christians. Quite so. And at this kind of imaginative work Christian writers have always been adepts. They have always been good at constructing imaginary narratives to suit theories, from the days of the apostles down to the Christian Evidence Society. Only in later days people of such riotous imaginative capacity have been called by a very disagreeable name. Not but that there exists a world of difference between the constructive imagination of the true artist and the wild, half-crazy, superstition-saturated mind of the early Christian writers.

Father H. Day, S. J., Holy Name, Manchester, has been preaching a series of sermons at Bolton on the subject of "The New Morality," and in the second in the course he alluded to Freethought, and characterised it as "neither free nor thought at all." Of course, if it is not thought at all it can be neither bound nor free—what doesn't exist can have no qualities or attributes. But the curious thing is that Father Day made not the slightest attempt to justify his definition. As reported in the Catholic Herald for June 21, he declared that the essence of Freethought is the repudiation of authority, whereas, in reality, Freethought only means the substitution of true authority for false; the substitution, that is, of the authority of reason for that of tradition; of common sense for that of superstition; of facts for that of assumptions; of man for that of the priest. What really annoys this Father-in-God is, however, not that the people are discarding authority, but that they recognise as authoritative teachers, writers, and speakers who are not in subjection to the Church. The truth is that authority, in Father Day's sense, is departing never to return; that the deathknell of priestcraft has already been sounded; and that the emancipation of the human intellect is steadily progressing.

Mr. R. J. Campbell has at last discovered that there is no hell-fire for anybody beyond the tomb. Jesus says there is, but he didn't mean it. He adopts the apocalyptic language of his day, but throws into it a new signification of his own. He doesn't say so, but Mr. Campbell can read it between the lines. It has lain there all through the centuries until now, but from this day forth the whole world shall see and read it, and recognise it as the special discovery of the great oracle of the City Temple.

The Glasgow Observer is evidently a Roman Catholic paper, since it complains of the late Lord Archibald Campbell's will penalising his widow and son by stipulating that if they "ever profess the Roman Catholic religion they shall forfeit every interest in his estate." Freethought papers always protest against such bigotry. But Protestant papers don't protest if the victims are Roman Catholics, and Roman Catholics don't protest if the victims are Protestants. So we put the Glasgow Observer down as an Irish Catholic organ. We are not surprised to see that it answers questions—even theological and Biblical questions. One of these, in the issue dated June 28, relates to that venerable question about Cain's wife. Who was she? "She was a daughter," our contemporary says, "of Adam and Cain's own sister, God dispensing with such marriages in the beginning of the world, as man could not otherwise be propagated." We suppose that settles it—though this explanation is dirtier than the old one. It used to be said that Cain married his sister, but it now appears that Adam married her, and Cain married the result. "An ounce of civet, good apothecary!"

There is a Bible recipe for consolation in misery which runs thus:—

> "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts. Let him drink, and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more" (Proverbs xxxi. 6-7).

Here is a recipe from the Greek poet Hesiod, who flourished hundreds of years before the Christian era:—

> "For if to one whose grief is fresh, as he sits silent with sorrow-stricken heart, a minstrel, the henchmen of the Muses, celebrates the men of old and the gods who possess Olympus; straightway he forgets his melancholy, and remembers not at all his grief, beguiled by the blessed gift of the goddess of song."

Which is the finer poetry? Which is the nobler morality?

That irrepressible "Brixton vicar" has been enlightening the world on Spiritualism through the columns of the London Budget. His opinions on this subject are not of any particular importance, and his English is susceptible of great improvement. He is fond of winding up with a poetical tag. We once heard him (it was many years ago, when his west-country accent was "all very fine and large") quote some lines from Browning, which we ventured to think were the only lines of that poet he was acquainted with. "I shall arrive," Browning said; and Mr. Waldron brought it out as "Oi shall arroive." Which, by the way, has turned out to be true—in a sense. Well, the poetical tag on this occasion is as follows:—

> "To God again the enfranchised soul must tend,
> He is her home, her Author is her end;
> No death is hers: when earthly eyes grow dim,
> Starlike she soars and Godlike melts in Him."

When the reverend gentleman "melts in Him" the Brixton district may lose one of its "great thinkers," but the rational people in the world at large will hardly put on mourning. Nor, perhaps, will the reverend gentleman need such appreciation. He will be in the starlight soaring business. We never saw a star soar, and don't know what it is like; but the "Brixton vicar" vouches for the astral phenomenon, and as old Omar Khayyam says "he knows—he knows."

According to the verdict of the coroner's jury, Hugh Davies, of the Bungalow, Southborne, near Emsworth, murdered his wife and committed suicide while insane. He attributed the "sad affair" to the "continuous nagging" of his wife. "May God have mercy on us both" he said. We hope so, if there be a God, and mercy be necessary. But it would have been a better mercy to stop the woman's nagging and let husband and wife live in greater happiness.

"God have mercy on me," wrote Ernest Winckler, a Greenwich chemist, before going out to poison himself in Borstal Woods, Plumstead. This sort of thing is getting too common. This "God" seems to play a very sorry part in the human tragi-comedy.

"Providence" has been showing the Balkan people that all the destruction in that part of the world is not to be left to them. An earthquake in the middle of Bulgaria has just wiped out two towns and hundreds of lives. "Providence" may follow up this performance with something still bigger, to take the cheek out of the Christian Brigands over there.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged. £155 2s. 11d. Received since:—H. Good, 10s.; F. Whatcott, 1s. 6d.; A Friend (per G. L. Alward), £1; H. Organ, 2s. 6d.

T. SHORE.—It is impossible to avoid forcing a highly composite language like English, if one wishes to avoid a finicking accuracy which loses more than it gains. Shakespeare had to say "too too" in Hamlet's first great soliloquy, and the "most unkindest" in Mark Antony's oration over the murdered Cæsar. The emphasis and intensity thus produced could not be achieved in any other way. Let anybody try for a week and see if he can succeed. Generally speaking, language has to give way to meaning, and the question is, What is permissible? We all say "sleep well"—therefore, to "sleep badly" cannot be kept out. Moreover, audacities of expression are more allowable in private correspondence than in writing intended for publication; just as greater audacities still are allowable in conversation.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for useful cuttings.

F. WHATCOTT.—Pleased to read your letter. We share your wish with regard to Miss Vance "that she may be with us many years yet."

H. MORTON REID.—It delights us to see that the Christians in London attach so much importance to the utterances of the Rev. A. J. Waldron. It is one of the most promising signs of Christian decadence.

E. B.—Thanks for all your trouble.

MISS VANCE acknowledges:—Benevolent Fund: Bethnal Green Branch, 5s. General Fund: Tunbridge Wells, 2s.

F. NIBLETT.—The reason you have not heard anything of Dr. Aveling for many years is because he is dead.

H. ROBERTS.—Pleased to see the letter in the New Zealand paper. It is, as you say, a sign of the spread of our views. We hope you are right in thinking that Mr. W. W. Collins, after nearly thirty years' hard work, now "sees a tangible result."

G. L. ALWARD.—Mr. Foote is really getting more and more his old self. Not only strength, but, the best symptom of all, serenity.

S. H. ALLSON.—We have put the unfortunate man on our free list for the present. You can advise us again later on.

VICTOR B. NEWBURG.—The Paine verses are capital, and shall appear in our next. Why don't you write more in this vein? The gift of song is a great thing. Would that all who have it might learn something from Whitman's declaration that "The business of great poets is to cheer up slaves and horrify despots."

J. KING.—Your criticisms are quite sound, but they do not touch us personally. Glad you were so pleased with Mr. Cohen's last week's article.

REFORMER.—We have nothing to do with domestic differences between Christian Churches and their supposed Founder.

H. ORGAN.—Glad to hear that our Meredith article gave you a permanent introduction to the English Review.

J. PARTRIDGE (Birmingham) writes: "It is pleasant to know you remember the Stratford-on-Avon trip as a 'golden day.' It was a never-to-be-forgotten day to us all."

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We have already said that Mr. Foote is taking as much holiday as he can compatibly with a minimum of work. The date of this number of the Freethinker will find him at the Isle of Thanet, the air of which has hitherto always agreed with him extremely well. He proposes to remain there for a fortnight, after which he will spend a week at Yarmouth with his old friend Mr. J. W. de Caux, J.P. Mr. Foote will take his work with him; not all of it, but as much as he cannot very well evade.

One of Mr. Foote's peculiarities is that when he has once written a thing he can take very little interest in it—at any rate, for a great length of time, when he can view it with a certain mental detachment, as though it were written by someone else. One result of this peculiarity is a carelessness in preserving pamphlets and other matters proceeding from his pen. He ought to have preserved them all for business reasons; but, as a matter of fact, he didn't—and there's an end of the matter. He is now trying to get a set of his things together. One of them is the Heroes and Martyrs of Freethought, written as far back as 1875. This work was published in twopenny sixteen-page parts. Is there any reader who has a set (or any of the numbers) and is willing to part with it? Mr. Foote will be glad to hear from him or her. Of course he is willing to pay a reasonable price.

Mr. J. W. Gott sought Mr. Foote's advice on behalf of Mr. Thompson, who was summoned for using "profane and disgusting language" at Blackburn. What the "profane and disgusting language" was we are not informed—as usual. The point on which we are asked to give advice does not concern the defence. It is whether the defendant should pay a fine or go to prison in default. Our reply is that advice cannot be offered in such an alternative. The defendant must always decide that question for himself. We declined to advise Mr. Boulter on the point, and we gave the same reason then. The question is a purely personal one, and must be answered personally.

Mr. J. W. Gott organised what appears to have been a successful demonstration at Blackburn on Sunday evening in protest against the recent prosecution for "profane language" under the Police Clauses Act. The defendant was Arthur Thompson, a cotton operative, who has been lecturing a good deal in the district lately. He appears to be too weak for such work, and the police frightened him into giving an undertaking not to lecture on Atheism again in Blackburn. This document has not the slightest validity. The magistrates appear to think that preaching Atheism is illegal, whereas it is quite as legal as preaching Christianity. Chief Constables, of course, violate the law every day of their lives, but Magistrates, with Chief Clerks to aid them, ought to know better.

Mr. Gott states that the expenses of the defence in this unheroic case are on the road to five pounds, and he applies to the N. S. S. through us for that sum. We are not able to request Miss Vance to send it. Mr. Gott must really take his own responsibilities in these matters. The N. S. S. cannot follow up his missionaries with a cheque-book. We have also to say another thing—reluctantly but firmly. He must stop using the name of the National Secular Society in his announcements and advertisements. Mr. Gott's courage is undoubted; his discretion is far to seek; and his want of sensibility leads him to do things that make other people shiver. We hope he will understand that this is serious. The N. S. S. simply will not allow Mr. Gott to use its name without its permission.

A flying visit was paid to Tunbridge Wells last Sunday by Mr. W. Davidson, who is assisting to expose the machinations of Mr. H. A. Marsh, of the C. E. S., in relation to the scandalous statements this gentleman has been making about the late Mr. J. M. Wheeler. Mr. Marsh, who has shifted his ground very often since his first pronouncement, but has still much to withdraw, was announced to lecture on Tunbridge Wells Common on Sunday afternoon. Mr. Davidson, who clearly explained that the object of his visit was to refute Mr. Marsh's statements, was courteously allowed to speak for half-an-hour by the chairman, the Rev. Stather Hunt, a local clergyman. Several other clerical gentlemen were present, and all must have been greatly edified by hearing Mr. Marsh, when confronted by his opponents, describe them as "Dirty dogs, who had followed him from London," and who were in the habit of engaging "thousands" to rush him from his platform in the London Parks. A crowded audience listened to Mr. Davidson in the evening, who addressed them until he was compelled to run for his train. Many requests were made for a return visit, and a local clergyman offered to debate with Mr. Davidson. This offer will in all probability be accepted, and Mr. Marsh may rely upon further attention until he makes the amende honorable to Mr. Wheeler's memory.—K. B. K.

The Gospel History a Fabrication.

THE NARRATIVES IN THE SYNOPTICS.

THE first three Gospels, as everyone knows, give an account of the sayings and doings of Jesus Christ, from the time of his baptism in the Jordan to that of his crucifixion and resurrection, so that in these Gospels (which are called Synoptics) we have three versions of the same sayings and doings. It may also have been noticed that, in a great number of cases, these Gospel events are recorded by all three Synoptists in nearly the same words. Another remarkable fact in connection with those incidents or discourses, is that, in the majority of cases, they are related by each Synoptist in the same order of sequence. Thus, we find that Matthew and Mark relate seventy-five of these events or circumstances in exactly the same order; next, we find that Mark and Luke relate seventy-two in the same order. Lastly, we find that Matthew, Mark, and Luke record sixty events or circumstances in exactly the same order. Some of these, it is true, would naturally be placed in the order given by all writers; as, for instance, the arrest of Jesus before his trial, the trial before the crucifixion, and the resurrection to follow: but that three independent writers should record such a number of unconnected, undated, and unlocated incidents in exactly the same order is one that calls for some rational explanation.

To make this matter clear, I subjoin a list of the various circumstances recorded in the same order by all three evangelists. These are the following:—

Ministry of John the Baptist—Baptism of Jesus—Temptation of Jesus—Jesus goes to Galilee after imprisonment of John—Jesus commences teaching—Healing a leper—Healing man sick of palsy—Call of Matthew—Levi's feast—Discourse on fasting—Patching of garments and bottles—Disciples plucking ears of corn—Healing man with withered hand—Parable of Sower—Herod believes Jesus to be the Baptist—Feeding five thousand—Jesus asks what men say of him—Jesus foretells his death—Taking up cross to follow Jesus—The Transfiguration—Disciples unable to cure demoniac—Jesus again foretells his death—Disciples contend who should be greatest—Jesus blesses little children—the Rich young man—The camel and needle's eye—Reward for following Jesus—Jesus again foretells his death—Healing blind man near Jericho—Two disciples sent for colt—Public entry into Jerusalem—Cleansing of temple—Authority of Jesus questioned—Tribute to Cæsar—Woman with seven husbands—How Jesus was son of David—Warnings against scribes and Pharisees—Jesus foretells destruction of Jerusalem—Priests take counsel against Jesus—Judas turns traitor—Disciples sent to find a room—Passover and Last Supper—Jesus foretells Peter's denial—Agony in Gethsemane—Jesus betrayed and made prisoner—Jesus before High Priest—Peter's denial of Jesus—Jesus before Pilate—Jews demand release of Barabbas—Simon bears cross—Jesus crucified—Casting lots for garments—Jesus mocked and reviled—Darkness all over land—Veil of temple rent—Testimony of Centurion—Women beholding afar off—Joseph of Arimathea—Mary Magdalene at the sepulchre.

To the foregoing may be added fifteen additional circumstances, omitted by Luke, which Matthew and Mark record in the same order; also twelve other circumstances, omitted by Matthew, which Mark and Luke give in the same order—bringing the total up to eighty-seven. Now, it is simply impossible that three independent writers—two of whom, Mark and Luke, had never seen nor accompanied Jesus—could record such a number of trifling, and mostly unconnected, incidents in exactly the same order. And, if to this order of sequence, we add the fact, already stated, that a large portion of these narratives are related in nearly the same words, we arrive at the only conclusion possible—that behind the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke, there lies an earlier and more primitive Gospel from which these evangelists took the discourses, events, and other circumstances that are now common to two or to the three. This common matter comprises nearly the whole of the Gospel of Mark; but Matthew and Luke give many additional narratives which they took from other primitive writings of their time, the most important of which are: the Birth stories (Matt. i. and ii.; Luke i. and ii.), the Temptation (Matt. iv. 1—11; Luke iv. 1—13), and the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v., vi., vii.; Luke vi. 20—49). This supplementary matter I leave for the present, being concerned now only with the narratives common to the three, as represented by the Gospel of Mark.

According to the orthodox view, the three Synoptical Gospels are independent accounts of the sayings and doings of Jesus. Matthew, it is said, was an apostle, and therefore a witness of what he relates; Mark is stated to have been a companion of Peter, and to have committed to writing all the narratives preached by Peter; Luke, it is declared, was a colleague of Paul, and accompanied that apostle in many of his journeys, and composed his Gospel from the substance of Paul's preaching. All this is apologetic nonsense, which is disproved by merely reading the following short sample of the teaching of Jesus:—

MARK x. 14—15.	LUKE XVIII. 16—17.
"Suffer the little children to come unto me; forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God. Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall in no wise enter therein."	"Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God. Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall in no wise enter therein."

Now, assuming that Jesus uttered these words, as represented in the Gospels, neither Mark nor Luke was there to hear them; nor was Paul. Peter, supposing he was historical, might have heard them spoken once; but no reporter was present, and it is admitted that nothing which Jesus is recorded to have said in the Gospels was ever written down at the time. Neither, again, were any primitive Gospels in existence in Paul's day. Yet, more than half a century later, Mark and Luke reproduce the passage verbatim—the only difference being the word "and," which Luke or some copyist has added. How did these two evangelists, who never saw or heard Jesus, become acquainted with the words they record? To this question there can be but one answer—that which I have stated.

Rational criticism is, however, now beginning to gain more recognition. During the last two decades a closer examination of the Gospels has proved to many Biblical critics that the three Synoptists drew their accounts from a pre-existing written Gospel—which is called the Common Tradition or the Common Source. Upon this subject the Rev. J. J. Scott, Canon of Manchester, says:—

> "Scholars are now of opinion that the likeness between the Synoptic Gospels is due to the fact that St. Matthew and St. Luke wrote with St. Mark's Gospel before them, and embodied in their Gospels such portions of St. Mark's Gospel as they deemed suitable for their purpose."—"St. Matthew embodies in his Gospel nearly the whole of the subject matter of St. Mark, and St. Luke includes about four-fifths of St. Mark."

Other critics, including Dr. Carpenter, take the same view. But even Canon Scott afterwards admits that "there are indications that St. Mark made use of a written record" in chapters xi. to xvi. It cannot, however, be shown that any portion of Mark's Gospel is original. The truth is that all three Synoptists took their accounts from the same Common Source, and living, as they all did, in post-apostolic times, they could not do otherwise. Not one of the three was an apostle or the companion of an apostle. Matthew, Mark, and Luke were merely editors who, in copying their narratives from an older Gospel, made additions or verbal alterations wherever they thought they could improve the narratives. This is why the Gospels they produced were said to be "according to" the first, second, or third editor—it being understood by the Christians of the time when they appeared that they were simply more accurate copies of the primitive Gospel then in use. (See Luke i. 1—4.)

I will now take a short example of verbal agreement from all three Synoptics in order to illustrate the method employed by these editors. The words in italics indicate their additions or alterations.

Matt. viii 2—4.—"And behold, there came to him a leper and worshiped him, saying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. And he stretched forth his hand, and touched him, saying, I will; be thou made clean. And straightway his leprosy was cleansed."

Mark i. 40—42.—"And there cometh to him a leper, beseeching him, and kneeling down to him, and saying unto him, If thou wilt thou canst make me clean. And being moved with compassion, he stretched forth his hand and touched him, and saith unto him, I will; be thou made clean. And straightway the leprosy departed from him, and he was made clean."

Luke v. 12—13.—"And it came to pass, while he was in one of the cities, behold a man full of leprosy: and when he saw Jesus, he fell on his face, and besought him, saying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. And he stretched forth his hand, and touched him, saying, I will; be thou made clean. And straightway the leprosy departed from him."

Here it appears evident that Matthew's account is the nearest to that in the primitive Gospel, to which, apparently, he has in this case made no addition. The "kneeling down" of Mark and the "fell on his face" of Luke are the equivalents of the "worshiped him" of Matthew.

Now, in these three examples, there is nothing to indicate that Matthew or Luke wrote with Mark's Gospel open before him; but rather the contrary. Had such been the case, we might expect one or the other to copy Mark's phrase—"being moved with compassion"—which was evidently not in the original Gospel. I have not space in this paper for further examples of the verbal agreements; but any readers who wish to make a comparison themselves may commence with those that follow. The Revised Version should be used, if available, as it is nearer to the Greek than the Authorised Version.

From the foregoing facts we obtain the following results: (1) That for the historicity of the threefold events recorded in the Synoptics we have no evidence whatever. This is obvious: the writer of the Common Tradition is unknown; so also is the source whence his narratives were derived. As to the latter, the probability is that the writer simply committed to writing a number of hearsay stories in circulation in his time—the originators being unknown. (2) That the orthodox assumptions respecting the writers of the canonical Gospels being apostolic, and their Gospels written under the influence of "the spirit of God," are now exploded for ever. We are therefore at liberty to examine the so-called Gospel "history" by precisely the same methods as any other ancient history.

THEOSOPHY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—You have already effectively commented on what Dr. Horton said in his attack on Theosophy, but there was one statement made by that gentleman which struck me as being very peculiar, and even awkward, from his point of view. He is reported by the Daily Chronicle to have said that he thought "the doctrine of Theosophy must have been invented by people who had no conception of the depth of human love, who did not understand that it was eternal, and could not be broken even by death." This statement seems to me to be rather general, and I should like to offer a specific case for consideration.

There was a certain old Israelitish king named Solomon, of whom it was recorded (1 Kings xi. 1-3) that he "loved many strange women, together with [or, beside (margin)] the daughter of Pharaoh, women of the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Zidonians, and Hittites;.....that Solomon clave unto these in love. And he had seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines; and his wives turned away his heart. For it came to pass, when Solomon was old, that his wives turned away his heart after other gods....."

Now, if, according to Dr. Horton, love is eternal, and cannot be broken by death, how does the case stand with regard to the love between Solomon and all these women? Is it still existing, and how? For in applying Dr. Horton's theory, there would appear to be some very knotty points to settle, to which the question as to the woman who had seven husbands would be a mere bagatelle.

I am not in any way defending Theosophy, for I have never been able to discover any basis for it; but I should think Dr. Horton will find his hands more than full in defending his own religious beliefs without going outside to attack those of others. And when one reads that Mr. Harry Lauder has been enlisted in the service of the pulpit, one may well open one's eyes and ask, "What next?"

J. TOMKINS.

PORTUGUESE POLITICAL PRISONERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Mr. C. M. Tenison's letter in the Freethinker of June 29 will not deceive anyone who is not deceived already. The four articles from my pen which appeared in the Freethinker issues of April 27, May 4, May 11, and June 8 of this year, made a long series of specific adverse comments and criticisms upon the fulminations of the crusading Duchess and the assertions of the "British National Protest." Neither the Daily Mail nor any of the British Manoelists have ventured to controvert my position of absolute scepticism concerning the validity of the charges and allegations made against the Republic. Instead of meeting my counter statements and refutations with a direct frontal attack, Mr. Tenison, writing as the honorary secretary to the Committee of "the British Protest," falls foul of my attribution of the pamphlet to Royalist authorship, and attempts to cover the mixed motives and ideas of the "British Protest" by the ipse dixits of Mr. Trevelyan.

Certainly I was not present at the Æolian Hall meeting on April 22, and, having regard to the brutal maltreatment which Senhor Gomes received for venturing very politely to ask permission to meet the statements of the Duchess with categorical refutation, I am not sorry that another engagement spared me from the fury of Mr. Trevelyan's Portuguese friends of "justice, humanity, and law."

I do not think that the citation of Mr. Trevelyan's uncorroborated opinions quite meets the necessity of the case. Does Mr. Trevelyan pretend to speak of his own knowledge when he states that "many" of the political prisoners in Portugal "are put there [i.e., in prison] because of their opinions, not because of their acts"? Because, on that point, Mr. Trevelyan ought to know that opinions, qud opinions, are no more liable to penal repression in Republican Portugal than in Monarchical England. Indeed, I am perfectly clear as to this, that in England opinions, qud opinions, will lead a man more speedily to prison than in Portugal

I am glad to hear, even at the eleventh hour, that Mr. Trevelyan "protested against the execution of Ferrer," but I do not recall any protest that he made at the prison indignities and cruelties inflicted upon Ferrer when in prison, nor do I remember any public meeting of protest that he addressed when Ferrer's life was in peril, nor when his assassination had become an accomplished fact.

Ferrer did not fall under the distinguished patronage of live lords or dowager duchesses; and Spanish prisons, with Montjuich as their fateful emblem, never stirred the sympathetic breasts of aristocratic committees.

And now for the pamphlet and its authorship. Mr. Tenison is quite mistaken in supposing that I derived from O Mundo my impression that the British National Protest was made in Portugal. As a matter of fact, I first knew of the pamphlet by reading a notice of it in O Mundo, and quite believed at the time that the Protest was of undoubted British manufacture. The perusal of the pamphlet at once wounded my patriotic pride. The Portuguese spirit of the Manoelist oozed out from every line of the production, and this impression I made clear not only in my Freethinker article of June 8, but in the translation thereof which appeared in O Mundo of June 16.

I found that the writer speaks (p. 3) only as one living on the spot in Portugal could pretend to speak. Only a Portuguese Royalist, as it seemed to me, with an inner knowledge of the Carbonaria could speak (p. 10), on his own authority, mark you, of their "initiatory oath"; could count the number (23,000) of those dreaded adepts in "massacre by bomb, poison, or dagger," or put forward (p. 37) a claim for "amnesty for all the Royalist prisoners without exception," especially as amongst those prisoners were rebels caught, arms in hand, against the constituted authority of their native country. These internal evidences, together with the passages cited in my last article, seemed to be so many cloven hoofs left carelessly on the trail to mark the nationality of the gay protestor. And now what do I see and hear? Why, the statement that "an English author is responsible for the pamphlet"! This statement, of course, I unreservedly accept au pied de la lettre. And I submit, this time for the purpose of eliciting information, that this "responsibility" will not carry us very far as to the veracity of the pamphlet until we hear definitely whether the English author who framed this British Protest did more than polish up into literary form the polemical materials made for him in Portugal. A mere Englishman, writing in Fleet-street or living in Tooley-street, could scarcely produce these thirty-nine pages of Manoelist protests from his inner consciousness.

The Duchess of Bedford, who contributes an eleven-lined "Foreword," only claims that "the writer" had exceptional opportunities of collecting "information"—so that until we know whether the English author "received" the "information" "collected" by another, or "collected" the "information" with his own hands, and attempted to verify his "facts" by critical examination and inspection on the spot (all which may, or may not, be the Duchess's meaning when speaking of his "exceptional opportunities")—until, I say, this is known, the ascription to an English author of our controverted pamphlet leaves its infallibility as much open to doubt as before, especially in view of Mr. Swinny's personal testimony and the detailed refutation of his charges in O Seculo.

As I have already stated in my previous article, amnesty is a blessed word and an excellent principle to adopt, but the Portuguese Government cannot be expected to carry out a policy of universal amnesty while the Royalists make murderous inroads from Galicia, or ally themselves with the bomb-throwers who, a few days ago, scattered death and destruction in the streets of Lisbon when patriotic citizens were celebrating the genius of Camœns, the great national poet of the country. The road to amnesty is through submission to the statue quo.

WILLIAM HEAFORD.

The Mission to the Heathen.

IN this German possession of Kamerun, West Africa, there are four lots of missions: Baptist (German), Basler (German Swiss), Roman Catholic (German), and the American Presbyterian. The two latter missions hold the field in South Kamerun, and, as is customary, each devotes part of its time in crying "stinking fish"—about the other one's goods. The following incident will throw a little light on the methods used by these Apostles of Peace in converting the heathen: A few weeks ago, in the district referred to, a Yankee soul-saver discovered that a native, upon whom he had his eye, had joined the Catholic mission. He thereupon approached the native and told him the Catholic pretensions were false, its theology all lies, and, indeed, that the holy Virgin Mary, about whom the Catholics made so much fuss, was really no better than she should be. As an extra and immediate inducement to the native to join the only true Church, the astute Yank promised him he might take a little strong drink, and that strict monogamy would not be insisted upon. These offers made it evident to the native that American Presbyterianism was the thing, so he promptly became converted to it.

This, of course, did not suit the Catholic missionary, so he went round to the American mission to speak to the native and with the missionary, but the latter, being evidently a man of deeds, promptly laid hold of the Catholic, gave him a severe shaking, and then knocked him over! The Lord, having failed to protect his holy Roman Catholic servant, the law was invoked, and a summons for assault issued. According to German custom, a "first trial" took place, at which endeavor was made to settle the matter; but, desiring to make a big blasphemy case of it, the Roman Catholic Bishop issued instructions that the case should not be amicably settled, but must be fought to the bitter end. The case was tried, and, to the utter astonishment of the Catholics, the judge refused to hear anything from the religious point of view, and, treating the case as one of simple assault, found each party to blame and dismissed it. I believe endeavor is being made to work a case up for blasphemy.

What a disgusting farce are these missions to the heathen, and what fairy tales are told in Europe about the devotion and sacrifice of these brave men, etc., etc.—instead of which ——the Catholic priests are very partial to a good cigar and a whisky and soda, and I have seen a "lay brother" in a condition that would have secured for him in England a verdict of "five bob and costs." The Catholics are, of course, celebates—that is to say, there are also nuns or sisters out here.

The Basler mission have a large trading concern, but I believe the departments of soap-selling and soul-saving are kept separate. The egregious American missionaries are, perhaps, the worst of the lot—for the most part snuffling ignoramuses, and nearly all ten-a-penny "doctors." Most of them are married, and the natives are not a little pleased to find the missionary bring a wife with him.

Of course, we must credit the missions with teaching trades to the natives; but the youth of Europe are taught trades without the help of missions, and let us hope it will soon be discovered that in tropical Africa and other "heathen" countries the technical school would make a really excellent (and cheap) substitute for the missions.

R. D. MORRIS.

A Score of Epigrams.

TOLSTOY.

WEARY of being a progenitor,
Tolstoy found children were against God's law:
Fatigued with courts, he found his God agrarian:
Bored epicure, he found God vegetarian:
Author and teacher for a whole life long,
He found that God thought novel-writing wrong:
Sated with love, when his old reins grew slack,
The Devil was an aphrodisiac:
The vainest egotist for centuries
Mistook his ennui for the world's disease.

THE JOURNALIST.

Such far-fetched metaphor! Such stern invective!
Such brilliant verbiage! Such noble rage!
If he's a worm, why are you so vindictive?
Because, old man, they pay me by the page.

GOD AND I.

If I were God, I'd not accept the apology
Offered for my existence by theology.

CHESTERTON.

Our Chesterton doth bless and damn,
According to his Beer and Joint:
He is our age's epigram,
Excepting that he has no point

THE LADY NOVELIST.

"You may decry them, but you find my novels Enjoyed at once in palaces and hovels."
"True. Hut and hall two kinds of room are rich in—
One never mind, the other one's the kitchen.
And, by the way, your sales would rise like vapor,
Were you but printed upon thinner paper."

THE THEOLOGIANS.

"God is a spirit." Then the stern Freethinker:
"I'm a Teetotaler; you, Sir, are a Drinker.
It follows then that Catholics are fuddled,
Whereas the Protestants are merely muddled;
Protestants have one spirit, though it stinks,
Whereas the Catholics all mix their drinks."
However fair the theologic weather,
The Pope and Mr. Foote can't dine together.
How sad it is that cranks in drink and food
Militate so against true brotherhood.

CHRISTIAN POETS.

The theory that life on earth's a proem
Prevents the accomplishment of any poem.

CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE.

When Doctors differ, where to find salvation?
Our Paul backs love, and Origen castration.

THE JEW.

The star-lit desert did my fathers range,
And found their God. For me the Stock Exchange
Serves as a temple. Sheep and Goats? My prayers
Divide all mankind into Bulls and Bears.

"PUNCH."

When poor old dotard Punch sacked E. T. Reed,
He showed why he'd so sadly run to seed:
He'll not employ those artists that can draw,
But those that live according to the law.

AN EPITAPH.

'Gainst scorn and blows
And all his mortal pain
Not once he rose,
So cannot rise again.

DEGENERACY.

Olympus ruled, and Art was firm and rigid,

Our poets, sordid in their lives and frigid,
Write their "free verses" in a London slum.

THE PHILANTHROPIST.

All day he ponders with a smile seraphic
Unwanted Babies and the White Slave Traffic.
At night he teaches, unctuous and demure,
Christian young men the Art of Being Pure.

VICTOR B. NEUBURG.

Renan on Himself.

LET us be austere to ourselves, but do not let us impoverish life. Let us not deprive humanity of its joys; let us take pleasure in beholding its enjoyment. The joy of others is a great part of our own; it constitutes that great recompense of a good life, which is gaiety.

I have been reproached with too much parade of this religion, so easy in appearance, but the most difficult of all in reality. Wishing will not make one gay. One must belong to an old race, not blasée; one must also be satisfied with one's life. My life has been what I should wish, what I conceive as the best. I would not alter much if I had to live it over again. On the other hand, I have little fear of the future. I shall have my biography and my legend. My legend? Yes. Having myself a little of the trick of ecclesiastical writers, I can trace it out in advance. The legends of the enemies of the official Church are all cast in the same mould. The fate which the book of Acts attributes to Judas is its essential feature. For one party of tradition I shall finish like that, in a fashion compounded of Arius and Voltaire. God, how black I shall be! All the more because when the Church feels herself lost, she will go down maliciously, biting like a mad dog.

In spite of all I have confidence in reason. The enlightened part of humanity, the only part I care for, will hold me in some esteem. Five hundred years hence the Committee of the Literary History of France, in the Academy of Inscriptions and Letters, will redact my biographical notice. It will have to discuss some singular documents. It will read in the books approved by the Church, that I received a million from Rothschild for writing the Vie de Jésus, and nearly as much from Napoleon the Third, who, afterwards, having reduced me to destitution, gave me a fine pension on the Journal des Savants.—[Footnote—I joined the Journal des Savants in 1878, the fixed salary being 500 francs (£20) a year.] The committee will disentangle all this as it can, according to the rules of criticism; I am sure that its judgment will be an authority to sensible people in the future.

The only thing I really fear is apocryphal texts. There is already a considerable mass of phrases, sayings, and anecdotes attributed to me, which amuse the Catholic press. The clergy quote in general at second-hand; they take their citations from little, low clerical reviews. Almost all that the religious polemists father upon me is sophisticated or full of absurdity. I implore the friends of truth only to count as mine which has appeared in the volumes published by the firm of Levy. When I gave to the world the Vie de Jésus, the journals subventioned by the Jesuits published pretended autographs of mine, which I never took the trouble to denounce. It is in this respect that the Committee aforesaid, in the twenty-fourth century, will have an opportunity to display its sagacity. If criticism, instead of making progress, should decline—then I shall be lost. But if humanity is doomed to cretinism, I no longer covet its esteem; it may think of me all the nonsense it pleases.....

I am thankful for my life. It has been sweet and precious to me. I have not been without sin; I have had the defects of all men; but, whatever may be said by those who call themselves God's priests, I have never committed any very bad action. I have loved truth, and made sacrifices for it. I have desired the diviner day, and I believe in its advent. When my old beliefs crumbled away, instead of weeping and feeling irritated, I faced ill fortune with a stout heart. Weeping would have been cowardice, and irritation the greatest absurdity.—Translated, with slight alteration, from "Feuilles Détachées."

National Secular Society.

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON JUNE 26.

The President, Mr. G. W. Foote in the chair. There were also present:—Messrs. Barry, Bowman, Cohen, Cowell, Cunningham, Davies, Davidson, Heaford, Lazarnick, Leat, Lloyd, Moss, Neate, Nichols, Quinton, Roger, Rosetti, Samuels, Silverstein, Thurlow, F. Wood, Miss Kough, and Miss Stanley.

The Minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed. the monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were admitted for Colne, Leeds, and West Ham Branches and for the Parent Society.

This being the first meeting of the new Executive, the following officers were elected:—General Secretary: Miss E. M. Vance. Monthly Auditors: Messrs. Leat and Samuels. Benevolent Fund Committee: Messrs. Davey, Leat, Roger, Samuels, and Wood.

The Secretary formally reported that the L.C.C. had reissued the permits for collecting in the Parks, withdrawn in June last, and was instructed to settle the account for the solicitor's charges in connection with the case so far as it had gone.

The President reported the receipt by him of a letter from the Bolton Branch and also a letter from Mr. J. W. Gott, reporting that a speaker, unconnected with the Society, had been prosecuted under the Police Clauses Act at Blackburn, and after a general discussion, the following resolution, moved by Mr. Cohen and seconded by Mr. Moss, was carried unanimously:—

> "That the Executive endorses the warning of the Bolton Branch against outside speakers who collect money on the pretence that they represent the N. S. S.; and that the Executive also warns all whom it may concern that irresponsible advocates of Freethought at outdoor meetings must not expect to be seen through their trouble by the N. S. S. if they cannot keep from using language which brings them under the 'profanity' clause of the Police Clauses Act."

The following resolution, remitted from the Annual Conference, was then discussed.

> "That the N. S. S. be represented as far as possible at the forthcoming International Freethought Congress at Lisbon, partly as an encouragement to the Portuguese Freethinkers who have taken such a great part in the recent work of progress in Portugal, and also as a protest against the malicious falsehoods so industriously circulated to their detriment by religious bigots and political schemers in England."

Mr. W. Heaford, the N. S. S. delegate to the International Freethought Bureau, was instructed to inform the Lisbon Freethought Association that the N. S. S. would be represented by at least three delegates, and it was further resolved that arrangements should be made to include in the party any members or friends of the movement who contemplated being present at the Congress.

The outdoor propaganda was discussed and further arrangements made.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

Obituary.

We deeply regret to learn of the death of Mrs. H. M. Hyndman, and our sympathy goes out to Mr. Hyndman in his great loss. Mrs. Hyndman was in every sense of the word a "helpmeet" for her husband, and her death will leave a void in his life which only those who knew how devotedly attached they were to each other can understand and sympathise with. Mr. Hyndman has never concealed his Freethought views, which were shared by Mrs. Hyndman.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st., London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 28 SUNDAY, JULY 13, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

History tells us that the good cause triumphs in the end, though the individuals may not live to see it. But we strive for the cause, not for ourselves.

—GEORGE MEREDITH.

"Honest Doubt."

TENNYSON started the talk about "honest doubt." He said that there "lived more faith" in it than in "half the creeds." He meant well. But he was mistaken. What is more, he was in a confusion. The whole passage was perhaps the weakest platitude in In Memoriam; and platitude so easily runs into sheer ineptitude.

It is assumed, in this unfortunate passage of Tennyson's, that there is some special virtue in "faith" and some special vice in "doubt." But it is perfectly clear, when you come to reflect, that "faith" and "doubt" must both have an object, and that the value of either depends upon what they are related to. If you have faith that the moon is made of green cheese, and I doubt the proposition, the difference is not one of transcendent importance. But if you have faith that a certain man will keep his word, and I doubt his fidelity, and the life or liberty of both of us depends upon his being true to his pledge, our difference is of tremendous importance. If you are right, we both gain; if I am right, we both lose. But the issue does not establish your moral superiority over me, or mine over you; it simply establishes the fact that your judgment was superior to mine, or mine to yours; and judgment is an intellectual process, which a bad man may sometimes perform better than a good one.

It is absurd to speak of "faith" in the abstract. When we are told that a man has faith, we should ask "faith in what?" He may have faith in a God of vengeance, or faith in a God of mercy; he may have faith in "grace" or faith in "good works"; he may have faith in moral rectitude or faith in Papal indulgences: he may have faith in reaching heaven through the sacrificial blood of Jesus Christ, or faith in reaching heaven through the gracious favor of the Virgin Mary; he may have faith in the Holy Trinity or faith in Mumbo Jumbo; he may have faith in holy water, faith in transubstantiation, faith in priestly pardon, faith in extreme unction, and faith in prayers for the abbreviation of purgatory, or he may have faith in simple human virtues, and regard all those things as superstitious inventions.

You may tell me that a man has faith, I may trust myself in his hands, and I may find that he is a Thug. By an act of faith he murders me. The deity he worships is pleased with human blood, and mine is shed for his gratification. The contents of my pocket may, at the same time, fall into the hands of the assassin; but the agent is entitled to some advantage as well as the principal.

John Huss trusted himself in the hands of the Catholic party, and they burnt him alive, because they had a faith against keeping faith with heretics.

A man may doubt the wisdom of peace, or doubt the wisdom of war. A man may doubt the value of parliamentary government, or doubt the value of autocracy. A man may doubt the sense of free trade, or doubt the sense of protection. A man may doubt anything, or doubt its opposite. And what is the use of counting his doubts as moral or immoral? They are nothing of the kind. They are simply opinions, which he forms according to his information and intellectual capacity.

If one man works a sum and gives the right answer, he is not moral, he is accurate. If another man works the sum and gives a wrong answer, he is not immoral, he is inaccurate. And the bad arithmetician may be the better citizen of the two.

Learned and able judges try cases and give judgments, and their judgments are sometimes reversed by other judges. There is a difference of opinion in the two separate hearings. But it would be absurd to infer that the judge in the first instance was wicked, and the judge in the second instance virtuous.

Faith is but an opinion, and doubt is an opinion; and by no possibility can an opinion be moral or immoral. These terms only apply to actions and agents. Opinions may be sound or unsound; in other words, they may be accurate or inaccurate. They cannot be anything else.

This philosophy teaches charity. Although we cannot all see eye to eye with each other, we can dwell together in peace and goodwill. A fellow citizen may differ from me and not deserve locking up; and I may differ from him, without deserving the gallows.

People differ on the most important practical questions, and still regard each other as gentlemen; yet when they differ on speculative questions, as to which they are all very much in the dark, they scowl and hiss and spit at each other, and call each other vile names, and do each other terrible injuries, and sometimes cut off each other's heads, or break each other to pieces, or burn each other to death.

All bigotry is bad, but religious bigotry is the worst of all. It is rare to find a Christian who admits that an "infidel" may be as good a man as himself. The priests and parsons naturally minister to this evil spirit. They treat unbelief as a sin. They represent those who reject their teachings as enemies of God. They speak the word Atheist as if it were the name of a monster. The better sort of them still talk of "honest doubts"—as though there could be dishonest doubts. Whenever they see an opponent they say (or look) "I am holier than thou." And the police reports often show that they are not.

Even the Rev. P. T. Forsyth, M.A., D.D., one of the "great" Free Church divines, in a Hibbert Journal article some time ago, ventured to express himself in the following manner:—

> "Much more doubt is voluntary and culpable than it is the fashion to admit. The mental confusion is due to some moral weakness and discursiveness. It is not wholly mental error, but to some extent moral dulness (to say the least), which causes so many to pass over the historic Christ as lightly as they do in their survey of the field of fact."

It is only the professional exhorters who are allowed to talk in that way. Once they flung around the lightnings of persecution. Now they only wield stage thunders. But they look what they cannot execute. "Sir," they say to the infidel, "consider yourself blasted." And the infidel lifts his hat with an ironical smile.

Dr. Forsyth has not mastered the elements of psychology. Otherwise he would know how absurd it is to speak of doubt as voluntary. The will has nothing to do with the matter. A man cannot believe as he would; he believes as he must. It is impossible for him to disbelieve what he sees to be the truth—and impossible for him to believe what he sees to be a falsehood.

When a man passes over anything lightly he does so because he thinks it is unimportant. And when Dr. Forsyth speaks of "the historic Christ" he should remember—for he surely knows—that many sceptics do not believe in the historicity of that personage. They have looked into the matter and have found a different conclusion from that which is propounded by Dr. Forsyth. Were they to call him a scoundrel, he would be justly indignant; but it appears that he feels at liberty to suggest that they are no better than they should be.

Considering that at least a half of the people of this country never darken the doors of church or chapel, it seems high time that the men of God dropped these impudent airs of superiority. They are not wiser men, they are not better men, than their fellow citizens. And people are beginning to laugh at the clerical "swelled head."

The Medicine Man, Ancient and Modern.

IN a savage tribe the medicine man and the magic worker are natural and inevitable figures. They are natural because they are of a piece with the rest of the social structure. They are inevitable because in his gropings after knowledge man learns by trial and failure, only finding the truth after many experiences of the false. Moreover, these experts in the supernatural have plenty of work on hand. Being in direct touch with that world of spirits which play so large a part in primitive life, they arrange for success in war and prosperity in peace. They procure good crops and avert disease. They interpret all the signs and wonders that surround man, and subdue him to order or inspire him to action. They interpret omens on the birth of a child, and prescribe the proper methods of attending to the ghost after the individual is dead. If the rest of the tribe has to support the primitive priest, he can at least be said, in a sense, to earn his keep. For the savage does not see how he could get along without him. The primitive community begs the priest to help it, the modern priest begs the community to help him. The positions are reversed; and herein lies a very important moral.

Time passes, and the relations of the priest to the community undergoes a profound change. Things that the priest alone could do other people accomplish without him. Strength, skill, and organisation in warfare are seen to be more important than incantations. The gods, ancient and modern, are on the side of the big battalions. The army chaplain is not invited to the council of war. He blesses the guns, but no one blames him if the gunner misses his object or praises him if the gun shoots straight. He blesses the Army, but if it is unsuccessful it is the generals who are blamed, not the parsons. If the crops are bad, we blame the weather or the soil. We don't say that the gods have nothing to do with the case, but we act as if we believe it. If disease rages, we appeal to the doctor, not to the priest. Even the pious Mr. McKenna, when called on to deal with an outbreak of cattle disease, took the opinion of scientists, and never once consulted any of his highly esteemed Nonconformist ministers. We do not go to the priest to find out the cause of an eclipse, or explain the significance of an epidemic. Nature, as a whole, has put off the livery of the gods, and their uniformed servants wander about without any definite or reliable instructions from their masters. All that God does, apparently, is exist. What he does no one knows; and a large number have ceased to care.

In civilised countries the conditions that gave birth to the priest no longer exist. The frame of mind that called for his help is gone; his function, as a priest, dead. He is as much a rudimentary organ in the body politic as the caudal appendage is in the human body. But he is still with us, still prominent in our social life, still demanding support from the community, and accusing it of lack of duty when it is not forthcoming. It is not important to inquire how many of him there are still with us, nor is it important to find out just how much he costs. The really important inquiry is the part he plays in life. Obviously, he cannot exist on the same terms that governed his existence in primitive communities. He may exert much the same influence—I believe he does—but the outward reasons for his being must be different. He no longer pleads supernatural reasons for his existence; he does not threaten supernatural penalties if we suggest his abolition. Both the justification and the penalties are social in form; and, although this is really giving up the ghost, it is on this ground that he must be met.

One curious feature about an attack on the priest is that he has so few open defenders. (I am using the word "priest" in a very comprehensive sense as embracing all varieties, from the Roman Catholic at the one extreme to the "advanced" Nonconformist at the other). A great many people will join with the Freethinker in denouncing the priesthood, but they will point to the good men among them as proof of the value of religion, to bad ones as evidencing the weakness of human nature, or offer the correction that the evils we ascribe to religion are really due to theology. There are three fallacies here in as many statements. Good and bad men are found in every direction, and in any case I am not concerned with whether the clergy represent good or bad types of human nature. I am only concerned with the influence of the clergy as an organised body; and that, too, only so far as it is a necessary influence. So far as it is accidental, it may be set on one side altogether, whatever its nature may be. To attempt to draw a distinction of any consequence between religion and theology is stupid. The bare belief in supernatural beings or in God, by itself, would be neither good nor bad. It is what man believes to be the relations existing between the gods and himself, and the way in which this influences conduct, that is of importance, and it is the statement of these relations that constitute a theology. There never has been a religion without a theology, and there never will be one. And, as a religion implies and involves a theology, so a theology involves some sort of a priesthood. The three hang together, an inseparable trinity in actual fact.

Now, it is a truism that the organised priesthoods of the world have been hostile to progress. I need not labor the point; it is conceded in the mere fact that each one admits it as true of all the others. Special individuals may here and there have taken the side of reform; special circumstances may for a season have ranged a body of the clergy on the side of reform; but, special circumstances aside, the truth remains that the clergy of all denominations and in all countries are found the supporters of retrogressive ideas. This phenomenon is so general and so uniform that it cannot be accidental. It must be due to something that has its origin in the very function of a priest in all societies immediately above the lowest stage of culture. Personally, I believe it will hold good even there; but I confine myself to the more easily demonstrable proposition.

This proposition is a very simple one: it is that the existence of every clergy, every priesthood, is bound up with the perpetuation of certain ideas quite irrespective of their truth or utility. Progress, we may say, depends on a continuous readjustment of opinion to new needs and a widening circle of information. No man and no society is truly progressive unless he and it holds beliefs as subject to whatever modifications increased knowledge may demand. To the true progressive the past is a book to be consulted, not an oracle to be slavishly obeyed. A new truth is something to be sought for; an opponent one to be welcomed for whatever light he may shed, not an enemy to be repulsed at all costs. On the other hand, the existence of the priest, as priest, depends upon the maintenance of beliefs that all verifiable knowledge tends to discredit. Although he exists in the present, he belongs to the past, and his power is exactly proportionate to his success in keeping the present in line with the past. His function is to hand on established opinions, not to create new ones. His is not only "not to reason why"; it is his task to prevent others reasoning why, or even to feel the necessity for so doing. Instinctively he feels, with an acuteness of perception that is curiously manifested by all vested interests, that a new idea is a ferment that may react disastrously on his position. Self-preservation, the first law of existence for institutions as for organisms, sets the priest in opposition to reform. Oppose it he must; to promote it is an act of class suicide.

The evil does not end here. A class that merely became identified with retrogressive ideas would exert but little influence. It would be known for what it was, and valued accordingly. Their success in safeguarding their status and function is really dependent upon the degree to which they are able to mould character. An historic tradition — little honored by the wisest teachers in all ages—gives them a prominent place in this matter. In that, and in matters of education generally, they still claim a prescriptive right to express an opinion. And yet the fact remains that of all classes in the community the priesthood is the worst possible for the work. Men who commence their career by pledging themselves to a set confession of faith, and continue teaching it by setting upon it an interpretation quite at variance with its plain meaning, must make the worst possible teachers and moulders of character. The secular teacher may be inefficient, but in that case he merely fails. The priestly teacher really aims to distort, and where he is allowed a free hand he rarely fails in his work. Their object is to give a decisive bent to the mind, and one that is fatal to a really healthy citizenship. Men who think more of where an opinion may lead than of the evidence for its justificatian can never either be genuine seekers for truth themselves or train others to the task. They would far rather see people grow up timid and credulous than strong with the strength that is born of fearless questioning and honestly expressed doubt. The purpose of every medicine-man, from the savage to the Nonconformist preacher, is to train people to become dependent on their ministrations, not to walk boldly in a path of their own choosing. By tradition and by training, by love of ease and lust of power, the clergy are thoroughly unfitted for the work of education or the healthy moulding of character. Every good teacher is interested in the ideas he gives his pupils; but the teacher whose existence, as a teacher, is bound up with the perpetuation of a special set of ideas is the most dangerous of all social forces.

Consider the character of those feelings aroused and maintained by religious discipline. The most generous of them are limited by the boundaries of a faith, the less generous by puny sectarian divisions. So far as people outside the faith or sect are considered, they are thought about as potential converts. The larger, healthier, humanitarian note is quite lacking. Unconsciously, this is admitted by the appeal to "Christian men and women" and "Christian feeling" when religious leaders are striving to rouse their followers to a sense of duty. Of course, it may be said that Christian feeling represents the highest to these people. This may be so, but the apology carries its own condemnation. For that, surely, is not the best teaching, which owes all its influence to appeals to what is essentially a sectarian feeling. It is but a poor defence of clerical training to argue that under its influence people are so poorly developed that appeals based on a sense of common humanity falls upon practically deaf ears.

It is the system, not the individual, that I am attacking. Systems and castes mould men, just as surely as men create castes and systems. The medicine man, ancient or modern, is not born but made. He is the creature of a system, just as he strives to make others its victims. Each class has its own special code of honor, and the mischief is that the clergy possess a caste morality of its own that tends to subvert the workings of a healthier social consciousness. For the "greater glory of God" almost anything becomes permissible; moral responsibilities that obtain elsewhere break down here. The story — probably apocryphal — told of Bunyan may be fitly applied. "There but for the grace of God go I," he said, on seeing a criminal led to execution. Were any of us in the pulpit, bound by its traditions, and swathed in its teachings, we all might behave as does the priest. It is not the man that spoils the religion, it is the religion that spoils the man. And that is the ultimate reason for its destruction.

C. COHEN.

The Virgin Birth.

A FEW weeks ago we called attention to a grotesque attempt to explain away great Biblical doctrines, such as those of the Edenic Fall and the Virgin Birth. With reference to the Genesis story the Rev. H. S. M'Clelland, B.A., B.D., asks, "What more beautiful legend could there be than this, which typifies humanity dwelling in that blissful garden of innocence, until the dawning of the moral consciousness, and the beginning of our long struggle with evil, for the conquest of the soul?" According to Mr. M'Clelland, he who takes the narrative of the Fall literally lacks spiritual discernment; he is a dullard, like the Apostle Paul, for example. It was not a deplorable fall, but a marvellous rise, that took place in the Garden of Eden. So, likewise, the Virgin Birth is nothing but a beautiful legend. The following are the reverend gentleman's own words:—

> "Apply the same method of spiritual interpretation to the Nativity stories that surround with their aureole of mystery the birth of Jesus, and you will see that there is more truth within those legends than you were at first aware of. Remember that more than fifty years had passed since that wondrous day, before any record of its events was written down. Remember, also, what Jesus had been to the simple men who wrote them. Is it very strange that they should consider that so unique a life must have had a dramatic entry, even though Jesus himself said nothing about it? They simply could not express what Jesus had been to them without the help of poetry and symbol. So we find his coming attended by the strangest of heavenly portents. A new star appears in the sky and hangs over Bethlehem, wise men come from afar, the heavens are literally opened, the angelic hosts become visible and audible.....To regard these statements as the record of actual facts is to deprive them at once of their spiritual significance for thousands of devout and holy men who simply cannot believe that they ever took place. To hold them as the expression of profound ideal truths is to find them rich in ethical and spiritual store."

If we bluntly characterise the spiritual interpretation of the Nativity stories as groundless and false, we shall be described as spiritually blind, and consequently incompetent to judge; but honesty compels us to declare that if Mr. M'Clelland is right all the Creeds of Christendom are wrong. If the Evangelists were poets, is it not strange that they were never recognised as such until the beginning of the twentieth century? So long as the people could believe the story of the Virgin Birth no one dreamed of regarding it as poetry. Matthew and Luke "could not express what Jesus had been to them" without saying that he came into the world without a human father. In order to tell us how he had changed the world for them by the mighty passion of his life they had to affirm that his mother had never known a man. In other words, the only way to make the truth about Jesus known was to tell a gigantic lie. This is scarcely complimentary to the Evangelists, to say the least; but what we wish to emphasise is the fact that what is actually false cannot be poetically true, or that an event that never took place cannot be "rich in ethical and spiritual store."

Now, the Virgin Birth is or is not a reality; it happened, or it did not happen. If it happened, it is an actual fact; if it did not happen, the only possible interpretation of it consists in the statement that it is a pure myth. If it is only a myth, as Mr. M'Clelland seems to assume, how can it be "rich in ethical and spiritual store"? And what is the good of treating what never occurred as poetry or symbol? A lie can never serve the cause of truth; and a virgin birth that never happened can never show forth the glory of Christ, nor tell the world what he did for his disciples. We maintain, therefore, that by repudiating the Virgin Birth Mr. M'Clelland has considerably weakened the case for the Bible and for Christianity, forgetting that there can be no shadow when the substance causing it has been withdrawn. It is the height of absurdity to speak of the spiritual interpretation of what never took place. To a believer in God and the Deity of Jesus Christ the Virgin Birth is neither impossible nor improbable, and certainly he cannot dismiss it as absurd. Professor Peake, writing from the standpoint of such a believer, puts the case as follows:—

> "We are speaking of one whom we regard as the Son of God, and whose earthly career closed with the still more stupendous miracle of the Resurrection. We are speaking of the central Figure of all history. Approaching the story along these lines, we may feel that in a person so supernatural the Virgin Birth was natural" (Christianity: its Nature and its Faith, p. 190).

When we read the story as related by Matthew and Luke, the impression made upon our minds is that the writers are dealing with a real incident, or at least wish us to believe that they are doing so; and when we come to the Apostles' Creed the impression is deepened. Here Jesus Christ is described as God's only Son, "who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary." Tertullian states that "God, the Son of God, was sent by the Father into the Virgin to be born of her"; that "when Mary conceived, she conceived as a virgin"; and "that what she conceived was God as well as man, the Son of God, who himself, sent by the Father, entered her womb to be born." This does not sound like poetry, does it? This second century Father tells us, further, that the "Son of God was not only sent down of the Father into the womb of Mary the Virgin, but was made flesh there by the agency of the Spirit and power of God." Irenæus is equally positive that the Son of God was made flesh and became man, though he does not mention the agency of the Holy Ghost. In his famous Apology, Justin says that "the Word, who is the first-born of God, was produced without sexual union"; and he assures his readers that the Virgin Birth is by no means an extraordinary thing, as they were constantly meeting with it in Pagan mythologies. There is no trace of poetry or idealism here. There were Christians in the early Church who denied the Virgin Birth, such as the Ebionites, who held that Jesus was only a man, and the Gnostics, who distinguished between the man, born Jesus, and the Christ, that descended upon him, and took possession of him afterwards; but they denied it absolutely, and found no ideal truth whatever in the story. In the Nicene Creed, two centuries later, the Virgin Birth is affirmed with greater clearness than ever. Having described Jesus Christ as "the Son of God, begotten of the Father before all worlds, the only begotten [that is, of the substance of the Father, God of God], Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten not made," the Creed continues: "Who for us men, and for our salvation, came down from heaven and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made man." The Virgin Birth is here a dogma of the most definite and rigid kind, upon which the Muses never breathed. These two Creeds, the Apostles' and the Nicene, with the Athanasian, the Anglican Articles of Religion inform us, "ought thoroughly to be received and believed, for they may be proved by certain warrants of holy Scripture." We fully agree, and cannot understand the position of those who boggle at the Virgin Birth while cheerfully swallowing the Resurrection. The one is not one whit more believable than the other. More irrational still is the attitude of those who endeavor to impose upon both a spiritual interpretation. Many New Theologians do not believe that Christ rose from the dead bodily, but spiritually; but what about his death? Are we to understand that he did not die physically, but ideally? Because it inevitably follows that if he died a bodily death he must have undergone a bodily resurrection, because it was that which died which was declared to have come to life again. Similarly, if Jesus was not born of a virgin he must have had a human father; and if he had a human father there is no intelligible sense in which the Virgin Birth can be true.

We reject the Virgin Birth simply because we believe neither in God nor in Christ, or because we have discarded supernaturalism in all its forms. We do not believe in the Divine Incarnation because we do not believe in Divinity. The late Professor Charles A. Briggs, of New York, imagines, in his Fundamental Christian Faith, that he has "hunted the opponents of the Virgin Birth out of all the holes and corners in which, like rats, they take refuge"; but in reality he has done nothing of the sort. For one thing, they do not take refuge, like rats, in holes and corners, but boldly take their stand upon stubborn facts which cannot be denied. It is utterly immaterial to us whether the word begat in Matthew's genealogy is used in the sense of legal or of physical descent, because we base no argument against the Virgin Birth upon such texts as "Joseph, to whom was betrothed Mary the Virgin, begat Jesus, called the Messiah." Our opposition to that dogma, as well as to all other Christian dogmas, rests upon the total lack of evidence in support of the belief in the supernatural. For all phenomena known to us we can account without going outside Nature; and certainly Jesus can be fully explained without bringing in any supernatural agency. The Christ of Paul and the Church has never done a single thing to prove his own existence. Like his much belauded Sermon, he has been a dead letter in the history of Christendom; and to the Church itself he has been mostly a bone of contention, a man of war rather than a Prince of Peace. But Nature is at last dethroning Supernature, and becoming supreme in human life.

Christianity and the Chinese.—IX.

> "The thin end of the entering wedge destined to split China into fragments, unless anticipated (as in fact it has been) in its disruptive work by some ruder allied agency, was clearly discerned by Consul Alcock while at Shanghai. Under cover of the first French treaties in 1844 and 1846 missionaries effected a legal lodgment on the coast of China, from which they cast longing eyes on the vast interior of the country. Rivalry between the Christian sects brought fresh pressure to bear on the Plenipotentiaries, and the 'toleration clause' was introduced into all the treaties negotiated at Tientsin in 1858 and in the German treaty of 1861."—ALEXANDER MICHIE, The Englishman in China, vol. ii., p. 224.

> "Fancy a Chinese Buddhist mounting on the roof of a hansom cab at Charing Cross and preaching Buddhism to the mob in pidgin English! That would give some measure of the effect produced on a Chinese crowd by a missionary I have seen perched upon a cart outside the great gate of the Tartar city at Peking, haranguing a yellow crowd of gapers in bastard Chinese."—A. B. MITFORD, The Attaché at Peking, p. 37.

OUR next war with China—in which the French took part—occurred in 1856. This arose through the seizure by the Chinese of the lorcha Arrow, trading under the British flag (a "lorcha" is a light vessel with a European hull, rigged like a Chinese junk) from which incident it is known as the "Arrow War," and not, as I was informed in all good faith when I was a child, because the Chinese fought with bows and arrows. This was concluded in 1858 with the treaty of Tientsin. Other treaties were also concluded with Russia, the United States, France, and, in 1861, with Germany. In all these treaties a "toleration clause" was inserted, allowing Christianity to be taught in China. Says Mr. Michie:—

> "What the Chinese would have said had they been free to discuss the demand made upon them, we can hardly conjecture, but in the position in which they actually found themselves they would have subscribed to any form of words submitted to them, their sole anxiety then being to get rid of the barbarians on any terms. Had the preamble run, 'Whereas the Christian religion as practised for 1800 years has not brought peace but a sword upon the earth, has set the father against the son, nation against nation, instigated crimes without number, sided with the oppressor and the unrighteous judge, and is daily prostituted for political ends,' the Chinese would have signed the toleration clause just the same. The phraseology was nothing to them, whence it follows that the responsibility for the consequences rests on the Powers who imposed the form, as well as substance, of the obligations." *

As the same historian further remarks:—

> "The mediæval solicitude for 'saving the heathen' survives, and the statesman has to reckon with it. It can neither be reasoned with nor turned aside, and is the more intractable in that the logical effect of its inspiration is to place it above civil law, but under a divine law of its own interpreting, the interpretation varying indefinitely with the divisions of the force."

Therefore, he says:—

> "To introduce such a complex ferment into the Chinese body politic was a psychological experiment on a colossal scale, and also irrevocable. It was, therefore, an experiment which demanded the kind of precaution used in handling dangerous chemicals. Yet absolutely no thought was bestowed on the subject, the explosive was imported with less ceremony than is bestowed on a bale of long cloth, and left to spread according to its own laws in the living tissue into which it was injected." †

Sir Rutherford Alcock spoke of "the futility of grafting on to a treaty of commerce, forced upon the Chinese under circumstances which left them no power to refuse, a proselytising agency for the conversion of the nation to Christianity."

As Mr. Michie further remarks:—

> "A rose-cutting would not be grafted with the insouciance with which this spiritual element was incongruously inserted in a commercial treaty. Commenting directly upon the toleration clause itself, Sir Rutherford wrote: 'It is only necessary to read carefully the words of the article to be aware that, in the whole range of the treaty, from the first to the fifty-sixth article, there is nothing stipulated for so difficult to secure as the fulfilment in its integrity of this one clause.'" ‡

Sir Rutherford was a clear-headed and far-sighted man, as after events have proved.

We now come to one of the blackest pieces of treachery and forgery ever perpetrated, even in the annals of religious history.

We have seen how the missionaries were turned out of China some centuries before, entirely owing to their quarrels and interference with Imperial affairs. Of course, they could not take the churches, houses, and land they had acquired—in teaching the gospel of Jesus Christ, who, according to the Bible, had not so much as a place to lay his head—so they disposed of them in the best manner they could, probably selling them for what they could get.

The aim of the priests was to obtain possession of this property again by one bold stroke, and this is the way they went about it. To cite the same able historian—Mr. Michie—again:—

> "There was one treaty stipulation which has not been left to chance for its fulfilment—the additional article inserted in the French Convention of Peking in 1860. An astute missionary, acting as interpreter to Baron Gros, managed to interpolate in the Chinese text a clause of their own which had no place in the French—the ruling version—and was quite unknown to the French Envoy. By that clause full permission was accorded to French missionaries to purchase land and erect buildings throughout the empire; and, further, all churches, schools, cemeteries, lands, and buildings which had been owned by persecuted Christians (Chinese) in previous centuries were to be paid for, and the money handed over to the French representative in Peking for transmission to the Christians in the localities concerned. This astounding demand, in our eyes at once so truculent and so impracticable, seems to have been to the Chinese neither more nor less oppressive than the rest of the treaty, and they signed without demur, under the usual mental reservation." *

Mr. Michie does not mention the name of the wretch who was responsible for this piece of perfidy; but we learn from M. Eug. Simon's able work on China that it was M. Delamarre, a French priest belonging to the French foreign mission, who was employed by Baron Gros—the French plenipotentiary—as his chief interpreter. Another proof that a priest can never be trusted and should never be employed in public affairs. A man who perpetrated such a fraud in any matter of daily life, not connected with religion, would be covered with shame and ignominy; he might, like the forger Piggot, blow his brains out when discovered. But religion sanctifies every wickedness when it has a pious motive in view. M. Eug. Simon tells us that not only did M. Delamarre admit to him that he was the author of this pious fraud, but he "boasted of it." †

"Some effort of imagination is required," says Mr. Michie, "to realise what is implied in this surreptitious article," and it cites an analogy made made by Sir Rutherford Alcock, who says:—

> "We must suppose a French Army entering London and there dictating the conditions of peace, and among others one that all church property confiscated by Henry VIII. should forthwith be restored to the Roman Catholic Church by the present holders, however acquired, and without compensation, and that the French Government could be appealed to in order to enforce the rigorous execution of the stipulation."

How the stipulation was enforced is thus described by Prince Kung in his circular of 1871, who declared:—

> "During the last few years the restitution of chapels in every province has been insisted upon without any regard for the feelings of the masses, the missionaries obstinately persisting in their claims. They have also pointed out fine, handsome houses (belonging to, or occupied by, the gentry or others) as buildings once used as churches, and these they have compelled the people to give up. But what is worse, and what wounds the dignity of the people, is that they often claim as their property yamêns, places of assembly, temples held in high respect by the literates and the inhabitants of the neighborhood. Buildings which were once used as chapels have been in some cases sold years ago by Christians; and, having been sold and resold by one of the people to another, have passed through the hands of several proprietors. There is also a large number of buildings which have been newly repaired at very considerable expense, of which the missionaries have insisted on the restitution, refusing at the same time to pay anything for them. On the other hand, there are some houses which have become dilapidated, and the missionaries put in a claim for the necessary repair. Their conduct excites the indignation of the people whenever they come in contact with each other, and it becomes impossible for them to live quietly together." †

This was the work of a Catholic priest, but what was the attitude of the Protestant missionaries towards this abominable treachery? Did they denounce it and decline to take advantage of the forged clause? Not a bit of it; they took full advantage of the forgery and advanced further claims of their own. Says Mr. Michie:—

> "The fraud was more than condoned by missionaries of all nations and sects, whose legal title to residence in > the interior of China, distant from all authority, rests solely on the interpolated French clause, the benefit of which accrues to them under the most-favored-nation privilege. British Protestant missionaries, not altogether satisfied with this tainted title, in a long letter to their Minister, Sir Rutherford Alcock, claimed the right of inland residence on another ground. They adduced the public declaration of Mr. Burlingame, that 'China invites Protestant missionaries to plant the shining Cross on every hill and in every valley,' to which the answer was simple, that the Chinese Government disavowed the promises of the Envoy, and repudiated the implied obligation." *

This so-called Burlingame "mission," which provides one of the very few touches of the comic element in the tragedy of China, came about in this way. When Mr. Burlingame was paying his farewell visit to the Chinese Ministers before retiring from his post as Minister for the United States of America, Prince Kung made the polite remark, "Now, why cannot you, when you are again in the West, represent our views of what is taking place in China, and of what we would wish to have done in our country?" Mr. Burlingame replied, "Should I visit any of the Courts of Europe, I shall have much pleasure in doing so." Mr. Burlingame seems to have taken a polite speech—and China is the country of polite speeches—too literally, and presently entered upon his comic-opera mission to the Courts of Europe, which is now chiefly remembered, says Mrs. Archibald Little, in her Life of Li Hung Chang, by its leader's public declaration that "China invites Protestant missionaries to plant the shining Cross on every hill and in every valley," a statement, she indignantly remarks, "which leads people of certain temperament to form so stern a judgment of the speaker that I refrain from touching further on this episode" (p. 64).†

Mr. Burlingame must have known the statement to be perfectly false when he made it, or, if he did not, he was unfit to hold his position as representative of the United States; he was, therefore, guilty of bad faith towards the Chinese Government in misrepresenting their wishes. The missionaries also knew, from personal experience, that the statement was false, but this did not prevent them from using it as a lever by which to force an entry into the inland parts of China. While they are loud in denouncing the Jesuit maxim that "the end justifies the means," they always practise it when they have the opportunity.

