Great privations ennoble man, petty privations degrade him.—GOETHE.

Cruel Christians.

"ARE Atheists Cruel?" was the title of our front-page article in the Freethinker of April 26, 1891. It was elicited by the Bishop of Chester's speech at the Town Hall meeting of the local Branch of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. His lordship had stated, quite gratuitously as it appeared, that "the persons who were most liable to be guilty of cruelty to their children were those artisans who had taken up Secularist opinions, and who looked upon their children as a nuisance, and were glad to get them out of the way." This statement was grotesque in its absurdity. If Secular principles tended to make parents hate their own children, why was their evil influence confined to artisans? Why did they not produce the same result amongst the wealthier classes? The Bishop admitted that "poverty did not necessarily mean cruelty." What then did he mean? The answer was obvious. The Bishop of Chester was bent on libelling sceptics, and deeming it safer to libel the poorer ones, he tempered his valor with a convenient amount of discretion. He was not even a brave fanatic. His bigotry was cowardly, crawling, abject, and contemptible.

The Bishop rested his libel on the authority of the Rev. B. Waugh, general secretary of the N.S.P.C.C., who happened to be present at that Chester meeting. Mr. Waugh jumped up in the middle of the Bishop's speech and declared that "it was the case, that the class most guilty of cruelty to children were those who took materialistic, atheistic, selfish and wicked views of their own existence." This chaotic stuff passed readily at a Christian meeting, but it was not in itself worthy of the slightest reply. We condescended, however, to ask the Bishop of Chester and Mr. Waugh for some evidence. Partisan assertions were of very little value in such a controversy. "Where," we asked them, "are the statistics to justify your assertion? Men who are sent to gaol, for whatever reason, have their religions registered. Give us, then, the total number of convictions your Society has obtained, and the precise proportion of Secularists among the offenders? And be careful to give us their names and the date and place of their conviction."

The method of Christian libellers, when they are challenged, is to stand upon their dignity. They do not possess Jack Falstaff's wit, but they have all his impudence, and they decline to give a reason on compulsion. The Bishop of Chester and the Rev. Mr. Waugh vouchsafed no reply. We went down to Chester, hired a public hall, and challenged the Bishop in his own city, within earshot of his own cathedral. Our challenge was published in the local press, but his lordship made no sign. He was a confirmed Christian.

Years rolled by. Experience showed that this charge against Secularist parents was ridiculous. It happened, also, that in specially atrocious cases of cruelty to children the culprits were always particularly pious. This fact has now become a byword. Mr. Waugh could not resist such palpable proofs for ever. He retracted at Leeds what he had said at Chester. He apologised for his blunder. He is dead now and "gone to his account." But the Bishop of Chester lives on. Dr. Jayne still stands upon his dignity—with the aid of £4,200 per annum as a preacher of the gospel of "blessed be ye poor."

Since that time we have frequently said that the great ill-users of children are not Freethinkers but Christians. It is only in Christian countries that societies for the prevention of cruelty to children are needed.

Some day or other we knew that our contention in this respect would receive "respectable" support. It has at last done so. Mr. G. R. Sims dealt with the subject in last week's Referee, and we have pleasure (in one way it is, of course, a ghastly pleasure) in quoting the following passage from his "Mustard and Cress":—

> "This terrible cruelty to children is not confined to any one class, and it prevails in every town in the United Kingdom. The most painful investigation that it was ever my lot to make as a journalist was that which induced me to write "The Black Stain." I accompanied officers of that splendid organisation the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children on their visits to houses where terrible cruelty was practised in every part of London and a dozen of the principal provincial towns, and what I saw will remain in my memory as long as my memory lasts.
> "We talk of the Congo and Putumayo. The horrors of the Congo and Putumayo are to be found in thousands of homes every day in this Christian country. It must be a form of insanity. I cannot bring myself to think that civilised men and women in full possession of their senses could systematically practise unthinkable barbarities on the bodies of helpless little children, often of their own flesh and blood. In the Official Report of the N.S.P.C.C. for last year it is stated that 156,637 children were involved in the cases of cruelty, and of this terrible total 154,387 were related to the offenders.
> "For two months I wandered through an inferno of child torture. I only described half of what I had seen. The other half was too horrible for the columns of a daily newspaper. And yet it is only by the widest publicity that we can hope to arouse the conscience of the nation to the black shame of child suffering.
> "When I had finished and had told the plain unvarnished truth I was assured by more than one journalistic friend that I had made a mistake in letting the light of day in upon the shameful deeds. 'The public don't want to read about such things,' I was told. No one wants to read about these things, but it is the duty of every man and woman with a conscience in this country to aid, at least with sympathy and encouragement, the great crusade of the N. S. P. C. C. against an infamy which in one way is even more infamous than the White Slave Traffic. The Society annually rescues thousands of little English children from homes where they are being starved and tortured by their own kith and kin. That this horror continues to flourish in our midst is a black reproach not only to our humanity but to our Christian Churches.
> "In spite of the vast hordes of Jewish aliens who pour into this country every year, a case of cruelty to children is hardly ever found in a Jewish home. So far as I have been able to ascertain, child torture seems to be a form of barbarity entirely confined to Christian people. What is the answer of our churches and our chapels to this indictment? I should like to hear it."

Mr. Sims will not get that answer. But we welcome his honesty and courage in putting the question.

A Look Round.

ON the principle that nothing but good should be spoken of the dead, it is usual to look back upon only the brighter aspects of a year just closed. The practice is inspiriting, and so has much to say for itself. Moreover, it is the easiest thing possible to point out the rapid advance made by Freethought ideas during the past twelve months. In every direction superstitious ideas are becoming less assertive, and teachings from the pulpit that not so long ago would have provided a first-class heresy case now pass without comment. In literature also one sees Freethought ideas more and more freely expressed, with only a solitary voice here and there is raised in protest. Politics alone—the most backward and least scientific of all branches of human activity except theology itself—remains much about the same in relation to religious ideas. It is still extremely dangerous to make public avowal of unbelief. It may be even said that the recent growth of organised Nonconformity in political life has, so far as Freethought is concerned, worked for little but harm.

The growth of Freethought is unquestionable. Equally unquestionable is the decline of the belief in theology. One is, indeed, the reverse side of the other. So far, all is gain. But it is well to bear in mind that there is another side to the picture. It is well to avoid underestimating the strength of the enemy, or, what is equally important, to overestimate the value of the advantage gained. These are common mistakes for people to make, and there is no reason to believe that in this respect Freethought human nature is very different from human nature in general. During the course of the year, for example, I receive many letters from Freethinkers telling me of liberal utterances by the local clergy, and also many newspapers containing marked passages of a similar character. In addition, one is often told of certain clergymen whose sermons are mere lectures on social or ethical topics, theological doctrine being altogether excluded.

Apparently, this kind of thing is taken as something that is wholly to the good. A liberal clergyman, it is assumed, is better than an illiberal one; and a clergyman who adulterates his theology with a certain amount of Freethought is preferable to one who gives theology pure and undefiled. With this position I entirely disagree. It may be more pleasant to a Freethinker to hear a liberal clergyman than it would be to listen to an illiberal one. But is there any reason why he should listen to either variety? In any case, how do these things affect the Freethought position? It is gratifying to find that a narrow theology offends so large a class of the people; but what Freethought propaganda is aiming at is the liberation of the public mind from theology of every kind—whether it be of the City Temple or of the Spurgeon's Tabernacle variety. And so far as this purpose is concerned, the tendency under consideration is almost wholly evil in its consequences. It is, in fact, keeping people inside religious organisations who might otherwise be definitely apart from them.

Let us take the most recent of all great controversies—that of the doctrine of Evolution—as an example. Rightly conceived, evolution means the death of all supernaturalistic ideas. And in the origin of the controversy between evolution and religion this was substantially the position accepted by religionists. They were not slow to emphasise the logic of the situation, and the triumph of evolution should have meant the defeat of religion. Putting on one side the mere handful who still see this point of view clearly, what is the actual position? The mass of educated religious people have no hesitation whatever in accepting the general principle of evolution, and are quite convinced that it is consonant with religious beliefs. Nothing is more amusing in this connection than those people who imagine that by popularising evolution they are delivering a serious attack on religion. They would be doing so under certain conditions. As things are at present there would be no great difficulty in getting a clergyman to take the chair. So far as the majority of people are concerned, the impact of evolution on theology has been deadened by the liberalising theologian on the one side and by the theologising scientist on the other; with the result that evolutionary doctrines in the pulpit do not mean an aid to Freethought so much as keeping people away from a definitely Freethought position. Real Freethought work is not to be done to-day by a preaching of evolution or by the delivery of lectures on physical science. This can only be done to-day by the application of scientific principles to religious ideas, and by the demonstration of their essential incongruity.

What is true of evolution is true of many other things. Liberalism in the pulpit, a greater measure of rationalistic interpretation of religious beliefs among the people, is not necessarily pure gain. It may be only the religious method of weakening the Freethought attack. It is the method by which Protestantism held back the world for nearly two centuries; it is the method by which the eighteenth and early nineteenth century attack on the Bible was weakened, and it is the way by which the Churches have countered the attack on religious doctrines. Men like Dr. Campbell Morgan or Dr. Dixon threaten no danger to Freethought. The real danger is from the liberalising theologian who makes Christianity comfortable for those within the Church, and deceives a great many outside into believing that there is no longer need for so vigorous and so uncompromising an attack.

There is danger in still another direction. Many are inclined to take liberalism of thought, without any other qualification, as pure gain. This, however, is not the case. What is required is not merely liberal thinking, but, in addition, strong thinking and clear thinking. Now, I do not think it can be questioned that while there has been a growing want of interest in theology, while the number of non-believers have increased enormously, there has not been a corresponding growth of strong and vigorous thinking. While Christian doctrines were obviously barbarous, and Christian organisations openly oppressive, there existed plenty of incentive to keep Freethinkers active and thorough. But with Christian teaching covered with a spurious humanism, and a sham profession of toleration the fashion; many non-Christians are lulled into quietude. Thousands who ought to be taking part in aggressive Freethought work are idle, they say, because the fight is really over. There was never a greater mistake than this. Religion is never so dangerous as when it covers itself with a veneer of civilised customs, and disguises its thoughts in civilised language. Religion to-day is purchasing a new lease of life by accommodating its teachings to its avowed supporters, and by imposing on the shortsightedness of many of its enemies. And that way lies all the possibility and all the danger of reaction.

It is no use underestimating the power of the enemy, and encouraging ourselves with false estimates of our own strength. We must recognise the plain fact that, in spite of all our progress, Christianity still exercises a powerful control—more or less disguised—over the direction of social life. Every now and then one gets an indication of the real thing that lies below the veneer of civilised phrase and pose. When the Balkan States went to war, it was noteworthy that the Turk, held up as the ideal religious fanatic, refrained from all appeals to religion. It was the Christian who did this. And more striking still was the extent to which the cry was taken up in this country. The press was full of sentimental slush over restoring Santa Sophia to Christendom, and a parade of clergy was arranged to take place in the West End of London. In a flash the civilised Christian of England had thrown off his pretence of culture, and was revealing the uncivilised religious fanatic of the Middle Ages.

Moreover, in any case where Christian organisations combine, it is the lower and less educated elements that exert commanding influence. This is indicated in two directions. First, in that of the control of education. In spite of all the advance that has been made, the schools are still under the influence of theology. Freethought has never been strong enough to keep the priest out of the elementary school, and very little help has been forthcoming from the religious world—despite professions of fair play—to secure this act of elementary justice. In face of a common danger, the Christian ranks are closed. Churchman, Roman Catholic, and Nonconformist are at one as to the necessity of keeping control of the child, and until Freethought is strong enough to keep the nation's schools free from all forms of priestcraft, we cannot be said to have made our first great advance really secure.

In the next place, Sabbatarianism still exerts considerable force in the country, and, next to the question of the child, this is an issue on which the Churches display the greatest unity. Recently, at Birmingham, a poll of the city was able to defeat a proposal for Sunday boats and bands in two of the public parks. In many other places successful opposition is offered towards Sunday entertainments. There is no question of the undesirable character of these entertainments. It is no longer profitable to play that card. It is even admitted that the entertainments are socially beneficial; that they provide a couple of hours clean, healthy entertainment for those who might otherwise spend their time in an undesirable manner. The opposition is frankly religious. It is the coercion of a section by a religious majority. And the fact that this can be done, the fact that one of the ugliest and most demoralising forms of English religious life is still so active and so strong, ought to give pause to those who regard the fight with theology as virtually over.

And in addition there are other things. The power of the religious boycott still exists although it may not be openly practised. It is still difficult to get a fair hearing for Freethought, and, in some cases, practically impossible. Free speech is threatened where it can be threatened, and prevented where it can be prevented. Recent prosecutions for obstruction, disorder, and profanity have no other meaning than this. Those in power would openly stop the advocacy of Freethought if they dared; that they proceed by a roundabout and often underhand method, is nothing more than a concession to unfavorable circumstances. But the old-time spirit of suppression and persecution is there, and, given favorable circumstances, would not be slow to express itself in the old-time drastic manner. And one ought not to omit to point out that while this spirit exists with any large number of people the extension of the powers of the State and of the police is a phenomenon full of menace to the future of Freethought.

Our work in the past has borne splendid results, but there is still much to be done before these results can be considered permanently secure. Such freedom as we have is, perhaps, of too recent growth for it to be taken as a matter of course by the mass of people. Until free speech is taken in this light, until it is accepted as something beyond even the scope of discussion, there is always danger. Old prejudices are still with us, primitive ideas are still powerful, religious interests and the interests that religion serves are still strong. Until these forces are robbed of their power for evil, we must always be on our guard. That we have won so much is only a reason for continued fighting—not for rest. Nineteen hundred and twelve has seen, as previous years saw, a great extension of Freethought ideas. But has it seen a corresponding growth in the number of men and women strong enough to defy all prejudice and let the world know their real opinions? On that point I have my doubts. And yet until and unless that kind of result is achieved, our successes provide occasion for but a limited measure of rejoicing.

C. COHEN.

Sabbatarianism.

HOWEVER great and numerous the faults of primitive Christians may have been Sabbatarianism was not one of them. The Gospel Jesus was a notorious Sabbath-breaker, and as such suffered persecution. Indeed, he is represented as denouncing Sabbatarianism in the strongest terms. To Paul also, all days were alike. He was exceedingly distressed to learn that his Galatian converts "observed days, and months, and seasons, and years." "I am afraid of you," he told them, "lest by any means I have bestowed labor upon you in vain." At best the Sabbath was to him but a shadow that had already served its purpose, and was no longer required (Col. ii. 16, 17). The duty of Sabbath observance is not once mentioned in the New Testament, and the fact of observance is spoken of with disfavor. There was a general conviction that Christ had abolished the Jewish law of the Sabbath, and the day of his alleged resurrection was believed to be of much greater importance than the last day of the creation week. Now, the curious thing is, that his alleged resurrection occurred on the day set apart by the Pagan world as the people's weekly holiday; but for three centuries the Christians treated all days practically alike. Whatever observance of Sunday there may have been was altogether voluntary. There were no Sunday restrictions of any kind. Origen held that "the perfect Christian is always keeping the Lord's Day," because "all his days are the Lord's." The first Sunday legislation, under Constantine, was of a mild character, forbidding only judges, town people, and tradesmen to pursue their avocations "on the venerable day of the Sun." Those engaged in agriculture were allowed to work as on other days. But in spite of that legislation the Church of the Middle Ages was anything but strictly Sabbatarian. Whenever she advised the people to rest from work, she was careful to add that Sunday work was in no sense a sin, and was discouraged simply because it prevented people from attending church.

Thus we see that, in principle, Christianity is absolutely opposed to Sunday observance. The so-called sanctity of the Lord's Day is repudiated in the New Testament, and, in the main, by the Catholic Church. Sunday was to be observed, not because of its superior holiness, but merely as the field-day of the Church. This principle was formally enunciated at the third Council of Orleans in the year 538; and when, in the thirteenth century, it was contended that a peculiar sanctity attached to the day, the object was to fortify the Church. In the main, however, the Church has always enjoined the observance of Sunday alone in her own interest. In his "Table Talk," Martin Luther says:—

> "If anywhere the day is made holy for the mere day's sake, if anywhere one sets up its observance upon a Jewish foundation, then I order you to work on it, to dance on it, to ride on it, to feast on it, to do anything that shall reprove this encroachment on the Christian spirit of liberty."

Most of the Reformers spoke and wrote in the same strain. It is true that the Westminster Assembly of Divines regarded the observance of Sunday as a part of the moral law; but it is also true that Archbishop Whateley characterised such a dogma as "utterly unintelligible." But, although the leaders of the Reformation were the friends of liberty, it must be admitted that it was the Reformation that made the introduction of the Puritan Sunday possible in Great Britain. First of all, an attempt was made to restore the Hebrew Sabbath, but it miserably failed. Then the process of Hebraising the Christian Sunday began, and this met with considerable success, with the result that Sunday became, by Acts of Parliament, indescribably dull and dreary—an intolerable burden which the people were compelled to bear. But the object of the introduction of this Puritan "Sunday Sabbath," as Dr. Hardwicke aptly calls it, was to glorify the Church. Sunday work and Sunday amusements were forbidden simply in order that the Church services might reign without a single rival. Church attendance was made compulsory, and non-attendance a crime against the State as well as a sin against God. A man was fined for kissing his wife, child, or sweetheart on Sunday in order that his mind should not be diverted from the contemplation of spiritual realities. Places of amusement were closed that places of worship might have the day to themselves.

At last, after centuries of passive endurance, the people of this country are beginning actively to rebel against the cruel tyranny of such a forbidding Sunday. They are throwing off the yoke of bondage to it. The astonishing popularity of the Sunday cinema has opened the eyes of Christian leaders to the fact that the British Christian Sunday is seriously threatened, and the Rev. Dr. Newton Marshall is afraid that it is doomed. Writing in the Baptist Times and Freeman for December 27, the reverend gentleman says:—

> "There is to-day a mighty struggle going on as to whether theatres and music-halls should be opened on Sundays or not. How this struggle will end it is hard to say. One fears, however, that mammon will win. The actors and actresses and artistes may be bitterly opposed to Sunday performances (indeed they seem to be), but there is vast capital invested in the business of amusement, and capital is soulless, remorseless, inhuman. Unless other forces, more determined and potent, overcome it, the sheer weight of gold must have its way."

Dr. Marshall is surely mistaken. There is more capital invested in the business of Divine worship than in that of amusement; and "if the sheer weight of gold must have its way," then the business of Divine worship is certain to be victorious. But the question will be settled, not by capital, but by the public taste. What is beyond all controversy is that the public taste is rapidly changing, and crying out with swelling insistence for Sunday amusement. Dr. Marshall is not blind to the issues at stake. He says:—

> "If the theatres and music-halls and cinemas are generally opened on Sundays in our land, the Continental Sunday, to which we suppose ourselves so superior, is here. How fatal an evil this would be, let our own past utterances testify. Have we not traced our national greatness to our national Day of Rest? Have we not treated the quiet of the Lord's Day as the salt of our religious life? Have we not urged it as the bulwark of purity in the home and of a high ideal of conduct for each day's business? Have we not insisted that the Sunday is a day set apart by God for his purposes?"

Dr. Marshall is quite right. The theologians have made, and still make, all those high claims in behalf of Sunday; but they have never been able to establish the truth of one of them. What proof is there that Sunday is "a day set apart by God for his purposes"? None has ever been adduced. As Bishop Andrews, in his History of the Sabbath, well says:—

> "The festival of Sunday is more ancient than the Christian religion; its origin being lost in remote antiquity. It did not originate from any Divine command, nor from piety towards God; on the contrary, it was set apart as a sacred day by the Heathen world in honor of their chief God, the Sun."

Again, it is utterly impossible to trace our vaunted "national greatness to our national Day of Rest." Our so-called "national greatness" is very largely mythical. We only fancy ourselves superior to other nations which have enjoyed a freer, more rational Sunday. An individual who continually calls attention to his superior qualities and attainments only succeeds in proving himself an unmitigated fool; and precisely the same thing is true of a boastful, vainglorious nation. We are usually set down abroad as a nation of hypocrites and braggarts. But whatever excellences we may possess, nothing is more certain than that we do not owe a single one of them to our strict Sabbatarianism. Indeed, Dr. Hardwicke informs us, in his interesting little work, Sunday, that when he "once asked an intelligent foreigner what, in his opinion, was the cause of so much inebriety in our country, he replied at once, 'Your Sunday'"; and then added "that he had never seen so much hypocrisy as he had during his visit of two months in England." The claim that Sunday is "the bulwark of purity in the home and of a high ideal of conduct for each day's business" is so palpably false as to deserve no serious consideration. Are British homes, on an average, purer that the homes of countries wherein the Continental Sunday obtains? We challenge Dr. Marshall to produce any valid evidence of the truth of such a contention.

Now, after writing so grandiloquently about our national greatness, the purity of our homes, and the righteous conduct of our business, all of which he traces to the beneficent influence of Sunday, the reverend gentleman proceeds to mourn over the fact that, in all probability, we shall not succeed in saving the institution to which we owe so much. And he makes the strange, almost incredible, confession that "in this struggle for the maintenance of the British Sunday the Church is taking no part. True, Dr. F. B. Meyer has had something to say—but then he has something to say about everything!" We agree with the reverend gentleman in the conviction that the Christian Sunday is a vanishing institution. Its secularisation has been steadily going on for many years. It is being gradually restored to what it was before the Church laid its mutilating hand upon it. What is so much needed just now, however, is liberty to spend the day according to one's predilection. Let the Christians realise, as John Stuart Mill perceived long ago, that "Sabbatarian legislation is an illegitimate interference with the rightful liberty of the individual"; but they are cowards. They foresee that unless they retain the unjust monopoly of Sunday they are sure to lose it altogether.

J. T. LLOYD.

Confitemini Domino.

THIS is not at all the Bay of Biscay I had been taught to believe in. The Biscay creed of my youth was full of visions of storm, and broken spars, and of drowned folk sinking "unknelled, uncoffined, and unknown." This blue water, spangled with morning light, might be the happy Bay of Bournemouth or the summer sea of Scarborough. Thus do the terrific gods of man's infancy dissolve into the purer and serener thoughts of his prime.

Folk-lorists say that some of the fairies of popular tales are the miniature survivals of older gods, no longer feared, and now reduced to amusing unimportance. I have heard, also, that the gay and painted clown of the Christmas pantomime is the representative of the Devil of the Middle Ages, who once performed pranks on the stage of Miracle-plays, and threw our ancestors into passions of terror and laughter. It is not the least interesting occupation of the sociologist to watch the dwindling of the gods, and to see how giant figures that formerly sat throned in cloudy majesty are now reduced to the small proportions of the puppet.

So, on Sunday morning, I attended Church Service in the saloon of the P. and O. steamer that was carrying me to the East. The gilt-buttoned captain led our devotions, and we were a thoroughly respectable congregation. I should have felt more comfortable if a few engineers from below had joined the assembly, and one or two red-capped and bare-brown-footed Lascars had mingled with our gentility; for these elements would have reminded us of the basis of labor upon which our Sabbatical ease rested. Yet, perhaps, the program was more logical as it stood. The genius of labor is massive, Herculean, and manly; and our Sunday morning gods were but frail and puny creatures, chiefly adapted for the adoration of the British middle-class intellect. When the psalm bade us "Confitemini Domino"—"Trust in the Lord"—we responded with a faint and æsthetic suburban trust. Little gods, little faith. We and the captain recited together the Mariners' Psalm:—

"They that go down to the sea in ships, and occupy their business in the great waters;

"These men see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep;

"They are carried up to the heaven, and down again to the deep; their soul melteth away because of the trouble;

"So when they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, he delivereth them out of their distress."

But our voices did not ring with the conviction that roared in the worship of our Puritan fathers. We were conscious all the time that, if this sunny Bay of Biscay changed its mood from smiles to tempest, our confidence would not be in the petty gods, but in the captain, the engineers, the Lascars, the boats, the Marconi messages, the chart, and the noble astronomy which the scientific patience of many generations has constructed for the law of times, seasons, and navigation. Gentle was the wheeze of the violin that formed our orchestra, and the bourgeois congregation so feebly sang the hymn:—

"Cast care aside, lean on thy Guide,
His boundless mercy will provide,"

that I felt obliged to answer the signal of distress, and, Agnostic as I was, to join in and strengthen the quavering choir. But, as I chanted the marvels of Divine Providence, my mind ran back to a conversation I had just held on deck with an invalid who was on his way to Ceylon in search of warmth and health.

"My intestines," he said to me, with a curious smile, "were entirely taken out."

This sudden insight into the manufacture of hollow ware fascinated my attention. I listened eagerly while my companion unfolded the story of his pains, his operations, his fears and hopes. He had lain under chloroform for the space of one hour and a half, and nine minutes; and he named a group of the most distinguished physicians in England as the examiners of his inner chambers and his friendly dissectors. The intestines were replaced, but with a junction on the left side of the stomach, instead of the right; and the orifice on the right side had been deftly sewn up and rendered "blind." And now, when the plaintive violin unenchantingly chanted,—

"Cast care aside, lean on thy Guide,
His boundless mercy will provide,"—

I thought of the cheerful invalid on deck, who, thanks to the providential wisdom of humanity, was endowed with fresh life, and was joyously expecting to breathe the spicy air of Ceylon.

If one must have gods at all, oh! let them be splendid! Let us have that magnificent Zeus who reigned, imperially and thunderously, among the glorious company on Mount Olympus. Or let us have mighty Siva, riding on a bull, and with the colossal stream of Ganges trickling down his shaggy hair and beard. Or let us have Odin, conqueror of giants of frost and blast, and honored by the valiant sea-kings of Scandinavia. Even Luther's piety had a worthy object,—"Our God's a sure stronghold" ("Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott"). But to-day the master-forces of the globe are wielded by other hands. The weakened hands of the divinities have resigned the lightnings and the bolts, and the dominion and the empire, to the Man who was once so much lower than the angels. They have yielded the stars to Herschel and Leverrier; the secrets of electricity to Faraday and Edison; the arcana of physics to Clerk Maxwell and Hertz; the passwords of the realm of biology to Darwin and Haeckel; the power of healing to Lister and Ronald Ross; and the art of Scripture-writing to Shakespeare, Montaigne, Goethe, Emerson, Nietzsche.

Poetic William Blake once asked a lady, "Have you ever seen a fairy funeral?" And he went on to describe to her the details of the procession he had witnessed.

Such a funeral I seemed to assist at on that Sunday morning in the saloon of a P. and O. boat. Perfectly certain am I that nobody in the congregation effectively believed in the gods in the grand mediæval manner, or even in the seventeenth-century manner of Spinoza and Bunyan. The gods that presided over our service were shaped after the fashion of the little images one sees in the Egyptian galleries of the British Museum,—tiny pocket-deities and heavenly dolls. Just as to-day the really great structures of London are the docks, the electric power-stations, the tube-railways, and the thousand schools and colleges, while the Tower of London is a mere phantom of barbaric tyranny, so the genuine triumphs of the human genius of our age are visible in science, art, craft, literature, and an immense Labor Movement and Woman Movement, while the gods are diminished to puny ghosts and thin imaginations that prepare to leave the soul of man forever.

Literary Gossip.

WE have been looking again into that pious paper Great Thoughts. The first noticeable thing we came across was a half-page headed "George Meredith on Religion," acknowledged as from Scribner's Magazine, and therefore indicating that the editor had not read the two volumes of George Meredith's Letters, but only the selection printed beforehand in the American periodical. Religious men like the editor think nothing of the lie by suggestion. They do not say, but they suggest, that a quotation arbitrarily picked from the pages of a great writer represents his ripest thought, whereas it may represent (as it does in this case) only one of he landmarks which he has passed on the road to his full mental development. Meredith's fatherly letter to his young son Arthur, from which the passage in question was taken, was written as far back as April 25, 1872. He lived thirty-seven years after that date and passed through many stages of intellectual growth until he reached the final stage of pure Humanism, which is so nobly expressed in his later letters as well as in his later poems. Even in the passage on religion in that far-off letter there are signs that Meredith could say a good deal more if he were not writing to the young son of his first (unhappy) marriage. And it is clear that the idea of a personal God was waning in his mind and becoming merely symbolic of Virtue and Truth,—in short, not a term of theology but a term of moral idealism. Certainly he did not decorate the pronouns of the Deity with capital letters as they are printed in the pious Great Thoughts.

Rather more than two years after the date of that letter to his young son, Meredith mentioned a famous American scandal in one of his delightfully open letters to Captain Maxse. "You have seen the papers," he wrote, "and meditated upon the Beecher-Tilton scandal. Guilty or not, there is a sickly sanctimoniousness about the religious fry that makes the tale of their fornications and adulteries absolutely repulsive to read of, and but for the feeding of the reptile sarcasm in our bosoms, it would disgust one more than a chronicle of the amors of costermongers." "Religious fry" is a branding phrase. A little later Meredith was declaring to Maxse that the fight with priestcraft and priests was the fight of the immediate future.

The next noticeable thing in Great Thoughts was a reference to Meredith in a review of Frederic Harrison's Among My Books. We have not read this book, nor do we mean to. We have no taste for a writer who calls Lamb a "poor thing"; Lamb whose life was a daily heroism, and who wrote things as sure of immortality as any prose of his time. Amongst the gems of wisdom and wit fished out of Frederic Harrison's volume is this—that Meredith was a brilliant novelist rather than a poet; nature having denied him an ear for music in verse. Fancy saying this of the author of "Love in the Valley" which Tennyson said he would be proud to have written himself, and that Stevenson almost raved about. That poem gave a new music to English poetry.

And now for Apollo's revenge. The clerical editor of Great Thoughts, after endorsing Frederic Harrison's denunciation of the unrest and frivolity of the present age, quotes what he calls the "appropriate counsel of Sophocles." Here it is:—

"Keep the young generation in hail,
And beneath them no tumbled house."

"Sophocles!" The knowing reader will remember, the unknowing reader will be surprised to learn, that these two lines are a spoilt quotation from one of the most Meredithian of Meredith's own poems. They are from "The Empty Purse," and should run thus :—

Digitized by Google

> "Keep the young generations in hail,
> And bequeath them no tumbled house!"

Excellent advice! No wonder Meredith called it "The cry of the conscience of Life."

"Sophocles!" Oh Downes!—Downes! No doubt thou meanest well. But thou art as wise as thou art accurate. In this very number of thy extravagantly named journal thou makest Samuel Johnson the author of "Hell is paved with good intentions." How could hell be paved? Hast thou not heard it is a bottomless pit? It is "the road to hell" that is "paved with good intentions." And there is some sense in that if we leave out the theology. Moreover, the saying is generations older than Samuel Johnson. It came from one of the old Puritan preachers—perhaps Richard Baxter, but we are not sure. But thou hast mangled it whatever its origin. Thou art a club-footed critic, and thou presumest too much in the company of thy betters.

We have been offered a big price for the George Meredith letters to ourselves, and still in our possession, as well as the presentation volume of verse he sent to us while we were in Holloway Prison under the Blasphemy Laws. But they are not for sale. Meredith prices are running high just now, and we do not think they are likely to drop. At Sotheby's last week the manuscripts of three of the four parts of Odes In Contribution to the Song of French History fetched nearly £300 ("The Revolution" £100—"Napoleon" £92—"Alsace-Lorraine" £95); and 44 letters to Dr. and Mrs. Jessopp £445—in round figures £10 each. The whole volume containing the three Odes and another entitled "France," extends to less than a hundred pages. What a change from the old days of unappreciation! One is reminded of the flippant reviewer who remarked that Shelley's masterpiece was well called "Prometheus Unbound"—for who would ever think of binding it? A copy of that very first edition would now fetch several times its weight in gold. Thus (in the case of real great genius) does the whirligig of time bring its revenges.

The Church's Motives.

TAKE Church colleges and schools. Are they founded in the interests of true education? On the contrary, they are for the purpose of maintaining a creed. A Catholic college has for its object just enough education to make a student a Catholic. Any further knowledge would be heresy. A Lutheran school has one purpose in view—to make Lutherans. Knowledge that might militate against this end must be excluded. Methodist, Presbyterian, and other denominational schools are conducted along the same lines. Real education does not consist in teaching the mind according to a certain system of belief or dogma, but in training it to think and to reason from facts. One-half of Christian education consists of burdening the brain with myths, miracles, and other unnaturalisms, which must be outgrown later in life. The Church has prostituted education to creed. In the public schools, not controlled by the Church, a boy or girl learns more, learns more thoroughly, is better mentally and morally prepared for the battle of life than in any Church school. Consider, again, higher education. Once this was entirely in the hands of the clergy. Sixty years ago, according to Andrew D. White, the great majority of the presidents of our colleges and universities were ministers. To-day, the majority are laymen, to the greater efficiency of education.

When we look upon hospitals and other organised charities founded by the Church, the same motives and methods exist. They are not primarily to help afflicted humanity, but to make Christians and to perpetuate the power of the priesthood. The Church has used bad methods to further its progress, and it has, when necessary, resorted to good ones. But, above all, its end has been priestly domination, putting out the lamp of liberty, stifling free speech and honest thought. It points its finger to heaven, as a reward for the faithful, while, had not the false teachings of the Church turned men's minds to this imaginary heaven, this world would have been a fitter place of abode, and we would not require so much charity. If the Church has relieved some human suffering it has caused more than it has abolished.

Acid Drops.

"Providence" gave us a particularly "Merry Christmas" by way of winding up 1912. We hope it will settle down a bit for the new year. Storms, shipwrecks, and all sorts of incidents caused by too much wind and water, are not quite so "merry" to the sufferers as they appear to the party inflicting them. It would be a good thing, indeed, if the said party took a long rest—for "Providence" nearly always means ructions.

The range of "Providence's" Christmas benevolence was very wide. No less than sixty Russian fishing boats capsized during the storm in the Caspian Sea. The loss of life is reported to be "very great." "Providence" will note the fact with great pleasure.

With what unction the Daily Chronicle, in its Christmas Eve number, maundered over the blessings of British rule in India. Whether the ruling of India by Great Britain is right and just, to begin with, did not occur to our contemporary. John Bull's brain is never crossed by an idea of that kind. He is too pious and too self-righteous to consider the possibility of his not being chosen by God to keep other people in their proper places. It has always been the characteristic of Christian nations, and of Great Britain the most of all, to disdain the notion that their power should be limited by their own frontiers. They see a special wickedness in throwing a bomb at the Viceroy of India. Lord Hardinge is British, moreover he is a Christian; and those are two special marks of the divine favor; the bomb-thrower is therefore worse than a mere criminal, he is guilty of something like sacrilege, he tried to kill the deputy of the Lord's anointed. All this was involved in the Chronicle's article. The British are "a ruling and civilising race," they have a mandate from heaven, as the Jews had in the land of Canaan. It justifies them in crushing down all opposition, and to lay a heavy hand even on honest criticism. What is for the good of India, though India may not see it, must be forced upon its three hundred million inhabitants. "Our clear duty," the Chronicle concluded, "is to persevere in that course with resolute determination, and cool courage, for that alone will make India peaceful, prosperous, and happy, sustain our own credit, hold high our honor, and justify our rule and our presence in India." These compliments, paid by ourselves to ourselves, are delightful. They display the proverbial humility of the good earnest Christians.

The unction of the dear Daily News was displayed in another direction. Nearly all the newspapers at this time of the year are cadging in the name of Christ for some "charitable" object. People living in destitution and misery all the year round are provided with one day's decent eating and drinking; editorial bosoms swell with the pride of benevolence; and this is considered a highly satisfactory state of things; besides, it silences the Secularists who are always twitting the Christians with trying to do good in the next world instead of in this one. So the Christmas Eve special article in the Daily News carried on in this fashion :—

> "Whatever else grows old and passes away, the spirit of Christmas will remain for ever fresh and vital. Its message of 'Peace on earth, good will among men' can never be exhausted. The reminder that, behind the struggles and controversies that embitter our relations, we are all—black and white, yellow and brown—members of one family, comrades for a little while in the great adventure of life, subject to like afflictions, exalted by like joys, enveloped equally by the mystery that will not yield its secret, needing equally the warmth of human friendship and human love—this can never grow stale or obsolete."

What a farce it is to read this little sermon and then turn to the facts. The "spirit of Christmas" has been prompting the Balkan States to demand "another slice of Turkey" for their Christmas dinner. The Christian States, in fact, have been presenting the Mohammedan enemy with terms of peace as hard, ungenerous, and humiliating as can well be conceived. We admit that this "spirit of Christmas" among Christians will "never be exhausted." It holds out to the bitter end.

The modern Christmas—what we may call the Dickens Christmas—is comparatively a thing of yesterday. It is really a recurrence to the old Pagan festival which Christmas supplanted. But the Daily News appears to think that human love and friendship are Christmas gifts to the world, and that without Christianity we should never have known of our common human nature and that at bottom all men are members of one family. This is claiming for Christianity what is no more due to it than it is to the religion of

Mumbo Jumbo. Love, friendship, and the recognition of human brotherhood, were ethical commonplaces before Christianity was heard of. The great master of human nature, William Shakespeare, stated the truth of natural human brotherhood, without any assistance from the Christian or other religion, between three and four hundred years before Charles Dickens. When the monarch in Richard II. is falling he addresses to his courtiers that piece of incomparable eloquence on the frailty and mortality of all men alike, whether prince or peasant; and then, addressing his courtiers still more directly, he says to them :—

> "Cover your heads, and mock not flesh and blood
> With solemn reverence; throw away respect,
> Tradition, form, and ceremonious duty;
> For you have but mistook me all this while:
> I live with bread like you, feel want, taste grief,
> Need friends:—subjected thus,
> How can you say to me, I am a king."

The holy anointing oil of kings went for nothing in the last extremities of fate. The common nature of King Richard and his lowest subject was proved finally by their common feelings, common wants, common desires, and common weaknesses. There we come to the bedrock of humanity.

Reports are continuing to arrive as to the truly Christian spirit that prevails between the Greek and Bulgarian allies, and also as to the treatment of Mohammedans and Jews by the allied armies. At Salonika whole detachments of Greeks and Bulgarians have been drawn up in fighting array, and only dispersed at the last moment. One Bulgarian chief is reported as pillaging and murdering Greeks and Mohammedans alike. At Lagavani this chief, one Dumboulakoff, ordered the priest to omit the name of the King of Greece from his prayers, and then took the Turkish inhabitants and used them as targets for the rifles of his men. Four men, two women, and one child—all Mohammedans—were also found murdered one morning just outside Salonika. The correspondent of the Jewish Chronicle also continues to forward accounts of the open murder of Jews by the soldiers of the Cross. Yet the Church Times remarks in its last issue that no excesses have followed the victorious march of the allied armies. Well, we have given accounts of a fair number during the past month, and we are convinced much is to be said when the whole truth becomes public property.

The Catholic Times has a cheerful kind of message for its devout readers. The religious outlook it finds to be very black indeed. There is a "mighty army" leagued against Christianity with an influence all-powerful in the offices of newspapers. When representatives of this army "meet in their lodges and clubs to discuss public affairs, they ask themselves how, in dealing with national and international questions, they can hurt Christianity." All this has a very "raw-head-and-bloody-bones" air about it, and readers will take it for what it is worth. In some countries, we are told, this anti-Christian army has "captured the Governments and made them instruments for carrying out their own anti-Christian designs." Protestants, who are "Christians only in name," are powerless against this anti-Christian movement. "Their views can scarcely be distinguished from those of Freethinkers," and amongst Protestants Freethinkers are winning an "immense number of disciples almost without effort." The only bulwark is, of course, Roman Catholicism, and the moral of the article appears to be that unless all Christians become Roman Catholics, they will all turn into Freethinkers before they know where they are.

While we are on the Catholic Times, we may notice a curious defence of Catholic toleration offered by Bishop Keating. The Bishop said it was an ironical situation that Protestants should charge Catholics with intolerance, and, so far, we agree with him. Intolerance is as inherent in Protestantism as it is in Roman Catholicism. The wider latitude existing in countries where the majority are Protestants is due to the impossibility of union among them, not to any willingness to suffer differences of opinion. Bishop Keating, however, says that with Catholics toleration is determined "wholly and exclusively by considerations of right and wrong." And, he added, "they believed there was only one true religion." Well, if that means anything at all, it means that the Catholic will tolerate a difference of opinion so long as convenient. You may believe what you please so long as you don't disagree with the Church. In matters of practice that is really all that most Christians ever understand by toleration, but it is well to have something like an official declaration of the position. The only toleration we care about is that which allows every man to believe and teach what he pleases, whether it happens to be truth or error. It is enough that it is truth to him. And the court that should determine whether an opinion is right or wrong is neither Church nor State, but the tribunal of public intelligence.

God's Plaything is the title of Marjorie Bowen's latest volume of tragic stories. The Daily Chronicle reviewer quarrels with the title as "rather unpleasing, implying, as it does, that the Almighty has a grim and cruel sense of humor." But this is not a new implication. Has not the reviewer heard of Heine's "Aristophanes of the Universe"? And what of Thomas Hardy's reply to certain critics of Tess?

The newspapers give prominence to the statement that the authorities at Hereford Cathedral have decided to retain the Athanasian Creed. What a tenacious Creed that is! Many years ago the following riddle was propounded:—Why is the Athanasian Creed like a royal Bengal tiger? The answer being, Because it holds on by its damnation clause (claws).

Finding that they cannot legally close the Picture Shows on Sunday, the Brighton Town Council have decided to grant seven-days licenses, with the proviso that all employees shall have one full day's holiday every week. This is precisely what we have recommended all along. One stroke of the pen destroys the canting clerical objection to "Sunday labor." Not that the Sunday license is in any strict sense of the word legal. It is not. The old Statute of George III. against Sunday entertainments is still in force. The Sunday license is, however, an assurance that the authorities will not seek to enforce the Statute; and the Brighton Aquarium Act, as it is briefly called, renders the action of private citizens in the same direction a risky proceeding, since it declares that the Attorney-General has power to remit the penalties on behalf of the Crown,—in which case the "common informer" might lose instead of gaining considerably.

Middlesex County Council, by 43 to 17, have decided that Sunday cinematograph shows are not desirable, and have instructed the licensing committee to take proceedings against offenders. What on earth is meant by "not desirable"? Surely the shows are desirable to the crowds of orderly people who patronise them. They may not be desirable to those who do not patronise them, but it is not suggested that such be compelled to attend. They have all the rest of the world left them for recreation or edification. It is really a thing to be noted that the Sabbatarian bigots—in this like all bigots—regard "liberty" as meaning the right to do what they like and the right to prevent all their neighbors from doing anything else. The law of freedom is non-interference with the rights of others. You interfere with another man's rights when you prevent him doing what he wishes to do. He does not interfere with your rights in doing what he chooses and leaving you to do what you choose.

The following case is an item of Christmas news; we take it from the Daily Chronicle of December 27—its Milan correspondent having wired the news on Christmas Day :—

> "The extraordinary trial of Monsignor Appeddu, Canon of Sassari Cathedral, Sardinia, pending since August, 1910, has just terminated in the Local Assize Court, in the condemnation of that famous pulpit orator to 15 years' penal servitude.
> "As recounted in the Daily Chronicle at the time, Appeddu published a story according to which he and his valet had been waylaid by five brigands on the road between Pattada and Mamoiada, robbed of an enormous sum of money, beaten, and abandoned half-dead. The keys of his residence, he narrated, were also seized by the bandits, and when the police proceeded to the canonry, they found the place sacked from top to bottom.
> "No sooner, however, had a searching inquiry begun than Appeddu fled to Corsica. Besides being bankrupt for £8,000, it was found that the canon had been for several years defrauding banks and misappropriating vast sums from his admirers, in order to bolster up reckless speculations in the sugar industry, and that together with his valet he had concocted the brigand 'outrage' as a last desperate resource."

No doubt this case will soon be forgotten. Criminals are so frequently Christians; in fact, they are seldom anything else. Had the culprit been an eminent Freethinker his case would have figured constantly in pious "improving" literature as a frightful warning against the immoral influence of "infidelity."

The Rev. Father Graham, of Motherwell, says that the "grand characteristic" of the Catholic faith is that it enables people to believe. A Catholic has no doubts. He says, "Ask a Catholic 'Is there a hell? Is there an endless hell? Will people dying unsaved burn there for ever?' He will reply without hesitation, 'Yes, certainly.' Ask a Protestant, and he will answer, 'I do not know for certain. Some say Yes, and some say No.'" Therefore, Father Graham prefers Catholicism. He has a sincere pity for the poor souls who maybe die and are yet without the comforting reflection that there is a hell waiting where the unsaved will "burn eternally for ever." Father Graham knows there is a hell. He expects it in the next world. We are inclined to hope that he will not be disappointed.

In common, we suppose, with a large number of other people, we received a Christmas appeal for charity on behalf of a Christian organisation for the care of poor children. We were not surprised at this, nor, it being signed by the Bishop of London, at finding one or two silly statements in the course of the letter. And in this instance such statements were quite gratuitous. If people are not concerned to help poor children for the child's sake, it may well be doubted whether any other appeal is likely to move them. In this instance, however, the Bishop of London enforced the appeal by saying that Christianity had always made the care of the child its peculiar work. In a sinister sense this is true enough. In a broad, healthy, human sense it is altogether false. Religiously, Christianity has always aimed at capturing the child, because that was the only way to secure the adult. Religiously, too, the child has played a part in Christian writing and preaching as a symbol. But the child was held up as a symbol of innocence, helplessness, and dependence to the adult. We were to become as little children in order to gain the kingdom of heaven. We were to sacrifice the strength, the independence, the critical power of the adult mind, so that we might become the better believers. This is really what there is in the Christian exaltation of the child.

The study of the child, the care of the child, the social value of the child, as serious studies really belongs to the nineteenth century—a period that saw a more decisive weakening of Christianity than had ever before occurred. And the impetus to this came from two directions. First, from the development of a non-theological sociology; secondly, from the growth of the doctrine of Evolution. The extensive literature that has grown up around the child during the past thirty years owes nothing whatever to either Christian teaching or Christian influence. More than that, it should be remembered that the greatest brutalities ever practised against children occurred in this country, and in the full glow of the evangelistic revival. We do not think that in the whole history of humanity there is a more horrible chapter than that of child labor under the English factory system. Other people have occasionally practised infanticide; but killing a newly-born child is surely a harmless pastime compared with the systematic murdering of children of seven and eight years of age for the sake of making money out of their labor. And even to-day it may be questioned whether so large a number of neglected children exist anywhere in Europe as we have in Christian England. Travellers speak of Japan as the children's paradise. Little is heard of the ill-treatment of children in China or in the East. Nansen said the Esquimaux simply couldn't see why a child should be beaten. In England a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children brings thousands of cases of the ill-treatment of children every year into court, and deals with a still larger number that never come before the public.

America—meaning the United States—is a Christian country. Nobody but a Christian, and a loudly professing one, would be elected President of that great and glorious and free (yes, don't forget free) country. President Hayes found out the full force of American bigotry when he was appointing Colonel Ingersoll to the Ambassadorship at Berlin. Such a Christian howl went up from New York to San Francisco, and from the Gulf of Mexico to the Great Lakes, that Ingersoll had to come to his friend President Hayes' relief by declining the appointment. Yes, America is a Christian country; and Anthony Comstock means to keep it so. American publications are mostly "mailed"; that is, they go from the publishers to the subscribers by post; and as the Post Office is really governed by Anthony Comstock, seeing that no publication gets through the mail without his approval,—and as he is prying piety and prurient puritanism personified,—it is easy to see how "free" the public, and especially the advanced, press is over there. Religious journalists and blatant pulpiteers are even crying out that "Ingersoll is a back number." We will not discuss that statement. It is really too absurd. But there are other things in America that are certainly not back numbers. Some of them have lately been ventilated by Dr. Thomas D. Woods, Professor of Physical Education at Columbia University, in an official report published by the Board of Education. Here are some of the up-to-date things in Christian America:—

> "Between 50 and 98 per cent. of the children [in the schools] have defective teeth, 25 per cent. defective sight, and 30 per cent. suffer from adenoids or enlarged tonsils. Many millions of children have several ailments, and 25 per cent. suffer from mal-nutrition. Five per cent. of the country's children have, or have had, tubercular disease of the lungs, and an equal number suffer from curvature of the spine or flat-foot to a degree that is most detrimental to their general health. Organic heart disease claims nearly half a million children among its victims in American schools."

Does any man in his senses imagine that such a state of things would exist in an Ingersollite society? Godliness would take a back seat, and cleanliness would come to the front—cleanliness of eating and drinking, cleanliness of person, cleanliness of dwellings, cleanliness of habits, and cleanliness of thinking and feeling.

In commenting on the decline of church attendance one of the religious weeklies notes that people are not inclined to talk about religious things, and points out that this is in contrast with our forefathers, who made religion a topic of every-day conversation. We do not think the last part of the statement is strictly accurate, but all the same it contains a truth. In earlier times religious phrases and expressions formed a much larger part of ordinary conversation, and for very obvious reasons. When religious belief is really alive it is expressed in ordinary talk because it expresses a common conviction and is not in direct conflict with common knowledge. Under such conditions men could invoke the name of God and use religious terms in a way that nowadays would be thought little short of blasphemous. With a more complete development there is a more drastic division between the world of actual life and religion. Religious phraseology assumes a special character for the simple reason that it no longer has any application to life, and when it is introduced the only effect is to display its incongruity. The more religious people are, the more this is experienced. It is this feeling that lies at the root of the objection to exhibiting the life of Jesus in a picture show. The Middle Ages had its religious plays, depicting nearly all the main incidents in the New Testament, and there was no outcry from anybody. It was perfectly natural that what was believed should be depicted. To-day such representations jar on believers because they represent a number of beliefs that people have really outgrown. They merely objectify what is to nearly all an utterly incredible story.

Ex-Lieutenant Sutor seems to have developed into a first-rate crank. The doctor at Bow-street Police Station reported that he could not be certified as insane. "He held certain religious beliefs which he wished to promulgate, and he broke windows to keep his name before the public." Religious fanatics generally want to promulgate their religious beliefs at other people's expense; and they love being advertised.

Freethought teachings find their echo in unexpected places, as we have often pointed out. Take, as an example, the following:—

> "The history of religion is largely the history of human cruelty and dread. In this respect I should think no single psychological force has ever equalled it. Whatever be the explanation of the fact—and it is not altogether without explanation—the religious instincts of mankind have, broadly speaking, been the direct cause of more misery, bloodshed, terrorism, and all manner of fiendishness, than the ambition of conquerors, or greed, or lust, or any other form taken by man's inhumanity to man.....There has always been a peculiar ingredient in religious zealotry which has rendered men insensible to human feeling in a way that nothing else can approach; they have steeled their hearts against natural impulses and mercy at the supposed bidding of their gods to a degree that nothing else could compel. The very last thing associated with Deity as a rule has been anything approximating to love."

This is not from an avowed Freethinker. It is from a recent sermon by the Rev. R. J. Campbell. The Freethinkers' work has been to make it possible for Mr. Campbell to say this and still draw a large salary for preaching the Gospel.

HELLO IN THE PULPIT.

An admiring parishioner of a young divine in an Ohio town recently had a telephone installed in the clergyman's house. The good man was delighted with the convenience and used it immediately before going to church.

When the time came for him to announce the first hymn he read the first lines with his usual impressiveness and concluded with, "Let us all unite in hymn seven O three."

This completes the subscription list to December 31, 1912.

Correction: James Blamford in last week's list should have been James Blampied.

W. OWEN.—Thanks for long explanatory letter re Glasgow.

T. BARKER.—We do not rank Matthew Arnold as highly as some of his admirers do, but we should be very sorry to call him a "minor" poet.

T. ROBERTSON.—See the result. Thanks also for your new year's good wishes.

A. PRICE.—There is room for what may be called an artistic Life of Thomas Paine; something as full essentially, and as accurate, as Dr. Conway's voluminous work, but less diffuse and documented. Of the short sketches of Paine's career our own, published as an Introduction to the Twentieth Century Edition of the Age of Reason, was very carefully written. The late George Jacob Holyoake called it "masterly." We have thought of adding something to it and including it in the "Pioneer Pamphlets."

W. T. CLARK.—Why shouldn't the same publishers issue sporting papers and pious papers from the same office? Ordinary publishers are only out to make money. Didn't you know it?

J. BETTERIDGE.—Glad you are "a lover of the Freethinker" after reading it three years.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for cuttings.

CONNIE BROOKS.—Pleased to hear that you and your mother both read the Freethinker eagerly. We recognise more than ever, if possible, the necessity of converting women to Freethought.

"VINCENT."—We have seen the brochure Ma Vie. It may be clever, in its way, but the discussion of the historicity of Jesus has gone far beyond that stage. Fresh "Lives of Christ," from any point of view, are only a waste of time. With regard to Mr. Mann's articles, we endorse your opinion that they are "fine."

PRETORIA FREETHINKER.—Glad you still "greatly enjoy" this journal and do your best to promote its circulation in your part of the world.

PETER GRAY.—Veterans of 77 are not numerous. We are glad to hear from one of them. Send us cuttings whenever you please.

T. H. PERKINS.—Good wishes reciprocated. It is pleasant to hear from readers who date from 1886.

W. CALLAGHAN.—Sent as desired. We note your "opinion that the Freethinker is the finest literary paper published."

JAMES NEEDHAM.—Why shouldn't a miner write? A miner is as good as anybody else. Not in our occupations, which are generally a matter of chance, but in ourselves lies our worth to the world. Glad to hear you reckon the night you heard Mr. Foote lecture at Manchester the best night in your life. We hope you will find more toleration in America.

CLYDEBANK.—An envelope with this postmark contains a 5s. Postal Order but no letter of instructions. What is it for?

J. BURNS.—Alloted as desired. Thanks. Shop manager will send you receipt for his portion.

E. B.—Thanks for useful matter.

L. GEMMER.—Presumably for the new year. Kindly confirm or otherwise.

W. BAILEY.—We are writing you on the matter, which is certainly important.

JOSEPH ROSTOCK.—We hope the acknowledgment is correct. Thanks for the Warrington "saints'" compliment and good wishes.

PHILIP VIVIAN.—Happy to renew acquaintance with your Churches and Modern Thought through your presentation copy of what we suppose is the new impression advertised.

T. O. T.—We note that you "have derived more intellectual light from the Freethinker than from any other paper."

BELFAST FACTORY LADS.—We have already given the "Manger to Cross" picture show as much attention as it deserves. It won't help Christianity,—quite the contrary. And why should we be angry when Christians blaspheme?

"BOLTON."—Your subscription was duly handed over, and should have been specially referred to. It dropped into the general account of the meetings. We propose to deal with your interesting letter next week—without disclosing your identity.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Our Fighting Fund.

[The object of this Fund is to provide the sinews of war in the National Secular Society's fight against the London County Council, which is seeking to stop all collections at the Society's open-air meetings in London, and thus to abolish a practically immemorial right; this step being but one in a calculated policy which is clearly intended to suppress the right of free speech in all parks and other open spaces under the Council's control. This Fund is being raised by the Editor of the Freethinker by request of the N. S. S. Executive. Subscriptions should therefore be sent direct to G. W. Foote, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C. Cheques, etc., should be made payable to him.]

Previously acknowledged, £76 10s. 9d. Received since:—W. R. Angell, 2s. 6d.; J. Burns, 10s.; R. L. M., 10s.

Sugar Plums.

The Queen's (Minor) Hall lectures will be resumed on Sunday evening, January 12. Mr. Foote is preparing special lectures for the new course. A full announcement will appear in our next issue.

Further Sunday lectures have been arranged for during January at the Public (Minor) Hall, George-street, Croydon. It is hoped that the local "saints" will do their best to make these meetings well known. Mr. Cohen leads off this evening (Jan. 5), his subject being "Christianity and Social Problems." Mr. J. T. Lloyd, Miss K. B. Kough, and Mr. A. B. Moss will occupy the platform on the following three Sundays. Admission is free, so it will cost inquiring Christians nothing to attend, unless they choose to drop something into the collection box. Questions and discussion are cordially invited as usual. It may be added that Miss Vance, at 2 Newcastle-street, E.C., will be happy to supply applicants with neat little printed announcements of this course of lectures for judicious distribution.

The London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner, under the auspices of the N. S. S. Executive takes place at the Holborn Restaurant on Tuesday evening, January 14. Mr. Foote will preside, and will be supported by most of the leading Freethought lecturers in London, including Mr. Cohen, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Moss, and Mr. Heaford. There is sure to be a good dinner, some good music, and some good (brief) speeches. We hope to see a big rally of "saints" at the festive board, as a kind of send-off to a vigorous new year's work.

Mr. F. J. Gould's bright and (if he were not on the sea we might say) breezy article in this week's Freethinker was written in redemption of a promise he made us a few days before he set sail for India, where he has engaged to do some Ethical work in the interest of public education. Mr. Gould said that he must write an article for the Freethinker very shortly, or people would be saying that he was lost to the cause. This was a bit of our old friend's fun. He is as little likely to be lost to the cause, if the cause means Atheistic Secularism, as any man we know. But he has his own ideas of "constructive" work as a Positivist, which does not at all mean that he is nearer Christianity than he used to be, as some who read him misconceive.

At the dinner which was given to Mr. Gould (with £143) early in December, mainly though not officially by Ethicists and Rationalists, but which we did not hear of till it was over, he did not hide his respect for the Freethinker and its editor. "In my speech of thanks," Mr. Gould wrote us, "I made special friendly reference to you; and I mention this now, as I do not know what, if any, report may appear." Mr. Gould sails for home from Bombay on February 22, and should be back in London about the middle of March.

There is some interesting matter (we think) about George Meredith in this week's "Literary Gossip." Our special articles on Meredith's Letters will not be started till next week. The delay is owing to some correspondence we have had with the editor of another periodical on the matter of Meredith's letters to ourselves.

We are sorry for it, though not surprised, but the Glasgow Branch, now its old meeting-place has been burnt down, is feeling the pinch of Christian intolerance. Few halls are obtainable at all for Sunday lectures, and those few are under the crippling conditions that there shall be no charge for admission, that no discussion shall be allowed, and that no literature shall be sold. It seems likely, therefore, that the fire has annihilated Freethought propaganda in Glasgow during the present winter. Some open-air work will probably be done locally during the summer, and there is a good prospect of the indoor work being resumed in the autumn.

The December number of Concord, the organ of the International Arbitration and Peace Society, reaches us belatedly. It contains, amongst other interesting matter, some "International Notes" by Mr. W. Heaford, written with his usual vigor and vividness. Also a wise article by Mr. G. H. Perris on "The Worth of Man." Mr. Perris quotes a paragraph from the Times to the effect that "The Bible Society has given away 100,000 Testaments or Gospels among the armies of Turkey and the Balkan States, and is printing 70,000 more in Bulgarian, Servian, and Croatian." Surely this is what Rabelais would have called sanglante dérision? We rejoice to see Mr. Perris's protest against the importation of the odium theologicum to the detriment of the Turks:—

> "'Give a dog a bad name,' and you may do what you like. The odium theologicum plays its part. A German firm made the guns of Mahomet, a French firm those fired in the name of Christ. There are pashas in St. Petersburg as well as Constantinople, and the Duma has effected no more than the Young Turks; but shallow minds have easily convinced themselves that all Turks are savages, and deserve the worst that can be done to them. It is a base temper, this, ignorant and unmanly; and it may cost us dear, if it be not soon checked. The misgovernment of the so-called Christian populations by Turkish pashas and their agents has been a frightful scandal, eclipsed in recent history only by the misdeeds of the Government of Russia and its Holy Synod. But who thinks of butchering the Russian people to avenge the wrongs of Finland? Pack the Turk off to Asia! it is said. The Armenians, I suppose, are to be ignored, because they have not been able to provide a throne for some unemployed member of the Houses of Hapsburg, Bourbon, Hohenzollern, or Romanoff, to borrow money in Paris, or to buy big guns in Essen."

These words are very pertinent and timely.

The Christians are giving Freethought another advertisement at Leeds. Mr. Thomas Jackson has been prosecuted again for "profanity" of which we have not particulars. His first communication on the matter only reached us on Tuesday morning. A few hours later we received his telegram: "Twenty shillings or fourteen days. Doing the time. Jackson." We are just going to press and can say no more at present.

Our attention has been drawn to an editorial paragraph in the Literary Guide complaining that the Freethinker had "refused" a Rationalist Press Association advertisement of some of its recent publications. The complaint comes to our notice too late for a reply in this week's Freethinker. Some falsehoods are disposed of by a flat denial; others, as Tennyson said, are a different matter to fight. Moreover, this one gives us an opportunity of stating some facts that may as well be known. For the moment we must be content with assuring our readers that the alleged "refusal" is entirely imaginary—and not exactly the dream of innocent simplicity.

An American friend sends a pretty Christmas card. It is in the form of a letter, and it runs as follows:—Dear Mr. Foote,—If the 'Honorarium' lacks any part of the £300 on December 31, I will consider it a privilege to contribute the part wanting. I will send cheque on receipt of advice from you. Yours faithfully ——." A generous intention gallantly expressed! We leave it to the writer to decide whether his name shall go with his donation.

The Superiority of Science to Revelation.

THE claims of science to human regard are universal. The term "science" embraces knowledge in all its multitudinous forms. Apart from science, theoretical and applied, man would have remained an untutored child of nature, little above the man-like apes. It is to the fairy wand of science that civilisation and culture are due. Early man, when he provided himself with stone implements and weapons, laid the first foundations of modern civilised society. From a rude hunter, dependent for his very existence on the spoils of the chase, he acquired the art of domesticating certain of the lower animals which ministered to his needs. The earlier hunting stage was for a time combined with the pastoral stage, and at a later period man developed a rude system of agriculture. Originally a dweller in caves and other natural shelters, man proceeded to erect pile-dwellings on the margins of lakes and to raise primitive huts on the firmer earth. Step by step, from prehistoric times onwards, the scientific spirit in man has ingeniously evolved the art of breeding animals and cultivating plants—apart from which we would starve; the most up-to-date systems of land and ocean transit; beautiful cities with all their contained treasures of art and invention; the innumerable textiles and fabrics which, originally the costly luxuries of the favored few, are now numbered among the necessities of civilised life; with the thousand and one additional devices which minister to the comfort, convenience, and prolongation of human existence.

It would appear almost superfluous to enter upon a detailed disquisition concerning the benefits rendered by science to humanity were it not for the fact that the blessings of civilisation are so familiar that their secular creator is very frequently forgotten.

Science, then, is the result of the critical observations and experiments of the entire human race. But, irrational as it may seem, the "revelations of devout and learned," which date from a far-distant, ignorant, and uncritical past, have been blindly accepted by the majority of mankind. Other faiths besides the Christian vaunt their sacred scriptures. Vast value was in ancient Rome attached to the Sibylline verses. Homer and Hesiod were in Greece regarded as semi-sacred exponents of the Greek religion; but as civilisation advanced "the human element in their compositions was sifted from what was still considered as divine; all that was repugnant to reason, conscience, or taste was explained away either as an allegory or a corruption of the text." In our own day and generation, as many are aware, our own divine documents have been subjected to similar treatment.

The Zend-Aveeta of ancient Persia and the Vedas of early India were likewise adored as revelations from God. In a later age the Mohammedan Bible, the Koran, occupied a kindred position among the faithful. The Hebrew records were similarly exalted, and, according to Protestant theology, our salvation depends upon our acceptance of the divine veracities revealed in the New Testament Scriptures.

Curiously enough, with the triumph of the Christian religion, the civilisation of Pagan Rome sank into chaos and old night. For centuries the then known world was convulsed by the persecutions, squabbles, and wholesale butcheries which were the outstanding episodes of the time. With all the advantages which flow from a revealed religion at their command, the nations steadily refused to progress. It was with the decline of the sacred and the rise of the secular spirit that the scientific field was reoccupied. Instead of trusting uncritically to the fading legends of a musty past, men began to shake themselves free from the trammels of sacerdotalism, and proceeded to face the problems presented by the real world in which their lot was cast. Continents unknown to the ancients began to be opened up. Columbus discovered America; Magellan circumnavigated the globe. Copernicus, Galileo, and Bruno declared that our earth was not the centre of the universe, and prepared the way for the subsequent triumphs of astronomy. Newton weighed the universe in his balance. Kant and Laplace traced the genesis and evolution of the solar system. Hutton, Lyell, and their successors placed geology, the science of the earth, on a sound basis of orderly development. Astronomy, geology, and physics thus prepared the path for the doctrine of organic evolution.

With Herbert Spencer as its philosopher, and with Darwin and Haeckel as its two most powerful scientific expositors, the doctrine of the evolution of life and mind from the simplest beginnings became the accepted philosophy of all the younger searchers into nature's secrets. The Mosaic cosmogony was regarded as a product of the world's infancy. It became obvious that man had not fallen from a high condition, but had risen from a low one. The general history of man, considered as a whole, despite occasional relapses here and there, was discovered to have been one of advance towards the better and the best. Instead of a shadowy vale of sorrows and tears, our earthly home began to be looked upon as the main centre of man's healthful and beneficent activities. Human duties were to be performed while the day lasted. Man might repose in eternal sleep within the grave.

There was more material progress in the nineteenth century—which was essentially the age of scientific achievement — than all the others that went before. The standard of comfort was vastly raised, and the death-rate materially fell. The old lumbering sailing vessel gave way to the fast travelling steamship; the antiquated coach was replaced by the railway; the horse-drawn vehicle is being rapidly superseded by the motor. The dirty disease-engendering and ill-lit streets of the past are now being transformed into clean, healthy, and clearly illuminated thoroughfares. The means of transit have been so cheapened that countless people who in past ages never left their native homes may now visit celebrated cities which were previously unvisited save by a privileged few. As a result, the insular prejudices of centuries tend to disappear. All the world over, to study and understand foreigners is to appreciate their good qualities, and to sympathise with their particular point of view.

Among the notable characteristics of science is its tendency to liberate the human mind. Science, as Huxley says, commits suicide when it binds itself to a creed. On the other hand, as Shakespeare says, "In religion, what damned error but some sober brow will bless it, and approve it, with a text?" Theology is essentially stationary and stagnant. Those of its blots and blemishes which have been eliminated have been removed by the criticisms and discoveries of science. Wherever religion has come into collision with science, it has always been ignominiously defeated. For its present comparatively purified state, theology is heavily indebted to science. In every branch of secular knowledge progress is taken for granted. But the religious reformer is invariably ostracised by his clerical brethren. While the opener-up of new knowledge is accorded a respectful, if critical, scientific hearing, the progressive religionist is vilified or subjected to a conspiracy of silence. The case of Colenso in the Church of England and the more recent instance of Father Tyrrel in the Church of Rome bear abundant evidence of this melancholy truth, and these things were possible in an age of enlightenment. In more remote days, before science had humanised men's deeds, the rack, the thumbscrew, the gibbet, and the flames were the customary rewards of the heroes and martyrs of philosophical inquiry. But all clerical animosity and antagonism were unavailing. Science has, in the long run, rendered her enemy powerless.

One notable instance of the superiority of science to revelation is presented by her attitude towards the insane. Her conduct in connection with those who claim our most unstinted pity redounds to her honor and glory. In the bad old times of sacerdotal supremacy, the mentally diseased were regarded as victims or colleagues of the Devil. The doctrine of demoniacal possession was derived, according to the Church, from revelation itself. As a consequence of this, all lunatics were regarded as the temporary abodes of evil spirits. The devils were beaten out of their bodies; they were confined in pestilent prisons, and treated as enemies to the human race. Thanks to the growth of Rationalism, the medical man was ultimately permitted to minister to their disease.

In every branch of her multifarious activities, science represents the sun of righteousness. She carries on an untiring war against all the diseases which afflict mankind. The plague, leprosy, smallpox, and other dire diseases have almost disappeared from civilised Europe. Consumption, cancer, epilepsy, dipsomania, scrofula, and other maladies must ultimately succumb to her treatment. And if the people are to secure more rational social and economic conditions, sociology, the science of society, must render assistance in bringing into being this consummation devoutly to be wished.

The hall of science, said Buckle, is the temple of democracy. Science is essentially democratic, as her gifts are showered upon high and low alike. And we stand sadly in need of a more scientific system of education. It is of supreme importance that the children of this generation, who will be the parents of the one that is to follow, should be made acquainted with the actualities of the universe. There is nothing better fitted to broaden the mental horizon than a knowledge of the marvels and wonders of great evolving nature. No grain of sand but moves a brightly millioned peopled land. In a star-mist scattered through countless miles of space are resident the promise and the potency of worlds yet unborn. The flower in the crannied wall, the ivy clinging to a moonlit ruin, the clouds as they cast their moving shadows on a sunlit plain, the still waters when they reflect the orbs of heaven on a calm, cold winter's night, the laws that govern life in childhood, adolescence, maturity, and decay, all lie within the province of scientific inquiry and explanation.

The devotees of revelation demand acquiescence in their dogmas. The student of nature, on the contrary, counsels the fullest inquiry. The only scientific dogmas are those facts and principles which have been demonstrated beyond dispute. It is sometimes objected that science robs men of the poetry of life. If by poetry, falsehood is meant, it does. The mission of science is to unmask falsehood and bring truth to light. But there is nothing in science which dwarfs or deadens the imaginative faculty. On the contrary, science by bringing us into closer contact with realities promotes the growth of the imaginative and æsthetic powers. A drop of water is not less wonderful, but more so, when the microscope reveals its true condition. What appears as a transparent liquid to the unaided eye becomes a world of wonder and beauty when examined under a magnifying glass. As Carlyle once put it, what a vast difference existed between the picture presented to Newton's dog Diamond and to that of the natural philosopher when the two gazed in company upon the starry sky! The heavens revealed no more to the dog than to a lowly savage, but to the mind of Newton a glimpse was afforded of the unspeakable vastness of the universe.

Science, then, is superior to any form of alleged revelation. It has ever ministered to the mental, moral, and social well-being of the human race. It teaches us to realise our kinship with the lower animals and deepens our sympathies with them. It lessens man's pride and arrogance; it proves that he is not a special creation fashioned in the image of God, but a product, in company with countless others, of the forces of nature. Science affords no evidence of a future life, but it assures us that our good and evil deeds live after us in the thoughts and actions of succeeding generations. She forces the truth upon us that our duty lies in the present, and that sin is never washed away by any form of vicarious atonement. In the light of science, man's position in nature is precisely that which was accorded it by the greatest of poets and of men: "What a piece of work is man! how noble in reason! how infinite in faculty! in form and moving how express and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god! the beauty of the world! the paragon of animals!"

T. F. PALMER.

Lyman Abbott on Immortality.—II.

A Lecture delivered before the Independent Religious Society (Rationalist), Chicago.

BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.

THOUGHT is no more independent of the body than is life. When I was still in the Church, one of my arguments in proof of the immateriality of thought was that the body consisted of oxygen, carbon, nitrogen, etc., and that these could not think. Can oxygen think? I would ask. If we were to place carbon or nitrogen into a glass tube, would the combination produce thought? Would the tube begin to think? But all I had to do to perceive the fallacy of my reasoning was to turn my question around and ask: Can there be thought without oxygen or nitrogen? Do we know of a single instance of the existence of mind apart from an organised body? If thought is not dependent on carbon and oxygen, why is it that there is no thought where these are not present?

Theologians make the mistake of assuming that before a given combination or organism can have a certain quality, that quality must be in each or any of the parts that make up the combination. That is to say, if oxygen, carbon, and nitrogen combined produce thought, then these elements should contain in their separate state what they produce when combined. But the reverse of this is the affirmation of both experience and science. Sugar, for instance, is a combination of so much of carbon, so much of oxygen, and so much of hydrogen, yet separately neither of these elements is sweet to the taste. Yet united they produce a new substance. Thought is the new substance which the combinations of the vibrating cells in the brain when flooded with blood from the heart produce.

The thought ability of any organism is always in precise proportion to the delicacy and perfection of the organism. As the brain develops, it thinks more and better. When the brain is shrunk or pinched, or injured by accident, its thinking becomes defective. A bullet in the head stops all mental activity, and thought does not return until the material damage is repaired. If thought or the soul is not a product of the organism, why is not the infant as good a reasoner as its grown-up parents, or if the soul is independent of the convolutions of the brain, why is not the savage as resourceful as a Shakespeare?

Again, we believe in the love, the hope, and the courage of mother because we can reasonably prove that she possessed these noble qualities. We cannot only convince ourselves, but convince also others, of the beauty of her character. When a man says his mother had the gentlest disposition he is not speculating; he can prove it. If he has any doubts of his mother's love he would be disconsolate all his life. But if I question the love and tender mercies of God it is because I cannot prove them. How a God could be infinite in power, in love, and in wisdom, and yet fail to enforce his will on earth—on this tiny atom of dust that floats in the air—as he is supposed to enforce it in heaven, is beyond my comprehension. "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Goodness! If God does not have to ask anybody's permission to have his will done in heaven, why does he ask us to let him have his way on earth? I believe in my mother's love and devotion because there is nothing contradictory or mysterious about it. I cannot say I believe in the love of God, because a thousand things disprove it.

The Doctor's next argument is this: "My grounds of belief in God and immortality are based upon the comforts that I get in sorrow. I am sure there is an invisible being who talks to me." Not for all the world would I take away from anyone a single comfort he may possess, but is a doctrine true because it is comforting? Even as it is by accommodating ourselves to nature that we can live at all, it is by obeying the truth instead of commanding it that truth will bless us. We would not have to go to school to learn mathematics, or chemistry, or history, if we could command these sciences to mind us. To study them means to learn how to obey them. If the Bible is true, we do not need any education because we can reverse the process and command the laws of matter and force to study us, and to suit themselves to our needs and desires. The sea must learn how to step aside for us, the iron must learn how to float when we command it; fire must not burn, and sun or moon must not move, when we so order it. It is not we, it is nature that must go to school, if the Bible is true. That is why the Jews in the Old Testament, and the Christians in the New, say not a word about schools or education. When you can work miracles education is superfluous.

The real difference between theology and science, or between the supernatural and Rationalism, is that, while the former flatters us into the belief that we may command the truth, Rationalism teaches that we must obey the truth. Sooner or later, we must learn to square our desires, our beliefs, and our hopes with the facts, if we are to live at all. The child cannot go on for ever believing that the dolls it plays with are real. If we suppress the truth from the child, we will only be postponing the day of awakening. Not to tell the truth about dolls to children does not make them real, it only hides their unreality. That is what theology does, it hides the truth. It cannot do more. Rationalism arms us for the battle of life by opening our eyes to the difficulties and dangers which confront us; theology, on the other hand, puts us off our guard by raising false hopes.

Moreover, if comforting beliefs are true, why does the missionary attack or expose the idols of the heathen? Are not wooden gods comforting to some people? Why does the missionary denounce them? But if it is to give in its place something more comforting that he takes away the wooden gods, for the same reason we take away a far-away heaven to help make this earth a heaven. What would be more consoling than the conviction that if there is another life we cannot possibly miss it, if we have made the best of this, and if there be no other life we may still have the satisfaction that we have not lost this one by throwing it away for another. Nothing could be more comforting than to try to make the present life yield all that we expect of a future life. It is the only way to deserve another life. The Rationalist has this additional comfort, that he does not let the future, with its worries and fears, spoil the present. Nor is he driven to the verge of despair by the terrible prospect of an eternity of suffering for practically the majority of the human race. Is it comforting to look forward to a time when half of humanity will be in heaven and the other half in hell, and the two worlds side by side within view of each other? What great-minded man or woman would derive any comfort from such an outlook? Who would be so callous as to congratulate himself upon such a finale for the universe? How pinched in heart and brain is orthodoxy! It wants a hell alongside of its heaven, as a comfort! "How could anyone live," people ask, "without the Christian hope?" But what is this hope? A heaven and a hell! Real suffering in the one place, and unreal pleasures in the other. Let not the anxieties about such a future destroy the peace and tranquillity of the present life. If we are mortal, all the crying and fretting will not make us immortal. If, on the other hand, we are immortal, we cannot escape it. Peace to our troubled minds! One life at a time.

Furthermore, lack of anxiety about the unexplored future will help us to be more appreciative of our present opportunities. When an Italian or a Frenchman comes to America to tarry here only until he has saved enough to return to his old country, he cannot become very much interested in this country, or be sincerely attached to its institutions. It is not likely that he will even become naturalised, nor will he endeavor to assimilate our civilisation. He will remain a stranger during all the years he spends here, and America will occupy second place in his affections. In the same way, if we looked forward to a world beyond, and were always preparing to emigrate to it, we would be apt to care less and less for this world. The Christians are always talking about the next world: "I am a pilgrim, I am a stranger, and I can tarry but a night," is one of their hymns. "Here we have no abiding city," is one of the favorite texts of the pulpit. No wonder that during the Middle Ages, when faith in the next world was very much stronger, ignorance, disease, poverty, and misery played havoc with this world.

The Rationalist, not knowing anything about a future world, nor caring to speculate about it, devotes all his time to the service of the world he lives in. Oh! that the time, the money, and the energy employed to prove and preach another world had been devoted toward making this one habitable, happy, clean, and sweet! Instead of trying to get ready to migrate into some unknown world, let us do our best to make life in this world so beautiful, so exalted, so free, and so attractive as to make the people in the next world, if there is such a world, long to come and live with us!

Quieting a Maudlin Myth.

IT will be remembered that when, last spring, the ill-fated Titanic went down the story of the heroic band playing "Nearer, My God, to Thee," until swept from the deck by the angry waves, was sent broadcast throughout the world.

This alleged incident was a fruitful theme of discourse by the thousands of pulpiteers while Sunday-school teachers everywhere grew maudlin recounting to their youthful charges the alleged Christian zeal and fortitude displayed by that band as they calmly awaited death as only Christians could. But alas! this myth, like thousands of others before it, must also vanish before the light of truth.

Among the survivors of that memorable ocean tragedy was one Colonel Archibald Gracie, of Washington, D.C.

It was Colonel Gracie who, soon after his arrival here from his harrowing experience, distinguished himself by announcing in church one evening that God had saved him from the wreck in answer to his prayers. Just why God had not heard and "answered" the prayers of the 1,600 or more who perished, this special favorite of God's mercy was, perhaps, too modest to explain. It may, however, be added parenthetically that some of his more irreverent hearers declared that as it was a characteristic trait of the Colonel's to always look out for number one, it might at least be a matter of doubt whether God had had a hand in "saving" him or not.

Be that as it may, Colonel Gracie, after a long silence, in an address before the University Club, in describing some of the scenes of that fearful night, declared that not only did the band not play "Nearer, My God, to Thee," but intimated that had they attempted to do so, the men among the passengers who were doing all they could to cheer and encourage the women and children would have prevented them, forcibly, if necessary.

Furthermore, Colonel Gracie declared that these bandsmen, who have been given a place in history for their fortitude in continuing to play as the tragedy was being enacted, and who were said to have gone to their deaths in the performance of their duty, so that they might cheer others with their music, in fact ceased to play some time before the ship went down. He added that he himself saw the men throw away their instruments, showing that the natural instinct of self-preservation outweighted the weaker side of human nature, mere sentiment.

What the band really did play was "ragtime" music, which was, of course, the sensible thing to do. This the Colonel himself admits when he said, "If the band had played that familiar hymn, panic would have resulted. Fixing the minds of the passengers on the possibility of their being nearer to God, and I say it seriously, would have been the last thing wanted."

He further declared that no music was played for fully half an hour before the Titanic finally sank, and that the men must have realised that their time could be much better employed in helping to load the boats, and this they probably did.

Two facts, then, stand out prominently in Colonel Gracie's narrative, and they are, that the band did not play "Nearer, My God, to Thee," nor any other hymn, and that they ceased playing altogether fully half an hour before the sinking of the ship.

Thus is shattered by an unimpeachable witness the "Nearer, My God, to Thee" myth, but this will not prevent our clerical friends from repeating this exploded yarn for generations to come. But now that the truth is out, all Truthseeker readers can in the future refute the statement by quoting as their authority Colonel Archibald Gracie, an eye and ear witness, who, on the evening of November 23, 1912, in a speech before the University Club of Washington, D.C., publicly denied that the band on the Titanic on the night she went down played "Nearer, My God, to Thee" or any other hymn; but, on the contrary, played ragtime music until within a half hour before she was engulfed by the waves, after which no music was played at all.

The belief in a God has hitherto been the seed of all the bloody dissensions among men. The various ways of worshiping an imaginary being have caused more wars and ruin than all the varieties of other interests. With the disappearance of belief in God disappears the foundation of all religious hostility, and in its place arises the foundation of human equality and universal peace. All wars have sprung from two grounds: on the political field, the monarchical subjects fight for their earthly despots; on the religious, the godly subjects fight for their heavenly ones; and as on the political field the abolition of Royal Majesty and its subjects lays the foundation for a union of the nations, so on the religious domain the abolition of the Divine Majesty and its believers lays the foundation for the solidarity of humanity.—Karl Heinzen.

As I stood behind the coffin of my little son the other day, with my mind bent on anything but disputation, the officiating minister read, as a part of his duty, the words, "If the dead rise not again, let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." I cannot tell you how inexpressibly they shocked me. Paul had neither wife nor child, or he must have known that his alternative involved a blasphemy against all that was best and noblest in human nature. I could have laughed with scorn. What! because I am face to face with irreparable loss, because I have given back to the source from whence it came the cause of great happiness—still retaining through all my life the blessings that have sprung, and will spring, from that cause—am I to renounce my manhood and, howling, grovel in bestiality? Why, the very apes know better, and, if you shoot their young, the poor brutes grieve their grief out, and do not immediately seek distraction in a gorge.—Thomas Henry Huxley.

Obituary.

We have to record the death of David Turnbull, of 140 Rachery-street, Glasgow, on Friday, December 20, at the age of twenty-seven. For ten years he had been helpless from paralysis, during which time he had been attended with a mother's sublime devotion. "Mrs. Turnbull," a Glasgow correspondent writes, "nursed him through all those years with a devotion that never slackened. Her case shows how a rational view of things may mitigate the worst evils. Her son was only seventeen years of age when he was stricken down, and she recognised that his only salvation from the dreadful calamity of physical helplessness lay in stimulating the activities of his mind. She read to him day after day, she interested him in politics and Freethought, he looked forward to his weekly Freethinker, and was as interested as any of the family in the progress of the movement." We desire to associate ourselves personally with this tribute to a nobly affectionate woman. The Turnbulls all ring true, but the mother is one of nature's exceptional products. Her son's death is, in one sense, a happy relief; but the blow of bereavement is felt when it falls, and we beg to assure her of our sincere sympathy.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than wal ve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 2 SUNDAY, JANUARY 12, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

The peace of the two worlds depends upon these two words—Be kind to your friends, and be merciful to your enemies.—SADI.

The Passing of Christianity.

FOR some weeks the religious journals of this country have been crowded with articles and letters concerning the recent census of church and chapel attendance at Liverpool. Most of the writers maintain that the immense falling off reported must not be taken as evidence that the people generally are, at bottom, any less religious than they used to be. Not one of them concurs with Dr. C. R. Niven, the well-known Freethinker, in the contention that the decrease in church attendance is due to the fact that the modern man is making the discovery that however necessary religion may have been to his remote ancestors in times of ignorance and inexperience, yet for him, in this age of scientific knowledge, it is quite unnecessary. Dr. Niven is convinced that it is this discovery that really explains "the avalanche that is overwhelming the churches and chapels of these islands, and for that matter the world over." The Christian World for January 2 frankly admits that "in Liverpool, at all events, there is no escaping Dr. Niven's conclusion that where 100 people formerly attended worship (i.e., twenty years ago) only 73 do so now." Our contemporary refers to Dr. Niven's article, presumably in the Liverpool Daily Post, as "a searching examination" of the results of the census, and characterises the following extract as "brutally frank":—

> "The net result of the last ten years' work of the Protestant churches and chapels in Liverpool is to show a decrease of 16,000 worshipers every Sunday, with an increase of over 8,000 seats for the 16,000 people who do not come to worship. In other words, the net gain of ten years' preaching in the Protestant churches is the production of 24,000 empty seats."

It seems to us that Dr. Niven's interpretation of the facts disclosed by the Liverpool census is unquestionably true. The steady decrease of church and chapel-going is only one of the symptoms of the passing of the Christian superstition. But the official defenders of the faith assert dogmatically that it is nothing of the sort. Dr. Clifford, in his review of 1912, which appears in the Christian World Pulpit for January 1, admits the facts, but rejects the Freethinker's interpretation of them. He says:

> "Just now, alas, the air is filled with lamentation and mourning over decaying Churches and Sunday-schools, declining attendances at public worship, and a general neglect of institutional religion. There are deep searchings of heart amongst the Churches. The Liverpool census is most discouraging, and everybody is apprehensive of a similar or worse state of facts being discovered by the statistics to be given us about London. The outlook is dark and threatening for organised religion."

Those are the facts; but no sooner are they stated than the Christian sophisticator begins to manipulate them to his own advantage. Dr. Clifford proceeds:—

> "But we must not forget that Churches may cease growing, without that meaning that religion is losing its hold of us, or that we are losing our grip of it. We may have to cease 'building temples' in order to 'worship God,' and dissociate ourselves from organisations that claim the Christian name in order that we may be faithful to Christ himself and his claims."

This fallacious reasoning is altogether too transparent, and is rooted in dishonesty as well. Dr. Clifford knows quite well that, as Dr. Niven observes, temple building is still indulged in as vigorously as ever; it is a Christian hobby of the hour; but the all-significant fact is that the temples built lack worshipers. What the Churches have to complain of is not merely the dearth of new recruits, but a vast plethora of deserters; not only that they have ceased to grow bigger with the population, but that, in spite of themselves, they have taken to growing alarmingly smaller. It is idle sophistry to say that the Churches, while retrograding quantitatively, may, in reality, be gradually advancing qualitatively. And yet we find even Principal Adeney, as Chairman of the Congregational Union, declaring that "we have had enough of statistics, the question being not the size of the church, but its quality, its tone, spirit, efficiency," forgetting that the Church, according to its New Testament ideal, is to prove its quality, tone, spirit, efficiency by conquering the world; or that the Church, if true to its Lord, exists, not for its own sake, but for that of the world outside. We read in the Book of the Acts that the Apostolic Church evinced its efficiency in the fact that there were being "added to it day by day such as should be saved." In other words, an efficient Church must be a victorious Church.

Dr. Clifford is a magnificent rhetorician. He has not "the sweet, silent rhetoric of persuading eyes," but the boisterous rampageous, and irresponsible rhetoric of the modern pulpiteer, who flees for refuge to subterfuge and evasion. Here is a sample:—

> "We may have been losing only to find; losing limited prejudices to acquire emancipating ideas, leaving behind us the crippling and obsolete machinery that we might breathe the fuller life, forsaking the broken and splintered cisterns of human manufacture in order to drink from the exhaustless fountain of the soul of the world. The tree of religion may be bursting and breaking the pot in which its roots have been bound, in order that it may be replanted in a purer and richer soil, and thereafter produce a more nourishing fruit."

If that passage has any meaning at all, the idea it conveys is that Christianity is securing a divorce from the Church, because of her manifold infidelities, or in order to contract a fresh marriage with the State. Nay, more, Christianity is sick and tired of monogamy and has resolved to make experiments in polygamy. The State is already almost a Church. District and City Councils, Parliament, and the movements of the modern mind, all these are becoming quite churchy; and thus is religion, "slowly but surely, ascending to its throne in the experience of men." But this is unutterable, intolerable twaddle. By the State, Dr. Clifford understands the democracy as against the aristocracy; by Parliament, the radical wing of the Liberal Party; by the County Council, its Progressive members; and by the movements of the modern mind, the New Theology and Socialism. In other words, Jesus Christ, in his theory of government, is a Democrat; in his politics a Radical; and in his political economy a Socialist; and, naturally, only Democrats, Radicals, and Socialists can be Christians. Aristocrats, Tories, and Individualists are enemies of the Cross of Christ, and shall be excluded from the kingdom of heaven.

The truth is, however, that the Churches are declining because Christianity is dying, and that Christianity is dying because humanity is slowly but surely coming into its own. Dr. Clifford is professionally blind to this truth, and attributes whatever natural good emerges in the world to the influence of Christianity, forgetting that throughout the ages Christianity was bitterly opposed to most of the reforms which he regards as its fruit. The Church not only tolerated but advocated slavery, and winked at feudalism. The Church carried favor with the high and mighty, and perpetuated poverty by her very charities. The Church hobnobbed with the landlord and the squire, and kept the working classes under her iron heel. Dr. Clifford may tell us that it was not Christianity but a corrupt Church that did all these dreadful things; but, we ask, where then was Christianity? Where was the omnipotent Christ, the head of the Church? Where was the Holy Ghost, the comforter, sanctifier, and protector of the Church? Does not Dr. Clifford realise that to admit that the Church was at any time corrupt and guilty of wicked deeds is tantamount to acknowledging that the Church has never been what it always claims to be? In any case, Christianity is whatever the Church chooses it to be, and she has chosen to make different representations of it at different periods, and even at one and the same period. Everybody knows that Dr. Clifford's version of Christianity differs widely from that championed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, or even from that so zealously promulgated by his own brother of the Metropolitan Tabernacle; and has he the hardihood to believe that he is more competent to interpret it than either of the other two? No, there never has been and there never can be any Christianity apart from the Churches; and even the Churches of to-day harbor extremely divergent views of it. "But," someone may object, "it is the spirit of Christ that ought to decide every question"; and yet the spirit of Christ is the vaguest and most variable thing in the world. It impels Dr. Clifford to fight with tooth and nail for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Episcopal Church in Wales, and the Archbishop of Canterbury to resist both with all his might. It sets all the Churches at sixes and sevens on the subject of national education, and keeps them endlessly quarreling about doctrine and ritual. In reality, the spirit of Christ is as great a myth as Christ himself, and as variously interpreted. There never has been, there never can be, any agreement as to either.

Naturally enough, the last thing Christian ministers are prepared to do is to admit that the religion on which they live is passing away; and quite as naturally, they will do everything within their power to prolong its life. Dr. Clifford asks us to "note the march of the Brotherhood movement in France, Canada, and England," and as a result of noting it we have come to the conclusion that the Brotherhood movement is a desperate device for catching recruits for the depleted Churches; and so is "the Men and Religion movement." And yet, in spite of all such devices, the Churches are getting to leak more and more every year. They are losing both adherents and members by the thousand. Nothing is easier than to assert in Christian pulpits that "moral salvation is not in politics nor in administration"; but nothing is more certain than that "moral salvation" has never been brought about through the instrumentality of the Churches. The fact that "moral salvation" is still to seek involves the absolute damnation of the Churches. When the divine tells the scientific moralist that he has not moralised society, the retort is irresistible, "Neither have you." One thing is certain: in whatever economic or moral reform that has recently been effected the Churches have not been even consulted; their very existence has been quietly ignored. "True, Dr. F. B. Meyer has had something to say" in each case; "but then he has something to say about everything"; and so it is not of the least account.

J. T. LLOYD.

One Out of Five.

ACCORDING to Sir Robertson Nicoll, of the British Weekly, out of every five children that pass through Nonconformist Sunday-schools, not more than one grows up to be a member of a Nonconformist church or chapel. Sir Robertson is naturally much perturbed at such a condition of affairs. He calls upon parents and preachers to be up and mend this condition of things—if they can. He asks them to form leagues of worshiping children, so that by-and-bye they will become worshiping adults. If they can do this all may yet be well. If they cannot, then we are witnessing the beginning of the end. Presently, not four out of five, but the whole five will escape the net of the clerical fishers. The Churches will try to subsist on an adult population, which could not last beyond a single generation. For it is a commonplace of observation that the only way to make anyone a Christian is to set to work on him before he is old enough to see what you are about. You must catch your believer young—the younger the better. If you catch him young enough, and train him hard enough, there is hope. He may never leave you, or, if he does, there is the possibility of recapturing him at a later period. For the religious virus bites deep. Once get it into the system and it is difficult to eradicate. Therefore, the maxim of all wide-awake Churchmen is "catch the kids." Every priest is a professional kidnapper. A church that leaves the children their freedom is doomed. Sir Robertson Nicoll says so, and every Freethinker will agree with him. To turn an adult Christian into a Freethinker is a good piece of work. To stop the child becoming a Christian is better work still. Therefore, I feel like congratulating the lucky four who—if they have not become real Freethinkers—have taken one step in the direction of freedom. And I sympathise heartily with the one who is left in captivity.

A complete philosophy of religion lies locked up in this struggle of the churches for the control of the children, and in the escape of so many despite all the precautions taken. Let us note, in the first place, how heavily the dice are loaded in favor of the Churches. The influence of the home is on their side. The parents clearly desire their children to grow up Christians or they would not send them to Sunday-school. They are sent for religious instruction during the most impressionable period of their lives. The value of religious belief is impressed upon them in a number of different ways. Religion becomes associated with early recollections of home, of parents, of teachers. Yet four out of every five break away. The Church that has fought so hard to keep them sees them depart. And all that the advisers of the clergy can say is "make the services brighter. Interest them, amuse them, give them pictures, singing and entertainments, then perhaps they will stay." And, strangely enough, many of the clergy seriously discuss the advisability of turning themselves into juvenile entertainers in the hope of securing a crop of adult supporters.

Next, let it be noted that this frantic struggle to get hold of children is a comparatively modern phenomenon. Where religious belief is a natural outcome of contemporary life the religious art of kidnapping is unknown. Indeed, among primitive peoples, the religious instruction of children is quite ignored. When they are just emerging from childhood some care is bestowed on their initiation into the mysteries of religion, but religion remains an affair of adult life. Even at a much later stage of social culture there is no special call for the religious education of children. With mediæval Christianity, for example, there was no demand for a religious

"atmosphere" to be created around children. Religion did not have to be recommended to the child by the agency of tea meetings, singing, entertainments, or kindergarten games. The religious atmosphere was provided by the life of the time. There was no difficulty in keeping people—young or old—religious, the difficulty would have been to have kept them from becoming so. Between religious belief and the social environment, there existed, at least, no direct and obvious disharmony.

It is a change in the character of the social environment that produces the need for capturing children. Growing knowledge of the world, with the development of social life, sets up an unconscious antagonism to religious beliefs. The power of the priesthood, the welfare of all that a priesthood stands for, is threatened. A line of cleavage is established between inherited religion and contemporary life, with the result that a struggle for the direction of life becomes one of the marked features of all religious organisations. In place of social life confirming religious teaching, an antagonism is created between the Church and the world. And this, not because one is pure and the other impure, but simply because the stages of culture are in conflict. The theory that religious organisations have stood, or now stand, for a purer morality than that expressed in everyday life, is undiluted nonsense. The impulse to a healthier morality has always originated outside the Churches, and it needs little study to prove that, defective as it may be, the ethic of ordinary social intercourse is much higher than the ethic of the pulpit. The real cause of division, of the separation of things into sacred and secular, of the marking off the Church from the world, is that if religious beliefs are exposed to the free play of current life and knowledge, they inevitably decay. And in sheer self-defence religious organisations protect themselves by the maintenance of a special language, clothing, manner, and general "atmosphere"—all so many attempts to insulate the religious life and protect it from healthy criticism.

Proofs of this are numerous and unmistakable. It is a common complaint of all Churches that when their members move into new districts, or into a new country, they frequently cease attending a place of worship and drop religion altogether. In other ages, when religious belief had a real and independent vitality, people took their gods or their religion with them. It was a part of their mental life, and could not be shaken off with a change of habitat. To-day, the religionist is often like a ticket-of-leave man. He will report himself only so long as he feels he may be discovered. Not so long ago, Dr. Horton was complaining that Sunday cycling had done much to break down the habit of worship. The same complaint is constantly made concerning the week-end habit, picture shows, and a hundred and one other things. They are all illustrations of the truth that the maintenance of religion in modern society involves the operation of a host of artificial safeguards, and that, if these were withdrawn, religion is doomed. A belief that is not proof against a picture palace, a bicycle, or a Sunday on the river, is almost outside the bounds of respectful discussion.

The consequence of all this is that the Churches have been driven to concentrate more and more on securing control of the family, and of the children in particular. Everything else can wait for a more or less mature individuality. There is no frantic haste to cram a child with other subjects. The scientist, the teacher of art, of literature, of mechanics, waits until the child is old enough to appreciate what is being taught to it. To follow this policy in religion would be suicidal. Is there any instance known of an educated, intelligent person of, say, twenty years of age, brought up without religious belief, and then becoming religious? I have never heard of such a case, although I have been looking for one for many years. Religion must perforce commence with the child. It must breed clients for church and chapel if either is to possess them. That is the plain economic side of the problem. Every child represents a potential customer of the Church. The fight of the Churches for the control of children, under whatever form it may be, is a fight for clients and for revenue. Cut them off here and their supply is destroyed. They simply cannot wait to submit their creeds to an unbiassed mature intelligence. It is the children or nothing.

Of course, this is putting the matter very plainly, even brutally. And it is quite probable that many of the clergy, in resenting this charge, would do so with all sincerity. The majority of people develop a certain dexterity in disguising from themselves the operations of self-interest, and when one happens to be working with a sect or a party its workings become still more successfully cloaked. To openly admit, or even to recognise, its workings would be fatal to its success. An unselfish reason must be discovered for a selfish action; and it must not only impose upon those to whom it is given, but it must also, at least in the majority of cases, impose upon those who use it. So it happens that the workings of this particular piece of corporate self-interest is disguised under a concern for morality, for the development of character, for the creation of a healthy sense of citizenship. And all the time there is the plain, and now generally admitted, fact that good character, sound morality, and healthy citizenship may be cultivated, and actually exists, apart from all religious belief whatsoever.

The child has no pressing need for instruction in speculative doctrines, whether they refer to this world or the next. Such subjects can at least wait until each child is old enough to understand what it is being taught, and to exercise complete liberty of acceptance or rejection. Self-respecting men with sensible teaching ask for nothing more than this, and they should be satisfied with nothing less than this. What the child really needs is a measure of protection against the crowd of priests seeking to capture it in the interests of this or that religious organisation. Sadder still is the fact that the child should so often need protection against its own parents. A Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children already exists, but it is concerned only with the infliction of material injuries. We need another organisation, or at least a lively sense of the need for protecting children against having forced upon them teachings that are wholly unfitted to their years, against their innocently accepting as true doctrines that many afterwards discover to be false, and which are actually known to be of a dubious character by those who teach them. It is not the least of the offences of the priesthood that it converts into an instrument of oppression parental care and affection, which under proper conditions should form the child's principal defences against aggression.

The burden of Sir Robertson Nicoll's lament is cheerful news to all lovers of genuine progress. That four-fifths of the children who are dosed in Nonconformist Sunday-schools should escape the Nonconformist churches is so much to the good. It is an indication that the pull of life is more powerful than the teachings of religion. True, the liberated four-fifths may not all become avowed Freethinkers, but their not becoming avowed Christians is something to the good. If this condition of things can be maintained it is, as Sir Robertson Nicoll sees, the beginning of the end. The secularisation of the schools bids fair to become soon an article of practical politics. The secularisation of the home must follow. And that means that religion must depend upon an appeal to the educated adult intelligence for support. And its chances of success in that direction are not likely to fill any Freethinker with grave misgivings.

Francis Thompson.

"That same gentle spirit from whose pen Large streams of honey and sweet nectar flow."
—SPENSER.

AMID thousands of unloved and obscure graves at Kensal Green Cemetery is one with the touching inscription, "Look for me in the nurseries of heaven." This is the last resting place of Francis Thompson, who was buried there about five years ago. He was then almost unknown, and during his lifetime he had suffered the hardships of lonely poverty to a degree not surpassed by any of the most unfortunate poets of the world. He had slept many nights upon the Thames Embankment, and under carts in Covent Garden Market. He sold matches in the Strand, and was a bookseller's porter staggering through London streets with a heavy sack upon his back. When he was carried to his grave only a few intimate friends, who had looked after him for the last few months of his life, were present to mourn. Now he is placed by all good judges in the ranks of poets of genius, and the garland of laurel decorates his tomb which was denied to the living man.

It is quite possible both to overrate and to underestimate Thompson's merits; but no one, we suppose, would contend that he was other than a genuine and unmistakable poet. He was a very unequal writer, sometimes soaring to the pure ether of the great singers, and sometimes falling to the lower slopes of Parnassus. He had, indeed, his faults; but against them must be placed his unbalanced, imaginative, reckless nature. There can hardly be a sadder story than his in the whole history of literature, though Chatterton, Villon, Poe, James Thomson, and Verlaine are among them. To be at once a genius and a drudge, to live in direst poverty and to die of a lingering disease, is as melancholy a lot as can be imagined. Nor would he deserve less pity if we denied his genius. His faults, whatever they may have been, injured himself alone; but genius he most certainly had.

Thompson is a poet's poet—like Blake, Rossetti, and Shelley. His kinship with these singers is far nearer than to Crashaw and the ecclesiastical mystics. He assuredly calls for a meed of praise equal to that accorded to Maeterlinck, D'Annunzio, Rostand, and others for whom so many British altars have flamed in worship. Thompson's genius was Oriental, exuberant in color, woven with strange textures. His poetry was mainly a splendid rhetoric, imaginative and passionate, as if the moods went by wrapped in imperial purple in a great procession. His masterpiece, "The Hound of Heaven," is molten white with passion. Listen to these lines, in which the alchemy of the poet's genius transmits the dross of theology into the fine gold of poetry:—

"I dimly guess what time in mists confounds;
Yet ever and anon a trumpet sounds
From the hid battlements of eternity.
Those shaken mists a space unsettle, then
Round the half-glimpsed turrets slowly wash again;
But not ere him who summoneth
I first have seen, enwound
With glooming robes purpureal, cypress crowned;
His name I know, and what his trumpet saith."

Now hear the great valediction which concludes his "Anthem of Earth":—

"Now, mortal, son-like,
I thou hast suckled, mother, I at last
Shall sustenant be to thee. Here I untrammel,
Here I pluck loose the body's cerementing,
And break the tomb of life; here I shake off
The bur of o' the world, man's congregation shun,
And to the antique order of the dead
I take the tongueless vow: my cell is set
Here in thy bosom; my little trouble is ended
In a little peace."

How fine, too, is his vision of the woman sleeping in the child, like a dryad hiding among the leaves:—

"Those whose young sex is yet but in thy soul,
As, hoarded in the vine,
Hang the gold skins of undelirious wine,
As air sleeps, till it toss its limbs in breeze."

The closing stanza of "Daisy" is dangerously near perfection:—

"She went her unremembering way;
She went, and left in me
The pang of all the partings gone,
And partings yet to be."

This sensitive singer, who suffered much, undisheartened and undismayed, was also a magnificent prose writer. His essay on Shelley, posthumously published in the Dublin Review, is unmatched of its kind. The jewelled panoply of his diction bears ample witness to the princely opulence of his imagination. Writing of Prometheus Unbound, he says:

"The final scenes especially are such a Bacchic reel and rout and revelry of beauty as leaves one staggered and giddy; poetry is spilt like wine, music runs to drunken waste. The choruses sweep down the wind, tirelessly, flight after flight, till the breathless soul almost cries for respite from the unrolling splendors."

This is a superb tribute from the Catholic poet to the Atheist singer. Literature, like music, is wider than opinion, broader than dogma, as limitless as the humanity to which it appeals. When Gladstone passionately addressed his speech on the Oaths Bill to a hushed and expectant House of Commons, he quoted some perfect lines of the old Roman Freethinker, Lucretius, as daring an iconoclast as Voltaire. The majesty of the quotation was its justification. Gladstone's brain and taste persisted in being independent of his heart, like the German soldier who fought through the Franco-German war, and who, when killed, was found to have in his pocket a well-thumbed copy of De Musset's poems. Catholic though he was, Francis Thompson deserves a few words of praise in a Freethought paper. He never did weak or puling work in prose or verse. Although he waged an unequal war against fate, he was at least a happy soldier. When his turn came, he yielded up his broken sword with a brave and a humble heart.

MIMNERMUS.

The Leeds "Profanity" Case.