Paganism and Christianity.

AN unusually interesting article appears in the June New Church Monthly (Swedenborgian) on the subject of "Paganism and Christianity," written by the Rev. J. R. Rendell, B.A. The reverend gentleman has been paying a visit to Rome, the result being to bring to his mind in "an astonishingly vivid way" the fact, "known to every student," of the close connection which exists between the old Pagan worship of Rome and Christianity. It is certain, says he, that Pagan temples were used as Christian churches. Ancient ceremonies like the burning of the lamp before the altar were retained. Incense was burnt before the Gods of Rome. The worship of the Virgin is not far removed from the adoration of one of the Roman goddesses. Even the robes of the Pagan priests were worn. Archæologists, says he, assure us that nearly all the details of the dress of a cardinal were to be found on the dress of the Assyrian priests. As Mr. Rendell visited the chief monuments of the city he "was often reminded of the close relations between the ancient civic life of Rome and the customs of Christianity." The popes did not hesitate to despoil the ancient Forum to add to the glories of the Church. The great bronze doors of St. John's Lateran were formerly the doors of the Senate House. Professor Reynaud said that if by some divine power all that belonged to the Pagan temples of the Forum and its civic buildings were to be restored, St. Peter's itself would be the very first to move to the centre of the city. This, however, is more particularly interesting to the archæologist. What is more serious from the Christian point of view is the "naked and unabashed" way in which Rome has borrowed Pagan ideas and ceremonies. Mr. Rendell was present in St. Peter's on the occasion of some important ceremony at which the Pope was to have officiated, but did not owing to illness. The service occupied about two hours, but the vast congregation seemed to take no part at all in it. There was nothing for the congregation to sing, not even a response. No seats are provided. The people crowded and crushed as they might on entering some place of entertainment. Mr. Rendell could not help being struck by the irreverent manner of the priests. None of the crowd could hear a single sentence of the service.

A bronze statue of St. Peter is of special interest to the worshipers. It is blackened by age, with the exception of the great toe on the right foot, which is kept bright by the lips of the faithful. A line of worshipers was waiting the opportunity of kissing the toe. "What are we to think of it?" exclaims Mr. Rendell. No wonder, says he, the Churches of Italy are deserted and that they are forsaken by the intellect of the nation. Indeed, in Northern Italy, there is scarcely a good word for the priests. In Italy, as in France, the Government has found it necessary to suppress the monasteries.

Most of the Churches boast the possession of some relic of a saint. Mr. Rendell hopes he was willing to believe what the custodians told him, but even his powers of credence gave out when he was shown the bones of the whale that swallowed Jonah!

Another relic was a piece of the rock that Moses struck. Mr. Rendell (who is a Swedenborgian) is not particularly enamored of typical Protestant Christianity, but, at any rate, it is an advance on such besotted superstition as this. Moreover, Protestantism is an elastic term which may be stretched even to the extent of covering the position of the non-historicity of the gospel Jesus. Vide sundry reverends who are attending to the obsequies of historical Christianity. But the most striking instance of Paganism, says Mr. Rendell, is the Bambino, which he was shown in the Church of Araceeli. This object is a large and somewhat ugly doll, covered with gold chains and jewels, and is kept in a glass case to protect it from theft. Not so long ago it was carried through the city as a means of staying an epidemic disease. At the present time children are often brought to it as a means of healing.

Mr. Rendell tells us that the great monuments of the city are a reminder of the divine honors paid to the Cæsars. These honors could only be conferred by the Senate by vote, and he recalls that Faustina was the first Roman lady to enter heaven, and she was smuggled in by a snatch vote. Mr. Rendell asks, is not this election to divine honors just what takes place on the canonisation of a saint? The cardinals assembled in the Sistine Chapel determined by vote whether a person was to be recognised as a saint or not. This, by the way, was the method adopted by the Church to decide which of the mass of Gospels and Epistles afloat in the fourth century should be regarded as inspired and which not. It suggests the question whether those who decided really cared whether the documents they selected were authentic or not so long as they put an end to a much debated question; for it surely must have occurred to the meanest intellect that the intrinsic truth of a book could not be demonstrated by a mere show of hands.

It has not yet dawned on Mr. Rendell that the facts he has personally vouched for are not the only reminiscences of Paganism in Christianity. If he extends his researches he will discover that practically the whole system is Paganism under another name.

Mr. Rendell strikes a really good note in winding up his article. He says had he been compelled to choose between a religion that trusted to such ceremonies as he had witnessed at St. Peter's, and certain almost equally superstitious forms of Protestant worship at Rome, he fears he would have been constrained to join the crowd of those Italians who are utterly dissatisfied with religion and who have become Agnostics. Never before had he so fully realised the causes of Italian scepticism. A deeper penetration into the origins of Christianity may enable him to realise the causes, not only of Italian scepticism, but of that cosmopolitan scepticism which is undermining the Christian religion throughout the world.

Acid Drops.

We can't help saying "I told you so," although the telling required no supernatural, or even remarkable, insight into matters. Still, when the religious press was publishing special articles on "China's appeal for prayer," and writing fantastic accounts of how Chinese statesmen felt the need for Christian help, we pointed out how absurd the whole business was. The Chinese did not want Christianity, and do not want it. It suited the missionary game to pretend otherwise, and the British public—surely the most gullible public in Europe!—were led to believe that if only people would subscribe liberally, within a very little while the Chinese Empire would be practically Christianised. It was not clear why these subscriptions were necessary. If the Chinese were really crying out for Christianity, and prostrating themselves in admiration before the types of Christians they saw—evidently a much different lot to what we have at home—there was nothing in the world, as far as we could see, to prevent their adopting Christianity offhand. But lavish subscription is always essential to missionary work. You must subscribe to help an Almighty God do his work, and you must subscribe to induce a people to adopt a religion they are clamoring to secure.

From recent articles in the daily press we find that the cat is now out of the bag. Yuan-Shi-Kai, who spoke well of Christianity, has been elected President of the Republic, and one of the earliest of his edicts has practically re-established Confucianism as the official creed. He cites Confucius's teaching that after war comes peace, and with peace real tranquillity and happiness, and declares that to be "the function of republicanism." And he adds that Confucius "must remain the teacher of China for thousands of generations." For thousands of generations! After that Christianity may be given a chance. And the poor fools in England were subscribing in the hope of an immediate conversion of the Celestial Empire! Of course, the religious leaders who worked the yarn of China's immediate conversion have remained quiet. That is only to be expected. People who lie for the glory of God usually remain silent under exposure.

Public bodies in China have been ordered to revive the ceremonies of Confucius, and the President will worship, officially, as Patriarch at the Temple of Heaven. The Daily Telegraph says that the appeal of the Government for "Christian prayers for the Republic throughout England and America only, two months ago, now assumes a particularly ugly look," and adds that the history of official China since 1911 may be "expressed in one pregnant word—bluff." We may point out that the Chinese did not ask for Christian prayers "throughout England and America." That was a Christian distortion of the truth. All it asked for was the prayers of Christians in China. That, we agree, was bluff. It deceived no person of common sense or knowledge. We do not believe it deceived even the missionaries themselves. But it suited their game to accept the bluff at its face value, and we expect the Chinese officials were sufficiently cute in their estimate of missionary psychology to realise that the missionaries would be their best helpers at the game.

Six of Dr. Orchard's "Modern Tracts on Religion" have now been published in the Christian Commonwealth. The sixth is entitled "Why Go to Church?" and, like its predecessors, it contains several observations which are obviously true. It is true, for example, that "the church's call to worship no longer possesses any Divine or natural right in the estimate of the majority." It is true, also, that if the tendency to non-churchgoing "continues our churches will soon be standing as forsaken and ruined as the monasteries." It is true, further, "that communal worship and religious fellowship are essential to religion, and particularly to Christianity." Then there follows a series of assertions that are palpably false. It by no means necessarily follows that "the decay of a social custom is due to the decay of the social sense." It is, on the contrary, a demonstrable fact that the custom of church-attendance has never tended to the cultivation of the social sense; as a matter of fact, it has, rather, fostered the spirit of division and snobbishness. It may safely be affirmed that the overwhelming majority of scoundrels, in all ages, have been noted for their devotion to religious exercises. It was stated that the notorious criminal, Charles Peace, had a pew in a South London church. We differ totally from Dr. Orchard, and without fear of contradiction from history reverse his statement thus: "It is much more likely that the notorious sweater will be found on Sunday singing hymns about entire consecration, rather than raising clouds of dust upon our country roads, or sunning himself for the week-end at some luxurious seaside hotel." The truth is that even Dr. Orchard fails to make out a good case for the superstitious and antiquated custom of church-going. It is a thoroughly bad case, and no amount of eloquent writing can ever make it good.

The religious bodies at Lincoln plied the Town Council with deputations against the Sunday cinematograph shows. We are glad to note that they failed in this professional effort. The continuance of the shows on Sunday was carried by a majority of twelve to six. Unfortunately, however, the Council started a censorship of the pictures, besides refusing to let the shows open till after "divine service" in the evening, thus limiting the performances to an hour and a half, from 8.30 to 10, and practically preventing the attendance of children. The censorship provides that "on Sundays only religious, historical, scientific, landscape, maritime, or select topical pictures shall be exhibited." This is pure Sabbatarianism, and we should like to know what right Town Councils have to impose that burden upon the public. The cream of this wretched joke is yet to come. Legal opinion at Brighton has been given in favor of what we have always maintained; namely, that Town Councils have no power to grant Sunday licences at all—that their legal control over the picture shows begins on Monday morning and ends on Saturday night. Why don't the picture theatre people in some town pluck up courage and defy the "authorities"? They would be sure to win if they stuck together.

"The Scythe" was the title of a column sketch by Basil Macdonald Hastings in the Daily News of July 2, and as it was placed next to the leading articles it must have been considered of some importance. We have only one fault to find with it; what William Cobbett might have called its "base and bloody" theology. A shocking motor-car accident is related, in which two attractive young people, bride and bridegroom, are crushed to death, besides other unfortunate victims of the unforeseeable. A peasant who had come over the hedge to lend a hand goes back to his grass-mowing, and the article winds up thus:—"Man scythes on one side of the hedge; God on the other." Is this what the Daily News wants people to believe? Mowing down the grass is honest and useful labor. Mowing down human beings is sheer massacre. The peasant was earning his living—and perhaps his wife's and children's. God was simply amusing himself.

What a pity it is that God (if there be a God) does not look after the world better. A Clerkenwell magistrate, the other day, asked a woman, "What is your husband?" "A druokard, sir," she replied. Poor woman! Yet even according to orthodox Christianity the world has been under God's management for six thousand years! He might have done better in that time by what commercial advertisers call "strict attention to business."

Rev. Dr. Alfred Rowland, who is retiring from the ministry, has gone over the manuscripts of his sermons and destroyed over two thousand of them. We believe the public has reason to be thankful. Suppose he had published them!

"If Christian men," says Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., "will not perform the duties of citizenship, you may be quite sure that other men will pour into the gap and bring selfish motives and unclean hands to the work." Mr. Henderson is named as the next president of the "Brotherhood" movement. Apparently his conception of brotherhood is to associate all who are not Christians with "selfish motives and unclean hands." We should have thought that Mr. Henderson's experience of churches and chapels would have shown him a deal of both in close connection with the most fervent Christian belief. At any rate, if his experience has been so curiously limited as to be otherwise, we shall be happy to put him on the track of getting evidence. The real vice of our public life is that it has been so largely in the hands of Christians; and Christianity has, along with the mouthing of superficially admirable sentiments, always had the effect of encouraging a type of mind fatal to a healthy social life. We might even suggest Mr. Henderson himself as evidence. For when a man has reached the point of ranking people as desirable citizens on the ground of whether they believe in Christianity or not, and so slandering a large number of his fellow citizens, he himself is helping to lower the standard of citizenship in no small measure.

"Why should we be ashamed of emotion and feeling?" asks the Rev. J. E. Rattenbury. We do not know that anyone desires that people should be ashamed of expressing emotion; and whether they are ashamed of it or not, it remains an inescapable fact. Freethinkers only complain when religionists take a burst of emotion for the conclusions of impartial reasoning. And above all, they object to the manner in which a highly emotional state is deliberately cultivated in some religious meetings; and while under its influence, people are induced to say things they would never dream of saying in their cooler moments. Such conduct is pure quackery. From a reasonable point of view, opinions expressed under such conditions are of no more value than those expressed under the influence of alcohol. There are many forms of intoxication, and there are many kinds of intoxicants. Perhaps the most dangerous form of all is that of lashing oneself into a frenzy of emotion in order to reach a conclusion that could not be attained otherwise. Emotion has its legitimate place in life, but a good thing out of its place becomes a veritable nuisance.

Mr. Parton Millum, in the Methodist magazine, the London Quarterly, says of Darwin's method of working that "the pivot upon which evolution has rested, and the means by which it has conquered men's minds, was a train of thought, a logical syllogism, rather than an observed sequence of events in outward nature." Mr. Millum should be more careful as to his facts, especially when the facts are so easily ascertainable. For instance, Darwin spent some twenty years in experimenting and observing before he published his great work on earthworms. His works on the fertilisation of orchids and insectivorous plants are also monuments of close observation and the careful checking of theory by facts. On the Origin of Species Darwin began to write in 1837, and did not publish for twenty-two years after. There are not many who observe and reflect for over twenty years in order to test a theory. One may safely say, if that were a general rule, many theories would be abandoned before publication. For a Christian to urge the complaint approaches very near impudence.

The Rev. George M. Searle, C. S. P., may be an excellent Catholic priest, but he is either profoundly ignorant of science, or he wilfully misrepresents it. In the Catholic Herald for July 5, the reverend gentleman asserts that there is "no real science" in Darwinism, that "the real inner ring of scientists have no real expectation that any further advance will be made in it," and that "some of them, who are opposed to religion, are trying to find some substitute for it, such as the production of life by artificial means." Every one of these assertions is wholly false. If Darwinism is "no real science," no real science exists. In point of fact, Darwinism is the accepted science of to-day, even for "the real inner ring of scientists." Will Mr. Searle kindly name five first-class biologists who are not Darwinians? The truth is that he does not know what he is writing about. Fancy his imagining that any biologist or even physicist can be silly enough to suggest the possible artificial production of life as a substitution for Darwinism. Why the two have absolutely nothing in common. Darwinism does not trouble itself about the origin of life, but with its evolution, with special reference to the origin of species. The curious thing is that Mr. Searle gives his readers nothing but bare assumptions and assertions, as if the mere word of a priest were sufficient on every point. It is not sufficient, however; and now at last even Catholics are beginning to find this out.

It is interesting to note that a writer in the Catholic organ of the Anglican Communion, the Church Times for July 4, candidly admits that "Darwinism (transmutation of species) is taught everywhere as a dead certainty." Here we have one Catholic giving another the lie direct on a simple question of fact.

To serve the will of God simply means to exhibit piety, to be devout, and take delight in religious exercises. According to the Burton Evening Gazette for June 30, the Rev. E. Gilmour told the Red Cross Society and the Territorials, on the occasion of their annual military parade recently, that everything depends upon our attitude to God's will. We may be the best people in the world, doing all the good we can from the purest human motives, and yet, unless we are pious and show our piety by our attendance at public worship, we shall be accursed for ever. The vicar went to the length of saying that "God will disown all service that is done without any regard to his will." This may be sound Gospel teaching, and certain emotionally religious people may welcome it because it panders to their vanity; but as a matter of fact, it is nothing but arrant nonsense, and they who indulge in it are reaping their reward—emptying churches and chapels.

We agree with the Dean of Durham (Dr. Hensley Henson) that the secularisation of Christianity would be its destruction, and that they who take part in that process are its worst enemies; but after stating that truth, the Manchester Guardian for July 1 represents him as proceeding to make a savage and libellous attack upon Secularism and its effects upon character. Losing his temper, he thundered out that "in the English-speaking communities the spread of Secularism had been accompanied by sinister demonstrations of moral decline." Such a statement is absolutely false; and the reference to "the far extended corruption of American politics" is at once irrelevant and in very bad taste. It is generally admitted that the last Presidential Election in the States was the purest in the history of the country. Dean Henson had better stick to the truth and crucify his blind prejudices.

"Divine service" was held lately at Buddon Camp for the second Lowland Brigade. Chaplain R. M. Adamson officiated. The pulpit was extemporised from a gun limber. An excellent way of honoring the Prince of Peace!

The proprietors of the Christian Herald, at one time edited by prophet Baxter, have a curious sense of humor. They issue pictorial contents-bills, and the one for last week represented a battleship with big guns sticking out in all directions. Underneath were the words, "Entente Cordiale." A truly Christian idea of friendship!

Glad Tidings.

Down in the soul-swarming region of Hades,
Down in the lurid recesses of hell,
Christians—except a few humbugs and ladies—
Tell us that sceptics for ever will dwell;
Calling on God in vain,
Writhing in swoonless pain,
Senses unblunted and nerves all awake;
Dowered with hellish might Meet for the endless fight,
Swathed in the flames of the sulphurous lake.

Up through the sky on the line of the plummet;
Up in the star-swarming region of space,
Christians will each have a harp, and will strum it,
Praising for ever God's love and his grace;
Grandly their hymns will swell,
Drowning the shrieks from Hell.
Mothers above, and their children below:
What though our children roast,
Praise Father, Son, and Ghost!
We have been rescued, and share not their woe!

Some of a family chanting God's praises;
Some of them, tortured, despairingly cry;
Some of them endlessly shrieking in blazes;
Some of them joyously singing on high—
Out on the heartless knaves!
Comfort their foolish slaves!
Sow what is true, if contentment you'd reap;
Cast heav'n and hell away!
Work! and let noodles pray!
Then shall your children say:
Life is a summer's day; Death is a sleep.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged. £156 16s. 11d. Received since:—W. Cromack, 5s.; H. M. Ridgway, £1.

G. FROST.—We don't understand what you want. If meetings of 5,000 are held in Leeds already, as you say, what special "help" is required. London headquarters spent a good deal of money on Leeds a year or more ago, and the local Branch ought to be running well "on its own" now. If it wishes for the services of London lecturers now and then, it should apply for them in the ordinary way.

W. MATHIAS.—Glad to hear the Freethinker has been of so much use to you. With regard to the other matter, we are not going to have the question of the suffrage, which is purely political, either for men or women, discussed in these columns. The rest of your observations commit you to nothing. Do you mean that political or social parties have a right to practise arson in order to advertise their cause or terrify the community? Or do you confine this privilege to women? And why do you mention Byron? He assisted Greece against Turkey; true, but it was in open warfare; he did not live amongst the Turks, enjoy all the advantages of doing so, and do them all the injury he could in an anonymous and surreptitious manner. As to "God defend the right," we should laugh at it on any banner; in fact, we have often done so. It invites ridicule. God defend the right! Whoever found him doing it?

A. MILLAR.—Glad to see the letter of which you enclose copy. We repeat our wish that Freethinkers would make more use of their local newspapers. You omitted the name of the paper from which the larger cutting was taken.

W. L. DEWAR.—Your compliments to the Freethinker are appreciated. Thanks for your effort to promote its circulation amongst your friends.

RAGGED ROBIN.—The verses are not one of your happiest efforts. Nothing atones for the lack of simplicity and sincerity. You cannot really mean that the working classes are "fed on stones."

D. MANNING.—We suppose it was left to the publishers; anyhow, we have not been favored with a review copy of the Rationalist Peace Society's new volume of Essays. You know now.

C. F. B.—Yes, we were right over the latest Eastern Question. The Balkan war has, as you say, followed the course we predicted at the very beginning. The Christian brigands are fighting each other for the lion's share of the spoil. The cutting you send us is one proof amongst many that the ordinary newspapers are following in our wake—after the event.

A. J. MARRIOTT.—What you may wish to see on Sunday, and what you may have a right to impose upon other people by Sabbatarian legislation, are entirely different things. And how on earth do picture shows interfere with cricket and other outdoor games? We fail to see any serious rivalry—for the games are played in the day and the picture shows are most patronised in the evening. Anyhow, the law of liberty is the best law in all such cases.

W. CROMACK says he is glad to see that Mr. Foote is better in health. He takes two Freethinkers a week, and wishes all readers who can afford it would do the same.

E. B.—Much obliged.

J. J. WARDHAUGH.—Shall be sent as desired. Much obliged for the list.

J. BLACKHALL.—Shall have attention. But 'tis impossible for us to regulate all the Freethought platforms in England. The local Freethinkers should move first in such matters.

ROBERT KENNEDY.—The names and addresses we really want are not those of hardened bigots, but those of persons who show liberal-minded tendencies. Sorry you misread the announcement.

W. J. RAMSEY.—See paragraph.

A. H. P.—It has no merit as verse.

J. A. R.—Apply to J. R. Holmes, Hanney, Wantage, Berks.

G. CHRISTIAN.—Mr. Foote will write you on the matter of your letter.

FREDERICK DIXON.—Our paragraph on Mrs. Stetson and her relation to the Christian Science movement was based, as was stated, on the account given by the Daily Telegraph. We cannot take further responsibility for its accuracy. Still, as you say that Mrs. Stetson's connection with the movement was brought to a close "several years ago," and as she is now running an opposition body, calling it a "split" doesn't seem a very grave abuse of language. We did not say that Mrs. Eddy taught reincarnation, only that Mrs. Stetson claims, or it has been claimed for her, that she is a reincarnation of Mrs. Eddy. We are not very much interested in the question of whether reincarnation is correct Christian Science teaching or not.

"AN OLD BRADLAUGHITE," in sending us an account of last Sunday's annual pilgrimage to Bradlaugh's grave at Woking, expresses his disgust at the behavior of a well-known Christian Evidence speaker and his supporters, some of whom must have travelled to Woking for the express purpose of misbehaving themselves. The graveside is a place that has a restraining and sobering effect upon all with a spark of decency in their composition, but those C. E. S. gentlemen who went to Woking for the purpose of attacking the N. S. S. and its work must have lacked even that solitary spark. A meeting was organised outside the Cemetery gates, and the public treated to the customary slanders of the N. S. S. and those who carry on its work. The effort does not appear to have met with great success, and we hope that thoughtful Christians present made due note of the place and method of attack and the type of those who engineered it.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. M. H. Donohoe contributed a good article to the Daily Chronicle (July 2) on the death of Henri Rochefort. When the great French journalist left the Intransigeant in 1907, after being connected with it for twenty-seven years, he transferred his pen to the Patrie—a journal of a very different color. On this point Mr. Donohoe writes:—

> "His departure from the Intransigeant set Paris talking. The old Atheist, it was said, had seen the error of his way, and had decided to die in the bosom of the Church.
> "Well do I remember calling on Rochefort on this occasion to ask his opinion. His mop of white hair stood bolt upright. The face was pale, but the eyes had lost none of their fire and the body little of its vigor. The man himself possessed that silvery speech, that vivaciousness and charm of manner which combined to make him the most dreaded, albeit the most admired, man in France. In his vigorous fashion, M. Rochefort denied that he had taken the road to Canossa. 'My convictions,' he said, 'religious or anti-clerical, whichever you wish, have undergone no change, neither have my political views. I am still as anti-clerical as ever. My enemies say this is my one consistent attitude. When I ceased attending church, I did not become anti-religious. It was only that my way of viewing things religious had become changed. It was quite a mistake to suppose that I am thirsting to kill all the priests in France. When I meet a good fellow in the shape of a curé, I have not the slightest objection to cracking a bottle of champagne with him."

Rochefort's nature was evidently less vitriolic than his pen. "The old Atheist" was no bigot.

Professor F. T. Del Marmol, writing to the Star, says that Henri Rochefort had a free hand in the Patrie and his articles were most distasteful to the Clericals. "So strongly did he feel on the subject of religion," Professor Del Marmol continues, "that he said to me, not many months ago, that he could never understand how any thinking man could accept the dogmas of any of the existing religious creeds."

We have pleasure in calling attention to the excellent July number of the English Review. Mr. Henry Newbolt's article on "John Milton" is extremely well written. His position is one that we have ourselves maintained in the Freethinker, especially during the late centenary; namely, that the Puritan ossification of Milton's genius prevented his fulfilling the promise of his exquisite early poems. Mr. Newbolt smiles broadly at Addison's assurance that the theme of Paradise Lost could never lose its interest, as "all will, through all ages, bear the same relation to Adam and Eve." That statement might have been generally endorsed so recently as fifty years ago, but we belong now to "a generation which does not number Adam and Eve among its ancestors." This is followed by a further instalment of the deeply interesting correspondence between Nietzsche and Brandes. Mr. Arnold Bennett's article on "The Writing of Plays" is written with intellect and authority. Professor Rémond's scientific article on "The Sexual Correlations of Poetic Genius" is calculated to flutter the Suffragette dovecotes. Its conclusion is that the qualities and functions of men and women are determined by physiology; and as it is the male generally, who wears and wields the sexual decorations amongst the lower animals, so it is the human male who paints the pictures and writes the poetry. The other articles include a noticeable one on "Women and Morality," by a Mother. It is strongly written and remorselessly points out social evils. But the writer seems more plain-spoken than she really is. She hints at her solutions, but does not actually state them, and we are left with a feeling of frustration. Mr. Norman Douglas's "Pioneer of Aviation" is brightly and vividly written — and humorous; and the editor's monthly notes are, as usual, stirring and suggestive. Freethinkers should not neglect the English Review.

The Leeds Branch of the N.S.S. recently applied for permission to renew its meetings on Woodhouse Moor, where the same conditions appear to govern the sale of literature and the taking up of collections there that obtain in the London Parks. That is, permission of the Council must be first of all obtained. At the request of the local secretary Miss Vance, the Society's general secretary, applied to the Parks Committee of the City Council, asking that such permission should be given. As the request came from headquarters, there could be no question as to the bonâ-fides of the organisation. The reply to the application was that the Parks Committee had advised the Council "not to accede to the application of your Society for permission to make collections and sell literature at meetings on Woodhouse Moor." We are not aware of the ground on which permission is given by a City Council to some societies to do certain things and withhold from others. It appears to be a gross usurpation of power, and the Leeds Branch is taking steps to make a public protest against such differential treatment. We hope that this public protest will be as effective in Leeds as it has been in London, and the local Society may rely upon headquarters' assistance in any legitimate effort it may make to vindicate its right to just treatment at the hands of the public authorities.

The July number of the Humanitarian (organ of the Humanitarian League, price one penny) is well up to its usual excellent level. There is a moderate but firm protest against some of the cruder cinematograph shows, in which cruel violence (of men to animals or animals to each other) is represented. Young people, especially, cannot be improved by such pictures. This is followed by a spirited protest against Child Beating—a matter in which "God's Englishman" is miles below the heathen Jap. How this brutal practice degrades even superior men is shown by Mr. John Burns's reply to a question put to him in the House of Commons by Mr. O'Grady respecting the flogging of convalescent boys in the Camberwell workhouse infirmary. "My attention," Mr. Burns said, "has been called to this matter. The punishment does not seem to have been excessive, and I see no necessity for a public inquiry." Who would have thought, when John Burns was imprisoned in connection with the "Battle of Trafalgar Square," some twenty-five years ago, that he would sink into giving such pompous and callous replies to questions in the House of Commons? We ought to be grateful to the Humanitarian for turning the searchlight of publicity upon these exhibitions of brutal stupidity. We do not speak in haste to repent at leisure. Beating children at all is a moral offence; and beating them deliberately in public institutions is a social crime.

Mr. M. M. Mangasarian has delivered his farewell address for the 1912-13 season to the Independent Religious Society (Rationalist) at Chicago. The first lecture of the 1913-14 season will be delivered on October 5. In the Program for May 25 Mr. Mangasarian wrote:—

> "And now let me utilise this opportunity to express once more my deep appreciation of the loyalty of the members to our platform; of the devotion of the Trustees to the interests of the Society; of the activity of the ladies who have so admirably kept up the study classes and the evening meetings, which have done so much to cultivate the social spirit among us. I am also greatly indebted to the ushers, who, with wonderful regularity and commendable disinterestedness, have given their Sunday mornings to the care of the audience, which frequently overflowed the house when hundreds had to be turned away. No public speaker in Chicago is more fortunate either in the number or in the character of his colleagues as is—Your grateful lecturer, M. M. MANGASARIAN."

We are delighted to read this favorable report.

The St. James's Gazette (July 2) was tolerant enough to publish a letter from Mr. Joseph Lebois-Carey, of Cardiff, against the cruel sport of otter hunting. "I have travelled widely," he concluded, "and in my varied experience I have found as much, when not more, kindness and downright honest regard evinced among professed Freethinkers, Agnostics, and Atheists than among those Christians who profess to serve an all-merciful God."

"Quo Vadis?"

I WAS in the mood of Kipling's camel; I had got the hump, the double hump; I had to wash and dress, tie and collar, and clean boots, and walk all the way into the town to worry about a blessed pump valve; leave my books and everything and pad the hoof over a newly tarred road; no trams, no penny 'buses, shanks's pony all the way; so I had the hump, and when I had seen about the pump, and had half-an-hour with one of the most tempting bookshops (and bookseller's) in the kingdom, I did not feel like sitting down to write or read.

So I decided I'd go on for a bust, and recklessly dashed down sixpence to see what the film really could make of Quo Vadis?

It was the early show, and some of the élite (moi aussi) had been moved to attend, but particularly to be noted, was a considerable delegation from the two grammar schools.

As they filed in in batches, it would seem that this must have been a special bit of 'cute managership (reduced prices for schools, perhaps), seconded by the goody teachers and chiefs.

It was rather droll later on to note the very evident dilemma as to whether they should clap when the ghost of Christ walked along the Via Appia, or whether they should be particularly grave and quiet; I think the clappers had it.

As a sample of film-making, there is no doubt it deserves all that has been said about it.

The acting, or posing, is as perfect as one can think possible; the pictures of the men and women really look as if copied from actual living, breathing men and women, not mere dolls or dummies; and the architectural construction and details seem as near perfection as any theatrical scenes can possibly be. The pictures look as if photographed from real marble and stone. It may be that the duplications of transference, from the built-up wood and canvas to the first photo and then from that to the film photo, gives opportunities for touching-up and solidifying; I cannot say, but the final effect is very, very real.

So, also, is the fine scene—the burning of Rome; it is an exceedingly clever bit of stage craft, and some of the incidents really grip.

Another detail worth note, too, is the completeness of every picture, calling for big, busy, masses of people; the crowds are real crowds; it is difficult to specify and say which is the best when each is so good, but certainly the great banquet scene, with the dancers, is worth notice.

But, having said all this of the production, as a wonderfully complete bit of workmanship, what is to be said of the idea of making a public show of such a series of incidents, no matter be they true or false?

How the clergy of this enlightened land of ours can ever have been brought to consider such a show of any advantage to them is beyond comprehension.

As something to read, Sienkiewcz's clever novel, no doubt, has been read by thousands without more than the usual satisfaction or realisation that graphic writing gives, but with a really well done film there comes a something which, for a moment, must move almost the most cold-blooded and captious of critics.

Without any doubt, the moving picture bites into one with a keenness that not even Dickens or Zola can touch, and, by the same token, the feelings of disgust and ludicrousness are enormously intensified also.

Great Nero! what can these fool Christians be thinking of, to boom up this Quo Vadis? film in the way they do, while to any thinking being—to even the most careless thinker it seems almost—the outstanding feature of the show must be an echo of the old cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

There is no single phase of the whole so many thousand yards of film, where the religious part is made prominent, that does not positively glow with the abounding futility, the absolute puerility, of the God or the Christ to whom they appeal.

It is to see a marvel of impotence to compare the ferocious completeness of Nero with the conduct of the apostle Peter when he meets the ghost of Christ on the Appian Way.

Peter has had enough of Rome, so he and a disciple are doing a best on record "Down to Dixie" or elsewhere, and have just got on to a straight stretch towards safety when they meet a shadow; they are asked where they are off to in such a ragtime hurry, and told that if they do not go back and attend to things, "he" will have to go, and be a second time made a sacrifice.

The thought seems to jump at one, on the very minute, why the plague he does not go, if he be "he"? why, if the first sacrifice was any sort of good, his chosen ones should be in such deadly strait as they are said to be? But no; the shadow fades away, and, as Peter and his mate turn on their tracks, we match the Quo Vadis? with Cui Bono? A lot of his chosen ones get burned in the general conflagration; some are soaked in the Roman equivalent of kerosine, and set up on tall poles and used as torches; and another lot are kept for what is a really fine bit of scenery—the arena and the lions.

A mob of men, women, and babies—bowing, crouching, horror-stricken—some with arms uplifted towards the sky, praying to their damnably idle or careless God, the mock of the effective, potent Nero, the one real dominating force of the whole show, every nerve and sense plainly at bursting point with a surfeit of the pleasure of almost unlimited power.

The horror grows as the animals come up into the arena, and prowl around, and draw near the "chosen ones"; and, as Carlyle said, "God does nothing."

A sudden flash and blank—and—some little heaps dotted about, a scuffle over the last mouthful—and —— Well, what price that for a living, loving God?

What everlasting blithering fools these Christians must be to allow this to be seen.

The final duel between Ursus and the bull seems almost tame compared to the previous one, although the bull has the heroine strapped on. The leap of the hero down into the arena, and the baring of his bosom, is acting—and looks like it; and the death of the butcher of Rome leaves one unmoved—he deserved something slow, with burning oil, unless the last joke of Petronius could be made effective.

Just when dying he read a letter which was to be sent to Nero, and in it said to be a matricide or to burn a city was nothing, but for Nero to read his poems to his guests was something in the way of a refinement of cruelty; and so it almost seems to me that for the poor Christians of to-day to be invited to see Quo Vadis? as a means of Christian propaganda is really taking a mean advantage of their supreme ignorance and want of logic. It is a low-down, mean sort of trick to play on them.

It would almost pay for Freethinkers to circulate a small leaflet to annotate the Quo Vadis? program. Will someone try it?

The Gospel History a Fabrication.

THE TIME WHEN JESUS LIVED.

THE period in Jewish history at which Jesus Christ is supposed to have appeared as a teacher is thus recorded in three of the canonical Gospels:—

> Matt. iii. 1, 13.—"And in those days cometh John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness of Judæa.....Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to the Jordan," etc.
> Mark i. 4, 9.—"John came, who baptised in the wilderness.....And it came to pass in those days that Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee," etc.
> John i. 6, 29.—"There came a man, sent from God, whose name was John.....On the morrow he seeth Jesus coming unto him," etc.

Now, it is quite clear from the foregoing extracts that the unknown writer of the primitive Gospel from which the Synoptists took the main portion of their narratives, did not know at what period in history Jesus and the Baptist commenced their public ministries; he therefore placed it "in those days," which is the Gospel equivalent for "once upon a time." Coming now to Luke, who wrote later than the others, and who had consulted the Antiquities of Josephus for historical facts connected with the Gospels, we find details added which fix the time.

> Luke ii. 1, 2.—"Now in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar, Pontius Pilate being governor of Judæa, and Herod being tetrarch of Galilee, and his brother Philip tetrarch of Ituræa and Trachonitis, and Lysanias tetrarch of Abilene, in the high-priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas, the word of God came unto John the son of Zacharias in the wilderness," etc.

This addition was, of course, inserted to make the Third Gospel appear historical; but it does not affect the older primitive source of the Synoptic narratives. Now, if the writer of the primitive Gospel had no knowledge of the period when Jesus first appeared, neither would he be likely to know the time of the alleged Crucifixion. This period, as we have seen, was supplied by Luke when he named Annas and Caiaphas as high priests and Pilate as governor of Judæa in "the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar"—that is to say, in the year A.D. 28.

In the case of one of the last-named individuals, however, Luke was mistaken. Pilate was procurator, and Caiaphas was high priest, from A.D. 26 to 36; but Annas, or Ananus, held the latter office from A.D. 7 to 14, and at no later period.

In the primitive account of the trial of Jesus, the names of the high priest and the procurator, being unknown to the writer, could not have been given. In accordance with this fact, we find no name of the high priest in Mark's or Luke's Gospel. Luke, though he names two high priests in chapter iii., does not mention either again. In the case of Matthew, the house or palace of "Caiaphas" is twice referred to (xxvi. 3 and 57); but the high priest himself is not named. That "Caiaphas" was not in the primitive account we know from Luke xxii. 54 and Mark xiv. 53—in which latter passage (and in Matt. xxvi. 57) the word "house" is implied.

With regard to the procurator, the name "Pilate" is now found in all four Gospels; but in that of Matthew—which is the nearest to the Common source—we find both "Pilate" and "the governor." The following extract from the latter Gospel may be taken as a sample of the reading given in the primitive account:—

> "Now Jesus stood before the governor: and the governor asked him, saying, Art thou the king of the Jews.....And he gave him no answer.....insomuch that the governor marvelled greatly. Now at the feast the governor was wont to release unto the multitude one prisoner," etc. (Matt. xxvii. 11, 14, 15).

In the parallel passages in the other three Gospels only the name "Pilate" is used; never "the governor." Of course, after Luke's Gospel became known, the name "Pilate" found its way into all new copies of the other Gospels, and the original reading "the governor" was omitted; but in that of Matthew the proper name was probably only inserted in the place where the governor was first mentioned—"delivered him up to Pilate the governor" (xxvii. 2). In the course of time, however, "Pilate" came to be inserted in other passages by copyists; so we now find the procurator in some places called "Pilate," and in others "the governor."

LYSANIAS.

Another misstatement of Luke in the foregoing Gospel extract is that relating to Lysanias. In "the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar" that tetrarch had been dead sixty years. This Lysanias was the son of Ptolemy Menneus, the ruler of a kingdom in the north of Palestine, its principal city being Abila. In the second or third year of the reign of Herod the Great (38 B.C.—4 B.C.) Ptolemy died, and Lysanias succeeded his father as ruler. After reigning for three or four years, Lysanias was put to death by Mark Antony (32 B.C.). His successor is uncertain; but the kingdom was leased to Zenodorus, a man in league with a band of cut-throats, who robbed and murdered all who passed through the country. Complaints at length reached the ears of Cæsar, who, to stop the evil, bestowed part of the kingdom on Herod, and placed the other part under the rule of the president of Syria.

There is no need to go into this matter further, for one fact is beyond doubt. No other Lysanias ever ruled over the province whose capital was Abila. After Herod's death, that king's portion of "the kingdom of Lysanias" was given to his son Philip, the tetrarch of Trachonitis, etc., the other portion remaining under the governor of Syria.

But, how came Luke to fall into such an error? Well, Josephus, later on, having several times occasion to mention the district once ruled by Lysanias, calls it "the tetrarchy of Lysanias" or "Abila of Lysanias" (Antiq. 18, 6, 10; 19, 5, 1; 20, 7, 1). Luke, in searching through these Antiquities, noticed these statements, and took them as meaning that Lysanias was "tetrarch of Abila" at a later period. He had not looked so far back as Antiq. 15, 4, 1, where the death of that tetrarch is recorded, nor had he seen what became of that kingdom.

THE MARTYR ZACHARIAH.

In the Gospel of Matthew, Jesus is represented as saying to some of the chief men among the Jews:—

> "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! .....Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers..... that upon you may come all the righteous blood shed on the earth, from the blood of Abel the righteous unto the blood of Zachariah son of Barachiah, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar" (Matt. xxiii. 29, 33, 35).

In the parallel account in Luke's Gospel (xi. 50, 51) the words "son of Barachiah" are omitted. With regard to the justice of punishing the Jews of Jesus Christ's day for "all the righteous blood shed on the earth" up to their time, I have nothing to say, being now concerned only with the words in italics. From these it is quite clear that the reference is to "all the righteous blood shed" from the earliest recorded instance (Abel) down to the latest notable example —"Zachariah the son of Barachiah."

Who, then, was this recent martyr Zachariah? Upon this question Christian commentators throw no light. In 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 21 we have an account of the martyrdom of "Zachariah, the son of Jehoiada"; but this took place more than 800 years B.C., and could not be the one referred to. We have therefore to look for a much later Zachariah, and, of course, we find him. He was "Zachariah the son of Baruch," who was foully murdered (A.D. 68) by the Jewish assassins called Zealots in the temple, or court of the temple, during the siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, Wars, 4, 5, 4). Barachiah and Baruch are merely different forms of the same name. No other historical martyr of the first century named Zachariah is known.

In the Gospel passage, then, Jesus is represented as referring to an event that occurred thirty-eight years after his death: or, to put it another way, this Gospel paragraph was one of the little hearsay stories which the writer of the primitive Gospel collected and committed to writing at some unknown period. This period now appears to have been a decade or two after the destruction of Jerusalem —say, between A.D. 80 and 90, or later. The four canonical Gospel writers all lived in the first half of the second century.

THE PROPHECY OF THE LAST DAYS.

One of the longest and most important of the threefold narratives which the three Synoptists took from the primitive Gospel is that now called "the prophecy of the last days" (Matt. xxiv.; Mark xiii.; Luke xxi.). In this so-called "prophecy" Jesus is represented as predicting the siege of Jerusalem and the destruction of that city and the temple, with all the attendant horrors that should come upon the Jewish nation (A.D. 66—70). After reading this long chapter of predictions, the question naturally arises: Whence did the primitive writer get all the words which are there ascribed to Jesus?—which words, assuming they were actually spoken, were certainly not taken down at the time. Neither, again, could any disciple, assuming he heard them spoken once, commit them to memory, or afterwards reproduce them in writing—even if we further assume that fishermen and such people could write in those days. The old orthodox plea that the evangelists wrote their Gospels under the influence of the "spirit of God," which brought the words of Jesus to their remembrance, is now exploded. Whence, then, did the primitive Gospel writer obtain this long oration? The answer is, He had no report of the speech from anyone. The words were simply fabricated for the occasion, and then piously placed in the mouth of Jesus. This was, of course, done some time after the fall of the holy city; for, needless to say, the primitive Christians possessed no prophetic powers: they were all, without exception, extremely ignorant and credulous men.

There need, however, be no mystery as regards the source. The chapter, upon examination, will be found to be a purely literary composition, made up of a dozen or more passages pieced together, these passages having been taken from the Old Testament and apocryphal writings. It can, therefore, be safely said that this grand "prophecy" was never spoken by Jesus, as represented in the Gospels, but was laboriously compiled by the primitive Christian teachers from the source I have named. Moreover, the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew (or either of its parallels in Mark and Luke) is itself a proof, not only of systematic fabrication, but of the fact that the earliest known Gospel was written after A.D. 70. After Jerusalem had been destroyed, and a large proportion of the Jews had been slaughtered or carried away captive, the primitive Christians (who had taken no part in the war) imagined the end of the world to be at hand. Hence, it is stated in this pseudo-prophecy that "immediately after the tribulation of those days" the "Son of man" should come with his angels to judge the world. This "immediate" coming is afterwards modified into "before that generation should pass away" (Matt. xxiv. 29, 34)—the generation referred to being that of those living at the time of the "tribulation" mentioned. It was during this period (A.D. 70—90) that the primitive Gospel was written. The time when Jesus is said to have first appeared—"in those days"—was, of course, before the holy city was besieged by the Romans: but how long before we have no evidence to show.

ABRACADABRA.

FAITH.

A teacher wrote two separate sentences on a blackboard. They were: "The hen has three legs," "Who done it?" the object of one being to exemplify a misstatement of fact, and the other to illustrate bad grammar. Then a boy was called up, and the teacher said to him: "Harry, go to the blackboard and show where the fault lies in those two sentences." The boy went up, studied the sentences diligently, took up the chalk, and wrote: "The boy never done it. God done it."—Western Mail.

"Now, to business!" said the Chevalier Terence Theophrastus O'Shaughnessy. "I have here a schedule of certain studies. Each day in the week, of which five are educationally important, and two relatively independent—I propose to devote to one or more of these studies. The sixth day is to be observed as an opportunity for recreation. The seventh, I need hardly tell well brought up Christian young ladies, is appointed for attendance on holy rites and conventional ceremonies such as make this good land so notable for hypocrisy."—Rita, "A Grey Life."

It is usually supposed that children are ingenuous, frank, and outspoken. But the modern child has a reserve hardly in keeping with this character. A little fellow had helped himself to two apples in his father's garden and afterwards told his sister. She was shocked and inquired, "Did you tell God about it?" "Yes," was the slow reply, and then added, "I didn't tell him I had taken two."—English Illustrated Magazine.

THOMAS PAINE,
B. 1737; D. 1809.

Author of "Common Sense,"
"Rights of Man," and "The Age of Reason,"
A Founder of American Independence with Pen and Sword.

LIVED IN THIS HOUSE
As Exciseman and Tobacconist.
1768—1774.

—Inscription on a house in Bull Lane, Lewes.

Here in the heart of the Sussex hills,
Green young Summer hath stayed to sing
The chalky pits and the shallow rills,
And the footprints left by the feet of Spring.
In Lewes town there is Summer again,
As under the eaves in old Bull Lane
We linger to dream of one Thomas Paine.

Out on the hills dance the nymphs with Pan,
Fresh from the woods and the brisk, bright streams;
But here in Lewes the Rights of Man
Were born in a brave Exciseman's dreams.
And see, here is Summer! Here Summer hath lain,
Waiting and waiting and to live again,
As she lived in a brave Exciseman's brain.

Oh, here in Lewes who would have wist,
As he strolled for his shag in the years of yore
To the vigorous young Tobacconist,
That far away, on a strange new shore,
Where Washington strove, and the English ran,
That a Freethinker and a Republican,
One Paine, would herald the Rights of Man?

One Paine, one born in Thetford, knew
That the world, not England, would blare his fame;
So Albion, Gaul, and Columbia drew
A lighted torch from his lambent flame:
For he served his land, and his land was the world;
And wherever Freedom, with banner uncurled,
Strides through the earth, Paine that banner unfurled.

Pure was his brain from craft and creed,
His hope was centred alone in Man;
As pure was his life from graft and greed,
A Freethinker and a Republican!
Joy for the Man! And the rest may go—
With God above and the Devil below,
With the Church of Christ, with last year's snow.

The streams are stirred by Summer's breath,
The hills are green over Lewes town!
Here dwelt one fearing nor life nor death,
For he hated the Cross as he hated the Crown.
In Lewes town there is Summer again;
Under the shadows in old Bull Lane,
We stay to wonder at one called Paine.

"All These Things....."

Two there were on a mountain peak,
Who stood and gazed on the world around
In silence, for neither cared to speak,
Viewing with rapture the waste profound.

The mountain range upon either hand,
Its cloud-capped peaks reared to the sky,
While away from their feet the pasture land
Sloped down to a river rippling by.

"All this is grand," the younger said;
"The hills, the vales, the woods, the stream;
The gorgeous colors God has spread
Seem like a wild, fantastic dream."

"You call it God;" the old man smiled,
And paused, and in a while began,
"Your God is naught but Nature, child,
And Nature neither God nor man.

"This fair expanse of vale and hill
Is but a battlefield of blood,
Where Nature's lovely creatures kill
The lesser, weaker ones for food.

"Each has to kill to keep alive;
Each has a life he must defend;
Each feels the pain he must survive:
All is a struggle from start to end.

"Did God in his love create all this,
This war, this battle of weak and strong,
And cloak behind his tender kiss
His jaded sense of right and wrong?.....

"God neither made this world of pain,
Nor us, its grandest product, man;
Nor sent his first-born to be slain,
To mitigate an ill-made plan.

"Like yonder waters as they flow
To lose their ripples in the sea,
One day we come, another go,
And slip into eternity,

"Leaving no more to mark our course
Than bubbles scar the river bed:
Ripples from the very source,
Fading away when life had fled."

Sunday Pleasures.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE REV. FATHER BERNARD VAUGHAN.

DEAR FATHER,—I have read with much pain your dismal and pathetic wail which appeared in the Daily Mail of the 27th ult. You are quite right, and you have my sincerest sympathy. People are really taking to motoring on Sunday instead of going to church and counting their beads as they should, but you can comfort yourself by reflecting that your Church is not the only one that suffers in this respect. It is chronic. All the Churches have the same trouble.

When I started the gun works at Crayford, I employed a large number of men, most of them trained mechanicians. We had only been running a short time when a very pious Protestant lady came down from London with the laudable intention of saving the souls of my poor benighted workmen. I gave my consent, for which she thanked me. She then started a little mission hall, and, after several weeks of strenuous effort, she came and told me that she had not met with the least particle of success; she had been fishing for souls that really ought to be saved, but had not had a single bite. She was discouraged and disheartened, and asked me if I could give some reason why the men failed to be interested in religion. I told her that perhaps they had found out that it was not true. She said she thought I was quite right; I had diagnosed the case correctly. This was twenty-four years ago. Quite recently I learned that this one-time very pious and God-fearing lady had given up religion altogether; in fact, she appears to have all the characteristics of that horrible, wicked, and detestable gang known variously as Agnostics, Infidels, Atheists, and Freethinkers, who have no faith and obstinately refuse to believe anything except the truth.

A dreadfully wicked infidel, now happily dead, and no doubt receiving his just deserts, said: "The way to be happy is to make those about us happy; the place to be happy is here, and the time to be happy is now." These unholy words were uttered by that arch-infidel, Colonel Ingersoll; but, wicked as they are, they cannot at all be compared with the following, which I quote from the Chinese System of Ethics:—

> "Do not dream of a life beyond this, for you will find no other, nor of a heaven beyond the universe, for beyond the infinite universe there is nothing. Earth is heaven, and paradise is on earth; it is for you to realise it. Cultivate your mind, honor your ancestors, respect your traditions, let the past and the future be both a living present to your mind. Identify yourself with one and the other through humanity. Never forget that you are one with the earth, with the universe, and take care no act of yours offends against this unity....."

Can we imagine anything better calculated than the above to demonstrate the necessity of sending missionaries to that benighted people?—Mournfully yours,

HIRAM S. MAXIM.

"Please, sir, ought I to be punished for something I have not done," inquired a boy of his form master. "Why, certainly not," he replied. "Well, then, ought I to be punished because I have not done my sums?"—English Illustrated Magazine.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 29 SUNDAY, JULY 20, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Evil must be removed before good has a place.
—GARTH WILKINSON.

Views and Opinions.

"KING FERDINAND MURDERED" was a big headline in Sunday's edition of a paper called the People. I never bought it before, and I scarcely think I shall buy it again. That headline was a "fake." King Ferdinand was not murdered. There was not a particle of evidence in support of the statement. The sole authority for it was "rumor"—which may mean anything or nothing to suit the circumstances, in case of a challenge and an inquiry. But the penny-catcher's announcement opened in this decisive manner:—

> "A military revolt has broken out in Sofia, the King of Bulgaria has been assassinated, and an unsuccessful attempt has been made to kill Dr. Daneff, the Premier.
> "The Government offices have been stormed, the Royal Palace is surrounded, and many persons have been shot down by soldiers."

This was modified by a qualification, in smaller type, that the report lacked confirmation, but was nevertheless probably true.

Monday's newspapers treated this "report" with disdain. Few mentioned it; one alluded to it as utterly contemptible. Yet this People is a highly moral Tory newspaper, with a great (professed) belief in Church and State and Altar and Throne.

Having no other Sunday newspaper (so it happened) than this People, I was obliged in common prudence to wait till Monday before writing about this alleged "assassination." And it was lucky that I did so, or I should have wasted my time. But I could not help thinking, "Suppose this be true! Is it not one of Time's conspicuous revenges? This story of the assassinated assassin proves that poetical justice is not entirely absent from the universe. It reminds one of the awful consolation of Swinburne's 'Night hath but one red star, Tyrannicide.'" For the King of Bulgaria was an assassin—though not more so than his fellow-Christian Kings of Servia, Montenegro, and Greece. He started on one of the most cruel and wanton wars of modern times with a religious service in the capital church of his capital city; he received the Primate's blessing; he dedicated himself as a soldier of Christ; it was to be a war of the Cross against the Crescent, and its immediate and practical object was to liberate oppressed populations from the intolerable tyranny of the unspeakable Turk. It was a beautiful picture. But how different is the reality! The oppressed populations have suffered more from the Christian Allies than they did from their Mohammedan overlords. Myriads of them have been wiped out of existence by hunger, outrage, and massacre. The liberators have turned out to be brigands. They took to fighting each other over the division of a larger spoil than was contemplated in their preliminary agreement. Not only have they turned their arms upon each other—Christian thief against Christian thief!—but they are calling each other the most abominable names and accusing each other of the most infamous crimes.

King Constantine has telegraphed as follows from the head of his army to his Ministry of Foreign Affairs at Athens:—

> "Protest in my name to the representatives of the civilised Powers against the acts of these monsters in human form. Protest also to the entire civilised world, and say that to my regret I see myself compelled to wreak vengeance in order to inspire terror into these monsters and to make them reflect before they commit any more crimes of this sort. The Bulgarians have surpassed all the horrors of barbaric times and have proved that they have no longer the right to be reckoned among civilised peoples."

This is a terrible indictment, and it is drawn up by the responsible head of the Kingdom of Greece. On the other hand, King Ferdinand has drawn up a similar indictment against Greece and Servia. After referring to various places where the civil population had been driven out by the thousand, the Bulgarian monarch adds that "These refugees gave terrifying accounts of the horrible deeds committed by the Servians and Greeks."

Each side denies its own guilt. Each side affirms the other's guilt. Is one to believe them both—as Voltaire said he believed both the old ladies he heard giving their opinion of each other in the public thoroughfare? King Ferdinand suggests "an inquiry." We should like to see it instituted, but we fear that such news is too good to be true.

Roumania, the other Christian Power in the Balkans, has taken no share in the war. She played a meaner part. She stood by as a neutral, and claimed her share of the victors' spoils, as the price of her neutrality, at the finish. She has invaded Bulgaria now that her neighbor is beaten to the ground. She would be mild and placable enough if Bulgaria had beaten her Christian rivals. Such is Christian chivalry! Who can imagine the "unspeakable Turk" acting in such a contemptible manner?

The religious mind, and especially the Christian mind, is always peculiar. There is no connection between the Balkan war and the express train disaster at Colchester; only the beauty of religion is displayed in both—and on the same page of the holy and veracious People. A Clapham engineer told the reporter how "the driver was already dead when extricated from beneath the engine, whilst the guard was in a dying condition, and the fireman was disembowelled." Then came this gem of piety: "Another passenger," the reporter relates, "said it was nothing but a miracle that all the passengers in the first carriage were not killed." A miracle was it? Performed, of course, by God. And what a God! Why was not the miracle of the "saved" extended to those who were "lost"? God is a respecter of persons, after all. But his discrimination appears to be only a whim. He has mercy on whom he will have mercy. He is on the moral level of Caliban's deity in Browning's wonderful poem. In short the Christian "God" is a relic of the religion of barbarism, and should be dropped by all humane and intelligent people.

Religion and the Child.

IT is a part of the case for religion that man is a religious animal. In opposition to this it has been affirmed that man is by nature an Atheist. No less a person than John Wesley held this opinion, meaning by Atheist a man unsaved by grace or revelation. It is a futile speculation in either direction. By nature man is neither an Atheist nor a Theist—that is, if we attach to either term certain definite beliefs for or against the belief in God. Indeed, by nature man is very little—far less than any other member of the animal world. Other animals are born into the world with fully formed instincts sufficient in number to preserve their lives. Man has least of all. The education of other animals lies chiefly in the direction of exercise; with man the chief work is acquisition. And herein lies the secret of man's superiority, and his capacity for continuous progress. The world of the animal varies but little. One generation succeeds another, and the adaptive actions essential to life are repeated in endless monotony. The world of man varies constantly. It changes with time and place, and puts on a growing complexity. Man is continually called on to make new adjustments, and to effect these his nature must be plastic and educable. Many instincts and less educability; fewer instincts and great capacity for education; these are the cardinal and all-important distinctions between man and the rest of the animal world.

But this advantage over the animal world has its drawbacks. The fact of man having everything to learn places him at the mercy of his surroundings. The fundamental functions of life are all right because they can be ignored by none, and so form part of every person's experience. But above these, what the child will become is mainly a question of the educative influences of his environment. He may be educated into becoming an ardent Republican or a fanatical Royalist; a strenuous Atheist or an uncompromising pietist. His code of honor will be determined in the same way—either that of the merchant, the gambler, the criminal, or the man of science. His native capacity will, of course, find expression under any conditions. It will determine the eminence attained, but the social environment will decide the form in which this capacity is expressed.

These principles give the reply to the propositions at the beginning of this article. Man is born neither an Atheist nor a Theist; but his capacity for, and his dependence upon, education makes him one or the other. It is theoretically not a harder task to bring up a child an Atheist than to train it as a Theist, given the same educational opportunities. It is only harder in practice because the dice of social life are loaded in favor of religion, and the two phases of thought do not fight under equal conditions. Inside the home one set of tendencies may be supreme, but outside other forces are encountered. The child is subjected to the incidence of other ideas and ideals. Opinions it is taught on the one hand to respect, it is taught on the other to despise. It sees certain beliefs held in admiration, and sees the social status of people determined by their adherence to these beliefs. And the child is naturally imitative; that is the source of both its strength and weakness. Exposed to the influence of an environment making at least for conformity to religious beliefs, one need not be surprised that the majority profess some form of religious faith.

In what way does religion utilise the native capacity of children? First of all, in a rough-and-ready way, children reproduce in their mental growth those stages covered by the race in its intellectual development. The fear of a child in face of the unknown, the indistinct sense of causation, the readiness to ascribe life to all around with the small development of the larger racial feelings, bring us very near to the mental condition from which religions originate and to which religions still appeal. One may, therefore, say that if children are not born religious, their capacity for education, with their general mental endowment, hands them over, unresisting subjects, to their religious instructors. They commence with the capacity for fetishism, and there are those who take full advantage of the fact. Of course, there is no reason why children should not pass through this period with safety. Many do, just as they pass through those physical disorders incidental to childhood. But in a great many instances, in the hands of parents acting from a mistaken sense of duty, and of a priesthood that possesses a keen sense of self-interest, a passing mental phase is seized, strengthened, and converted into a permanent possession. This in turn becomes a part of the environment that reacts, educationally, on every newcomer; while the priest appeals to the existence of an artificially prolonged mental phase as a proof of man's natural craving for religious belief.

All religions in civilised countries have been quick to seize upon the plastic nature of childhood as the right period for the inculcation of religion. It is not the case among uncivilised peoples, because the whole of the environment does then what is afterwards left to be done by special instructors. But in civilised countries, when certain forces make for the destruction of religion, it is recognised that childhood is the most favorable period—perhaps the only favorable period—for the inculcation of religious beliefs. Even with adults it is only when a sense of the mysterious is strong, and is enforced by a feeling of helplessness and a consciousness of ignorance, that religion grips them strongly. At other times it may appeal to one here and there as a plausible speculation, but it does not produce a strong conviction. Religion must get the child, if it is to live; it must utilise the child's capacity for receiving impressions. To wait until the individual reaches maturity is to lose everything.

Religion, be it observed, is the only subject that is compelled to do this. Every other subject can wait. If we try to teach a child simple principles of mathematics, or of physics, or of any of the sciences, and the child does not understand, we wait for a time until its understanding has developed. We say the thing is beyond the grasp of the child, and we wait for it to understand until we resume our teaching. A capacity for understanding what is taught is taken as an essential condition of the teaching. With religion this capacity is never considered. The child must be habituated to religious phrases, religious forms, and a religious atmosphere. Let it alone until it reaches years of understanding, and ministers of religion are the first to assure us that the task is then a hopeless one.

It may be granted that a policy of creating sentiments in favor of certain beliefs not wholly understood by the child is legitimate enough in its proper place. We do not wait until the child is old enough to appreciate rationally the grounds of good conduct to give it ethical instruction. We seek to bring out certain tendencies for good and suppress those of an opposite character, and so fashion the child's nature in accordance with an accepted standard. But, at least, these are things for which a reason can be given, and we are sure of the child's approbation when it is old enough to understand the subject fully. But, in the case of religion, the situation is quite different. We dare not wait until the child is old enough to understand, because by that time reason would be against us. The mystery does not decrease as understanding develops; it remains to the end. Moreover, among adults it is freely admitted that the religious hypothesis may be wrong, and there is clearly a very wide and vital difference between cultivating in a child certain feelings, the validity of which may be rationally demonstrated at any time, and teaching it to regard as true things that all admit might be false. In the one case, we have in view the child's future welfare; in the other, we are forcing upon it certain speculations of our own, on which there exists no common agreement.

I come back to the point at which I set out. Man is born neither religious nor atheistic. But, unlike the rest of the animal world, which is furnished with instincts adequate to its self-preservation, man is born with an immense capacity for acquiring habits and information. It is this that makes him, in a very peculiar sense, the victim of the educational force of his environment. For good or ill that fact remains as the most important truth concerning him. Given a society in which knowledge of all kinds were allowed to develop naturally and express itself freely, there would be no struggle to capture the child, such as now exists in all civilised countries. But, given a society where religious ideas maintain an artificial existence by the deliberate cultivation of a frame of mind favorable to its claim, and religious organisations are forced to concentrate their energies upon the capture of the young. That is why the clergy make so fierce a fight for the schools, it is also why, alarmed at a declining adult church attendance, both Church and Chapel are driven to paying renewed attention to Sunday-school development.

The child is the raw material out of which Church and Chapel create their future patrons. The adult is in one or other class mainly because of habits formed and impressions gained during childhood. Secure the child and the rest is easy. The tenacity of early impressions is notorious; the man dying of delirium babbles of his childhood's days, the criminal on the scaffold has his recollection carried back to far-off years when he received lessons at his mother's knee; the religious lessons received in youth seldom entirely disappear. We may not always be conscious of their force, but they are there, like the scar of a wound long since received. Even when the positive belief in religion is outgrown, the fear of it remains. There is often a lurking timidity in opposing it. And if the clergy have to face the fact that a great many do escape their control, they have the consolation of knowing that their policy has diffused a certain general impression as to the value of religion in the social life of the community.

But the child is also the raw material out of which the future citizen is fashioned; and, therefore, the question of who shall possess the child—the priest or the community—involves more than a mere contest of rival teachers. It is really a struggle for the direction of civilisation. The issue is a simple but profoundly important one. Are we to pay more attention to the temper of mind induced in a child than to the inculcation of specific beliefs? Are we to value the habit of finding reasons for beliefs——of criticising received opinions freely and without prejudice—more than a slavish re-echoing of hereditary doctrines? The inherited capacity of a child can be exercised in whichever direction seems preferable. We can turn it out a mere transmitter of established opinions or a new and healthy force for rational progress. The essential issue is whether the developing mind of the child is to be directed by agencies to which the growth of civilisation is entirely due, or by organisations that are bound to perpetuate the delusions of the past as the sole condition of their power in the present and the future.

C. COHEN.

Are Agnostics Cowards?

IN the issue of this journal for June 8, we animadverted upon a sermon by the Rev. F. C. Spurr, of Melbourne, upon "Courageous Agnosticism," in which the reverend gentleman endeavored to depreciate knowledge in order to place the crown on the brow of faith. We have now before us, in the Christian World Pulpit for July 9, his previous discourse upon "Cowardly Agnosticism." In itself this oration deserves no notice, being flippant, superficial, and illogical; but inasmuch as the preacher seems to be a great luminary in the Australian religious firmament, it may serve a good purpose to examine his present utterances somewhat in detail. Flippancy and arrogance are in evidence from beginning to end. Mr. Spurr imagines that he is a very superior person who can afford to look down disdainfully upon those who are impudent enough to deny the possibility of supernatural knowledge. Listen to the following:—

> "So long as any person honestly remains in doubt concerning God and the highest things, and at the same time keeps an open mind to all light and truth, and an open heart to receive these when they appear, so long must we extend to him or her the most hearty sympathy. Sympathy, however, disappears when Agnosticism belies its name and becomes dogmatic. It is one thing to say 'I do not know God; would that I did; I am not certain; would that I were.' It is quite another to dogmatically assert, as did Mr. Spencer, and as do our Rationalists to-day, 'The whole thing is inscrutable and beyond us. God is not only unknown, he is unknowable. We cannot know. Those who say they know are simply mistaken. Knowledge is impossible.' It is this dogmatism that is offensive, and, as I shall show you, cowardly."

This promise, "as I shall show you," this cocksure dogmatist signally fails to fulfil. He contrasts Christianity and Agnosticism by affirming that the former presents certain facts while the latter deals with pure ideas; but this contrast is wholly imaginary, and puts the preacher in a bad light. What are the facts which Christianity is said to present? These: "That God, although invisible and incomprehensible, has sufficiently revealed himself—his life and power—to enable men to enter into fellowship with him"; "the fact of Christ, and the fact of the Divine action in human life." It is passing strange that it has never dawned upon Mr. Spurr that these are not facts but theories, conjectures, ideas, the very points in dispute between Christians and Agnostics. God, Christ, and the Divine action in human life are metaphysical hypotheses, not ascertained facts. To say that "our own nature is a text from which we may preach to ourselves a sermon about God," is not to state a fact, but to propound a speculative dogma. It is a gross misrepresentation to assert that Agnostics refuse to face the facts. In their estimation the facts of life are the only things that really matter; but their earnest contention is that such facts do not embrace God and Christ and the Divine action, these being not facts but theological fancies, which the divines, without rhyme or reason, offer to the world as facts. If we decline their offer they charge us with a lack of seriousness and call us cowards.

At this point Mr. Spurr allows his cocksureness to run away with him, and he raves thus irresponsibly against Agnosticism:—

> "It is cowardly because it is impertinent, and all impertinence is a form of cowardice. For a man to say, 'I do not know God,' may be perfectly true for him and modest withal'; but if he continues, 'I deny that anyone else can or does know him,' he is impertinent, for he makes his lack of knowledge the measure of the knowledge of others. More than this, he gives the lie direct to that accumulated Christian experience of the best kind which is witnessed to by men and women of all times."

The reverend gentleman is fundamentally mistaken. There is no more impertinence in maintaining that no one can or does know God than in claiming that he can be known by all and is known to millions. Indeed, if there be impertinence at all it lies in the claim to knowledge, not in the assertion of ignorance. Mr. Spurr admits that God is both invisible and incomprehensible, and yet proclaims him as an object of knowledge, which is plainly a contradiction in terms. Here the reverend gentleman trots out what he calls a parallel case. He draws a vivid picture of husbands and wives living together for many years in perfect love and harmony. "Through years of sunshine and storm, through joy and sorrow, in wealth and in poverty, in health and in sickness, their mutual love has suffered no diminution, no shock. Rather it has grown ever stronger, and after half a century of wedded life they are more completely lovers." Now, if anybody, say a dramatist, comes along and pronounces such a case impossible, he richly deserves to be laughed to scorn for giving expression to such an inane, brutal judgment. Unfortunately, however, this is in no sense a parallel case. Husbands and wives are veritable people of flesh and blood whose lives are objective realities that can be watched and examined, whereas God is admittedly an invisible and incomprehensible being, with whom we have no means whatever, except by faith, of getting into any sort of touch. Christian experience of communion with heaven possesses no evidential value, because the object with whom the alleged communion is held is a creation of faith, or imagination, but by no means an object of knowledge. Tennyson was much wiser than Mr. Spurr when he said, "We cannot know, for knowledge is of things we see."

The minister of Collins-street Baptist Church, Melbourne, is a perfect treat whenever he turns scientific. Having exhausted logic in defence of his strange thesis, he appeals to science for a final confirmation of it. Agnostics are coolly informed that "the scientific spirit in the name of which they speak entirely condemns them." This is a brand-new scientific discovery, the honor and glory of which belong to Mr. Spurr alone. Listen: "What is the scientific spirit? It is a spirit that leads men to seek until they find." We are prepared now for the following brilliant ray:—

> "Had explorers, chemists, astronomers, and others accepted the Agnostic faith—'we do not know, nothing can be known'—the world would never have progressed. Scientists have always refused to be Agnostics in science, and to their indomitable efforts we owe our progress."

This is a miserable travesty of the Agnostic position, and it is impossible to take it seriously, or to believe that the preacher was awake when he penned it. It is a truism that scientists are not Agnostics in science; but they are, almost to a man, thorough Agnostics in relation to theology or Supernature. They are resolved to seek until they find within the limits of the mechanism of Nature, but they know of nothing beyond or above those limits. Without fear of intelligent contradiction we hold that science inevitably tends to foster Agnosticism in the minds of its students, in relation to all matters of a superhuman or supernatural character. To our forefathers Romulus and Remus, King Arthur, and Hengist and Horsa were historical personalities, but the science of history has relegated them to the sphere of myths. Mr. Spurr says that "God is found by all who seek him as he should be sought." Of course, we all know that God is sought and found only by faith. But why should it be necessary to seek him with such diligence? Surely, if he existed, there would be no necessity to seek him. Children do not have to seek in order to find their father. To show how utterly unscientific the Christian doctrine of God is we need only point out that it at once represents God as seeking man with quenchless desire, and man as instinctively and passionately engaged in the quest of God, and that yet, in spite of this mutual seeking, in a great number, perhaps in the majority, of instances, the two never find each other, while in the comparatively few instances in which they do presumably meet they are for ever losing, or in danger of losing, grip of each other. We have no hesitation in averring that as touching such a God every sane person is bound to be an Agnostic, which is only Atheist writ large. No science would ever encourage the quest for such a Deity.

No, Agnostics are not cowards; nor are they impertinent. Why, the cowardice and impertinence are characteristics of Christian believers, who never fail to vilify all who differ from themselves; and like Mr. Lloyd George, when hit we are instinctively impelled to hit back. Is it not impertinence of the worst kind to call such great men as Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Haeckel, Schafer, Chalmers Mitchell, and Ray Lankester cowards because of their attitude of unbelief towards the Christian religion? There are hundreds, if not thousands, of genuine Agnostics in Melbourne, many of them endowed by Nature with plenty of brains; but the minister of Collins-street Baptist Church, a professional representative of a God of love and mercy, denounces them all as impertinent cowards. How very sweet of the dear man! Fancy his audacity in oracularly declaring that "no man can courageously remain an Agnostic." That is an unqualified falsehood, and it is difficult to believe that the preacher, in uttering it, did not know that he was lying. The fact is that the public avowal of Agnosticism implies the possession of an exceptional amount of courage. A weak man cannot possibly make such an avowal; and besides strength of character there must be a considerable quantity of mental power. It requires practically no courage to make a profession of faith in Christ and join a church, and multitudes do both without seriously thinking at all. Until quite lately the conventions rendered the life of an Agnostic extremely uncomfortable. He was looked upon and treated as an Ishmael. He was shunned as if he were a pestilent fellow and threatened the moral health of the community. But the triumph of science is slowly providing for him a respectable place in society. In Germany it is already the fashion not to attend a place of worship, only about three per cent. doing so. France, Italy, Switzerland, Portugal, and even Great Britain rapidly follow suit, thus proving that Mr. Spurr was radically wrong when he added that it cannot be denied but that man is "incurably religious." He is not, but we can honestly say of him that he is incurably social, which is the most hopeful sign for the future.

Christianity and the Chinese.—X.

> "Since the treaties have permitted foreigners from the West to spread their doctrines, the morals of the people have been greatly injured" (Memorial "On the Restriction of Christianity," addressed to the Throne of China in 1884 by the High Commissioner Pêng Yu-Lin.)—DR. MORRISON, An Australian in China, p. 192.
> "As to the opinion of the [Chinese] Government, an Imperial Edict of July 2, 1900, states clearly: 'Ever since foreign nations began the propagation of their religion there have been instances throughout the country of ill-feeling between the people and the converts.....The truth is that converts.....have relied on the missionary for support, with the result that they have committed many misdeeds.' An Edict published three days after this states: 'The reason for the fighting between the Chinese [Boxers] and the foreigners sprung from a disagreement between the people and the Christian converts.' Not a word, so far as I have yet ascertained, has been uttered either by the Boxers or the Imperial or Provincial Governments respecting opium in this connection."
> "In his utter disregard for the conservation of human life, the views of Jonah closely resemble those of the present-day missionary and his supporters in England. After the wholesale torture and massacres in China, they set forth the doctrine that it is impossible to convert a nation to Christianity without rebellions, riots, and bloodshed, basing themselves on quotations from Scripture, such as: 'Not peace but a sword'; 'These that have turned the world upside down have come hither also,' and other isolated texts."—A. DAVENPORT, China from Within, pp. 36-66.

WE have remarked that China has been twice on the verge of being Christianised: First, by the Jesuits—the conditions under which they were so successful have passed, never to recur again—the second occasion was at the time of the great Tai-ping Rebellion, a movement about which very little is known by the vast majority of people, and that little is mostly erroneous.

Most people who have heard anything at all about the Tai-ping (sometimes written Ti-ping, Taeping, etc.) Rebellion, think that the Tai-pings were a band of brigands who aimed at overthrowing the Manchu rulers and reducing the empire to a state of anarchy, from which the Chinese were only rescued by that great Christian hero, General Gordon. You will not find much light thrown on the subject by studying missionary literature, unless you can get back to the missionary literature written at the time when the Tai-pings first took the field, then you will be surprised to find that the missionaries were backing them for all they were worth. Even English histories of China seem to be struck dumb when they reach the period dealing with its origins and aims. Just staying long enough to record Gordon's exploits, and then hurrying on like skaters over thin ice. Yet the lowest computation of lives lost through this rising is twenty millions, other authorities giving thirty-nine millions, fifty millions, and even one hundred millions! If twenty million Christian lives had been sacrificed in any European country in the attempt to introduce a foreign religion, we should have heard something about it. We dealt with this episode in these columns some five years ago (October 25, 1908). Given concisely, the facts are as follows:—

"The great Tai-ping Rebellion," says Mr. Archibald Little, "broke out after the empire had enjoyed a long peace of over two hundred years, and the leader of which, Hung-siu-chuen, was one of the very few genuine Christian converts ever made in China." *

This Hung-siu-chuen (or tsuen) was the son of a well-to-do farmer living about thirty miles from Canton. Coming to Canton to sit for a government examination, he received nine tracts from a Protestant evangelist who was giving them away in the street. Upon arriving home and discovering their character, he threw them on one side, but some time afterwards, upon the advice of his brother-in-law, who had borrowed them, he studied them and became converted. This was in 1843. He immediately began to exhort those around him to accept Christianity, and in 1846 received an invitation from J. J. Roberts, an American missionary at Canton to come there and study. He remained with Mr. Roberts for two months studying the new religion. Returning home, his followers rapidly increased in numbers until, upon one occasion while a congregation of about five thousand were deep in prayer, the leaders were overcome by what they believed to be "a Pentecostal outpouring of the Holy Spirit" in the most approved style of religious revivalism as experienced from St. Paul down to Evan Roberts. They were now ripe for mischief.

As might be expected by those who know anything of missionary teaching, they soon began to fall foul of the idols and persecuted the religion they formerly professed, but which they now denounced as idolatry, in the usual intolerant style of that religion when it has the power. Says Mrs. Little:—

> "With fierce and fanatical missionary zeal they at once set to work to break up one of the most esteemed images in the neighborhood — would not many Europeans on their first entrance into China wish to do likewise? — destroyed the vessels of spice and incense burning in front of it, were arrested and imprisoned." †

Released by friends, and emboldened by numbers and success, the Tai-pings formed an army and went on the march to convert the empire to Christianity.

All the inhabitants of the towns they captured who refused to accept the new faith were killed, in imitation of the Jews when they conquered the land of Canaan. Their leader, says Mr. Archibald Little, "modelled his action on that of the Jewish leaders, his war-cry being 'Sho Yao' ('Slay the idolators.')" ‡ The Tai-ping insurrection, says James Freeman Clarke, "has shown its religious character throughout." He observes: "Hymns of praise to the Heavenly Father and Elder Brother were chanted in the camp. And the head of the insurrection distinctly announced that, in case it succeeded, the Bible would be substituted in all public examinations for office in the place of Confucius." §

In every household throughout the Tai-ping territory, the Lord's Prayer, printed in large black characters on a white board, was hung up for the use of the children. The Sabbath was religiously kept on the seventh day. They celebrated the communion once a month by partaking of wine, and everyone admitted to their fellowship was baptised after an examination and confession of sins.

The missionaries, who thought their business was booming splendidly, were enthusiastic over their new converts, and, as Demetrius Boulger observes, "took the Taepings under their very special protection, and strained all their influence to the adventure of espousing the cause of these spurious Christians." * Why Mr. Boulger should brand the Tai-pings as "spurious Christians" we do not know—and he gives no explanation—unless it arose from a servile pandering to the official pretence that the Tai-pings were robbers and brigands. Evidently the missionaries did not regard them as "spurious Christians," and the missionaries were the originators of the movement and intimate with it from the very commencement. It is very certain that the Tai-pings had very much more faith and belief in the Bible and Christianity than the cosmopolitan historian of the Far East, Mr. Demetrius Boulger, or of many prominent men of the type of Sir Oliver Lodge, who allow their names to be used as supporting a belief which has nothing in common with the crude and unscientific ideas of those before whom their names are paraded. "Nothing succeeds like success," says the proverb, and all those whose adherence to the faith would tend to its credit are, by hook or by crook, made to testify to the creed; while all those who are discreditable are "spurious Christians." But the facts of the case are not so easily burked in the case of the Tai-pings.

An Englishman, who held a command among the Tai-pings, observes:—

> "I have probably had a much greater experience of the Ti-ping religious practices than any other European, and as a Protestant Christian I have never yet found occasion to condemn their form of worship. The most important part of their faith is the Holy Bible—Old and New Testament entire. These have been printed and circulated gratuitously by the Government through the whole population of the Ti-ping jurisdiction." †

Of one of the Tai-ping books, Dr. Medhurst, the missionary, declared: "There is not a word in it which a Christian missionary might not adopt and circulate as a tract for the benefit of the Chinese." ‡

The attempt to realise the devastation and slaughter wrought by the Tai-ping revolution would stagger the strongest imagination. Says Mrs. Little, it "was to devastate China for over thirteen years with a destruction of human life far exceeding that of the whole Thirty Years' War in Germany." § Lord Curzon, in considering how the missionaries acquit themselves in China, observes:—

> "A hostile critic might retort that the leader of the Tai-ping Rebellion, who was a Christian convert, and as such was hailed by many of the missionaries as the herald of a new dispensation, succeeded in nothing better than in devastating thirteen out of eighteen provinces of China, and in sacrificing the lives (at the lowest computation) of 20,000,000 men." ||

On another page he says, "it lasted for fourteen years, [and] cost China from twenty to fifty million lives" (p. 400).

The missionary organ, China's Millions, for January, 1903, describes the devastation suffered in the single province of Gan-hwuy, as follows:—

> "No idea can be conveyed to the mind of the English reader of the sufferings endured by the people of this province during the Reign of Terror. Twice did the rebel hordes sweep through its fertile valleys and plains, carrying off its possessions and multitudes of people, never to return. Those who survived these onslaughts endured fresh suffering when the rebels were driven back by the Imperial troops, who completed the destruction the rebels had commenced."

> "Thirty out of thirty-nine millions were swept away, and in districts so complete was the desolation that not a man, nor a woman, nor a child, nor a hamlet, nor a cottage, not even a hut was left to mark the site of a once flourishing place."

Mr. Davenport, who cites the above testimony in his China from Within (p. 258), observes: "Seeing that thirty millions thus disappeared in one inland province, the figure of one hundred millions as the sum of all the inhabitants who lost their lives during this prolonged rebellion is evidently too low an estimate" (p. 259).

Perhaps it will be asked why the British Government went against the Tai-pings, and sent General —at that time Captain—Gordon to help suppress them if they were Christians? The fact of the matter is, our Government's sole consideration was our merchant trade with China. They had just concluded an expensive war with that object solely in view; they had, with the help of the French and modern firearms, brought the Chinese Government to its knees (the Chinese dispatches complained that "contrary to all the rules of war, instead of coming on from the front like an honorable foe, [they] had attacked the Taku forts from the rear")* and had put it in the irons of a commercial-religious treaty, and now meant to maintain its authority against all comers. As Scarth says: "Sir John Bowring's policy was that the British trade with China depended upon the present dynasty being maintained."†

Acid Drops.

By 44 votes to 39 (quite a narrow majority) the London County Council has rejected the recommendation of the Parks Committee that golf should be permitted on the Hainault course on Sundays. It was not a party discussion, however, nor a party vote. Lord Haddo, for instance, said that only a few members of the Hainault Club were in favor of Sunday golf, and this was flatly contradicted by Mr. A. O. Goodrich. The latter gentleman said that he was against Sunday picture shows, but in favor of opening golf links on Sundays, though he did not say why. At least, the reason was not recorded in the report. We should say that the real reason, in all probability, was the fact that he is vice-president of the Hainault Golf Club—and wishes to play the game on Sundays himself. It may also be that the sense of a coming defeat induced him to turn upon the Rev. J. Scott Lidgett, "whose Sunday was like the tradesman's Saturday—it was his busy day." This would have sounded awfully wicked in the Freethinker, but it was greeted with roars of laughter on the London County Council. More laughter was due to the next speaker, Mr. G. A. Hardy, though we are afraid he did not get it. This gentleman declared that Sunday golf "would, in the end, result in a terrible blow to the workers of this country." We will end at that. It was the climax of the debate.

There is little respect for poets and poetry in this Christian country. At Southport, the other day, they got eight hundred little girls in white to greet the Queen. They were not able to manage anything original for the children to sing, so they prepared a parody of a famous and beautiful Scottish song, which turned out thus in the Southport rendering:—

> "Kind, kind, and queenly is she,
> Kind is Queen Mary;
> With honor, love, and loyalty,
> We breathe the name of Mary."

The man who perpetrated that hideous parody ought to be memorialised. He deserves to be stuffed and placed in a public museum, as responsible for the worst atrocity of the twentieth century. We dare say he belongs to the clerical profession.

We have hesitated to publish reports of the accounts of the new "Bulgarian Atrocities," not because we doubted their occurrence, but because these Christian Allies have shown themselves to be such colossal liars that one could never feel quite sure which story was correct. Eastern Christians generally have a high reputation for lying and dishonesty, and the "Allies" well sustained this character in their conflict with Turkey. Freethinkers at least will remember the way in which the Christian papers and preachers in this country slobbered over the lofty aims of the gallant Crusaders who were bent on liberating a suffering population from the yoke of the Crescent. It was a war of the Cross against the Crescent. That is quite true, so far as England was concerned. That was all our preachers saw in it—the chance of beating a Mohammedan Power, and utilising the victory to advertise Christianity. Only the other Day Canon Peyke carried, in Convocation, a resolution that—

> "This House is further of opinion that it will be the duty of the Church to avail itself of any opportunity that may arise in consequence of the recent victories of the allies in the Near East for the presentation of the Gospel of Christ to the Mohammedans in Europe and Asia Minor."

That is all Christians were concerned about—the chance of new markets for their spiritual wares. Many of them publicly described the ceremonies that would take place when the unselfish crusading Allies would celebrate Christian prayers in Santa Sophia.

Now, all this Christian humbug is blown into the air. It was no war of the Cross against the Crescent so far as the Allies were concerned. It was no war of liberation. It was a purely piratical expedition by Christian nations intent on nothing but plunder, and ready to get it by any amount of lying and cruelty. It is even admitted that the Turk may have been preferable to the Christian, and that the conquered territories will benefit little by the change. So little of the Cross against the Crescent element was there that Bulgaria—from whence the phrase originated—would be only too pleased to enter into a defensive alliance with Turkey against the other Balkan States. Some of the writers of the press are beginning to recognise the truth of what we have said above—which is only a repetition of what we said at the beginning of the war—but with singular fatuity they say the crusading element was not present. We beg to differ. It was present. The Crusades were conspicuous above all wars for their greed, cruelty, and internal dissension. And in this respect, at least, the most recent Crusade has lived up to the name.

To return to the stories of massacre. A week or so back Mr. Herbert asked in the House of Commons whether the Government had any information to give the House concerning religious persecution of Mohammedans or Moslems in Macedonia. Of course, no information was forthcoming, but it was admitted that complaints had been received. Directly after the Allies began their unofficial war, stories began to appear of outrages on captured villages, of women violated and exposed to all sorts of indecency. On July 10, the Daily Telegraph published a long account from its correspondent at the front, who had been invited by King Constantine to visit the town of Nigrita, just recaptured from the Bulgarians, and report his experience. Summarised, the correspondent's report is as follows:—Nigrita was a town of 8,000 inhabitants and 1,450 houses. "To-day it is a reeking heap of smouldering ruins, and the acrid stench of burning flesh and bones overpowers the nostrils as I write." Only forty-nine houses are left standing. "1,500 villagers have been foully murdered. Scores of women are still living who were violated, and every house was looted." The correspondent examined and cross-examined witnesses, and tested their stories in every way. His conclusion is that "seldom in the history of warfare has the barbarity of the Bulgarians been surpassed." And the contemptible religious press of Great Britain, after parading the Bulgarians and other Allies as noble-minded liberators, sacrificing themselves for the benefit of others, has not even the manliness to confess their error—if it was an error. Anyhow, they remain silent, only regretting the "fratricidal war." War in any case is bad and brutal, but when religion is there as an inspiring force it becomes indescribably barbarous.

We beg our readers to note well the following extract from an article, headed "A War of Hate," in the Daily News for July 9:—

> "We do not doubt that our correspondent is right when he says that the mutual antagonism to the Turk was mild in comparison with the mutual savagery revealed by the new turn of events. The war against the Turk was a war against an alien tyrant of another race, another religion, another civilisation. It was a war against an oppressor, not against a rival. The new conflict has all the bitterness of a conflict between relations infuriated by jealousy and mutual ambitions. We do not recall a struggle in which the element of sheer hate has played so hideous a part as it is doing in the Balkans to-day."

Doesn't this bear out all that we have written about the Turks and the Balkan States? It is easy to see now that the Turks were controlling wasps' nests. They had a frightful task in keeping the various Christian nations from flying at each other's throats. We now see these Christian nations in their true colors. It is because they are Christians that they love each other so.

Rev. Vaughan Charles Turner, of Kettering, for forty years rector of Little Oakley, left £12,885. He would have taken it if he could. "Blessed be ye poor."

More of them! Rev. John Kipling Quarterman, of Blackheath, for some time Chaplain of the Woolwich Union, left £9,651. Rev. George Alexander Skinner, of Hove, Sussex, left £6,714.

At the recent annual conference of the United Methodist Church, at Halifax, the new President, the Rev. W. Redfern, of Rochdale, declared that their Church had always had a passion for freedom. It may be so, but the fact had escaped us. We never heard of United Methodists having a passion for anybody's freedom than their own,—which is not really freedom at all, but a selfish share of privilege. It would be news to us, for instance, if they passed a resolution in favor of the abolition of the Blasphemy Laws. Freedom? Yes. But not for Freethinkers.

The United Methodist Church Conference resolved to make further efforts to obtain chaplain representation in the Army and Navy. This is one of the Christian bodies which profess to believe that there should be no connection whatever between Religion and the State. That is the theory. In practice it depends on what religion and what connection. Nonconformists do not object to the State patronage of Religion when it serves their turn. In elementary schools, for instance; or in the exemption of chapels, as well as churches, from rates and taxes.

Mr. Harold Spender should really try to omit the pious gags from his political articles in the Daily News. In a diffuse column on "Fratricide in the Balkans" the other day, he said that "the spectacle is as miserable as it is horrible." And he might have stopped there. But he must go on to say that "the folly and crime of it cry to Heaven." It does not appear, though, to reach the ears of the Boss, who takes no notice. Mr. Spender assures us, however, that "it is one of those things over which the angels weep." Shakespeare's poetry is grand in its proper place; it is poor stuff when degraded to a newspaper announcement.

"Sub Rosa" is rather a wearisome humorist, but he might write English. He calls old Spelman "a great antiquarian." What is an "antiquarian"? There is no such substantive in the English dictionary. "Antiquarian" is an adjective. We suppose Mr. Hughes means antiquary.

It is not of very great consequence, only one might as well be exact, and there is a slovenly habit abroad of tacking familiar sayings on to any well-known name. Thus Mr. Philip Snowden remarks that "One French monarch was safe from assassination because his heir was more detested than himself." The story really belongs to our Charles II. His brother James had been remonstrating with him on his habit of wandering about without guards. "Fret not that I go unattended," he replied, "for they will never kill me, James, to make you King." Charles was a shrewd judge of men and circumstances, and very much wiser than most people have imagined. The popular estimate of his character which he so carefully fostered is, perhaps, the best proof of this.

Dr. Campbell Morgan tells us that God is "a God of action, reigning over the Universe in every form so that nothing escapes his government." Then, of necessity, he is still a man of war, delighting in scenes of bloody cruelty and horrible carnage; and Jesus Christ, instead of being the Prince of Peace, is the most heartless of warriors. There is absolutely no escape from this conclusion. If God governs this world, he is a God of unspeakably cruel and bloodthirsty action. Dr. Morgan has unwittingly supplied us with an unanswerable argument for Atheism.

The Bishop of Exeter has sent a friendly letter to the Wesleyan Methodist Conference which has opened at Plymouth. This is thought so unusual that the letter is called "very striking." It is almost a miracle when Christian denominations have a good word for each other. Such is the upshot of nearly two thousand years of the religion of love!

Sabbatarianism is naturally rampant at Cambridge. By a majority of thirty-three votes to ten the Town Council refused to sanction a Trades Union demonstration on Parker's Piece last Sunday, under the auspices of the Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen. Several members declared that such an assembly would be "a desecration of the Sabbath." Mr. Hawkins, a Conservative Churchman, said he had had experience of such Sundays in London, and they were "more like Bedlam than Sundays." He was balanced by a Liberal Nonconformist, Mr. Sturton, who declared that it would be a disgrace to Cambridge to begin to allow these demonstrations. Every sort of religion is the same when it comes to common sense and common justice.

The following is from the Daily News (July 11):—

> "Sir Lewis Dibdin, Dean of the Arches, yesterday delivered judgment in the Court of Arches on the appeal by the Bishop of Ely against a decision by the Chancellor of the Diocese. The Chancellor held that the writing and posting of an admittedly obscene letter by a clergyman to a young lady parishioner was not an offence under the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, and dismissed the case. The defendant is the vicar of St. Matthew's, Littleport, and Sir Lewis said he had been in orders for more than forty years, and must therefore be above sixty years of age. He was also married. His Lordship held that the writing and sending of the letter was an immoral act within the meaning of the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892. The appeal was therefore allowed, and remitted to the Consistory Court of the diocese of Ely in order that further proceedings might be taken."

Before the passing of the Clergy Discipline Act, under Gladstone, it was impossible to get rid of a peccant clergyman. His bishop could inhibit him from preaching, but he remained a clergyman and retained his benefice. Many influential Nonconformists opposed the Bill in order to leave the Church of England with all the trouble of its black sheep. Mr. Gladstone was very angry at this, and called it blackguardly—which indeed it was. It was another illustration of "How these Christians love one another!"

We were under the impression that Paley's Evidences of Christianity had been withdrawn from use at the Universities, but it appears that we were mistaken. According to "Cambridge Notes" in last week's Athenæum, Paley still holds the field:—

> "It is a matter of speculation whether Paley's Evidences will be finally killed by the proposed scheme. That immortal work, though a trifle out of date, has hitherto managed to survive all attempts to destroy its study. Years ago the Divinity Professors tried to abolish it, but the present Dean of Wells—then, I believe, Norrisian Professor—spoke up so eloquently for Paley as a sound theologian and an honored member of the same college as himself, that the Evidences once more survived the ordeal. At present it is easier than the alternative—Logic and Chemistry, and it is studied in the analysis, as of yore, without much benefit or injury to the faith of the candidates. One thing may be said in its favor: now that Euclid has gone, it is the only compulsory subject which gives the slightest idea of the meaning of an argument; and, if Paley's premises are granted, his conclusions are hard to refute."

"A trifle out of date" is really rich. Paley never was actually up to date. It was a masterpiece, but a masterpiece of sophistry, which would have to be rewritten to be effective now,—and who could rewrite it but Paley himself? Take, for instance, his treatment of Celsus. Paley based an argument on the silence of Celsus. He was bound to allude to the fact that the writings of that keen opponent of Christianity are not extant; but it would never do to state that they were deliberately destroyed by the Christian Church by means of an imperial rescript; so Paley stuck to the truth as far as it served the turn. "The writings of Celsus," he said, "are lost." It was extraordinarily clever. But it reminds us of the appeal the American lawyer made on behalf of his client who was indicted for murdering his own parents. He besought the jury to have compassion upon the orphan prisoner.

The writer of these "Cambridge Notes" is hardly accurate, we believe, in his reference to David Hume. He relates that when Hume's "old servant" called him "Saint David" the philosopher-historian—who, by the way, had a pawky humor of his own, running easily into irony—replied "Better men than I have been called Saints." On the face of it there is something wrong with this variant of the story. We fancy the following is more like the original. Hume's reputation for scepticism was common in Edinburgh, and one day a lively street urchin chalked "Saint David" on the great man's by no means luxurious dwelling. The maidservant came running in full of indignation to tell her master of the outrage. "Never mind, lassie," he answered, "many a better man has been made a Saint." We are writing from memory, a long way from books of reference.

We do not allow political questions, as such, to be discussed in the Freethinker. But there are political questions which have definite religious aspects. Welsh Disestablishment, for instance. There are also religious aspects of Home Rule. Sir Edward Carson and the Ulsterites (who, after all, only represent a little more than half their province) constantly parade the religious aspects of Irish self-government. They never tire of declaring that Home Rule means Rome Rule. Without wishing to discuss Home Rule on other grounds, we unhesitatingly repeat what we have plainly asserted before, that Home Rule does not mean Rome Rule, but the very opposite. Irish nature does not differ intrinsically from other human nature. It is not endowed with a double dose of original superstition. What the priest wants in Ireland is not Home Rule but a perpetual agitation for Home Rule. Home Rule would rob the Church of half its power and profits in the time that it takes for a new generation to grow up. This decadence of the Catholic Church is common in all Catholic countries in which representative government triumphs. Look at Italy, look at Portugal, look even at Spain, look above all at France. Catholic France has gradually developed into Freethinking France. Protestantism can scarcely be said to exist there. So it will be in Ireland. It is only a question of time.

We have as much right to say that of Ireland as we have of any other country. That it is a part of the United Kingdom makes no difference at all. The argument is not political or social; it is independent of frontiers; it rests upon an historical law of mental development. That is the great thing. The passions of the hour die out and are forgotten. The laws of human progress are eternal. Catholic and Protestant have fought each other for centuries. Behind them both is the slow but irresistible movement of civilisation, which is overwhelming them both, and will leave them behind as landmarks of antiquarianism.

Our denial that Home Rule meant, or could possibly mean, Rome Rule, some time ago cost us the fairly liberal subscription of one of our readers to the President's Honorarium Fund. We regret the fact—for the subscriber's sake. No financial consideration, in such a connection, never weighed with us more than a feather does on a railway weighing machine. We never wrote for money, and we do not think we ever shall. We trust our career has shown that we are above bribes or intimidation. When we cannot gain a hearing for what we think we shall remain silent.

We are sorry to see Sir Edward Carson descending so much to Billingsgate. We should not allow such language to appear in the Freethinker. We believe that Sir Edward Carson is quite in favor of prosecuting us, simply because we displease his fellow Christians; but we are far from returning the compliment; what we preach we practice; we would allow him the liberty of speech that he would deny us. We believe in freedom. He doesn't. We don't know what he does believe in. He professes to believe in religious toleration, but he rarely opens his mouth without stirring up religious bigotry and hatred.

"Alfonsus," writing in the Catholic Herald for July 12, admits that some popes, though by no means as many as Protestants allege, have been bad men. To us such an admission seems fatal to the claim of papal infallibility, but "Alfonsus" regards it as quite harmless. Indeed, he accounts for the existence of unworthy pontiffs by saying that "our Lord never promised that the supreme heads of the Church should always be holy men," and that "God permits the frailties of the popes in order to show that the Church is a Divine institution, and that it survives all, no matter how terrible shocks, by its inherent supernatural power." They must be exceptionally gullible who will find this explanation satisfactory. How on earth can corrupt popes show forth the Divinity of the Church? Whether they be many or few, the Church is disgraced by having unworthy heads. Fancy the most Holy God being represented on earth by unholy men! The very thought is impossible.

The most curious thing of all is that bad popes are yet infallible. "Alfonsus" assures us that "our Lord" did promise to make them infallible teachers of the truth, and no pope has ever taught heresy to the Church. History, however, informs us that successive popes have promulgated contrary doctrines, and that not a few have contradicted themselves; and we all know that papal schisms have been notoriously numerous. We readily grant that the dogma of infallibility is implied, if not actually taught, in the New Testament; and we are convinced that no one can be Biblically orthodox without believing it. The only fault that can possibly be found with it is that it isn't true.

Canon Masterman, in the exercise of that Christian charity which is so characteristic of the Pulpit, calls the New Theology "a Pantheistic and anti-Christian hash." This delightful bit of polite, elegant language occurs, not in a newspaper report of an extemporaneous address, but in a published volume, entitled The Challenge of Christ. We have no sympathy with the New Theology, any more than with the Old; and we employ the quotation merely as an illustration of the ardor with which Christians love one another when their opinions are in conflict.

Canon Masterman is a Socialist, and, like all other Christian Socialists, he is convinced that Socialism, "apart from the Christian ideal of personal character might prove a colossal disaster." Why? Is not Socialism itself an ideal of personal character? Whether true or false, Socialism is represented to be an infallible remedy for all existing evils. The Socialist is declared to be the ideal man, ideal in his own character and in his relations with all his fellows. Does Canon Masterman mean to convey the conviction that, after all, the Socialist ideal of character and conduct is defective, and that it must be supplemented by what he calls the Christian ideal? To our mind nothing is more indisputable than the fact that Christianity and Socialism are fundamentally opposed to each other. The Gospel Jesus is without doubt an Individualist, and under Christianity a stupendously cruel form of Individualism has almost invariably prevailed, and still prevails.

In connection with the Anglo-German Exhibition it is proposed to open the Crystal Palace on Sundays. The Archbishop of Canterbury has promptly written to the Imperial Sunday Alliance advising its secretary to write to the Lord Mayor warning him that this may affect the fund now being raised for the purchase of the Palace and grounds. We do not think that the threatened financial boycott will have much effect, as the fund appears to be well on the road to completion. But if the Palace is to become public property, there is every reason why it should fall in line with London museums and art galleries and open every Sunday for the benefit of the public. If Christians had a healthy and sensible concern for family life, they would realise that Sunday is the one day in the week in which a man and his wife and children could comfortably spend a day at the Palace. Any other day is difficult for most, and for working men practically impossible. Something in this direction might help to raise English family life to the level of family life on the Continent, where united parties are much more common than they are in this country. But, of course, all the Archbishop has in view is the sectarian question of how it will affect Church attendance.

The Congregational Union has decided to collect £50,000 in order to provide a minimum salary (of how much?) for its ministers. What was the maximum salary of the first twelve apostles—if they ever existed? Just what they could get into the common dish, which is mentioned in the story of the last supper. Sometimes, we dare say, it was thick with solids; at other times, we also dare say, it was thin for the want of them. Such as it was, they had to be contented; not even Judas seems to have been dissatisfied. How many Congregational ministers would accept a job in the Lord's vineyard on the same terms? How many of them, that is, are real Christians?

Now that organised Christianity is rapidly dying, its ministers assure us that unorganised or spiritual Christianity is making amazing progress everywhere. Dr. Horton states that "while it is true that religion seems to lose ground, it is equally true that Christianity is gaining ground." Religion, he admits, is not in itself a good thing, and its passing away may not mean a serious loss; but Christianity, he is confident, is taking a vital hold of the world, and slowly transforming it into the image of Christ. What evidence is there of the truth of such a statement? The Old Age Pension and the Insurance Acts. All we can say is that the case for Christianity is a desperately bad one when this is all that can be said for it. A little more than a year ago Dr. Horton sadly complained that the current of things was dead against the Christian faith, and that in consequence spiritual work was dreadfully handicapped. Can the trend of things have been so radically reversed in so short a time? It is Dr. Horton that has changed; and this is his new plea: "If religions decay, Christianity marches ever forward, for Christianity is Christ." And, at this rate, nobody can tell what either Christ or Christianity is; but never mind, both are marching to—death.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1918.—Previously acknowledged, £158 1s. 11d. Received since:—J. H. (Liverpool), 5s.; Mrs. A. W. Hutty, 2s. 6d.; A. Hacke, 10s.

F. J. VOISEY.—We congratulate you, but don't see anything in the vicar's remarks of special interest to us or our readers.

E. B.—Many thanks for useful matter.

C. F. BUDGE.—You assume that Nature is bound to justify herself to you. She is under no such obligation. There are many theories, of which reincarnation is one, that are logical because they are made logical, and may all be false. Nothing is more logical than Presbyterianism, with its heaven, hell, and predestination. Logic, after all, means nothing but self-agreement or the absence of self-contradiction.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are very welcome.

NEOPHYTE.—The explanation is that Stephen Grellet was a liar—like ninety-nine per cent. of all the Christians who have written about "infidels." William Cobbett, who had an immense respect for Thomas Paine as a political writer, investigated that "Mary Ross" story when he was in New York in 1819; he called on the woman herself, and proved her to be a liar of whom the Devil might be proud. His conclusion was that her whole story of Paine's recantation, etc., was "a lie from beginning to end." Cobbett was not an "infidel." He was a Christian. See Conway's Life of Paine.

E. GWINNELL.—When we say that political questions cannot be discussed in the Freethinker it must not be assumed that we have not thought about them ourselves. We simply mean that our pages are not the place to ventilate them.

L. B. WARDEN.—"Absolute freedom of discussion" may refer to the treatment or the choice of topic. You confuse them. We never closed, because we never opened, our columns to essentially political discussions. What you call "militancy" is a question of policy. If you want to discuss whether arson and murder are legitimate political and social weapons in a civilised community, we can only reply that this journal is not edited and published at a lunatic asylum. We have never said a word against Woman Suffrage, or any other suffrage, in these columns. All we have objected to is violence of method,—from the initial interference with free public meeting up to arson, which easily passes into homicide. Violence is like a drug: it satisfies only by means of ever-increasing doses. For the rest, you do not surprise us by cutting off your weekly "tuppence." We have weathered other calamities, and we hope to weather this one.

A. H. DUNSTAN.—You do well to write again about the matter. Mr. Foote is away from the office for a day or two, and, as the question is obviously one for him to deal with, your letter has been forwarded.

MRS. A. HUTTY.—Subscription received and acknowledged. Mr. Foote values your good wishes for his health, and appreciates your high opinion of his English Review article. Articles of that class from his pen might appear more frequently were there not other calls upon his time, and it is a case of the most urgent work first.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

We do not know that Box Hill is exactly a memorial to George Meredith, although he lived at Flint Cottage so many years. The best Meredith memorial, of course, is his collected writings. Nevertheless, we are glad to hear that the rumor that the speculative jerry builder was to be let loose on Box Hill has been set at rest for ever. Sir Robert Hunter, at the recent annual meeting of the National Trust, announced that a gentleman who wished to remain anonymous had proposed to purchase Box Hill and hand it over in trust for public use and enjoyment in the future. The idea might now be consummated by the preservation of Flint Cottage.

"A reasonable facility of divorce" has, for ever so many years, been one of the immediate practical objects of the National Secular Society. We are delighted to see that this object is attracting more and more support amongst thoughtful people. This was shown in the late Majority Report of the Divorce Commission. It was also very strongly displayed by a recent speech of Mr. Plowden, the well-known London magistrate, to a meeting of the Actress's Franchise League. The following report of Mr. Plowden's speech is from the Daily Chronicle:—

> "Mr. Plowden said legislation to extend the grounds for divorce was bound to come. He had authority to say that a Bill had been drafted to carry into action the proposals of the Majority Report of the Commission. The Bill was in the capable hands of Sir David Brynmor Jones, and he believed it was laid on the table of the House of Commons the previous day.
> "No feverish agitation was required — no mammoth demonstrations in Hyde Park, not even the destruction of a single window-pane. What was required were a few penetrating lines in a short Act of Parliament, and there would be lifted an immense load of misery from thousands and thousands of homes which were at present rent asunder by conjugal strife.
> "Referring to his police-court experience of separations, he said it was his sympathy with the poor that caused him to take an interest in the divorce question.
> "'I live amongst the poor,' he added, 'and I don't believe a more patient and more long-suffering class are to be found than in the slums and alleys of London.'
> "In many cases, he continued, separations led women to the gutter or workhouse through no fault of their own. What was wanted was not medicine, but a surgical operation. When a woman discovered that she had married a drunkard who terrorised her, or her partner became a lunatic, some people held that she should be bound to him, 'because the sanctity of the tie forbade divorce!' Others said: 'Whom God hath joined——.' But he was not going to confound God with a curate. (Laughter and cheers.) He would rather say, 'Whom God has ceased to join let no man keep together.' Besides holding that divorce should be granted by mutual consent, he would like to see no marriage legal unless it was peformed before the registrar.
> "Without divorce, marriage—at the best an experiment—was reduced to a gamble, for it punished the innocent. That a couple, whose confident hope of a happy union was replaced by a decision after marriage that they were not suited, could not break the fetters which they had innocently forged was a cruel barbarity and a positive disgrace to civilisation."

Miss Gertrude Kingston approved of divorce, but she did not wish to see it too easy. Which also is a point of view that should not be lost sight of.

We regret to hear that Christian rowdyism has been developing at the open air meetings of the Edmonton Branch of the N. S. S. Last Sunday evening Miss Kough was subjected to continuous interruption during the whole of her lecture; not satisfied with this, some of the pious hooligans present took to the Biblical pastime of stone-throwing. One struck her on the back; but, fortunately, no injury was done. After she had concluded her lecture, and left the meeting, the rowdyism became still greater. Perhaps Freethinkers who have a little time to spare on Sundays will feel moved to pay a visit to the Edmonton Branch meetings. There is nothing that so effectually checks the cowardly ruffianism of these Christian Evidence supporters as the sight of a goodly number of Freethinkers round the platform

A book of what should be very great interest is promised through the Oxford University Press. It is Autobiographical Notes by the late William Hale White, the author of the "Mark Rutherford" series of novels and a few other volumes. He was a powerful writer and a thorough Freethinker.

The following is from last week's Athenæum:—

> "The Early Life of Mark Rutherford (W. Hale White), by Himself, will be published by Mr. Humphrey Milford this month. These autobiographical notes were written by Mr. Hale White when he was 78 years old, not primarily for publication, but 'to please two or three persons related to me by affection.' The volume, which has been seen through the press by Miss Mary Theodora White, is uniform with Pages from a Journal and More Pages, already issued by the Oxford University Press, and includes portraits of Mark Rutherford and his father, and views of old Bedford."

We shall welcome this book and introduce it to our readers. But we must deny at once that it can be uniform with the two volumes mentioned, for those volumes are dissimilar from each other. We speak without hesitation, for they are both in our own library.

The Gospel History a Fabrication.

THE TWO VIRGIN BIRTH STORIES.

THE earliest Gospel legends of which we have any knowledge—viz., those from which the three Synoptists derived the main portion of their Gospels—commenced with the preaching of John the Baptist, as in the canonical Mark. Later on, new stories came into circulation relating to the births of Jesus and the Baptist, and to the infancy and childhood of the Savior—the originators of the legends being unknown. From this later class of literature two of the Gospel writers, Matthew and Luke, have given us revised versions of the Birth stories, derived in each case from primitive narratives now called apocryphal (Matt. i., ii.; Luke i., ii.).

Matthew, in chap. i., introduces Joseph and Mary, and speaks of the latter as being "found with child of the Holy Ghost." In chap ii. he says:—

> "Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judæa in the days of Herod the king, behold there came wise men from the east," etc.

Further on, we find this king to be Herod the Great, who reigned thirty-four years (38 B.C.—4 B C), and also that the birth is placed towards the end of his reign. Next, it is stated that Joseph, Mary, and Jesus went to Egypt, and did not return until after the death of Herod. Furthermore, Herod is stated to have slaughtered all the male children of Bethlehem "from two years old and under, according to the time which he had carefully learned of the wise men." It is implied in the narrative that the time of the appearance of the star coincided with that of the birth. These statements are all the data we possess for fixing the year of the birth of Jesus Christ; whence we have but to consider the following alleged circumstances: (1) Herod did not massacre the babies until nearly two years after the first appearance of the star; (2) he lived for some time, long or short, after the massacre; (3) he died in 4 B.C. Hence, according to Matthew, the birth of Jesus could not have been later than 6 B.C.; but it may have been earlier.

We come now to Luke's account, which commences as follows:—

> Luke ii. 1—5.—"Now it came to pass in those days, there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the inhabited earth should be registered. This registration [first] took place when Kurenios was governor of Syria. And all went to be registered, every one to his own city. And Joseph also went up from Galilee, out of the city of Nazareth, into Judæa, to the city of David, which is called Bethlehem.....to register himself, with his betrothed wife," etc.

Luke, as already stated, took the first two chapters of his Gospel from apocryphal writings, in one of which—the Protevangelium of James—it was stated (par. 17): "And there was an order from the emperor Augustus that all in Bethlehem should be enrolled." The words "enrolled" and "registered" are merely translations of the same Greek word, which in the Authorised Version is rendered "taxed."

Now Luke, in consulting the Antiquities of Josephus for historical data connected with the alleged Gospel events, noticed among other matters the statement that Quirinius (therein called Kurenios) came to Judæa to superintend a registration; but not taking time to properly understand the matter, that evangelist wrote, as we have seen, that all the inhabitants of countries subject to Cæsar were to be registered for taxation—which registration explained, he thought, why Joseph had to go from Nazareth to Bethlehem. But Luke was mistaken. There was no such decree made by Cæsar Augustus: the facts are simply as follows.

Ten years after the death of Herod the Great, Archelaus, who had governed Samaria and Judæa, was deposed by Augustus, and his kingdom was made a Roman province. As a preliminary to this change of government, Cæsar, after appointing Quirinius president of Syria, sent him into Judæa "to take account of the people's substance," and with him went Coponius as procurator. This was all. A registration was made of the people living in those two provinces, who would be required to pay tribute to Cæsar, and the list doubtless included those who had previously paid to Archelaus (Antiq. 17, 11, 4; 17, 13, 2 and 5; 18, 1, 1). As to "Joseph the carpenter," if he was then living in Galilee, as Luke states, he would pay his tribute to the tetrarch of Galilee: the registration related only to the two provinces that had been governed by Archelaus. But, in any case, there would be no rushing about of the whole population to cities in which some remote ancestors had once lived. The names would be taken in each city as it stood, where the residents, and their social position and property, were known. The idea of Joseph journeying from Galilee to Bethlehem to pay a tax not required of him is nothing less than idiotic.

Furthermore, all Luke's statements in chap. ii. respecting the birth and childhood of Jesus are but a revised version of fictitious narratives which he found in the apocryphal Gospels of his time. The story of the child Jesus, for instance, being found by his parents in the temple, sitting surrounded by learned rabbis (Luke ii. 41—52) is still found, almost verbatim, in one of the few apocryphal writings that have come down to us—the Gospel of Thomas.

There is one word in the foregoing Gospel statement for which Luke is not responsible: this is the word "first" in the sentence, "This registration first took place when Kurenios was governor of Syria." The word should have been expunged by the New Testament Revisers; but, instead of so doing, those Christian scholars made the passage read: "This was the first enrolment made when Quirinius was governor of Syria"—a statement which implies that at least two enrolments were made during the governorship of Quirinius. The reason for this misrepresentation is obvious. In Matthew's account, the birth of Jesus took place in the reign of Herod the Great, in the year 6 B.C., or earlier; in Luke's account Jesus was born during the registration under Quirinius, in the year A.D. 6—that is to say, twelve years later. The only way to reconcile these conflicting narratives is by first boldly asserting that two registrations were made under Quirinius, the first in 6 B.C., the year of the Birth, according to Matthew; next, by brazenly asserting that Quirinius was governor of Syria in that year also. Now, astonishing to relate, both assertions are actually made, and the historical registration recorded by Josephus, A D. 6, is declared to be a second enrolment, and not the one referred to by Luke. This method of harmonising shows the lengths to which Christian advocates will go to conceal obvious Gospel fictions, as well as their utter disregard for truth. For, needless to say, there was no registration in Judæa in the latter part of the reign of Herod the Great, nor in any later years, save that mentioned by Josephus in A.D. 6. Neither, again, had Quirinius been governor of Syria before the latter year. Josephus speaks of him as new to the presidentship, though he had held "other magistracies" (Antiq. 18, 1, 1).

It is further a fact of history that from 12 B.C. down to 3 B.C., the office of president of Syria was filled by two persons only, Saturninus and Quintilius Varus, the latter succeeding the former in 5 B.C. (Antiq. 17, 5, 2). During this period—which covers the "Birth" of Matthew—Josephus refers to the ruling president thirteen or fourteen times, and in each case mentions the one or the other by name. There was therefore no place for Quirinius between 12 B C. and 3 B.C. If further proof be needed of the registration to which Luke referred, it is given by Luke himself, who represents a Jewish rabbi as saying (Acts v. 37):—

> "After this man rose up Judas of Galilee in the days of the Registration, and drew away much people," etc.

Here it is clear that Luke knew of but one "registration" or "enrolment," namely, that made by Quirinius (or Kurenios) in A.D. 6, as narrated by Josephus, who in the same paragraph (Antiq. 18, 1, 1) records the insurrection raised by Judas of Galilee against the payment of tribute to the Romans. Here, too, we have proof that the word "first" in Luke ii. 2 is a later addition.

But the Christian falsification of history is not yet ended. In a Christian text-book called Aids to the Student of the Holy Bible I find a "Historical Epitome" arranged in tabular form, from which I make the following extracts:—

6 B.C.—"The census or registration of the Roman world (Luke ii. 2) begins."
5 B.C.—Antipater "is convicted before Herod and Varus, legatus of Syria.....Birth of Christ.....Quirinius legatus of Syria the first time."
4 B.C.—"Local rebellions, especially under Judas of Galilee, plunge Palestine into anarchy and bloodshed..... Varus, legatus of Syria, restores order with fire and sword, crucifying 2,000 Jews."
A.D. 6.—"Augustus banishes Archelaus.....Quirinius, again legatus of Syria, makes a taxing-census."

From the foregoing, it will be seen: (1) that the two conflicting "Birth" stories are merged into one, and placed in 5 B.C.; (2) that Quirinius is fraudulently represented as legatus, or imperial governor, during that year; (3) that Judas of Galilee, who is named in the Acts as an agitator "in the days of the Registration" (i.e., A.D. 6) is transferred to 4 B.C. Here we have a sample of the methods employed by Christian reconcilers to nullify the results of adverse Biblical criticism.

In the foregoing "Epitome" the words I have placed in italics are nothing less than falsifications of history. In Luke ii. 1—5, Jesus Christ is said to have been born at the time when a registration was being made in Judæa: this is the one great fact to be borne in mind. Now the first statement in the foregoing extract (under 6 B.C.)—that "the census or registration of the Roman world (Luke ii. 2) begins"—is untrue, and is made simply to support Luke's error respecting "a decree.....that all the inhabited earth should be registered." As already stated, there was no such decree by Cæsar Augustus: neither was there a historical registration of any kind in 6 B.C.—or one begun in that year—nor in 5 B.C. or 4 B.C. If a census at Rome be referred to, there was one in 29 B.C., in 8 B.C., and in A.D. 14; but none in 6, 5, or 4 B.C. But, even had such been the case, it would not affect Palestine, or any other country. The Epitome statement could only deceive the very ignorant.

Next, with regard to "Judas of Galilee," that individual only became known, even according to the Acts, "in the days of the Registration," at which time he raised an agitation against paying tribute to the Romans. There was no registration in 4 B.C., where Christian falsifiers have placed him, and no question of paying tribute to the Romans: he has therefore no place in history but A.D. 6, when that tribute was about to be paid.

Lastly, in this Epitome, Quintilius Varus is president of Syria all the time. He is named as legatus both before and after the "Birth of Christ"; and when anarchy arose in Judæa during the absence of Archelaus in Rome, it was Varus, not Quirinius, who marched with a legion from Antioch, and put down the disturbances. Varus was the governor of Syria: Quirinius is but an interpolated name. It is almost needless to say, there is no historical record of this Quirinius being president of Syria prior to A.D. 6.

One other question remains to be noticed. Luke states in his Gospel (iii. 23) that "in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar" (i.e., A.D. 28) Jesus "was about thirty years of age." This statement places the "Birth" in the year 2 B.C.; that is to say, four years later than the time given by Matthew, and eight years earlier than that previously given by Luke himself. There are thus three conflicting dates to be reconciled instead of two. And, after all this investigation, the evidence for the historicity of the Virgin Birth stories remains the same: Matthew and Luke found them among some lying apocryphal writings of their time, and made revised copies of them—the original concoctors of the stories being unknown. If to this lack of evidence we add the conflicting dates, the flat contradictions of the stories themselves, and the utter improbability of a Virgin birth, we arrive at the only conclusion possible—that both were early Christian fabrications.

ABRACADABRA.

Jesus on Holiday.

THEY went to church; I came down to the sea; and now I am wondering whether they are enjoying the service as much as I am enjoying the sunshine and sea-air. Somehow, I think the balance falls on my side. They are attending the old kirk with a different name. The main portions of the worship will certainly be identical to what they have respected throughout their lives. The form of the service will be similar. At the same time, many little distinguishing traits will crop up occasionally, and, methinks, their minds will readily be led from what they themselves term the reality, to the superficial. Comparisons will be worked out mentally; and not all the power of God will be able to dull to extinction the feeling that their method of worshiping God is by far the better. And so I conclude that they, despite their beliefs, are not so much worshipers as observers; and the suspicion steals over me that practically the same may be said of all the holidaying Christians in Britain.

Easily can I imagine the members of a small church being really imbued with the spirit (so-called) of worship. They know each other. They are more or less actuated by the same desires, and feelings, and ideas. Worshiping together, they may truly experience the fellowship that robs conflicting characteristics of their sharpness. They will draw together and taste the happiness of fellowship. Paucity of numbers makes for comradeship; and they will delight in it, saying it is one of God's great gifts. But I cannot imagine a crowd, gathered from all corners of the land, basking in the sunshine of such a fellowship. Nor is it possible that every sub-lieutenant of Jesus Christ possesses the wonderful power of linking together human units that have no mental relationship except their vaunted love of God. Consequently, the eloquence poured over pulpit bulwarks is blarney, if I may be so rude as to use the word; church attendance in holiday resorts, as in cities, hypocrisy, and, necessarily, a base insult gratuitously offered to, and never refused by, the Lord of the Heavens; and the happiness derived from it absolutely fictitious.

Besides, people on holidays usually determine to enjoy themselves to the utmost. They go for pleasure; and pleasure is not to be found within the walls of a church. "But," Christians object, "the enjoyment we receive in church is completely different from that which we indulge outside." Decidedly; and because it is so there is written above the entrance to every seaside and city church the words, "The Temple of Whited Sepulchres." For the enjoyment obtained therein is not the fellowship of worship, or the Freethinker's tasks, arduous enough, would be sterner and more troublesome: it is no more than the gratification of the demands of a weak-kneed custom and pleasure, hollow, ephemeral, more imaginary than real, and the real portion of it fraught with disaster to their own little creed.

To-day the disaster is more apparent than it was yesterday; for the saving grace of Christianity, as of all creeds, the fellowship of worship, has become a memory of the past, even in villages. The Church is too big. Through the gaps in its body, slashed open by the swords of Freethought and Science, rushes in the wind. The Church is troubled with an ailment from which it will never recover.

Thinking of the gaily dressed congregation, and recollecting what I had heard about the famous church parade, I smiled. It is too lovely a day for me to feel the anger that generally surges over me when my mind takes to noticing these things. Perhaps I am too sensitive to the seriousness of it to see the humorous side. But to-day I fancy I can see the Lord Jesus Christ, great broad-minded man as he is claimed to be, shoot down on a sunray to this summer resort, just for an hour's fun. Of course, being a broad-minded man, he is able, at times, to enjoy the funny aspect of things. I can imagine him standing in a corner of the church, and enjoying the farce immensely. I can see the laughter-tears roll down his white cheeks, and see the nail-pierced hands lift the thorn-crown from his head so that it may not fall off in his glee. One hand is pressed to his side; not to stay the flow of blood; it is the characteristic attitude of the merrymaker. And then I can see him sitting on a seat on the "prom.," watching the gaudily dressed church crowds, listening to their remarks, and enjoying the religious pantomime hugely.

The Man of Sorrows becomes, for an hour, the Man of Merriment. He chuckles at the play of his puppets. Amusement lights up the carewornness of the age-grey eyes. The wrinkles of loving-kindness contract into ripples of mirth. The sorrow-laden brow shines, even in its whiteness, with light-heartedness. Jesus is as happy as a boy who pulls a bottom stone from a castle he himself has built, and it topples over to confusion. He shouts, for he does not recognise it as failure, knowing not that endurability is success.

The low, sonorous music of the waves, as they rise to kiss the sunshine, then falling in millions of bright beads of creamy splendor, is more marvellous to my ears than the inspired, sickly, slavish hymns that are being sung by thousands of Christians at this moment. On the waters the wonderful colors and movements appeal more to my sense of beauty than all the verbal pictures of God, Christ, and the angels. The sunrays pressing their hot loving lips to the wave-crests, transforming them into a foaming mass of drops of light, are more lovely than the visioned white face of Christ.

I have often been told that God gave us beauty; but sometimes I think that when God and his shadow are flung from the minds of men Nature's beauty will be seen as it never was seen before.

ROBERT MORELAND.

Chamfort, the Friend of Mirabeau.

NEARLY a hundred and twenty years ago (April 13, 1794) there expired at Paris a Freethinking wit of the first order, Sebastian Roch Nicholas Chamfort. Born in Auvergne, 1741, he knew no parent save his mother, a peasant girl, who was "companion to a lady." When the lady saw another companion was coming, Chamfort's mother was turned out of doors. Her son, however, consoled her with his love, and in after life he often denied himself necessaries to supply her wants. He was placed at the College des Grassins. Here he studied hard, though he said, "What I learned I have forgotten, and the little I know was guess-work." Yet he carried off all the prizes. Some fellow-students proposed to travel over the world. He remarked: "Before making the tour of the world, suppose we were to make the tour of ourselves." For his attainments he had the offer of an abbey, but he said: "I will never become a priest for three reasons—I like honor and not honors; philosophy, not hair-cloth; the fair sex, not money." He sought, often in vain, for literary employment, and at first found nothing better than writing sermons. In time, however, he gained a prize at the Academy for an éloge on Molière, and, coming under the patronage of Mdme. Helvetius, attained a seat at the Academy himself. Offered a secretaryship by the Prince of Condé, lack of money forced him to accept, though he spent his time in devising means of leaving without giving offence. "My life is a tissue of striking contrasts with my principles. I do not like princes, and yet I am attached to a prince; my republican maxims are known, and yet I live among courtiers; I like poverty, and all my friends are among the rich; I fly from men, but men come after me; literature is my only consolation, and yet I am never with men of letters; I wished to be a member of the Academy, and now I never go there; I think that illusions are necessary to my existence, and yet I live without illusions." One friend he found at court, the Titanic Mirabeau; and, curiously enough, the man of action treated the man of thought as his master. In a letter to Chamfort, whom he called une tête electrique, Mirabeau says: "I left off my swaddling clothes too late. The conventions of mankind have fettered me too long; and when my bonds were somewhat loosened (for broken they never were) I still found myself bedecked with the liveries of opinion. But I was too passionate, and had sacrificed too much to fortune ever to become a man of nature. It is not in the midst of dangers that one can follow a regular route. Oh, if I had but known you ten years ago, what precipices and ravines might I not have avoided! Never a day passes, and never does anything serious occur, without my saying to myself, 'No, Chamfort would frown; let me not do so, let me not write that'; or, 'Chamfort will be pleased; for Chamfort's mind and soul are tempered in the same water as my own.'"

Chamfort embraced the revolution with ardor. His sympathies had always been with the poor, whom he called "the negroes of Europe." Rivarol said there would be no patronage of men of letters in a Republic. "So," replied Chamfort, "you are one of those who forgive all the harm the priests have done, on reflecting that, but for the priest, we should not have had the comedy of 'Tartufe.'" Rivarol reminded Chamfort that he was formerly one of those who pleaded the cause of nobility. "It was, you said, an intermediary between the king and the people." "Yes," replied Chamfort, "but I added something else; true, an intermediary, but as the hound is an intermediary between the huntsman and the hare."

Chamfort took part in the leading events of the Revolution, and became secretary of the famous Jacobin Club. He disliked windy speeches. Once he rose and said that he would speak on despotism and democracy. The following is his entire speech. "I everything; the rest nothing: there is despotism. I another; another I: there is democracy." To those who advocated slight reforms, he said, "You would have the Augean stables cleaned with a feather broom! Society must be refounded, as Bacon said the understanding must." Chamfort said that priests and kings prescribed suicide in order to rivet servitude. When thrown into prison by Robespierre, he found it intolerable. "It is neither life nor death; for me there is no middle course—I must either open my eyes on the blue expanse of heaven, or close them in the tomb." He regained his liberty, but had scarcely had time to breathe the free air, still watched by a gendarme, when his prison doors again opened to receive him. He swore that he would elude his pursuers; and, on their coming to seize him, placed a pistol against his forehead and fired; the ball shattered his nose and destroyed one of his eyes. Astonished at still finding himself alive, he took up a razor and tried to cut his throat; but death rejected him. It was in vain that, maddened by pain, he slashed at his breast and cut himself in every part of his body. His blood flowed from his wounds in streams, and he fell down exhausted, but still living. He dictated to those who came to drag him to prison: "I, Sebastian Roch Nicholas Chamfort, declare that I wish to die a free man, rather than be led like a slave to prison." He signed this thoroughly Roman declaration with a steady hand and a flourish traced in blood. Strange to say, he still lived on for many days, and when at length he succumbed he said: "I am at last about to quit this world, where the heart must break if it be not brazened."

WISE AND WITTY SAYINGS OF CHAMFORT.

It is asserted that Madame, the king's daughter, playing with one of her nurses, looked at her hand, and after counting her fingers, exclaimed, "What! you have five fingers too, like me?" And she counted them again to be sure.

La Fontaine, hearing someone mourn over the lot of the damned in the fire of hell, said, "I flatter myself they get used to it, and at last are like fishes in water."

A countryman divided his little property between his four sons, and went to live, now with one and now with another. He was asked on returning from one of these visits, "Well, how were you received? How did they treat you?" "They treated me like their own child," he replied; and from the lips of such a father the answer was sublime.

Monsieur de ——, who saw the source of human degradation in the establishment of the sect of Nazarenes and in Feudalism, said that, to be worth anything, it was necessary to un-French and un-baptise oneself, and become Greek or Roman in spirit.

Marmontel, in his youth, much sought the society of old Boindin, who was famous for his wit and his scepticism. The old man made an appointment with him at the Café Procope. "But we cannot speak there on philosophic matters." "Oh, yes, by means of a special language, a kind of argot." Then they made up a vocabulary: the soul was called Margot; religion, Javotte; liberty, Jeanneton; and God the Father, M. de l'Etre. A man dressed in black, with an unpleasant countenance, joined in the conversation, and said to Boindin, "Sir, may I venture to ask you who is that M. de l'Etre that behaves himself so badly, and gives you such dissatisfaction?" "Sir," replied Boindin, "he was a police spy." One can imagine the roars of laughter, the man being himself in that profession.

Louis XV. inquired of the Duke of Ayen (afterwards Marshal Noailles) if he had sent his plate to the mint. The duke replied, No. "But," the king said, "I have sent my own." "Ah, sire," rejoined the duke, "when Jesus Christ died on Good Friday he knew very well that he would rise again on Sunday."

Diderot was asked what kind of man was M. d'Epinay. "He is a man who has eaten two millions, without saying a sensible word or doing a good action."

A lady ninety years of age said to Fontenelle aged ninety-five, "Death has forgotten us." "Hush!" said Fontenelle with finger on lip.

Fontenelle had composed an opera in which there was a chorus of priests that scandalised the devout, and the Archbishop of Paris wanted to suppress it. "I don't meddle with his clergy," said Fontenelle, "and he shouldn't meddle with mine."

Monsieur —— begged of the Bishop of —— a country house which he never visited. The bishop replied, "Don't you know that one should always have a place one doesn't go to, but where one thinks he would be happy if he did go?" After a moment's silence Monsieur —— said, "That is true, and it is that which made the fortune of heaven."

A man of letters who was made to feel a certain nobleman's superiority of position, said to him, "My lord, I am not ignorant of what I ought to know; but I also know it is easier to be above me than beside me."

I have heard a devotee, speaking against those who discussed the articles of faith, say, "Sir, a true Christian does not investigate what he is ordered to believe. It is like taking a bitter pill; if you chew it you will never swallow it."

There are well-dressed follies as well as well-dressed fools.

The physical world appears the work of a powerful and good being, who has been obliged to leave to a malignant being the execution of a part of his plan. But the moral world seems to be the capricious work of a devil gone mad.

What is a philosopher? A man who opposes nature to law, reason to custom, his conscience to opinion, and his judgment to error.

The most wasted of all days is the one in which we have not laughed.

Society is composed of two great classes; those who have more dinner than appetite, and those who have more appetite than dinner.

Live and let live, without hurting yourself or anyone else; that, I believe, is the sum of morality.

LISBON CONGRESS—OCTOBER, 1913.

IT being the desire of the Executive of the N. S. S. to make such arrangements as will enable any members or friends of the movement who may wish to be present at the Lisbon Congress to travel with the official delegates of the N. S. S., I wish to call attention to the following particulars:—

The cheapest and most direct way of reaching Lisbon is by the Nederland Royal Mail Line from Southampton. The President of the Positivist Society, Mr. S. H. Swinny, who has made the journey, recommends this route.

The return fare from Southampton to Lisbon (second class) is £8 5s. For the convenience of those residing in the provinces, the Company issues a return ticket to Southampton from all important provincial towns at a fare and a quarter, available for forty days.

The shipping company do not provide hotel accommodation. This may be reckoned, from the time of reaching Lisbon, at about 11s. per day.

The Congress opens on October 4, and continues on October 6, 7, and 8; therefore, the only available boat for the outward journey is the one leaving Southampton at mid-day on September 30, the connecting train from London leaving Waterloo at 10 a.m. For the return journey the earliest boat leaves Lisbon on October 15, thus allowing ample time for sight-seeing. Tickets are also available by a boat leaving on October 17.

As the sea journey takes three days each way, friends must reckon on an absence from England of practically three weeks.

These particulars should assist in forming a rough estimate of the cost, but it may be possible to secure some reduction per head when the number of the party is definitely ascertained. I must, however, request that early notice be given me by friends proposing to join the party, as I am informed by the shipping agents that passages must be booked well in advance, and this applies also to hotel accommodation.

As has already been stated, the opening day of the Congress (Oct. 5) coincides with the date of the third celebration of the proclamation of the Portuguese Republic. Senhor Magalhaès Lima, the President of the Republic, I understand from Mr. Heaford, has expressed his pleasure at the prospect of the attendance of English Freethinkers, and our party will be included in the invitation to take part in the fêtes organised by the Government to celebrate the occasion.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND?

You say there is a God
  Above the boundless sky,
A wise and wondrous Deity
  Whose strength none can defy.
You say that he is seated
  Upon a throne most grand,
Millions of angels at his beck—
  Why don't he lend a hand?

See how the earth is groaning,
  What countless tears are shed!
See how the plague stalks forward,
  And brave and sweet lie dead.
Homes burn and hearts are breaking,
  Grim murder stalks the land;
You say he is omnipotent—
  Why don't he lend a hand?

Behold, injustice conquers!
  Pain curses every hour!
The good and true and beautiful
  Are trampled like the flower!
You say he is our father,
  That what he wills doth stand;
If he is thus almighty,
  Why don't he lend a hand?

What is this monarch doing
  Upon his golden throne,
To right the wrong stupendous,
  Give joy instead of moan?
With his resistless majesty,
  Each force at his command,
Each law his own creation—
  Why don't he lend a hand?

Alas! I fear he's sleeping,
  Or is himself a dream,
A bubble on thought's ocean,
  Our fancy's fading gleam.
We look in vain to find him
  Upon his throne so grand,
Then turn your vision earthward—
  'Tis we must lend a hand.

'Tis we must grasp the lightning,
  And plough the rugged soil;
'Tis we must beat back suffering,
  And plague and murder foil;
'Tis we must build the paradise
  And bravely right the wrong:
The God within us faileth,
  The God within is strong.

Obituary.

We regret to report the death of Miss Mary Warner in the seventy-fourth year of her age. She was for twenty-five years the faithful housekeeper of Mr. Ed. Parker, 50 London-road, Plaistow, and remained to the end a firm and consistent Freethinker. Mr. Parker is a well-known and diligent worker in connection with the West Ham Branch, and we tender him our sincere sympathy in the loss of his old friend. The interment took place on Tuesday afternoon, July 8, when a Secular Service was conducted in the presence of a very large number of friends.—J. T. L.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 30 SUNDAY, JULY 27, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

I have the confidence, which began with hope and strengthens with experience, that humanity is gaining in the stores of mind, and that the signification of this gift of life, that we should leave a better world for our successors is being understood.—GEORGE MEREDITH.

Christianity and Force.

IT is quite in accord with the policy of the religious press that not a word has appeared therein concerning the reported brutalities and massacres by the Christian powers in the Balkans. They have expressed regret that Bulgaria cannot agree with its late allies, and professed much sorrow over "this fratricidal war"—as though any war could be called brotherly—but for the rest there has been silence. I have only come across one implied exception to this, and with that I will deal in a moment. Meanwhile, those who know the readiness with which accounts of massacres are published, when it is a non-Christian power that is guilty of the crime, will appreciate the silence in this instance. The truth is, of course, that the first Balkan War made its primary and strongest appeal to Christian feelings; and before this every other consideration was of small weight.

What Christians in England expected was doubtless a wholesale conversion from Mohammedanism. Reports of such conversions actually appeared. Readers of the Freethinker may remember that, some weeks back, there were given in the "Acid Drops" columns some quotations from a writer in the Christian World describing how a number of villages had come over, practically in a body to Christianity. He assured his readers that no force was used in the conversion, the Mohammedan villagers had simply been hungering for an opportunity to embrace Christianity; doubtless attracted by the nobility of character exemplified among the Balkan Christians. The true story of those conversions appeared in the Daily Telegraph of July 17, in connection with an account of the new "Bulgarian Atrocities." The account is from a statement by Mohammedans of standing, countersigned by several Bulgarian priests. The report states that, first of all, the Bulgarians converted the mosque into a church. This was at Doiran, the place of the reported conversions. Some thousands of people were also slaughtered.

> "The Musulmans at Guirian, Bala, and other villages were forcibly baptised by priests from Sofia. Many women and girls were outraged at Doiran. Others working in the fields, planting tobacco and maize, were assailed and dishonored in the daytime by Bulgarian soldiers."

The document is signed "in the name of the whole population of Kaya Doiran" by the Mufti and sixteen nobles. Then follows this statement, signed by Bulgarian priests:—

> "We Bulgarian priests declare and testify the above to be the pure truth, and that this is a free and unconstrained declaration, due simply to the love of truth."

This account puts a very neat finish to the elaborate story of the conversion of crowds of Mohammedan villagers, although we do not expect the correction will appear in the journal which published the original narrative.

It was said above that only one implied reference to the massacres had appeared in the religious press. This was to the effect that when the war spirit was aroused the better influences of Christianity were nullified, but that while the actions of Christians gave pleasure to the enemies of Christianity, others would discriminate between "the lofty and beautiful teachings of Christ" and the practice of some of its professors acting under the influence of racial hatred sharpened by a state of actual warfare. This is a very familiar apology for the misbehavior of Christians, and it has the fatal weakness of heavily discounting the value of Christianity as a civilising or even a moralising force. The lofty and beautiful teachings of Christ break down at the very point where they are most needed. Instead of curbing the passion of racial hatred, and humanising, so far as it can be humanised, the barbarous practice of warfare, we are warned that in such cases we must expect Christian principles to be completely ignored. The apology is thus bad enough as it stands, it is still worse when one examines it more carefully. Then it will be found that there is no more prolific cause of hatred and ill-will—not only in times of war but also in times of peace—than religion, and no worse offender in this respect than Christianity.

Let us look at a few facts. We will take them apart from the question of war, so that the subject may be looked at with a little less prejudice than would otherwise be the case. It will not be denied that Christians have quarrelled with each other, fought with each other, and murdered each other as the result of differences of religious opinion, nor will it be denied that differences in religion are the most intractable of all disagreements. Neither will it be questioned that usually people can express different opinions concerning science, or literature, or politics without a tithe of the ill-feeling aroused in religious discussions. And even though Christianity had no part in the perpetuation of this savage spirit, it, at all events, has been unable to abolish or even to restrain it. And it is a yet more strking fact that refinement in controversy and toleration of opposing opinions does not commence with religion and then pass on to other subjects. The movement is in quite an opposite direction. It commences with non-religious subjects; and habits engendered elsewhere exert a gradually refining influence on religion. It is life that humanises religion. Religion does nothing to humanise life.