MY advice has been asked on this matter. It might have been better if it had been asked before. I heard absolutely nothing about it until the very morning Mr. Jackson's case was to be called in court, and shortly after that I was apprised by telegram of his sentence of "twenty shillings or a fortnight." Mr. Jackson chose the fortnight. His choice shows he does not lack courage. But that is not the only virtue in a public propagandist. An Andalusian bull has plenty of courage, but he is generally carted out of the arena at the finish. His adversaries are too cunning for his methods of warfare.

I repeat that my advice has been sought. To begin with, the seeking is too late for any useful action. In the second place, Mr. Jackson's case is not one that could be taken to the Court of Appeal. Mr. Horace Marshall—who, by the way, complimented Mr. Jackson on his able and temperate defence—refused to state a case. He did not see any case to state. Nor do I. All he had to decide was whether the defendant was guilty of "profanity" under the Police Act. That question turned upon the first sentence. Mr. Jackson had publicly declared in Victoria Square, Leeds, that "The God of this anti-infidel crusade is a mean, contemptible, cowardly, bloodthirsty old monster."

Without disputing the truth of this, one must admit that if it is not "profanity" in the ordinary sense of the word, it is remarkably like it. Personally, of course, I want to see all references to "profanity" as well as to "blasphemy" banished from the laws of England. But I cannot close my eyes to the fact that they are there, and I cannot expect magistrates and judges (not even the best of them—and we all know what the worst are) to overlook the fact either. One may insist on one's right to use "profane language" in public places, and take the consequences as cheerfully as possible. That is an intelligible policy, and no one could call it dishonorable. But the question of an appeal against one's sentence is simply one of law and utility. And in this case I see nothing that can be gained by such action. The Court of Appeal would be certain, in my opinion, to back up the magistrate. For there is nothing in dispute except the two points:—(1) Did the defendant use that language, and (2) Is it "profane language" within the meaning of the Act?

Some readers seem to have misunderstood what I have previously written on "appealing." What is the use of fighting over a hopeless case? Well, it may be asked, what is a favorable case? It is a case in which reasonable argument is possible. It is arguable, for instance, that the defendant ought never to have been prosecuted under the Police Clauses Act; that the words charged against him were part of a legitimate attack upon certain ideas which were defended by their own spokesmen; that they cannot fairly be regarded as "profanity" in the common meaning of the term; that the Act could never have been intended to apply to any language used in the course of a public address or a public discussion; that if the defendant is to be prosecuted at all he should be prosecuted under the Blasphemy Law, and indicted and tried in a superior court, and not dealt with in a court of summary jurisdiction, so that the invaluable right of free speech might be guarded against hasty assaults. I should like to argue such a case before the Court of Appeal, but I confess I should shun the task of arguing Mr. Jackson's present case. Moreover, the Freethought party has no money to throw away. Certainly the N. S. S. has not. I may add that Mr. Jackson was not speaking for the N. S. S. or the Secular Society, Ltd., when he used the "profane language" he is under sentence for.

I see that Mr. Jackson, in his address to the Magistrate, kept to the old Leeds plan of defence. Mr. Robert Blatchford was dragged in again. Certain warm words about Jehovah were quoted from his God and My Neighbor. But these words were not uttered in a public place; they were printed in a book, which was not given away, but had to be bought; they were thus not prosecutable under the Police Clauses Act; and Mr. Blatchford was discreet enough to say "Jehovah" instead of "God."

No one need go to prison under the Act in question. Mr. Jackson can easily refrain from language on which the police can base a prosecution. If he chooses to court prosecution, that is his affair, not mine. It is for him to decide whether the advertisement is worth the cost.

Perhaps we may all rejoice that the cost is limited. A fortnight's imprisonment is the utmost penalty for "profane language" under the Police Clauses Act. If the defendant preferred to pay a fine I should not be inclined to blame him. If he can spare his money better than his time, I think he has a right of choice; in either case he submits to force majeure. Giving an undertaking is quite another matter. That is a self-humiliation for the sake of safety.

G. W. FOOTE.

THE PREACHER'S PERQUISITE.

When the new minister, a handsome and unmarried man, made his first pastoral call at the Fosdicks, he took little Anna up in his arms and tried to kiss her. But the child refused to be kissed; she struggled loose and ran off into the next room where her mother was putting a few finishing touches to her adornment before going into the drawing room to greet the clergyman.

"Mamma," the little girl whispered, "the man in the drawing room wanted me to kiss him."

"Well," replied mamma, "why didn't you let him? I would if I were you."

Thereupon Anna ran back into the drawing room, and the minister asked:

"Well, little lady, won't you kiss me now?"

"No, I won't," replied Anna promptly, "but mamma says she will."

A Churchless Community.

A READER personally acquainted with the facts vouches for the truth of an article in the Leader of Davenport, Iowa, which states that the town of Walcott, thirteen miles west of that city, has no church, and yet that its people are not only contented and happy, peaceful and law-abiding, but also thrifty and prosperous. To dispose of the financial part at the outset, it may be said that Walcott is next to the richest city per capita in the world. The banks have a deposit of $1,126,000, and the inhabitants number 416. The article in the Leader says:—

> "One of the distinctive features of Walcott, aside from its heavily-laden banks, is the absence of a church or other place of worship. It has been twenty-seven years since the town has had a church. Like a flower by the wayside, it failed to thrive and finally withered for the lack of nourishment. The edifice was located on the old cemetery grounds. It was abandoned as a house of worship, moved further into town, and converted into a dwelling.
> "Fifteen years ago an itinerant Episcopal clergyman struck Walcott and endeavored to find a home there. But the community failed to receive him with open arms or to extend him any encouragement. So, after a brief tarry, he moved on in search of greener pastures.
> "'No, no; we do not want a church in Walcott. We have no use for one,' declared Louis Hinz, one of the pioneers of the town. 'We are now one community, one people, one happy family, you might say. We have no differences about religion. We are all peaceful and law-abiding. If we had a church there would be a division of sentiment. It would create two parties. One would go to church, and the other would not. Then one side would attempt to convince the other. This would create agitation and a division of sentiment. It would destroy our pleasant, happy relations. So you see why we don't want a church in Walcott.'
> "Walcott has three general stores, three implement stores, two banks, two blacksmith shops, two butcher shops, two barber shops, two garages, two grain elevators, three doctors, a lumber yard, a restaurant, two public halls, and one saloon."

The mayor of this churchless town is Dr. Carl Hinrichs, whose picture embellishes the newspaper account. He is serving his second term and is perfectly satisfied with Walcott as it is, so far as preaching is concerned. This village answers in the affirmative the question whether a community can thrive and its people enjoy all of the blessings of civilisation without supporting a church.—Truthseeker (New York).

Mark Twain's "Confession."

[Written in the early eighties.]

I BELIEVE in God the Almighty.

I do not believe he has ever sent a message to man by anybody, or delivered one to him by word of mouth, or made himself visible to mortal eyes at any time in any place.

I believe that the Old and New Testaments were imagined and written by man, and that no line in them was authorised by God, much less inspired by him.

I think the goodness, the justice, and the mercy of God are manifested in his works: I perceive that they are manifested toward me in this life; the logical conclusion is that they will be manifested toward me in the life to come, if there should be one.

I do not believe in special providences. I believe that the universe is governed by strict and immutable laws. If one man's family is swept away by a pestilence and another man's spared, it is only the law working: God is not interfering in that small matter, either against the one man or in favor of the other.

I cannot see how eternal punishment hereafter could accomplish any good end, therefore I am not able to believe in it. To chasten a man in order to perfect him might be reasonable enough; to annihilate him when he shall have proved himself incapable of reaching perfection might be reasonable enough; but to roast him forever for the mere satisfaction of seeing him roast would not be reasonable—even the atrocious God imagined by the Jews would tire of the spectacle eventually.

There may be a hereafter and there may not be. I am wholly indifferent about it. If I am appointed to live again, I feel sure it will be for some more sane and useful purpose than to flounder about for ages in a lake of fire and brimstone for having violated a confusion of ill-defined and contradictory rules said (but not evidenced) to be of divine institution. If annihilation is to follow death, I shall not be aware of the annihilation, and therefore shall not care a straw about it.

I believe that the world's moral laws are the outcome of the world's experience. It needed no God to come down out of heaven to tell men that murder and theft and the other immoralities were bad, both for the individual who commits them and for society which suffers from them.

If I break all these moral laws, I cannot see how I injure God by it, for he is beyond the reach of injury from me—I could as easily injure a planet by throwing mud at it. It seems to me that my misconduct could only injure me and other men. I cannot benefit God by obeying these moral laws—I could as easily benefit the planet by withholding my mud. (Let these sentences be read in the light of the fact that I have received moral laws only from man—none whatever from God.) Consequently, I do not see why I should be either punished or rewarded hereafter for the deeds I do here.

Tales of Our Times.

BY A CYNIC.

JOHNNY SMITH was a thoughtful little boy who not only took great pains with his copy-book, but who paid more attention to the excellent moral precepts contained in them than little boys generally do. That sage injunction, "Be virtuous and you will be happy," early arrested his attention, and as, with painful effort and inky fingers, he traced each line of this familiar formula he became impressed with a growing conviction that the attainment of happiness must surely be an easier achievement than the reproduction of the sweeping curves and graceful symmetries of those beautiful letters.

This conviction remained with Johnny as he grew through boyhood, and he often wondered why happiness was always supposed to be so difficult to gain when all one had to do in order to gain it was to "be virtuous." So he began to make the experiment of practising what he understood to be virtue as often as possible in order to become, as he confidently expected, the happiest boy in the world.

In his schoolboy days it seemed to him that robbing birds' nests, torturing frogs, or throwing stray cats into ponds scarcely came under the category of virtuous conduct, so he steadily refrained from these pastimes, thus earning for himself the contempt of all his schoolfellows and the opprobrious name of "Amelia"—this being supposed to convey implications of feminine tender-heartedness and susceptibility unutterably despicable to all manly schoolboys. He also felt that fighting was not virtuous, so he never fought except in sheer self-defence. Thus he became the victim of all the bullies in the school, and was universally regarded as a coward, but he was neither a coward nor a weakling, for he was proficient in many boyish sports, notably swimming. This was proved on one occasion when the boy who had been in the habit of bullying him most unmercifully fell into a river, and when Smith plunged in and saved the bully's life at the risk of his own. But the only reward he got for this was a severe chill, followed by an attack of pneumonia, which nearly killed him, while the bully suffered no harm whatever from the accident.

When Smith left school he became a clerk in a bank, and gradually rose to a position of trust as an accountant. A fellow-accountant once proposed to him that the two of them should carry out a dastardly scheme of embezzlement, which of course, remembering the old copy-book of his childhood's days, he indignantly refused to participate in. This made the other accountant his mortal enemy, and when the embezzlement was carried out and discovered the perpetrator of the crime escaped unscathed, but there were circumstances which threw grave suspicion on Smith. He was tried, and, though acquitted for want of evidence, he lost his situation and had to start earning a living again in a distant part of the country. But the man who had committed the fraud bought a country house with the proceeds, was honored and respected by all his neighbors, and read the Lessons in the Parish Church every Sunday.

After some years of toil and privation, Smith once more found himself in fairly prosperous circumstances. He was now married, and had several friends whom he esteemed and trusted; and one of these, happening to get into financial difficulties, applied to him for assistance. To help one's friends in distress is certainly a virtuous act, so Smith had no hesitation in lending his friend all his hard-earned savings. But the friend, who had not paid much attention to copy-book maxims, neglected to repay a single penny of the loan, and Smith was once again plunged in poverty. Whereupon his wife, disgusted at what she called his imbecile stupidity, eloped with another of his friends.

Smith now began seriously to doubt whether his old copy-book maxim, "Be virtuous and you will be happy," was altogether to be depended on as a guide through life; and he had almost resolved to abandon it, and to seek for happiness on quite other lines, when he fortunately came across a volume of Essays by an anonymous writer. One of these essays seemed to fit his own case so admirably that it might almost have been written specially for his instruction. Here are some passages of it which impressed themselves most deeply on Smith's mind:—

> "Some of our copy-book headings ought to be carefully revised. Take, for instance, that familiar one, 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' If this were altered to 'Be virtuous and you will deserve to be happy' no exception could be taken to it; but the injunction as it stands in our copy-books would be valid only in a perfectly virtuous social State. A virtuous character is one which prompts conduct favorable to the welfare of the community; but if the community be not itself entirely virtuous—that is, if it contain a certain number of non-virtuous individuals—virtuous conduct may often be the direct cause, not of happiness, but of bitter unhappiness to the virtuous individuals practising it.
> "Sages of all ages, from that rather over-rated person King Solomon down to modern times, have invited mankind to seek moral guidance from the habits of ants and bees; but no strict analogy exists between the communities of the social hymenopters and human communities, because the former are perfectly organised societies and the latter are not. Was it not Marcus Aurelius who observed that 'What is bad for the beehive cannot be good for the bee'? This is true enough for beehives, but not for human societies. Every individual bee is so organised through ages of inherited instinct that it cannot act in any way but what is beneficial to the hive, and any attempt to act otherwise would probably involve a painful effort. Therefore what is 'good' for each individual bee must also be 'good' for the hive. But supposing bee communities were not thus perfectly organised, and that they contained a certain number of bees who were, let us imagine, addicted to stealing the stored honey or devouring the eggs. An indulgence in such nourishing diet might well be 'good' for the non-virtuous bees practising it, and they would doubtless be 'happier' than the virtuous bees who refrained from such wrong conduct, but it would certainly be 'bad for the beehive.'
> "It must not, however, be supposed that this view justifies a negation of virtue and a dissolution of all ethical sanctions. Virtuous conduct is such as promotes the general welfare, and as the general welfare is always and indefeasibly right—it follows that virtuous conduct must be always and indefeasibly right. But it should not be pursued with any expectation of individual happiness — indeed, virtuous conduct practised with a view to one's individual happiness as a reward, whether in this world or an imaginary future one, ceases to be virtuous conduct at all. The sole and sufficient sanction for such conduct is the welfare of the community of which each individual is an integral and inseparable part. The sole reward of the virtuous man is a share in that social welfare along with his fellows. The final purpose of his virtue is the attainment of that far-off goal when the community shall be as perfectly organised as a hive of bees, when the social equilibrium shall be complete, and when the maxim, 'Be virtuous and you will be happy,' shall be really true."

The reading of this essay prevented Smith from abandoning his virtuous principles, but it also prevented him from expecting their practice to meet with much reward of a hedonic kind.

ANSWER THE QUESTIONS!

Leave your holy parables,
Leave your pious suppositions;
Try to give straightforward answers
To the damnable old questions.

Why must Right, a bleeding outcast,
Trail the burden of the Cross,
While exultant as a victor
Riding the high-horse goes Wrong?

Where, then, lies the fault? Perchance
The Lord is not quite Almighty?
Or himself he works the mischief?
Ah, but this were too degrading.

Thus we ask, and ask for ever,
Till at length our mouths are stopped
With a handful of mere earth;—
But can this be called an answer?

—Heine (translated by James Thomson "B. V.")

If I had been helping the Almighty when he created man, I would have had him begin at the other end, and start human beings with old age. How much better it would have been to start old and have all the bitterness and blindness of age in the beginning. One would not mind then if he were looking forward to a joyful youth. Think of the joyous prospect of growing young instead of old! Think of looking forward to eighteen instead of eighty! Yes, the Almighty made a poor job of it. I wish he had invited my assistance—Mark Twain.

Acid Drops.

The wisdom of trusting to "names" and "authorities" is proved by two recent facts. Mr. Frederic Harrison has been writing up the German scare in the English Review. He does it in the Jeremiah style. He reminds us, indeed, of our old friend Jonah, with his "Yet forty Days and Nineveh shall be destroyed." Dr. Alfred Wallace, on the other hand, has just been laughing the German scare to scorn. These rival prophets are both old men, both highly intellectual, and both famous publicists. If age, and mental power, and moral sincerity, were enough to justify a public utterance, they would both be entitled to belief. But that is impossible, for they are at opposite poles to each other. The moral is that every man should do his own thinking. There are no real "authorities" in the realm of mind. The first of all gospels is the gospel of Freethought.

Mr. Plowden, the well-known London magistrate, had a Scotsman before him charged with being drunk on New Year's Day. Defendant couldn't see any harm in that. "Then it is part of your religion to get drunk on ——," Mr. Plowden said. "Yes, it is," the defendant interrupted. The sentence was "ten shillings or seven days." Such is the respect paid to North British religion in London.

The Salvation Army has been making use of the parasitic daily press again to puff the "wonderful work" of its Suicide Bureau. The work itself is not wonderful; the wonder is that people swallow all the lies told about it,—they are so transparently silly. Every person in distress who consults the Bureau officials, and doesn't commit suicide afterwards, is apparently counted as a person saved from self-slaughter by the "power of religion." Common-garden journalists seem to take this quite for granted. But after all it is utter nonsense. The only way in which the Salvation Army can show that it saves anybody at all from suicide is by showing a decrease in the general statistics of that "crime" over the area of the Suicide Bureau's operations. The Blood-and-Fire Brigade, however, is very chary of figures since Mr. Manson's criticisms were pressed upon public attention. Mr. Manson has placed on record the extravagant statements made by the "Army" officials about the success of its crusade against suicide in the earliest days of that effort. The very first week's results were given as follows:—

Non-suicide cases	12
Doubtful cases	5
Lives saved	194

The Bureau had only just started its work, and its efforts must then have been confined to London. Therefore the Bureau officials "saved" 194 suicides in one week. Now the Registrar-General's returns just then showed that only 587 suicides took place in London during the whole of the year 1906—and the Bureau started on January 1, 1907. In seven days the Salvation Army "saved" more than one-third of a whole year's suicides! Of course it did nothing of the kind. The officials omitted to look up the public statistics before uttering their false boastings.

English newspapers are boasting of the suppression of murderous witchcraft, with its inhuman sacrifices, in Southern Nigeria. Several of the chief priests have been condemned to death. Shocking, no doubt. But how long is it since human sacrifices in the name of witchcraft were common in England and other Christian countries? Does not the Bible teach the reality of witchcraft? Was it not believed in as late as the days of John Wesley, who declared that to give up witchcraft was to give up the Bible? And it is only 121 years since John Wesley died.

The Bishop of Carlisle's new year's pastoral letter to the clergy and laity of his diocese says that some of the clergy do good work, but—> "There are exceptions, and two or three of the clergy are approaching the brink of exposure for their habits. Others seem to be afflicted with incurable indolence. The less they have to do the worse they do it. Others are dull and listless, and their ministry of the Word and sacrament is not a ministry but a mechanism. Their churches are shut from Sunday to Sunday, and on Sundays they are empty. Fortunately, this class is very few."

Evidently the second coming of Christ is badly wanted in that part of the world.

The Daily Telegraph continues to publish lengthy accounts of the cruelties practised by the Balkan Christian Allies on the inhabitants of the conquered districts. In its issue for December 31 the paper publishes a full column account of what it properly calls "the horrible cruelty" of the Servians on "unarmed, defenceless persons, old men, women, children, and infants at the breast" in Albania. Between Kumanovo and Uskub some 3,000 were put to death; near Pristina the number amounted to 5,000. Women were forced to watch their children being "literally carved to pieces with bayonets." We are told that "the deeds done exceed anything" which occurred under Turkish rule. Moreover, "the less the resistance of the Albanians to the invading armies the greater the massacre." Many of the details of the cruelties practised do not admit of being plainly recorded. The Turkish authorities have made representations to the Powers on the subject, but it is not likely that much will be done on behalf of Mohammedans and Jews when the ruffianly murderers are such pious Christians fighting an avowedly religious war of the Cross against the Crescent.

In the light of the Telegraph revelations, it is well to record the tribute paid the allied armies by Dr. Clifford in his New Year's address at Westbourne Park Chapel on January 1. Apparently it is enough for Dr. Clifford that Christians have won a much exaggerated series of victories against a Mohammedan enemy. Accordingly he bursts out as follows:—

> "They have faced the situation and patiently prepared for the fight on behalf of civic liberty. Their drill was their development. Character emerged. Character is mastery, and has won in the heroic struggle against corruption and tyranny, and the world."

Not a word, it will be observed, about the outrages reported, not by the Turks, but by English newspaper correspondents. The Christian has been victorious, the Mohammedan has been defeated, and Dr. Clifford would not be Dr. Clifford if he did not find the reason for this to lie with the superior character of the conquerors due to their Christian faith. Character has won! And these people of character and Christian faith are those of whom the crimes indicated above are reported, and which are not seriously denied.

Another striking feature of the situation is the complete silence of the religious papers on the subject. We have not come across one—and we glance through a number each week—that has made any reference to it. The Church Times, which regretted the war coming to end without the recapture of Santa Sophia, has not said a word about the outrages, although it has dealt with the progress of the war week by week. Had the outrages been committed by Turks on Christians, pious England would have been ringing with the story, with all the embellishments that could be suggested by a Christian imagination. Under these circumstances we were more than pleased to see a letter in the press from Mr. H. B. Marriott Watson expressing his astonishment that no public notice has been taken of the matter. He pertinently asks:—

> "Are these the people who boasted that they carried the liberating Cross against the Crescent? Are these the people who proclaimed a Holy War against the iniquities of Turkish rule? Are these the people who professed to extend the benefits of civilisation to the suffering inhabitants of Thrace, Macedonia, and Albania? Are these the people who claimed a few weeks back that they came as deliverers, they whose hands are now red with the blood of innocent victims?.....Away with all these mawkish and miserable sentimental lies which have bolstered up the legend that the Balkan peoples stand for enlightenment and justice and progress. Let us have done with cant, cant for which the pulpits are largely responsible, and recognise that the Balkan Allies are out to grab territory, and have waded to their goal through rapine, murder, and massacre."

Mr. Marriott Watson asks for the truth to be made public at any cost. But he little knows the pulpit of England if he expects the truth to be told there of the treatment of non-Christians by an ostentatiously professing Christian enemy.

The Rev. J. Stephen Roose says there was originally no demand for Sunday picture shows. The demand was created when their opening was permitted. Well, what more does the man want? People could not well demand a thing before they knew what it was. If they continue to demand it after they have once tried it, that is clear proof of a public demand, whatever may be said to the contrary. Mr. Roose also says that Christians have taken shares in cinematograph shows, and so do not oppose their opening because they do not wish to diminish the profits. We should not be surprised if this were true. The Christian conscience is usually susceptible to monetary pressure. It was Ruskin who said that if engineers could build a tunnel to hell Christians would invest their money in it, and they would willingly close the churches rather than lower the dividends.

Those poor picture palaces! And our poor addle-headed public officials! Three lads were recently charged at Wigan with robbery. The Chief Constable said that the money was stolen in order to obtain admission to picture palaces. He said it was his experience that these places had a bad influence on boys. We wonder how many forms there are of this particular superstition? At one time it is through reading boys' papers; then boys do wrong as a consequence of listening to Socialist orators. Now it is because of picture palaces. Generally, these excuses are put in the mouths of offenders by the police, or by the magistrate, or by someone else. And none of them have the wit to realise that when a boy—or an adult, either, for that matter—does wrong, he is quite ready to fall in with the views of those who judge him as to the cause of his misconduct.

The Universal Week of Prayer, under the World's Evangelical Alliance, hasn't improved the weather. The week-end was marked by storms, wrecks, and floods. Neither has it improved the prospect of peace in the East of Europe. We should like to know what good it has done.

"General" Bramwell Booth and his wife are visiting Liverpool next Wednesday and holding meetings in Hope Hall. They call it "A Day with God." We were not aware that the Booths had "God" on a string like that. Suppose he won't go with them! Well, they could keep it dark, and do the business all the same.

Church reports for 1912 continue what is now the usual tale of Christian progress—that is, increased accommodation for worshipers, with fewer worshipers than ever to fill them. In Wales the four principal Nonconformist denominations report a decrease of 877 members, making over a 30,000 loss in five years. In England the Congregationalists report a decrease of 2,221 church members and 3,178 Sunday-school scholars. To accommodate these people who stay away they have provided four extra churches, while 269 additional teachers minister to the 3,178 absent scholars. The Baptists also report a decline in membership of 2,231, and nearly 5,000 Sunday-school attendants. The authorities have, therefore, thoughtfully provided 36 new churches, with 17 extra preachers. The steady decrease in membership is no less striking than the steady increase in buildings. Some attempt to explain the decline in membership is offered by way of change of population. But the population does not vanish into air, and when people move out of one district they move into another, and this should not affect the totals. The only genuine explanation is that year by year a larger number of people simply dispense with Christianity altogether. It should be added that the figures given also represent an absolute decrease. If we take it in relation to the increase of population the loss would be still more striking.

Rev. Donald B. Fraser, of Pembroke Chapel, Liverpool, tells the local Post and Mercury that the emptying of the Christian churches is a very bad thing for the community. He says it means that morality is disappearing. Every man of God knows that you can't have morality without him. Other people are not quite so sure about it nowadays.

Rev. Dr. Clifford delivered his New Year's address to a large gathering at Westbourne Park Chapel. "We are a year's march," he said, "further on in humanity's journey; has it been a march nearer to God's goal or the Devil's?" The question is a poor compliment to God. Dr. Clifford also srggested that declining churches may mean the reverse of declining religion. When the churches are all empty, we suppose, Christianity will have reached the height of prosperity. It must be admitted that the old gentleman (Dr. Clifford—not the Devil) has an original way of looking at things.

Of all ways of promoting the cause of woman suffrage its lady friends have hit upon the very worst. They have prayed for it—in Westminster Abbey. What pathetic confidence in the do-nothing Christian God!

The leaflet calling the suffragettes to Westminster Abbey was signed by Mrs. Henry Fawcett, Lady Frances Balfour, Mrs. H. Percy Boulnois, and Lady Bunting. The call was to "a day of silent prayer." Perhaps they thought a whole day's silence would do some of the sisterhood good. But that isn't as bad as the argument of the man who declared that there were no women in heaven, and proved it (as he thought) by quoting the text, "And there was silence in heaven for the space of half an hour." We are bound to add, for our own part, that we have known some men who would have found half-an-hour's silence a trial.

The Church Times wonders "What would Bethlehem and Calvary be to people living A.D. 300,000?" This is a very long way ahead, and we have little hesitation in saying that long before that date arrives people will not be thinking of Bethlehem and Calvary at all. And if anyone happens to mention the names, we expect there will be resort to some dictionary of mythology to find out what the words really mean. The poor Church Times editor seems to imagine that he has got hold of a god that will live for ever. It is sheer delusion. An immortal god has never yet been discovered. Some of them live longer than others, and some of them undergo a kind of reincarnation; but sooner or later they all come to an end. Man does not possess immortality himself, and he cannot confer it upon any of his creations.

John D. Rockefeller junior has been holding forth strongly of late on the efficacy of prayer. Here is a passage from his discourse on that subject:—

> "There came a time in my life when I met a grave crisis. My happiness and usefulness in this world depended on my decision. I prayed every night for four years. One morning, just before dawn broke, I awoke and felt just as sure which road to take as if there had been a big sign to guide me. I got up from my bed, lighted a lamp, and wrote a letter committing myself to that course."

That was one of the slowest answers to prayer that we ever heard of. But it was satisfactory when it arrived. We understand that young Rockefeller received a heavenly message that he was to do no work, but help spend the old man's money. The heavenly message arrived in time to prevent his being of any earthly use.

Rev. C. E. Lamb, of Gretton, Northamptonshire, left £8,381. Rev. Francis Griffith Jones, of Bryncorach, Conway, Carvarvon, left £16,365. Venerable Brownlow Thomas Atlay, of Ealing, left £4 505. These are little better than sprats. But here's a regular whale. Rev. John Filmer Anstey, of St. James's-terrace, Regent's Park, left £142,026. Blessed be ye poor!

The Bishop of Southwell has hit upon a good idea. He recommends what may be called "silent sermons." Preachers should give out a text and say "Dear people, we will sit perfectly still for a quarter of an hour and think about that text." The Bishop believes that many of them would feel that "they had drunk in a tremendous amount of knowledge." Perhaps the idea would catch on better if the reflection could take place in smoking pews, where a little something else could be "drunk in" at the same time.

Colonel Seely has informed the House of Commons that officiating army clergymen are paid according to the average strength of the garrison. We should have thought that the average strength of the congregation would be a better guide.

Our sympathy is sometimes with the parson. Here is a case in point. Rev. John Hosking, Congregational minister, Melbourne, found his Sunday evening service disturbed by a gang of roughs who had been called in for that purpose. The man of God felt the old Adam move in him. He descended from the pulpit, took off his uniform, and gave the ringleador "one on the jaw." Down he went, and his pals were easily ejected. We are glad to hear it. Every man is entitled to a fair hearing—even a clergyman.

The following are the last sentences in the criticism of a new theological book (no matter what one) in the January British Review:—

> "Christianity is a religion for the man in the street. You have got to inform him (if you are a preacher) either that the four Gospels are true from end to end, or that they are untrustworthy from end to end. If you say to him that they are largely false but that patient study will elicit vital truth from them, he will laugh in your face and very properly tell you that jesuitry of that sort is not to his liking."

This would be rather mild, perhaps, in the Freethinker, but in the first number of a monthly, with which the Oxford and Cambridge Magazine is incorporated, it is rather striking.

Those who are agitating for a fixed Easter have a good deal to say for it from the point of view of public convenience, but their success would hide the mingled sun and moon worship of the present arrangement. Not that it would really settle the date of the death, etc., of Jesus Christ; for if Easter is arbitrarily fixed it will have no relation to any past event whatever, real or supposed, but merely to the time most suitable for a general spring holiday.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, January 12, Queen's (Minor) Hall, Langham-place, Regent-street, London, W., at 7.30, "The King and the Bible."

January 19 and 26, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London.

To Correspondents.

ALGERNON HERVEY-BATHURST.—In reproducing Mr. Mangasarian's eloquent lecture we do not undertake responsibility for all its opinions or statements. Besides, your letter on behalf of Christian Science is not a correction,—it is controversial; nor has Mother Eddy superseded Webster.

ARNOLD HUNTON, a Cardiff tobacconist, after reading our article on the Bishop of Chester's statement that Secularists are prone to be unkind to their children, puts in a similar (trade) word for the "divine weed," as Spenser called it. "I have noticed," he writes, "that non-smokers are generally quite brutal to their offspring." A justified joke!

F. A. DAVIES.—Sorry to learn you find it impossible to attend the Annual Dinner this time. Better luck next time. Thanks for the cutting.

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings.

H. MEREDITH.—They are "chestnuts." But we are glad to see that solemnity is losing ground at Calcutta

J. W. R.—Thanks for pleasant letter and wishes.

JOHN LATHAM (S. Africa).—Formal receipt follows this acknowledgment. Did you receive our registered letter of October 30? You have not alluded to it in any of your letters. Perhaps you think there is no need to, but we should like to have assurance at your end as well as the Post Office receipt at this end.

E. LATCHMERE.—Which fund is intended? Kindly let us know.

G. BEARISFORD.—Necessarily shortened, but "all there."

F. B. ZEIGENHEIN (Australia).—Order passed over to shop manager. Pleased you heard of us through Mr. W. H. Jackson, whose name is well known to us.

E. BURKE.—Glad you keep active in the Freethought "vineyard." We hope there will be no abatement of our own activity in 1913.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are always welcome.

L. ALEXANDER (S. Africa).—Formal receipt in due course.

A. HARVEY.—Will be acknowledged later.

A. H. ERNST.—We cannot tell you whether there are other readers of the Freethinker in Milan or not. Most of our readers get the paper through newsagents.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Our Fighting Fund.

[The object of this Fund is to provide the sinews of war in the National Secular Society's fight against the London County Council, which is seeking to stop all collections at the Society's open-air meetings in London, and thus to abolish a practically immemorial right; this step being but one in a calculated policy which is clearly intended to suppress the right of free speech in all parks and other open spaces under the Council's control. This Fund is being raised by the Editor of the Freethinker by request of the N. S. S. Executive. Subscriptions should therefore be sent direct to G. W. Foote, 2 Newcastle-street, London, E.C. Cheques, etc., should be made payable to him.]

Previously acknowledged, £77 13s. 3d.

Sugar Plums.

London "saints" are earnestly desired to procure from Miss E. M. Vance, at 2 Newcastle-street, E.C., a supply of the neat little printed announcement of Mr. Foote's Sunday evening lectures at the Queen's (Minor) Hall. It is impossible to advertise these lectures in the ordinary way all over London. The area is too vast—the expense is too great. But much can be done by the "saints" themselves in the way suggested. Mr. Foote's opening lecture to-night (Jan. 12) on "The King and the Bible" should be entertaining as well as instructive.

This is the last time we can call attention to the London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner, which takes place at the Holborn Restaurant on Tuesday evening next, January 14. The function is timed to start at 7 o'clock and the chairman will take his seat as punctually as possible. It is to be hoped the guests will assist him in this matter. A good dinner, of course, is expected at the Holborn. No doubt, also, there will be some good in the music and some in the post-prandial speeches. Besides the chairman's (Mr. Foote's) address there are to be a few brief speeches to the usual toasts. With decent weather there should be a large gathering on this popular occasion.

There will be an innovation in the top of the table arrangements at this year's Dinner in order to make the Chairman more accessible, instead of being built in by the usual barriers.

Mr. Cohen opened the new (January) course of lectures at the Public Hall, Croydon, on Sunday evening, with a good lecture to a good audience. Mr. Lloyd occupies the platform this evening (Jan. 12) and we hope to hear of another good meeting. The local "saints" appear to be very pleased with this enterprise.

Ex-Rev. E. Morris Young opens the Birmingham Branch's new season's propaganda to-day (Jan. 12), lecturing at 7 p.m. at the King's Hall, Corporation-street, on "What is Truth?"—the question that Pilate asked and Jesus didn't answer.

The Sheffield Branch had an enjoyable social gathering on New Year's Eve. The President, Mr. T. Dennis, gave a spirited address on the Society's principles and objects, and on the favorable outlook upon 1913. A picture painted by Mr. B. A. Shipman was then unveiled. The speeches of several young members were full of enthusiasm. We wish the new Branch all success.

Mr. Foote's first article on George Meredith's Letters has to be postponed again for a week. Too many other matters have been occupying his attention. And he wants to do all the justice he can to this particular piece of work.

The London Typographical Journal for January—an extremely well-printed periodical—reproduces an appropriate passage, filling one of its columns, from our "Literary Gossip" with due acknowledgment to the Freethinker.

The new year's circular re the President's Honorarium Fund will be issued to subscribers before the end of January. A few subscriptions for 1913 have reached us already, and will be formally acknowledged in due course.

The duty of a philosopher is clear. His path lies straight before him. He must take every pains to ascertain the truth; and having arrived at a conclusion, he, instead of shrinking from it because it is unpalatable or because it seems dangerous, should, on that very account, cling the closer to it; should uphold it in bad repute more zealously than he would have done in good repute; should noise it abroad far and wide, utterly regardless of what opinions he shocks, of what interests he imperils; should, on its behalf, court hostility and despise contempt, being well assured that if it is not true it will die, but that if it is true it must produce ultimate benefit, albeit unsuited for practical adoption by the age or country in which it is first propounded.—Buckle, "History of Civilisation."

A Triangular Duel.

BY THE LATE J. M. WHEELER,

Sub-Editor of the "Freethinker" and Author of the "Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers," etc.

IT was a lovely Sunday morning on board the steamship Marmion, bound from London to Leith. There were but few passengers, for it was the dull season. Among them was a Scotch minister, and the sailors were piped to morning service. All on deck, except myself, gathered round the minister, who proceeded to read from the Bible. Pacing up and down, I was soon accompanied by a gentleman, who before long told me he was a Deist. After a little chat we adjourned to the smoking cabin, where we were joined by the minister when he had concluded his short service. I cannot pretend to accurately reproduce the conversation that ensued, but what remains in my memory was something like this:—

CHRISTIAN.—I'm sorry you gentlemen did not put in an appearance, if only as an example to others.

ATHEIST.—I have no wish to act as an example to others in this particular.

DEIST.—The fact is, sir, we do not agree with your views and cannot countenance them.

C.—What is it you take exception to?

D.—Your doctrine of eternal torment, for instance. Who can credit a good God will so punish his children?

C.—You believe, then, in a good God?

D.—Certainly. Nature proclaims there is a divine power, and that he is good.

C.—I have just come from visiting a friend at a home for incurables. He is hopelessly paralysed, and cannot even move without pain. What do you say to that punishment, which, mind you, is from an accident, and not for his own misdeeds?

D.—I confess there is much in nature I cannot understand, but there is enough to show me there is an all-good God.

C.—To show you, perhaps—for you, I presume, have had a Christian education. But I have been out in Africa, where the only gods believed in are stone and wooden fetishes, and these are worshiped with bloody sacrifices and absurd ceremonies.

D.—Probably far less absurd to them than your creed is to me.

C.—You evade my case, which is that nature does not suffice to tell them about an all-good God. For this they need the light of revelation.

D.—But your revelation reveals nothing. The Jehovah of the Bible is certainly not an all-good God, but partial, savage, and bloodthirsty.

C.—My point, I must repeat, is that exactly the same difficulties confront us in nature that we find in the Bible. Jehovah declares he visits the sins of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation. This is verified in my own experience. My grandfather was a three-bottle man, my father was over-fond of port, and I, though abstemious, suffer from the gout. Nature, too, seems savage and bloodthirsty. She kills her children day by day, and often agonisingly.

A.—It seems to me yours is an argument for Atheism.

D.—Just so. Two blacks cannot make a white. Your revelation should clear up the difficulties found in nature; instead of which it adds to them. Your arguments and those of Bishop Butler, whom you follow, would serve to defend all the atrocious and absurd superstitions of the savages you visited.

C.—Not at all. I hold that nature indicates the selfsame God more fully revealed in the Bible, and our duty is to learn his will and obey him.

D.—And I answer, the God of the Bible is not the God revealed by my heart and conscience, and I cannot worship what I can neither reverence nor love Jehovah is no more to me than Jupiter.

A.—And I answer that I find no all-good God revealed either in nature or in the Bible.

D.—But there must be a Supreme Power who designed everything.

A.—The mouse for the cat, and cats' skins for ladies' gloves?

C.—Nature does not suffice to tell us whether there be one or many superior powers. It cannot assure us that the designer is the creator. It does not reveal his omnipotence nor his infinite goodness. Its difficulties must be cleared up in another world. Nature, in short, is an enigma. We see through a glass darkly, but by the light of the Bible we may dimly discern, and yet firmly believe, that "all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are called according to his purpose."

D.—I'm not sure that man should arrogate immortality to himself any more than for the animals. In nature we find that of a thousand seeds but one ripens. I think I can discern some good purpose beneath all sin and suffering, but cannot flatter myself that my own personality is immediately concerned therein. I do not know anyone so good as to deserve eternal felicity, or so utterly and impossibly wicked as to deserve eternal torments.

A.—The only harmony I discern is that which must exist between life and its environment, and this is effected by constant suffering and death. What is the one growing seed to the myriads crushed out? All of good that I observe is from the efforts of human kind. What is man in his natural state without the inheritance of ages of civilised human effort? Let our missionary friend answer. In the discords of nature I note but one harmony—the still, sad music of humanity.

C.—Man in his fallen state is truly a wicked and corrupt creature.

D.—No, he is not a fallen angel, but a risen ape, and some day may as far outsoar us as Shakespeare does the savage fetish worshiper.

C.—This world is too evidently corrupt; wrong too often triumphs. Believe me, your ideal state must be in another world.

A.—How can a state of injustice in this world prove a state of justice in any other, when you agree all the arguments for that other world must be drawn from this present one? The fact is, you first assume a God, and then a heaven to cover his handiwork. The one assumption impels you to the other, at which my friend, who is more modest if less logical, pauses.

C.—I hope he agrees with me that this world, with all its sin and wickedness, is in a state of probation. If so, all the discipline we undergo is surely to prepare us for a future state.

A.—For what sort of a future state does your friend's paralysis prepare him?

D.—I've spent much time in learning various languages, but certainly I do not expect to put them to use in some future existence.

C.—You do not know.

A.—A good reason for silence, none for affirmation.

C.—I admit philosophy can give us no positive assurance of a future state, still less of eternal rewards and punishments. This conviction must come from religion. Where philosophy is weak religion is strong.

A.—That is, it bolsters up poor arguments by fictions.

C.—It is no use arguing with you. We have no common ground, though I hope my friend, when he sees the only alternative is Christianity or Atheism, will decide for Christianity.

A.—And I hope he will follow his reason whithersoever it leads him. If we want sure standing ground we must, as Descartes said, be prepared to doubt of all that can be doubted.

Bathos and Botticelli.

IT is Christmas Eve. Borne on the breezes come the sounds of lusty singers, whose mournful tunes seem somewhat out of harmony with the season. They are singing carols in praise of the Founder of Christianity; they are also singing for a consideration. Thus we have at once a delightful combination of business and piety—characteristics which are never wanting in a profession which had its origin in Palestine.

At this time of year, any seasonable custom which yields a profit is trotted out; even the daily papers which minister to the intellectual needs of the public are not behind in these matters. We notice in the Daily Telegraph, under the heading of "Art Notes," two columns of intensely seasonable material. In these lines the devout reader may indulge his imagination, and find exactly what he wants—at this time of the year. We are treated to an elaborate discourse on the relative values of pictures of the Nativity. Botticelli, Mantegna, Duccio, Giotto, and many others have all essayed, with varying degrees of success, to portray this event of transcendent importance, yet we doubt whether their motives were any worthier than carol singers'. As works showing the progress of painting, they are excellent, but to seriously hold up these samples of barbarian art to an intelligent public is worthy of the daily press.

In a fine outburst, which can only be called intemperance of language, the writer of "Art Notes" eulogises the sublimity and grandeur of the stable "thick with the breath of the ox and the ass." This, we are obliged to admit, is not exactly a savory atmosphere, but religious rhapsody, real or simulated, takes no note of such trifling incongruities. Of course, no reference to the stable would be complete unless the stars were included, and our head swooned when we read of the long piercing rays of the stars shedding their light in this place, with which, according to the writer, Cæsar's palace could not compare. It is possible that the Bethlehem variety of stars differ from those we are accustomed to seeing in this unromantic country; we cannot but think that the stars on that particular night behaved in a most erratic manner.

With a pomposity of diction which nowadays passes for erudition, and a judicious placing of technical phrases peculiar to the art critic, he sets forth in glowing terms the wonderful genius of Botticelli, as revealed in the picture called "Nativity." And it is precisely at this juncture that we begin to realise what faith and imagination will produce. Although we cannot boast of having seen angels, our conception of such ethereal beings will not allow us to take for granted that they wear crowns made of leaves. To quote the writer, "leaf-crowned angels are seen embracing the shepherds, and above the roof—moved by, breathing forth, sphere-music—other angels, higher in the hierarchy, their whirling robes shot with a golden light, circle in a solemn song and dance." The spiritual and the material embrace, the spiritual indulge in recreation essentially mundane, and last, but not least, they wear clothes. The sphere-music is beyond our comprehension, but we suppose it is easily understood by those whose faith will move mountains. We will not weary readers of this journal with any more extracts of this pious nonsense; it had to be seasonable even if the writer was obliged to fly fifteenth-century painters for material. Doubtless the Italian knew on which side his bread was buttered, and painted accordingly. A nation which had swallowed Dante two centuries previous could easily assimilate a thousand pictures of the Nativity, especially as it was dangerous to life to be unorthodox. Goldsmith, one of the most charming and delightfully human of writers, once expressed his opinion of Dante by by saying that his works were written for barbarians, and we are inclined to think that this piece of drastic criticism also applies to old religious painters of Italy. At the present time, they have their paid apologists in the press, to whom sincerity spells ruin. And this is the outcome of a religion which has run riot through centuries—to finish up with press, public, and pulpit saturated with hypocrisy.

We are gratified to see this recourse of religion to art; it is illustrative of the turns and twists it takes to prolong its existence. However, the Church of Rome must smile to see its countrymen requisitioned to impress the subtle beauty of the Nativity—it can easily afford to do so, and then have much left to spare. The writer of "Art Notes" has made the best of a bad job; as Religion and Art are antagonistic terms, he would have been well advised to leave Christmas Eve in the hands of tradespeople, carol singers, and professional preachers. If he should require a specimen of Christian art, he will be recommended to view the page opposite the one where his own contribution scintillates. There he will find an advertisement of crippled children, not even worthy of a seller of patent medicines. Ghastly faces, bandaged eyes, children on crutches, these are the sights, badly sketched, which are intended to touch the hearts of the generous. Along with this specimen of bad taste is an appeal couched in semi-religious language; we sincerely hope that there will be a generous response. There ought to be, as Christians inherit the earth. We hope, also, that they are proud of the Deity who looks on a crippled, helpless mass of humanity and cannot do anything to prevent such failures in life. Whichever view they take, they are spitted on the horns of a dilemma which is the inevitable outcome of a faith discredited and disbelieved by half its adherents.

Biblical teaching and theological imagination have invested the Nativity story with the garments of a farce. From Genesis, where the curse was uttered to Eve, to the supposed birth of Jesus, and on to the present day, Christians' coarse and ruffian hands have polluted the holy of holies. Woman a chattel, and childbirth something to be tolerated, but overlooked after the "churching" service—a rigmarole of words which would insult a Kaffir's intelligence. Blundering fools all when they touch any matters essentially human. With their eyes to heaven, they forget the earth, and at the present time the followers of Gentle Jesus have not even influenced the Christian public sufficiently to greet expectant motherhood with anything but a titter or a lascivious leer.

By their fruits shall we know them—and we are profoundly thankful for the two pages from the respectable press, which, by some Rabelaisian touch, were arranged to face each other.

CHRISTOPHER GAY.

Nailed Down!

THE Freethinker is my oldest child, and I believe it has, first and last, cost me more than all my other children put together. I am naturally proud of its good character. It has fought hard against superstition and tyranny, and in doing so has offended some hyper-sensitive and timid people; but this is the only crime that has ever been alleged against it. In the matter of fair-play it has shown an example to all other journals in England. I have always acted, or tried to act, as I did in the famous "Atheist Shoemaker" case, when I printed all that Mr. Price Hughes and Mr. G. J. Holyoake had to say on the matter, without a word of mine being allowed to creep into the Methodist Times.

This is not boasting. It is a plain statement of an obvious truth. And there are times when the truth should be heard. This is one of them.

I referred last week to an editorial paragraph in the Literary Guide charging me with refusing to insert a Rationalist Press Association advertisement. I am going to break that paragraph to pieces and grind it to dust. But I shall do it in the old Freethinker fashion of absolute fair-play.

Here then is the paragraph in its entirety, exactly as it appeared :—

> "Most advanced journals have difficulty in obtaining advertisements for their columns. The Freethinker, however, would appear to be an exception to the rule. The other day the Secretary of the R. P. A. sent to this fortunate heterodox paper instructions to insert the advertisement of "Pamphlets for the Million" which is printed on the front cover of our present issue, and the following reply was received :—
> 'November 25, 1912.
> Dear Sir,—We beg to say there will be no room in the Freethinker for some months for outside advertisements of any length; we therefore return your advertisement herewith.—Yours faithfully, THE PIONEER PRESS.'
> Were the Freethinker not a Freethought paper, it might be suspected that its proprietors wished to join in the boycott of R. P. A. publications to which we called attention in these columns last month."

Although the Rationalist Press Association itself must be held responsible for that paragraph, I may as well say that I cannot easily be mistaken as to the writer's identity. I recognise certain family characteristics : first of all, the clumsy composition, with its superfluities such as "for their columns" and "in these columns"—than which there can be nothing more detestable from a literary point of view; next, the heavy-handed attempt at jocosity; lastly, the want of good manners, running into insolence, where it is thought to be safe. The brief letter of the Pioneer Press is a model in comparison. It says exactly what had to be said, without a word too many or a word too little.

That letter was as honest as it was plain. The Pioneer Press does not take the Rationalist Press Association's "instructions" about anything. An advertisement for the Freethinker was sent in by the Association's secretary. It was not refused, but had to be declined. The difference consists in the fact that reasons were assigned.

Let me at this point place a few facts before my readers; facts well known to the writer of that libellous paragraph, but not disclosed to the readers of his paper. Some may ask why I do not send a correction to the Literary Guide. This is my answer. I once sent a letter to that journal, and it was refused admission. No one has an opportunity of playing off that sort of insult upon me twice.

But the facts! Much against my will I carry on a small printing and publishing business. The insecurity of the Freethinker is the reason of this. I cannot afford to place it at the mercy of outsiders. They would "rat" at the first sound of danger. The only person I am sure I can depend upon is myself. So I keep a small printing office to produce the Freethinker and I keep a shop to sell it in. This is necessitated—and I go no further. My real function in the world is not "running" a shop or a printing office.

Now with regard to advertisements. I tried desperately hard a few years ago to get some, but the attempt was a fiasco. I am reconciled to the fact that the Freethinker must subsist without them. They are not even solicited now. For a long while the advertisement scale has been omitted. A regular, if small, inflow of advertisements, could be provided for; a sporadic few, at incalculable intervals, cannot be. They are not worth the trouble they involve. And there is always the danger of delaying the publication of the paper. I refused an "inset" advertisement some time ago for that very reason. Yet I inserted one gratuitously for the Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. There are things I love better than money. It may sound strange to some people, but it is a fact nevertheless, that I have never charged the N. S. S. or the Secular Society, Ltd., a single penny for all their advertisements in my paper.

The R. P. A. advertisement was to be nine inches long and packed with matter. I could not take it that week, nor for some weeks after. I was daily expecting the fresh advertisements of the Annual Dinner, the new Queen's Hall lectures, the "Bible Handbook," and other things. These would bring me nothing, but I gave them their time-honored precedence.

The R. P. A. advertisement which it is represented that I did not insert in order to boycott its publications, had actually appeared in the Freethinker of July 21. "Pamphlets for the Million" will be found filling a column on page 464 of that issue. So much for the "boycott."

And now I have a harder thing to say. The Pioneer Press letter to the R. P. A. secretary is not printed as it was written. The original said that there would be "no room in the Freethinker for some weeks for outside advertisements of any length." The Literary Guide turned "weeks" into "months." Why? There is only one possible answer. It follows from the character of the "boycott" libel.

A man who does that sort of thing, in a public charge against a public man, is a scoundrel if he does it deliberately; if he does it unwittingly he is a careless contemptible fool.

G. W. FOOTE.

A Verbal Bomb.

"THERE is only one thing," the lecturer was saying, "that can keep a man pure-hearted, and that thing is religion. Find me a man who has forsaken the faith of his fathers, and I will show you a man whose conscience has become atrophied, a man who, having nothing to grip, nothing to hope for, whose arms are not outstretched to God, whose eyes are full of this world, and whose soul is a puny vessel full of corruption, is a man from whom we can expect nothing. Having no conscience, he is liable to cheat, to thieve, to be depraved, immoral, and——"

"Liar!"

The lecturer was startled. His cheeks became white in the gaslight; and he involuntarily took two steps backwards to the small table. Several times he vainly endeavored to force words from his dry tongue and lips.

A sudden silence had swept upon the assembly. For a few seconds there was a dead stillness, and again came the sharp, but cold and cynical voice, cutting through the silence like the swish of a sword, "Liar!"

All eyes looked to the back of the hall. A young man had risen from his seat under the gallery, and was standing, with his hands in his pockets, looking with a quiet, pleasant smile at the discomfiture of the preacher.

The big, burly individual, who, to all appearances at least, occupied the position of chairman, rose patronisingly from his chair; but one look from the interrupter crumpled him up, and he subsided to his former attitude of imbecility.

Again there were some moments of chilling silence; and, obviously, the lecturer was becoming more and more intellectually benumbed. The congregation sat agape, their minds made utterly useless by the strangeness of the situation. Never before had their little Bethel been so desecrated. Never before had the Lord been so ungracious as to permit such a monstrous occurrence. Never before had their peaceful prayer and praise received such an awful shock. It was a new experience, and they were, seemingly, quite incapable of dealing with it. They sat, like so many human dolls, wonderstruck, awaiting, perhaps, the divine guidance that did not transpire.

Once again the cold, sharp voice broke the quietness, this time adorned with a studiedly polished sarcasm.

"I say you are a liar, a scheming, miserable, and foolish liar. Have you anything to reply in refutation of my deliberate accusation?"

The preacher at length found the power to rescue his voice from the clutches of the phenomenal, and hissed, or rather spluttered, between his quivering lips, "Put him out."

But there was no movement on the part of his audience. They had not yet recovered from their vapid wonderment. They were still gazing in mute helplessness at the young man. With a bright smile he looked round, and bowing to the chairman, he replied, "It is quite unnecessary, I am going.

He lifted his cap from the seat, and quietly left the pew. Without a sound he reached the door, which he noiselessly opened and closed. He was gone: or rather, in religious language, materially he had disappeared, but spiritually he remained. His quiet smile, the fresh young face, the strong, cold, reprimanding voice, and the few words he had used, prolonged the silence after the door had closed behind him. He had left an antagonistic influence within the sacred tabernacle.

Something had happened. God did not seem to be so near now. The appealing, friendly presence of the Lord Jesus Christ had, in some unaccountable manner, taken a second seat to the young man of the modern world. The Holy Ghost had been diddled of he, she, or its pre-eminence; but the people were blissfully unconscious of a blank in their lives.

The text had been of the adulterated milk variety. Peculiarly enough, to those who could remember it, it seemed tame and stale beside the word "liar." The preacher's remarks, too, had become thin. Not that anyone in the tabernacle was able distinctly to recollect them in units; but they appeared, in their totality, like a blotch on a landscape, such as we sometimes see when we turn from facing the sun. Out of this confusion, or rather ending it, was the straight, clear, determinate idea, embodied in the word "liar."

The solemnity and hush and quietude generally associated with the house of prayer had changed its character. It was the difference between faith and doubt, between ignorance and the demand for knowledge, between weakness and strength. Minds that had been lulled to sleep seemed to be awakening. An electric thrill of life, a sense of vigor, as if charging the very atmosphere with an unaccustomed vitality, gave one the dim impression of the early convolutions in the growth of strength.

The idea of the building being the dwelling place of the Lord of Hosts had faded like a coward's courage before a man's unassuming assertion of his manliness. Holiness had evanished. The happiness of a cheery smile always evaporates holiness; which probably proves the unnaturalness of that wonderful condition which springs from the love of God. Amazement had overthrown worship. Mental genuflexion, or mental somnolence, was resolving itself into uprightness. These people were worshipers no longer, for a word had played the hat trick with the God, Son, and Holy Ghost Co., Ltd. The young man had temporarily evicted them from the House of Prayer; which may prove to some disgracefully Pagan minds that permanency of residence is somewhat of an assumption in this respect.

Wonderment still deleted character from the faces of the congregation; but eyes were beginning to show new lights.

Thought, the great purifier, the broom that sweeps superstition from the present and future into the dust-heaps of the past, was beginning to realise itself. Questions were coming into the minds of these people. They moved restlessly in their seats. For the first time, maybe, there was a desire to get outside. The tabernacle had become too small for some of them. They wished for fresh air. Were they slaves? Did the young man speak truthfully? Were they accusing falsely? What if they were all liars?

A man's voice murmured something. But the preacher managed to control himself sufficiently to guard against an outbreak of the restlessness. "Let us pray," he said stridently. And he prayed. But his prayer was not a success. This was, of course, to be expected; for had not the very presence presumably of an Atheist turned off the supply of divine wisdom at the fountain-head, and had, in truth, cut off the connection between the Heavenly Father and his sinful apostle? And so, after several shambling sentences relating to God's eternal presence amongst us, guiding, supporting, protecting us here upon earth, he abruptly brought the meeting to a close, and the congregation dispersed.

There is no moral. A word did it.

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON JAN. 2.

The President, Mr. G. W. Foote, occupied the chair. There were also present: Messrs. Barry, Bowman, Cohen, Cowell, Davey, Davidson, Greyton, Heaford, Leat, Lloyd, Lazarnick, Neate, Nichols, Quinton, Rosetti, Samuels, Silverstein, Schindle, Thurlow, Wood, Miss Kough, and Miss Stanley.

The Minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed. The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were received for the Liverpool Branch and the Parent Society.

The Secretary reported receipt of a letter from Leeds, giving details of the hearing of the charge of profanity against Mr. Jackson on December 31.

The President pointed out that this was a fresh attack on Freethinkers, not under the Blasphemy Laws, but under the Police Clauses Act dealing with Profanity, which could not have been intended to apply to such cases at the time of passing the Act.

After further questions the following resolution was moved:—

> "That this Executive protests against the continued use of the Police Clauses Act for the prosecution of Freethought lecturers for 'profanity' on account of arbitrarily selected sentences in public addresses, which never could have been contemplated when the said Act was passed, thus avoiding the odium of proceeding against such speakers in the proper and legitimate way under the 'Blasphemy' Law, and making the indulgence of Christian bigotry comparatively safe and easy by raising the minimum of sympathy with the victims of persecution."

It was further resolved that in the event of Mr. Jackson's family being in need during his imprisonment the Society would be prepared to render assistance.

The resolution proposed at the Annual Conference by the Wood Green Branch to call a half-yearly meeting of members of the Society in London was discussed, and the Secretary instructed to arrange for such a meeting to be held during the first week in March.

The President reported that the members of the deputation who waited upon the L.C.C. Committee had resolved to wait for the decision of the L.C.C. General Purposes Committee, until the meeting to be held by that body in the middle of January had taken place.

The Secretary reported that Mr. A. B. Moss had notified her of his retirement from outdoor work, he having spoken continuously for thirty-six years, but that he would be prepared to speak occasionally indoors, his enthusiasm for the cause being as great as ever.

The Secretary was instructed to forward to Mr. Moss the following resolution:—

> "That this Executive, while regretting that Mr. A. B. Moss has decided to do no more open-air Freethought lecturing, desires to thank him in the name of the Freethought movement generally for his long and valuable service in the outdoor lecture field, and hopes his voice may still be heard for many years in other ways of propaganda."

Mr. Quinton suggested that a further invitation to members to avail themselves of the Scholarship Scheme should be given through the columns of the Freethinker.

The Secretary reported an innovation in the arrangements for the Annual Dinner.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

Obituary.

We regret to report the death of Mr. John Francis Martin, of 30 Hunstmoor-road, Wandsworth, which took place on Tuesday, December 31, 1912. Mr. Martin was a convinced Freethinker, and for about thirty years rendered valuable service as a member of the Battersea Branch of the N.S.S. It is comforting to think that he died in the faith to the service of which he had devoted his life. On Saturday, January 4, he was buried in the Wandsworth Cemetery, when a Secular Service was conducted at the graveside. We tender his sorrowing family our sincere sympathy.—J. T. L.

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—No. 3 SUNDAY, JANUARY 19, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Deafness is not to be healed by breaking the head, nor blindness by pulling the eyes out: it is time the doctors should try new experiments; if they will not, it is time that the patients should try new doctors.—LANDOR.

The Logic of Persecution.

NEITHER the cruelty of tyrants, nor the ambition of conquerors, has wrought so much mischief and suffering as the principle of persecution. The crimes of a Nero, the ravages of an Attila, afflict the world for a season, and then cease and are forgotten, or only linger in the memory of history. But persecution operates incessantly like a natural force. With the universality of light, it radiates in every direction. The palace is not too proud for its entrance, nor is the cottage too humble. It affects every relationship of life. Its action is exhibited in public through imprisonment, torture, and bloodshed, and in private through the tears of misery and the groans of despair.

But worse remains. Bodies starve and hearts break, but at last there comes "the poppied sleep, the end of all." Grief is buried in the grave, Nature covers it with a mantle of grass and flowers, and the feet of joy trip merrily over the paths once trodden by heavy-footed care. Yet the more subtle effects of persecution remain with the living. They are not screwed down in the coffin and buried with the dead. They become part of the pestilential atmosphere of cowardice and hypocrisy which saps the intellectual manhood of society, so that bright-eyed inquiry sinks into blear-eyed faith, and the rich vitality of active honest thought falls into the decrepitude of timid and slothful acquiescence.

What is this principle of persecution, and how is it generated and developed in the human mind? Now that it is falling into discredit, there is a tendency on the part of Christian apologists to ascribe it to our natural hatred of contradiction. Men argue and quarrel, and if intellectual differences excite hostility in an age like this, how easy it was for them to excite the bitterest animosity in more ignorant and barbarous ages! Such is the plea now frequently advanced. No doubt it wears a certain plausibility, but a little investigation will show its fallacy. Men and women are so various in their minds, characters, circumstances, and interests, that if left to themselves they inevitably form a multiplicity of ever-shifting parties, sects, fashions, and opinions; and while each might resent the impertinence of disagreement from its own standard, the very multiformity of the whole mass must preserve a general balance of fair play, since every single sect with an itch for persecuting would be confronted by an overwhelming majority of dissidents. It is obvious, therefore, that persecution can only be indulged in when some particular form of opinion is in the ascendant: and if this form is artificially developed; if it is the result, not of knowledge and reflection, but of custom and training; if, in short, it is rather a superstition than a belief; you have a condition of things highly favorable to the forcible suppression of heresy. Now, throughout history, there is one great form of opinion which has been artificially developed, which has been accepted through faith and not through study, which has always been concerned with alleged occurrences in the remote past or the inaccessible future, and which has also been systematically maintained in its "pristine purity" by an army of teachers who have pledged themselves to inculcate the ancient faith without any admixture of their own intelligence.

That form of opinion is Religion. Accordingly we should expect to find its career always attended with persecution, and the expectation is amply justified by a cursory glance at the history of every faith. There is, indeed, one great exception; but, to use a popular though inaccurate phrase, it is an exception which proves the rule. Buddhism has never persecuted. But Buddhism is rather a philosophy than a religion; or, if a religion, it is not a theology, and that is the sense attached to religion in this article.

All such religions have persecuted, do persecute, and will persecute while they exist. Let it not be supposed, however, that they punish heretics on the open ground that the majority must be right and the minority must be wrong, or that some people have a right to think while others have only the right to acquiesce. No, that is too shameless an avowal; nor would it, indeed, be the real truth. There is a principle in religions which has always been the sanction of persecution, and if it be true, persecution is more than right, it is a duty. That principle is Salvation by Faith.

If a certain belief is necessary to salvation, if to reject it is to merit damnation, and to undermine it is to imperil the eternal welfare of others, there is only one course open to its adherents; they must treat the heretic as they would treat a viper. He is a poisonous creature to be swiftly extinguished. But not too swiftly, for he has a soul that may still be saved. Accordingly he is sequestered to prevent further harm, an effort is made to convert him, then he is punished, and the rest is left with God. That his conversion is attempted by torture, either physical or mental, is not an absurdity; it is consonant to the doctrine of salvation by faith. For if God punishes or rewards us according to our possession or lack of faith, it follows that faith is within the power of will. Accordingly the heretic, to use Dr. Martineau's expression, is reminded not of arguments but of motives, not of evidence but of fear, not of proofs but of perils, not of reasons but of ruin. When we recognise that the understanding acts independently of volition, and that the threat of punishment, while it may produce silence or hypocrisy, cannot alter belief, this method of procedure strikes us as a monstrous imbecility; but, given a belief in the doctrine of salvation by faith, it must necessarily appear both logical and just. If the heretic will not believe, he is clearly wicked, for he rejects the truth and insults God. He has deliberately chosen the path to hell, and does it matter whether he travel slowly or swiftly to his destination? But does it not matter whether he go alone or drag down others with him to perdition? Such was the logic of the Inquisitors, and although their cruelties must be detested their consistency must be allowed.

Catholics have an infallible Church, and the Protestants an infallible Bible. Yet as the teaching of the Bible becomes a question of interpretation, the infallibility of each Church resolves itself into the infallibility of its priesthood. Each asserts that some belief is necessary to salvation. Religious liberty, therefore, has never entered into the imagination of either. The Protestants who revolted against the Papacy openly avowed the principle of persecution. Luther, Beza, Calvin, and Melancthon, were probably more intolerant than any Pope of their age; and if the Protestant persecutions were not, on the whole, so sanguinary as those of the Roman Cathelic Church, it was simply due to the fact that Catholicism passed through a dark and ferocious period of history, while Protestantism emerged in an age of greater light and humanity. Persecution cannot always be bloody, but it always inflicts on heretics as much suffering as the sentiment of the community will tolerate.

The doctrine of salvation by faith has been more mischievous than all other delusions of theology combined. How true are the words of Pascal: "Jamais on ne fait le mal si pleinement et si gaiement que quand on le fait par un faux principe de conscience." Fortunately a nobler day is breaking. The light of truth succeeds the darkness of error. Right belief is infinitely important, but it cannot be forced. Belief is independent of will. But character is not, and therefore the philosopher approves or condemns actions instead of censuring beliefs. Theology, however, consistently clings to its old habits. "Infidels" must not be argued with but threatened, not convinced but libelled; and when these weapons are futile there ensues the persecution of silence. That serves for a time, but only for a time; it may obstruct, but it cannot prevent, the spread of unbelief. It is like a veil against the light. It may obscure the dawn to the dull-eyed and the uninquisitive, but presently the blindest sluggards in the penfolds of faith will see that the sun has risen.

G. W. FOOTE.

The Culture of the Supernatural.

IN the course of a recent lecture I had occasion to refer to "easily recognisable pathological and sexual elements in religious development," and added that a deal of what the world had taken as proofs of inspiration and illumination could be explained in this way. I gave at the time some illustrations of what I meant. Since then one of my audience has written asking if I would be good enough to explain myself further. The writer also refers me for proofs of "cases of genuine illumination" to the late Professor James's Varieties of Religious Experience, a work that is receiving continuous laudation in the religious press—which is almost enough to damn its character as a scientific production. I have no objection whatever to explaining more fully the position taken up in the lecture referred to, particularly as "mysticism"—of a kind—plays a large part in what is called advanced religious teaching. These deliverances are more noticeable for their misty than for their mystical character, as in general they achieve unintelligibility and mistake it for profundity. The genuine mystics of old were not unintelligible. One knew what they meant, even though one did not agree with their meaning. The meaning of the modern Christian mystic is not only difficult—often impossible—to discover, but in nine out of ten cases it is worthless when it is discovered.

Regular readers of the Freethinker will perhaps recall that some years ago I gave a number of elaborate proofs of the play of pathologic and perverted sexual elements in religious phenomena. I have no intention of repeating those proofs now—only giving a summary, with no more than the necessary proofs of this position. And this may be done by way of criticism of Professor James's book—a work with which I am perfectly familiar, and which I regard as one of the most extraordinary pieces of religious yellow journalism ever put forward by a front rank writer. As a scientific study, the book is simply worthless. It can help no one to understand the phenomena; it only provides them with a catalogue of cases, useful enough for preacher and religious writer, and of which both have made good use.

Let us take, for example, a passage in which Professor James attacks what I may briefly call the pathologic study of religion. He says, "Few conceptions are less instructive than this re-interpretation of religion as perverted sexuality"; and, proceeding on the assumption that this interpretation is based solely on the use of amorous language by religious devotees, he points out religious literature is full of similes drawn from eating and drinking; and so one might as reasonably call religion a disorder of the digestive organs. Or, again, the Bible is full of the language of respiratory oppression, and one might call religion a disease of the respiratory organs. And against the statement that active interest in religion synchronises with adolescence, he retorts that increased interest in art, chemistry, etc., likewise synchronises with adolescence, and might with equal justice be put down to a perversion of the sexual instinct.*

Now, this is excellent fooling, but it is really little else. No one has ever claimed either that religion took its origin in sexuality, normal or abnormal, or that this alone will provide an explanation of historical religion. All that is claimed is that a great deal of so-called religious feeling, past and present, can be shown to be due to unsatisfied or perverted sexuality—which is a very different statement indeed. Between saying that certain feelings are wrongly interpreted in terms of an already existing idea, and saying that the idea is nothing but the feelings transformed, there is a vital and important difference. In every case the religious idea is taken for granted. The origin of that idea is quite a different line of inquiry. But once the idea is in existence there is always the possibility of people finding evidence of its truth in a quite wrong direction.

The analogy of the digestive and respiratory organs is clever, but futile. For the belief that much that passes for religious fervor is merely perverted sexual feeling is not based merely upon the language employed. This is only symptomatic. The language of respiration and digestion when used in connection with religion is frankly and palpably symbolic. The language of sexual love in the same connection is often frankly literal, and can be correlated with the actual state of the person using it. Digestion and respiration must go on in any case. But it is precisely the point at issue whether with a different sexual life these so-called religious ecstatic states would have been experienced. When we find religious characters of strongly marked amorous disposition, but condemned to a physically ascetic life, using towards the object of their religious adoration terms usually associated with strong sexual feeling, it does not seem very difficult to see here something more than the use of symbolic language. Would the mediæval monk have experienced temptations from Satan in the form of beautiful women had he been happily married? Would Santa Teresa or Saint Catherine have used the language they did use of their relations with Jesus had they been wives and mothers? I hardly think that Professor James would have answered such an inquiry in the affirmative. At any rate, it is curious that such visions did not appear to, nor were such expressions used, nor such feelings experienced by those who were married and living a normal life.

Again, it may be quite true that adolescence brings with it an awakening of the whole mental life, not of religion alone. But the analogy goes no further, and, at all events, it begs the question at issue. The interest in art, in science, in literature, or in sociology, are ends in themselves, and one need go no further than the developing mental life for an explanation. But here the question is whether the interest shown in religion is or is not due to a misdirection of a growing mental, sexual, and social life? A developing interest in the larger social life is common to all. An interest in religion only exists with some—only with those whose natures have received this special inclination. Meanwhile, those who do not evince this interest in religion show no lack of anything—save the use of religious terms. In every respect they exhibit the same qualities as their fellows, and show the same feelings. The only discernible difference is that, while adolescent nature is expressed in the one case in terms of religion, in the other case it is expressed in terms of a larger social life. The problem might be put thus: Given a generation not taught to express its growing life in terms of religion, could satisfactory expression be found in the social life to which adolescence is an introduction? I believe it could and would. Moreover, I maintain that from this point of view modern religion is no more than an exploitation of man's social nature. At any rate, this is the essential question at issue, and yet Professor James never once, in the whole of his over 500 pages, addresses himself to it.

Further, there is the question of the relation between nervous diseases and religious illumination. How far has the one been mistaken for the other? To what extent have people accepted states of mind, purely pathologic in origin, as proofs of intercourse with an unseen spiritual world? That this idea is general among uncivilised people there is not the slightest doubt. And when we bear in mind the dense ignorance that until quite recently prevailed concerning the relations between mental states and the nervous system, when we remember that in all ages and places insanity and epilepsy have been counted as of supernatural origin, that fasting, solitary brooding, and self-torture have been taken as paths of celestial illumination, no one can possibly dispute the connection between a sense of religious conviction and pathological conditions.

The connection is, indeed, too obvious, to be even ignored. Professor James says that "we cannot possibly ignore these pathological aspects of the subject." Unfortunately, so far as attempting to explain them goes, he completely ignores them. The whole of his book consists of a throwing at the head of the reader a mass of "religious experiences" without any serious attempt at explanation. It is a glorified revival meeting in an expensive volume. No wonder it has been welcomed by preachers as an "epoch marking work." The testimony of a crowd of religious enthusiasts of all ages is accepted at practically face value. Thus, a religious writer who interprets the fairly common feeling of exaltation during a storm at sea, and explains his carelessness of danger as resulting from his "certainty of eternal life" (p. 288) is gravely cited as evidence of the workings of the religious consciousness. What, then, are we to make of those who have similar feelings, but who are without a certainty of eternal life? The declaration of St. Ignatius that a single hour of meditation taught him more of the truth of "heavenly things than all the teachings of the doctors," is given as one of the evidences of mystic illumination (p. 410). So are numerous other cases. Even the effects of nitrous oxide and ether is cited for its power to "stimulate the mystic consciousness to an extraordinary degree" (p. 387). There is really no reason why the same claim should not be made on behalf of whisky.

The use made by Professor James of his long list of cases is the more remarkable, since he points out, quite correctly, that there are no religious feelings, but only feelings directed to a religious end. But if this be so, how are we justified in taking descriptions of religious visionaries as correct accounts of the real nature of their mental states? Clearly, what we need is a study of such cases quite apart from the religious interpretation of them. Professor James does not give us such a study, he merely supplies us with a catalogue. And he is so averse to subjecting his cases to critical analysis, that when the extravagant features of certain cases are glaring, he warns us that it is unfair to impute narrowness of mind as a vice of the individual, because in "religious and theological matters he probably absorbs his narrowness from his generation" (p. 370). Granted; only one would like to know what reason there is for not deriving the virtues as well as the vices of religious leaders from the same source? And, deeper query still, may not a large part of the phenomena classed as religious admit of explanation apart from religion altogether?

C. COHEN.

The Massacre of the Innocents.

MANY Christian scholars now maintain that the birth-stories related by Matthew and Luke are unhistorical. The other evangelists and the author of the Acts never once mention them. Indeed, in John vii. 42, we learn that the people generally regarded Jesus as a native of Nazareth, a fact which some employed as an argument against his Messiahship, saying, "Hath not the Scripture said that the Christ cometh of the seed of David, and from Bethlehem, the village where David was?" It is a significant fact that in telling the birth-stories Matthew and Luke flatly contradict each other. Matthew says that almost immediately after the birth Joseph was commanded in a dream to "take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt," where they were to remain as long as Herod lived; but Luke assures us that when the parents "had accomplished all things that were according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee." Luke knows nothing of the flight to Egypt and the massacre of the innocents, while Mark and John are equally ignorant even of the birth at Bethlehem. It follows from all this that the massacre of the innocents, described by Matthew (ii. 16), never took place at all, though there was nothing in Herod's character to prevent the commission of such a crime. And yet, whilst there is no evidence that Herod slaughtered all the male children of Bethlehem, from two years old and under, it is absolutely undeniable that Christianity, throughout its entire history, has been guilty of perpetuating itself by the metaphorical massacre of the innocents. Apart from this dark crime it would have died in its own infancy; and if this cruel offence were to be discontinued to-day, it is beyond doubt that in a few generations Christianity would only be an unhallowed memory. Of this its champions are perfectly aware, and knowing it they do not hesitate, they are even devoutly eager, to sacrifice the children. It is this alone that accounts for their bitter hostility to the policy of Secular Education and for their lamentation and mourning over decaying Sunday-schools. The children must be offered up or the Churches will cease to be.

In the Saturday Review for December 21, there is an article, entitled "The Children's Festival," from the pen of the Rev. Dr. J. Neville Figgis, in which Christmas is enthusiastically hailed as the child's peculiar possession. "Children have no special place at the other festivals," says Dr. Figgis, but "Christmas will always be theirs." The meaning of Christmas for the child, according to this divine, is summed up in the well-known couplet—

> "Jesus, who lived above the sky,
> Came down to be a man and die."

Dr. Figgis declares that "probably the child enters more readily than his elders into this notion of Christmas," which, if true, is not very complimentary to the elders. As a matter of fact, the child never enters into that notion of Christmas at all. Neither to the child nor to his elders does the so-called incarnation of the second person in the Holy Trinity bear the least intelligible meaning, and to speak of it as a fact is sheer mockery. It is indeed comparatively easy to persuade children to believe in it, and to sing the quoted couplet with emotional delight; but they get to believe in it alone on the testimony of those who are supposed to know all about it. They naturally take it for granted that their parents and teachers, whom they trust and revere, thoroughly understand the whole subject, and that the time is coming when they shall understand too. They cannot think it out; they can only believe what they are told about it. Now, is it not the most cruel abuse possible of their filial trust thus to treat them? The conviction, of course, is that unless they acquire the habit of believing before they are able to think they will never believe at all; and no conviction could be truer. Ignorance is the only soil in which faith can take roots and grow; and the natural tendency of all serious thinking is to weaken faith, and to end in uprooting it altogether.

But why should children be taught to believe that—

> "Jesus, who lived above the sky,
> Came down to be a man and die"?

What good comes of such a belief? In our opinion, no good at all, but much genuine harm, comes of it; and to instil it into the minds of children, prior to the awakening of their reason, is to degrade them. Dr. Figgis, however, thinks differently. He looks upon the birth-stories in Matthew and Luke, not only as true, but as indispensable to human nature. The purport of these stories is to show that Jesus was something more than human, and our divine ventures upon the assertion that "unless Jesus Christ was something more than human, men in general become less." But this is a mere dogmatic assertion, without a single fact adduced in support of it. Were men in general less than human before Jesus came? Are men in general less than human in China, India, or Japan? The assertion is so absurd and preposterous that one wonders how any man in his senses can make it. Dr. Figgis is bold enough to assure us that modern thought is now gradually veering round to renewed belief in it. He claims that there are many to whom the superhuman elements in the Christian faith prove "a great attraction." He says:—

> "They feel that the obstacles on the side of science are not what they were at one time thought to be; indeed, that the 'whole mechanical theory of the world is on its trial.' There is proceeding among us what has been well termed a 'renaissance of the supernatural.' The child motif is coming back into the world."

The reverend gentleman is a gigantic idealiser. The facts are all against him. The trend is in the opposite direction. There are doubtless times when Dr. Figgis himself lugubriously admits it. It is more than probable that we still "live in the world to which T. H. Green lectured." Science, at any rate, is just as materialistic in its terminology as it ever was. Dr. Chalmers Mitchell is not more friendly towards the supernatural than was Professor Tyndall, and Sir Ray Lankester is no less attached to the mechanistic view of the Universe than was Charles Darwin in his old age. Will Dr. Figgis have the kindness to inform us in what part of the world, or in what department of science or of life "the renaissance of the supernatural" is proceeding?

We happen to be among those to whom "the story of the birth and death of Jesus and 'faith in his blood' will be now, as always, midsummer madness"; but in his description of us Dr. Figgis is guilty of gross misrepresentation. It is false to say that we reject Christ because we hate or dislike him. Many of us do not even believe that he ever lived, and those of us who do, reject him, not because we dislike him personally, but because we totally disapprove of the religious system of which he is supposed to be the founder. We reject him in the same way as we reject Mohammed, or any other great exponent of supernaturalism. We are not Christians simply because we are convinced that Christianity is not true. This was true even of Nietzsche. He opposed the Christian morality not because he hated it, but because he regarded it as morality only fit for slaves. That he did hate it is true enough; but his hatred of it was not the cause, but the result, of his firm conviction that it is false. We hoped the time was past for taunting unbelievers in that cowardly and dishonest fashion, but Dr. Figgis has undeceived us. It is perfectly true that we have no sense of sin from which the Cross can deliver us, and that we have "neither belief nor interest in any way of life which is mainly dependent on the reality of the other world"; but it is positively false to represent us as being governed by low ideals and base ambitions.

Now, it is beyond controversy that there is a growing number of people who no longer believe in the Christian religion, who are persuaded that it has done incalculable harm in the world, and that the world would advance much more rapidly and healthily were it swept clean out of the way. This being the case, there is no getting away from the fact that Christianity is an open question, a debatable subject, and that we are all called upon to examine it with care, and to come to a conclusion with regard to it, of which our reason will fully approve. Dr. Figgis says that "liberty of speech is now our custom and that people will frankly repudiate what they no longer admire"; but he does not seem to realise that the existence of thousands upon thousands of people who "frankly repudiate" Christianity as false should open the eyes of believers to the utter injustice and cruelty of the present custom of forcing it down the throats of little children before they have acquired the art of thinking for themselves. The present system of religious education is fundamentally wrong and egregiously unjust in that it involves a wicked exploitation of the filial instincts, a cowardly abuse of the trusting disposition, which is so beautiful a feature of child-life. It has doomed multitudes of children to a lifelong slavery, from which only a few ever succeed in emancipating themselves. At first, no child takes kindly either to religious beliefs or to religious practices. It takes a long time to manufacture an earnest believer out of a healthy child full of animal spirits, and in many instances the work is never completed. We are continually meeting with adults who confess that in spite of the zeal and assiduity of their parents and others, they never really believed; and a large measure of their hatred of Christianity is the outcome of the attempt to force them into acceptance of it in their childhood. Why not leave them alone? The admission that if they are not taught to believe in their childhood days they are not likely to believe at all, shows that Christianity fails to commend itself to a wideawake intellect. If it were in itself believable it would appear more believable to mature age than to ignorant childhood. It cannot be denied that the majority of Christians believe in spite of the protest of their reason, just simply because they developed the habit of believing on their mothers' knees. Whole-hearted, ebulliently joyous believers are few and far between, even amongst ministers of the Gospel. If the children had justice meted out to them the Christian superstition would soon disappear.

J. T. LLOYD.

"Our Blessed Lord" on the Stage.

A GREAT deal has been written of late in the columns of various religious newspapers of the serious falling-off in church attendance, and a variety of reasons have been given to account for this alarming fact by the clergy and ministers of all denominations. They have noted, in the first place, that the observance of Sunday was dwindling away in a terrible manner. A large number of shops were open which might very well be closed on the "Lord's Day." Tobacconists, sweetstuff shops, and refreshment places of various kinds were open in every part of the great metropolis. Why could not children do without lollipops on Sunday? and as for tobacco and liquid refreshments, they were quite unnecessary on that day, and did not induce within the bosoms of those who partook of such material things that feeling of sanctity which should possess their souls on such a holy day. Also it was to be remarked that even those who attended church did not give serious attention to the sermon, and some actually had the audacity to leave the holy edifice the moment the preacher began to give out his text. All these things were undoubtedly very disconcerting to the clergy; but Canon Newbolt had recently discovered a more important fact—or at least he had been told—that "our blessed Lord is being presented on the stage in another name, and so has escaped the censor's notice." Of course, such a state of affairs is too terrible for words; but it is a fact nevertheless that the "Savior" is being presented on the stage in another name; and the censor has actually passed the play, and sees nothing objectionable in its representation.

Although I had not been to see the play in question, I made it my business, as soon as I had an evening off, to pay a visit to the Lyceum Theatre to witness a play called The Open Door, by Arthur Shirley and Benjamin Landeck. Now both of these gentlemen I had known for many years as writers of good old melodramas of the unsophisticated order, designed for the delectation of that section of the British public who take everything for granted that they see on the stage, without inquiring too closely into the probabilities of the story—always providing that it is interesting, pathetic, and amusing. But recently we have had upon our stage a number of old morality plays, and Messrs. Shirley and Landeck thought that it would be a good idea to introduce into their latest melodrama a fine figure answering to the character of the Chorus in some of our older plays, and so they boldly introduced the character of Homo into their play, The Open Door; and this was the character referred to by the worthy Canon as none other than "our blessed Lord" under another name. Now, the play itself was obviously a melodrama of the old-fashioned type, with a hero and heroine who are very cruelly persecuted, and with a cunning villain, in the person of a Russian nobleman, who is constantly at their heels with crafty devices to encompass their ruin. This play, however, differs from the ordinary run of melodramas in the fact that it has no comedy scenes and no low comedian to supply the humor or fun to lighten the more serious character of the play. The story is a very serious one, and has some substantial foundation in fact as materials for a very strong play. It is the story of the persecution of the Jews in Russia by the Christians, and the fearful torture to which they are subjected by those in authority. The hero is a young Jew in love with a young Jewess, and the Christian Count makes all kinds of serious accusations against them, so that the hero is thrown into prison; but the young heroine, under most trying circumstances, always remains faithful to him; and when the young couple are in their direst trouble, there comes the fine figure of Homo—the friend of Man, as he is called—to show them the way out. At the end of the second act one of the Russian soldiers strikes Homo on the cheek, whereupon this Savior of young Jews from the persecuting hands of cruel Christians exclaims: "You have smitten me on the one cheek; I now turn to you the other." The Russian soldier then raises his hand to strike another blow, but his arm is paralysed, and falls useless to his side. This makes what is called in theatrical language "a very effective curtain"; in other words, the curtain falls on a scene which arouses the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm. Another effective scene is where Homo and another are ordered by the Russian soldier to whip the poor persecuted heroine, and they refuse; they and a rascal of a Jew, who was prepared to betrap the hero for thirty pieces of silver—a sort of modern Judas Iscariot, in fact—are thereupon ordered to be shot. The Russian soldiers retire to the summit of a hill, and from this eminence fire upon the prisoners, all of whom fall as though killed; but, after a few strains of celestial music from the orchestra, Homo slowly rises and, with an air of spiritual triumph, slowly walks off the stage. The audience, of course, shouted themselves hoarse at this marvellous manifestation of supernatural power. But when the curtain had gone down I asked a friend who was sitting next to me whether this action meant a resurrection on the part of Homo, or whether, after all, the authors only wished to imply that the Russians were such bad shots that they could not hit such a stately figure as this alleged friend of man? The hero escapes from prison, but Homo is ever at hand through all his trials and troubles to assist him and the faithful heroine; and the last we see of them is in a beautiful scene representing the sea by night, and they are being taken from a raft on to a ship; but Homo declines to be saved, and at last we just catch a glimpse of him on the raft alone; but what becomes of him—whether he remains there at the mercy of the sea or gets off and walks to the place of landing on shore—the authors leave to the imagination of the audience.

It goes without saying that the authors have treated the subject very reverentially—especially as one of them is a Jew, and unless he has been recently converted, has no more belief in the supernatural or historical character of the Jesus of the Gospels than I have.

The play has been beautifully staged, and the acting is admirable, especially that of the character of Homo, by Mr. Halliwell Hobbes, which was full of dignity and pathos.

But, of course, such a play as this was sure to arouse conflicting ideas and feelings in the minds and hearts of the audience, and I was not at all surprised to find members of the audience discussing various points between the acts. I ventured to remark to my friend that Christians did not often turn the other cheek when smitten on the one side, and even in this play the Russian soldier, who was a Christian, was quite ready to strike Homo on the other cheek when it was turned to him; and, as a matter of historical fact, even to-day all the Christian nations were armed to the teeth to resist the slightest signs of aggression on the part of the enemy. Most of the ladies in the audience, however, were very much impressed with what they evidently regarded as the nobility of the character of Homo—and they were almost as much moved by the elevating strains of the music and the splendid scenery—as they were by the acting itself.

Such plays, although obviously written for the purpose of teaching a Christian moral, more often provoke in the minds of the observer serious doubts, and tend to make such persons Freethinkers rather than Christians. "Our Blessed Lord," in the person of Homo, has now gone on tour throughout the provinces, and no doubt a good many Freethinkers will go and see him, as well as thousands of Christians, to see what real resemblance they can find to the character of the Jesus of the Gospels.

While I am writing about this play I may as well mention another that is being performed at the Haymarket. It is called The Younger Generation, and is by Stanley Houghton. It is designed to show the absurd and narrow views of the ordinary Manchester Nonconformist—and it applies just as well to Nonconformists from other parts of this island—and no doubt would be particularly interesting to Canon Newbolt and other clergymen with broader views of human life. In any case, I found it extremely amusing, and I am quite sure that such plays go a a good way towards breaking down some of the worst barriers to human progress.

Tales of Our Times.

BY A CYNIC.

No one doubts the existence of that inscrutable power called Fashion, which dictates how one must dress in order to be "correct"—which lays down the law as to the proper color for the ties, the proper pattern for the socks, and the proper shape for the hats of its faithful votaries. But there came one memorable London season when the worshipers of the God of Fashion had their faith sorely tried, and when that reputedly omipotent deity was nearly sent toppling from his throne. For a strange epidemic of eccentricity in dress seemed suddenly to seize the whole male world of Fashion—fortunately, it did not spread to the other sex. Sartorial heresies sprang up on every side, not only in the lighter matter of ties and socks, but even in the weightier matters of the law. The fundamental tenets of the faith—the solemn cult of the top hat, the sacred mysteries of the frock coat—were set at defiance. The high priests of the religion of Fashion could neither understand nor check the movement. They could only watch it in dumb wonderment, their hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after the things that were coming on the West-end of London. Huxley has somewhere referred to the justifiable scepticism with which we should receive a declaration by anyone, however honest and truthful, that he had just seen a centaur trotting down Piccadilly; but the astonishment which such a phenomenon might be expected to arouse would have been scarcely greater than that caused by some of the abnormalities of male attire observable that season in Belgravia and Park-lane.

But the explanation came at last. After the close of the season a letter signed "Sartor" appeared in all the "society papers" in London, and it was as follows:—

> "I feel that the time has come to allay that agitation in the fashionable world for which I must confess myself solely responsible. The means whereby I have been able to achieve the unprecedented feat of upsetting the long established conventions of male attire is simply my extraordinary physical resemblance to his gracious Majesty the King. In vulgar parlance, the King and I are 'alike as two peas'—indeed, the resemblance sometimes almost deceives myself, for when I suddenly see myself reflected in a large mirror I often experience a strong impulse to lift my hat.
> "I happen to be a member of a Debating Society, and at one of our meetings the subject for discussion was, 'Are the English Upper Classes Inherently Snobbish?' I took the affirmative view, but was in a hopeless minority of one, all the other members being dead against me. Thereupon, in the heat of discussion, I undertook to prove my point, and incidentally booked numerous heavy bets on the subject.
> "My method of procedure will be readily guessed. Taking advantage of that remarkable resemblance to his Majesty the King with which nature has endowed me, I proceeded to personate him in various incongruous and bizarre outfits. For instance, one afternoon, while the King was in residence at Buckingham Palace, I strolled through St. James's Park attired in a top hat, a short lounge coat, and knickerbockers; and this soon became the only wear for fashionable strollers in that and other West-end pleasure resorts. On another occasion, borrowing a horse exactly resembling the King's favorite steed, I rode in the Row wearing a frock coat, a red tie, and a tweed cap; and next morning my example was almost universally followed by equestrians in Hyde Park. Once, when his Majesty was staying at Windsor Castle, I walked through the streets of that ancient town in a rather 'loud' checked suit, and smoking a clay pipe; and students of fashion will remember the sudden adoption of garishly colored check suits for country wear by the aristocracy, and the rage which simultaneously set in among them for smoking 'penny clays.' When, last autumn, the King was spending a week in Scotland as the guest of the Duke of Gargoyle, I visited the same locality and put up at the village inn. And one morning, when I happened to know that the King was not playing golf, I drove a ball round the well-known links near Gargoyle Castle in full Highland costume. The effect of this among golfers was rapid and quite picturesque, for thereafter no one—none at least with any pretensions to social 'tone'—thought of playing the Scottish national game that autumn except in the Scottish national garb.
> "But I need not multiply these instances. It will be sufficient to say that any costume I chose to personate his Majesty in, however eccentric, was eagerly imitated. And now, having established my contention that the English upper classes are inherently snobbish, and having won all my bets, I make this confession and retire into obscurity."

This extraordinary disclosure was, of course, received with a storm of indignation, but it had the effect of quickly putting an end to the sad vagaries of male attire in the western part of the Metropolis. Within a week of its publication, the fashionable world had returned to a state of sartorial sanity and rectitude.

Acid Drops.

Mrs. Besant has been interviewed for Great Thoughts by Mr. W. H. Seed. Referring to the time when she was an active member of the London School Board, and much occupied with social reform, he says it was the period of her life "in which many people still think she did the most good." "She is now," he adds, "out of sympathy with the leaders of the Labor movement, and she spoke to me of 'trade-union tyranny' in pretty much the same way as a member of the Free Labor Association might have done." With regard to her new "spiritual" beliefs, Mrs. Besant said she came to them by hard thinking. No doubt she fancies this is true. Many people, however, will conclude that she is mistaken. None of her changes were really original. She is a born disciple. She passed from one master to another. Bradlaugh followed others, and the Blavatsky followed Bradlaugh. And now the Blavatsky is dead she governs Mrs. Besant from the grave.

Mrs. Besant has found out what to most people is the very antithesis of the truth. She has discovered that the more torpid the brain the brighter the intelligence. "One can learn," she says, "to leave the physical body and find one's mental powers increased and not diminished." Of course one can. One sees, hears, and says wonderful things in one's dreams. That is, they seem wonderful things to the dreamer; but wideawake persons who hear them talking in their sleep generally find it is great nonsense. Coleridge and Shelley composed poems in their dreams, but they were great poets beforehand. There is nothing surprising in that.

People who can do better intellectually without their brains should get rid of them. Many go about already with only just brains enough to swear by, but Mrs. Besant believes in getting rid of them altogether. The body is a mere incumbrance to the spirit. Why, then, don't the Theosophists get rid of their bodies and regain their freedom? You never hear of any of them doing it. Not even Mrs. Besant. They like to live on, as other people do, under existing conditions. Which shows their common sense at "the sticking point."

Mrs. Besant once believed that all religions were false. She now believes that all religions are true. She was as confident then as she is now. She is as confident now as she was then. The one thing that does not change is her cocksureness; in other words, her belief in herself. That quality makes for courage. It has no necessary relation to truth.

Mr. Seed notices the "doleful prognostication" that Mrs. Besant will "eventually find her way into the Roman Catholic community." That was prognosticated more than twenty years ago. We disputed the prophecy. We said that the Catholic Church offers women only suffering and silence. Mrs. Besant could do the suffering; she could not the other thing. And we were right. At least, there is no sign, after the best part of a quarter of a century, that we were wrong.

"President Taft followed the precedent set by himself and again assisted at mass in a Catholic church on Thanksgiving day. 'The preparations for the mass,' the newspaper report says, 'were on a grander scale than ever before. The church was decorated with the silk flags of the nations representing the Pan-American Union. Cardinal Gibbons sat on a scarlet throne on the right of the altar. Near him were the Very Rev. James A. Burns, D.D., and the Rev. John T. Whelan, chaplain to the Cardinal, and Mgr. Russell.' All the cardinals have thrones; mere Presidents occupy chairs ten feet below. Mgr. Russell should have more prominent mention. He is the priest who invented the trap that caught Taft by calling the Thanksgiving mummery a 'Pan-American mass.' All the other Americas except the United States are Catholic, and their representatives would attend mass any way; but ours is the America the Church is after, and ours the President; and the Pan-American expedient seems to be working very well. Without a struggle it caught the presidential fish, one of whose species is said to be born every minute."—Truth-seeker (New York).

It is strange what a difference point of view makes! A Christian missionary, the Rev. W. A. Shedd, who has spent many years among Mohammedans, says that the missionaries suffer great temptations from a Mohammedan environment, and are often inclined to compromise with the faith they are sent to attack. By this, we suppose, is meant that when a Christian is not an irredeemable bigot he will recognise many things to admire in Islamism. But, says Mr. Shedd, the Mohammedan seldom looks on religion as a power for personal righteousness, and this is the point a Christian preacher should emphasise. On the other hand, a missionary convert to Christianity explains, in the same magazine in which Mr. Shedd's article appears, that the reason why Christianity makes so little headway against Islamism is that Mohammedans are repelled because the Christian religion does not appear to have much influence on the lives of Christians. As a private individual a Christian may be vindictive, although he may be preaching the virtues of forbearance. Obviously, what the Mohammedan is looking for is not merely a preaching of the value of personal righteousness, but its practice. And if Christians show consistency in this respect when abroad, we feel that all of them ought to be encouraged to travel.

The old monkish proverb that laborare est orare was much liked by Carlyle. We see it is used by the Rev. S. C. Carpenter in a eulogy of the Church in the English Review. Both use it as meaning that "work is worship." Martin Luther, who was nearer the days of monkery, used it in the opposite sense, as meaning that "worship (or prayer) is work." We have no doubt whatever that Luther was right. The monks had no interest in declaring that laymen were as good as themselves; the time had arrived when they felt it necessary to declare that the lazy service of the Church was as much work as the hard service of the World.

News of the "Christian charity" and "brotherly love" of the "Soldiers of the Cross" is gradually creeping into the English press—whose policy in this matter has been simply disgraceful. Here is a cutting from the Westminster Gazette of January 9:—

"DISTRESS IN SALONICA.

"The Vossische Zeitung publishes a letter from Herr Brunan, a German pastor in Salonica, in which (says a Reuter telegram from Berlin) he asks for charitable gifts. He describes the need as beyond description, and says that the Turkish inhabitants in that vilayet have been massacred in thousands and their villages burned. Untold cruelties have been committed.

"The pastor adds that it is impossible for the expelled Turks to return to their homes, as they would perish of hunger and cold. The number of those to be fed in Salonica amounts to about 30,000."

"Untold cruelties have been committed." No one can realise the full dread meaning of that sentence. We believe it will turn out eventually, when the impartial historian records the real facts of this war of the Balkan Brigands, in the name of Christ, upon the Mohammedan Turks, already battered and drained by Christian Italy, that it was one of the bloodiest and most brutal tragedies of modern times—and one of the most inexcusable.

The Vienna correspondent of the Daily Telegraph sends extracts from a long article in the greatest Hungarian journal, the Budapest Hirlap, giving new details of atrocities committed by the Christian Allies during the Balkan campaign. The following is a general list of these infamies:

"1. Slaughter of Albanians by Serbs: What the Serbs have done to the Albanians is putting all international law to ridicule. Albanian prisoners were fearfully tortured, then buried alive.

"Our Vice-Consul in Mitrovitza, Ludwig von Tahy, relates that the Servian troops slew the Albanians in masses. During the massacres of Albanians in Prizrend he himself saw Servian soldiers dragging small children into the streets, perpetrating atrocities upon them openly.

"Young girls and women were fearfully maltreated in the courtyard of the Consulate in Prizrend.

"2. Atrocities of Bulgarians and Bulgarian bands: The Bulgars murdered more than half of the Musculman population of the vilayet of Salonica—55,000 men. Only those were saved who embraced the Catholic religion. Not a single Musculman was left alive at Radovista and Avrathissar.

"Nearly 5,000 women who took refuge in the mosques in the neighborhood of Serres were burned alive at the order of the band leader, Sandansky. Hundreds of these corpses can still be seen under the ruins of the mosques of Tetova and Viterne, which were destroyed by fire.

"At Stundsha the slaughter of human beings lasted twenty days. Some 900 Musculmans were murdered, while the Bulgars slew 200 Musculmans at Toiran. In the small village of Bingoe 90 men were killed."

The writer gives particulars of alleged outrages on Jews at Salonica, and proceeds:—

"4. Greek Atrocities: Travellers from Salonica to Florina see hundreds of corpses alongside the railway line—old men, with their noses and ears cut off, corpses of women whose eyelids had been slit, and bodies of women who were hanged by their hair, can all be seen.

"Further, corpses of young men, with the heads severed from the bodies, and of infants murdered in their mothers' arms are visible."

What will the English religious newspapers say to all this? Probably nothing.

When Christians accuse Mohammedans of atrocities, although all the alleged facts come through purely partisan sources and channels, the Christian world believes them. It fits in with their preconceived notions that nearly all the good on this earth belongs to them, and nearly all the wickedness to the "heathen." But when Mohammedans accuse Christians, and still more when Christians accuse each other, of similar atrocities, the Christian world turns a deaf ear to them. It can't be true. That's settled. And they take the next business. This is the policy of the dear Daily News. "We must warn our readers," it said on Monday, "against the stream of concocted falsehoods about the conduct of the Balkan allies in the field which is being poured out from the press bureaus of Buda Pesth and Vienna. These falsehoods have been emphatically contradicted more than once by the English correspondents who were in the field with the armies." Indeed! We thought it had been a complaint from the first that war correspondents were not allowed in the field with the armies. In any case, an emphatic contradiction does not disprove a specific detailed charge. And just see what the Daily News argument comes to. You mustn't believe that Christians could be cruel to Mohammedans, but you may believe that Christians can accuse each other, without the slightest evidence, of the most abominable crimes. For, after all, it is Christians who run the "press bureaus of Buda Pesth and Vienna," and "concoct" all those falsehoods about the Balkan allies. This is saving them on the one side by giving them away on the other.

We don't understand it. William Nicholas Miller, aged seventy-four, a retired Canadian barrister, was worshiping at the Christian Science Church, Curzon-street, Mayfair, when he died suddenly of heart disease. "Natural death" was the jury's verdict, but it should have been "mental incapacity." All he had to do as a Christian Scientist was to think he had no heart disease, and to think he wasn't dead. He didn't think hard enough. That was the trouble.

An interesting and apparently fair-minded article is published in the Methodist Times for January 9 on "How Londoners spend Sunday." It deals with the West End only, and is written by Mr. H. Elmore—a clergyman, we fancy, but are not sure on that point. Mr. Elmore paid visits to a number of picture palaces and restaurants, and his comments on what he saw are instructive. First, the restaurants. The one he entered was filled with a well-dressed middle-class crowd of both sexes. Music was provided, and from the remarks overheard, the people seemed to take a genuine interest in listening to the selections given. It was, he says, a merry, light-hearted crowd, the people had probably spent the afternoon in the parks, and then dropped in for tea. Many sat for a couple of hours listening to the music. In the hands of professional purity-mongers of the F. B. Meyer type, there would probably have been seen a good deal of incipient or open ill-conduct, with a poorly concealed gloating over the presence of questionable female characters. Mr. Elmore saw nothing and heard nothing that was objectionable.

Mr. Elmore next paid a visit to a National Sunday League concert. "It is a highly respectable crowd," and the concert was "a high-class one." In a picture palace, next visited, the pictures are "popular and good," each "so far as good taste is concerned is unimpeachable." In another, described by someone as "rather bad," the pictures "are of the same class—there is the same absence of objectionable features." As to the audiences, Mr. Elmore says: "In both these picture palaces I take particular notice, so far as I can observe, of the behavior of the youth of both sexes. In the first, described as 'rather bad,' I neither see any indecorous behavior, nor hear a word that should not be spoken." In the second the same state of things prevails. The only difference noted was that in one place the audience was of a poorer class than that which patronised the other. Unobjectionable pictures and a well-behaved audience. No one should ask for more, and there seems no room for complaint.

But some complaint has to be made, and having described fairly what he saw, Mr. Elmore adds: "Thus it is on a Sunday evening in the West End. One and all, men and women, in a tainted atmosphere, sipping the cup of Pleasure, soiling their souls, and destroying their bodies." In the name of all that is reasonable, how? How can people soil their souls and destroy their bodies listening to music, "correct, of good class, and tastefully played," looking at pictures with an "absence of objectionable features," and exhibiting meanwhile behavior and speech that gave no room for hostile criticism? Mr. Elmore could not have reported more favorably had he been writing of church or chapel congregations. Would those "youth of both sexes" have been better employed if they had been idling in the streets? For our own part, we deny that they would have been better employed had they been in either church or chapel. Mr. Elmore's only objection is that they were not at church. Well, no one can prevent their going if they feel that way inclined. And if they are not inclined, why repeat this meaningless rubbish about soiling their souls and destroying their bodies? It is a pity that Mr. Elmore should end an unprejudiced report of what he actually saw and heard with such a stupid comment.

The managers of the Metropolitan Telephone Service have issued a notice to the girls in their employ warning them of the danger of speaking to any stranger in the streets or in public places, and telling them, should such a thing occur, to go as quickly as possible and report to the nearest policeman. We wonder whether these people really imagine that a girl is in any danger from any man who happens to speak to her in the streets or in a public place. And we wonder what impression an intelligent Chinaman, or Turk, or Japanese will form of the morality of a Christian city where such notices are deemed necessary. Above all, what a glorious commentary it is upon the civilising and moralising influence of the Christian religion. A.D. 1913, and this is what we have to show! Could things have been worse without Christianity?

Lord Haldane announces that Education is the next great question which the Government is going to take in hand. The whole system is to be reorganised from top to bottom. Well, we have heard something like that before. The present Government has brought in several Education Bills already and every one has come to grief. They have all been wrecked on the rock of religious instruction. How will the next fare any better—unless the Government adopts the principle of Disestablishment, and goes in boldly for Secular Education. That is the only way to success.

Sir J. Compton Rickett warns Nonconformists that the only way in which a "complete solution of the education problem" can be obtained during the life of the present Parliament is by consent. By this he means that Churchmen and Nonconformists must arrive at some sort of a compromise that will give each party something of what they desire. And this means that a form of religious instruction must be agreed on between the two principal divisions of the Christian Church in this country, with regard to its effect on those who are not Christians. We are so used to the impertinence of Christians in counting themselves as the only people in the community that matters, that we have ceased to be either surprised or annoyed at its manifestations. All the same, we can assure Sir J. Compton Rickett that if a miracle could be performed, and rival bodies of Christians agree on a compromise and keep it, there is a large and growing body of public opinion that would protest against the exploitation of State schools in the interest of Church and Chapel, and which would still work for a more equitable adjustment of affairs. There is, in fact, only "one complete solution of the education problem," and that is for the State to leave religion severely alone, and let those parents who wish their children to be taught religion to get it in whatever manner they and the clergy can devise between them.