Here is still another fact that hardly admits of dispute. Christianity has not only failed to induce people to exercise a common courtesy in differences of opinion, but intolerance and persecution have been more intense and more sustained under Christianity than under any other religion in the civilised world. The Balkan War gave Christians the opportunity of holding up Mohammedanism as a religion of persecution. That it has persecuted none will dispute. It is a religion, and carries the iniquity common to the species. But, as an historic fact, it has been far more tolerant than Christianity. Jews and Christians were allowed to live at peace under Mohammedan rule—under trifling restrictions—were allowed the exercise of their religion, and permitted to hold public office at a time when unbelievers were being hunted down like vermin by the Church and Jews compelled to wear a distinguishing dress so that they might be the more easily exposed to public outrage. Moreover, in Europe all laws against heresy were of Christian origin. In the old Roman Empire liberty of worship was universal. So long as one treated the religion of the State with a degree of decency, one might worship any god one pleased. And when Christians were proceeded against under laws that were not primarily aimed at liberty of worship or opinion, the procedure was formal, the trial public, time given for defence, and the behavior of judges showed their dislike to the prosecution.*

But with Christianity, instead of persecution being spasmodic, it was persistent. It was not taken up by the authorities with reluctance; it was inculcated by them as one of the chief virtues. Nor was it directed against a sectarian power that threatened the power of the State. The worst periods of Christian persecution were precisely those when the State had least to fear from internal dissension. The people persecuted were not men and women who were guilty of neglect of social duty. On the contrary, they were serving the State by the encouragement of literature, science, philosophy, and commerce. One of the Roman emperors, the great Trajan, had advised magistrates not to search for Christians, and to treat anonymous communications with contempt. Christians carried the search for heresy into a man's own household. It used the child in order to obtain evidence against the parent, the wife to secure the condemnation of the husband; it tortured to provide dictated confessions, and placed boxes at church doors to receive anonymous accusations. It established an index of forbidden books—an institution unknown to the whole of the ancient world. The Roman trial was open, and in accordance with established form. The accused could hear the charge, examine witnesses, cite witnesses in his defence. The Christian trial for heresy was usually in secret; special forms were used, no witnesses for the defence were allowed, special punishments were created. Persecution was raised to a fine art. Under Christian auspices it assumed the most damnable forms known in the whole history of mankind.

To what was this development of all that is most ugly in human nature due? One cant reply is that it was due to the natural intolerance of human nature. This, however, hardly meets the case. It is the same human nature that meets us in religion that we are familiar with in sociology or in science. And yet people hold different opinions in these fields without it ever dawning on the minds of the vast majority that the method of the persecutor should be invoked. Conservatives, Liberals, and Socialists may be seen walking, talking, and eating together. It is significant, by the way, that the political question on which feeling is most bitter, that of Home Rule, is the one in which the subject of religion enters largely. Darwinists and anti-Darwinists have never suggested imprisonment for each other as a way out of their differences. Human nature behaves itself with tolerable decency in its different views of other subjects; why should religion form the solitary exception? Is it the subjects that have humanised men and women. If so, why is it that religion has not had an equally favorable influence? Or is it that men and women have raised the subjects to a better level? In that case, why should religion prove itself so intractable to civilising influences? In either case the verdict on religion must be condemnatory.

Another cant reply is that people have misunderstood, or have failed to rise to the level of Christian teaching. The reply is really a condemnation. There must be something radically wrong about a religion that is so persistently misunderstood. And not for a day or generation, but for hundreds of years. Neither is it so misunderstood by one here and there, by men of little weight or influence. The greatest of Christian leaders, right up to modern times, have upheld the right of persecution. The forcible suppression of heresy has been taken by them to be one of the primary duties of the Christian State. It is strange that Christianity from the outset should have been so subject to this fatal misconception. It is the reverse of the usual order of things. Usually a teaching is best understood at the beginning; it becomes corrupted later. But Christianity was, we are asked to believe, never understood at all. It was misunderstood at its inception—it was misunderstood by both its teachers and its followers; it was misunderstood right up to our own day. And yet, wonder of wonders! it is this religion, continually misunderstood, mistaught, wrongly used, that has never really existed in practice, but which has yet exerted a supremely moralising influence on the world. That is the greatest miracle of all.

C. COHEN.

(To be concluded.)

* I am taking the persecutions of the early Christians for granted; but, as a matter of demonstrable fact, they have been very much exaggerated, and many of the related ones never occurred. The whole story of Christian persecution is so foreign to the Roman temper of government that it must be regarded with the greatest suspicion. It is a pity that someone competent does not subject the story to a critical examination. The story of ten persecutions is obviously mythical, being avowedly based upon there having been ten plagues in Egypt.

Experiment and Experience.

IT is frankly acknowledged by many prominent divines that "there never was a day when it was easy to believe the Christian Gospel." The late Principal Rainy was in the habit of saying that "God never meant it to be an easy thing to believe." Belief is thus treated as a voluntary act, an act of which every human being is supposed to be capable. Volumes have been published in which the Will to Believe is regarded as a reality. The will to believe is possessed by all, though comparatively few put it in operation. In the New Testament, the refusal to believe is the one sin that damns the soul to all eternity. As a matter of fact, however, belief or unbelief is an intellectual necessity, over which the will has no control. A man believes or disbelieves simply because he must, neither act being a matter of choice. Every statement made is either true or false. If we know it to be true, we cannot disbelieve it; if we know it to be false, belief in it is an impossibility. This is a fact from which there is no escape, no matter what the preacher may say to the contrary. Now, religion begins in faith. Religious beliefs precede and are the cause of religious emotions and practices. The divines often appeal to what they call the consciousness of God; but whether such a consciousness is real or imaginary, it certainly does not exist in the absence of the belief in God. This being the case, the question naturally arises, Are religious beliefs verifiable? Can the Christian religion be proved to be true? What are the evidences upon which its apologists rely?

Two new Handbooks of Christian Apologetics have recently been published by two first-class Christian scholars, Principal Garvie and Dr. T. R. Glover. Dr. Glover entitles his book The Christian Tradition and its Verification. It is a work of distinct merit, and has been welcomed by the theologians as a fully convincing defence of the Christian faith. We may rest assured that the arguments advanced by Dr. Glover are the very best available, and that if he does not make a thoroughly good case for Christianity, the task is impossible of accomplishment. This is how he puts the problem:—

> "There are three questions which we may ask about any religion—quite simple questions. What will it do for you? What will it do to protect other people against you? How far does it hold open the door for the future?" (p. 56).

Unfortunately, in dealing with those questions, Dr. Glover allows his judgment to be warped by prejudice. He admits that things are deplorably bad in

Digitized by Google

European and American society; but he rejoices in the conviction that "they are bad, nevertheless, with the continual correction of a Christian background" (p. 61). In the absence of this background, we are told industrial enormities, flagrant cruelty, and open uncleanness would continue unchecked, and gain rather than lose in volume. We do not believe it, and our author does not justify his assertion. He alludes to the ancient world as containing noble-minded and good-hearted characters, but denies that they exerted much influence upon their fellow-beings. In spite of them, the gladiatorial shows continued to flourish. Well, what has the Christian background done for Christendom? Has it put a stop to the bull-fights in Spain, or to fox and deer hunting in our own land? Has it rid us of sweated industries, flagrant cruelty, and open uncleanness? We affirm, without a moment's hesitation, that Christianity has never done anything for Europeans and Americans which has tended to establish its claim to Divine origin and power.

Dr. Glover is grossly unjust to the Buddha and the Stoic. Fancy a scholar, at this time of day, charging Gotama with taking the worth out of life, and characterising every non-Christian religion as follows:—

> "The plain fact is that, in the long run, despair is at the heart of every religion without Christ; and if man or woman is to get through the world at all, it must be by the hardening or deadening of the more sensitive parts of human nature. Marcus Aurelius' Diary is a sort of breviary of despair" (p. 63).

Buddhism is pre-eminently a religion of hope. Has our author never heard what the Dhammapada says about Right Rapture, or the state of bliss to which every true Buddhist attains? "It is in very bliss we dwell," "Among men full of worries we continue calm," "We will become feeders on joy"—such are the phrases in which the followers of the Buddha describe themselves. Confucianism, likewise, teaches that man is master of his own destiny, and can by complete sincerity give its full development to his nature. Mohammedanism urges its devotees to observe justice, to banish hatred, to resist evil, and to strive to excel each other in good works. Dr. Glover avers that "the belief in Jesus has given men a keener insight and a warmer and quicker sympathy, waked the dedicated spirit, and taught new ways of service." It would be more accurate to say that the belief in Jesus has made men so overweeningly conceited that they are everlastingly singing their own praises and vilifying the characters of all others. It is a notorious fact that Christians are the most intolerant and cruel people on the face of the earth. If you want to know what Christianity has done for the world read the history of the Church. You will then learn with what colossal cruelty the Lamb's bride pursued for years and exterminated the Albigenses and how horribly brutal was the administration of the Holy Inquisition in Spain. And what do you see to-day? Christian Europe an armed camp, more war-like and war-prepared than ever before, Christ's people, with the love of God shed abroad in their hearts, slaying one another by the thousand under the banner of the Cross. If we are to judge Christianity by what it has done for Christendom, it stands utterly discredited and deserving of speedy extinction.

Dr. Glover's supreme appeal is to Christian experience. He tells us how Paul felt under the spell of the Nazarene, how the love of Christ flooded his whole being and constrained him in and out of season to preach the Gospel, and how in the Master's service he considered it a privilege to endure persecution. We have no desire to throw any suspicion upon the sincerity of the Apostle's passion of love to Christ, or upon the reality of his zeal in his service; but we are persuaded that his ecstatic experience cannot be adduced as an argument for the objective existence of a God of love and a redeeming Christ. It was not God, but Paul's faith in God, that threw him into such raptures of delight. God has never been seen or heard, but the belief that he is accounts for every religious experience. Experiments are not possible in this region, while in science they are the main road to knowledge. Dr. Glover says:—

> "The results of scientific experiment are patent to sense. Of course, the values of these results are not so patent. They require sometimes a vastly higher power of intellect to grasp them in their relation to one another, and to the whole body of established fact, than is required to make the experiments from which they are gained. But in the main the results of scientific experiment are patent and clear, and they lead to the establishment of facts which any competent person can verify" (p. 41).

Religion takes us into a realm in which experiment is absolutely out of the question and experience is the only form of verification furnished. A well-known psychologist explains religion as a matter of auto-suggestion, and we know that auto-suggestion may occur without any reference to external facts. Dr. Glover makes merry over this theory; and asks, "Why should auto-suggestion, when it takes the form or direction of the Christian religion, work so uniformly towards sanity and morals?" and we answer that it does not work so uniformly towards sanity and morals. Religious experience and morality are not vitally related. Devout people are not necessarily sane and moral; sometimes they are quite the reverse.

J. T. LLOYD.

Christianity and the Chinese.—XI.

> "This is an era of competition; and if it be true, as I have read, that there are now over fifty distinct societies, representing as many forms of Protestantism, contending for the credit of bringing the Chinese within their respective folds, the antagonism of interests must be somewhat severe. In the race for results which have to be presented to meetings at home, and to form the subject of 'reports,' the precepts of justice which form Article VIII. of the treaty are liable to be lost sight of, and to yield to considerations of a more strictly mundane character.
> "This is exactly what the Chinese complain of. They urge that they never get a fair hearing. The people lament the supineness of their rulers, which permits their interests to be sacrificed. The governing classes feel that as between the people and the central authorities they are apt to be between the devil and the deep sea. The central authorities have before their eyes Ministers Plenipotentiary with ultimatums backed by ironclads in the offing."—T. C. HAYLLAR, Nineteenth Century, November, 1895.
> "Looking upon their [Catholic missionaries] polished, gentle, and courteous demeanor, they appear the best of men, and listening to their patriotic conversation, it is not to be wondered at that their influence, however problematical, should appear desirable. But they are not to be trusted, and however devoted and good they may seem, they lose their heads the instant that the interests of their religion or congregation appears in danger. They then become false egoists, hard and covetous, shrinking from no means, not even the sacrifice of your life, to enable them to reach either their own ends, or those imposed upon them by their position."—ERN. SIMON, China—Its Social, Political, and Religious Life (1887), p. 165.

THE Tai-ping Rebellion—which attempted to substitute Christianity for Confucianism in China—was eventually suppressed by General Gordon. No one but a Christian was considered capable of exorcising the seventy devils of Christian fanaticism which the missionaries had loosed on China.

The popular "lives" of this Christian hero contain wholesale suppression of the truth and suggestion of the false. The truth as to the Christian origin, and the missionary support, of the Tai-pings is suppressed.

It is falsely claimed that Gordon raised and trained the Chinese troops of the "Ever-victorious Army" (which was not ever-victorious), whereas it was an American named Ward, a brave and fearless leader, who, after being several times severely wounded—the palate of his mouth being destroyed by a bullet upon one occasion—was at last killed in action, Gordon only taking over the command of the force after his death and against the wishes of the Chinese, who wished to appoint Macartney to the command. Macartney, who had entered the Chinese service, and in whom the Chinese Government placed every confidence, was also largely instrumental in Gordon's ultimate success, for by almost superhuman exertions he founded an arsenal at Sunkiang for the manufacture of ammunition, and himself raised Chinese troops and took part in the operations in the field.

It would take us too far afield to deal with the real life of Gordon in these articles. It is time an independent life of Gordon (for which there is now plenty of material) was undertaken by a competent authority. It would present a very different picture to the melodramatic-Sunday-school-prize version which now prevails.

For instance, we read of Gordon leading his Chinese troops to the attack, armed only a walking-stick, himself unharmed among the storm of bullets, while his followers fell thickly round him. Quite on a level with the Theosophical fairy tales of the Mahatma, who, when fired at with rifles, calmly waved the bullets to right and left.

Now, Gordon—with the colossal egotism of all fanatics, who believe that the Creator of fifty million suns spends his time in watching over, guiding, and protecting them—thought that this escape was clearly due to the interposition of Providence, and was thus still further confirmed in his religious beliefs. But there is always a rational explanation for the supernatural, and this was no exception to the rule.

It should be borne in mind that the Tai-pings are the only important body of Chinese, in modern times, to extend a welcome to Europeans. The Englishman who served with them, and whose work we have quoted, observes: "To those who have experienced the ordinary dislike of foreigners by the Chinese, the surprising friendliness of the Tai-pings was most remarkable. They welcomed Europeans as 'brethren from across the sea,' and claimed them as fellow-worshipers of 'Yesu.'" And this friendliness remained unchanged, he says, "even when their dearest relatives were being slaughtered by my countrymen, or delivered over to the Manchoos to be tortured to death." *

And this is the secret of Gordon's seemingly miraculous escape. Of this we have very definite evidence, for Mrs. Archibald Little, in her Life of Li Hung Chang, cites a letter from a contemporary paper at Canton, giving the testimony of an actual eye-witness, who declares:—

> "Often have I seen the deadly musket struck from the hand of a dastardly Englishman (tempted by love of loot to join our ranks) when he attempted, from his place of safety, to kill Gordon, who ever rashly exposed himself. This has been the act of a chief, yea, of the Shield King himself; how then can we be accused of blind hatred even to our enemies?" †

So it was the hands of the men he was fighting against who preserved Gordon's life from his own countrymen.

The story of the capture of Soochow and the capitulation of the Tai-ping leaders to Gordon, who pledged his word for their safety—Li Hung Chang, and Ching, the Chinese commander, offering them a free pardon and Government employment—is better known, from the treachery of Li Hung Chang, who, in the absence of Gordon, ordered the chiefs to be hamstrung upon their declining to kneel, and then had them beheaded. It is often stated that Gordon went in search of Li Hung Chang with a loaded revolver; this is not true, but it is true he searched for him. The wily Li—who had received warning, probably from Macartney or Hart—was not to be found, or most probably that astute diplomatist's head would have made acquaintance with the famous walking-stick.

Unsuccessful in his search, Gordon wrote a furious letter denouncing his cruelty and breach of faith The principal passages, says Demetrius Boulger:—

> "were that Li Hung Chang should at once resign his post of Governor of Kiangsu, and give up the seals of office to Gordon, so that he might put them in commission until the Emperor's pleasure should be ascertained; or that, failing that step, Gordon would forthwith proceed to attack the Imperialists, and retake from them all the places captured by the Ever-Victorious Army, for the purpose of handing them back again to the Taepings." *

Macartney, acting the part of peacemaker, took a letter from Li Hung Chang to Gordon, who had gone to Quinsan on board the Hyson. Macartney arrived in the middle of the night. To cite Boulger again:—

> "Before day had really broken, Gordon sent down word that he would see him, and Macartney went upstairs to an ill-lighted room, when he found Gordon sitting on his bedstead. Hen fond Gordon sobbing, and before a word was exchanged, Gordon stooped down, and, taking something from under the bedstead, held it up in the air, exclaiming:—
> "'Do you see that? Do you see that?'
> "The light through the small Chinese windows was so faint that Macartney had at first some difficulty in discerning what it was, when Gordon again exclaimed:—
> "'It is the head of the Lar Wang, foully murdered!' and with that burst into hysterical tears." †

Seeing that it was useless to attempt to reason with Gordon in this highly hysterical condition, Macartney retired; later, at breakfast, Gordon would listen to nothing, but ordered the Hyson to be got ready, with a party of infantry, to attack Li Hung Chang and the Imperialist forces. Macartney borrowed a horse and rode post haste to Li Hung Chang to warn him, and also to bring up his own troops ready to oppose the advance of Gordon, who actually moved out of Quinsan with the intention of carrying out his threats, but returned there when the flotilla had proceeded half-way to Soochow, by which time, says Boulger, "he had fortunately reflected on the situation, and a sanguinary struggle was averted" (p. 108).

So far, Gordon's indignation, however hysterical and melodramatic it might be, was worthy of all praise. But one would think, after this terrible experience, that Gordon would be more careful how he delivered the captured Tai-pings into the hands of their enemies. It is quite evident that he did not regard them as the common robbers and brigands of popular imagination. For it is a fact that the very night after the treacherous murder of the Tai-ping leaders, as Boulger records, "The principal captor of Soochow [Gordon] was thus a prisoner in the hands of the Taepings during the evening and night of December 6" (p. 102), and was allowed to depart unharmed in the early morning. Lest we be thought guilty of exaggeration, we give the sequel, in the words of Mrs. Archibald Little, as given in her Life of Li Hung Chang:—

> "People with a taste for bloodshed can certainly get enough of it in the Tai-ping Rebellion.....the ground soaked, the rivers choked, the dogs gorged, the stench and all the rest of it. Mr. Howard puts it forcibly, as usual:—
> "'Two weeks afterwards we stormed and captured their position, driving out the rebels into the Imperialists' lines. 10,000 were taken prisoners; about 4,000, old men and boys, were stripped entirely naked and sent adrift; the others, about 6,000, were put in a large compound and beheaded. It was an awful sight to see Li Hung Chang's men hacking at them. The bodies of the eight foreigners taken by the rebels were found with their heads off and their bodies mutilated.'
> "This was after Gordon and Li had become friendly again, Mr. [now Sir Robert] Hart having persuaded Gordon that he had judged Li too harshly. So Gordon had led his men to victory, and this was the outcome of it all. Certainly, war is not a kid-glove affair, but it is incredible that this was the highest use to which to put a hero-saint—to win victories for the Chinese Imperialists' forces who acted after this fashion, and then unconditionally to hand the poor conquered nation over to the Manchu dynasty, from which the Tai-pings had sought to free it. They, poor people, were certainly imperfectly enough instructed in the doctrines of Christianity from the outset, and power and luxury not only had temptations for them, but also attracted to their side nearly all the needy daredevils in China. But what was the Imperialist side that we should send our men to fight for them, and watch Li Hung Chang's men hacking 6,000 men to death, after turning 4,000 old men and boys out naked to perish? And these were small numbers compared to those that were often killed. Captain Roderick Dew, R.N., tells how, in the great populous city of Ningpo, he found not a living soul, and Mr. Archibald Little has often told me how, as a young man, he has ridden through large cities and found only corpses." *

This throws a somewhat different complexion upon the actions of General Gordon to that given in the popular "lives" of him. A great deal concerning Gordon has yet to be revealed. Sir Henry Norman observes in this connection:—

> "Opinions differ among students of Chinese history as to whether it would not have been better for China had the Tai-pings succeeded. I came upon many curious reminiscences of General Gordon up and down the coast of China. He was a man of remarkable virtues and of no less weaknesses, and the stories of him which survive in the Far East would make very interesting reading. I do not give them, however, because public opinion seems to have determined that this many-sided man shall be known under one aspect only of his life—that of Hero. I will only say that there is correspondence of his, still in existence in China, some of which I have read, which should in the interest of history be published." †

There has been too much of this burking of facts regarding the life of Gordon, and, indeed, of the whole Tai-ping Rebellion from beginning to end. But the inexpugnable fact remains; and by no artifice can it be explained away—that, but for the missionaries, there would have been no Tai-ping Rebellion. Therefore, the missionaries are solely responsible for the awful carnage which ensued.

Another Leeds Fight.

WHILE we were away from home last week we heard from the N. S. S. Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, that the trouble with the police and the Town Council at Leeds was taking a serious development, and a public demonstration was being organised to take place on Woodhouse Moor the next Sunday (July 20). The time was then too short for intermediate correspondence; and as our advice was sought we were obliged to write to Mr. E. Pack, on behalf of the Leeds Branch, direct. We wrote a long and careful letter dealing with every aspect of the matter at issue, and we learn that it was found useful and highly appreciated. We also sent down some 200 copies of the Freethinker, by request, for sale at the demonstration.

This Leeds matter has been mentioned in our columns before. The Leeds Town Council went one worse than the London County Council. The latter refused all permits for collections at public meetings; the former refused a permit only to the local Branch of the National Secular Society. This singling out of one Society on which to impose a disability was tried at Chicago some twelve months ago, but the bigoted despotism of the police was foiled at last by an upright and courageous magistrate who declared that public rights and rules should be the same for all citizens, otherwise the police and not the law would govern the United States. He found that the action of the police was unconstitutional, and dismissed the case before him. That ended, once for all, we hope, the singling out of movements the police do not like to be deprived of a common right of citizenship. Some such lesson as this is needed at Leeds.

The Leeds N. S. S. Branch was bound to do something. The simplest thing was to set about exercising the right which the police assumed a power to suppress. A demonstration was organised for Sunday on Woodhouse Moor, by way of testing the alleged power of the police, and bringing the question before a court of justice. But in the meantime the police attempted a flank movement. And a very pretty movement it was.

They issued one of their old summonses against Mr. Pack for "language." When they got him in court they proceeded to develop some strange charges. They represented him as using language that could hardly occur to anyone who was not mad or drunk; language which no English audience would stand from any speaker for a single minute. They also alleged that he was inebriated,—which must have been an afterthought, or they would have arrested him on that charge in the first place; moreover, there was no suggestion of drunkenness in the summons, as Mr. Pack very properly pointed out. But, after all, what we think of the police evidence is of less importance than what the Stipendiary Magistrate thought. Mr. Atkinson dismissed the summons and passed on to the next business.

The demonstration was held on Woodhouse Moor. There was a tremendous crowd of orderly people who voted unanimously for the following resolution:—

> "That this mass meeting recognising that constitutional methods have failed to secure for the Leeds Branch of the National Secular Society the same privileges accorded to other public bodies, endorses its action in challenging this grossly inequitable attitude of the governing authorities and condemns that attitude as a public menace and unworthy of the best traditions of the City of Leeds."

Mr. Pack acted as chairman. He informs us that everything was done in the spirit of our letter of advice and encouragement, portions of which were read to the meeting and greatly applauded. Messrs. Jackson, Weir, Killip, and other Branch members took up the collection, sold the literature, and delivered the speeches. Everything went off with gratifying enthusiasm on the part of the crowd and self-control on the part of the organisers and speakers.

The next move lies with the police, who took the names and addresses of the "chief conspirators." If they issue summonses for collecting money and selling literature without the permit, which is granted to every other Society in Leeds, the case will come before Mr. Atkinson. We have great hopes of his intelligence and impartiality. But if the case has to be carried farther the Leeds Branch is going to fight it as far as possible, and it will have our best assistance as well (we feel sure) as the best assistance of the N. S. S. Executive.

Acid Drops.

"It goes without saying," the Archbishop of Canterbury wrote to his "Dear Mr. Lansbury"—"that anything relating to the well-being of those upon whom our industrial conditions press with harshness will always enlist my deep interest and sympathy." If it goes without saying, why say it?

We never thought the Bishops were fools, nor is it one of the charges we ever suggested against them. We know they were clever enough. They don't surprise us by the new line they are taking in defence of their big salaries. Some of them hint what the Bishop of London declares. That right reverend father in God's salary is £10,000 a year, and he says that he loses on his job. Others plead that it costs them half their salary, and sometimes more, to keep up their positions and palaces. But it costs every man with a good income a terrible lot of it to keep up his residence and social position. That is where most of the money goes. In this respect a bishop does not differ from other people. To deduct all such expenses, and to treat the balance as his income, is to confuse salary and pocket-money.

The Bishop of Winchester has a glorious old palace and grounds at Farnham, situated on a natural terrace commanding a magnificent view over half the county of Surrey. The gardens and hothouses—with their beautiful flowers, and rich grapes, and other fruit—match the lovely grass which springs under your feet like three-piled Turkey carpet. Only a vandal would propose the destruction of such a place, and when the Church has to give it up some of us will know what to do with it. Its upkeep at present is said to be between £2,000 and £3,500. This is not a very precise estimate. Suppose we split the difference and call it £2,750. How, we ask, does that justify the Bishop's groans? His stipend, paid to him with the regularity of the seasons by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, is £6,500 a year. This leaves a balance of £3,750 a year. That sum his lordship has at his absolute disposal. Only £3,750. Think of it! What a martyrdom the poor man's life must be! Yet a lot of men would jump at his lordship's chance if it were floating their way. If it were not for the preaching, the praying, and the other nonsensical "duties" of the Bishop's post—if it were merely a question of keeping up the noble building and its beautiful grounds at a cost of £2,750 per annum, with £3,750 per annum in addition as personal pocket-money—we rather think we should be inclined to accept the post ourselves. If we refused it we should certainly not do so with any murderous violence. But we don't suppose there will be any vacancy at Farnham Palace until the Bishop of Winchester is taken away to make room for another martyr. Bishops grumble, but they "stick it." Bless them!

It is rather a pity that the Protestant Churches have not the practice of canonisation. If they had we feel certain that there would soon be a Saint Pierpont Morgan in the calendar. We have read no end of eulogies as to his religious convictions, and in the July Century there is a further testimony from Mr. J. B. Gilder. He was a man of faith, it appears, so completely so, that it appeared to him a real and tangible thing, transmissible by legal process. Religion was "fundamental in his own nature, and as potent a force as any that shaped his actions." We do not doubt it. We believe it is equally true of Rockefeller. And in both cases it pays. The pity is, we repeat, that Protestantism cannot perpetuate the memory of men such as these in a Saints' Calendar. The Catholic Church has the calendar, but, to do it justice, it does not lay itself out to exalt to religious eminence multi-millionaires. That it leaves to Protestantism.

It is quite a long time since a blasphemer was struck dead by Divine Benevolence. According to the Universe, a Catholic paper, the thing has happened in America, the land of tall buildings and tall statements. The story goes that a miner, named Angelo Rotundo, at Trinidad, Colorado, U.S.A., parodied the death and resurrection of Christ, and lost his balance and never rose again. The tale is vouched for by Father Principle, S.J. If the tale had been told without principle we could hardly have believed it.

The Daily Sketch has been discussing childrens' names, and says the old-fashioned titles are dropping out. There are no Sarahs and Marys nowadays. Maybe, some up-to-date commentator will alter these Biblical names to Sally and Marie.

Citizen Rockefeller, the Christian multi-millionaire, visited the Euclid Avenue Baptist Church, Cleveland, and the parson described him as "a rosebush in the Lord's garden." That parson never calls the fellows on the rocks blush-roses.

The Montreal Star of June 30, reported a Catholic meeting held at Three Rivers. The theme of discussion—if discussion it can be called where they all think as the priest does—was elementary education, and the summary of Dr. Baril's speech is decidedly interesting. We make the following extract:—

> "Dr. Baril spoke of the public school as the battleground on which were arrayed the contending forces of the Church and the body of Freemasons, Freethinkers, and Atheists, whom he classed together, and whose object, he alleged, was to strike at the Church through the school. He charged them with making efforts to secure Godless schools for Canada, and said such efforts should be vigorously resisted by faithful Catholics.
> "The speaker defined the leading principles of the Association in regard to education as first and foremost absolute unquestioning submission to the Church and its right to control in moral and religious education; secondly, the assertion of the parents' duty to watch over the child; lastly, the exclusion of the Government from the sphere of education.
> "'The Church,' he said, "has the sacred right to direct the education of its youth and to see that none of the books of instruction are allowed to contain anything in the least injurious to the doctrines of the Catholic Church. It is the business of the State to give protection and financial assistance, if need be, but not to take charge of national education.'"

All the State has to do with education is to find the money. The Church will see to the rest. A fine thing—for the Church. But those who find the money are apt to have ideas of their own, and even to demand control of the expenditure. Which is awkward—for the Church.

In connection with that same gathering, Mgr. F. X. Cloutier bewailed the fact that the Church was in danger from "the growth of an anti-Christian civilisation." He was specially severe on Freemasons and Jews. The latter ought never to have been allowed to enter Canada. French-Canadian Catholics would be able to retain their rights if they only stuck together instead of splitting up over political divisions. What those "Catholic rights" are is not difficult to see. They mean that the Catholic Church, that is the Catholic priests—for it must be remembered that the Catholic laymen are no part of the Catholic Church, which is a pure Ecclesiasticism — should govern the whole Province of Quebec, and, if possible, the whole of Canada. We note that this arrogant priest denounced "the mistaken idea that religion must be kept out of politics." "A good Catholic," he said, "in private life must be a good Catholic in public life"—and obey the Church's orders in both cases. That is what his lordship, like all other priests, means by "the rights of our faith."

Sir Griffith Boscawen, M.P., speaking at a Church Protest meeting against the Welsh Disestablishment Bill at Southend-on-Sea, poured scorn on the suggestion of employing "God's" money for washhouses and museums. Evidently, this gentleman thinks cleanliness a very bad second to godliness.

Is it wicked to play whist? is the question asked in a religious periodical. It is—the way some people play it.

According to tradition, if July 15 is wet, the next forty days will be rainy, and we suppose that the same principle should apply to a dry St. Swithin's Day. There have been many wet St. Swithin's Days, but there is no record in which all the forty following days were wet. The record of the days following a dry St. Swithin's Day is, if anything, worse. Cold statistics prove that superstition and fact are in direct conflict; but, as usual, it has no effect upon the believers in the nonsense.

The Bishops of St. Albans and Barking have left their work of soul-saving for extended holidays. Times have changed since the fishing-nets of the Apostles were sold to the rag and bone dealers. "Blessed be ye poor"!

Dr. Horton tells us that in 1880 the great names were Huxley, Tyndall, and Spencer. Then he adds, "Haeckel still lives, representing the thought of 1880, a somewhat pathetic and antiquated figure, from whom all interest has disappeared, because his point of view has become practically meaningless for the modern world." A bigger lie was never told. Dr. Horton must know that Haeckel's works are read in this country at the present time by tens of thousands of admirers, and that his point of view, so far from being "practically meaningless for the modern world," is the point of view of practically every living biologist. Indeed, less than a year ago, this reverend gentleman complained that the intellect of the Protestant world was now engaged on the task of getting rid of God and Christ. That was immediately after the "strange proceedings" at the Dundee meeting of the British Association, when Haeckel's point of view was all-dominant. Dr. Horton is anything but consistent.

In the Christian Commonwealth for July 16, there is an article entitled "The Reinstatement of Prayer," in which we are assured that the old-fashioned view of prayer is no longer tenable. That is to say, the Biblical conception of prayer is out of date. "Laborare est orare (to pray is to work) is the motto of our age." Prayer originated in fear, and fear was the offspring of ignorance. In proportion as ignorance and fear vanish the inclination to pray ceases, even among those who still nominally believe in God. Atheism excludes prayer altogether.

The Education Committee of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference says in its report that it stands "for Christian education under public control." The position is quite unjustifiable, and the phrasing is simply dishonest. Christian education ought not to be a public matter at all. It is a private concern. The only difference between advocating Christian education or Mohammedan education as matters of public concern, is a difference of numbers. There are more Christians than Mohammedans, hence the Christian claim. And the "Free Church" Wesleyan Methodists ought to realise that the number of people who support a speculative opinion has no bearing upon the question of whether that opinion should be made a question of public policy. Moreover, public control here means, very clearly, Christian control. The word "public" is a cant word, only introduced because the majority of the population are Christians—nominally so, at all events. Clearly, Methodists do not mean that Christian education is to be controlled by Buddhists, Jews, and Freethinkers. What they really mean is, that public power and public money is to be used to teach Christianity, and that all other beliefs are to be ignored. We do not desire that any other form of religious or non-religious belief should be considered. We are only desirous that all should be put on one side.

The Catholic Times put the logic of the situation in a recent issue in the following sentence:—

> "Either all religious teaching must be allowed public money in support, or none. And evidence is forthcoming that the secular solution is making its way in favor with the Wesleyans. If Free Churchmen nail their flag to the Cowper-Temple mast, they will certainly lose the mast, and probably the ship."

We believe the ship will be lost any way. But to cry out against State patronage of religion, and demand the State enforcement of religion in the schools, only hastens its destruction.

Six years ago the Rev. Frank Ballard was appointed by the Home Mission Committee of the Methodist Conference as a travelling infidel-slayer. Since then he has been travelling up and down the country—he himself says that he has travelled 50,000 miles and addressed a million and a half of people—and glowing accounts of his successes have appeared from time to time. The Committee is now recommending to the Plymouth Conference that a Committee should be appointed to look into the whole question of the Christian Evidence Mission, and that no new appointment be made at the present Conference. This, we may safely assume, is the Committee's way of reporting that the Mission has been a failure. And what otherwise could it be? Mr. Ballard could not hope to convert Freethinkers. They know the substance of his arguments before he gives them voice. That the growth of Freethought can be stayed by a Christian Evidence missioner is as wild and fantastic an idea as ever existed. He may save one here and there from straying out of the fold; but, on the other hand, he is all the time suggesting doubts to the others. The growth of Freethought is part of a world-process of development, and if the whole of the Methodist Church turned itself into a Christian Evidence Mission it would make very little difference. Religion carries within itself the seed of dissolution, as surely as Freethought contains the germ of certain growth.

Amongst those who escaped alive from the Cromer express smash a fortnight ago was the Rev. Len Broughton, of Christ Church, Westminster. Dr. Broughton informed his congregation the morning after the accident that "had it not been for the direct providence of God," he would not have been preaching to them. Dr. Broughton, as a preacher of the gospel of poverty and self-sacrifice, was travelling in a first-class reserved compartment with his secretary, and had only just dined. Five minutes after he left the dining-car came the smash. Hence the proof of the "direct providence of God." Providence, we must assume, kept its eye on Dr. Broughton, waited until he had finished his dinner, and said, "Now that my servant Broughton has dined, and is back in his first-class reserved compartment, let her go," and the car was smashed into "worse than kindling wood." There is no other conclusion possible that we can see. The direct providence of God saved Dr. Broughton and let the rest of the travellers go to the Devil as rapidly as possible.

The British Weekly has been inviting correspondence on the ten men in England who would be most missed? A large number of people have plumped for Dr. Clifford. Only one reason is quoted; this is, "Because of the doughty championship of religious equality. He regards a parliamentary religion as a pharisaic anachronism." This might almost have been written by Dr. Clifford himself. When has Dr. Clifford worked for a genuine equality of opinion? We know he has worked to get Nonconformist opinions favored by the State to the same extent as is Episcopalianism. But that we believe is all. And the enemy of a parliamentary religion is, to-day, one of the most ardent advocates of a form of religion to be created by Parliament and paid for out of public funds. What slaves to phrases most men are!

Thomas Paine has been dead more than a hundred years. Yet the Wesleyan Methodists are just discussing a heresy-hunt against the Rev. George Jackson for entertaining doubts about Moses and Jonah. And they call Christianity a progressive religion!

The Methodist heresy-hunt fizzled out. The Conference President ruled the motion against Dr. Jackson out of order as being too late, the Conference having no authority to deal with an appointment when it is once made. This was a clever move. It averted an inconvenient discussion.

Rev. Irvine Lister, pastor of Ebenezer Congregational Church, Uppermill, near Oldham, has resigned his pulpit because his opinions on religion are now such as to prevent his continuing to be a Christian minister.

There is a row going on in one of the monasteries on Mount Athos, and the Holy Synod has sent Archbishop Nikon there to make peace—on a Russian gunboat!

Bible subjects are tabu at the Lord Chamberlain's office but it appears that the licensing is to be less rigid in future and the censorship is to make a start in relaxation with the voluptuous story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife. The play of "Joseph and his Brethren" is to be produced at His Majesty's Theatre in September. Miss Maxine Elliott is to play the part of Lady Potiphar. We should hardly think Sir Herbert Tree will play the part of Joseph. In any case, the interview between madame and the private secretary will have to stop short of the naked truth. These oriental stories are all right in the Bible, which is an oriental book; but they are rather embarrassing on a Western stage. The severity of il casto Giuseppe's temptation will have to be largely taken for granted—even in the days of the hobble skirt and the consumptive blouse.

The new President of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, the Rev. Samuel Francis Collier, in his official address, declared that "the Methodist Church had a message for the twentieth century." His audience thoroughly agreed with the declaration. Here and there, perhaps, a very thoughtful one may have wondered when it was going to get delivered. A whole eighth of the century has gone by already. Wonder may have been felt, too, at Mr. Collier's declaring that "the late Canon Barnett had said that 'the Lord loveth a cheerful taxpayer.'" We know from Holy Writ that the Lord loveth a cheerful giver, just as we know that whoso giveth unto the poor lendeth unto the Lord—though a good many rich Christians appear to mistrust the security. But a cheerful taxpayer! The word "publican" in the New Testament means a taxgatherer, and "the Lord" brackets "publicans" with "harlots" and "sinners." Canon Barnett is dead, but Mr. Collier might think this matter over again—with the aid of this paragraph.

How easy it is to twist the Bible into teaching anything under the sun. In last Sunday's International Sunday-school Lesson, the words "I will harden Pharaoh's heart" occurred, which one reverend commentator explained thus: "The hardening of Pharaoh's heart simply means that he became the more determined or stubborn in his refusal [to let the children of Israel go]. It was not that God made him wicked; it simply means that God foresaw that he would not give way." Now, the Apostle Paul interpreted Exodus iv. 21 in a perfectly natural way, and founded upon the words his wonderful argument for the absolute sovereignty of God (Romans ix. 14-24). Modern divines may regard such a doctrine as utterly unbelievable, but it is entirely dishonest to pretend that it is not taught in the Bible.

Digitized by Google

A bitter controversy has arisen at Hull regarding the propriety of Sunday flying. As usual, the friends of Jesus are relying upon the police, regardless of the story in the Gospels of Christ's attempt at aviation.

A recent issue of the Weekly Dispatch contained a picture of the King's youngest son, with the touching inscription. "The Human Boy-Prince." It won't do! All the scribes of Carmelite House cannot deify royalty nowadays.

Eighty thousand pounds has been raised by the Church Missionary Society towards clearing off its deficit of £100,000. With a fourth of that sum to be expended on Freethought we would guarantee to knock a greater hole in the missionary man's religion in this country in a twelve-month than the whole body of the clergy could repair in a generation—or ever again.

Speaking at a British and Foreign Bible Society meeting at Southend-on-Sea, the Rev. Barclay Buxton said the Japanese were attached to the Bible even before they could read or understand it. It's about that way in England, anyhow.

S. Verdad, who writes the "Foreign Affairs" column for the New Age, referring to the fight between the Bulgarians and the Greeks and Servians, says that "the slaughter was appalling, and the outrages unprecedented. These Christians showed more savagery towards one another than the Turks had ever shown towards them. No trick was too contemptible if only the enemy could be lured into a trap; and no form of mutilation and torture was too vile once he was safely in it. We shall never hear the full story of this savage war."

What a terrible irony on the professed civilising influence of Christianity is contained in the Annual Report of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. In England, Ireland, and Wales the number of offenders dealt with by the Society numbered no less than 74 678. Of these, 38,798 were males, and 35,880 females. The total shows an increase of 889 more than in the previous year. Of the victims, there were 79,366 boys, 80,041 girls, and—terrible to think of—23,175 babies under two years of age. The Christian religion has been in existence many centuries, and, despite the hypocritical boasting of its defenders, has done nothing to inculcate kindness in the treatment of the most helpless members of the community. One Freethinker, Colonel Ingersoll, did more to foster humanity in dealing with children than all the millions of professional followers of Christ.

Dr. Robert Bridges, who has been appointed Poet Laureate in succession to the late Mr. Alfred Austin, is a Doctor of Literature. The degree is indicated by the letters D.Litt., and, when Mark Twain had the same honor conferred upon him, he laughingly said he "cared D.Litt. about it."

At the United Methodist Conference at Halifax tearful reference was made to the huge decline in Sunday-school membership and other young people's organisations. The decrease was attributed to the falling birth-rate, emigration, Christian Science, Socialism, and other absurdities. Not one of the many sleepy theologians at the Conference woke up and suggested that the spread of Freethought had anything to do with it.

Rev. Hugh Fleming, of Rayrigg, Windermere, left £25,672. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth."

Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree, the distinguished actor, has published a little volume, entitled Thoughts and After Thoughts, in which he has some thoughtful and inspiring remarks on a multitude of subjects. He expresses his belief in the dawn of a "new religion," and writes forcibly and eloquently. We are glad to note that the religion he refers to is that of humanity. It is only right that a Tree of knowledge should bear rare and refreshing fruit.

Dr. Hoskyns, the Bishop of Southwell, has been condemning caste in the Church. He found, in colliery villages where pitmen were called upon to mix with other classes, they were looked down upon by the classes who thought they were above them. The Bishop might notice that, in spite of twenty centuries of the religion of the carpenter-god, caste is just as prevalent in England as in India.

Christians are never weary of persecuting and defaming Freethinkers; but they do not want too much religion themselves. Pious ladies nowadays feel too tired to carry complete Church Services to "God's" house, and small booklets containing selected portions only are much in favor. A few more years and the worshipers will feel too tired even to carry that.

It seems that, like an electric bell, the Church must be re-charged periodically with spiritual life and power. At present, she is devoid of attractive and preservative energy, with the result that the crowds, instead of flocking into, are actually rushing out of her. Recognising this fact, the Rev. David Adams, Chairman of the Congregational Union of Wales, declares that the Church is in serious need of re-endowment. In view of such a declaration one naturally asks, What has happened to Jesus Christ, the Church's head? Has he taken offence at something and left her in a huff? Or where is the Holy Ghost, who was to dwell within her always, and lead her into all knowledge and complete efficiency? Merely to ask such questions is to fully expose the deceptive character of the Lamb's Bride.

We are indebted to the New York Truthseeker for the following choice specimens of eloquence from "Billy" Sunday, the American evangelist, who is drawing more than a Prime Minister's salary from his soul-saving crusade:—

> "A young man or women who fights against the Christian life cannot measure character with a grizzly ape or yellow dog."
> "It takes a little weazen-headed, jug-headed man to doubt God—I've sure got down to the size of some of the mute of your town this morning."
>
> "Let me say that when you little, vile hounds attack me you are a liar and a coward, for it is at the cause of Jesus Christ and all the Churches united in these meetings you are striking over my shoulders. You little hum, I'm calling your bluff."
> "If any minister believes and teaches evolution he is a stinking skunk, a fraud, a hypocrite, and a liar."
>
> "The statement has been made by some dirty little puppet of the pulpit that there is no harm in the dance, the theatre, or cards. To hell with that kind of a minister. I am not swearing, brethren, I am praying. A preacher of that sort is worse than a bull-necked bar-tender."
> "If a woman on the avenue plays a game of cards in her home she is worse than any blackleg gambler in the slums."

We do not think that in any profession in the world, save that of Christian evangelicism, language of this sort would be tolerated. Sunday is a converted prize-fighter, but even that profession must have gained in decency by his conversion. Some clergymen, it is only fair to say, have publicly protested against Sunday's language, and some of the above expressions were in reply to their protest. Dr. Washington Gladden is among the number, and relates how, when a clergyman on the same platform with Sunday, had expressed a belief in evolution, Sunday shook his fist in his face, and yelled:—

> "Stand up there, you bastard evolutionist! Stand up with the Atheists and the Infidels and the whoremongers and the adulterers and go to hell."

It is not reported that the clergyman went. He might have felt inclined to say "After you, Billy."

"J. B." has a long article in the Christian World for July 17 on "The Heart of Things," but after reading it most carefully we do not know what he means by the phrase. He tells us that the Christian Gospel is "the nearest approach to the heart of things which has yet been opened to our race"; but how does he know that? No one can tell what the heart of things is, not even that they have a heart; and consequently it is simply absurd to say of this, that, and the other that it is a nearer, or the nearest approach to it. Every religion, "J. B." informs us, is a more or less successful attempt to find the heart of things; but, of course, his own religion is the most successful of all, whilst Buddhists and Mohammedans think the same of their religions. We are convinced, on the contrary, of the utter futility of all religions alike, and stoutly maintain that science is the only agency that can lead us to the heart of things. In other words, it is by observing, examining, and listening to Nature herself that we have any chance of getting her secret out of her.

A. H. DUNSTAN.—We have neither a private secretary nor an office clerk. Every bit of our business has to be done with our own hands—from writing articles to acknowledging subscriptions for the various objects appealed for from time to time in the Freethinker. Elaborate book-keeping is absolutely impossible; and, as a matter of fact, we never charged a halfpenny for expenses against any fund that we "ran" in these columns. We are as careful as we can be, and we make a mistake occasionally, but very seldom considering the circumstances. To the best of our belief we acknowledge every subscription that arrives, writing out the acknowledgments when we open the envelopes containing them. Letters are dealt with, when necessary, at the same time; they are then torn up and thrown into the waste-basket. We could trace a cheque, of course, afterwards; but not a small postal order, which is not individually identifiable in the pay-in to the bank. What is not acknowledged we are bound to treat as not having reached us. Many things, it must be remembered, are lost in the Post Office—and are sometimes heard of in the police-court. This is a long answer concerning a very small amount, but the principle is the same whatever the size of the subscription.

W. MATHIAS.—We have read your letter carefully, and in many ways it does you credit. But you did not read our paragraphs as carefully as we read your observations. So far from recommending that hunger-striking Suffragettes should be allowed to starve to death, we blamed Mr. Bernard Shaw for making such a foolish and impossible suggestion. Our own personal opinion is that the whole situation is pathological, like so much else in present-day society. We call this our personal opinion, because we only state it by the way without offering it as a topic for discussion in the Freethinker. To return. You failed to notice that the words "There are plenty of cemeteries" were printed in inverted commas. They were not our words. We do not think we are capable of such brutality. Those words were what we said that the authorities would address to the Suffragette prisoners if the "militancy" policy were pursued by a working-class women's movement. We have but one thing more to say. Many people abuse the word Determinism. You, for instance, apply it to the violent aggressor; you forget that it is equally applicable to the rest of mankind. Society has a right to protect itself against anti-social conduct on the part of its members. We admit, of course, that this should be done with as much common sense and humanity as possible.

G. SMITH (Montreal).—Thanks for your letter and cutting. The latter is dealt with elsewhere. We quite understand what a hotbed of bigotry you are in.

E. B.—Much obliged for cuttings.

W. TAYLOR.—An opinion without its grounds is of no particular value. It does not enlighten or help us in any way. Nor should it. We listen to facts and arguments, but we allow no man's judgment to weigh against our own.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are very welcome.

A. M.—You are by no means "an empty shell." Clear your head of that nonsense and smile again. Not that a little self-depreciation now and then will do you any harm. But let it be only now and then. Most men suffer in the opposite direction.

J. F. AUST.—"But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me" occurs in Luke ix. 27. You would find our Bible Handbook useful for all such references.

N. LEVY.—We have not neglected "the report of a great victory for free speech in Scotland." We have not seen it. Perhaps you will explain your impolite postcard.

W. DODD, subscribing again, wishes to see the President's Honorarium Fund "going stronger."

Sugar Plums.

Next week's Freethinker will contain a long article by Mr. Foote on the new edition of Mr. H. S. Salt's monograph on Shelley.

Loving Christians tried to break up the Edmonton Branch meeting on Sunday evening, but they failed in their amiable attempt. Mr. Max Hope was the lecturer, and an able one too. The next evening he ventured to ask a question of the speaker on the platform of the West London Mission. A pious constable arrested him, and he was bound over to keep the peace he had never broken! By the way, a lady lecturer (Miss Pankhurst) should be well supported at Edmonton this evening (July 27).

We are exceedingly sorry that in our issue for July 20, we inadvertently attributed the description of the New Theology as "a Pantheistic and anti-Christian hash" to Canon Masterman. We ought to have stated that it occurs in a review of the Canon's book, The Challenge of Christ, which appeared in the Church Times for July 11. We tender to Mr. Masterman our sincerest apology, and beg to observe that the reviewer, who employed the offensive characterisation of the New Theology, warmly eulogised the Canon's treatment of the subject. With this correction the paragraph stands.

Li Hung Chang's Scrap Book, by Sir Hiram Maxim, is causing the greatest possible consternation among the Christians in China. The missionaries are beside themselves with indignation against the author and his book, and would burn both had they the power they once had. The Shanghai Times could not find terms strong enough to denounce the wicked volume, although its command of Billingsgate is exceedingly great. The ire of the Times was fanned into leaping flames by a long and powerful letter from Sir Hiram, which the Republican Advocate had the courage to print. In this letter were quotations from many eminent authorities, notably from the writings of the learned Jesuit missionary, Père Le Comte, who was honest enough to tell the truth about the Chinese. It is a significant fact that no Missionary Society has ever made use of the valuable information contained in the letters of this famous Jesuit. It is interesting to note that Le Comte gave the Chinese a splendid character, decidedly superior to that of Europeans. And this is really the damning fault of Sir Hiram Maxim's book—it gives the Chinese such a good character that the presence and labors of Christian missionaries among them can only be regarded as an insult and a crime. This book is also unpalatable to the missionaries because it shows the Chinese what Christianity is in itself, and what it has really done in all the ages of its dominance in Christendom. Sir Hiram is to be heartily congratulated upon the fact that his Scrap Book is already doing much to discredit the Christian superstition everywhere, and particularly in China.—J. T. L.

From the Daily News, Saturday, July 12:—

"PRISON RELIGIOUS CENSUS.

"The Home Secretary has informed Mr. Hay Morgan, M.P., that a recent census of the religious persuasions of inmates in England and Wales as stated by the prisoners on reception were as follows:—

"Church of England	13,691
Roman Catholics	3,273
Wesleyans	442
Baptists	96
Presbyterians	93
Methodists	87
Congregationalists	41
Jews	133
Freethinkers	109

"Personal inquiry, Mr. McKenna adds, resulted in some change of the figures, the chief alterations being that 13,957 were ascertained to be of the Church of England, 669 Wesleyans, and 209 Baptists."

Using the amended figures in the three instances given we find 18,329 Christians to 133 Jews and 109 Freethinkers. On the face of it this overwhelmingly refutes the common orthodox statement that "infidelity and immorality are the same thing." Not only in England and Wales, but in other countries, it is found that Freethinkers contribute less, not more, than their proportion of criminals to the general total. If may even be less than it looks. One would like to know whether the whole 109 Freethinkers in this list professed themselves Freethinkers or were placed in the list simply because they belonged to no Christian denomination.

Napoleon, like Cæsar (both, by the way, were Freethinkers) had a strong keen pen. It was as potent as his sword. When we speak of his pen we must include his tongue—both worked by the same strong brain. Some of his sayings are as immortal as his deeds. Even about the general run of them there is something of the great general's sagacity and the good soldier's brevity. Many sarcasms, some of them very witty, were expended upon Mme. Tallien, a famous frail beauty of the last days of the French Revolution; but which of them can be compared to Napoleon's that she "had two or three husbands, and children by everybody"? Compared with such a sentence ordinary journalism and oratory are as flat ginger-beer to a fine and fresh champagne. Even religious journalism and oratory are poor things, with all their inspiration, after the speech of the "Corsican atheist" who did not wait for the Pope to put the crown upon his head at Nôtre Dame, but took it between his own hands and clapped it upon his own head.

Mr. J. W. Gott resents our references to him in recent numbers of the Freethinker, and he has published an appeal against what he seems to regard as our tyranny. It appears that he started some "missionary" work in Lancashire, paying the missionaries themselves at the rate of a shilling a lecture, which must be highly conducive to efficiency. One of these missionaries got into trouble with the police at Blackburn by the use of indiscreet language in a place of public resort. Mr. Gott prints two of his missionary's expressions. We see no reason for reprinting them here. What we have to say is that if Mr. Gott thinks this sort of language proper and useful at public meetings his ideas and ours are too far apart for useful correspondence.

Mr. Gott wrote to us in a great hurry when his missionary got into trouble at Blackburn. He requested our advice as to whether Mr. Thompson should pay the fine or go to prison. We can hardly conceive a meaner request from one human being to another. We have hinted this before; we say it plainly now, and once for all. Left to himself, Mr. Thompson chose the fine; he also gave an undertaking not to repeat his offence, or even to lecture on Atheism again in that district. This news was forwarded to us with a further request that we would pay Thompson's fine and costs, amounting in all to something like £5. Had we done what Mr. Gott requested there would have been no tyranny about us. We declined to exercise the presidential authority, which must sometimes be exercised between Executive meetings, on such a matter and in such circumstances. Mr. Gott still had it open to him, however, to apply to the Executive at its monthly meeting. And he still has it open.

The statement with which Mr. Gott seeks to cover himself and gain sympathy is that "the lectures were delivered under the auspices of the N. S. S." We reply that Mr. Gott has no right to employ lecturers—at a shilling a time or otherwise—to represent the National Secular Society. He has no such commission himself, and how can he impart it to others? The idea that the illicit use of the Society's name saddles it with responsibility is one that could hardly enter any head but Mr. Gott's. He says that his use of the Society's name is not illicit. He is one of the Society's members, he says, and that gives him a right to use the Society's name as he pleases. There is, of course, an easy practical refutation of that sophistry. Meanwhile we may notice another specimen of Mr. Gott's logic. "I tell Mr. Foote," he says, "that as long as I remain a member of the N. S. S. my work will be for the N. S. S., whether he likes it or not." This ridiculous outburst does not touch the point at issue. That point is whether Mr. Gott shall use the Society's name without its permission. He says that he will. We say that he shall not. And if he does not desist out of regard to common sense and common decency, there are ways of compelling him to desist, and they will be employed. He will not bluff the N. S. S. Nobody has ever attempted that very successfully.

Mr. Gott aims a parting shot at the despotic President of the N. S. S. "Mrs. H. Bradlaugh Bonner," he says, "has sent for full particulars of the Thompson trial, with a view to having some questions put in the House of Commons." What a contrast to the do-nothing Mr. Foote! But it happens that Mr. Foote was at the bottom of that movement. He introduced the Thompson case at a meeting of the National Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. No other member present had heard of it. It was unanimously agreed that Mrs. Bonner, who occupies the chair, should be requested to obtain further details, with a view to several procedures, of which a question in the House of Commons was one. It is never safe to assume that Mr. Foote is doing nothing because he is not doing it himself before the footlights. Those behind the scenes know better.

The Gospel History a Fabrication.

THE NAZARENES.

IN the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, as we have seen, the supernatural birth of Jesus Christ is narrated as having taken place at three different periods of history. We have also seen that the Virgin Birth story had no place in the primitive Gospel from which Matthew, Mark, and Luke copied the main portion of their narratives. That this story is an early Christian fabrication is further proved by the following facts relating to the Nazarenes.

1. The Christian religion took its rise amongst the Jews; its first believers were also Jews. This fact is admitted by all critics.

2. The name by which these primitive Jewish believers were first known was "the sect of the Nazarenes"—as stated in the Book of the Acts (xxiv. 5). It must not, however, be thought that in citing "the Acts" as evidence I thereby assume that book to be historical. I do nothing of the kind: but this particular fact is not dependent upon the accuracy or veracity of Luke; it is one that would be known to all Christians of any standing in Luke's day. This name, too, was employed from the earliest times throughout the entire East to designate believers in Jesus Christ, and is still applied to Christians in some Eastern districts at the present day. We are also incidentally told in the Acts (xi. 26) that these believers were first called Christians at Antioch. This may be true; but the name was applied only to Gentile Christians, and at a much later period than that implied in the Acts. The primitive sect of Jewish believers were known from first to last (i.e., to the fourth century A.D.) as Nazarenes, though those of the sect who remained faithful to the Jewish ritual received the name Ebionites (from ebion, poor). It was probably the latter who were referred to in the text—"Blessed are ye poor," etc.

3. Before the appearance of the Greek canonical Gospels, the Nazarenes had a Gospel of their own, in Aramaic, called the "Gospel according to the Hebrews," which was also the Gospel of the stricter members of the sect who were called Ebionites. Now, we have evidence that this Gospel contained no Virgin Birth story, but commenced, like the canonical Mark, with the preaching of the Baptist. We also know that the Nazarenes and Ebionites believed Jesus to be merely a man, begotten by Joseph. Thus, speaking of the Ebionites, Eusebius says (Eccl. Hist. iii. 27):—

> "They cherished low and mean opinions of Christ. For they considered him a plain and common man, justified only by his exalted virtue, and that he was born by natural generation.....They use only the Gospel according to the Hebrews, esteeming the others as of but little value. They also observe the Sabbath and other rites of the Jews."

Treating of the same subject, Irenæus, who first mentions the four Gospels, says (Her. v. i. 3):—

> "Vain also are the Ebionites.....who do not choose to understand that the Holy Ghost came upon Mary, and that the power of the Most High did overshadow her."

Thus, these two kindred sects, that had been the first to embrace Christianity, came to be regarded by the Gentile churches (in the last quarter of the second century) as heretics. They were quite aware that a Virgin Birth story was recorded in the Gentile Gospels; but they could not be induced to believe or adopt it: so that in the time of Epiphanius (A.D. 374—377) their Gospel commenced, as at the first, with the preaching of the Baptist.

Looking, now, at the foregoing facts, there cannot be the smallest doubt as to the deliberate fabrication of the story of the supernatural birth of Jesus Christ. The first generation of Jewish Christians, who for some unknown reason revered the name of Jesus, knew nothing about a Virgin Birth, and gave no credence to it when they afterwards heard the story. And no other early Christians, save the Nazarenes, were in a position to judge of the truth or falsehood of that alleged event. If they rejected the story, it was because they knew it had been concocted after their Gospel was written, and concocted by Gentile Christians who knew nothing about their Jesus. The sect, it is true, narrated stories of that personage working miracles; but this was because it was believed that the "spirit of God" had descended upon him at his baptism: then he became a prophet like Moses and Elijah—who were reported to have come down from heaven to converse with him.

Christian apologists and reconcilers, as might be expected, assert that the Nazarenes were a sect of heretics that arose after the appearance of the canonical Gospels; but the fact that "the sect of the Nazarenes" is named in "the Acts" as the first society of Christians proves the assertion to be a Christian misrepresentation. The name "Christians" had, of course, come into general use in Luke's time; but the appellation "Nazarenes," which preceded it by many years, was known in that day to have been the original name. The Nazarene sect appears to have been a branch of that of the Essenes, whose doctrines and practices upon many points were in agreement with those afterwards ascribed to Jesus. The Nazarenes were therefore practically Christians before they knew anything about that personage—the belief in the latter as a prophet being probably the only new matter added to their articles of faith.

JESUS THE NAZARENE.

One of the most important facts in connection with Jesus Christ is that he is called in the Gospels and the Acts "Jesus the Nazarene"—a title which is mistranslated "Jesus of Nazareth." In no less than seventeen passages the Jewish Savior is called "Jesus the Nazarene," the word employed in some places being Nazoraios; in others Nazarenos. By a comparison of parallel passages, we find both referring to the same person or sect, as in the following examples:—

> Matt. xxvi. 71.—"This man also was with Jesus the Nazarene" (Nazoraios).
> Mark xiv. 67.—"Thou also wast with Jesus the Nazarene" (Nazarenos).

The first appellation might be translated Nazarite, and the second Nazarene; but Epiphanius, in his book on Heresies, quotes both as the names of two distinct sects among the Nazarenes of his time—one of them, apparently, being the proper name of those called by the Gentiles "Ebionites." Hence, in conformity with Matthew's statement—"he shall be called a Nazarene"—Jesus is so called in the Gospels. The only question remaining is the origin of the name. Was Jesus a member of the sect when he first appeared? or, Did his Essene followers give themselves that appellation to glorify his name?

Well, in the first place, there can be no doubt that "Jesus the Nazarene" was in some way connected with "the sect of the Nazarenes." Why, otherwise, have our translators and Revisers deliberately miscalled him "Jesus of Nazareth"? We may be quite certain that this was not done without some good reason. In the next place (as will be shown later) there appears to have been no city in Galilee called Nazareth, from which "the Nazarene" could take his name—and the latter appellation has to be accounted for. Why, then, was Jesus so called? To this there can be but one answer: Jesus must have been a member of the sect, and possibly one of some authority in it. The name "Jesus the Nazarene" was evidently employed in the same way as that of "John the Essene," who is mentioned by Josephus as a general in the Jewish war. Had the Jewish historian had occasion to refer to "Jesus the Nazarene," it would have been by this name; but his not having done so clearly shows that Jesus must have been almost unknown outside his own sect. The Gospel of the Nazarenes was not composed until some years after the death of Jesus, and the latter, being then esteemed a prophet, it is not surprising that in those times fictitious sayings and doings were ascribed to him. It should, however, be remembered that miracles were then believed to be possible, either by magic, the agency of Satan, or the power of God. Why, then, should not Jesus be credited with the power to work them?

Assuming the Epistle to the Galatians to be authentic, Paul refers in it to James, John, and Cephas, who, he says, were "reputed to be pillars" of the primitive Jewish Church, the president being "James, the Lord's brother." These—whom we may assume to be historical—were, of course, Nazarenes: from which fact it appears evident that these three so-called "apostles" of Jesus were simply elders of the sect—the society having arisen some time before Jesus came to be regarded as a prophet. The other "apostles" named in the Gospels were probably only ordinary members of the sect, of whom nothing was known except the names. As to Peter, it is doubtful whether he was the same person as Cephas (John i. 42); for the Synoptists appear to have never heard of the latter name.

The Nazarenes, being Jews, required their converts to be circumcised and to conform to all the Mosaic ritual—except animal sacrifice. These conditions Paul found to be a stumbling-block to the would-be Gentile converts; he therefore set them aside as unnecessary—making the simple belief in Jesus—whom he exalted into a divine being—the sole condition of salvation. Needless to say, that "apostle" had no authority for so doing: for one of the traditional instructions of Jesus to his disciples was to go only to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel"; while the last twelve verses in Mark's Gospel—including the command to go to "all the world" and preach salvation by faith only—were a later addition to that Gospel, written long after the time of Paul. The last-named "apostle" was an unscrupulous innovator, and the real founder of Gentile Christianity, which in a short time spread from Asia Minor to Greece, Rome, and Alexandria; but the first sect of Christians, the Nazarenes, who merely regarded Jesus as a prophet, "having remained beyond the reach of the great current which had carried away all the other churches, were treated as heretics" (Renan).

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE HEBREWS.

The Biblical critics who admit that the narratives in the Synoptics were drawn from a primitive written Gospel make no attempt to identify the latter Gospel; but it appears that it was the "Gospel according to the Hebrews," used by the Nazarenes. Epiphanius says in his work on Heresies (xxx. 18) that the Ebionites had a Gospel "called the Gospel according to Matthew, not entire and perfectly complete, but falsified and mutilated, which they call the Hebrew Gospel": after which he quotes the opening paragraph—of John baptising in the Jordan, and of the baptism of Jesus.

Again, Jerome, presbyter of Antioch, who lived at the same period, says in his Commentary on Matthew:—

> "In the Gospel which the Nazarenes and Ebionites use, which I lately translated from the Hebrew into Greek, and which is called by very many the original Gospel of Matthew, the man with the withered hand is described as a mason," etc.

This statement is in agreement with the fact that the canonical Matthew (omitting the first two chapters) is considered to be nearer to the primitive Gospel than any of the others, besides containing more Hebraisms. Moreover, the Gospel of the Nazarenes appears to have contained all the threefold narratives which the Synoptists took from the Common Source, besides several others not found in the canonical Gospels. The statement of Epiphanius that this Gospel was "falsified and mutilated" refers to its not containing the Virgin Birth story, which, as we know, the last-named editor added from an apocryphal source. All the so-called Christian "fathers," from Irenæus downwards, assumed as a matter of course that the canonical Gospels were written in apostolic times, and were the originals from which all other known Gospels were derived; whereas, as a matter of fact, they were the last written.

ABRACADABRA.

George Borrow.

1803—1881.

"I claim no place in the world of letters; I am, and will be, alone, as long as I live and after."—LANDOR.

THE small but fierce tribe of Borrovians will be delighted at the news that the city of Norwich has been honoring that bright and particular genius, George Borrow, the scholar-gipsy, who deserves the tribute of the town as much as that other great writer, Sir Thomas Browne.

It was one of fate's little ironies which imposed on the pagan George Borrow the function of colporteur of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The story of Borrow's introduction to the officials of the Society is characteristic. Hearing of the possibility of work for the Society, the young man tramped from Norwich to London, walking one hundred and twelve miles in twenty-seven hours, and spending less than sixpence on the way. On arrival, he told the surprised secretary that he could translate Manchu, and this was his first work for the Society. Borrow went to St. Petersburg, and, facing great difficulties, translated the New Testament into the Manchu-Tartar dialect. There was nothing he was not ready to do, even to setting up type, teaching wooden-headed compositors, buying paper, and hustling Russian officials. Later, he went to Spain on behalf of the Society, and the adventurous career he led in the Peninsula while hawking Bibles in this most bigoted of Catholic countries forms the groundwork of one of the most vivacious travel-books ever written, The Bible in Spain. "Gil Blas, with a touch of Bunyan," the volume has been called wittily. For the author pays small attention to the evangelical business of the Society that dispatched him, and he writes of thieves, murderers, gipsies, bandits, prisons, wars, and kindred subjects, with all the gusto of a Burton. Addressed to the narrow-minded Victorian religious public, it was a wonderfully stimulating drink to unaccustomed palates. It was the time when strict evangelical parents forbade secular books on Sunday, and Mr. Augustine Birrell has told us how, as a boy, he rejoiced in the old pagan's writings, the innocent title of which had passed the unsuspecting critics on the hearth.

As may be imagined, the correspondence between Borrow and the Bible Society officials is delicious reading. For Borrow worshiped at many shrines from that of Christ to that of Tom Sayers. We see the old Adam peeping out in the evangelist, as Dr. Jeykll changed into Mr. Hyde, and the growing distrust of the authorities, who saw their official boxing the compass, and forgetting the narrow channel which they wished him to pursue. At times, Borrow quite forgot the theological jargon of Earl-street, and it all ended in his being recalled and being given no further employment.

This strange agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society commenced his literary career in London by writing the Newgate Calendar, which bears so marked a resemblance to the earlier books of the Holy Scriptures sold by the Society. He was ever a fighter, even when his Flaming Tinman days were over; and his animosities extended from popes to parsons. When a Canon of St. Paul's ventured to criticise The Bible in Spain, Borrow sent a saucy note to his publishers, calmly stating that the ecclesiastic was a jackass, and that he would be doing better by minding his own business in his ugly cathedral.

Borrow had a real passion for adventure, and a love of language. Whilst an articled clerk to a solicitor at Norwich, he translated a volume of ballads from the Danish. Later, at St. Petersburg, he published his Targum: Translations from Thirty Languages and Dialects. In the course of his travels through France, Germany, Russia, and Eastern Europe he learnt languages as he went. With the exceptions of Sir Richard Burton and Prince Lucien Bonaparte, he was probably the most enthusiastic linguist who ever lived. During a few years of travelling activity he translated portions of the Bible into many languages and dialects, he produced a Turkish version of Bluebeard, and rendered Danish, Russian, and Welsh tales in English.

For the last forty years of his life he lived on "emotions remembered in tranquillity," passing his existence between Oulton Broad, Norfolk, and London. Lavengro, The Romany Rye, Wild Wales, were all written amid the peaceful Broads, and his tranquillity was only broken by fierce paper warfare with publishers, critics, and reformers, who aroused the old lion's wrath. Borrow was always furious at the want of public appreciation; but his fame has grown since he died at Oulton, and Norwich has done the right thing in purchasing Borrow's house.