The Methodist Times also treats us to a Nonconformist "chestnut" in connection with the same subject. "Free Churchmen," it says, "stand for the complete emancipation of the teachers who are appointed and maintained by the State from ecclesiastical tests and conditions of appointment." There is only one word that fits such a statement, and that is "bunkum." Free Churchmen only stand for the protection of teachers who are Nonconformists against the sectarianism of the Church of England. But what of those teachers who belong to neither religious camp? What chance would a known Atheist receive of getting appointed to the head-mastership of a Council school where the majority of the members of the Council are Nonconformists? The plain truth is that you cannot avoid religious tests—official or unofficial—so long as any form of religion is taught in the State schools. The only difference is that in the one case the test is open and above-board; in the other case it is concealed. So long as religion is in the schools it is idle to expect that teachers will be appointed without regard to their opinions on matters of religion. We do not think there is a responsible teacher in the country who will not agree with us on this point. And we have no doubt that the Methodist Times is as well aware of the fact as we. The bigot who denies one liberty in the name of duty we can respect, but the bigot who puts one in fetters in the name of freedom is enough to make decent people vomit.

Thomas H. C. McNeil, founder of a Red Cross boys' club in Everton, was sent to gaol at Liverpool on January 10 for eighteen months' with hard labor for obtaining goods by false pretences. It transpired that he had spent over twenty years in penal servitude for fraud carried out chiefly under the cloak of religion. There is no moral. He was not a Freethinker.

It is rumored that the Congregationalists are going to join the Baptists. Query—in the water tank?

Reporting a sermon by the Rev. J. Campbell Morgan, the British Weekly notes that when the preacher said that "the man who says cheerily 'I am an Agnostic' is a fool," the Rev. Mr. Rattenbury and Mrs. Hugh Price Hughes "exchanged a swift smile of decisive assent." We don't know that we should easily recognise that kind of a smile if we came across it, but we are quite ready to believe that any number of preachers would agree with the sentiment. And doubtless when such giants in the intellectual world as this trio agree, the poor Agnostic ought to sharply reconsider his position. On the other hand, it is possible that the Agnostic may reflect that the folly of preachers of this class looking down on men of the stamp of Darwin and Spencer is only equalled by its impertinence, and he may further decide that both folly and impertinence are always at home in the pulpit.

We see from an address by the Bishop of Zululand that the color problem there is beginning to assume some of the features of the color problem of the United States. In Zululand, the white Christian will not go to communion with the black one, and the Bishop, apparently, does not see why he should. The brotherhood between Christians, he says, is a spiritual brotherhood, but it does not follow that they are sworn friends. And so the Bishop's advice is to let things alone, and black and white will each find their own place. We suppose they will, but we do not see what help "spiritual brotherhood" is going to be. The Englishman's claim to "wallop his own nigger" has not prevented his admitting a "spiritual brotherhood," but, on the other hand, the "spiritual brotherhood" has never prevented the walloping, so we quite fail to see what benefit the wallopee derives from his relation to the walloper. The long and the short of it is that Christianity in Zululand will no more help the native than it has helped the negro in the United States. The Bishop has come to England for the purpose of collecting £4 000. The future relations between Black and White he is content to leave in the hands of God. The collection of the money he will attend to personally.

The dear Daily News follows the Daily Mirror in giving its circulation daily. The latter also gives an accountant's certificate. We don't notice one in the case of the former.

It is usually said that religion makes men moral, and that, in fact, whether it be true or false, it forms an excellent safeguard, a sort of police regulation and disciplinary corrective. A simple glance at history will suffice to show how utterly baseless is such an assertion. One can say without exaggeration that the most religious times and the most religious peoples, or those in which or among whom the power of the Church has been the strongest, have, generally speaking, been the most immoral.—Ludwig Buchner.

Whatever turn may ultimately be taken by our convictions about a hereafter, society will uphold by law or social influence rules necessary to its own security and convenience here. It may even uphold them more rigorously, perhaps cruelly, if it is convinced that the present life is all. The natural affections, parental, conjugal, and social, will also retain their force.—Goldwin Smith.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, January 19, Queen's (Minor) Hall, Langham-place, Regent-street, London, W., at 7 30, "More 'Bradlaugh' Fables."

January 26, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London.

To Correspondents.

J. W. DAWSON.—It is best to let Colonel Gracie's testimony stand as that of an undoubted spectator. The "arguments" of people who were not present at the loss of the Titanic are worthless. It is a waste of time to notice them.

R. NORTH.—Sailors have successfully resisted the regulation as to "divine service" and we think it might be done by soldiers if a few of them held together. Our comment in the paragraph you mention was satirical. Did we miss fire?

J. E. REMSBURG.—Delighted to have you still figuring on our list of subscribers. Shop manager will send formal receipt.

A. HUNCH.—Every precaution is taken at our publishing office against mistakes in the dispatch of subscribers' copies. The Post Office is often at fault; probably so in your case last week.

H. GEORGE FARMER.—Thanks for the cutting. The Leeds police are evidently short of work. If they can find nothing better to do than worrying Freethinkers some of them should be discharged or transferred to a less holy and moral town.

J. H. GARTRELL.—Shall appear next week. Cheque divided as desired. Shop manager will forward the pamphlets.

E. B.—Better if they reached us on Saturday. But, of course, some of them couldn't—chronology being in the way. Thanks for cuttings, etc. We note your delight at seeing that an American friend fills the 1912 Honorarium Fund to the brim.

E. PACK.—(1) You correct what was not our real point. We had the author and not the vendor or distributor in our mind. The constant Leeds plea is that Mr. Blatchford is not prosecuted. We reply that he could not be prosecuted under the Police Clauses Act on account of any "profanity" in his books. Whether vendors or distributors could be so prosecuted is a matter of opinion. "Non prosecutable" doesn't mean that proceedings could not possibly be started; there is no limit to the possible blunders of policemen and magistrates; it simply means that the case could not be carried to a successful termination. (2) We did not say we could argue a case before the Court of Appeal. We said we should like to. We supposed it was well known by this time that we are not in the legal profession. Neither are you. But you have advised all the Leeds defendants, and not one of them escaped. Mr. Stewart defended himself and got three months; you wrote Mr. Gott's defence and he had four months.

ISABELLA ROBERTS.—Glad to receive your good wishes.

J. B. (Birmingham).—We have got to the bottom of it; so look out.

ELIZABETH LECHMERE.—It will appear in list.

COLONEL REILLY and DR. S. LAING.—Formal acknowledgment in next week's first list.

A GOOD deal of correspondence stands over unavoidably till next week.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The new season at Queen's (Minor) Hall opened well on Sunday evening, Mr. Foote being the lecturer and Mr. Roger the chairman. The lecture on "The King and the Bible" was greatly relished and much applauded. A few questions were asked, but there was no formal opposition. Mr. Roger appealed to the audience to help in advertising these Queen's Hall lectures, at least by circulating the waistcoat pocket announcements. We join in that appeal very earnestly. Supplies for circulation can be obtained of the Secretary, Miss Vance, at 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.

"More 'Bradlaugh' Fables" is the subject of Mr. Foote's lecture at Queen's Hall this evening (Jan. 19). It should prove attractive.

Mr. Foote is obliged, after all, to defer any further announcement as to George Meredith's Letters until it is definitely decided whether a special article of his on Meredith's Freethought is to appear in a certain monthly magazine where it would command a wider audience than in our pages. This idea was dropped for a time, but has been raised afresh.

Mr. A. B. Moss has definitely retired from open-air lecturing. He has been working in that field—though not exclusively there—for more years than we care to count. Talking ancient chronology while you are alive is the way to hasten your cremation. Suffice it to say that Mr. Moss's long service deserves all the thanks which the N. S. S. Executive has tendered him in the name of the Freethought movement; thanks which are most heartily endorsed by the President personally. Mr. Moss will still be heard, as occasion serves, at indoor meetings. It will be long, we hope, before he retires altogether. Even then he may continue writing—for the pen outlasts the tongue as an instrument or a weapon.

Miss Kough occupies the platform at the Public Hall, Croydon, this evening (Jan. 19). We bespeak for her a good audience and a hearty welcome.

Mrs. Teresa Billington Greig lectures for the Manchester Branch to-day (Jan 19) at the Secular Hall, Rusholme-road, where she should be greeted by good audiences. Her subjects are appropriate ones—"No Bible in School" and "Woman and the Church."

Several subscribers to the President's Honorarium Fund have forwarded their 1913 donations already. We do not wish to discourage subscribers from remitting early; at the same time, we are not opening the formal list of acknowledgments till next week. Meanwhile the usual circular will be placed in the hands of the printer.

With regard to Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner's excellent little volume on the Blasphemy Laws, entitled Penalties on Opinion, we have been given the right to say that the bold advertisement we gave it for several months was quite gratuitous. We wanted to see it circulated as widely as possible, and we did what we could to help it forward. The book was issued by the Rationalist Press Association, and that fact was stated in the advertisement every week, though it could easily and not unjustly have been omitted, as we were using our own machinery to push the sale of the volume. Perhaps this will be added to the list of boycottings by the wicked (and wealthy) Freethinker.

The new edition of the Bible Handbook, issued by the Secular Society, Ltd., at a very low price, as a propagandist effort, is on sale at our publishing office, and should have a large and prompt circulation. It is one of the most useful publications ever issued from the Freethought press. Nearly every question that Freethinkers ask us from time to time about the Bible can be answered by consulting this book. The references are given with great exactitude. The section on "Bible Contradictions" is printed in parallel columns, so that the contradictions stand out to the eye in a striking manner. Altogether this cheap issue of a work of such utility may be called "the sixpenny limit." The shilling edition is bound in cloth, and is the better of the two for those who can afford it, on account of the more lasting character of the binding.

Some of our readers must be getting tired of our "Fighting Fund" as it stands week after week. So are we. But it will not stand in that way much longer. We hope the London County Council will decide to act wisely and justly by withdrawing its mistaken and aggressive policy with regard to free speech and free collections (by bonâ fide societies) in the London Parks and other open spaces. It has had nearly six months' already to make up its mind in, and further delay could hardly be anything else than sheer procrastination. Our readers are bound to see a definite announcement on this matter very shortly.

Ignorance and Religion.

BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.

THE greatest thing in the world which I encountered during my recent wanderings in Europe—the greatest, not for value, but for size and force—the thing most colossal, most impenetrable, most boundless and bottomless—was human ignorance! Knowledge is power, say we; but what about the power of ignorance? Was it not George Eliot who warned the sanguine reformers not to be too confident, in their hopeful ardor, of their ability to cope with this Abysmal Monster—Ignorance! It was particularly in Catholic Europe that I was brought into very close touch with this fearful foe to human progress.

The conclusion was forcibly impressed upon me during my summer in Europe that the countries which are the most religious,—which have the greatest number of churches, of priests and clergymen, of monks and monasteries, of nuns and convents,—are also without a single exception the most poverty-stricken and the most ignorant. Constantinople, for instance, is one of the most religious cities of the world; it was partly the scene of the conversion of the Roman Empire, the home of the first Christian emperor, and the rendezvous of ecclesiastical councils and synods. To-day it is as intensely Mohammedan as formerly it was Christian; but whether the one or the other, it has never ceased to be one of the most religious and one of the most wretched of the world's great cities. Churches and mosques are as thick as blackberries in Constantinople; and what is more, these numerous houses of Moslem and Christian prayer are always open and bustling with worshipers. The Turks themselves, one would suppose, are never quite out of their mosques. Five times a day they must absent themselves from business to appear in the presence of their God, to tell him there is only one God and that he is it. This last time my windows in Constantinople looked directly into the inside of the mosque across the street, which gave me an opportunity to witness the inveterate piety of the Turk. While the muezzin was crying from the top of the steeple, or "minaret," that the hour for prayer had arrived—and it arrives, as I said, five times in twenty-four hours—the little mosque was filling up with turbaned and sandalled Turks. The words "turbaned" and "sandalled" are apt to give you a picturesque idea of these worshipers, while in reality they are a most ragged crowd. But they are pious. I was convinced of that when I saw them performing their namaz with a seriousness and a scrupulosity difficult to duplicate.

But does religiosity, the constant praying and bending with the accompaniment of tapering candles, the curling fumes of incense, the chime of bells and the music of processions as in Catholic churches, induce God to do more for a people than he otherwise would? Does he love the Moslems for their five prayers a day more than the Christians? Does he love them as much? Or is he more prodigal with his blessings to the Italians and the Spaniards, who go to mass every day, than to the Germans or the Americans, who never go to mass? Are the material and moral conditions of the people in Catholic countries where the Holy Trinity, the Virgin Mary, and the long list of saints are daily and loudly invoked, better, or even as good, as those prevailing in heretical countries? In which country of Europe is there more security of life, property, and liberty,—or better sanitary conditions, wholesomer bread for the masses, less grinding misery or blighting ignorance? Certainly not in the most devoutly religious lands.

I was standing on a Sunday morning in St. Peter's Cathedral in Rome, where I saw troops of Italian pilgrim peasants, one after the other, walk up and kiss St. Peter's toe. "You have been kissing that bare and cold foot," said I to them in my mind, "all these years, and your fathers and mothers before you; but what has it done for you or your country? You are wretched, poor, and even filthy. I can see it. There is an unpleasant odor about your clothes. You are uncombed and unwashed, and you have had scarcely enough to eat. You look sleepy and stupid. The human element is scarcely discernible in you! What, then, has St. Peter done for you? Or is it in the next world that he is going to reward you for kissing his toe and paying his pence so regularly? But what prevents him from blessing you now and here, when your needs are so urgent and your lot is so unspeakably wretched? Besides, if he insists on getting his pence now, why do you not insist on getting your reward now? If you were to tell St. Peter that you will keep your savings until you go to the next world, where you will place it all in a lump in his hands, he will shake his head, as much as to say, 'No, pay me now.' Why, then, should you be content with credit, when he insists on cash?"

I stood before the statue of St. Peter buried in meditations which really oppressed me. A black Peter in bronze, with a golden crown in the form of an aureola around his head, under a canopy of blue and gold, and with two huge keys in one of his hands resting upon his breast,—the one supposed to be the key of heaven, and the other of hell,—the control of both being handed over to him. In this posture St. Peter holds out one foot, the toe of which is pretty well worn out, not from kissing, but from being wiped by people before kissing it. It seems they are afraid they might contract some disease by kissing the apostle's toe without first wiping it, which shows really what little faith, after all, people have in the power of their saint for present help. If a saint cannot save men from catching a disease when they are kissing his blessed toe, what, then, can he do for them? If people have to use their minds and then their handkerchiefs before kissing a saint, why do they not extend that practice of self-help and common sense to everything else in life? I saw some of these pious folk not only kiss the toe, but also bow and shove their heads under it as a sign of absolute submission to the authority of St. Peter. Great is ignorance!

It must be admitted that the piety of these people is not mere lip service, but genuine. As in Turkey, so in Italy, so in all Catholic Europe, there is no such thing as religious cant. Emerson used to say that only the English and the Americans are given to the odious practice of uttering hypocritical phrases to God; he was right. Of course, the sincerity of the Moslems and the Catholics does not make their faith any the less, I am sorry to say, something of the nature of a malignant growth which is eating away all their material resources, as well as withering all their intellectual powers. But the ignorant are at least sincere, though their sincerity is no protection against the ravages of ignorance. It is pathetic to see how often an Italian beggar, the moment a penny is slipped into his hands, runs away forthwith to deposit it in the church box. The "chink, chink, chink," of the pennies falling into the church receptacles, everywhere visible, is a deplorable, yet a convincing, evidence of the sincerity of these simple worshipers. Of course, the money is not given to the Church in any disinterested spirit. On the contrary, the people have an idea that dropping money into the church box, especially when it has been blessed by the Pope or sprinkled with holy water, is like depositing it in a savings bank. Some day and somewhere they will get it all back again with compound interest.

On our way to Pompeii we drove for hours through Naples, which gave us an opportunity to see the homes of these pious people. Ah, what wretched dwellings! These unfortunate people are crowded into dark, dirty, barren quarters, not "flowing with milk and honey," as the promise runs, but dark and dingy. No carpets, no chairs, no beds, no tables, but a few black, broken, cast-away and nameless articles in the way of household furniture. Yet in some of the meanest of these habitations there could be seen on the walls an altar or a shrine of some virgin or saint, cased in glass, and an oil lamp burning before it day and night. The savings of the family go to give the saint a light, when it should help to give the children bread or an education. The poor Italians who buy and support these saints believe that without the presence of these saints in the house everything would go wrong with them—as if it were possible for them to sink into lower depths of want and ignorance.

In many of the Catholic churches of Italy we were shown by the guides the crutches which the lame had left there, having recovered the use of their limbs through the intervention of heaven. The pictures of the Madonnas were covered with silver hands and gold hearts in gratitude for answered prayers. In one of the Venetian churches, on the Grand Canal, we saw a wooden leg on the altar, which was exhibited to prove the power of the Church to restore lost limbs. "Is it possible," I asked the guide, "that a man came here with that wooden contrivance and exchanged it for a flesh and bone leg?" But he paid no attention to my question. Now think of an organisation that will resort to such advertisements for purposes of revenue. In this same church the religious guide led us into another room, where he explained to us how, some years ago, the roof had fallen during a fire and partly destroyed the mosaic floor, and also crushed and broken many of the images of the saints. Poor saints! they saved others, but could not save themselves!

In the Church of St. Mark, in Venice, one of the richest in all Europe, we were shown the grave of the apostle of that name. How in all the world they found out who St. Mark was and where he was buried, I cannot tell. It is believed that an Eastern anchorite, living in the desert, saw in a dream the Apostle Mark, who told him where he was buried and begged to be removed to Venice. Of course, his request was carried out. We were also shown in this church the stone upon which St. John was beheaded, and were actually informed besides that if we paid five francs apiece the guide would conduct us to the vaults in the basement, the keys of which he held in his hand, where we would see the blood "of our Lord," and a few of his bones. The Catholics hold on to "bones and blood" as their best answer to the doubter. If you say such and such a saint never lived, they show you his bones. To make sure the guide was in earnest, I asked him repeatedly if the church was really in possession of the blood and bones of "our Lord." Yes, he was not jesting. Who discovered all these relics? Money! If the ignorant could not pay, there would be no relics to exhibit.

Perhaps of all the sights the one which pained me most was what I saw in the Church of the Holy Stairs in Rome, near St. John the Lateran. From a circular posted in the vestibule of this little church, I learned that it possessed one of the richest treasures of Christendom—the marble steps which Jesus ascended when he was in the flesh, and upon which fell drops of his blood. These steps, which are supposed to have been miraculously preserved for the church, have now a wooden covering to preserve them from wearing out. What God has preserved for two thousand years is now being preserved by a wooden casing. The blood spots are there under the wood, though they are invisible except to the eye of faith. The circular in the vestibule, printed in Italian, German, and French—but not in English—says further, that these steps were brought to Rome in the year 861 by Queen Helen during the lifetime of Constantine, the first Christian emperor, and that Pope Leo IV., in the year 850, offered nine years' indulgences to everyone who climbed them on his knees while saying a prayer on each round. The circular further stated, in Italian, German, and French, that a Bull of Pope Pascal, A.D. 1100, confirmed this decree, and Pope Pius VII. declared the climbing of these steps on one's knees good also for the souls in purgatory. There were old men and women here going up these steps on their knees, some of them with arms outstretched, and muttering a prayer as they crawled to the top—about forty-three steps in all. I am restraining myself from exclaiming, "O the power of human ignorance!" for the simple story I am telling you needs no coaching to make it convey its lesson.

I look upon the mosques in Constantinople, the cathedrals in Rome, the great army of sleek, well-fed monks, the religious establishments with their enormous wealth, as the greatest and most enduring monument ever raised to the power of human ignorance. When I saw men and women dipping their fingers in holy water, and then falling on their knees before a clumsily dressed, doll-like Madonna, done with rouge, ribbons, and ruffles, calico skirts and sun-bonnet, and calling it "the mother of God," I did not feel like exclaiming with Shakespeare, "What a piece of work is man!" but with Voltaire I cried, "What an absurd animal is man!" The clock has struck twenty on the dial of time, and yet Ignorance, the abysmal monster, rules its millions, when knowledge has only a handful to depend upon. Walking down the street the other day, I saw an organ grinder, with his wife and daughter assisting him, devouring the windows of the houses on both sides of the streets with his eyes, and grinning and courtesying to the children for a penny. He was an Italian. Did I ask a moment ago what Rome had done for Italy? But see! she has left the hand-organ to a people once the proudest in the world.

But I must now try to explain how religiosity, such as it exists, especially in Catholic and Moslem countries, became the parent of two of the greatest evils which have ever inflicted humanity—poverty and ignorance. In all such countries the clergy have succeeded in shifting the centre of interest from the present to the future. Then, again, insistence upon the authority of the Book or the Church has impaired, hopelessly, the will, as well as the ability, to think independently. In the next place, the menace of hell fire has frightened the people away from new and progressive ideas as from poisoned food. Once more, the forcing of impossible and absurd propositions upon the intelligence as holy mysteries and as absolutely essential both to morality and salvation, has unhinged the people mentally and left them mere puppets in the hands of their exploiters. Flying from one saint to another; seeking now the intervention of the Virgin, and now of that; invoking to-day one martyr and to-morrow another; on a pilgrimage now to one holy relic or grave, and then to another, but living always with the dead—the people have neither the leisure nor the taste for study. Instead of learning and trying to help himself, the believer is praying for help from above. Petronius remarks in one of his letters that there were so many gods in Rome that there was no room left for men. In Catholic countries the gods and saints do everything, leaving man only to wait. But there is no evidence that the gods have ever hurt a man or helped him. Thus, we see how superstition cramps man's energies while science expands his mind and trains his hands. A people who fear remain slaves, and without science people must ever dwell in fear.

The Northern or Protestant nations are not hurt to the same extent by their religious beliefs, because their loyalty to these beliefs is largely nominal. It is a shocking admission to make, but it is nevertheless true, that the secret of the comparative freedom of Protestant peoples from the bad effects of their creeds is that they are insincere. The Protestants only profess, while the Catholics and the Moslems believe and tremble. When Bishop Colenso had finished fitting up a house for a British eighteen-pounder, the Zulus who had often heard him preach that they must put their trust in the good God, asked him why he reserved a part of his for the English cannon. But that is English; to profess faith in God, and to appeal to the cannon. James Nasmyth, the founder of the steam hammer, speaks of an announcement posted on the walls of Edinburgh streets before the days of railroads, which illustrates perfectly the radical difference between the Northern and Southern mind. The notice read: "The coach would set out from the Grass Market ilka Tuesday at Twa o'clock in the day, God Wullin, but whether or no on Wednesday." The Protestants intend to let God have his own way until Tuesday, but after that they will take the reins in their own hands. Their deference to the supernatural is partial and insincere, and it is to this fact—a fact which makes hypocrites and pharisees of them—that they owe whatever progress they have made in knowledge and civilisation.

A stupid people are worse than an insincere, hypocritical people, for while the latter may be converted to honesty, the former are past redemption. A stupid world would be infinitely less interesting even than a wicked world, for the one manifests an energy that might some day be put to better uses, while the other has the smell of the grave about it. "Against the stupid," says Schiller, "even the gods are helpless." It is this inconsistency, the insincerity of the Protestant, his "make-believe" loyalty to religious dogmas imported from Asia, and therefore alien to his native genius, that enables him to replace in all practical affairs, superstition by science, and "faith" by intelligence. But even the orthodox Catholic is not free from religious insincerity altogether. So long as religious practices and dogmas refuse to respect the rights of reason, it will be impossible to dispense with hypocrisy. My complaint against the creeds is that they make insincerity indispensable.

The Catholic nations of Southern Europe, who have no end of churches and crucifixes, Cararra marble Virgins and painted saints, bronze popes, alabaster Christs, and Madonnas with diamonds for eyes, and who are more interested in purgatory or in paradise than in life here and now, are the most backward peoples in Christendom. To be saved—that is to say, to have the means for a decent and useful life—ennobled by the untiring pursuit of truth in the service of humanity, the priest must become a teacher, the church a school, and the locust cloud of saints and gods must make room for man!

Of course, from the day that Garibaldi entered Rome, its secularisation began. Italy has at last turned her face toward the light. The reign of ignorance is drawing to a close. I have given you now a picture of old Italy. I will in my next tell you of the Italy that is breaking away from her chains.

—From a Lecture on "A Rationalist in Rome," delivered before the Independent Religious Society, Chicago.

If.

EVERY little while some Christian clergyman tells "what Christ [meaning Jesus] would do if he came again." I can think of no greater waste of words than results from such predictions, or guesswork.

But before anyone undertakes to paint a second career for Jesus it is necessary to prove a first one. There is not a particle of proof that any such person as the Gospel Jesus ever lived on earth. A character such as Jesus is not born; he is made. He does not have human parents. He comes from the brain of man, not from the body of woman. His career is manufactured to carry out the artist's idea. Divinity has been constructed in a myriad form—Jesus is only one of the mythological deities. He is made a little more human, brought a little nearer home to our hearts, than most of them have been. He is only half celestial. He is not pure divinity. There is earth in his picture. He is painted in human likeness, and is endowed with human weakness. Such a being is neither God nor man.

The Gospel Jesus belongs to literature, not to life. He has no history. All that is said of him could be said of Apollo, or Hercules, or Mercury, or of any other creature of human imagination. Jesus is only one attempt of man to make a god.

So we say that it is incumbent upon the person who tells us "what Christ would do if he came again" to show that he ever came; that he ever had an earthly existence; that he ever spoke to man; that he ever wrought a wondrous deed or died as he is represented to have died on the pictured cross.

But take the life of Jesus as a fact, and what is it but a foolish dream? As a model for humanity it is a wretched failure. Men to-day have to work with hand and brain; have to labor for all they get; have to meet the hard, cruel, heartless forces of nature with bleeding hands, with breaking hearts, with eyes burning with tears, and the admonitions of Jesus to "take no thought for the morrow" and to trust to God to feed and clothe them are but insults to the poor who live on the line of starvation and barely escape freezing.

It is the truth that Jesus never did a thing to change the destiny of mankind; that neither his life nor his death altered the conditions under which mankind lives. He did nothing to make the frost less freezing, the heat less burning; nothing to save the aching hands; nothing to stop the sufferings of the body, the agony of the soul; nothing to lessen the drudgery of toil, the misery of existence.

Admit that that Jesus lived as the Gospel story says he lived, what right has anyone to assume that he would do differently were he to return to earth? And what right has anyone to assume that his second advent would benefit the world of man any more than did his first?

The New Testament has ceased to influence human thought, and its central hero has lost his hold upon the sympathy and respect of men and women for the reason that he cannot be shown to be a historical character. Fictitious suffering does not appeal to the honest heart, and persons of a drama or a novel do not move mankind as do flesh-and-blood beings who we know have lived and suffered and sorrowed on earth as we ourselves have done.

We do not want anyone to come back to earth after having once quit it dressed in the garb of death. Life cannot be repeated. A career cannot be lived again. Every soul must be a new soul; every life a new life.

But there is no danger of any person coming again to earth who has passed from it. Nature gives one life to each. It is as foolish to talk about "what Christ would do if he came again" as it would be to predicate what Shakespeare would write or Calvin believe or Jonathan Edwards preach.

Literary Gossip.

How much real knowledge of English (or any other) literature is there in the editorial offices of our London newspapers? A correspondent of the Daily Mirror having referred to "Macaulay's New Zealander viewing the ruins of London" is pounced upon by another correspondent, who remarks that "Macaulay's idea was not original," and quotes the following passage from Captain Marryat's Frank Mildmay, written in 1829:—

> "London may one day be the same—and Paris; and you and your children's children will all have lived and had their their loves and adventures; but who will the wretched man be that shall sit on the summit of Primrose Hill and look down upon the desolation of the mighty city, as you, from this eminence, behold the once flourishing town of St. Jago?"

This idea is not so recondite that it might not occur to many imaginative persons. Still, if there is to be so much talk about "originality" it may as well be remarked that the conception occurs in the pages of a far greater writer than Marryat or Macaulay, who flourished before either of them. I refer to Shelley—in the serio-comic Dedication of Peter Bell the Third, dated December 1, 1819. I have just turned to that Dedication and read it through once more with unimpaired delight. Shelley's prose is, in its own way, as fine as his verse. I know this is a heresy, but I never trouble about a charge like that. I read for my own pleasure,—I judge from my own perception. But somebody will be telling me to "leave off my damnable faces and begin"—or rather come to the point. Here it is then: Shelley's last paragraph—the poet soaring above the satirist (you see I am incurable!)—runs as follows:—

> "Hoping that the immortality which you have given to the Fudges, you will receive from them; and in the firm expectation, that when London shall be a habitation of bitterns, when St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey shall stand, shapeless and nameless ruins, in the midst of an unpeopled marsh; when the piers of Waterloo Bridge shall become the nuclei of islets of reeds and osiers, and cast the jagged shadows of their broken arches on the solitary stream, some transatlantic commentator will be weighing in the scales of some new and now unimagined system of criticism the respective merits of the Bells and the Fudges, and their historians.—I remain, etc."

The essence of this idea, in all these cases, is London in a state of ruin and desertion. Macaulay had read Shelley, Marryat might have, and both may have drawn from the same great source. I repeat, however, that the varied use made of the idea renders the discussion about "originality" and "plagiarism" as superfluous as it is inappropriate.

Fielding's genius has been the admiration of every great English writer since, and his masterpiece is one of the translated classics in most civilised languages. Gibbon's immortal compliment to our great novelist is famous; and to be mentioned by Gibbon, as Thackeray said, is like having your name inscribed on the dome of St. Peter's, where it is visible to visitors from all parts of the world. Thackeray's own admiration of Fielding is also well known. But it is not my intention to draw up a list of Fielding's eulogists. It would take too long—and would be too long. I will therefore just turn to Coleridge. That mighty and subtle genius, who was perhaps the most splendidly endowed of all English poets since Shakespeare, refers to Fielding frequently in his Table Talk and elsewhere. The following passage is one of the most characteristic:—

> "What a master of composition Fielding was! Upon my word, I think the Œdipus Tyrannus, the Alchemist, and Tom Jones, the three most perfect plots ever planned. And how charming, how wholesome, Fielding always is! To take him up after Richardson, is like emerging from a sick room heated by stoves, into an open lawn, on a breezy day in May."

Being asked whether Tom Jones is not a dangerous book for a young man, Coleridge replied "No,—unless the young man's mind is hopelessly corrupt already." The author of that great novel was "manly Harry Fielding" then, and he is manly Harry Fielding still to all whose minds are not morbid and prurient. And as to Fielding's style, it was George Eliot (in Middlemarch, I think) who speaks of his "lusty English." His is masculine English from head to foot. On all accounts he is admirable to men, and only distasteful to effeminates and eunuchs.

It may be objected that this classification is hard upon the Doncaster Corporation Free Library Committee. They had a copy of Tom Jones on their shelves and they resolved to burn it. A member took it home and read it for the first time. He reported it as immoral. In this, however, he was opposed by other members; but the majority agreed with him and resolved that the book should be burnt. We suppose the resolution has been duly carried out.

Nobody knows the name of the builder of the famous Temple of Ephesus. Everybody knows the name of the man who burnt it down. He immortalised himself by one act of vandalism. So has the Free Library Committee of the city of Doncaster. * * *

Public Free Libraries are good things in their way, but it is easy to overestimate their value—especially now that books are so cheap that twenty classics can be bought for a pound. They provide a plethora of reading (mostly novels—and not by Fieldings) to the general public,—chiefly to young ladies who have nothing else to do with their time. But they take as much care as possible to make all the reading they supply harmless. They keep out what excites thought on great questions, not merely of the day and hour, but of all time. Books by thinkers and reformers, whose names are in intelligent people's mouths, are carefully banned. Serious readers ask for them in vain. The average man rules there absolutely, through his representatives (a local Church parson, a local Dissenting preacher, a local builder, a local tailor, a local grocer, and a local "retired" gentleman, who came from nowhere and is going to the same place). And the rule of the average man in the realm of mind is intellectual desolation and death.

GOD'S ADVISERS.

The Lord's most vain and stupid friends go out
To teach his pagan children how to pray;
The god-helped pagans kill God's friends, and flout
The God whose schemes they aid, whilst thus they slay;
And all's for best, God's friends agree.

God's creatures kill God's creatures, and obey
His grinding law of change: Life, Strife, and Death;
They work and love; they preach, and hate, and pray,
And think, poor fools! that God cares aught for breath
Of infant, tiger, priest, or flea.

Does Nature's hideous strife our Reason fill
With hope that Hatred's fell Designer feels
For those whose slaughter prompts the song-bird's trill,
Or those whom tyrants crush beneath their heels?
To sharks, go bend in pray'r your knee!

A pray'r to Him that doeth all things well,
That numbers, and makes the sparrows fall,
Must shake the universe, from heav'n to hell,
With mirthful shrieks of demons, great and small—
If God, heav'n, hell, and ghosts there be.

The priests and parsons—God Almighty's staff
Of cosmical, consulting engineers—
Advising God, are fit to force a laugh
From Christ himself, the man of threats and tears,
Whose frenzied frown could blast a tree.

The foolish folk that pray—if God there be—
Were made to pray, and we were made to think
That pray'r's absurd, and yet that they and we,
Their faith and our contempt, with all things link,
Perforce, to make what is to be.

If aught we know, we know that naught is known
Of heav'nly aid—man saves himself, or dies.
Let, therefore, work, true seed of hope, be sown
On earth alone, nor waste on silent skies
The time so short for you and me.

God is not in the world. In all business transactions there is no mention of a deity. Go into all the offices of the town you will not run against God in any of them. We live without God, we do business without God, we plant, cultivate, and harvest without God. It is only the priest and preacher who keep God in stock. The priest and preacher get their living out of the God idea and they can only live by humbugging the world into the notion that there is a God. But ask them to show their God and they stand dumb.—L. K. Washburn.

THE SOUL'S SINCERE DESIRE.

Three Philadelphia ministers were watching the score board of the last game of the world series. It was the first half of the tenth inning, and the score read: New York, 2; Boston, 1.

A large colored man attracted the attention of the ministers by his attitude and intense interest. His eyes were glued on the score board, while his hands were folded in an attitude of prayer. One of the ministers touched him gently and inquired: "Brother, what are you doing with your hands folded?"

"I'se prayin', sah," was his reply.

"For whom are you praying?" asked the minister.

Said the colored man: "For Boston, sah, for Boston! Law's sake, sah, if Boston loses I'se ruined."

THE CAT'S COMMUNION.

In order that the revival spirit might be quickened, it was arranged in a negro church, near Savannah, that the preacher should give a signal when he thought the excitement was highest, and from the attic, through a hole in the ceiling over the pulpit, the sexton was to throw down a pure white dove, whose flight around the church and over the heads of the audience was expected to provide the climax.

All went well at the start—the church was packed. The preacher's text was, "In the form of a dove," and fervidly he piled up his periods till the emotion of the congregation grew to the breaking point.

The opportune moment had arrived, the signal was given, and the packed audience was scared out of its wits on looking up to the ceiling to behold a cat growling and spitting, dangling from a string above the preacher's head.

"Whar's de dove?" the preacher called out to the sexton.

The sexton's voice came down through the opening loud enough to be heard in all parts of the building:

"Inside de cat!"

THE INVALID—How to brace up and keep well.

Whatever you'd ask a doctor you find herein, or (if not, Dr. F. will answer your inquiry FREE, any time)

Dr. Foote's books have been the popular instructors of the masses in America for fifty years (often re-written, enlarged, and always kept up-to-date). For twenty years they have sold largely (from London) to all countries where English is spoken, and everywhere highly praised. Last editions are best, largest, and most for the price. You may save the price by not buying, and you may lose your life (or your wife or child) by not knowing some of the vitally important truths it tells.

Most Grateful Testimonials From Everywhere.

Gudivada, India: "It is a store of medical knowledge in plainest language, and every reader of English would be benefited by it."—W. L. N.

Triplicane, India: "I have gone through the book many times, and not only benefited myself but many friends also."—G. V. T.

Panderma, Turkey: "I can avow frankly there is rarely to be found such an interesting book as yours."—K. H. (Chemist).

Calgary, Can.: "The information therein has changed my whole idea of life—to be nobler and happier."—D. N. M.

Laverton, W. Aust.: "I consider it worth ten times the price. I have benefited much by it."—R. M.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Another "Bradlaugh" Fable.

ONE of the most instructive things, in its way, in the whole range of literature, is the chapter on "The Watch Story" in Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner's biography of her father, the great Charles Bradlaugh. Perhaps the following chapter on "Other Fables" should go with it. Taken together they show the invincible unveracity and incurable credulity of the general Christian mind. Deception and self-deception are displayed to such an extent in those two chapters as to suggest that any wicked imbecility or imbecile wickedness is possible to irrational human nature under the influence of religious bigotry. And the moral is that no report of Christians about Freethinkers should be believed without absolute corroboration.

Let the Christian say "I tell you, I saw it—I heard it. I couldn't be mistaken." He may be trying to deceive you, but he may have deceived himself. Charles Bradlaugh never gave the Almighty five minutes to strike him dead, either on a public platform or elsewhere. This is as certain as any negative proposition can be. Yet it is clear that in one or two cases the reporter must really have believed that he saw and heard Bradlaugh do it. At the time when Bradlaugh was prosecuting the man Edgecumbe for printing the Watch Story in the British Empire an interesting statement was made by the editor of the Huddersfield Examiner. He said that a person called at his office the previous week and alleged that "he had heard Mr. Bradlaugh utter such a challenge, and saw him pull out his watch in the manner stated in the course of the debate with the Rev. Dr. M'Cann in Huddersfield. To our certain knowledge no such occurrence ever took place, yet the man making the statement appeared to be fully convinced that he had heard and seen what he described as having taken place, and he was prepared to give evidence on the subject if called upon to do so."

We remember a somewhat similar case. It must be premised that the Watch Story was not confined to Bradlaugh; it was applied to every leading Freethought lecturer of the nineteenth century, including George Jacob Holyoake, who had to deny it before Bradlaugh appeared on the scene. Ladies like Mrs. Harriet Law and Mrs. Annie Besant fared no better than the male advocates of Freethought. The Rev. J. Moffat Logan, with whom we debated at Bristol many years ago, assured us that when he was a very young man at Glasgow he saw Mrs. Harriet Law perform what we may call "the watch trick" on the platform of the Secular Hall. We are certain he never saw anything of the kind. How he came to believe he did is more than we can explain. But he was a highly emotional man, and that was probably the governing factor in his case.

We could write a lot upon the Watch Story, but our present object is only to show that "fables" about Bradlaugh could arise and hold their own, without a particle of real evidence to support them, and in spite of the most complete refutation.

This is by way of introduction to a new Bradlaugh "fable" which appeared lately in the Liverpool Weekly Post, in the "Workaday World" department, edited by "Ben Adhem"—whoever that gentleman may be. It was a story of Bradlaugh being put to confusion by a young soldier at Portsmouth. One of our Birmingham readers asked "Ben Adhem" his authority for the story, and this was his reply (Dec. 28):—

> "J. B.—Thanks for the Freethinker. The Bradlaugh and young soldier incident is related by the soldier himself in his book—'From the Bottom Up,' by Alexander Irvine, published by Heinemann, London: and is quoted and endorsed by Mrs. Annie Besant—Bradlaugh's colleague for many years—in the 'Theosophist' for December, 1910."

Now we like to do things thoroughly, so we invested our money in the book and the periodical referred to. We speak, therefore, "by the card," as Hamlet says; which "Ben Adhem" could not have done, unless he is a very careless or a very dishonest writer.

We are not called upon to give an opinion of Mr. Alexander Irvine's book generally. His work as a Christian missionary in England and America is not the best training in logic and accuracy. Anyhow, here is his story:—

> "The most powerful speaker I ever heard was Charles Bradlaugh. I attended one of his lectures one Sunday afternoon in a large auditorium in Portsmouth. I shall never forget that wonderful voice as it thrilled an audience of four thousand people. Bradlaugh was engaged in one of his favorite themes, demolishing God and the theologians. It was the most daring thing I had ever heard, and my mind and soul were in revolt. When the time for questions came, I pushed my way to the front, was recognised by the chairman, and mounted the platform. My lips were parched and I could scarcely utter a word. The big man with the homely face saw my embarrassment, and said, 'Take your time, my boy; don't be in a hurry.'
> "He had been a soldier himself, and, I supposed, as I stood there in my scarlet tunic, Glengarry cap in hand, Bradlaugh became reminiscent.
> "When I got command of my voice, I said: 'I want to ask Mr. Bradlaugh a question. I have very little education and little opportunity to get more, but I have a peace in my heart; I call it "Belief in God." I don't know what else to call it and I want to ask Mr. Bradlaugh whether he is willing to take that away from me and deprive me of the biggest pleasure in my life, and leave nothing in its place?'
> "He rose from his chair, came forward, laid his hand on my shoulder, and amid a most impressive silence, said:—
> "'No, my lad, Charles Bradlaugh will be the last man on the face of the earth to take a pleasure from a soldier boy, even though it be a "belief in God!"'
> "The crowd wildly cheered, and I went out grateful and strengthened."

Mr. Irvine does not tell us when this happened. We gather that it must have been in the early 'eighties. The story is therefore some thirty years old. That is the worst of these things. Mrs. Besant justly noticed this in 1877, when the Watch Story was applied to her, not only by the smaller fry of Christianity, but by the famous Dr. Joseph

Parker, who attacked her in the following elegant language :—

> "There is a woman going up and down the country lecturing, and may be in London city at this moment, and she proudly cries out that there is no God, and she takes out her watch and says, 'Now, if there be a God, I give him five minutes to strike me dead,' and she coolly stands watching the hands of her watchdial, and because she is not struck dead by the time she stipulates, she cries out that there is no God; and workingmen run after this woman, and pay for listening to this ginger-beer blasphemy, and the ravings of a half-drunken woman."

Mrs. Besant, in the course of her reply, made this very palpable hit :—

> "There is one very queer thing about the story; it never appears in any report given at the time of any lecture, and no one speaks of having heard the challenge, the day, week, or month, or year after it was done. The pious Christian always heard it about twenty years ago, and has kept it locked in his bosom ever since."

Not twenty years, but thirty years (apparently) has Mr. Irvine kept that Bradlaugh story "locked in his bosom." It is a ridiculous story on the face of it. Bradlaugh was lecturing against Theism in order to make Atheists. Why should he scruple at Alexander Irvine? What was it the crowd "wildly cheered"? Was it his eagerness to get off or Bradlaugh's willingness to let him off? The reply, too, is so unlike Bradlaugh! He thought Atheism a good thing. Why should he nearly weep at the thought of its infecting a soldier boy? The story is a perfect tissue of absurdity.

"Ben Adhem's" statement that Mrs. Besant "quoted and endorsed" Mr. Irvine's story is not true. The Theosophist review of the book does not endorse the story at all, but merely refers to it as a part of the author's narrative. And the review was not written by Mrs. Besant. It is signed "E. S." These are not the initials of Annie Besant. So that "Ben Adhem's" one strong point is "rotten."

G. W. FOOTE.

The Culture of the Supernatural.—II.

THE value of the study of religion from the point of view indicated in my last article, is of first-rate importance. It does not concern itself — except indirectly—with the origin of religion. This it takes as already existing, and inquires to what extent have manifestations of the sexual life, normal and abnormal, and nervous states, normal and pathological, been accepted as evidences of supernatural influence. Although much may have been said and written on this subject, in parentheses, so to speak, it is a line of inquiry that has never, I believe, been systematically and exhaustively worked. This is not due to any lack of material, for this is of great bulk, both with savage and civilised people. Perhaps it is that while it is permissible to point out that certain individuals here and there have mistaken their own morbid condition for supernatural illumination, it would rouse too much ill-will to demonstrate that a deliberate culture of perverted sex feeling and morbid nervous states have been features of all religious cults from the most savage to the most civilised. In this connection it is worth noting that a very clear and shrewd essay on the connection between sexual feeling and religious devotion that appeared in the first edition of D'Israeli's Miscellanies of Literature, was quietly dropped from subsequent editions.

At any rate, no one who is even slenderly acquainted with the facts will deny that sexual and mental aberrations have at all times been taken as evidences of spiritual illumination. We may, therefore, give Professor James's query concerning the Biblical writers: "Under just what biographic conditions did the sacred writers bring forth their various contributions to the holy volume?" and give it wider scope. What are the conditions, biographic and social, under which certain persons have imagined themselves, and have been believed by others, to be specially favored with divine illumination? The majority of people, it may safely be said, are conscious of no such experience. In what respect does the favored few differ from their fellows? Must we assume that by some finer development of their nature, or by some peculiar development of faculty, they are brought into touch with a wider and deeper reality? Or are we to seek a less romantic explanation by the help of known forces and tendencies in human nature? And, further, as this minority are not conscious of divine illumination all the time, what is it that differentiates their normal state from their abnormal condition?

No answer of any value to any queries will be found in ordinary religious writings. Rhapsodical eulogies of religion tell us nothing at all. Nay, they tell us less than nothing that is useful, since theories that obtain in this quarter are founded upon the absolute veracity of the phenomena under consideration. Speaking generally, it is impossible to learn anything of the real nature of religion from religious teachers. One may gather from them what religious people say or do, but not why they say or do these things. A description of the states of mind of religious personages, such as that supplied by Professor James, is interesting enough, but it is the causes of these states that is of real importance. And this causation can only be understood by associating them with other and more fundamental processes. Within recent years psychology owes its real advances to a closer attention to the physiology of the nervous system, and if any like advance is to be made in our knowledge of religious phenomena we must adopt the same line of inquiry. We do not, for instance, understand the nature of demoniacal possession by collating cases. It is only when we place them side by side with similar cases that now come under the control of the physician, and associate them with a peculiar mental and social environment that we find ourselves in possession of a rational explanation. In this instance, as in the case of delusion or of insanity, a study of the anatomy and physiology of the nervous system is essential. Without it we are in the position of trying to determine the nature of a locomotive while in complete ignorance of its internal mechanism. Yet this is precisely the position of all professional exponents of religion. As a student the budding divine has his head stuffed full of historic creeds, and texts, and doctrines, and dogmas, none of which can possibly tell him the real nature of religion. On the contrary, they act as so many obstacles to his acquiring knowledge. Which is one of the reasons that, while we turn to the astronomer for information about astronomy, to the biologist for information about biology, or to the sociologist for a knowledge of sociology, to gain real knowledge about religion we have to forsake the professional teacher of religion altogether.

To put the whole matter in a sentence, the study of religion must be affiliated to the study of life as a whole. If possible, we want to get at the determining conditions that lead one person to expend his energy in religion, while another person with the same qualities of mind finds full satisfaction in other directions. Religion can only be treated as a distinct thing so long as we believe in a "religious faculty" organically ear-marked for religious use. This is what people have in mind when they explain Darwin's Agnosticism as due to an atrophy of the "religious faculty" consequent on over-absorption in scientific pursuits, or who argue that the "religious faculty," like a physiological structure, increases in efficiency with use and atrophies with disuse. But this is without the slightest scientific justification. There is no reason for believing that had Darwin professed religion his mental qualities would have been different to what they were. They would merely have been expressed in different language. For there are no specifically religious qualities. There may be hope, or fear, or love, or terror, or devotion, in relation to religion, but they are precisely the same qualities that manifest themselves in relation to other things. Mental qualities may be roused to activity in connection with a belief in the supernatural, or they may be expressed in connection with mundane associations. Whatever be the exciting cause, the qualities themselves remain unchanged. And a scientific inquiry consequently concerns itself less with the form in which they are expressed than with an investigation of the causes of their operation.

It is perfectly true, as Professor James says, that "the whole array of Christian saints and hierarchs, including the greatest, the Bernards, the Loyolas, the Luthers, the Foxes, the Wesleys, had their visions, voices, rapt conditions, guiding impressions, and 'openings,'" but when he goes on to say that the subjects "actually feel themselves played upon by a power beyond their will. The evidence is dynamic. The God or spirit moves the very organs of their body," one can admit this as only true of the subject's own belief about the nature of their feelings and of the convictions of some of the onlookers. In any other sense, one may simply meet the conviction with a flat denial. It is not a question of the actuality of certain states, but of their origin and nature. It is quite beside the point to dwell upon the intense conviction of the subject of these seizures. The subjective state is always real, whether it belongs to a saint in ecstasy or a drunkard in delirium tremens. There are no subjective states more real than are the visions of an opium eater; but it is never suggested that we are to take the opium eater's proofs of his being brought into touch with a new world of being. In such cases the testimony of a normal onlooker is of more value than that of the visionary. So it may well be that what to one person is evidence of the supernatural is to another no more than a false interpretation of a real mental experience, although many are inclined to treat the rejection of the interpretation as equivalent to a denial of the fact.

It must also be remembered that it is a matter of actual demonstration that these religious experiences are strictly determined by environmental influences. Thousands of Christians have been favored with visions of Jesus or of heaven in their dying moments. Millions of Jews have lived and died without any such experience. The Virgin or Jesus have never appeared to a Mohammedan—the very person to whom such a vision would be most useful. The spiritual experience of each is determined by the pre-existing religious belief. When the Devil was generally believed in, visions of Satan were quite common. The evidence for personal conflicts with Satan is quite as strong as the evidence for intercourse with God. When the belief in Satan died out, the visions died out also. Moreover, these visions and this sense of contact with a super-normal world of being is not peculiar to religion. It is a common feature of a general psycho-pathic condition. Medical works are full of such instances. And, naturally, when the psychopath is of a deeply religious nature, the affection is expressed in religious terms. In the well-known case of Martin Luther, his complaint of the Devil's attempt to interfere with his work by buzzing in his ears and knocking on his head, there is no need to go any further than a nervous affection for a complete explanation. Many similar cases might be quoted of ignorant people who have complained of the same diabolic persecution, but who have had Satan exorcised by the aid of a physician.

One could, in fact, construct an ascending series of cases, all of which agree in the symptoms displayed, and differ only in the explanation offered. The series would commence with the explanation of a possessing spirit, and end with that given by modern science. Ignorant of the nature, or even of the existence, of a nervous system, primitive man explains abnormal mental states as due to a malignant spirit. Martin Luther, George Fox, or John Bunyan, living at a time when the activity of a personal devil was one of the most firmly held of religious beliefs, are convinced of satanic activity as the cause of their affections. All the phenomena on which the animistic explanation rested are still with us, but they are described, and prescribed for, in medical manuals instead of in manuals of exorcism. The religious theory gives way to that of the expert neurologist. The exorcist is replaced by the physician. To argue that while the mental states remain constant, their causes may have been different in earlier ages, is sheer absurdity. To claim that the religious mystic is, in moments of exaltation, brought into touch with a "deeper reality," is to invite the retort that one might, with equal truth, say the same of the inmates of a lunatic asylum. It may be quite true that there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in our philosophy, but there is no need to make this a ground for useless speculation and grotesque theory. It is far more useful to drive home the much-needed lesson that there are few things in heaven or earth that will not yield their secrets to a method of investigation that is sanely conceived and diligently employed.

C. COHEN.

(To be concluded.)

Christian Lying.

THE Bishop of Southwell, according to a report in the Burton Evening Gazette for January 14, told a Derby audience that "the Midland Railway Company had created a class of men of which any town might be proud." By its "very rules the moral standard of the employees was lifted." Now, these people, whose moral standard was lifted, and of whom any town might be proud, were further described by his lordship as being, "generally speaking, not hostile to religion," while "an enormous mass of them was on its side, although they might not always attend church." Whether Dr. Hoskyns's estimate of the character of the Midland Railway's employees is accurate or not we do not know, and we also lack first-hand information as to their general attitude to religion. If we doubt the correctness of the Bishop's characterisation of them, we do so simply because he went out of his way to misrepresent what he called "the Atheistic propagandist" of to-day. This hateful pariah is not so prominent now as he was thirty years ago, and his lordship found that "intellectually he was falling short of those whom he sought to convert to his views." How many Atheistic propagandists did the Bishop know thirty years ago, and of how many has he any personal knowledge to-day? To under estimate an enemy is a proverbial human weakness, and it is quite evident that Dr. Hoskyns suffers severely from it. The high intellectuality of Atheists, as a class, is unquestionable. Only a person endowed with a considerable amount of brains is capable of becoming a convinced Atheist. The moment a man becomes a critic he ceases to be a good believer. The more a man thinks for himself the less grows the area of his faith. It is not so long ago since we read of a preacher who asked the Lord to help him to believe and to deliver him from the evil of thinking. Had that minister been guilty of real thinking he could not have indulged in such a silly prayer.

The truth is, that all genuine Atheists are such as the result of very serious thinking, while Christians are generally encouraged to depreciate the intellect and enthrone what is called intuition. One of the charges against the present age is its so-called excessive intellectualism. The reason, we are told, should be of secondary value and importance in human life, the first place rightly belonging to sanctified emotion. Such is the general teaching, though there are a few notable exceptions to it. Surely the Bishop of Southwell must be aware that intellectually very few preachers are shining lights. "Dry as a sermon" is a most familiar comparison. The inferior intellectuality of theologians is proved by the ease with which many of them accept the theory of evolution and combine it with their theology, though the former is of necessity the complete negation of the latter. Fancy an evolutionist defining the Divine Fatherhood as "God's self-reproduction in man!" Then God began to reproduce himself when the first tiny mass of living slime appeared a hundred million years ago; and the process went on without interruption, now producing wolves, tigers, and snakes, and now the birds of the air, until man came forth, who, by eating the forbidden fruit, arrested "God's self-production." The inference is, that when man fell, God ceased to reproduce himself. Then fancy, if you can, an evolutionist defining sin as "no part of evolution, not the remains of the brute, but the initial lapse of the race at its individual start." Here is another brilliant definition of sin: "It is not the failure of a son, but the failure to become a son." Take another instance of theological intelligence:—

> "If the purposive element of evolution be the racial reproduction of the Divine image, it is manifestly incongruous to attribute to an abnormal, degenerated species an individual deathlessness which can propagate itself indefinitely and permanently in the ever multiplying members of a sinful race."

If that be the case, there must be either redemption or annihilation for such a race of sinners; and individuals are represented as free to choose either the one or the other. But what is redemption? Astonishing to relate, it is defined as "the recovery of the vanishing environment," whatever on earth or in heaven that may mean. Seriously we do not think that, intellectually, an average "Atheistic propagandist" falls far short of the author of such amazing definitions as those just given.

But theologians are in the habit not only of under-estimating their enemies, but of under-estimating them in order to over-estimate themselves and the might of their religion. There is a striking example of this evil habit in "The Correspondence of Rev. Prof. David Smith, D.D.," in the British Weekly for January 16. The Professor is dealing with the case of a certain local preacher who is troubled over 2 Tim. iii. 13: "But evil men and impostors shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." We have no fault whatever to find with Dr. Smith's interpretation of that verse, though there is the utmost uncertainty as to by whom and when it was written. Even on the assumption, adopted by the reverend gentleman, that this epistle was sent to Timothy by Paul when a prisoner at Rome in the reign of Nero, the picture of Rome painted here is horribly exaggerated. It is as follows:—

> "It was an age of gross superstition, the golden age of charlatans. The ancient religions were dead, and the souls of men, with their ineradicable need of God, had fallen a prey to impostors—astrologers, sorcerers, and diviners. Nowhere was the evil so rife as at Rome, the imperial capital, whither all the rascality of the world streamed, in Sallust's phrase, as into a common cesspool; and Paul, a prisoner awaiting his final judgment before Nero, was in the thick of the moral pestilence, and breathed its poisoned atmosphere. It is interesting to recall that at that very crisis Apollonius of Tyana, that prince of charlatans, was at Rome, the hero of that deluded populace."

It is impossible to pass over in silence Dr. Smith's gross misrepresentation of the famous Pagan, Apollonius of Tyana. He was anything but the "prince of charlatans." Neander, the distinguished ecclesiastical historian, describes him as a man of great gifts and exalted character, whose one object was to restore Paganism to its primitive simplicity and beauty. Such was his humanity to animals that he refused, even on the invitation of a king, to take part in the chase (Lecky's History of European Morals, vol. ii., p. 165). He has the credit of having caused the abolition of the cruel gladiatorial games at Athens some two hundred years before Honorius abolished them in Rome. As a contrast to Dr. Smith's caricature, take the following picture by Professor W. M. Flinders Petrie:—

> "How then should we regard Apollonius? Certainly not as the originator of any new gospel or beliefs, but as a revivalist whose power lay in exhortation and moral rebuke; without much sense of humor, to save him from being over-didactic; but with purity of motive and disinterestedness which gave him a great power over communities sunk in effeminacy and selfishness.....A preacher but not an apostle, a saint but not a prophet, must be our appreciation of Apollonius of Tyana" (Personal Religion in Egypt Before Christianity, p. 165).

Dr. Smith has proved, on several occasions, his utter incapacity to be just to a Pagan.

He seems equally incapable of doing justice to Paganism and Pagans generally. Nero was undoubtedly a bad man, but he had his good points. It was he who appointed a magistrate to hear the complaints of the slaves against their masters, and to punish the latter when guilty of barbarous treatment, of making their slaves instruments of lust, or of withholding from them a sufficient supply of the necessaries of life (Seneca, De Benef., iii. 22). In the first years of his reign it was his strong wish to abolish taxes, and he would have done so had it not been for the opposition of the senators who praised his magnanimity. The court was certainly extremely corrupt; but it was not nearly so corrupt as the Christian Church was in the tenth century during the supremacy of "the Pornocracy." What does Professor Smith think of Popes Sergius III., John X., John XI., and John XII.? Does he not know that they were morally worse than the worst people that surrounded Nero? Has he not read that when the Emperor Otto the Great instituted a strict inquiry into the character and habits of the pontiff there was disclosed the most abandoned profligacy? And yet, with all these horrible facts staring him in the face, Dr. Smith has the temerity to affirm that "all down the ages God has been working out the redemption of the world and raising humanity, by the patient process which science calls evolution, ever nearer and nearer to the ideal which was revealed in our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." It is as black a lie as was ever told. If we take the testimony of only Church historians, we learn that between the fourth century and the middle of the eleventh there was steadily going on a downward evolution. Instead of rising, humanity was sinking deeper and deeper into moral degradation. When Christianity was most powerful, Christendom wallowed in the foulest moral gutters. He who runs may read all this in the annals of the past. During the centuries that Christianity reigned alone, having forcibly suppressed all rivals, the world kept getting worse, which proves beyond the possibility of a doubt to unprejudiced people that Christianity has been from the beginning a gigantic failure; and its failure can only be accounted for by the fact that it is entirely false. Christendom did not begin to get better until secular forces came into operation and gradually broke the monopoly so long enjoyed by the Church; and it has been and is improving almost in the exact proportion in which the Church has been and is being deprived of its power.

In spite of the fact that Christianity is now rapidly dying, its official defenders declare that it is about to march on to final victory; but truth is great and shall prevail. O Science, thou hast conquered.

A Neglected Humorist.

> "John P. Robinson, he > Sez they didn't know everything down in Judee."
> —Biglow Papers.

THERE is more in a laugh than meets the ear. Everybody has laughed at least once in a lifetime, not excepting the professional bodyguard of the Man of Sorrows, whose perennial rigidity of features has always been the cause of the polite wonder of outsiders. Even priests laugh in private. Laughing is, happily, a more common indulgence than weeping, although the ever-growing sternness of the battle of life is tending to the elimination of real, hearty laughter. There is, moreover, an increasing body of laughless folk who regard the indulgence as ill-bred, if not criminal. They join cause with my Lord Chesterfield, who congratulated himself on the fact that since he had full use of his reason nobody had heard him laugh.

The function of the laugh-maker is underestimated. The man who grins at you through a horse-collar, and sets you laughing back at him, does you a great service. The physiological value of laughter has never been correctly appraised. Although doctors bestow a certain patronage on cheerfulness, and give it a minor place in the pharmacopœia, no one will dispute that the humorists are the benefactors of society. Yet, with the exception of Moliere, Rabelais, and Dickens, humorous writers are held to be only second-rate artists. The world will not take them seriously. Perhaps it is their own fault for electing to provide mirth for sober folk. Many jesters are neglected worthy of more than passing attention.

Take "Dod Grile" for example. Why his books are not so popular as those by Mark Twain, Max Adeler, or Artemus Ward is a mystery. That he is as funny as either is evident. If his humor is not appreciated by the public to the extent of those others, it may be because he has chosen to expend it largely upon a disrespectful perversion of religion. The proper study of mankind is man, and possibly the only burlesque that causes the wide mouth of the general public to broaden to a grin must also concern nature, and not the alleged supernatural. "Dod Grile" deserves a place beside the other jesters mainly because his work is of a rarer quality than theirs. Ambrose Bierce, for that was his correct name, was a journalist who was for many years connected with the London Figaro, Fun, and other humorous periodicals. He published two volumes, with the quaint titles, The Fiend's Delight and Cobwebs from an Empty Skull, under his nom de plume of "Dod Grile," and a third, In the Midst of Life, with his own name on the title. The two former books were as full of profanity as an egg is full of meat. Indeed, the title-page of The Fiend's Delight was ornamented with a drawing showing a devil toasting a tiny baby at a large fire, whilst in the body of the work the Christian superstition fares as badly as it did in the hands of Colonel Ingersoll. In the Midst of Life, which is far and away the most popular volume issued by Bierce, is a collection of short stories, mostly tragic, and all written with the hand of a master.

The gems of humor scattered throughout his writings would make the fortune of a comic writer. Here are a few taken at random:—

> "I once knew a man who made me a map of the opposite hemisphere of the moon. He was crazy. I knew another who taught me what country lay upon the other side of the grave. He was a most acute thinker—as he had need to be."
> "The Psalmist never saw the seed of the righteous begging bread. In our day they sometimes request pennies for keeping the street corners in order."
> "It is wicked to cheat on Sundays. The law recognises this truth, and shuts up the shops."
> "If a jackass were to describe the deity, he would represent him with long ears and a tail. Man's ideal is the higher and truer; he pictures him as somewhat resembling a man."
> "Camels and Christians receive their burdens kneeling."
>
> "Most people have no more definite idea of liberty than that it consists in being compelled by law to do as they like."
> "People who honor their fathers and their mothers have the comforting promise that their days shall be long in the land. They are not sufficiently numerous to make the life-assurance companies think it worth their while to offer them special rates."
> "Everybody professes to know that it would be difficult to find a needle in a haystack, but very few reflect that this is because haystacks seldom contain needles."
> "In calling a man a hog, it is the man who gets angry, but it is the hog who is insulted. Men are always taking up the quarrels of others."

But to pick out passages at haphazard is not doing justice to a clever jester. Not only does a jest's prosperity lie in the ear of him who hears it, but it has its life in an atmosphere of its own, and there are few plants so tender in the transplanting. While the creator of Dr. Dooley is welcomed, and the author of Three Men in a Boat is passing popular, one cannot help regretting the inadequate appreciation "Dod Grile" has won. Of course, all reading people must needs know his writings, but that the larger public should not have an opportunity of testing what he has written is unsatisfactory.

MIMNERMUS.

FETISHISM.

It is profoundly curious that in a city like Paris, which inherits the civilisation of Greece and of Rome, and after the progress of science accomplished during the last four centuries, there are still minds so belated or rudimentary as to represent the world as the work of a supreme being, who is a kind of almighty machine constructor, like Edison or Eiffel.

This fetishism, this African theology, this Papuan philosophy, belongs not only to the different Churches—Jewish, Christian, or Moslem, fossil débris of early ages of thought vainly trying to comprehend the world. Even present-day teachers seem as little emancipated in this particular as the magistrates, the politicians, and the common run of writers. The words, "God," "Providence," "soul," "immortality," are retained as much in the academies and the chairs of education as in synagogues, mosques, or churches. Since all infirmities are worthy of compassion, perhaps this is a sore which respect for humanity might interdict exposing to daylight; even the animals lick their ulcers. How long will this immense flock of deicoles make us assist at the spectacle of their superstition? There seems to be no remedy—at least, for all those who have neither the leisure to learn nor the power to reflect. We must take account of them. It has ever been thus, and perhaps will be always so. Democritus and Protagoras hardly found themselves in any better company.

I say this spectacle is profoundly curious. I say no more. To be astonished is simple; to be angry extremely bad taste. The naturalist who studies the social life of hymenoptera soon ceases either to admire or be indignant at the doings or antics of bees, wasps, and ants. When young, we dreamt of reforming the world; later, we held that all is probably for the best, or for the least evil in the human ant-hill.

Besides, to one who follows and observes, even from afar, the transformations of the public mind, it becomes evident that the leaders of opinion, who are always in reality serfs, do little beyond transposing the political institutions or the religious and metaphysical beliefs of a nation. These great players on the lyre sing and play in one key that which has been noted in another. That is all. But fetishism loses nothing by all this. The Mexicans have placed at the feet of the Pope a crown of gold and precious stones destined for some statue of the Virgin. Leo XIII. blesses the crown at audiences accorded to the academicians. The French raise statues to their heroes, and, above all, to their heroine. The worship of Joan of Arc succeeds to that of the Madonna, as this last succeeded the worship of Isis. Yet these are men of the nineteenth century, doubtless in possession of "integral instruction," and not poor, ignorant monks. Well, in my opinion, this fetishism is well worth that of the Eternal Father.

I say that the most striking result of the knowledge of the world and of life, accumulated during two thousand years in human brains, is not that there is no God, Providence, immortal soul, etc., but that it is useless to discuss, save as an historian of language and ideas, conceptions which have been as necessary, but are as childish, as those of the devil, of ghosts, or of phlogisticon. No instructed person, capable of reflection, provided sincere and not under the weight of inherited physiological fatalities, admits that the causes of things are to be sought for outside the universe itself—that is to say, in nothingness; for what can there be outside all? The sane and penetrating reason of the old Greek philosophers long since posited the problem in the same terms as Laplace and Darwin.

I know well, and profess, that we have not, and cannot have, any other knowledge of ourselves and of the universe than one which is subjective and ideal, and that the reality of things is only a postulate. Such is the result of an analysis of the human understanding. But if the last word of science should be a supreme avowal of ignorance, assuredly it will not be an act of faith. It is not enough to be ignorant that one must also be a dupe? Nothing, absolutely nothing, as far as we can penetrate into infinity, leads us to think that that which now exists has not ever existed, under some form and in some condition. Nothing suggests the idea that the universe does not suffice for itself, its own cause, or, as says St. Beuve, all can be deduced from the eternity of matter.

That this matter is neither brute nor inert, in the sense of antique atomism, may be seen by the physico-chemical sciences. But if for life and the elementary properties of life the same eternity may be argued as for force and matter, it does not follow, in my opinion, that we must place consciousness among these, or any consciousness whatever among those primordial properties which are common to inorganic and organic existences. Nothing reveals the existence of consciousness, however elementary, neither in the sidereal universe, nor in the life of plants, nor in that of animals, until physiological division of labor has determined the appearance of nervous structure.—Jules Soury.

GOD'S GOODNESS.

We were told that there is a purpose in suffering. Easy words to utter! but they carry no balm of consolation to my mind. I have witnessed suffering: I have felt a little, and witnessed much. This suffering is a grim fact. You say there is a purpose in it. Tell us what you mean by a purpose. A purpose must have some sort of explanation. Do not call it a purpose unless you can give us some indication of what the purpose is. The general theory is that suffering is for the education, and chiefly the moral education, of the race. Ah, but it gets distributed in the wrong way. And there comes a time when suffering, instead of helping you, thrusts you down, degrades you, brings you to impotence, abjectness, and despair. If the suffering is for education in ethics, how is it that the very poorest, who, by the hard labor of their lives, are under less temptation than the idle or luxurious, get by far the most of it, while the idle and luxurious frequently go scot free? I see no purpose in this at all. Why, we actually band ourselves together to abolish or diminish the very suffering which you say is so beautifully designed. God has a purpose in inflicting it, and we put the sufferers into a place we call a hospital, and we say to the men of science "fight it." We appoint nurses, and we say to them "fight it." We ask the public at large to find the money to assist in doing away with it. God is sending the suffering for moral purposes, and we are striving to abolish it, and so to prevent the ethical education which you say God intends by his inflictions.

God, we are told, has a right to take the life he sends. For the sake of argument, I will not impugn that. There is no time to discuss it. But, assuming that God has the right to take life, let us see how it works out. Under the law we have the right to take life. A criminal is tried and sentenced to execution. But society insists that, if he is to be killed, he shall be killed in the most painless manner possible. We insist that the hanging shall be done with the utmost dispatch. In America they are trying whether electricity is not even less painful than hanging. In short, although we must (as we say) kill (though I doubt if anybody has that right), still, if we must kill, we are refined enough to say we must kill swiftly and painlessly. But that is not God's method; what we see in nature is not swift killing; it is slow killing. When man is killed by "the act of God," it is often done very slowly; not in a moment as by the hangman's noose or by electrocution. A lingering disease comes on and kills him week by week, month by month, and year by year. It is an agonising form of cruelty. If God has the right to take life, I deny that he has the right to take it in that way. If life must be taken, it should be taken swiftly and painlessly. All this cruelty in nature, all this killing of human beings by slow disease and long agony, gives the lie to the statement that your God is a being of infinite kindness and love.—G. W. Foote, "Theism or Atheism: Which is the More Reasonable?"

No matter whose lips that speak, they must be free and ungagged. Let us believe that the whole truth can never do harm to the whole of virtue; and remember that in order to get the whole truth you must allow every man, right or wrong, freely to utter his conscience, and to protect him in so doing. Entire unshackled freedom for every man's life, no matter what his doctrine—the safety of free discussion no matter how wide its range. The community which dares not trust a member in the free utterance of his opinions, no matter how false or hateful, is only a gang of slaves.—Wendell Phillips.

Acid Drops.

As compared with the French or German working man the English working man is very much of a Philistine. He is quite right in fighting for better wages and fewer hours of labor, but he ought not to stop there. It is stupid on his part to shut his eyes, for instance, to the Education question. Apart from the intellectual and æsthetic aspects of this question, there is the social and political fact that it is through their superior education that the "upper" classes govern the "lower" classes. If the "upper" classes had the same knowledge, the same manners, and the same ways of speech that the "lower" classes display, their dominance would be an impossibility. Even from that point of view the working people should be anxious to secure the best possible education for their children. At present they get almost the worst possible education. The reason is that the higher development of education is sacrificed to the quarrel of the Churches over the question of who shall control the religious instruction in the schools. And the only way to terminate that quarrel is to remove the subject of religion altogether. Hence the necessity—to say nothing of the utility—of Secular Education. Once establish that system in the schools and the higher education would go forward with leaps and bounds.

Working-class leaders used to recognise this, and the Trade Union Congress passed a resolution in favor of Secular Education at every annual meeting. Catholic miners, however, under the direction of their priests, have succeeded, not in getting a resolution passed against Secular Education, but in shunting it altogether. Under the pretence that the debate on Secular Education was a religious controversy, they induced the last Congress to decide that the question should not be allowed to appear on future Agendas. The Catholic Church was always clever, and that was one of its cleverest moves. Without defeating Secular Education the Catholics have got it put out of the way. And this seems quite the proper policy to some persons who are not Catholics. Here is the Daily Citizen crying out against the Government for declaring that its next task will be the reorganisation of the Education system. What do we want of a new Education Bill, our contemporary cries? Why stir up religious controversy again? Why not go on with "social reform"? The obvious answer is that improved education is at the bottom of all reform. The children of to-day will be the men of to-morrow. The better the material the better the structure. Never mind the material (the Daily Citizen says in effect), let us hurry on with the building. Which does not look like wisdom.

Religion spoils everything it touches. It often makes the most serious things absurd, and the best of things contemptible. It was with mixed feelings that we read the following announcement in the Daily News (Jan. 16):—

> "By arrangement with various bodies interested in the suffrage question, February 1, St. Bride's Day, will be held as a day of special meditation and intercession in Westminster Abbey, in St. Paul's, and in various cathedrals, chapels, and churches throughout Great Britain.
> "An appeal to men and women to keep five minutes at noon for silent remembrance and prayer during the week January 20 to 27, during which days the suffrage question will be before the Commons, is signed by many influential personages, including Archdeacon Wilberforce, the Rev. John Clifford, D.D., Muriel Countess De La Warr, the Rev. Percy Dearmer, D.D., Mrs. Florence Bramwell Booth, Miss Lena Ashwell, the Rev. J. Scott Lidgett, J. Forbes Robertson, and Gertrude Forbes Robertson, etc.
> "An all-day devotional meeting will be held on Monday next by the Free Church League for Woman Suffrage at Caxton Hall."

Nations have always prayed for victory for themselves and defeat for their enemies. This practice is now, apparently, to be extended to the warfare of political parties. God Almighty is to be asked to take sides in our public disputes. One lot of supplicators will beseech the Deity to favor Mr. Asquith; another lot will beseech him to favor Mr. Bonar Law. Mr. Lloyd George and the British Medical Association will both have the help of their prayerful partisans. What will the poor Deity do between them? His best policy is to do nothing—for disappointment is generally stronger than gratitude. And then the unfairness of it. For a whole week the ladies are to tease and coax the Lord into deciding, over the heads of members, the voting on a Bill in the House of Commons. Now if this can be done successfully in regard to one Bill it can be done successfully with regard to others. And as nobody can tell what "God" will do at the finish, politics would become a mere lottery. Speeches and arguments would have nothing to do with the fate of any measure. Even the Referendum would be useless. On the whole, we think that all the gods should be warned off the political field, leaving it entirely to the people's representatives.

Another point! Archdeacon This and the Rev. Mr. That naturally believe in prayer. It is their business. But do the ladies themselves really believe that all the prayer in the world could batter down the male opposition to the female franchise? If they do believe this, it is very cruel on their part to resort to assault and arson. If they do not believe it, they are simply playing to the gallery. We strongly advise them to play their game according to the best rules, without the help of "God" or his agents. It is the belief that they would use their vote under the control of the clergy that makes a large number of men hesitate to entrust them with it. This may be unjust, but is a fact, and has to be taken into account.

Why not? Dr. Miller, in an address before the Medical Society of London, said that the one thing a drunkard felt was physical pain. He therefore advocated that the chronic drunkard should be flogged. We have not had to wait long for the House of Commons' vote in favor of flogging to find imitators. And, of course, if flogging is able to stop one thing, why not another? It is a short and easy method of dealing with objectionable persons and things. Moreover, it is a doctrine that, to use a common phrase, appeals to the meanest intelligence—and, we should add, the meaner the intelligence the stronger the appeal. In a general way we should advise Dr. Miller to stick to whatever other subjects he happens to understand, for it is quite evident that he does not understand that of alcoholism. Still, if the arguments in favor of flogging are good enough in relation to the "White Slave Traffic," we do not see why they are not equally good with regard to other offences. And so we ask, Why not?

The sooner our penal system is taken out of the hands of pietists and ex-military men the better. The same people who cry out for "more flogging" are the people who support the senseless and degrading system which now exists. Mr. Thomas Holmes has just been pointing out that about a million persons, during the past ten years, have been imprisoned quite needlessly. Being fined for trivial offences, and not having the money in their pockets at the moment, they have been refused a few days' grace in which to obtain it, and treated as hardened criminals. The thing is so utterly silly and brutal that one wonders how even "God's Englishmen" can stand it.

It is fortunate for some people that a district can be slandered with impunity. If one says that John Smith, of a certain address in Wandsworth, is a blackguard, that is actionable; but if you say the whole of Wandsworth is vile, you are quite safe. Now, the Rev. T. L. B. Westerdale, of Streatham, writes that when it was announced at a Picture Palace that the place would be open on Sundays, the information "was greeted again and again with hisses." From this Mr. Westerdale draws two conclusions:—

(1) Streatham is respectable;
(2) The Methodist Church here is alive.

Now, these are horrible things to say of any person, and they are quite as objectionable when said of a locality. Certainly no one with any sense of moral responsibility would make these charges without the strongest provocation and without their being accompanied by the clearest of proof. We know that many districts in and around London are not all that they should be, but we do not believe there is any adequate reason for selecting Streatham for special denunciation. At any rate, if this is the kind of feeling towards one's neighbor that Christian charity develops, the less we have of it the better.

Mr. Harry Elmore continues, in the Methodist Times, to narrate his experiences of how Londoners spend Sunday. On this occasion he deals with Brixton and East Ham. In Brixton he found a number of picture palaces open. The crowd was, as usual, well-behaved and appreciative. "The pictures are of the usual healthy type—the 'moral' of the picture story.....being always a good one." In East Ham the only brightly lighted street was High-street. There were crowds of young men and women perambulating the streets, and Mr. Elmore was struck by the "apathetic" look on the majority of faces. There is no sign of keen poverty, but there is an absence of enjoyment. Mr. Elmore inquired of a policeman if there were any picture palaces open, and was told, No. Asking where people went when it was wet, the policeman said, "Don't know, sir. Some go to the pubs, I suppose." Mr. Elmore rightly concludes that "The people seem to be simply aimless, wanting somewhere to go, and the publichouse is the only place that attracts many of them when the streets fail," and also that "To sit in a picture palace might be a better proceeding than this aimless strolling." Some of the readers of the Methodist Times will probably have their eyes opened by Mr. Elmore's articles; some of them may be brought to realise the truth that the Christian Sunday has been and is one of the most potent forces for demoralisation that we have. For ourselves we are curious to see the kind of moral—suitable to the Methodist Times—Mr. Elmore will draw when he has completed his investigations.

"From Manger to Cross," described as "A Cinematograph Representation of the Life of Jesus of Nazareth," is still going strong at the Albert Hall. "From Annunciation to Ascension" would be a truer title. But neither the first nor the last incident in the Gospel story of Jesus could be presented in a picture show. The Annunciation is too ticklish; the Ascension is too farcical.

"Joseph and His Brethren" is drawing crowds to a picture show in New York. Presumably a lot of the attraction is due to Mrs. Potiphar's courtship of il casto Giuseppe. Another story with two ladies in it would no doubt draw even better. We refer to Lot and his daughters.

Some time ago, in "Literary Gossip," we drew attention to Great Thoughts quoting a poem of James Thomson's as one of William Blake's. It first appeared at the end of Thomson's essay on Blake in his early contributions to the National Reformer. Fifty years afterwards it is printed as Blake's own, and Thomson's authorship is dropped out altogether. And this seems likely to continue, in spite of our correction. The blunder reappeared in the Westminster Gazette the other night (Jan. 16) in an editorial on "London and Its Directory":—

> "'The Desert of London Town,' with its 'grey miles long' and its 'mirk miles broad,' as William Blake once described it.'"

Nothing of the sort. It should be "as James Thomson once described it, in relation to William Blake." To speak plainly, we regard this kind of blunder as quite inexcusable. No one with an ear for poetry could take "grey miles long" or "mirk miles broad" as William Blake's work. It is James Thomson's work all over.

More accurate quotations! Christians seem blessed with a mania in this direction. Rev. R. J. Campbell, in one of his recent City Temple sermons, reported in the Christian Commonwealth, quoted Henley's "Out of the night that covers me," and this is how he did it,—at least this is how it appeared in the New Theology's weekly:—

> "Out of the night that covers me,
> Black as the pit from pole to pole,
> I thank whatever gods there be
> For my unconquerable soul."

"There be" is wrong—and badly wrong. Henley wrote "may be." And if Mr. Campbell fancies his misquotation is as good as the original he lacks both ear and understanding.

By far the most complete, and we are afraid, deliberate misrepresentation of historic truth in the interests of Christianity that we have seen for some time occurs in a couple of articles by the Rev. Percy Dearmer in recent issues of Everyman. He writes on the "Cross and the Crescent," his purpose being to prove the inferiority of Mohammedanism when compared with Christianity. His method is a simple one, although it is a plan that would only be pursued by either a fool or a knave. Certain countries under Mohammedan rule are inferior to other countries where Christianity is prevalent. Therefore, the superiority of these latter countries is due to Christianity. The centre of civilisation has drifted away from two sides of the Mediterranean, northward and westward, and the reason for this is to be found in the rise of Mohammedanism, which destroyed civilisation wherever it exerted an influence. And so on, and so forth. This is the history of an old-fashioned Christian Evidence lecturer. Many of even this class are beyond that to-day, but Dr. Dearmer has revived it in a journal that boasts of its claims to represent modern culture. Even schoolboys are taught the reasons for the decline of power on the shores of the Mediterranean, apart from religion. Dr. Dearmer never appears to have heard of such causes—at least, he is careful not to mention them.

But Dr. Dearmer's crowning misrepresentation is contained in his treatment of Spain. After noting the check received to the Mohammedan Conquest in 732, Dr. Dearmer says:—

> "Yet Spain itself remained under the Moors until the fifteenth century. Perhaps, when we speak of Spanish cruelties and the horrors of the Inquisition in the sixteenth, we ought to remember that. The other nations of Christendom have been slow enough in learning the lessons of mercy, peace, and goodwill among men; and it is not to be wondered at that Spain was slower still."

If this passage means anything, it means that the backward condition of Spain and the cruelties of the Spanish Church, including the Inquisition, were due to the influence of the Mohammedan rulers, who kept the country in a backward condition and developed habits of cruelty. And such a position is so monstrously untrue, so plainly at variance with facts noted in almost every history of Spain written which deals with the Mohammedan period, that Dr. Dearmer can hardly be unaware of the truth. At any rate, we hesitate to charge him with such miraculous ignorance without positive proof.

For the facts, as we say, are so easily got at. Buckle, Draper, Lea, Prescott, Hallam, Renan, the writers of the articles on this topic in any decent Encyclopædia, all point out that under Mohammedan rule Spain, or the portion under its control, was the most civilised and most tolerant place in the Western world. They led the way in all the sciences, they taught the men who brought about the awakening of Europe. They developed the commerce, the agriculture, the trade of Spain. They made Spain a wealthy civilised country. And the same authorities point out that expelling the Jews and Mohammedans destroyed the trade and commerce of Spain, crippled its scientific activity, and left it, as Buckle said, proud of having all that a nation should be ashamed of possessing.

The statement concerning the Inquisition is, we are afraid, a deliberate untruth. Mohammedanism had no such institution. No other religion ever had such a damnable instrument of religious defence. The Spanish Mohammedans allowed Christians and Jews to fill public offices, while in the rest of Europe Christianity was butchering heretics and sending scholar after scholar to linger in Christian prisons. It was Christian intolerance that set the example of butchery in the name of religion, and which made Spain a byword for all that was backward and mentally repulsive. The facts are well known to all with the slightest pretence to a knowledge of history. Anyone will find them well set forth in Mr. H. C. Lea's authoritative work, The Moriscoes of Spain. We can only congratulate Dr. Dearmer on his profound faith in the ignorance of the public to which he addresses himself.

An evening paper has been discussing the question, "Are we too busy to think?" It is a stupid way of putting it, because the busier a man is, the more he thinks—about the things that keep him busy. The vital question is not even whether we think, it is rather "What is it that we are thinking about?" There is no lack of thinking in the world, but there is a lack of right thinking, and of things that are worthy of attention. There is a lack of mental proportion abroad which leads many to place in the front rank things that are of quite a subordinate importance, and delegate prime things to the rear. The man who is spending his energies in going one better than his neighbor in social display, is thinking, within the limits of his capacity, as hard as a philosopher, but he is using his mental energy on a matter of no real importance whatever. The people who, preaching from one year's end to another about God, or a future life, or some other religious dogma, are thinking, but their thinking involves a misunderstanding and a misinterpretation of matters that are of infinitely greater consequence. No, we are never too busy to think, but we are often too ill-informed or too poorly trained to think about the right things. And it is how we think, and what we think about, that is of primary importance.

"Can Methodism Save its Soul?" asks the editor of the Methodist Times. We are reminded of Oliver Wendell Holmes' remark that when a man is always worrying whether his soul will be damned, he will usually be found to have a soul that isn't worth a damn. Whether Methodism can save its soul or not is, perhaps, an important question to Methodists. For our part, we have never seen any reason for believing that it has a soul worth preserving.

"A reminder of the grip which the old superstitions retain on present generations comes from Virginia, where a case has been carried up to the Supreme Court of Appeals because of the ruling of Judge Martin of the Court of Law and Chancery at Norfolk that an Atheist is a competent witness. The witness was N. M. Osborne, Jnr., of Norfolk, who disclaimed any belief in a supreme being. Judge Martin held that under the statute based upon the bill of Religious Freedom, as originally drawn by Thomas Jefferson, no man's civil capacities can be diminished because of his opinion on matters of religion, and he permitted Osborne to testify. It appears that affirmation as a substitute for swearing is unknown in Virginia, for which reason the witness took the Bible oath; but because of his unbelief the case will go up to the Appeals Court for a decision on his competence. That such a question could arise in Virginia shows a degeneration since the days of its great statesman, the collaborator of Paine in the production of the Declaration of Independence—Thomas Jefferson."—Truthseeker (New York).

We thought the London Signal was a sporting paper. Would it were so honest a journal! we might now say, with a recollection of Hamlet's words to Polonius. We find it is edited by the Rev. C. Silvester Horne—the gentleman who won a safe seat for Ipswich in the House of Commons, where, by the way, he seems to be a failure. Someone has sent us a cutting from the January number of the magazine, containing an answer to the question "Is Christianity Failing?" Of course, the answer may be guessed. Who would go to Mr. Horne or his paper for a straight reply? Why should he cry stinking fish, and give his business away? He does nothing of the sort. Christianity may be losing ground in England, but it is gaining in China—where our Christian Government seems to be bent on forcing some millions of pounds' worth of opium upon the Heathen Celestials—in spite of treaties, justice, and common decency. Mr. Horne finds comfort, too, in Mr. Joseph Hocking's statement that "Crude infidelity of the Bradlaugh and Ingersoll school is practically dead." Fancy a creature like Horne calling Bradlaugh and Ingersoll crude! Let him try his hand at answering Bradlaugh's Plea for Atheism or Doubts in Dialogue. He might find on any single page of Ingersoll enough wisdom and wit to last him a lifetime.

"Even Agnosticism," Mr. Horne rejoices, "is by no means so rampant as it used to be." We suppose he means "so prevalent." Who ever saw Agnosticism rampant? Does the reverend gentleman understand this word? Christian preachers—and even Christian journalists—would often be improved by a little study of the Dictionary.

Rev. Robert Louis Wild, M.A., of Hurstmonceaux, patron of the living, which he enjoyed himself for forty-six years, and has bequeathed (with right of presentation) to his son, the Rev. Herbert L. Wild, of Oxford, left £113,715. He desired that his manuscript sermons, manuscripts, and correspondence, should be burnt. Wouldn't it have done to put them in his coffin?

The cracks in St. Paul's are to be mended. But who is to mend the cracks in Christianity?

YOU NEVER CAN TELL.

The following is one of the best Yankee stories I have ever heard. An American was re-visiting the scene of a terrible battle he had been through, and he recognised a hut to which he had crawled after the fight, and where the occupier, a handsome colored woman, had given him food and shelter. He went down to renew his acquaintance with his benefactress, and found her alive and flourishing.

"Good day," said he; "isn't this the place where the famous battle was fought which lasted two days, and—don't you remember me?"

"No, sah," she replied; "I remember the battle, but I don't remember you."

"Come, come," he remarked; "don't you remember a man crawling in here about four o'clock on the second day of the battle, and you giving him some bread?"

The woman looked at him intently, and then asked very slowly: "Are you quite sure that you are de gentleman who came in here 'bout four o'clock ob de second day ob de great battle?"

"Yes," he answered, solemnly; "I swear it's the truth."

Then the benefactress called to someone in the next room, "Lucinda, my girl, come in here right away. Here's your pa."—Lord Rossmore, "Things I Can Tell."

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, January 26, Queen's (Minor) Hall, Langham-place, Regent-street, London, W., at 7.30, "The Function of Atheism."

To Correspondents.

J. BELL (New Zealand).—Thanks for your good wishes. Subscription arranged to start with the year. Shop manager will send you formal receipt.

VAUGHAN GREY.—We received your telegram from Paris at the Annual Dinner. Sorry you could not attend the function. Your "hearty wishes" were realised; it was an "enjoyable evening."

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for cuttings.

E. PACK.—We repeat that while Mr. Blatchford stands as simply the author of the book in which a "blasphemous" passage occurs he cannot be liable to prosecution under the Police Clauses Act. We know no more about Mr. Gott's defence than we found in the book you wrote yourself.

R. BELL.—You complain that we "write too much about London." We were not aware of it. But the Freethinker is edited and published in London, and we naturally know most of what goes on there. You date from Stanley, S.O. We should be happy to report any Freethought work going on there. Is there any?

J. BATESON.—The article you send us from Everyman—which we hoped would be a good paper, but turned out one of the most namby-pamby things we ever saw—is not worth answering in detail. It is said to have been written by "a member of the diplomatic service." Where did he serve? In the kitchen? Anyhow, we will make one remark. It is this. What right have Christians to blame the Turk for fighting in the name of Allah? Don't they fight in the name of Christ? Did not the Bulgarians hold a big dedication service in their biggest church, and did not King Ferdinand assure them that they would march to victory as Soldiers of the Cross? The toleration of the Turks is a matter of history. It can be demonstrated. Christian toleration never existed, except among the smallest of all sects—the Quakers.

G. E. Q.—See "Acid Drops." Thanks.

J. E. R.—Glad to have your encouraging letter, and to know you enjoy the "Literary Gossip" so much.

WELL-WISHER.—Too late for this week.

EDWIN MILLS.—Next week, if possible.

POSTMAN.—Very shortly.

D. LAMBERT.—Gladstone and Stead were brought up as Christians. Their adherence to Christianity counts for nothing. Ingersoll did not disown the appellation of "Atheist." He said that Agnosticism and Atheism were the same thing.

J. SOLOMONS.—Contributions intended for the Freethinker are considered on their merits.

G. F. E. SAMUEL.—Thanks for new year's good wishes.

ARTHUR BROOKES.—There is nothing in your verse likely to lead to a "blasphemy" prosecution.

A good deal of correspondence stands over again unavoidably.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote lectured at Queen's Hall on Sunday evening on "More 'Bradlaugh' Fables." Travelling along to the hall from Fenchurch-street Station, he watched the empty rain-swept streets, and wondered if he would find any audience at all. In the circumstances it was quite a good one, and the lecture was very warmly applauded. Mr. A. B. Moss, who occupied the chair, elicited a few questions from the meeting, but failed to woo any critic on to the platform. Mr. Foote occupies the Queen's Hall platform again to-night (Jan. 26), taking for his subject the important question of "The Function of Atheism."

We were glad to see our old friend, the veteran Mr. Side, of Walworth, at the Annual Dinner, in spite of his eighty-nine years. Barring a slowly increasing deafness he is nearly as lively as ever. He looks forward cheerfully to completing his century. Certainly he has aids in doing this, for he has children and children's children about him to the third and fourth generation.

We were also glad to see our old friends, Mr. and Mrs. G. Alward at the Dinner. They came up from Grimsby, where, in the long-long-ago, we used to enjoy their homely, but generous, hospitality, during our lecture visits. The Secularists had a hall of their own then—and, strange as it sounds, that was their misfortune. They put their money into it, and found it was a white elephant. Hiring halls is, on the whole, better (for Secularists, at least) than acquiring them. It limits responsibility and enables you to see the end of your expenditure.

Mr. Heaford has explained to us how it was that we missed him at the Annual Dinner at the Holborn Restaurant on Tuesday evening, January 14. He labored under the fixed impression that the Dinner was to take place on the Wednesday, and it was the only on going to the Holborn on that evening that he learned of his mistake. The incident has its comic aspect, but its serious aspect too. Mr. Heaford has been overworking himself ever since the martyrdom of Francisco Ferrer. We have strongly advised him to ease off a bit, but he hasn't seen his way to do so. He will have to see it now. Work and worry tell their own tale in time, whether you want them or not.

Mr. Herbert Burrows deserves our thanks—and we are happy in tendering them—for his honest and manly words about Secularists at the close of his article on "Religion and Social Reform" in the Christian Commonwealth of Jan. 8. This article is one of a series which the C. C. has been obtaining under that general title from "distinguished" persons. Rev. E. W. Lewis, who started the discussion, seems to fancy that not even Socialists can live good lives without belief in God. Mr. Burrows hopes Mr. Lewis does not, and never will, mean this nakedly. "I am sure," he says, "Mr. Lewis will not affirm that a good life, a true life, a loving life, a human life, a life which is athirst for the saving of humanity, cannot be lived on the secular basis. If he does so affirm, then he is a dogmatist of the Torquemada Inquisition order."

Miss Kough's audience, considering the weather, was a very good one at the Public Hall, Croydon, on Sunday evening, and her lecture was highly appreciated. Mr. A. B. Moss occupies the same platform this evening (Jan. 26), winding up the present series of lectures there.

Bournemouth is progressing. Six years ago a poll of the ratepayers settled Sunday tramcars by a majority of nearly a thousand against them. Another poll just taken shows a majority of 448 the other way; the full figures being 4,716 for, and 4 268 against. There is hope for all places when Bournemouth turns its back on Sabbatarianism.

A correspondent sends us a little picture from the Daily Mirror of "Pablo Garcia, the Spanish marine who was sentenced to imprisonment for refusing to kneel before the Host"—that is, the priest-manufactured Body of Christ. The young fellow has a fine clear-cut face and his body is as upright as an electric standard. We lift our hat to him.

Acknowledgment of subscriptions to the President's Honorarium Fund for 1913 is postponed till next week, when the Annual Circular will appear in our columns. We shall also have something to say then about the "Fighting Fund" and its object.

As scientific generalisation has steadily extended the region of natural law, the region which theology has assigned to divine action has steadily diminished. Every discovery in science has stripped off territory from the latter province and added it to the former one. Every such discovery has accordingly been promulgated and established in the teeth of bitter and violent opposition on the part of theologians. A desperate fight it has been for some centuries, in which science has won every disputed position, while theology, untaught by perennial defeat, still valiantly defends the little corner which is left of it.—John Fiske.

The Meaning of the Eucharist.

SAVAGE and semi-civilised peoples in all parts of the world have for many ages observed the custom of devouring their divinities. The most sacred mystery of the Christian religion—the Eucharist—is a sacrament of this character. All the innumerable sects into which Christianity is split up, with the solitary exception of the Quakers, celebrate the Lord's Supper, however much they may differ as to its meaning.

We have every reason to believe that the Agapæ, or love-feasts of the early Christians, were combined with the celebration of the Eucharist or Communion. At these love festivals the celebrants partook, in the form of bread and wine, of the body and blood of Jesus, their dead divinity. Down to the end of the second century, the observance of the Agapæ coincides with that of the Eucharist. Whatever these love banquets may, or may not, have been in the "pure ages" of the Church, in the third and fourth centuries they were without doubt joyous gatherings, in which departed relatives and sanctified martyrs were commemorated. It was during this period that the various sections into which the true faith was already segregated openly accused each other of using the Agapæ as a cover for the grossest licentiousness. So great grew the scandal that Church Councils pronounced against them and forbade the priests all participation in their celebration.

It had long been customary for the Greeks and Romans to assemble together to celebrate their sacred anniversaries. As Dr. Conybeare, in his essay on the Eucharist, pointedly remarks:—

> "Professor Sanday has reminded us that Providence even in its revolutions is conservative. The world could only be Christianised on condition that holy days and customs were continued. The early Christian agape admitted of adaptation to older funeral and sacrificial feasts, and was so adapted."

Truly, the solar orb seldom shines on anything theologically new.

The doctrine that the bread and wine consumed at the celebration of the Lord's Supper were, in reality, his body and blood, was not sanctioned by the Church until the eleventh century. It was at the Council of Rome in 1079 that official approval was granted to transubstantiation, and it yet remained for the Fourth Lateran Council at Rome in 1215, held under Innocent III., to pronounce transubstantiation an article of faith. And as such it has continued in the Roman Church ever since.

Many Protestants assume that the communicant drinks the communion wine in the Catholic ceremony. But this assumption is erroneous; the wine, or blood, is reserved to the priest. As the Marquis of Bute states, it has been the rule of the Church since the fifteenth century that the celebrant only (with the exception of the Kings of France at their coronation, and a few of the assistants at a Papal high mass) is permitted to communicate from the chalice.

In his monumental masterpiece, the Golden Bough, that brilliant anthropologist, Professor J. G. Frazer, has gathered together a mass of information relating to the world-wide custom of god eating. Illustrations are furnished by savage, barbarian, and civilised peoples in all parts of the earth.

A very close parallel to the Catholic ceremony is afforded by the ancient Mexican custom of eating a dough image of the Huitzilopochtli as a means of communion with the divinity. Before Mexico was discovered and devastated by the Spaniards, bread was eaten sacramentally as the body of this god. Twice a year an image of the great Mexican deity was made of dough, then broken to pieces, and solemnly eaten. The principal feast was celebrated in spring. According to an eye-witness, a few days before the festival took place, the sacred virgins of the temple prepared a mixture of beet seed and roasted maize, which they moulded with honey. This compound was then fashioned into the likeness of Huitzilopochtli; grains of maize serving for the deity's teeth, and colored grains of glass doing duty for his eyes. The Mexican noblemen then adorned the image with a choice and beautiful garment. The dough divinity was then seated in a chair and carried in a litter on patrician shoulders. An hour before dawn on the morning of the feast, the virgins appeared in white garments and crowned with garlands of maize, while their necks were adorned with chains of corn. Youths attired in red robes and bearing maize then carried the image in its litter to the steps of the temple. It was then solemnly drawn up the steps, performers playing on musical instruments as it ascended, while the people reverently watched the spectacle. When the young men had deposited their holy burden in a bower of roses prepared for its reception in the temple, the interior and exterior of the fane were strewn with floral tributes. The virgins then brought pieces of paste prepared from the same ingredients as the image itself, and these they handed to the young men, who solemnly laid them at the idol's feet. Then the sacred and secular magnates, each according to their dignities and antiquities, proceeded to range themselves in due order about the fragments of paste.

Certain ceremonies, accompanied by singing and dancing, were then gone through, and thus was the dough religiously transformed into the flesh and bones of the god. The paste, having thus been consecrated and blessed, was worshiped by the multitude. The feast and the idol were next celebrated in dance and song. It was absolutely imperative that all should abstain from food and drink at this solemn time, lest the body of the god which the priests afterwards administered in the manner of a communion should be contaminated by contact with ordinary food in the stomachs of the worshipers.

We thus learn that the Mexicans were fully acquainted with the doctrine of the real presence long before their country was invaded and plundered by European adventurers. Dr. Frazer writes:—

> "They believed that by consecrating bread their priests could turn it into the very body of their god, so that all who thereupon partook of the consecrated bread entered into a mystic communion with the deity by receiving a portion of the divine substance into themselves. The doctrine of transubstantiation, or the magical conversion of bread into flesh was also familiar to the Aryans of ancient India long before the spread, or even the rise of Christianity." *

Until recently, the Huichol Indians of Central America, and the Malas of Southern India even now make themselves at one with their gods by eating their effigies. While in modern Europe, as Frazer says,—

> "the Catholic Church has resorted to similar means for enabling the pious to enjoy the ineffable privilege of eating the persons of the Infant God and his Mother. For this purpose images of the Madonna are printed on some soluble and harmless substance and sold in sheets like postage stamps. The worshiper buys as many of these sacred emblems as he has occasion for, and affixing one or more of them to his food, swallows the bolus. This practice is not confined to the poor and ignorant. In his youth Count Hoensbroech and his devout mother used thus to consume portions of God and his mother with their meals."

And, in a footnote, Dr. Frazer states that this practice was officially sanctioned by a decree of the Inquisition, July 29, 1903.

Among uncivilised races there exists an almost universal belief that by eating an animal or plant the eater acquires the distinguishing qualities of the plants or animals in question. Once we realise this we may easily grasp the primitive ideas which underlie the mystery of the Christian communion service. When a savage devours the flesh of an animal or man, he is convinced that he acquires not merely the physical, but also the mental, qualities which characterised these organisms before death. Consequently, when the man or animal is deemed divine, its savage worshiper considers that he absorbs a part of its divinity when he consumes its flesh. Innumerable instances of this belief are known to exist, even in cases in which it is never supposed that the fleshly nourishment is in reality the body or blood of a god. The doctrine, as Frazer says, forms part of a widely distributed system of sympathetic magic.

Some savages refuse to eat venison in case they should become timid like the deer. Certain of the Brazilian tribes will not partake of slow-moving birds, quadrupeds, or fish lest they contract their inactive habits, and thus be unable to flee from their enemies. On the other hand, the Kansas Indians, before entering upon a war, devoured dogs' flesh, which was held to serve the double purpose of rendering them valorous and inspiring them with deathless loyalty to their chiefs. The Miris of Assam "prize tigers' flesh as food for men; it gives them strength and courage. But it is not suited for women; it would make them strong minded." The wolf, bear, leopard, serpents, and other creatures are eaten in various parts of the world, as their flesh imparts wisdom and courage. Certain savages devour the flesh, particularly the hearts of dead men, and drink their blood with the object of acquiring their good qualities. It is said that when Sir Charles McCarthy was killed by the Ashantees in 1824, his heart was eaten by the chiefs of the Ashantee army for the purpose of gaining the dead soldier's courage.

Similar superstitious fancies induced the Central Australian Dieri tribe to take the weapons with which a prisoner had been judicially executed and to wash them in a wooden vessel. The resulting gory liquid was then poured down the throats of the executioners of the tribe. This was supposed to vastly increase their strength and courage for future enterprise. The ethical qualities possessed by the dead are capable of acquisition by the living through simple contact with their bones.

Savages all the world over never doubt that through the transfusion of a few drops of their blood into each other's veins two men at once become kinsmen and allies. Nor does this blood-covenant end with life. Some savages hold that they can become reconciled to their slain foes by swallowing their blood. The fear inspired by their dead enemies' avenging ghosts is thus allayed. It was an article of faith among the Maoris that if they tasted the blood of enemies slain in battle they had nothing to fear from their avenging spirits. Another way of establishing post-mortem harmony is to swallow the ashes of defunct kinsmen or enemies:—

> "Savages also inoculate themselves with moral and other virtues by making cuts in their bodies and inserting in the cuts the ashes of animals and plants in which they suppose to be endowed with the virtues in question. Some savages attempt to acquire the mental and physical qualities of the dead by anointing themselves with their remains."

Sufficient has now been said to explain the savage's custom of eating the flesh of divine animals and men. By eating the body of the god, he participates in the god's attributes and powers. The representative of the corn god is bread. The juice of the grape is the representative of the god of the vine. The juice of the grape is the god's precious blood. And thus it happens that, through eating the bread and drinking the wine, the communicant partakes of the real blood and body of his deity:—

> "Yet a time comes when reasonable men find it hard to understand how anyone in his senses can suppose that by eating bread or drinking wine he consumes the body or blood of a divinity. 'When we call corn Ceres and wine Bacchus,' says Cicero, 'we use a common figure of speech; but do you imagine that anyone is so insane as to believe that the thing he feeds upon is a god.' In writing thus the Roman philosopher little foresaw that in Rome itself, and in the countries which have derived their creed from her, the belief which he here stigmatises as insane was destined to persist for thousands of years, as a cardinal doctrine of religion, among peoples who ride themselves on their religious enlightenment by comparison with the blind superstitions of pagan antiquity. So little can the greatest minds of one generation foresee the devious track which the religious faith of mankind will pursue in after ages."[*]

A Frost Picture by God.

NATURE'S wand had passed over the woods and hills during the hours of our sleep. For weeks our spirits had been dulled to tiredness by the constant closeness, the rain, and mud, and grey, unbroken skies. But the wind had swung swiftly into the north in the night, and had borne down, over the cold seas, from the northern Icelands, bringing on its broad wings change and joy. There were beauty, and health, and happiness, energy and love of life, in the morning, where, the night before, were satiation, weariness, dispiritment, and ugliness.

Within a few hours the roads had become diapered iron. Sheets of white ice hazily reflected the sun's early rays. The cart-ruts through which we had squashed the previous evening were roadway viaducts moulded in beautiful corrugation. The hard earth rang to our feet. Beneath its covering of glistening frost we imagined we could hear its hearty response to our footfalls.

Inclination to woo the fairies of the fireflames had given place to a healthy desire for physical activity. There was a fresh and strong vitality in the mind that urged us outside. The keen, frosty air had awakened within us a demand the house restriction could not supply; and we felt impelled to be energetic, to be out amongst the ensilvered trees, where the robins were chirping and chattering to themselves, seemingly in great glee at their vain attempt to rival their neighbors, the crows, and where a blackie nobly endeavored to introduce a shake into his monotoned music.

The feeling the frost had inspired in our bodies resembled somewhat the mental influence of a dose of Freethought tonic. We were alert, quick, active. There was a new joy in being alive, a keener interest in the things around us, a grander delight in being appreciative. The range of our vision, and its acuteness, were too diminutive to permit us catching and retaining all the wonders we passed. Entwining twigs had been formed into marvellously pretty grottos and palaces, into exquisite designs and rare pictures, all eloquent with beauty, and full of the choicest art. The hedgerows, so lately dark and ugly and funereal in their sombre, rain-sodden hopelessness of spring, were now bright with light and loveliness. Were our eyes entranced by some seemingly daring piece of extravagant design, it was but for a moment; some other more beautiful structure of hedgerow architecture immediately claimed their admiration.

And so we were lured on from picture to picture, along the road gallery, till we reached the hill gate. It seemed like the doorway leading into an annexe, whose contents had been chosen and grouped because of their delicacy. Every leaf of grass was fringed and set with tiny beads of crystallised purity, all sparkling in the sunshine. Every tuft of frost-starred grass entangled the mind in a web of beauty. The tall grass leaves, laden with their wealth of jewels, bent over till their lips touched those of their smaller brothers and sisters, forming miniature caverns into which the sunbeams shot and were kept captives to illume the fragile splendor of the crystal chambers.

The hand of God! No God, although he be never so cunning in artistry, never so full of genius, never so inventively "creative," could have accomplished such a transformation of a few hours. Man's influence in the making of the idea of God is most obvious in God's restrictions. That God may have the suggestion, at least, of comprehensibility, some restriction is inevitable; and God's limitations are gauged by the mental power of his worshipers. They cannot, even if they would, see beyond the limits of their knowledge. As their knowledge is restricted, so is their God. And no man or woman, looking at such a marvellous array of wonderful pictures, of exquisite fragility and sublime exactitude, such as was spread before us on the hillside, could possibly believe a God was the designer. From my own mental experience I am fully convinced that no man in his innermost conscience truthfully believes his God performs these marvels.

The task is too great for a God. It is too stupendous. The result is too lovely. The stupid Christian thinks he believes; the artistically sensitive Christian says he believes; but the former's thought is the last thin smoke column of a dying fire, ascending to lose itself in uncharted immensity, and the latter's professed conviction is a specious superficial tenacity to adhere to beliefs, not because he finds any rationality in them, but because to abjure them would entail, he thinks, discomfort. There is a trace, too, of the child's reactionary obstinacy against a parent's rebuke in his attitude: the rebuke being the agreement between the man's deep-lying doubt of the truth of his belief, and the denial his knowledge would give, were he to allow it full and open voice.

Behind the appreciative consciousness of the beauty of one leaf of grass glittering with its robe of frost pearls, the belief in God as its creator, although the idea be imagined in the most glorious verbal drapery, is as an amateur water-color to a masterpiece: it is a puny idea set in a heavy frame of words. Were we true to ourselves, we would admit that we cannot conceive a God capable of producing such a delicate piece of magnificent handiwork. You cannot dispart from your conception of Deity a human semblance, without annihilating him. Consequently, whether you like it or not, a limit to his power is inevitable. If he must retain some similarity to humanity, then limitation of his power is the first similitude that comes to the mind when there is stretched outwards and upwards before you such a wealth of loveliness as that which we saw on the hillside.

God, the idea of God, is a poor thing to a frost-empearled leaf of grass, waving in the wind, and glistening in the sunshine. Grant the existence of God; bespeak for him all the might in which you have hitherto enswathed him; all the power and possibility of which you have sung; all the wonder-working love of which you have prayed, and for which your thanksgiving has touched the vermilion clouds of sunset; all his genius that you have dinned into our ears till we recoiled before your imaginative potentialities; and you have but chanted a rude folk-song. There are notes unknown to your voice; words with which you are unfamiliar; ideas too sublime for the setting of your song.

There is something greater, something more wonderful, more powerful, something that awakens, not worship nor thanksgiving in us, but the desire to know—something, or, rather, many things, more marvellous than this little and badly executed photograph you have mounted on a cardboard of lies, before which you bow down and praise.

Beside these things, these activities, and results, as yet so imperfectly recognised by our knowledge, which we group in the name of Nature, your idea of God is a weak and faulty solution to a foolish problem of your own making.

Some of these thoughts my voice formed into words, as we bent over to examine a tuft of grass that had been transmogrified into a fairy stage, with the drooping blades as the proscenium.

"I'm not going to argue with you," Mainie said, "however much you'd like me to. Besides, if it will give you any consolation, I wasn't thinking of God at all. It's too lovely for anything."

ROBERT MORELAND.

Tales of Our Times.

BY A CYNIC.

MR. WILLIAM BROADARROW, known among his associates as the Night Bird, and Mr. Samuel Shortcrop, familiarly called Slim Sam, pursued their business careers chiefly in London, and their energies had frequently been rewarded by the provision of free board and lodging in various Government establishments in the metropolis. But the nature of their business was such as often necessitated sudden excursions to foreign parts, and on one occasion, finding it expedient to get as far away from London as possible, they resolved to profit by the geometrical principle that the greatest distance between two points on a sphere is equal to half its circumference, and accordingly made a hurried departure for the antipodes.

They travelled by way of New York and San Francisco, but between the latter port and Sydney their ship foundered in mid-ocean. The Night Bird and Slim Sam did not perish, however. On the contrary, these two, the most abandoned and worthless individuals on board, were the only ones who escaped, thus affording yet another instance of the whimsical playfulness of Divine Providence. After drifting about in an open boat till all their companions died of starvation, they were cast on a coral reef encircling one of those "summer isles of Eden" which afford so fertile a field for the activities of slave-hunting labor agents, swindling traders, and Christian missionaries. As their boat was smashed on the reef, our adventurers had to strip themselves of most of their clothing and swim across the intervening lagoon to the island.

The march of civilisation has carried its blessings to many savage lands, but to this particular island it had not yet penetrated. Its dusky inhabitants had not yet enjoyed the privileges of having the Gospel preached to them, of getting drunk on "trade gin," or of having their blood poisoned by imported disease—indeed, they had never yet set eyes on a European. So when the Night Bird and Slim Sam, their white skins shining under the tropic sun, emerged as it were from the ocean's depths and walked up the coral strand, their appearance occasioned no little astonishment among the islanders. They were soon surrounded by an excited crowd, gesticulating and clamoring to each other, but all the while paying the white men a strange deference. A council was hurriedly held among the leading men, and then the visitors were conducted towards the interior of the island in what seemed to be a solemn procession. This presently came to a halt before a large building which proved to be a temple, and into the dark recesses of which the Night Bird and Slim Sam were conducted, to the accompaniment of the beating of tomtoms and the chanting of priests. A great ugly idol was now removed from its throne in the holy of holies; the Night Bird was ceremoniously requested by signs to take its place, which he did; while Slim Sam, who was much the smaller man of the two, was installed on a low stool at the foot of the throne.

"Strike me dotty if they ain't making a gawd o' you, Bill," said Slim Sam. "'Ere's a pretty go."

"I b'lieve yer right, Sam," replied the Night Bird, looking down at his companion with some complacency. "I wos 'ardly prepared to okkerpy such an eggzalted persition, but I must do my best. Any'ow, it's better than being killed an' eaten, which I thought we wos in for at fust."

"But I'm blowed if I can understand 'ow even these silly niggers could make a gawd o' you, Bill," said Sam, who seemed very dissatisfied with his subordinate role. "I'd make a damned sight better gawd than you, with my intelleck and eddication."

"Wot does a gawd want intelleck and eddication for?" asked Bill, contemptuously. "It's my 'andsome face and fine fizzeek wot's done it. You can't expeck people to worship a gawd with an ugly mug like yours."

"I fancy yer wrong, Bill," said Sam, reflectively. "Come to think of it, they nacherally want their new gawd to be something like their old un. Wot's infl'enced their chice is yer resemblance to that old graven image they're now 'auling out o' the front door."

Sam's surmise as to his friend's deification was quite correct. Having installed their new divinity, the savages now proceeded to burn their old wooden idol on an immense bonfire, which, as night approached, threw a lurid glare around the precincts of the temple. All night long the religious rejoicings continued. The wild barbaric din of drums, the horrid hooting of horns, and the yells of the excited multitude made a pandemonium which, Slim Sam declared, reminded him forcibly of "Mafficking" night in the Mile End-road.

But the ensuing days and weeks were monotonous enough. The physical wants of the new divinities were carefully attended to, as they always are in savage lands. Food and drink were regularly and abundantly supplied by the priests, but except for an hour or so at midday and for some six hours at night they were required to occupy their seats in the temple to receive the worship of their devotees.

The ennui induced by this sort of life was greater than they had ever experienced, even during their periods of residence in those Government establishments already referred to, and it caused much irritability of temper.

"I'm getting 'ellish sick o' this 'ere gawd business," observed the Night Bird, during one of their midday hours off duty. "I'd a damned sight rather be doing six months' 'ard in chokey than be sitting six weeks on the throne o' gawd—that's flat."

"And if its slow for you, wot d'you s'pose it must be for me?" said Slim Sam, sullenly. "Any'ow, yer getting the honner and glory—the psalm-singing and the alleloojers—but I've just got to sit at yer blooming feet. What perseition am I s'posed to okkerpy in this blessed show? Am I a gawd or am I not?—answer me that."

"Oh, I dunno," replied Bill, with a yawn of intense boredom. "P'r'aps yer s'posed to be a sort o' 'Oly Ghost, 'anging about in the background and looking sollum, but not doing anything pertickler."

"If it comes to that, I don't see as you've been doing anything pertickler yerself," retorted Sam. "W'y don't you get up and work some wonders?"

"Oh, that's orl right," replied Bill. "Gods don't do anything pertickler nowadays, as I knows on. I'm playing the game orl right, only it's a damned slow one. If it goes on much longer I'll 'ave to get up and murder one o' them yowling priests to r'lieve my feelings."

As the days passed these colloquies assumed a more and more acrimonious tone, till they seemed likely to end in an open fight; but, fortunately, relief arrived before the occurrence of an incident so disturbing to the theological system of the islanders as a bout of fisticuffs between their deities.

One morning a steamer cast anchor off the island, and presently there came ashore a missionary, accompanied by some native Christians, one of whom was found to have some acquaintance with the language of the islanders, and could thus act as interpreter. After the usual presentation of glass beads and other products of civilisation, mostly of German manufacture, the missionary got to business, and asked the chief of the islanders whether he would not like his people to become servants of the living God—the God of the white men?

The chief replied that they already possessed two living gods who had probably come from the white men's country, as they were quite white themselves, and had marched straight out of the sea.

This information so deeply interested the missionary that he asked to be conducted to these gods at once, and on arrival at the temple he was ushered with much ceremony into the holy of holies, where the Night Bird and Slim Sam were duly fulfilling their divine functions.

"Jolly glad to see you, guv'nor," said the Night Bird. "'Ere 'ave I and my pal been playing at gawds in this stinking 'ole for two blooming months, and we're about fed up with it. I 'ope yer capt'n 'll send a boat off to-night, so as we may 'ook it from 'ere in the dark and get aboard. The gawd business don't suit us a little bit, and we're quite willing to leave the field open to you to intrerjooce the genwin article. These niggers burnt their old graven image w'en we arrived, and after we clear out they'll be pretty 'ard up for something in the gawd line, so you'll 'ave a charnce for a smart deal."

The Night Bird and Slim Sam got away safely to the ship, but when their absence was discovered the indignation and ferocity of the natives broke out alarmingly. Their resentment was chiefly directed against the missionary, whom they held responsible for the loss of their gods, and so threatening was their temper that he decided to depart with the ship, and to defer the conversion of these poor heathen to a more favorable opportunity.

But the reverend gentleman had to submit to some light pleasantries from the captain and officers, who pointed out how wrong it was to make Atheists of the inhabitants of an entire island by taking away the gods they had and not leaving them a substitute.

By a man's life, by his acts, it was then, as it is now, impossible to know whether he was a believer or not. If there be a difference between one who openly professes the doctrines of the Orthodox Church and one who denies them, the difference is not to the advantage of the former. The open profession of the orthodox doctrines is mostly found among persons of dull intellects, of stern character, who think much of their own importance. Intelligence, honesty, frankness, a good heart, and moral conduct are oftener met with among those who are disbelievers.—Leo Tolstoy.

The Annual Dinner.

THE London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner (under the auspices of the National Secular Society) took place on January 14 at the Holborn Restaurant, and was attended by nearly 200 people, among whom were quite a fair proportion of our women friends, which is one of the best and surest signs of the growing success of our propaganda. Provincial members mustered in good force, among them being Mr. and Mrs. Alward, from Grimsby; A. C. Brown and party of friends, from Oxford; Johann Scu, from Nottingham; and F. Goodwin and friends, from Grays.

The legal, medical, and military professions were all represented; and, stranger still, we had a clergyman still on the active list among the company, as well as the two ex-members of the profession who have thrown in their lot with us.

An innovation in the arrangement of the tables, which left the Chairman, Mr. G. W. Foote, much more accessible to his friends, was generally approved of; and when the good dinner had been partaken of, an excellent musical program was given, interspersed between the speeches and toasts.

After Madame Saunders' overture on the piano came the address from the Chairman, who was in his usual good form, and was listened to with marked attention and interest.

The toast of "The National Secular Society," proposed in a neat and commendably brief speech by Mr. Victor Roger, the oldest of our vice-presidents, in the regretted absence of Mr. William Heaford, was effectively responded to by Mr. A. B. Moss.

"Freethought At Home and Abroad," proposed by Mr. Morris Young (who, as a newcomer to the party was enthusiastically received, and who, in an amusing and most interesting speech, mentioned that he had a surplice and cassock for sale, but so far had found no bidders for them), was briefly spoken to by Mr. Lloyd, and at more length by Mr. Cohen, who made use of the opportunity to give some good advice to his friends.

Between these more serious items the musical portions of the program made some pleasant breaks. Mr. Morley Peel has an excellent baritone voice, and gave some well-chosen songs; and Miss Helen Blaine's most delightful singing will not soon be forgotten. Our old friend Mr. Will Edwards was funnier than ever—and that's saying a great deal. His hearers were just convulsed. A most successful evening's entertainment was brought to a fitting close by the singing of "Auld Lang Syne" by all those present.

THE GRAVE OF A FREETHINKER.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—A few days ago I was on top of one of the highest hills in Cornwall—Castle an Dinas—about half way between Penzance and St. Ives. In a field close to the top of the hill I saw the grave of a Freethinker. It had a stone wall around it, and carving on three of the stones. On the centre stone was cut the name Hasking, aged 65, and date of interment 1823. On the second stone was cut, "Custom is the idol of Fools"; and on the third stone, "Virtue only consecrates the ground." The hill gets its name from an old prehistoric castle on the top, built thousands of years ago, and is an interesting example of primitive fortifications. It is a circular wall, in ruins now, the enclosure about 100 yards in diameter. From the hill may be surveyed Mount's Bay and the English Channel on one side, and St. Ives Bay and the Bristol Channel on the other; and on a clear day twenty-four parish churches can be seen, and the Scilly Isles may be descried on the horizon's verge like clouds resting on the ocean. Should any Freethinker visiting Penzance wish to see this grave and castle, I shall be pleased to motor him up there.

"The law of this State provides that no more than one-half of an estate may be left to religious or charitable institutions when the person making the will has a wife or children. The late John Ladin, a Catholic merchant of this city, evaded the law by leaving the bulk of his $810,000 estate to the archbishop of the diocese; and although it is well-known that the clergy are constrained by their vows to leave all their property to the Church, the Court of Appeals has upheld the validity of the bequest. Ladin left a daughter and grandchildren, who sought to break the will, alleging a secret arrangement between the testator and the archbishop."—Truthseeker (New York).

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

When once you can trust yourself, you know how to live.
—GOETHE.

The Black Army.

AFTER a Sunday evening lecture of mine a young gentleman rose to offer some opposition. While not wearing clerical attire, he had a very decided clerical accent, and I concluded that he had caught the twang in addressing Sunday-school children or in debating at Young Men's Christian Associations. Perhaps he had aspirations for the ministry, for one of his objections to my lecture was urged with much feeling. I had said that the ministers of all denominations were, for the most part, actuated by commonplace motives; that they went into pulpits as others go into law, or physic, or the army—for a living; and that their being called by the Holy Ghost was only the cant of their profession. My critic declared that I was wrong. He asserted that hundreds of them, perhaps thousands, entered their Churches, and engaged in the service of Christ, for purely disinterested reasons; that their great object was to save souls and fill heaven; that many of them were very poor, the average income of curates, for instance, being only £120 a year; and that some of them went abroad as missionaries to convert the heathen, facing all sorts of hardships, and carrying their lives in their hands. I cannot say that my critic put his case so tersely, but this was the substance of his objection; and I will give an answer, once for all, to what I daresay is a very common argument.

Now at the outset I wish to make my own position clear, and to guard against misunderstanding. In the first place, I have nothing to do at present with the truth or falsity of Christianity; yet at the same time I am entitled to expect of its ministers a decent conformity to its teachings. In the next place, I do not assert that there are no ministers or missionaries who are earnest and sincere. Some of them, I have no doubt, would preach Christianity if it were poor, despised, and oppressed. These are men of principle and conviction; men with a passion for their calling; men who really believe that they are under God's orders to exhort and reprove a fallen, sinful world, and to point out the only way of eternal salvation. There are also some lawyers with a passion for law, some doctors with a passion for medicine, and some soldiers with a passion for military affairs; as I daresay there are men with a passion for almost every one of what are called the "humblest" employments. But these are the exceptions, and may be eliminated from a general survey. When we talk of any profession, as such, we have to go by the average; and I say that the average minister, like the average lawyer, doctor, soldier, tinker, tailor, or ploughman, is simply earning a subsistence for himself and his family; in short, that he preaches for a living. Simply this and nothing more.

Let us look at the number of these clerical gentlemen. There are some fifty thousand of them in England alone. Will any man in his senses affirm that the law of averages does not apply to this huge Black Army? Are they all heroes and enthusiasts? The very idea is an absurdity. Try them by any other test, and what is the result? They are average in stature, average in shape, average in looks, average in strength, and average in intelligence. Why then, even on the most favorable estimate, should they not be average in character? Has not the Catholic Church always recognised this fact, and made its priests sink their little individualities in the greatness and splendor of the Church? Has it not found a compensation for the pettiness of its myriad agents in the magnificence of its organisation? Are not all its orders, wheel within wheel, from the Pope down to the poor bog-trotting Irish priest, a practical recognition of the hard truth that the men of God, like the masses of other men, are actuated by the fundamental motives of human nature?

Look next at the unfailing supply of these clerical gentlemen. Exceptional motives are liable to fluctuation, and are therefore unaccountable. Any one of twenty men who saw a sovereign lying at his feet would pick it up, but it would be hard to tell which of them would risk his life to save a fellow being's. The British Army is filled by enlistment, and well filled, because poverty and misadventure drive thousands into taking "the King's shilling." But how full would it be if it depended upon the accession of men who yearn to fight and die for their country, turning from other attractions to follow that stern ideal? And how full would the Black Army be if it were not recruited like the Red Army, under the forceful pressure of the necessities of existence? Year by year every vacancy is filled, and a waiting crowd is clamoring for admission. The supply always equals the demand, and goes beyond it, as it does in every other trade and profession. This phenomenon can only be explained by the ordinary laws of human action. Were the Churches manned by persons of exceptional—that is, incalculable—motive and character, there would be variations in the supply. Sometimes there would be a lull, and sometimes a feverish activity. But nothing of this sort ever occurs; the supply of ministers is as regular as the supply of carpenters and tailors, and must be subject to laws of the same generality.

This is quite consistent with the fact that aptitude, as well as accident, plays a part in determining a minister's career; but it also operates in the case of other professions, without implying any ethical consideration. A young man at one of the universities may have a taste for theology, as another has a taste for science or art or history or poetry. He may have a bent for public speaking, without the active, enterprising character which is requisite for successful oratory in politics; he may be fond of the social attentions which are paid to clergymen, especially by the female members of their congregations; or his temperament may be suited to the comparatively easy, unharassed life which is led by the general run of Christian ministers, who go to bed when they like, rise when they like, and adapt their duties to their convenience.

We will now consider the financial aspect of the question. It may be true that the average income of Church of England curates is only £120 a year. But before I recognise any hardship in this, I must be assured that they would earn more (I mean on the average) in the general labor market. I am not at all satisfied that the ordinary curate is gifted with more brains than the ordinary skilled artisan. He may talk better English, but that is an accident, and we all know that great nonsense may be couched in very elegant language. Being able to speak grammatically is no criterion of a man's ability to do anything serviceable for his fellow men, for which he may reasonably expect a fair remuneration. One's own experience, of course, is not everything; but I have met both curates and artisans, and I cannot say that the former showed any distinct superiority over the latter. Perhaps I shall be told that their superiority is ethical and spiritual; to which I reply that I am not discussing their character, but their capacity.

It must also be remembered that income is not the sole factor in determining employments; or we should not see so many clerks keeping up a respectable appearance on meagre salaries, while they might earn more in a rougher or more active occupation. A minister's life has certain advantages of personal comfort and social respectability. Nor is this all. His position is not precarious; he is not affected by commercial disasters and aberrations; his income is generally as certain, and as regular, as the succession of the seasons.

There is also the prospect to be considered. A curate's position is humble, and his income is "sadly limited," but a long vista of possibilities is before him—temporal as well as spiritual. He may become a vicar, a rector, a dean, an archdeacon, a canon, a bishop, even an archbishop. Who knows? Every one of Napoleon's soldiers fought with "a marshal's baton in his knapsack." Few of them could become marshals, but there was at least the chance, and the hope lured them to a hundred battlefields. And is not the "poor curate" under a similar inspiration? He also may climb the ladder of preferment, at the top of which shines resplendent, in the sunlight of glory, the golden prize of the great Archbishopric.

(To be continued.) G. W. FOOTE.

The Culture of the Supernatural.—III.

THE utter uselessness of accepting at its face value anyone's explanation of the cause of his own subjective experience, is well illustrated by the belief in witchcraft. If there is a single belief on which clouds of apparently unimpeachable evidence could be produced, it is this. It has run its course throughout the whole of the world. Eminent men, not alone theologians, but doctors, lawyers, men of letters, and statesmen have given their testimony to the reality of diabolic intercourse. Those accused have themselves confessed to such intercourse; and although some of these confessions were extorted under torture, many were quite genuine. Thousands of people have been "bewitched" into a certain class of disorders and have manifested appropriate symptoms. Yet this belief is now dead amongst civilised and educated people. Even religious teachers accept the explanation that these witchcraft cases were due to distinctly pathological conditions and to the power of suggestion operating upon uninformed minds during an unenlightened age. But there is really no better evidence for communication with Divinity than there is of communication with Satan. The testimony of a man like Mr. R. J. Campbell, that he is conscious of a divine influence in his life, is of no greater value than that of a sixteenth century witch that she was conscious of a satanic influence urging her to particular actions. Whether the inspiration be angelic or diabolic, the evidence for either, or both, is the same. Mr. Campbell is no better authority on the matter than an ignorant peasant of four centuries ago. His is simply the survival of the belief in a form more acceptable to the changed religious convictions of the twentieth century.

There is nothing new under the sun, and human nature remains substantially unchanged generation after generation. All the phenomena on which the old belief in witchcraft was based is still with us. Similar cases of delusion are still here, and the power of suggestion is one of the established facts of modern psychology. Nay, there may still be found thousands of people who are convinced of the activity of Satan. What, then, has happened? Only this; that taking the same facts on which certain religious beliefs were based, the modern scientist shows that they may be explained in terms of forces and conditions that altogether exclude operations of a supernatural character. The facts of the religious life remain; our understanding of them has changed materially. If Mr. Campbell, or anyone else, tells us that he had a feeling of a "divine presence," we may admit the feeling, but inquire how he became acquainted with its source? Mr. Campbell would not hesitate to challenge the conviction of a West African that an attack of epilepsy was due to enchantment or possession. Is his explanation of the origin of certain of his own emotional states of a really higher character? Between Mumbo-Jumbo and God, as casual agents, the difference is verbalistic only.

Old occurrences have to be explained in the light of new knowledge. This is the rule in all directions, and it is of peculiar force in relation to religion. To know what religious people have thought, and felt, and said, is no more than the data for a scientific study of the subject. To know why they thought, and felt, and said these things is what we really need to understand. And to do this we must either conclude that religious experiences are quite apart from life in general and stand in a special and isolated category, or it must be shown that they can be grouped with other experiences of an admittedly non-religious character. I believe that it is quite possible to do the latter. From medical records and from numerous biographies, it is easily possible to parallel all the experiences of the religious mystic. We can see the same sense of exaltation, the same conviction of illumination, the same belief that one is the tool of a superior power. Let us take, for example, the case of so eminent a writer as John Addington Symonds. He tells us that until he was twenty-eight years of age—the significance of this age limit will not be lost on those who know the connection existing between religious conversion and adolescence—he was liable to extreme states of exaltation concerning the nature of self. It is worth pointing out that Dr. Crichton-Browne expressed the opinion that Symonds' higher nerve centres were in some degree enfeebled by these abnormal states. In addition to this confusion, Symonds placed on record an interesting experience while under the influence of chloroform. He says:—

> "After the choking and stifling had passed away, I seemed at first in a state of utter blankness; then came flashes of intense light, alternating with blankness, and with a keen sense of vision of what was going on in the room around me, but no sensation of touch. I thought that I was near death; when suddenly my soul became aware of God, who was manifestly dealing with me, handling me, so to speak, in an intense personal reality. I felt him streaming in like light upon me.....I cannot describe the ecstasy I felt. Then, as I gradually awoke from the influence of the anæsthetic, the old sense of my relation with the world began to return, the new sense of my relation to God began to fade."

With a slight variation of expression this passage might have been taken straight from the pages of some mediæval mystic. There is no question of the intense reality of experience. That was as real as anything that ever occurred to any saint in the calendar. The distinction here is that Symonds knew and stated the cause of his sensations. And no one would question that Symonds' explanation completely covers the ground. Of course, one may be met with the rather cheap retort that saints and mystics did not use chloroform to produce their visions. Granted, but chloroform is not the only agent by means of which the subject may be thrown into an abnormal condition as a means of inducing a sense of spiritual illumination. And, as a matter of fact, from the most primitive times, the use of herbs and drugs, valued in religious ceremonies for the state of exaltation induced, is one of the commonest practices. Tobacco, hashish, coca, laurel water, with numerous other agents of a similar kind, have been largely used in religious ceremonies. And when we have not this plan—sometimes side by side with it—we have the practice of fasting and other forms of self-torture, solitary brooding, and the like, obviously practised because of the abnormal conditions provoked.

It is not argued that there was in all this deliberate imposture. That would have implied the presence of more knowledge than people actually possessed. But it was known that these abnormal states followed the use of certain drugs, or was consequent on the practice of certain austerities. They were accordingly valued because they were thought to bring people into touch with an already believed in supernatural world. In this way there was always going on, and is still going on in a more or less modified form, a positive culture of the supernatural. People create a sense of the supernatural by the cultivation of states of mind that are of no greater evidential value than the experience of an opium eater is proof of the objective reality of his vision.

Above all, if one wishes to really understand the nature of religion, one must never lose sight of the earlier forms of religious life. It is sometimes said that we must explain the lower by the higher. This is sheer fallacy. The higher can only be explained by the lower. In biological investigation it is now generally conceded that the secret of animal organisation lies in the cell. Let this be modified as much as is possible, it is still the basis of organic structure. So, too, with religious phenomena. The important feature in the history of religion is that the story is a continuous one. The forms of religion change with time and place, but its fundamental properties remain. And as we are driven back to the cell to explain organic activities, so we are compelled to take the mental life of primitive man as supplying the key to an understanding of all forms of religion. Apart from this, we are merely engaged in a word-contest which inevitably ends in false theory and confusion.

Finally, the study of abnormal nervous states, as providing much of the material on which all religions have built, does not exhaust the survey. There still remains the misinterpretation of feelings and frames of mind that are perfectly normal, and of their diversion into religious channels. Current religious literature is full of quite worthless chatter concerning the way in which religion opens up a larger and fuller life. Because, at a certain time of life, young men and young women begin to take an active interest in the social life around them, and because this is often connected with religious work, it is assumed that religious belief is the impelling force. But against this there is the positively demonstrated fact that this is a phenomenon of adolescence. Statistics are quite conclusive on this point. And the whole significance of adolescence, physiologically, psychologically, and socially, is the calling into operation of feelings hitherto dormant, and the creation of a consciousness that simply craves for a part in the larger life of the species. At this stage the whole nature of the individual cries out for communion with his fellows. He becomes less self-centred, more alive to the demands of others upon him, and manifests tendencies in the direction of what the world calls self-sacrifice. It is not the religious nature that is craving satisfaction at adolescence, it is the social nature. It is the period when development awakens in the individual a sense of unity, of kinship with the species to which he belongs.

Left alone, and in a thoroughly civilised environment, these awakening impulses would receive gratification, and undergo a healthy development, by participation in a rational social life. If, however, as so often happens, the strongest expressed influences encountered are of a religious form, these developing feelings are clothed in a religious dress. The new, strange, and inchoate feelings of sex, the gropings of a social consciousness of kind, are by interest or ignorance, or by both combined, interpreted as the direct influence of the spirit of God, and the individual is induced to give to religion what properly belongs to society. In such cases we are concerned with the wrong interpretation of normal feelings, or with the exploitation of the social nature of man by religious organisations. Man is emphatically not a religious animal; he is a social animal. But how man interprets his own nature is determined by the actual knowledge in his possession. Given a sufficient absence of knowledge, and the religious explanation is completely triumphant. Given adequate knowledge, and the religious explanation is seen to be useless, and is discarded. The gods are seen to be only man in masquerade, and the activities of a supernatural world the product of human ignorance of the nature of the natural one.

Twaddle About the Soul and Inspiration.

In the Christian World Pulpit for January 22 there is a very remarkable sermon by the Rev. James L. Gordon, D.D., entitled "Inspiration." This discourse is remarkable for its great length, its grandiloquence, its self-contradictions, its pretentiousness, and its shallowness. Dr. Gordon gives us the following ascending degrees of fineness, or scale of values: "The hand is finer than the foot, the ear finer than the hand, the eye finer than the ear, the brain finer than the eye, the mind finer than the brain, the spirit finer than the mind, and the soul—the soul is the essence and quintessence of all unseen and spiritual values." Having got at the soul in that novel fashion, the reverend gentleman favors us with several original definitions of it. He calls it "a bit of God, a perfect atom of Divinity," "the exact centre of a universe," "the invisible force of a human personality," and "the sum total of all human sensations and aspirations." Then he quotes Henley's well-known lines—

> "Out of the night that covers me
> Black as the pit from pole to pole,
> I thank whatever Gods may be
> For my unconquerable soul."

According to this divine, God is broken up into innumerable little bits, and each little bit is encased and corrupted in a material body. And yet, after setting the soul in so lofty and dignified a position, he drags it down again thus:—

> "What the shell is to the nut, what the skin is to an orange, what the glove is to the hand, what the shoe is to the foot, what the casket is to the jewel—that the soul is to the body."

Adopting Dr. Gordon's style, we say that as the nut is finer than the shell, the orange than the skin, the foot than the shoe, and the jewel than the casket, so is the body finer and more valuable than the soul, which is the very opposite of what the preacher wishes to set forth.

Unless the printer is grossly unfair to him, Dr. Gordon is an extremely careless writer. In another part of the sermon he describes the soul as "an extinguishable spark of Divine life." It is perfectly true that to blow out the flame is not to blow out the candle; but any fool can see that the candle's usefulness depends upon the flame. What the preacher desires to prove, however, is the indestructibility of the soul; but he never gets within sight of his goal. Here is a fine sample of his style:—

> "Your hand may sleep in paralysis, your eye may slumber in blindness, your ear may decline in deafness, your brain may fag in weariness, your nerves may relax in sheer exhaustion, but your soul lives on, fresh, vital, and strong."

That is the dogmatism of complete ignorance. When hand and eye and nerve and brain shall have ceased to be, neither Dr. Gordon nor anybody else knows of anything destined to survive them. The soul is a purely imaginary entity. God is admittedly an incomprehensible being, and a bit or an atom of him would be equally inconceivable. To define the soul as "a bit of God," or "a perfect atom of Divinity," is therefore to use words to which intelligible meanings cannot be attached. Then, again, to speak of the soul as "the sum total of all human sensations and aspirations" is to deny its existence as an entity; and the dissolution of the body puts an end to all sensations and aspirations. The surest thing about human sensations and aspirations is that they are human both in their origin and in their nature.

Indeed, all talk about the soul as an entity is wholly absurd. Dr. Gordon says that "the grandest moment in a man's life is when he becomes conscious of his soul." As a matter of fact, no man ever does become conscious of his soul. An ignorant belief in it is common, but knowledge or consciousness of it no one has. A man will be born again in very truth when he becomes conscious of possessing a soul. We are only conscious of ourselves as units. The people who believe that they have souls are, as a rule, unbearably conceited. Dr. Gordon tells us that when Richard Mills was converted, he wrote in his diary these words: "Clang! Clang! Clang! went all the bells in heaven, for Richard Mills was born again." Of what infinite importance the poor fellow believed himself to be in the Universe. Even Dr. Gordon regards himself as great enough to speak for God. Without a blush he says that "God divides men into two classes, Spiritualists and Sensualists." If so, all we can say is that God's classification is incorrect, men being by no means so divided. Millions of people who are not Spiritualists conscientiously live by their higher nature, and never become the slaves of their appetites and passions. If Dr. Gordon does not know this we must pronounce his ignorance culpable. Science, which knows nothing of the spiritual, unhesitatingly condemns sensuality as an offence against our own nature. All allusions to and descriptions of "the spiritual" are utterly unmeaning, "the spiritual" being nothing but the city of refuge of total ignorance. Here is an apt example:—

> "The fundamental fact about man is expressed in five words—Man is a spiritual creature. He has a soul. He is a soul. He can respond to a spiritual inspiration. He can reflect the thought of God. He can mirror the face of Truth. He can know God."

High-sounding words, but as empty as any drum that fills the atmosphere with sound. He who speaks of "the response of the moral qualities in man to the moral qualities in God" entirely misinterprets man's moral nature. Man's moral qualities are the result of countless ages of social evolution, and have absolutely no connection with any other world than this.

We are quite willing to accept the statement that society is governed by ideas, and that "the progress of the world depends on the startling power of new thought." Neither have we any objection to the further proposition that "new ideas depend on new inspirations," because "inspiration" is a word whose primary reference is to a physical act, and which may legitimately be employed as a symbol of mental stimulation. For instilling into it a supernatural meaning there is absolutely no justification in a single well-attested fact. And yet Dr. Gordon claims the term in the interests of supernaturalism. "An inspiration," he says, "is a flash of soul-revealing consciousness"; but it would be more intelligible to define it as a natural quickening or stimulation of the mental faculties. Were it not for the theological misapprehension and misapplication it would be perfectly legitimate to call a man of genuis an inspired person, in which event Shakespeare could be spoken of as one of the most inspired men that ever lived. There is no limit to Dr. Gordon's rapacity. He steals the word "insight" and rechristens it "soul-sight," assuring us that "the soul has dreams, visions, and revelations." He praises Haydn for his dramatic declaration during a performance of his Creation: "It came from above! It came from above!" He wants us to believe that great sermons and noted hymns are gifts from God. Indeed, he waxes eloquent in the glorification of what he calls an inspiration:—

> "It is the Divine original. It bears the trade-mark of the skies. The signature of God is upon it. It is history and prophecy in one red lightning flash of supernatural glory. Its thrill is the sure sign of the touch of God for the soul. It is the greatest thing in human experience."

We should dearly love to come across an inspiration that answers to that extravagant eulogy. We have searched the Bible and the theological literature of all the ages without once catching the faintest glimpse of it. We have heard and read innumerable sermons, Dr. Gordon's included, without discerning the slightest trace of it. More than once have we waded through Baxter's The Saints' Everlasting Rest, in the writing of which he prided himself on being "only a pen in God's hand," but never met with one idea that bore "the trade-mark of the skies." Those who take the preacher's claim seriously must surely come to the conclusion that the Holy Ghost talks a vast amount of nonsense, and never utters a thought with his own signature upon it.

We believe with all our heart in the splendor and glory of the human imagination, in the inspiring grace and beauty and elevating influence of poetry and art, and in the cultivation of the noblest moral qualities for the betterment of human conditions; and it is our honest conviction that there is ample scope for the full exercise of all man's faculties within the sphere of this world alone. It is highly probable that the greatest poet the world has ever seen was an unbeliever in supernaturalism; and it is an established fact that one who might have almost become his equal, had he lived, was an avowed Atheist. Shelley had his inspired moments, when ideas of transcendent charm and loveliness were suddenly born within him and found expression in faultless music. The flights of his glowing imagination were not hampered or circumscribed by the fact that he acknowledged neither God nor the spiritual world. Lucretius was no less a poet because the supernatural was non-existent to him: his unbelief did not clip the wings of his fancy in the least, though he went the length of saying that—

> "When our mortal frame shall be disjoined,
> The lifeless lump uncoupled from the mind,
> From sense of grief and pain we shall be free;
> We shall not feel because we shall not be."

No, there is nothing in Freethought to damp the ardor or to curb the genius of poet or artist. The world we live in is densely packed with all sorts of wonders and beauties and experiences which are calculated to stimulate the mind, and the problems of life are sufficiently numerous and great to give incessant and fruitful occupation to the strongest and keenest intellects, and to fire the finest imagination. Poets generally take very little practical interest in social questions, however religious they may be. But Shelley had a passion for social reform because he loved his fellow-beings. Destitute alike of the love of God and the hope of heaven as incentives to good works, he was irresistibly moved thereto by his humanity alone.

Pears' Soap Bubbles About Paine.

Pears' Shilling Cyclopædia for 1913 is a pocket edition of omniscience in 1,070 pages, containing, amongst other things put together in handy form for quick reference, an infinite number of bovrilised biographies of prominent men. At p. 861 is an account of Thomas Paine in ten lines and one "thumper." Here is the "thumper":—

> "In 1794 his Age of Reason was published, and again his atheistical opinions roused strong opposition."

After reading this airy description of Paine's opinions, one is surprised to find that, in the general "Introduction," the editor states that "in every instance the essential facts are given, and each edition is revised to the date of publication." Taking for granted that in this particular instance the "essential facts" were "revised so recently as a few months ago, it must be assumed that the editor had access to documents and declarations, hitherto unknown to all the world, in which Paine must have revised and re-edited his pronounced Theistic opinions as writ large on every page of the Age of Reason. For everybody who knows Paine's writings, and especially that classic piece of polemical English, the Age of Reason, knows that Paine lived and died a Theist; that he wrote elaborate and passionate arguments against Atheism and its doctrines in the very work cited by Pears'; and that in almost the opening lines of the Age he wrote down his decidedly anti-atheistic opinions, as below:

> "I believe in one God, and no more; and I hope for happiness beyond this life."

No Christian apologist can add to the sum of arguments adduced by Paine in Part I. in favor of the God idea. They may copy his language, but they cannot surpass the beauty and the forcefulness of his rich and varied style.

In Pears' Cyclopædia of general information (one of the twenty crammed sections of this wonderfully cheap volume) a generally fair definition is given of Atheism as "the denial of the divine, [and] it assumes three forms—denial of the existence of God, denial that God has been proved to exist, and denial of the possibility of knowing of divine existence." Judged by this threefold test, Paine was the very reverse of being an Atheist. In fact, he did not deny the existence of God; he adduced a long string of what he considered proofs of God's existence, and he emphatically answered "Yes" to the question, Canst thou by searching find out God?

The truth is that the lie that Paine was an Atheist got started a hundred years ago, and a thousand holy agencies of organised lying have kept up the deceit ever since. With the illuminating instance before us of fair play towards Atheism given in Pears' compendious description quoted above, I am unable to believe that the Cyclopædia has sinned maliciously against Paine, and I venture to believe that Pears' editor will make an honest attempt to digest a few more essential facts for the benefit of the sane people who expect to find facts in a book of reference, and that he will in future editions remove this blemishing inaccuracy from the pages of this marvellous shillingsworth.

We make this appeal to Pears' in the academic interests of literary and historic truth. As Atheists, some of us have perhaps groaned to find Paine, like Voltaire, fighting keenly in the Theistic ranks, armed cap-à pie with all the weapons of logic, in the general assault upon the impregnable rock of our holy Atheism. Well, it is useless for us to kick against the dead wall of facts, or to curse the nature of things. Paine, in spite of all our regrets or of the ignorant denial of his detractors, was a Theist; but transcendently above that label shines his greatness and courage in speaking unpopular truths in an age not always cruel enough to kill the unbeliever, but always mean enough to lie about him. Will our age be candid enough at last to disown a hoary lie?

WILLIAM HEAFORD.

The Agency of Insects in the Dissemination of Disease.

THE part played by insects in spreading disease has been made startlingly evident by recent medical science. There are various reasons for thinking that all diseases will be ultimately traced to the malign influences of microbes. Immense weight is added to this theory by the fact that in every instance in which we possess a full history of the genesis and development of a disease, the germs responsible for its existence have been detected through microscopical observation and experiment. In the inquiries which have for their object the prevention and ultimate extinction of disease, zoologists, botanists, entomologists, and physicians have all lent their aid. The victories already won constitute one of the most amazing episodes in the chronicle of scientific achievements.

As Metchnikoff and other bacteriologists have demonstrated, comparatively few of the parasitic organisms which reside in or upon higher animals or plants are seriously detrimental to their hosts. For this providential concession we should be sincerely grateful, for were even a tithe of their number inimical to the wellbeing of higher living things, our planet would soon be swept clear of all its most characteristic animals and plants.

It is most proper to remark that, from the standpoint of the plant or animal preyed upon by parasites, these unwelcome intruders are most assuredly where they should not be. In the eyes of cold and dispassionate Nature, however, there is nothing anomalous in their presence. Parasitism is a necessary condition of their existence; apart from their hosts they would perish. Every time a human being doses himself with quinine or any other drug he is either slaying or ejecting from their natural dwellings millions of these minute creatures who have dropped in upon him for the time being. Still, it is quite ethical on our part to place our own comfort and convenience first, and to expel the microbes whenever necessary.

At this point it may not be altogether unprofitable to emphasise the important distinction between infectious and contagious disease. What are known in medical circles as contagious diseases are those which are transmitted by contact with the diseased subject, either by touch or by the use of the same articles, by the breath or effluvial discharges from the body, as well as other sources of contagion. Small-pox and measles are well-known examples of contagious disease. Infectious diseases, on the other hand, are those that are disseminated indirectly, as, for instance, by the adventitious introduction of solid or liquid substances into a human or animal body. Yellow fever, malaria, typhoid, and other diseases are examples of this nature. It is therefore obvious that all contagious diseases may be contracted through infection; but a large number of infectious diseases are very rarely contagious, and even then in very exceptional circumstances. The importance which resides in this distinction between infection and contagion is clearly illustrated in the following passage:—

> "Until a few years ago it was believed that yellow fever was highly contagious, and every precaution was taken to keep the disease from spreading by keeping the infected region in strict quarantine. This often meant much hardship and suffering, and always a great financial loss. We now know that it is infectious only, and not contagious, and that all this quarantine was unnecessary. The whole fight in controlling an outbreak of yellow fever or in preventing such an outbreak is now directed against the mosquito, the sole agent by which the disease can be transmitted from one person to another."*

Among all the insect enemies of man the mosquito is probably the deadliest. When Linnæus prepared his famous list of living things in 1758, he catalogued six species of mosquitoes only. When, in 1901, Dr. Theobald published his work on mosquitoes, he enumerated three hundred and forty-three kinds. At the time of writing some six hundred species are known to exist, and numerous others doubtless remain to be discovered.

A great impetus was given to the study of mosquitoes when it began to be suspected that these creatures played a very uncanny part in the propagation of disease. It was discovered that the eggs of the insect are deposited in water. When the eggs hatch the larvæ burst open the lower end of the eggs, and then enter the water. An aquatic medium is absolutely essential to the growth of the larvæ. A small quantity of water will suffice, but unless there be sufficient to cover the larvæ they die. The mouth parts of the different species vary very considerably, as their feeding habits are frequently quite dissimilar. Some mosquito larvæ prey on the young of other species, or on other insects. The majority of the "wigglers," as the Americans call them, content themselves with a diet of algæ, diatoms, and other lowly-living forms, which they sweep into their mouths. This end is achieved by the motions of their little brush-like organs, which impel currents of water towards their mouths.

When hatched the larvæ are extremely small, but, given a high temperature and an abundant food supply, they grow very rapidly. In a day or two the outer skin becomes hard and inelastic, and in this manner prevents further growth. A new integument now forms underneath, and the old skin is discarded. This process is termed moulting, and is repeated four times during the weeks covered by the life of the larvæ. After the fourth moult the free-swimming larva is transformed into a still active, but fasting, pupa. The pupal period occupies from two to six days more. When the mature insect prepares to emerge, the pupal skin splits along the back, and the fully-developed mosquito makes its appearance. After resting on its discarded skin, or on the water, until its wings have hardened, the insect enters upon its flying career.

Although all mosquitoes appear much alike, there are nevertheless marked structural differences in the two sexes. This is important, as the male's mouth organs are so constructed that it cannot, even if it desired to suck our blood, engage in that disease-creating occupation. Some authorities contend that the female is alone capable of biting, but others think that the males of some species draw blood. In any case, the lady mosquito is the chief offender.

Malaria dates from the dawn of human history: and although various theories were propounded in antiquity concerning it, it was not until the commencement of the eighteenth century that modern views began to be expressed. In 1718 Lancisi advanced the view that the swarms of gnats, mosquitoes, and other insects which haunt malarial regions carry poisonous substances, and introduce them by means of their mouth organs into the human body. This was a most progressive step, as all previous inquirers appear to have associated malarial fevers with impure air alone. But it was not until 1880 that Laveran, a French army surgeon, began to study the blood of malarial patients microscopically, and he soon detected the parasite responsible for the disease. He met with the usual experience of the pioneer; but his discovery was amply verified by other investigators, and was universally acknowledged by the world of science. That his experimental work is now fully recognised is evidenced by the fact that the Nobel prize for medicine was recently bestowed upon him.

In 1885 Dr. Golgi proceeded on the lines laid down by Laveran, and made a minute study of malarial parasites. He determined their life-history in the blood, and distinguished the three parasitical organisms which cause malarial fevers of the tertian, quartan, and remittent types. It is now known that the life-histories of these parasites are very similar, the main difference residing in the time taken in their reproduction. At first the parasite is rod-like in form. It moves in the blood-plasm, and quickly proceeds to attack the red blood-corpuscles and penetrates into their interior. It feeds upon the blood-cell it has pierced until it has completely assimilated it.

> "After about forty hours, if the parasite is vivax, or about sixty-five hours if it is malariæ, it becomes immobile; the nucleus divides again and again, and the protoplasm collects around these nuclei, forming a number of small cells or spores, as they are called. In about forty-eight or seventy-two hours, depending on whether the parasite is vivax or malariæ, the wall of the corpuscle bursts, and all these spores, with the black pigment and the waste products that have been stored away within the cell, are liberated into the blood-plasm."

Acid Drops.

We have been amused lately by a reperusal of Moncure D. Conway's Autobiography. It is a bold and honest book intellectually, but it was written in Conway's old age, and there is a subtle blight of "respectability" all over it—especially in its later portions. Conway had bravely denounced the prosecution of the Freethinker, and indignantly protested against the malicious use of the word "indecent" by its enemies. At the great St. James's Hall meeting after the editor's liberation from Holloway Prison, he raised a perfect storm of cheers by saying that some of Mr. Foote's elders had thought he was going a little too far in his attacks on Christianity, but the Christians had gone out of their way to prove that all Mr. Foote had said against it was true. They answered him by putting him in prison, which was exactly the policy that he had charged them with through the whole of their history. It was a great hit, and the meeting rose to it. But there is not a word about Mr. Foote or the Freethinker prosecution in Conway's Autobiography. He had fallen exclusively into the society of "respectable" people; that is, people of social standing and more than average income. We gratefully remember his attitude at the time of our prosecution. And we sincerely regret that he edged away from "common" (that is, poor) people in the later years of his life.

The worst of that sort of thing is that it always spells failure in the end. An agitation of any sort without the support of the masses is doomed to sterility. Conway found that out, but he did not profit by the lesson. He relates the brief history of his Congress of Liberal Thinkers, held at South Place Chapel in 1878. We attended it in company with James Thomson ("B. V."), who was bitterly satirical over the sorry exhibition of half-heartedness we witnessed. The "classes" were represented—but not the "masses." The organisation started came to nothing. The world couldn't be set on fire by twenty-four highly respectable unorthodox ladies and gentlemen meeting occasionally at Huxley's house. The one open fighter who helped in calling the Congress was Clifford—and he, alas, was dying. There was another fighting man whom they had not taken into their calculations; he was a man of the people, and he was destined to lead and inspire the real fight for Freethought for many years to come. His name was Charles Bradlaugh.

We recollect hearing at the Congress of Liberal Thinkers that the fight for mere freedom of speech was over. Nearly everybody was saying so. We have been hearing the same thing from the same sort of people ever since. But the event has always belied their cheerful (and timid) optimism. Conway was obliged to see this. He admits that while that Liberal Congress was sitting London was seething with superstition. There was soon "a recrudescence of wildest fanaticism" and "also a recrudescence of legal persecution." In that phrase, presumably, the Freethinker case is discreetly included. But the point we want to emphasise is Conway's admission that while the Liberal Thinkers were "theoretically abolishing superstition" it was actually flourishing with remarkable and even explosive vitality. The same thing is to a large extent true now. Let us never be deceived by easy counsels in which the wish is father to the thought. The Goddess of Wisdom is always armed. She wears her helmet and wields her sword. It was a grand symbol of the old Greeks. And we hope Freethinkers will not forget the great truth it enshrines. Civilisation is never safe from superstition while they co-exist. Look at the Rome of the Cæsars and the Rome of the Popes. Who could have imagined that the one would be succeeded by the other? Yet it was so. And to forget the lesson is to invite disaster.

The danger of a recrudescence of superstition is noted by Dr. Benjamin Andrews, President of Brown University, U.S.A., in an article in the International Journal of Ethics. He is doubtful if the scientific mind is holding its own. "Superstition not unlike belief in ghosts," he says, "is still widespread and rank," and "ideas of prayer as irrational as fetish worship have immense vogue among the people." The Gods, in short, threaten to come back. George Macdonald, editor of the New York Truthseeker, with reference to this matter, puts the case very pointedly. "Christianity produced the Dark Ages once," he says, "and who knows that it cannot repeat the trick?"

From the Christian World we learn "there is a strong movement among the leaders of Free Churches" to induce the editor of the Daily News to reconsider the advisability of a Church census in London. We are not surprised. What is the good of printing columns of sensational stuff about the progress of the Gospel, the way in which London is being won for Christ, with the many thousands of converts gained by professional evangelists, if a census is to be taken which proves that all these successes have resulted in a diminished attendance? The Free Churches have always twitted the Church of England, when it objected to a religious census in Wales, with being afraid of having its weakness disclosed. What other reason is there for their objecting to the Daily News census? Of course, the real reason is disguised by a professed fear that important items of the religious life are ignored and unimportant ones emphasised. But the census does not pretend to deal with the state of religion, but with the number of church attendances. And if we give the Churches the full benefit of all who attend from non-religious reasons, this will about balance those who stay away without having their faith in religious teaching diminished.

"Materialism is dead." "It is the doctrine of a handful of discredited thinkers." Such is the burden of men like Sir Oliver Lodge and of many others who are less conversant with the real facts of the situation. Meanwhile, science goes on its way making one discovery after another in virtue of its loyalty to the materialistic principle of investigation. And here is one of our leading neurologists, Sir T. S. Clouston, in an article in the current Quarterly Review, insisting that if we are to understand mental phenomena "we must think of mind not as a self-existing, self-acting entity, but as an energy which is as dependent on brain and brain memories for its exhibition as electricity, motion, or heat are on matter." And in a recent address by Dr. Schafer, we observed that eminent physiologist declaring that the outcry over the Materialism of his presidential address before the British Association only demonstrated the ignorance of Fleet-street. This is exactly what was said in the Freethinker at the time of the hubbub. The ordinary English journalist is really an uneducated person, and the developments of newspaper work seem to hold out greater attractions than ever to irredeemable mediocrity.

The Bishop of London says that for every ten men in East London who listened to the Gospel twenty-four years ago, you will now find six hundred. Perhaps the twenty-four years has reference to Bishop Ingram's appearance on the scene, and this is his graceful way of paying himself a compliment. We have no means of testing the figures, but we should like to know where this additional 590 manage to hide themselves. Evidently they don't show up in church attendances. And one cannot think of a Bishop telling an untruth.

None so blind as those who won't see. A reviewer in the Guardian remarks that "In England, though it may be otherwise in the Latin countries, unbelief is rare." We readily grant that in England unbelief is neither so bold nor so pronounced as it is, say, in France; but to speak of it as "rare" is simply ridiculous. We do not believe that the proportion of unbelievers to believers is very much different in England to what is the case in France. But here it goes under a number of more or less fancy names. Moreover, in the political world the rule is for those who are Freethinkers to keep their opinions to themselves, or at most never allow their Freethought to make itself obvious in connection with their political life. But if England were to be suddenly seized with an epidemic of mental honesty and straightforward speech, we believe it would be found that the number of unbelievers would not be very far short of many sects that rank themselves as quite respectable in point of numbers.

A Wycliffe preacher—that is, a Kensitite—went into St. Matthew's Parish Church, Sheffield, with a hammer, which he used on an image of the Madonna and Child. The head of little Jesus was knocked right off, and the Madonna's head and face were seriously injured. The iconoclast begged the Archbishop of York to prosecute him. Whether his wish will be granted remains to be seen. Meanwhile we note the strange harmony in the household of faith.

Another poor professional Christite. Rev. William Henry Arundell, rector of Stockleigh, Devon, left £23,043. If the Gospels are true he must have made a big splash in hell.

One thing is certain amidst the chances and changes of French politics. The men at the head of affairs are nearly all Freethinkers. The new Ministry under M. Briand is as full of Freethinkers as the old Ministry under M. Poincaré. The latter, who is now President of the French Republic, is a well-known materialistic scientist.

Among the interesting, and sometimes valuable, books included in Nelson's "Shilling Library" is the Letters of Dr. John Brown. This is not the place to say anything about the general contents of this volume. Our object here is not literary. We desire to illustrate a very significant fact in the bearing of Christians towards Freethinkers. Now that the Blasphemy Laws are falling into disgrace, it is often contended that "blasphemers" are rightly punished, not for for their heresy, but for "hurting the feelings" of their orthodox fellow citizens. How absurd and hypocritical this is may be seen by the fact that it is only one set of people's feelings that receive protection. A question of "wounded feelings" should be considered impartially. A Christian should be punished for "outraging" the feelings of Freethinkers as much as a Freethinker for "outraging" the feelings of Christians. But this is never contemplated—and it never will be. For the present view of the Blasphemy Laws is merely an excuse for punishing Freethinkers by incurring an unanswerable charge of intolerance. Now one of the things most strongly reprobated by Christians is "ridicule." This is no wonder. The most trying of all criticism is ridicule—when you are not sure of your ground, which no Christian of to-day really is. But the Christian who objects to ridicule when applied to his convictions does not object to it when applied to the convictions of his opponents. On the contrary, he thoroughly enjoys it, and says it is the most just and effective way of dealing with them. Moreover, the Christians are all pretty much alike in this respect. Station and education seem to make no difference; neither does character,—and that is curious. Dr. John Brown was one of the best and kindest of men by nature. Christian as he was, and an orthodox Christian too, a beautiful sonnet was addressed to him by Swinburne, which opens this collection of his Letters; while the very last thing in the volume is a letter from another Freethinker, Mark Twain, wittily declaring that "He was the most extensive slaveholder of his time, and the kindest; and yet he died without setting one of his bondmen free." Yet this good man, so finely eulogised by two Freethinkers who loved him, had the gracelessness to refer to Professor Tyndall in the following manner, three or four years after the delivery of the famous Belfast address:

> "Thanks again for the Tyndall; ridicule is one of the best ways of meeting his pernicious and idiotic stuff."

How ridiculous this sounds after the lapse of nearly forty years! How ill-mannered, also, is such language in reference to a scientist of Tyndall's size and weight! "Don't let us argue with him," Dr. Brown seems to say, "let us ridicule him and make people laugh at him." And this in spite of the fact that Tyndall's own style of controversy was as grave as possible, and his language of the most correct good breeding. One cannot help reflecting that Christian bigotry was enough to poison so sweet and sound a nature as Dr. Brown's; and what worse could be said of it?

We remember an almost sadder case than this. Bishop Berkeley, a man of saintly character, to whom Pope ascribed "every virtue under heaven," wrote an article in the Guardian, in which he said that the author of the famous Discourse on Freethinking "deserved to be denied the common benefits of air and water." And who was the author of that wicked book? Anthony Collins, a man of most exemplary character. The great John Locke was charmed with him and made him one of his executors, praising his "love of truth and moral courage as superior to almost any other he had ever known"—according to Professor Fraser.

In another part of this week's Freethinker we reproduce a Star report of a curious case at the court of Coroner Waldo, of Southwark. Evidently the Coroner was angry at the foreman of the jury preferring the Affirmation to the Oath. But that does not excuse the vulgar insolence with which he addressed Mr. Ray. The Bradlaugh Oaths Act gives the same rights in every respect to those who affirm as to those who swear. Dr. Waldo may think otherwise, but in that case he is mistaken,—as he may learn to his cost if he insults an affirming juryman who is able and willing to carry the matter further.

For two or three generations at least after John Wesley, says Dr. Scott Lidgett, "when any man became distinguished for religious fervor, for moral earnestness, or for humane sympathies, men said of him, 'He has turned Methodist.'" Well, this is simply not true. Methodists might have said it; but then no one has ever accused them of lack of impertinence. Rightly or wrongly, but as a mere question of fact, with large numbers of people a profession of moral earnestness and humanitarian sympathies was in no sense identified with Methodism. Methodism was rather a synonym for moral cant and religious hypocrisy. We are not now saying whether this identification was justifiable or not, but it was there. All the same, we should like to know with what humanitarian movements Methodism was allied in its earlier years. It was certainly not the Temperance movement. Neither was it the movement for the rational treatment of criminals, nor for the equality of the sexes. And it is significant that the developments of the worst features of the English factory system, with its systematic depopulation of the countryside in the interests of the factory owner, and its wholesale murder of women and children for the sake of huge profits, was coincident with the development of Methodism. Perhaps Dr. Scott Lidgett will explain.

A correspondent of the Methodist Times, commenting on Mr. Elmore's description of Sunday in East Ham (noted in last week's Freethinker), wishes to know why the Churches were passed over in dealing with East Ham's Sunday resources. We fancy Mr. Elmore might reply that he was dealing with the absence of places that offered a clean, healthy entertainment, and which might offer to the crowds parading the streets some better attraction than the public-house. Of course, in the ordinary way, such articles in a religious paper would have dwelt upon the number of churches, their tremendous power in beautifying and purifying the district, and the eagerness with which the crowds flocked to the services. For once in a way, a little of the truth was allowed to show itself. Hence the surprise of the correspondent. The same gentleman also observes on Mr. Elmore's remark that the streets of East Ham on Sunday presented "a dismal spectacle," "What better of a sane and health community could one wish to meet with?" That sentence is a gem, and it would be a pity to spoil it by comment.

"When Miss Mary Boone arrived in New York last week from Munich with a gold and diamond chalice which Princess Louise Ferdinand of Bavaria wished to present to the new Spanish church in this city, the customs officers refused to let the bauble pass without duty. Miss Boone thereupon hiked to the residence of Cardinal Farley, who went forthwith to the custom house and came away with the chalice. We do not understand the action of the customs officials. If there is a law under which they acted in refusing to let the importation pass in the custody of the woman, how could the appearance of the Catholic prelate alter the state of affairs? What is the graft? How are Farley and the Catholic churches privileged above secular citizens and institutions to import articles of value duty free? Does exemption from taxation and assessments imply an equally corrupt immunity from the customs charges the rest of us have to pay? Do corruption, protection, and graft become virtuous when practised in the name of religion?"—Truthseeker (New York).

A lady living at Plumstead has six sons in the Army, four of whom have reached non-commissioned rank. Their mother is naturally proud of her sons, and we should be very sorry to say anything that would diminish her pride in her family, or the sons' respect for their mother. But in connection with this we came across a comment in one of our leading newspapers to the effect that not many women have rendered more splendid or honorable service to their country than this one. And to that we do object most emphatically. The notion that parents only do the country service when they supply sons for the Army or the Navy is simply monstrous. Any parent that brings up a child in a clean and honorable manner, and leaves it at maturity capable of playing his or her part in the work of the world, has done the State full and honorable service. The mother who has sons working honorably on the land, or in any other decent occupation, has quite as much cause to be proud of her family as has the mother of these six soldiers, and we hope that she would endorse our opinion. We do not wish to saddle her with responsibility for the opinion of the newspaper from which we quote, but that opinion may surely be taken as an indication of the undeveloped character of our civilisation.

The Guardian warns people against assuming that Disestablishment will heal religious differences and cause the various sects to work more amicably together. It also points out that neither in America nor in Ireland has the absence of an Established Church had this effect. For once in a way, we find ourselves in agreement with a religious paper. We should, of course, support any measure of real Disestablishment on purely political grounds, and as an act of justice towards all citizens. But we should not expect, in the present state of the world, any remarkable results to follow from it. We certainly should not expect Christians to become less Christian or less intolerant, either towards each other or towards non-Christians, as a consequence of such a measure. All that the absence of one Established Church in the States has meant is that all Churches are established. They are more or less protected by the State, and non-Christians are more or less harmed by them.

This is really what we should expect to see follow the Disestablishment of the Church in England and Wales. And this is really all that the vast majority of Nonconformists have in view. Their objection is not to religion patronised, protected, and endowed by the State, but to one religion being selected, and that one not their own. If the State offered to endow all sects alike, the cry for Disestablishment would be killed outright—except with a few enthusiasts for principle. The clamor of Nonconformists to have their sects officially represented at State functions, their acceptance of public money in the shape of remission of rates, their maintenance of religious functions in connection with municipal life, their use of the State for the suppression of anti-Christian opinion, with their support of the State teaching and endowment of religion in schools, proves that they are not advocating a genuine Disestablishment of religion. It is the Disestablishment of a Church they are after. And, candidly, we have no desire to see the Church of England pulled down in order to erect in its place Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, and the numerous other rag-tag and bob-tail of the religious world. Religion is only genuinely disestablished when a sufficient number of people have ceased to believe in it. While they do believe in it, all history shows that they will scheme and manœuvre for the help of the secular power in maintaining it. The man who does not recognise this has read history with his eyes closed.

The truth is gradually leaking out as to the conduct of the Balkan Allies during the recent war. Here is a passage from an article in the Outlook:—

> "Not one, but a hundred, Cawnpores have marked the march of the Servian and Bulgarian Nana Sahibs. 'The blood of scores of thousands of Turkish and Albanian women and children is on the hands of the 'Christian' armies. Old men and prisoners have been shot, stabbed, or brained with the rifle-butt after almost every Servian and Bulgarian occupation of conquered territory. 'The Cross' has not been 'raised above the Crescent,' as Mr. Harold Spender fondly asserts in the gushing columns of the Daily News, but it has been raised above a hundred and fifty thousand butchered men, women, and children, sacrificed to a devilish inhumanity and to a still more devilish cupidity and calculation by the officers and soldiers of King Peter of Servia and King Ferdinand of Bulgaria. It was not merely the defeat of the Turkish arms that the savage victors desired. They wanted the conquered land to be utterly cleared of inhabitants in order to have unimpeded room for Servian and Bulgarian colonisation. 'There will be no Moslem questions for the future in Macedonia,' said a Serb conqueror to Miss Durham, as reported by her in the Nation. 'The Moslems have been killed off.' The lowest estimate which has been made of the work of ruthless, deliberate massacre places the total of murdered Turkish and Albanian people—men, women, and children—at over a hundred and sixty thousand and probably as many as two hundred thousand."

"The common bond of outrage and butchery," the Outlook says, "will hardly provide a solid base of Balkan union."

Some day or other a collection of noble sayings of actual personages will be made. It will be a fine task for whoever undertakes it. We doubt if anything in the collection will beat the saying of the lofty-souled Frenchwoman who offered Condorcet a shelter when he was proscribed during the French Revolution. According to the law, whoever gave refuge to a proscribed person incurred the penalty of death. But that did not frighten her. "If you are outside the law," she said, "we are not outside humanity." Isn't that grand? Condorcet's action was also grand. He would not bring peril upon her house, and he went forth to his doom. He was an Atheist. Probably she was too.

We told the Leeds police that there was plenty of necessary work for them without worrying Freethought speakers over a little "extra" language. Many of the clergy want a great deal more looking after. We see that the Rev. Joseph Armitage Haigh has been arrested with a reformatory-school boy and charged with "a grave offence." His guilt or innocence the law will decide. We are merely congratulating the Leeds police on attending to their proper business.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, February 2, Queen's (Minor) Hall, Langham-place, Regent-street, London, W., at 7.30, "Woman's Worst Enemy."

February 9, 16, and 23, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London.

To Correspondents.

J. D. REDDING.—You can obtain "specimen" copies of the Freethinker (back numbers, of course) from our publishing office for free distribution. You would merely have to pay the carriage.

E. B.—Your cuttings, etc., are very welcome.

G. BARNARD.—The reply is simply disreputable. But it is not worth a rejoinder. And if the Rationalist Press Association does not object to such an abuse of its name by one in whom superiority of nature does not correct the defects of education, there is no more to be said.

E. HANNAH.—See paragraph. Thanks.

E. J. JONES.—Too late for this week; in our next.

"BAFFLED."—Yes, the Deity has sold the Suffragists. But will they take it as his answer?

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

M. M. MANGASARIAN (Chicago).—Very glad to hear from you again. Thanks also for your new lectures. We shall be writing you very shortly. Meanwhile we wish to assure you that you have many admirers (amongst our readers, at any rate) over here.

HARRY SHAW.—You have full permission to translate any of our articles into Esperanto. Is there any need to say more? Of course our great object is to be read.

C. W. COYLE.—Glad to hear that this journal affords you so much "intellectual enjoyment."

SOME correspondence stands over unavoidably till next week.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

"Woman's Worst Enemy" is the subject of Mr. Foote's lecture at Queen's Hall this evening (Feb. 2). It should be of peculiar interest in view of the "week of prayer" organised by the leaders of the Suffragist movement and the prompt collapse of "woman suffrage" cause in the House of Commons on Monday.

The January course of lectures at the Public Hall, Croydon, was wound up on Sunday evening by Mr. A. B. Moss, who had an excellent audience. The Secular Society, Ltd., having started this interesting experiment at considerable cost is now leaving it to the new N. S. S. Branch to continue the local propaganda.

The West Ham Branch holds a "social" at the Workmen's Hall, Romford-road, Stratford, on Saturday evening, February 8. Admission is free and all Freethinkers are cordially invited. Start at 7.30.

The Annual Meeting of the Rationalist Peace Society will be held at 167 St. Stephen's House, Westminster, on Thursday evening, February 13, at 8 o'clock. Members are earnestly invited to attend. St. Stephen's House faces the Embankment just a little east of the Parliament buildings.

The late Andrew Lang's book on the Bacon theory of "Shakespeare" has been published promptly. Another book on the same subject is now announced—"The Bacon Heresy," by Mr. J. M. Robertson, which is sure to be a thorough piece of work, whatever judgment it may challenge in other respects.

We see by the Truthseeker that an effort is being made to organise Sunday morning Freethought lectures in New York, with Mr. William Thurston Brown as speaker. We wish the experiment all success. There certainly appears room for it. We have often wondered why nothing of the kind existed in the biggest city in America.

Mrs. Ingersoll, the widow of R. G. Ingersoll, who is therefore the first lady in America in our estimation, has sent us a card announcing her daughter Maud's marriage to Mr. Wallace Marcus Probasco. Of course the nuptial ceremony was on secular lines and of the greatest simplicity. We wish the bride and bridegroom a long and happy union. Our one regret is that we cannot accept their kind invitation to look in at one of their at-homes.

The Ingersoll family is still a subject of attention in America. It also seems to be growing in spite of the Colonel's death. Billy Sunday, the revivalist, is running round the story that Ingersoll recanted and told his son to return to his mother's faith. Mrs. Ingersoll's "faith" was the same as her husband's, so their "son" hadn't far to go; moreover, the said "son" is like Jesus Christ in this that he is a product of Christian imagination.

This week's Freethinker leaves the editorial hands on Tuesday evening. Two days later there will be a meeting of the National Secular Society's Executive. At that meeting the whole matter involved in the purposes of our "Fighting Fund" will be discussed and decided. It is probable that very early action will be taken. The policy of the London County Council appears to be one of evasion by delay. But this will not be submitted to by the friends of free speech and discussion. A really definite statement may, therefore, be expected in our next issue.

The matter of the President's Honorarium Fund stands over for another week. We desire to say something about it ourselves in addition to the annual circular, and we prefer to let both appear in the same number of this journal. Meanwhile subscriptions—which will be publicly acknowledged in due course—are being acknowledged privately.

The American friend who offered to make up any deficiency on the full £300 for the 1912 Fund forwarded us his cheque with the utmost promptitude, but he omitted to say whether we were to disclose his name or not, so we are waiting until we hear from him again.

Correspondence.

FIELDING—MACAULAY—SHELLEY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Your luminous exposition of the resemblance between Shelley's dedication of Peter Bell and Macaulay's forecast of the New Zealander suggests to me the possible relationship of Sheridan's Mrs. Malaprop to Fielding's Mrs. Slipslop in Joseph Andrews.

The Rivals appears to have been first produced in 1775, while Joseph Andrews appeared in 1742; and may it not have been that, to enhance the risible element in his first attempt as a dramatist, Sheridan expanded the somewhat limited vocabulary of Mrs. Slipslop into Mrs. Malaprop's somewhat overdone "derangement of epitaphs"?

J. W. O'LEARY.

Religion and Rapine in the Balkans.

THE Balkan nations have sullied their triumphant career of conquest and racial revenge by exhibiting some of the worst vices of the "bottom dog" rendered vicious by the new-found capacity to bark and bite. The fact that the conquerors are Christian will not deprive them of one atom of the sympathy and enthusiasm with which Freethinkers throughout the world are wont to greet the efforts of brave races "nobly struggling to be free." But the fight for liberty and national redemption from an intolerable yoke is one thing, and the entrance upon a veritable crusade of ferocity is another.

The initial proclamation by the Bulgarian Ferdinand of a crusade against the Turk, with the religious sanction and approval of the Bulgarian variety of the Christian faith, was of bad omen for the humane prosecution of the war—that is to say, for its prosecution with only the ordinary accessories of superfluous killing consecrated by the usages of war as practised by the present-day followers of the Prince of Peace. The events of the last few months have served to prove that a war of religions under the immediate patronage of rival gods and priests can engender more ferocities than a mere war of races, and that the Christian hatred of the Moslem and Jew, qua Moslem and qua Jew, has suffered no mitigation in the long course of the ages.

Already, in mid-November, the news was known in England that the Greek soldiers in Salonica had sacked the Jewish quarter, ransacking and destroying the synagogues; and this, coupled with the time-honored violation of young Jewish women, completed the picture of terror and desolation wrought by the newly consecrated soldiers of the Cross. The Times correspondent at Salonica tells us that, "inaugurated by the local Greek press, a crusade of anti-Semitism has spread over the armies, with the result that the unfortunate Israelites have been pillaged and mercilessly ill-treated." The correspondent of the Manchester Guardian did not confine the blame to the Greeks, for he says that "on their march to Salonica the Bulgarians had already had more than a taste for blood and rapine, having ravaged without mercy the Turkish villages on the way, and as soon as they entered Salonica they began to pillage systematically the quarters occupied by them." As the Greek and Bulgarian armies made practically simultaneous entry into Salonica, the inhabitants, who, as is well known, are mostly Jews, were caught between two fires and maltreated by two sets of infuriated bigots. We can now understand why certain pious people in this country were hungering after a full-dress national thanksgiving and singing of the Te Deum in the churches and chapels in laudation of the Lord for crowning with victory the army of the Balkan Allies.

The Jews of European Turkey are mostly the descendants of the 300,000 Jews that were driven out of Spain by the Holy Inquisition and the Christian monarchs of Spain, who acted as the familiars of the Holy Office. There are now in the Balkans some 400,000 of these scattered offshoots of a scattered race—the Sephardim, as they are called, to distinguish them from the Achkenazim, who came from Poland, Hungary, and Germany, driven forth, in both cases, by the holy zeal of the Christian. The Sephardim speak—writing it in quasi-Hebrew characters—the old language of Spain, and hold a tenacious remembrance of the prosperity and brilliant culture that their forefathers created in Spain under the Arab domination.

My friend Lorand, who knows these Balkanic Judeo-Spaniards well,* states that for some time after their dispersion, the Sephardim were subdivided into as many local groups as there were centres of origin, and that right down to the seventeenth century the Castilian, the Toledan, and the Barcelonian groups of emigrants kept themselves distinct and separate. Salonica contained thirty-six of these divisions, corresponding to as many parishes, but with the march of time unity was at length established.

At a period of their chequered history when the cup of their sufferings was filled to overflowing, the Jews enjoyed in Turkey a long spell of hospitality and toleration. The fifteenth and sixteenth centuries were the age of gold for the Sephardim. The Jewish refugees from Spain and Portugal, who were distinguished by their culture, found ready access to the Sultan's court, and careers were opened up to them in diplomacy or in the public administration. For two centuries the Sephardim Jews in Turkey carried on the high functions of state, but, subsequently, these passed from them into the hands of the Greeks. During the early days that succeeded the establishment of the Sephardim in the diverse states of the Sultan's dominions, the first emigrants from Spain and Portugal, whose forefathers had provided a rich succession of savants, philosophers, and renowned physicians to the Caliphs of Cordova, strove to develop in their new home the culture which they had fostered in Spain. The sterilising influence of the Turk was, however, by no means so favorable to their efforts for culture and civilisation as the enlightened rule of the Arabs.

In these later years the educational work of the "Alliance israélite" brought about a revival of culture amongst the Balkan Jews, and this has borne moral and political fruit; the enlightened Jews in Macedonia, who, for the most part, were affiliated to the Masonic lodges, were amongst the first to rally to the liberalising movement which, four years ago, brought about the downfall of the Hamidian regime. The lodges of Salonica became the principal hotbeds of the Young Turk revolution, and the Israelitish element was honorably associated with the new Government of Turkey: with the official Government as also with the secret government organised by the Committee of Union and Progress. Until the Kiamil Cabinet was formed, the Jews occupied the highest posts under the Porte, and the boycott against Greek commerce was especially their work. The revenge which the Greeks have recently taken in the form of massacre, rape, and rapine is thus seen to be the culminating point of a long series of racial and religious rivalries between Greek and Jew, accentuated by the recent irritations occasioned by commercial loss through the boycott; and, secondly, by an insolent sense of mastery and victory on the part of the Greeks.

There is danger lest, in its anxiety for peace and its indifference to anything so ideal as fair play for Jews against Christians, Europe may ignore the hard case of the persecuted Jews at Salonica. Apparently, some 100,000 Sephardim are immediately affected by these tragic outbursts of mediæval horrors in and about Salonica, which, whether it become a Bulgarian or a Greek town, is already predominantly a Jewish town. In fact, Salonica is, perhaps, the place where the Jewish element is most predominant from a numerical, and normally, from a self-government point of view.

My attention was drawn with special interest to this dark shadow on the Balkan horizon by a pathetic article in El Progreso of January 10, written by Senor Sam Levy, the late editor of La Epoca of Salonica. The article, written in the curious Spanish which survives amongst the Balkan Jews, is an appeal to Spain and to her people and government to defend "the holy cause of humanity" by intervening in defence of the threatened Sephardim,—

> "that is to say, in defence of a hundred thousand Judeo-Spaniards who are your brothers in language and nationality. Europe is looking on with indifference at the scenes, so dishonorable to humanity and to modern civilisation, that are being enacted in Macedonia, a cursed land soaked with human blood, and, above all, in Salonica, which has been the cradle of liberty.....In the streets, in the squares, and in every corner of Salonica, the Greeks, those unworthy descendants of ancient Hellas, are wounding, robbing, violating, assassinating, and despoiling under the indulgent eyes of the officials and the authorities."

* Le Rattachement (Bruxelles), January 5, 1913.

This touching article, which originally appeared in the Heraldo, and produced a painful and sympathetic impression on Spanish public opinion, winds up with an appeal to the mother country for protection :—

> "All these victims, Spain, are thy children; the children whom thou did'st abandon five centuries ago; but they have not cast aside their maternal language, nor their traditions, nor their memories."

Resolute intervention on behalf of these, her long-lost children, is Spain's obvious duty, and such an act in noble reparation of an ancient wrong would be more honorable to Spain than the wasting of her substance upon illusory empire in the Rif. Here is a chance for Spain now that a new regime of progress seems dawning upon the country by the signal revenge upon Maura which the ghost of Ferrer has again inflicted upon that dangerous bigot.

Senor Sam Levy has written to me with further information on these Greek outrages and on the future dangers to which the Sephardim are subjected. He states that when the invaders entered into the Macedonian towns the Sephardim, who were well affected to the Turks, did not indulge in any manifestations of joy, nor did they display any outward signs of sympathy with the conquerors. The Greeks have officially declared that the persecutions to which the Jews have been subjected were due to the frigid reception which they accorded to the soldiers of the Cross. But even if the Jews had given way to transports of delight in welcoming their implacable enemies, the Greeks, the latter would doubtless have persecuted them under some other pretext equally frivolous. The truth is that the Greeks are jealous of the commercial prosperity of the Jews, and are piously anxious to effect their ruin. According to advices received from Macedonia, more than 8,000 Jewish families have been the victims of numerous acts of robbery, the infliction of the bastinado, and the rape of young girls in the presence of their parents. Jewish merchants and traders have been assassinated in broad daylight and their property plundered. Already three accusations of the ritual crime, the blood accusation—that sure provocative of massacre so dear to the heart of Christians in Eastern Europe when they lust to kill—have been made against the Sephardim. My correspondent dreads the awful consequences to his race when the Easter festivities take place. Senor Levy declares most positively that if the press in Western Europe takes no notice of these abominations, the persecutions will break out again in more terrible form. If the Greeks remain at Salonica, the total ruin of the Sephardim is—he thinks—a matter of certainty. For that reason he insists that Spain and the rest of Europe should seriously concern themselves with this new danger to civilisation. His view is that Spain ought, in the first place, to take under its protection the Sephardim of the Balkans, and afterwards organise a systematic and rational system of emigration for the reintegration of the Sephardim into the body of the Spanish race. The uncultivated lands in Spain, left fallow since the days when Moor and Jew lived peaceably side by side under the Spanish sun, might, he considers, be apportioned to the refugee Sephardim, true sons of mediæval Iberia, expatriated from her once fertile soil by the relentless ferocity of the Holy Inquisition. Senor Levy appeals to the English press to create a strong current of public opinion on behalf of the threatened Sephardim, and I am glad to be his mouthpiece in making urgent appeal for humanity and justice. As for Spain, she has every interest, and her Government has every incentive of national duty, to step forward now to repair in some measure the calamitous mistake and crime—the mistake being greater than ordinarily is the case than the crime—to which the nation was driven five hundred years ago when the Church rooted out of Spain and Portugal the quick-witted, cultured, and industrious ancestors of the Sephardim. I am glad to say that the question of repatriation has already enlisted much sympathy in influential quarters in Spain. Thus one generation is called upon to heal the wounds of the past, and thus the conscience of the race slowly but surely acquires the painful but salutary conviction that religion in general, and the Christian superstition in particular, are seminally the morbus maleficus, the perennial plague-spots of humanity, ever sapping the foundations of sympathy and goodwill between man and man and race and race; yielding only to the disinfecting influence of rational culture and to the enlightened secularisation of the social activities of mankind.

WILLIAM HEAFORD.

God's Views on Women.

GERTRUDE ATHERTON, an American authoress, says of men : "They admire God because he made himself in their gender, and knew what he was about when he invented woman." According to the Bible, however, woman was merely an afterthought of creation, and "brought sin into the world and all our woe," shortly after he appearance on the scene. She owes to man the rib for her manufacture. Eve, says Paul, was in the trangression. She had the curse which involves most suffering, and "He shall rule over thee" was a prophetic portion thereof. From first to last the Bible is a he-book. God is masculine, and his only-begotten child is a son. Why did he not beget a daughter to right the wrong Mother Eve is said to have committed? The Roman Catholics have endeavored to supply this omission by elevating Mary to a position of more importance than God the Father himself.

Throughout the Bible women are treated with contempt. All God's favorites were polygamists. Women were bought and sold in the same way as other merchandise. Rebekah was virtually bought by Abraham's servant for Isaac. In the Ten Commandments a man's wife is classed with his ox, his ass, or anything which is his. In the chapter following the Decalogue permission is given to fathers to sell their daughters into slavery. Sarah gave Hagar, her female slave, "to her husband, Abraham, to be his wife," and when he was tired of her he cast her with her child into the desert. "And God said unto Abraham, Let it not be grievous in thy sight because of the lad, and because of thy bond-woman."

The patriarchal system had long been established when the Bible was compiled, although there are traces in the Old Testament records of a far earlier matriarchal stage, when kinship was traced through mothers, fathers being uncertain. The power of the father was supreme, extending, as in the case of Abraham, to life and death. He never thought of consulting Sarah as to whether he should sacrifice her only son. According to the divine laws dictated by God to Moses, all that a husband had to do if his wife found no favor in his eyes was to "write her a bill of divorcement, give it in her hand, and send her out of his house" (Deut. xxiv. 1). The woman had no power of appeal. Her husband was accuser, judge, and jury. No remedy is offered to the woman if her husband finds no favor in her eyes. A female child was held to be an extra defilement to a woman, and an additional atonement was required.

Painters depict angels as feminine, but the Bible angels are all males. The three who appeared to Abraham were mistaken for men. The one who wrestled with Jacob is called a man. The angel that announced a child to Manoah's wife was "a man of God." The angel that announced to Zachariah the birth of John was a male, and so was the one who appeared to Mary. It is curious how often angelic visits were followed by births.

The preacher who writes in the name of the sensual sultan Solomon declares : "One man among a thousand have I found; but a woman among all those have I not found." This is put forward as God's word, and his opinion of his handiwork. Burns paid God a better compliment when he wrote of Nature :—

> "Her prentice han' she tried on man,
> And then she made the lasses, O!"

The women most praised in the Bible are Rahab, the harlot, who betrayed her own people, and Jael, the wife of Heber, the Kenite, who basely assassinated a man who took refuge in her tent. If women had written the Bible, they would not have selected such heroines as these. No wonder some of them desire a revised Woman's Bible of their own!

God surely never meant women to read his holy volume, or he would have expunged the many shameless stories and filthy words which it contains. A decent deity would hardly have had the effrontery to inspire such narratives as those of Lot and his daughters, Tamar, the Levite's concubine, Bathsheba, Abishag, Aholah and Aholibah, and the details of Ezekiel, Hosea, and the Song of Solomon, if he had expected feminine readers. Had the Bible been written by women, be sure we should have had a different representation of them. Perhaps we might have read that it was Adam, not Eve, who was in the transegression.

The New Testament regards woman in much the same light as the Old. Paul says: "But I would have you know that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man" (1 Cor. xi. 3). In his epistle to the Ephesians (v. 22), he commands: "Wives, submit yourselves unto your husbands as unto the Lord." That is to say, the submission must be unquestioning and complete. "For," he repeats, "the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the Church.....Therefore, as the Church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything." No despot could require a larger charter than granted by Paul. Again he says: "Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection" (1 Tim. ii. 7). He affirms, in the most pronounced terms, that the position of woman is a subordinate and servile one. "I suffer not a woman to teach," he exclaims with masculine arrogance (1 Tim. ii. 12).

In the seventh chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, where Paul deals with the marriage relation, he puts that institution on a purely bestial basis, and says: "He that giveth a virgin in marriage doeth well, but he that giveth her not in marriage doeth better." Not a word as to the possibility of a girl having a will of her own in the matter. In a succeeding chapter (xi. 6-10) he insists that "the woman" must either be covered (wear a veil, as they do in the East) or "let her also be shorn." "For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God; but the woman is the glory of the man. For the man is not of the woman, but the woman of the man. Neither was the man created for the woman, but the woman for the man." The verse which follows, "For this cause ought the woman to have power on her head because of the angels," has puzzled the commentators. It is illustrated by similar precepts in the Koran. Paul, like Mohammed, thought that even the angels might fall into the snares of female beauty. A little further on (xiv. 34, 35) Paul again says: "Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law." Paul well knew that the whole tenor and spirit of the Bible touching the status of woman is that her main mission is but to minister to man—his inferior, not his equal.

Our "great exemplar" was a male, who never married. The references of Jesus to the sex are entirely of a monkish character. "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" he brutally exclaims to his mother. His chosen disciples were men, though he let women minister unto him. He taught that marriage was an inferior state, praising those who made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake (Matthew xix. 12). In the Apocalypse we find that the elect of heaven are those "not defiled with women" (Rev. xiv. 4). The Catholic Church has always taught that unnatural celibacy is the higher state of life, and the early Christian Fathers unite in contemning the characters of women. Tertullian calls her "the gateway of hell." Through the ages when Christianity was predominant she was regarded emphatically as the temptress, the agent of Satan, to lead man from the holy life. Of the nine millions who, it has been computed, were slaughtered in the persecution of witchcraft, probably only one in five hundred was a male.

The teachings of the Bible have contributed to make slaves of women and tyrants of men. There are abundant signs that this old teaching will not suit the present day. Women, who desire the emancipation of their sex, should cease to work for the religion which has built its churches on their prostration, and have the courage to affirm that Paul's authority has no influence with them.

—Sub-Editor of the "Freethinker" and Author of the "Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers," etc.

The Infidel and the Christian.

[The following extract is from Mark Twain's What is Man? which was given to the public only after his death. The book is in the form of a dialogue between an Old Man—a Determinist—and a Young Man—an orthodox Christian. The Old Man's theory is that conscience is a product of environment and outside influences, and, therefore, the standard of right and wrong must vary according to circumstances. The Old Man further contends that the mainspring of all of our actions is to do that only which gives us pleasure. The purport of the following story is to force home the admission that if it is wrong for an infidel to disturb a Christian's religion, it is equally reprehensible for a Christian to shake the faith of a heathen in his own pet gods.—E. B.]

OLD MAN.—I will tell you a little story. Once upon a time an Infidel was guest in the house of a Christian widow whose little boy was ill and near to death. The Infidel often watched by the bedside and entertained the boy with talk, and he used these opportunities to satisfy a strong longing of his nature—that desire which is in us all, to better other people's condition by having them think as we think. He was successful. But the dying boy, in his last moments, reproached him, and said:—

"I believed and was happy in it; you have taken my belief away and my comfort. Now, I have nothing left, and I die miserable; for the things which you have told me do not take the place of that which I have lost."

And the mother also reproached the Infidel, and said:—

"My child is for ever lost, and my heart is broken. How could you do this cruel thing? We have done you no harm, but only kindness; we made our house your home, you were welcome to all we had, and this is our reward."

The heart of the Infidel was filled with remorse for what he had done, and he said:—

"It was wrong—I see it now; but I was only trying to do him good. In my view, he was in error; it seemed my duty to teach him the truth."

Then the mother said:—

"I had taught him all his little life what I believed to be the truth, and in his believing faith both of us were happy. Now he is dead and lost, and I am miserable. Our faith came down to us through centuries of believing ancestors; what right had you, or anyone, to disturb it? Where was your honor, where was your shame?"

YOUNG MAN.—He was a miscreant, and deserved death.

O. M.—He thought so himself, and said so.

Y. M.—Ah—you see, his conscience was awakened!

O. M.—Yes—his Self Disapproval was. It pained him to see the mother suffer. He was sorry he had done a thing which brought him pain. It did not occur to him to think of the mother when he was misteaching the boy, for he was absorbed in providing pleasure for himself then. Providing it by satisfying what he believed to be a call of duty.

Y. M.—Call it what you please, it is to me a case of awakened conscience. That awakened conscience could never get itself into that species of trouble again. A cure like that is a permanent cure.

O. M.—Pardon—I had not finished the story. We are creatures of outside influences—we originate nothing within. Whenever we take a new line of thought and drift into a new line of belief and action, the impulse is always suggested from the outside. Remorse so preyed upon the Infidel that it dissolved his harshness towards the boy's religion, and made him come to regard it with tolerance, next with kindness, for the boy's sake and the mother's. Finally, he found himself examining it. From that moment, his progress in the new trend was steady and rapid. He became a believing Christian. And now his remorse for having robbed the dying boy of his faith and his salvation was bitterer than ever. It gave him no rest, no peace. He must have rest and peace—it is the law of our nature. There seemed but one way to get it; he must devote himself to saving imperilled souls. He became a missionary. He landed in a Pagan country ill and helpless. A native widow took him into her humble home and nursed him back to convalescence. Then her young boy was taken hopelessly ill, and the grateful missionary helped her tend him. Here was the first opportunity to repair a part of the wrong done to the other boy by doing a precious service for this one by undermining his foolish faith in his false gods. He was successful. But the dying boy in his last moments reproached him and said:—

"I believed and was happy in it; you have taken my belief away, and my comfort. Now, I have nothing left, and I die miserable; for the things you have told me do not take the place of that which I have lost."

And the mother also reproached the missionary and said:—

"My child is for ever lost, and my heart is broken. How could you do this cruel thing? We had done you no harm, but only kindness; we made our house your home, you were welcome to all we had, and this is our reward."

The heart of the missionary was filled with remorse for what he had done and he said:—

"It was wrong—I see it now; but I was only trying to do him good. In my view, he was in error; it seemed my duty to teach him the truth."

Then the mother said:—

"I had taught him, all his little life, what I believed to be the truth, and in his believing faith both of us were happy. Now he is dead—and lost; and I am miserable. Our faith came down to us through centuries of believing ancestors; what right had you, or anyone, to disturb it? Where was your honor, where was your shame?"

The missionary's anguish of remorse and sense of treachery were as bitter and persecuting and unappeasable now as they they had been in the former case. The story is finished. What is your comment?

Y. M.—The man's conscience was a fool! It was morbid. It didn't know right from wrong.

O. M.—I am not sorry to hear you say that. If you grant that one man's conscience doesn't know right from wrong, it is an admission that there are others like it. This single admission pulls down the whole doctrine of infallibility of judgment in consciences. Meantime, there is one thing which I ask you to notice.

Y. M.—What is that?

O. M.—That in both cases the man's act gave him no spiritual discomfort, and that he was quite satisfied with it and got pleasure out of it. But afterwards when it resulted in pain to him he was sorry. Sorry it had inflicted pain upon the others, but for no reason under the sun except that their pain had given HIM pain. Our consciences take no notice of pain inflicted upon others until it reaches a point where it gives pain to us. In all cases, without exception, we are absolutely indifferent to another person's pain until his sufferings make us uncomfortable. Many an infidel would not have been troubled by that Christian mother's distress. Don't you believe that?

Y. M.—Yes, you might almost say it of the average infidel, I think.

O. M.—And many a missionary, sternly fortified by his sense of duty, would not have been troubled by the pagan mother's distress—Jesuit missionaries in Canada in the early French times, for instance; see Episodes quoted by Parkman.

Y. M.—Well, let us adjourn. Where have we arrived?

O. M.—At this. That we (mankind) have ticketed ourselves with a number of qualities to which we have given misleading names. Love, Hate, Charity, Compassion, Avarice, Benevolence, and so on. I mean we attach misleading meanings to the names. They are all forms of self-contentment, self-gratification, but the names so disguise them that they distract our attention from the fact. Also, we have smuggled a word into the dictionary which ought not to be there at all—self-sacrifice. It describes a thing which does not exist. But, worst of all, we ignore and never mention the Sole Impulse which dictates and compels a man's every act; the imperious necessity of securing his own approval, in every emergency and at all costs. To it we owe all that we are. It is our breath, our heart, our blood. It is our only spur, our whip, our goad, our only impelling power; we have no other. Without it we should be mere inert images, corpses; no one would do anything, there would be no progress, the world would stand still. We ought to stand reverently uncovered when the name of that stupendous power is uttered.

Y. M.—I am not convinced.

O. M.—You will be when you think.

"My Lord the King."

FOREMAN OF JURY REFUSES TO AFFIRM AT SOUTHWARK INQUEST.

THE foreman of a jury at the Southwark Coroner's Court to-day refused to take the oath, or to pronounce the words "on behalf of my Sovereign Lord the King," in the affirmation.

The coroner (Dr. Waldo) noticed that the foreman, a man named Ray, was not holding a Bible. Mr. Ray explained that his objection was a conscientious one.

Mr. Ray then repeated the affirmation until he reached the words "on behalf of my Sovereign Lord the King." He then observed, "I shall not say that."

The Coroner: What objection is there?

The Foreman: I am here to do my duty in the interests of the people present. The King has nothing to do with what is to be decided here.

The Coroner: You are not worthy to sit here, you had better go.

The Foreman: I do not see why I should say those words.

The Coroner: You are subject to a penalty, you know, if you do not do what you are summoned to do.

The Foreman: I might do it just as a matter of convenience if the jury wish, but I am not bound to pledge myself to the King.

The Coroner went over the affirmation again, and the foreman repeated the words until he reached "on behalf of my Sovereign Lord the King." The foreman then remarked: "There you bring him in again. It is the same thing again."

The Coroner: You had better go. You are not worthy to sit here.

The Foreman: I am here to serve faithfully in the interests of the people present, and the King is not here, and is not interested in the case.

The foreman said he was willing to do his duty, but not to repeat the words.

The Coroner: You are subject to a fine, you know, and you could go to prison for contempt of court. Officer, just remove this man.

The coroner's officer then spoke to the foreman, who left the box saying, "Don't summon me in future, then, to attend a jury."

The Coroner: You are subject to a fine for contempt of court or to be sent to Brixton Prison, but you can go.—Star (Jan. 21).

A NOVEL PRAYER.

O Lord, you know that I do not believe in you as you are described in the Bible and believed in by the Church. You know I do not believe in the Bible as the Word of God. If it is true, as affirmed, that you created the universe, it follows that you have created all that is in it. You have created evil as well as good, the Devil as well as the angels, hell as well as heaven. If you have made men at all, you have made them as they are. If they are good it is because you have made them so, if they are wicked it is equally your work. If you are omnipotent and universal, as you are said to be, there can be no evil thing or wicked deed that is not the result of characters and conditions which you have created. If there is a hell and men are to be burned in it, it is because you have wished it to be so. All things are possible with you; had you wished to make men good and happy you would have done so. It has pleased you to make them evil and wretched. You are not, then, good, nor do you love your creatures. It is evident their sufferings give you pleasure or you would make them happy. Could I believe in you, I could not worship you, except through fear, the meanest of emotions, but the only one you seem desirous to excite. We cannot love you for the good you have done, for it serves only to make us more miserable, by contrast with the evil you have forced us to endure. And so, O Lord, if the Bible be truly your Word, and you are as the Old Testament describes you, I can only hate you and be thankful that I do not believe. And now, O Lord, if I am wrong it is because you have made me so, and because you wish me to continue so; for you can make me believe and do what you please. Created by you, I am a mere creature in your hands, and am responsible for nothing. I have not the power to choose between good and evil, as I am told I should do, for I can judge of right and wrong only through the use of a brain created by you in the full knowledge of the conclusions it would lead me to; with you and not with me rests the responsibility. I can only be thankful that I am not cowardly enough to fear nor weak enough to worship so horrible a creature as the God of the Church. Amen.—By the late W. S. Andrews, Commissioner of Records, New York.

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 6 SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

For I think that all right use of life, and the one secret of life, is to pave ways for the firmer footing of those who succeed us.—GEORGE MEREDITH.

A Great Book on Religion.

As a seat of learning Oxford has had an exceedingly interesting though somewhat chequered history. The leaders of the Methodist revival were nearly all Oxford men, as were also the authors of the famous Essays and Reviews. About the middle of the nineteenth century, the university became enamored of Mill's philosophy, and a kind of phenomenal Idealism has reigned there ever since. When M. Taine visited Oxford, on the occasion of the meeting of the British Association there in 1860, he met a young Englishman of genius, whom he questioned as to the philosophy of his country. After listening to the scientific papers, and examining the museums, the great French writer said to the Englishman, "You have no philosophers; you have savants, but not thinkers." The young gentleman, thrown upon his defence, named, as the original thinkers of England, Benjamin Jowett and John Stuart Mill. Jowett was a great teacher, but not a great philosopher. Theologically he was looked upon as a dangerous heresiarch. It was with him that the idea of the Essays and Reviews originated; and he shared to the full the cruel persecution to which the authors were subjected for many years. His Epistles of St. Paul created a tremendous sensation in the theological world. Mark Pattison was another theological heretic, whose works were for a time of immense influence. Oxonian heretics have been by no means rare. Only six years ago a Fellow and Tutor at Merton College, Mr. H. W. Garrod, published a heretical book, entitled The Religion of All Good Men, which fell like a bomb upon the theological camp. But Jowett and Pattison, though heterodox, were Christians, and championed their own versions of Christianity. At last, however, an Oxford Professor has just issued a volume in which he sets out to say all the good he can about Paganism. The author is the brilliant Greek scholar, Professor Gilbert Murray, to whom we were already indebted for most charming translations of some of the plays of Sophocles, Euripides, and Aristophanes. The present work, Four Stages of Greek Religion, is one of the boldest books ever published from a Christian university. Professor Murray believes in religion, but admits that there can be no such thing as religious knowledge. He says:—

> "In the first place, religion essentially deals with the uncharted region of human experience. A large part of human life has been thoroughly surveyed and explored; we understand the causes at work; and we are not bewildered by the problems. That is the domain of positive knowledge. But all around us on every side is an uncharted region, just fragments of the fringe of it explored, and those imperfectly; it is with this that religion deals. And secondly we may note that religion deals with its own province not tentatively, by the normal methods of patient intellectual research, but directly, and by methods of emotion, or sub-conscious apprehension" (p. 18).

To what extent any religious system is regarded by him as being anything but mere superstition, it is difficult to tell; but it is unquestionable that he would not hesitate to pronounce all theological dogmas false. "Superstition," he says, "is the name given to a low or bad religion, to the kind of religion we disapprove." The four stages of Greek religion are so described as to lead one to infer that in the Professor's opinion no religion can be wholly true at any stage in its development. The first stage he calls an "Age of Ignorance." Dr. Preuss uses stronger words still, namely "Primal Stupidity." This "Age of Ignorance," this "Primal Stupidity" is regarded as "the normal beginning of all religion, or almost as the normal raw material out of which religion is made." Then comes the Olympian or classical stage, the stage immortalised in the Homeric poems. In the first stage there were no gods, but only qualities which Homer converted into man-like personalities. The Olympian gods were super-men and super-women. They were not supposed to have created the world, but simply to have conquered it. Professor Murray pokes fun at them thus:—

> "When they have conquered their kingdoms, what do they do? Do they attend to the government? Do they promote agriculture? Do they practise trades and industries? Not a bit of it. Why should they do any honest work? They find it easier to live on the revenues and blast with thunderbolts the people who do not pay. They are conquering chieftains, royal buccaneers. They fight, and feast, and play, and make music; they drink deep, and roar with laughter at the lame smith who waits on them. They are never afraid, except of their own king. They never tell lies, except in love and war" (p. 65).

Now, if "Primal Stupidity" be "the normal raw material out of which religion is made," one would naturally infer that at no stage in its history can religion be true, though at some stages it may embody certain elements of truth. In its second stage, as well as in its first, Greek religion was false; and it was a failure in both. The Professor says:—

> "The Olympian Religion did not merely fail: it did worse. To make the elements of a nature-religion human is inevitably to make them vicious. There is no great moral harm in worshiping a thunderstorm, even though the lightning strikes the good and evil quite recklessly. There is no need to pretend that the lightning is exercising a wise and righteous choice. But when once you worship an imaginary quasi-human being who throws the lightning, you are in a dilemma. Either you have to admit that you are worshiping and flattering a being with no moral sense, because he happens to be dangerous, or else you have to invent reasons for his wrath against the people who happen to be struck. And they are pretty sure to be bad reasons. The god, if personal, becomes capricious and cruel" (p. 88).

Dr. Murray bestows praise upon the Olympian system, not for its truth, but for its beauty. It was so highly artistic. "Truth, no doubt, is greater than beauty; but in many matters beauty can be attained and truth cannot" (p. 93). The Professor admires Olympianism also, not because it was a religious faith, but because "it was at least a vital force in the shaping of cities and societies which remain after two thousand years a type to the world of beauty and freedom and high endeavor" (p. 94).

The third stage of Greek religion reaches roughly from Plato to Paul, "a period based on the consciousness of manifold failure, and consequently touched both with morbidness and with that spiritual exaltation which is so often the companion of morbidness." The propaganda of Hellenism was a heroic attempt to redeem the world from its corruption and barbarism; but it failed, with the result that people lost self-confidence and hope, and learned to depreciate the present transitory and imperfect life, and to fix their minds upon an imaginary world in which all their desires would be abundantly satisfied. The fourth stage was only an accentuation of the third, "when the old religion in the time of Julian roused itself for a last spiritual protest against the all-conquering 'Atheism' of the Christians" (p. 18). Christianity conquered and Paganism was crushed. The controversy, the conflict between the two was not of long duration, and Professor Murray characterises it thus:—

> "As in other wars, each side had its wise men and its foolish, its good men and its evil. Like other conquerors, these conquerors were often treacherous and brutal; like other vanquished, these vanquished have been tried at the bar of history without benefit of counsel, have been condemned in their absence and died with their lips sealed. The polemic literature of Christianity is loud and triumphant, the books of the Pagans have been destroyed" (p. 180).

In all its stages alike, Greek religion was a failure, and the inevitable inference is that it failed simply because it was not true. But has not Christianity been equally a failure? The asceticism that crept into Greek religion during the Hellenistic period was taken bodily over by the Christians. Contempt for this world and retirement from it came to be considered as highest virtues. As Professor Murray says, "the Emperor Julian was probably as proud of his fireless cell and the crowding lice in his beard and cassock as an average Egyptian monk. The ascetic movement grew, as we all know, to be measureless and insane. It seemed to be almost another form of lust and to have the same affinities with cruelty" (p. 181). Our author is marvellously fair and moderate; but in spite of his eagerness to speak ill of no religion, and of his desire to praise Christianity, he cannot be blind to "its comparative indifference to the virtues which are specially incumbent on a governing class, such as statesmanship, moderation, truthfulness, active courage, learning, culture, and public spirit" (p. 179).