Nature mixed George Borrow in a moment of magnificence. Only those who have realised for themselves the inadequacy of a pen when brought in contact with the rich and tumultuous glow of life can appreciate to the full the wonder of his achievement; the imagination, the insight, which are required to bring before us those unforgettable incidents of human life. Besides all these gifts, he possessed in a great degree the sense of the significance of life apart from any personal liking or disliking, of the beauty and continuity of the great stream. A little aloof, a little inscrutable he will ever remain, but magnificent because of his greatness as an artist. Borrow was impatient of the narrow standards of civilisation and society, and loved the men and women of the wayside. He recognised in these vagrants the true sons and daughters of "The Great Mother who mixes all our bloods." Listen to his exquisitely phrased Pagan glorification of existence: "Life is sweet, brother. There's night and day, brother, both sweet things; sun, moon, and stars, brother—all sweet things; there's likewise the wind on the heath. Life is very sweet, brother; who would wish to die?"

MIMNERMUS.

Our Lady of Guadalupe: The Brown Virgin of Mexico.

WITHIN half-an-hour's ride of the City of Mexico, in a pretty and romantic situation on the top of a hill, may be found a fine cathedral, of Spanish design, which is the headquarters of the Brown Virgin of Mexico, better known to the faithful as Our Lady of Guadalupe.

We are informed by sacred history that for many centuries it has been the custom of the Mother of God to appear occasionally in Catholic countries for the edification of the pious, and it would have been a sad omission on her part to have neglected to put in an appearance in such a devout country as Mexico was in the time of the Spaniards.

It is reported that in the year 1531 the Blessed Virgin appeared to a poor "peon" named Juan Diego on the exact site where the present cathedral now stands. Astonished at so wonderful a revelation and so great an honor, the poor Indian, after saying a prayer and devoutly crossing himself, rushed breathless to the nearest church and informed the clergy of the miracle he had witnessed. Like the unbelieving disciple, they were not readily convinced, and sent him back again for further investigation. This time the Virgin not only favored him with an "encore," but caused a beautiful rose-bush to spring out of the sand, which, in ordinary circumstances, would have been a most unsuitable place for it to grow.

This confirmation settled the matter in the mind of Don Juan. He returned to the church in holy fear, and, whilst explaining his second adventure to the astonished priests, they suddenly observed in the folds of his "Ayatl" (a rough cloth used by poor Indians to carry their goods or cover them on a journey) a beautiful picture of Our Lady surrounded by celestial objects.

The final corroboration put matters entirely beyond doubt. A church was soon built on the site, and solemnly dedicated to Our Lady of Guadalupe. Unfortunately, like love, the course of true religion does not always run smooth.

Digitized by Google

Many difficulties had to be contended with from the start. Our Lady, like some others of less exalted position, had a rival. The proud and haughty Castilian who came over with the conquerors, Nuestra Senora de Remidios (Our Lady of Help), was not at all inclined to give place to her tawny rival. The Spaniards patriotically stuck to their own Queen of Heaven, and looked down on the Queen of the Dagoes as they would have done on a daughter of Moctezuma. For many long years this royal rivalry existed, but the time came at last when the Mexicans rose in revolt. Goaded by the cruelty of the Spaniards, they threw off the hated yoke, and in the year 1810 established their independence. After ridding themselves of their oppressors, they lost no time in packing off Our Lady of Help, and sending her after them. With solemn ceremonies they excommunicated her, and banished her for ever from the Republic. The Mexican Senora then reigned in peace, and rewarded her patrons with innumerable miraculous cures.

Every year pious Indians come from distant villages on a pilgrimage to the shrine of their saint and, after painfully crawling up a long flight of steps on their bare knees, present their humble offerings to their protectress.

The walls of the little chapel at the back of the cathedral are covered with testimonials to the power of the Virgin; scores of pictures are hung round, showing the blind restored to sight, cripples throwing away their crutches, and the sick jumping from their beds. Names, date, and place are given, and everything is most convincing to those who believe. But to the sceptic there is a certain amount of pathos in it all; it seems sad to reflect how degraded human understanding may become through the influence of superstition—to see the poor untutored Indian put his trust in such sorry means, and pin his simple faith to the priests' decoy duck.

FLYING FISH AND PHARAOH'S WHEEL.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—The article by "Sibley" in the Freethinker of July 13 on "Paganism and Christianity" is full of interest, and the part in which he refers to relics reminds me of the story about the orthodox old Scotswoman whose son became a sailor. On his return after a long absence, she plied him with questions about the various things he had seen in different parts of the world. At length he told her that on several occasions he had seen "fleein' fish." "Noo, noo Jock," said the old lady with a knowing smile, "dinna try tae tak aff yer auld mither. I've heard afore o' the lees you sailor chields come hame wi', but ye'll no catch me." Jock smilingly let this pass, and further on in the course of their conversation he told about his experiences coming through the Red Sea. The old lady's features at once assumed a look of reverent awe when that Scriptural name was mentioned, and she waited with eager interest for all her son had to tell. "An' then, mither," he remarked, "just as we got aboot the middle we drappit the anchor, and when we hauled it up to start again we found we had fished up ane of the wheels of Pharaoh's chariot." "Ay, laddie," said the old lady in a subdued voice, "Dae tell me that? What positive proof o' the truth o' the guid auld Book. I wish I had been there tae see't!"

God and Immortality.

SELECTED BY E. B.

The hope of a future state is that which our wise men do promise, but do not prove.—Seneca.

I hope to go hence to good men, but of that I am not very confident. Nor does it become any wise man to be positive that so it will be. I must now die, and you shall live, but which of us is in the better state, the living, or the dead, only God knows.—Socrates on his dying bed.

Neither soul nor body has any more sense after death than before it was born.—Pliny.

I can deliver nothing as fixed and certain regarding a future life, but only something as probable, and as having some likelihood of truth. Which of the sentiments of the various philosophers is true, some god must tell us; which is most like to truth is a great question.—Cicero.

If there are gods they certainly pay no attention to the affairs of men.—Quintus Ennius.

Whence and why is evil, and whence and how is man, and whence is God?—Tertullian.

The immortality of the soul is rather supposed, or taken for granted, than expressly revealed in the Bible.—Archbishop Tillotson.

If God made made man in his own image, man has certainly returned the compliment.—Fontenelle.

If God did not exist, it certainly would have been necessary to invent him.—Voltaire.

Science has conducted God to its frontiers, and thanked him for his provisional services.—Caro.

God does nothing.—Thomas Carlyle.

The only excuse for God is that he does not exist.—Stendhal.

If there be a presiding intelligence in the universe it certainly suggests "some blackguardly larrikin kicking his heels in the clouds, not perhaps bent on mischief, but indifferent to the fact that he has caused it."—W. H. Mallock.

Those are the elect of God, his best and most useful servants who teach science and wisdom. They are the luminaries and legislators of the world which, without their help, would fall back into ignorance and barbarism.—Al Mamoun, Arabian Philosopher.

Gods are even more changeable than men. In the course of a century a god will become almost unrecognisable. The God of the Christian has changed more than any other.—Anatole France.

An honest God is the noblest work of man.—Ingersoll.

The truth is that no human being knows anything of what is beyond the grave. If nothing is known, then it is not honest for anyone to pretend that he does know. If nothing is known, then we can only hope for the good.—Ingersoll.

While one does not yet know what life is, how should we know what death is?.....While you cannot serve man how can you serve spirits?—Confucius.

Death is not so great a matter when you don't make it the gate to a heaven or to a hell.—E. Temple Thurston.

What went before, and what will follow me, I regard as two inpenetrable curtains, which hang down at the two extremities of human life, and which no man has drawn aside.—Thomas Carlyle.

An Epitaph.

HERE lies Jehovah, once the God Supreme,
Now but the memory of an empty dream.
The fell disease that brought his end about
Is quickly told,—Jehovah was found out.

His life was long. His fortunes rose and fell
Like those of men. At first he did but dwell
Among the household Gods of some wild clan,
Perhaps, at first, the ghost of their head man.

Successful battles fame and honor brought
To him the victors worshiped. Men were taught
By cunning priests his friendship to procure,
And by rich gifts their welfare to ensure.

'Twas said that Jupiter his place had gained
By conquering Saturn, who before had reigned.
A paltry boast, beside the ample claim
With which Jehovah's priests adorned his fame.

The God who once, with other oddments, rode
Inside a box, or in a tent abode,
Who once to win a paltry fight had failed,
Creator of the Universe was hailed.

When, 'neath Imperial Rome's corrupted sway,
The classic nations fell into decay,
And learning withered till it almost died,
The Jew God's worship triumphed far and wide.

Through ten long centuries of darkest night,
All Europe knew and feared Jehovah's might.
On God was centred every heart and mind,
To every other subject men were blind.

But when the dawn of science lit the earth
And ushered in the cultured world's re-birth,
The knell of ghosts and Gods was surely rung,
Whose fate on ignorance and darkness hung.

God died not suddenly, but pined away,
His priests with every art prolonged his stay.
They strove with all their heart and soul and might
To stop the progress of the fatal light.

No deed too vile, no lie too gross they found
To keep their useful phantom safe and sound,
But all their foul conspiracy was vain.
Jehovah's dead, and ne'er will rise again.

As "essence immanent" Jehovah's ghost
Still haunts his former strongholds, and a host
Of priests exploit his shadow for their bread,
Who know full well the Bible God is dead.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this..... day of..... 190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 31 SUNDAY, AUGUST 3, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts,
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals or forts.
—LONGFELLOW.

The Use of Missionaries.

IT is naturally denied by the more zealous Christians that the missionaries are at the bottom of any of the troubles in China or in other parts of the East. The secretary of the Chinese Legation in London said that they were; indeed, he declared that there would be no peace, and no prospect of peace, until the missionaries were recalled. But the friends of the missionaries say that this is all nonsense. The Protestants admit, however, that the Catholic missionaries are an obtrusive and intriguing lot, and that the Chinese have at least some reason for hating them and trying to clear them out of the Celestial Empire. On the other hand, the Catholics broadly hint that all would go well if the Protestant missionaries would go back to Europe and take with them their absurd and narrow dogmatism. For our part, we believe both sides; that is, we believe what the Protestants say of the Catholics, and what the Catholics say of the Protestants. Probably they know each other if they do not know themselves; and, as lookers-on often see most of the game, it is quite possible that we see through both parties in this interesting dispute.

The Chinese do not appear to draw a distinction in favor of either set of Christian soul-savers. They love them so that they dote upon their very absence. Nevertheless, it must be allowed that there was no particular opposition to the missionaries when they first visited China. The Jesuits were almost welcomed, and they seem to have taken care that their welcome was not worn out too rapidly. They taught the Chinese a good deal of useful knowledge, translated Euclid into their language, gave them lessons in astronomy, and put them up to many wrinkles in the mechanical arts. Christianity was insinuated as they went along. But the Dominicans appeared upon the scene and quarreled with the Jesuits; and then the Protestants came and quarreled with both —and with each other; and the Chinese began to wish them all to the devil. But unfortunately they stayed there and played the devil with the Chinese.

What is the object of these missionaries? In the first place, they are getting a living, and some of them a good one. It is a mistake to suppose that they are all burning with disinterested zeal. For the most part the missionary societies are well-organised agencies for diminishing the pressure of the unemployed in the clerical labor market at home. Millions of souls still need saving here, but there are too many gentlemen engaged already in the business, and it is found advisable to send off a number of them every year to save souls in heathen countries. Ostensibly, of course, their object is to save the souls of the said heathen. To save them from what? The only possible answer is that the heathen are going in streams to hell, and that it is an act of infinite charity to arrest their headlong flight to everlasting perdition. Well, if the missionaries really believe that, and are actuated by such a tender motive, they are worthy of our admiration from a moral point of view, whatever we may think of their intelligence. But they betray at least the mixture of their motives when they clamor for protection. They proclaim themselves as a species of traders. Missionaries should go on their own responsibilities, take their own risks, and accept martyrdom, if they meet it, as the crown of their enterprise. But when they claim to be protected as citizens of the countries they have left, and call for naval and military assistance in the extremities they have deliberately occasioned, they range themselves with the other commercial classes who seek openings in foreign lands. Moreover, they exhibit an additional hypocrisy; for Jesus Christ told his apostles that they should be delighted when they were persecuted for his sake, and that a great reward was awaiting them in heaven. It is, therefore, a gross insincerity on their part to fly from persecution, often with indecent haste, and seek shelter under the Union Jack. They say that Christ is their captain, but when their persons are in danger they trust to Admiral This and General That.

Even if the missionaries were perfectly sincere and absolutely disinterested, we might still ask them whether their game is worth the candle. China contains more than four hundred millions of inhabitants. Some fifteen millions of these die every year. Now, it is doubtful if the missionaries succeed in converting one thousand per annum. Would it not be just as well to let such a few die in their national faith, and make themselves as comfortable as possible in the other world with their own countrymen? It seems to be overlooked that converted Chinamen are expected to live in the other world with Europeans, and that a great many Celestials do not regard the prospect as alluring.

Some time ago the Rev. Dr. Clifford, the famous, energetic Baptist, delivered a very fiery speech on the subject of Missions to China. He more than admitted the "greed" of the Catholic missionaries for "political power," but he denied that "our Protestant messengers have created troubles." Anyhow, he said, they mean to continue their work. Their object is to "carry to men redemption and renewal, and peace and joy, the new life that is in Christ," and "nothing will hold them back." This, however, is untrue. Something does hold them back. Protestant missionaries have often fled for safety to places guarded by British and other European troops. They held back until they felt they could preach Christ again with the prospect of regular meals and sound sleep.

Dr. Clifford affirmed that "the undecaying strength of missions is the perpetual miracle of conversion." Miracle, indeed! Why, if conversion were a matter of miracle the whole world ought to have been converted long ago. Omnipotence should not be as slow as a missionary society. There are really no degrees in the miraculous; to God one act must be as simple as another, and the conversion of millions as easy as the conversion of units. The very paucity of converts is a proof of the absence of supernatural agency. Indeed, the phenomenon is rather surprising even on purely natural grounds. Considering the number of missionaries, their advantage of education, the money spent upon them, and the prestige they enjoy in belonging to the conquering races of Europe; considering also the curious worldly temptations so frequently offered to the lower classes of heathen; it is quite astonishing that so few are "brought to Christ." How many real converts there are it is hard to calculate, but the nominal converts can be counted, and the total is a satire on Christian pretensions.

G. W. FOOTE.

Christianity and Force.—II.

WHY should religion be the one topic that defies tolerance and courteous controversy? In addition to the replies already given it is said that religious persecution is due to an intense conviction of the value of right religious belief. They are convinced that "the issue of the controversy is of the most momentous importance. Man's highest moral and spiritual welfare hinge upon the acceptance or rejection of the teaching." This strikes one as no more than a roundabout way of repeating the question. Theologians quarrel violently, Christians persecute bitterly, because they believe their teachings to be of paramount importance. In other words, because they are Christians. We knew this much at the start; what we want to know is, why it should be so? Why should Christians have got into a chronic state of mind which results in the belief that their opinions on religion are of so much greater importance than their opinions on other subjects as to warrant treating those who differ from them as either criminals or lunatics? Why should disbelief in religion call forth an exhibition of moral repugnance? This is not the case elsewhere; why should it be so here?

So far as tradition counts in the affairs of men everything is on the side of the Christian persecutor. The earliest appearance of groups of Christians is as rival sects fighting over fantastic points of doctrinal differences, and quarrelling with a ferocity that caused the tolerant Pagans to open their eyes in astonishment. Church councils as often as not ended in a fight; the election of a new Pope left the Church in which the succession was decided littered with corpses. In the election of Pope Damasus, according to Dean Milman, there were a hundred and thirty-four dead bodies left when the election was concluded. Over and over again, Roman Emperors had to stop the murderous quarrels of the sects. No other disputes can show the same barbarous scenes as those between Arians and Athanasians, Catholics and Protestants, Lutherans and Anabaptists. Luther, in the very act of pleading for tolerance, did not ask it "for such as deny the common principles of the Christian religion." The intolerance of Calvin has become a byeword, and his apology for the murder of Servetus, A Defence of the Orthodox, bore on the title-page the sentence, "In which it is proved that heretics may be rightly coerced with the sword." His follower, Knox, illustrated the same principle in declaring that "provoking the people ought not to be exempt from the punishment of death." All over the Christian world imprisonment or death were the common punishments for heresy. Even in America, a country, so to speak, in which Christianity made a fresh start, Fiske says:—

> "Anyone who should dare to speculate too freely about the nature of Christ, or the philosophy of the plan of salvation, or to express a doubt as to the plenary inspiration of every word between the two covers of the Bible, was subject to fine and imprisonment. The tithing man still arrested Sabbath breakers, and shut them up in the town cage in the market place; he stopped all unnecessary riding or driving on Sunday, and haled people off to the meeting-house whether they would or no."

Force in matters of faith is the one principle to which every Christian sect has yielded undeviating obedience, given the conditions for exercising it.

Persecution in matters of religion does not manifest itself as something sporadic, due to an outburst of human ferocity in a special direction; it is, indeed, inherent in the nature of religious belief. The reason for this is to be found in the character of the ideas that govern respectively religious belief and social affairs. In all matters of social life, so soon as man emerges from the overpowering mass of superstitions that clouds primitive life, discussion plays a part. Just in proportion as fighting, hunting, or the various affairs of a tribe are liberated from superstitious beliefs, they become affairs that are amenable to knowledge, and their course to be decided on a basis of human experience and knowledge. No matter how valuable one person might believe his opinion to be, there exists not alone the recognition of the existence of other opinions, but that of their legitimacy and right of expression. The result is, that on the social side there is an element of toleration from the outset. The appeal is to what men know, to their judgment, a general recognition that the final course is to be decided by the weight of evidence and a balancing of opinion. And all this involves an appeal to man's reason instead of to his prejudices; to his sense of comradeship rather than to feelings of hostility.

With the religious idea the influence exerted is entirely in the other direction. Here all difference of opinion is discouraged, and this for one very strong reason. In purely social matters man is master of his fate in proportion to his knowledge of the forces with which he is dealing. If he blunders he pays the penalty; he knows it is due to his want of knowledge; and, generally speaking, he profits by his failure. In religion he is not master, but slave. It is not what he sees to be right, but what the gods declare is right. No purely social consideration could suggest the punishment of death for picking up sticks on the Sabbath, stoning to death for worshiping other gods, or make offences of a hundred and one other doctrinal lapses. The only reason for these things is that the gods have so decreed. Their decrees admit of no question, there is no room for asking why, there is simply a punishment for disobedience. Religion cannot be made a subject for discussion; there is nothing to discuss. It is only a question of discovering what the gods desire. And their will does not come under the control of human reason.

There is still another reason for the inherent persecuting spirit of religion. This lies in the fact of what Sir Henry Maine declared to be a cardinal feature of all primitive society, namely, a strong sense of corporate responsibility. The gods are not only quick to punish, they punish indiscriminately. If one member of the tribe offends the whole may suffer. In the story of Jonah, God is about to drown all the sailors because he is offended with one person, and this fairly represents savage notions on that point. The unbeliever is thus a social danger. His suppression becomes an act of social necessity. This idea, although primitive in point of origin, is modern in so far as it still exists with a large number of religionists. Thousands still believe that national calamities are judgments upon us for desecration of the Sabbath, or similar religious offences. It is this element that gives to religious persecution the character of a social or moral duty, as well as a religious obligation. It also marks religion as something that must be protected from discussion, and so fenced in from the more humanising influence of social life.

It is not true, then, that religious persecution owes its existence and perpetuation to either the inherent intolerance of human nature or to the incursion into the religious domain of the secular power of the community. Exactly the reverse of this is the truth. So far as the secular power has affected religion, it has influenced it for good. When a government has wished to persecute, whether it was a Mohammedan or a Christian government, it has nearly always invoked religious prejudice as its principal ally. The secular power of Spain would never have committed suicide by expelling Mohammedans and Jews, France would never have impoverished itself by expelling the Huguenots, had it not been for the power of religion. In the whole history of the world one may challenge the production of a case in which the religious influence in the State has made for greater tolerance and a decrease in persecution. All available instances are in the other direction. Man has humanised his gods; society has civilised the creeds; the whole impulse to toleration has come from the social and secular side of life. To-day toleration is most complete in precisely those civilised States wherein religion has the smallest share in a conscious direction of the social forces.

As an apology for religious intolerance, it is sometimes pointed out that it invokes intense earnestness. But this is, if anything, an aggravation of the evil. No doubt the men of the Spanish Inquisition were earnest men. Calvin was the embodiment of earnestness. Men do not fight and imprison and kill unless they are in earnest. But it really does not compensate if, after breaking a man's head because he differs with you on the question of the Trinity, you plead that you feel very earnestly on the subject. Your victim might reply that with less earnestness and more judgment you would make a much better companion. A Christian may honestly believe that a Freethinker is an immoral person, or that a rejection of religion spells social disaster, and feel that it is his duty to suppress Freethought at any cost. All this may be admitted; but the essential point is not whether he believes these things or not—the point is that he has no right to believe them; that if he were guided by social considerations, he would not believe them; and that he only believes them because his judgment is decided by purely religious considerations. We do not act thus in science or art or literature or politics; we only do so where religion is in question, because it is fundamentally a non-social, non-moral force. Earnestness with judgment is a good thing; but earnestness without judgment, without those controlling elements that operate in secular affairs, is one of the most dangerous forces that can be let loose on society.

Savagery and persecution does not, then, result from a misunderstanding of Christianity. It is inherent in Christianity, as it is inherent in all religion. So long as people believe that salvation hereafter is determined by right belief, so long we retain the germ from which has developed persecution in the past, and from which persecution springs in the present. The brutalities of Balkan Christians occur, truly, because a state of war exists; but it is because the feelings excited by war are sharpened by religious prejudice that this war has provided us with some of the most horrible butcheries of modern times. The war is being waged by people who are habituated to persecution by religious hatred, who have behind them the tradition that religious differences rob a man of social rights, and dispenses with the necessity for courteous or considered treatment. Every religion carries this tradition with it, and a nation or a people does not outgrow a tradition in a single generation. And behind this tradition of hatred based on religious differences lies one of the oldest and deepest of social customs. Something has been done to weaken its force. The growth of science, the rationalising of one institution after another—in a word, the gradual secularisation of life—is slowly creating more rational, and therefore more tolerant, relations between people. But religion is still with us; and so long as it remains it will never fail to make its most secure appeals to passions of which the best amongst us are heartily ashamed.

Criticism Caricatured.

THE last chapter in Dr. T. R. Glover's book, The Christian Tradition and Its Verification, is entitled "The Criticism of Jesus"; but the chapter is remarkable, not for any criticism of Jesus, but for the entire absence of it. To the author, the reputed founder of Christianity is immeasurably above criticism. Throughout its history, in all its varied experiences, the Church has carried within its bosom a direct challenge to the critic. In a word, the critic is rigidly excluded. Within the Church everything depends upon Christ:—

> "In every phase of its life the one thing that decisively differentiates its experience from that of the world around is its relation to him. He is the historical source of the whole movement; he is the moving factor still;—such, rightly or wrongly, is the fixed belief of the Christian Church, after a great deal of experiment, both in trying to minimise the place he must hold, and in trying to avail itself of what it calls 'the unsearchable riches of Christ'" (pp. 193-4).

Consequently, the moment the critic turns up he is denounced as one incapable of doing justice to Christ because he does not understand him. If he did understand him his attitude to him would be identical with that of the Church. In other words, only a Christian is competent to judge a Christian. Or, as Dr. Glover puts it, "our business is to realise before we judge; and however odd the fundamental conviction of others may sound to us, we have to see for ourselves what they really mean, and what they are trying to express—not least when this conviction is strongly held by a community the thoughts and lives of whose members have so profoundly affected human history." We have no hesitation in characterising this account of the essential qualifications of a critic as wholly erroneous and irrational, although we are persuaded that there are critics of Christianity not a few who comply with the conditions laid down by Dr. Glover. They know by a past experience of their own "what it is that drives the Church back on to him [Christ] in every age and in every situation," and while thus knowing it they are bold enough to affirm that the Church has always been wrong.

It is true that "we are confronted by the historical Christian Church, and cannot get away from it, however much some of us may wish to be rid of it;" but, surely, the existence of the Church proves nothing. Personally, we have succeeded in cutting ourselves off from what our author calls "the deepest force mankind has known," because we have discovered that Christianity is not, nor has ever done, what its apologists claim on its behalf. Furthermore, we have found out that the alleged dependence of this religion on an historical Jesus is insusceptible of verification. In his treatment of this point, Dr. Glover resorts to blind dogmatism because the facts are all against him. He says:—

> "If the ordinary canons of history, used in every other case, hold good in this case, Jesus is undoubtedly an historical person. If he is not an historical person, the only alternative is, that there is no such thing as history at all—it is delirium, nothing else; and a rational being would be better employed in the collection of snuff-boxes. And if history is impossible, so is all other knowledge" (p. 198).

In our judgment, this is a piece of delirious reasoning, "nothing else; and a rational being would be better employed in the collection of snuff-boxes." It is simply because we do employ the ordinary canons of history in the case of the Gospel Jesus that we pronounce him an unhistorical character. You cannot get away from the fact that the Gospel Jesus is an unnatural, chimerical being, with a human mother and a Divine father. He is supernaturally born, leads a life that teems with supernatural events, dies a supernatural death, and then undergoes or accomplishes a supernatural resurrection. Without a doubt, if you apply the ordinary canons of history to the study of such a being, you will be bound to regard him as either a mythical or largely legendary character. The ordinary canons of history positively declare that such a being never existed.

According to Dr. Glover, Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, and the Savior of the world. Through the Church, "he has forced himself upon the world—quite quietly." As a matter of fact, he has not forced himself upon the world, whether quite quietly or otherwise, but only on a small fraction of it, and even upon this most superficially, as every clergyman knows very well; and as history testifies, this forcing meant making thousands upon thousands of converts at the point of the sword, as Dr. Glover cannot but be aware. Is he proud of the record of the Englishman, St. Boniface, through whom Christ forced himself upon Germany? It was at the head of armed troops that that representative of the meek and lowly Jesus made converts. But that is only by the way, our present concern being with the personality of Christ as the alleged head of the Church. Our author informs us that we are made or unmade by our judgments upon him. That is to say, we disbelieve in and reject him to our own undoing. This is only another way of saying that Christ is above criticism. "He is the central figure in all human history," says Dr. Glover, "and on our attitude to the centre all depends for us":—

> "On our judgment rests in great measure our use and place in society—as we ignore or admire, turn away or follow, hate or love, him who has meant and means most for all mankind" (p. 208).

Those are the words of a special pleader, for whom the subject of Christ is not an open question. And yet, strangely and inconsistently enough, our author says that "we have to remind ourselves again and again that we have to touch the fact independently of preconception, to know it from within, and to know it in its full significance and its true perspective." No true critic could indulge in such twaddle as that. To say that we must love Christ before we can understand him is to beg the question, because before we can rationally love him we must find out by means of criticism whether or not he is worthy of our affection. In order to touch the so-called fact of Christ "independently of preconception" we must touch it absolutely unaffected by love or hate, admiration or contempt. Impartial criticism of the Gospels is making it quite impossible for ever-growing numbers of people to accept and love Christ, or to regard him in any other light than that in which they regard all the Pagan Christs. This is what Dr. Glover contemptuously calls judging him "from the Stoic and Epicurean standpoint after all." We prefer to characterise it as judging him from the standpoint of reason and common sense. Dr. Glover says:—

> "The general teaching of the Gospel is intelligible and simple, and it is amazing how, if you let people alone with the Gospels, they will understand Jesus Christ, if they are simple enough and true enough" (p. 212).

We maintain that the Gospel of salvation by faith in the efficacy of the blood of the Cross is neither intelligible nor simple, and that in proportion as the people become intelligent they spurn it as at once immoral and degrading. Dr. Glover asserts that "sympathy is the highest mode of intelligence," and we agree if it be sympathy with truth and virtue; but sympathy with error and falsehood and superstition is, surely, the highest or lowest mode of unintelligence. We cannot possibly have sympathy with the Gospel Jesus, because we do not believe that he ever lived. We neither love nor hate the Christ of the Churches, because we look upon him as nothing but a creation of the theological imagination. Of course, in Dr. Glover's opinion, this is the criticism of the "outsider" which "is everywhere recognised as worthless." We hold, on the contrary, that the criticism of the "outsider" alone is worth anything, because the "insider" is too prejudiced, too infatuated, too blinded by fanaticism to play the part of a critic at all. Dr. Glover himself is not in any legitimate sense a critic. As an "outsider" he does criticise Buddhism and Mohammedanism; and even as an "outsider" his criticism of these is not reliable, because it is biased by the fact that he is a Christian "insider." The only fair critic is he who stands outside all religions alike, for he holds a brief only for truth.

Dr. Glover makes use of an exceedingly thread-worn fallacy which has done service for countless generations.

> "Is a critic of Jesus to be trusted who has no essential sympathy with religion; who does not see how native it is to man, like art and music; whose instincts for religion have become atrophied? Is he not, rather, like a color-blind person, who has not studied pictures, let loose in a picture gallery? What can he say without giving himself away?"

We would be genuinely sorry for a color-blind person let loose in a picture gallery, for he would be a truly pitiable object; but his case is not in the least parallel to that of an outsider criticising Christ and Christianity. When a man is outside all religions he is precisely where all others would be were it not for persistent religious teaching and training during childhood and youth. Religion is not native to man, else all men would be religious. Its origin has been traced down to ignorance and fear, to the "primal stupidity"; and it is as true to-day as ever that unless a child can be induced to take to it in its teens it will never have anything to do with it at all. The other day we had the pleasure of meeting three bright and intelligent young people, the youngest of whom is fifteen, who are free from every vestige of religion, because it was not taught to them in their younger years; and what they are all young people would be in the absence of religious instruction in home and school. No, religion is not native to man, nor do even the divines believe, at bottom, that it is, for if they did they would not so vigorously oppose the adoption of the secular system of education in Government-supported schools. The religious outsider is, therefore, the only natural man, the only man who has a right to be a critic of religion, because he is the only man who has an open mind when its claims are set before him.

Christianity and the Chinese.—XII.

> "Our missionaries go forth to earn the crown of martyrdom. But if they gain it their societies demand vengeance in blood and coin from the murderers. The Gospel of Love becomes the Doctrine of Revenge. 'Forgive your enemies!' O ye saintly missionaries who are so shocked at the ungodly lives of your sinful fellow-countrymen in foreign lands, will you not practise what you preach? Think of the divine precept of the Master you profess to serve and pardon the blind rage of the ignorant heathen!"—CAPTAIN GORDON CASSERLY, The Land of the Boxers, p. 291.

> "If I were a missionary I do not see why I should object to persecution. A soldier takes his wounds, or his possible death, as part of his day's work. Even in the nondescript capacity of war correspondent, I had to go through three diseases which are incidental to campaigns, and be twice wounded. And if the soldier takes his killing as kindly as may be, I do not see why the missionary should not do so. Or, if he is not prepared to do so, I do not think he is worthy of the high calling he has adopted, for inconceivably higher is the vocation of the missionary to that of any soldier. I do not understand this muddling of things. There have been more helpless Chinese laborers killed in North America alone than there have been Europeans killed in the whole of China."—GEORGE LYNCH, The War of Civilisations (1901), p. 257.

IT is not our intention to go into all the cases where missionary aggression has been answered by Chinese retaliation, resulting in bloodshed, riot, and murder, followed by the demands of Christian Governments upon the Chinese for indemnity or the confiscation of territory. To deal with all of them would extend these articles to an interminable length. As Mr. Michie observes:—

> "The fruits of this war of the social elements began to be harvested in 1868, as Sir Rutherford Alcock observed; but that was only the beginning of a long series of conflicts which have marked the progress of missionary work in China up to the present day. Riot, outrage, and massacre are its regular landmarks."*

On June 21, 1870, occurred the massacre of Tientsin, by which sixteen French sisters of charity—including an Irish girl, Alice Sullivan—a French Consul, several French subjects, and a Russian merchant and his wife, lost their lives. This was entirely owing to the operations of a Catholic orphanage, or institution for obtaining Chinese children in order to Christianise them, entitled the Society of the Sainte-Enfance. Says M. Eugene S mon :—

> "In 1870 the Society of the Sainte-Enfance had, after several years without success, collected at Tientsin a certain number of children whose parents had been compelled to abandon them by the floods of the Yellow River. The parents, having recovered from their misfortunes, reclaimed their children, but, as they had been baptised, the Sainte-Enfance refused to give them up, and for greater security dispatched them to another province. The consequence was the massacre not only of the missionaries, but of the French residents at Tientsin and of the Consul." *

The missionaries—who do not believe in returning good for evil—demanded retribution and the punishment of the perpetrators of the massacre. Under pressure, "not without hints of stronger measures," says Mr. Michie, it—

> "resulted in the offer of fifteen of the mob to be executed, which being unanimously rejected, the Chinese Government, apparently thinking it was the number that was inadequate, threw in five more, making twenty in all. Sixteen were actually beheaded, the remaining four being saved by the timely arrival of the Russian Minister, who (to his eternal credit) protested against the execution of the men accused of murdering the Russians, because he did not believe in their guilt. Compensation was paid by the Chinese officials to the families of the executed men, which, with the honors done to their dead bodies, showed that they were sacrificed not for crime, but for reasons of State. Of course, pecuniary compensation was made on account of the victims of the massacre, the Chinese Government being never hard to deal with where money is concerned." †

This cost the Chinese Government £160,000. "It is generally believed," says Mr. Davenport, that upon this occasion, as upon others, "the innocent have suffered for the guilty, who were too powerfully protected to be arrested." ‡

This punishment of the innocent for the guilty again took place in the province of Shantung. On November 1, 1897, two German Catholic priests, who had thrust themselves into a far-off village, twenty-five miles west of Chi-Ning-Chou, in Western Shantung, were suddenly set upon by a band of twenty men, armed with swords, both priests being killed. It has never, we believe, been satisfactorily settled as to the motives governing this double murder. Says Mr. Arthur Smith :—

> "Many theories were advanced to account for the act, such as that it was committed by banditti, who abound in that part of Shantung, that it was done in revenge for a failure to secure employment, or for help given to certain Catholic converts who had a lawsuit, or that it was instigated by the Ta Tao Hui, or 'Great Sword Society,' between which and the Catholics there had even at that time been a bitter feud of some years standing. Whatever the occasion for this outrage may have been, it was certainly not in any way due to official connivance, as the local magistrate happened to be well acquainted with one of the priests, and was much affected at the terrible sight, when he arrived in his capacity of coroner to make an official inspection." §

There is not much doubt that the murder was the result of some aggression on the part of the priests, due to their religion, for "No one else in the compound received any injury," which is not likely to have been the case if the attack had been made by brigands.

Again the pound of flesh was demanded. Two priests were killed on this occasion, and seven innocent men paid the penalty. Upon this point we have the express testimony of Father Stenz, the German Catholic priest, who wrote in 1898 :—

> "Up to this date, May 10, consequently more than half a year afterwards, not one of the actual murderers has been arrested. Two individuals have been beheaded. Seven others have been found guilty; for, although innocent, they were tortured until they decided to make false confessions." *

Mr. Davenport, who cites this letter, observes :—

> "Our missionaries tell us that persecution and death frequently await the natives whom they have converted; while, in addition, far too large a number of Chinese have been beheaded during the past half century as supposed murderers of foreign missionaries."

And yet they "persist in sending missionaries to China, knowing full well that under the present system either some of them, or of their converts, must from time to time necessarily be killed; and that other Chinese, innocent or guilty, must be beheaded in consequence." †

The Germans, who had long been waiting for a pretext for getting a footing in China, eagerly seized the opportunity. Within two weeks of the murder of the two priests, German ships of war made their appearance and seized Kia-chow, on the coast of Shantung. Says Mr. George Lynch :—

> "From conversation with intelligent Chinamen and a few Europeans who have any sympathetic insight into things Chinese, it appears that there is nothing in later years which has made a more profound impression on the Chinese than this seizure by the mailed fist of the Kaiser of those ports of their Holy Land."

The Emperor of China—

> "felt it so keenly, and for a time was so overcome, that he spoke of abdication. It broke the heart of the aged Prince Kung; he died in consequence in the year 1898. More than the loss of Formosa or Wei-Hai-Wei was the loss of this section of their Holy Land. It naturally worked on the religious and imaginative feelings of the people, and hallowed the aspirations of the Boxers with the sanctity of a crusade." ‡

There is no doubt that this seizure was one of the determining causes of the Boxer rising two years later. The same writer observes :—

> "If two Chinese missionaries had been killed in a German village, would the German Emperor have consented to the cession of a Baltic port as compensation for the outrage? And if through force of circumstances he had to consent, would it have been surprising if his subjects had risen indignantly in arms to wrest it back?" (p. 8).

Another great grievance to the Chinese is caused by what is known as the "Extra-territoriality" clause inserted in the treaties forced upon China. Sir Robert Hart remarks :—

> "The most striking among the treaty clauses are those which, under the heading 'Extra-territoriality,' withdraw foreigners from Chinese control and place them under their own national officials in China; and, under the heading of 'The Most Favored Nation,' provide that whatever is accorded to new-comers will be enjoyed by their predecessors." §

The missionaries have taken advantage of both these clauses to the very utmost. Mr. Davenport quotes from a Parliamentary paper the letter addressed by a missionary to a naval commander, from which we extract the following :—"Why not bring a few gunboats to Nanking, and order the Viceroy to stop the nonsense in his district with the alternative of a bombardment?" Mr. Davenport continues :—

> "The same Blue-book contains a letter from the then Commander-in-Chief to the Admiralty, wherein he states :—
> "'Having looked in vain for the authority under which English missionaries establish themselves throughout China outside Treaty limits, I applied for information to H.M. Minister at Peking, and the explanation is that no such stipulation was contained in the Treaty of Peking at all, but that the present state of affairs arises from Art. VI. of the Convention between the Emperor of France and China, signed at Peking, October 25, 1860, and that England has to claim for her subjects equal rights under the most-favored nation clause.....It seems altogether unreasonable that the Societies should exercise absolute freedom in going where they please, and that their agents should look to H.M. Government for protection.'" *

Mr. George Lynch illustrates how these clauses would work out in our own country :—

> "If we were endeavoring to evolve a combination of circumstances which would absolutely ensure Christian missionaries being thoroughly hated by the Chinese, we could not have surpassed the present position. Assuming the principle of 'Do as you would be done by,' apply the position of our missionaries in the East to England, for instance. Say that Chinese missionaries had obtained an entry into this country by a clause in a certain treaty, and a clause which, parenthetically it must be remarked, is a forgery. Thus, as a matter of fact, every missionary passport to China at the present day bears upon it the seal of Ananias, the indelible stain of as low a piece of cheating as ever diplomacy can show. When the missionary starts preaching his strange doctrine, one of its immediate effects is that any converts he makes are practically exempt from the laws of the country in which they are living. The converts that a Chinese missionary would make around Covent Garden would de facto be outside the jurisdiction of the police magistrate sitting at Bow-street, and for the judgment of any legal dispute, or the punishment of any misconduct, would have the right to have their cases tried before the representative of the Chinese Minister in Portland-place." †

That very high authority upon Chinese history, Mr. Michie, observes :—

> "But if toleration be the note of Chinese polity—concerning not religion alone, but almost every matter affecting government—it may be asked, what is it in the propagation of Christianity that excites the hostility of people and rulers? It is that the missionaries present themselves to Chinese view as the instruments of powerful nations bent on the ruin of the empire. They enter the country with a talisman of extra-territoriality; their persons are sacred: the law of the land cannot lay hands on them. That is the first stage. The second is, that they seek to extra-territorialise their converts also, whose battle they fight in the provincial courts and in the rustic communes, and so make it of material advantage to the people to bear the banner of the Cross. Many missionaries are really zealous in the work of alienating the Chinese from their natural allegiance, and of encouraging them to seek the protection of foreign Powers against the native authorities. Thus a revolution of the most vital nature is in progress, and is being pushed on with all the energy which Christian, combined with ecclesiastical and political, zeal can throw into the work. Village is set against village, clan against clan, family against family, and a man's foes in China are too often they of his own household." ‡

A PRINTER'S ERROR.

In the Brighton Herald of Saturday, July 12, there was, among the list of Church Services for the following day, a notice that, at the French Reformed Church, M. Le Pasteur Joye, B.A., B.D., would preach in the afternoon on "The Pleasures of Immorality." It seems only fitting that Parson Joye should discourse on Pleasures; but that the theme should be that of Immorality is testimony to the courage of this conventional cleric. Although the title of the sermon was not correct to a t, yet, as printed, it unwittingly conveyed the true character of the type of pleasure discoursed. So, on occasions, good cometh out of even a printer's devilment.—E. B.

Acid Drops.

The doings of the Bulgarian Crusaders continue to form ghastly reading in the daily press, with still not a word from the religious press that held them up to admiration while they were maltreating Mohammedans. A very circumstantial account of Bulgarian massacres has been supplied by Commander Cardale, an officer on the active list of the British Navy. Commander Cardale visited Doxaro immediately after the Bulgarian departure. His story eclipses all that has yet been told concerning these gallant liberators. In one courtyard 120 women and children were massacred. The walls were spattered with blood to a height of six feet from the ground. In one corner he saw huddled together the bodies of six little children. In one room a woman and her child had been crucified. In a stovepipe he found the body of a little girl wedged, who had tried to escape, but who had been killed with bayonet thrusts from below. Throughout the town Commander Cardale personally counted no less than 600 bodies still unburied, mostly of women and children. Bands of dogs were feeding on human remains, and the town presented a loathsome picture of burning and ruined homes and murdered bodies. For cold-blooded barbarity these Christian liberators appear to have eclipsed all records.

"Warfare in the Balkans," a leaderette in the Catholic Times, contains the following admission :—

> "The Balkan Powers have destroyed for ever the reputation they gained when undertaking the war against Turkey. They appeared to be cordially friendly with one another, and their announcement that their troops were taking the field as crusaders bent on delivering the Christians throughout Turkey in Europe from an intolerable servitude secured for them enthusiastic admiration. Misgivings were laid aside, and it was generally believed that the desire to improve the position of the Christian subjects of the Porte was one of the motives, if not the chief object, for which the campaign was commenced. From the moment when the Turk lay vanquished and the question of dividing the spoil arose, it became evident that their aim was entirely self-aggrandisement. Jealous of the predominance of Bulgaria, the three other Powers—Servia, Greece, and Montenegro—have turned their arms against her, and in the battles that have just taken place there has been fearful carnage. The belligerents have been betraying a stronger determination to give no quarter than when they were fighting against the Turks, and the devastation is now almost as great in their own territories as that caused in the Sultan's dominions by the invasion."

The Protestant journals in England are less candid. They try to hide the greedy blackguardism of the Christian Powers.

Here is another striking extract from another page of the same number of the Catholic Times :—

> "History repeats itself in little in the sordid rivalry of the Balkan Allies. In the four great crusades against the Saracen and the Turk lust and avarice and brutal enormities covered with shame and dishonor Christian arms, and made the Crescent shine by comparison with chivalrous lustre. With broken pledges and fratricidal hate the Balkan barbarians 'reel back into the beast,' and make their unhappy lands once more the menace of the world's peace, and themselves the silly puppets of rival Powers who pull the strings. In the history of civilised nations the state of the Balkans to-day is without parallel."

We fancy the editorial knuckles will get well rapped by the Catholic dignitaries. This is plain speaking with a vengeance.

One of the most interesting conversions on record is that of John-street Congregational Church, Aberdeen, into a picture palace. At one time this church was eminently prosperous, with crowded congregations; but, ere long, as a House of God it ceased to attract, and now it is about to try its luck as a place of amusement.

Is There a Hell? is the title of a shilling volume just published by Cassell & Co. The question is answered by sixteen Christian divines, who cannot all be speaking by the power of the Holy Ghost, since they differ from each other very considerably. We shall have more to say about this burning question next week. We believe we know quite as much about it as all those sixteen Christian divines put together. Still, we shall let them have a look in, though they wouldn't let us appear in their company.

Dr. Farquhar McRae should have known better. He became surety in the sum of £20 for the reappearance of Mrs. Susannah Watson, described as a Christian missionary and the wife of a Presbyterian minister in Canada, who was remanded on a charge of shoplifting. The lady disappeared; it was thought she had gone for a holiday to Germany. Anyhow, she did not answer the call, and Dr. Rae was asked to find that £20. He pleaded for mercy, and Mr. Plowden let the poor innocent off with a fine of twenty shillings. He will beware of pious grass-widows in future.

The second Plymouth Conference of the Wesleyan Church may recall to some one incident of the first Conference held there in 1896. It was at this Conference that the admission of women as delegates was first raised. To the honor of the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes it has to be recorded that he was in favor of their admission. On the other hand, the Rev. W. L. Watkinson said that, if admitted, they would be like poppies among the corn. The obvious meaning of this was that they would be pretty but useless; although a long while afterwards Dr. Watkinson explained that he meant very few would attend. A committee was appointed, we believe, to report on the question, and did so in its favor. This recommendation the Conference summarily threw out. Thus the matter remained until 1910, when the Conference decided that it was quite in accord with Christian principles that women might attend a Methodist Conference as delegates. That is the way Christian progress is achieved. After nearly two thousand years, some Christian discovers a truth that is generally recognised in non-Christian organisations. He brings it forward and there is some years spent in fighting the question before the pressure of public opinion converts other Christians. Then the reform is admitted—or, rather, the injustice is removed—and Christians assume the airs of devil-may-care, up-to-date reformers. Genuine reformers, meanwhile, only smile at these attempts of stage coaches to masquerade as motor-cars.

The Freethought analysis of the social function of religion was unconsciously endorsed in the presidential address to the Wesleyan Methodist Conference. The President quoted with approval a writer who said, "The social service that Wesley accomplished was not the least of its triumphs, for Methodism diverted into religious channels a vast volume of social discontent which in France swelled the tide that submerged Church and State in 1789." This is quite true; but the service is not peculiar to Methodism; it is true, in measure, of all forms of religion. Its function has always been to direct social unrest into religious channels, and so help to keep things as they are. That is one reason why the powers that be have always encouraged religion and discouraged unbelief. And it is not without its significance that some of the worst features of the English factory system, and some of the vilest robberies of the land from the English people, succeeded the Methodist revival. As a religious movement, the revolt against the established form of religion was socially retrogressive. But it had other and indirect consequences—consequences that the Dissenters worked hard to suppress. The revolt against the Established Church led indirectly to a questioning of authority. Social causes, amongst others the French Revolution itself, directed attention to social ills and the prospect of remedying them; and many who had commenced with a break from the Established Church went on to break from religion altogether. But Methodism, no more than Episcopalianism, aimed at social reform, and, so far as its influence can be clearly traced on social and political life, it was wholly unhealthy.

The President of the Conference fell back upon the familiar argument that many of the social reformers of the last fifty years were born of Methodist stock and trained in Methodist schools. It would be surprising were it otherwise. John Wesley was born of Church of England stock and trained in Church of England schools, but we have never heard Methodists claim that they owed all that was good in Methodism to Episcopalian influence. Martin Luther was born of Roman Catholic stock and trained in Roman Catholic schools, and, by a parity of reasoning, Roman Catholicism is to be thanked for the Reformation. In a Christian country most people are naturally born of a Christian stock and trained under Christian influence. The significant thing is not that in a Christian country some leaders in social movements come from a Christian stock, but that so large a number of social leaders and workers break definitely from all Christian organisations and reject Christian doctrines. More significant still is the fact that practically every movement of social reform for the last hundred years has begun and developed apart from Christian influence and Christian teaching, and often enough in the teeth of Christian opposition. And it is tolerably certain that even now, when the Churches have been driven into professing an interest in progressive movements, if non-Christians were to withdraw from them the vitality of these movements would be reduced to a very low ebb indeed.

Mr. Dan Crawford, the African missionary, about whom some fuss was made a little while back, and who is returning to Africa because he prefers a non-Christian country, told a Y. M. C. A. meeting the other day that before Henry Drummond died he took back all that he once wrote in Natural Law in the Spiritual World. We do not know whether there is anything in the statement, and it does not much matter anyway. The book is now dead as a doornail, and was a shoddy performance at best. Its chief significance lies in its having been one of the many works that was to harmonise Christianity with science, and which in due course went the way of its predecessors. After Drummond came Kidd; after Kidd, Balfour; after Balfour, Bergson. All have their day, and in a few years are forgotten. Christians confess their plight by the eagerness with which they greet every attempt, and its failure by the readiness with which they turn to a new one. Meanwhile, science is extending knowledge in all directions, and so providing the material that will one day expel all religion from civilised society.

Peace has been secured in the new Christian Republic of Mount Athos. Six hundred and sixteen of the monks have been arrested and deported to Russia in a transport of the Russian Volunteer Fleet. The fighting among the monks all arose over a quarrel concerning the name of God. Some said that the name, being part of God, was divine. Others denied it. And they proceeded to settle the dispute on the plan of starving those that could be seized and shut up, after considerable fighting. And now there is peace on Mount Athos—thanks to the gunboat.

Professor's Bury's new History of Freedom of Thought was reviewed by R. Ellis Roberts in the Daily News (July 23). Our contemporary should keep such ignorant insolence out of its pages. The reviewer has the impudence to sneer at Gibbon—the greatest of modern historians—and to call Buckle "the most shallow of writers." Vulgar outrages of this kind are unworthy of a journal that was established by Charles Dickens.

The Daily Sketch reports one of the Rev. G. Jackson's dribbles thusly:—

> "It is a significant fact that neither Charles Bradlaugh in England nor Colonel Ingersoll in America has had any successor. Again, it is safe to predict they never will. And why? Because our changed methods of interpretation have robbed them of the miserable wares which formed their whole stock in trade."

This pretence of never having heard of the National Secular Society and the Freethinker, not to mention Mr. Foote, is simply ridiculous. And what is to be thought of the following?—

> "As it was given to the Greek to teach men art, and to the Roman to teach men law, so to the Jew it was given to teach men religion."

Where is the art to be found? In many splendid galleries. Where is the law to be found? In courts of justice all over Europe. Where is the religion to be found. In the blood-soaked Balkans. On the whole, the world might dispense with the religion, and even with some of the Jewish gentlemen who keep it alive for our sakes.

"Preaching is vain without the Holy Ghost," exclaimed a preacher the other day. We know nothing about the powers of the Holy Ghost, but we do know that preaching is vain. At best preaching only helps to prolong the night of superstition and retard the advent of the day of enlightenment and freedom. The pulpit has always been and is now a spoke in the wheel of progress. Hence the knowledge that its influence is visibly declining fills our heart with joy. The members of the Black Brigade are very loath to admit that their glory is departing; but even they are obliged reluctantly to acknowledge that they are by no means the deep force they used to be in days gone by.

Little Dombey asked, "What are the wild waves saying?" At this season of the year, owing to the travelling evangelists on the sands, it would appear to be something warm.

Mr. A. C. Benson has just spoken on the subject of immortality. Of course, he had nothing new to say about it. He intimated that he had been converted to a belief in a future life by a "personal experience." The experience was that of a general breakdown through overwork. "The machinery of the brain was out of gear"; but his mind or spirit criticised and was sorry for the poor unfortunate organ of thought. Hence he jumped to the conclusion that his mind or spirit "was the thing untouched by illness or disability"; but had his mind been able to think a little more logically and deeply he would have learned that paralysis of the brain is accompanied by a total loss of consciousness. Is the mind or spirit then "the thing that is untouched by illness or disability"? Clearly, Mr. Benson was not at his best when the said conversion took place.

Mr. A. C. Benson says that so far as we can follow the records of history and archæology, the funeral arrangements of humanity testify to the belief in a life after death. This is true, but it is not the kind of truth it is assumed to be. The beliefs of primitive mankind do not testify to a belief after death, but to a continuance in living. This may sound an unnecessarily subtle distinction, but in reality it is a vital one. A child, for instance, finds it a matter of great difficulty to conceive a cessation of life—we doubt if any child could have any adequate conception of this—but it has no difficulty in thinking of people living, because that is a continuance of things as they are. The dead person is, to the child, asleep; and it is a quite acceptable explanation that he or she has gone away somewhere. It is the same with early humanity. Life is a continuous fact; to group the conception of death as a cessation of living, implies no small degree of mental effort. The truth is that the savage does not think of people dying and living again, but as continuing to live. Death as due to the cessation of organic functioning, is the other side of the conception of life as the outcome of organic functioning, and neither conception is present in primitive thought. Thus it is that man has not to grow towards the conception of a continuous life, but towards the scientific conception of death. Modern religious theories on the subject are due to the persistence of the primitive idea, modified by the pressure of more exact knowledge. Mr. Benson in no sense troubles the non-believer by proofs that people have always believed in a continuance of life—he rather supports their position. Even to-day it requires an effort to think of people as really dead. "Could we think that death was death indeed," the main strength of religion would be gone. Here, as elsewhere, it finds its main support in human weakness and incapacity.

At a reception given by a bishop, visitors of one rank were admitted by blue cards, and those of a lower caste by white tickets. A nobleman, who had married an actress, received a blue card, and his wife a white one. When challenged at the entrance, the lady insisted that they could go in together. "What do you take us for," she shouted to the astonished flunkey, "a blooming Seidlitz powder?"

"D. V." (Deo Volente, God willing) are initials that have dropped out of public announcements, except in the case of certain ignorant communities that still follow in the dreary old paths of the ages of faith. Nowadays, the public generally does not care a D. whether D is V or not.

As a rendezvous in cold and wet weather the British Museum finds favor with many people. One of the official guides has been telling of parents who send children from homes where there is infection in order to "get them out of the way." Fancy Pharaoh waking up at the call of the "mummy." If he caught the measles, he might think that he was back in the old Bible days, and faced by the ten plagues.

"It is a waste of time," says Professor Josiah Boyce in his new work The Problem of Christianity, "to endeavor to prove the usual theses of dogmatic Christology by any collection of accessible historical evidences. Such historical evidences are once for all insufficient." Thus is the second death of Christ gaining recognition even in Christian circles. The mythical Christ is doomed, and the historical Christ never existed.

The most rowdy students in Edinburgh, with one exception, are the "medicals." The exception is the "theologicals." It appears to be much the same further south. The non-militant Suffragette pilgrims met the "theological students" at Durham (the Daily News says), and the embryo divines "attempted to cause a disturbance." Of course they did. But the more gallant miners, with less godliness and more manliness about them, defended the women and ducked some of the future Bible-bangers in the river.

John Wesley indignantly denounced that blasphemous mockery called "lying in state." But the Salvation Army puts "business" before everything else. Mrs. Booth's dead body was exhibited to the crowd, so was William Booth's when his turn came, and the late Commissioner Railton's corpse laid in state for two days at the Regent Hall, Oxford-street, London.

A confused witness in a King's Bench case, before taking the oath, carefully examined the Testament, explaining that he was "looking for Joshua." Most professing Christians do not know one part of the Bible from the other; but they are so certain of their faith.

To enliven the big gooseberry season, the pious Daily News has published correspondence on "Ladies Who Smoke," and not a few of the writers were horrified at the very idea. A few years ago the pious world was charmed to think that men and women smoked—in the "next world."

The Southend Justices recently sentenced a man to fourteen days' imprisonment for sleeping out of doors. It would be interesting to hear the unfortunate prisoner's views concerning the blessings of poverty.

Jesus Christ and his Apostles were in the habit of sleeping out of doors. Fortunately, they lived a long time ago and in another country. If they lived now they would have to avoid Southend.

Father Hopkins, the sailor's chaplain, giving evidence in a recent law case, stated that he was "a sky pilot," and "had given his services for twenty-five years without stipend." Was this because his ship never started?

In the course of a discussion on emigration at a recent meeting of the Rochford (Essex) Board of Guardians, it was stated that children in Canada had to sleep in stables, and had been frost-bitten. A Mr. Leonard, one of the Guardians, retorted that "Jesus Christ slept in a stable." It is more certain that many of his followers behave as if they were brought up in such places.

Last week's Church Times had a long article on "Open Air Apologetic" in which both Christian and Freethought meetings were dealt with as impartially as could very well be expected. "What is wanted," the writer says, "is an organised band of hecklers to worry the rationalist speaker." We have no objection to that. At present organised hecklers are simply organised interrupters. Certainly the change would be very much for the better. Nor should we object to the hecklers doing all they can to "turn the laugh against" the Freethought lecturers. They will probably find it a difficult thing to do, but in attempting it they must allow the Freethought hecklers to turn the laugh against the Christian lecturers—which is comparatively easy.

Mr. John Francis, Mayor of Southend-on-Sea, speaking at the stone-laying of a new Baptist Church, said "The success of religion meant that the police force would have less to do." As the police are overworked all over England, we conclude that religion is a failure.

That up-to-date prophet, Old Moore, writing last year, declared that the weather this July would be "uncertain, causing some disappointment." This is not too precise, but it is to be wished that Biblical prophecies were half as accurate.

The Rev. Dr. Campbell Morgan declares, ex cathedra, that "the Bible must be retained in the schools of the nation." Why? Because he knows that if the Bible is taken out Christianity will die. He is quite right, and we do not blame him for his zealous opposition to secular education. All we wish to point out at present is that his and his brethren's attitude on this subject clearly shows that, even in their own estimation, religion's hold upon the human mind is purely accidental. What a humiliating confession on the part of those whose boast is, when they are not discussing religious education, that man is "incurably religious." Religious apologists are perpetually contradicting themselves, and they have been doing it for so many ages that they no longer blush for it.

The ban on Biblical subjects is to be removed from the theatre; but apparently it has already been lifted from the music-hall stage. Miss Marie Lloyd, one of the most popular of comediennes, has a song, "Mother Eve," which she sings in a dress symbolical of leaves. It contains the pious couplet:—

> "When once I ate an apple the whole universe was stirred,
> Now girls eat bananas and no one says a word."

The Daily News recently printed a paragraph relating to a woman attending school at the age of seventy. It is not a record, for Methuselah and other patriarchs must have attended school far beyond that trivial term.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £160 11s. 11d. Received since:—Frederic W. Walsh, 2s.

C. F. BUNDE.—You take the trouble to write us a long letter to persuade us of the uselessness of troubling about anything. Perhaps you'll see the joke of it all when it is pointed out. Seriously, you have fallen into the fallacy of supposing that it is of no use striving at all because man and his dwelling-place will never be perfect. We are neither Pessimist nor Optimist, but (adopting George Eliot's nomenclature) a Meliorist.

"A."—It doesn't seem to call for any special notice. "Liberal Christianity" is a shockingly hybrid expression.

J. MCCLELLAN.—It certainly is the poorest alleged Freethought production we have ever seen.

GOCHURCH.—The Welsh revival was not alone in being followed by a reaction which set religion farther back than ever. It is rarely if ever noticed, but it is an obvious fact that John Wesley's revival in England was followed by the great fight over Thomas Paine's Age of Reason. It was all the worse for religion in the end.

J. WRAIGHT.—You knew, of course, that matter posted on July 24 was four days too late for that week's Freethinker. It appears this week.

E. PARKER.—We note your correction—that in last week's Obituary Miss Mary Ann Warner should have been Mrs., and her age 76. The other point is hardly worth raising now.

J. F. AVAR.—A printer's blunder. It should have been Luke xix. 27.

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

J. L. B. (Johannesburg).—See "Acid Drops." Thanks.

E. B.—Your weekly cuttings are always welcome.

W. J. RAMSEY.—Thanks for the newspaper extracts, but we have got the book and shall notice it at some length.

"SUB ROSA," with no date, address, or name, writes us a letter on our criticism of the "Sub Rosa's" use of the word antiquarian some weeks ago. We do not happen to know Mr. Spencer Hughes's hand-writing, and are therefore unable to tell whether this letter comes from him or not. We could not deal with it this week in any case. Perhaps we may hear as to its authorship in time for our next issue.

MRS. FLEMING.—Accept our best thanks for your trouble in the matter. Lord Rosebery's lament over the decay of good manners seems only too true in many directions.

A. B. MOSS.—We hope you will have a good time at Clacton, and shall be glad to see you on your return.

F. COLLINS.—You forget that our advice was requested.

E. PACK.—Pleased to hear the meetings and the sale of literature continue good at Leeds.

ANONYMOUS CORRESPONDENTS are once more warned that their letters cannot be dealt with. We act upon the common rule of journalistic etiquette in this matter.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

At a very large meeting held on Edmonton Green on Thursday, July 24, protesting against the recent attempt to suppress free speech, the following resolution, supported by the several Secularist and Socialist speakers—Mr. J. Hecht, Mr. W. Davidson, Mr. F. Charters, Mr. C. Dilthey, and Mr. J. Summers—was carried without dissent: "That this meeting of Edmonton citizens expresses its disgust at the cowardly and unfair tactics displayed by certain religious elements in attempting to destroy the right of free speech, and pledges itself to maintain that right at all costs."

We are glad to hear that Miss Pankhurst had a most orderly meeting at Edmonton on Sunday.

There were lively times at Parliament Hill Fields last Sunday. Miss Vance has written an equally lively account of them, which we regret we must hold over till next week, the copy reaching us too late for inclusion in this week's Freethinker, the make-up having already been settled.

We are glad to see that one Leeds paper, at least, sympathises with the local N. S. S. Branch in its fight with the police for its common rights of citizenship in the holding of public meetings. We take the following paragraph from the Editor's "Review of Current Events" in the Leeds and District Weekly Citizen (July 25):—

> "The Leeds branch of the National Secularist Society is making a fight for the same freedom given to other societies in the public parks of the city. The present position is that anyone can speak in the parks, but if it is desired to give or sell literature, or to take a collection, special permission must be obtained. The Secularists have applied for this permission, and have been refused. Last Sunday they sold literature and took a collection on Woodhouse Moor, in spite of the by-laws. In this fight for liberty we are entirely with them, and fail to see any consistency in the position of the Parks Committee."

Another paragraph reproduces the resolution which was "carried unanimously" at the Woodhouse Moor demonstration.

There was a slight confusion of names in our report of the Woodhouse Moor demonstration last week. The point is not one of great importance, but we may as well be correct. It was Mr. Pack who took up the collection and Mr. Jackson who sold the literature, and the veteran Mr. Sollett's name should have been in the list of speakers.

The Leeds police are apparently not going to take up the local N. S. S. Branch's challenge re the "permits" for Woodhouse Moor. Up to our going to press no summonses have been issued on account of the Demonstration on July 20. They have prosecuted three lads, instead, for larking on the Moor and using obscene language.

We are delighted to see that the High Court at Edinburgh has dismissed the appeal of the Edinburgh magistrates against the decision of the lower court. It will be remembered that the magistrates took it upon themselves to issue a proclamation forbidding public meetings at the Mound. Mr. John M'Ara refused to obey this proclamation. Litigation followed, and the Court held that the magistrates had no right to make laws on their own account. They appealed against this judgment, but the higher court has confirmed it. The victory remains with free speech, and Mr. M'Ara and his supporters are to be congratulated.

Mr. Frederic W. Walsh, our much-tried brave friend at Leamington, insists on sending his mite to the President's Honorarium Fund. "It is very little," he says, "but after all every little helps, and if all enthusiasts for 'the best of causes' gave what they could, the Fund would not drag on through a whole year." If this won't stir up the laggards, nothing will; so we say no more at present.

Mr. Walsh sends us an interesting page or two about the late W. Hale White, with whom he was brought into contact by correspondence.

Mr. Walsh has since called our attention to Miss Durham's "ghastly record of atrocities" in the Nation. "You are one of the very few," he adds, "who foresaw all this." Referring to our prophecy of how the Christian warriors would act if they had the opportunity.

Mr. Cohen is holidaying. He will be back about the middle of August. We hope he will find the change beneficial. The work of a Freethought lecturer and journalist is more trying than most people imagine.

Abbot Gasquet, addressing the Catholic Congress at Plymouth, said that—"The Bible of the northern working classes was a certain blasphemous, yet well-written, weekly Rationalist newspaper."

Sir Robert Anderson, formerly head of the Criminal Investigation Department, in an interview published recently in the Daily News and Leader said, "The Humanitarian League had more influence than all his Majesty's judges." This is a well-deserved compliment to an institution which, under the guidance of Mr. H. S. Salt, has done so much to awaken the national conscience.

The Gospel History a Fabrication.

The Fourth Gospel.

THE three Synoptists, as we have seen, were editors who re-wrote and revised a long series of narratives which they found in a more primitive Gospel. The writer of the Fourth Gospel, however, was a born fabricator who could not copy a reputed historic event from an ancient document without so altering the details as to make a practically new story—and with an utter disregard for truth. Not content with taking some of the primitive narratives and transforming them almost beyond recognition, he boldly fabricated some new ones himself; to which, at the same time, he added a number of new sayings and long discourses, which he piously placed in the mouth of his Savior. Next, he altered the plan of the public ministry of Jesus, and placed it in Judæa instead of in Galilee, as recorded in the three Synoptics. Finally, though he took his account of the trial and crucifixion of Jesus from the same primitive records as the Synoptists, he could not refrain from altering and making additions to those alleged events also. He has placed the trial a day earlier than the Synoptists—on the day for eating the passover in the evening—so that the accusers of Jesus could not go into the Pretorium where the trial was held, lest "they might be defiled," and Pilate is represented as repeatedly going out of the court to speak to them outside—a thing which no Roman procurator would have done. The writer has further introduced new incidents at the Crucifixion, and has fabricated new appearances of Jesus to his disciples after the alleged resurrection. Space will not allow me to go fully into all these matters here; I shall therefore content myself with giving some brief examples.

The Call of Peter and Andrew.

The call of these two brothers, as revised by the first two evangelists from the primitive source (Matt. iv. 18—20; Mark i. 16—18) is thus recorded by Matthew:—

> "And walking by the sea of Galilee, he saw two brethren, Simon who is called Peter, and Andrew his brother, casting a net into the sea; for they were fishers. And he said unto them, Come ye after me, and I will make you fishers of men. And they straightway left the nets, and followed him."

Mark relates the incident in nearly the same words. We now turn to the Fourth Gospel, and find the event completely transformed. According to this writer, Jesus came to the Jordan the day after he had been baptised. The writer says (John i. 35—42):—

> "Again on the morrow John was standing, and two of his disciples; and he looked upon Jesus as he walked, and saith, Behold the lamb of God! And the two disciples heard him speak, and they followed Jesus. And Jesus turned, and beheld them following, and saith unto them, What seek ye?.....One of the two that heard John speak, and followed him, was Andrew, Simon Peter's brother. He findeth first his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, We have found the Messiah. He brought him unto Jesus. Jesus looked upon him, and said, Thou art Simon the son of Joanes: thou shalt be called Peter. On the morrow he was minded to go forth into Galilee."

The writer of this account knew that in the primitive document Jesus did not go into Galilee and commence preaching until after John the Baptist had been cast into prison (Matt. iv. 12; Mark i. 14), and that the call of Peter and Andrew did not take place until after that; also, that the two brothers were strangers to Jesus when called to be apostles. These facts he knew quite well; but he could not resist the temptation of trying to make a better story of it, as in the case of casting lots for the garments at the Crucifixion (John xix. 23—24). We find, further, that this fraudulent writer has put his own words and ideas in the mouth of the Baptist. This will be seen by comparing the following paragraphs: Mark i. 4—11; Matt. iii. 1—17; Luke iii. 7—17, 21, 22; John i. 6—7, 15—51; iii. 28—36. Here Matthew and Luke have evidently made additions to the primitive account; but these are small in comparison with those made by the accomplished fabricator of the Fourth Gospel.

The Pool of Bethesda.

In John v. 2—9 we find the following extraordinary narrative, piously fabricated by the writer himself in order "that ye may believe that Jesus is the Anointed One, the Son of God" (xx. 31):—

> "Now there is in Jerusalem by the Sheep market a pool, which is called in the Hebrew Bethesda, having five porches. In these lay a multitude of them that were sick, blind, halt, withered [waiting for the moving of the water: for an angel of the Lord went down at certain seasons into the pool, and troubled the water: whosoever then first after the troubling of the water stepped in, was made whole, with whatsoever disease he was holden]. And a certain man was there, which had been thirty and eight years in his infirmity. When Jesus saw him lying, and knew that he had been now a long time in that case, he said unto him, Wouldest thou be made whole? The infirm man answered him, Sir, I have no man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool: but while I am coming, another steppeth down before me."

There is no need to read further; Jesus, of course, healed the infirm man. But the method employed by the writer's God to show his love and compassion for his afflicted people was, to say the least, godlike. That deity possessed the power, if he thought fit to exercise it, to heal all the sick people around the pool; but, in his loving-kindness, he chose to heal but one. Moreover, the writer's Savior, like the writer's God, never gave a thought to the healing of more than one person, but went away leaving all "the sick, blind, halt, and withered" unhealed.