This is truly a great book, and may prove epoch-making. The author is clearly religiously inclined, but what his religion is, if he has one, we are not told. He disbelieves in all personal deities. To state that religion deals with an uncharted region is to admit that its truth or falsehood cannot be established. It is an affair of the emotions purely; but it cannot be an affair of the emotions unless it consists of certain beliefs concerning the uncharted regions, and it is practically impossible to distinguish between beliefs and dogmas. Indeed, they are really identical. Even in the New Testament faith is treated as if it were the same thing as supernatural knowledge (John xvii. 8, 25, 26). On this point Professor Murray is perfectly sound:—

> "I confess it seems strange to me as I write here, to reflect that at this moment many of my friends and most of my fellow creatures are, as far as one can judge, quite confident that they possess supernatural knowledge. As a rule, each individual belongs to some body which has received in writing the results of a Divine revelation. I cannot share in any such feeling" (p. 152).

How unutterably foolish are they who allow themselves to be carried away by emotions artificially roused by supernatural beliefs which are completely outside the realm of knowledge. Professor Murray affirms that the religious region is uncharted; but is not the very existence of such a region a mere dream of the fancy? The Professor declares that "as far as knowledge and conscious reason will go, we should follow resolutely their austere guidance"; but is it expedient even to imagine that we can go any farther?

J. T. LLOYD.

The Primitive Mind and the Beginnings of Religion.

ONE of the outstanding contributions of Herbert Spencer to the science of sociology was his description of social life and social institutions in terms of psychology. Whereas other writers had emphasised the initiatory power of physical conditions, Spencer, in his Principles of Sociology, placed chief stress upon the emotional and intellectual state of primitive man. Since Spencer wrote, this conception has been steadily gaining ground, with the result that most of the leading European and American writers on sociology recognise, or are well on the way towards recognition of, the important truth that the essence of social life lies, not in a common need for food, shelter, and protection, but in a community of emotional and intellectual life. The need for food and protection is common to all life; it is the additional factor that gives us true social phenomena. The form of this cementing mental life may be, in turn, determined by physical conditions; but once it exists, it reacts on the physical environment and rapidly becomes the controlling factor.

Now, there is no question that the most powerful force of which primitive peoples are conscious is that which goes under the name of religion. Frazer has very properly pointed out that "the continuity of human development has been such that most, if not all, of the great institutions which still form the framework of a civilised community have their roots in savagery," and has, with equal propriety, dismissed those theorisers who fail to reckon "with the influence of superstition, which pervades the life of the savage, and has contributed to build up the social organism to an incalculable extent." The recognition of this does not involve the admission that social life could not have existed in the absence of religion, it only means that the essential forms of social existence are in primitive times expressed in a religious guise. It is part of the truth that man is always under the dominion of his emotional and intellectual life, whether that life be rich or poor, expansive or contracted.

This being taken for granted, the immediate inquiry is: How comes it that man should express his social life in terms of religion? To answer this question one must bear in mind a further truth, which is that while man is largely at the mercy of his ideas and his beliefs, these in turn are determined by the stock of knowledge available in the society to which he belongs. Thus, if one were to ask an educated man to-day the meaning of some striking occurrence in the physical world, the reply would be in terms that implied a considerable development of scientific knowledge. He would have at his command the labors of generations of scientific workers, the products of which had become part of his environment and of his social heritage. But with primitive man this knowledge was yet to be, the heritage had to be created. The social environment that determined his ideas was vastly different to that which surrounds us to-day. Like the modern, he explained things in terms of the forces known to him. His reasoning was determined by his knowledge. If his inferences were faulty, it is not because his mind worked differently, but simply because of a difference of data. Given the premises of the savage, and the savage conclusion follows. The savage is quite as logical as the modern; the knowledge of the modern is more accurate. Hence the vital difference in their conclusions. Hence, too, the dominance of religious ideas in primitive life.

A half-century of work by anthropologists has made one thing clear. This is that while the modern scientific mind explains man by the world, working from without inward, primitive man explains the world by himself, working from within outward. There is substantial agreement among those able to express an authoritative opinion—an agreement supported by evidence that simply has nothing against it—that the world of primitive man is overpoweringly animistic. In the absence of that mass of knowledge, which the modern accepts as part of his social heritage, humanity commences its intellectual career by endowing the world with the same conscious personality that is possessed by itself. The only forces conceived are living ones. They are to be dreaded exactly as human beings are dreaded, and appeased as human beings are appeased. And the problem before the savage is a very real one. He is not concerned with the elaboration of theories, or with the desire to gratify some vague "spiritual yearning." His difficulty is how to control, or placate, those personal powers upon which everything is believed to depend. He would willingly ignore them if he could, and would cheerfully dispense with their presence if he believed things would not be affected by their absence. But there they are, inescapable facts that have to be reckoned with.

Miss Mary Kingsley, in her West African Studies, well describes the general outlook of the primitive mind in the following passage:—

> "To the African the Universe is made up of matter permeated by spirit. Everything happens by the direct action of spirit. The thing he does himself is done by the spirit within him acting on his body.....everything that is done by other things is done by their spirit associated with their particular mass of matter.....The native will point out to you a lightning-stricken tree and tell you that its spirit has been killed. He will tell you, when the earthern cooking pot is broken, it has lost its spirit. If his weapon fails him, it is because someone has stolen its spirit or made it weak by means of his influence on spirits of the same class.....In every action of his life he shows you how he lives with a great spirit world around him. You see him before he starts out to fight rubbing stuff into his weapon to strengthen the spirit that is in it; telling it the while what care he has taken of it.....You see him leaning over the face of the water talking to its spirit with proper incantations, asking it when it meets an enemy of his to upset his canoe and destroy him.....If a man is knocked on the head with a club, or shot by an arrow or a bullet, the cause of death is clearly the maligaity of persons using these weapons; and so it is easy to think that a man killed by the falling of a tree, or by the upsetting of a canoe in the surf, or in a whirlpool in the river is also a victim of some being using these things as weapons. For a man holding this view, it seems both natural and easy to regard disease as a manifestation of the wrath of some invisible being, and to construct that intricate system which we find among the Africans, and agree to call Witchcraft, Fetish, or Juju."

Miss Kingsley is dealing specifically with West Africa, but hers is a description that applies, in general terms, to the whole of the primitive world. For the savage philosophy of things is simple, comprehensive, and given the data, logical. He does not divide the world into natural and supernatural; it is all one. The supernatural only appears as a distinct category when a definite knowledge of the natural has arisen to which it can be opposed. He has no such distinctions as that of the material and immaterial; even death itself has a different appearance to that which it subsequently wears. To the modern mind, death puts a sharp termination to life. To the primitive intelligence, there is no such ending. Death is no more a break than is sleep; the "dead" man simply goes on living. He is still there; he may be incarnated in a tree, or a stone, or an animal; or he may remain one of the innumerable company of tribal ghosts. But he remains, a force to be reckoned with, and the need for dealing with these ghostly personages lies at the root of most, if not all, fundamental religious ceremonies.

Once this initial blunder has been committed, daily experience seems to give it the strongest confirmation. The only thing that could correct this blunder is knowledge, and that is not merely a plant of very slow growth, there is a positive danger in its application to religious beliefs. Above all, there is the proof conveyed to the savage mind by the presence of disease, mental and physical. I do not, at present, want to labor this point; it is enough to say that all over the uncivilised or semi-civilised world there is one prevailing theory of disease, which is, that it is due to the malignant activity of ghostly beings. Almost any decent work dealing with savage life will furnish proof of this statement, and readers of the Old and New Testament hardly need to be told that this is the Biblical theory of disease. We see it also in full activity in the Christian Church. One of the great fathers of the Church, Origen, laid it down that, "It is demons which produce famine, unfruitfulness, corruption, and pestilences." Saint Augustine also said that "All diseases of Christians can be ascribed to demons." On this topic the leaders of the Christian Church, and the New Testament Jesus, were upon precisely the level of Miss Kingsley's West African. The Church of England still contains in its Articles an authorisation to its clergy to cast out demons, while the theory of demoniacal possession held its place in Christian teaching until at least a century ago.

It is not, then, difficult to conceive the kind of environment in which religion is born and to which religious ideas are adapted. Situated in a world where everything has yet to be learned, man's earliest attempts at understanding are of necessity blundering and tentative. He sees himself, his own passions, strength, and weaknesses reflected in the world around him. This is the outstanding, governing fact in primitive life. Leave out this consideration and primitive life becomes an insoluble enigma. It is in this mental atmosphere that religion is born. It is not something that can be considered apart from the rest of primitive social life, since it permeates it and colors all conscious action. The mistake once made is perpetuated. This is brought about partly because of the conservatism that attaches to all established ideas, partly because of vested interests that it subserves, partly because of the deliberate cultivation of abnormal nervous states and the misinterpretation of normal ones. From this point of view both the phenomena of sexuality and of disease have played no small part in confirming, strengthening, and so perpetuating religious beliefs. How much this has been the case has never yet, I believe, been fully realised. But to me it is tolerably certain that had there not been offered to people evidence in the shape of visions, ecstatic states, etc., with an erroneous interpretation of activities that are purely social and secular in origin and application, religion would now be a negligible force in all civilised societies. Religion has not been without its "evidences," or it could not have continued in existence. And the hopelessness of the religious outlook is most clearly seen by our taking all the facts of the religious life and proving them susceptible to a non-religious explanation.

C. COHEN.

Curiosities of Religious Bigotry in Spain.

THE Madrid telegrams have just lately announced that the King of Spain has pardoned Pablo Garcia, the soldier who was sentenced to imprisonment for refusing to kneel down before the Host. Garcia was that rara avis, a Spanish Protestant, and when present with his company at church he refused to obey the military regulations which require that soldiers attending church shall obey the officers' commands to prostrate themselves before the consecrated elements which, by the magical incantations of the priest, are converted into the body and blood, the bones and tissue, and the full anatomical parts and parcels that belonged to our blessed Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. For this heinous offence Pablo Garcia was sentenced, on appeal from an inferior court which had acquitted him, to six months' imprisonment. If he had been rushing about in a motor-car, and had killed a few small boys and a stray apple-woman, it is most likely that he would have purged his offence by paying a slight fine, or by receiving a pompous lecture from the magisterial bench. But, of course, there is a differential tariff of punishments for offences against Our Father which art in heaven and those against our brother who is a mere man in the street.

The release of the imprisoned soldier is naturally a matter of rejoicing to every lover of liberty of thought and speech. The sentence upon the brave Protestant soldier raised a great commotion in Spain, and gave rise to much discussion in the Cortes. The Radical, Socialist, Republican, and Freethinking organs of public opinion were the chief vehicles of indignation against this monstrous conviction, and but for their protests and the changed aspect which, through their action, Spanish politics have assumed since the virtual political suicide, a few weeks ago, of Maura, Pablo Garcia would now be eating his heart out in a fetid Spanish prison, for want of other nourishment. When the laws of a country set up a God and compel the reluctant outsider to prostrate himself before the symbol or altar erected in his honor or for his exploitation, the natural result is to turn every honest man into an adversary of a religion which upholds its supremacy by the terrors of prison.

All this has happened in twentieth-century Spain, although Article 11 of the Constitution declares that no Spanish citizen shall be molested on account of his religious beliefs. The establishment of that charter of liberty cost the Spanish people oceans of blood in cruel strife of a singularly prolonged and atrocious character, and it is an ignominious reminder of the fragile character of mere paper parliamentary guarantees of freedom that three generations after the battle had been "won," an arbitrary, albeit meritorious, exercise of the royal prerogative becomes necessary in order to pardon an offence that had apparently ceased to be a crime. No wonder Shakespeare called the law an ass.

The ordinary penal law as to religious offences in Spain is antiquated and full of perils for the free exercise of private judgment and for liberty of thought and conscience. A few examples may suffice. There is in the Penal Code an article, number 240, which punishes with imprisonment and a fine of 250 to 2,500 pesetas (a peseta is equal to a franc) any person who publicly brings into contempt any of the dogmas of any of the religions having proselytes in Spain. In practice, the interpretation of this law has degenerated into a species of gag upon the free expression of ideas in Spain. The terminology of this and of other legal dispositions of an analogous character suffers from the usual legal vice of vagueness to such an extent that diverse and conflicting interpretations have been made of the general provisions of the law according to whether the judges administering the same happened to be believers or unbelievers, Catholics, Freethinkers, or indifferentists in matters of religion. According to a well-known Spanish deputy and journalist, Alvaro de Albornoz, the Supreme Tribunal has adjudicated in various cases that have come before it to the effect that the denial of Christian dogmas does not constitute a crime, although the denial has been expressed in an excessive form, it being held that what the law chastises is the gross and insulting expression of contempt. At other times, the Supreme Tribunal has considered punishable the expressions of opinion that were merely lacking in respect. Certain other tribunals have inflicted penalties for the mere denial of Christian dogmas; for indulging either in scientific criticism of Christianity, or in Rationalist criticism of religion.

A fine example of the vagueness of terminology, which thus leaves the interpretation of Spanish law at the mercy of the judges, is offered to us by the application of Article 586 of the Penal Code, which punishes as an offence the omission to uncover one's head at the passing of the Viaticum or before a religious procession or at an interment. In certain judgments under this Article, the test of crime is whether the actions complained of shall have been committed with intention to wound the sentiments of religion, and whether they did or did not, in reality, signify mere carelessness or simply indifference. Other judgments have been given in which it has been declared that no offence has been committed when the refusal to salute the Viaticum has been motived by the fear of compromising one's health. In another judgment, the constitutional principle has been openly declared that no man shall be molested for his religious opinions, and this has been followed by the legal dictum that he who abstains from honoring the Host, or refuses to take off his hat to a passing God, commits no offence if his action springs from an anxiety "not to allow his conscience to be violated, and because he believes that the law of God prohibits the doing of the act." On other occasions the law has taken into account the greater or lesser degree of solemnity attending the religious act; thus, it has been declared that the refusal to salute the Viaticum is not punishable when you come across it in a public road, the priest at the time not being in his robes and unaccompanied by acolytes. On the other hand, certain judges have laid it down that neither the principle of religious toleration nor that of liberty of religious profession absolves one from the respect and external marks of consideration due to the collective manifestations of religious sentiments, and have constituted it an offence against religion to remain uncovered at the passage of a religious procession, of a funeral party, or of the Viaticum. In accordance with that dictum, a professor at the secular school at Orense was recently condemned to two months' imprisonment for having refused, at the instance of the priest and of the Municipal Guard, to salute the Holy Viaticum. The case, which happened on March 27 last, was carried to the Supreme Court of Justice at Madrid, and, although the Court recognised that the offender, Don Luengo, was only casually passing along the street when he met God being taken out for a walk, the appeal was rejected, with costs, and the sentence of the inferior court was upheld. The result of this decision is that in Spain no unbeliever can venture into the public streets without a feeling of insecurity.

It comes to this, then, that at the present time, in Spain, a man can be prosecuted for blasphemy and receive much more copious correction than our recent Leeds blasphemers, without venturing upon speaking unpalatable things in the street about religion in crude language easily understanded of the common people, but merely for refusing to conform with ceremonial deference to the religious symbols or acts of the priest. The offender of this sort is prosecuted in Spain as for the crime of "mocking at religion." It often happens that the priest, on noting some "mocker" who keeps his hat on in the presence of the Host, etc., rushes out of the ranks of the procession, threatens him, and even strikes him—all this without prejudice to the holy man's legal right to obtain the instant arrest of the offender. In such cases the prosecution and imprisonment, not of the insolent priest, but of his unfortunate victim, always happen. Things have now come to such a pass that peaceful people in Spain who are not anxious to be punched first and imprisoned afterwards actually flee into the back streets when they notice that a religious procession is passing along their way. In Spain, at the present time, there are several thousand victims of these vexatious prosecutions. These Spanish criminals, like the police-made criminals recently created at Leeds and elsewhere in England, committed their blasphemy in the public streets; they offended public order; their act or inaction constitutes legally a mockery of religion. The bigots in England might ponder the analogy and begin to blush.

The case of Pablo Garcia, the Spanish marine of Ferrol, although a very grave case of religious persecution, is only the last to date of an interminable line of Spanish martyrs in modern times immolated upon the altars of religious persecution. A worse case of flagrant injustice, perhaps, is the sentence pronounced nearly a year ago against the well-known Freethinker and ex-Catholic priest, José Ferrandiz, better known by friends and foes as El Padre

Ferrandiz. What was his atrocious crime? It was this: that in an article in El Progreso, about two years ago, he stated that the young priests looked up to the Church with veneration; those who were more advanced in years looked her face to face in a critical spirit; and those of mature age looked down upon her with disdain and hatred, having been skinned alive by her injustice.

This was not a very savage affront to Christianity, and the treatment dealt out to Ferrandiz for his epigrammatic language deserves to be recorded for the benefit of certain people who affect to believe that Christian judges in the twentieth century are not to be tempted by appeals to their religious sentiment to sully the fair annals of judicial moderation in the administration of the law as affecting Freethinkers. The judgment delivered last March in this preposterous case was a sentence of four years, six months, and I forget how many days of imprisonment; the payment of costs; and a fine of 250 pesetas. The sentence of death was not pronounced, but no doubt there was the savage desire to inflict that penalty, for no twentieth-century judge, without being a Torquemada at heart, could bring his lips to utter so fearful a sentence without a secret longing to destroy the life of his unhappy victim. José Ferrandiz is not an illiterate nobody. He is one of the chief ornaments of the Radical and Freethought press in Spain. He has made two notable contributions to Spanish Freethought literature by his translation of Strauss' New Life of Jesus and his translation of that masterly work of Lanfrey's, the Political History of the Popes,* which he has enriched with a Prologue and by some additional chapters, carries Lanfrey's story down to the pontificate of the ineffable Sarto. Unless this savage sentence is quashed on appeal, this distinguished ex-priest, who sought the arduous life of a journalist and man of letters in exchange for the pious sloth of a monastic career, and whose able articles on religion have for some years been a notable feature in Spanish Radical papers, will be swallowed up in a loathsome Spanish prison for the better part of five years for stating in cold print what he knows to be the opinion of the Church entertained by many of the liveried and consecrated servants of the Lord.

Whilst these odious principles of intolerance are thus consecrated by law and usage in Spain, the new Franco-Spanish Treaty as to Morocco establishes, in Article 8, the principle of absolute toleration for the new Moslem subjects of Spain in the Rif. This concession, absolutely opposed to the Catholic traditions of Spain in its historic relations with the Moors, is virtually the official recognition by the Spanish Government of to-day of the criminal policy of religious persecution which tore the Spanish race into three sections (the Iberian, the Arab, and the Jewish), and decimated and impoverished the country. To-day, in the Rif, the Synagogue, the Mosque, and the Church are to enjoy equal liberty; and Spain gives an absolute guarantee to France, in a diplomatic document invested with the sanctity of international law, that the religious liberty and the external practice of all existing religions in Morocco shall be respected. On African soil Spain plants the banner of religious toleration and places the criticism of Christian dogma under the protection of her flag. No wonder that the proud Spaniard, who cannot call his soul his own for fear he may meet in the streets an arrogant and ignorant priest "conducting the Sacred Form" (to quote the Judgment in the case of Don Luengo), envies the fuller religious liberty of the semi-savages of the Rif.

Free Speech at Edinburgh.

LORD SKERRINGTON, in the Court of Session to-day, gave judgment in the action by John M'Ara, 3 Guthrie-street, Edinburgh, against the Magistrates of Edinburgh and others. Pursuer sought declarator that the magistrates had no authority to issue a proclamation prohibiting the citizens from holding meetings at the Mound, Princes-street, unless permits were obtained from the defenders, and interdict was sought against the defenders issuing such a proclamation, and granting such permits. Pursuer also sued for £250 damages in respect of alleged wrongous arrest for a breach of the proclamation. His lordship found that the magistrates were not empowered by common law or by any statute to issue the proclamation, and that the pursuer was not bound to obey it. His lordship found it unnecessary to pronounce any declaration or grant interdict. He dismissed the conclusion for damages so far as against the Corporation, but as regards the magistrates allowed the pursuer to lodge an issue without pronouncing any decision as to the competency or relevancy of his claim of damages. No expenses were found due to or by either party as between pursuer and the Town Council.

TITLE TO SUE.

In the course of his opinion his lordship, referring to defenders' plea of no title to sue, said the magistrates of Edinburgh had issued a proclamation threatening their fellow-citizens with penalties, but they now wished to avoid a judgment as to its legality. His lordship did not understand that policy on their part, or why the pursuer should not have a title to challenge the legality of a proclamation which attempted to stop a practice which he had pursued for years without objection upon the part of the civic authorities. The defenders' counsel argued that the only remedy open to a citizen who objected to the proclamation was to disobey it and to plead the illegality in defence to a prosecution. That argument seemed to his lordship contrary to good sense and good order. He did not see why, in order to obtain a judgment upon a purely legal question, a citizen must expose himself to arrest and imprisonment or why the magistrates must be exposed to claims of damages. His lordship dissented from the view that the public had only a bare right of passage over a country highway or over the streets of a burgh.

THE ACT OF 1606.

The magistrates maintained that their proclamation was justified by the Act of 1606. The question whether that Act was still in force depended primarily upon the construction which ought to be given to the decision of the High Court of Justiciary in the case of Deakin v. Milne, 1882. That case might be quoted as an authority for the proposition that the Act was not in desuetude, or alternatively for the proposition that the magistrates of a burgh had power at common law to issue a proclamation prohibiting a meeting, with the result that any person who disobeyed was guilty of a substantive offence. His lordship had come to the conclusion that the judges in that case did not intend to affirm either of these propositions. His lordship read the opinions as meaning that in the special circumstances the magistrates had power to prohibit a procession which was likely to cause a breach of the peace, but he did not think the judges intended to affirm that disobedience to the proclamation was a substantive offence apart from breach of the peace. It was, his lordship thought, certain that both at the present day and as far back as the memory of man could carry the offence prohibited by the 1606 Act was not only practised without being checked, but was no longer considered or dealt with in this country as an offence against the law.

NO POWER TO LICENSE.

Apart from the Act of 1606, the magistrates had no power to institute a licensing system in order to prevent annoyance, disorder, and obstruction, or even breach of the peace, consequent upon the holding of meetings upon the Mound. A person convicted of causing an obstruction, or of conduct which, if continued, would produce reasonable apprehension of "the breaking up of the social peace," might be fined or ordered to find security for his future good behavior. The proclamation, if effectual, would dispense with the necessity of both trial and conviction, and would subject a citizen to disabilities merely because the magistrates, in their private room, had come to the conclusion that his conduct was calculated to produce obstruction or breach of the peace. His lordship could figure nothing more arbitrary or unconstitutional. For the purpose of preserving the public peace the magistrates of Edinburgh had, in addition to the powers pertaining to magistrates, the powers of Justices of the Peace and of Sheriffs. His lordship assumed that if they thought it necessary they might lawfully issue a proclamation prohibiting the holding of any meetings which, in their opinion, were likely to lead to a breach of the peace, and they might warn the citizens that persons who disobeyed would be liable to prosecution for obstruction and breach of the peace, but they could not lawfully threaten the citizens with penalties for contravening their proclamation.

A USURPATION OF PUBLIC RIGHT.

The proclamation was a usurpation by the magistrates of the right which belonged to the citizens as represented by the Corporation to regulate the use of the streets so as to benefit so far as possible the community as a whole. It would be a fitting question for the consideration of the Town Council whether those citizens who derived edification, instruction, or amusement from street preachers ought to be allowed to gratify this taste on the Mound although other members of the community might object to the inevitable noise and crowd and to occasional coarse language. Even if the judgment of the Town Council were adverse, the pursuer would be entitled to be heard by his counsel or agent before the Sheriff allowed any bye-law prohibiting meetings on the Mound. The proclamation rode roughshod over those rights and liberties.—Edinburgh Evening News (Jan. 28).

Acid Drops.

Now that the war is breaking out again, and the Bulgarians promise to give the world "a new surprise," we pity the poor Mohammedans who come in their way. We refer to the civil and not the military population. The latter will give a good account of themselves.

What a curious boast of the Bulgarians that was about the surrender of Adrianople. Seven weeks ago it was bound to surrender in a few days. It appears to be still as far off surrendering. Turkish soldiers are not so easily beaten when they have food for their stomachs and ammunition for their guns and rifles. The "great Bulgarian victories" at the beginning of the war were due to the Turkish armies being caught in a helpless condition.

Very late in the day, and now that the matter can no longer be ignored, one of the religious weeklies has broken silence concerning the massacre of Mohammedans by Christians in the Balkan struggle. The Guardian, in its issue for January 31, without any special words of condemnation, chides the Turks for overstating "as recklessly as they do the number of peaceable Moslems butchered in Macedonia by so-called Christians." It quotes the Times correspondent's estimate that 20,000 have been massacred in Macedonia, but has no words of condemnation for the butchers. There is a half-hearted attempt at justification even in the remark that the massacre of Christians when the Crescent was in the ascendant was hardly less terrible. Its final comment is, "What can be done to put a stop to this state of things it is difficult to say." We hardly know which is the more contemptible—the silence of the religious press concerning the massacres by the soldiers of the Cross, or the attempt at condoning the evil now that it can no longer be hidden.

The Rev. R. F. Horton is visiting India, and having spent two or three weeks there, feels able to express an authoritative opinion on the condition and needs of the Indian people. We do not observe that Dr. Horton has discovered the development in India—in connection with the cotton industry particularly—of one of the worst features of the old English Factory System, but that is what one would expect. The main thing with Dr. Horton is whether the people are properly religious or not. If they are, nothing else is of any great consequence. If they are not, then all is wrong. Now, curiously enough, Dr. Horton has discovered, what a good many people in London could have told him, that the people of India have "far more of genuine and inward religion" than we have. He says that, "looking at our own godless and irreligious people at home, who never worship, and have no vital creed, or even religious interest, I am very ready to admit that India is more religious than England." But the point is that this religion, even though "genuine and inward," is not the right kind of religion. "What is wanted is not religion, but a good religion, a religion which builds character, and makes a strong and progressive state possible. In these all-important respects the irreligion of England is better than the religion of India."

Now, here is a very curious situation. A large proportion of our people at home are "godless and irreligious," and in developing character and a progressive state this irreligion is better than some people's religion. Yet Dr. Horton wants to see India Christian! But, unless he at the same time imports this godless and irreligious element, there is no security that India will become progressive and develop character. Of course, Dr. Horton has a saving clause. "Our worst people at home," he says, "are personalities; centuries of Christian tradition have given them the sense of freewill and responsibility." So that it apparently comes to this: Our strong progressive characters at home are the products of Christian tradition (it must be assumed that there are no strong characters without a Christian tradition, Japan for instance), but this development in turn leads to a personality that becomes "godless and irreligious," without ceasing to make a strong and progressive state possible. We owe our strength of character to Christianity; our strength of character ends in our rejection of Christianity. It really looks as though Dr. Horton is in a bit of a muddle.

Here is another specimen of Dr. Horton's wisdom. The Moslem countries, he tells us, are all going by the board. "They cannot find the foundation of a stable society or of a just administration. The reason lies in the Koran itself. That inspired book is the limitation of the Moslem mind, and it does not contain the principles on which an enlightened and progressive community can be formed." Now, it is about as reasonable to judge a Mohammedan people by the Koran as it is to judge a Christian people by the Bible. Christians do not stone heretics to death, they do not burn witches, they do not practise non-resistance, they do not carry out a hundred-and-one other ridiculous and criminal things that are taught in the Bible. And they will say in defence that the Bible must be interpreted in the light of the present age. Yet they take the Koran, and quietly ignore the fact that Mohammedan teachers adopt quite the same principle in relation to the Koran. As having said this, we beg to say very definitely that the Koran is the superior of the New Testament in so far as presenting teachings on which a State may be built are concerned. The one precept in the Koran, "A ruler who appoints any man to an office, when there is in his dominion another man better qualified for it, sins against God and the State," is superior to any counsel on the subject in the New Testament. There the attitude towards the State is negative or passively submissive. Had Christians been tied down to the New Testament, which practically ignores both the family and the State, society would have ceased to exist. The salvation of Christians has been that the very extravagance of New Testament teaching compelled modification. A piece of advice that is impossible in practice is really less dangerous than bad counsel that can be carried into action.

Two poor Jesuites are in the latest list of Wills. Rev. William Hart-Smith, of Launceston, left £7,453. Rev. John Thomas Pearse, of Chiddingstone, Kent, left £2,508. These are small fortunes in comparison with many that we chronicle, but they would have appeared colossal to Jesus Christ and his apostles.

Here is a bigger clerical fortune—though by no means the biggest. Rev. Alfred Turner, of Hillersdon-avenue, Barnes, S.W., left £26,331. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth."

Churchmen pray, in the language of the Prayer Book, against "battle, murder, and sudden death," but they are no more preserved from these things than other people are. Canon Edward Townsend, vicar of St. Peter's, Fulham, died on the last Sunday evening in January at Lezant, near Launceston. Soon after supper he fell forward in his chair and died. "One thing befalleth them; yea, they have all one breath."

Mr. Harold Begbie is always "gassing" about something or other. It is the way he gets his living. His latest subject is "the soul of the convict"—as though it were a speciality in "spirits." What the convict really wants, according to Mr. Begbie, is religion, more religion, and still more religion. Well, there ought not to be much difficulty about that; Mr. Begbie himself has religion enough, apparently, to supply "the blooming lot." Unfortunately, however, his prescription is not as satisfactory as he fancies. Mr. Thomas Holmes, who knows a thousand times more about prison life and prisoners than Mr. Begbie does, plainly tells him so. "If Mr. Begbie will make himself acquainted with the mental and physical condition of the bulk of the prisoners he will see that a great deal is wanted in addition to spiritual regeneration, the fact being that no one can find social and industrial positions for a great number of the prisoners because of their disabilities. About 1,000 convicts are discharged from prison every year, many of them certified as feeble-minded; others suffer from epilepsy, or other kinds of fits, or from physical afflictions, and still more are very aged, and their day of useful labor is past. These people can only do a very small amount of work when under control, at liberty their industrial value is nil." But all this is below the notice of Mr. Harold Begbie.

The Rev. F. B. Meyer seems to think that the world would come to an end if it lost the privilege of listening to his evangelical voice. He talks on every subject under the sun, and always conveys the impression that his one business in life is to set the Church and the world right on every conceivable point. According to the North Mail for January 29, he informed the Novocastrians that "there was something in the air." Everywhere, among all sorts of people, civilised and savage, in the East as well as in the West, "there was something in the air"; and this something, of course, was the spirit of Christ. There is something in the air, it is true, but not the spirit of Christ, which has reddened Christendom from end to end with innocent blood. It is the spirit of humanity that is in the air; and this spirit is working its way to the throne by gradually casting out the spirit of Christ.

Another foolish utterance that fell from Mr. Meyer at Newcastle was this: "There is going to be a great revival in England. I know it is coming before many months are gone, and our nets will be so full of fish that they will burst." This prophecy is an old acquaintance. We have been personally familiar with it for forty years, and know there is nothing in it but wind. For the last forty years, instead of reviving, the Church has been steadily dying. Mr. Meyer himself knows this; and conscious of it, he has joined the Bishop of London in imploring the Daily News and Leader not to take their contemplated census of church and chapel attendance in the metropolis.

Sir John Benn, the leader of the Progressives on the London County Council, has issued an appeal to the Churches in connection with the forthcoming elections. The only passage we are concerned with here is one dealing with Sunday entertainments. Sir John Benn says:—

> "Recent experiences in connection with picture palaces show that on this pressing question the Churches must at least insist that those entertainments shall not be run for private gain or by way of trade."

Except as an electioneering "dodge," we cannot congratulate Sir John Benn on his deliverance. We can appreciate a straightforward objection to any kind of entertainments on Sunday. We can also appreciate an advocacy of any entertainment so long as it is "wholesome and properly conducted." But anything in between seems clearly to involve stupidity or hypocrisy. A body such as the L.C.C. has an obvious right and duty to see that licensed places are properly conducted. But what justification has it for saying that, although an entertainment is quite unobjectionable—even on Sunday—those whose business it is to run such places shall make no profit whatever from them? Charity or no charity, the work involved is the same. If these entertainments are objectionable, can one conceive a more contemptible position than that of "We will consent to what we believe to be wrong providing you salve our conscience by paying a few pounds into some charity"? And if they are unobjectionable, it is an act of sheer bigotry and tyranny to impose what is virtually a fine upon the owners of these picture shows. Sir John Benn does not take up the position of a straightforward bigot or of a clear-sighted public reformer. His appeal strikes one as a mere electioneering attempt to enlist the services of the most bigoted and ignorant section of Christians. We think it is about time that those responsible for Sunday entertainments plainly resisted this attempt to treat them as a kind of criminal class, subject to a weekly fine for appearing before the public.

Mr. Meyer is on the warpath against Sunday picture shows again. He sees that all is lost unless churches and chapels "stand together" as he puts it in defence of their trade monopoly. Not that he uses such a bald and sordid word as "trade," but that is what he really means. Meanwhile the Sunday picture shows are multiplying in London, and churches and chapels are getting emptier and emptier. And what will be the end thereof who knoweth?

Canon Christopher, who is ninety-three years of age, shows much activity in view of his chronology. He is also very optimistic. He invited a meeting at the Oxford Town Hall to listen to the eloquence of Prebendary H. E. Fox, secretary of the Church Missionary Society. This gentleman had just returned from a visit to Japan, and he was bursting with the happy news that the Japanese were getting ready to adopt Christianity. The reason he gave was rather peculiar:—

> "The Japanese Government has got alarmed at the decadence of a great deal of the national character by its touch with the Western world. The Japanese were distinctly a religious people, and were ready for Christianity."

Surely the Japanese were not such fools as that! Contact with Christians has corrupted them, so they are going to adopt the religion of their corrupters in order to set themselves right again! This is worthy of Bedlam.

We have heard that Japan was going to adopt Christianity any time for the last forty years. But she never does it—and she never will. The Japanese are a sensible people. They quite understand the Christian missionary business.

"No man," said the Rev. J. D. Jones, at Liverpool, the other day, "should be a minister who could be anything else." Mr. Jones may make his mind easy; there are few men who do become a minister who can be anything else. And of those who do, a portion find out their mistake and forsake the "sacred calling."

More consolation for the microcephalic pietist! The Bible Society publishes the following from Sir Sven Hedin:—

> "With a strong and absolute belief in God and in His almighty protection I should not have been able to live alone in Asia's wildest regions for twelve years."

To make this more impressive, the letter is reproduced in facsimile. Readers, therefore, can see the actual caligraphy of the explorer, and that will, of course, carry still greater conviction. For a personal testimony in print is nothing like so strong as in a man's own handwriting. Personally, we were inclined to give Sir Sven Hedin all the credit for his travels and discoveries. Travellers like Nansen, Burton, and Winwood Reade managed to get through their work without the help of God, and it is strange that in the person of Sir Sven Hedin the race of explorers has so far degenerated. And in common justice, as God did part of the work, it is only fair that he should receive half the profits. Therefore, we hope that Sir Sven Hedin devotes fifty per cent. of his income from lectures, articles, and books to Church work. It would be depressing to find that God had not only helped Sir Sven Hedin to do his work, but was now being further exploited by way of advertisement.

Dr. Woodrow Wilson, the incoming Democratic President of the United States, is likely to raise the Philippines question. There is already a Bill before Congress proposing Home Rule for 8,000,000 Filipinos in eight years. This proposal has alarmed President Taft; indeed, all the "Imperialists," including Roosevelt, are against it. Taft denounces doing for the Filipinos what has already been done for the Cubans as a policy that is sure to end "in confusion, humiliation, and defeat." Like the wily fat gentleman he is, Taft appeals to religious prejudice in favor of the opposite policy. Listen to this from a recent speech of his at a Washington banquet:—

> "Mr. Taft appealed to the Democratic leaders to ask not American officials nor American business men interested in Philippine trade, but missionaries of every denomination who are giving up their lives teaching religion and virtue in the tropics. They would agree that the Filipinos were not yet ready for self-government, and that if autonomy were forced upon them, no influence more discouraging to the march of Christian progress in those islands, whose guardianship providence had thrust upon the American people, could well be imagined."

Taft knows what the missionaries are really working for. That their object is to "teach religion" is a proposition that Taft himself must laugh at under the rose. As to their teaching "virtue," Taft must know that if they are able to do that their services are far more needed in the United States than in the Philippine Islands. The missionaries are looking, as far as possible, to the interests of the good Americans who send them out and pay them to "save the heathen"—who, by the way, are mostly Roman Catholics. They are prepared to take their solemn affidavits that the Filipinos are too bad a lot to be trusted to walk without U.S.A. crutches. The Filipinos require moral crutches, and the United States supplies them. The arrangement benefits both sides, and if the Filipinos don't see it they must be made to.

Dr. Boyd Carpenter, Dean of Westminster, goes to Boston and talks about tobacco, and his wonderful words are telegraphed across the Atlantic for the edification of the people in England. One would hardly think a Christian preacher's opinions on such a subject were worth so much trouble and expense. It appears that Dr. Boyd Carpenter doesn't see why women shouldn't smoke as well as men. At present he talks only of cigarettes; perhaps he will go on to cigars and pipes, and even short clays. We have seen many an old Irishwoman in Lancashire smoking a "dudeen"—without asking the Dean of Westminster's permission. While he was at home in England nobody troubled about his views on smoking; when he went to America his opinions became important enough to communicate them to his native land. Anyhow, it seems odd that God Almighty—as they say Christ was—should establish a special religion on earth in order that, two thousand years afterwards, its ministers should deliver oracles on 'baccy.

The Winchester Board of Guardians differed from one of its members, Mr. Stephen Bull, who knelt down and asked God to give them his guidance. This led to a suspension of the sitting, whereupon Mr. Stephen Bull called his fellow members "heathen dogs" and then fell upon his knees again, addressing the Almighty on their behalf once more. There they left him. We have not heard that the "One Above" has interfered with the natural course of events. Had he done so Mr. Stephen Bull would be the absolute master of the Winchester Board of Guardians; and that, to say the least of it, would be very awkward for the town.

The following is from the New York Truthseeker:

> "Elbert Hubbard, publisher of the Philistine, was brought before Judge Hazen in the United States District Court at Buffalo, N.Y., January 11, charged with circulating through the mails a publication containing 'certain prints of an obscene, lewd, lascivious, filthy, and indecent character.' It was hoped by the defenders of free mails that Hubbard would put up a good fight, but he disappointed them, pleading guilty to mailing the aforesaid obscene, lewd, lascivious, filthy, and indecent matter, promising to do so no more, and submitting to a fine of $100."

What a rare thing is courage! The whole American press is controlled by Anthony Comstock, the professional secretary of the Society for the Suppression of Vice—the English original of which William Cobbett used to call the Vice Society. Whatever old Comstock chooses to call "obscene, lewd, lascivious, filthy, and indecent" is knocked out of the mails by the Post Office authorities, and the responsible persons are lucky when they are not prosecuted and imprisoned. Yet the Americans put up with this intolerable tyranny with the greatest complaisance. Even a writer like Elbert Hubbard shows no fight when he is attacked. The case seems almost hopeless.

The Church Times rejoices that the date of the Oxford and Cambridge Boat Race has been changed from the Wednesday in Holy Week to Thursday, March 13. It is very undesirable, we learn, that a race should be run while people are dwelling upon the "Passion of Our Lord." We should have thought that anyone who wanted to dwell upon the "Passion" could easily have got far enough from the Thames to do so undisturbed. Naturally, if one starts dwelling upon "the Passion of Our Lord" in the middle of a boat race, one may be disturbed. But that is quite one's own fault. We also note that the joy of the Church Times is diminished by the fact that the King is going to Portsmouth on Ash Wednesday to inspect the New Zealand. This is evidently wrong, as he ought to have been at home, also dwelling on the "Passion." Some comfort is derived from the visit being a private one, for which, we are told, the inhabitants of Portsmouth will be thankful. We suppose it is hoped that, there be no public ceremonial, the Lord will not observe a private visit by the King. It is unflattering to George the Fifth, but pleasing to the religious mind. And we call ourselves a civilised people!

Wednesday, February 12, is fixed as the day of intercession on behalf of the Church of England's work at home, and against the threatened disestablishment of the Church in Wales. The latter is a very hopeful supplication. Mr. Lloyd George is a Nonconformist, Mr. Asquith is a Churchman; and we can picture both of them smiling at the Archbishops' simplicity.

Father Pinnamonti's Hell Open to Christians and Father Furniss's Sight of Hell are still published by Duffy & Co., with the authority of the Holy Catholic Church. These publications are intended for the special edification of young people and children. They are among the most disgusting things ever issued to frighten such readers out of their natural senses and drive them into the arms of priestcraft. Father Pinnamonti's volume is "ornamented" with pictures—one for every day in the week, showing the physical tortures of the "souls" in hell. The writers of these things must have known that the contents were all imaginary. They were therefore scoundrels to terrify children in this way. It is a scandal that such impostures should be permitted in a civilised country.

"Dr. Lancelot Blackburne, the eighteenth-century Archbishop of York, who is the earliest recorded smoker among Anglican Bishops, would hardly have furnished a desirable precedent for the Bishop of Peterborough. For he was a retired pirate. According to Oxford tradition, he was "sent down" from Christ Church for stealing a violin, and joined the buccaneers in the West Indies. His fellow-criminals were eventually captured and hanged, but Blackburne returned home, attached himself to Bishop Trelawney—of the Cornish song—and received rapid promotion. Horace Walpole writes about 'the jolly old Archbishop of York, who had all the manners of a man of quality, though he had been a buccaneer, and was a clergyman; but he retained nothing of his first profession, except his seraglio.' He was made Archbishop of York for reading the marriage service over George I. and his mistress the Duchess of Munster. Those were 'the good old times.'"—Daily Chronicle (Jan. 27).

Rev. James W. A. Mackenzie, vicar of Whitwick, Leicester, has been committed for trial at Douglas, Isle of Man, on a charge of attempting to utter a forged promissory note. Bail was fixed at £400. There is no moral. There would have been one if the defendant had been an Athiest.

We have no fault to find with the jury's verdict of "suicide while of unsound mind." This was the result of the inquest over the dead body of the Rev. G. H. Lamb, curate of Southwick-on-the-Weir, who jumped through the window of a train on the Great Northern Railway. It was said that he suffered from a nervous breakdown following on influenza. Quite so. But the same might have been said of an Atheist in the same circumstances. Where did the "safeguards of religion" come in?

A Sydney paper called the Sun—which, we see, boasts of the largest circulation in Australia—prints the following in its issue of December 8:—

> "San Francisco, Saturday.
> "Five Seattle men are planning to go one better than Noah. They are going to build an ark bigger than that into which the animals went two by two.
> "Noah's cockleshell was very small potatoes, they say, and the new craft is to be fitted with every convenience.
> "When it is finished a pair of every known type of living creature is to be put on board, together with a first-class troupe of circus performers, and then the ark will sail round the world, stopping at every big port to give a performance.
> "The articles of incorporation of the Noah's Ark Company were filed yesterday, the capital being £300,000."

All they want now is a Flood.

Perhaps the Leeds Police fancy that their prosecutions for "blasphemy" and "profanity" do a great deal towards keeping the city orthodox. Poor creatures, dressed in a little brief authority, they are vastly mistaken! There must be a lot of "infidelity" knocking about the district when the Yorkshire Evening Post (Jan. 27) can publish leaderettes like the following:—

> "The meetings which are being held in Leeds this week in celebration of the completion of a hundred years' work for the Church Missionary Society may induce the Man in the Street to spend a little time in considering a subject which is a favorite topic for his cheap sarcasm. In his lordly way he is as fond of telling people that foreign missions are a mere fad, that they represent a great waste of money, inasmuch as the 'heathen' don't need the missions, and the missions themselves are a failure. Now, to put it vulgarly, when the Man in the Street talks like that, he is 'talking through his hat'; and, if he can so far forget his belief in his own omniscience as to seek information at first hand, he will find that he is wrong in both particulars. He would probably be a good deal surprised if he were told that many of the so-called 'heathen' know a good deal more about religion than he does, and practise what they know in a way he never dreams of doing. At the same time, the very men who know that best, and most readily admit it, are precisely those who are most convinced of the need for missionary effort."

The clergy can hardly be dull enough to appreciate these sarcastic compliments.

"I want a nice book for an invalid," the lady said. "Something religious, madam?" asked the shopkeeper. "Er—no," replied the lady," he's convalescent."

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, February 9, Queen's (Minor) Hall, Langham-place, Regent-street, London, W., at 7.30, "Blood on the Balkan Cross."

February 16 and 23, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London.

To Correspondents.

FIGHTING FUND.—S. H. Adams (Transvaal), 5s.; J. H. Gartrell, 10s.

CANTERL.—See paragraph. Thanks.

T. HODGSON.—Provincial aspirants would not be barred in any way from obtaining "diplomas."

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

R. MARELAND.—We hope to give more attention to literature generally, and to new books especially, in future.

E. B.—We suppose you know that Mark Twain's What is Man? is not obtainable now. It is another case of the family of a distinguished man trying to suppress the best fruit of his brain. Mark should have published the book during his lifetime. He admits that he had not the courage to do so.

M. ROGERS.—The little books are not new, though they may be new to you. They have been referred to in our columns from time to time during the last thirty years.

H. BEARSFORD.—Order passed on to shop manager. We send the Freethinker post free to any part of the world at our advertised rate. We do send to most parts of the world. Few papers are so widely distributed.

S. H. ADAMS.—With regard to wish that our shadow may never grow less, we may be allowed to take a prosaic view of that orientalism and state that we have kept nearly the same weight for the last twenty-five years.

W. P. HEDLEY.—We cannot answer your questions about Determinism in this column. We should need a lot of space. A question of a few words in length often fills pages in reply; especially when the question is controversial. Your first question, however, answers itself. "Is man a machine?" This is a confusion of language. Man is a living being; and living beings are not machines, and machines are not living beings. Biology and mechanics are different sciences.

E. RAGGETT.—Mr. Foote's articles on "The Real Robert Burns" appeared some seventeen or eighteen years ago. Numbers so far back are not in stock now.

J. B.—Glad you enjoyed our article on the new Bradlaugh fable so much. But it won't stop the lie. Christian lies, when they once get started, last as long as they are profitable. You deserve credit for your share in the matter.

S. LIDGETT.—We were never fond of political badges, and we have certainly never worn one since we became President of the N. S. S. That was twenty-three years ago. During that long period we have neither been for nor against Socialism. We have worked with Socialists, as we have with other parties, for objects held in common. We are devoted first of all, and above all, to Freethought, which we regard as the most important work of all, and which has fewer friends than most others.

W. CALLAGHAN.—Pleased to know that your two friends, to whom six consecutive copies were sent, have become regular readers and admirers of the Freethinker. Lea's great History of the Inquisition is the best, but it is expensive. You might find it in your Free Library.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

The President's Honorarium Fund.

To the Freethinkers of Great Britain.

January, 1913.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,

We the undersigned renew our appeal on behalf of the above Fund.

Its object is to relieve Mr. G. W. Foote—President of the National Secular Society, Chairman of the Secular Society, Ltd., and Editor of the Freethinker—from financial worries that would prevent his devoting himself entirely to his work as leader of the militant Freethought movement in this country.

During previous years Mr. Foote has actually had to pay money out of his own pocket to sustain the Freethinker, besides doing all his own work on the paper without any remuneration whatever. We are happy to have his assurance that this state of things has improved. He has no longer to make up a deficit, but the slight profit from the increased circulation of the Freethinker is only sufficient as yet to treat the contributors a little more liberally.

This is the sixth year of the President's Honorarium Fund. We suggested that £300 might be raised in this way annually. During the first two years it was nearly raised, the third year it was fully raised, the fourth year it was exceeded, owing to a special donation of £50 from Mr. John Helm, of Canada, since deceased. Death has, indeed, been busy with the larger subscribers during the last year or two—such as Major Harris, Mrs. Donaldson, Mr. George Payne, Mr. F. Smallman, and Mr. Horace W. Parsons. Nevertheless, the Fund for 1912 only lacked some £20 of the total, which has been made up by a generous American supporter. It is evident, therefore, that Mr. Foote must have gained new friends to balance the (financial) loss of old ones.

All subscriptions received have been acknowledged week by week in the Freethinker, and will continue to be acknowledged in that way.

Subscriptions for 1913 can be forwarded to the undersigned. Those who prefer to do so can send, as before, direct to Mr. Foote himself at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Subscribers who do not wish their names to appear in print should state how they wish their subscriptions to be acknowledged.

It would be pleasant if the bulk of the £300 could be raised in the first few months and the balance before the close of the summer.

Yours faithfully,

J. W. DE CAUX, J.P.,

"Woman's Worst Enemy," the subject of Mr. Foote's lecture on Sunday evening, drew a number of ladies to Queen's Hall. They not only listened with great attention but several of them asked pertinent questions when the lecture was over. Mr. Foote's answers seemed to give general satisfaction.

Mr. Foote's lecture at Queen's Hall this evening (Feb. 9) should attract a large audience. "Blood on the Balkan Cross" is its title. Mr. Foote will show what the Christian Powers are really seeking. Their real object is systematically concealed by the Christian press.

Mr. Cohen had a crowded audience on Sunday evening at Liverpool. We regret that his visit was not announced in our last issue, but the fault was not ours—and all's well that ends well.

Mr. Robert Blatchford wrote three columns in last week's Clarion on the Leeds prosecutions for "blasphemy" and "profanity"—and incidentally he makes a curious reference to "Mr. Foote." Mr. Blatchford's position, at least, makes what he has to say on this matter of some importance, and we shall give it our attention next week.

Mr. Maurice Young, the ex-clergyman who made such a favorable impression at the London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner on January 14, lectures twice (afternoon and evening) for the Manchester Branch to-day (Feb. 9), at the Secular Hall in Rusholme-road. We trust he will have good audiences and a hearty reception.

The Rationalist Peace Society holds its Annual Meeting next Thursday evening (Feb. 13) at 8 o'clock in Room 167 St. Stephen's House, Westminster—near the Houses of Parliament, facing the Embankment. Members should try to attend. Mr. Foote expects to be present.

The Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws is organising a public demonstration, which will probably be held early in March at South Place Institute. Several well-known speakers have promised to join in the oratory. Further particulars will appear in our next issue.

The Annual Meeting of the Secular Education League will be held at Room 18, Caxton Hall, Westminster, on Tuesday evening, March 11, at 7.30. Members are specially urged to attend. A public meeting will follow at 8.15, with Mr. Halley Stewart in the chair. The list of speakers includes Mr. George Greenwood, M.P., Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., Mr. G. W. Foote, Rev. Walter Walsh, D.D.

The General Committee dealing with the matter of the London County Council's policy with respect to meetings and collections in the Parks met again on Tuesday (our press day) and decided to make a final effort in a peaceable way before drawing the sword and flinging away the scabbard. The N. S. S. does not wish to break away from its associates on this question. Hence a further unavoidable delay.

We reproduce on another page a report of a very important law case from the columns of the Edinburgh Evening News. The Court of Sessions has taught the Edinburgh magistrates their proper place and warned them against straying outside it. These municipal busybodies have learnt that they have no power whatever to decide who shall deliver open-air addresses and what opinions shall be expressed at public meetings. Lord Skerrington has made that perfectly clear, and his judgment will encourage us up in London to resist the arbitrary action of the London County Council. Thanks are due to plaintiff in the Edinburgh case and to the committee that supported him in his resistance to despotism.

Some time ago a correspondent asked us whether the contents of the two volumes of the Flowers of Freethought represented our present views on all the subjects treated in them. This was a question that could only be answered in general terms. Our correspondent then did the right thing; he wished to make the volumes a present to a friend, so he bought them and read them himself, with a view to forming his own judgment. And this is the result. "I have now read these two volumes," he writes us, "and without offering any extravagant praise I must say that they are splendid; in fact, no Freethinker's library is complete without them. It would be a hard task to choose the best half-dozen 'Flowers,' as they one and all come in very useful in arguments and debates in which I frequently indulge."

The Agency of Insects in the Dissemination of Disease.—II.

THESE spores now proceed to attack other blood-cells, and all succeeding generations of these parasitic intruders repeat the process above described. As a result, in a few days hundreds of thousands of human blood-cells are destroyed, and the blood-stream is poisoned with parasitic waste products, leaving the patient pale and exhausted.

As we have seen, these parasites reproduce themselves by the simple process of nuclear division; their spores or young result from the splitting up of the parent parasite body, which occurs while the parasite is destroying the blood-cell in which it has taken up its temporary abode. Now, it is well known that this method of asexual reproduction cannot be carried on indefinitely, and the difficulty was to discover in what manner the sexual generation was consummated.

This seemed an insurmountable problem; but, thanks to the untiring labors of a band of medical men, its solution has been found. But the two investigators to whom the palm must, above all others, be given, are Patrick Manson and Ronald Ross.

Dr. Smith, while investigating the life-history of the germ which produces the Texas cattle fever, noted that some of the germs did not reproduce themselves like the others.

> "When these individuals were drawn from the circulation and placed on a slide for study, it was found that they would swell up and free themselves from the inclosing corpuscle, and some of them would emit long filaments, which would dart away among the corpuscles."

Now, it became obvious that certain of these parasites fail to develop unless they are removed from the blood in which they dwell. The question to be decided was, the conditions that were required to enable them to leave the blood of their victim so that their processes of reproduction could be carried out. It was necessary to determine this before the greater problem as to the means whereby the parasite is transmitted from one human being to another could be successfully attacked. Manson, after pondering over the difficulty, reached the conclusion that suctorial insects were the agencies he was in search of. His reasonings led him to the belief that, when insects removed germ-infected blood from their victims' veins into their own stomachs, they in this way provided the parasites with the conditions essential to their reproduction. This daring theory of Manson's greatly impressed Ross, who began a long and laborious investigation with the object of determining its truth. The parasite which he strove to discover is just visible under the most powerful microscope. Ross, who was at the time in India, selected the mosquito as the most likely insect for his purpose. In the course of nearly three years he made a thorough examination of thousands of mosquitoes without discovering the slightest trace of the parasite. But at last a friend sent him a mosquito of the Culex species; and, when this was placed under the microscope, Ross observed certain nodules on the walls of the insect's stomach. Closer observations disclosed the presence of granules of the coal-black melanin of malarial fever. Further experiments led to the epoch-making discovery that these special cells were always to be found on the walls of the stomach of this species of mosquito a few days after it had sucked the blood of a malarial patient. Ross's subsequent researches have since made clear the complete life-history of the parasite. All independent investigations made by other medical men have done nothing except establish his conclusions as absolutely beyond dispute.

The above results may be summarised thus: The malarial parasites carry on their life-processes in the human blood-stream, but after a time the development of a certain percentage of these parasites is arrested. When these particular parasites are introduced into the bodies of most mosquitoes, they are digested like ordinary food. But when they find their way into the stomach of a mosquito of the genus anopheles, or other nearly related genera, they are not assimilated, but continue their development, and conjugate with other parasitic cells. As a consequence of this fertilisation, more elongated parasitical forms make their appearance, proceed to pierce their way through the linings of the mosquito's stomach, and evolve into the tiny nodules which Ross detected on the insects he studied. These parasites then divide and develop within their enclosing sheath, until at last the nodule bursts, and thousands of rod-shaped sporozoites enter the body-cavity of the mosquito. These sporozoites now make their way towards the large vacuolated cells of the salivary glands, where they cluster together. Thus it happens that when the mosquito bites a man or other animal, these rejuvenated parasites re-enter the human or animal blood, and are in this way enabled to reproduce themselves at the expense of their victim's health or life. A vivid idea of the danger arising in this way may be formed when we learn that the "nodules or cysts on the walls of the stomach of the mosquito may contain as many as ten thousand sporozoites, and as many as five hundred cysts may occur in a single stomach."

Another disease with which the mosquito is closely associated is yellow fever. This scourge manifests itself mainly in seaport cities, and the United States has suffered more from its ravages than any other country. The West Coast of Africa, Havana, Rio de Janeiro, and other places were long considered as permanent endemic spots, from which it travelled to other port towns with which they were in communication. The American territories in the neighborhood of the Mexican Gulf have been among the keenest sufferers. But, when given a sufficiently high temperature, yellow fever has been known to spread to Washington, Baltimore, and Philadelphia.

An appalling outbreak of yellow fever took place in New Orleans in 1905. Eight thousand people were smitten with the disease, and nearly one thousand perished. Instead of humiliation and prayer, the methods of science were put into operation. The result was that the scourge was stayed at the very time when, according to all precedent, its ravages should have been most severe. The older remedies of isolation and quarantine were abandoned, and a direct attack was made upon the mosquitoes which were the disseminators of the disease.

The history of the scientific studies which enabled New Orleans to cope with this serious outbreak is extremely instructive. Owing to the prevalence of yellow fever in Cuba, the American authorities, in 1900, appointed a board of medical officers for service in Havana, for the purpose of investigating the malady on the spot. This board, afterwards known as the Yellow Fever Commission, was made up of some of the greatest American doctors. Their first duty was to ascertain whether any of the germs which were suspected to be the cause of the disease were really responsible for its existence. Bacillus icteroides was by some authorities regarded as the culprit, but after a thorough inquiry this bacillus was shown to play but a secondary part in the matter. Various other theories were put to the test, and some very remarkable experiments were made upon those who volunteered as subjects. Dr. Carroll, a leading member of the Commission, thus describes the experiments:—

> "Two separate lines of work were now presented: one, the study of the bacterial flora of the intestine and anaërobic cultures from the blood and various organs; the other, the theory of the transmission of the disease by the mosquito, which had been advanced by Dr. Carlos Finlay in 1881. After due consideration it was decided to investigate the latter first. Then arose the tremendous responsibility involved in the use of human beings for experimental purposes. It was concluded that the results themselves, if positive, would be sufficient justification of the undertaking.....On the afternoon of July 27, 1900, I submitted myself to the bite of a mosquito applied by Dr. Lazear. The insect had been reared and hatched in the laboratory, had been caused to feed upon four cases of yellow fever—two of them severe and two mild. The first patient, a severe case, was bitten twelve hours before; the second, third, and fourth patients had been bitten six, four, and two days previously, and were in character mild, severe, and mild respectively.....After having slight premonitory symptoms for two days.....I was carried to the yellow fever camp. My life was in the balance three days.....On the day I was taken sick, August 31, 1900, Dr. Lazear applied the same mosquito, with three others, to another individual who suffered with a comparatively mild attack and was well before I left my bed. It so happened that I was the first person to whom the mosquito was proved to convey the disease.
> "On September 18, five days after I was permitted to leave my bed, Dr. Lazear was stricken, and died in convulsions just one week later, after several days of delirium with black vomit. Such is yellow fever."

A large number of similar experiments have since been conducted, and all of them prove that the stegomymia mosquito will transmit the disease under certain conditions. It has also been demonstrated that mosquitoes are alone chargeable with the dissemination of the fever.

Camp Lazear was established, and in it was erected a mosquito-proof structure, which was divided by a wire screen from floor to ceiling. In one of these chambers several mosquitoes, which were known to have bitten yellow-fever patients, were liberated. A non-immune then entered this chamber, and was bitten by one of these insects. He was twice afterwards bitten by these mosquitoes, and after the usual five days' interval he betrayed the symptoms of yellow fever.

While the foregoing experiment was being conducted, two other non-immunes placed themselves in the other compartment, where they slept for eighteen nights. The wire screen prevented the entrance of the mosquitoes, and the two men never showed the least signs of the fever. Another experiment proved that two soldiers and a surgeon, all non-immunes, could live in a mosquito-proof house in perfect security for three weeks while surrounded by all the instruments of contagion. They were supplied with unwashed clothing and bedding direct from the yellow-fever hospital in the town:—

> "These articles had been soiled by the urine, fecal matter, and black vomit obtained from fatal and other cases of yellow fever. These articles were handled and shaken daily, but no disease developed among the men, and at the end of twenty-one days two other non-immunes relieved them and handled a new supply of clothing in the same way, sleeping between the same sheets that had been used by a patient dying of yellow fever, and exposing themselves in every possible way to the soiled clothing."

But the disease did not appear. As soon as these men were inoculated, they developed the fever. Further test experiments by independent investigators, as well as French and English Commissions, completely substantiated these findings.

The results above described were put to practical use in Havana in 1901 and 1902, and the fever was completely stamped out. Another splendid opportunity for demonstrating the triumph and methods of science occurred with the terrible outbreak of yellow fever at New Orleans in 1905. Cautioned by the panic which prevailed in the city during the epidemic of 1897, the authorities at first endeavored to conceal from the public the nature of the disease which was raging. But it spread with such awful rapidity that it was soon realised that it was necessary to unite the entire community in a warfare with the accursed mosquito. The all too abundant breeding places of the mosquitoes were drained, salted, and cleansed. Well-organised medical services fought the mosquito until the disease died down, so that long before wintry weather arrived, the pest had been overcome.

When the French were attempting to build the Panama Canal, yellow fever held undisputed sway over the entire region. The death-rate among the laborers, engineers, doctors, and nurses was appalling. But, thanks to science, yellow fever is now practically unknown throughout the Panama zone. And in every fever area at present known, it is only necessary to successfully combat the mosquito in order to banish the terrible disease.

Plague has always been justly regarded with horror. And when we remember the misery and death it has occasioned in the past, its commitment to the control of science may be reckoned as one of the supreme triumphs of medical research. Quite recently San Francisco has been visited by an outbreak of plague, which in earlier and more religious times would have swept from the Pacific to the Atlantic. But medical and sanitary science not merely held it in check, but succeeded in stamping it out, with the loss of little human life. In this instance the authorities declared war upon the rats. Thousands of men were engaged in rat-catching in all parts of the city, and about a million of these rodents were slaughtered. Their breeding quarters were burnt or made rat-proof, and the refuse of the city was stored so that the rats could not infest it.

When, in 1896, a serious outbreak of plague occurred in India, the Indian Plague Commission carried out a most exhaustive inquiry into the causes of the disease, and also into the manner in which it is communicated. The evidence clearly indicated that the chief mode of infection both for man and rats was through some kind of abrasion in the skin. And it was ultimately established "that the flea is the most common agent in transferring the disease from rat to rat or from rat to man." And the highly valuable experiments made a few years ago by Dr. Verjbitski carry these conclusions still further. He has shown among other things that:—

> "All fleas and bugs (bedbugs) which have sucked the blood of animals dying from plague contain plague microbes.
> "Human fleas and fleas found on cats and dogs can live on rats as casual parasites, and therefore can under certain conditions play a part in the transmission of plague from rats to human beings, and vice versâ."

Insects in all parts of the earth are indirectly responsible for almost all deadly diseases. The common house fly is one of the most dangerous of these. Not only is it an important agent in spreading typhoid fever, but it has been found guilty of transmitting several other very serious maladies. That the fly may carry and disseminate the cholera-germ has been demonstrated. And that it is capable of spreading leprosy, consumption, anthrax, and smallpox is much more than a mere medical suspicion. Flea-bites and fly-stings are therefore not the mere innocent and unimportant insect antics that some of us were taught to believe them to be.

The Black Army.—II.

THE clerical profession, like every other, has its prizes, and they are so graduated as to inspire hope in the least capable and sanguine. No doubt it is true that in the Church of England, particularly, a minister may wait long, or all his life, for preferment, unless he has influential friends or relatives. But this is a disadvantage which is common in every branch of industry. While, however, there are doctors with no patients, and barristers with no briefs, there are comparatively few ministers without occupation and salary. However small their income may be they begin with something, which is solid and secure; whereas a doctor has often to spend years in seeking patients enough to keep him in bread and cheese, and a barrister to wait years for his first solicitor's cheque.

A complaint was made at one of the Church Congresses that many incumbents were deplorably poor, and it was proposed that a gigantic national fund should be raised in order to level up the poorest to £300 a year. Now, I ask any man of candor and intelligence, who has seen anything of the average "poor" incumbent, to say whether he is really the equal, in energy and general ability, of the average man who occupies a post worth £300 in the commercial or professional world.

Probably the clergy would resent their ability being canvassed in this profane manner, but when they complain of their poverty they invite such treatment; in fact, it is inevitable.

Much as it may hurt their feelings, I will even go farther. I have already said that we have a right to expect from Christian ministers, as from all other men, a decent conformity to their own teachings. Now, if there is any teaching in the New Testament which is clear, explicit, and unmistakable, it is that wealth is a danger and poverty a blessing. According to the Sermon on the Mount, the "poor" are the first to inherit the kingdom of heaven; and according to the epistles of Saint Paul, every Christian should content himself with little, and only minister to the bare necessities of his "carnal" part during his early pilgrimage. I do not accept this teaching myself. I believe that man is a risen animal, not a fallen angel; and that our sensuous nature should have its rational gratification. But I am not a Christian, while the clergy are—at least by profession. They are bound to follow Jesus and Paul, or to confess themselves hypocrites. And if the teaching of Jesus and Paul should be followed by every ordinary Christian, how much more should it be followed by those who assume to exhort and reprove their brethren.

Apart altogether from the express teaching of the New Testament, there is something incongruous in the action of spiritual teachers, who would wean us from the material world, and who at the same time demand a fair share at least of all the good things of this life. It reminds one of the Cornish minister, whose sermon was interrupted by the news that a ship had run ashore. The wrecking instinct was strong in that congregation, and every man started for the door. They were arrested, however, by the stentorian voice of their pastor, who bade them take their seats before God; and then, casting off his ministerial robe, he exclaimed: "Let us start fair."

Considering the spiritual pretensions of the clergy, I smile when they complain that they are poor. That is precisely what they ought to be. It is their only honest condition. Every penny they expend on themselves, or their families, beyond what is necessary to support life, is a confession that their doctrines are absurd and impracticable, and that they are subsisting on false pretences. I am not at all sure that they are entitled to take any care of their bodies. If they had a proper supply of the faith, which they recommend to us, they might trust to God for a supply of their bodily wants, as Elijah did in the desert and the Jews in the wilderness.

Let us turn our attention now to the missionaries. It is popularly believed that these gentlemen are all animated by a burning zeal to spend and be spent in the cause of Christ; that they court hardship and danger in the spirit of martyrdom. But what is the real truth? It is beyond doubt, to anyone who has investigated the matter, that the great majority of missionaries have positions of ease and emolument. They are generally within reach of protection, and their salaries, though sometimes moderate if expended in England, are always sufficient to provide them with every comfort in the land of their labor, and generally to provide them with a retinue of servants which they could never hope to have in their native country. I have no hesitation in saying that the lot of the average missionary is an enviable one. If the statement be disputed, I will furnish conclusive evidence from the writings of travellers, and even from the reports of Missionary Societies.

It is of course undeniable that there have been missionaries who held their lives cheap, and faced hardship, peril, and death itself with unfaltering devotion. I honor such men, though I do not share their faith. Courage and conviction are always admirable, and a martyr's grave is holy ground. But every cause has had its heroes. A doctor in a hospital has been known to suck the poison of diphtheria from the throat of a strange child, and imperil his own life in the attempt to save another's. Large bodies of men will always yield a percentage of such noble spirits; and we may reverence the martyr missionary without throwing a false halo round the heads of all his profession.

Missionary Societies, in practice, are chiefly agents for relieving the congestion of the clerical labor market. It is better to send the superfluous men of God abroad than to let them stay at home, competing with their brethren and reducing the general rate of wages. Emigration is an advantage to those who go and to those who remain. And when this is understood by the British public, the missionary business will be seen in its true light. A few go converting the heathen for Christ, some from Christ and themselves, and more for themselves and Christ.

Of a piece with the chief motive of this missionary enterprise are the arts employed in raising its expenses. School children are cheated of buns and toffee to fill the mission-box with halfpence. Shameless begging goes on from door to door. False pictures are drawn of missionary heroism, and falser pictures of the moral darkness of the "heathen." It is perfectly certain that in many cases, whatever may be said of the "civilisation" of the heathen, and their scanty costume in hot climates, they are essentially more moral than the majority of the missionary's countrymen; more truthful, more honest, more sober, more tender to their children, and more respectful to their elders and parents.

It is a common reply, on the part of its apologists, that the Black Army is too much judged by exceptional cases. In the Church of England, for instance, there are only two Archbishops, and less than three dozen Bishops; and what are these among the many thousand ministers of the Establishment? But what is the real value of this objection? Are not the plums few in every profession? How many physicians, how many King's Counsel, how many writers make their thousands a year? The number is just sufficient to keep the fire of hope alive in the breasts of the less fortunate; so that, after all, we find the same commercial law operating in the clerical profession, which operates in other departments of human activity.

The critic to whom I referred in my opening paragraph asserted, as though it were a fact of his own knowledge, that the Archbishop of Canterbury does not spend a penny of his £15,000 a year upon himself; that it is all expended upon his diocese, his own wants being supplied by his private income. I do not believe this: but if it be true, it proves nothing. One swallow does not make a summer, and an argument cannot be based on a glaring exception. It cannot be usual for Church dignitaries to subsist on private fortunes. Nor is my critic's suggestion in any way reconcilable with the fact that such immense sums of money have been left by so many Bishops during the present century. I take it that their estates, as disclosed by probate, were partially, if not wholly, built up by savings out of their episcopal revenues; and I say that their conduct in this respect is scandalous, when we consider that Bishops are constantly pleading to laymen on behalf of "the poor clergy," and that Jesus Christ told them to feed, and not to fleece, the flock committed to their charge.

Another objection of the Black Army's apologists is that the Church of England does not comprise the whole Christianity of the country, and that the Nonconformist ministers must be taken into account. None of these, it is said—not even the highest—is paid five thousand a year. I daresay not, but I think it probable that they take all they can get. Some of the luckiest Dissenting ministers in America have salaries running into four figures. Dr. Hall, of New York, was reported to be in enjoyment of £8,000 a year. Dr. Talmage took a very large salary at the Brooklyn Tabernacle, with freedom to make as much more as he could by writing and lecturing. When he visited England, and discoursed for Christian bodies, he never opened his mouth for less than £50 a night. Surely it is difficult to see anything but commercialism in such conditions of advocacy. The late Mr. Spurgeon was paid £1,200 a year, in addition to the revenue accruing from the extensive sale of his publications. Dr. Joseph Parker lived in a fine house and kept his carriage. Even the salary of a provincial minister, like the Rev. A. J. Berry, of Wolverhampton, was far from despicable. This gentleman publicly called me "a professional infidel." I replied that his salary exceeded the earnings of all the "infidel" lecturers in this country put together. Of course there are plenty of Nonconformist ministers with very small stipends, but are there not plenty of ill-paid doctors and barristers, and still more of journalists? The law of supply and demand operates in all professions. The clericals may not get as much as they desire, and indeed they were never heard to say they had enough; but they obtain all that is possible in the existing state of the market.

(To be concluded.)

G. W. FOOTE.

The baby boy kept crying while the sermon was on, and at last his mother got up to take him out. But the preacher begged her not to do so. "He doesn't disturb me," he assured her. "Perhaps not," she said, "but you're disturbing him."

We should hardly fancy that Mr. Jay Franklin, of Burlington, Vermont, is the most popular man in his State, if he frequently talks in the following manner. "You often hear the religious churchgoer," he says, "shout with delight that his creed is the oldest, and he apparently thinks age is a great asset. Did you ever hear a grocery man shout with joy because he had the oldest eggs in stock?

The Salvationists have had a "three-day whirlwind campaign" in Toronto to collect £20,000 towards the Booth memorial. With the help of the newspapers (of course!) they succeeded in extracting that sum from the public on behalf of the greatest religious imposture of modern times. Let us pray!

Obituary.

I regret in one way, though not in another, to hear of the death of my old friend Mr. B. L. Coleman, of Sandwich. He had a good head and a sound heart; always ready to express his Freethought, which raised the ire of the bigots—and always ready to do a kind deed, though it seldom brought him gratitude. He experienced how hard and painful it is to pull against the stream of prejudice and superstition, but he was not built to go along with the thoughtless and the cowards that constitute the great majority. Secretly he was admired and respected by many who dared not say so. "Ben Coleman" was a familiar name to all the town. But nature is no respecter of persons, in any sense of the words; he had far more than one man's share of misfortunes—peculiarly painful misfortunes—which broke him down and wore him out. His housekeeper informs me however, that he awaited death with perfect serenity. He often spoke of me, but when she asked if she should write and tell me of his condition, he replied that he would not have me troubled (which was a mistake, after all). His housekeeper says: "If all Freethinkers were as good as he I wish there were more about." Unfortunately those who had legal control paid no respect to his well-known wishes; they gave him a Christian funeral, the one thing he hated to think of; and a Church clergyman lent himself to the ignoble farce.—G. W. FOOTE.

North London Freethinkers will hear with regret of the death of Mr. Benjamin Stanniforth, who died on Jan. 23, aged sixty-nine. Although unattached to any Society, Mr. Stanniforth was a zealous propagandist. Widely read, especially on the subject of Egyptology, his researches in the British Museum, where he spent the greater portion of every week, were always at the disposal of young lecturers. He was a regular attendant at the Parliament Hill meetings, and a constant thorn in the side of our Christian opponents. During his brief illness attempts were made by the local Christians to offer him assistance, which, being unsought, was most indignantly declined by this sturdy and independent old Atheist. He was interred at Finchley Cemetery on January 30, but, unfortunately, owing to the secresy preserved by his family, only a few of his Secularist friends were able to be present.—A. STANLEY.

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 7 SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

One should only advise about matters in which one is prepared to co-operate.—GOETHE.

Mr. Blatchford's Blunder.

THE title of this article does not mean that Mr. Robert Blatchford has made only one blunder. He has made many. He blundered over Determinism, he blundered over Shelley. He now blunders over the Blasphemy Laws.

He has just been writing on the last subject. His reason for doing so is that "some of the Freethinkers in Leeds have been sent to prison for making 'blasphemous' speeches in the streets," and "one of them writes to ask me for help in the Clarion."

Whoever wrote to Mr. Blatchford was very ill-advised. He has never given help in "blasphemy" cases. Why should he alter now? He has not even interest enough in the matter to be reasonably accurate. Prosecutions for "blasphemy" have been dropped at Leeds; the more recent prosecutions have been for "profane language" under the Police Clauses Act, in which the heaviest possible sentence is only a fortnight's imprisonment.

All that Mr. Blatchford can offer the person who asks him for "help" is "friendly and good advice." No doubt the advice is as good as it is friendly—and as friendly as it is good.

Mr. Blatchford's advice is characteristic. Practically he says, like the gentleman in the comic song, "You do as I do." He believes in written Freethought, and apparently in nothing else; and that is because he has no faculty for anything else. If he were a public speaker he would have more respect for oratory. He would even sympathise with the rougher propagandists of "the streets."

But to return to our main point. Mr. Blatchford says he "thinks the Leeds Freethinkers are guilty of bad manners when they annoy Christians in the streets." Now "in the streets" is a popular and striking expression, but in this case it does not represent the truth. The Freethought speakers at Leeds do not run up and down the streets shouting "blasphemy" or "profanity" to the annoyance of passers-by. They deliver lectures at open places, like Victoria-square, which have always been devoted to outdoor oratory, and are patronised by all sorts of societies. When this fact is perceived it throws a strange light on Mr. Blatchford's advice. "Don't speak blasphemy in the streets," he says. They don't. They speak it, if it is blasphemy—and the word sounds odd from Mr. Blatchford's lips—in a kind of public discussion forum. People who stop to listen know they are likely to be "annoyed." Their remedy is to walk on if they cannot hear their own views challenged in plain language.

Why is Mr. Blatchford's advice confined to Freethinkers? Why did he not give it long ago to Socialists? He begs Freethinkers to spare the feelings of the Christians. Why has he not begged Socialists to spare the feelings of "exploiters" and "capitalists"? It is all very well to say that "we Rationalists" have "a strong case" and "can afford to be tolerant, courteous, and calm." Mr. Blatchford believes that the Socialists have a strong case too. His advice, therefore, is equally applicable in both cases.

Observe that it is not a question of good manners all round. It is a question whether Christians should imprison Freethinkers for "annoying" them. It has never been suggested that Freethinkers should serve Christians in the same way. Mr. Blatchford speaks sternly to the imprisoned Freethinker; he speaks pleasantly to the "annoyed" Christian who imprisoned him. That is what we object to. When you imprison a man he should have committed a crime. It is not enough to say that he "annoyed" his adversaries in a public discussion.

Mr. Blatchford would stop all Freethought propaganda "in the streets"—meaning, of course, in the open air. Listen to this:—

> "I am convinced that this street oratory is useless to the cause of truth. It is not only bad manners: it is bad policy. To convince a Christian that his Bible is not true it is necessary to educate him anew. It needs much reasoning and many books; and he must read in quiet and in private. Fancy trying to convert anyone to Determinism and Evolution in a short speech in the open street.....My advice to the Leeds men is to abandon a useless and irritating form of propaganda and find a better way of serving the cause."

This "irritating" form of propaganda should be dropped by all parties, if it is dropped at all. If Mr. Blatchford means this, let him plainly say so. If he does not mean it, let him plainly say why.

Mr. Blatchford's tenderness towards the "annoyed" Christian is wonderful. Usually, the "annoyed" Christian is a policeman. Mr. Blatchford takes a different illustration. After quoting a well-known passage about Jehovah from God and My Neighbor, he proceeds:—

> "Imagine the effect of such words in a crowd. Some decent but not well-informed Methodist hears what I say. He does not even guess what I mean. He thinks I am talking about God—his God. He goes away quickly, his simple and reverent mind full of anger and disgust. He does not know that Jahweh is not his God. He does not wait for me to prove my charges. He goes away feeling that I am a vile blasphemer."

This overwhelming sympathy for the "simple and reverent" Methodist who goes, for instance, to the Leeds discussion forum, is really touching. Mr. Blatchford has a tender heart.

We see Mr. Blatchford's generous nature—besides some other qualities—in the following passage:—

> "And here I will notice a blunder made by Mr. Foote. Mr. Foote says: 'Mr. Blatchford was discreet enough to say "Jehovah" instead of "God."'
> "Mr. Blatchford was discreet enough to say Jehovah instead of God, because Mr. Blatchford was speaking about Jehovah, and not about God.
> "If Mr. Blatchford had said about God what he said about Jehovah he would have been as stupid as Mr. Foote."

It is not for us to discuss the relative proportions of Mr. Blatchford's stupidity and our own. We leave the public to attend to all such matters. We are sorry that he resents the word "discreet." He ought to have welcomed it in the light of his present article. We are also sorry that he is under the impression that Christians have any other God than the God of the Bible. When he says there are two Gods in the Bible he might as well say a thousand.

The Religion of Disease.

IN my last article I tried to show that religion was a normal, inevitable, and logical expression of human intelligence dealing with a host of forces the nature of which was quite unknown. In that stage of culture, the gods are no more a deduction from observed facts. Certain things are seen and experienced, and the conclusion is that they are the products of supernatural agencies. From this point of view, religion takes rank as a primitive science. It is the first stage of that long series of generalisations that, beginning with primitive animism, ends with the discoveries of a Copernicus, a Newton, a Darwin, and a Spencer. It is a history which begins with vitalism and ends with mechanism. A world in which we commence with a chaotic assemblage of independent personal forces, and end with a universe that is self-acting, self-adjusting, and in which there is neither room nor any allowance made for the operation of intelligence save such as meets us in animal organisation.

So far, we have what one may call the normal basis of religious belief. But, in addition to this, the religious idea has received enormous support from the occurrence of purely pathologic states, and, what is more important, from the cultivation of abnormal conditions, with the deliberate intention of producing a conviction, in both the subject and the onlookers, of supernatural communion. Nor is there need to assume deliberate imposture. With some existing medicine men, this may be the case, but in the mass, certainly with a people more primitive than any existing tribe of savages, the operator imposes on himself quite as much as he imposes on others. Noting that privation of body, or torture of mind, or the eating or use of certain herbs is followed by an ecstatic state that brings one into touch with an assumed ghostly world, it is believed, not that the vision is the direct result of the practice, but that the practice is the condition of communication.

It is inevitable that this should be so. One could hardly expect uncivilised or semi-civilised man to know why conium should stimulate the nerves, or belladonna arrest the secretions; why aconite should decrease sensibility, or laurel water induce ecstasy. What are the precise effects of fasting on the nervous system is, again, a question quite beyond the powers of primitive man, and even in our own day is not always sufficiently recognised. And the instructive fact here is that the history of religion shows the same features throughout. The modern preacher no longer advocates the use of drugs as a means of securing celestial illumination; but he does advocate the cultivation of certain habits of mind if we desire to properly realise the workings of the spirit of God. That is, we are to achieve by a mental discipline what the savage secures by a coarser and more obvious method. The modern preacher is one with the savage in his inability to recognise the truth that the illumination is the product of the discipline, not the mere condition of its possession. Between the drug of the savage, the fasting and self-torture of the mediæval monk, and the prayerful meditation of the modern religious mystic, the difference is only one of changed times and altered conditions. The method is the same throughout.

This aspect of the matter is well put by Tylor in the following passage:—

> "From the earliest stages of culture we find religion in close alliance with ecstatic physical conditions. These are brought on by various means of interference with the healthy action of body and mind, and it is scarcely needful to remind the reader that, according to philosophic theories antecedent to those of modern medicine, such morbid disturbances are explained as symptoms of divine visitation, or at least of superhuman spirituality. Among the strongest means of disturbing the functions of the mind so as to produce ecstatic vision, is fasting, accompanied, as it usually is, with other privations, and with prolonged solitary contemplation in the desert or in the forest. Among the ordinary vicissitudes of savage life, the wild hunter has many a time to try involuntarily the effects of such a life for days together, and under these circumstances he soon comes to see and talk with phantoms which are to him invisible spirits. The secret of spiritual intercourse thus learnt, he has thenceforth but to reproduce the cause in order to renew the effects." *

In the history of religion, and as a means of inducing a sense of religious conviction, we have to reckon, therefore, with the deliberate cultivation of abnormal states of mind and body as a very powerful factor in the perpetuation of religious beliefs. This exists, as Tylor says, from the earliest ages. Thus we find the Australians using a certain shrub in their religious ceremonies, or, since contact with the whites, tobacco. In Western Siberia a species of mushroom is used to produce religious ecstasy.† An early Spanish observer also records of the ancient Mexicans that they ate on religious occasions a species of mushroom, which produced visions, and which was called "the bread of the gods."‡ Among the North American Indians the most generally used agent is tobacco. The Californian Indians give children tobacco in order to obtain information from the resulting visions. The Darien Indians used the seeds of the "Datura Sanguinea" for the same purpose. In India the Laws of Manu describes as one of the means of producing sacred visions the use of the "soma" drink. This is prepared from the sap of the lotus flower, and, while poisonous in large doses, in small quantities merely induces hallucinations. Opium and hashish, a preparation of the hemp plant, has been in general use as a means of producing ecstasy among Eastern peoples from a very remote antiquity. Opium, it is known, produces an extraordinary state of exaltation, intensifying the sense of one's personality and inducing a pleasurable consciousness of mental clarity and strength.§ Belladonna, a drug much used by the mediæval witches and sorcerers, has also its vogue for purely religious purposes. With a people as generally advanced as the Greeks, the laurel was sacred to Æsculapius. Those who wished to ask counsel of the god had to appear before the altar crowned with laurel and chewing some of the leaves. The Greek priestesses, before prophesying, drank a preparation of laurel water, which contained two toxic substances—prussic acid and the volatile oil of laurel. The first would induce convulsions and the latter hallucinatory visions. The two combined would produce, both on the subject and on the spectators, a profound conviction of spiritual illumination and possession.

Apart from the religious use of drugs in either a natural or a prepared state, there are various other methods of inducing a sense of religious exaltation. Dancing, howling, and singing are common methods to this end, from the primitive savage down to the latest Welsh revival. Primitive dancing had both a phallic and a religious significance, although, as will be shown later, to the primitive mind the sexual functions themselves are closely connected with the idea of supernatural agency. In many cases the religious dance is preceded by drug-taking; in other instances reliance is placed on the dance alone. In Ceylon this is the case with the "Devil Dancers." In Africa the witch doctor discovers the wizard through the vision induced by a prolonged dance. The Eastern Dervish produces a state of frenzy by a whirling dance. In the Bible we have the Jews dancing round the Ark in a state of nudity. David, too, danced naked before the Lord. Dancing was also part of the Greek religious ceremonies attendant on the worship of Dionysius and Bacchus. In the mediæval period witch dances were used as a means of producing exaltation. When in a state of frenzy visions of Satan naturally followed. In the dancing mania of the fourteenth century the sufferers saw visions of heaven with Jesus and the Virgin enthroned. Dancing was one of the prominent features of the Convulsionaires of France in the eighteenth century. People were seized with convulsions, rolled on the ground, leaped in the air, and indulged in other forms of extravagance. So far as the religious world was concerned there was a common agreement as to the supernatural origin of the epidemic. Disagreement only arose as to whether the source was divine or diabolic. In the early period of the Methodist movement we have frenzied dancing and singing and convulsive movements again accepted as proofs of the working of the "Holy Spirit." In more recent times—except among the religiously primitive Welsh revivals—dancing and jumping seems to have been principally an outlet for the nervous energy generated at religious gatherings. In earlier times there is no doubt that dancing was deliberately resorted to as a means of inducing a sense of religious exaltation.

In both classes of cases dealt with we have the deliberate cultivation of abnormal states of mind, owing to the belief that these bring the subject into touch with a hidden supernatural world. Later, I hope to show how, with a change of form, essentially the same thing is taking place in present day religious organisations. At present we have to note that, in addition to deliberately inducing states of mind that favor or strengthen religious belief, there are other conditions of mind and body that have the same result. It has already been pointed out that amongst primitive peoples there is only one current explanation of disease. The insane person, the epileptic, the diseased person, is in the power of an indwelling spirit. There is no need to cite again evidence in favor of this statement. The main point is that people see in such cases continued and cumulative evidence of the existence of a supernatural world. Just as the inhabitants of a Welsh village have their religious beliefs quickened and strengthened by the hysterical ravings of an Evan Roberts, and the convulsive capers of a whole congregation, so in all ages people have seen endorsement of their belief in a supernatural world in the existence of cases that are now universally handed over to the care of the physician.

Consider how much of the New Testament evidence for the supernatural rests upon cases that are obviously pathological. Thus in Matthew xvii. 15 we have recorded what is, on the face of it, a clear case of epilepsy. The man describes his son as "lunatic and sore vexed; for oftimes he falleth into the fire, and oft into the water." The boy is brought to Jesus, who promptly rebukes the Devil and casts him out. The description of the seizure is more detailed still in Mark (ix. 18) but the method of cure remains the same. In Luke (viii. 2-3) there is also an account of many people out of whom devils are cast. But there is no doubt whatever as to the nature of the complaints under which the demoniacs of the New Testament were suffering, and it is a nice question, as Dean Trench remarks, with unconscious sarcasm, if one of the disciples "were to enter a madhouse now, how many of the sufferers there he might recognise as possessed?" The answer is, All. More, it is certain that a savage taken from any part of the world would find in the New Testament treatment of disease nothing incongruous with his own beliefs on the subject. He would be moving in a familiar atmosphere, and could cite his own experience in confirmation of the New Testament, or use the New Testament as confirmation of his own beliefs and practices.

C. COHEN.

Modern Criticism and Christianity.

A MAN'S religion is determined by geography. A mere glance at the religions of the world makes this perfectly clear. Whatever a man's religion may be, if he professes it with any degree of sincerity and zeal, he believes it to be the only true one. If there are a million different religions in the world, nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand of them are false. Everybody denounces superstition as vain and unprofitable; but it is the people who are not of the speaker's religious way of thinking alone who are superstitious. When a Christian is reminded of the fact that his religion is the result of the geographical accident of his birth, he waxes exceedingly indignant, and would deny it if he could. Deny it he cannot, however, except with deliberately closed eyes. Only the other day a well-known divine expressed the opinion that the Turk would be a very fine fellow if only he possessed a better religion; but he forgot that the Mohammedans cherish the same conviction concerning the Christians. Where can you find an umpire competent to settle the point in dispute? Dr. Horton admits that the Indians generally are much more religious than Britishers; but their religions are so imperfect and corrupt that they cannot produce the noblest type of character—Christianity alone can do that. Mrs. Besant is equally convinced that Theosophy is the best character-forming religion in the world, while thousands of intelligent people make the same claim for Buddhism. This is the tritest of truisms, though the majority of us act as though we had never heard of it. It is the same in connection with everything. It would be easy to name four or five European nations, each of which glories in the dream that it is the greatest in the world. Mr. Lloyd George seldom addresses an audience without indulging in that boast on behalf of the British nation. The champions of France and Germany sing the praises of their respective countries in the same superlative degree—all alike forgetting that comparisons of that kind are always invidious. It is a common human weakness to place self and its interests in the position of highest honor and dignity.

Now, the comparative study of religions exposes the utter absurdity of such an ignorant and selfish claim on the part of the representatives of any religion. We will consider it in its relation to Christianity. We are assured by the divines that Christianity is the only infallible religion in existence, and by infallible is meant not capable of erring, not liable to fail, deceive, or disappoint; the only religion in which redemption through the blood of a crucified Redeemer is offered free to a lost world. But the truth is that the Christian doctrine of the Redeemer is neither original nor unique. Professor Bousset says that "the figure of the Redeemer, as such, did not wait for Christianity to force its way into the religion of the Gnosis." There are two pre-Christian documents, according to the erudite Dr. Reitzenstein, in which he clearly appears; as a rule, these pre-Christian Gnostic sects were violently anti-Jewish, speaking of "the accursed God of the Jews," and identifying him with Saturn and the Devil; and even in the Mandean and Manichean systems an entirely non-Christian standpoint is still visible. Speaking of all these pre- and non-Christian systems, Professor Gilbert Murray says:—

> "Their Redeemer is descended by a fairly clear genealogy from the 'Tritos Soter' of early Greece, contaminated with similar figures, like Attis and Adonis from Asia Minor, Osiris from Egypt, and the special Jewish conception of the Messiah of the chosen people. He has various names, which the name of Jesus or 'Christos,' 'the Anointed,' tends gradually to supersede. Above all, he is, in some sense, Man, or 'the Second Man,' or 'the Son of Man.'.....He is the real, the ultimate, the perfect and eternal Man, of whom all bodily men are feeble copies. He is also the Father; the Savior is the Son, 'the image of the Father,' 'the Second Man,' 'the Son of Man.'.....In the main he descends, of his freewill or by the eternal purpose of the Father, from Heaven through the spheres of all the Archontes or Kosmokratores, the planets, to save mankind, or sometimes to save the fallen Virgin, Wisdom, or 'the Pearl.'.....When his work is done he ascends to Heaven to sit by the side of the Father in glory" (Four Stages of Greek Religion, pp. 144-5).

The Rev. B. W. Bacon, D.D., Professor of New

Testament Criticism and Exegesis in Yale University, is in full agreement with Professor Murray, and, on the whole, more to the point. He says:—

> "In the Pauline gospel the story of Jesus is a drama of the supernal regions, wherein his earthly career as a prophet, leader, teacher, sinks to the level of the merest episode. As pre-existent spirit, Jesus had been from the beginning of creation 'in the form of God.' As the period of its consummation drew near he took upon him human form, descended through suffering and death to the lowest depths of the under-world, and by Divine power had re-ascended above all the heavens with their ranks of angelic hierarchies. Whether Paul himself so conceived it or not, the Gentile world had no other moulds of thought wherein to formulate such a Christology than the current myths of Redeemer-gods. The value of the individual soul had at last been discovered, and men resorted to the ancient personifications of the forces of Nature as deliverers of this new-found soul from its weakness and mortality. The influential religions of the time were those of personal redemption by mystic union with a dying and resurrected 'Savior-god,' an Osiris, an Adonis, a Mithra. Religions of this type were everywhere displacing the old national faiths" (The Making of the New Testament, pp. 49 50).

Dr. Bacon is a distinguished member of the Modernist School of Liberal Christianity, the distinction between which and Unitarianism is more nominal than real. He finds two distinct gospels in the New Testament, the Gospel of Jesus, or the gospel which Jesus himself preached, of which Dr. Bacon is minister, and the gospel about Jesus, which Paul and his followers proclaimed. Jesus was only a man. Paul changed him into a God-man, in order to make him acceptable to the Gentile world. Even if the human Jesus ever lived at all, he could not have lived in history had he not been arrayed in the borrowed garments of the God-man of Paganism. Christianity has persisted, not because it is true, but because it assumed a form in which it is palpably false. In a world saturated with superstition only a superstitious cult had the slightest chance of surviving.

Is it not indisputable, then, that the Christianity of the orthodox Church is fully as mythical, fully as great a failure as any Pagan religion ever was? Dr. Bacon himself practically admits this when he says that the difference between Paul and the Jerusalem Apostles had reference to the quality of their respective gospels, and not merely to the extent of their message. Professor Bacon puts it thus:—

> "Paul's whole message of redemption through the cross and resurrection started from other premises than those of the Galilean apostles, and was conceived in other terms. For this reason it leads over to a new Christology. In short, the transition of Christianity from its Jewish to its Gentile form is not a mere enlargement of its field by the abolition of particularistic barriers. The background we must study for the understanding of it is not so much mere contemporary history as the contemporary history of religion. The development from the Petrine gospel, broadly characteristic of the Synoptic writings, through the Pauline Epistles to that of the Johannine writings, is a transition from Hebrew to Hellenic conceptions of what redemption is, and how it is effected" (Ibid, pp. 47, 48).

Thus, Biblical criticism, though it started on its career for the pious purpose of defending the traditional view of the Scripture, has been of the highest service to the cause of truth, firstly by putting the Bible in the same category as other sacred writings, and, secondly, by thrusting Christianity into its appropriate place among other religions. Instead of being, as its advocates vainly imagined, a thing apart, a special balm from heaven for the healing of the world's wounds, the science of criticism has positively proved it to be a blood-relation of every other religion on the planet. In origin, in nature, and in pretentiousness it is no exception to the rule. Its egotism is insufferable, its haughtiness is colossal, and its intolerance unequalled; and these wicked qualities were never in greater evidence than at the present moment. Almost daily they obtrude themselves upon us, and rob us of our rights and privileges. Dr. F. B. Meyer is perfectly well aware that there is "a growing demand for Sunday amusements," and yet he would move heaven and earth to prevent its being yielded to. In this metropolis, out of a population of six millions less than one million ever darken church or chapel doors; and yet the barely one million arrogate to themselves the right to determine how the remaining five millions shall spend their Sundays. Dr. Meyer has the temerity to expect the London County Council to legislate in the interests of the one million, and pay no heed whatever to any demands that may be made by the rest of the people. Is not this selfishness at its lowest and worst? Is it not bigotry in all its repulsiveness and shamelessness? Dr. Meyer's mode of life may have deprived him of the capacity to enjoy such amusements as theatres, music halls, and cinemas provide, and no doubt he has a perfect right to exhort Christians to stay away from such godless places; but he certainly has no right to impose upon the non-church going community the narrow rules by which he and his followers see fit to regulate their lives. As long as Christianity remains in our midst it will do all within its power to put down everything that does not tend to subserve its own interests. Therefore, we are resolved to devote all our resources to the task of bringing its nefarious and injurious career to as speedy an end as possible.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Vanguard of Science.

THE armies of ignorance were powerless against it. Prejudice, custom, conceit attacked it with all their malignity, and were sent awandering in the maze of credulity: they were utterly routed, but could not believe it. Strength rose up against it, fiercely innocuous. Surrounded, often, by almost inconceivable hardships, it survived to confound the imposers of them. Restricted, thwarted, bruised and broken on many a wheel of torture, its life suffered no developing weakness. Miseries were heaped upon it, and the misery-makers rewarded with a smile. Forced by bigotry into the prison of silence, it changed that into a house of thought, wherein it fashioned weapons for the future. Against it and around it religion massed its devotees, using every fair and every mean advantage to capture and enslave it, but unsuccessfully. For the desire to know is stronger than prisons, braver than its bravest enthusiast, greater than all religions, grander than its grandest discovery. To seek to enslave it, as religion has done, is but "to chasten the high sea with rods." The desire to know is immortal, in the only understandable sense, because humanity is immortal; and religion's attempt has but shown to all open minds how pitiably ignorant, or how grossly self-seeking, the upholders of superstition have been and are.

The searching for facts, and their accumulation in sequential order, named Science, has been man's principal and most glorious task. It is the father of all progress; has given into our hands the power to raise ourselves from the level whereon our predecessors walked. It has taught us their errors; nor has it omitted to tell us how to avoid them. From the greatest things to the smallest, in every aspect of our lives, the ministrations of Science have outswamped the influence of Religion. The veriest detail of our most commonplace duty is resplendent with the glory of man's organised knowledge. Contrast it with the vaunted indispensibility of Religion, and where is the latter? Hidden in the miasma of its own inutility.

Knowledge is no ascetic. Its nature is social. It belongs to humanity; not to the individual or to a sect. Its chief function is to attend humanity. And Science, classified knowledge, knowledge brought into mathematical perfection, has never stayed for one moment the dictates of its nature. Science is man's best friend. Accompanying him during his times of travail, easing his pains, smoothing the hard rough road before him, probing, with inexpressible sympathy and consideration, the pain-racked depths of his being, that it might discover some lever whereby the load could be lifted from his heart, going ahead that it might light the lamp of encouragement and hope, guiding, assisting, attending, Science has never ceased to be man's most noble companion.

The tasks it has accomplished have been as tremendous in their import as they have been wide in their range. It has disrobed the stars of their secrecy. It has given the wayside violet a story more marvellous than the God-myth. The Book of Ages, so long heavily sealed, it has opened and partially translated for us. In the history of a flame Science has told a tale more wonderful than the assumed glory of an assumed Jesus Christ. From the past it has drawn facts that give the lie to the past as men have painted it for us. It has broken the bars that encircled the priest-slave, Knowledge, giving us a whiff of the fragrance of freedom. Throughout all its multifarious activities Science has ever sought the wellbeing of humanity. Behind even its errors, its shortcomings, its failures, we can often see its real nature shine.

Men, under the influence of Religion, which never sought to know, but ever remained amongst the unknown things, often treated Science contemptuously and superciliously, and yet they based their little lives upon its teachings all the time. Their bitterest condemnations were made possible by the Science they affected so thoroughly to despise; they did not renounce, in their severest fulminations, the results of Science they found in organised language.

Because it undermined some of man's most deeply rooted and cherished prejudices, many men, self-styled teachers, have turned round and rent the faithful attendant. In their ignorance and ire they have countenanced a persecution the results of which no one can truthfully reckon. Around man's ankles they have locked the gyves from which he has yet to escape. He is manacled and loaded with irons moulded from priest opposition to knowledge. He lives in a narrow dark den, and breathes a fetid atmosphere Religion has fouled. It has been inevitable! Yes, it has happened; and, were it not for the vainglorious assumption of unparalleled humanitarianism in which Religion enswathes itself, we would willingly forego condemnation; but the attitude of Religion demands condemnation, and there are those who shall see it fails not.

One by one the bars are being cut through, and the shutters unhinged. Slowly, stone by stone, the demolition of the structure Religion has raised takes place. Gradually the prisoner is drawn from the farthest corner of his den nearer to the light.

Science gave man power, and received buffets. She gave him mastery and was repaid with scorn and diatribe. From the chalice of her might she poured forth at his feet the fruits of her labors, and man trod the best of them under his heel. But the light, streaming through the orifices of his prison is beginning to stir within him a sense of remorse. With the gleams of understanding comes appreciation, and with appreciation comes the desire to test and to realise. And ears that were open only to the insidious word-fooling of priests are now hearing the clash and clamor of the war of ideas that rages outside the prison.

While Science worked, studied, and searched, there was something that used the ammunition provided, something that advanced boldly, militant and relentless, against the armies of superstition. It was Freethought, the pioneer, the vanguard of Science. Against the huge batallions that ranged themselves to confront the discoveries of Science the Freethinker toiled and struggled in active opposition, with never diminishing strength. Science worked patiently in peace, remote from the din and turmoil; but Freethought was there in the midst of the fight battling for the liberty of mind that is the spirit of Science. If Science has attended humanity, Freethought has attended Science. In the war of Reason with Religion the protagonist of Science has been and is Freethought. Despite the odds and hardships, the thanklessness of the task, Freethought will never crave peace; not till the bars are all broken and the walls all razed to the ground, not till the foundation of religion is disentombed from its depths in ignorance.

ROBERT MORELAND.

Saucy and Audacious "Science."

"Shall quips and sentences and these paper bullets of the brain awe a man from the career of his humor."—Much Ado About Nothing.

SCIENCE and religion have ever been mortal enemies. Scientific teaching and investigation, or, indeed, any form of intellectual liberty, has always been incompatible with assent to the dogmas of religion. The entire organisation of priestcraft has invariably been brought to bear against science on the ground that it is a powerful solvent of religious faith. This resistance of the Church of Christ to the prevalent opinions of scientists has no indisputable claim to our respect. When we remember that the system of Copernicus, the discoveries of Galileo, the law of gravitation of Newton, and the Darwinian theory were all in turn received in the same venerable quarter with equal disfavor, we are inclined to attribute that resistance, not to the weakness of the arguments of the scientists, but to a general dislike of knowledge.

Chemistry was opposed as an impious prying into the secrets of "God." The early chemists were regarded as agents of "the Devil." Physiology and medicine were opposed on similar grounds. Geology and biology were also opposed tooth and nail by the Bride of Christ. She bitterly resented inquiry, and preferred explaining natural phenomena by mythological invention.

After these many centuries of opposition, however, a lady has boldly attempted to build a golden bridge between the two. As the lady hails from the land of tall buildings and tall statements, the new evangel is not hid under a bushel. It has been spread abroad, and the gospel of Mary Baker Glover Eddy bids fair to rival the older evangel of Jesus Christ. The newest of new bibles, Christian Science: A Key to the Scriptures, of which the American lady-savior is the author, appeared in 1866, and is now nearing its two hundredth edition. It has been enthusiastically received by thousands of half-educated religious men and women, reverent of learning, quite unable to discriminate it from its adulterated imitation. And Mrs. Eddy, quite as indiscriminating as any of them, was admirably equipped by a nodding acquaintance with theology, metaphysics, and a pseudo-scientific vocabulary, and the gift of a tenacious memory, to give them the thing they longed for. Words were Mrs. Eddy's sole stock-in-trade. Her pomp of court and her priesthood were verbosity. There are five hundred pages of polysyllabic words in her book. To a reader familiar with the sober use of scientific terms, her explanations and definitions are delirious jargon. They are the bastard offspring of a riotous imagination playing, in the light of half-grasped ideas from the scientists, upon resonant polysyllables. For example, here is a—definition!—

> "Matter, mythology, mortality; another name for mortal mind; illusion, intelligence, substance, and life in non-intelligence and mortality; life resulting in death, and death in life; sensation in the sensationless; mind originating in matter; the opposite of truth; the opposite of God; that of which immortal mind takes no cognisance; that which mortal mind sees, feels, tastes, and smells in belief."

The author of this farrago of nonsense has been appropriately hailed as a teacher "second only to" Christ. It was only proper, therefore, that she should regard matter, mythology, and mortality as synonymous. Even the sacrosanct individual who thought a "whale" was a "fish" could not improve upon that blunder. On another page of this "divine revelation" we read that—

> "the metaphysics of Christian science prove the rule by inversion."

Digitized by Google

For example:—

> "There is no pain in truth, and there is no truth in pain."

Mrs. Eddy regrets that ontology receives less attention than physiology, and relates the following improving anecdote, worthy of Baron Munchausen or Dr. Torrey:—

> "It is related that a father, anxious to try such an experiment, plunged his infant babe, only a few hours old, into water for several minutes, and repeated this operation daily, until the child could remain under water twenty minutes, moving and playing without harm, like a fish. Parents should remember this, and so learn how to develop their children properly on dry land."

"Angels and ministers of grace defend us!" What, in the name of common sense, did the lady-savior suppose ontology to mean? It was fitting such a teacher should give her disciples a form of prayer and a confession of faith which bears the same resemblance to the "Lord's" Prayer that margarine does to butter. The new high-priestess strutted in borrowed plumes, and charged 300 dollars for a dozen lessons. No American oil-king ever kept a keener eye or a tighter fist on money—the only material thing in existence which "Christian" science allows to be real. She never allowed a dollar that had no friends to get by her alive. In short, Ma Eddy was a religious "boss" like the late-lamented General Booth. The high-priestess of the newest and most successful form of religiosity did not escape ridicule. Mark Twain, with that characteristic twinkle in his eye, that irresistible drawl in his voice, that gravity of manner, tried to convince the lady-savior that she was mistaken. This is the way Mark burlesqued the American Abracadabra:—

> "There is an account of the restoration to perfect health in a single night, of a fatally injured horse, by the application of Christian science. I can stand a good deal, but I recognise that the ice is getting thin here. That horse had as many as fifty claims; how could he demonstrate over them? Could he do the All Good, Good-Good, Good Gracious, Liver, Bones, Truth, all down but nine, set them up on the other alley? Could he intone the scientific Statement of Being? Now could he? Wouldn't it give him a relapse? Let us draw the line at horses. Horses and furniture."

This is genuine fun, and more effective than reams of argument. It never affected the continued popularity of the Eddy evangel. For when a person joins the Christian Science temples he must leave his brains at home. Leave them locked up in an iron safe, or else have them removed by a skilled surgeon. If he should forget himself, and think just once, the bye-law provides that he shall be fired out—instantly—for ever—no return ticket.

We set out in a spirit of inquiry to make a serious examination of the claims made by Ma Eddy. But this nonsensical system makes us giddy; for, of all the strange, frantic, and incomprehensible books which have emanated from the imaginations of religious maniacs, this book takes the first prize. It is more incoherent than the ravings of Joanna Southcott. Beside it the Book of Mormon is a plain, unvarnished tale. The Forty Coming Wonders of the late Prophet Baxter is shrinking modesty compared with the effusion of Mrs. Eddy. This Yankee Bible fairly takes the breath away. No other less colloquial phrase can so aptly describe the effect of claims so far transcending sanity. One reels back from the insane heights of "Christian" Science to the simplicity of a rational system like Secularism, suited to the requirements of the age, and freed from the absurd aberrations of pre-scientific times.

MIMNERMUS.

We don't wonder that the Free Church Council of the Aberdare district are denouncing the picture-show of the Life of Jesus called "From Manger to Cross." Their wailings nearly made a funeral number of a local newspaper. They scent mischief. People may prefer to see "The Old Old Story" in a picture theatre to hearing it in a church—and that will play Old Harry with the clerical business.

Acid Drops.

"Ben Adhem" of the Liverpool Weekly Post, whom we had to challenge a few weeks ago for giving extra publicity to a ridiculous fable about Charles Bradlaugh and a Christian young soldier at Portsmouth, and trying to justify it by declaring that it was endorsed by Mrs. Besant, has devoted a long column of small type to a reply which is no answer. The one important point he had to deal with was the statement about Mrs. Besant. The fable itself was taken from the book he referred to. He did not invent that, he did not even misrepresent it. But he did invent, or he borrowed from someone else who invented it, the fiction of Mrs. Besant's having endorsed it. We obtained the number of the Theosophist he mentioned as his authority, and all we found in it was a review of Mr. Alexander Irvine's book, signed by "E. S.," which are not Mrs. Besant's initials. The Portsmouth story is quoted in that review, but to say it is endorsed is absurd. "E. S." does not endorse it. "E. S." treats it as a pleasant story which he (or she) has heard of for the first time. A story can only be endorsed by a person who knows whether it is true or not. "Ben Adhem" is not a fool. He sees this clearly enough. But he seeks to relieve his endangered infallibility by pretending now that it doesn't matter whether Mrs. Besant endorsed the story or not. He says that is "a minor issue." Well, it was the only issue he raised when he was challenged. It was therefore neither minor nor major. It was all in all. Mrs. Besant's endorsement settled the matter. But it turns out that this was only supporting one fable with another.

"Ben Adhem's" case, his only case, breaks down. The Bradlaugh fable was not endorsed at all in the Theosophist, much less endorsed by Mrs. Besant. But there is no end to the wriggling of a Christian when his infallibility is attacked. "Ben Adhem" is like the rest of his fraternity under an obligation—to his editor or his God—never to be mistaken. So he defends himself with another infallibility. "I am sure," he says. Is he? Sure of what? Why, that Mrs. Besant "would not print anything about her old colleague unless she endorses it as correct." We beg to tell "Ben Adhem" that he would be laughed at if he tried this sort of logic in a court of law. Judges don't take inferential statements as valid testimony. A plain peremptory allegation has to be justified by plain peremptory evidence. Let us also tell "Ben Adhem" that his idea of editorial responsibility is ridiculous, and especially so in this case. Mrs. Besant spends most of her time in India. How, as a mere matter of fact, can she see everything beforehand in a monthly magazine which one buys in London? Even if she did—even if she saw "E. S.'s" review of a new book published in London—it is nonsense to say that she endorsed what the reviewer did not endorse. "Ben Adhem's" argument comes to this,—that any statement about Bradlaugh must be true if it appears in the Theosophist—even if it is only quoted by an unknown contributor from a book casually under review! Such is the intellectual legerdemain which takes the place of the clear assertion that the Bradlaugh story was "endorsed" by Mrs. Besant.

"Ben Adhem" cannot even keep up this nonsense in his own person. After declaring that any Bradlaugh story must be true if it appears in the Theosophist, and arguing that this story must be considered as certified by Mrs. Besant's endorsement, he asks "Is Mr. Irvine's story true?" and he replies "As to that I cannot say." Of course he cannot. He sees the truth in a lucid interval.

What more is to be said? "Ben Adhem's" case is done for. The long list of Bradlaugh fables is lengthened by another. But a few words may be devoted to "Ben Adhem" himself.

There is said to be an editor in the Midlands who declares that he is the only sane editor in the district; at least the only editor who can prove he is sane. He was once confined in a lunatic asylum, and he was released with a certificate of sanity. He flourishes it. He defies other editors to show one like it. "Ben Adhem" goes one better than that. He writes and signs his own certificate. He assures his readers that his mind is of a high philosophical type. He always sees both sides of a question. Bradlaugh did not. He was a fanatic. Foote does not. He is a fanatic. "He is unbalanced," this great critic says, "as every man must be who believes that he is right and that all who hold a different view are wrong." At this rate we are all fanatics—including "Ben Adhem." Every man believes he is right; he must do so,—otherwise he would hold another opinion. Every man, likewise, believes that all who differ from him are mistaken. To say that he is right is to say that they are wrong. This is not fanaticism. It is a necessary law of thought. A fanatic is not a person who believes he is right, and that those who differ from him are wrong. All men do that. It is inevitable. A fanatic is a person who tries to back up his opinions with his personality; who is insulted by the dissidence of others; who assumes that others are easily mistaken and that he cannot be; who attaches an exorbitant value to his opinions on the smallest questions; and, above all, who is prepared to promote his own views by any and every available form of force, instead of trusting to intellectual and moral persuasion. Judged by this standard, both Bradlaugh and Foote (it is "Ben Adhem" who puts them together) might hope for a verdict of Not Guilty against the charge of fanaticism.

We don't see why "Ben Adhem" should be annoyed at our observation "whoever that gentleman may be." He says that he might as well say "Mr. G. W. Foote—whoever that gentleman may be." Really! We have said that "Ben Adhem" is not a fool, but a man who is not a fool may sometimes be foolish. To print Mr. Foote's name is to say who he is. To print a writer's name as "Ben Adhem" is not to say who he is. Doesn't the gentleman see the difference?

All that can be inferred from the pseudonym of "Ben Adhem" is that the gentleman is acquainted with Leigh Hunt's beautiful poem. He might be better acquainted with it than he is. "Ben Adhem" is not a name at all. The name of the hero of the poem is Abou,—which doesn't sound so nice. Ben Adhem means a son of the family, house, or tribe of Adhem. "Ben" occurs in the Bible—for Hebrew is a Semitic language. The familiar name of Benjamin is a case in point. But we will stop here. If we went further "Ben Adhem" might regard us as a "fanatic" in accuracy —which we are sure he is not.

There was an illuminating passage in "A Correspondent's" reminiscences of Adrianople in the Daily Chronicle of February 5:—

> "The people do not trust themselves alone in the streets at night where the population is mixed. Dark deeds can easily be done quietly. This is not so true of Adrianople as of smaller towns in Turkey, where the feud between Greeks and Bulgarians have always been very bitter."

So much for the alleged "happy family" character of the Soldiers of the Cross.

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett has been the correspondent of the Daily Telegraph during the Balkan War. His communications have not manifested any very strong partiality for the Turks, and what he has to say in their favor comes, therefore, with the greater force. His experiences have just been issued under the title of With the Turks in Thrace, and in this volume he meets with a flat denial the stories of Turkish atrocities that were circulated, apparently as a counterblast to the undoubted Christian atrocities that occurred. The following description of the behavior of the retiring Turkish troops from Lule Burgas is taken from a Daily Telegraph review of the volume named:—

> "The men were starving and disorganised, but they left untouched the flocks, the chickens, and the corn of the villages they passed through, and when food was refused to them by the Christian inhabitants, who had plenty, they were gentle and forbearing. One of them offered to share with the Christian foreigner his last crust of bread. Amid all the welter of confusion and failure that these pages record there is revealed a quality of fortitude and magnanimity in the beaten Turkish soldier which is profoundly impressive."

We wonder of how many Christian troops, embittered by failure and defeat, it would be possible to write the same words?

There are times when a man of simple mind will take up a much more straightforward position, because of his simplicity, than that occupied by a more acute intelligence. The Bishop of London has been discussing the question of a miraculous versus a non-miraculous Christianity. Quite properly, he defends the miraculous. Being a Bishop, that, as Heine said in another connection, is his trade. He is convinced that if once the working man of East London wakes up to the fact that belief in the miraculous is absurd, he will cease to believe in the Christian Church. We agree with him. A non-miraculous Christianity is no Christianity at all. The life of the New Testament Jesus is simply saturated with the miraculous. It begins before his birth and it follows him after his death. And if anyone believes in either the miraculous birth or the resurrection of Jesus, it is simply idiotic to boggle at accepting any other of the miracles recorded. We agree with Bishop Ingram that a genuine Christianity must hold to "a supernatural and miraculous Christ." They who say otherwise are either dishonest or stupid. And we will only add that a supernatural and miraculous Christ is precisely the thing that the educated intelligence finds it increasingly difficult to accept.

The Rev. Dr. W. F. Adeney has been gladdening a Church congregation by an address on the same subject. In the course of this address, he is reported as taking his hearers back some fifteen centuries and proving from Christian writings, by what the report calls "infallible evidence," that the writers of that time believed that Jesus Christ did live. We don't doubt it. But there was no need to travel back fifteen centuries to produce this wonderful testimony. The War Cry would have done quite as well, and would have been equally conclusive. People believed, three hundred years after his alleged death, that Jesus actually lived. How on earth does that prove that their belief was solidly based on fact? Above all, how does it prove that the stories told about the Jesus whom they believed to have lived were the true stories? Dr. Adeney is the principal of a theological training college, and one can imagine the kind of thinkers that will be turned out after being subjected to his discipline.

After all, what does it matter? Suppose it could be shown that people, not fifteen centuries ago, but people living in A.D. 30 believed and knew Jesus lived. How much further have we got? All it proves is that people believed in him and the stories related about him. They believed he had a miraculous birth, that he was a supernatural person, that he worked miracles, that he rose from the dead. They believed all these things, but it does not prove that any of them occurred. Does the belief of the girl Bernadette that the Virgin appeared to her at Lourdes, and the belief of thousands of others that she did appear, prove that the Virgin Mary actually landed in Lourdes on that occasion? It proves this just as much or just as little as the belief of the primitive Christians prove that the Gospel story is true. Freethinkers do not want Christians to prove that other Christians, centuries ago, believed these stories, they want them to prove their truth. And the question is not, fundamentally, a question of history. It is a question of psychology. All the stories told about Jesus were believed about other people—both before and after him. Find out how people came to believe these stories about others, and you will understand how they came to believe them about Jesus. Dr. Adeney is merely illustrating in his own person the persistence of the type of mind that craves for the miraculous, and accordingly discovers it.

For sheer cant a sentence in the Rev. F. B. Meyer's appeal to the Churches concerning the L.C.C. elections beats everything we have seen for some time. He refers to "the variety artistes, with whom I have cast in my lot." The notion that Mr. Meyer has anything in common with music-hall artistes is supremely ridiculous. One would imagine that Mr. Meyer intended seeing that the poorer ones were better paid, or that in any legitimate grievance they have in the mode of their employment they could count on his assistance. It might even be expected that he would not be averse to doing a "turn" himself on the music-hall stage, in order to help those with whom "I have cast in my lot." Of course, all that this clerical "artful dodger" desires is to exploit the music-hall artistes in the interests of his own bigoted Sabbatarianism. We would impress upon music-hall artistes the necessity of having an eye on the company they appear to have been keeping.

What wonderful things happen to preachers. The Rev. R. J. Campbell told his congregation the other day that "One of the ablest men in the House of Commons, a man of world-wide fame, told me with the utmost simplicity and frankness that he was converted all at once from Agnosticism to faith in Christ through the power exercised, all unknown to him, by the daily prayers of someone who loved him dearly." This converted Agnostic said that the change had "nothing to do with his mentality," which we can quite believe. What we are curious about is how it was done. And how did this "ablest man in the House Commons" know it was done in that way? And if it worked with this one individual, why cannot it work with others? Why does not Mr. Campbell, for instance, select some well-known Freethinker and convert him, "all at once," by the same method? It is really a pity, with so many Freethinkers abroad, and such a cheap and easy method of getting them to see the error of their ways, that the plan is not put into practice more.

What an unspeakable scoundrel was that Parson Knight who not only abandoned his wife and went off with a girl engaged in Church work, but let it be supposed that he had fallen over Flamborough cliffs, and thus set far better men than himself risking their lives in a charitable effort to find him! That was the worst part of his offence. It was simply detestable.

We hear that several ladies of the congregation went into deep mourning for the "dear vicar." Their comments now are decidedly interesting. So are their husbands' who paid for the mourning.

Freethinkers may derive some amusement, at any rate in looking back, from the way in which "God" was made a party to the Hunslet farce. A memorial service was held in the eloping vicar's church, with the Bishop of Richmond as the principal performer. Men and women wept over the poor "deceased" and sang "O God Our Help in Ages Past." "God" said nothing; the pious farce went through without a word of remonstrance; which seems to us to prove the extreme improbability of "God" being a real existence.

The eloping vicar's clerical friends naturally make the most of that knock on the head. Rev. W. L. Moreton, of St. Clement's Church, Leeds, for instance, addressed his Shrovetide congregation on the subject as follows:—

> "We are met together to-night with sad hearts. It has been a heart-breaking affair to us who were friends of him of whom we are all thinking. I am glad that you all in St. Clement's parish stood up for him before this news came. He was one whom we knew to be good, and I don't think that the dreadful things of the past twelve months would ever have happened but for that motor-car accident of five years ago."

We don't suppose the Rev. W. L. Moreton extends this sort of consideration to ordinary offenders. Yet if he would give the matter a few minutes' honest reflection he would see that, whether the existing state of a man's brain was produced by an accident or given him as a natural endowment by God or Nature, he is equally under the compulsion of his physical organism. The eloping vicar is entitled to the same consideration as other offenders—no less and no more.

Parson Knight's curate, the Rev. H. J. Cobett, believing his superior officer in the Army of the Lord to be dead, published the following about him in the February number of the parish magazine:—

> "Our dear vicar has left us an example. His life was beautiful, and a few years of such service as he gave are worth a hundred years of humdrum toil. We need the inspiration of such a life as his."

What a joke! It is enough to tickle the melancholy rhinoceros.

Suppose this vulgar and vicious priest of the Church of Christ had been one of the prosecuted Freethought advocates at Leeds, only a few miles distant from Hunslet. What a hullabaloo would have been raised then! What articles would have been written, what sermons preached, on the awful effects of infidelity! As it is, however, the reverend blackguard's performance is attributed by many to his having knocked his poor head some time ago.

Parson Knight's little boy, seven years of age, is most to be pitied. He was told that his father was dead. He has since learnt that his father is a living scoundrel. Poor boy! And they sentimentalise over his father's "fondness" for him! Christianity used to be cruel; it is now simply disgusting.

Rev. Robert Leamon, aged sixty, has been sentenced at the Old Bailey, London, to three months' imprisonment for publishing libels concerning Mr. Douglas Earle Marsh. The Common Serjeant said he had no doubt that the prisoner's object was blackmail.

A young woman of twenty, called Lucie Allaigre, of Annecy, murdered her mother because she would not allow her to become a nun in a convent. In face of suspicious circumstances she finally confessed her guilt, and is now doing twenty years' imprisonment. We presume the clergy will not parade this case as a testimony to the moral influence of religion.

Buddhu, the prisoner who has turned King's evidence in the Clark case at Agra, mentions a curious instance of religious action in the course of the murder. One of the assassins hired to kill Mrs. Clark "proceeded to the Clarks' house with a large knife, which Mohan kissed and worshiped and sharpened on a stone." There is nothing new in this to the student of religion, but it may strike the ordinary man as extremely strange. The explanation is that religion is not necessarily connected with morality at all. It is frequently the last sanction of crime.

In the course of a recent application at a Consistory Court on behalf of Grosvenor Chapel, Hanover-square, it was mentioned that the chapel had accommodation for 800 persons but 80 was now considered a good congregation. It was thought that more people would be attracted if a four-post canopy (a balachino) were erected over the communion table. What a sensible and dignified way of trying to fill a church!

Sunday tramcars have just started at Bournemouth. We shall see whether the cliffs fall in.

The opponents of Sunday picture-shows are now railing at what they call the "thin pretext of charity" on the part of the management. We beg to remind them that it was their own invention. They did not like to deliver a frontal attack on "Sunday amusements" so they raised an objection to such things being carried on "for gain." It was a silly objection—as well as a dishonest objection; but it caught on with the "authorities," and committees were formed to comply with the new regulation. When it was found that the Sunday picture-shows were not stopped by this difficult regulation the Sabbatarians took to denouncing their own offspring. They now talk about "gain" and the "thin pretext of charity" in the same breath.

The Wolverhampton Free Church Council has passed the following resolution:—

> "This Council, composed of ministers and laymen representing the Free Churches of Wolverhampton and district, deeply deplores the publishing of newspapers to be sold on Sunday, and especially regrets the intention to add to such papers by the issuing of one in Wolverhampton."

Note the trade spirit of this protest. It is Sunday selling, not Sunday labor, that is found so objectionable; for Sunday papers are edited and printed on Saturday, while Monday papers are edited and printed on Sunday. Of course the selling of papers on Sunday is a rivalry with the Churches. Anything that interests the people on the "Lord's Day" tends to keep them away from "divine service." What the Free Church ministers and their friends want is a monopoly of business on the Blessed Sabbath. They don't say so, but that is what they mean, and it is the key to all their acts and resolutions.

A remark made by the Rev. Davison Brown in the discussion was very naive. "If they had administrative power to the extent of their convictions," he said, "there would be a great change in the social conditions in Wolverhampton." No doubt there would. Fortunately it isn't likely to happen.

As our readers are probably aware, the proposed census of the churches by the Daily News has been abandoned, owing to an appeal from the Bishop of London and the Rev. F. B. Meyer. Both these clerical lights argue that numbers prove nothing, or are positively misleading. Their position is that what the churches lose in quantity they gain in quality. The lukewarm and indifferentists drop out, and the church is left with a band of devoted and enthusiastic believers. We are glad to see the British Weekly protesting against this assumption, and calling for the census to be taken. It also quotes from the Inquirer to the effect that a declining church attendance, instead of meaning a concentration of "spiritual power," really "means that the diminishing congregations of the faithful are depressed and out of heart..... The decline in the habit of worshiping means a decline in the power of religion, and should be treated from that point of view." And this, we think, is the only sane point of view from which to treat it.

The assumption that it is the mentally lazy, the indifferent, and the "worldly minded" who throw up the churches is simply untrue. It is precisely those classes that remain. In the vast majority of cases the people who sever their connection with churches are those who think seriously about religious questions, and who value consistency above worldly advancement. There is simply no question that, if one could subject to some common test those who have thrown up the churches and those who still remain, there would be a big balance of moral force and intellectual strength in favor of those who are outside. No man gains anything by throwing up a church; it may often subject him to loss. And the notion that the remaining church attendants are filled with moral fervor, intellectual strength, and high spiritual aspirations is about as ridiculous as anything could well be. Look at a church or chapel congregation, listen to their conversation, or follow their progress from Monday morning to Saturday night, and see.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, February 16, Queen's (Minor) Hall, Langham-place, Regent-street, London, W., at 7.30, "The Meaning of Death."

February 23, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London.

To Correspondents.

J. B.—We have not the slightest idea who "Ben Adhem" is. He says he contributed to this journal when he was a mere boy. We do not recollect it, but there have been hundreds of "contributors" to the Freethinker, first and last, outside the regular staff; besides, nothing hangs on that point in the present controversy.

T. HODGSON.—The quotation from the Huddersfield Examiner was written by the editor in 1880 and might have been challenged at the time if it could be challenged. What is the use of a contradiction at this time of day? You may rely upon it that the gentleman you refer to is mistaken. The watch story is a myth. It has been told of all Freethought leaders, and every one of them has denied it in his or her own case. Bradlaugh asked for the evidence in his case; it was never produced, even though he took legal action in order to kill the slander. If the evidence could not be produced then, how on earth is it to be produced now? Besides, the gentleman you refer to, being 64, must have been remarkably young at the time when Bradlaugh was alleged to have performed the watch trick at the Philosophical Hall, Huddersfield. That was in 1860 or 1861. Ask the gentleman to work out the figures for himself.

E. HANNAH.—Thanks for the cuttings. We did not know that the eloping vicar of Hunslet had publicly debated with Mr. T. A. Jackson at Victoria-square, Leeds.

SYDNEY A. GIMSON, subscribing to the President's Honorarium Fund, writes: "I hope the Fund may be early completed, and that you may have health and strength to enjoy it and to give that service to Freethought which is the salt of life to you."

F. C. HOLDEN (U.S.A.).—Thanks for your efforts to extend our circulation.

F. HILL.—Quite right. Freethinkers who claim to affirm under Bradlaugh's Oaths Act should recollect that they are demanding a right not requesting a privilege. If they ask why they claim to affirm, they should reply that they do so on the ground that they have no religious belief. They should stick to this and respectfully decline to answer any other question.

E. RUSSELL.—There is nothing to take hold of in the reverend gentleman's sermon. Glad you owe your mental emancipation to the Freethinker.

H. SILVERSTEIN.—Your appreciative and encouraging letter is valued. As a member of the N. S. S. Executive you are in a position to judge, and you know what you are talking about. Thanks for your good wishes, as well as subscription (in last week's list) for the President's Honorarium Fund.

JOSEPH BAVINS.—Sorry for the oversight.

A. W. HUTT.—Harold Spender's articles on the war are jokes. He is just a hired partisan. Mr. Foote keeps tolerably well.

S. SOLOMONS.—Not quite up to our mark—and we have plenty of copy at present.

H. HUMPHREYS.—Shall appear.

E. B. forwards cheque "With compliments and best wishes for a more rapid inpouring of the subscriptions to the Honorarium Fund, which stands as the tangible appreciation of the gifted editor of the all-alive Freethinker by its grateful readers."

JOHN SUMNER (Birmingham) remarks that his subscription to the President's Honorarium Fund for 1913 is twice the amount of last year's. This is on account of the reference in the Appeal to the death of former large subscribers. "I sincerely hope," he says, "that many others may be like-influenced, and that the sum aimed at may be considerably exceeded." Our correspondent wishes that "an additional nought could supplement" the present figure. It is good of him, but our wants do not rise to that majestic height. We are not a Bishop—though we hope we are more useful.

F. PRAWETT.—The sentence you quote from Mr. Lloyd is a fine one, but we don't think it quite meets the questioner's trouble re Determinism. At the root of most misunderstanding of the subject is the confusion of free choice and free will.

M. M.—Sorry you had the trouble.

R. P.—Mr. Foote is an extemporaneous speaker; all his notes for any lecture would go on one page of a sheet of notepaper, and would be unintelligible to anyone but himself. It would be too expensive to have verbatim reports of his lectures taken for publication, either in the Freethinker or in pamphlet form.

A. R.—Next week. Thanks.

AVON DALE.—Dante was a great poet, of course, but it is a pity that his genius is associated with such a theme as the exploded theology of the Middle Ages. It has not been in our way to refer to him much. We have no other reason for our silence. We are sorry the publicist you refer to is so "jumpy."

CAN anyone supply us with Nos. 14 and 34 of the Freethinker for 1893?

KRIDON.—Shall be very pleased to receive it, or anything else from your pen. Glad to have your opinion that the "Logic of Persecution" is "exceptionally fine."

E. N.—It is impossible to say how much the State Church really costs. The clergy have always managed to baffle inquiry. Gladstone reckoned its capitalised revenues would represent a hundred millions. Estimates vary from four to ten millions annually.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

The President's Honorarium Fund.

SECOND LIST OF SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Previously acknowledged, £30 10s. 10d. Received since: C. F. Simpson, 10s. 6d.; Sydney A. Gimson, £2 2s.; E. B., £1 1s.; John Sumner, £2 2s.; Josiah Pendlebury, £1; Joseph Bevins, £1; M. M., 5s.; W. H. Morrish, £2 2s.; T. Robson, 5s.

Correction: Harriet Blake in last week's list should have been Harriet Baker.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote's subject at Queen's Hall this evening (Feb. 16) is "The Meaning of Death." Such a subject should be generally attractive. It affords a good opportunity for Freethinkers to bring their orthodox friends along to the meeting.

London Freethinkers should heckle their County Council candidates on the question of collections at meetings conducted by bond fide Societies in the Parks and other open spaces under the Council's control. The Parks Committee are trying to stop all such collections, and a Central Committee of delegates from advanced Societies, including the N. S. S., is trying to assert the old right. The fight will begin in grim earnest as soon as the new Council meets.

Mr. Cohen is paying Belfast another visit. He is booked to lecture at the Old School of Art on February 13, 14, and 16. We hope all readers of the Freethinker in the neighborhood will try to attend these meetings.

The Annual Meeting of the Secular Education League will be held at Room 18, Caxton Hall, Westminster, on Tuesday evening, March 11, at 7.30. Members are specially urged to attend. A public meeting will follow at 8.15, with Mr. Halley Stewart in the chair. The list of speakers includes Mr. George Greenwood, M.P., Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., Mr. G. W. Foote, Rev. Walter Walsh, D.D.

The newly formed Croydon Branch of the N. S. S. held its first meeting on Sunday at Ruskin House, West Croydon. There was a good attendance. Officers were elected for the ensuing twelve months, and it was arranged to hold meetings at Ruskin House opposite West Croydon Station. Freethinkers in the neighborhood are earnestly invited to attend the next meeting on March 2 at 7.30 p.m. Further information may be obtained of the secretary, Mr. J. U. Wood, 200 St. James's-road, Croydon.

The half-yearly meeting of London members of the N. S. S. will be held at Chandos Hall, Maiden-lane, Strand, on Tuesday, March 4. Chair will be taken at 8 p.m. by the President, Mr. G. W. Foote. The Executive will be present. Members are reminded that admission can only be secured by showing cards of membership. This rule will be strictly observed. The business of the meeting will be a discussion on the lines of the resolution carried at the last (Leeds) Conference.

We are pleased to hear again from our veteran friend Mr. W. H. Morrish, of Bristol, whose memories of Freethought go back to the days of Charles Southwell and the imprisonment of George Jacob Holyoake. Our old friend's handwriting is nearly as good as ever, but we regret to hear that he has been ailing lately. He says of the President's Honorarium Fund "it has always commanded my warmest sympathies." "I have still a warm corner in my heart for the Freethinker," he adds, "and it is a frequent wonder to me that you still find so many good things to say."

The local press notices the death and funeral of Mr. B. L. Coleman, of Sandwich, but nothing is said about his having been almost a lifelong Freethinker. We see by the Advertiser that the clergyman who lent himself to the "ignoble farce," as we called it, of burying Coleman as a Christian, was the Rev. Orlebar Payne, who must know that the dead man would laugh in his face if he could. The Deal, Walmer, and Sandwich Mercury confirms a point in our own obituary notice of Coleman. He says that he "will be greatly missed by many in the district whom he has at various times befriended."

Rev. Dr. Inge, preaching at St. Ann's Church, Manchester, on "Christianity and its Opponents," said there were three counts in the indictment against Christianity (we quote from the Daily Mail (Feb. 7) :—

> "First, the educated man of the world said, 'Your ethics on the whole are sound and good, but they are entangled in a mythology which has become almost incredible and barbarous.' Secondly, the student of evolutionary science said Christian ethics were founded on sentiment, not on reason. It thwarted the beneficent action of nature by protecting the weak against the strong. It preached forgiveness, whereas nature never forgave. Thirdly, and much more clamorously, they heard all round them a very different complaint, couched in less academic language, 'You sky-pilots offer us cheques on another world in order that we may tamely submit to be swindled in this. We don't want to hear about heaven or hell; we want better wages and shorter hours. If your religion will help us to get what we want here and now, well and good; otherwise, we have no use for it.'"

Dr. Inge's reply was of no importance. It was, indeed, no reply at all, but a rapturous eulogy of Christianity. The really important thing is the admission which we reproduce.

China and Our Christian Civilisation.

A FEW weeks ago I had the pleasure of meeting, at one of the principal hotels in London, a distinguished Chinese Freethinker, Mr. Hain-Jou-Kia, the founder of the Parliamentary Sinophile group in Europe. Mr. Hain-Jou-Kia is a cultured young man, apparently of the higher literary class in China. He has spent the last six years of his life in France and Belgium, principally as a student at the University of Liège, preparatory to entering upon his professional career as a civil engineer. His knowledge of English is confined to the reading of our authors, but his mastery of the French language has been justly admired, especially on account of his notable speech at the Freethought demonstration at Brussels in November last, when he occupied the platform and divided the honors of the evening with such accomplished orators as M. Gustave Hubbard, the French Deputé, and the Portuguese Senator, Senhor Magalhaes Lima.

Mr. Hain-Jou-Kia is evidently a man of considerable energy and determination of character, with a phenomenally impressive personality. Despite the immense disadvantage of being an unknown and unaccompanied individuality, he has been able, in quite a surprisingly short space of time, to visit the different capitals of Europe, and obtain introductions to, and awaken the deep interest of, some of the most prominent parliamentarians of France, England, Belgium, Germany, and Austria in his semi-official project for the formation of Sinophile groups in the different countries of Europe and America. His mission was to expound the present situation as between China and European civilisation, and to invite the different Parliaments of the West to send representatives to attend the approaching assembly of the first legislative Chambers of the Chinese Republic. The opening of the first Chinese Parliament will take place two months hence (in April), and this event will form one of the most remarkable occurrences in contemporary history. Not the most optimistic amongst the friends of human progress would have dared, a few years ago, to prophesy that a Chinese Republic was destined to be formed within the lifetime of this generation, or that a clean sweep would be made of the Manchu regime. But this and many other things even more astounding have been realised in the epoch-making year of 1912, the first day of which was signalised by the proclamation of the Chinese Republic and the deposition of the Emperor. In this work of regeneration we may see the leaven of the principles of Freethought and its collateral political principles brought into China from Europe in the quick brains and receptive intelligence of the many Chinese students who have been sent to Europe as "chiels amang ye takin' notes," and have studied and reflected upon the virtues and vices inherent in our Western civilisation.

The regeneration of China and the rejuvenating of its anachronistic type of civilisation became the inevitable law of national defence and of the corporate stability of the yellow race after the culminating horrors which the coalesced nations of Europe imposed upon the Chinese people at the time when the allied robber nations of Christendom were Shanghaied into a crusade of plunder and spoliation in China. The process of national rejuvenation, indeed, became inevitable after France and England had nefariously combined to levy the odious opium war against the "heathen Chinee" Government. China's crime was that she sought to defend her subjects against the imposition of Christian-grown opium, with its demoralising train of consequences. The pillage of the Summer Palace was the barbaric sign and manifestation of the superior morality of Christianity as a civilising agency in the Farther East. The Shanghai expedition, ten years ago, was but the culminating point at which a cynical display was made of the rapacity and unblushing piracy of the religious robber races of the West in their dealings with the defenceless hordes of the East. It is clear that unless Europe is willing in the near future to make atonement to China by adopting the policy nearest to the heart of the Chinese people—a policy of laissez faire—the course of national evolution in China will assuredly take shape in the militarisation of the Republic and the ultimate consecration of its chief resources to the patriotic task of driving the European nations into the sea.

My intercourse with Mr. Hain-Jou-Kia taught me that such a line of national development is farthest from the thought of the capable and enlightened men who are at the helm of affairs in the Celestial Republic. Mr. Hain-Jou-Kia assured me that China has but one wish, and that is to develop her internal resources and to remain at peace with the whole world. The Chinese, in fact, although far from lacking animal courage, are naturally the most pacific race of men, and have no ambition to overrun the neighboring nations, inasmuch as the enormous territory settled by them forms in itself a complete world, amply meeting all the requirements of the national ideals. If the evolution of the sceptical and utilitarian Chinese is, indeed, to take the direction of excessive militarisation, it will be entirely the fault of the peace-loving followers of Christianity. At this very moment, Russia—Christian and holy—is endeavoring to grab Mongolia, and is, moreover, laboring in an underhand manner to obtain the restoration of the fallen Manchu dynasty. All the Powers besides seem actuated by the maleficent desire to secure the economic servitude of China by imposing loans upon her that shall be territorially secured, or by extracting from her enforced concessions for the benefit of unscrupulous financial syndicates. This dangerous Christian game, already successfully played quite recently in Persia, of "beating my neighbor out of doors," can only have one issue—the partition of China; and China would follow the downward path pursued by Poland, and share the fate of Poland, with all the usual dreadful consequences of national absorption, enforced by irresponsible satraps and by soldiery acting at their behests. In view of these grim possibilities, the Chinese, who, though heathen, are not idiots cretinised by the slave ethics of Christianity, are quite determined to defend their national integrity and are not sighing to be placed under the tender mercies of European tutelage.

The leading men who are now guiding the destinies of the Chinese Republic are anxious to establish sympathetic relations between the intellectuals of China and the intellectuals of Europe. Up to the present, as Mr. Hain-Jou-Kia has epigrammatically stated, China has only come in contact with three categories of Europeans, the diplomatists, the financiers, and the missionaries. The first step towards the establishment of this eminently desirable understanding was the formation of the French parliamentary group, under the presidency of M. Painlevé, Membre of the Institut de France and Deputé. Similar groups have since been formed in Belgium, Germany, Austria, Portugal, and the United States, and in each case the initiative has been undertaken by our friend, Hain-Jou-Kia. As the result of his labors, a joint parliamentary visit will be paid to Pekin, and the party will most likely consist of Herr Scheidemann, the veteran German Socialist Democrat, my friend Magalhaes Lima, representing the Portuguese Parliament—the latest Republic in Europe thus saluting the first Republic in Asia—and my good friend Lorand, who says that though the journey is a long one, it is worth the time and the money and the labor in order to take part in this embodied proof of the awakening of the yellow races. M. H. de Pressensé, the eminent French Socialist, and M. Pichon will go as representing the French Government, and England will probably be represented by Mr. Josiah Wedgwood, M.P.

The formation of the English parliamentary group took place on January 1. A preliminary meeting was held the same day in one of the Committee Rooms of the House of Commons, and several well-known M.P.'s, including Mr. Arthur Lynch and Mr. J. Wedgwood signified their willingness to join. In this way England was happily brought into line with the other progressive nations of Europe in this important movement for a better understanding between East and West.

In my interview with him, Mr. Hain-Jou-Kia stated that as soon as the French parliamentary group had been formed at Paris, Yan-Shi-Kai, the provisional President of the Chinese Republic, at once gave his adhesion to the French group, and the President of the Provisional Assembly telegraphed to him that he had formed a parliamentary group at Pekin amongst the Chinese delegates. He told me that, in forming these groups, "we are concerned not only with a principle of justice, but with a principle dealing with the universal conscience of mankind towards the aspirations of the Chinese people for more light and liberty." He was abounding in gratitude to the French nation, because it was in France, in March last, at Paris, that he had the honor of organising the first manifestation in Europe favorable to the maintenance of the Chinese Republic—viz., at the inaugural banquet at which three hundred parliamentary delegates and university professors took part, under the presidency of M. Paul Painlevé, assisted by M. Monis, late President of the Council, and the world-renowned M. Anatole France, who, in a superb speech, expressed himself in these terms:—

> "The Chinese Republic is founded on the principle of justice and liberty. In spite of the troublous experiences and the somewhat uncertain situation through which the Republic is passing, I have confidence in the Chinese Republic. China, now a Republic, is the preparation for universal peace."

In expounding his object, Mr. Hain-Jou-Kai reminded me that the Chinese people, up to the present, have been in contact with only two sorts of European—the religious missionaries and the men of commerce. But the great bulk of the Chinese—those in the interior—have been for thousands of years trained in the Confucian philosophy and are indifferent to religious questions; and, as for the European traders and exploiters, whose only interest is in material affairs, the Chinese people are equally suspicious of them and their particular ways of pushing their commercial interests. The intellectuals in China know that in Europe there exist great numbers of independent and high-minded politicians and savants and philosophers of immense value, who enjoy an important moral authority in the world of thought. These are the sort of Europeans too little known in China, the men with whom it is extremely important that China should become intimately and sympathetically acquainted. I, therefore, propose (he said) to form an Anglo-Chinese Association, consisting, first of all, of members of the English parliamentary group, and, secondly, of English scientists, savants, philosophers, journalists—in a word, of all the men of liberal thought and humanitarian principles, in order to bring home to the Chinese people a clear knowledge of the true conditions of civilisation, as understood in Europe; to teach them that the Europe outside China is not to be judged by the Europe as seen in China; and, finally, to complete the work of the parliamentary group, as exerted upon governments and diplomacy, by a sympathetic understanding between the progressive and enlightened elements both in Europe and China.

I hope that these Sinophile groups, so happily inaugurated by Mr. Hain-Jou-Kia, will prosper in every land; and I shall look forward with intense interest to the reports which our parliamentary missionaries will render as to the prospects of stability before the new Republic of China. To Freethinkers, especially, this mission of goodwill from West to East will be of deep interest, as opening up a new world to be won for the eternal principles of human liberty.

WILLIAM HEAFORD.

The Black Army.—III.

I MAY be told—in fact I have been told—that the salary is not everything to the members of the Black Army. I never said it was. They have tastes and inclinations, like other men, and prefer to earn their living in that way. What tickles my risibility is the pretence that they are "moved by the Holy Ghost." They are really "called" by the motives which lead men into other professions. When a man already in holy orders receives a "call," in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it is to a more lucrative or eligible situation. The farce which is gone through on such occasions is sickening. When a clergyman leaves a poor living for a richer one, he solemnly declares that he is directed thither by the third person of the Trinity. Every man of sense knows this to be a hypocritical falsehood. Nor is the case any better among Nonconformists. A minister is invited by a neighboring or distant congregation; the stipend is higher, and the church more famous. He cannot give an immediate answer, for it would look too much like a mere business transaction. He says he will consider it, and consult the Lord, and pray to be told what he should do. Meanwhile he makes inquiries, the negotiations continue, and perhaps his old congregation makes him a tempting offer to remain. When he has thought the matter out and come to a decision, he finds that he has a clear call from the Holy Ghost; and when he preaches his farewell sermon, he does not say that he has accepted a better situation, but that he is going to a wider sphere of usefulness.

Many years ago a friend of mine was a member of a Congregational Church at Manchester. The minister was an attractive rhetorician, and was known to be contemplating a career in London. His congregation wished to retain him, and money was raised to purchase him a house. Subsequently a fresh bribe had to be put in his way. Another house was purchased for him, and a handsome cheque was presented to him in the vestry. The man of God pocketed the cheque with great complacency: but he could not tell the deputation whether he would stay with "his old church" or go to London. He would have to lay the matter before the Lord. A week later he said he had been told to go. But he did not return the cheque, and within another week the house was advertised "to be sold." My friend thought the church was sold too. It was a lesson to him for life. He has understood the Black Army ever since.

English history furnishes a colossal illustration of the worldly, mercenary motives of the Black Army. During the sixteenth century England was converted, reconverted, and converted back again; and it was all done with the high hand of temporal power. Henry the Eighth quarrelled with the Pope, repudiated his spiritual supremacy, and set up an independent Church. Under his successor this Church was made definitely Protestant. The reign of Edward the Sixth was a short one, but during that brief period the Prayer Book was drawn up and ordered to be used in all churches, under penalty of fine, imprisonment, banishment, and finally death. The Church officials declared that they were moved in this matter by the Holy Ghost. But soon after, when Mary came to the throne, they kicked out the Prayer Book, and declared that the Holy Ghost had nothing to do with it. Once more the English Church became Catholic, and the Protestant clergy turned right about face to keep their livings. Only a hundred and twenty, out of about thirteen thousand, had the honesty to stand by their convictions. Elizabeth succeeded Mary, the English Church went back to Protestantism, and the glorious Reformation was a standing proof of the ease with which the pulpit can be turned by those who have power over the bread-and-cheese of the clergy.

Let me conclude with a few words on the function of this Black Army. Our red-coats have to fight a visible, tangible enemy; they shoot, and they are shot at; they kill, and they are killed. Many who are not killed are wounded, and bear about them the scars of combat. But the Black Army fight an enemy who is intangible and invisible. They fight the Devil. This personage was once a grim reality, at least in the imagination of believers; but he has sunk into a comic figure, and is now laughed at as a bogey. Nevertheless, the Black Army survives. It is engaged in fighting "Sin." But what a ridiculous notion it is that sin can be put down by preaching. The Black Army should be disbanded, and the money it costs be expended on the secular improvement of the people.

"Vital Lies."

"How shall my friend revere the truth in my mind when I myself am careless about it, when I believe things because I want to believe them, and because they are comforting and pleasant? Will he not learn to cry 'Peace' to me when there is no peace? By such a course I shall surround myself with a thick atmosphere of falsehood and fraud, and in that I must live. It may matter little to me, in my cloud-castle of sweet illusions and darling lies; but it matters much to Man that I have made my neighbors ready to deceive. The credulous man is father to the liar and the cheat; he lives in the bosom of this his family, and it is no marvel if he should become even as they are."—PROFESSOR W. K. CLIFFORD, Lectures and Essays; 1886; pp. 345-6.

"This is a common argument: 'If you only knew the comfort of belief!' My reply is that I choose the nobler part of Emerson, when, after various disenchantments, he exclaimed, 'I covet truth!' The gladness of true heroism visits the heart of him who is really competent to say this."—PROFESSOR TYNDALL, Fragments of Science; 1879; vol. ii., p. 233.

"The profoundest of all infidelity is the fear lest the truth be bad."—HERBERT SPENCER.

EVERY year, with monotonous regularity, when the statistics of the Nonconformist Churches are published, it is found that their membership, instead of increasing, has decreased, and this in spite of the increase in the population. And yet, in spite of this increasing slump in membership, we are assured by the religious press that there is not less religious belief prevalent, but more; that the mechanical and materialistic explanations of the scientists of the last century have been abandoned, and that science is now leading us to a belief in a spiritual, in place of a material, basis of the universe.

Now, those who are conversant with the aims and methods of modern science know that this is untrue, and if the writers in the religious press knew anything more of science than what they skim from the pages of the Hibbert Journal, the Contemporary Review, and similar spineless publications, they also would know that it was untrue.

That there has not been so much attention bestowed by scientific men upon what is called the conflict between religion and science, is due to the fact that the scientists of the last century, represented by Tyndall, Huxley, Clifford, and others—using the bullets moulded by Spencer and Darwin—so completely put the theologians to rout that their successors have regarded any further operations in this direction in the light of flogging a dead horse. As Huxley once remarked, scientists "have better than mere antiquarian business in hand, and if dogmas, which ought to be fossils but are not, are not forced upon their notice, they are too happy to treat them as non-existent."*

Taking heart from this victorious peace, we find the defenders of supernaturalism now claiming that science is not opposed to the teachings of religion as to creation and a future life, and back their assertion by citing Kelvin, Wallace, and Sir Oliver Lodge. We have gone into this question before, and have pointed out that Wallace admits, and deplores, that scientists as a body are wholly given over to the mechanical view of things. Sir Oliver Lodge declares that the "atmosphere of modern science is adverse to the highest religious emotion," and it "shows us a self-contained and self-sufficient universe.....nothing supernatural or miraculous, no intervention of beings other than ourselves being conceived possible."† When Lord Kelvin—deservedly famous for his discoveries and inventions in mathematics, physics, and mechanics—appealed to creative power for the production of life, the introduction of the supernatural into this department of science was promptly repudiated by our leading naturalists and biologists, Sir Thistleton Dyer roundly declaring that "For dogmatic utterance on biological questions there is no reason to suppose that he is better equipped than any person of average intelligence."

But it is from the philosophers like the French Professor Bergson and the American Professor James that the reactionaries draw their greatest strength. We make bold to assert that neither of these gentlemen would have been heard of beyond their own circle but for their gift of fine writing with which they have clothed their ideas, such as they are. As Mr. Hugh Elliott has observed, "The metaphysic of Bergson has all the incomprehensibility that are essential to the most respectable philosophy."‡

By the way, was the Bergsonian philosophy responsible for the conversion of Mr. Bernard Shaw—who used loudly to proclaim his Atheism—whose "Life Force" bears a suspicious family likeness to Bergson's "Vital Impetus"? Meeting Mr. Shaw one day, the Rev. R. J. Campbell—like another Paul at Athens—improved the occasion by saying: "Do you know, Shaw, that your 'Life Force' is identical with my God?" Stunned by this revelation from the City Temple prophet, Mr. Bernard Shaw replied: "Good God! Campbell, you don't say so?" "Oh, yes; it's quite true," said the divine; "and what's more, Shaw, you're a Christian without knowing it." And Mr. Bernard Shaw went straight home and wrote a tract in which he declared his belief "not only in a trinity, but in a trillion-trinity," and in the immaculate conception of Jesus, because he believed in the immaculate conception of every mother.* The Rev. R. J. Campbell thankfully accepted this marvellous—and evidently inspired proof—of doctrines which even Christians had become ashamed of, and published it in his "Modern Pulpit" series. This comes of consorting with a priest and a metaphysician.

Mr. Hugh Elliott dealt faithfully with Professor Bergson, and now we have another trenchant work dealing with Professor James and other obscurantists, by the brilliant and accomplished lady who writes under the pen name of "Vernon Lee."†

Professor James is best known as the author of The Will to Believe, Pragmatism, and Varieties of Religious Experience. It is to these works that Vernon Lee more especially addresses herself. Says the author:—

> "The peculiarity of Pragmatism is (as I hope to demonstrate) its tactics of advancing untenable propositions and falling back upon received ones; its shuffling the principle which is hard to accept in a handful of principles we have willingly accepted; its medium-like device (for only successive metaphors can illustrate habits so protean) of slipping a hand out of the seemingly unbroken circle of concatenated thought, in order to produce all manner of new and desirable manifestations" (vol. i., p. 8).

Pragmatism was not invented by Professor James, although it is now identified with his name; it was the name adopted by Mr. Pierce for the principle of "How to Make our Ideas Clear," a very laudable undertaking until Professor James, as Vernon Lee shows, transmogrified it into the Will-to-Believe and the Making of Truth, "and by converting this principle, by endless moves revoked whenever detected, into the very thing which that proto-Pragmatist had invented Pragmatism to expose, disprove, confute, and reduce for ever to silence" (vol. i., p 12)

In the chapters dealing with "What is Truth?" Vernon Lee lays bare the true inwardness of Pragmatism. It works out like this (to give a very short and condensed summary): Professor James begins with the seemingly innocent statement that you can say of an opinion "either that 'it is useful because it is true' or that 'it is true because it is useful'—both these phrases mean exactly the same thing." That is the first step. Then further:—

> "The true is the name of whatever proves itself to be good in the way of belief, and good, too, for definite assignable reasonable reasons. Surely you must admit this, that if there were no good for life in true ideas, or if the knowledge of them were positively disadvantageous and false ideas the only useful ones, then the current notion that truth is divine, and its pursuit a duty, could never have grown up or become a dogma. In a world like that, our duty would be to shun truth, rather."

That is the second step, which brings us to the third step, as follows:—

> "If there be any life that it is really better we should lead, and if there be any idea which, if believed in, would help us to lead that life, then it would be really better for us to believe in that idea, unless, indeed, belief in it incidentally clashed with other greater vital benefits."‡

And there you have it; the believer, or rather the one who wills to believe, can be safely trusted to take the last step for himself, and say that he believes in a future life and a benevolent God, not because they can be proved true, but because they are useful or comfortable.

Vernon Lee also calls attention to Professor James' claim for alcohol, that it "stimulates the mystical faculties of human nature." That drunkenness "brings its votary from the chill periphery of things to their radiant core. It makes him for the moment one with truth." This provides a new excuse for the toper, who may now plead that he is only stimulating his "mystical faculties." The Professor does not state that he himself experimented in this direction; but he submitted himself to the influence of nitrous oxide gas—commonly called "laughing gas"—and he gives some examples of the resulting gibberish. This is one: "What's mistake but a kind of take? What's nausea but a kind of ausea? Sober, drunk,—unk, astonishment, etc., etc." How sublime!

However, Professor James was not the first to experiment in this direction. Mr. Moncure Conway tells us that, when ether was discovered, Oliver Wendell Holmes—thinking it might possess some spiritual virtues—placed himself under its influence, pencil in hand. Being seized with a vast thought, he wrote it down.

> "It proved to be these words: 'A strong smell of turpentine pervades the whole.' But he was not satisfied with that, and made another effort. 'This time,' he said, 'I felt as I wrote that I really had seen the secret of the universe. The words proved to be: Put Jesus Christ into a Brahma press and that's what you'll get!'"*

National Secular Society.

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON JAN. 30.

The President, Mr. G. W. Foote, occupied the chair. Other members present were: Messrs. Barry, Brandes, Cohen, Cowell, Davey, Davies, Davidson, Gorniot, Leat, Neate, Nichols, Quinton, Rosetti, Samuels, Silverstein, Schindle, Wood, and Misses Kough and Stanley.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed. The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were received for the Liverpool and West Ham Branches and the Parent Society, and an application was received and granted for the formation of a new Branch at Croydon as the result of the lectures recently given there under the auspices of the Secular Society, Ltd.

A suggestion from M. Victor Charbonnel, Secretary of the Cercle Berthelot, of Paris, was received through a friend of the movement, that an interchange of visits between French and English Freethinkers might be arranged, and that whilst in this country the French delegates might join in a protestation against the Blasphemy Laws. The Secretary was instructed to reply cordially reciprocating their desire.

Further particulars having been received, it was resolved to affiliate with the Social Defence Committee, and Messrs. Heaford and Cohen were elected as delegates.

The Executive being informed that the L. C. C. Parks Committee had not reported to the Council, the President suggested that it was time for the N. S. S. to act, the Executive heartily concurring.

The following resolution was moved by Mr. Rosetti, and strongly supported by Mr. Cowell and Mr. Gorniot:—

> "That this Executive ask the Management Committee to draw up a syllabus and details of examination for the Scholarship Scheme. To prepare copies, and insert a notice in the Freethinker inviting intending candidates to apply for a copy. That a date be fixed for close of applications, and arrangements be made for examination to take place in London in May, 1913."

An application from one candidate under the Scholarship Scheme was received.

Other matters of business were held over until next month.

E. M. VANCE, Secretary.

The first person to report what is false is a liar. When a lie is a few days, or a few years old, it becomes hearsay, and when the lie has lived to a patriarchal age it is then called tradition. But Nature prevents any lie from becoming history. Nature is true and always tells the truth, while every lie is unnatural and must at last be exposed as such. This is why the story of Jesus must die out of men's minds and men's mouths: it is false and unnatural.—Truthseeker (New York).

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 8 SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Is it sublime to strain our vision into a fog? and must we fancy we see far because we are looking where nobody can see farther.—LANDOR.

God Damn!

"'Tis strange—the Hebrew noun which means 'I am,'
The English always use to govern 'damn.'"
—BYRON.

THE late Dr. Joseph Parker, of City Temple fame, once cried "God damn the Sultan!" It caused a tremendous flutter in many circles. Some papers cried "Bravo!" Several others cried "Shocking!" The religious press was much divided. Organs of the Nonconformist Conscience were quite delighted over Dr. Parker's expletive, while the more sedate of the Church organs condemned it as an exhibition of very bad manners. For our part, we were neither pleased nor disgusted. If a minister likes to swear in the pulpit, we are not at all disposed to quarrel with him. It is more a matter for his congregation than it is for us. Besides, although swearing—as the angry rebuker said—is a damned bad habit, it is better to let off steam than to burst the boiler. There are occasions in life when the mildest-mannered man, even a saint of the first water, may be pardoned for indulging in a recitation from the slang dictionary. Has not Mark Twain said that when a man goes into a dark room, and sits on the business end of a tintack, his only refuge is profanity?

Great allowance, too, ought to be made for Christian ministers. In the first place, they are—or are supposed to be—diligent students of the Bible. Now the Bible is a first-rate cursing manual. Jehovah opens the ball in Genesis by cursing pretty nearly everything—the serpent, Adam and Eve, and the very ground under their feet; and the author of the book of Revelation closes with a red-hot curse on anybody who should presume to add anything to, or subtract anything from, that mysterious composition. Between this fine beginning and this noble end there is a vast variety of malediction. Most of the Bible writers take a hand in the business. Jehovah assumes the lion's share, as is natural, for the boss should be the first in everything; but one or two of his subordinates occasionally run him pretty closely. Moses, though the meekest man on earth, could let out rarely when his blood was up. David, or whoever wrote the cursing Psalms, played up well for a front place in the competition. Some of the prophets did their level best. Even the great New Testament saints, Paul and Peter, labored to sustain the credit of their profession. Jesus Christ himself was very successful when he let himself go. His outburst in Jerusalem, towards the close of his career, was highly creditable. It was Professor Newman's opinion that he outdid Tacitus and Suetonius in malignant denunciation of his enemies, who were after all simply his rivals. He called them hypocrites, whited sepulchres, vipers, and children of hell. In his last sermon on the Day of Judgment he used the words, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire." And after his Resurrection, according to the second Gospel, he declared that those who believed should be saved, and that those who did not believe should be damned. No doubt a great literary artist, like Shakespeare or Rabelais, could have considerably improved on this performance, but it is a good one nevertheless.

The fact is that "damn" is a remarkably common word in the Bible, and if an irate saint is not to be allowed to use it when he feels disposed, what on earth has become of English freedom?

But why, it may be asked, should Dr. Parker have damned anybody, even the Sultan of Turkey? Is it not written that Jesus came to save, not to destroy; and should not Dr. Parker have followed in the footsteps of his Master? But this question involves a very partial view of the glorious Gospel. Jesus did, indeed, come to save the few, but he also came to damn the many, or at least to let them be damned by his Father. Many are called, but few chosen; many slide down the way to Hell, few climb the path to Heaven; the sheep are a little flock, the goats are a countless multitude. Salvation is for the elect, and damnation for the mob. According to the old religion—instead of the modern makeshift—the chief work of the Lord is the damnation of sinners. He sometimes protests that he doesn't like it, but he laid down his plan and abides by it, and even a deity must be judged by actions rather than by words. Byron felt, in the good old orthodox days of years ago, that he was very much alone in wishing to circumscribe the limits of Hell's hot jurisdiction, and that the clergy would hold that he ought to be damned for "hoping no one else might e'er be so."

On the whole, therefore, we think that Dr. Parker's "God damn" is susceptible of an easy justification. But some people will ask why "God damn"? Why not call on the Devil to do it, as Macbeth does to the messenger who brings the tidings that Burnham wood has come to Dunsinane?—"The Devil damn thee black, thou cream-faced loon." Well, the answer is very simple. The Devil damns nobody; all who are damned are damned by God. When you look at it closely, the Bible God is the Devil. The two personages have got on the wrong tickets. This is felt to be so by unsophisticated people. When a rough fellow swears, he says "God damn you." He knows instinctively who it is that presides over damnation.

Over in America they say there are three sorts of fools: fools, damn fools, and God damn fools. Wherever the English language goes, it carries with it the peculiarity which Byron noticed in the Don Juan couplet at the head of this article.

Many years ago Colonel Ingersoll was quoting a legal author called Moses in arguing a case of Mandamus in court, and the Christian judge, thinking he would take a rise out of "Bob," asked: "By the way, Mr. Ingersoll, is that the gentleman you go about the country abusing?"—alluding to the then very famous lecture on "The Mistakes of Moses." "Oh, no," Ingersoll readily replied; "this is Moses on Mandamus; the other is Moses on God damn us." That judge never tried it on "Bob" again. As for Dr. Parker, he was not exactly an Ingersoll, but he was not to be bullied for his "God damn," at least by Christians. From every point of view the expression is strictly orthodox.

The Religion of Disease.—II.

IT is not the least of the evils induced by the triumph of Christianity that, by its advocacy of the savage theory of the nature of mental and physical disorders, it arrested the advance made in Greece, Rome, and Alexandria, and saddled European life with a set of beliefs that now have their counterpart only amongst uncivilised peoples. The effect of this may be traced in many directions; at present I am concerned only with showing the extent to which it served to keep alive a sense of intercourse with a supernatural world. And it is not too much to say that every case of disease, particularly of mental disease, gave to the fervent Christian additional proof of the activity of the spiritual world. Indeed, the expulsion of demons from afflicted persons was one of the powers upon which Christians prided themselves, and a belief in its possibility continued at least up to the time of John Wesley. The most elaborate regulations and formulæ were devised, all inspired by the idea of making the evil spirit's dwelling-place as uncomfortable as possible, and so ensuring evacuation. If an insane person was to be dealt with, he was prayed over, drenched with incense, and evil-smelling drugs burned under his nose. Then a set form of objurgation followed, thus:—

> "Thou lustful and stupid one.....Thou lean sow..... Thou wrinkled beast, thou mangy beast, thou beast of all beasts the most beastly.....Thou mad spirit..... Thou greedy wolf.....Loathsome cobbler.....filthy sow .....perfidious boar.....envious crocodile.....malodorous drudge.....wounded basilisk.....swollen toad.....entangled spider.....lousy swineherd.....lowest of the low .....cudgelled ass," etc., etc.*

Then followed the exorcism proper:—

> "By the Apocalypse of Jesus Christ by which God hath given to make known unto his servants those things which are shortly to be.....I exorcise you, ye angels of untold perversity.....May all the devils that are thy foes rush forth upon thee and drag thee down to hell.....May the Holy One trample on thee and hang thee up in an infernal fork, as was done to the five kings of the Amorites.....May God set a nail to your skull, and pound it with a hammer as Jael did unto Sisera.....May.....Sotter.....break thy head and cut off thy hands, as was done to the cursed Dagon..... May God hang thee in a hellish yoke, as seven men were hanged by the sons of Saul."†

All over Europe, for centuries, lunatics and epileptics were tormented and ill-treated under the obsession of these ideas. Whipping-posts were set up, and the insane soundly scourged. Here is a specimen recipe of this class:—

> "In case a man be lunatic, take a skin of mere swine, work it into a whip, and winge the man therewith. Soon he will be quite cured. Amen."‡

In some parts of Scotland, as late as 1789, lunatics were placed in the churchyard all night, bound hand and foot, and with a holy bell over their heads. In Cornwall, St. Nun's Pool was famous for its cure of those possessed. Even the embraces of prostitutes were recommended as a cure for insanity.§ So proud were the priests of their power to expel demons that in Vienna, in 1783, the Jesuit Fathers boasted that they had cast out no less than 12,652 "living devils." Two centuries later (1788), in Bristol, a drunken epileptic, one George Larkins, was solemnly brought into church and seven clergymen as solemnly set themselves to work to cast out the possessing demon. Whereupon Satan swore "by his infernal den" that he would not come out—an oath, says the chronicler, nowhere to be found but in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. Under date of October 25, 1739, John Wesley also relates how he was sent for, and assisted at the expulsion of a demon from the body of a young girl.

It is no wonder that we find a missionary from New Guinea confessing that the native demoniacs "are certainly not unlike those described in the New Testament. Frantic gestures, convulsions, foaming at the mouth, feats of supernatural strength, furious ravings, bodily lacerations, gnashing of teeth, and other things of a similar character may be witnessed in most of the cases which are supposed to be under diabolical influence."‖ In truth, there is not a resemblance merely between these cases and those described in the New Testament; they are identical. No rational line of difference can be drawn between the uncivilised inhabitant of New Guinea or Africa, the early Christian, the mediæval Churchman, or John Wesley. Faced by the same facts, they arrive at the same conclusion. This conclusion is one suggested by their religious beliefs, and in turn it reacts and strengthens their religious convictions.

Of all diseases, that of epilepsy appears to have been most favorable to the encouragement of a belief in spiritual operation. One medical authority has pointed out, as the result of his own experience, that with epilepsy there is often an exaltation of the religious sentiments.† A still more recent authority, Sir T. S. Clouston, has also remarked that strong religious emotionalism often accompanies epilepsy.‡ Another eminent physician, while pointing out that "a high degree of intelligence, amounting even to genius, has in some cases been associated with epilepsy," points out that "The epileptic is apt to be influenced greatly by the mystical and the awe-inspiring, and he is disposed to morbid piety. He has an outward religiousness without corresponding strictness in morals."§ The very name of this disease shows its association with religion. Emanuel Deutsch says:—

> "There is a peculiar something supposed to inhere in epilepsy. The Greeks called it a sacred disease. Bacchantic and corybantic furore were god-inspired stages. The Pythia uttered her oracles under the most distressing signs. Symptoms of convulsions were ever needed as a sign of the divine."‖

So, too, a modern observer, Mr. W. Ellis, writing of the Polynesians, says:—

> "As soon as the god was supposed to have entered the priest, the latter became violently agitated and worked himself up to the highest pitch of apparent frenzy; the muscles of the limbs seemed convulsed, the body swelled, the countenance became terrific, the features distorted, the eyes wild and strained. In this state he often rolled on the earth, foaming at the mouth, as if laboring under the influence of the divinity by whom he was possessed, and in shrill cries, and often violent and indistinct sounds, revealed the will of the god."¶

There is every reason for believing that Mohammed received many of his celestial messages and visions during epileptic seizures, hallucinations of sight and hearing being the normal accompaniments of such attacks. Swedenborg's visions may also be traced to a similar source. These, and others, were illustrating in their own person the policy of the Siberian Shamans, who actually select epileptic lads to be trained for the priesthood. Long experience had doubtless taught them that the hallucinations which beset epileptics are of exactly the kind that create a sense and appearance of religious illumination. Thus, Dr. Ball says that the most common hallucinations are those of vision. And Dr. Maudsley thus describes the normal accompaniments of an epileptic attack:—

> "The patient's senses are possessed with hallucinations, his ganglionic central cells being in a state of what may be called convulsive action; before the eyes are blood-red flames of fire, amidst which whoever happens to present himself appears as a devil, or otherwise horribly transformed; the ears are filled with a terrible roaring noise, or resound with a voice imperatively commanding him to save himself; the smell is perhaps of sulphurous stifling, and the desperate and violent actions are the convulsive reaction to such fearful hallucinations."*

If anyone will bear in mind the numerous descriptions of religious visions and the accounts, written in all good faith, of the behavior of "inspired" personages during their seasons of inspiration, he will have little difficulty in realising that in all stages of culture, from Ellis's Polynesian medicine-man down to the modern revival, epilepsy has played no small part in inducing and developing a sense of intercourse between man and a spiritual world.

It has already been mentioned that one of the commonest methods of inducing a sense of spiritual intercourse is that of fasting. A lowered vitality is eminently favorable to hallucinations of every description. A shipwrecked sailor is placed in the same condition, through no act of his own, as is the primitive medicine-man and the mediæval saint by their own volition. There is really much more in the Christian outcry against "fleshly indulgence" than a revolt against mere sensualism. It might even be claimed that indulgence in sensual gratification in one direction was condemned in order to increase sensual gratification in another direction. A well-fed body has been deprecated because it cut off one of the conditions of "spiritual" illumination. The Zulu maxim, "A stuffed body cannot see secret things," really expresses the philosophy of the matter.

Among the Blackfoot Indians of North America, when a boy reaches fourteen years of age he is sent away from his father's lodge in search of a spiritual protector or totem. Seeking some secluded spot, he abstains from food until such time as he dreams, or receives a vision of some animal or bird, which he at once adopts.† Similarly, the Malay, to procure supernatural visitations, retires to the jungle and abstains from food. The Zulu doctor qualifies himself for intercourse with the tribal ghosts by spare diet and solitary fasts. Fasting is part of the regular regimen of the Hindoo Yogi. In the New Testament, the encounter of Jesus with the Devil is preceded by a forty days' fast. Santa Teresa kept severe fasts for lengthy periods each year. George Fox confesses that he "fasted much," and "walked abroad in solitary places." Less fasting and more genial intercourse with his fellows might easily have prevented his hearing spiritual voices offering counsel. Perhaps the most curious religious reason for fasting is that cited from a monkish preacher by Brady, in his Clavis Calendaria:—

> "As a coach goes faster when it is empty, a man by fasting can be better united to God; for it is a principle with geometers that a round body can never touch a plane except in one point.....A belly too well filled becomes round, it cannot touch God except in one point; but fasting flattens the belly, and it is united with the surface of God in all points."

"Personal Religion."

WHAT is religion? As a matter of fact, nobody knows. Everybody defines it to suit himself, and scarcely any two frame an identical definition. One divine assures us that religion is neither cultus, creed, nor conduct, but fellowship with the Unseen, or communion with God. Another is equally certain that religion means the sense of dependence and the various obligations which that sense carries with it. To others, religion signifies acceptance of a definite creed and the adoption of a mode of life suggested or enjoined by such a creed. At present, the Rev. W. E. Orchard, D.D., of Enfield, is issuing a series of what he calls "Modern Tracts on Religion," the first of which appeared in the Christian Commonwealth for February 5, and which he entitles "Personal Religion—Your Concern." In the very first sentence Dr. Orchard falls into the common error of thinking that "we are all religious nowadays—more or less." It would be easy enough to bring the reverend gentleman into touch with thousands of people in London alone who glory in the fact that they have no religion at all in the popular acceptation of the term. Some of them were trained to live without it, while others have succeeded in throwing it off at the bidding of their reason. No doubt there are not a few even at Enfield who do not believe in a Supreme Being nor take part, in public or in private, in any acts of worship. Thomas Paine said that to do good was his religion, and Dr. Orchard refers to the man who declares that "his religion consists in doing all the good he can." But this definition is really a complete negation of religion in any of its approved significations; nor is Dr. Orchard himself satisfied with it. Speaking of the man who takes refuge in it, he says:—

> "Is that right? No, for he, too, has not gone far enough back. Behind all the good we do there is the impulse to do it. And it is this that makes all the difference. Very few of us can be sincerely content only to yield to the impulse without inquiring where it comes from, for the one sufficient reason that the impulse seems never to be satisfied by what we are actually able to do. To do all that we could for one short day, would certainly involve us in very big adventures. When have we felt at the close of day that we had done all that we could?"

We must confess that we are rather surprised to find a man of Dr. Orchard's calibre falling back upon such spurious reasoning. Obviously the impulse to do good comes from the same source as ourselves. It is a product of social evolution, and is shared, more or less, by all the gregarious animals below us. Prince Kropotkin, in his excellent work, Mutual Aid a Factor of Evolution, furnishes numerous instances of its active presence in ants, bees, birds, and many others of the lower animals. And without a doubt the impulse is in its nature the same in them as in us. It is an essential requisite of a happy social life. We are aware that Dr. Orchard was bound, in the interest of religion, to ignore this undeniable fact in natural history. His ambition is to show that the impulse to do good is of supernatural origin, in which event religion may be defined as "a sense of connection with something higher than ourselves, something that has power to move us and inspire us to thought and activity." Now, Prince Kropotkin informs us that the impulse to do good, or mutual aid, "is to be met with even amidst the lowest animals." He writes:—

> "Some land-crabs of the West Indies and North America combine in large swarms in order to travel to the sea and to deposit therein their spawn; and each such migration implies concert, co-operation, and mutua support. As to the big Molucca crab (Limulus), I was struck (in 1882 at the Brighton Aquarium) with the extent of mutual assistance which these clumsy animals are capable of bestowing upon a comrade in case of need. One of them had fallen upon its back in a corner of the tank, and its heavy saucepan-like carapace prevented it from returning to its natural position, the more so as there was in the corner an iron bar which rendered the task still more difficult. Its comrades came to the rescue, and for one hour's time I watched how they endeavored to help their fellow prisoner" (Mutual Aid, p. 11).

If Dr. Orchard is right, those ministering crabs were acting from a sense of connection with something higher than themselves, something that had power to move and inspire them to such noble activity; that is to say, they were performing a religious duty, or taking part in a religious ceremony; but Dr. Orchard is not right. The impulse to do good is not a gift from above, but an acquirement instinctively won on the upward road. Its existence in man does not connect him with anything higher and better than himself, but is merely an indication of the stage he has reached in the evolutionary process. It simply shows exactly where he stands.

For Dr. Orchard, all roads lead to God, only not one of them is a real road. That they are not genuine roads is proved by the fact that nobody knows who, what, or where God is. The reverend gentleman himself admits that the moment we pronounce the name of God we "are in the thick of a hundred controversies." Some are quite sure that he is a personal being, who hears and answers prayer; others refer to him as the Unknowable; to others he is the Ideal, their deepest self, or the Cosmic Consciousness; and each view "is supported with loud asseverations and mighty arguments." And yet, in the teeth of this admission, Dr. Orchard maintains that God is, at least, "a spiritual activity with whom we can have personal relationship and who can be incarnate in our personality." Personal relationship is possible only between persons, and, necessarily, to say that we can have personal relationship with God is to declare that he is a person, a declaration which, on Dr. Orchard's own showing, nobody is competent to make. We much fear that the famous divine is here guilty of "darkening counsel by words without knowledge." He has ventured beyond his depth, and is at the mercy of many contrary currents. He exhorts us to get "an increased sensibility to God." How shall we get it? "By meditation and laying ourselves open to the visitation of God." That answer is correct, and it lets us into the whole secret of personal religion. Without knowing in the least what God is, Dr. Orchard jumps to the conclusion that the term IT is obviously an inadequate description of him. Quite as obviously, then, God is a HE; and we are to arrive at a realisation of him as such by meditation. It is a perfectly simple and safe rule, and it never utterly fails. If you meditate upon God as a personal being he will certainly grant you a personal visitation in due course; but so will King Œdipus or King Arthur, or any other great fictitious character in literature, on precisely the same terms. Nothing in the world is easier than to get into personal relationship with purely imaginary beings if we are willing to pay the price. Martin Luther was in personal relationship with the Devil, and his Satanic Majesty paid him several memorable visits. On this point we are in complete agreement with the Presbyterian minister of Enfield. Religious experience is real, as real as that of any novelist who lives in a world of fiction. God used to be tremendously real at the old-fashioned Methodist prayer meeting, when the faithful deafened him with the thunders of their impassioned petitions. But the fact that God is real to ardent believers is no evidence whatever that he really exists. They think they can see him with the inward eye; but there is absolutely nothing to prove that he sees them or takes the slightest interest in their affairs. The reality is all on the human side; and surely Dr. Orchard will concur in the statement that the sense of reality enjoyed by devoutly religious people is no guarantee that there is any reality on the Divine side, or even that there is a Divine side at all except in their own minds.

Dr. Orchard has the temerity to think that he has found "the clue to the mystery of all the ages;" but, although we know that he is an exceedingly clever man, we are confident that he is mistaken. "The solution of existence" is not so easy of accomplishment as he seems to imagine. What is the fulfilment of human personality? Dissolution. We know of no other possible fulfilment. We do not even know what personality is; but we do know that, whatever it is, the time comes when it ceases to be. It fulfils itself only in the hour of death. Why we are here we know not; but, being here, our mission is to make the most and best of life while we have it. If this is religion, we are eager to be classed with the profoundly religious; but if religion means "a sense of connection with something higher than ourselves," then let us be put in the category of the notoriously non-religious. In Dr. Orchard's explanation of the term, we are not ashamed to publish it in Gath and to sing it out in the streets of Askalon that we have no religion at all. A hundred years ago even Dr. Orchard would have been numbered among the non-religious, and probably put to death as an enemy of the cross of Christ. On the one side of his nature he is an out and out Rationalist; but the Rationalism is rendered of non-effect by the undiluted mysticism on the other side. In his Rationalism we are heart and soul with him; but when he retires for refuge into the shadowy realm of mysticism, we are obliged to part company with him, preferring to remain in as close touch as possible to Mother Earth. We also beg to assure him that there is no unbroken testimony that nowhere except in religion have men found themselves at home. On the contrary, we are in possession of very ample testimony from men and women who never felt at home until they got rid of religion, but whose emancipation from the bondage of superstition has spelt for them "peace, power, purpose, that which alone can make life worth living."

When, therefore, a tract comes our way with the arresting title, "Personal Religion—Your Concern," we reply thus: "Dear Tractarian, you are really laboring under a vain delusion—religion is no concern of ours. We have outgrown it and left it behind. In your sense of the word, as well as in that of your more orthodox brethren, we are proud to be numbered among the large army of the non-religious, and to be engaged in a distinctly anti-religious propagandism. You yourself repudiate much of what our forefathers loved as the very truth of God; and the only difference between you and us is that our Rationalism has compelled us, not only to drop the dogmas of orthodoxy, but also to renounce Supernaturalism in all its forms."

J. T. LLOYD.

"Vital Lies."—II.

"You appear to think, as I used to think in earlier days, that mankind are rational beings, and that when a thing has been demonstrated they will be convinced. Everything proves the contrary. A man is a bundle of passions which severally use his reason to get gratification, and the result in all times and places depends on what passions are dominant."—HERBERT SPENCER. Cited in Moncure Conway's Autobiography, vol. ii., p. 409.

"Every step towards truth has had to be fought for, and there has had to be abandoned for it almost whatever otherwise human hearts, human love, human confidence in life are attached to. Therefore greatness of soul is required: the service of truth is the hardest service."—NIETZSCHE, The Antichrist; 1899; p. 323.

NOTHING is more disconcerting to the young—at least we have found it so—than, having discovered the falsity of a religious idea and replaced it with a truth, to find that other people, instead of receiving the proof with pleasure, receive it coldly and grudgingly—if they receive it at all. They wish to believe, and do not wish to be undeceived.

We have just noticed a case in point in the Saturday Review (Jan. 25), where Mr. Filson Young, the novelist, dealing with Mr. Maskelyne's exposure of Madame Blavatsky,* and, incidentally, with Indian magic, declares:—

> "I am sorry to have these great delusions destroyed for me.....I do not like to come near a thing which I have believed to be magic and wonderful, and find it tawdry and mean and insignificant.....To expose a thing is to rob it of its agreeable coloring, and lay bare its ugliness; and many people have a preference for the decent coverings being left on."

It is for these people who "Will to Believe" and do not wish to be undeceived in matters of religion that the books dealt with by Vernon Lee in Vital Lies are written.

Leaving Professor James, Vernon Lee deals next with the "Modernist" movement represented by

* J. N. Maskelyne, The Fraud of Theosophy Exposed. Our older readers will recognise that there is nothing new in this booklet. All the evidence in it, and a great deal more, appeared in this journal, and in two pamphlets by Mr. Foote, at the time of Mrs. Besant's defection to Theosophy.

Father Tyrrell. The Modernist movement, as our readers know, is the attempt of those Roman Catholics who, having an acquaintance more or less deep with the facts and hypotheses of modern science, and knowing the incompatibility of this knowledge with the traditions and dogmas taught by the Church of Rome, attempt to establish a right to believe in the demonstrated truths of science and yet remain in the Church, similar to the latitudinarianism of the Church of England, where little is required besides belief in God and conformity to the ritual.

In the part devoted to Father Tyrrell, Vernon Lee's writing is seen at its best; the style is not hampered by the necessity of tracking "ways that are dark and tricks that are vain," as was the case when dealing with Professor James. As Vernon Lee remarks, and the passage is an illustration itself of fine writing:—

> "After a course of Pragmastic theory, with its hurry to talk over; its shirking of conclusions and shifting of responsibilities; its words thrown down at random, revoked when convenient; its twilight of suggestion and occasional Sludge-the-Medium gesture of turning on the light and showing that there's no deception; after the jumbled metaphors of Dr. Schiller, the verbal slovenliness of Professor James; after that lack of logical structure which makes even M. Bergson's magnificent volumes like caverns, glittering with gems and ores, but viewless and without exit; after all that confusion of genius and shoddy, of ideality and hustle, the satisfaction inspired by this book of Father Tyrrell's* is almost moral, and is most certainly æsthetic. It is like the satisfaction felt in certain churches: the recognition that all is swept and garnished, well set ashlar and massive silver, fair linen and pure vessels; everything done and spoken without hurry or passion; with no audience save the One, whom the Initiate carries in his own consecrated hands." †

Father Tyrrell is abreast of the scientific thought of the day; religion itself he holds to be the result of evolution, and has no more supernatural origin than science, philosophy, or art. Religion, beginning in magic and discipline, in the course of ages evolved, or developed, a spiritual element denied by Father Tyrrell to the primitive magic from which it sprang. Moreover, he holds that the continued progress and ultimate survival of religion depends upon its adaptation to the progress of science, and stands in the same relation as medicine does to the chemical and biological sciences. In other words, if religion does not accommodate itself to the progress of science it will become entirely extinct.

> "Nor is this all," says Vernon Lee. "According to Father Tyrrell, the Founder of Christianity worked miracles only in the ignorant belief of men who did not even distinguish between natural and supernatural, because they had no conception of nature's regularity. Jesus did not rise from his grave and show himself to his disciples, but his disciples thought that he had thus risen."

Moreover—

> "Jesus was an uneducated and superstitious Jew, of the reign of Tiberius; his mind was incapable of certain views which are nowadays attributed to him; him, on the other hand, full of ideas which had to be revised as a result of his own death, and the non-fulfilment of his own prophecies. Jesus was not a moral innovator, since his morality was current both among the Jewish pietists and the Gentile philosophers of his day." ‡

We see by this that Father Tyrrell, a Catholic priest, had advanced far beyond the limits marked out by any of our tinpot Protestant sects, who look down upon Roman Catholics as superstitious image-worshipers.

Of course, there is a limit to Father Tyrrell's Rationalism, or he would have to proclaim himself an Atheist, or at least an unbeliever in Christianity. As Vernon Lee remarks, his thought starting on plain rationalistic lines, but "ever and anon running against that hidden centre of habitual and beloved beliefs, and against the need to believe in them which he finds in himself" (vol. i., p. 189). To the scientific evolutionist the Christian God, like the Christian Christ, becomes more and more shadowy as man's thought progresses, until at last it shuffles out of the universe altogether. But according to Father Tyrrell the Deity, having allowed man to struggle and fight his way upward through the laws of evolution, suddenly discovered man's dire need of salvation, and, about the year one of our era, revealed himself

> "in the province of Judea and through the miraculous mediation (we might almost say mediumship) of an ignorant and superstitious Jewish pietist, whose mind is, if possible, more incapable of grasping the divine reality than that of mankind as a whole, and of his contemporaries in particular." *

Then, again, we have the wholly irrational theory of good and evil:—

> "For some inexplicable reason this absolutely Good, Infinite, and Eternal is crossed in its own designs (or crosses its own designs) by the presence of what Man knows as Suffering and Sin. But this contradiction is set right by the divine arrangement of an after-life in which suffering is compensated, and sin either obliterated, if we have arrived at a humanitarian stage in the interpretation of symbols, or if we are in a previous stage—let us say the Dante or Pascal stage—thoroughly well, indeed eternally punished." †

These beliefs culminate in the direct communication—by means of prayer and the sacraments—between God and man. "But why," asks the Rationalist, "why did not Father Tyrrell carry his evolutionary science to its natural and logical conclusion, and dispense with the Deity and the supernatural altogether?" How are we to explain his partiality and fidelity to the Church of Rome? Vernon Lee supplies the answer: "Having arrived at the point where Father Tyrrell refuses to ask more questions, we must apply our further examinations, not in his company, but to his person." And the question immediately arises "What is this Modernist priest likely to have wished?" Thus, after a long circuit, we are back again at the Will-to-believe. ‡ That is what we found at the bottom of Professor James's philosophy—the Will-to-believe in an after-life in which everything will be set right, and the efficacy of the sacraments of the Church in this life.

It is in explaining this phase of the problem that Vernon Lee shows the keenest sympathy and insight. None but those who have themselves believed in these legends and undergone the mystical state of conversion can really understand the strength of these non-rational states of the mind. As our author acutely remarks:—

> "Religion is born not of Man's strength, but of his weakness.....Religion provides for the mortal want which cannot provide for itself; it promises more of whatsoever is stinted—more love, more justice, more life; the very promise arising from the felt insufficiency. The understanding and sympathy it brings is born of the loneliness of the lonely."

They want not only to love but to be loved:—

> "Religious persons require also community of feeling, or the illusion, the feeling, of community of feeling. They would, indeed, like to be the best-beloved child, but they also want other children, brethren, with whom to love in company. For human creatures feel insecure and lost by themselves. They require almost as much as light and bodily warmth the sense that others are thinking and feeling like themselves." §

Vernon Lee, who resides in Italy, describes her visit lately, during the twilight of a wintry afternoon, to some of the humbler churches in her neighborhood:—

> "The people who have stolen in one by one, barely lifting the leather door curtain, do not take heed of one another; and when each has sat or knelt down among the empty benches, he sees, in that gloom, only the mystic golden blaze of the altar and the vestments.

But they feel that they are not alone: They are side by side with unseen fellow-creatures stripped by this darkness of all vain work-a-day personality, reduced to mere similar souls, suffering or hopeful, human, with a common human need for sympathy or consolation; the human being in its weakness and sadness, the ghosts that lurk in all of us, but shrouded in the majestic impersonal forms of that church, of its half-visible aisles and arches. And even if custom blunt and leaves things scarcely noticed, there must be peace and rest and refreshment to be brought back from these places; the sense of those other men and women, unseen, nameless, and almost shapeless, who murmur or chant the same (even unheard) words of supplication or thanksgiving, must leave the certainty that there is brooding, like the dusky architecture, thinning out mysteriously like the distant altar, a great Reality who hears and answers" (vol. i., p. 255).

And if an unbeliever like Vernon Lee can enter into and sympathise with the feelings of these worshipers,—

"What must not be the longing for all this of one who has participated without suspicion of his own fancy's share; the longing for that certainty such as neither act nor the imagination brings—the certainty that this is not the illusion of the Creature, but the reality of the Divine."

We can only wonder that the Modernists have travelled "so far from the full, unreasoned acceptance of all these things which the poor human heart has fashioned for its comfort during the innumerable ages."

As Vernon Lee further observes, "Catholicism hinges not on doctrine but on Sacrament." Now, what the Modernists really wish to do is to get rid of the dogmas of the Church and retain the sacraments. But, as our author further points out, the soaring cathedral is built upon a foundation of alleged facts,—

"And if you pull up fact after fact, crumble one dogma after another into mere symbol, your edifice will speedily show rent after rent, and the day will come when it will strew the ground, as the pine-woods of Olympia are strewn with the column-drums of the temple of Zeus, which, in its day, was one of the seven wonders of the world."

And in the end Father Tyrrell's efforts were a failure, the Modernist movement was condemned by the Pope, Father Tyrrell himself was excommunicated, and died broken-hearted, not living long enough to see his book (Christianity at the Cross Roads) in print.

The Jumping Bible.

WITCHCRAFT IN A GERMAN VILLAGE.

THE efficacy of white witchcraft as a means of detecting evildoers was raised in the second Berlin penal court yesterday when an elderly woman named Adelheid Gebhardt, who lives in the village of Bohnsdorf, was charged with slandering a neighbor, the wife of the village barber.

Gebhardt has an old leather-bound Bible which she declares is enchanted. When a crime is committed in the village she takes the Bible in one hand and puts a huge, ancient key between the leaves, holding the ring end of the key in the other hand. She repeats an appropriate text and then asks: "Dear Bible, say who is the guilty person," meanwhile herself reciting the names of possible offenders. When the right name is uttered the Bible springs out of her hand and falls to the floor.

This method of detecting crime naturally caused considerable unpleasantness in the village. Recently Gebhardt missed some money. The Bible declared that the barber's wife was the thief. Gebhardt promptly denounced her, but in the absence of evidence the charge fell through. Gebhardt was then prosecuted for slander.

She showed the court how she established the guilt of the barber's wife with the Bible, which actually again fell to the floor when the accused pronounced the woman's name. The court, however, decided that one reason for the falling of the Bible was that Gebhardt's septuagenarian fingers could not hold it while she was reciting twenty names; also that unconscious reflex action of the nerves at the mention of a particular name had something to do with it. But in view of her obvious sincerity Gebhardt was let off with a fine of 10s.—Daily Mail (Feb. 3).

Acid Drops.

How the clergy and their friends hurried up to reap all the benefit they could from the death of poor Captain Scott. It was Christianity and the Churches first with them. They even got the King to go to St. Paul's Cathedral and figure in a Memorial Service. What the service was for, except to advertise the Church, was a puzzle. Was it to thank God for calling Captain Scott "home," or for not calling him sooner, or for sending the continuous severe weather that settled the fate of the three sound men hindered by two sick ones? We should be glad to have some sort of an answer to these questions.

Captain Scott himself does not appear to have been troubled very much with piety. There is only one religious expression in the whole of that brave and pathetic message he left for his countrymen and the world, written with the hand of death pressing heavily upon him. It is the expression about bowing to the decree of Providence. But this must not be taken too literally,—for he went on to say that they would still struggle to the last; which makes "Providence" more a fashion of speech than anything else.

"Captain Scott and the Gospels" was a pretty heading in the Daily Chronicle, which always comes out strong on these occasions. It appears that Mr. F. J. Cross offered to send copies of the Gospels for the use of the members of the expedition. We are not told why he did so. Did he suppose that Captain Scott and his companions were not likely to take any religious literature—not even a Bible or a New Testament? If that was the idea it is a tribute to the failure instead of to the success of Christianity. And Captain Scott's reply was not gushing:—

"Thank you for your kind offer. I gladly accept it to the extent of ten copies of each Gospel—more raises difficulty of weight and transport. Perhaps you will be good enough to arrange delivery as follows:—

"Books to be in a box with plain statement of contents on outside; to be addressed British Antarctic Expedition, 1910, East India Docks, and forwarded between May 1 and 14.

"These precautions are necessary on account of the proper stowage of the ship and the chance of unauthorised goods being sent to us.—Yours faithfully, R. Scott."

This seems to show that Captain Scott and his companions had made no provision for their own religious reading themselves. Nor did they want the Gospels en route. The place for them was with the luggage, in a properly secured box; where, for all we are told, they may still remain.

The inscription on the cross and cairn erected over the remains of Captain Scott and his two remaining companions found dead in the tent with him, ended with the text, "The Lord gave, and the Lord taketh away. Blessed be the name of the Lord." We are a wretched Freethinker, who only disbelieves the Bible because he does not know what is in it, but we felt certain the text was wrongly printed, so we turned to Job i. 21, where we found it printed thus—and it is the same in the Revised Version:—"Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." Job spoke in that manner over the violent death of his children. He was making a personal confession. He was not concerned about the theory that "the Lord taketh away" but about the practical truth that "the Lord hath taken away." The "gave" is naturally balanced by "hath taken." "Taketh" would balance "giveth." Either the memories of the men who buried Captain Scott failed them or they shrank from the plain "hath taken away" and found refuge in the generalisation "taketh away." But what is to be said for the pious journalists who let the misquotation of the Blessed Book pass without recognition?

The late George Bigwood, the well-known comedian, who died recently, was witty off the stage as well as on. He used to tell a good story concerning a benefit concert in which he took part. The organiser was a bigoted teetotaler, and, after the show, he said in the ante-room, "I am sorry, Mr. Bigwood, we cannot offer you anything to drink; but will you take an apple?" Bigwood had no desire to follow Adam and Eve so closely.

Some of Harmsworth's young men have been quoting Swinburne and Whitman in their references to the death of Captain Scott. When it comes to ideas Christians have to fall back on the Freethinkers.

probably, invoking the Almighty to bestow all the plagues of Egypt on the Emperor of all the Russias.

The Rev. A. J. Waldron is one of the vice-presidents of the British Federation for the Emancipation of Women. If this is a Suffragette organisation, the reverend gentleman must find it quite tame after the more vigorous propaganda of the Christian Evidence Society.

According to the Daily Mirror, the Rev. R. B. Exton, of Edmonton, said, speaking at a Suffrage meeting, "Until the word 'obey' is omitted from the marriage service, and women are put on an equality with men in that service, I shall decline to officiate at any more weddings." Is this to be regarded as a marriage-service strike?

The religious conspiracy against the mental integrity of children, known as "The Young Worshipers' League," is being energetically pushed by the British Weekly. The object of the League is to force upon children a "worshipful habit," so that when they are grown up they may become customers at some gospel shop or other. This is the real gist of the movement, and it is well to keep this plain fact before our minds. For ministers have been driven to form this League, not because children were less religious than they used to be, but because adults were staying away from church in increasing numbers. It is the grown-up clients they want, not the juveniles. And if clergymen could feel sure of the adult they would not trouble in the least about the child. The proof of this is, as we have already said, that not until the decline of adult patronage became serious did these traffickers in spiritual merchandise become seriously concerned about the child. For there is no immediate profit in making the child religious, that only comes when the child reaches maturity. The child is in the nature of an investment from which it is hoped to secure a handsome profit in the future.

In earlier times pressure of external forces secured a certain observance of religious forms by the adult. With current knowledge not in any violent and obvious conflict with religious teaching, the adult could give, at least, a passive assent to current doctrines. The child could, therefore, be let alone, and generally it was let alone. But, as the environment underwent a change, as the moral and mental life of the day became essentially antagonistic to religion, this was felt to be a dangerous policy. Something had to be done to protect the adult against the religiously corrupting influence of modern life, and it was rightly felt that the best way to do this was to so treat the plastic brain of childhood that it would be proof against change on reaching maturity. Hence the growing desire of priests of all denominations to practise the direct cultivation of religious habits in children, instead of depending upon the pressure of family and social life. The Rev. J. W. Butcher, one of the leaders of the movement, says it must be recognised as a truth of psychology that, unless a certain type of habit be formed in the pre-adolescent period, it will probably never be formed when the adolescent age is reached. This is all very well in its way, and no one would object to children being taught good habits. But it is not the cultivation of habits that these people are really aiming at. It is the implanting of doctrines, of beliefs, that is their real object. And they seek to implant these beliefs in the pre-adolescent period because they feel that otherwise the mature intellect would be sure to reject them. It is this to which objection is really raised. It is the deliberate exploitation of the helplessness of childhood in the interests of religious organisations that are afraid of the unbiassed adult intelligence which is going on. This is a point that Freethinkers should never lose sight of, and should take care that it is kept well in front of Christians.

At the funeral of Franz Schuhmaier, the Labor leader, of Vienna, which took place on Sunday, upwards of half-a-million people took part. Twenty-eight hearses were filled and covered with wreaths, and the procession extended four miles. It is significant that the clergy had no place in the ceremony.

"On one occasion, being asked to meet an Irish enthusiast who went about the country enlightening people's minds on the subject of Popish errors, Hartley Coleridge after dinner asked to be presented to the lecturer; and, taking his arm while the guests were gathered round, he addressed him with solemnity: 'Sir, there are two great evils in Ireland.' 'There are indeed,' replied the Irish guest, 'but please to name them.' 'The first,' Hartley resumed, 'is Popery.' 'It is,' cried the other, in emphatic acquiescence; 'how wonderful you should have discovered it! Now, what is the second great evil?' 'Protestantism,' was Hartley's reply in a voice of thunder, as he ran away screaming with laughter."—Liverpool Post.

Rev. William Stacey, of Charing, Kent, left £21,913. He is wintering in a place where there is no cold weather.

"England has ceased to be Christian," said Father Benedict, C.S.S.S., speaking at Chelsea. We wish this were true, but much regret to have to confess that there is a considerable quantity of Christianity still with us. Father Benedict declines to be cheered even by the fact that his own Church showed an increase of worshipers in the recent Liverpool census. He asks, plaintively, "What is the increase of a few hundreds compared with the tremendous loss and abandonment of all faith on the part of the rest?" We quite agree, however, with Father Benedict that there is a steady movement "away from God," and that this is "not the frenzy of a moment, but the steady tramp of a whole nation away from God." And we find pleasure in reflecting that this is only part of a still wider movement—the march of the human race from superstition to reason.

The early Christians believed in a community of property. Lingering traces of this belief may account for the fact that hotel managers place framed texts in their premises "The proprietor is not responsible for any articles left in the bedrooms."

Some of the clergy are clamoring for the multiplication of bishoprics. If the proposed "Fathers-in-God" are to be as handsomely rewarded as the present holders, we can quite understand the cause of the excitement.

The editors have been making headlines about a case in which a man had three wives. What a chance the scribes would have had if they had lived in the Holy Land in the days of Solomon!

Religion is not so brutal as in the days of yore. In old times the ladies who kicked over the matrimonial traces were stoned. This happens to-day; but the stones come from Bond-street.

The Pope is mourning the loss of his sister, Signora Rosa Sarto, who, the newspapers unkindly state, was unable to write. It is a popular failing in Catholic countries.

The Salvation Army's "Self-Denial" Week commences on February 22. It is being preceded by a week of prayer. Of course, the prayers are being well advertised, and the public are informed that the Lord will be asked to move their hearts to give liberally to the Army. The honest way to hold a week of prayer for this purpose would be to pray in secret, and only tell people afterwards. But the Army is too "slim" to work on this plan. It prefers to let the religious public know that it is praying to the Lord, so that genuine believers will feel impelled to back up the Lord's credit by giving; and the Army may even feel that, by making the prayers public, they are putting God Almighty on his mettle, and compelling him to support their efforts. An organisation that continuously supplies newspapers and journalists with laudatory accounts of its own work, and then reproduces these as independent testimony to the value of the work it is doing, is not likely to be caught napping. And there is always the stupidity of the British public to fall back on.

Everyone is familiar with the Christian pose about the non-existence of Atheism. Some Christians have kept this up so long that they believe in it themselves, and with the number of Atheists growing larger each year, will solemnly assert that there used to be Atheists in the time of Charles Bradlaugh, but they are now extinct. We are reminded of this by a remark of "Claudius Clear" (Sir Robertson Nicoll) in a recent issue of the British Weekly. He says, "There used to be persons who went about the country making public attacks on Christianity, but they seem somehow to have disappeared." If the assurance is really needed, we can inform Dr. Nicoll that he is quite under a delusion, and the propaganda of Freethought on the platform is still carried on under better conditions than it was ever carried on before. Of course, the newspapers do not report these meetings—or, at least, they do not often report them—but non-reporting and extinction are not quite the same thing. Sir Robertson says the attack on belief is carried on by books and papers, and he admits that "many attacks on belief are formidable by reason of the knowledge and power and sincerity of their authors." Well, it is something to have even this much recognised. Presently, maybe, Sir Robertson Nicoll may realise that the attack on religion is considerably more powerful, more scientific, and, therefore, more potent than it was thirty or forty years ago. At the risk of being thought egotistical, we venture to say that there is no other movement in the country, religious or non-religious, that carries behind it the same weight of brains and ability that is to-day at the service of Freethought.

Every minister ought to properly understand the mind and temper of his congregation; and we may assume that the Rev. W. Patterson, of May-street Presbyterian Church, Belfast, understands his congregation thoroughly. In a little magazine, The Greeting, issued from the church, Mr. Patterson gives a number of reasons why his congregation ought to subscribe to the Foreign Missionary movement; and, knowing the spiritual spring of Christian conduct, he lays chief and first stress on the fact that it pays as a commercial investment. He writes:—

> "When John D. Rockefeller was convinced that mission work in the Foreign Field would likely lead to an increased use of oil, he contributed a large sum to the cause, and from his standpoint he was right, for to-day hundreds of thousands of barrels of oil are being used in China since that sleeping nation woke up, and she was first roused from her slumbers by the missionary trumpet. What is true of oil is true also along other lines of merchandise. For example, in the same nation at the present time there is a wonderful demand for European clothes and for British commodities. Every shilling our country has contributed towards evangelising she has brought back to our treasury twenty shillings in return.....Every person who reads and does a little thinking on the subject is well aware that the Christianising, which includes the civilising of heathen nations, pays a hundred per cent. even on this lower level of the financial and commercial."

Of course every thinking Christian knows it pays, otherwise he would not support it. The missionary movement is the advertising agent for the trader, and both are the advance guard for the soldier. It pays the good Christian to see that the native's appetite is aroused for British commodities. If we can supply him with cotton goods, rum, and shoddy manufactures of various descriptions, why should we not do so? Whether the Chinaman or negro is the better for our trading is quite another question. He is Christianised. And as Mr. Patterson well says, for every shilling we give to send missionaries abroad we get twenty shillings in return. Christianising the native pays. Mr. Patterson does not say that it pays the native. But it pays the Christian at home, and that is the all-important aspect. As for civilising—well, the notion that a Belfast Presbyterian parson could civilise anything is one that could only find lodgment in the brain of a lunatic.

The Mormon missionaries have been active at Southend-on-Sea lately, and the local Free Church Council is up in arms. The latter has not the same financial interest in Brigham Young as in Jesus Christ.

Gerhart Hauptmann's The Fool in Christ has just been published in English by Methuen. We should turn the title the other way round.

Rev. Lionel Lewis, Vicar of St. Mark's Whitechapel, presents a fresh view of the atrocities perpetrated by the Balkan Allies. If they are true, he says, the Turk has no right to complain. If Christian regular troops have done these unchristian things it is the result of centuries of education by Mohammedans! This is the first time we ever heard that Christians needed lessons in cruelty. Perhaps the reverend gentleman will tell us who taught it to Alva, Torquemada, Louis XIV., or even the present Czar of Russia. We might also inquire what Mohammedan or other model is imitated in the English organisation for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. We have always understood that this Society is an original effort of Christian genius. Has not Mr. G. R. Sims been telling us lately that it is only in Christian countries that such a Society is necessary? We should like to hear from Mr. Lewis again.

One of the prisoners in the Paris motor bandit trial has the name "Dieudonné." Another better-known criminal who bore that title was his Catholic Majesty, Louis XIV.

The police are making "further inquiries" about the eloping Vicar of Hunslet. Why not let him be? Is it such a luxury to pursue a bad egg? We should hesitate to get within a mile of such a Christian product.

The connection between Atheism and suicide was once more illustrated by Frederick Albert Phillips, who threw himself over the Dover cliffs. A Bible was found in his pocket with passages underlined in red ink. Clearly an Atheist!

A religious census at Reading shows that one in thirteen of the inhabitants attends church regularly. This takes the biscuit. Christianity is getting on in Reading.

The Bishop of Oxford has been discoursing on "The Religion of the Poor." Is he an authority on that subject? We thought his income was several thousands a year.

WATER FROM THE ROCK.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In times like the present, when many highly respectable Christians are very busily engaged in trying to explain the Biblical miracles on the basis of natural phenomena, perhaps a little experience of my own might be usefully added to their efforts.

From 1881 to 1885, I served in the Egyptian Light Camel Corps and took part in the dash to Khartoum in the attempt to rescue Gordon.

One night we encamped at a place called Jackdrill (Jackdaul) Well. On looking for the well in order to refill my water bottle, I found a rocky hill over 150 ft. high, instead of a muddy pool, as was usually the case. In the side of the hill, about 6 ft. from the ground, a pipe had been inserted, from which gushed forth a constant stream of water. Feeling rather curious, I climbed to the top of the hill and found, to my surprise, that the mass of seeming solid rock was hollow and formed a huge, natural reservoir.

Some days afterwards, I got into conversation with an interpreter, and mentioning the peculiarity of Jackdrill Well, he explained the matter to me.

In that particular district, rain falls but once in about six years, but when it does rain the downpour is tremendous. Some of it is caught in this natural cavity, and the thickness of the sides, combined with its depth, prevents the heat of the sun from evaporating the water thus accumulated.

Now, when I had received this explanation, my mind immediately flew to the alleged miracle of Moses, when in the desert he struck a rock in order to find water for the clamoring children of Israel. It is a moot point whether Moses ever existed, but might not the story be founded on some hocus-pocus trick of a wily old medicine-man of long ago.

Such an one, knowing of the existence of a well of this description, might have easily obtained a cheap reputation as a miracle monger by striking the rock, which had previously been weakened by artificial means on the spot struck. Naturally, the water would gush forth, and the pious multitude of that day would swallow the miracle as eagerly as they swallowed the water.

H. HUMPHRIES.

Jove nods, we have been informed, and God, or whoever is the author of the Bible, has a poor memory. We don't look for mistakes in a deity who is perfect, and for this reason we fear that a very imperfect God inspired the Gospel of Matthew or the book of the Acts, or both. In Matthew we read that Judas repented of having betrayed his master, Jesus, and "went and hanged himself," but in the first chapter of the Acts we are told by Peter that Judas "purchased" a field with the reward of iniquity and "falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst and all his bowels gushed out." We should prefer to cut down Judas rather than pick him up, but, if he hanged himself, then Peter is up to his old tricks. If God inspired Matthew, who inspired Peter? The discrepancy in the two accounts of the end of Judas does not prove that "every word of the Bible is true," as some Christians claim.—Truthseeker (New York).

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, February 23, Queen's (Minor) Hall, Langham-place, Regent-street, London, W., at 7.30, "Captain Scott and Providence."

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £40 18s. 4d. Received since:—Juliet and Julian, 7s. 6d.; Mrs. and Mrs. James Neate, £1.

MR. AND MRS. JAMES NEATE, sending their annual subscription to the President's Honorarium Fund, wish they could send ten times as much, and trust "to have the honor of subscribing" for many years yet.

J. B.—Tuesday is too late for paragraphs. May do for next week. Mr. Foote is much better now.

W. STEWART.—Shall be sent. Thanks.

W. P. BALL.—Thanks for cuttings.

G. BRITTAN.—We are much obliged.

A. C. WYKES.—Swinburne's poems (not including the dramas) are published in six volumes at 5s. each. It is ridiculous that there is not a cheaper collected edition. Songs Before Sunrise is published separately at 7s. 6d. we think.

B. D. WINLAND.—Will look into it and write you.

JOSEPH ALWARD.—Sorry to hear that the Christian Esperantists (bless them!) have made a dead set at Dr. Stromboli as an Atheist and brought about his resignation.

T. HODGSON.—Clearly a case of confused memory after a great lapse of time. Thanks for cuttings.

W. LOVETT.—We cannot let a political discussion be started in our columns. Article writers will indulge in incidental observations now and then, which must not be allowed to become themes of debate.

GEORGE RENNIE.—We are a bit tired, as probably our readers are, of these "remarkable" faith cures. We will take them up again when we have recovered. Pleased that you regard the Freethinker as "the one paper for fruitfulness and intelligence." We think your opinion of the "Acid Drops" is widely shared.

WILLIAM STOKES.—Accept our best thanks.

E. B.—Much obliged for cuttings.

W. DAVIDSON.—Glad you heckled the St. Pancras candidates so effectively.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

The President's Honorarium Fund.

To the Freethinkers of Great Britain.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN, January, 1913.

We the undersigned renew our appeal on behalf of the above Fund.