Now, that the foregoing story is a fiction is beyond the shadow of a doubt. In the first place, the account was not in the primitive Gospel from which the other three evangelists drew the main portion of their narratives. In the next place, no such pool at which an angel agitated the water for the cure of sickness or disease is mentioned by any writer known to history. Josephus, in his description of Jerusalem, states that there were places within that city called "Bethso" and "Bezetha," and mentions "the fountain of Siloam" and "Solomon's pool"; but he knew nothing of a periodical intervention of heaven for the cure of disease at a pool in Jerusalem. It is probable that Bezetha was the locality which the Fourth Gospel writer selected for his imaginary pool. Writing, as he did, many years after the destruction of Jerusalem, he had no fear of his fraud being detected.

The Christian Church would be glad to get rid of this miracle; but not being able to do so, they have in the Revised Version omitted from the text the words I have placed within brackets, and relegated them to the margin, though they admit in doing so that "Many ancient authorities insert wholly or in part" the words they have erased. The reason for this action was to get rid of the statement that "at certain seasons" an angel agitated the water of the pool—which they all knew to be a fabrication. But these apologetic efforts to conceal the fraud are vain; for the words I have italicised in the reply of the infirm man prove that the words within brackets were originally an essential part of the narrative, which is not only founded upon them, but cannot be understood without them.

The Raising of Lazarus.

In the same questionable Gospel, chapter xi., we have the story of Jesus restoring to life a man named Lazarus, who was not only dead, but his body "had been in the tomb four days," and putrefaction had commenced. This miracle Jesus is stated to have performed by "crying with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth"; whereupon the putrescent corpse came out of the tomb restored to life and perfect health. The only evidence we possess for such an astounding miracle is that it was written by the man who fabricated the story of the Pool of Bethesda. No one ever witnessed it, and the three Synoptists never heard of it.

Digitized by Google

The same pious fabricator excogitated the little story of Turning water into wine (John ii. 1—11), a miracle which no one ever beheld, and of which the Synoptists had also never heard.

NEW INCIDENTS AT THE CRUCIFIXION.

In his account of the Crucifixion, the same fraudulent writer says that "there were standing by the cross of Jesus" his mother and other women, besides the disciple John; that Jesus, looking down upon them, said to his mother, "Woman, behold thy son," and to John, "Behold thy mother"; and that "from that hour the disciple took her to his own home" (John xix. 25—27).

This mendacious writer next represents the Jews as asking Pilate to have the legs of the three persons who were crucified broken (xix. 31), in order to have a pretext for making one of the soldiers pierce the dead body of Jesus with a spear, and by so doing, fulfil two Old Testament "prophecies"—"A bone of him shall not be broken," and "They shall look on him whom they pierced"—after which he has the hardihood to say: "And he that hath seen hath borne witness, and his witness is true: and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye also may believe" (xix. 35). This last statement is implied to have been made by the apostle John, in whose name the Gospel was written.

A NEW PUBLIC MINISTRY OF JESUS.

According to the Synoptics, Jesus came to Galilee and commenced preaching after the Baptist had been cast into prison (Matt. iv. 12; Mark i. 14; Luke iv. 14), and remained in the northern province teaching and working miracles until within a fortnight of his crucifixion. He was arrested six or seven days after entering Jerusalem. The writer of the Fourth Gospel has, however, represented Jesus as spending nearly all his time in Jerusalem or Judæa, with only three flying visits to Galilee, the latter recorded in John ii. 1—12, iv. 43—45, vi. i.—vii. 9. The first of these visits was to "Cana of Galilee" where the water was turned into wine, which visit was made before John was cast into prison; that is to say before Jesus had commenced preaching in Galilee, and before he had chosen any of his disciples. Yet this writer represents Jesus as having all his disciples with him, and says that they "believed on him" after witnessing the miracle. The events in these three visits are equivalent to the following paragraphs in the Synoptics: Matt. xiv. 13—34; Mark vi. 30—53; Luke ix. 10—17—that is to say, less than one chapter in each—which scarcely affects the public ministry at all. Hence, while Jesus is preaching in the cities and villages of Galilee, according to the Synoptics, another Jesus is represented as declaiming and wrangling in Jerusalem or Judæa, in the so-called "Gospel of John." Two such conflicting ministries cannot both be historical: one account or the other must be a fabrication.

Christian apologists endeavor to reconcile the two by saying that "the apostle John" had read the other Gospels, and wrote his own to supply circumstances which they had omitted. This is simply apologetic nonsense; for not one of the canonical Gospels was written in apostolic times, and not one of them by an apostle. The forger of the Fourth Gospel lived in the second century, in the days referred to by Luke in his Preface (i. 1—4), when "many" Christian scholars were making revised copies of the primitive Gospel, and when the new Gospels, after they were made, circulated singly in different districts. Later on, when the four canonical Gospels had become known, fresh forgeries would be impossible. But the unprincipled Christian who wrote the Fourth Gospel—probably, John the Presbyter, a friend of Papias—succeeded in getting his forgery received as the evangel of the apostle John.

I have no space for noticing the sayings and discourses of the Fourth Gospel. It must suffice to say that they were all composed by the writer himself, and placed by him in the mouth of Jesus. This fact is beyond all doubt, but it would take too long to deal with the matter in this series of papers.

ABRACADABRA.

Mr. Salt's "Shelley."

Percy Bysshe Shelley—Poet and Pioneer. By Henry S. Salt. Revised Edition. Watts & Co.

I AM indebted to Mr. Salt for a presentation copy of this excellent little book. I have not gone through it carefully with the former edition, but there does not appear to be much alteration in the text. That does not, however, affect the justification of this reissue, for the former edition had, I believe, been long out of print; and the book is certainly not one that should remain inaccessible to the new generation of readers that is always coming along.

The really novel feature of this revised edition is the frontispiece, in the shape of a portrait of Shelley, reproduced from a painting by William Edward West, a young American artist, who was living at Florence in 1822, and met Shelley at Byron's villa near Leghorn. He had no commission for the portrait, but he was so struck by Shelley's personality that he "made a surreptitious sketch of him which he afterwards completed and took back to America." It was preserved, after West's death, by his relatives, and is now in the possession of Mrs. John Dunn. The oil painting is eight by nine inches in size, and is very beautiful. "The soft, light-brown hair," Mrs. Dunn says, "the blue eyes, the youthful texture of the flesh, the freshness of the coloring, the strength and beauty of the soul within, charm the eye and fill the imagination." Of course the reproduction in Mr. Salt's new volume is in black and white, and we miss the "coloring" that the lady praises.

"It seems to me," Mr. Salt says, "that we get a better understanding from this portrait of Shelley's human qualities than from the more familiar pictures." I cannot say it makes quite the same impression on me. It certainly corrects the "inspired lunatic" portrait which adorns so many editions of Shelley's poems; but, on the other hand, it rather suggests an extremely refined doctor than the most ethereal of English poets. The head seems to outweigh the face. Now the head of Shelley was not large, though beautifully shaped. The nose, likewise, in West's portrait, looks too thin, and the nostrils look too close, for those of the "poet of poets." The eyes are better, and there is in them something of the sadness—an intellectual and moral sadness—of the rich and noble nature that bruised and broke itself against the hard world, and at last found its merciful Nirvana, in less than thirty years.

We ought to thank Mr. Salt, however—we lovers of Shelley—for giving us the opportunity of seeing this fine picture. It possesses a haunting quality, there must be something of Shelley in it, and it should help our realisation of him "in his habit as he lived."

I have called Mr. Salt's book excellent. Beyond all question it is the best succinct biography of Shelley ever written. There is the warmest eulogy; there is also the criticism of an independent thinker, in whom worship does not extinguish sagacity. I recommend this volume, above all others, as an introduction to Shelley. Here and there I should hesitate to endorse Mr. Salt's view without qualification; but I am confident that, in the main, his conception of Shelley as man, poet, and reformer is perfectly sound. Neither is there any slipshod or feeble writing in this volume. Mr. Salt maintains a high level of vital efficiency from beginning to end.

It should be added that if he is not always fair he always tries to be. He recognises that it takes a lot of people to make up a world. There has been too much mere partisanship in Shelley criticism and biography. Shelley was not always right, and those he came into conflict with were not always wrong. His side of the case may have been very strong, but there was something to be said for theirs. I repeat that Mr. Salt is fair. And he is never bitter. He sees, with a great French thinker, that to know all is to forgive all. Take, for instance, his treatment of the quarrel between Shelley and his father, and indeed with the whole family. Mr. Salt's remarks are eminently sane:—

> "No verdict of 'bad son' or 'bad father' is to be given in such a case; the pathos of the position—a typical position—lies far deeper than that. Estrangement, whether veiled or recognised, must inevitably result between those who, albeit blood-relations—are by temperament strangers from the first; and it is worse than useless to allot praise or blame when there is no single feeling in common. On the one side is the Family, with its constant demand that each and all of its members shall think and live in subjection to the domestic ideal; on the other side is the young and ardent spirit, possessed of larger aspirations and wider aims, which realises that the true piety of life consists neither in gratifying nor in mortifying self, but in faithfully following the highest line of self-development."

The same sanity marks Mr. Salt's attitude towards the Harriet question. Shelley was young, but he did blunder. For my part, I agree with Matthew Arnold as to the quality of Shelley's letter to Harriet, after the separation, inviting her to accompany him and Mary on a tour of Europe. Shelley meant well, from his own point of view the invitation was an act of benevolence; but he ought to have learnt enough of human nature by that time to be aware that nothing could be better calculated to fill her with disgust and agony. It is literally true that Shelley was too good for this world. Experience brought him knowledge without taint, and the knowledge enlightened his sympathies. It is from his own point of view alone that a sufferer can be soothed and comforted. Shelley knew all that when he wrote the Cenci. He is not to be blamed severely for not knowing it at the age of twenty. Some virtues cannot belong to youth; they depend upon experience. A very young man is as much qualified as an old one to pronounce upon the truth or falsity of the Christian religion. But his opinion (say) on the institution of marriage (other things being equal) is sure to be of far less value and importance. In practical matters a power of weighing the facts is necessary, and that power only comes through vital experience. According to the proverb a bachelor's children are always well brought up. Which means, of course, that nothing but the experience of fatherhood enables a man to understand the real nature of the family problem.

Here is Mr. Salt's charitable account of Harriet:—

> "Harriet was a schoolgirl of sixteen, pretty and pleasing in appearance and manners, but utterly destitute of any real strength of character, the mere reflex of the surroundings in which her lot was cast; at first a Methodist in religious creed, and looking forward to some day marrying a minister, though at the same time confessing in her own mind that the military were the most fascinating of men—afterwards an easy convert to Shelley's revolutionary arguments. It is true that she was far from being actually illiterate; but her interest in literature was a mere passing illusion, derived at second-hand from opinions which she chanced to hear expressed. Neither in religion nor in culture had she any fixed principles or convictions which might prove a guidance and support. And though at this early age she was bright, winning, and compliant, there was a fibre of obstinacy and worldliness in her nature which was destined to make itself felt as the years went on."

And here is Mr. Salt's judgment on Shelley:—

> "'Foolish but generous' has been the usual verdict of Shelley's biographers regarding the marriage with Harriet, the unhappy consequences of which were apparent to the last day of his life. Let it be frankly recognised that the folly was greatly in excess of the generosity, and that we miss in this disastrous action the clear-sighted and faithful adhesion to rational principles which was conspicuous in the other great turning-points of his life. Had it not been for the restless, excited condition of his mind at this time, he would have seen, as he saw afterwards, that it could be no duty of his to devote himself to a girl whom he did not love, and of whose fitness to be his permanent companion he had by no means satisfied himself. From such a blunder there could only ensue a life-long crop of calamities, which, though insufficient to warp the main purpose of his strong and indomitable will, would yet have the power to cause him and others much acute suffering."

Mistakes are vices only when they are repeated and prolonged. There was not an atom of vice in Shelley's composition. He blundered — and he suffered—and others suffered. For nature makes no difference between mistakes and crimes. Whatever the motive, we have to face the consequences of our actions. We are moral beings. She is non-moral.

(To be concluded.) G. W. FOOTE.

One World at a Time.

MANY Christians are brought up to regard all those who reject their faith as wretches who have thereby put themselves outside the pale of all that is good, and discarded the very foundations of morality. When, however, they mix in the world; when they study its history; when they read its best literature; they discover what a petty item even the widespread Christian faith appears. They find that noble lives have been lived where it was never heard of, and that even in Christian nations some of the brightest minds reject the Christian faith. If they come into intimate contact with unbelievers, they discover they are no whit worse than their neighbors; nay, that they are among the most earnest in seeking to improve the common lot. And this is after all only what is reasonably to be expected. Morality is not dependent on the will of an arbitrary being with "right divine to govern wrong," but has its natural foundations. It is based on the relations of man in society. It implies recognition of reciprocal rights and duties. These relations remain, whatever views may be held concerning our origin and end.

The Freethinker, as much as the Christian, recognises the value of love, sympathy, and mutual helpfulness. The elements which have given vitality to the old faiths have been all human, and in discarding supernatural dogmas we by no means throw away anything that gives life its dignity and value. Take God away, the universe remains. Cease to regard Christ as divine, you still have the heroes of entire humanity. Have no special reverence for the Virgin Mother, and there is still womanhood to evoke love, tenderness, poetry, and chivalry.

The Freethinker can, and does, accept all of worth in the Bible, as in any other book. But he also knows that it contains much that is barbarous and false. Viewing its books as human products of the past, they have a new significance and value from the light they throw on past history, anthropology, and human evolution. But he knows the world has outgrown the polygamy, slavery, witchcraft, intolerance, persecution, and superstition sanctioned by the Bible, and he refuses to treat as divine that which but represents a lower phase of humanity, and objects to such a dogma being thrust on the plastic minds of innocent children.

History proclaims that those who have most concerned themselves with celestial business—priests, monks, and inquisitors — have been scourges of humanity. The ages of faith were ages of darkness. The Church has had its chance. It set itself in opposition to the happiness and welfare of this world, which it held to be doomed to speedy destruction. Its theory of endless futurity elsewhere necessarily dwarfed all mundane duties. Yet, does anyone now suppose the eternal salvation of any being was assured by the ascetic, ignorant faith and misrule which prevailed for a thousand years in Europe when the Church was supreme? No; the world is becoming secularised, and the Church with it.

It is learning that it is better to make a clock than to go in search of perpetual motion; better to dig up coal than seek to transmute iron into gold. The poorest hut gives better shelter than the finest castle in the air. So the Freethinker loses not, but gains by giving up some cherished illusion to concentrate his effort on the actual and the real. By resigning the vain hopes of alchemy, valuable effort was saved, and true science advanced. A like gain is made when human intelligence ceases to concern itself with a miraculous hereafter, but turns its attention to realising a better life here and now. Concentration on the attainable is the secret of success. The present age is literally full of important secular problems pressing for solution. Its progress is only hindered by what George Eliot called "that impiety towards the present and the visible which flies for its motives, its sanctions, and its religion to the remote, the vague, and the unknown."

This world is our home. Who is likely to make the best of it—those who regard it as such, or those who sing, "I'm but a stranger here, Heaven is my home; Earth is a desert drear, Heaven is my home"? Here at any rate for a while we may live. Let us make the best of it. We cannot sow and neither can we reap in the skies. This earth may be a desert drear to many of us, but it is at least improvable. If we cultivate our garden we may reasonably expect a few blossoms. The worst scourges of mankind—poverty, crime, war, slavery, oppression, and much of disease—are removable evils. Here is something definite. There is no limit to may be's. We may have pre-existed; we may be in purgatory now. This at least is certain, if we waste our thoughts on unverifiable speculations and our energies in seeking to serve a being who can have no need of our services, we shall be in danger of missing the plain duties nearer hand. One at a time is good fishing, and one world at a time is a very good motto to ensure right living.

(The late) J. M. WHEELER

Letter by Mr. Foote to the Leeds N.S.S. Branch

Re the Proposed Demonstration Against the Arbitrary Action of the Police and the Town Council.

[One unimportant paragraph of this letter is omitted. The rest is printed in order to show the principles on which Mr. Foote is prepared to assist in protecting the rights of Freethought.]

Ramsgate, July 17, 1913.

DEAR MR. PACK,—

I quite understand that you have an unchallenged right of meeting on Woodhouse Moor. What the Council refuses you is a permit to take up collections and sell literature.

According to the "Extract from Bye-Laws" you send me, the Council has clearly a right to grant or refuse such permits. But it is also clearly its duty not to do so arbitrarily or out of mere whim or prejudice; its action must be governed by a principle which is capable of being stated, and which is to be applied to all citizens with absolute impartiality. To deny citizens justice, and refuse them the rights guaranteed to all other citizens, except on obvious grounds of statute or common law, is to leave them to such redress as they can obtain by themselves, whatsoever that redress may be. And the original wrongdoers are responsible for any disorder that ensues.

If the Town Council refuses you the permit which it grants to all other applicants, it must justify the difference of treatment. It is not enough to say "we refuse your application because we choose to, and that is an end of the matter." Public bodies must give public reasons for their actions. And the reasons must be just and wise reasons that would satisfy sensible men. This has been pressed upon the licensing magistrates again and again by the Judges of the Supreme Court. I do not say that you (or anyone else) will always get your legal rights, but you are entitled to them, and it is bad citizenship to let yourselves be robbed of them. You are morally bound to resist the exceptional treatment to which the Council seeks to subject you and to resent the insult which it involves. And in that direction you shall have my fullest support as President of the National Secular Society and Editor of the Freethinker.

You have two courses open at the moment. You can hold your Demonstration and collect money and sell literature in defiance of the police; not out of mere defiance (you should explain that) but in order that the matter may be brought before a Court of Law, to which citizens must appeal, and to which alone they can appeal for the protection of their rights against arbitrary power.

If, however, there is any reasonable hope that a fresh application for the permit would meet with a better fate, I think you should make it. Citizens should not flaunt the public authorities unnecessarily, and if there has been a misunderstanding you should give them (if they will accept it) an opportunity of remedying any mistake.

If you decide to go on with the Demonstration, I advise you to be very careful in what you do. Mr. Atkinson is a wise and just magistrate, but he is not omnipotent. He may inflict fines and tell you that you have taken the wrong method of redress. It would be well, then, to have as few as possible actively engaged in challenging the police; say one to collect and one to sell literature. The Chairman and speakers are also responsible, but the Chairman would probably be the one proceeded against as obviously responsible.

Mr. Atkinson's dismissal of the case might end the prosecution. But he may not dismiss it. He may find the police a loophole by saying, as Mr. Taylor told us in London, that the proper method of procedure was by mandamus. In that case you should plead for the very lightest fines as your action was not fractious but a serious attempt to ascertain and defend your rights.

I think you ought to have a competent Solicitor—one generally respected, if possible, and not a fanatic in any way whatever. Towards the expenses of this policy I will engage to contribute a substantial support.

If you remember, it was our threat of a mandamus and my prompt action in the Freethinker that made the London County Council pause. I believe the battle will ultimately have to be fought on those lines.

Be firm and dignified. Don't let the fool friends of our movement spoil your good case. Good manners and decent speech do not cause any harm. It is possible to be very effective without ill-breeding. Severe things can be said without vulgarity. The language of the smokeroom is out of place at a public meeting. Let us think of our cause, as a good man thinks of his wife or his sweetheart. We are things of an hour; it is "the best of causes," as Meredith called it, that is immortal. I don't want to preach, but I do want us all to be as sensible and self-controlled as we can in these emergencies.—Yours faithfully,

G. W. FOOTE.

Obituary.

It is with deep regret that we report the death of Mrs Smart, the wife of Mr. T. Smart, of 20 Pelling-street, Limehouse, which occurred in the forty-sixth year of her age. Though brought up in an orthodox Christian home, Mrs. Smart became, soon after her marriage twenty-five years ago, a firmly convinced Freethinker; and her subsequent life was given to the practical exemplification of the glorious principles of Secularism. Her noblemind dness, her love of truth, her loyalty to convictions, and her diligent discharge of all her wifely and motherly duties, endeared her to all who knew her. The funeral took place on Thursday, July 24, at the Woodgrange Park Cemetery, when a secular service was conducted at the graveside. Mr. Smart is a life-long Freethinker, and was a member of the old East London Branch of the N.S.S. To him and his three sorrowing children, we tender our sincere condolence. J. T. L.

I regret to record the death of Augustus Williams, who passed away at the age of 67, and was buried at Bow Cemetery on July 25. He was for many years an active Secularist, a frequent attendant at the Hall of Science, a member of the Central London Branch of the N.S.S., and, in later years, of the Bradlaugh Fellowship. He was one of the rank and file of the movement, and was always ready to champion the cause and its leaders when attacked. It was his expressed wish that there should be no religious ceremony at his funeral. A brief and simple address was given by George Standring in the presence of a large number of sorrowing relatives and friends.—H. REEVE.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

A Floundering Apologist.

As a matter of fact, it is utterly impossible for a Christian apologist to do anything but flounder, and he generally does so, as the great preacher, Robert Hall, said of the readers of the voluminous Puritan writer, Dr. John Owen, "in a continent of mud." There is in this statement, however extravagant it may sound, no intended reflection upon the ability or dexterity of the apologist, but, rather, a conviction of the fundamental weakness of the cause he sets out to defend. "Viator," a regular contributor of the Church Times, is an exceptionally clever, fair-minded, and interesting advocate of the faith "which was once for all delivered unto the saints." He is free from the spirit of bitterness and bigotry, and he never intentionally misrepresents the views and arguments of opponents. If his own arguments are not always relevant and convincing it is certainly no fault of his, but wholly of the system he undertakes to champion. In the issue of the Church Times for July 11, he gives an account of a Christian Evidence lecture delivered, not by a theologian, but by a well-known electrician, whom he calls Braine, and particularly of the general discussion that followed it. Braine, he frankly acknowledges, is not in his element as a lecturer, but commits the fault of being at once diffuse and illiptical. He is confessedly not an adept at answering questions. A dark man asked for an explanation of the contradictions contained in the Four Gospels, specially in the narratives of the Resurrection, on the assumption that the men who wrote them were Divinely inspired. Braine said:—

> "I will answer, like a Scotchman, with another question. On the hypothesis that God dictated the Four Gospels to the men who wrote them—I do not for one moment believe that he did, but just on that hypothesis—doesn't it seem probable that he knew his own business better than you or I can know it?"

"'You are evading the question, sir,' said the dark man sternly; 'I asked why this was done.' 'Ah! that is a plain question,' replied Braine, 'and my plain answer is that I don't know.' The dark man sat down triumphantly." A soft-spoken man was of opinion that the lecturer really knew nothing at all about God, God being, according to the Athanasian Creed, incomprehensible. This was Braine's illuminating answer:—

> "To say that a thing is incomprehensible is exactly the same as saying that you can't put a quart into a pint pot; but the pint pot will hold half the quart, and you can drink it. A thimble won't hold the sea, but I can dip a thimbleful out of the sea, and taste it, and know that it is salt. I have told you that I know very little about God. I can only dip with my thimble in that vast ocean, but I do know my thimbleful, and it tells me something about the whole."

The soft-spoken man pronounced that "very pretty, quite poetic, in fact," but declined to accept it as a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. In point of fact it is not an explanation at all. For one thing it takes the existence of God for granted, just as if it were as self-evident as that of the sea. The sea is there in full, irrefutable evidence, and you can easily dip your thimbleful out of it and drink it; but God is not there as a self-evident, indubitable fact, but merely in imagination, or in exactly the same sense as the Olympian Gods were real to the pre-Socratic Greeks. The cases mentioned are, therefore, in no sense whatever analogous. It is true that you cannot put a quart into a pint pot; but the quart is there, and so is the pint pot, and you can put half the former into the latter; but God can be there only by being brought there imaginatively, and your little thimble is there in precisely the same manner.

Braine employed another false analogy, quite as misleading as that about the boundless ocean. He said:

> "'I am certainly incomprehensible to my dog, and to all dogs. Yet my dog knows me; he understands half-a-dozen words that I use; he knows when I am angry'—'because you lick him'—interrupted the rough fellow in front. Braine leaned forward and said, almost in a whisper, 'I think that is one of the ways in which we know God.' 'So we may consider ourselves whipped curs,' said the soft-voiced man, looking round the room; 'I am sure we are much obliged to the lecturer. It is one of the truly comforting doctrines of Christianity.' 'That is so,' said Braine; 'we Christians like to compare ourselves to the little dogs eating the crumbs that fall from our Master's table. We know that we have a good Master, who sometimes whips us, and we can't always see why. We understand some of his words; not many, but enough to get on with. And,' he concluded, 'we are very sorry for a lost dog.'"

Anyone who takes the trouble to think can see at a glance how absolutely fallacious that reasoning is. The dog sees his master and hears his voice, and in countless instances there naturally spring up between them the closest friendship, the deepest affection, and the clearest understanding; but no one has seen God at any time, or heard his voice. Throughout all the ages of time he has remained both invisible and silent. In no respect whatever, then, is the relationship between a dog and his master analogous to that supposed to exist between man and God. It is perfectly true, as "Viator" avers, that a man is not an Agnostic because he doubts whether God spoke with Moses face-to-face; but it is equally true that many a man is an Agnostic because of the total lack of any convincing evidence that God has ever spoken to anybody in any way whatsoever. Consequently, the conclusion to which we have been inevitably driven is, not that God is unknown or unknowable, but that there are no grounds in reason for believing that he exists at all. And, with all due deference to "Viator," we venture to declare that to give expression to this conclusion is not "to talk nonsense." We go further still, and maintain that when "Viator" assures us that if he knows enough about "the works of God" to be able to catch a train he is "not entirely ignorant of God," he is decidedly not talking sense. On what authority does he assume that the phenomena of Nature are "the works of God"? It is easy enough to assert that "we observe in Nature certain activities which point with overwhelming probability to an intelligent and personal agent," but we beg to remind "Viator" that there are hundreds and thousands of scientific thinkers who, to say the very least, know fully as much about the activities of Nature as he does, but are not able to discern the slightest trace or sign of "an intelligent and personal agent." He informs us that "from a man who is not either Theist or Pantheist he is separated by a chasm of thought." We are aware of it, but we have looked to him in vain for a single argument that even tends to invalidate the Atheistic position.

In an article in the Church Times for July 4, "Viator" commits himself to several extremely curious and, in our judgment, foolish statements. For example, he declares that God was never less evident to him than the world, or that the world was never evident to him "otherwise than as a revelation of God." If we interpret him aright he claims to know God and the world separately, and to have known the former before he knew the latter. When he first became aware of the world he recognised it as a revelation of God; but he omits to mention how and when he acquired his knowledge of the latter, though he is quite sure that it enabled him to hail the world as a visible reflection of his invisible being. This is a stupendous claim which cannot possibly be substantiated, and the more we examine it the more irrational it becomes. Fancy a man saying in cold blood that as soon as he reasoned with himself about the world, as soon as he was conscious of a sort of unity in the world, he "was conscious of God." By "the world" this writer presumably means the universe, and we ask him to tell us how his reasoning with himself about the universe made him conscious of God? The scientists have succeeded in demonstrating the fact that life and matter are alike controlled by purely physical and chemical forces. These forces are alone responsible for the production of matter as we know it, and for the innumerable changes that are continually taking place in the physical universe. Of this every student of astronomy and geology is inalterably convinced. The biologists, likewise, account for the origin and maintenance of life in the same mechanistic manner. Biological experimenters, like Dr. Loeb, are beginning to say openly that "we ourselves are only chemical mechanisms," and that all our activities are explicable without any reference to supernatural agency. Even psychology is classed with the natural sciences. "Viator" says that he has discovered "a sort of unity in the world"; but is he not aware that Atheistic scientists are always talking and writing about the unity of the universe without becoming "conscious of God"? As a matter of fact, we seriously question "Viator's" consciousness, as we would very probably deny the validity of his self-consciousness.

The universe teems with awful tragedies. Cosmic disasters are almost of daily occurrence. The order and beauty of Nature are ignorant, unfounded fancies. Even stars not infrequently collide and are destroyed as they rush through illimitable space. When we enter the kingdom of life the anomalies that we meet with are of the most shocking character. For millions upon millions of years the struggle for existence was a fearful and unbroken carnage. All through her history Nature has been "red in tooth and claw with ravine," shrieking with all her might against the Christian creed. And yet "Viator," face to face with the indescribable horrors and monstrosities of existence, and "conscious of a sort of unity in the world" whose hall-mark is cruelty, announces his consciousness of God; and being a Christian divine he doubtless has the hardihood to define the God of whom he is conscious as compassionate and redeeming love. Well, we are thankful that we can honestly say that from a man who fondly imagines that he has such a consciousness we are "separated by a chasm of thought." The more we study Nature the more impossible it becomes to believe in God; and the more familiar we get with history the more convinced we are that the hope of the world is centred in man. It is beyond controversy that we are indebted for all improvement, for all real progress that has ever taken place, to the intelligence and consequent goodness of men and women.

Are we not justified, therefore, in describing the theological apologist, in the words of Robert Hall, as "a double Dutchman floundering in a continent of mud"?

J. T. LLOYD.

Science and God.

I HAVE been spending an hour or two in the company of a dead man. This does not mean that I have been calling up spirits at a spiritualistic séance or experiencing visions of a more or less weird description. But the man is dead in the deadest sense of the term. Once upon a time he was very much alive. His apologetic on behalf of Christianity was hailed as a valuable contribution to the armory of faith; he had shown a way in which science and religion might be harmonised; more, he had shown how scientific religion was, and that in the most important respects it had really forstalled science, proclaiming in the world of human life and emotion truths that science, with its slower and more cumbersome methods, had only established within recent times. The basis of science and the basis of religion were one. Properly understood, the laws of the spiritual and the laws of the natural world were one. They were merely working in different spheres of existence. For a time, the Rev. Professor Henry Drummond was a very live man in the world of religion. Orthodox men were afraid, but those who are called "advanced thinkers" in theology rejoiced. And in less than a generation the orthodox had lost cause for fear—from this quarter, at least. Professor Drummond was dead—before even he was buried. Natural Law in the Spiritual World was forgotten. Some new apology was discovered, and learning nothing from past experience, the Bourbons of the world of thought were worshiping at the shrine of a new idol doomed to the same fate that had overtaken its predecessors.

Away from home, and with my weekly article—thanks to a habit of never writing to-day what can be put off till to-morrow—unwritten, I find among the books thoughtfully provided for holiday reading, a volume of the late Henry Drummond's on Evangelical Christianity. One of the essays in the book is entitled "The Contribution of Science to Christianity," and it has been annotated by someone who was evidently an ardent admirer of the author. The essay itself points out that there are two main contributions made by science to Christianity. One is the doctrine of evolution. The other, and the greatest, is a contribution of failure. Science, says the twice defunct Professor, "tells us candidly it has failed—and the failures of science are among its richest contributions to Christianity—it has failed to discover any clue to the ultimate mystery of origins, any view which can compete for a moment with the view of theology." We are invited to consider the impressive silence of science on the question of origins. Science took these questions from theology, "and proclaimed that it would try and answer them." It has now handed them back. "Science has not discovered a substitute for God." More:—

> "It has seen plainly that Atheism is unscientific. It is a remarkable thing that after trailing its black length for centuries across European thought, Atheism should have its doom pronounced by science. With its most penetrating gaze science has now looked at the back of the phenomena. It says: 'The Atheist tells us there is nothing there. We cannot tell what it is, but there is certainly something. Agnostics we may be, but we can no longer be Atheists.'"

Now, I should not dream of inflicting Henry Drummond upon my readers, even at holiday time, if these opinions were peculiarly the author's. But they are not. They are really the commonplaces of apologists of every school. And when theologians agree, it is usually upon something that is incurably stupid. Is there, for example, anyone but a theologian who would hail failure, a confession of ignorance, as the most valuable of contributions? "The ultimate mystery of origins" is as great with theology as it is with science. Neither knows more about it than the other. I question, indeed, if anyone could say clearly and intelligibly what it means. At any rate, failure, if temporary, is good cause only for fresh effort, and if irretrievable, cause only for regret. But the rejoicing of the religionist is that we are doomed to ignorance. No one can remove it. So he believes, and in effect he says, that so long as ignorance remains, so long there is territory over which religion may hope to rule. And so every Freethinker believes also. Hence the desire of the one to limit that territory as much as possible, and the instinct of the other to guard it as his dearest possession. To the one, knowledge is the symbol of power; to the other, it is the instrument of destruction.

Really, the "mystery of origins," in the religious sense, is not a scientific question or problem at all. It is the creation of religion, and a late creation at that. Early religion has no problem of origins. The facts of the religious life are there found in such phenomena as now admittedly belong to the scientific sphere. The gods are seen in the everyday activities and facts of life. It is when these gods are pushed farther and farther back, out of the world and over the edge of the beyond, when that organised knowledge which we call science holds the world in its grasp, and promises to explain things of which we are ignorant as it has already explained things we know, that religion falls back upon the "mystery of origins." Then the religious apologist bethinks himself, and says, "It is true that there is no safe place for God in the world that is known, or in the larger world that is to be known; but away beyond either the known or the knowable, in a region where knowledge can never penetrate, there God sits in absolute security. We feel he is safe because science can never get at him. We know he is there, because no one can tell us anything about it." Ignorance is the mother of Devotion, midwife to the gods, and stands in jealous guard over those whom she brought into being.

I do not know where science performed the remarkable feat of looking "at the back of phenomena." It seems quite a light and easy performance, as Professor Drummond describes it. But having got at the back, it really might have found out with some degree of certainty whether there was anything there or not. That is the worst of the theologian turned scientist. Either he gives science credit for performing greater things than it has accomplished, or he endows it with a degree of folly that properly belongs to his own department. Science has neither looked at the back of phenomena nor did it take in hand theological conundrums and "proclaimed that it would try to answer them." It found them engaging human attention, and examined them. And having examined them, it handed them back as futile and spurious. They were not genuine problems at all; they were manufactured mysteries that vanished into air just so soon as they were submitted to analysis. How many pseudo-scientific minds have been interested in the problem of what would happen if an irresistible force encountered an immovable object? This was a problem worthy of theology itself. And the correct reply is neither to formulate an answer nor hand it back as an unsolved mystery, but to point out that it is a meaningless jumble of terms, and has no reason for its existence. Ten minutes' careful analysis of most of these theological mysteries yield a precisely similar result. They are mysteries only because people do not trouble to find out whether they have any genuine claim to an existence. To pure science they simply do not exist. And if science has handed them back unanswered, it is as fairies and ghosts and the like have been handed back. They simply do not exist.

This is also the reason why "science has not found a substitute for God." It has not provided a substitute because it has nothing for God to do. A God who is in phenomena, or who regulates phenomena, is conceivably useful, and employment may be found for him. But a God who is merely at the back of everything, doing nothing and saying nothing, simply existing, is the most useless of all conceivable things. Early religionists were more intelligent than to believe in such a being. Their god, or gods, did something. He, or they, regulated the weather, the crops, disease, life and death. Civilised man alone is unintelligent enough to pay homage to a Deity whom, he insists on, does nothing—as though unemployment were as signal a proof of divinity as it is of an aristocracy. Nearly two thousand years ago Lucretius undertook to prove that the things attributed to the gods were brought about by natural means. The submergence of ancient civilisation by Christianity prevented that proof being made popular; but modern science has reverted to the Lucretian point of view. Problems there are yet unsolved, questions still unanswered; but of one thing modern thought is assured, and that is that science alone can give adequate and intelligible replies.

The science that has made Atheism unscientific is as remarkable as the science that gets round to the back of phenomena and discovers that there is certainly something there. Why the whole of modern science is a triumphant vindication of the sanity of the Atheistic position. What is Atheism? It is not concerned with idiotic conundrums concerning the back of phenomena, and what may or may not exist in a probably non-existent region, and which is certainly beyond the reach of even human thought. It depends upon the invalidity of every alleged proof of mind animating or controlling nature. It denies that any such evidence will ever be discovered. Science does not categorically affirm this, but it certainly acts on the assumption that it is the only justifiable position. There is not a single branch of science that allows for the remotest possibility of "divine interference," and the man who suggested such a likelihood to a scientific assemblage would be looked upon as a lunatic. The universe disclosed by modern science is an Atheistic universe. The world of science is a world without God. A religious man the scientist may be—the human mind presents, often enough, a strange jumble of mutually destructive ideas—but he leaves his religion behind him when he enters the scientific workshop. He acts as though the Atheist was right; and the Atheist may well be content to wait for opinion to square itself with practice in this direction as it has already done in others.

Atheism "trailing its black length" across European thought may be dismissed as a piece of theological impertinence. One may only remind Christians that the European dark ages were not Atheistic, but Christian. It was not Atheism that buried ancient civilisation under mountains of superstitious ignorance, but religion. And it is not Christianity that we have to thank for freeing European thought from this incubus, but a succession of men, from Roger Bacon onward, whose dominant characteristic was their dissent from the prevalent forms of Christian teaching. These men not only beat back the churches of their day, they and their successors banished the Deity in whose name the Churches existed. The world exists without God's interference, and between a God who does nothing and one who does not exist, the distinction is merely verbal.

(To be concluded.) C. COHEN.

The Wonder-Spirit.

A SOFTLY colored mist lay over the water. Greyish white it was; and it hung all around us like—oh! like a crowd of departed, spiritualised Christians, an assemblage of souls. Our boat seemed to be lying perfectly motionless, for the sea-swell, to all appearances, had died, and forgotten itself. Where we were the sea had a peculiar brown color, deep, dark brown that shaded away into black, and then brightened into a grey that became one with the mist. The strange peace of the waters contrasted strongly with the weird restlessness of the mist. It heaved around us sometimes like the expansion and contraction of a woman's bosom, when the arrows of sorrow penetrate her heart. Sometimes there were spasms of tempestuous anger, when it curled and rose in white columns that seemed engaged in inter-necine warfare. It would surge forwards, and retreat from our boat, as if attempting to show its resentment at our presence. Occasionally it would make as if to disappear, giving us a glimpse of a round yellow disc not far above our head, the sun; and then it would fall, in heavy masses, upon us, determined to make our stay as unpleasant as possible.

Digitized by Google

Without warning, in two or three seconds of time, it disappeared completely, and we were drifting slowly out into the bay, the hot rays of the sun pouring down upon us as they did but ten minutes before.

We enjoyed the fleeting, moving picture immensely. Once, many years ago, we had been nearly trapped on a hill by the mist. So keenly eager were we in its progress through the valleys that we failed to notice it had already begun to encircle us. We escaped in the nick of time.

In the evening, after supper, we related the pleasure we had enjoyed on the sea that afternoon; and the conversation turned upon the "wonderful" in nature and in life. Happily, or perhaps unhappily, the church-goers of the party had been sermonised on the subject at the evening service; and one lady gave us a synopsis of the sermon: Christianity developed the "wonder"-spirit of man; nay, more, Christianity was the Wonder-Spirit itself.

Naturally, we retorted we quite agreed with her and the parson. Christianity had never been anything but Wonder-Spirit. To-day, we said, it was the purest form of that mental commodity we had come across. For a long time it had been undergoing a process of distillation. Improving civilisation was gradually and very effectually eliminating all the more poisonous foreign substances from it. The black grains of bigotry, hate, murder, and hundreds of other social vilities that had, in the past, discolored the Wonder-Spirit, were being precipitated. We understood that all right; and we had often observed Christians holding up the glass jar to the light, and admiring the purity of the purified contents—when the precipitate had been removed!

We were quite delighted at our agreement with the minister and his hearers. What mattered it if our interpretations of "Wonder-spirit" were somewhat conflicting. Whatever the practical man may say, wonderment is a valuable mental condition at times; but when we get it in too frequent and too prolonged spasms pathology proclaims the necessity of a rest cure. Judging from the remarks of our holiday acquaintances and friends, and from the attitude of the preacher as revealed by them, we came to the conclusion that they were all wonder-mad.

We learned that the Christianity of to-day was the most wonderful thing that ever human beings had been blessed to enjoy. Men gazed in amazement up to the stars, the jewels of God's throne, and from their wonderment they gave us astronomy. Looking out upon the great sea, searching in the earth, turning his eyes upon his own delicately made body, seeing the wonderful beauties of the blue veins of his hand, the ineffable loveliness of the lines in a leaf, the exquisite softness of a violet, etc., ad lib., ad nauseam, man saw and wondered at the great and glorious power of God. God gave man wonderment, and the spirit of wonderment gave man knowledge.

Had not wonder, they said, peopled and pictured the future?—to say nothing of the religious past, we said. Had not wonder brought us within the everlasting arms of the great Father?—they said—not to mention within the swing of the Devil's tail and the kick of his hoofs, said we.

Wonder had given us heaven—and hell; hope everlasting—and eternal damnation; fountains of love—and oceans of blood; noble-hearted martyrs—and ignoble, mean-hearted murderers. It had given us big-brained legislators, this Christian wonderment—and pew-holding, rack-renting, sweating capitalists. There was no end to the wonderful things this wonderful Christian spirit of wonder had given us—and taken from us.

And then they took us into child-life to prove that our contempt and unbelief were nothing but prejudice. They told us, in Marie Corellian language, that a baby's big blue eyes were mirrors of heaven. The pastor had said something about it. Grandly had he remarked that a child's wonderment was full of prophesies of paradise. They thought we were frivolous when we suggested that the child's paradise ran a bad second to a be-ribboned rattle. And when we insinuated that the affair was reversed in after years, that heaven, with its hierarchy of God, Christ, Holy Ghost, and angels as the dried peas, became the rattle, running a bad second to the realities of life, they intimated, in polite phraseology, it was time to terminate the conversation.

We went out into the fresh air, down to the sea, and tramping over the moist sands we wondered at the magnitude and beauty of the waters; but we wondered more at the mental powers that discovered the relationship of sea and moon. While Christians were dry-rotting in the Wonder-Spirit, great men were working out bravely, against great odds, the problems Nature set them. Had they been praising the Lord we would have had less knowledge. Had they not been restricted in their labors by the children of the false Wonder-Spirit we would have had more.

The real Wonder-Spirit, if such a thing there be, prompts men to know, not to dream. It is Science.

ROBERT MORELAND.

Christianity and the Chinese.—XIII.

"It will probably startle many good people who fancy they are sending out a message of peace and goodwill, to be told further that 'every missionary in every part of China is an element of more or less disturbance in the civil affairs of his neighborhood.'* Yet this is a missionary's verdict on the situation.

"The Chinese have a culture of their own—defective in our eyes—but of which they are intensely proud; they have classics which are remarkable at least for their purity of thought and expression, and a cult which has served as a bond of social union through untold generations. It is fantastic to suppose that the first European commissioned to inform them that Christianity is superior to Confucianism will be able to convince them that his impression must necessarily be true. Only men of wide education and large sympathies, men sufficiently acquainted with the religious thought of China to understand what they are attacking, and sufficiently familiar with a difficult language to preach and argue without exciting ridicule, can hope to gain a sympathetic hearing. The day is past when public opinion approved proselytism by force. Yet is little less to insist that missionaries of every conceivable sect and of every intellectual standard shall be allowed to establish themselves and their buildings in the teeth of popular dislike, and to expect that that dislike can be hindered from finding expression."—R. S. GUNDAY, "Missionaries in China," Fortnightly Review, August, 1893, pp. 251-3.

LORD CURZON has remarked upon the ill-feeling caused by the special privileges the missionaries—

> "are disposed to claim on behalf of native converts engaged in litigation or other disputes; and by their interference in the civil affairs of the neighborhood in which they reside. Just as in Southern India many a native becomes a Christian in order to get a situation as a servant or a clerk, so in China it not infrequently happens that a shady character will suddenly find salvation for the sake of the material advantages or protection which it may be expected to confer upon him."

And, as he further remarks, the thoughtful Chinaman "sees in missionary enterprise the existence of an insidious imperium in imperio, of a secret society hostile to the Commonwealth, of detriment and damage to the State."† He also remembers that the Tai-ping Rebellion was a Christian enterprise.

Mr. Eugene Simon gives a good illustration of the constant irritation caused by the missionaries; the protests of the Chinese against their methods being denounced in the missionary journals as persecution. He says:—

> "A child has been converted, for example, and in consequence renounces ancestral worship and his contribution to its expenses. His brothers and relations demand that he shall give up his share of his inheritance, which he refuses to do. A lawsuit follows, with which the missionaries interfere; they in their turn are requested to take their departure. This is called persecution in the annals of the propagation of the faith. A criminal is being pursued and requests baptism, which is granted, together with a temporary asylum. The magistrate continues the pursuit and arrests the guilty person. This, again, is called persecution in the annals. The dream of most missionaries is to possess the right to administer justice to their converts, and they would not hesitate to bring about a new war if they could hope to obtain in a new treaty a clause giving them this right, even if they gained it after the fashion of M. Delamarre."*

Mr. George Lynch says of these missionary extra-territorial rights:—

> "I have discussed this with several conscientious and intelligent missionaries. One of them, a man of many years' experience of mission work in China, expressed the opinion, which was also held by many others, that if the rights were done away with, they would lose more than half their converts; but that the moiety that remained would be worth the larger number, because these would unquestionably be genuine, and would have no ulterior motive for continuing to profess Christianity."

We believe that if these rights were withdrawn, together with free education and free medical aid—and every missionary is now required to have a knowledge of medicine as part of his stock-in-trade—"the moiety" remaining would not be worth considering.

In September of 1878, an attack was made upon the mission at Woo-Shi-Shan, near Foochow, the mission buildings being burnt down. As usual, compensation was demanded from the Chinese Government, backed up, says Boulger, "by threats of the old 'gunboat' type"†—this being remarkable, says the same writer, "as the first expression of China's intention to refuse to pay compensation for attacks on missionaries when their own acts had contributed to the occurrence." Mr. Boulger gives the dispatch—a most interesting document, but far too long to give here in full—of the Marquise Tséng, for the Chinese Government, to the Marquis of Salisbury.

The dispatch begins by recounting the well-known facts as to the toleration of the Chinese Government for all religions of a peaceable and non-aggressive type. He then deals with the causes which led to the destruction of the mission, as follows: "A Christian church was opened in the very buildings of a temple situated on a hill, which the people for ages had viewed with peculiar veneration." After a time, action was taken, on behalf of the public, in the courts of the country, with a view to the church being removed.

The result of the action was a compromise, the purchase of the premises—

> "was ruled to be illegal, but in virtue of extenuating circumstances the Mission was granted a lease of twenty years, at the expiration of which the premises should again revert to the public, from which they had been secretly alienated. This produced much dissatisfaction and occasioned great popular excitement; whereupon the Governor, in order to prevent disturbances, proposed that the site of the Mission should be changed, and in terms which Her Majesty's Government characterised as very fair, offered another site to the Mission."

This proposal was submitted by the missionaries to their chiefs in England, who rejected the proposal.

The Chinese authorities, who continued to urge the danger to the public peace caused by the mission, submitted the same proposal to Her Majesty's Government:—

> "While still under consideration, and before any reply had been received, Mr. Wolfe, the Superior of the Mission, regardless of the dissatisfaction which already existed among the people, proceeded to erect a new building on land asserted to be beyond the boundary of the premises which he had hitherto occupied. Whether this were so or not does not appear to have been clearly determined, but, whether within or without, his act must nevertheless be stigmatised as highly injudicious and utterly inexcusable. The people who had been patiently waiting the result of the reference which had been made to Her Majesty's Government, seeing the chief of the Mission taking the matter into his own hands became enraged, and, forgetting themselves, set fire to the premises which were the subject of contestation."

The dispatch goes on to ask:—

> "Who was the most to blame, the teacher who, disregarding the principles of forbearance which he came to teach, acted thus, or the ignorant people whom he goaded on to fight themselves? I cannot but consider the conduct of the missionary authorities most reprehensible. Whilst missionaries feel themselves at liberty to pursue their avocations without taking any of the precautions which common prudence may dictate, you will continue to find them, as at Woo-Shi-Shan, pushing their conquests into quarters where the result must inevitably be trouble of the gravest nature. Who can doubt that had they been made to feel that their occupation of the Tan Shan-quan was at their own risk, and might be attended with the sacrifice of the Mission premises, they would have hesitated before thrusting themselves into the temple, into the very sanctuary of the religion which it was their avowed object to overthrow? In no part of the world would such preposterous indiscretion be tolerated; and, except in China, in no country would a claim be made for compensation when, as in the present instance, it led to its necessary consequences."*

Many of the missionaries deliberately seek to irritate and provoke the religious sensibilities of those they come to convert. It is a missionary who boasts that—

> "standing with his back towards the tablet of Confucius, he (or his companions) addressed the assembled crowd on the folly and sin of worshiping deceased men perhaps the first Gospel discourse ever delivered in a temple dedicated to the worship of the Chinese sage."†

The same thing is going on at this very day, notwithstanding all the misery and bloodshed caused by such conduct in the past. For, at the annual meeting of the China Inland Mission, held in London last May, the papers record: "The annual report of the mission alludes to the preaching of the Gospel on 'the Altar of Heaven' in Peking—a spot for many centuries sacred to the worship of heaven by the Emperor alone."

Suppose a Chinese missionary came over here and attempted to harangue the people in St. Paul's, or Westminster Abbey, upon the folly of worshiping a man who died on a gibbet. He would stir up a pretty hornet's nest about his ears. Yet his conduct would differ in nothing from that of our missionaries in China.

Another great cause of irritation to the Chinese is the erection by the missionaries of their ugly and foreign-looking (to Chinese eyes) churches and chapels, in the most commanding positions, and quite out of harmony with their surroundings. Moreover, it comes in collision with the curious belief entitled "Feng-shui." Lord Curzon observes:—

> "To the European an elevated or commanding site is always, both for picturesque and sanitary reasons, preferable to a lower position; while for purposes of privacy or protection, a high enclosure wall is superior to a low one. But to the Chinaman, with his extraordinary ideas about the feng-shui, or Spirits of Air and Water, and his geomantic superstitions, a building in an elevated position appears to have an effect like the 'evil eye,' and is a source of genuine suspicion and alarm; while anything appertaining to secrecy suggests to his depraved imagination the ambiguous character of Eleusinian mysteries. It is strange that missionaries of all sects and creeds seem to be quite unable to resist these easily surmounted temptations. At Tokio, in Japan, the most commanding edifice in the entire city is the Russian Cathedral that crowns one of its timbered heights. At Canton, the twin towers of the French Gothic Cathedral, erected under circumstances that should bring a blush to every Christian's cheek, may been seen for miles across the level country. At Peking, one of the French Cathedrals, the Peitang, actually overlooked the sacrosanct enclosure of the Forbidden City; until at length, after prolonged negotiations, and the gift of a superior site elsewhere, the French authorities were persuaded, in 1895, to acquiesce in its removal."*

Mr. Gundry, in his article on "Missionaries in China" (Fortnightly Review, August, 1893) quotes Mr. Michie as saying, "hateful as the invader is, per se, he becomes tenfold more so when he is seen erecting, on some commanding and salubrious site, beautiful (in his own eyes), but outlandish, buildings which bring ill-luck to the whole district." He also cites Mr. Little, who instances—

> "two distinct riots caused, of late years, in Chungking, by attempts to build churches on prominent sites in that city. The Roman Catholics had succeeded, in one case, in tempting some Taoist priests to sell a beautifully situated old temple, which they proposed replacing by one of their 'hideous bastard-classic brick and plaster piles,' while a Protestant missionary was about to build, on another conspicuous site, one of the 'distractingly ugly whitewashed' structures that are so painfully out of harmony with their surroundings, instead of contenting himself with the Chinese house in which he had been temporarily located."

Acid Drops.

The taste of these religious people! Dr. Knox, Bishop of Manchester, began his mission on Blackpool sands last Saturday (Aug. 2) by blubbering over his dead mother. He told his audience that when his mother was dying she was moved to the window of her room, so that she could see the fields which she had always loved; and as she "gazed at the sunlit vista" (note the sentimental—that is, insincere composition) she said: "Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty; they shall behold the land that is very far off." At that point the Bishop broke off his address, and was silent for several moments, with clasped hands and closed eyes and tears trickling through them. Nothing, the French proverb says, is sacred to a sapper—and nothing seems sacred to a Bishop. An ordinary man, with no boasts and pretences, but just plain decency of mind and character, would keep his mother's last hours and words to himself. Working them up for a public audience would never occur to him, and the very suggestion would be utterly nauseous. But these Christian preachers have no sensitiveness and no reticences. What should be the most sacred private experiences are fully available for business purposes. Perhaps the Bishop of Manchester thought himself a monument of pathos. But the truth is that he was the most vulgar entertainer on Blackpool sands that week-end.

What on earth did Bishop Knox imagine that this anecdote proved or illustrated? Had his mother been an important public character, of whose end falsehoods had been concocted and imposed upon the world, there might have been a reason for relating what actually occurred. But to blubber in public over her death, merely as her death, is childish and contemptible. We repeat our question. What did Bishop Knox think his anecdote achieved? We should really like to get at something solid in the pious slush of his mind.

The taste of these Christians was further displayed at St. Paul's Cathedral last Sunday. During "divine service" between thirty and forty Suffragettes stood up and chanted: "God save Emmeline Pankhurst. Spare her, spare her with her life and set her free. Hear us while we pray to Thee." Presumably "Thee" means God. The supplicants were therefore asking the Deity to take their side in what they insist on calling a political struggle. They gave him the tip as to which side he should espouse—if he had any intelligence and self-respect. They wished to prevent his making a mistake. It was good of them, of course, and it if to be hoped that the Almighty is duly grateful. It is conceivable, however, that the Almighty wondered what the ladies meant. Whether the militant policy is wise or otherwise, it is certain that Mrs. Pankhurst pursues it voluntarily. What has "God" to do with it? Why is he called upon to "spare" her? They should call upon the lady to spare herself. But religionists were always muddle-headed.

Someone wrote to the Church Times suggesting that what was wanted to counteract Secularist propaganda is "an organised band of hecklers." The secretary of the Bishop of Southwark's Diocesan Evangelical Council agrees with the suggestion, and asks that all who would like to undertake such work to communicate with him. He adds that the essential qualifications are a sense of humor and a good temper. We wish this gentleman all success in his endeavor to form a band of hecklers to fight Secularist propagandists, but we think a sense of humor is rather a dangerous qualification. A man with a genuine sense of humor wouldn't keep at the job for a month. The absurdity of the position he was defending would become so apparent that he would soon throw the job up. We notice that nothing is said about possessing knowledge. Probably the less they have of that the better.

The Rev. C. L. Drawbridge joins in the discussion, but only to condemn the proposal. He confesses that he tried the policy of heckling, and "soon found that I did a great deal more harm than good to the cause I had at heart." From what we know of Mr. Drawbridge, we should think this extremely likely. The man who was convinced of the truth of Christianity by Mr. Drawbridge's heckling or speaking would only cause surprise as to how he had developed sufficient intelligence ever to leave the fold. Mr. Drawbridge advises speakers to take notes of what the Secularist speaker has to say, and then "hold a rival meeting close to it." That is quite in character with what we know of Mr. Drawbridge. It is so much easier to reply to a Secularist when he is not present, and the lavish use of the speaker's name may induce unwary listeners at the other meeting to cross over and see what it is all about. But having listened once, we should hardly think they would care for a second visit. Mr. Drawbridge advises, also, that Christians should be organised to ask questions at the Christian meetings. Evidently he wishes the public to be deluded into believing that the questions so asked are suggested by the lecture itself, and to be gulled by pretended attack and defence that is really a put-up job. And that is quite like Mr. Drawbridge.

Dr. J. H. Moulton, Professor of New Testament Language and Literature at Didsbury College (Wesleyan Methodist), recently treated his listeners to a new version of one of the main ideas in Frazer's Golden Bough. Dr. Frazer had showed, he said, the existence of a practically universal belief in God becoming incarnate and giving his life for the benefit of mankind. Thus the way was prepared for the Christian teaching of the Atonement. This is a queer distortion of the truth. What Frazer shows in the section of his work referred to is not that gods become incarnate for the benefit of mankind, but that men make gods for their own benefit. The god was not killed; it was the man who was killed, and being killed became a god. Of course, this belief and practice prepared the way for Christian teaching, for the killing of the man-god Jesus was only another example of the general practice of god-making. To put it more correctly, the Christian practice was a simple continuance of the primitive savage rite of god-making. The beliefs of savages prepared the way for Christian beliefs only in the sense that essential Christian beliefs are based upon them, and without them they would never have existed. Banish the savage from religion and it disappears entirely. Christian beliefs are only savage beliefs with the veneer of a more civilised language and a more dignified ritual.

The Rev. Dr. Horton is nothing if not extravagant and self-contradictory. One day he tells us that all great scientists believe in God and bow before him, and recognise Christ as his highest expression in history; but the next he is equally convinced that the intellect of the Protestant world is now engaged on the task of getting rid of God and Christ as unnecessary encumbrances on the uniformity of Nature. Now he assures us that "we are obliged to revise the geography of the spiritual world"; and of course Dr. Horton will be a member of the revision committee. We prefer to follow Shakespeare, who describes the spiritual world as "the undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns."

The Rev. Dr. Dixon, of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, believes in and preaches the hell with the vivid description with which Mr. Spurgeon used to frighten his hearers forty and fifty years ago. Of the sixteen well-known ministers and clergymen who express their views in the volume, Is there a Hell? Dr. Dixon is the only one who clings to the old-fashioned conception of a material hell-fire, in which the damned are to burn to all eternity. And yet, if the Bible is true, and if the Church is a Divine institution, Dr. Dixon is right, while the other fifteen are guilty of suppressing, or misrepresenting, an essential portion of the counsel of God.

"An Average Man" waxes hilariously merry in the Manchester City News for July 26, over the heresy hunt so vigorously indulged in for many months within the Wesleyan Church in connection with the appointment of the Rev. George Jackson, an exceedingly mild Higher Critic, to a theological chair at Didsbury College. The hunt turned out a perfect fiasco, a ludicrous failure. The following quotation is much to the point:—

> "As an Average Man I sometimes marvel by what special mandate the so-called Orthodox call all who do not agree with them Heretics. The Jew calls me a heretic if I am not a Jew, the Christian calls me a heretic if I am not a Christian, the Moslem calls me a heretic if I am not a Moslem, and the Buddhist calls me a heretic if I am not a Buddhist. So we must all of us be heretics according to somebody else, but who made Somebody Else the Judge? Besides, all these Orthodox people are Heretics also from the standpoint of the rivals, and really they cannot all be infallibly correct. Religion is largely a matter of temperament and race. We are, as a rule, of the religion of the country in which we are born—the place of our birth decides that—and we believe that our own religion is the only religion that is true. If you tell a Mohammedan he is in error, he slays you in righteous indignation. If a Mohammedan tells a Confucian he is wrong, the Chinaman slays him in turn. And so it goes on. As for ourselves, we used to slay each other in the old days for what now seem to be the merest trifles. The orthodoxy of yesterday is by no means the orthodoxy of to-day, and that is why it is additionally difficult to say who is a heretic and who is not."

Writing of this kind would have been impossible twenty or thirty years ago in any newspaper. Galileo was right. The world does move.

Dr. Clifford is getting more and more reckless in his public statements. In his inaugural address as President of the second European Baptist Congress held at Stockholm on July 21, he asserted that "there are sufficient reasons for believing that the modern mind in its scientific and philosophical activities is coming to the aid of spiritual religion." The statement is a monstrous falsehood, though often brazenly repeated. Dr. Clifford must be culpably ignorant if he is not aware that the modern mind is not "moving towards the supernatural and the spiritual with increasing sureness of step and certainty of conviction." We are getting tired of nailing this hoary lie to the counter. This rhetorical Baptist divine could not quote from a single scientist in support of his assertion. The only men he dared to mention were two famous metaphysicians, Eucken and Bergson, neither of whom can be claimed as an evangelical Christian. If Dr. Clifford were in the habit of perusing scientific works he would learn that the modern mind is moving away from "the supernatural and the spiritual with increasing sureness of step and certainty of conviction"; and were he to heed the signs of the times he would realise that Christianity has one foot in the grave already.

A correspondent informs us that on the Notice Board outside a church in the New Kent-road he read "Affliction of God." "I am not surprised," our correspondent says, 'seeing the crowd of humbugs pulling his ear down every Sunday."

A mass of manuscripts in the autograph of Walt Whitman has just been sold for the paltry sum of £16 10s. Pork, iron, and copper "kings" in the Great Republic prefer spending their thousands on chorus girls and "spread-eagle" philanthropy.

"The Christian Church does not rest on theology," says a recent apologist for Christianity. Maybe perhapsology would be a more correct guess.

Writing in the Labor Leader, Mr. S. B. James says, "Socialism is a religion." One religion, more or less, will make very little difference. "Let them all come!"

The following elegant extract is from the Johannesburg Star (July 2):—

> "ILL-TREATING A CAT.
> "Kimberley, Tuesday.
> "In the local Magistrate's Court to-day a clergyman was fined 20s. for ill-treating a cat by forcing the prongs of a fork through the animal's body, pinning the cat to the ground.
> "The accused was the Rev. George Mitchell, and witnesses stated that an attempt to drown the cat had evidently failed, and that the accused drove a garden fork through the animal's body. The cat remained alive about half an hour. It was eventually despatched by the police, who found it screaming with agony.
>
> "The accused, in defence, said he had no intention of torturing the animal. Having failed to drown the cat, he thought the other method adopted to dispatch it would be immediately successful."

What a product of nearly two thousand years of Christianity!

Miss Durham's letter to the Nation (July 26) is a document of such importance that we venture to call our readers' special attention to it. Her subject is the frightful barbarities of the Montenegrin troops; not accidental, not committed in an access of passion, but designed beforehand and deliberately inflicted. Miss Durham knows what she is talking about. She is an observant and a truthful person, and she is a Christian and not a Mohammedan. Common honesty bids her speak out. She cannot possibly have any other motive. Her denunciation of the Balkan "Holy War for the True Faith" is wrung from her. "Tsar Ferdinand," she says, "spoke the truth when he said that the war was one of Cross v. Crescent. The Orthodox Cross drips red with the blood of victims. They are not all Moslems. Orthodox fanaticism has not spared the Roman Catholics." Miss Durham tells how the Montenegrins "liberated" the Catholic village of Gajtan from Turkish tyranny. Entering the village as "friends" they pillaged it of everything movable; then they felled the olive and fruit trees, on which the inhabitants largely depended for a living, and even lighted fires at the roots of the olives to ensure their not growing again. "A flourishing little community was completely ruined to the cry of 'Long Live King Nikola!'" And having completed this glorious work the "Liberators" marched away.

The poor Moslems were treated not only with the worst brutality, but even with refinements of cruelty. Impalement used to be thought a Turkish monopoly. Some of our readers will remember the stories of impalement in the old "Bulgarian Horrors" in the late 'seventies, when Holy Russia fell upon the Turks in the name of humanity (heaven save the mark!) and Mr. Gladstone swept England with a deluge of passionate eloquence against the "unspeakable Turk" who was to be swept "bag and baggage" out of Europe. Canon McColl, if we recollect aright, swore he saw, with the aid of a field-glass, a Bulgarian stuck on a pole; and gallons of ink were spilt over that doubtful story. Only the Turk, it was said, could possibly do such things. But listen! The Montenegrin soldiers who fell outside Scutari, when time was found to bury them, were all completely clad; while the Turkish corpses were all stripped and plundered. There was even worse than that. "Outside Scutari," Miss Durham says, "two half-naked bodies of Moslems were found, bound with cords and extended, showing that they had been tortured, and they appeared to have died in great agony. Two others were clearly seen through field-glasses, impaled on poles near the Montenegrin lines." So the good Christians enjoy the luxury of impaling their enemies just as well as the wicked Mohammedans ever did.

We have seen photographs from Constantinople of Turks mutilated in a most diabolical fashion. They gave us the shudders for weeks. Judging from what Miss Durham says, they were not faked but authentic. She heard a professor of the Boys' School of Podgoritza say, a few days before the war broke out, "Now you'll see plenty of noses!" He said it gleefully. Noses were to these beastly Christian "liberators" what scalps were to the North American Indians. Miss Durham describes what she saw on one occasion. "Among the crowd of wounded," she says, "were eight Nizams, whose noses and upper lips had been cut off by Montenegrins." She calls this a "peculiarly hideous mutilation"—as indeed it is. It strikes us as about the most atrocious mutilation conceivable. Words fail to represent it. It must be seen.

Miss Durham heard Montenegrin wounded in the hospital boast of the number of noses they had taken. "They described," she says, "the fun of transfixing a Turk on a bayonet, grasping his moustache, cutting off the coveted portion, and bidding him go home and show his wives how pretty he was. It was considered, however, more honorable not to leave him alive." These soldiers of Christ also boasted that they had castrated their enemies; the "trophies" being taken to their commander. How it reminds one of the dower that King Saul demanded of David for the hand of Michel.

One fact mentioned by Miss Durham is of the most sinister significance. Scarcely any Turkish prisoners were brought into Podgoritza during the whole six months' campaign, nor were "any Turkish wounded brought into the hospital while I was there." "We cured them all with our bayonets" was the Montenegrin boast. No wonder that Miss Durham calls upon the Great Powers not to let any Moslems or Catholics come under the rule of these fiend-warriors of the Cross.

The devilries that Miss Durham records were deliberate. That is the worst of them. The war was not one of "liberation" but of "vengeance and plunder":—

> "It is time that the foul savagery with which this war has been waged should be made clear; that the public should realise that the real reason why no correspondents and no foreign doctors were admitted to certain districts was because of the brutalities, planned in cold blood beforehand, which were to have no witnesses. A strict censorship was intended to suppress such details as might leak out."

Montenegro means to exterminate all Albanian or other populations handed over to her. Believing this, and with good cause, Miss Durham calls on the civilised world to take precautions against such an abominable catastrophe.

There is still no word of comment from the religious press on the subject of the Christian massacres in the Balkans. So far as they are concerned, they might never have occurred. Their chief concern appears to be lest any of the territory conquered from the Turks should again pass out of Christian hands. The Guardian, for example, says that the duty of the Powers is perfectly clear. If Turkey proves obdurate, she must "be turned out of Adrianople neck and crop." It is gracious enough to say that they do not "think the Christians who reconquered Turkey's Balkan possessions are a particularly admirable type"; but still they are Christians, and that is everything. The Balkan Christians are "amenable to the spirit of the West." "To Turkey civilisation, as we know it, is utterly foreign."

This is a double-barrelled sectarianism. First of all, a Christian as a Christian is preferable to a Mohammedan, even though the latter may be the better man. We hold no brief for the Turk, but no man of sense and fairness will hold that during the past six months the Balkan Christians have shown themselves in any way superior to their Mohammedan neighbors. If one half the barbarities recorded of Christians in both the first and second Balkan Wars had been recorded of Mohammedans, the English press would have been shrieking for immediate intervention. But they are Christians, and that atones for a deal. In the next place, we have the usual British stupidity that because the civilisation of the West suits us it must not only be the best form of civilisation for the rest of the world, but it must be forced upon all people at the point of the bayonet. It never dawns upon these wiseacres that a form of civilisation suitable to some people may be totally unsuitable to others. Friendly intercourse between peoples will enable each to absorb from the other all that is beneficial to them. Institutions and ideas forced upon them result in nothing but evil. And it is by no means certain that the West has not as much to learn from the East as the East has to learn from the West.

Mr. J. H. Ritson, secretary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, is greatly alarmed, as are other missionaries, at what they are pleased to call the menace of Islam in Africa. On examination, the menace only means that, in spite of Christianity occupying the more favorable position, it cannot compete with Mohammedanism in evangelising the natives. The missionary of Islam, without huge funds from home, and without his religion being that of the governing race, beats the Christian missionary at his own game. Mr. Ritson says that each missionary teaches the blacks Arabic, and opens the way to a religion "which sanctions the sins men love." It is seldom, indeed, that a Christian can refer to opponents without slandering them, and Mr. Ritson is no exception. We should much like to know what "sins" are sanctioned by Islam? It does not teach men to lie, to steal, or to commit murder. It does sanction polygamy—not very generally practised, however—but so does Christianity for that matter, and at any rate it is stupid to call that a sin. As an institution it may be good or bad—we firmly believe it is the latter—but it is a social institution, and must be judged as other institutions are judged. And travellers of repute have testified over and over again that the native who becomes a Mohammedan shows a marked improvement in character and cleanliness over those who become Christians. At any rate, Islam manages to keep its converts free from the unquestionable evils of prostitution and drunkenness—two things that Christian civilisation carries into every country it conquers.

"Are these the people to make England great? Why, if they were sunk into the depths of the sea to-morrow morning, England would not be the poorer for it." These terrible people had been visiting the Holland Park Skating Rink on Sunday instead of attending church, and so the Rev. T. Phillips treated his congregation to his opinion of them. Mr. Phillips does not think that any people who spent their Sunday in this way would be found doing social work in the slums. We do not know; but we feel pretty sure that a great many of those who do not go skating on Sunday, but regularly attend church or chapel, are partly responsible for there being any slums to visit. And we do not think that Mr. Phillips would care to say from the pulpit that they ought to be drowned in the sea. It might thin his congregation somewhat. It is perfectly safe denouncing absentees to a chapel congregation.