Its object is to relieve Mr. G. W. Foote—President of the National Secular Society, Chairman of the Secular Society, Ltd., and Editor of the Freethinker—from financial worries that would prevent his devoting himself entirely to his work as leader of the militant Freethought movement in this country.

During previous years Mr. Foote has actually had to pay money out of his own pocket to sustain the Freethinker, besides doing all his own work on the paper without any remuneration whatever. We are happy to have his assurance that this state of things has improved. He has no longer to make up a deficit, but the slight profit from the increased circulation of the Freethinker is only sufficient as yet to treat the contributors a little more liberally.

This is the sixth year of the President's Honorarium Fund. We suggested that £300 might be raised in this way annually. During the first two years it was nearly raised, the third year it was fully raised, the fourth year it was exceeded, owing to a special donation of £50 from Mr. John Helm, of Canada, since deceased. Death has, indeed, been busy with the larger subscribers during the last year or two—such as Major Harris, Mrs. Donaldson, Mr. George Payne, Mr. F. Smallman, and Mr. Horace W. Parsons. Nevertheless, the Fund for 1912 only lacked some £20 of the total, which has been made up by a generous American supporter. It is evident, therefore, that Mr. Foote must have gained new friends to balance the (financial) loss of old ones.

All subscriptions received have been acknowledged week by week in the Freethinker, and will continue to be acknowledged in that way.

Subscriptions for 1913 can be forwarded to the undersigned. Those who prefer to do so can send, as before, direct to Mr. Foote himself at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Subscribers who do not wish their names to appear in print should state how they wish their subscriptions to be acknowledged.

It would be pleasant if the bulk of the £300 could be raised in the first few months and the balance before the close of the summer.

Yours faithfully,

Mr. Foote's subject at Queen's Hall this evening (Feb. 23) will be "Captain Scott and Providence." It will enable him to say many things on Christian efforts to "justify the ways of God to men."

Mr. Foote was suffering from a bad cold last week end, contracted no doubt during the wretched foggy weather of the previous week. He was unable to fulfil his engagement at Queen's Hall on Sunday evening, but Mr. J. T. Lloyd kindly came to the rescue and delivered a fine lecture on the same subject, though with a different title, to a very appreciative audience, which was an improvement on the previous Sunday's. Mr. Lloyd was much applauded, being in his very best form.

The Secular Education League's annual meeting takes place on Tuesday evening, March 11, at 7.30 in Room 18, Caxton Hall, Westminster. It is hoped there will be a good attendance of members. A public meeting will follow at 8.15, with Mr. Halley Stewart in the chair, and Mr. George Greenwood, M.P., Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., Mr. G. W. Foote, and the Rev. Walter Walsh, D.D., in the list of speakers.

The Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws is organising a demonstration in favor of its objects, which will take place at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, on Friday evening, March 14. The chair will be occupied by the Rev. S. D. Headlam, if the County Council elections do not interfere with the arrangement. The list of speakers includes Mr. S. W. P. Byles, M.P., Mr. George Greenwood, M.P., Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner, Lord Harberton, Rev. Copeland Bowie, Sir Hiram Maxim, and Mr. G. W. Foote. We invite our London readers to help make the gathering a great success.

London Freethinkers should heckle their London County Council candidates on the question of the attempted new policy of refusing permits to bonâ-fide Societies to make collections, as of old, in connection with meetings conducted by them in the Parks and other open spaces under the Council's control. A number of advanced bodies, including the London Trades Council, the National Secular Society, and several Socialist organisations, are resolved to maintain the old right of collection if possible. The Parks Committee has evaded this question for months, and declares now that the matter must be left for the new Committee to settle. The fight, therefore—if it must be a fight—has to wait till the new Committee meets.

The Bethnal Green Branch holds its "Tea and Social Evening" at the King's Assembly Hall, Cottage Grove, Mile End, on Sunday evening, March 2, with Mr. C. Quinton as M.C. Tickets, 1s. each, are obtainable of Mr. James Neate, 385 Bethnal Green-road. District Freethinkers are invited to patronise this function. They will enjoy it. By the way, the tickets for the dance are only 6d. each.

The Birmingham N. S. S. Branch is going to present a token of appreciation to Mr. James Partridge, its honorary secretary, who has held the office for a quarter of a century. "He has managed our affairs," the Committee say, "for that long period in such an effective yet unassuming manner, that he has won, and retained, the goodwill and respect of all members and friends." Subscriptions are invited and should be sent to Mrs. Annie Bolt, 68 Brougham-street, Lozells, Birmingham. Mr. Partridge must have many frinds outside the Midlands capital who would like to share in this tribute to his character and services to the Freethought movement. We are having our own name entered on the roll.

The Rationalist Peace Society's annual meeting passed the following resolution: "This meeting of the Rationalist Peace Society has noted with grave apprehension the recent speech of Lord Herschell in the House of Lords, in which, speaking as a representative of the Government, he favored the idea of compulsory military training in secondary schools; the meeting strongly condemns any attempt to introduce any form of compulsory military training, or service, of men, or youths, into this country, and trusts that public opinion will be strongly expressed against such a proposal."

The Edinburgh free-speech case reported at length in a late issue, has attracted a good deal of attention in the Scottish press. The Daily Record leading article is particularly outspoken. The heading of "Bumbledom in Scotland" is itself striking. We quote the following passage with pleasure:—

> "The Bumbledom that exists in Scotland is one of the most depressing features of the national life. Pettifogging authorities are everlastingly issuing proclamations interdicting people from obtaining refreshment on Sundays, however much they may need it, or invading other public amenities in the spirit of the days of the Inquisition. Scotland is bailie-ridden. Its people are shepherded and driven by magistrates, police, and presbytery. They hardly dare open their mouths in the streets, and it seems to be a criminal offence to be hungry on the Lord's Day. Public places seem to be no longer the possession of the people. They appear to have passed into the hands of the magistracy. In the eyes of the magistrates, the average citizen is a potential criminal, a trespasser upon the public thoroughfare, and if the estimable gentlemen who write J.P. after their names had their way we should not be allowed out after dark unless furnished with a police pass. And if we had the misfortune to be hungry we should be put into a police cell and admonished. It is very singular that the people of Scotland do not rebel against the magisterial and presbyterial tyranny. These juntas appear to be perpetually conspiring to diminish the sum of human enjoyment, and where it will end nobody knows. We have passed from the domination of the Kirk under the joint domination of Kirk and Justice of the Peace, and the change does not seem to be for the better."

We should like to see a good deal more of such plain speaking. It is as much wanted in England as it is in Scotland. The press is the slave of the authorities.

Would we have known that a man existed in the world if we had not seen his body? Have we any knowledge of man except that which has come through man's existence on the earth? Has a man any experience which he acquired in some other sphere prior to his advent on earth? If human souls exist independent of human bodies, where and how do they exist?—Truthseeker (New York).

The Jesus Legend.

La Légende Chrétienne, Auguste Dide. (Paris: 1912. Ernest Flammarion; pp. 254; 1 franc).

IN this useful book, so admirably adapted for propagandist purposes by reason of its short, crisp chapters and the simple ease with which the exposition of the Christ Legend is expounded, M. Auguste Dide delivers a frontal attack upon the religion which has Jesus as its central figure, and the obfuscation of the human intellect as its prime object. Courage, thoroughness, and deep erudition are the characteristic traits of this wise and wholesome piece of drastic criticism of the creed that had for its origin the belief in the resurrection of a corpse and a childish faith in the early reappearance of a reanimated dead Jew as vengeful judge in the clouds of heaven. Leaving on one side the historicity of the resurrection, we know that Jesus has failed, during nearly two thousand years, to redeem "his" promise to revisit the glimpses of the moon. Illusion, imposture, or folly; these, apparently, have been the determining factors in the causation of the primitive Christian beliefs concerning the miraculous life and posthumous apotheosis of the pale, mysterious phantom that flits through the Gospels but escapes the verifying grasp of the historian. In M. Dide's view, the historic personality of Jesus remains a problem enveloped in impenetrable doubt, and the twenty brilliant chapters of this, his latest work*, review in detail the elements of mystery and incredibility that form the fabric of the Christian Legend.

Chapter I., entitled "Did Jesus Exist?" introduces the damning inquiry by recalling the hypocritical attitude towards Christianity of Chateaubriand, Napoleon, and the then contemporary Pope, Pius VII. A few years before Chateaubriand wrote his pietistic Genié du Christianisme, he was, if not an Atheist, a pronounced anti-Christian. This fact is clear from what he wrote about God, the soul, and Jesus Christ at a time when religion was at low water in France:—

> "God, matter, and fatality [he said] are but one This is my system, and this is what I believe: All is chance and fatality in this world—reputation, honor, and virtue itself; how then can we believe that we are guided by an intelligent God?"

As to Jesus, he wrote "that it is by no means demonstrated that there ever existed a man called Jesus who was crucified at Jerusalem" (Dide, p. 12).

And yet it was this aristocratic unbeliever who subsequently dedicated his Génie du Christianisme to Napoleon, then First Consul of the Republic which, later, he strangled. Napoleon at that time had made his immoral peace with the Church, having brought her in in aid of his nefarious plans of empire and domination. For all that, the Corsican prodigy no more believed in Jesus than in Osiris, and he only reimported religion into the political life of France for the furtherance of his vast ambitions. His case is a striking illustration of the cynical attitude of rulers, statesmen, and tyrants generally towards religion. Usually without stable convictions, and ready at any time to barter them for dynastic ends or for the high purposes of statecraft, they are astute enough to enlist God into their service and to utilise his priests, their soporific doctrines, and their terroristic influences in aid of the army and the police.

M. Dide cites two characteristic views of Napoleon about the historicity of the Jewish peasant whose religion he re-established in France by means of the Concordat. First, we have this revelation, culled from the Journal de Saint-Hélène, in which General Gourgaud kept a record of the religious and philosophic opinions of the great conqueror: "As for me," he says, "my mind is made up; I do not believe that Jesus ever existed." And then, this other jewel:—

* I dealt with M. Dide's great book on Servetus in the Freethinker of December 27, 1908, and January 24, 1909.

> "At Milan [said Napoleon] I took an original manuscript of Josephus' History of the Jews, in which one could see between the lines some words speaking of Jesus, for Josephus makes no mention of him. The Pope worried me a good deal in order to get possession of this manuscript" (Ibid., p. 17).

Evidently the Pope believed in Christ—as a profitable fable not to be endangered by the publication of a compromising manuscript.

When we pass from the dark region of historic doubt which surrounds the alleged personality of Jesus to the evangelic records themselves, the obscurity that envelops the misty figure of the Nazarene becomes deeper and more perplexing than ever. The Gospels are not the biographies of a real Jesus, but apologies for, and glorifications of, a supernatural and miraculously divine ideal God-man. They are but the echo of various oral traditions—"the tradition of many traditions." It is evident from the discrepancies, omissions, and additions appearing in the evangelic documents that fresh biographic supplements, new hypotheses, and legends transformed by faith into realities, sprang into acceptance and became embodied in the growing text:—

> "Additions were introduced in conformity with the spirit of the time. The new facts were created by the process of affirming them. Thus the Church was engaged in a perpetual production of discourses, evangelical sentences, and miracles, until the time came when, all control being impossible and the prospect of serious verification having evaporated, the Church—that is to say, some anonymous reunion of the faithful—marked its preferences for the apologies which have come down to us, and brought about their acceptance to the exclusion of all the rest."

M. Dide very acutely remarks that if the facts that thus grew into the life of Christ escaped control, it is clear that the sayings were not likely to enjoy a more discriminating scrutiny. Who was at hand to gather the uttered words? There were no stenographers in those days to take down these improvised speeches. Some of the more important declarations of the Christ were made solely to one individual, who sometimes, as in the case of the Samaritan woman, is presented to us as a person devoid of intelligence. Where, then, are the guarantees of authenticity, or even of probability? No wonder the Holy Ghost was invented as the infallible sponsor for the veracity of these astonishing documents.

This very story of the Samaritan woman only appears in the neo-platonic Gospel attributed to John. The fourth Gospel quite evidently represents in literary form the new departure impressed upon the narrow exclusivism of the early Christians by the universalistic movement typified or represented by the Apostle Paul—Paul, who seems to know surprisingly little about the Synoptic Jesus, and, indeed, only presents him to us as a resurrected man who had lately ascended to God and was soon about to appear with glory in the clouds of heaven. The opening words of the Johannine romance creates a new Christ. John knows nothing of the Holy Child, the lowly stable, the sordid environments of the early poverty which invested the Synoptic Jesus; he takes his hero—Christ—back to the beginning of time; locates him at the dawn of creation with God himself, and makes him, indeed, the fountain of life and light at the beginning of all things. As we witness "this fog of phrases" which settles on the opening verses of John, and as we notice how the haze and obscurity continue right through the theological romance, till the closing verses speak to us of Christ's inexhaustible verbosity and of his rich full life which all the books that ever were written could not contain or record, it is abundantly clear that fiction and not fact forms the substance of the Johannine story. The extravagant chemistry involved in the miracle by which water was instantaneously converted into 480 litres of wine—better stuff than the original tipple on tap when the wedding feast first began—should quite suffice to put this Gospel into the category of religious romance.

Dide's chapter on the "Sermon on the Mount" is valuable as showing that the maxims and sentences of which the alleged Sermon is composed are the result of diverse influences anterior to the date ascribed to Jesus. Nothing essential is to be found in the Sermon that may not be discovered in the ancient Biblical writings. M. Dide tells us that the historian, Joseph Salvador,* in his book, Jesus-Christ et sa doctrine; H. Rodrigues,† in his study on Les Origines du Sermon sur le montagne; Leopold Dukes,‡ in his dissertation, Qu'est ce que le Christianisme a pris du judaïsme? and Joseph Cohen,§ in his Deicides, have shown by incontestable citations that the commands of charity, meekness, and religious submission—the tout ensemble and all the details of the moral teaching of the New Testament—are nothing more than the transcription of certain parts of Jewish teaching. The saying which Rousseau places in the mouth of the Vicaire Savoyard: "Never man spake like this man," is thus nothing more than a phrase mouthed by an ignorant rhetorician.

If any reliance is to be placed upon the evangelical portraiture of Jesus, it is clear, amidst much that is doubtful and uncertain, that he held the belief that the end of the world was at hand, that it would happen in the lifetime of his generation, that he would come from heaven with angels blowing loud trumpets in order to plunge the wicked into a fiery furnace, and that the normal functions of sun, moon, and stars would be deranged and the cosmos generally upset as the theatrical accompaniment of the dire event. The existence, then, of Jesus can only be admitted, as M. Dide very properly insists, on the condition that we accept him as the deluded victim of a self-glorifying hallucination. Strauss has already remarked that there would never have been a Christian Church without the belief that the return of Christ to judge the earth was imminent. M. Dide justly insists that the peculiar morality taught by Jesus can only be understood in the light of that fantastic belief. In fact, Christ's ultra-mystic doctrines find their appropriate and logical explanation in an absolute contempt of every sane rule of life, framed on the principle of the perpetuity of social existence and based on the humane as apart from the divine organisation of communities. Here, too, is the key to the self-renunciatory position occupied by Jesus and his disciples, with their rejection of the family and personal property, and their insistence upon religious contemplation, celibacy and poverty, together with their detachment from all considerations as to labor, marriage, or the political and social organisation of society. The chapter dealing with this crucial aspect of the Jesus Legend is a very full and convincing exposure of the fallacies of ethical infallibility that cluster around the hazy figure of the Gospel hero.

Step by step, and chapter after chapter, M. Dide takes the reader through legend after legend woven around the mystic miracle-worker of Roman Palestine. He makes it clear that Messianic textual suggestions in the Jewish writings and the doctrinal necessities arising out of new controversies with Jews and heretics, created the ideal figure that looms so mysteriously in the Christian conscience throughout the ages. A trifling, but suggestive instance of the growth of ideas concerning Christ is set forth in the chapter on the transformations during many centuries of the physical personality of Jesus. The Messianic declaration in Isaiah xliii. having stated that the Christ would be ugly—like a leper, without grace and without beauty, as the Vulgate puts it—Jesus began his legendary career as a man void of beauty, of diminished stature, and with vulgar mien. The idea is traced through Eusebius, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, St. Cyprian, and all the old ecclesiastical writers. Later on, the Byzantine Church insisted on the material ugliness of the Christ. Ages passed, and then a new physical ideal was formed; Jesus became the beau ideal of human beauty, and artists and writers completed and fixed the metamorphosis

But I must linger no longer over these delightful pages, and plunder no more from the rich stores of criticism and learning with which these chapters teem. This conscientious study has already been translated,* together with others of M. Dide's works, into Spanish, and I should be glad to see an English translation spreading the light far and wide in the dark places. M. Dide is a fine writer, a staunch and cultured Freethinker, who has labored in many fields of historic investigation on behalf of Rationalist ideas, and has won a high position amongst contemporary exponents of advanced philosophic ideas.

Senor Moret.—In Memoriam.

THE death of Senor Segismundo Moret removes from Spanish politics a respectable and respected statesman. He had filled the highest positions in the State, having been Prime Minister, Leader of the Liberal Party, Leader of the Spanish Bar, President of the Ateneo (Madrid), and, at his death, President of the Cortes. He replaced Sagasta as chief of the Liberal Party, and, in that capacity, alternated with the now execrated Maura in the enjoyment of the pride and profits of political power according to the see-saw system in Spain, under which, the Conservatives went out after a time to let the Liberals in, the Liberals in their turn vacating the reins of power in favor of the Conservatives. Moret succeeded Maura when the indignation of Europe hurled that religious hyena from power. In the ordinary course of Spanish affairs, the death of Canalejas would have paved the way for a new lease of Maura and murder for religion's sake; but the Ferrer case and a dread of the revolution that would have supervened on the resumption of power by the Chueta of Majorca†, has closed for ever the evil system under which the two orthodox political parties divided the spoils of the nation. From that point of view, if from no other, Ferrer's blood was not shed in vain.

My friend Lorand has paid a tribute of homage to Moret's memory, a note of which deserves to be recorded. Lorand declares that before Moret's resignation — brought about by a Court intrigue planned and carried out by Maura—Moret was on the eve of bringing about the restitution of Ferrer's property. During the remainder of his political career he not only supported Canalejas, known to be favorable to Ferrer's cause, but interested himself in Lorand's efforts to obtain the restoration of the confiscated property, and aided and assisted towards that end to a considerable extent. No one knows better than M. Lorand how deep is the debt of gratitude due from Ferrer's friends to the late Spanish statesman. To have wrought service for justice in the company of such a distinguished and capable man is not the least amongst the compensations with which one's sacrifices for right and truth are sweetened.

† The Chuetas (numerous in Majorca) are the descendants of the converted Jews in Spain, and were hated and despised by the Spaniards of reputedly pure race. The Chuetas were compelled annually, on various occasions, publicly to eat pork. Maura's gastronomic preferences are not known except that, unmindful of the persecutions and outrages suffered by his race, he meanly prefers to herd with the Catholics with wolfish appetites for the flesh and the blood of unbelievers.

A Pioneer Schoolmaster.

"Lofty designs must close in like effects."
—ROBERT BROWNING.

A SCHOOL in which Ingersoll's works and other Freethought publications are used, and on the walls of which hang portraits of Bradlaugh, Foote, Ingersoll, Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Whitman, and other Freethought worthies, suggests an educational establishment of the future rather than one of to-day. Yet, about an hour's journey from London, such a school has existed for the past ten years, and the constantly increasing number of scholars testifies to the efficiency of the education imparted. The principal of the school is a man in the full prime of life. He is an ardent and enthusiastic Freethinker, and an earnest social reformer, and is full of a high and unflinching courage. As a schoolmaster, he may have his peers; he can scarcely have any superiors. He is among schoolmasters of to-day what Dr. Arnold was at Rugby in the schooldays of Judge Hughes. Animated with the idea of the high nature of his calling, he throws himself into forwarding the physical, mental, and ethical development of the boys and girls under his charge; and the growing popularity of this centre of education gives evidence of his success, and of the coming triumph of Freethought. Like his famous prototype, he aims at training the children so that they are a credit to his system and a gain to the country in which they live.

In the course of an interview with the principal some interesting details of the work at this unique school were gleaned. "Nature studies," said the head-master, "are a feature. During the summer months weekly rambles are arranged, and the scholars journey to the heart of the country or to the seashore, and learn to read directly from Nature's 'infinite book of secrecy.' A short walk or train journey is usually sufficient; but once a year we go to London and visit the Zoological Gardens and the Natural History Museum. On our last trip Sir E. Ray Lankester, F.R.S., was interested in the young visitors to the museum. Daily talks form another part of our educational program. These range over a variety of subjects, principally scientific, historic, and biographic. Birthdays of great or famous men and women are honored. Quite recently Darwin formed the subject of an address; and a host of well-known names have been used in this connection, from Bruno to Bradlaugh. Ingersoll's works are largely used for dictation, especially his oration on Shakespeare and the famous address on Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child. Other books used are F. G. Gould's Children's Plutarch and Brave Citizens. Dennis Hird's volumes on Evolution are also favorites; but Ingersoll is easily first in the children's affection."

In reply to the question as to mixed classes, the principal continued: "Yes! boys and girls sit together, and the tuition is precisely the same for both. So far as physical culture is concerned, the Sandow system is in use. We have succeeded with the mixed classes, for experience has shown us that the girls become more self-reliant and the boys more amenable and courteous. Science is taught to all, and every scholar has a sound knowledge. Even the youngest children know the star groups and the fundamentals of science."

The school itself is a model one, and most pleasantly situated close to the sea and the open country. The class-rooms are examples of neatness and order, and the dining-room and dormitories well in keeping with the general order that reigned throughout. There are day-scholars and boarders, and the relationship between the principal and the pupils is of the happiest. Indeed, the prevalent impression is the absence of restraint; the whole school is simply one happy family of boys and girls, and the teaching staff foster parents. Questions are freely invited, and every opportunity is given for the development of individuality in the scholars. The critical faculties are kept alert. One day the scholars will be told the story of Richard III., and maybe on the next day that of Socrates. Then they will be asked to contrast the two personalities. This is but an instance of how unconventional is the work at this school. Another point worth emphasising is the absence of corporal punishment. Discipline is maintained by moral suasion, and the radiant happiness of the pupils is a perpetual proof that the newer and higher methods are so far an improvement on the barbaric methods of Wackford Squeers and Dotheboys Hall as the Himalayas are superior to Highgate Hill.

In a wholesome world the boy must always throw back to his barbaric ancestors; there should be a touch of barbarism left in the young man. There is not much to be said for the little boy who does not admire sport and physical culture. With this idea, manly exercises are encouraged among the pupils, and in the eager air surrounding the salt gates of the sea the scholars grow famously. Illness is unknown among the pupils, and not a single case of serious sickness has taken place in the school since its foundation. The girls take a lesser amount of exercise and play the pleasantest games. Above all, both sexes have a proper amount of that social and literary activity which is delightfully necessary to the complete life of cultivated young citizens, who are destined to herald the dawn of a new era, and who are responding to the calling bugles of Liberty.

As we left the building, the fresh, young, childish voices were repeating in unison, "The time to be happy is now; the place to be happy is here; and the way to be happy is to make others happy," and we fancied that the large portrait of Ingersoll upon the walls smiled approval. Certainly, the great American's influence is not waning when his winged words lend inspiration to budding manhood and womanhood. Dead, he remains a living force by the nobility of his writing and the consistency of his example. Freethought, too, is undeniably spreading when parents can be found in sufficient numbers to entrust their children to the charge of a schoolmaster whose teaching ignores the "lie at the lips of the priest." In the ripe years when Freethinkers will get their rightful share of the inheritance of the world's wisdom, such schools will be multiplied through the length and breadth of the land. It will form a fitting sequel to the work of such men as the principal of this school, modest as he is brave, whose quiet but unshakable adherence to his own high ideals of liberty is typical of the best of the race of Freethinkers. It may be only in little ways or obscure that we may perform our part, our efforts may never be recognised, but such action forms the highest and most perfect tribute to the ennobling ideals of Freethought.

MIMNERMUS.

A Renegade Parson.

IF Laurence Sterne lived in the present day, his writings would probably adorn the pages of this journal.

Like the poor, he is always with us, either in the form of fresh biographies or new editions; in whatever manner he is presented, we find that his little excursions in the broad fields of humanity are ever marked with success.

Although his sentiment may ring false occasionally, we can readily forgive him, and, as Freethinkers on the lookout for good in everything, we can enjoy and appreciate the graceful writings of one whose heart was in the right place.

A keen student of emotions and an observer of mankind's faults, it was only natural that his generous judgment should fail to find a congenial reception in the narrow purview of the Church.

Most of his sermons seem to undervalue the worth of religion—for a parson; and this, along with a defect in speech, did not win for him the approbation of his brother clerics.

To judge from his exquisite effusions, a terrible God and a fiery hell would be as superfluous as stage thunder to a Garrick. He could well afford to dispense with theatrical matter of that kind.

Well do we remember the painful pilgrimages to church two or three times each Sunday as a boy; better still do we recall the wondrous inspiration which our worthy vicar received from those three sources—God, Death, and Hell. By a priestly Prospero these were the spirits summoned; and, with the exception of one or two hardened churchgoers, they would never fail to keep the congregation awake. We have too much respect for Sterne to compare him with the ordinary modern country vicar, hated and despised by the intelligent few and worshiped in ignorant awe by the feeble-minded many.

But it certainly stands to his credit that, despite position, he refused to rattle the dry bones of superstition, and chose instead to embellish his books with those human touches which make him so lovable.

In reading his numerous works we cannot fail to be struck by the rich fund of secular philosophy they contain.

Dealing with such diverse subjects as Death, Slander, Enmity, and Wisdom, he discards the Divinity, and chooses to speak of the philosophy of life rather than speculate about man's relation to God.

In A Sentimental Journey the description of his encounter with a monk soliciting alms is delightful in its self-analysis.

With an absence of acrimony, although the monk's religion differ from his own, he refuses to give, but not without serious after-thought that he had used the votary of St. Francis unkindly.

Later on Sterne has ample opportunities to make amends; the pair exchange snuff-boxes, and all's well that ends well.

Such small acts of courtesy well became this agreeable author's character.

His individuality was too powerful to be imprisoned by the Church; and in choosing the world as his parish, through the medium of his books, none will regret that he preferred this to the obscurity of a country vicarage.

Whilst not being openly a sceptic, his works have more of an earthly flavor than otherwise, and contain much that is now advocated by Freethought.

He died in poverty at the age of fifty-five. Perhaps if hypocrisy, that sure talisman to wealth, had been ingrained in him, affluence might have robbed us of one who can be read and appreciated by anyone, whatever their creed may be.

Shakespeare's luminous remarks in Hamlet truthfully apply to the gayer side of Sterne's life. The gadflies of slander were busy before and after his death; but, considering that this treatment is always meted out to any souls who dare defy the conventions, we are not surprised.

That a lesser light such as the "son of Yorick" should miss what befell Shelley at a later period is inconsistent with the history of those salacious-minded gentry whose loftiest ambition is that of pointing out spots on the sun. If Laurence Sterne hovered in the twilight between scepticism and expedient orthodoxy, we, as Freethinkers, regard him no less as a man who gave the world his best, and bequeathed to us some of the noble qualities which enlarge the vision of Humanity.

WILLIAM REPTON.

The parable of the Prodigal Son has made prodigals. It has made a lot of dead-beats think themselves better than honest, respectable people. If life's rewards are to be given to those who have wasted life's gifts, what is there for those who have kept themselves clean and moral? A story of a prodigal's career without a prodigal's shame is a poor lesson for humanity. But the truth is greater than parables, and the moral son is the only one to get the reward of clean living.—Truthseeker (New York).

"Habits that enslave" wreck thousands—young and old Fathers fail, mothers are "bed-ridden," babies die. Family feuds, marital miseries, divorces—even murders—All can be avoided by self-knowledge, self-control.

You can discount heaven—dodge hell—here and now, by reading and applying the wisdom of this one book of 1,200 pages, 400 illustrations, 80 lithographs on 18 anatomical color plates, and over 250 prescriptions.

OF COURSE YOU WANT TO KNOW WHAT EVERYONE OUGHT TO KNOW.

THE YOUNG—How to choose the best to marry.
THE MARRIED—How to be happy in marriage.
THE FOND PARENT—How to have prize babies.
THE MOTHER—How to have them without pain.
THE CHILDLESS—How to be fruitful and multiply.
THE CURIOUS—How they "growed" from germ-cell.
THE HEALTHY—How to enjoy life and keep well.
THE INVALID—How to brace up and keep well.

Whatever you'd ask a doctor you find herein.

Dr. Foote's books have been the popular instructors of the masses in America for fifty years (often re-written, enlarged) and always kept up-to-date). For twenty years they have sold largely (from London) to all countries where English is spoken, and everywhere highly praised. Last editions are best, largest, and most for the price. You may save the price by not buying, and you may lose your life (or your wife or child) by not knowing some of the vitally important truths it tells.

Most Grateful Testimonials From Everywhere.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

VOL. XXXIII.—No. 9 SUNDAY, MARCH 2, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Abstinence from low pleasures is the only means of meriting or obtaining the higher.—LANDOR.

Captain Scott and Providence.

CAPTAIN SCOTT'S manly message to the world in general, and his own country in particular, was worthy of himself, his companions, and the cause in which he died; although there is no need to go into hysterics over it as so many clergymen and journalists have done, as if nothing worthy to be set in comparison with it existed in human literature. Had the hired speakers and writers been less sentimental and more sagacious they would have noticed that Captain Scott himself avoided all sentimentalism. There is no spontaneous religious expression in the whole of the document. The reference to "Providence" is merely formal. The dying explorer admitted that they would have to bow to the will of Providence, but he added that they would still struggle to the last—which is not exactly what a Mohammedan understands by "Kismet." It seems pretty clear that "Providence" meant little more to Captain Scott than the course of events.

There was far more piety in the address of Lord Curzon as president of the Royal Geographical Society on Monday. His lordship said that Captain Scott's "last thoughts were of his comrades, his last praise for them, his dying wish to impute no human blame, but to accept without a murmur the inscrutable decrees of Providence." This is a rhetorical elaboration of Captain Scott's words. But his lordship improved even on that. He expressed a personal hope that the explorers' remains might rest where they are, that "their bodies may be left where they lie, with the snow as their winding sheet, the eternal ice as their tomb, and the solemn Antarctic waste as the graveyard in which it had pleased God that they should sleep." Lord Curzon's rhetoric is good in its way, but it is still rhetoric. It does not represent the frame of mind of the dying explorers. Their thoughts were naturally about their honor in the eyes of their countrymen, and the future of those who were nearest and dearest to them at home. We do not suppose that they troubled themselves for a single moment as to what would become of their dead bodies. Men in such a situation would be quite careless of that problem. It would only exercise minds at leisure, with no personal interest in the matter. Lord Curzon was, to some extent, talking to shine; otherwise he would never have thought that the explorers' dead bodies could be removed if God had settled that they should sleep amidst the desolate scenes where they died. Captain Scott made but one formal reference to the Deity in the presence of death. Lord Curzon, as a comfortable spectator of the tragedy, plays with the subject in the most approved style of "eloquence."

One is bound to ask why there is so much talk about the tragedy of Captain Scott's death if "Providence" settled it—if it happened as it "pleased God." If it was settled by "Providence" there was no accident whatever, and a great deal of Captain Scott's last message, as well as of Lord Curzon's speech, was a waste of paper and breath. What is the use of talking about adverse conditions, unforeseeable difficulties, and incalculable dangers, if the circumstances were the details of a divine design? Napoleon was beaten by the armies of the wind and snow. Captain Scott, though on a different expedition, was beaten in the same way. There is no luck in nature, but there is luck to man, whose mind cannot read the secrets of futurity—and the luck was against the gallant explorers. That is why they perished.

Some religious people assert the principle of general Providence, and deny the doctrine of particular Providence. They ask us to believe that God arranges everything in general but nothing in particular. But this is incredible. It is even absurd. It is a self-contradiction. We hold with John Wesley that there cannot be a general Providence without a particular Providence. Generals do not exist of themselves. They are the sum total of particulars, which alone have any real existence. Whiteness is only the name of a quality in which all white objects agree; whiteness is only their common characteristic. And the general providence of God on earth is made up of, and is another word for, the particular providence of God on earth. Providence, in short, must be particular, or it is no Providence at all. Limiting providence is like explaining a miracle. Both disappear the moment they are rationalised.

A particular Providence seems to have been in the minds of the search party who found the dead bodies of Captain Scott, Dr. E. A. Wilson, and Lieutenant H. R. Bowers in the tent where they drew their last breath through half-frozen lips—and erected a Cross and Cairn over their remains, with an honorable mention of another member of the South Pole party Petty Officer Edgar Evans; the memorial to Captain Oates, that "very gallant gentleman," being erected some twenty miles further south. After the record on the larger memorial the burial party added a Bible quotation: "The Lord gave, and the Lord taketh away. Blessed be the name of the Lord." Evidently they had no Bible with them, in spite of their piety, or they might have turned to the text and got it right in the inscription. Job was the speaker; his wealth had gone, his children were all killed,—it was a particular providence by which he was afflicted. He was not thinking of religious theorems but of his own dread loss. His resignation to the divine hand was also particular. "The Lord gave," he said, and "the Lord hath taken away"—not "the Lord taketh away." "Blessed be the name of the Lord" came after that. It was all leading up to the "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him."

Not even the clergy, who were in such haste to do a stroke of business for themselves in the memorial service at St. Paul's, have the courage to present the old doctrine of Providence in its naked horror. They dare not say that God deliberately killed Captain Scott and his companions. Ill luck did it, and God only permitted it—just as he permits everything else that happens. It suffices nowadays if God has a look in. His functions are uncertain but he must not be omitted. He is to be praised when things happen favorably, and not blamed when they happen unfavorably. But what a God is this!

The Religion of Disease.—III.

FASTING, as a religious practice, is too well known for it to be necessary to do more than call attention to its widespread character. The significance of the practice is well expressed by Tylor:—

> "So long as fasting is continued as a religious rite, so long its consequences in morbid mental exaltation will continue the old savage doctrine that morbid phantasy is supernatural experience. Bread and meat would have robbed the ascetic of many an angel's visit; the opening of the refectory door must many a time have closed the gate of heaven to his gaze."

So long as we are dealing with the lower races this will be questioned by neither the serious investigator nor the fervent Christian. It is when we approach the religious beliefs and practices of later times, and attempt to apply the same principle of interpretation throughout, that a different theory is advanced. Thus, a missionary, contemplating the methods of a medicine-man, remarks:—

> "It always appeared probable to me that these rogues, from long fasting, contract a weakness of brain, a giddiness, and kind of delirium, which makes them imagine that they are gifted with superior wisdom, and give themselves out for physicians. They impose upon themselves first, and afterwards upon others."*

This is shrewdly said, and is a good example of the readiness with which religionists recognise the obvious when recognition does not clash with their own prepossessions. The difficulty for outsiders is to discern any line of demarcation between ascetic practices as causes of spiritual illumination among savages and these among religious devotees in civilised countries. So far as one can see, the only distinction is that among savages the method is simple and open. With people who are in other respects on a higher level of culture the method is concealed among a number of attendant circumstances.

As a means of intensifying the sense of religious illumination, fasting is only one of many kinds of self-torture. Professor James confesses that:—

> "Even more perhaps than other kinds of genius, religious leaders have been subject to abnormal psychical visitations. Invariably they have been creatures of exalted emotional sensibility. Often they have led a discordant inner life, and had melancholy during a part of their career. They have known no measure, been liable to obsessions and fixed ideas; and frequently they have fallen into trances, heard voices, seen visions, and presented all sorts of peculiarities which are ordinarily classed as pathological. Often, moreover, these pathological features in their career have helped to give them their religious authority and influence."†

Here, at all events, is a plain admission of the truth for which these articles are contending—that a large part of what has passed, historically, for proof of the truth of religion, and which has served to an enormous extent to perpetuate religion, has been nothing more than disease misunderstood. It is an admission that in religious ecstasy we have, to quote Dr. Maudesley's phrase, neither theolepsy nor diabolepsy, nor any other lepsy, in the sense of the possession of the individual by an external power. All that is there is a psycholepsy. Dr. Granger, dealing with this aspect of the question, says that "the religious genius is not proved to be morbid by the extent to which he diverges from the average type."‡ Quite so; but the reply quite misses the point. For it is not a mere divergence from the average type that warrants one in saying that much that passes for religious illumination is pathological in character, but the degree to which it is possible to affiliate certain types of religious exaltation with what are admittedly cases of disease when they occur out of connection with religious belief. Both Dr. Granger and Professor James simply stand as examples of how completely men will overlook the obvious in their desire to find a footing for religion. Thus, had Professor James applied his scientific knowledge to religious experience, he would have been compelled to interpret the cases cited in his volume in terms of the "Medical Materialism" he is continually jibing at. Instead of this, he devotes best part of his book to an endeavor to discover the point at which these abnormal experiences impinge on a "hidden reality." And to all these attempts one need only put the decisive query, "In what way are the visions of a religious person, admittedly of an abnormal disposition, subject to fits of melancholy, to hearing voices, seeing visions, and presenting 'all sorts of peculiarities ordinarily classed as pathological,' in what way are the experiences of such a person differentiated from those hallucinations that are admittedly due to the influence of disease?"

Let us take as an example one of James' own cases, which he admits is "distinctly pathological," but without allowing this admission to disturb his belief that he, too, came into touch with a supersensual world. The case is that of Suso, a fourteenth century mystic. As a young man he wore a hair shirt and an iron chain. Later, he had a leathern undergarment studded with 150 brass nails, points inward. To prevent himself throwing off this dress at night he had made a pair of leather gloves studded with tacks, so that if he attempted to unclothe the tacks would penetrate the flesh. Next, he had made a wooden cross, with thirty protruding nails, to emulate the sufferings of Jesus. He procured an old door, and without covering, slept upon it. His feet became full of sores, his knees were dropsical, his body scarred with the horsehair, his hands trembled. During twenty years he fed scantily upon the coarsest food, slept in the most uncomfortable places, and during the whole of the time never once took a bath. One is not suprised to learn that as a result of these practices visions were vouchsafed him. No "Medical Materialist" would be suprised at that—he would only be surprised were it otherwise. He would only ask, in what respect does this case differ from those which can be frequently met with amongst savage races? Surely the sight of the Virgin or Jesus in the one case, and of the tribal ghost in the other, does not amount to a substantial difference.

In the case of Catherine of Siena the austerities began still earlier. At six years of age she flogged herself and saw visions. At seven she practised fasting. For years she slept but an hour or two every day. Santa Teresa, as a young woman, prayed to God for an illness, and describes how she remained for days in a trance, during which her tongue was bitten in many places. She was also subject to sudden attacks, during which, she would remain in the same attitude in which she was overtaken. All was, of course, due to the direct action of God.* St. Paul, Professor James admits, "certainly had once an epileptoid, if not an epileptic, seizure." All that one need add is, that it was this once that gave him the experience which led to his conversion. Mary Magdalene, the first who brought tidings of the resurrection, had been delivered of seven devils—that is, was either an epileptic or an insane subject. Martin Luther's visions, etc., may, on the strength of his own description of the symptoms, be traced to a neuropathic source. John Bunyan's nervous disorder is attested by the fearful dreams and visions he had while a boy, and by the voices heard in later years. George Fox, the founder of the Society of Friends, describes how, in the middle of winter, when approaching Lichfield, "the word of the Lord was like a fire in me." And, as he went through the streets, "there seemed to me to be a channel of blood running down the streets, and the marketplace appeared like a pool of blood." Reflecting on the meaning of the vision, he remembered that "in the Emperor Diocletian's time a thousand Christians were martyred in Lichfield. So I was to go without my shoes through the channel of their blood in the market-place, that I might raise up the blood of those martyrs which had been shed above a thousand years before."

The classical example of the creation and strengthening of a sense of divine communion by the methods above noted is found in the annals of monasticism. For several centuries every conceivable torture of mind and body was practised in the name of religion. Ignorant, superstitious, believing that they were surrounded by demons, the monks by their habits and mode of life supplied all the conditions of hallucination; with the result that a large part of the annals of monasticism read more like the records of a lunatic asylum than a page from the history of civilised humanity. "Religious teachers," says Francis Galton, "by enforcing celibacy, fasting, and solitude have done their best towards making men mad, and they have always largely succeeded in in inducing morbid mental conditions among their followers." *

The important thing to remember is that the history of religion is continuous. From the savage onward there is no break. Commencing with a simple but inevitable blunder, the initial error is perpetuated throughout the ages. First, we have the observing of the conditions under which intercourse with the spiritual world is believed to occur, and then the re-creation of these conditions for the sake of resuming the assumed communication. And when increased knowledge has robbed actual disease of its supernatural character, we have the same plan of misinterpretation of normally healthy human qualities. In the main, this is the position to-day among the more advanced communities. It is the social and moral qualities that are now chiefly exploited in the interests of supernaturalism. Learning nothing from experience, our "mystical" and "advanced" theologians babble of the social and moral qualities of man in exactly the same strain as the primitive savage talked of actual disease. He does not, or will not, see that the same principle of explanation holds throughout. Just as research in pathology has tracked the supernatural into its most obscure retreat in the workings of the most complex mechanism in the world, so research in the general nature of man will detect beneath the modern consciousness of a spiritual world no more than the normal feelings, ideals, and aspirations of humanity. The scientific study of religion does not bring man into contact with God. Its effect is to bring man to an understanding of himself, and thus realise the conditions that gave all the gods their being.

"The Four Toll-Bars."

IT sounds extremely blasphemous for a Christian to declare that, in his religion, God has reached the end of his tether; or in other words, that Christianity represents the utmost that the Almighty can do for the world; or, in the elegant language of the Bishop of London, that herein "God has shot his last bolt." The inference from this is, that in Christianity we find God at his highest and best, so that if he fails here, he fails absolutely and finally. Christianity makes heavier and costlier demands upon Deity than any other religion the world has ever seen. As a popular preacher once said, the Cross of Calvary presents the impressive spectacle of God with his coat off, at work on, giving the last, supreme touch to, the masterpiece of the Universe. But Christianity is unique, not only for its phenomenal demands upon Deity, but also in its exceptional exactions from man. Its very first order to the latter is to make an immediate and complete surrender of himself. He is solemnly summoned to hand himself over to the Lord Jesus Christ as his slave, or property, for the rest of his life. He is nevermore to do a single thing on his own initiative, but everything as commanded by his Lord and Master. He has neither intellect, will, nor heart of his own. He no longer lives; it is another that lives in him and uses him for his own purposes. The surrender is complete. Not only the person of a believer, but his property as well, is claimed by the Redeemer. Both he and his are holy unto the Lord. If we take the Sacraments of the Church we shall see this principle in full operation. This is how Mr. W. Carew Hazlitt, of the Inner Temple, puts the case:—

> "Baptism, Confirmation, Marriage, and Interment are four stages in our career, where the ecclesiastical arm intervenes for our supposed good and salvation. It is a species of quadrilateral, of which the sides are betraying some signs of an inclination to yield. Baptism, which is an adroit step to secure us all in advance, before we can have a voice in the business, has itself produced a volume of controversial literature sufficient to form a lifelong study for anyone disposed to lay out his time in such a manner. The broad issue has always been of course between Infant and Adult baptism: but nothing can be more certain than that as a saving process one is as efficacious as the other—it is the certificate alone which possesses any practical or other value" (Man in Relation to God and a Church, p. 61).

As a matter of fact, infant baptism has been of incalculably greater service to the Church than adult, because from the moment of its christening the child belongs to the Church and is a citizen of heaven. When the parents and godparents appear before the font they are informed by the officiating clergyman that all men are conceived and born in sin; that our Savior Christ has said that none can enter into the kingdom of God except through the door of baptism and regeneration; and that God the Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ, is prepared to grant to their child "that thing which by nature he cannot have," which thing will be conferred upon him in the rite of baptism. The sooner baptism takes place the better in every way, because unbaptised children, if they die, go to hell, and are not entitled to Christian burial. It is impossible to overestimate the amount of worldly wisdom involved in the sacrament of infant baptism. If a child is to be secured for the Church, the earlier he is taken in hand the better. Though too young to take any vows upon himself, the first possible moment is seized to impress upon him the solemnity of the vows made on his behalf by others. In the Catechism he is taught to repeat day by day that his name was given him by his godfathers and godmothers in his baptism, wherein he was made "a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven." Then he is instructed to describe what his godfathers and godmothers then did for him, thus:—

> "They did promise and vow three things in my name. First that I should renounce the Devil and all his works, the pomps and vanity of this wicked world, and all the sinful lusts of the flesh. Secondly, that I should believe all the Articles of the Christian Faith. And thirdly, that I should keep God's holy will and commandments, and walk in the same all the days of my life."

The next question put to the little one is, "Dost thou not think that thou art bound to believe and to do as they have promised for thee?" And naturally the child answers in the affirmative. "I heartily thank our Heavenly Father," he is taught to add, "that he hath called me to this state of salvation, through Jesus Christ our Savior. And I pray unto God to give me his grace, that I may continue in the same unto my life's end." The system is so perfect that it would be difficult to suggest any improvement upon it.

"Confirmation," Mr. Hazlitt observes, "may be regarded as a sort of corollary to the christening formula." Until quite recently practically all schools were under the wing of the Church, and religious instruction filled a large portion of the curriculum. In addition confirmation classes are conducted by the clergy, at which the children learn to regard themselves as heaven's favorites, whom God has accepted and forgiven for Christ's sake, and who are now set apart for a distinctly Christian life. At confirmation they formally ratify and confirm the promises and vows of their godfathers and godmothers, and acknowledge themselves bound to believe and to do those things which were undertaken for them at their baptism.

Is it not incontrovertible that children thus brought up are almost sure to become loyal members of the Church? Would not something like a miracle be required to make them renounce the Christian Faith? A born Freethinker marvels greatly that anybody can be so simple as to believe in God, Christ, and the Church; but to a young man or maiden duly trained on ecclesiastical lines nothing is so inconceivable as unbelief. The recent formation of the League of Worshiping Children among the Free Churches is an acknowledgment of the truth that the future of Christianity is dependent upon its being crammed down the throats of little children before they acquire the art of thinking. The leaders of all the Churches are now fully aware that unless they win the children before they arrive at years of discretion their profession is doomed. They know that to think is to doubt, and that doubt naturally leads to denial.

After Confirmation, in most cases, comes marriage, which the Church declares to be a sacrament, "instituted of God in the time of man's innocency, signifying unto us the mystical union that is betwixt Christ and his Church, which holy estate Christ adorned and beautified with his presence, and first miracle that he wrought in Cana of Gallilee." Mr. Hazlitt says:—

> "The assumption of control over the ceremony of marriage, and its admittance among the sacraments, by means of counter-balancing the civil plea, was a consummate piece of strategy on the part of the early hierarchy. The civil law said, and still says, 'This is a civil contract'; the canon law said, and says, 'But if you wish to appear respectable, and to be received into genteel society, you must subscribe to the dual form; we will accommodate you by allowing you to sign the book in the Vestry instead of going to the Registrar.' The latter demands a shilling; the clergyman looks rather sourly at you if you do not give him a good deal more—he is not shy or proud. Besides, it is an offering to the Church, and he is Cashier and Book-keeper, he says" (Ibid., p. 63).

The attitude of the Church on the subject of marriage is perfectly scandalous; and must be held responsible for the major portion of the immorality that obtains in Christendom. She looks upon divorce, under any circumstances, as contrary to the law of God; and she resolutely sets her face against any reform of the marriage laws, with the result that in this country we have now two marriage laws, that of the Church, which the clergy call Divine, and that of the land, which the clergy denounce as being of the Devil. Of course, in the long run the law of the land will be so modified as to be recognised as the law of Nature, while the law of the Church will be remembered only as an unwholesome dream of the times of ignorance and superstition.

Equally irrational and degrading is the attitude of the Church on the subject of death. Believing in the resurrection of the body at the last day, she has persistently opposed the idea of cremation as an anti-Christian heresy. Consequently, our cities and towns are full of cemeteries which have been and are sources of corruption and infection; and within them is found something worse even than physical infection, namely, the accursed spirit of sectarianism, which has divided them into "consecrated" and "unconsecrated" sections. Was ever anything more ridiculous or more monstrously cruel and inhuman? Happily, however, to the non-religious, to the convinced unbeliever, "consecrated" and "unconsecrated" are unmeaning terms, terms of religion which he has left behind, while the multiplication of crematoriums enables him to dispose of his dead in a much saner, wholesomer, and less repulsive manner.

It is very gratifying to learn that the Church is steadily losing its hold of mankind. Thousands of children are now being brought up without any religious instruction whatsoever; and when they arrive at years of discretion the wonder of wonders for them is that there are any Christian believers in the world. In their estimation nothing can be more absurd than the popular belief in God and immortality. When they come to be married the services of the parson will be cheerfully dispensed with, the brief and simple ceremony at the Registry Office being amply sufficient for them. For them, too, death has lost its sting, being looked upon more as a friend and deliverer than an enemy. They are freed from the cramping prejudices and depressing superstitions of their ancestors and most of their neighbors. They are content with being the children of the earth, happy in their birthright, thinking only of life and how to utilise it to the best advantage, and being quite ready to die when the time comes. They can say, with Mr. Hazlitt:—

> "We happen to have educated ourselves up to a loftier standard of thought and knowledge than the bulk of those around us. The benevolent and worshipful representatives of Jesus Christ, titled and untitled, can, however, only at best intern us, point the invisible finger at us, send us to Coventry. Is it not something that they have had their wings clipped and their talons drawn to this extent?.....We stand on an equal footing with the most exalted in worldly station of our adversaries and deceivers, and can meet them everywhere in the field openly and securely" (Ibid., p. 73).

Missionaries and Mrs. Grundy.

SOME time ago I wrote an article in the Freethinker (July 14, 1912) on the awakening of Freethought ideas in the minds of the natives of Madagascar, and I pointed out that the Malagasy Rationalists were waging polemical warfare with the missionaries. I now learn of an excellent piece of propaganda by the Madagascar unbelievers in retaliation upon the Catholics, who, this time, are being hoist by their own petard. It appears that the Congregations had circulated the report that the well-known French work, Voyage humouristique à travers les religions, by a French judge, Monsieur N. Simon, is only made up of lies written for the special purpose of turning the Malagasy away from the Catholic religion. Of course, this is a Christian lie, which, luckily, is not likely to abound to the glory of God. For the missionaries had not taken into account the energy and determination of the valiant Freethinkers in Madagascar. In order to pulverise the mendacious tactics of the holy men of God, a Madagascar Freethinker, M. Razanamahery, the General Secretary of the Société mutuelle des Amis Laïques, has undertaken the translation into the Malagasy tongue of the wise and witty publications of M. Simon. The first volume of the Voyage humouristique has already appeared, and the translation, with its 125 pages, is on sale at the price of 30 centimes. Evidently the half-baked Christians in the great African island are going to have some fine fun at the expense of the Christians in general and the Catholics in particular. I also learn that another Madagascar Freethinker, M. Rajaona, a native inspector of primary education, and therefore a French Government official, has just translated the excellent pamphlet, La Bible expliquée, written by our good friend, Eugène Hins. Evidently the Madagascar Freethinkers are going to keep the paunch-bellied missionaries on the run.

M. Simon's useful book, which is now increasing the gaiety of the Malagasy, consists of two volumes, and forms part of the popular "Collection A. L. Guyot."* Every page of the volume is freely peppered with facts, arguments, and analogies drawn from the study of the non-Christian religions and philosophies. M. Simon, whose book has already been translated into Italian, makes no pretence to originality or profundity. His main idea is to present the case against Christianity in a light, bright, and amusing manner, without any of the ponderous affectations of solemnity that are so dear to the heart of many modern critics of Christianity. As he says, there is no need to dock one's language with crape when dealing with the death rattles of a decrepit religion.

The fact that in France a Judge, a Doctor of Law, and, consequently, a man of social position, like M. Simon, comes out boldly in the advanced ranks of Freethought advocates, and writes with unsparing pen against the whole doctrinal paraphernalia of Christianity, from the idea of God down to the most modern developments of sacerdotal puerility, is the sign (as our author declares) that the old beliefs are dying, and that the struggle between science and the religions that sprang out of the Bible is approaching its end. More than ever, the resistance offered to the modern spirit by religion is a matter, not of conviction, but of convention. What are the soul-throbs of Mrs. Grundy, the innermost religious certitudes nestling in the vacuous mind of the average middle-class paterfamilias? In both cases the manifestations of religion are, for the most part, only the social badges of a blighting—I had almost said, a blithering—respectability. Of all the false gods ever foisted upon human credulity the most empty-headed of them all is the god "Respectability." Before this shrine Judge Simon refuses to bow with the obsequious deference of the conventional flunkey, and by that gran rifiuto which some modern Dante will yet have to sing, he sets his compeers a good example.

But the good example is not only put before us by this witty but judicial writer: it is, perhaps, more daringly shown by the enterprising publisher. The two volumes of M. Simon's Voyage humouristique form respectively volumes 851 and 852 in the Guyot collection. In England, popular publishers who are out to make money on their publications and to maintain the capricious favor of the big crowd of their patrons, would never risk their popularity or the forfeiting of their "respectability" by including in their list such an audacious piece of flat and flagrant "blasphemy" as the Voyage. Such temerity would spell ruin in England; or, at any rate, the fear of commercial disaster would limit the publisher's opportunity for the exercise of an intelligent hospitality to the out-and-out heretical thinker.

I do not pretend that the Voyage is a work fully abreast of modern criticism, or that its erudition, as, for instance, its reliance upon the Christ and Chrishna theories of Jacolliot, is always well-founded. Nor do I claim that these volumes, sold at the cheap rate of twopence each, are models of typography. But I certainly claim that these little tomes of pungent Biblical criticism, with their twenty-seven chapters ranging through all the heights and depths of Christian dogma, form one of the most readable and entertaining samples of satire and refutation in the whole run of Freethought literature. In about 800 pages M. Simon writes an enormous number of witty epigrams at the expense of the doctrines and dogmas of Christianity. The puritanic severity of the English language, which no longer assumes the blunt directness of a Dean Swift, would shrink with terror from the winged shafts of satire which fly with such deadly force in some of these chapters, and our bashful Briton, with the fear of Mrs. Grundy before his eyes, would, perhaps, translate some of these daring but legitimate flashes of wit by blushes and asterisks. I understand that the Malagasy translator will not labor under these censorious conditions, but will render with unemasculated energy the virile thought of his author.

WILLIAM HEAFORD.

That Wretched Goat.

"ONCE a year," said my host, as we sat in his bungalow at Poona, "a goat dies in my garden."

I waited inquiringly.

"You see a tree over there, with a few rough stones placed about its roots?"

I saw it.

"Well, it is sacred. Nobody knows why. Perhaps a Hindu saint was buried there generations ago, and the tree, or a tree that preceded it, was hallowed by his memory. The tree stands in my garden, but the pious souls hereabouts enjoy a prescriptive right to worship at this spot. Sometimes, I find at night a little earthenware lamp laid and lit under the tree. And, as I said, once a year a man comes with his friends, and they bring a goat as a sacrifice, and the wretched goat is killed in honor of the dead worthy."

The stones at the foot of the tree, I noticed, were daubed with red paint, as a symbol of the blood which gods and ghosts thankfully receive.

If an intelligent goat could write a book, he could put together a very interesting, though not very edifying, history of the connection between religion and the animal world. If he were descriptively and statistically inclined, he might portray a vast procession of oxen, sheep, goats, pigs, horses, and camels, over which hover immense swarms of birds. He would roughly calculate the number of sub-human creatures slaughtered for love or fear of Heaven, since the days of Primitive Man to the year 1918. He would then conclude his learned treatise:—

> "In the name of mercy, I ask, Why should this vast procession have been sacrificed? Were the worshipers any the better for the holocausts? Even supposing the gods existed (and from modern researches conducted by my literary and scientific colleagues in the human species, the question is a very open one), surely they could not be justified by seeing their own creations flung bleeding at their footstools? Nor could we goats be expected to become very willing subscribers to creeds which disembowelled us in the name of the just and holy Gods. If it should come to my turn to be offered up under the tree at Poona".....

The rest of the agonised reflections had better be omitted.

Christian apologists genially assure us that their religion abolished the sacrificial slaughter of lambs, doves, etc. But they will also affirm that "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us, therefore let us keep the feast"; and some of them speak of Christ's sacrifice as perpetual. Into such mysteries, I do not now pry. My present object is to put a very simple query,—Why should we enjoy any religion that renders other beings,—human or animals,—uncomfortable?

You come across singular people who discuss the beneficence of pain; who say tragedy is part of the Divine order; who portray God Almighty as smiling serenely amid scenes of wreck, fire, battle, plague, and famine; who sneer at a possible world where goats are no longer wretched, and men no longer die, praying with parched tongues for a drop of water. Such a world, they say, would be too horribly pleasant! We should all degenerate into gaiety and music.

Well, no profession likes to be snuffed out. These prophets of melancholy would never be employed by the merry nations. Even their voluntary services would be declined. Very naturally, therefore, they seek to stave off the evil day, and they try to convince us that the cure for misery is misery, and that their servile Gospel, which excuses suffering, is worth paying for.

I have often thought that one of the finest opponents of religious melancholy is the sanitarian. The sanitarian has one of the most joyous occupations under the sun. It is his business to kill mosquitoes, and so exterminate malaria and yellow fever; to get rid of venom, whether in snakes or rotten fruit or meat; to purify our water; to make the air crystal-clear; to render clothing efficient for the protection of our bodies; to promote—oh, most glorious of missions!—the spread of sunshine. Civilisation might well build a temple—at Paris, for example—to the genius of sanitation; and red-cheeked virgins, glowing emblems of health of physique and soul, should dance in its courts to the sound of the most magical drums, strings, pipes, and trumpets ever invented by human skill.

While the world was more or less insanitary, the priests and prophets had to do their best to justify its discomfort. But to-day, just as working men will positively not put up with bad wages, even though you crack their skulls by flinging volumes of political economy at them, so the world at large declines to accept dirt and disease and preventible accidents as necessary items in the cosmic program. As the world becomes healthier, its spirits rise, its temper sweetens, and its theology diminishes. It has had bad dreams. It refuses to be wretched any longer.

If we are to retain the term "religion" (and, in spite of the nervous protests of some of my Freethought friends, I stoutly desire to retain it), let it stand for strength, for health, for cheerful households, for industry that sings, for capital that exploits not, for painless childbirth, for love that never knows prostitution, for a buoyant, agile, joyful human mind that discovers truth every day, and sleeps easily at night in smiling expectation of new discoveries and conquests to-morrow. Religion then will laugh, as naturally as waves leap, and winds blow, and snow whitens, and children play. Religion will reveal its splendor in expeditions to the far corners of the earth for the war against poverty and inhumanity. Religion will prove its sanity and its imperishable value in its capacity for joy and beauty. And Death itself, impelled by the abounding good companionship of the globe, will regard mankind with tranquil but no longer gloomy eyes, even as old men smile at the sports of little lads and lasses.

Acid Drops.

It is not surprising to find Mr. Frederic Harrison's books well noticed in the press. He is a rich man, and the worship of wealth is the national religion of England. Had he been a poor man his writings on Positivism would have been treated like—well, like the writings of other poor men on such subjects. The Daily News actually devoted a column to Mr. Harrison's last book, the Positive Evolution of Religion, but it should not have turned on an impudent ignoramus to write the review. The name of this creature is E. W. Sutton. In the whole of the column there is not a word from which the reader could get an inkling of the contents of Mr. Harrison's book. Incidentally, the silly scribbler says that "There is little of Comte's bitterness in the cultivated pages of Mr. Harrison." Strictly speaking, a "cultivated page" is sheer nonsense. A page in waiting might be cultivated, but not a page of printed matter. But letting that pass, what does the fool mean by "Comte's bitterness"? And what does he mean by the suggestion that Comte was not as "cultivated" as Mr. Harrison is. To mention Comte and Mr. Harrison in the same breath is like mentioning Mont Blanc with Primrose Hill. Mr. Harrison never had an original idea, or did an original thing, in his life. He is an elegant writer under the inspiration of his betters. Comte was a great and original thinker, one of the most seminal minds of modern times, from whom many sweet and "cultivated" philosophers have borrowed without acknowledgment. Comte has been dead nearly sixty years. Does anyone suppose that Mr. Frederic Harrison will be talked and written about sixty years after his death?

The Egregious ass who chatted in the Daily News in that way went one better still. "Comte," he said, "understands religion, that is, he is not without his religious experience, but because he understands the force of it, and can find no place for it in his system, he detests and mistrusts it." Comte finds no place for supernatural religion in his system; that is true enough, and hardly needs to be reiterated nowadays; but the whole of his philosophy was a preparation for the Religion of Humanity. It is indeed at this point that many Positivists break from him. They are grateful disciples of the great teacher, but they cannot stand his religion. They call it reactionary; he called it progressive. The Daily News reviewer doesn't know this. We should be astonished if he had read two pages of Comte. If he has done so he is a hopeless donkey.

Here is another of the hopeless donkey's exhibitions. "There is no means," he says, "of proving that two and two make four, so far as I am aware; the public must be good enough to accept the fact." There is no need for proof; there is no room for proof; it is a statement of fact, which can be demonstrated to the senses. Properly speaking, two and two do not make four; they are four; that is what we call them when we put them together. Such are the poor ninnies that religion now pays to defend it!

Spiritualists and other "occult" people are now explaining why they did not get news of the death of Captain Scott and his companions from the spirit-world. The only explanation is that all the "spirits" in the universe cannot tell any man (or woman either) what he does not know without their assistance. There is a lot of foolish gabble after the event, and never any knowledge before it.

A sailor on horseback is as much at home as a nautical gentleman engaged in spiritualistic research. The Daily Mirror has recently twitted the Spiritualists with ignorance of the death of Captain Scott, and asked Vice-Admiral Moore for corroboration as to Scott's name being mentioned at seances. The Admiral's reply was immense: "Have heard word Scott, also Smith, Jones, Robinson, nothing to connect with Robert Scott Antarctic. Thanks for kind advice. Don't care damn if world is convinced or not of telepathy. Everyone worth convincing knows truth."

After speeches in Latin, the Archdeacon of Leicester was elected Prolocutor of the Convocation of Canterbury. It is appropriate that the priests of a dying religion should use a dead language.

At a Southend Mission Hall soup is to be supplied to poor people two days weekly. Are they to be left to the "loving kindness" of Providence on the other five days?

An "indoor picnic" was held at Chalkwell Park Union Church, Westcliff-on-Sea, recently. We prayerfully hope that the refreshments did not include "communion port" at one-and-three a bottle.

The Wesleyans of Canada are making for themselves a tremendous reputation as heresy-hunters. Within the last few years they have run more than one dangerous heresiarch to earth and duly dealt with the same. The latest victim is the Rev. Dr. Workman, whom they summarily deposed from his chair in their Theological College at Montreal simply because he could not see eye to eye with the renowned John Wesley. The subjects on which he differed from the standards were the Virgin Birth, the Deity of Jesus Christ, and the Atonement. On these questions no minister of the Wesleyan Church dares to think for himself, or to keep an open mind. All its teachers are compelled to bear the yoke of slavish submission to a mechanically constituted authority. To be tolerated at all they must be miserable, cowardly slaves, whose thinking was done for them more than a hundred years ago. And yet there are some who wonder why their Church fails to secure the allegiance of thoughtful people, and is visibly shrinking!

It is amazing with what thoughtless ease men of God often give their whole case away. Quite recently an eminent divine was urging Christians not to neglect family worship. It would better for you to omit the morning meal, he argued, rather than the morning prayers, because the omission of breakfast will never grow into a habit, whereas the omission of worship very soon will. But surely if a man has by nature a genuine appetite for worship, a real hunger for communion with God, his spiritual nature will be as clamorous for food as his physical nature, and it will be quite as impossible for him to go without family prayer as without breakfast. And yet the great preacher was right, because the need in the one case is real, and in other artificial.

How the truth leaks out! We all remember the boasts of Montenegro, at the outset of the war, that its object was the liberation of its fellow Christians in Albania, Macedonia, and other parts of European Turkey. That was only a pretence. The real object of Montenegro and its pious King has just been set forth more specifically. We beg our readers to pay careful attention to the following extract from the Westminster Gazette of Feb. 21 :—

"MONTENEGRO AND SCUTARI.

"Reuter's Agency is informed that, acting under telegraphic instructions from his Government, M. Popovitch, the Montenegrin delegate, yesterday afternoon visited the Foreign Office, and made a declaration in the following sense :

"'That in order to make clear the position of the Montenegrin Government, he was charged to explain the situation as it existed to-day. Montenegro had already lost much in the attack upon Scutari, the possession of which was for her the principal reason of the war, and in a short time her efforts would be successful and the town be taken. Under these circumstances he was charged categorically to inform the British Government that under no circumstances could Montenegro accept any transaction that might have in view Scutari not being Montenegrin, even if such were proposed by the Powers. Montenegro was determined never to evacuate Scutari, and if attacked was resolved to risk annihilation rather than give up the city.'"

There you are. It is written quite plainly. It was the acquisition of Scutari that was the "principal reason of the war" for Montenegro. The soldiers of the Cross are simply after plunder. We have said so all the time—and now they say so themselves.

"Hubert," of the Sunday Chronicle, can write an interesting and well-informed article, but he occasionally gets off his beat, and this happens, as is so often the case, when he is most certain of his absolute accuracy. Thus, writing on the death of Captain Scott and his companions, he asserts emphatically that the unappeasable desire of man for knowledge, quite irrespective of its making for comfort and convenience, "cannot be accounted for by the scientific evolutionist." "Hubert" is apparently under the impression that only those qualities of mind or body that are of obvious and immediate value can be accounted for by evolution. Evolution may thus account for the engineer, but not for the philosopher. It may account for the man who is seeking knowledge as the means to some utilitarian end, but it will not account for men seeking knowledge with no other end in view but its acquisition; and, above all, it will not explain men sacrificing themselves to acquire knowledge of this kind.

This is a very common form of reasoning, and its attractiveness is entirely due to inadequate understanding of all that scientific evolution involves. To begin with, is it quite certain that the pursuit of knowledge, as such, has no utilitarian value, that is, does not add "to the comforts and conveniences of life"? or that the desire for mere knowledge does not "help him to survive"? Living in a Christian country, and fighting against the incubus of a Christian ancestry, "Hubert" appears to be under the impression that useful things must come under the category of either cash, or food, or some material thing, or, if knowledge, then must be convertible into some material form. Scientific evolutionists know better than this. In the case of play, so long an unsolved problem, it has now been shown that this is the young animals' preparation for the more strenuous life of maturity. And, on similar lines, the craving for knowledge of all kinds, and at all costs, is ultimately based on the fact that not only does it strengthen mental qualities as a whole, but because on knowledge rests man's power of mastery over the forces that surround him. It is because of these two facts that social opinion has in all ages laid emphasis upon the value of knowledge as an end in itself. No one can say what knowledge will become of actual practical value; we can only say that all knowledge is of use under some condition or other. It is thus that, in the course of evolution, means become ends in themselves, and also that a quality not useful to survival in a given individual, or a given occasion, may yet have a survival value from the point of view of the life of the species.

If "Hubert" had asked himself, Is any knowledge of value? he might have saved himself from confusion. For if the answer is in the affirmative, then the mystery disappears. And a quality of mind, once existing, may well go on developing, provided it be not actually injurious. Moreover, the opinion of one's fellows counts naturally and properly for something. And although public opinion may have condemned, at times, certain forms of knowledge, it has never failed to pay homage to those who possessed it—if not individually, then in the mass. In brief, the place and function of the desire for knowledge in human evolution presents no difficulty to the really scientific evolutionist. He is not surprised at men forsaking home and comfort, and risking a lonely death, to gratify this craving. He would be surprised were it otherwise. The end of Captain Scott and his companions is only another illustration of how fundamental social forces will assert their supremacy over a conscious commercialism and religious teaching.

The Suffragettes seem to be improving in the gentle art of making enemies, and we are wondering what they are likely to do next. We hope that they will draw the line before imitating the Biblical heroine, Jael, who had considerable fame as the user of a hammer.

Nottingham Baptists have taken the bull by the horns. Some Christians may denounce picture palaces, but those responsible for the Baptist tabernacle in that town have decided that they are good enough to make money on. So the building has been let to a cinematograph company during the week, the services continuing as usual on Sunday. The tabernacle has a seating accommodation of 2,000, and a membership of 211. Evidently no danger of overcrowding.

Our readers will probably remember how the great Talmage demonstrated the truth of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah by exhibiting a piece of pitch from the assumed place of their burial. At this game the Bishop of London is not to be beaten, and at the Brompton Parish Church, the other Sunday evening, he adduced his evidence in favor of the miracle of turning water into wine. He had been to Cana of Galilee, and had actually "seen the great water-pots, the successors of those very water-pots in which the water was placed before the miracle." That settles it. The actual pots were no longer there, but their successors were, and, presumably, there was something about them that carried conviction to what Bishop Ingram is pleased to call his intelligence. They looked as though they would be connected with a miracle of that description. What a pity the Bishop did not bring home one of the pots and exhibit it to his congregation. The curious thing is that Bishop Ingram regards himself as a civilised person.

The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has just received a gift of £10,000. It is a pity that the donor did not care for knowledge without the adjective.

A novel has recently been published with the title The House of the Other World. It is already a familiar object in theological fiction.

Of all the fantastic reasons why working men do not attend church, the one put forward by Canon Alexander, at St. Paul's Cathedral, takes the cake. This far-seeing, deep-thinking ecclesiastic has discovered that the reason why working men stay away from church—he means, of course, the Established Church—is that they have no part in the management of its affairs. We suggest that the working man is not quite such a fool as Canon Alexander seems to think him. We have heard of people leaving a church because they were not petted or praised, or were slighted in some way or the other; but in the main there is only one reason why people do not attend church, and that is because they have ceased to believe in the doctrines taught. While people believe in religion they will go to church somewhere. They may fall out with a particular preacher, but that only means that they will find another one, and so the number of church attendants is not materially affected. But the absence of church attendance affects all alike. Those which are managed by the congregation are no better off than the others. And the slump is not even confined to the working class. The clergy are more concerned with their abstention because, as they sometimes say, it is the business of the Church to keep the people in order. And if it cannot do this one of the principal reasons for subsidising the Church disappears.

The abuse of one's enemies is often a compliment, and what is intended as an indictment may in reality be a tribute to one's worth. It has been proposed by some members of the French Chamber of Deputies that there should be a national celebration of the second centenary of Diderot's birth. If the proposal realises itself, the French people will honor itself in showing national recognition of the principal editor of the famous Encyclopædia, a work that had such an enormous influence, not only on French, but on European thought. The Catholic Times, naturally, does not welcome such a proposal, and remarks that, while Diderot's ability was indisputable, the effects of the Encyclopædia were "deplorable." The Encyclopædia "encouraged the wildest speculation of immature minds and gave a vogue to Freethought. From the effects of the impulse then given to the conceptions of the most irreverent theorists France has never recovered." We readily overlook the "immature minds"—that is only what one would expect from a Catholic editor—for the sake of truth admitted. Not only France, but the whole civilised world benefited by the work of Diderot and his fellow-workers. France has never ceased to benefit from their labors, and the Christian Church has never recovered the vigor of their onslaught.

Even when a clergyman hits on the truth, he is unable, in nine cases out of ten, to express it plainly. Says the Rev. A. E. Garrie:—

> "I confront this vast physical universe, with all its wonder and world of being, and I ask myself, What does the physical universe tell me about God? and there is silence, and not a voice. And I turn my face to Jesus Christ, and he says to me that God is Father."

Now, in plain English, all this means that the familiar argument from design is all rubbish. Nature by itself bears no evidence of the existence of a God, and so far Atheism is fully justified. But if, after failing to find any reasonable proof of God, you will take a dose of theological soothing syrup and believe in Jesus, then you can believe in God. And with this the Atheist will agree. To have said this much quite plainly would have opened the eyes of Mr. Garrie's hearers. And it is just possible that by not saying it plainly he even prevented himself from recognising all that the statement involved.

Rev. Evan Edwards, the oldest Nonconformist minister, celebrated his ninety-eighth birthday at Torquay last week. Adam and Methuselah would have regarded the gentleman as a green youth.

Rev. E. T. Griffiths died suddenly while preaching in Cam Parish Church. He was referring to the death of Captain Scott and his party at the post of duty, when his voice failed, and he fell down the pulpit steps. The papers speak of "heart affection," and they are very likely right. But if a Secular lecturer were to fall down dead in similar circumstances it would certainly be a "judgment."

The Bishop of Chichister is courting danger. He has been complaining of the "church voice" among his clerical brethren. Many a time, he said, one came across a clergyman who spoke very nicely outside the church, but directly he got on his legs, or on his knees, in church he lost his natural voice, and spoke in "this miserable church voice." Quite true—and we venture to say the reverend gentlemen know what they are doing. They talk such nonsense in church that only artificial tones carry it off. If it were spoken in a natural voice everybody would laugh at it—and decline to hear it again.

The Bishop of Chichester, speaking at the House of Convocation at Canterbury, expressed the desire that "every young clergyman should have a pin with its point upwards just under his chin. It is a simple and safe cure for clergy who lower their heads when reading." He also said that "the reading of the lessons is the most melancholy thing in the church to-day." Does the Bishop imagine that any man could be very jolly whilst worshiping a Deity who is suspended to two pieces of wood with three tenpenny nails?

A priest was shot dead at St. Englebert Church, Mülheim, during the celebration of Mass. He was in one of the holy boxes confessing a young girl. But he was not the murderer's intended victim after all. The priest he meant to shoot had "stolen his guardian angel"—which we take to mean "his girl." Priests are not supposed to meddle with other men's "guardian angels." But they do sometimes. And sometimes other men's "guardian angels" meddle with them.

Mr. H. M. Hyndman has been interviewed by the Daily Express on "What is wrong with Socialism?" He says there is nothing wrong with Socialism, but there is ever so much wrong with England and the English people. Amongst the evils he notes is this. "I know of no country," Mr. Hyndman says, "in which a low type of supernatural religion is used so systematically to chloroform what little of intelligence is left to the wage-earning class." Why then do so many Socialists look askance at Freethought propaganda? Mr. Hyndman himself rarely opens his mouth on the subject. We thank him, however, for his straightforward utterance on this occasion. It justifies the policy of the National Secular Society and the Freethinker.

Emperor William has been preaching again. He evidently loves it, and we are inclined to think he has missed his proper vocation. This time he has explained how and why Germany rose from the dust in 1813. Of course the failing health of Napoleon had nothing whatever to do with it, neither had the statecraft of the German leaders, such as Stein. No, the explanation is that Germany recovered her faith in God, and based her moral views of life on religion. God was with Germany, and God is still with her, and Germany will be all right while she carries the shield of faith. "Armed with such weapons," the Kaiser continued, "we will, untroubled from right or left, pursue our straight path, eyes upraised, hearts upraised, trusting in God." Such weapons! Germany would want something better than the shield of faith if Russia and France were to fall upon her together.

It is a pity that "Providence" cannot look after its own places. The recent disastrous fire at Tokyo, in which 3,990 houses were destroyed, and 15,000 people rendered homeless, broke out in the Salvation Army Hall at Kanda. We are not aware of any good the Salvation Army has done in Japan to balance this mischief.

A two-year-old baby boy was fatally burned at Millman-street, London, last week. The eagle eye of Providence only sees sparrows.

The question of heating an open-air swimming bath has arisen at a seaside resort, and the question of the cheapest method has been raised. Why not try placing a few Bibles around the edge? The sacred volume is "hot" enough to make a bronze statue blush. Or the local clergy might be induced to discuss Christian Unity. There would be sure to be plenty of hot water then.

Europe's bill for military purposes this year will be four hundred millions. Yet the people profess to worship "The Prince of Peace."

The question of the treatment of the Mohammedan inhabitants of Macedonia and Thrace came up lately in the House of Lords. We were glad to see the report of Lord Cromer's speech in particular.

> "Earl Cromer confessed that it was a very great disappointment to those of them who thought that the cause of Christianity was identified with that of progress and humanity that the massacres in Macedonia had not ceased. He acquitted the Government of any sort of indifference in the matter, but could not help contrasting the extreme indignation shown by certain classes in this country when it was a question of Turks massacring Christians with the apparent apathy which was shown when it was a question of Christians massacring Turks."

Lord Newton called attention to the Mussulman refugees in Asia Minor and other places. Some hundreds of thousands of these unfortunate people had been driven out of Bulgaria and were in a state of utter destitution, having literally lost everything they possessed. Lord Morley gave the usual polite assurance that "when the time came" the Government would do what it could on behalf of these refugees. Meanwhile ——! Ah, meanwhile!

Mr. Pankhurst, of Manchester, whose widow is now so famous, was a barrister by profession and a Freethinker by conviction. He once brought an action against a political opponent for charging him with having declared that the Holy Ghost was the foggy member of the Trinity—and lost the case. Mr. Pankhurst was a little man, with a sanguine temperament, and a peculiar voice somewhat suggestive of G. J. Holyoake's. It was something between a squeak and a shriek. Yet he possessed great knowledge and considerable ability, and ought to have made a much greater mark in the world than he did. Mrs. Pankhurst is a very religious woman, judging by her public utterances. According to a correspondent of the Observer she lately stated at Essex Hall that "there was only one General to this movement, and that General was God, and only God's methods were the telling ones in this big work." Mrs. Pankhurst may be right. She seems to have been reading the Bible, anyhow.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, March 2, Secular Hall, Humberstone-gate, Leicester, at 6.30, Address at Anniversary Meeting.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £42 5s. 10d. Received since:—F. Rose (S. Africa), 10s. 6d.; A. Phillips (S. Africa), 10s.; James Moffat, £1 1s.; A. H. Deacon, 2s. 6d.; Fred Lucas, £1 1s.; W. Bean, 5s.; "Ernest," 5s.; D. Wright, 5s.; Robert Taylor, 2s.; J. Dunlop, £1; T. H. Elstob, 10s.; G. White, 10s.; Edward Oliver, £3 3s.; W. Bailey, £6 6s.; Wm. Feltrup, £5.

ANNIE BOLT.—We hardly want thanks for a pleasurable act.

ROBERT TAYLOR.—Will deal with it next week.

J. DUNLOP.—Shall be glad if your good wishes are realised.

R. YATES.—See the chapter on "Bible Animals" in our Bible Romances.

W. J. WILDES.—Next week.

"PAGANUS" writes: "Will 'Mimnermus' kindly give the name and address of 'a pioneer schoolmaster'? I am very anxious to place my children under the guidance of such a master."

R. CHAPMAN.—The South Shields effort commands our best wishes. We should very much like to see more Freethought work on the Tyneside.

E. B.—Many thanks for cuttings.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are always very welcome.

A. C.—What is "Semper eadum"? It is best to stick to the language one knows. You express yourself very well in English. Heaps of people can't do that. We read your tribute to your father with pleasure, and are glad to hear you are grateful to him for having introduced the Freethinker to you, or you to the paper, whichever expression is preferable. Thanks for cutting. See "Acid Drops."

A. PHILLIPS (S. Africa).—Subscription all the more valuable because accompanied by such good wishes.

JAMES MOFFAT.—Glad to see your letter to our old friend Mr. de Caux. Your name is familiar to us from of old. It is pleasant to note the good health and good spirits you still possess.

R. C.—Pastor Russell's opinion on Darwinism, for instance, is not of the slightest importance to any educated person. It is certainly not worthy of criticism in our columns. Pleased you thought Mr. Lloyd's lecture "very interesting."

EDWARD OLIVER, sending cheque towards the President's Honorarium Fund, says: "I have increased my contribution this year by 50 per cent., and I trust others who can afford it will do likewise."

G. CADOKSON.—"Hard nuts" filled with sawdust. Wait till next week.

R. D. WEALANDS.—Passed over to N. S. S. Secretary. Glad the Freethinker has helped so much in your mental emancipation.

W. BAILEY.—Pleased to have your good wishes. We mean to hear them expressed—for we know we always have them.

W. FELTRUP.—Sorry to leave the Gypsy over till next week for want of space.

A good deal of correspondence stands over till next week.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote visits Leicester to-day (March 2) to take part in the anniversary meeting in the Secular Hall, Humberstone-gate. Mr. Foote's contribution will not be a lecture but a speech. It will include some of his reminiscences of the Freethought movement in Leicester. He lectured there before the Secular Hall was built.

"George Meredith: Freethinker" is the title of a long and outspoken article by Mr. G. W. Foote in the March number of the English Review. Mr. Foote did not press the article upon the editor of that magazine,—he was invited to contribute it—and that fact witnesses all the more to the courage of the editor and the proprietors. If for no other reason, our readers should patronise the English Review for this month. Many of them will probably continue to take it, for it is a live magazine and a wonderful shillingsworth.

Mr. Foote is allowed to tell the whole truth in the English Review about George Meredith's relations to Freethought. Not a single sentence was objected to by the management. This is very satisfactory. The article in such a magazine will gain the attention of a much larger public than it would have reached in the Freethinker.

Mr. Foote's lecture at Queen's Hall on Sunday evening on "Captain Scott and Providence" was much applauded by a further improved audience. Mr. Victor Roger, who occupied the chair, elicited some questions, but no formal opposition.

London "saints" are asked to note that the 1912-1913 course of Queen's Hall Sunday evening lectures is now over. We shall have something to say about the experiment very shortly, perhaps next week.

Mr. Cohen lectures to-day (March 2) for the Manchester Branch at the Secular Hall, Rusholme-road. His subjects should prove attractive, and we hope to hear of good audiences.

Mr. Cohen had good audiences at Belfast, and they were very attentive and sympathetic. The questions asked after the lectures were more intelligent than the usual efforts of inquiring Christians. Good reports of the meetings appeared in the Northern Whig and the Belfast News Letter. Mr. Cohen unfortunately caught a cold at Belfast, and had a very rough passage back to England, and being a bad sailor he arrived home in a sad condition, having to take to his bed for some days. Such are the side pleasures of Freethought lecturing, in addition to the wealth in which Freethought advocates are known to be rolling.

Mr. Lloyd lectures this evening (March 2) for the West Ham Branch at the Workman's Hall, Stratford. District "saints" will please note.

The South Shields Branch is endeavoring to arrange a course of Sunday evening meetings in the Victoria Hall Buildings, Fowler-street, during March. Mr. J. Bryce, of Newcastle, well known to Freethinker readers, and always well worth listening to, has agreed to take the opening lecture this evening (March 2) The local "saints" are invited to do all they can for the success of this effort.

The Leeds Conference of the National Secular Society decided that a half-yearly meeting of the London members should be held. The first of these gatherings has been arranged to take place at the Chandos Hall, Maiden-lane, Charing-cross, on Tuesday evening, March 4, at 8 o'clock. Mr. Foote will preside and the Executive will be present. Cards of membership will have to be shown at the door to secure admission.

The Secular Education League's Annual Meeting will be held at Room 18, Caxton Hall, Westminster, on Tuesday evening, March 11, at 7.30. Members are earnestly invited to attend. A public meeting will follow at 8.15. The list of speakers includes Mr. Halley Stewart, Mr. George Greenwood, M.P., Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., Rev. Walter Walsh, D.D., and Mr. G. W. Foote. We hope there will be a really good attendance. There ought to be, considering that the Government promises or threatens to deal with the Education question again in the near future.

There should be a good attendance at the first public meeting organised by the Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws, which takes place at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, on Friday evening, March 14. The chair will be occupied by the Rev. Copeland-Bowie, and the list of speakers includes Sir W. P. Byles, Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Mr. G. W. Foote, Lord Harberton, Mr. A. L. Atherley Jones, K.C., M.P., and Sir Hiram Maxim. We may add that Essex-street is on the south side of the extreme east end of the Strand.

The Evolution of Wireless Telegraphy.

BOTH in its order of its discovery and in its method of application, wireless telegraphy furnishes a vivid illustration of the ubiquitous activities of evolution. Not to the genius of one, but of many men of science, are its triumphs to be attributed. Various writers have written volumes on this subject, but, from some points of view, Mr. A. Story, in his charming book, The Story of Wireless Telegraphy, and M. Lucien Poincaré, in his The New Physics and its Evolution, have presented us with the most lucid history of the genesis and development of this far-reaching discovery. The aim of this article is to prove that the numerous men who contributed their various mites towards the building up of one of the most wonderful modern scientific achievements, were all more or less necessary to its ultimate triumph. To chatter about priority, or to attempt to place in their exact position of importance, the innumerable theorists and investigators who were the instruments of the evolution of radio-telegraphy were utterly futile and vain. In this department of human effort, as in most others, some have perhaps obtained more praise than their merits deserve, but this in no way invalidates the contention that each pioneer has played a worthy part in the development of wave transmission.

In what may be regarded as early days in the life of electrical science, and shortly after the illustrious Ampère had conceived the idea of constructing a telegraph, and when Gauss and Weber had arranged a telegraphic line which carried communications between their respective houses at Göttingen, scientists began to speculate upon the possibility of the utilisation of the conducting properties of air and water for the transmission of messages.

While acting on certain suggestions of Gauss, Professor Steinheil, of Munich, in 1838 made the valuable discovery that it was possible to dispense with the return wire if the line wire was connected with the earth. This was a marked advance, as Steinheil's discovery enabled him to eliminate half the line of wire previously employed, thus solving half the problem. Even at this time Steinheil seems to have fully realised the importance of the earth's power as a conducting body.

Several physicists interested in telegraphy had by this time arrived at similar conclusions, and four years after Steinheil's discovery, the celebrated Morse, who then occupied the position of telegraph superintendent to the United States Government, performed a series of electrical experiments before a commission of experts and a numerous audience of the general public in New York. During his experimental demonstrations, he was struck by the happy idea of replacing,—

> "by the water of a canal, the length of about a mile of wire which had been suddenly and accidentally destroyed. This accident, which for the moment compromised the legitimate success the eminent engineer expected, thus suggested to him a fruitful idea which he did not forget. He subsequently repeated attempts to thus utilise the air and water, and obtained some very remarkable results."

Researches on similar lines were prosecuted by Wheatstone, Wilkins, Highton, Bonetti, and other investigators, with varying success.

Lucien Poincaré has recalled with emotion an occurrence connected with the siege of Paris in 1870-71. The famous physicist, M. d'Almeida escaped from the besieged capital in a balloon, and descended in the midst of the Prussian lines. After a hazardous journey, he arrived at Havre by way of Bordeaux and Lyons. He journeyed to England to purchase the apparatus necessary for his projected experiments, and then returned along the Seine as far as Poissy. Two scientific friends, relieving one another at intervals, watched and waited day and night on a wherry on the Seine at Paris for a message from D'Almeida. In this experiment the river water replaced the customary wire, but, unfortunately, no sooner was the communication received than Paris capitulated to the enemy, and D'Almeida's patriotic sacrifice was rendered useless.

Well worthy of remembrance are the experiments which were conducted by Melhuish and Johnson at the Indian Telegraph office. These led to the establishment, in 1899, of a service in which wire lines were replaced by the carrying power of the earth. Oceanic transmission was attempted, and at last accomplished, by means of the electric cable. But many efforts had previously been made, quite unsuccessfully, however, to transmit signals through the sea itself.

It seems but yesterday since wireless or radio-telegraphy secured its first practical success. The great engineer, Sir William Preece, successfully established clear and regular communications between certain stations. One of his earliest successes was the transmission of wireless messages over the Bristol Channel. These results, however, were soon overshadowed by the epoch-making experiments of the Italian, Marconi. Despite the dispraise with which the able efforts of Sir W. Preece have been rewarded in certain circles, it is undeniable that he generously welcomed the young Italian, and became his guide, philosopher, and friend.

The first philosophers who based their electrical inquiries on the properties of the lumiferous ether are probably numbered with the unhonored dead. The known practical workers, however, make up a formidable list of names. Lindsay, Smith, C. A. Stevenson, Bell, Edison, Henry, Rathenau, and Trowbridge may be mentioned as a few only out of a crowd of working scientists who obtained solid, practical results.

These practical scientists, however, did by no means evolve their concepts of electrical phenomena from their inner consciousness. They stood upon the shoulders of the theoretical physicists who went before:—

> "If we speak of the propagation of a current in a material medium, can we forget the names of Fourier and Ohm, who established by theoretical considerations the laws which preside over this propagation? When one looks at the phenomena of induction, would it not be just to remember that Arago foresaw them?.....The merit of an inventor like Edison and that of a theorist like Clerk Maxwell have no common measure, and mankind is indebted for its great progress to the one as much as to the other" *

Young, Fresnel, Foucault, Fizeau, and other illustrious natural philosophers have all played their part in the evolution of electrical science. But the man whose labors were most precious to radio-telegraphy was the great German physicist, Heinrich Hertz. He it was who demonstrated beyond dispute that an electric discharge generates undulatory motions in the ether contained in the insulating media in its neighborhood. And to him is due the discovery of the mechanism of the evolved product, as also of the laws of electro-magnetic waves. It appears that Hertz failed to grasp the possibilities revealed by his own discoveries. But what might have been a long life devoted to human service was prematurely closed in 1894 at the early age of thirty-five. Other physicists whose contributions to electrical science smoothed the way for their successors' triumphs were Branly, Hughes, and Dolbear.

After the experiments of Hertz were published to the world, the evolution of wireless telegraphy became indissolubly associated with research work bearing upon the phenomena presented by electrical waves. Hertz' discoveries were carefully tested by Lodge, Righi, M. H. Poincaré, and others. These were completely verified, while the test experiments themselves helped to elucidate various problems previously unsolved.

Professor Threlfall, in 1890, surmised that the Hertzian waves might be rendered available as media of communication. In 1892 Professor Crookes stated the conditions in which this supposition could be put into practice. Tesla, Oliver Lodge, Rutherford, Popoff, and other electricians made fresh experiments with newly devised apparatus, and Threlfall's theory was proved correct in every particular.

It in no way detracts from the merits of Guglielmo Marconi to candidly acknowledge that his patented system of radio-telegraphy was immensely indebted to the pioneer work of his predecessors and contemporaries. Indeed, his obligations to his teacher, Professor Righi, were very considerable. Trained in the laboratory of Righi, the man of science who has probably done more than any other to confirm and elaborate the research work of Hertz, Marconi had been made thoroughly familiar with the properties of electric waves, as well as with the modes in which they could be manipulated most successfully. Some of Marconi's critics allege that his system is utterly devoid of originality; that his waves are generated by the oscillator of Righi; that his receiver was precisely that previously employed by Lodge and Bose, which in its turn was still earlier invented by the French scientist Branly, and that the entire arrangement of his system was that elaborated by Popoff.

Still, when all deductions demanded by legitimate criticism are adequately met, the fact remains that Marconi's contributions towards the establishment of his system were by no means inconsiderable. His combination far excelled anything previously contrived. He was ahead of all competitors in obtaining solid results, while he demonstrated that "electric waves could be transmitted and received at distances enormous compared with those obtained before his day."

The incidents which make up the historical development of this wonderful discovery prove that its practical triumphs are the outcome of the genius of generations of workers in Nature's elusive laboratories. What wireless telegraphy has so far accomplished is as dust in the balance compared with its coming achievements. Already, as Professor J. A. Fleming says,—

> "Electric wave telegraphy has revolutionised our means of communication from place to place on the surface of the earth, making it possible to communicate instantly and certainly between places separated by several thousand miles, while at the same time it has taken a position of the greatest importance in connection with naval strategy and communication between ships and ships and the shore in time of peace. It is now generally recognised that Hertzian wave telegraphy, or radio-telegraphy, as it is sometimes called, has a special field of operations of its own, and that the anticipations that were at one time excited.....that it would speedily annihilate all telegraphy conducted by wires have been dispersed by experience. Nevertheless, transoceanic wireless telegraphy over long distances such as those across the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans is a matter to be reckoned with in the future."

Wireless, or as Oliver Lodge prefers to term it, electric space telegraphy, played a very decisive part in one of the greatest naval battles of the Russo-Japanese War. From the humanitarian side, it rendered signal service when the Titanic disaster occurred. In its absence the toll of life would have been far greater.

Signals first successfully spanned the Atlantic from Cornwall to St. John's, Newfoundland, in December, 1901. In the intervening years all the leading nations of the world have provided regulations for its use. Long-distance wireless stations to provide communication between New York and London are in course of erection. The Marconi Companies have arranged with the British Government a plan which will ultimately link up the Empire. At present the scheme embraces Egypt (from London), Aden, Pretoria, Bangalore, and Singapore. West Africa and Hong Kong remain to be included, while Australia and New Zealand have separate schemes of their own. Thus, in the course of a few years, a gigantic department of applied science has evolved from a few theories which were originally tested and confirmed by a few electrical experiments. The workers in electrical science are now legion, and we have every justification for believing that the immediate future will yield most amazing results.

T. F. PALMER.

"Vital Lies."—III.

(Concluded from p. 118.)

> "From the intellectual point of view I cannot advise you to restrain the spirit of investigation, which is the scientific spirit. It may lead you far, yet always to truth, ultimately,—you, or those after you, whose path you may be destined to prepare. Science requires a certain inward heat and heroism in her votories, notwithstanding the apparent coldness of her statements. Especially does she require that intellectual fearlessness which accepts a proved fact without reference to its personal or its social consequences."—P. G. HAMERTON, The Intellectual Life; 1911; p. 218.
> "What is the use of grounds of consolation and peacefulness over which is constantly hanging the Damocles' sword of deception? The truth, my friend, the truth alone holds good, and remains constant and faithful; it is the only solid consolation; it is the indestructible diamond."—SCHOPENHAUER, "Religion: a Dialogue," Essays, p. 121.
> "To parley with science is fatal to theology."—EDWARD CLODD, Pioneers of Evolution, p. 108.

THE first volume of Vital Lies having dealt with Professor James' "Will to Believe" and with Father Tyrrell's "Will to Believe in the Roman Catholic Church," the second volume deals with Mr. Crawley, another type of latter-day obscurantist, who has written a book, entitled The Tree of Life, in which he attempts an apology for the beliefs and rites of the Church of England by a comparison of its mysteries to the religious notions of savage races! It also deals with "The Syndicalist Myth," and concludes with a general discussion of Truth and "Vital Lies." Our immediate interest centres more particularly upon the first and last part of the volume.

Of all the injuries inflicted by science upon Christianity in our time, none have been so deadly as those inflicted by the science of anthropology. Anthropology explains the origin of religious ideas; it shows that, instead of these religious ideas—such as the ideas of God and a future life—being supernaturally revealed—they have had a perfectly natural origin. Moreover, it teaches not only that these fundamental ideas have naturally evolved, but that the whole of the ideas of the Christian religion, including its rites and ceremonies, can also be traced back to their origin in the primitive beliefs, rites, and ceremonies of our savage ancestors who lived before the beginning of civilisation.

Now, Mr. Crawley's book, The Tree of Life, is a study in anthropology. Mr. Crawley traces the beliefs and practices of Christianity to their origin in what seems to us now very stupid, puerile, and often disgusting and indecent, beliefs and practices of the aforesaid savage ancestors. Mr. Crawley euphemistically speaks of these barbarous beliefs as "Elemental Views of Life." For example, he observes:—

> "The analogues from savage culture show that religion is a direct outcome of elemental human nature, and that this human elemental nature remains practically unchanged.....If a savage eats the flesh of a strong man or divine person, and a modern Christian partakes sacramentally of Christ's body and blood under the forms of bread and wine, there is evidently a human need behind both acts which prompts them and is responsible for their similarity."*

That is to say that the Christian rite of the sacramental partaking of the body and blood of the Lord symbolically, in the form of bread and wine, had its origin in the same ideas which cause a savage to eat the heart of a lion or of a warrior, that he may secure to himself the qualities of strength and courage of which they were possessed. Mr. Crawley goes even lower still, and holds that "the religious emotion springs from the same source as the sexual"!

* The Tree of Life, p. 261.

Digitized by Google

Now, one would think that Mr. Crawley, having laid bare the origins of Christianity in these indecent and debasing superstitions, would give up, and recommend others to give up, belief in that faith. Nothing of the kind. In fact, Mr. Crawley founds an argument for keeping it in the very fact that it has such a human origin, and he quotes a writer in the Church Times to the effect that "These rites and beliefs"—that is, of savages and Christians—"declare eloquently that there are spiritual needs common to the whole of mankind." And Mr. Crawley finds in this "a new method of defence which is both positive and scientific." But, observes Vernon Lee, let us ask the Christians why they believe in the Savior and the sacraments?

> "I think they will answer that they believe in it all because it has been revealed by God, registered in the Holy Scriptures, and taught by the Church. They will refer us to a thousand texts, a million ecclesiastical authorities, and, if we press them further, to the consensus of Christianity as expressed in the Creed and the Catechism. In other words, they believe because they have been taught."*

And Mr. Crawley is very anxious that they shall remain undisturbed in their unintelligent belief.

> "Nor, to do him justice," says Vernon Lee, "have I found in all his book a single word suggesting that the truths of anthropology and comparative mythology (however much they justify those of Anglican Christianity) should be taught in the place of, or in addition to, the Catechism. This is one of those questions where modern philosophy has shown its superiority by recognising the existence of different planes of thought."

It will be seen that Vernon Lee brings a keen and trenchant wit to bear on the issue. But to continue: "These two planes—that of the believer and of the anthropological mythologist—do not conflict, because they do not come into contact: nothing even in the most empirical sense is rarer than that a Christian believer should be an anthropological mythologist, or vice versâ;.....the anthropological mythologist, as is shown by this very book, never dreams of addressing his scientific" remarks to believers, and Vernon Lee arrives at the "legitimate and inevitable" conclusion "that Mr. Crawley's book is written for persons who are on the plane of not believing in Anglican Christianity," and further observes: "My own remarks in answer exist also, be it well understood, on that merely scientific and positive plain, for I have no sort of hope that any genuine Christian believer will ever come across, or coming across, ever be influenced by, them."† Which, by the way, is far too modest an estimate of this keen and brilliant work; for no educated believer could read it without being influenced by it.

But in all this new method of defence there is, as Vernon Lee points out, a very curious oversight:—

> "In their anxiety to prove that religious beliefs, specified or unspecified, are desirable and indispensable, our apologists ignore that the essence of a religious belief is that it should be held to be true. They forget that although such beliefs may be quite wonderfully useful as long as they are held, they are not held except inasmuch as they are held to be true. And they will cease to be held as true so soon as it is understood that they originate not in Divine revelation but in the jumbled abortive thoughts and panic-ridden rituals of savage men."‡

Mr. Crawley also believes that we are in terrible danger from Socialism, and he observes, "It was no Socialist who died upon the cross"; upon which Vernon Lee caustically remarks:—

> "A solid historical fact extremely valuable after Mr. Crawley's masterly recapitulation of all the conflicting hypotheses of his fellow-anthropologists and mythologists as to whether any person did die upon that particular cross, which cross was itself a derivation from some primeval Tree of Life" (vol. ii., p. 54).

We cannot refrain from giving one more sample of Vernon Lee's mordant irony. It deals with Mr. Crawley's division of those who know all the secrets of mythology and anthropology—those for whom The Tree of Life was written, and those other simple souls who are to be left undisturbed in their innocence. The difference, says Vernon Lee, lies between We and They:—

> "We, Mr. Crawley, you the Reader, and I, who are discussing the matter, are free to believe in Higher Criticism, Anthropological Mythology, and Evolution .....to believe also in the Elemental View of Life and the close affinity of the religious and the sexual instincts; in the derivation of morality from taboos and the derivation of the Eucharist from eating of the 'flesh of a strong man or divine person'; in short, we are free to believe in the theories expounded in the Tree of Life. But they, who are not Mr. Crawley, nor you, nor I, nor perhaps anyone with whom we should care to discuss these subjects—they who are likely to lose respect for the national religion.....They had better be left to the 'instincts'—'behind which' (says Mr. Crawley) 'there is sound human nature, which leads men to distrust an Atheist.' In fact, the perusal of the Tree of Life is to persuade Us that They had better not peruse that book, but stick to the Bible and the Catechism."*

We do not think there is any cause to fear that honest, truth-loving people will distrust the Atheist to place their confidence in Mr. Crawley, who advocates suppression of the truths of science to those who believe in the fairy tales of religion and the continued teaching of what is known to be false. What is this but the Jesuit doctrine that "the end justifies the means"; that it is allowable to act wickedly that good may come?—a doctrine so vehemently denounced by all the Protestant Churches.

Our thanks are due to Vernon Lee for stepping down into the arena, from those calm and serene heights of art and literature in which she has won name and fame among the choicest spirits of our time, to vindicate truth and right. And we hope that all truth-lovers who can afford it will buy a copy of this fine work—several chapters of which we have not dealt with—for themselves.

The First Modern Man.

A Lecture delivered before the Independent Religious Society (Rationalist), Chicago.

BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.

WE celebrate again this morning the Festival of the Renaissance. It is hardly necessary to explain to this audience that the French word "Renaissance" means re-birth. After Athens and Rome, the two centres of ancient civilisation, had fallen, for over one thousand years Europe was left in darkness. Then the world slowly emerged from this long night, and the modern times were born. The birth of our world from the womb of the Dark Ages is the Renaissance.

If people only know how much they are indebted to that event, they would unite with us to make this festival, inaugurated by our Society, one of the happiest, as well as the proudest, in the calendar. July 4 celebrates the Declaration of Independence; Columbus Day commemorates the discovery of a continent; yet these are mere detail in comparison with the Renaissance, which helped us to discover ourselves. Moreover, July 4 in America and July 14 in France, celebrate events which would never have transpired but for the Renaissance.

There was a new humanity after the Renaissance. It was as if a slave and a beggar, dressed in tattered clothes and loaded down with chains, had suddenly discovered that he was of royal blood, and that the power and the glory ascribed to kings and gods belonged to him. This thought makes a new man of him. His fetters snap; his rags change into a robe of gold; his wail turns into a shout; and the stick he leaned upon for support becomes a magic wand in his hand.

* Vital Lies, vol. ii., pp. 56-7.

Digitized by Google

But the Renaissance does not merely mean an epoch or a period in history. It means more than a date, and more even than a movement. The Renaissance is a mental attitude and a method. It is the consciousness of being awake. It is the sense of recovered powers. If you feel self-reliant, if you feel equal to the task of life, if you feel young despite the weight of years and cares, and if you feel confident that, for all the difficulties pitted against you, you are more than a match, why, you are the Renaissance!

Let us see if we cannot make the meaning of this charmed word a little clearer. The Renaissance is the man or the woman who can say—I. To dare say I, we must have faith in ourselves. It is the memory of past achievements that inspires self-respect. To feel capable we must have capital. Let me illustrate: Nature furnishes just enough brains to make the animal know what muscles to work in order to eat, drink, and perform the other necessary functions of the body—just enough brains to preside over the body and manage it. But in time we come to have more brains than we need for the immediate wants of the body. And out of that capital, or surplus, is born civilisation. He who can say, I think, I desire, I decide, is a new force, a new tendency, a new hope. His nativity ought to be celebrated as that of a savior. Who says, I think, or I will, creates the world anew. When he comes he brings with him the Renaissance.

During the period in history known as the Dark Ages, not a man could be found who could say I. The individual had not yet matured. In those times man was crowded out by the God of the king and the priest who filled heaven and earth. The Deity was purposely magnified to crowd out man. The only terms on which a man could live in the Europe of old was by repressing himself. His position in the world was very much like that of the man who attends a performance to which he has not been invited, and where no seat has been reserved for him. He manages to slip in, however; but the only condition on which he may witness the spectacle is that he shall take no part in it whatever—that he shall neither be seen nor heard. That describes the insignificant role of man during the ages of faith, when the stage was entirely in the hands of the gods. Then man was only a looker-on. He owned nothing in his own name. He borrowed his politics from the king, and his religion from the priest. He was no more than an echo, a copy, or better still, a beggar. Then came that most wonderful awakening we call the Renaissance; and as if by magic, the beggar, depending on crumbs for his existence, became a millionaire of the mind,—a lender to the gods out of his surplus! That is what the Renaissance did for man. It enabled him to say, This is my home; this is my country; this is my religion; this is my politics; this is—I.