Professor John Milne, the famous inventor of instruments to detect earthquakes, who died last week, spent the best years of his life in Japan, which experiences about 500 shocks yearly, often accompanied by great loss of life. The Professor, who was a Christian, married a Japanese lady who kept a large statue of Buddha in his home, to which she made offerings. Maybe, the devoted pair hoped to square the Divine Benevolence between them.

Laurel wreaths picked from the garden of the late Mr. W. T. Stead were dropped from the liner Franconia over the watery grave of the Titanic on Sunday, whilst the ship's band played "Nearer, My God, to Thee." Fifteen hundred men and women stood at the Franconia's side with bowed heads during the sorry business. It would be hard to beat this example of misplaced piety.

The recent publication of Charlotte Bronte's letters to Professor Heger in the columns of the Times makes interesting reading. There are, however, some matters that require further elucidation, as, for instance, Charlotte Bronte's statement that her writings had received the approbation of Shelley and Coleridge. Shelley died when Charlotte was six years old, and Coleridge was dead before she was eighteen.

An Exmouth lady has left the whole of her fortune to a Cats' Home in Whitechapel, because "cats are daily made footballs of by roughs of that locality." It is a pity that ladies so seldom leave money for the intellectual emancipation of the race.

An immense swarm of locusts has been doing enormous damage in Corsica, devastating the crops. The inhabitants must have had as jolly a time as the Egyptians with the plagues.

According to an Education Blue Book, there are nearly seven millions of scholars attending the elementary schools of England and Wales. Clerically controlled schools included nearly three millions of these children. In spite of kid-glove Rationalists, the N. S. S. has plenty of work in front of it.

A gold repeater watch, formerly belonging to Charles Dickens, was sold last week for £44 at a London saleroom. Priests who get high prices for relics of people who never existed will smile.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £160 13s. 11d. Received since:—T. Hibbott, 5s.; S. Clowes and Father, 2s.; J. White, 2s.

R. J. DE L—— (S. Africa).—Your friend is not the author of the Parson's Idol. We printed it in the Freethinker some thirty years ago, and it was a bit of an antiquity then. It was written by that copious author Mr. Anonymous. We are pleased to receive your own letter.

G. GILETTE (S. Africa).—Glad to hear you have read the Freethinker since 1890 and "never found a dull item in it." We will consider your suggestion about publishing Mr. Cohen's article on the Witch Mania as a pamphlet.

T. HIBBOTT.—We note your wish that the pace of the President's Honorarium Fund might be quickened. Kindly forward the book you refer to.

S. CLOWES.—Pleased to have your congratulations and good wishes.

W. BRADBURN.—See paragraph. Thanks.

J. DAVENDALE.—Thanks for your efforts to promote our circulation. Sorry to say the verse is not quite up to our level for publication.

H. D. A.—Shakespeare is omitted as well as Burns. Your friend's verses want correcting by a grammarian. They are not without a certain merit. But, after all, they are not really poetry.

A. N. KOHN.—There is a Benevolent Fund connected with the N. S. S., with its own Committee, to which access is gained through the Secretary (Miss Vance). We understand that the gentleman you mention has several times been helped. We take no part ourselves in the administration of this Fund.

E. B.—Much obliged.

W. A. YATES.—Thanks for your successful efforts to promote our circulation.

R. F. M.—Naturally.

J. H. KENWARD.—Tyndall's statement was surely a truism. But it is a hypothetical statement, as all "ifs" are. It is the logic of thought, though not necessarily the logic of fact, that makes the conclusion follow the major and minor premises. Comte said truly that science is prevision. If we knew enough of causes we should be able to foresee results. It is a very questionable thing, however, to assert that what was evolved was originally involved. The case is one of confused metaphor.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for cuttings.

G. DURDEN.—Next week. Thanks.

W. H. HARRIS.—Thanks for the cutting, but we are going to review Professor Bury's book ourselves.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The trouble with the London County Council is now completely over. The unheard summonses against the N. S. S. London Branches, which had been standing over from August, are all withdrawn, and the collections and sale of literature go on as before in the case of bonâ-fide Societies. The legal bill has been discharged, including counsel's services in court and at consultations, and the whole of the Fighting Fund, with these deductions, is available for the ordinary work of the N. S. S. We gave subscribers an opportunity of objecting to this disposition of the balance of the Fund, if they wished to, but there has been absolutely no response to the paragraph which appeared in the Freethinker. The matter must, therefore, be now considered as ended. Perhaps we ought to add that "All's well that ends well"—and to thank the Freethought party for backing up our plan of campaign.

Mr. Lloyd takes the anniversary services at the Failsworth Secular Sunday School (Pole-lane) to-day (Aug. 10). His address at 2.45 will be on "The Making of Heroes" and at 6.30 on "Religion and Morals."

The conclusion of Mr. Foote's article on "Mr. Salt's Shelley" stands over unavoidably till next week.

Cupid laughs at everything but his own bow and arrows. He knows that he is the master of the world. Emperors, czars, kings, and princes are very secondary beings in comparison with him. Realising this, we are not surprised that we have to announce the marriage of Mr. R. H. Rosetti and Miss H. Pankhurst, which took place at the Registrar's office, Stratford, on Saturday (Aug. 2). Both belong to the West Ham Branch, the bride being its secretary and the bridegroom its president. We wish them a long life of private happiness and public usefulness.

Mr. Davidson paid a flying visit to Tunbridge Wells on Sunday. His object was to lecture, but accident brought him into a public debate with one of the most offensive Christian Evidence lecturers. The subject Mr. Davidson was invited to debate was "The Athiest and the Child"—which quite covered the two disputants. Neither the chairman nor anyone else could keep the C. E. S. speaker to time or from vulgar personalities. Mr. Davidson's matter and manner were evidently much more to the taste of a large and interested audience.

Dr. Arthur Lynch, M.P., reviewing Professor Bury's new book in the Chronicle, says that "laws against blasphemy exist which are a disgrace to the Statute Book."

Summonses have been issued at last at Leeds on account of the demonstration held by the Leeds N. S. S. Branch,—against Mr. Pack for taking up the collection and against Mr. Jackson for selling literature. The summonses are returnable at the Town Hall, on Wednesday, August 27, at 11 a.m. We have sent on an additional letter of advice to Mr. Pack on behalf of the Branch. There is no doubt, of course, that the demonstration was held, as to the collection and the sale of literature, against the strict letter of the bye-law. This is understood. But it was necessary to bring an all-important question to the test; the question, namely, whether the local authorities possess a discretionary power to favor the advocates of some opinions and put disabilities upon the advocates of other opinions. This has not yet been decided in a court of justice. It is high time that it were decided; otherwise the Leeds police will govern the city at will by successive acts of usurpation. There can hardly be a difference amongst Freethinkers as to the duty of opposing such intolerance; and if the fight has to be carried beyond the Leeds Police-court we shall make a confident appeal to the Freethought movement for proper support in this emergency.

The Positivist Review for August opens with an article by Sir Henry Cotton on "A Tragedy of the Gallows in India," which we commend to the attention of those who fancy that British government out there is perfectly ideal. Mr. Frederic Harrison writes on the late Mr. Goldwin Smith's recently published Correspondence. The article is interesting, for Goldwin Smith was a man of distinction, and Mr. Harrison wields a bright and facile pen. Mr. Swinny deals with M. Paul Sabatier's book, France To-Day: Its Religious Orientation. Like all that Mr. Swinny writes this article is worth reading. There is a curious touch in it, however, of what we may call Positivist partisanship,—a thing which we have often detected in this excellent little magazine. It is evident, we are told, that M. Sabatier has studied Comte; so Comte is quoted, and Guyau, and Bergson, as to the idea of an ever-advancing Humanity which is carrying all of us along. We do not "take much stock" in Bergson, but we very much admire Guyau, and we have always regarded Comte as one of the great seminal thinkers of the modern world. But our Positivist friends have quite a craze for quoting French writers and tracing every good thing to France. It was a great Englishman, Thomas Paine, who first used the expression "The Religion of Humanity." It was a still greater Englishman, the poet Shelley, who drew Leigh Hunt's attention in the Cathedral at Pisa to what a glorious religion men might have if its principle were humanity instead of theology. Even the "barbarian" Carlyle, as some reckon him, expressed the idea that Mr. Swinny refers to—as long ago as when he wrote Sartor Resartus. And we venture to say that he expressed it with greater eloquence and enthusiasm than Comte or Guyau (we will drop Bergson) ever had at command. We could quote several passages, but this one must suffice:—

> "Spake we not of a Communion of Saints, unseen, yet not unreal, accompanying and brother-like embracing thee, so thou be worthy? Their heroic Sufferings rise up melodiously together to Heaven, out of all lands, and out of all times, as a sacred Miserere; their heroic Actions also, as a boundless everlasting Psalm of Triumph."

Carlyle's graphic power has hardly ever been excelled, and this quotation is no bad sample of it.

Christ on the Cinema.

A WEEK or so ago I went to a picture palace in Peckham, and witnessed a representation of the famous film entitled "From Manger to the Cross." I went on a Saturday, as that was the only evening I had vacant that week. Naturally, I expected to find the hall crowded, as it was the last night's representation of the "sacred drama" of the life and death of the supposed Founder of Christianity. The building, however, was far from full, and so little interest did some of the members of the audience take in the performance that they left before half the length of the film had been shown, as though the subject bored them, or had no real attraction for them.

The story is told in five parts, and although one or two girls giggled during some portion of the representation, the majority of the audience listened attentively, and treated the subject in what Christians call a reverent spirit. During each scene an American organ played well-known hymn tunes appropriate to the occasion. I regret that I did not arrive in time to see the scene depicting the alleged birth of Jesus; so that I did not see the young Messiah, as the ladies say, "before he was shortened"; nor did I see the wise men watching the stars, and being directed by one of them to the place where Jesus was to be born. But I saw Jesus as a boy, and a very nice-looking chap he was. I also saw Joseph and Mary and the Mother of Jesus, and I wondered why Mary was dressed like a modern Sister of Mercy, and whether such a costume was likely to have been worn by a lady who had no official connection with any Church close on two thousand years ago. Every scene was supposed to illustrate some text, or some alleged teaching of Jesus, and this text was thrown upon the sheet for the spectators to read.

The picture illustrating young Jesus being taken by his parents to the Temple and being lost, and the parents returning in three days and finding him confounding the wise men by his wonderful sayings, struck me as extremely unconvincing—especially the unsympathetic manner in which he treated his parents, who had been vainly seeking for him for some days, and who were broken-hearted with grief and despair at his loss.

There were two boys who played the part of young Jesus, one when he was twelve and the other when he was a little older; they were both good-looking boys, and contrived to look the character as near as possible. In the next scene we saw Jesus, the wandering missionary, grown to manhood, and I rather regretted that we did not have one scene with Jesus working at the carpenter's bench; but I suppose that was too commonplace and risky from a dramatic point of view. For many years I have maintained that the story of Jesus as told in the Gospels is purely a dramatic story, probably based upon some old morality play coming down to us from a Greek source years after the beginning of the Christian era.

On seeing this film I was more than ever convinced of the dramatic character of the story, although in some of its details it lacks the true dramatic grip, and is almost entirely destitute of female interest. Now, if Jesus had fallen in love with a pretty Greek maiden, and the Devil, in the person of Satan, had lured her away from him, and made Judas a rival, and then tempted Judas to betray Jesus, and thus to lead him step by step to his arrest and crucifixion, the story would have some vital dramatic interest. But Jesus apparently had no love for woman, although he had several female acquaintances who followed him about constantly; and on the cinema we saw two of these lovely females, who came and emptied bottles of oil over his feet and wiped them with their wavy long hair. Jesus did not seem to be particularly moved by this performance, but he turned and gave them a gracious smile, as though he was not displeased with their conduct.

When we saw Jesus in the act of delivering his Sermon on the Mount, the young man who played the part committed what used to be considered by the old school of actors the unpardonable offence of turning his back entirely upon his audience—that is, the audience in the picture theatre—while he addressed the multitude. The young actor who played the part of Jesus was a tall, handsome fellow, with Greek countenance, rather effeminate in appearance, with fine aquiline nose and long flowing hair, and the orthodox moustache and beard after the well-known pictures of the Nazarene; while his disciples, on the other hand, possessed strongly marked Jewish faces and general characteristics. I thought perhaps that the promoters of this religious film would scarcely risk putting on the screen the representations of the chief miracles said to have been wrought by Jesus. But they did. And when one comes to think about it, what would the life of Jesus be without the miracles? A series of Sermons on the Mount, of which not one word could be heard, would have little or no interest to the ordinary spectator. In drama, you must have action, and plenty of it; and, therefore, the managers have no option but to put on the sheet the representation of some of the most important miracles narrated by the writers of the Gospels. And so we have the miracle of the healing of the centurion's servant; the opening of the eyes of the blind; but as Jesus had merely to pass his hands over the eyes of the blind man and say "Receive your sight," the thing was simple enough, and, as the doctors would say, involved no complications.

We saw Jesus calling his disciples out of their fishing smacks from the useful occupation of fishermen, and getting them to join him in the missionary business as "fishers of men." And though we saw him casting devils (whatever they are) out of men, we did not see the devils come out and enter into the bodies of swine, whose constitutions were so disturbed by these new tenants that they rushed furiously down a steep pit into the sea, and were drowned. Whether the devils shared the same fate as the pigs, Matthew does not say. No doubt the manager found this one of the impracticable incidents in the miracle series; he could not get actors to play the part of pigs, nor devils to set them on the run, so that they could go scampering along to their destruction.

Such miracles as the healing of the withered hand, or making the lame to walk, were easy enough, especially when we knew that the actors were not lame, but only pretending, and did not have withered hands to heal. In like manner, it was an easy matter for Jesus to turn water into wine, especially as we did not see any of the disciples drink any of the water; but it was much harder for Jesus to walk upon the sea, without Boyton boots, and any man with a knowledge of stagecraft and stage carpentry could see that he was walking upon a solid plank, although the waves of the sea appeared to be close upon him. But the real dramatic incidents began to manifest themselves when the villain—Judas—showed his willingness to betray Jesus; and the scenes representing Judas selling his Master for thirty pieces of silver; kissing Jesus, as a sign to his enemies that he was the man they were seeking (as though they did not know him when they had witnessed all his alleged miracles, and had been lashed by him out of the Temple)—attending the last supper, taking the sop with the Master, these scenes were played with real dramatic effect.

So, also, were the scenes of the Trial and Condemnation. Pilate did all he could to save Jesus, but the mob was against him. When we came to the scene of the crowd assaulting and ill-using Jews on the way to his execution, we could not help feeling for the poor fellow in his extremity, and in imagination we could realise what poor, despised Freethought martyrs like Bruno and Vanini must have experienced under similar circumstances. In the case of Jesus, I could not understand how he could allow this ignorant rabble to strike him on the cheek, to spit upon him, to tear his robes from off him, to give him vinegar and gall to drink, and to subject him to other forms of indignity, when, by merely holding up his hands, he could have silenced and paralysed them all with fear. But, then, I was only a poor Freethinker, allowing my thoughts free play, and forgetting for the moment that I was only witnessing a play and being moved by a scene of human helplessness amid the passion and violence of a savage mob. The scene of the Crucifixion was, indeed, a great triumph of the art of the cinematograph.

We saw Jesus on the Cross, moving his head and body, opening his eyes and mouth, and expressing in his countenance great grief and anguish. Yes, we saw him there between the two thieves, and they all moved to show that they were actual human beings who were stretched upon the cross, and not mere puppets. How it was all worked, I do not know, but it was a great triumph for the actors.

There were no scenes of the Resurrection or Ascension, so I suppose these were considered unnecessary to the completion of the drama, or impracticable from the point of view of the manager. Be that as it may, I quite expected to see Jesus come again, in form like the Ghost of Hamlet's Father, and, though I did not expect to witness an ascension, I have no doubt it could be managed easily enough on the cinematograph.

On the whole, I am satisfied that the exhibition of this film will lead thousands to think, and to think on the subject of miracles is always liable to lead to doubt, and doubt leads to investigation, and investigation to truth. And, as we all know, "the truth will set you free."

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

The Gospel History a Fabrication.

THE STORY OF THE BAPTIST.

THIS narrative is one of those which the three Synoptists copied from a more primitive Gospel; but the way Matthew and Mark introduce the subject is somewhat peculiar. Taking Matthew's account, that editor says (xiv. 1, 2):—

> "At that season Herod the tetrarch heard the report concerning Jesus, and he said unto his servants, This is John the Baptist; he is risen from the dead."

Mark commences his account in precisely the same way (vi. 14). Matthew, next, makes use of the error into which the tetrarch had fallen to introduce the story of the imprisonment and death of John. He says:—

> "For Herod had laid hold on John, and bound him, and put him in prison for the sake of Herodias, his brother Philip's wife."

Mark likewise makes this mistake of Herod the introduction to the story of the imprisonment of the Baptist, and in nearly the same words as Matthew. The latter editor goes on:—

> "For John said unto him, It is not lawful for thee to have her."

Mark, following the same plan, put this statement a little plainer—"It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife." Both editors, in fact, commence telling the story backwards, after which they narrate it more in order. This story is as follows: That Herod Antipas, the tetrarch of Galilee, had taken to himself Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, and, being reproved by the Baptist for so doing, he had cast that baptiser into prison. Then, later on, "when Herod's birth-day came [Herod made a feast, at which] the daughter of Herodias danced in the midst, and pleased Herod. Whereupon he promised with an oath to give her whatsoever she should ask. And she, being put forward by her mother, saith, Give me here in a charger the head of John the Baptist.....And Herod sent and beheaded John in prison. And his head was brought in a charger, and given to the damsel: and she brought it to her mother" (Matt. xiv. 8—11).

This Gospel story is a Christian fabrication, though it contains a small grain of truth. John the Baptist was a historical person—a crank who preached and baptised near the Jordan—whom, after a short public ministry, Herod Antipas placed in confinement, and subsequently put to death. But the silly statements of John rebuking Antipas on account of his marrying his brother Philip's wife, of the dancing before him, of his oath, of the demand for the Baptist's head, and of John's immediate execution in consequence—these are pure fabrications.

In the first place, Antipas did not take his brother Philip's wife. He did, however, induce Herodias, the wife of his half brother Herod, to leave her husband and live with him. To make this clear, we have but to glance at the sons of Herod the Great who were living in the time of the Baptist. They were the following:—

> Herod—who had married Herodias, and lived in private life.
> Antipas—Tetrarch of Galilee, who had married the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia Petrea.
> Philip—Tetrarch of Trachonitis, who had married Salome, the daughter of Herodias.

These three sons of Herod the Great were by different wives, and therefore only half-brothers. The first, Herod, was named after his father, by whom (in his will) he was disinherited. Herod the Great, though a hard and unprincipled man, was great as a king, and his name was honored throughout the Roman world. For this reason, Antipas assumed the name as a title (like that of Cæsar), and was called "Herod Antipas," or "Herod the tetrarch." Philip never assumed the name, though he could have done so, had he chosen.

Now, the concoctor of the Gospel story thought that the wife of Philip the tetrarch was Herodias. He says that Herod the tetrarch had taken "his brother Philip's wife," and he gives her name as Herodias. He had evidently never heard of the "Herod" who was living unnoticed as a private gentleman in Rome. The concoctor of the story, again, was not aware that the daughter of Herodias, whom he represents as dancing before an assembly of half-intoxicated men, was Salome, a grand lady, and the young wife of Philip the tetrarch, who would not be likely to demean herself by dancing before such an audience (Mark vi. 21)—even were her husband willing to countenance such an act.

In order to conceal the Gospel misstatement respecting Herodias being the wife of Antipas's "brother Philip," Christian reconcilers have elected to call the disinherited son of Herod the Great "Herod Philip," though they knew perfectly well that not one of the seven sons of Herod the Great had a second name. If we turn to a table of the "Herodian Family" in any Bible text-book, we shall find the disinherited son called "Herod Philip I.," and Philip the tetrarch called "Herod Philip II." As already stated, Antipas assumed the name "Herod" as a title, as did also, later on, king Agrippa; but Philip the tetrarch did not, and was never known as "Herod Philip." Josephus never calls the disinherited son by any other name than "Herod," nor Philip the tetrarch by any other name than "Philip." Luke also says (iii. 1)—"Herod being tetrarch of Galilee, and his brother Philip tetrarch of," etc. This was the "brother Philip" of the Baptist story.

There can thus be no doubt as to whom the primitive Gospel writer referred when he said "his brother Philip." The giving to Philip the tetrarch the honorary title "Herod" might, perhaps, be allowed to pass; but to give to the disinherited son Herod another name, "Philip," which this Herod never possessed, and to do it for the purpose of deceiving the uninformed reader—such a dastardly action is one which only a Christian reconciler could stoop to perform.

Coming now to the Gospel story, Luke tells us that "in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar" (i.e.,

Digitized by Google

A D 28), Jesus was baptised by John in the Jordan; shortly after which John was cast into prison, and Jesus began to preach. Now, if the Baptist had rebuked Antipas for marrying his brother's wife, it must have been before he was cast into prison, and Herodias must have gone to live with Antipas before that. The latter event, then, could not have been later than A D. 28.

Leaving dates for the moment, we find that Antipas, when in Rome, saw Herodias, the wife of his brother Herod, and falling in love with her, he asked her to become his wife. To this the lady agreed, provided he first put away Aretas's daughter. But the latter, having been secretly informed of the compact, asked her husband for an escort to take her to Macherus, a castle on the borders of Arabia, subject to her father Aretas—which Antipas was pleased to grant. Arrived there, she made rapid journeys under Arabian escorts to Arabia Petrea, and informed her father of her husband's intentions. Upon hearing of such perfidy, Aretas sent a strong force against his faithless son-in-law; a battle was fought, and Antipas's army was annihilated. After giving a detailed account of the foregoing circumstances, Josephus says (Antiq. 18, 5, 2):—

> "Now some of the Jews thought that the destruction of Herod's army came from God, and that very justly, as a punishment for what he did against John that was called the Baptist.....For Herod, fearing lest the great influence John had over the people might put it into his power and inclination to raise a rebellion.....thought it best, by putting him to death, to prevent any mischief he might cause.....Accordingly, he was sent a prisoner, out of Herod's suspicious temper, to Macherus, the castle I before mentioned, and was there put to death."

Josephus does not say how long the Baptist had been dead when the battle between Aretas and Antipas took place. We have now to ascertain the date of the battle. When Antipas received news of the loss of his army, he wrote informing the emperor Tiberius, "who being angry at the action of Aretas, sent orders to Vitellius [the president of Syria] to make war upon him." Upon receipt of this command Vitellius set out with a large force for Arabia Petrea, and, on his way, came to Jerusalem, where he stayed to confer with Antipas for four days. While there, he received official notice of the death of Tiberius, so he returned with his army to Antioch. Tiberius died on March 16, A.D 37; hence, the little domestic arrangement between Antipas and Herodias, and the battle that resulted from it, would be in the year A D 36.

We are now in a position to compare the Gospel story with the foregoing facts of history. In A.D. 28, Herod Antipas hearing of the influence which John the Baptist had obtained over the common people, had him arrested and confined in the fortress of Macherus. Some months later (A.D 29), he caused the Baptist to be beheaded. Six or seven years afterwards, Antipas paid a visit to Rome, and took lodgings in the house where his half-brother Herod was staying. During this visit he became acquainted with this brother's wife, Herodias, and made certain overtures to her, which she accepted on one condition —to which he agreed. After a short stay he returned to Galilee; but here, one of his attendants who had overheard or discovered the little matter planned with Herodias, mentioned the fact in strict confidence to her highness the legitimate wife of Antipas. Thereupon, that lady fled as fast as horses could carry her to Arabia Petrea, and informed her father Aretas—the result being a battle, fought in the same year (A.D 36), in which the army of the tetrarch was destroyed.

Now, looking at the Gospel narrative, it is quite clear that no reconciliation with history is possible. John the Baptist had been dead six or seven years when Antipas married his brother Herod's wife; hence, the little stories of the Baptist reproving that tetrarch, of the daughter of Herodias dancing at the feast, of Antipas promising on oath to give her whatever she asked for, and of John's head being brought to her in a charger—these are all pure fictions, fabricated by the primitive Gospel-writer to account for the imprisonment and death of the Baptist. Matthew, Mark, and Luke found the incidents recorded in the primitive Gospel, and merely made revised copies of them.

But, if we set aside all dates, the conclusion we arrive at is the same.

1. Herod Antipas had not taken Herodias to be his wife when the daughter of Aretas set out for Arabia Petrea, and some weeks later, when the battle was fought, John the Baptist had been dead some time.

2. Herod Antipas would only have been allowed to use the fortress of Macherus as a prison while he and his father-in-law, Aretas, were upon friendly terms. It must therefore have been before the flight of Aretas's daughter, when the Baptist was arrested, and sent there, and some time later put to death.

An Example of Inadvertence.

The editor of Matthew's Gospel represents Jesus as saying (xi. 12):—

> "And from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and men of violence take it by force."

These words are said to have been uttered while the Baptist was alive, and at a period when "the kingdom of heaven" can scarcely be said to have begun. No time had elapsed between "the days of John the Baptist" and the day upon which Jesus is represented as speaking: they were the same days. Only a writer who lived many years after Jesus and the Baptist could have employed the words here put in the mouth of the Nazarene. These words, too, could not have been used until the Christians had become a well-known sect, and had suffered persecution—a fact which again points to post-apostolic times.

ABRACADABRA.

National Secular Society.

Report of Monthly Executive Meeting held on July 31.

The President, Mr. G. W. Foote, in the chair. There were also present:—Messrs. Baker, Barry, Brandes, Cunningham, Davidson, Heaford, Judge, Leat, Lloyd, Neate, Roger, Rosetti, Samuels, Thurlow, and Miss Kough and the Secretary (Miss Vance).

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed.

The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were admitted for the Edmonton, Kingsland, and West Ham Branches and for the Parent Society.

The Secretary reported that the L.C.C. had definitely decided to withdraw the adjourned summonses against the several members of the N.S.S. for taking collections while the permits were suspended, and the final account for legal charges incurred was ordered to be paid. The President announced that as no objection had been raised by subscribers, the balance of the "Fighting Fund" raised in the Freethinker would be handed over to the N.S.S. General Fund.

The correspondence with Mr. J. W. Gott was referred to, and the President's action endorsed; and the following resolution, moved by Mr. Davidson, and seconded by Mr. Heaford, was carried:—

> "That this Executive repudiates all connection or association with Mr. J. W. Gott's propaganda, denies that he has ever had permission to use the name of the N.S.S. on the announcements or advertisements of his meetings, and calls upon him, as a member of this Society, to desist from such outrageous conduct. This Executive further repudiates responsibility for any literature sold at such meetings by Mr. Gott, unless the book, pamphlet, or paper bear the Society's imprimatur or guarantee."

Messrs. Davidson, Roger, and Thurlow were then elected as a sub-committee to consider and report upon certain printed matter falling under the previous resolution.

The question of the delegation to the International Congress at Libson was then reviewed, and after some discussion, particularly in regard to the prolonged absence from England that would be entailed, it was unanimously resolved:—

> "That we retire from the position of the previous resolution on this matter."

Correspondence from Preston and other matters having been dealt with, the meeting adjourned until September 25.

E. M. Vance, General Secretary.

Christian Evidences.

MR. MARSH, the redoubtable Christian Evidence lecturer, who has recently gained an unenviable notoriety by his scandalous statements about a dead Freethinker, has been complaining bitterly of being followed about by Secularists, who have confronted him with his statements, and whom he describes as "dirty hirelings."

As he has continued to reiterate, deny, and repeat these slanders, and finally to make blustering challenges, I wrote him offering to accept his challenges and to produce persons who had heard the statements he now denies, or to expose his particular type of Christian evidence.

Mr. Marsh was announced to give a lecture at Parliament Hill on Sunday, July 27, and notified me he would re-read his former statements, and promised to answer any questions of mine.

On my arrival, I found Mr. Marsh on a brake, with the Rev. C. N. Drawbridge acting as chairman, supported by Mr. Baker, the Rev. O. D. Brown, and other representatives of the C. E. S., either to take care of or repress him. Mr. Marsh's performance consisted of reading a twenty-year-old article from the Freethinker (which he insisted upon describing as a "letter"), reading extracts from a letter, examining at some length a Mr. Richards on trivial matters which were never in dispute, and behaving generally like a hooligan, to the intense delight of a large and carefully packed crowd of his well-known followers. On his conclusion, the Rev. C. N. Drawbridge magnanimously allowed me five minutes in which to correct Mr. Marsh, put my questions, and produce my witnesses—having permitted Mr. Marsh to inquire of the audience whether he had not proved his case, before I opened my mouth.

I commenced, and was interrupted by Mr. Marsh. I requested the chairman to call him to order, and waited whilst they wrangled for some minutes. At the end of half-a-dozen sentences, during which time Mr. Drawbridge made no attempt to stop the howlings of Mr. Marsh's friends, he informed me my time was up.

Messrs. Davidson and Hope (who were there to answer the charge of "following" Mr. Marsh about) kindly waived their time in my favor, and I recommenced. In the next ten minutes, Mr. Drawbridge himself interrupted me no less than three times, whilst he descanted upon the unfairness of the Editor of the Freethinker in not printing in his paper the scholarly epistles of Mr. Marsh. In the meantime, the latter conveniently forgot his promise to reply to my questions. On being reminded of this, I received a partial and shuffling reply to one of them, with a piteous regret that he could not treat me as he would a man. No opportunity was given to Messrs. Judge, Cunningham, Hopkins, and others, my witnesses, whom Mr. Marsh had so desired to hear, as Mr. Drawbridge then announced that they were now "full up" of the other side. This was undoubtedly true; but, feeling that the other side had not had their innings, I called upon those who desired to hear me without interruption to follow, and my friends escorted me to the adjacent N. S. S. platform, accompanied by quite half of the C. E. S. audience, where I was able to hold them for upwards of an hour, to the evident discomfort of our fair-minded opponents. I hope, however, they are compensated by the snapshot they obtained of me on their brake. An incident worth snapshotting was, I am told, the expression on Mr. Marsh's face when a lady in the audience, who, whilst avowing herself a Christian, accused Mr. Marsh of being the aggressor in a disorderly scene at Edmonton on the previous Sunday (when he left his own platform to attack the N. S. S. speaker) and flatly told him she was ashamed of him, and, later on, the spectacle of another lady who, enraged by Mr. Marsh's vicious and untruthful statements about her husband, seized and shook him vigorously.

Mr. Marsh's swaggering and ludicrous challenge to Mr Foote to debate with him was made in the full knowledge that it would never be accepted; but there are others who would condescend to refute him under ordinary conditions. When he can screw up sufficient courage to face this music, minus the assistance of a brake and a C. E S. demonstration, the "following about" to which he so much objects will cease.

EDITH M. VANCE.

"Have you said your prayers?" inquired a mother of her little son. "No, I haven't," was the prompt reply, "and I didn't say 'em last night, nor the night before, and if nothing happens to-night, I shall never say 'em again."—English Illustrated Magazine.

Conductor: "Excuse me, but this is a bad nickel."

Lady Passenger: "Oh, I beg your pardon. That was a mistake. I was saving that for the church collection."

THE SERMON.

First prayer, then praise, then comes the [preachin':
Nae modern theologic teaching
To suit the taste o' warly folk;
But plain, auld-fashioned orthodox,
Wi' hell a'maist in ilka sentence,
To fricht the sinner to repentance.
The rich, the usurer, the cheat,
The harlot, and the hypocrite,
The sot, the glutton, and the thief,
The suicide, o' sinners chief,
Wi' unbelievers a' are doomed
To burn, and never be consumed,
In brimstane fire and burning marl
Doon yonder in the nether warl'.
Lood and lang the preacher rails,
Flings his airms aboot like flails;
Stamps and raves like ane possessed,
Bangs the Bible, dauds the desk,
Gars the stour flee oot in clouds
Wi' sic unmercifu'-like thuds
That sleepers wauken wi' the soun',
Sit up at last and glower aroun',
Wi' dazed-like luks that seem to say,
"Guid Lord, is this the judgment day?"

—George Cunningham, "Sunday."

THE GLOOMY DEAN.

They've christened him the Gloomy Dean,
For oft he vents his learned spleen
By scoffing, in sardonic mood,
At dreams of equal brotherhood.
Ah, well we know his cultured school
That breeds the Philosophic Fool,
Who, stuffed with ancient lore, decries
The nascent, live Humanities!
Now, with some ponderous paradox,
The gentler hopes of man he mocks;
Now, flattered by the smiling Press,
Acclaims the old Vindictiveness.
A Gloomy Dean! Benighted he
By his own dim theology—
Deep versed in doctrines of Saint Paul,
Of modern vision heedless all—
No second Swift is here, we trow;
The gloom that beetles on his brow
Is of the dull, belated kind
That haunts the mediæval mind:
For the Dark Ages best had been
The birth-time of this Gloomy Dean.

—The Humanitarian.

Husband (sarcastically): "Well, my dear, did you derive much consolation from your attendance at church this morning?"

Wife (enthusiastically): "Rather! Mrs. Gibbs had on that old blue hat of hers—and I sat right in front of her the whole morning."—London Mail.

Obituary.

We regret to record the death of Mr. John Oram, of Bath, which occurred on July 22, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. For upwards of forty years Mr. Oram was a prominent Freethinker, who worked faithfully against superstition and for the dissemination of the grand truths of Secularism. He acted as secretary of the Branch of the N. S. S. which existed at Bath some twenty years ago. He died in the faith in the service of which he had spent his life; and although all the members of his family were not of his way of thinking, they loyally carried out his wish that only a Secular Service should be conducted at his funeral, which took place on Monday, July 28. We express our sincere sympathy with the family in their bereavement. —J. T. L.

It is with deep regret that I record the death of Mr. Alton C. V. Bonvouni, of Pembroke Dock, the son of Mr. D E. Bonvouni, of Letterstone, Pembroke. Our friend, who was in the prime of his life (being only twenty-one), unfortunately lost his life while bathing on Sunday, July 20. Brought up in a Secular home, he was always ready and willing to assist in every possible way the advancement of the Secular movement. His nobleness of mind and his sterling qualities as a man endeared him to all that knew him. His god was science and his ideal was to know the truth. The funeral took place on Thursday, July 31. Owing to great difficulties, it was not a Secular funeral. To his father, mother, sister, and brother we tender our sincere condolence.—F. J. F.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 33 SUNDAY, AUGUST 17, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

A wise and honest man has other guides than superstition to direct his conduct.—MACAULAY.

Principles and Persons.

"VANOC" of the Referee is a facile writer, but a man who undertakes to write on anything and everything must write a good deal of nonsense in the course of a year. There was a fine specimen of such nonsense in "Vanoc's" last week's article. The subject of the article was "Cranks"—of which there are three species,—the useful cranks, with whom "Vanoc" agrees; the mischievous cranks, with whom he disagrees; and the indifferent cranks, in whom he takes no interest at all. This classification is purely personal; that is to say, an active and earnest promoter of any principle whatever is a crank in the first, second, or third category, just as he happens to please, displease, or fail to affect "Vanoc." Such a criterion may be a good working one at the Referee office; from the nature of the case, however, it cannot be of the least use anywhere else.

"Vanoc's" signs of crankyism, by the way, are abundantly displayed in the Gospel life of Jesus Christ. One of the charges against that personage was that he was a public upsetter. He was so much so, in fact, that his own disciples forsook him and fled when he was arrested by the public authorities, and the very mob that acclaimed him with "Hosannahs!" when he rode into Jerusalem turned against him only a few days after and clamored for his blood. He became "this fellow" at the last. One can imagine the contempt with which the "Vanocs" of that day uttered the withering expression.

But that is not the special point to which we desire to draw attention in "Vanoc's" article. The point is this. It will be remembered that Christian apologists have always made much use of the "great man" argument. They run off a list of great men, in various branches of human knowledge and activity, who were or are Christians, at least by profession; they then ask the "infidel" how he can have the impudence to set up his own judgment against that grand army of authorities? Were all those mighty geniuses, of all European countries and centuries, in the wrong? And is he, the puny opponent of all of them, in the right? People who are Christians themselves regard this as an unanswerable argument. They overlook the fact that the same argument, in different conditions of time and place, could be employed to prove the truth of every religion in the world. It would justify Mohammedanism at Constantinople, Brahmanism at Calcutta or Bombay, Buddhism in Ceylon or Tibet, and Judaism in all parts of the civilised world where the spirit of commerce prevails. The truth is that this so-called argument against the "infidel" is a sheer fallacy. Neither the size nor the number of the supporters of any opinion gives it an iota of validity. An opinion rests entirely on its evidence,—which is the same whether its adherents are counted by units or by millions. Could anyone conceive a medical congress, for instance, taking a vote to decide whether any biological or physiological theory is true or false? It is only in theology that such ridiculous practices obtain. Voting what shall be done is proper and necessary; voting what shall be believed is simple fatuity. The whole world may be right against one man; but, also, one man may be right against the whole world. Such a case happened when the great and noble Giordano Bruno was burnt alive at Rome. He was one of the "cranks," and his name is immortal. And where are his persecutors now? Nothing but his fate and personality saves them from absolute oblivion.

"Vanoc" makes his own use of this foolish "great man" argument. He employs it in behalf of what he calls Research Defence; which is a very pretty euphemism for cutting up animals alive. We are not going to discuss vivisection just now, but we always like things to be called by their proper names. It is beside our purpose even to question the statement that "a great saving of human and animal life and health is already due to the Research people." We wish to deal with "Vanoc's" method of avoiding personal responsibility in this matter. "I have always found it a safe plan," he says, "to weigh personalities when facts are in dispute. The Chairman of the Committee of the Research Defence Society, Mr. Sydney Holland, is also Chairman of the London Hospital and the Poplar Hospital. The fact that Mr. Holland, who has devoted his life to the saving of human health, takes a responsible part in the Research Society's labors is good enough for me, because I know, on the best of evidence—experience, that there could be no inhumanity in any campaign in which he is a leader."

Now what does this contention amount to? It amounts to this—that no good man can be in the wrong, that no generous man can be mistaken, that no disinterested man can do any injury to his fellow men.

But this is flatly contradicted by personal experience and universal history. We all know honest people in private life who are a constant source of trouble and annoyance to those around them,—and even to others who are not around them. And is it not a commonplace of historical criticism that well-meaning men have been the authors of a very large part of all the mischief and misery in the world? Victor Hugo wrote almost a plea for Torquemada. The great poet made the great Inquisitor human by explaining his point of view. Lecky did a similar thing, in a more abstract way, in his Rationalism; and George Eliot (a woman of genius and a thoroughgoing Freethinker), in reviewing Lecky's work, dwelt on the wisdom of recognising and avowing that persecution was not due to "man's inhumanity to man" but to the damnable doctrine of salvation by faith.

Is it not obvious that "Vanoc's" trust in Mr. Holland would apply equally well to Torquemada? Suppose the question were, should the Inquisition and its work be countenanced? The "Vanoc" of that day might argue in this manner: "I know that cruel sufferings are inflicted on heretics in the dungeons and torture-chambers of this institution; I know that heretics' wives and families are deprived of their property and thrown into destitution—for no apparent fault of their own; I know that the ordinary laws of evidence are flouted and defied in the examination of these poor prisoners. I know all this, and in ordinary circumstances I should condemn and denounce it. But there is that good man Torquemada. How can I mistrust him? He tells me that all these cruelties and other outrages—for such they are on the face of them—are necessary to the spiritual "health" of the community. I cannot overlook that great consideration. Christianity is the religion of sacrifice. True, the victims in this instance do not sacrifice themselves; but what does it matter, after all, as long as they are sacrificed? The act itself depends neither upon the motive nor the means. Anyhow, I put my trust in the honor and humanity of the great and good Torquemada. I am satisfied from experience that there can be no real inhumanity in any campaign in which he is a leader."

Digitized by Google

"Vanoc's" fine gospel ends with "Three cheers for Torquemada."

We decline to join in that acclamation. We beg all the readers we have the honor to address not to join in any such chorus. Think for yourselves. Put your conscience in no man's keeping. Accept your own intellectual and moral responsibilities. You have moral, as well as legal, duties to perform. If you cannot do your fellow men, or the lower animals, any particular good—which is generally a rash assumption—you can at least refrain from doing them any injury, or letting others do them injury in your name. Remember the sublime exclamation of Macbeth under the agony of his wife's temptation to the murder of his king, his friend, his benefactor:—

> "Prithee, peace:
> I dare do all that may become a man;
> Who dares do more is none."

G. W. FOOTE.

Science and God.—II.

(Concluded from p. 499.)

THE copy of Drummond's lectures to which I referred in my previous article, has been, if not exactly enriched with notes by some reader, at least annotated. And to the passage in which Drummond says the doctrine of Evolution has in itself been a contribution to religion, an anonymous passage has been appended. I think the passage is taken from one of Mr. Balfour's writings, but its origin is immaterial. The substance of the note is that Evolution has provided two arguments: one in favor of religion in general, the other in favor of Christianity in particular. The first is, that if Evolution be true we should expect the principle of growth to express itself in religion as it does in other directions. The second, that by the fact of its survival, Christianity has demonstrated its fitness to survive, and so must answer to some real need of the human spirit. Either we must grant this or we must surrender the principle of the survival of the fittest, since, in the case of Christianity, the fittest has not survived.

Let us consider first of all the analogy of growth. In ordinary instances growth implies three things. Either there is growth in stature—a mere increase in size—or there is an enlargement in function, or there is an increase of knowledge. Government may be said to grow when its powers are extended over a wider area. Knowledge grows when our information concerning a subject becomes more precise. So long as we keep to these plain meanings of growth there is no confusion; and if by religious growth was intended either of these meanings, or all of them, all would be clear likewise. The truth is, however, that none of these meanings fit the case of religion. It has not grown to be a larger part in life; on the contrary, it has become more and more negligible. One need not go back to the earliest period of human history or culture for proof of this. Three or four centuries ago religion was still counted of sufficient importance to mark a boundary between nations, and within its scope secular affairs could still be subordinated to right religious belief. To-day a Christian "Jehad" is no longer possible; not because there are no fanatical Christians left, but because in all civilised countries there exists a large body of opinion that definitely relegates religion to a subordinate position.

Neither has there been growth in the functions exercised by religion. Its function as lawgiver in the physical world is definitely abandoned, and all it asks now is for science to let it alone. In ethics and sociology it still maintains a precarious kind of an existence, but even here it no longer claims supreme position. It is content to urge its utility as a source of inspiration, to rank as one among a number of other forces that are frankly secular and utilitarian. Finally, there has been no growth in the shape of an extension of knowledge. Even the religious man is now amused at the precise character of the information earlier believers had about God. The affairs of God, his aims and intentions, were discussed with the same degree of confidence that one might now discuss the proceedings of the House of Commons. The modern believer is far more anxious to impress upon the world how little we know about God, or how little we can ever know. There is nothing surprising about this; the surprising thing is that he should call this process of realisation growth in religion. A process that removes the operation of deity from one department of the universe after another, which deprives religion of any peculiar or exclusive function in the social structure, and, finally, which brings home to people the conviction that all their assumed knowledge of God is a delusion, is characterised as growth, and as being on all fours with the growth exemplified in the process of Evolution! If this be growth, one wonders what decay would be like. The truth is, that religion quite lacks the quality of growth. Its whole history is one of decline. The only growth connected with it is that which leads the instructed mind to realise the utter futility of claims made on its behalf.

Much of the strength of the argument that Christianity has survived because of its "fitness" is derived from an unexpressed identification of "fitness" with an ethical significance with which it has no necessary connection. It is a truism that survival shows fitness to survive, but whether that which survives is ethically admirable is quite another question. In a thieves' kitchen honesty and truthfulness are not qualities that would lead to survival. In an environment of an opposite kind greed and cunning would lead to suppression. It is indisputable that Christianity survived, but it is very disputable that its survival was either a good thing for the race, or that it survived because of ethical or intellectual superiority over forms of belief or modes of life that were suppressed. The triumph of early Christianity over Paganism was not due to its inherent ethical or intellectual superiority, but precisely because it strengthened and utilised some of the worst elements in the life of the ancient civilisation. The truth of this is demonstrated in the fact that the decay of Roman civilisation proceeded with increasing speed as Christianity gained more complete control.

Further, when we come to Christian times, we see that the survival of Christianity was not a question of demonstrating its fitness to survive, but one of preventing any kind of competition. And there can be no question of the survival of the fittest when competition is not allowed to exist. In the world of science there is a survival of the fittest, because there all opinions are permitted, and the ones that live have to prove their worth. In religion, for many hundreds of years, no opposing opinions were permitted, and the survival of one opinion was proof only of a forced and artificial culture. The Church carefully weeded out all undesirable variations, and at the same time maintained an environment that placed a heavy premium upon the Christian type. Under such circumstances the survival of Christianity was no more proof of its ethical or social value than the existence of a heavily subsidised business house would be proof of its commercial soundness. How little genuine survival value Christianity possessed was shown by the fact that so soon as changes in the environment were effected—first, by the influence of the civilised Mohammedan world from the ninth to the thirteenth century; then, by the revival of the classical culture; and, later, by the rebirth of the scientific spirit, Christianity was faced by the choice of modification or disappearance.

The same lesson is seen in contemporary life. Christianity is so little able to live in open and fair competition with other forms that the energies of its professional advocates are mainly expended in the maintenance of an artificial environment. We have a special literature created to ward off attack, there is a careful shielding of believers from Freethought teachings, social influences are maintained that place a premium upon faith and attach a penalty to unbelief, anti-Christian literature is banned or boycotted, thousands of Christians — the majority, probably—pass through life without finding their beliefs ever brought into healthy antagonism with opposite opinions, and thousands confess openly that they avoid such encounters for fear it will unsettle their faith. The whole of the quarrel over education is an illustration of the same truth. The child must be surrounded with an artificially sustained religious atmosphere, because the normal play of social life will leave them void of inclination towards religious belief. The whole of the special paraphernalia attached to religion—the special form of language, dress, mental attitude, etc.—are all so many admissions that once Christianity is placed on the same level as other opinions, subject to the same free criticism and open competition, it would hardly survive a single generation of civilised life.

In what has been said it has been taken for granted that Christianity has survived. But this is really conceding too much—for more than is warranted by the facts. As a matter of fact, in spite of the wholesale elimination of non-Christians, in spite also of the maintenance of an environment favorable to Christianity, hostile influences have been too strong to be permanently denied. In what part of the world has Christianity really and honestly survived? Something near the original thing may be met with in Abyssinia and parts of the South-East of Europe—notably among people who have made little progress—but where else? Christianity is in other places in name, but in teaching and in doctrines the modification has been so great and so profound that it is really a different faith altogether. There has been a continuity of possession, even of formula; but to point to the Christianity existing in England, or America, or Germany, as proof that Christianity has survived, is absurd. Every one of the orthodox doctrines of Christianity has been successfully challenged in its own pulpits. Preachers have made reputations by voicing the heresies for which better men suffered. A religion that becomes so modified cannot really be said to survive. One might as well talk of the Eohippus surviving because its descendant, the horse, is still with us. An organism or an institution that can only survive by a complete change of character has really demonstrated that in its original state it could not have survived at all.

Finally, neither Christianity nor religion in general meets a deep and indestructible need of human nature. The best men and women are always more or less uneasy under religion, not because it imposes restraints, but because these restraints are of the wrong order. Men are comfortable enough under all sorts of social or ethical restrictions, but they are in more or less continuous revolt against religion. And this is because religion, in spite of the enormous conservative power behind it, is continuously coming into conflict with the more progressive and humanising tendencies of contemporary life. In civilised countries it is not man that seeks religion; it is religion, in the shape of many organisations, that seeks man. Man can get along well enough without his gods, but his gods cannot get on at all without him. For, apart from all metaphor, it was man's belief that first gave the gods their being; their life continues only so long as that belief remains, and its cessation puts a period to their existence.

"An Average Man" Caught Napping.

WE have no intention of reviewing, in the present article, Professor Bury's eminently sane little book, entitled A History of Freedom of Thought, which is one of the most recent volumes in the Home University Library; but we wish to call special attention to certain errors into which "An Average Man" has fallen in his references to this work in a breezy article in the Manchester City News for August 2. Usually this popular writer is delightfully sensible and fresh; but every now and then he gives us reasons to suspect either that he has not been fully emancipated himself from the traditions of the past, or else that he yields to the temptation of pandering, more or less, to the prejudices of his readers. Yet, while there are statements in the article under consideration upon which we feel bound to animadvert, we rejoice to say that we greatly admire the wholesome tone and broadening tendency of his writings in general.

Early in his review of Professor Bury's book, "An Average Man" says: "It will be a bad and sad day for the nation if it ceases to believe." Ceases to believe what? During the last three hundred years, and particularly during the last fifty, the nation has ceased to believe in a vast variety of things. Three hundred years ago the nation believed in witchcraft and in burning witches. During the seventeenth century trials for witchcraft in this country were frightfully numerous. In 1634 seventeen Lancashire witches were condemned on the evidence of one boy. From 1645 to 1647 some three hundred were indicted in Suffolk and Essex alone, of whom nearly two-thirds were convicted. Who can ever forget the famous trial of the Suffolk witches at Bury St. Edmunds, when Sir Matthew Hale acted as judge and Sir Thomas Browne as medical expert witness? And is it not on record that in 1712 some Hertfordshire clergymen prosecuted a poor woman named Jane Wenham for the same alleged crime? The judge did not believe in witchcraft, and charged the jury strongly in favor of the accused; but the rector of the parish testified, "on his faith as a clergyman," that he believed her to be a witch, and the jury, composed of men tyrannised over by the parsonry, returned a verdict of guilty. John Wesley was a firm believer in witchcraft, and, writing in 1768, he maintained that those who disbelieved in it did so "in direct opposition, not only to the Bible, but to the suffrage of the wisest and best of men in all ages and nations"; and he went to the length of holding "that the giving up witchcraft is in effect giving up the Bible." To-day that belief is extinct, though the Bible fully justifies it. Does "An Average Man" mean to say that it was "a bad and sad day for the nation" when it threw that foolish superstition overboard? Certainly not.

Fifty years ago the doctrine of the verbal inspiration and infallibility of the Bible was held by the nation as an essential article of the Christian faith. Again and again have we heard preachers declare that every word—every punctuation mark even—in the Sacred Book was God's. But you can count on the fingers of your two hands all the prominent people who cherish that view now. Ten years ago we did hear a preacher declare from his pulpit that he believed every word between the two covers of Holy Writ; but the same preacher admitted, in conversation with the present writer a few months ago, that such a belief is no longer tenable. Adam and Eve and the Garden of Eden have vanished from history; and in a book recently published we are informed that hell has lost all its Dantesque terrors. Even the Devil has been dropped by the majority of the people. Is the nation any the poorer for the disappearance of all these beliefs?

The startling fact is that for the last two hundred years the theology of the Church has been undergoing a process of impoverishment. How much less in quantity it is now than it was then. And the process is still going on. "It will be a bad and sad day for the nation if it ceases to believe," says "An Average Man"; and again we ask, ceases to believe what? If "An Average Man" admits, as we know he does, that the loss of the beliefs just mentioned has done the nation no harm, will he kindly tell us which of the beliefs that still remain are essential to its wellbeing? On what grounds does he indulge in such a dogmatic assertion? Take, for example, the belief in God and a future life, or even the belief in Christ as the Savior of the world, and inform us of what benefit it has been to this nation. Why, according to a report in the Daily News and Leader for August 7, the Rev. S. J. Whitmee told a meeting at Chipperfield that "Heathenism is as dense in the villages of Hertfordshire as in the South Sea Islands"; and in an interview with a representative of the same newspaper the reverend gentleman explained that by "Heathenism" he meant a growing disregard of God and religion. This man of God is doubtless pessimistic, and exaggerates, in consequence of the scanty support given to his motor-car mission up and down the country; and yet there is a great deal of truth in what he says. Everywhere religious belief is decidedly on the decline, and has been so for the last fifty years; but we must point "An Average Man" to the fact that during the last sixty years, whilst the population of England and Wales has more than doubled, crime has decreased by almost one-half. This fact cannot serve as a firm basis for our friend's lugubrious prophecy; and we are confident he cannot enlist any other fact in his service.

We take it for granted that by "belief" "An Average Man" means belief in the supernatural, for no one ever ceases to believe in the natural. He advocates universal toleration, because, in the long run, scepticism, even unbelief itself, tends to cleanse and refine faith. "The age of reason," he says further, "need not be the age of unbelief, but it must be the age of 'intelligent' faith"; but, surely, there can be no "intelligent" faith in the supernatural, because the supernatural is not an object of intelligence. If it be, as Shakespeare so subtly defines it, "the undiscovered country, from whose bourne no traveller returns," it follows, of necessity, that faith in it must be blind. It is a realm from which not a scrap of intelligence has ever reached our shores, and both logically and ethically we are forced to the conclusion that faith in it can never be intelligent.

What does "An Average Man" mean by "religion" and "Christian principles"? Are Confucianism and Buddhism religions, and if they are, do they embody "Christian principles"? If they do, then Christian principles do not stand for anything that is unique and distinctive, but for something that is common to all periods and countries. In other words, religion and Christian principles confine their attention to this world and life alone, and do not embrace supernaturalism in any shape or form. But we are afraid, after all, that "An Average Man" employs the terms "religion" and "Christian principles" in the same sense as the theologians. In some vague, undefined sense he evidently believes in God and immortality, and that in some way freedom of thought is bound to strengthen and refine such a belief. Freedom of thought, of course, is only another word for toleration. Well, we Atheists are zealous believers in and advocates of toleration; and, in fact, we are its only genuine champions in practice. Even "An Average Man" is not really tolerant towards Freethinkers. He either does not know us, or regards us as a negligible quantity, when he says that "it will be a bad and sad day for the nation when it ceases to believe." Be that as it may, the fact remains that, in the estimation of this clever journalist, doubters, heretics, unbelievers, scientists prove, ultimately, invaluable servants of religion. Whatever discoveries scientists and philosophers may make are destined to redound to the glory of religion. He says:—

> "I am concerned with the fact that heresy, so called, has always existed, and that the heretics have been the men of new ideas, the advanced thinkers, the scholars, and the scientists. But I have found also that when the truths were established they have been incorporated in religion, though it must be admitted, only tardily. Yet their final acceptance is the best vindication of freedom of thought that we can have, and the one great fact to regret is that this freedom was so often denied or rigorously penalised."

What "An Average Man" fails to realise is that the incorporation of natural knowledge in religion results in its gradual disintegration. Take an example. The sciences of astronomy and geology have robbed the first three chapters of Genesis of their historicity. This is now admitted by practically all Christian critics. But the loss of the first three chapters of Genesis carries with it the loss of the foundation upon which the Christian conception of redemption has always rested. If the third of Genesis is not historical, the fifth of Romans is a house built upon the sand; and if the fifth of Romans is not true the Christian Church in all ages has borne witness to a lie, and is itself the supreme lie. Instead of strengthening religion science has fatally emasculated it. All the heretics of the past were the precursors and heralds of modern science; and modern science and religion are absolutely irreconcilable. They attempt to interpret the Universe on opposite principles. Now, Rationalism is only another word for science. Rationalism, according to "An Average Man," is doubtless an excellent thing, but it has its limitations. It fails because it does not "confirm us in any idea of existence after death." But what right has anybody to expect Rationalism to do anything of the kind? Science recognises no hereafter at all, and this is the reason why it throws no light upon it. It is not accurate to say that it "abolishes hell with costs," because not recognising a hereafter it knows nothing about either heaven or hell. "An Average Man" says: "Does it provide us with a higher morality, a truer idea of goodness and virtue, a nobler gospel? I think not." From this we totally differ. Morality is a sphere in which reason is the sole umpire; and religion has degraded morality by supplying it with false motives and sanctions. What, then, is wrong with modern unbelief? Nothing, except its rarity; nothing, except its being misunderstood and misrepresented by those who attack it. We have a great admiration for "An Average Man," and we tolerate him gladly; but we do wish he would take pains to acquire a more accurate and reliable knowledge of the principles of Rationalism.

Cockney Christianity.

> "Of all the dull, stagnant, unedifying entourages, that of middle-class Dissent seems to me the stupidest."
> —MATTHEW ARNOLD.

To the superficial observer, not skilled to penetrate beneath the surface of things, there is probably but one thing in the world more solemn than a funeral; and that is religion. Short of death itself, nothing seems more awful than the Christian Scheme of Salvation. Only think of it! To Mr. John Smith, simply the most stupendous thought that can engage the attention of the watery custard which he is pleased to consider as representing the human mind. For it is not alone the weal or woe of all living human beings, including Mrs. Smith and the children, but also of generations of Smiths unborn, that may be involved in the awful issue.

The very perpetuity of the Scheme, in a vanishing world, where all things are passing away even as a dream, seems to impart a quality of awe to the dwarfed perception of the average believer. To a superficial observer all this must seem most solemn and impressive. But appearances are deceptive, and it is foolish to look at any question with only one eye, as is said to be the habit of birds. The unfeathered biped, man, should know better. A more philosophic view of the matter would lead to another conclusion. So far from religion being a serious affair, it is simply a joke. An expensive and elaborate jest it may be, but none the less a jest. You cannot tell what the religious circus is like by looking at the highly-colored posters on the walls. For in all nations it has been customary from time immemorial to invest religion with an air of gloom. So it was "in the beginning," is now, and must be, even in the byeways of the great Metropolis.

The mere circumstance of that respectable ratepayer, Mr. John Smith, "finding Jesus" in his fiftieth year is enough to set his numerous friends and acquaintances on the alert. They know that when he goes psalm-smiting his countenance will exhibit the tragic expression of a tired cab-horse, and that his every word, look, and action will eclipse the gaiety of the spectators.

Mr. John Smith, junior, is compelled to check the tide of his laughter with a sigh. Miss Henrietta Smith, his sister, finds that pa's condition clouds the delights of sweethearting. Like Banquo's ghost at the feast, the blear-eyed picture of melancholy imbecility overawes the flow of soul. But if "finding Jesus" is but a laughing matter, how dire are the after-effects. Resplendent in his best clothes, Mr. John Smith conveys his family to the nearest jerry-built church or tin tabernacle. If he has the disease badly, this will become the rule every Sunday. He is under the spell of religiosity, and as proud of it as a corpse with two tombstones. Master Johnny can hardly contain himself for speechless transport as he finds that his Sunday fishing excursions are no longer to be tolerated. He turns green with envy when he passes the splendid pageant of the greengrocer's boy and the postman's son with rods and bait-cans, on their way to the still waters of the nearest pond. Miss Henrietta, who is neither so blind as a bat nor so deaf as an adder, may easily envy 'Arry and 'Arriet treading the primrose path of dalliance. What would she not give for the chance of starting the stitching in 'Arry's heart herself? As for Mrs. Smith, she is firmly convinced that all this piety springs from the idea of her lord and master to be considered "respectable," and, incidentally, to extend his business. In one of her confidential chats over the tea-table with Mrs. Jones, she expresses her private opinion with a powerful metaphor: "Find Jesus, my dear! I had as soon go to sea in a ship afire."

What does Mr. John Smith himself gain by this finding of the "Blessed Savior"? The Bible? He reads it daily, and his verbal knowledge is nearly perfect; but what he apprehends is but a purblind parson's conception of what is written. The literature of Israel is intensely local. There are passages where the perfumes of Sharon and Lebanon, the glory of the hills about Jerusalem, the beauty of the daughters of Judæa, are so caught and rendered that in a distant age, an alien speech, a remote land, they affect the reader. Under what restrictions, and with what explanations, the pictures of the Orient are adapted to the requirements of uneducated Londoners. Mr. Smith cannot usefully adopt Oriental thought with his ordinary business avocation. He cannot, with any success, apply Eastern ethics to everyday life. Hence his admiration for the sleek parson who shepherds the flock at the church he attends. The minister instructs poor Mr. Smith as if the Bible were of yesterday and the legends but the facts of fifth-edition journalism. Hence the delight of the professional soul-saver and the limitations of poor Mr. Smith, who rapidly becomes the perfect expression of the self-opinionated Englishman, a figure at which all educated foreigners raise their eyebrows and politely smile.

Mr. Salt's "Shelley."—II.

THERE is one point of Shelley criticism which I think has been overdone, and overdone by Mr. Salt himself (if he will allow me to say so) in his admirable opening chapter on "Rival Views of Shelley." From the "fiend" of the early criticism of 1821 to Matthew Arnold's "ineffectual angel," from damning Shelley to smothering him with pity, is a long way; and Mr. Salt is rightly humorous in relation to both extremes. We are with him, and always have been with him, in holding that Shelley has to be taken seriously as the herald of a new age and a new state of society. The notion that "materialists" aim at destroying the "ideal" is the very acme of ridiculousness. They have feeling and imagination like other men, and need both to be fed and stimulated. Mr. Salt remarks that it is, of course, as Poet that Shelley "holds the surest claim to immortality." Those who accept his evangel love him with a double love, and to them "one single spirit-song from the tumultuous harmonies of his lyrical masterpiece is more precious than all the 'systems' that the mind of democrat can devise." We endorse this, and we add that the "systems" that anybody can devise are of very little importance, and that so far from being delightful they are only too apt to taste like sawdust. For my part, as a lifelong lover of Shelley, I protest that I cannot imagine his caring to sing one single note for a Bellamy paradise. He sings the ideas and sentiments that are necessary to man's happiness; without which "the paragon of animals" may be as ill off as any lower animal,—may be well-drilled, and decorous, and outwardly altruistic—yet all the time essentially undignified and miserable. Mr. Salt knows all this at least as well as we do, and his passionate love for Shelley led him, as we think, into overdoing his denunciation of the mostly insignificant critics who wielded their pens against Shelley, both as a man and as a poet. They only acted after their kind. Why not let them drop into their natural oblivion? What, after all, does it matter, that the geese hissed at Shelley, and the asses brayed against him? Too much attention to these creatures spoils the critical perspective. Shelley was never without admirers amongst capable judges. Byron knew that Shelley was a great poet; so did Keats—and Landor, and Browning, and Tennyson—and Meredith, and Swinburne, whose longevity tended to conceal the fact that they belonged to a much earlier age than that in which they died. I have been astonished of late years at recognising what a long list of eminent writers one could compile—such as John Mill, Alexander Bain, Macaulay, and George Eliot—who gave Shelley their deep if discriminating admiration. Moreover, original critics are nearly as scarce as original poets. The ordinary journalist is simply a man with a pen—though he may write in a way that overawes the ordinary reader. How many critics, if Shakespeare himself came along again, would "feel the touch of his electric hand"? Is it not true, as Wordsworth said, that a great poet has to create the taste by which he is appreciated? A great poet is always an original poet. He simply must wait for adequate recognition. Shelley was a great original poet, and he had to wait, and what more is there to be said? That he was assailed with hatred and abuse only means that Christianity was rampant when he offered the world a philosophy which, if it is to be called a religion, was the religion of humanity.

In answer to the better sort of Christians—some of whom fancy that Shelley was a Christian without knowing it, and others that he would have become a Christian if he had lived longer—Mr. Salt writes as follows:—

> "It may be said that the gospel preached by Shelley was, like that of Christianity, a gospel of love. But here again the distinction between the teaching of Christ and the teaching of his followers is a vital one. And it must be noted that the love which Shelley inculcates is represented by him as resulting from the innate goodness, the natural benevolence of mankind, and not from any sense of religious obligation. Freethought and liberty are the very basis of Shelleyan morality, it being Shelley's contention that virtue results from the intuitive desire to promote the happiness of others, and that morality must languish in proportion as freedom of thought and action is withdrawn. This code of morals can scarcely be held to be compatible with the doctrines of Christianity."

One is pleased also, to read Mr. Salt's plea for Queen Mab:—

"I cannot follow Mr. Forman's example of relegating Queen Mab to the juvenilia, as if it were unworthy of the serious attention of Shelley students. It is in many ways a crude and ill-considered performance, but its defects lie more in the style than in the conception—to repeat what Shelley said of it in later years 'the matter is good, but the treatment is not equal.' The views expressed in Queen Mab on religious and social topics are practically the same as those held by Shelley to the last day of his life, and, as Mr. Forman himself tells us, 'the poem and its notes played a considerable part in the growth of Freethought in England and America, especially among the working classes.' For both of these reasons it seems to me that Queen Mab will always maintain an honorable place in the records of its author's achievements."

This is extremely well said. I agree with every word of it. I would even go further. What on earth do some critics expect from young poets who have only just passed boyhood? Shelley's Queen Mab is faulty in one way just as Keats's Endymion is faulty in another way. Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis showed youth and inexperience. But a sagacious eye might see the beginnings of a great poet in each of them.

This last quotation from Mr. Salt's book is a long one, but it could not well be broken.

"However justifiable our dread of mere sentimental eulogy, we may surely venture to speak generously and unreservedly in our praise of a man whose great primary qualities of unworldliness and sincerity drew unstinted tributes of admiration from those who knew him personally, even when they chanced to be cynical lawyers, satirical novelists, bluff sailors, retired cavalry officers, or misanthropic poets.

"Such homage paid to such a character does not imply that we are blind to the many foibles, eccentricities, and minor blemishes by which even the noblest nature may be crossed and chequered, and from which Shelley was certainly not exempt. We are well aware that his life, except in its one dominant feature, was a strange mixture of contrary tendencies and varying moods. He was hopeful and despondent, strong and weak, graceful and awkward, frugal and lavish, serious and playful, wise and whimsical, forbearing and charitable to a single degree in his intercourse with friend or foe, yet on rare occasions hasty and unjust in his judgments; by habit candid and trustworthy, yet sometimes led on by a predilection for mystery, and by an extreme dislike of causing pain or disappointment, to be evasive and circuitous in his dealings. But while he was thus, to some extent, the creature of conflicting moods and circumstances—'chased by the spirit of his destiny,' as he himself expressed it, 'from purpose to purpose, like clouds by the wind'—it is important to remember that these contradictions and weaknesses lay on the surface of his nature, and not at its core; for his character in all vital and essential points was strikingly firm and consistent, his innate and solid virtues standing him in good stead at all the great and fateful crises of his mature life."

I call that beautifully written, and I believe it is true. It is justified by all that Shelley said and did during the last twelve years of his life. But words fail to describe what he had grown into when blind fate cut short his career in the Bay of Spezzia, and English literature suffered an immeasurable loss.

"There was the very Best of men, and he was treated as the very Worst," said Trelawny to Swinburne, fifty years after that dramatic cremation on the Italian seashore, fifty years after Trelawny snatched that "heart of hearts" from the funeral flames. A similar tribute was wrung from the better nature of Byron. "I never knew another man," he said, "who was not a beast in comparison with him."

G. W. FOOTE.

The Warfare of Truth.

THEIR image of Truth—the dead form, the mere shell
Whence the spirit escapes them—men worship too well;
But the goddess herself, all unknown to their gaze,
They shrink from with horror, they dread all their days:
And if vision grew not with renewal of youth,
The world would ne'er witness the triumph of Truth.

In their systems on earth, in their dreams of the sky,
Men love the delusion, they cherish the lie;
Who dares undeceive them they hang and they burn,
And only of martyrs will man ever learn.
Dead sea apes still enchanted, with nail and with tooth
Men rend the rash brother who brings them new truth.

Fair Science arose and she read the dim past,
The ascent of our species through periods vast;
She taught us new lessons of thought and of act—
Not guesswork of fiction, but guidance of fact.
From Protestant Oxford, from Popish Maynooth,
Came the howl against Science, the shriek against Truth.

Who sees the sad city where, weary and worn,
The victims of want wish they never were born,
Let him delve to the root and proclaim the true cause
And the means of controlling stern Nature's grim laws:
Him they stone as of old, they revile without ruth,
For seeking strange knowledge and speaking new truth.

The poor are too many, competing to death;
Yet tell them, with ever so earnest a breath,
To limit their children, to limit their dead,
To limit their horrible struggle for bread,
And straight you're a fiend, a foul monster uncouth,
To dare be so vile as to teach precious truth.

All truth must be pleasant—the edict so runs—
And never must point to a path that man shuns
Or else 'tis a madness, a crime, a disgrace,
A heresy hell-born that flaunts in our face:
For the world never welcomes such wisdom, forsooth,
As shows the strait way of salvation by truth.

Men talk of their Savior, hung high by the priest,
Of Socrates martyr'd for teaching the Beast—
That beast the great Public that crushes true friends
And crouches to flatterers seeking their ends;
But this only they see: In the world's cruel youth
The wisest and bravest were martyr'd for Truth.

How many have died but for seeing too well,
Have swooned on the rack and have sighed in their cell!
Men honor such brave ones, such heroes of old;
They can worship the past with devotion untold:
But they see not that now, in this age, forsooth,
Victims still suffer for speaking new truth.

So age after age is Truth's triumph begun;
So battle by battle the war must be won.
Pioneers must push forward ahead of the host,
And the foremost and bravest must suffer the most.
Must it always be so? Must the Fetish, forsooth,
For ever take toll of the vanguard of Truth?

Not if manhood survive, not if wisdom endure,
To teach life's true lessons to rich and to poor.
For the dawn is upon us, the daybreak is near,
The evil deciphered, the problem grown clear.
Even now men are learning the wisdom that smooths
The pathway of brothers who bring them new truths.

AN ACTOR'S PHILOSOPHY.

Is it not possible that the peoples of the earth will arise in the might of a new-born religion and will knock at the gates of the world's conscience, singing in unison the hymn of humanity, and crying "Thou shalt do no murder—even for the divine right of kings"; when frontiers shall be swept away and there shall be one brotherhood of man, one flag, one language, and one religion, the religion of Humanity; when the people shall be generalled by the dreamers, the poets, the philosophers, the seers and singers, the artists of the world?—Sir Herbert Tree, "Thoughts and After Thoughts."

Acid Drops.

Dean Inge, preaching on Sunday at St. Paul's Cathedral, made the ignominious confession that doctors were supplanting the clergy, even in moral and spiritual matters. Dr. Ryle said the same thing in the evening sermon. He affirmed that the doctor was going to be "a more effective teacher than the clergyman," and he was "already the first person confided in." This must be pleasant news for Dissenting clergy, who subsist but partially on endowments, and have already to collect their salaries from doubt-smitten congregations.

The International Medical Congress could not break up without discussing what the newspapers call the Social Evil. One speaker declared that the very existence of the English nation was threatened. Another declared that there were half a million fresh infections each year. Compared with this, the subjects discussed in Parliament, and written about in the newspapers, are of trivial importance. Christian nations are all syphilised. Piety and filth run together, as they always did, and always will; and the filth is all the worse for being internal. Christianity poisons the mind while syphilis poisons the blood. And what is the remedy? The destruction of Christianity. That is the universal remedy. And we are engaged in applying it.

While this "social evil" is ravaging England, and imperilling its very existence, the clergy are discussing "Where is Hell?" We wish they could speak from experience. If they all cleared out of this world the rest of us would be able to do something with it.

Many who have taken part in the "Where is Hell?" correspondence are certain there is a hell and equally certain that all sinners and unbelievers (don't forget the unbelievers) will be cast into it. But hell isn't for them. Oh, dear no. They are booked for the other place. They admit, however, that they ought to be damned. Their next step should be plain enough. Carlyle urged that the duty of a man who felt that he ought to be damned was to go and be damned. We agree with him.

Our old friend Mr. J. W. de Caux, of Yarmouth, whose pen is known to our own readers, took it into his head (in a moment of aberration) that the Daily News was an honest paper and that its recent correspondence on "Where is Hell?" was an honest correspondence; so he took the trouble to send in a letter from a newer point of view than any disclosed in the nicely selected budget already printed. It ran as follows:—

> "The opinions of the Men of God respecting Hell that you have published are both amusing and instructive. Amusing—because of their puerile contradictions. And instructive—because they innocently prove that these wiseacres are simply living by false pretences. According to the Gospels, Christ taught explicitly that there is a Hell, and that in its 'everlasting fires' the great bulk of mankind will be tortured throughout eternity. If Christ did not tell the truth in this instance what becomes of his teaching? One fact is beyond all doubt, and that is, as Thomas Carlyle has written, that at the two extremities of human life there are two impenetrable curtains behind which no one has ever seen."

That letter never appeared. Mr. de Caux ought to have known it wouldn't. We fear he is getting too optimistic in his old age—looking for journalistic virtue in an old literary prostitute.

He was a Christian clergyman. His name was George Shackleton Boys. He had been curate of St. Peter's, Oldham. He made violent love to Mrs. Travis, wife of Mr. J. M. Travis, of Saddlesworth, Yorks. She yielded to his blandishments. The upshot is that the husband has lost his wife, and the wife her husband, while the man of God is off "to begin a new life in some dark corner of the earth"—which will probably be light enough for him to play the same old game again.

Benjamin Jewell, a Stroud Green builder, has lost his little girl, seven years of age, after Christian Science treatment for diphtheria. But he still holds that "illness is a false belief." You are not really ill—you only believe you are ill. We suppose that little Norah Annie Jewell is not really dead; they only believe she is dead. Perhaps they only believe she is buried.

There is a sect called "the Old Believers" in Russia, and we fancy the vicar of Chesbunt must be well qualified for its membership. Officiating at the funeral of the four men killed in the motor-bus disaster near Hoddesdon, Herts, he told a congregation, which included several bandaged survivors of the accident, that God was speaking to them through the catastrophe. There was too much swearing, too much drinking, too much blasphemy, too much dishonesty, too much of everything that was bad in the district. "God is speaking to us," the reverend gentleman said," "bidding us turn from our evil ways. This is the meaning of this, and it has all been done in love." We do not contradict the Rev. C. B. Law, but we do not believe that his testimony would be listened to in any coroner's court. Morally speaking, his Deity is nothing but a criminal lunatic. Killing one lot of people in order to make another lot of people buck up is as foolish as it is wicked, though we admit that it is worthy of the religion of the Atonement.

The city of Hull has been having an up-to-date inquisition, and has decided to enter upon a campaign against evil. The Watch Committee have adopted thirty-two suggestions, which should, if enforced, make the town the dullest in England. In their anxiety to prevent Hull becoming Hell they have censored everything that gives life a taste of the other place.

What quaint ideas of human happiness Christians possess? At Southend-on-Sea, which is at present crowded with holiday folk, religious persons are industriously circulating a booklet, entitled "The Southend Monthly Messenger," with the text, "Prepare to meet thy God," boldly printed on the cover. What an attractive advertisement of the town!

Divine Benevolence keeps one holy eye on the fall of the sparrows; but the other optic takes no notice of the many mishaps to holiday folk. As the newspapers sagely remark, the drowning season has commenced.

The Truthseeker (New York) prints the following letter from a correspondent at New Mexico:—

> "One of my friends in the South-west has recently had a stirring experience. He sought the hand of an eminently respectable woman, and was accepted. The prospective husband was a 'good Catholic,' although he had not attended church for fifteen years. He desired that a priest should perform the marriage ceremony. The reverend father would have to consult with the bishop. That eminent functionary refused a dispensation unless the woman would agree in writing to become a Catholic, which she refused to do. The priest then said: 'If you marry this woman you will be excommunicated; if you marry her out of the Church and have children by her they will be bastards. Do you want to bring up a brood of bastards?'
> "'You take your d——d church and go to hell with it!' was the prompt and correct response of the future husband. The couple were united in marriage by a Protestant minister.
> "Really, the thing is admirable. For cold-blooded insolence, calculated malice, and impudent bravado, the religious machine for graft, of graft, and by graft, has the rest of the world left at the quarter pole. Meanwhile, the bull-necked 'fathers' and the 'sisters' continue to thrive on Protestant money whenever they can lay their greedy hands upon it."

This is strong language, but unfortunately it is true. The New Mexico policy is pursued by the priests in England—as far as possible. They have to be a little more cautious over here. That is all.

The Rev. Dr. Orchard is still issuing his "Modern Tracts on Religion." The seventh is entitled "Why Pray?" and having carefully read it we are still at a loss to know why anybody should pray. The reverend gentleman says "it is astounding how few people pray, even among those who desire to be reckoned religious," but to our mind the most astounding fact is that a single person has the audacity to pray, even on the assumption that the Christian God exists. Prayer is certainly the worst possible form of blasphemy. A God who needs to be instructed, besought, and cajoled, as is always the case in public prayer, is but the merest travesty of a deity. Dr. Orchard thinks that "the fact of prayer is a proof of God." All we know is, that if there be a God who hears all the millions of conflicting prayers that are daily addressed to him from all parts of the globe, he is of all beings the greatest to be pitied.

In this tract Dr. Orchard rants and raves a good deal. After all, it is very childish and silly to begin and not to finish such a sentence as this: "Personally, I would sooner be reckoned among the babes who pray that God may make pussy's tail straight, or with peasants who bother the Virgin Mary about every blessed ——." That is a feeble echo from one of Wordsworth's sonnets, but it is none the less nonsensical for all that. All little children's prayers are excusable, because they are natural expressions of what they have been taught by their seniors concerning God's power. Of course, Dr. Orchard will never ask his God to straighten his cat's tail; but why not? Simply because he knows that his God neither does nor can do such things.

Dr. Orchard says: "Why don't men pray? Because they don't want to." That is perfectly true; and men don't want to pray simply because they have discovered how utterly futile all prayer is. They are not quite certain that there is anyone who hears; but they are absolutely convinced that there is none who answers. A young man of twenty-nine is on a visit to London. He is conscious that he has a failing, and that, in consequence, he may go utterly astray. Being a firm believer in the efficacy of prayer, he earnestly beseeches the Almighty, for Christ's sake, to keep him from falling. No one ever prayed more sincerely and passionately; and yet when the great temptation assailed him, he eventually yielded to it and was covered with confusion and shame. Had he been strong enough to resist, he would have concluded that God had graciously answered his prayer; but his fall was interpreted as a sign that, for some mysterious reason of his own, God had withheld from him the requisite power to stand. Is it any wonder that, in the long run, that young man became an Atheist, and instead of relying on supernatural strength which never came, learned to develop and discipline his own?

The late Mr. Gladstone affirmed good breeding to be the result of Christian civilisation. One would suppose he had never read Plato and Marcus Aurelius. If the Grand Old Man were alive now we might ask him to preach a sermon on courtesy from the text of the new "Bulgarian Horrors."

How the "Liberal" newspapers, and especially the dear Daily News, began working up "Turkish atrocities" again when the Turk took advantage (as he was entitled to) of the mess in which his Christian conquerors had got themselves into by their mutual hatreds and jealousies. But it is too late in the day to play that old game successfully again. The civilised world knows now that the Balkan States can massacre just as well as Turkey; on the whole, indeed, rather better, and with no sort of excuse. The Daily News was quickly on the job. First of all, it printed bad news of the wicked Turk from Mr. Noel Buxton—of all men. Two days later our pious contemporary confirmed the news "from a source which places its authenticity beyond question." And what was this infallible "source"? It was the Assistant Bishop of the Metropolitan of Rodosto. This Christian gentleman had four other Christian assistants. The five of them went out "investigating" and their report is, of course, beyond question! Yes, by a Christian newspaper. But who else believes what the Balkan Christians say about the Turk? These soldiers of Christ have proved themselves the biggest liars in the world.

Now and then the Daily News lets truth get the better of its partisanship. In a leaderette on the "Peace" which Rumania forced upon the Balkan Allies (heaven save the mark!) our contemporary let the cat out of the bag, tail and all:—

> "The result of the new arrangement, according to calculations at Bukharest, is that Rumania will have 7,600,000 inhabitants, Bulgaria 5,000,000, Greece 4,500,000, Servia 4,000,000. Rumania will be the greatest of the States, which is what she desired; and the other States, having made the sacrifices from which she profits, will be sufficiently near equality to hold out a prospect of permanent rivalry and unrest, which is what Russia and Austria want. Speculation is venturesome, but it can hardly exclude as the outcome of such an arrangement an ultimate division of the Balkan Peninsula between Austria and Russia. There is here no triumph of peace or of nationalism, and for that the folly of the ex-Allies in allowing their bitter jealousies to be fomented to the point of war must bear the fatal responsibility."

Rumania, Bulgaria, Greece, Servia, Montenegro, Austria, and Russia, are all Christian Powers. How they love one another! And how the Turk must admire them!

A religious contemporary has an article on "Seaside Complexions." That is an ephemeral matter; but the complexion that won't come off should be found in the establishment that contains no water.

In the course of a sermonette in Lloyd's Weekly News, the clerical writer quotes some Latin tags. It is appropriate that a dead religion should be bolstered up by a dead language.

The following sample of religious superstition is taken from the Daily Chronicle of August 9:—

> "Paris, August 8.
> "Religious fanaticism caused a terrible tragedy at a farm at Ponmieux, near Avignon, yesterday.
> "The farmer Julien, his wife, their three children, Marius, Rose, and Julie, aged 25, 19, and 20 respectively, and the grandmother, of 80, lived there. The family was well-off and the farm in a prosperous condition.
> "One day the eldest daughter, Julie, declared that she was possessed by Satan. Every day she had another tale to tell about the demon in whose power she believed herself to be.
> "The other members of the family, with the exception of the grandmother, seemed to have been so worked upon by her statements that at last they believed her.
> "Yesterday she lay on the floor and began crying out, 'Go away, Satan, go away!' Suddenly her brother, sister, and parents joined in the performance, and all began to cry out for the 'demon' to go away. The grandmother tried to comfort them, but they bound her to an armchair.
> "Then they returned to the daughter with chairs and sticks, shouted to the demon to go away, and beat the poor girl's head till it was an unrecognisable mass of broken bones, brains, and blood.
> "When the girl was dead the brother and sister called at the house of the local abbe to tell him they had succeeded in driving Satan away. The priest informed the police, who arrested the family."

Comment is unnecessary.

The clergy do not read the Bible so much as they ought to. Writing in Lloyd's Weekly News, the Rev. A. W. Robinson says that Christ "chose to live long years of his earthly life in the sequestered retirement of a Galilean village." The reverend gentleman is mixing his Master with Methuselah, for we have the idea that Christ died whilst still a young man.

In an article headed "The Peril of Thought," a contributor to the Daily Chronicle writes: "The only Atheism is denial of the truth." There is no peril of thought to the man who wrote that.

The clergy are considerably disappointed with the religious results of the Brotherhood Movement, which they fondly hoped would "rope in" the working man to the Christian fold. They will have to offer better inducements than loquacious lay-preachers and sentimental cornet solos.

It appears that the sale of the Revised Version of the Bible and the New Testament during 1912 was 28,000 copies. No less than 1,200,000 copies of the Authorised Version of the Bible and New Testament were sold. Evidently the Christian world doesn't care for accuracy. It wants "the old, old Book." Or, as it is often put more pathetically, the book that was read at mother's knee.

There are considerable differences between the Authorised Bible and the Revised Bible. Everybody knows the hymn "Almost persuaded." It is founded on Acts xxvi. 28, where King Agrippa says to Paul "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." That is how the text stands in the Authorised Version. In the Revised Version the admission is made that Agrippa really says the very opposite. It is not a compliment, but a sneer. In the English of the man of the street, Agrippa asks Paul if he thinks he is going to make him a Christian with such rotten stuff as that.

Highgate Police Court has furnished a contemptuous comment on the old declaration that England is a Christian country. The Benjamin Jowell referred to in a previous "Acid Drop" has been arrested on a charge of manslaughter. This will bring Christian Science into the law courts. It will now have to be decided whether Christian Science or Medical Science is obligatory on parents in case of their children's sickness.

SELF-CONGRATULATIONS.

An Irishman, in order to celebrate the advent of a new era, went out on a lark. He didn't get home till 3 o'clock in the morning, and was barely in the house before a nurse rushed up, and, uncovering a bunch of soft goods, showed him triplets. The Irishman looked up at the clock, which said three, then at the three of a kind in the nurse's arms, and said:—

"Oi'm not superstitious, but thank hivins that Oi didn't come home at 12!"

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £161 2s. 11d. Received since :—Margaret Robinson, 2s.; E. V. G. (third sub.), 10s.; Henry Holt, 5s. C. E. Bourchier, 9s. 6d.; R. C. P., 2s. 6d.; W. A. Yates, 2s. 6d.

E. W. COOPER.—Your remittance, 2s., passed over to shop manager. We note your sorrow that you were not introduced to the Freethinker long ago, and the fact that you owe your recent introduction to an occasional reader. No doubt more copies would be sold at one penny than at twopence, but not so many as some people fancy. Besides, we should have to sell, not twice but thrice, as many to leave the present financial position unchanged.

W. J. RAMSEY.—Clotted bosh, indeed. The clergy's letters on hell in the Daily News correspondence are not even worth Old Nick's supervision. He is reputed to be clever, but no ability could revise their letters into sense or consistency. One professional soul-saver cries "Let God be true and every man a liar"—including the professional soul-saver himself, we presume.

MARGARET ROBINSON.—We have done our measure of justice to the Turk in our own way. We cannot take part in political meetings, which are bound to trench on matters with which, as editor of the Freethinker, we have nothing whatever to do.

C. E. BOURCHIER.—Glad to have the high appreciation of one who has read this journal for so many years. We also remember the grand old fighting days that you refer to. We were young then, for a young man's work; and that particular work does not need to be done again.

HARRY HOLT.—Pleased to hear that you look forward eagerly for the Freethinker every week; also that you have learnt "lessons in composition" from it as well as lessons in thinking.

H. GEORGE FARMER.—Thanks. Shall appear. Will you send us your address for proofs? You move about a great deal, and the last proofs failed to overtake you.

E. M. BRITTEN.—See paragraph. Thanks.

W. DAVIDSON.—Glad to see you on the track of the C. E. S. "scholars."

ESPRIT FORT.—We cannot refer you to such a French paper. We used to receive La Raison from Paris, but we have not seen it lately and do not know whether it still exists. We could not supply it, anyhow.

W. A. YATES.—Glad to hear you appreciate "Abracadabra's" new series of articles so highly.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are well-selected, therefore useful, and therefore welcome.

J. PARTRIDGE.—The note you refer to did not reach us.

E. B.—Many thanks.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid :—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Edward Clodd was the only critic of the Meredith Letters, as far as we remember, who mentioned Mr. Foote as a recipient of some of them. Mr. Clodd also mentioned that Meredith's letters to Mr. Foote were letters of "encouragement." We are not surprised, therefore, at Mr. Clodd's speaking out plainly in his Daily Chronicle review of the English edition of M. Constantin Photiades' volume on Meredith, written originally in French and translated (apparently well) by Mr. Arthur Price. Mr. Clodd quotes a saying of Meredith's only a fortnight before his death—"Nature is my God, and I trust in her." "We may not name him pagan," Mr. Clodd adds, "because the epithet carries a reproach which, oddly enough, still clings round 'freethinkers,' surely a name to stand to a man's credit." Mr. Clodd thinks so, because he is a good Freethinker himself, as Meredith was; but we are sorry to inform him that the bulk of his countrymen still regard "Freethinker" as meaning what "Infidel" used to signify.

The principal article in the August number of the English Review is by Anatole France. It is entitled "Pour la Paix" and is written in his own beautiful French. It is a fine plea for European peace, and a confident prophecy of its coming; but one smiles at some of the references to Rudyard Kipling towards the end. It is certainly odd to find the author of "Pay, pay, pay!" amongst the members of the peace party. This appears to be the result of a compliment of his to the French nation. Another article from a foreign pen is a translation of a description by Turguenev (with reflections) of the execution of the famous murderer Troppman in 1870. It is a very powerful piece of writing. We have not seen the original, but Mary Gough's translation into English seems extremely well done. Mr. Cunninghame Graham follows with one of his fascinating, if exotic, short stories. There is a longer story, even still more exotic, though not without power of a sort, by Sir Hugh Clifford, called "The Further Side of Silence." Tragic, of course. Mr. Harrison, the editor, writes—too severely, we think—on "The Poetry of Francis Thompson." The article is strongly written, and some of the criticism is sound enough, but occasionally it forgets that the poet's genius is precedent to the poet's opinions; that genius, after all, is genius; and that all genius is of the blood royal. It appears to us, for instance, that what Thompson says of Byron (see p. 115) is quite intelligible, and quite just from the religious point of view, and that the image in which it is conveyed is of admirable force and illumination. The same thing, but not with the same power, has been said of Byron by other Christian critics; notably—and in this case with power—by Coventry Patmore. One need not agree with a writer in order to appreciate his intrinsic merits, and Thompson should have the benefit of this canon of criticism. We agree with Mr. Harrison, however, that Thompson has been immensely overpraised by certain pious and sentimental critics. He lived too much in the crypts of Catholicism. He is out of the direct line of English poetry. He is, if we may speak so bluntly, a side-show in the great exhibition. Poets like Crashaw and Vaughan have their place in the original plan. Thompson wrote some things that are likely to live long. But is there one of them that quite equals the very best of Vaughan's or even the second best of Crashaw's, in the highest qualities of imagination, logic, music, and workmanship? Time, that discovers all things, will tell.

The highest price paid for a picture during the recent art sale season was £39,400 guineas for Romney's "Lady de la Pole." Romney was a great portrait painter. He was also a Progressive after the manner of Thomas Paine. He painted Paine's portrait, but what has become of it is unknown. It lives in Sharpe's fine engraving, of which there is a good reproduction on the cover of the Twentieth Century Age of Reason, edited by Mr. Foote, and issued by the Secular Society, Ltd. This publication has been for some years out of print, but thousands of copies were put into circulation, and many of them must be still extant.

The Birmingham Branch has lost a good working member in Mrs. Bolt, who left England on Saturday, the 9th inst., for South Africa. A large gathering of members and friends assembled at the station on Friday to see her off and wish her good-speed. The week previous Mrs. Bolt was the recipient of a present from the members of the Branch of a travelling trunk. On returning thanks for it and the good wishes of present and absent friends, she expressed her intention of carrying on the work of our cause in her new home.—J. P.

HIS REVENGE.

James, four years old, had been naughty to the point of evoking a whipping from his long-suffering mother, and all day long a desire for revenge rankled in his little bosom.

At length bedtime came, and, kneeling beside her, he implored a blessing for each member of the family individually, she alone being conspicuous by her absence. Then, rising from his devout posture, the little suppliant fixed a keenly triumphant look upon her face, saying, as he turned to climb into bed:

"I s'pose you noticed you wasn't in it."

The Gospel History a Fabrication.

The Public Ministry of Jesus.

According to the first three Gospels, the whole of the public ministry of Jesus, with the exception of a few days preceding his arrest and trial, was carried on in Galilee. And here the primitive writer's ignorance of the topography of the northern province is manifest. If we attempt to follow the alleged wanderings of Jesus through Galilee, we soon come to an impasse. Thus, taking Matthew's account, Jesus, after visiting Nazareth and Capernaum, and walking by "the sea of Galilee," went up into a mountain; after which he "entered into Capernaum" (viii. 5) and afterwards departed "unto the other side" (viii. 18) and came into "the country of the Gergesenes" (viii. 28)—which district is in some MSS. called "the country of the Gadarenes"; in others, that of "the Gerasenes"—after which he came by boat to "his own city" (ix. 1). Next, he "passed from thence" to some unnamed place (ix. 9), and again "passed by from thence" to another unnamed place (ix. 27; after which he "went about all the cities and villages" (ix. 35). After this, "he departed thence to teach and preach in their cities" (xi. 1), and "at that season" he went through the cornfields (xii. 1), after which he "departed thence and went into their synagogue" (xii. 9), and afterwards "withdrew from thence" (xii. 15), and "on that day" he "sat by the sea side" (xiii. 1). Next, after discoursing at some unnamed place, he "departed thence" and came to "his own country" (xiii. 53, 54); but soon "he withdrew from thence in a boat to a desert place" (xiv. 13), then he "went up into a mountain apart" (xiv. 23), and, after walking on "the sea," came to "the land of Gennesareth" (xiv. 34). After this, he "withdrew into the parts of Tyre and Sidon" (xv. 21); but he soon "departed thence" towards "the sea of Galilee" and "went up into a mountain" (xv. 29). Next, he "came into the borders of Magadan" (xv. 39)—which Mark calls "the parts of Dalmanutha"—and, after orating, "he left them and departed" (xvi. 4). After this, he "came into the parts of Cæsarea Philippi" (xvi. 13) and "after six days" ascended "a high mountain," shortly after which he entered Capernaum (xvii. 1, 24), and finally "departed from Galilee, and came into the borders of Judæa" (xix. 1)—which completes the ministry in Galilee.

The accounts of Mark and Luke follow the same plan, and are of the same indefinite character. Now, after reading the foregoing, it at once becomes apparent that we have merely a number of unconnected, undated, and unlocated hearsay stories, more or less clumsily pieced together, which were certainly not taken from a biography written by an eye-witness. It is also clearly evident that the stories contained no other names of places visited by Jesus. The foregoing sketch contains all the cities or villages named in Matthew's Gospel. Of these, the words "his own country" refer to Nazareth; "his own city," to Capernaum. It is not stated that Jesus entered Tyre, Sidon, or Cæsarea Philippi—which were beyond the limits of Galilee—but only that he went into the neighborhood of those cities. Again, "the country of the Gergesenes" and "the borders of Magadan" have reference only to districts. Hence, the primitive writer knew of but two "cities" which had been visited by Jesus—Nazareth and Capernaum. The writer, it is true, says that "Jesus went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues" (Matt. iv. 23; x. 35; etc.); but this could be stated by anyone who had no knowledge of any cities in the northern province. Yet Galilee, in the reputed time of Jesus, had a large number of towns and villages, as may be seen by the following list, mentioned by Josephus:—

Cities.—Sepphoris (largest and strongest); Tiberias (next in importance); Tarichem, Jotapata, Zebulon (strong); Garis, Scythopolis (large); Gischala, Arbela, Bethmaus, Asochis, Magdala, Besara, Garisme, Gabara, Kadesh, Gaba, Salamis, Jamnith, Julias, Bersabe, Sennabris, Sigo, Seph, etc.

Villages.—Japhia (largest), Gabaroth, Dabaritta, Baca, Jamnia, Meroth, Achabare, Saab, Cana, Simonias, Emmaus, Meloth, Caphar-ecbo, Caphar-naum, Chabolo, Ruma, etc.

In Perea (east of Sea of Galilee), which Jesus is stated to have often visited, were: Gamala, Gadara, Gerasa, Julias, Solyma, Bethenabris, Bezemoth, Ginnibris, Arpha, Selucia, Sogana, Golar, etc.—the last six being villages.

How many of the foregoing places did Jesus visit during his public ministry? Well, according to Matthew, he entered one—the village of Capernaum.

The City of Nazareth.

According to the first three Gospels, Jesus Christ passed his childhood and early manhood in "a city of Galilee named Nazareth," where, it is said, he and other members of his family were well known. Now, as a matter of history, so far as can be ascertained, there was no city in Galilee named Nazareth, either in the reputed time of Jesus or at any other. No such city is named in the Old Testament, in the apocryphal books, or in the Talmud, nor in any Jewish literature known. The historian Josephus, in his War in Galilee and in his Life, goes again and again over the ground where this city is supposed to be located, without ever once coming across it; hence, the only rational conclusion possible is that the city is purely imaginary, and was so named by the primitive Gospel writer through ignorance of the country and misapprehension.

The province of Galilee, as everyone knows, has for its eastern boundary the Jordan and Lake Gennesareth, the latter being called in the Gospels "the sea of Galilee." Speaking of the western side of this lake, Josephus says: "Now the lake of Gennesareth is so called from the country adjoining it.....The length of this country extends itself along the banks of this lake that bears the same name, for thirty furlongs, and is in breadth twenty" (Wars, 3, 10, 7 and 8). Thus, on the Galilee side of the lake, the land for nearly four miles along its banks was called Gennesareth. This fact the writer of the primitive Gospel appears to have known (Matt. xiv. 34; Mark vi. 53), but not that "Gennesareth" was also the name of the lake; for the latter he calls "the sea" or "the sea of Galilee" (Matt. iv. 18; xv. 29; Mark vii. 31, etc.). Luke, however, had ascertained the correct name (v. 1); but he wrote later, and had consulted Josephus. The land was named "Gen-nesareth" on account of its great fertility and of the large number of fruit trees it contained: its appellation in Hebrew signified "garden of the prince"—the prefix gen or gan denoting a garden, and nasi and sar a prince.

The primitive writer, however, would seem to have imagined that the land of "Gen-nesareth" took its name from some city in the neighborhood called Nesareth—that it was the garden or fertile land surrounding the city—so after making Jesus a native of that place, he represented him as visiting it several times during his public ministry, and as going into the synagogue there, and astonishing his relatives by reading from the Book of Isaiah.

Capernaum.

From the way in which this "city of Galilee" is spoken of in the Gospels, it is generally supposed to have been one of the largest and most important of the cities in that province. Here Jesus is stated to have expelled a demon from a man in the synagogue, and also to have cured a man "sick of the palsy" (Mark i. 23; ii. 3; Luke iv. 33; v. 18). Now, as a matter of history, there certainly was a place in Galilee called Capernaum; but it was a mere village, noted only for having "a most fertile fountain" which watered the three or four miles of garden ground of Gennesareth in which it was located. Josephus states that when upon one occasion he was thrown from his horse, he was carried "into a village named Caphar-naum" (Life, par. 72). The name signifies in Hebrew "the village of Nahum," Kaphar or Caphar denoting a village. As to whether every village in Galilee possessed a synagogue I am unable to say, but I think it more than probable that they did not, more especially since nearly all the towns and villages in that province contained a large proportion of Gentile inhabitants. In any case, the going into an insignificant village, and holding forth to the few rustics found loafing about there, was not the way to make the new gospel known to the people of Galilee—and this appears to have been the only place that Jesus ever actually entered. The reiterated statement that he went through all the cities and villages, preaching and healing the sick, is merely an editorial addition, and goes for nothing. It would thus appear that there was really no public ministry at all, and that all the primitive narratives from which the first three canonical editors took their accounts were simply pious fabrications.

CHORAZIN AND BETHSAIDA.

In the First and Third Gospels, Jesus Christ is represented as upbraiding "the cities wherein most of his mighty works were done, because they repented not." He is described as saying:—

> "Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works had been done in Tyre and Sidon, which were done in you, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes" (Matt. xi. 21; Luke x. 13).

In the same category of unrepentant cities Jesus also places Capernaum. Now, as to Chorazin, there is no mention of Jesus having ever visited that city in any of the Gospels: indeed, its existence as a city of Galilee appears to be more than doubtful.

With regard to Bethsaida, the case is different. There really was, at one time, a village of that name near the sea of Galilee; but it had been rebuilt, enlarged, and "raised to the dignity of a city" by Philip the tetrarch, at the beginning of his reign, and its name had been changed to "Julias" in honor of the emperor Augustus's daughter (Antiq. 18, 2, 1). Hence, many years before the appearance of Jesus as a teacher, the stately city of Julias had taken the place of the little fishing village of Bethsaida, and everyone living in Galilee in the reputed time of Jesus would know that there was no place in that province then called Bethsaida: nor is there any evidence that there ever were two places named Bethsaida near the sea of Galilee.

Bearing these circumstances in mind, we find it stated in Mark (viii. 22, 23):—

> "And they come into Bethsaida. And they bring to Jesus a blind man, and beseech him to touch him. And he took hold of the blind man by the hand, and brought him out of the village," etc.

This miracle is not recorded by any of the other evangelists: several other blind men are said to have been healed, but not at Bethsaida. Again, in the same Gospel, after the feeding of 5,000, it is stated that the disciples "entered into a boat to go unto the other side to Bethsaida" (Mark vi. 45). In the parallel account in the First Gospel, the disciples merely go "unto the other side" (Matt. xiv. 22). But Luke, in his account of the miracle of the loaves, says that Jesus and his disciples "withdrew apart to a city called Bethsaida," and that "the multitude perceiving it followed him" (ix. 10), from which it would appear that the miraculous feeding took place within that city: but two verses further on it is said, "for we are here in a desert place," as stated in the parallel accounts of Matthew and Mark. Moreover, the writer of the Fourth Gospel tells us "on his own" that the three disciples Philip, Andrew, and Peter were natives of Bethsaida (John i. 44; xii. 21). It thus seems evident that stories were related of Jesus performing miracles at Bethsaida in some of the primitive Christian writings in existence in the time of the four canonical evangelists, and that Mark has recorded one of them. It should also be stated that Christian reconcilers, as might be expected, have placed another Bethsaida near the sea of Galilee in maps of Palestine of the so-called apostolic times.

ABRACADABRA.

Christianity and the Chinese.—XIV.

> "The presence of the foreign missionary element acts as an irritant to the whole body politic in China, and produces such terrible maladies as the Boxer movement of 1900. The reasons for this are somewhat intricate, but when it is remembered that the same treaties which record the humiliation of China, the payment of compensation for the surrendered opium, and the free admission of the drug into the 'Flowery Land,' are also the basis of what the missionaries regard as their 'rights,' it will be seen how different is the aspect of this question to the Chinese mind from that which presents itself to the conventional Englishman. Opium, Missionaries, Men-of-War are the agencies of European civilisation that have most impressed themselves on the Chinese imagination."—J. B. EAMES, The English in China (1909), p. 581.

> "The Chinese think that Europeans have neither religion nor morals nor manners, and only worship force as represented by big armies and navies. They say that, while we profess Christianity, its spirit influences our actions far less than do economic considerations; that Christianity is even less to us than is Confucianism to them; and that it is like our impertinence to send missionaries to China."—REV. E. J. HARDY, "As the Chinese See Us," Chambers' Journal, April, 1912.

THEN, again, there are the innumerable points upon which the missionaries offend against the complicated code of Chinese etiquette, morality, and good manners. As Mr. Lynch has remarked: "Chinese civilisation is such a mass of complicated and intricate manners, customs, and prejudices, that the average man is really like a bull in an intellectual china shop with regard to them."* And yet, says Professor Giles,— > "Correct behavior is regarded as of such extreme importance—and breaches of propriety in this sense are always so severely frowned upon—that it behoves the foreigner who would live comfortably and at peace with his Chinese neighbors, to pick up at least a casual knowledge of an etiquette which, in outward form, is so different from his own, and yet in spirit is so identically the same." †

For instance, the Chinese are very strict as to the separation of the sexes before marriage. Even after marriage, a Chinese gentleman is never seen in public in company with his wife. We remember reading of a foreigner, travelling in inland China, who wished to hire a sedan-chair to convey his wife and himself to another town, but found that no bribe was sufficient to induce the coolies to be a party to what they considered such a breach of decorum; they declared they would be mobbed. As Lord Curzon well says:—

> "The spectacle of unmarried persons of both sexes residing and working together, both in public and in private, and of girls making long journeys without a responsible escort, are sources of a misunderstanding at which the pure-minded scoff, but which in many cases has more to do with anti-missionary feeling in China than any amount of national hostility or doctrinal antagonism. In 1893, at the remote inland town of Kuei-hwa-cheng, a friend of mine encountered a missionary community consisting of one male and of twenty Swedish girls. The propaganda of the latter consisted in parading the streets and singing hymns to the strumming of tamborines and guitars. The society that had committed the outrage of sending out these innocent girls allowed them $200 (£27 10s.) a year apiece, for board, lodging, and clothing. As a consequence, they were destitute of the smallest comforts of life, and could not even perform their toilette without the impertinent eyes of Chinamen being directed upon them through the paper screens. Can anything more futile than such an enterprise be conceived, or more culpable? The popular feeling against female missionaries was illustrated in the recent massacre at Kutien [August, 1895], where out of ten persons that perished, eight were women." ‡

The same writer says that a steamer rarely sails from America for China and Japan without a bevy of young girls fresh from the schoolroom, to say nothing of the stream which flows in from the United Kingdom and the Colonies. Of course, they do not know that in China an unmarried girl who leaves her father's house without being married is looked upon as a concubine.

The Rev. E. J. Hardy, at one time Chaplain to our forces at Hong Kong, says plainly that these unmarried girls shock Chinese notions of morality, and to them "can have but one meaning." He also throws some light on the quality of the teachers thus imported, and says:—

> "Before leaving Hong Kong, I saw an annual consignment of female missionaries land in order to be distributed throughout China. Their physical appearance did not impress me. What waste of money to send out people whom a fever or two may sour and depress and necessitate their becoming returned empties! True, those who select female missionaries are on the horns of a dilemma. Well-favored girls marry and leave the business. Anæmic, unladylike, partially deformed ones, who have no chance either at home or abroad in the matrimonial line, do not physically adorn the Gospel or make its message attractive to the heathen. If the beauty of holiness were always underneath an ugly exterior, we would not have made the above remark."*

It would take too long to go into all the points where foreigners offend against the manners and customs of the Chinese. All writers upon the subject are agreed as to the courtesy practised by the Chinese in their social life, and which is so conspicuously absent in the foreigner, with his direct, brusque, and off-handed manner. And it has been remarked that the manners of the lower classes are much better in the inland parts of China, where foreigners have not penetrated, than in the treaty ports, where they are well known.

Lord Rosebery has been making an appeal for more courtesy and better manners.† After remarking that the English and Scotch have never been famous for good manners, and that there has been a tendency to despise them, he observes:—

> "That was a false view. Good manners were the sign of charity towards their fellow-men, a part of their duty to their neighbors, and also a sign of self-respect. A man who respected himself was always well-mannered to others."

Courtesy is the oil that makes the wheels of life run smoothly, and in this respect the Chinese and Japanese are far ahead of us. Nor is this confined to the upper classes, for if a man of the lower orders becomes wealthy, he takes up his new position with natural ease and dignity, as if to the manner born, and does not make himself the laughing-stock of his newly made acquaintances like our own newly made rich, who try to assume a dignity and manners to which they are unaccustomed.

This national gift is well brought out in a Chinese tale given by Mr. Arthur Smith in his Chinese Characteristics, which he says "not inaptly" illustrates the characteristic:—

> "A visitor is represented as calling clad in his best robes, and seated in the reception-room awaiting the arrival of his host. A rat which had been disporting itself upon the beams above, insinuating its nose into a jar of oil which was put there for safe-keeping, frightened at the sudden intrusion of the caller, ran away, and in so doing upset the oil jar, which fell directly on the caller, striking him a severe blow, and ruining his elegant garments with the saturation of the oil. Just as the face of the guest was purple with rage at the disaster, the host entered, when the proper salutations were performed, after which the guest proceeded to explain the situation. 'As I entered your honorable apartment and seated myself under your honorable beam, I inadvertently terrified your honorable rat, which fled and upset your honorable oil jar upon my mean and insignificant clothing, which is the reason of my contemptible appearance in your honorable presence.'"

And, as Mr. Arthur Smith observes:—

> "Inability to conform to Chinese ideas and ideals in ceremony, as well as in what we consider more important matters, causes the Chinese to feel a thinly disguised contempt for a race whom they think will not and cannot be made to understand propriety.....the foreigner, even in his own eyes, makes but a poor figure in comparison with a ceremonious Chinese. Compare the dress, flowing robes, and his graceful motions with the awkward genuflections of his foreign visitor. It requires all the native politeness of the Chinese to prevent them laughing outright at the contrast."*

Says Professor Giles:—

> "We can easily see from pictures, not intended to be caricatures, what were the chief features of the foreigner as viewed by the Chinaman. Red hair and blue eyes, almost without exception; short and extremely tight clothes; a quick walk and a mobility of body, involving ungraceful positions either sitting or standing; and with an additional feature which the artist could not portray—an unintelligible language resembling the twittering of birds. Small wonder that little children are terrified at these strange beings, and rush shrieking into their cottages as the foreigner passes by."†

Black hair and eyes are universal throughout China. Devils and bogeys are always depicted with red beards in the picture books. This accounts for the fact that, at Tientsin, a little Chinese girl went into "convulsions and literally died of dread when a German soldier harmlessly, as he thought, chucked her under the chin."‡

The clothes of foreigners are thought by the Chinese, says the Rev. E. J. Hardy, "to be melancholy, undignified, and generally absurd." And "For a woman to show her shape is considered in China most immodest. Even upon a man tight clothes can only be explained if the poor fellow have not enough cloth to cover himself properly."§

The same writer observes:—

> "But, indeed, we have to consider not only how the Chinese see us, but how they smell us, for what they call our European odor is quite as nauseous to them as their yellow smell is to us. Think of that, ye well-tubbed Britishers! A missionary friend, who is a very clean man, told me that he has often been pained by seeing Chinese hold their noses when talking to him. They say we smell rank because we eat beef."‖

Even the animals in China dread the foreigner. Says Professor Giles:—

> "The Mongolian pony has such a dread of the foreigner, and usually takes time to get accustomed to the presence of a barbarian; some ponies, indeed, will never allow themselves to be mounted unless blindfolded."

The same writer speaks of the unfailing attack of the dogs, so familiar to every foreigner who has rambled through country villages in China,—

> "who rush out and bark, apparently without rhyme or reason, at every passing foreigner.....The solution of this puzzle was extracted with difficulty from an amiable Chinaman, who explained that what the animals, and indeed his fellow-countrymen as well, could not help noticing, was the frowsy and very objectionable smell of all foreigners, which, strangely enough, is the very accusation which foreigners unanimously bring against the Chinese themselves."¶

Considering all these things, is it any cause for wonder that foreigners in China are known as "barbarians" and "foreign devils"? And what must have been the feelings of the Chinese when they learned that (in March, 1899), under compulsion, the Emperor of China signed a decree conferring official rank on missionaries, by which a bishop ranks with the governor of a province. As Sir Robert Hart remarks:—

> "The arrangement by which missionaries were to ride in green chairs and be recognised as the equals of Governors and Viceroys had its special significance and underlined missionary aspiration, telling people and officials in every province what they had to expect from it."††

M. Eugene Simon tells us how the missionaries enforced their claim to these new dignities. He says:—

> "M. Delamarre [the French priest] himself told me that on one occasion, not being received by the Viceroy with all the honors reserved for mandarins of high rank, he entered in a rage, struck the usher whose business it was to see that the countersign was respected, and, violently crossing the courts and apartments, presented himself before the Viceroy with threats in his mouth."*

"RECANT OR RESIGN."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I beg to ask the favor of space to draw the attention of Freethinkers and Rationalists to the latest example of the old cry of the bigot, "Recant or Resign."

There will no doubt be some readers of "ours" who will recall meeting Professor Bickerton some thirteen or fourteen years ago, when he paid a visit to his native land.

He is back again in England, as keen and full of fight as ever—in spite of his old saying that he never fights—and with more warrant than ever, for the fight he has been carrying on so long.

I have just lately had the opportunity of a day or two with him, discussing men, women, places, and things, and feel impelled to bring the matter before the notice of Freethinkers, for they to-day, as ever, should be keen to take up the cause of any man or woman who is forced to stand alone against all the forces of bigotry and prejudice.

As to the variety and deviousness of these forces, I have just been reminded by a re-read of Dr. William Lawrence's Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, Physiology, Zoology, and the Natural History of Man (1844), which in several ways matches our latest case, but more particularly the deviousness and far-reaching methods of the orthodox.

The Lawrence I have is the ninth edition, 1844. Chap. i., the "Introduction to the Course Delivered in 1817," is devoted to "A Reply to the Charges of Mr. Abernethy; Modern History and Progress of Comparative Anatomy."

Abernethy's charges of Materialism had been made in lectures delivered before the Royal College of Surgeons, and published as Physiological Lectures, Exhibiting a General View of Mr. Hunter's Physiology and of his Researches in Comparative Anatomy.

Lawrence here takes the gloves off for the benefit of his old master Abernethy and his idol Hunter. In clear and frank terms he states his position, and claims that, speaking as a scientist, a physiologist, he has nothing to do with religion or soul—that mind depends on matter. He does not build on the "unsafe grounds of abstruse metaphysical researches."

It was an interesting re-reading; and now for the "deviousness" of method.

Thinking to refresh my mind on some further details of the old controversy, I took down Thompson Cooper's Biographical Dictionary (Bell, 1883), and was then reminded of another of the ways in which orthodoxy works.

Lawrence, when he died, was a Baronet and Sergeant-Surgeon to Queen Victoria, having long been Surgeon-Extraordinary. He was for years F.R.S. and Member of the Institute of France, and of almost all the principal scientific societies of the world. But there is no mention of him in Thompson Cooper—though the less useful General Lawrence or the portrait painter can have several columns.

Some years ago, after much handling of this book, I made a note opposite the title page, after studying the passages dealing with Hume, Voltaire, and others of that ilk, "This Thompson Cooper is a man to beware of."

Then I turned to another Dictionary of Biography, and another, and presently arrived at another item in Men of the Reign (Routledge, 1885), an item, however, which seems to err by something like misstatement—perhaps even a lie.

In this notice it is stated that The Physiology, Zoology, and the Natural History of Man gave rise to very severe criticism, especially from Abernethy, who denounced his pupil as a Materialist, and accused him of misusing his office of lecturer to the Royal College of Surgeons to promulgate false and pernicious doctrines. The Governors of the Royal Hospitals called upon Lawrence to resign his opinions or his appointment, and he accordingly withdrew the papers complained of, and did not again touch on similar subjects.

I have no means at hand at the moment to test that statement, but I feel rather confident that the last part of that passage is not correct.

He was repeatedly elected to high positions in connection with the faculty, and always held in high regard. The edition I have is dated 1844, and I presume is authorised; and in the valuable but too brief Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers, by our J. M. Wheeler, there is no mention of any recantation. Lawrence died July 5, 1867.

I am hoping to extend my exact knowledge of Lawrence later on in connection with the "Recant or Resign cry," and in the meantime perhaps some other reader may be able to give us some new details.

It is rather pitiful to think how, in spite of the forty years of active scientific work done since Draper wrote his Conflict, that even to-day scientists should have to waste so much time as is done in side issues and demands for a fair hearing.

But worse still is the seriousness of the idea that, inspired by religion, there are men who can be moved to use their scientific knowledge to bolster up a faith which they know quite well all their scientific knowledge is in conflict with.

Who to-day pays a moment's regard to Professor Sir G. G. Stokes, Bart., and his dreary word-spinning on "Natural Theology," and who, twenty years from now, will pay any regard to the pages of wearying drivel spun out by Sir Oliver Lodge on similar subjects, or to the other titled or highly placed semi-religious, semi-scientific fatuities of to-day, who, flagrantly trading on social status and invertebrate science, foist on the public views which they know they would not defend on scientific grounds.

The Infallibility of the Pope has gone; the infallibility of religion has gone; but recent events and law cases suggest a new danger, a popedom of science—the infallibility of science.

There are scientific men, doctors, and others, who seem dominated by the idea "When I ope my mouth let no dog bark," and it is emphatically the duty of Freethinkers, as it has ever been, to doubt, and to claim for all the same right to doubt, to inquire, to criticise.

And so, at last, I get back to Professor Bickerton.

Forty years ago, after some brilliant work in London, he was elected to the Professorship of Chemistry of Christchurch, New Zealand, where he taught with success, with such success, in fact, that he seems to have aroused a spirit of keen jealousy.

He was not a professional astronomer, but chemist, engineer, and physicist, and so when, in 1877, he made some discoveries in astronomy, some opposition was aroused, and a fight began which has gone on without ceasing until to-day.

In 1894 an attempt was made to oust him from his Chair, but his record of successful work stood the strain, and the attack failed; but a renewed attack in 1902 succeeded. The old cry, "Recant opinions or resign your living," proved effectual. He was not built on resignation lines; he was deprived of his Chair, at sixty years of age, after twenty-eight years of splendid work for the colony, without redress, pension, or consideration.

After some years of struggle, a new turn was given to the film, for eight years later, Earl Dudley, Governor-General of Australia, became interested in the matter, and started with £100 a fund to which the Government of New Zealand added £300; a further £300 was raised by the scientific societies, college offices, and colleges of the Dominion, to which fund the Board of the University which had ejected him also subscribed.

By this fund he was enabled once again to visit England, to put before the scientific men of the Old World a full statement of his views and claims.

It is to be hoped that there will be found in our ranks some, if only one or two, adequately equipped with the special knowledge demanded, who may be able and willing to take a part in what must be, to all Freetbinkers, for many reasons, an important event in the scientific record of the century.

Although we have lost our Symes, there may be yet one or two, such as Mr. Coppock, who might be able to take some hand in this latest development of the old, evil game of "Recant or Resign," and I feel very sure that the editor will give attention to any views which may be submitted to him.

T. SHORE.

A SURE THING.

"Well, I see old man Moneybags gave Lord de Noodles a cheque for $500,000 the day he married Minnie Moneybags," said Dubbs.

"Yes," said Dumpkins. "And I suppose the lord loved the cheerful giver, as usual."

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 34 SUNDAY, AUGUST 24, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

My religion of life is always to be cheerful
—GEORGE MEREDITH.

Views and Opinions.

Rev. A. J. Waldron, who continues to prove himself an excellent self-advertiser, is evidently interested in the question "Should the Woman Tell?" He has written a one-act play with that title, and apparently in considerable haste, for he boasts that he wrote it in two days, and according to his preliminary puff in the Daily Chronicle it takes nearly half an hour in the representation.

We hope Mr. Waldron's play is better written than his contribution to the shilling "shocker" Is There a Hell?" just published by Cassell & Co. It passes our comprehension how such slovenly stuff is allowed to appear under that respected imprimatur. Look, first of all, at the reverend gentleman's quotations. He cannot quote even the Bible accurately. "Shall not the judge of the whole earth do right?" he asks in inverted commas. Now the Authorised Version, which is the only one appointed to be read in the Church to which Mr. Waldron belongs, reads thus in Genesis xviii. 25—"Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" This is a famous text—and a fine text from the point of view of composition. Yet see what Mr. Waldron makes of it! "All the earth" is musical. "The whole earth" is cacophonous. Where are Mr. Waldron's ears? They were fairly well developed the last time we saw his photograph.

If a clergyman cannot quote the Bible correctly, one need not wonder at his treating Tennyson in the same fashion. Mr. Waldron represents Tennyson as saying that "God will be the final goal of every ill." Where, we ask again, are this gentleman's ears? And what right has he to treat his betters in this unceremonious manner? And why do Cassell and Co.'s readers let such slipshod work pass their hands unchecked? Whatever else Tennyson was or was not, he was an exquisite artist. He would have been horrified to find himself accused of writing such a line as Mr. Waldron ascribes to him. He was a big, powerful man, and he might have tried the reverend gentleman's boasted pugilism. Anyhow, he could have proved that he had been libelled. What he really wrote was this—in the opening stanza of the fifty-fourth section of In Memoriam:—

> "Oh yet we trust that somehow good
> Will be the final goal of ill,
> To pangs of nature, sins of will,
> Defects of doubt, and taints of blood."

The word "God" does not occur in this passage. Mr. Waldron drags it in—professionally. What is he without his "God"? And, for that matter, what is he without "Hell"? A man of his mental and moral size would not find it easy to make a good living in any other than the clerical profession.

* * *

Mr. Waldron winds up by declaring that "Of course there is a hell." We could almost hope so—for his own sake. We should be sorry to see him disappointed. Meanwhile we may express a wish that, wherever he goes, he will not meet Robert Browning, whom he quotes as saying: "God! Thou are love." The most learned of poets would want the wretched sciolist's blood. "Thou are!"

* * *

Let us turn to another good Christian—Mr. Keir Hardie. We do not propose to follow him in his "Queenie Gerald" crusade. It is an unsavory subject, and we fail to see how publishing the secrets of a brothel can be any aid to virtue—though we can easily understand its gratifying political partisanship. Our object is far different. We want to correct Mr. Hardie's statement that "the late Queen Victoria told us 'the Bible is the secret of England's greatness.'" This is more slipshod work. Christians seem to be almost constitutionally inaccurate in these matters. Mr. Keir Hardie should really know better. Queen Victoria never made that declaration about the Bible being the secret of England's greatness. She knew better herself, and she was a truthful woman. Her private secretary contradicted the story on her behalf. The whole thing was a pious effort at "edification" on the part of a goody-goody paper called the British Workman. A picture was printed in that journal, representing Queen Victoria as presenting a Bible to a black chieftain, who knelt at her feet to receive it; and the letterpress below contained that legendary royal utterance to which Mr. Hardie gives fresh currency. The incident never occurred, Queen Victoria never presented that Bible to that black chieftain, and she was not responsible for the nonsense that was put into her mouth. We do not for a moment suppose that Mr. Keir Hardie will express regret for giving a new lease of life to this silly story, but we hope he will never attempt to promote its longevity again.

Another good Christian is the editor of the Walsall Observer. This gentleman "highly compliments" the Chief Constable for attempting (vainly, however) to "put down blasphemous oratory" and "wicked talk." But why should the Chief Constable take such a gratuitous interest in the religion of the town? Would he not be better employed in looking after criminals and disturbers of the public peace? That is what he is paid for. To go beyond it is mere impudence. And why does the Observer talk about the Atheistic orator's "wicked purposes"? It is high time that the Lord Chancellor issued a notice that Atheism has the same legal right of propagation as Christianity.

Christianity and Morals.

A MARKED tendency of contemporary religion is to emphasise—usually to over-emphasise—the importance of morals. I do not mean by this that too much importance can be attached to morality, but that an over-emphasis of morality often leads to an ignoring of numerous other factors, upon some of which morality depends for its sanity and serviceableness, and is apt to result in an aimless and fruitless form of moral aspiration. So far as many preachers are concerned, one might conclude from their sermons that doctrines are of no importance whatever, right beliefs of small consequence, and that what the older theologians contemptuously called "mere morality" is all-in-all. Matthew Arnold said that conduct was three-fourths of life; an attractive but not very helpful pronouncement, since the real problem is what kind of conduct is of importance. But to attend to many preachers one would conclude that there is nothing else in life but conduct.

A noticeable thing is that this continuous striking of the ethical note in preaching does not lead to an understanding of ethical theory, nor does it result in any marked improvement in conduct. It is a striking fact that during the period in which doctrines in the pulpit have been subordinated to moral exhortation, no contribution of value to the philosophy of ethics has come from any of the mouthpieces of the various Churches. The last contribution of value from a clergyman in this country came from Bishop Butler. But, apart from Butler, ethical philosophy and ethical science have been built up by laymen, and often enough, by Freethinkers. Mill's Utilitarianism, Stephen's Science of Ethics, and Spencer's Principles of Ethics will teach an inquirer more of the nature of morality than all the sermons of all the parsons in Great Britain could accomplish in a lifetime. And this result has been accomplished by a total surrender of the theological spirit and method. Morality has been treated as something organically connected with life as a whole. It has been studied just as any other series of natural facts are studied. The supernatural has been eliminated—even in the fashionable form of transcendentalism; and the consequence has been light instead of darkness, mental clarity in place of verbal fog.

Mr. R. J. Campbell is one of the modern ethico-religious preachers who usually succeeds in leaving an ethical subject a little more confused than he found it. His habit of using philosophical terms, and of seizing some well-recognised aspect of life as though it were quite an original or new discovery, doubtless persuades his City Temple hearers that they have been receiving enlightenment, but better-informed listeners will only smile. A man who dwells on a given fact or a certain state of mind, only to end by attributing it to some principle in man apart from his animal nature or earthly habits, is losing himself in a cloud of words, and leaving his hearers in that dangerous frame of mind which mistakes a phrase for an explanation. A fact is explained only when it is merged in some wider group of facts. To say that it is quite unlike any other fact is to abandon all hopes of understanding it.

In a recent sermon, Mr. Campbell treated his hearers to an account of what he calls the "naturalistic origin" of moral feelings, but with a curious shortsighted view of what that process really is and what it involves. This is mainly due to his desire to find a religious basis for sacrifice, which, owing to Christian bias, he regards as a good in itself. Self-preservation, he says, lies at the root of our morality—that is, so far as the naturalistic conception of morality is concerned. It creates the family, the tribe, the nation; it forces man into modes of combination. But suddenly—the "suddenly" is Mr. Campbell's—there arises something that strikes right across our instinct of self-preservation. This is "the impulse to give ourselves, destroy ourselves, crush our own personal interests at the bidding of something that we feel to be higher, and to have the right to compel the sacrifice." Where does this impulse come from? "It is impossible," says Mr. Campbell, "to explain it on any merely naturalistic hypothesis.....The instinct of self-preservation is still the leading motive from this point of view, and yet we see this instinct utterly repudiated when the higher call.....takes possession of the soul."

Now, all this mystery and confusion and would-be profundity is quite unnecessary. And if Mr. Campbell properly appreciated, not merely the naturalistic theory of morals, but the bearings of his own observations, his bewilderment would disappear. Granted that the desire for self-preservation drove men to combination—this is Mr. Campbell's very crude way of putting the case, not mine—combination or co-operation implies the play of other factors, not the least of which is some concern for others quite apart from the direct perception of immediate personal gain. As a matter of fact, however, the desire for self-preservation does not drive man to combination with his fellows. Man is a gregarious animal under all stages of human culture. He is born one of a family, and the family is a unit in a larger cluster—the tribe. And being a gregarious animal, his feelings are from the outset inextricably bound up with the feelings of others. He admires what the tribe admires, he hates what the tribe hates, his code of conduct is that furnished by the tribe, his individual conscience a reflection of the social conscience that antedates his birth and survives his death.

One need only properly appreciate the nature of this process to understand the meaning of "the impulse to give ourselves," etc.; or, in other words, to prefer the welfare of the whole to the apparent interest of self. For it is not the direct or immediate outcome of the instinct of self-preservation, but the product of social selection which in turn makes in the surest manner for individual preservation. The process is two sided. On the one side society itself sets a selective value on the type of individual that harmonises with the canons of social right. And selection in this direction is much more rigorous in primitive societies than it is at a later date. On the other hand, the societies in which the units are more closely welded together, are inspired by the same ideals and animated by the same motives, have a survival value greater than that possessed by communities more loosely knit. And because this is so, individual preservation is the more surely accomplished. In other words, regard for the welfare of others is not something that conflicts with our "instinct of self-preservation and self-advancement," it is a development of the primary impulse under the pressure of social evolution or social selection. Regard for others is, indeed, not a phase of self-sacrifice at all; it is rather one of self-realisation. It is just part of the hopelessness of all Christian morality that it nearly always treats regard for others as involving a deliberate sacrifice, just as it regards morality as a series of restraints upon our natural impulses. A saner view treats all impulses as equally natural, and equally explainable in terms of man's social evolution.

Mr. Campbell's conception of man's moral evolution appears to be that, at certain stages of his development, certain new factors begin to operate. But this is quite unlike what really occurs. In nature the great thing is not a new creation, but a transformation. Thus, the sexual impulse is operative in both man and the lower animals. But while in one direction the crude animal impulse is there without any disguise, in man it undergoes a substantial transformation through the accretion of numerous factors, ethical, æsthetic, and social, which ultimately determines the mode in which it is to find expression. There is, consequently, no need to assume, with Mr. Campbell, that at a certain stage of human history a spiritual principle—whatever that may mean—makes its appearance and tames the more animal impulses. There is no more in the problem than the play of these impulses throughout, but becoming more and more complicated in their mode of expression as social life and institutions become more complex. Loyalty to the family becomes loyalty to the group, thence to the nation, and finally to the ideal of humanity. The difficulty is almost entirely one of analysis, but the analysis is not impossible to those capable of sane and serious thinking.

Mr. Campbell's exhortations on morality are fundamentally as worthless as those of Christian preachers in general. There is, indeed, no wilder fallacy than that of assuming that improvement is to be effected by a mere preaching of right and wrong. Two thousand years of Christian history ought to have been enough to make this clear to the dullest understanding. For the Churches have never ceased preaching morality. The Catholic Church gave its followers little else; and if all these centuries of moral preaching has not resulted in the elimination of moral evil, it is obviously time that the method was dismissed as useless. The truth is, that in spite of all the preaching, there is no other body of educated people that have shown so small an appreciation of the real nature of morals as have the clergy. They were the last to realise—the majority do not realise it even now—that conduct has a purely physiological basis, and that good food, pure air, and healthy social environment are potent forces in the moulding of character. You can much more certainly lessen a man's resistance to evil impulses by lowering the tone of his nervous system, than by any possible preaching of evil; and the converse holds with equal truth. Of late, it is true, some preachers have begun to dwell upon this aspect of ethics. They have seen the absurdity of preaching purity in thought and deed to families living in a single room, or of preaching "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's goods" to a man when his wife and family are starving around him. But this is proof only that even Christians cannot remain quite uninfluenced by the spirit of the age. Unfortunately, the mass of preachers keep in the old ruts, even when a slightly different terminology is used. If man is no longer presented as wholly vile and incapable, apart from grace, of decent conduct, he is presented as made up of a material body and a "spiritual principle" in a constant state of conflict. At the City Temple, as at Spurgeon's Tabernacle, mere natural man is still represented as incapable of the highest forms of conduct. There is only a difference in the way the teaching is expressed. And that difference of expression is quite immaterial beside the substantial fact that in depicting human nature as destitute of the essentials of the highest morality, these preachers are not only reducing man to the level of the beasts, but are unconsciously preventing his transcending their condition.

C. COHEN.

The Art of Misrepresentation.

"J. B.," of the Christian World, is a dogmatist whose delight is to denounce dogmatism. He abhors the scholasticism of the Middle Ages, and the dogmas of the orthodox Church are an abomination in his sight. He has his own conception of Christianity, and in his statement and defence of this he is as dogmatic as any schoolman. There is not the remotest possibility of his being in error on the subject of religion. He writes about God, Christ, and the human soul as if they were self-evident realities. He champions what he calls the spiritual interpretation of the Universe, and characterises every other interpretation of it as utterly untenable and false. In the issue of the Christian World for August 14, his article is entitled, "Of Deep-rooted Souls," and his contention is that Materialism cannot produce such souls. It never occurs to him that the existence of souls is a pure assumption which never has been and never can be verified. To say that "mind is as old as matter" is to betray the grossest ignorance of the evolutionary process. According to the teaching of science, matter had been in existence for countless millions of years when life first appeared; and mind came long after life. When "J. B." adds that "there could never have been matter without a mind to know it as matter" he dogmatises without a single scrap of knowledge wherewith to bless himself. The majority of physicists believe in the eternity of matter, but we do not know of one accredited biologist who maintains that mind is eternal. The assertion that the Universe begins with mind and rests on love is absolutely incapable of being proved or demonstrated, and nothing is gained by making it.

Now, why cannot Materialism produce "deep-rooted souls," or the best men and the best women? As a matter of fact, neither Idealism nor Materialism can accurately be represented as the soil in which the right kind of character is grown, because people of equally good characters are to be found under both. How can the belief in "a creative intelligence," or in a "Divine purpose in the world," help or hinder the cultivation of the right affections or of high and noble ideals? Why should a mechanistic or materialistic interpretation of the Universe exert a degrading and cheapening influence upon character? Idealism and Materialism are only theories the truth of which is open to question. Whether we swear by the one or by the other the fact that love is the greatest thing in the world remains unaffected. And yet one would infer from "J. B.'s" misrepresentation of it that Materialism is such a deadly poison that justice, truth, and virtue cannot possibly thrive under its shadow. We admit that there is no room, no nourishment in it for "the spiritual life of man," if by that is meant the religious or supernatural life; but we declare there is ample room and rich nourishment in it for man's "highest exercises; for reverence, for love, for purity, for self-sacrifice." On the materialistic assumption, according to the reverend gentleman, the world has nothing in it but "soulless atoms, with chance as their governor, and nothing in front of it but blank annihilation." We challenge him to give his authority for such a statement, to name a single so-called Materialist who holds that the Universe is governed by chance and has nothing but blank annihilation in front of it. No scientist has ever been guilty of promulgating such a silly heresy, and no Atheist has ever been so foolish as to ignore the invariable laws by which the mechanism of Nature is controlled.

"J. B.'s" defence of the design argument is comical in the extreme. Admitting that the Universe is imperfect, he says:—

> "So we are to believe that because the thing may be bettered, there is no design. It is curious reasoning. Would any man conclude of a watch, because it was possible to produce a better, that there was no design in it? Would a Helmholtz hold that because the watch was imperfect, it was the work, not of an optician, but of the mindless operation of a nebulous mist? If he did say that, would it suggest to us anything beyond the enormous faith of philosophers in search of an Atheistic conclusion? Has it occurred to these philosophers that in creating an imperfect world, the mind behind it—supposing a mind—may have reasons of its own for a temporary imperfection?"

"It is curious reasoning." Fancy, if you can, a perfect being producing imperfection. If a watch is defective it argues defective skill in the maker. So, likewise, an imperfect Universe implies an imperfect Creator. The mind behind the world, "J. B." tells us, "may have reasons of its own for a temporary imperfection." Alluding to the Atheistic philosophers, he asks:—

> "Has it occurred to them that if this mind was one which contemplated as a final end the development of human spirits, in strength and happiness, that the end would be better secured by putting us in a world where there was something for us to do, rather than in one where everything was done, and ourselves placed there, with our hands in our pockets, simply as idle lookers on?"

That is very plausibly put, but it is not a correct statement of the case, if the Bible is to be relied upon. The inference of this writer is that if we had been placed in a perfect world there would have been nothing for us to do but play the part of interested spectators. The world was made a scene of imperfection that we might be kept busy improving it, and improving ourselves at the same time. But there is no trace of this strange view in the Bible or in the teaching of the orthodox Church. God is represented as describing all his creative works as very good: "And God saw everything that he had made [including Adam and Eve], and, behold, it was very good" (Gen. i. 31). Himself a perfect creature, in the image and after the likeness of God, man was put in command of a perfect world; but from the perfect state in which he originally stood he miserably fell, and became the just object of God's wrath. It was this fall that made the advent and work of Christ a necessity before he could be restored to the Divine favor. In point of fact, however, neither the world nor man possessed at any time anything like perfection. Indeed, so glaring and so gigantic has always been the imperfection of both that we can only look upon it as a terrible tragedy; and we cannot conceive it to be the designed work of a good and loving deity. This is what Helmholtz said of the human eye: "If an optician sent it to me as an instrument, I should send it back with reproaches for the carelessness of his work, and demand the return of my money." So, mentally, as well as physically, man is anything but a credit to his alleged Creator. Surely he could not have been designed by an all-perfect and almighty being. Darwin says that "where one would most expect design, viz., in the structure of a sentient being, the more I think on the subject, the less I can see proof of design" (Life, p. 62). Writing to Mr. W. Graham, in 1881, the great man said that he could not see that "the existence of natural laws implies purpose," though Mr. Graham seemed to endorse such a view in a book he had just published.

"J. B." says that there is no blunder in evolution." True; but it is a blunder to imagine that evolution is an exclusively upward and forward movement. During portions of the Middle Ages it was decidedly a backward and downward movement. Under Christianity there was a long period of arrest in the progress of knowledge, and of moral decadence. "J. B." asserts that it was not an arrest of humanity, but "a stay in the development of one side of faculty, that another, backward side might catch up." This again is an exceedingly plausible argument; but it is as fallacious as it can be. The idea that one side of humanity paused in its advancement in order that another backward side might overtake it, is altogether too ridiculous. The truth is that for some centuries, after Christianity became the established religion of the Roman Empire, there was a serious arrest, not only in the progress of knowledge, but in the evolution of morals also. Humanity not only stopped growing, but lost a considerable quantity of the intellectual and moral stature to which it had previously attained. Instead of going forwards, it went backwards until about the middle of the eleventh century. Need we remind our reverend friend of that dark chapter in the annals of the Church which has been stigmatised as "the Pornocracy"? Was that only a slight pause in the development of one side of faculty, that another, backward side might have a chance of catching up?

The conclusion to which "J. B." comes is this:—

> "Assuredly, we shall find one thing, that Materialism has never provided a soil deep enough and rich enough for high natures to reach their strength and stature."

We could hardly expect a Christian minister to come to any other conclusion. It is a conclusion eminently fitted to encourage and develop his sense of superiority. All high natures are said to be deeply religious, which is equivalent to affirming that the non-religious cannot attain to real greatness. With what pride our critic refers to Tennyson, Browning, Dickens, Thackeray, and George Eliot as mighty giants, with whom none of our "modern chatterers" can compare. What gave these their towering strength and stature? The fact that they were all "deeply religious spirits." Darwin, Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall, and Bradlaugh, not having been "deeply religious spirits," are not ranked with the great of the mid-Victorian age. Of course, "J. B.'s" Christian World public will heartily endorse his dogmatic utterances; but there is a larger, science-fed public which is finding out that religious people are not the great, superior folk they represent themselves to be, and that the mechanistic conception of Nature is now firmly held by thousands upon thousands of people of the highest and noblest character on earth.

EXORCISM AND MIRACLES.

"THE primitive Christians," says the historian Gibbon, "had their minds exercised by the habits of believing the most extraordinary events. They fancied that on every side they were incessantly assaulted by demons, comforted by visions, instructed by prophecy, and delivered from danger, sickness, and sometimes even death, by the supplications of the Church." This is true; but long before a Christian Society or "church" came into existence, and for several centuries after that event, both Jews and Gentiles had a firm belief in the existence of demons and demoniacal possession. This belief was common to the peoples of Palestine, Egypt, Greece, and Rome, and can be traced in the literature of those countries. Demoniacal possession is mentioned as an undoubted and well-known fact by the Jewish historian Josephus (Antiq. 8, 2, 5; Wars 7, 6, 3), and is found in the Talmud and other Jewish literature.