But how explain the thousand years of night which preceded the rejuvenation of the world? I wonder if I could answer that question just in a few words. As a nation our biggest income is from the soil,—is it not? Our corn fields and cotton fields supply us with the bulk of our daily bread. Suppose, now, the cultivation of the soil is forbidden henceforth, and agriculture is condemned as a crime against God and man, and farmers wherever found are prosecuted and put to death. What would happen? I say, what would happen? Then suppose, after a long period of the reign of misery which would follow such a regime, some brave farmer would begin digging in his yard and planting once more his seed. The exquisite green returns to the browned face of the earth; the air recovers its fragrance; and the golden fruit in clusters is seen peeping at the sun again through the luxuriant foliage. His example becomes contagious. Other farmers begin cultivating their yards. The yards become farms; the farms expand into prairies; the whole land waves with wheat and corn and cotton again. That is the Renaissance!

In mediæval times the clergy actually did to the mind what I have imagined some misguided State doing to the soil; that is to say, while we can only suppose such a situation in which the cultivation of the soil would be denounced as a crime, the culture of the mind was actually prohibited as a crime by the Church. Men went about armed with fire and the sword to exterminate the thinker and to make a bonfire of his books. Well, what happened then? What happened, I say? A thousand of the best years of the world's life were blighted. Knowledge was the forbidden fruit. To be stupid became an ideal. Dirt was given a prize. Poverty became blessed; and men fondled their chains like bondsmen who had never been free. Then there was night. The Greek fire which had lighted the world and warmed its brain into fruition went out completely. Disease followed the darkness. In the fourteenth century, the black plague alone carried away in the course of six years twenty millions of people. And disease and darkness dethroned reason. The world was turned into a madmen's camp. Everybody was spellbound with the fear of hell. Its glare was in every eye; its pinch upon everything that bloomed. Neither commerce, nor science, nor song, interested anybody. No one felt either hunger or thirst, and this loss of intellectual appetite was the sure herald of approaching dissolution. The world touched its nadir, a point lower than the lowest ever before reached.

Then appeared the first modern man!

What did he do? He cultivated his yard. He turned up the soil. He replanted Greece and Rome for seed. He did to the mind what the farmer does to the land, and the mind, like the land, responded to the magic of cultivation. But who was the first man to cultivate his yard? It will be impossible to state the name, the age, or the place of birth of the first modern man, and it is not necessary that we should. As I intimated a moment ago, the Renaissance is not a date or an epoch. Ideas have little to do with time or place. An idea may be three thousand years old and still be quite modern. And an idea may be recent, and still be quite worthless. Whatever is adapted to its environment, whatever continues in vital relations with the progressive life of man, and is affected by it, and in turn affects it—is modern. We mean by modern the opposite of moribund or obsolete. Two trees, both planted at the same time, and both still standing—one keeping up its commerce with the sun and soil—receiving and returning the forces of life—while the other has severed all relations with the earth in which its roots are buried, or with the sun its head is reared in, illustrate the difference between the modern, or the living, and the old, or the dead.

That the modernity of any idea has nothing to do with the question of time, let me call your attention to two radically different conceptions of life, both of which, as far as years are concerned, are very ancient. The story of Adam and Eve, as given in the Bible, must be a very old composition; but so is the story of Prometheus, told by the Greek dramatist, Æschylus. But the author of Prometheus Bound is modern, because he is just as much en rapport with the facts of human experience and the laws of human evolution to-day as he was three thousand years ago; while for the author of the Adam and Eve allegory, it is impossible to make room in our world. The Bible story is archaic, not simply because it is not true to the conditions of to-day, but because it never was true to any conditions that existed at any time.

YOU'LL NEVER KNOW FROM US.

When into ancient forms of speech and ways I did inquire,
Grandparents then, I found, were known as "granddam" or "grandsire."
Whereat this problem puzzled me far more than any other:
What term, I wonder, would be used in mentioning godmother?

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Salvation.

SALVATION, oh the joyful sound! as the hymn says. Yes, it is a joyful sound, if you happen to be one of the elect; but how dreary, if you happen to be one of the unfortunate wretches predestined to be damned! In that case, your very righteousness is nothing but filthy rags, and will only assist your combustion when you go below. Salvation to such miserable wretches will only give a poignancy to their misery. The sound of it will be to them like the cooked meat in a shop window to the poor devils who are starving outside.

Salvation is a favorite word in the Bible. The Jews were very fond of it, and the Christians copied their taste. But the two parties resemble each other with a difference. The chosen people looked for salvation in this world. They expected a time when all their troubles would end, when the protracted family quarrel between themselves and Jehovah would cease, when they should be redeemed from bondage, when they should triumph over all their enemies and rule the world with a rod of iron, when Zion should be the seat of universal sovereignty, and when the desirable things of all nations, such as gold, silver, and precious stones, should flow into the pockets of the circumcised children of Israel. Their carnal minds were not distracted by fantastic dreams about the dim and distant courses of a heavenly future. They were a shrewd, business people, with a keen eye for the main chance; and, well knowing their practical character, their prophets always foretold a flourishing state of things on earth, a happy land of Canaan, if they faithfully worshiped Jehovah without sneaking after his rivals. Even holy Moses, whose power was unbounded, offered them temporal rewards for keeping the commandments. He held out the lure of long life in the land which the Lord their God gave them. They were sharp traders, and he knew they would refuse promissory notes payable forty days after death.

The Christians, on the other hand, being a simpler and more gullible set of people, were quite content with poverty, servitude, and suffering on earth, in consideration of the good things they were to enjoy in heaven. It was not in this world, says Gibbon, that they expected to be either useful or happy. They dwelt fondly on the splendors of a new Jerusalem, and looked forward to the glories of a kingdom not made with hands. Salvation was to them "some far-off divine event." It was to be realised in the sweet by-and-bye. No wonder they and the Jews soon parted company. And to this day they are as far apart as ever. While the Christian snaps at the shadow the Jew eats the meat. He cannot understand the delights of heaven without a good taste of them on earth. He believes in making the best of this world, and if you bore him with sermons on kingdom-come, he eats his victuals with a fresh zest, and says, Sufficient unto the day is the fortune thereof.

Ever since that unhappy young carpenter was crucified the Christians have talked of Salvation; but it seems as far off as ever. It is always coming, but it never comes. Nineteen centuries ago the Redeemer came. Yes, said Louis Blanc, but when may we expect the Redemption? Except for the advances made by Science and Freethought during the last three centuries, the modern world is no improvement on the ancient. Civilisation was higher, and human happiness greater, in the best days of Greece and Rome than in the Middle Ages when Christianity was supreme.

The reason is obvious. Christianity pursued a wrong path towards a false goal. It neglected this life for another, forsook the known for the unknown, and aspired to a problematical salvation in heaven instead of achieving a real salvation on earth. Greece and Rome had their mythologies, but they put this world first, and thoroughly believed in making the most of it. Hence their science, art, philosophy, and literature, their social customs and political institutions, infinitely excelled everything that Christianity produced. Modern civilisation dates from the Renaissance, when Europe, after the long, dark night of Christian superstition, turned its dim eyes backwards and kindled them anew by gazing on the immortal glories of Paganism.

Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved! The world tried it for a thousand years and it proved a flagrant failure. Belief is not, never was, and never can be, the method of salvation. Thinking and acting are the right way. Far better than Jesus preaching faith is Hercules wrestling with the hydras, slaying the monsters, and cleansing the Augean stables of the world.

A mighty change is coming over Europe. Faith is nearly played out, and priestcraft is discredited. Let us save ourselves! is the general cry. Children are being educated, science is regarded as man's providence, secular welfare is made the criterion of law; and not only statesmen, but the very clergy themselves, are driven to admit that the problem of problems is how to improve the material condition of the people. Schools are supplanting churches, and happy homes are superseding heaven.

Salvation of the Christian sort is more and more falling into the hands of the Boothites. The heroes of the Army of "Blood and Fire" are the true successors of the apostles. The last Salvation Army is twin-brother to the first. According to one of its shining lights, it is "God's last effort to convert the world." We are glad to hear it, and we hope it is true.

Converting the world to religion has always been folly or crime, and too often both. Progress heavenward is slow business. As Punch said, you never get any "forrarder." You are eternally occupied in marking time. But secular progress is certain and obvious. Schoolboys can perceive what advances we have made on our ancestors, and it is easy to see that our posterity will make great advances on ourselves. And this kind of Salvation is for the benefit of all, and is achieved without misery and strife, except when it is opposed by priests and kings; while the Salvation of Christianity has taught men, in the fine phrase of Landor, to "plant unthrifty thorns over wells of blood."

Religion and Sex.

THE relation between sexual and religious phenomena all over the world, and in all stages of culture, has impressed itself on many observers, although, for various reasons, the nature of that relation is ignored by most and dealt with in a very gingerly fashion by others. By professional writers on religion the relation is dismissed as merely accidental, or is treated as evidence of the way in which so sacred a subject as religion may be degraded in degenerate hands. By others, of a rather more scientific temper, there is still the tendency to treat the connection between erotic and religious feelings as illustrating a mere perversion. We know, for instance, that when strong feeling cannot find an outlet in one direction it will in another. The annals of Roman Catholicism contain numerous records of people who have taken refuge in a monastery or a nunnery solely as the result of disappointment in love. And while Protestantism is without this obvious mode of transference, it provides other outlets. Religious service is still there, and the feelings that cannot find an outlet in their normal channels may often find expression in intense religious devotion.

But the connection between religious and sexual feelings is both wider and deeper than that expressed by mere perversion. Of recent years the writings of Havelock Ellis, Kraft-Ebing, Forel, Iwan Bloch, Starbuck, and others have shown the relation to be more than accidental. The two sets of feelings—those associated with religious ideas and those associated with ideas of a sexual life—have been shown to be united at their source. One eminent writer has gone so far as to assert that "In a certain sense, the history of religion can be regarded as a peculiar mode of manifestation of the human sexual impulse."* And, at all events, it is highly significant that the language of religious devotion and of amatory passion is often identical, and may serve equally well for either purpose. This fact is often obscured by our having etherealised the conception of human love, and so lost sight of the physiological basis upon which it rests. And having hidden it from sight we have, not unnaturally, ceased to give it consideration. This is a fatal blunder. The sex life of men and women is too important and too pervasive to be ignored with safety. And one result has been that, owing to a combination of ignorance and prudery, the sexual life, in both its normal and abnormal manifestations, has been continuously exploited in the interests of religion.

The evidence for what has been said is vast and covers a wide range. As a merely historical study we encounter it in the close relation between primitive religious beliefs and the sexual life; and in the multiplication of sects of a markedly erotic character during periods of religious enthusiasm. As a study in psychology we have the connection between religious and sexual feelings—not always expressed through the comparatively harmless vehicle of language. And, finally, we have the purely pathological aspect in which what is taken for religious fervor is no more than a perverted sexuality.

I have pointed out in previous articles what are the conditions under which the primitive mind reaches that interpretation of things which gives birth to the religious idea. Religion is one of the very earliest forms of systematised thinking, and for a time dominates all other forms of mental activity. Above all, it is important to bear in mind the fact that no dividing line is drawn between the natural and the supernatural. Such a division in the external world is a reflection of a division in the world of thought, and the knowledge necessary to this has yet to be gained. What is afterwards recognised as the supernatural pervades everything. In a sense, it is everything, since whatever occurs does so by the agency or connivance of animistic forces.

It would, indeed, be strange if in such a world the phenomena that are connected with sex life escaped the prevailing method of interpretation. As a matter of fact, it does not. What are to the modern mind the plainest and most obvious consequences of sex life, are to the primitive mind compelling proofs of supernatural activity. Nothing, for example, would appear less likely to misconception than the connection between sexual relations and the birth of children. Yet, on this head, Mr. Sidney Hartland has produced a mass of evidence, gathered from all parts of the world, and leading to the conclusion that in the most primitive stages of human culture conception and birth are regarded as due directly to supernatural influence. The wide vogue of magical practices to obtain children, practices that still exist in many parts of Europe, the unconcern among primitive peoples as to the male parent, the ignorance of early man concerning the functions of his own organism, with the universality of animistic beliefs, all lead Mr. Hartland to conclude that, to the primitive mind, childbirth is due to a more or less chance connection between woman and a supernatural world.* The common saying that God sends children thus points to what was at one time more than a mere figure of speech. It is reminiscent of a time when conception was actually attributed to ghostly influence.

With some peoples such a belief is still actually operative. Most of the Australian tribes believe that there are certain places where the tribal spirits congregate, and from whence they pounce upon women, and so secure rebirth. The man who desires that his wife shall have a child prays to these spirits to look with favor upon the woman and reincarnate themselves through her. On the other hand, the young woman who does not desire a child avoids passing these places, or assumes the manner of an aged woman in order to escape unnoticed. The Awunas, of West Africa, definitely assert that a child owes nothing to its father; everything comes from the mother and the ancestral spirit. The Queenslanders also deny the father any part in the production of the child. Mr. Hartland, in the work already named, gives numerous instances of a similar kind, and concludes that—

> "for generations and æons the truth that a child is only born in consequence of an act of sexual union, that the birth of a child is the natural consequence of such an act performed in favoring circumstances, and that every child must be the result of such an act and of no other cause, was not realised by mankind, that down to the present day it is imperfectly realised by some peoples, and that there are still others among whom it is unknown."

It is not surprising, therefore, to find from the earliest times a number of religious ceremonies connected with significant sexual phenomena. First, there is the always important fact of puberty. Mr. Stanley Hall, in his elaborate work on Adolescence (vol. ii., chap. 13), has brought together a very large number of practices connected with puberty, commencing with purely savage life, and ending with the modern Christian practice of confirmation. Almost universally, amongst uncivilised people, there is at this period a separation of the sexes, accompanied with fasting and magical practices. With most of the North American Indians, for instance, the boy, after being prepared by the priest, fasts until he receives a vision from the "great spirit." In nearly all these cases, as Frazer has pointed out, the governing idea is that at puberty the boy is brought into special relationship with the tribal gods, and in some there is the distinct, and probably earlier, notion that he receives into himself a portion of the divine spirit. In the case of girls, where the advent of puberty is marked by phenomena of a more startling character than those which occur with boys, the magical and supernatural rites are of a much more elaborate character. With boys, once puberty is attained, the sexual development is established and orderly. With girls, certain recurring phenomena make the essential fact of sex much more impressive to the uncivilised mind. A very general explanation

* Dr. Iwan Bloch; The Sexual Life of Our Time; p. 97.

* Primitive Paternity, 2 vols., 1909-10.

Digitized by Google

of menstrual phenomena is that the girl has been wounded by some spirit. This is the explanation given by some of the North American Indians, by the Siamese, and by many others.

But because the girl or the woman is brought into such close and frequent contact with the spirit world special precautions have to be taken concerning her. Contact with her at certain times is forbidden simply because she is spiritually infectious. Until the possessing spirit is cleared out, or has departed on its own account, the girl is dangerous. In Uganda, says Frazer, the pots which a woman touches while the impurity of childbirth or of menstruation is on her, must be destroyed. At similar times, with some of the North American tribes, women are forbidden to touch the weapons or utensils of men. No other person is so much dreaded amongst them as a woman enduring her periodic sickness. In Tahiti a woman is secluded for three weeks after childbirth, and must not touch food belonging to another. In the Island of Kadiah, off Alaska, a woman for twenty days after becoming a mother is so dangerous that even food is handed to her at the end of a stick.*

Among the Pueblo Indians it is believed that if a man touches a woman during certain seasons he will fall ill—that is, he will be attacked by an evil spirit. If a man touches her he becomes "taboo," as he may transmit the infection to others. So great is the possibility of infection that with some peoples women are prohibited from planting or preparing food. The spiritual germ might be conveyed from one to another in this way. And it is almost an inevitable extension of the same idea to conclude that, if a woman is highly dangerous at certain frequently recurring periods, she is more or less dangerous in between these times. Thus we find that the principles of "taboo" is made to cover many of the relations of woman to man. Kaffirs will not allow a woman to touch their cattle. In Tahiti, if a woman touches a man's weapons she robs them of their power. In New Guinea, for some days before fighting, warriors refrain from contact with women. A Hindoo wife does not eat with her husband. In New Zealand wives are not allowed to eat with even their male children lest their taboo should kill them.

It is needless to multiply instances; the same general idea governs all, and this is well expressed by Dr. Frazer:—

> "The object of secluding women at menstruation is to neutralise the dangerous influence which is supposed to emanate from them at such times. The general effect of these rules is to keep the women suspended, so to say, between heaven and earth. Whether enveloped in her hammock and slung up to the roof, as in South America, or elevated above the ground in a dark and narrow cage, as in New Zealand, she may be considered to be out of the way of doing mischief, since being shut off both from the earth and from the sun, she can poison neither of these great sources of life by her deadly contagion. The precautions thus taken to isolate and insulate the girl are dictated by regard for her own safety as well as for the safety of others..... In short, the girl is viewed as charged with a powerful force which, if not kept within bounds, may prove the destruction both of the girl herself and all with whom she comes in contact. To repress this force within the limits necessary for the safety of all concerned is the object of the taboos in question."†

Knowledge.

IN the Fourth Gospel the knowledge of God and eternal life are treated as absolutely synonymous terms. "This is eternal life," it says, "that they should know thee the only true God, and him whom thou didst send, even Jesus Christ." This is a perfectly safe statement, no one being competent to gainsay it. For all anybody knows, the knowledge of God does signify eternal life, because nobody has the slightest idea what either is. The only life that comes within the scope of our observation is this earthly life, which is not eternal; and all the beings of whom we possess any knowledge are denizens of this planet. Science informs us that space teems with solar systems which no man can number, and it can tell us of what material our sun is composed; but the only living beings known to it are to be found upon this earth. Far from us be the folly, of which scientists are so often falsely accused, "of putting aside as unverifiable everything which the senses cannot verify, everything beyond the bounds of physical science, everything which cannot be brought into the laboratory and dealt with chemically"; but we do make bold to affirm that no knowledge can be acquired except as the result of scientific investigation. Physical science is by no means the only science, but it must be admitted that all problems are, in the last analysis, problems of matter. The phenomena of consciousness are sometimes described as if they lay outside the legitimate limits of physical science, but in reality they are phenomena of the brain and nervous system; that is to say, phenomena of matter, and no knowledge of them is possible apart from matter. Even the feeling of music within us, from which many of us derive such exquisite delight, does not lie wholly outside the bounds of physical science, because it is dependent upon a specific condition of the nervous system, just as music itself is the outcome of a scientific combination of sounds. Now, as God is a being who is said to be "without body, parts, or passions," he is clearly not a subject that can be scientifically studied and known. Scientifically speaking, then, no knowledge of God is possible, a being "without body, parts, or passions" being simply unthinkable. Indeed, Mr. Bertrand Russell does not include God among the questions that can be intelligently discussed. In his admirable little book, entitled the Problems of Philosophy, in the Home University Library, God and immortality are coolly left out.

And yet we find the Chairman-elect of the Congregational Union, the Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon, of Stamford Hill, decrying science and its pretensions to knowledge. In a recent sermon, certain portions of which are published verbatim in the British Congregationalist for February 27, the reverend gentleman says:—

> "Along material lines what does anybody know? What are our definitions but our problems stated in different words? Who knows anything? Who can know along material lines? Science frankly deals with material things. What science tells us is of infinite value to industrial life. It is a magnificent gymnastic for the mind. But if you happen to have a sin eating like a corrosive acid into your consciousness, if you have a sorrow lying heavily upon your heart, if the dark camel comes to kneel at your door, if one of these days death should tap you on the shoulder with his wand, if the woe and wonder of this unintelligible world weigh upon you, if the deep-sea creatures of the soul should come to the surface crying for their food, that day you will utter a cry that will put to shame moon and stars, and the world, with all its wealth, will stand abashed and helpless, for you have asked for something it has not got."

No doubt, had it been permissible, most of Mr. Gibbon's hearers would have cheered that paragraph to the echo as irresistibly eloquent. We admit its eloquence, but deny its relevance. We maintain, in the first place, that if a man cries for something which this world cannot supply he is suffering from some serious disease and ought to be medically treated. All cries that are natural to a human being meet with satisfactory responses in Nature. The desire for knowledge, for sympathy, and for love finds complete fulfilment on earth. If a man falls into a bad habit, or is guilty of conducting himself to the injury of society, his "sin" can be satisfactorily dealt with only on scientific lines. All evil is, in itself, a curable disease; but whether or not it can be cured in any given case depends upon circumstance. In the second place, to Mr. Gibbon's question, "Who can know on material lines?" we return the answer, "Who can know on any but material lines?" All other lines are purely imaginary. Mr. Gibbon makes the mistake of charging science with hinting at "a dark god"; but as a matter of fact science hints at no god at all. It is true that it has a good deal to say about physical and chemical forces; but does the reverend gentleman deny or doubt the existence of such forces? If he does, what are his grounds; if he does not, what does he know about them? It is very cheap rhetoric to say that his dog that rubs against him, or his cat that wishes to fondle him, is a better deity than they. It is true that they do not answer prayer, or serve as special Providence, or pay the least heed to the whims of certain people; but in these respects they are only like the God in whom Mr. Gibbon believes.

Now the moment this divine begins to talk about his God he becomes irrational. He says, half quoting Scripture:—

> "We know that we are of God. We know that the Son of God is true, and we are in him that is true. The God that loves this poor life, the God that helps the helpless world, is the true God, and the Christ who died for the world is the true Christ."

Having delivered himself of that intimate statement concerning God, a statement which nothing but very close and full knowledge could justify, Mr. Gibbon assures us that "the only possible way of knowing God is to live God's life." This admission deserves to be printed in large letters of gold. The idea is indescribably rich. Fancy, if you can, a man getting to know God by living God's life! Are God and his life separable, so that the one may be known while the other is unknown? The idea of knowing the life of an unknown God is so ridiculous that we can only laugh it to scorn. "Act the God," exclaims Mr. Gibbon; but how on earth can we act a person of whom we have no knowledge? "Wherever there is a heart and a conscience," he continues, "there is a complete apparatus for knowing God." We deny it point blank, and confidently challenge the reverend gentleman to substantiate his wild assertion. There are at least five hundred millions of people with thoroughly good hearts and sensitive consciences who are absolutely ignorant about God, and the overwhelming majority of them actually disbelieve in his existence. They do not believe in him because they do not need him. They get on well enough without him. They forgive those who have wronged them, and are as firm as as a rock in the face of temptation. One naturally admires "the tender humor and the fire of sense in their good eyes"; and one is irresistibly drawn to them by the knowledge that they are so "full of heart for all, and chiefly for the weaker by the wall"; but they are without God in the world. Such people give the lie direct to Mr. Gibbon's teaching; and common sense does the same. The knowledge of God is an illusion that is passing.

Of course, the belief in God is immensely profitable. It provides a comfortable living for hundreds of thousands of men and women who would be left destitute were it suddenly to die out; but that is the only thing that it does for the world. Morally, mankind is all the poorer for cherishing it. It is a relic of savagedom, a survival of the Age of Ignorance, and in the twentieth century must be pronounced a misfit. But how are we to get rid of it? By persuading people of its unreality, by pointing out its origin and tracing its evolution, by shedding upon it the light of modern knowledge and thus exposing its irrationality and absurdity. It is a hopeful sign of the times that so many teachers at our various seats of learning openly repudiate it. Mr. G. E. Moore, Lecturer in Moral Science in the University of Cambridge, for example, has published a volume on Ethics, in which he expresses his positive unbelief in a supernatural being, whether called "God," "Reason," "The Practical Reason," "The Pure Will," "The Universal Will," or "The True Self." He says:—

> "It may seem to many people that the most serious objection to views of this kind is that it is, to say the least, extremely doubtful whether there is any being, such as they suppose to exist—any being who never wills what is wrong but always only what is right; and I think myself that, in all probability, there is no such being—neither a God, nor any being such as philosophers have called by the names I have mentioned" (Ethics, p. 151).

"Knowledge," says Tennyson, "is of things we see." In relation to God, at the very best, "we have but faith; we cannot know"; and the faith is not justified by a single evidence, not even the shadow of an evidence. The contemplation of the facts of life often caused Tennyson's own faith seriously to waver. His knowledge of the things he saw could not be harmonised with his belief in things he could not see. Darwin's knowledge killed his faith altogether. In the spread of knowledge, then, lies our only real hope for the future of the race.

The First Modern Man.—II.

A Lecture delivered before the Independent Religious Society (Rationalist), Chicago.

BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.

IN the Bible story, man finds the world a perfect paradise, which he spoils into a place of thorns and thistles. Was that ever true? In the Greek story, man finds the world a wilderness, which he cultivates into a garden. Can that idea ever become antiquated? The Bible represents the first man as wrecking his world; Æschylus represents the first man as mending his world. Adam robs the world of whatever beauty and loveliness it possessed; Prometheus, by stealing fire, gives to the world all that it possesses of goodness and beauty. The idea, then, that man is the maker of his world is a modern idea, though three thousand years old, because it is true to the facts; but the idea that man marred his world is a fiction, notwithstanding that many pulpits still proclaim it as the word of God.

Again, in the Bible story man's primary condition was one of innocence, and he owed his innocence to his ignorance. The moment he lost his ignorance he lost also his innocence. The Bible would have us believe that as long as man was ignorant he was happy. But is that true? In the Prometheus of Æschylus, man's primary condition was one of suffering and misery, due to his ignorance, which condition he changes into one of power and happiness through knowledge. Adam falls when he loses his ignorance; the Greek mounts through culture. Which of the two ideas is modern, in the sense of being true to the facts of experience?

There is still another difference to be noted between these two interpretations of life. The tree of knowledge in the Garden of Eden is represented as a temptation to man. That is to say, the Bible view makes the opportunity to acquire knowledge a temptation. To seek knowledge is to fall into sin. "God is like a parent who, to keep his children out of temptation, refuses to send them to school." Hence, the acquisition of knowledge, the opening of their eyes, strikes Adam and Eve with remorse. They are ashamed of the light, and they hide themselves. Was such a view ever true to life? But Prometheus glories in his conquest of knowledge, and is willing to suffer any punishment the gods can inflict for having kindled a flame which will never be extinguished. Prometheus is as old as Adam, but Prometheus is a modern man, while Adam was as much out of date in his day as he is to-day. Prometheus belongs to our world. He can feel at home with us of the twentieth century, and we with him of three thousand years ago. But Adam would be an alien in our midst, and his spirit and view-point would simply prove fatal to everything we cherish.

I trust we understand now what is meant by the word "modern." In his book on Averroes, Renan thinks Petrarch, who lived in the fourteenth century and was a co-worker with Dante and Boccaccio, was the first modern man. Figuratively speaking, Petrarch was the first to raise and send to the market samples of the products of the soil of Europe when the Greeks and the Romans farmed the land. But Renan also suggested that the Moorish philosoper, Averroes himself, was a harbinger of the Renaissance. For his heresies Averroes was condemned to sit at the door of the mosque, to be spat upon by every passer-by. To those who spewed their rheum upon his face he said: "Let me die the death of the philosopher." The honor of being the first modern man has by others been given to Bruno, whose life was extinguished at the stake in Rome. Others, again, reserve that proud distinction to Montaigne, who, they say, was the first to apply common sense to life. I believe it is impossible to single out any one man as the exclusive owner of that enviable title. When the sun rises in the morning more than one mountain peak catches his early glow. I have already mentioned a few of the tall minds upon whom the sun shone first, but there are a hundred others.

The earliest clear traces of Rational thinking in modern times, according to J. M. Robertson, appeared in the thirteenth century, in remarks attributed to Emperor Frederick II., whom Pope Gregory IX. denounced as "that pestilential monarch who says the world was cheated by three impostors, of whom two died in the height of power, while the third was hanged." The Pope also condemns the remark attributed to the same Frederick that "only fools believed the universal Creator was born of an unmarried girl." The further idea that "Men should believe nothing contrary to the laws of nature and reason" has also been ascribed to this monarch. Such sayings prove conclusively that their author is beginning to use his mind. He is reflecting. He is becoming critical. He demands respect for his intellect. He says, I.

The most effective instrument of the Renaissance against the old order and in the service of the new was the laugh. It would not be amiss to say that the laugh was the Renaissance argument par excellence. The laugh rejuvenated the ageing world. The great authors laughed hell and the Devil out of the people's minds. One of the things the laugher seeks to do is to remove the allaring glamor which makes so many things not debatable. The laugh secularises the solemn and the mock-sacred. Where there are hearty laughers, their cant and hypocrisy are nipped in the bud. Voltaire and Rabelais, with their exquisite humor and superb sarcasm drove humbug under cover. There is less stupidity in the world to-day because there are more laughers. One of the earliest poets to discover that the dogmas of the Church could not afford to be laughed at, was Luigi Pulci, whom Leigh Hunt calls "the most lovable among the great poets of the Renaissance." He was the author of a wonderfully suggestive book called Il Morgante Maggiore, or "Morgante the Great." This epic really bubbles over and is effervescent with keenest humor—but of the unbittered sort (John Owen, The Sceptics of the Italian Renaissance). It smarts, too, but just as the physician's healing hand, when feeling for the stone in the wound. There is in this work the very qualities which make the modern man—a joyous, large-hearted humanity, a Promethean defiance and jealousy of everything that threatens to repress or coerce the mind. Morgante the Great is an unbeliever, or a misbeliever, and he is converted to Catholicism by Orlando, the Christian. But what converted him? It is the answer to that question which reveals the subtle and sparkling criticism of Pulci against the stiffened and sombre religion of his day; and it was just such criticism as his that made the Renaissance possible. It must be remembered that in the Middle Ages a direct attack upon the Catholic Church meant death; hence, only indirectly, by innuendo and suggestion, could the thinkers voice or print their comments. One of the devices frequently resorted to by the Renaissance writers was to place their criticisms in the mouth of a jester or a fool. Shakespeare does that when he makes his clown in the Merchant of Venice, for instance, riddle Christian and Jewish theology with his blunt but searching questions. After permitting their own thought thus to leak out, the writers, when called to account for their heresies, excused themselves by the plea that they were only showing "how our holy religion appeared to a fool." In fact, the disguise was sometimes so perfect that the Churches recommended books of this nature to the faithful, mistaking them for the work of some pious author.

In the epic of Pulci, Morgante owes his conversion to Christianity, not to argument, or evidence, but to a dream. This is a splendid blow at a religion which counts on dreams and visions, on feverish states of the mind and the body for converts. The dream occupies a leading place in the Bible. It was in a dream, for instance, that Joseph learned the truth about Mary and her child. One of the greatest doctrines of the Christian Church, the incarnation, has for its basis little more than the dream of Joseph. Nearly all the doctrines and many of the holy relics of the Catholic Church were born of some dream. Morgante, the infidel, dreamed that he was assailed by a serpent. He called upon the gods for help, but none could help him. The dragon minded not any of the gods whose names he heard invoked. Then Morgante called on Jesus Christ and immediately the serpent released him. The mere mention of the name of Christ was more than a match for the serpent's might. "I am, therefore," he says to Orlando, "ready to become a Christian." Could any conversion be more spasmodic, irrational, or shallow? And yet even St. Paul was converted by a dream on the way to Damascus. The Renaissance poet, Pulci, exposes with his satire this cheap and easy "transmutation" of unbelievers into Christians.

And when the poet proceeds to give the evidence of Morgante's conversion he exposes indirectly, but none the less effectively, the immorality of the Christian conception of salvation. The converted Morgante is represented at first as being solicitous of the whereabouts of his brothers who had been slain in battle, and his parents who had died before they had been converted. Orlando tells him that they have all gone to hell, and he argues with the newly made Christian not to worry about such trifles. God has so arranged things, he goes on to explain, that in heaven there will not be uttered a single sigh, nor shall a single tear be shed for those of our own flesh and blood who may be burning in hell-fire. How does Orlando happen to be so sure of this? The priests have so informed him, and it has never occurred to him to question for one moment the authority of the priests. In all this the gentle poet is indirectly appealing to the sense of humanity, yea, and of decency, in man against a brutal creed that would turn the heart into a stone. When the converted giant expresses the fear that the priests might be in error on this delicate point, his Christian teacher replies that one of the duties of converts is never to doubt what a priest says. It is here Pulci points his finger at the incurable plague of the centuries—blind faith.

In the next place, Pulci represents Orlando as unwilling to believe that Morgante is really converted until the latter shall consent to the damnation of his relatives. Is not that a penetrating thrust? Does it not make orthodoxy quaver? A sharp stab like that tears its way into the very vitals of supernaturalism and makes an incision large enough for modern thought to enter with a rush. Morgante, however, proves the genuineness of his conversion by assuring Orlando that he has made up his mind not to grieve the least bit over his lost parents or brothers, but that, on the contrary, when he goes to heaven "he will behave like an angel." Could there be a more terrible arraingment of a religion which contorts the natural affections and makes the love of God put out the love of one's own father or mother? I would like to see a Calvanist or a Catholic read the Morgante Maggiore without a shudder for his creed.

In the twenty-fifth canto of this same work Pulci introduces the Devil, whom he names Ashtaroth. This is one of the best devils ever staged. So mild and philosophic is he that the most fastidious people even would have no reason to object to his society. Pulci's Devil is worth a hundred of Dante's grotesque and clumsy fiends. Milton's Satan was really diabolical. Goethe's Mephistopheles is a tease. The Bible Devil is an unspeakable combination. But the Ashtaroth of Pulci has qualities that endear him to the very people he is supposed to be conspiring against.

One of Charlemagne's generals happens to be in Egypt when he is needed in Europe. His participation in an approaching military engagement is urgent. But how to cover the distance from Egypt to Europe in time for the important battle, is the question. Who will transport the Paladin and his horse through the air from Egypt to Europe? There is only one being who can—the Devil. Did he not fly with Jesus to the top of the highest mountains, and set him down on the pinnacle of the Temple in Jerusalem? The Devil was the first flyer. All great and daring feats were at first believed to be possible only to the powers of evil. What the Devil had only courage to do once is now the latest victory of man. But it was fear of the Church which made men accuse the Devil for the hopes and ambitions they themselves entertained.

During the flight in the air, over land and sea, the sociable Devil entertains his charge with a philosophic disertation on things sacred. He thus encroaches upon the domain of the priests. But his discourse is so sane and beautiful that the Paladin cannot but express admiration for his guide, though he is the being for whom his religion has neither pity nor pardon. As they near the pillars of Hercules the Devil explains that there is a continent beyond the seas; that the world is round; and that there are people on the other side of the globe who "walk on their feet opposed to yours and worship other gods." The author of The Sceptics of the Renaissance, John Owen, thinks that this statement of Ashtaroth about the sphericity of the world was really the first clear assertion of that scientific truth in modern times. Pulci's Devil was also the first to announce the existence of the antipodes. In self-protection the poet had to put his prophecy in the mouth of the Devil. When Rinaldo, greatly puzzled by this revelation, asks whether people living on the other side of the globe could be saved, Pulci's Devil makes a reply which should put the theologians to shame: "Do you think," he says, "that a god died only for you?" To which he adds this quite modern and eternally true reflection—a reflection which is the creed of Rationalism to-day: "All goodness is acceptable, whatever the belief may be." Is there a Church whose teaching is as daring as that? But it was just such criticism as Pulci's—subtle, shrewd, incisive, witty, irresistible, luminous, laughing—which has opened our eyes to the folly and the conceit of sectarian shibboleths. And when Rinaldo expressed surprise that a Devil should have a heart, or feel pity, or entertain great hopes, or take an interest in the salvation of mankind, which if effected would put him out of business, so to speak, the Devil's reply is in these wonderful words: "Do you suppose that nobleness of nature is lost among us denizens of the lower regions? You know what the proverb says," he adds, "that there is never a fruit, however degenerate, but will taste of its stock. I was of a different order of being once"—then a lump rises in his throat, his eyes moisten, his voice trembles—"but it is as well not to talk of happy times." The fanatic Rinaldo, as he takes his leave of the Devil, is compelled to admit that even among devils, gentilleza, amicizia, et cortesia—gentleness, friendship, and courtesy are not unknown. Is it any wonder that the Florence of Lorenzo the Medici welcomed this saner and more human song of Pulci with enthusiasm. The Italians, we are told, adore Ariosto and admire Tasso, but they love Pulci. It was his intellectual health that became contagious in mediæval Europe. It was his laugh that helped to rip open the darkness of superstition. It was his joyous common sense which made the sunshine pleasant again, the air refreshing, the water of the springs drinkable, and life endurable. His touch made even the Devil modern, and his smile lit up the underworld. When Pulci came to die, the Church, among whose many saints it would be difficult to find a saint so generous or enlightened as Pulci's Devil—refused him Christian burial. His remains are not to be found in what is called consecrated ground. I know not what is, and what is not, consecrated ground. Does a crucifix make a place holy? Is it the churchyard that is sacred? I am not a judge of land values. But unconsecrated is the mind that does not hold something of the hopes and aspirations which throbbed in Pulci's, and unconsecrated is the life that is not devoted to the high and generous aims which made Pulci's thought the smile, and his laugh the music of the Renaissance.

Acid Drops.

There is a British Anti-Mormon League, and it lately held a meeting at Caxton Hall. One of the speakers, the Rev. G. Ernest Thorne, said he "wanted to see a law in this country making it penal for a Mormon elder to be found proselytising servant girls and young women." Evidently the reverend gentleman wishes to keep the servant girls and young women for the Christian Churches already existing in England. But it is to be recollected that ladies are comparatively scarce in all parts of the United States, including Utah, while England has an overplus of a million or so of the fair sex. This state of things may satisfy the Rev. G. Ernest Thorne, but why should Mormon elders be prevented by law from redressing the balance of the sexes?

There were two lady speakers (at least) at that Anti-Mormon meeting. Both of them seemed to believe, with the clerical speaker, that polygamy still exists amongst the Mormons in America. This is a mistake. Utah is now included in the United States, and monogamy is the law all over the Stars and Stripes territory. Whatever polygamy exists in Salt Lake City is just like the polygamy which exists in London.

One of the lady speakers said that "Mormonism was a great money-making machine; converts in England contributed £42,000 annually to the coffers of their president" Well, why not? This sum is nothing to the Peter's Pence fund that goes off to dear old Papa Sarto at Rome. The Salvation Army General expects a lot more than that from one week's Self-Denial Fund. It is a flea-bite to the funds of the Church presided over by the Archbishop of Canterbury. If one is an imposture so are all the rest. The game is a wretched one, but why not play it fair? Why should one long firm call upon the police to stop another? Honor amongst —— ! The proverb is somewhat musty.

George Macdonald, of the New York Truthseeker, has held his pawky humor too much in subjection since the death of his brother, whom he succeeded in the editorial chair. We think he is mistaken in this, but of course he is the best judge of his own policy as a practical question in view of his own public. We are glad to see, however, that stern repression has not annihilated our far-off colleagues congenital taste for the humorous side of things. Here is a neat sample from the last number of the Truthseeker to hand:—"Professor Bergson, it is said, was first introduced to America by William James, the Harvard professor who gave us 'pragmatism,' which we understand to be the doctrine that a thing is true if it works, or in other words that a bad half dollar is good if you can pass it." We are responsible for the italics. "George" is responsible for the wit.

A Little Tour in India, by the Hon. R. Palmer, is a book which we have not read, but we judge from a review of it in the Observer that the author takes a favorable view of missionary work in India. This is what the reviewer says:—

> "Few people who have not been in actual touch with the facts realise how rapidly some sections of the Indian people are being Christianised, or how genuine are the moral effects of conversion. It is true that progress is practically limited to the lower castes or 'outcastes,' but it is significant that a Christian witness is recognised as carrying more weight in a court of justice than a Hindoo, and that the honesty inculcated by the new faith is already becoming a commercial asset. If the missions are doing nothing else, they are raising up an alternative educated class whose superior morality may enable it to supplant the Brahmins in administrative work. If that prospect should be fulfilled, it would solve some notable difficulties in the Government of India. And the number of native Christians has increased by a million in the last ten years."

A military correspondent, who sent us this cutting, tells a very different tale. "My experience of forty years in India is diametrically opposed to the conclusions arrived at by the author of this book. The native of Southern India uncontaminated by the missionary is an infinitely more reliable man than the Christian convert." This is the general verdict of travellers. "Rice Christians" are known all through the East, where it is recognised that the missionaries have to keep the converts they make, in some way or other. What a world of meaning, too, there is in the statement that the Christian converts' word is accepted in preference to the Hindoo's in courts of law. The "acceptance," of course, is mere partisanship, and has no relation to truth or honor. Such acceptance obtains in all Christian countries. It is one of the privileges of belonging to the ruling faith.

The high-minded editors of the illustrated dailies have been publishing the portrait of a boy "hero" who swallowed a snail. Surely the record for this sort of thing is held by the Hebrew prophet who swallowed the whale. Or was it the whale who swallowed the prophet? One of them swallowed the other, anyhow.

In a political riot in Budapest revolvers and stones were used. These people make quite a religion of their politics.

A little mild profanity sometimes crops up in the daily papers. The Evening News recently, in an obituary notice of the late Sir William White, had a saucy headline, "Greatest Shipbuilder the World has ever Seen—not excepting Noah." But the old Bible shipbuilder's greatest speciality was not his vessel but his menagerie.

A very amusing discussion is now in progress in the Christian Commonwealth upon the subject, "Is Christianity the Final Religion?" Eminent scholars have already taken part in the debate; but the significant fact is that no two of them agree as to what Christianity is, or as to what is meant by finality. Professor Cheyne, of Oxford, expressed the opinion that "the religion of Jesus is not a final but an ever-expanding religion." It is the belief of this divine that Christianity is elastic enough to make room for "natural science, philosophy, and history, including the ancillary study of philology." Indeed, the Babai religion has an advantage over the Christian, in that it is more elastic still, and denies that any existing religion can be the final one. Professor Cheyne concludes in this heterodox fashion:—

> "At any rate, history is a son of God, and has, in the power of God, remade the religions of men. None of the great religions have grown up entirely from the original roots, and syncretism is largely responsible for the existing forms of the religions. And of none of the great religions can it be said that its expansion is complete. The only defensible position is that of the leaders of the Babai movement.....to adopt any good thing that other religions have .....As the sagacious critic, Professor Jowett, said, the Babai movement may not impossibly turn out to have the promise of the future. He, too, thought that Christianity was not the final religion."

Coming from a Christian minister, a dignitary of the Church of England, that is not at all bad.

The Rev. Dr. Walter Walsh, the present minister of the Theistic Church, is in substantial agreement with Professor Cheyne. To him, Christianity is "a conception compounded of the mythological notions of Mithraism, Greek hero-worship, and Platonism, Buddhism, Gnosticism, along with the political elements of Jewish Messianism"; and the improbability is, to his mind, "that such a conception will continue to satisfy the human soul throughout the future ages of expanding science, rationality, and democracy." Until a few months ago Dr. Walsh was a Christian minister at Dundee; and yet this is what he now says about the worship of Christ:—

> "I am well aware of the wealth of sentiment and affection lavished upon the 'Christ' ideal. That makes no difference to the fact that it is lavished not upon a supernatural person existing objectively to the mind, but upon an ideal conceived subjectively in the minds of passing generations, and therefore liable to change and elimination as humanity grows."

Dr. Lyman Abbott, however, though an admirer of the broad-minded Henry Ward Beecher, holds the orthodox view that Christianity, being the one perfect religion, is also of necessity the final. Unfortunately, his definition of Christianity is by no means orthodox; and Christianity, as he defines it, has never yet existed. What is beyond doubt is that historic Christianity is doomed; and our earnest hope is that it is the last religion to darken and confuse the mind of man.

Dr. Rigby, the chairman of the Health Committee of the Preston Town Council, has been arguing that smaller families give children a chance of being brought up properly. It appears that the Preston death-rate has been exceeding the birth-rate lately,—which rather astonishes us considering how strong the Roman Catholic Church is in that city. Dr. Rigg did not agree with Dr. Rigby. Small families, he said, meant moral rottenness. It was disobedience to God. Parents should have plenty of children, and God would help to keep them. That is what the Church parson said to the woman in the story. He told her that God never sent mouths without loaves to fill them. "Yes," she replied, "but he too often sends the mouths to one house and the loaves to another."

"It is absolutely essential," says the Bishop of Bristol, "that a clergyman should read the Word of God in a different way from any other book." Of course, the reading of the Bible may be performed in a capable or incapable manner; but why in a way different from any other book? If one really wants to appreciate whatever is of genuine literary value in the Bible, it should be read exactly as one reads other books. Really what the Bishop of Bristol means is that a clergyman should cultivate a special tone and manner when reading the Bible, and so supply the necessary element of hocus-pocus that will duly impress the unthinking and the credulous.

A religious contemporary warns English people that the natives of India do not understand the governmental attitude of neutrality in matters of religion. They can understand either patronage or oppression; but when the Government of India neither supports nor condemns, the conclusion they come to is that in its eyes the teaching of religion is of less importance than is he teaching of arithmetic. Well, but as a matter of fact, do not Christians, in practice, act as though they were of exactly this opinion? If it came to appointing a clerk in a bank or in an office, which would be considered of the greater importance—accuracy in arithmetic or correctness of doctrine? Whom would a Christian minister on his way to India sooner trust—an Atheistic captain but a skilled navigator, or a fervent Christian but a regular duffer at navigation? As a matter of fact, neutrality in religion does imply that religious belief is of subsidiary importance. It is practically saying that, while in the interests of the common welfare Government must insist upon certain duties, and see that the rising generation gets certain instruction, religion may be left alone, or left out altogether. This is the bottom reason why deeply religious people have so seldom been in favor of toleration.

In the Modern Churchman, the Rev. H. Northcote has an article on the mediæval hell, and in the course of his essay puts the question, "Did this awful doctrine of hell reinforce morality?" His reply is in the negative, and he adds that—

> "Many in desperation plunged into wild orgies which ended in intense misery. The effect of the doctrine was rather to drive men mad, and all Europe in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries seemed on the verge of madness, so colossal were the social evils. The great deliverance from the mediæval notion of a geographical hell came from the discoveries of science. First, the old Greek conception of the roundness of the earth was recovered and substantiated by Copernicus and other thinkers; then Magellan, Columbus, and others verified the conclusions, and their voyages definitely proved that the earth was round."

There is nothing novel in what Mr. Northcote has to say. It has been part of elementary Freethought ever since there has been any sort of organised propaganda. What Mr. Northcote has to say is, however, true, even to the fact that it was secular science that acted as the great corrective to Christian barbarism and religious brutality.

But when Mr. Northcote has said this much, he leaves unnoticed an equally important aspect of life. For our own part, we should not care to make the sweeping statement that in the sixteenth century all Europe was on the verge of collective madness. It would have been had everybody really felt all that the Christian doctrine of damnation involved. But in its more brutal, more honest form, Christianity could only be accepted by masses of people on condition that they either did not realise what it really meant, or that they gave it an interpretation which humanised it, or, finally, that people should have become so brutalised by it as to face with equanimity the prospect of the eternal damnation of millions of their fellows. As a matter of fact, all these things actually resulted. Some did go mad as a consequence of Christian teaching. The better minds suffered under it, the coarser ones became still coarser. The power of Christianity over the naturally better type of character has always been enormously exaggerated, and over the lower type its main influence has been to accentuate its worst features. And Mr. Northcote should remember that the period he is dealing with was the golden age of Christianity. It is the time when we see Christianity in the full strength of its teaching and influence. And a more barbarous and demoralising set of teachings never, either before or since, dominated the human mind.

When the Shoreditch Coroner asked a witness of what nationality he was, he received the bright answer, "Church of England." On further inquiry the "English Churchman" was found to be of German descent.

The Daily Herald has made the discovery that the "outside public hates scientific scepticism." The "outside public" do not read scientific works, and probably would not understand them if they tried to. Such people evidently prefer "literature" like the Daily Herald.

There are some Christians who appear to be under the impression that everything decent in the world began with the birth of Jesus Christ. There are others who count only from the Protestant reformation of the sixteenth century. And there are still others who date only from the beginnings of Wesleyan Methodism. To this latter class belongs, apparently, the Rev. J. Scott Lidgett, the editor of the Methodist Times. In a recent issue, Mr. Lidgett informed his readers that in his belief and that of "competent historians," "the rise of Methodism is at the very centre of the humanitarian movement of modern times." We do not know who are the "competent historians," but in our opinion Methodism has about as much to do with the rise of the modern humanitarian movement as with the Copernican astronomy. Dr. Lidgett himself confesses that "the generations that immediately succeeded Wesley.....did not play the part that might have been expected of them in rousing the conscience of England to a sense of the hideous social conditions that then prevailed." So that evidently the humanitarian movement got along for a generation without the help of Methodism. Not only did it manage without help from organised Methodism, but many of the most glaring evils of English industrial life grew up side by side with the development of English evangelism. Children were being murdered in factories, and women degraded in mines. The land of the country was being stolen from those to whom it belonged, and laws passed for the deliberate purpose of driving the peasantry into the power of manufacturers. English prison laws were among the most brutal in Europe, and attack after attack was being made upon the liberty of press and public. During all this time Methodism, in the words of Dr. Lidgett, was "organising its resources as a rising Church." And as a consequence, to again quote our Methodist editor, it "was disabled from seeing and serving the social needs of the country." That is the truth, at last. When people's heads are filled with theology they have room in it for little else. And the real influence of organised Methodism was to so fill people's minds with "other-worldism" that they could be the more easily exploited.

Sir Harry Johnston, presiding at a lecture by Professor Henry Balfour on the "Earliest Inhabitants of South Africa," said that men like the lecturer were "trying to spell out an imperfect chapter in the latest and greatest Bible—the book of the earth itself." The mental horizon had widened during the past century, religion and science were now friendly, and we were "endeavoring to find out what was God's object in bringing the world and man into existence." We thought Sir Harry Johnston knew better than to talk in this way. "God's object" will be known when he discloses it. But is there a God? That is the first question.

According to an advertisement in the Evening News, 110 Municipal Reform candidates at the London County Council Election were in favor of the Sunday opening of cinematograph shows, whilst only 27 Progressives were so minded. Unfortunately, so many "Progressives" are illiberal Nonconformists.

The vicar of St. Paul's Church, Moseley-road, Birmingham, is of opinion that it is "unfair to churches to provide entertainments during hours of divine service." Oh, these clerical protectionists! When they take their shutters down they want everybody else's shutters up. They know they cannot stand against open competition; so they call for a close time for their entertainments, which have long been ceasing to entertain.

The Christian World says that "the invasion of Sunday rest is one of the most melancholy features of modern London life," and announces that the publicans will join the crusade against the Sunday opening of picture palaces. We are not surprised at this. The public-house and the church seem to be the only two places injured by Sunday entertainments, and we are not astonished that when their mutual interests are threatened they are ready to unite forces against a common danger.

It is not often the truth of the situation is put as openly as is done by the editor of the Church Family Newspaper. This gentleman calls on all religious people in the community to "put an end to these counter attractions to public worship." That is the gist of the situation. Everything else is a mere subterfuge.

"From Manger to Cross" was running at a moving-picture house at Pontefract. One evening, before the picture was thrown upon the screen, the vicar (the Rev. W. Gell) stepped upon the stage and conducted "a short service of prayer." "This created a marked effect," the report said. We should think so, indeed. The impudence of the average man of God is simply astounding. In this case it was particularly so. Mr. Gell took his trade out with him to a place of public amusement, and forced it upon the attention of the audience, and wound up by calling for "No smoking and no applause." We suggest that the next time he wants an advertisement at a picture show he should pay for it at the usual rates. It ought to go among the business advertisements thrown upon the screen during an interval.

Mr. Julian Grande has been telling the Camera Club that he succeeded in entering "Aaron's Tomb" on the top of Mount Hor. Did he find Aaron's blooming rod there and the recipe for his patent macassar?

Among the recent clerical wills were those of the Rev. Charles Elsee, of Rugby School, who left £41,485, and the Rev. Canon Degge Wilmot Sitwell, Vicar of Leamington Hastings, Warwickshire, who left £59,673.

Germany (says Tit-Bits) has an increasing number of persons without any religious profession. The number has grown from 17,000 in 1907 to nearly 206,000. We venture to say that even these figures are far from an accurate statement of the case. There are crowds of Freethinkers who don't and won't make any public declaration of the fact. The great bulk of the Social Democrats, for instance, are known to be Anti-Christian.

A strike of bakers is feared in London. Christians had better find the present address of the individual who fed five thousand people with two sardines and three bath buns.

In a recent number of the Daily Herald, a writer on "Current Literature" says that "Gone is defiant materialism or anti-theologism." It is this sort of nonsense that makes people complain that the halfpenny papers are edited by office boys for errand boys.

A street-corner mission which was eternally collecting money had its banner altered by a humorist who did not leave his address behind. On the following Sunday the procession started, preceded by the amusing text suspended on a pole, "In the midst of life we are in debt."

A favorite hymn of the Brotherhood movement is Ebenezer Elliott's "God Save the People." Unfortunately, as Carlyle long ago pointed out, "God does nothing." In other words, is "good for nothing."

Africa), £2 2s.; H. S. Salt, £1 1s.; G. Smith, 10s.; G. R. Harker, £2 2s.; R. Stirton and Friends, Dundee (quarterly), £1 10s.; E. Kirton, 5s.

"HOMELESS."—An excellent letter, especially the parts relating to the Sunday question and the Blasphemy Laws. This is not a reflection on the other parts; it only means that they do not specially concern us in these pages. We wish Freethinkers would use the local press much more liberally than they do.

R. BELL.—We don't see that we can make copy out of it for this journal.

J. W. HACKETT.—This year, probably; but not this winter. Thanks for cuttings: see paragraph.

C. C.—The Life of Charles Bradlaugh, by his daughter, Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner, and Mr. J. M. Robertson, is what you want. There is a half-crown edition of it published by Fisher Unwin. Glad you found our Reminiscences of Bradlaugh "very interesting," leading you to desire "a fuller record."

E. B.—Many thanks for cuttings.

W. PALMER.—We also wish your purse were larger and better furnished.

A. MILLAR.—We have informed Mr. Cohen that you find his book on Determinism "very effective in debate." Mr. Foote will probably be visiting Glasgow in the fall if the Branch can find a hall by then for his lectures.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are always welcome.

G. CROOKSON.—Very well; there is no particular hurry.

S. M. PEACOCK.—Let us hope for better times.

R. D. VOSS.—Good wishes reciprocated.

G. SMITH hopes the P. H. Fund "will not lag this year as it did last."

A. MANN.—Even if we did answer such letters by post we should have to decline substantiating other persons' statements, either from the platform or otherwise.

J. W. H. DAVIS.—If you derive so much benefit and pleasure from the Freethinker we can understand your regret at not having met with it many years earlier. Thanks for your encouraging letter.

G. R. HARKER.—Glad you are taking the English Review for March; hope many of our readers will do so.

ROBERT TAYLOR.—Milman's History of the Jews is good in its way, and also cheap. Renan's great book is expensive, but you might find it in a Manchester library.

R. STIRTON.—Many thanks.

R. CHAPMAN.—Shall be carefully considered.

J. B.—Tuesday is too late for this week; must wait till next. We note your praise of the English Review for "beaking down the long and shameful press boycott of Mr. Foote."

J. W. DE CAUX.—Pleased you think the last week's front article "splendid"—for there are few, if any, better judges.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

There was a fine meeting at the Leicester Secular Hall on Sunday evening, in connection with the celebration of the thirty-second anniversary of the opening of the Hall. Mr. Sidney A. Gimson, the Secular Society's president, opened the proceedings with a gratifying statement of the recent work and progress of the Society. It was pleasant to see the good terms that he and the audience were on with each other. Mr. Mentor Gimson was present also—as a listener, smiling benevolently at every good thing that was said. The chairman's speech was deservedly applauded. Mr. Foote was the next speaker. He delivered no formal address, but just spoke for three quarters of an hour without a note, suitably to the occasion, and with particular reference to the late Mr. Josiah Gimson, Mr. Michael Wright, and other stalwarts who founded the Leicester Secular Society. Mrs. Adams spoke a few words for the lady members, Mr. A. C. Brant for the Sunday School, and Mr. Ronald Eagle for the Young People's Secular Society. This was a very agreeable feature of the proceedings. Another agreeable feature was the singing, in which Miss Burford, Mr. Harris, and Mr. Ligo acquitted themselves finely. Altogether it was a most enjoyable function. We wish a similar one could take place in every fair-sized town in England.

The Secular Education League's Annual Meeting will be held at Room 18, Caxton Hall, Westminster, on Tuesday evening, March 11, at 7.30. Members are earnestly invited to attend. A public meeting will follow at 8.15. The list of speakers includes Mr. Halley Stewart, Mr. George Greenwood, M.P., Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., Rev. Walter Walsh, D.D., and Mr. G. W. Foote. We hope there will be a really good attendance. There ought to be, considering that the Government promises or threatens to deal with the Education question again in the near future.

There should be a good attendance at the first public meeting organised by the Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws, which takes place at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, on Friday evening, March 14. The chair will be occupied by the Rev. Copeland Bowie, and the list of speakers includes Sir W. P. Byles, Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Mr. G. W. Foote, Lord Harberton, Mr. A. L. Atherley Jones, K.C., M.P., and Sir Hiram Maxim. We may add that Essex-street is on the south side of the extreme east end of the Strand.

Mr. Cohen was really suffering from a bad attack of influenza. We are glad to hear he is well on the way to recovery, but the road is rather longer than was expected. Mr. Cohen had to forego his Manchester visit on Sunday. We have strongly urged him to take no risks at all until he is thoroughly recovered. We begin to shiver ourselves when any one of our co-workers is ill. There are so few of us in this enterprise. And man is mortal. And nature, or "providence," or whatever it is, knocks out the useful just as readily as the useless.

The author of that very able and useful book, The Churches and Modern Thought, subscribing to the President's Honorarium Fund, writes:—"I take this opportunity of saying how much I appreciate the Freethinker; the articles always excellent and the 'Acid Drops' amusing and to the point. I only wish it had a larger circulation and could be seen by those who are less confirmed than myself in the need for militant Freethought."

Mr. H. S. Salt, writing to Mr. J. W. de Caux, with a contribution to the President's Honorarium Fund, says it is from "one who has long admired Mr. Foote's high abilities and devotion to a great cause."

The advertisement of the March number of the English Review in the Times tickled us a good deal. It was a boldly displayed advertisement, the conspicuous lines being "The Lesson of the Balkan War, by F.M. Lord Roberts," and "George Meredith—Freethinker," by G. W. Foote"—all the other contents being briefly indicated in a sort of footnote. We can guess Lord Roberts's feelings on seeing himself in such company. Our own feeling is simply one of amusement. The serious side of the matter is the courage of the English Review management. They have broken "the boycott of Foote" with a vengeance.

Mr. W. Bailey, a Manchester veteran, and a generous supporter of the Freethinker and other advanced efforts, writes us:—

> "I have read your Meredith article four times. It is a magnificent piece of work. You have laid the Freethought party under a deep obligation to you. Freethinkers should not fail to get, read, and pass on the English Review for March. There is no doubt of where Meredith stood."

Mr. Bailey would like to pay for some copies to be sent by us to persons who would like to have the magazine but cannot buy it. He shall be gratified.

Mr. Walter Stewart, who read the first number of the Freethinker and every number since, is seventy-two years of age. He is a candidate for the 1913 Pension Election in connection with the Printers' Pension and Almshouse Corporation. His address is 52 Hampden-road, Hornsey, N. Can any of our readers give him a vote? We hope so.

Mr. Elijah Copeland, who has been identified with the Freethought movement in the North of England for more than half a century, takes the chair this evening (March 9) at the address by Mr. D. R. Bowe to the South Shields N. S. S. Branch. Further particulars appear in our "Lecture Notices."

The Lisbon Freethought Congress, 1913.

THE International Freethought Federation has now issued its Manifesto in reference to the forthcoming Freethought Congress at Lisbon. The date of the Congress is fixed for October 6, 7, and 8, 1913, and the opening ceremonies, which will be on an imposing scale of magnificence, will coincide with the third celebration of the foundation of the Portuguese Republic (October 5, 1910). From every sentimental and historic point of view, the Lisbon Congress will be an unique international assembly, so far as Portugal is concerned. It will be graced by all that is most distinguished in the political and literary life of the country, and the duty of securing its success should, therefore, appeal with especial force to the Freethinkers of all shades and complexions in every civilised country. The Congress will, moreover, rally to its support a large number of Freethinkers and Republicans from Spain, who will doubtless derive fresh inspiration as they witness the brilliant achievements in social and political emancipation of the victorious Republicans and Freethinkers of Portugal. Success for the forthcoming Congress is thus all the more necessary in order that a definite set-back may be given, by the combined efforts of organised international Freethought, to the inroads of reaction and clericalism in Portugal and elsewhere. Portugal, since the establishment of the Republic, has secularised all its institutions, and, although the Augean stable of monarchical and ecclesiastical impurities requires much labor and time before the crimes and neglect of the past can be obliterated, Portugal's achievements in the secularisation of education and of the public services of the State will stand honorable comparison with the labors of the French Republic, which—be it remembered—had over forty years during which to operate, and longer years of liberty in which to learn the salutary lessons of freedom.

The foreign delegates to the Congress will be invited to the great Fêtes which the Portuguese Government will organise in October to celebrate the third anniversary of the proclamation of the Republic. The heartiness of the welcome which on this momentous occasion will be accorded to the international delegates will astound and gratify the hosts of Freethought assembled in Portugal's beautiful capital. The head of the Government, Senhor Affonso Costa, one of the chief glories of Portuguese Freethought, will attend the inaugural ceremony of the Congress, a fitting corollary to the splendid example of Dr. Theophilo Braga, who, a few days after his instalment as Provisional President of the new Republic, presided over the National Freethought Congress. The subjects appointed for discussion at the Congress in October are as follows:—

1. The Portuguese law separating Church and State; its political results, and the modifications that should be made therein.
2. By what method can we realise a system of Rationalist Education that shall be solely compatible with Freethought?
3. Freethought and the Social Question.

It is anticipated that a large number of delegates will attend the discussions on these interesting themes, and that the ripened experiences of the most capable specialists in the treatment of these questions will contribute a valued quota of facts and conclusions to the elucidation of these problems, which are living problems of universal application, and fraught with intense practical issues in the evolution of the modern State. The representatives of English Freethought must not be unseen and unheard during these deliberations.

Lisbon—to cite the words of our friend Magalhaes Lima—is one of the most Freethinking cities of the world. In expelling the Jesuits, and suppressing the religious congregations, in promulgating the law of divorce, the law of civil registration, and the law separating the Church and the State, little Portugal, small territorially, but great by its Republic, deserves, as it were, by right of its secular conquests, the visit of every Freethinker and Freemason. The proposition which Magalhaes Lima made at the Munich Congress last year to hold the next International Freethought Congress at Lisbon was hailed with delight and voted by acclamation. The Congress, which will be held practically under the auspices of the Portuguese Republic, will be the answer of organised international Freethought to the insolence of the Catholic Church, which, in its recent Eucharistic Congresses, has flung defiance at human reason and Freethought. At the recent Eucharistic Congress at Vienna, the reactionary Government in Austria armed every soldier with twenty ball cartridges, and ordered the troops not to fire in the air or on the ground, but to aim straight. As Magalhaes Lima remarks, this blustering exhibition of the most secret mystery of the Christian religion, which was thus invested with the brutal machinery of coercion proper to the Middle Ages, took us back to the time of Charlemagne; incidentally, it offered one more proof of the undying hostility of Christianity to the Rationalist spirit of the twentieth century.

Concurrently with the International Freethought Congress, there will be held, also at Lisbon, an International Congress of Freemasonry. As everybody knows, Freemasonry on the continent of Europe is practically Freethought organised on special lines of permeation and political activity, and the consequence will be that next October two convergent streams of international Rationalism will be poured from all parts of the world into the Portuguese capital. These two Congresses will have the inestimable advantage of uniting in one and the same "spiritual" communion the Masons and Freethinkers of Latin America (Brazil, Argentine, Chili, Mexico, Uruguay, etc.); of the Grand Orient de France, Italy, and Spain, and last, but not least in intellectual significance, it will bring the new thought of Republican China into fructifying contact with the Freethinkers and Masons of our Western civilisation. Like Rome, Lisbon is seated upon seven hills, but, unlike Rome, this beautiful city represents the modern revolt of the human intellect against the monstrous superstition begotten in the brains of Christian fanatics. Her hospitality to the Freethought delegates will, I am assured, be as broad and majestic as the unrivalled glories of its spacious Tagus.

Magalhaes Lima, from whose magnificent address at Lausanne I have already culled,* will be one of the leading spirits of the Lisbon Congress. For many years he was the untiring apostle of Freethought, the staunch enemy of the Braganza monarchy, and one of the chief heralds of the Portuguese Republic. For years an exile from Portugal, he familiarised his mind with all the advanced movements of political thought and mental emancipation throughout the world. He has suffered much and labored titanically for liberty of thought and for social freedom in his beloved country. The success of the forthcoming International Congress at Lisbon will be the fitting crown and reward of his splendid devotion to the noblest of all causes—the cause of Freethought and international peace. As Senator of the new Republic and Grand Master of the Portuguese Freemasons, his eyes have been gladdened by the recent inauguration of the Portuguese Republic and the Republic of China, "the two greatest events of this beginning of a new century." He is now on the eve of his departure for China, with the members of the different parliamentary groups, and, as the artisan and prime creator of the Portuguese Republic, will take with him to China the message of sympathy and solidarity of all those in Europe or elsewhere who want to see a peaceful and a progressive Chinese Republic established on a basis of Rationalism and humanity. He will tell the Chinese people that the Europeans are not all cretinised, à la Chrétienne, and that the true interests of the Yellow Race are bound up with industry, science, and Freethought. Not the least amongst his services to Rationalism will be the stimulation, through his commanding influence, of an active participation of the Chinese intellectuals in the Freethought trend of ideas in the Western world. As Magalhaes Lima himself remarks, in his Lausanne lecture:—

> "Of the Chinese revolution, it may be said that it was a more formidable event than any of the conquests of Alexander or the campaigns of Napoleon. It was the destruction of the old wall, supposed to be eternally guarded by immemorial dragons and favored by Heaven; as if the children of Heaven could resist the sledge-hammer blows of the demolishers of Gods and idols! There are no longer any more mysteries on earth than there are in Heaven. The telescope has unbared the latter to our eyes and put them into the category of astronomic phenomena. Heaven and Hell are unable to resist the scalpel of Science."

It is this splendid faith in progress and humanity, this enlightened idealism, that enabled our friend Magalhaes Lima to build the Republic of his ardent dreams and establish in the hearts of many thousands of Portuguese people a glowing enthusiasm for Freethought. On his return from China, his admirers, gathered from all parts of the world at Lisbon, will witness in the great Congress, with its touching enthusiasms for splendid ideals, the fruit of his long and incessant labors for Freethought and humanity.

WILLIAM HEAFORD.

The Golden Rule.

THE injunction, "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets," has been extolled as the very pith of Christian ethics. It has been emphatically denominated "the golden rule," and it has been supposed that nothing less than a divine revelation could have imparted to humanity the knowledge of so important a standard of conduct. This position, however, has been modified somewhat since evidence has been forthcoming that the rule is neither peculiar nor original to Christianity, but is found in authors anterior to the Christian era.

The sentiment of reciprocity in truth is one that is early developed in humanity. It springs from the notion of right evolved from the sense of special possession, and is even seen in animals, who find a modus vivendi in recognition of mutual rights. "The germ of conscience," it has been said, "lies in the struggle for existence having become aware of itself in the mind of a thinking person." When once a savage felt that it was wrong to take his life and the means whereby he lived, and saw the same feelings manifested by others, the transferring of the sense of wrong, and the contrasted sense of right, to others, would only be a work of time depending on the development of the reflective faculties and the social instincts by the ever constant action of natural selection weeding out the socially unfit.

No great mental effort would be needed for the savage, who feels it is wrong for another to deprive him of his property on a particular occasion, to infer that it is wrong for anyone else, at any time, so to act. No doubt there was a difficulty in recognising the equivalence of duties by and to the self, for, as Schopenhauer says, pure egoism would kill a man for the fat wherewith to grease its own boots; but mutual dependence and tribal living in common unfailingly bring the sense of identity of interests. "Do not wrong me, and I will not wrong you; I do not hurt you, why do you hurt me?" are the natural and spontaneous utterances of the sense of right as seen alike in savages and children. The rule of reciprocity beginning among friends extends itself as relationships of interests are extended.

Unsocial instincts also develop on the lines of reciprocity. The wild feeling of revenge for injury inflicted grows into a principle of returning a similar injury. The lex talionis, a life for a life, "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth," is the primitive rule. "Tit for tat" is the justice of the savage, and is not without its relics in the criminal codes of the civilised world. Yet this is the germ of reciprocity, and "the golden rule."

Professor Max Müller has already cited instances of this feeling directed towards the gods, from what is probably the oldest writing in the world, the Rig-Veda of the Hindus. In the notes to his translation of the "Hymns of the Marats," or "Storm Gods," he says:—

> "I think it best to connect the fourth and fifth verses, and I feel justified in so doing, and by other passages where the same or a similar idea is expressed—viz., that if the god were the poet, and the poet the god, then the poet would be more liberal to the god than the god is to him. Thus I translated a passage (vii., 31, 18) in my History of Sanskrit Literature, p. 565: 'If I were lord of as much as thou, I should support the sacred bard, thou scatterer of wealth; I should not abandon him to misery, I should award wealth day by day to him who magnifies, I should award it to whosoever it be.' Another parallel passage is pointed out by Mr. J. Muir (on the interpretation of the Veda, p. 79, viii., 19-25); 'If Agni thou wert a mortal, and I were an immortal, I should not abandon thee to malediction or to wretchedness; my worshipers should not be miserable or distressed.' Still more to the point is another passage, viii., 44, 23: 'If I wert thou, and thou wert I, thy wishes should be fulfilled.'"

The Rev. J. Stevenson, in his translation of the Sama Veda (p. 276), puts the following in the mouth of the singer: "When I, O Indra, shall become a possessor of wealth like thee, then assuredly my singer of sacred hymns shall possess abundance of cows." In the Odyssey, Calypso tells Ulysses she acts as she would wish to be done to were her fate the same. Hesiod enjoins "To all a love for love return." Herodotus relates how, when Mæandrius yielded up the supreme power to the citizens of Samos, he said: "I shall certainly avoid doing that myself which I deem reprehensible in another." The same historian tells how, when the Spartans, who went to Xerxes as a voluntary atonement for their country, were asked by the Persian Hydarnes to enter the service of the king, they replied: "To you servitude is familiar; but how sweet a thing liberty is you have never known; if you had, you yourself would advise us to make all possible exertions to preserve it." So, in Xenophon's Cyropædia, Cyaxares says to Cyrus: "If I appear to you to think unreasonably in this, do not consider these things as in my case, but turn the tables and make the case your own." Diogenes Laertius relates of the Greek sage Thales that when asked how we might live virtuously, he replied: "If we never do ourselves what we blame in others." Isocrates, in one of his orations, tells the Athenians: "You err against the first principles of wisdom, condemning in others what you yourself pursue." In his admonition to Nicocles, Isocrates says: "Do not those things to other people which you dislike when others do." "Put yourself in my place," says Scipio to Hannibal, as recorded by Polybius. A similar idea occurs in the precepts of Buddha (Dhammapada, 159): "Let each man make himself as he teaches others to be." "All men tremble at punishment; all men fear death; remember that you are like unto them, and do not kill nor cause slaughter." Max Müller cites in a note to this passage from the Ramayana, v., 23, 5: "Making oneself a likeness—i.e., putting oneself in the position of other people, it is right to love none but one's own wife." The sentiment is also found in the ancient Hindu book of fables and counsels, the Hitopadesa: "Good people show mercy unto all beings, considering how like they are to themselves."

Confucius, in China, distinctly enunciated the so-called golden rule. In Dr. Legge's translation of the Confucian Analects we read, p. 266: "Tsze-kung asked, saying, 'Is there one word which may serve as a rule of practice for all one's life?' The master said: 'Is not reciprocity [in Chinese chou] such a word? What you do not want done to yourself do not do to others.'" In his article upon Confucius, in the Encyclopædia Britannica, Dr. Legge—who, as a missionary, shows little disposition to accord bare justice to the Chinese sage—admits: "It has been said that he only gave the rule in its negative form, but he understood it also in its positive and most comprehensive force."

As reported by his grandson, Tsze-sze, in the Doctrine of the Mean (in Chinese Chung-Yung), chap. viii., sec. 3, Confucius taught that "when one cultivates to the utmost the principles of his nature, and exercises them on the principle of reciprocity, he is not far from the path." And again, in the Ta Hio, or Great Learning, chap. x., section 2: "What a man dislikes in his superiors let him not display in the treatment of his inferiors; what he dislikes in inferiors let him not display in the service of his superiors; what he hates in those who are before him let him not therewith precede those who are behind him; what he hates in those who are behind him let him not therewith follow those who are before him; what he hates to receive on the right let him not bestow on the left; what he hates to receive on the left let him not bestow on the right. This is what is called the principle with which, as with a measuring square, to regulate one's conscience."

In his translation of the Chinese sage, Mencius, p. 327, Dr. Legge gives the following passage: "If one acts with a vigorous effort at the law of reciprocity when he seeks for the realisation of perfect virtue, nothing can be closer than his approximation to it"; and in a note on the word translated "reciprocity" he says it is "the judging of others by oneself, and acting accordingly." Panthier translates the passage: "Si on fait tout ses efforts pour agir envers les autres comme on voudrait les agir envers nous, rien ne fait plus approche de l'humanité que cette conduite."

The sentiment was not new to the Jews. The Book of Leviticus ordained: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." "Do that to no man which thou hatest" appears in the apocryphal book of Tobit (iv. 15). "Judge of thy neighbor by thyself," says Jesus, the son of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus xxxi. 15). Emanuel Deutsch says that the maxim, "Do unto others as thou wouldst be done by," was quoted by Hillel the President—at whose death Jesus was ten years of age—"not as anything new, but as an old and well-known dictum, 'that comprised the whole law'" (Literary Remains, p. 27). It is also found in Philo Judæus.

The wide spread of the sentiment, of which we could give further evidence, doubtless shows that it has been an important factor in the evolution of morals. As a sort of ready, general guide to conduct, it has contributed towards the repression of actions which, being noxious to the individual, are at the same time hurtful to society, and it has tended to encourage actions promoting the welfare of both. But we deny that it is an infallible criterion of morals. It does not, indeed, appear to us a golden rule at all, but at the best only silver-gilt. Its essential principle does not ring true. It appeals primarily to self-interest, and assumes that what one wishes to be done to oneself is right. But it is not true that we wish for ourselves what would be best for the general welfare. The Christian who molests the last hours of a Freethinker excuses himself on the plea that he is doing as he would be done by. He would like his mind directed to thoughts of God and heaven in his last moments. Perhaps the strongest instance of the exhibition of the golden rule is to be found among those numerous savage tribes who, when they have a visitor, offer him a wife or sister by way of hospitality. If the formula is supposed to mean, "Do unto others as ye would they should do, providing it is right," this is at once conceding it to be useless; since, if the person already knows what is right to do, the rule is superfluous. If he does not know, the rule supplies no adequate criterion. My child wishes for ice cream. In its place I should desire the same. Must I, then, supply it? Evidently to decide so simple a question other considerations must be imported. A man can no more be sure of doing the right thing simply by putting himself in another man's place than he can learn to box by sparring at himself in the looking-glass. It may sometimes give a useful hint as to what he must not do, but it will not help him much as to what he should actually do. Brown, who is fond of a drink, stands Robinson a glass because he would like one himself. Jones, a teetotaler, persuades Robinson not to drink because he would wish to be deterred in the like circumstances. Smith, doing as he would be done by, gives Jones, who is hard up, a sovereign, which perhaps he spends foolishly; Robinson, who likes hard work, gives him a stiff job for which he is perhaps unfit, and Brown gives him brandy, which perhaps kills him. Yet each acts on the golden rule. The principle enunciated by Kant is evidently safer. Only those maxims must be adopted as ruling motives which are susceptible of being made universal. But the golden rule, so far from affording a universal law, varies in its application according to the subjective idiosyncrasies of each person. It may suffice to deter from evident wrong and injury, but in the minutiæ of conduct, which, after all, make up the important affairs of life, if weighed in the balance, it is often found wanting.

A Grave Subject.

"Death, not armed with any dart,
But crowned with poppies."
—JULIAN FANE.

FROM the earliest times men have sought to express their loves and joys, their sorrows and hatreds, in epitaphs and epigrams, and to inscribe them on sepulchral urns, tablets, or gravestones, as memorials of their pleasure or their pain. It is certain that such inscriptions were in use many centuries before the alleged birth of the mythical Christ. One of the most ancient epitaphs is that which Assyria's last king, Sardanapalus, ordered to be engraved on his tomb: "Sardanapalus built Anchiale and Tarsus in one day. Go, passenger, eat, drink, and rejoice, for the rest is nothing."

It is, however, among the Greeks that we find epitaphs properly so-called. Among the most famous is the inscription for the heroes of Thermopylæ: "Stranger, tell the Lacedemonians that we lie here, in obedience to their commands."

The propensity for writing punning epitaphs also existed at an early period. The inscription on the tombstone of Pausanius, the Greek physician, contains a pun on his name. The first two lines have been thus translated:—

"Pausanias, not so named without a cause,
Who oft to pain has given a pause."

The more serious Romans do not appear to have indulged much in epitaphs of this description. They preferred a more solemn note. Who ever wearies of Martial's "Erotion," so prettily Englished by Leigh Hunt:—

"Underneath this greedy stone
Lies little, sweet Erotion,
Whom the Fates, with hearts as cold,
Nipped away at six years old.
Those, whoever thou may'st be,
That hast this small field after me,
Let the yearly rites be paid
To her little slender shade,
So shall no disease or jar
Hurt thy house or chill thy lar,
But this tomb be here alone
The only melancholy stone."

Catullus has written one of the finest epitaphs.

Digitized by Google

The lines are in memory of his brother:—

"O'er many a realm, o'er many an ocean tost,
I come, my brother, to salute thy ghost!
Thus on thy tomb sad honor to bestow,
And vainly call the silent dust below.
Thou, too, art gone! Yes, thee I must resign,
My more than brother—ah! no longer mine,
The funeral rites to ancient Romans paid,
Duly I pay to thy lamented shade.
Take them—these tears their heart-felt homage tell;
And now—all hail for ever, and farewell."

In England, during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, tombs were thought to be the proper place, not only for puns, but for anagrams, acrostics, chronograms, and similar curiosities. For example:—

"On Archbishop Potter. Ob. 1747.

"Alack, and well-a-day, Potter himself is turned to clay."

"On Mrs. Death.

"Here lies Death's wife; when this way next you tread,
Be not surprised should Death himself be dead."

"On Mr. Fish.

"Worms bait for Fish; but here's a sudden change, Fish's bait for worms—is not that passing strange?"

"On Mr. Button.

"Oh! sun, moon, stars, and ye celestial poles!
Are graves, then, dwindled into button holes?"

"On John Penny.

"Reader! Of cash, if thou'rt in want of any,
Dig four feet deep, and thou shalt find a penny."

The complimentary epitaph seldom pleases. To lie like a tombstone has become a proverb. Pope's famous epitaph on Newton,

"Nature and Nature's laws lay hid in night;
God said, Let Newton be! and all was light," is a typical example. It is hyperbolical, and entirely out of character with the man it was intended to honor.

The tender and emotional epitaphs have a tendency to become insipid or silly. But Herrick, the most Pagan of Christians, has shown us how to rival the old-world Martial. The lines are upon a little girl:—

"Here she lies a pretty bud,
Lately made of flesh and blood,
Who, as soon fell fast asleep,
As her little eyes did peep.
Give her strewings, but not stir
The earth that lightly covers her."

Ben Jonson's exquisite epitaph on a child, beginning—

"Weep with me all you that read
This little story;
And know for whom the tear you shed
Death's self is sorry," is fine poetry; but it is not death as known by mourners.

Byron mentions two touching epitaphs which he saw at Ferrara. "Martini Luigi implores peace," and "Lucrezia Picini asks for eternal rest." Small wonder they struck a responsive chord in the world-worn heart af the English Catullus.

Keats desired that on his grave should be written:—

"Here lies one whose name was writ in water."

Water! Say, rather, in fire. In place of Keats' modest epitaph we have that glorious elegy, "Adonais," written by the Atheist Shelley, the finest elegiac poem in the English language. A few years later, in the same burying-ground was placed another stone, recording that below rested the passionate heart of Percy Bysshe Shelley.

Shakespeare's lines on the dead Duncan are perfect. They contain the oft-quoted—

"After life's fitful fever he sleeps well."

The tendency of the present day seems to be to do away with epitaphs, and merely to inscribe on the gravestone the name and age of the deceased, with the addition of a tag from the Bible, or a verse from a hymn, which may or not be poetry. But, apart from the purely conventional texts, the note of Christianity is seldom struck in these inscriptions. There is a deep-rooted Secularism in people which is for ever bubbling up and asserting itself in the most unexpected ways. That there are few inscriptions other than religious is to be attributed to the prejudices of the clergy, who object strongly to anything which clashes with their own views. Literary inscriptions are rare. We have noticed a tombstone in Nunhead Cemetery with the dying words of Hamlet, "The rest is silence," and a gravestone in Lee Cemetery with an entire poem by Longfellow. Personal inscriptions are to be found scattered up and down our churchyards and cemeteries. On a tombstone in Norwood Cemetery one reads, "Poor old Granny," and on another, "She was what a woman ought to be."

So do customs change, funeral fashions, too, and with them the salutation of the dead.

Report of Monthly Executive Meeting held on Feb. 27.

The President, Mr. G. W. Foote, occupied the chair. There were also present:—Messrs. Baker, Barry, Bowman, Cowell, Davey, Davidson, Gorniot, Greyton, Heaford, Leat, Lloyd, Moss, Neate, Nichols, Quinton, Roger, Rosetti, Samuels, Wood, and Miss Kough.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed.

The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were received for Croydon, West Ham, and the Parent Society.

The report of the Board of Management of the N. S. S. Scholarship Scheme was presented by Mr. Roger, and, after a lengthy discussion, in which Messrs. Cowell, Davidson, Rosetti, Gorniot, Moss, Lloyd, and Quinton took part, a slight addition was made and the report adopted. It was resolved that the fixing of the date of the examination should be deferred until further applications had been received from intending candidates, the Management Committee undertaking to have the syllabus ready by the next meeting.

The Secretary reported that a communication had been received from the Sheffield Branch inviting the Conference. After some explanation from the President as to the financial position of the Society, Mr. Quinton moved that the Conference be held in London this year.

The Secretary was authorised to make certain arrangements in regard to out-of-door propaganda.

ADRIANOPLE.

There falls perpetual snow upon a broken plain,
And through the twilight filled with flakes, the white earth joins the sky;
Grim as a famished, wounded wolf, his lean neck in a chain,
The Turk stands up to die.

Intrigues within, intrigues without, no man to trust,
He feeds street-dogs that starve with him; to friends who who are his foe,
To Greeks and Bulgars in his lines, he flings a soddened crust—
The Turk who has to go.

By infamous, unbridled tongues and dumb deceit,
Through pulpits and the Stock Exchange the Balkans do their work,
The preacher in the chapel and the hawker in the street,
Feed on the dying Turk.

The Turk worked in the vineyard; others drank the wine,
The Jew who sold him plough-shares, kept an interest in his plough.
The Serb and Bulgar waited till King and Priest should sign,
Till Kings said: kill—kill now.

So while the twilight falls upon the twice betrayed,
The Daily Mail tells England the Daily News tells God.
That God and British statesmen should make the Turks afraid—
Who fight unfed, unshod.

EFFICIENT.

The train robber suddenly appeared as many of the passengers were preparing to retire for the night.

"Come, shell out!" he demanded, as he stood towering above an Eastern clergyman, who had just finished a devout prayer.

The minister looked at him sadly for a moment, and then said:—

"If I had such energetic fellows as you to pass the plate now and then, I might have something to give you."

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 11 SUNDAY, MARCH 16, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

There can be no consistence in feelings which are not supported by convictions.—AUGUSTE COMTE.

The Dismal Failure.

THE worst of Christianity is that it is such a dismal failure. Jesus is reputed to have said that the tree must be judged by its fruit. Apply that test to the religion which bears his name, and what is the result? We may settle the point by taking a single fact. Not a great many years ago the Japanese had an official report presented to them as to the advisability of their accepting the Christian religion—and the report was unfavorable. The social and moral state of Christian nations was such as to condemn Christianity. The commission recommended the Japanese not to plant a shoot in their own country from so rotten a tree. So they accepted Western science and declined Western religion.

What reader of Newman's Apologia does not remember the magnificent and pathetic passage in which he describes the contradiction between the idea of God within him and what he beheld when he looked into the world and human society? Amongst the miserable things he enumerated were "the disappointments of life, the defeat of good, the prevalence and intensity of sin, the pervading idolatries, the corruptions, the dreary hopeless irreligion." All which, apparently, ought to have been banished from the world, or hopelessly subdued, in the course of nearly two thousand years.

A very different writer from Newman preached a powerful sermon from the same text forty years afterwards. James Cotter Morison, the Positivist, in his Service of Man, had a chapter on "What Christianity Has Done." He argued that it had done very little for men in this world, whatever it had (or had not) done for them in the next world; and he quoted Spurgeon, the famous Baptist, as declaring that the world was a bad in his day as it was in the days of Sodom and Gomorrah.

Coventry Patmore, the poet, saw that Christianity could not be defended on the ground of its temporal benefit to mankind; so he took this difficulty by the horns and tried to turn it out of the way. Speaking as a Christian (he was a Roman Catholic), he admitted with regard to Christianity that "it is open to question whether the race, as a race, has been much affected by it, and whether the external and visible evil and good which have come of it do not pretty nearly balance one another." But what of that? Christianity was not meant to give people food and drink, comfortable houses, and easy work; nor to improve bad or even indifferently good people. Christ came for the sake of those who are called "the elect." He lived and died to give all a chance of salvation, but he knew and said that "the number of individuals to be actually benefited by his having done so would be few; so that it was practically for those few only that he lived and died." Judging Christianity, therefore, by the common standards of progress was judging it unfairly. It was asking whether it had done what it never professed to do. The real question was, had it done what it did profess to do? And the answer to that question could only be supplied by "the elect" themselves.

This was not meant to be clever. Coventry Patmore meant it seriously. But it was clever, all the same. His admission, however, remains; namely, that, as far as human reason and common evidence are concerned, Christianity is decidedly not a success.

The very reverse of this is maintained by the general crowd of Christian apologists, who pretend that all the good—even the secular good—in modern society is due to their religion. They are the salt of the earth, and they keep it from stinking. They do even more than that. They are gradually "curing" the whole mass. Such is their contention, and they satisfy the ignorant believers who listen to them; while those who are better informed smile at the latest arts of successful priestcraft, and recognise that a religion founded upon ignorance and credulity must preserve itself by a continuance of the same agencies.

Murder will out, and so will truth. The most plausible deceivers have their lucid intervals of sincerity. General William Booth let the cat out of the bag in one of his addresses to the Salvation Army Congress. This is what he said:—

> "Those who followed the Master two thousand years ago turned the world upside down. Go and turn it upside down again. There is as much sin, as much wickedness, and as much devilry in the world as there was then—ay! and more."

Here we have a corroboration of Newman and Spurgeon. We were told by one who was supposed to know that the world is positively worse than it was nineteen hundred years ago. Not the heathen world, be it noticed, but the Christian world, for it is chiefly within Christendom that the Salvation Army operates, and General Booth had not then visited any heathen country in his circumnavigations of salvation.

Jesus Christ is said to have come from heaven to save the world. According to the New Testament there is no other name by which men can be saved. It is Jesus Christ or nobody. He lived a troubled life, died an ignominious death, rose from the dead, and ascended into heaven. But before leaving this world he commissioned his apostles (the first Salvation Army) to found his Church and preach his gospel to every creature. They did their best, though they did not quite "turn the world upside down." For three hundred years Christianity made its way by persuasion, and converted about a twentieth of the inhabitants of the Roman Empire. Then it secured the patronage of Constantine, and was made the State religion; and by means of bribery, ostracism, and bitter persecution it overcame all opposition in a century or so, and afterwards had the Western world to itself. From that time until quite recently it tolerated no rival, and wielded an absolute power. Its income runs into scores of millions, it has hundreds of thousands of churches and preachers, it has all the power of respectability on its side, and in some countries it still controls education. It does so in Great Britain, for instance; yet it was in the capital of Great Britain, the biggest Christian city on earth, and the birthplace of this very Salvation Army, that General Booth unhesitatingly declared that there is more sin, wickedness, and devilry in the world now than there was before Christianity was introduced.

Did any Freethinker ever frame a more terrible indictment of Christianity than this?

Religion and Sex.—II.

THIS connection of the sexual life of woman, including childbirth, with supernatural powers, seems to lie at the root of the widespread religious belief in the "uncleanness" of women. Modern apologists have obscured the real significance of the meaning of "unclean" in religious ritual by giving the word a hygienic or sanitary significance. In reality it is no more than an example of the principle of "taboo." Thus, it is an universal rule that when a particular animal is the totem of a tribe it becomes, so far as that tribe is concerned, "sacred." Members of the tribe will neither eat its flesh nor kill it, except under pressure of necessity, and then only with due religious ceremony. A tribe of American Indians whose totem is the bear will not eat bear flesh except as a religious function, and, as far as is possible, will abstain altogether. Or, to take a more familiar example, swine's flesh was not eaten by the Jews—not because they thought it to be undesirable from the point of view of dietetics, but because, as Robertson Smith showed, the pig was a totem with many of the Semitic tribes. It was not an unclean animal in the modern sense of the word; it was a holy animal. So with the Syrians, the dove was so holy that to touch it made one unclean for a whole day. Even contact with avowedly "holy" things by unauthorised hands rendered one unclean, and demanded a special process of purification.*

The real significance of "unclean," when used in connection with religious ceremonies, is, then, "holy." Havelock Ellis properly ascribes non-recognition of this truth to "ignorance of primitive religious ideas."† And Robertson Smith says:—

> "Holiness and uncleanness.....are in their origin indistinguishable.....The acts that cause uncleanness are exactly the same that among savage nations place a man under taboo, and these acts are often involuntary, and often innocent, or even necessary to society. The savage, accordingly, imposes a taboo on a woman in childbed or during her courses.....simply because birth and everything connected with the propagation of the species on the one hand, and disease and death on the other, seem to him to involve the action of superhuman agencies of a different kind. If he attempts to explain, he does so by supposing that on these occasions spirits of deadly power are present; at all events, the persons involved seem to him to be sources of mysterious danger, which has all the character of an infection, and may extend to other people unless due precautions are observed."‡

The sacramentally "unclean" nature of women is brought out very clearly in the regulations which debar women from religious ceremonies. Among the Australians, women are shut out from any part in the religious mysteries. In Fiji, women are excluded from the temples. In the Sandwich Isles, if a woman touches offerings to the gods they are made "unclean." The same regulation obtains in the Society Islands; and we have a parallel in the Church Council of Auxerre, which forebade a woman approaching the altar during the celebration of Mass, or to touch the Eucharist with bare hands. In Melanesia, women are excluded from religious ceremonies. The Ainos of Japan allow a woman to prepare the sacrifice, but not to offer it. In India, if a woman or a dog touch a consecrated image it is unclean. It will be remembered that in the Gospels, Jesus, after his resurrection, forbids the woman to touch him, while allowing Thomas to feel his flesh. Among the Jews, up to the present time, women have no part in the religious ritual. In the Christian Church the general exclusion of women from the priestly office had its roots in the same primitive view of the nature of women. During the Middle Ages, the Church supplied itself with sopranos by providing eunuchs rather than employ women.* The "churching" of women not improbably had its origin in the desire to exorcise the supernatural influence contracted by childbirth.

The persistence of this primitive view of woman's nature is mainly responsible for the fierce invective against women by early Christian writers. In their case we are observing the play of primitive ideas expressed in forms determined by changed conditions. But it needs little study to show that animating their invective is the original conviction that has been described. The ruling idea was that woman was charged, so to speak, with a dangerous supernatural influence. In this connection it may be recorded that Westermarck, during his stay among the country people of Morocco, was often struck by the superstitious fear men had of women. They were believed to be much better versed in magic than were men, and were, consequently, more dangerous. In Dahomey, also, no man will interfere with his wife while her "fetish" is upon her. Here, also, the curses of women are greatly feared, being much more powerful than those of men. Again we have a parallel in the case of Christianity, which so frequently revived and strengthened the lower and more primitive religious beliefs. During the witch mania, the overwhelming proportion of those who were punished or put to death for intercourse with Satan, were women. As a matter of fact, more women than men did believe themselves capable of such intercourse. But the Christian's explanation was that it was due to the Devil having more power over women than men.

It would take me too far out of my course to dwell upon the influence that this belief in the relation of woman to dangerous supernatural powers has had in determining her social position. Whatever the nature of the subsequent social and economic forces that gave rise to the notion of female inferiority, it may be taken as certain that these rested upon the primitive ideas I have been describing. For with the savage, woman is not really thought of as inferior to man—she is different from him. And she is different in a sense that calls for regulations concerning her actions. Many things are "taboo" to her in her own interest and in the interest of society at large. She is spiritually infectious, very much so at certain times, but more or less so at all times. Later, when other forces begin to operate, the ground is prepared for the growth of a belief in the inferiority of women. And thus, upon the primitive basis of the greater spiritual malignancy of women, there is reared social and political regulations that seek justification by arguments more or less specious, and by methods more or less blameworthy. "Our resemblances to the savage," says Frazer, "are still more numerous than our differences from him," and it is certain that due comprehension of the workings of the savage mind is essential to the proper understanding of "civilised" society.

It is, perhaps, necessary to point out another way in which sexual matters have, in early times, a close connection with religious worship. This is the very widely spread worship of phallic objects. The worship of the generative powers in the form of stones, pillars, and carved representations of male and female organs plays an unquestionably important part in early religions, although it has naturally been too hardly pressed by some theorisers. Still, it is met with practically all over the world. The stone set up by Jacob (Gen. xxviii. 18-19) is of this character. So were the stones set up in the Temple itself, and against which some of the prophets protested. Major-General Forlong has also argued that the God of the Jewish Ark was a sexual symbol. In India, phallic worship is widely scattered. In Mohammedanism, it is met with in the famous "Black Stone" of Mecca. In Greece, it was associated with the cult of Dionysius. In Egypt, the phallus was carried in religious processions by women, as also in Greece during the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries. In Rome, the worship of Priapus was well established. It is met with even in America among the ancient Mexicans and Peruvians, and also among North American tribes. The sale of phalli was common in parts of Italy certainly as late as the early part of the nineteenth century. Phallic figures existed in some Christian churches down to the end of the eighteenth century, and women, to obtain children, either placed themselves on the figure of the saint, or scraped the appropriate part of the effigy, and drank the scrapings in water.

There is no need to multiply details.* Nor is there any necessity for dwelling at any length upon the origin of the practice. In all probability, it is originally a form of magic intended to have a productive influence upon the crops. It is at least significant that the periods of licentiousness allowed by many tribes have the nature of a religious ceremony, and usually takes place during the festival of sowing. And from this to the practice of religious prostitution would be an easy step. It only needs adding that, to the primitive intelligence, phalli are not symbols, but actualities. They are regarded as the dwelling-place of the power that causes reproduction. Thus, in India, "The lingam, issuing from the hands of the workman, is deemed an instrument without virtue; it acquires it only by consecration—that is, when a Brahmin has blessed it, and has rendered incarnate in it the Deity by religious ceremonies." †

A survey of the facts thus serves to make plain how, from the very earliest times, religious ideas have been closely interwoven with the sexual life. In this respect, sexual phenomena are on all fours with phenomena in general; for the primitive mind, as we have seen, associates supernatural or supernormal activities with practically everything. But this general attitude is accentuated and prolonged by the strange and unaccountable facts of sexual development; and there is, consequently, perpetuated a very close and intimate alliance between sexual and religious feelings. The connection is so intimate that it is not surprising to find the two sets of feelings to be frequently interchangeable, and for the association to have persisted down to the present day. In future articles I hope to show how outbursts of religious zeal have been almost invariably, if not invariably, accompanied by displays of sexual extravagance, and that very much of what is taken in modern times to be the expression of fervent belief is little more than normal or abnormal sexual feeling. It is not pretended that religion is no more than sexual feeling. The religious ideas has a quite independent origin. But once it exists, it lives by feeding upon aspects of life that are in no genuine sense of the word religious. And by studying religion along these lines, it is possible to make plain much that would otherwise be wrapped in obsurity.

(To be continued.) C. COHEN.

"The Godless Good."

THE Thirty-Nine Articles were agreed upon by the archbishops and bishops of both Provinces, and the whole clergy in the Convocation held in the year 1562, "for the avoiding of diversities of opinions, and for the establishing of consent touching true religion." They were adopted by the Irish Church in 1635, by the Episcopal Church in America in 1801, and in Scotland in 1804. These Articles of Religion contain the public standard of belief for all Episcopalians; and upon the whole clergy they are supposed to be absolutely binding, although a large amount of liberty is generally allowed in their interpretation. It is to one of them only that we wish to draw attention on the present occasion, namely the Thirteenth, which is entitled "Of Works before Justification," and reads thus:—

> "Works done before the grace of Christ and the Inspiration of his Spirit, are not pleasant to God, forasmuch as they spring not of faith in Jesus Christ, neither do they make men meet to receive grace, nor (as the School authors say) deserve grace of congruity; yea rather, for that they are not done as God hath willed and commanded them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin."

This Article is not more irrational than many of the others; and it must be frankly admitted that it expresses a conviction which the Christian Church has consistently held from the beginning, and which it must always hold or cease to be Christian. To say that salvation is by faith is tantamount to asserting that unbelievers in Christ cannot be good. Even so progressive a theologian as Professor Peake declares that faith implies a sense of guilt and the impossibility of self-salvation. The sinner must renounce all other grounds of salvation and cast himself upon Christ alone. No orthodox divine can hold the view that moral goodness is attainable except through faith in and reliance upon the Atonement.

We know how utterly ridiculous and how absolutely false such teaching is; but its being thoroughly Christian is beyond all doubt. Unbelievers may seem to have virtues, but in heaven's sight they have nothing but splendid vices. They may and often do appear to be good, but at heart they are desperately wicked and full of all vileness. The apparent goodness which many of them exhibit is "the effect of hereditary Christianity—of the impetus towards good given by a religious upbringing, which lasts on after belief has faded." Even Professor Sanday, of Oxford, "fails to see what solid foundation for any system of morals" there can be apart from the Christian religion. When a man parts with his faith he loses every substantial ground or motive for the least remnant of morality. Of course, a man may be better than his creed. "This is what constantly happens," Dr. Sanday continues; "a Christian upbringing tells, and the effects of it survive after it has been given up as theoretically untenable" (A New Marcion, p. 16). It is also maintained that many good people who imagine that they are Sceptics are in reality genuine believers. "To all intents and purposes they are convinced Christians.....Their doubts belong to the hour, or even to what we might call 'the accident of birth.' Had they lived a hundred years ago they would have been evangelicals."

Now, an interesting article appeared in the Spectator for February 22, entitled "The Problem of the Godless Good," in which it is frankly admitted that multitudes of even militant Secularists are capable of thoughts, words, and deeds of highest excellence. The writer believes that such excellence exists without being the effect of "hereditary Christianity," or of a definitely Christian upbringing. In thus thinking, he shows plainly that he is not a good Christian. The curious thing, however, is that he gives many godless people the credit of showing forth what he calls "the Christian virtues." Is he not aware that there are no "Christian virtues"? The alleged virtues Jesus is supposed to have insisted upon most firmly are never shown forth by anybody, while the virtues which many Christians do show forth are not Christian but common human virtues. But we sincerely thank him for his unequivocal acknowledgment of the actual existence of "a vast and increasing number of good people who are not religious." He says:—

> "It may have been our privilege to have seen a man sacrifice his life for scientific research or for the deliverance of his neighbors from the cruel bondage of disease, and we may know that he professed to be a Materialist. We may have received such kindness and sympathy as we can never forget or repay from a man—and we might even say nowadays, though the case is rarer, from a woman—in whom the ordinarily received doctrines of religion produced nothing but a bitter irritation. And more than this is true: we have not only seen such people produce what we call, and rightly call, 'the fruits of the spirit,' but we have seen them the recipients of such help and consolation as our fathers believed to be reserved for what old-fashioned people called 'the servants of God,' and reserved for them alone. For instance, who has not felt his heart sink on hearing of some misfortune which threatens a friend who has no belief in the sustaining power of God? The misfortune has fallen, and we dare hardly turn our eyes towards our friend. The blow, we feel, will distract, agonise, humiliate him. On the contrary, when we see him we are amazed. He is calm, self-possessed, anxious not to distress those near and dear to him. Such courage seems possible enough in one who can resign himself to the will of God, but almost miraculous in him who trusts to nothing outside himself."

That is very touchingly said, and one feels that it is so entirely true. The writer of it has no patience whatever with those religious people who will not look at the goodness of Sceptics, and who "in their terror of mental confusion declared first that such goodness was but self-interest, and then in their rage at being unable wholly to shut their eyes to the goodness of the godless, cursed such goodness and ventured to declare that 'works done before the grace of Christ.....have the nature of sin.'" We do not blame religious people for such an attitude to unbelievers. Being Christians, they cannot cherish any other attitude. Their religion renders any other attitude quite impossible. As an Article in the Christian Creed we can find no fault with the Thirteenth in the Book of Common Prayer. To improve such a creed is impracticable: the only thing it needs is annihilation, not expurgation. Our writer advocates the pruning of the credal tree, but we recommend its being completely uprooted from the soil of humanity. As long as Articles I., II., III., and IV. remain, Article XIII. must be retained as an essential part of a whole that deserves nothing but unqualified condemnation.

At this point our agreement with the writer of the article under consideration comes to an end. His admission of the real goodness of many godless people is made, not in the interest of Freethought, but in that of his belief in what he calls the magnanimity of God. Magnanimity is a new attribute of God, discovered, we fancy, for the first time by the writer of the Spectator discourse. How does the Almighty use this his latest discovered attribute? By not repaying the godless good in their own coin. Whilst they deny him he graciously recognises them by conferring the gift of goodness upon them without their knowing it. "To believe—to have even a lurking suspicion—that God takes no thought for those who pay him no homage," we are told, "is to sacrifice the character of God in order to exalt the duty of godliness." The godless good, we are further assured, "are the recipients of the direct grace of God, a gift which he still bestows upon the unthankful who render him no service but the sweet-smelling odor of their good deeds." For ourselves, we must sadly confess our total inability to see how this unbiblical, untheological, and astounding idea reveals the magnanimity of God. In our judgment, it is an idea that lands its author in hopeless confusion. Why are some godless people the recipients of the direct grace of God while others are not? Why does he withhold his direct grace, the grace that bears the fruit of good deeds, from some of the godly, who acknowledge him in all their ways and sing his praises day and night, and grant it to others? Can it be a good God who is guilty of such shocking partiality? Then, again, if God exists, why are there good and bad people, and why are even the very best so far short of perfection? These are awkward questions which no believer in God can satisfactorily answer. On this writer's own showing, goodness yields no advantages. He represents the religious man as not unnaturally saying, "Why should I have borne the burden and heat of the day, and tried all my life to honor God, and then get no more benefits than a man who has done so much less?" Our author meets that objection thus:—

"To say this, however, is only to insist that 'godliness' should be 'a way of gain.' As to the value of faith, it is not a thing which can be computed by adding up advantages. It is known to those who have faith and to those who desire to have it alike, it is a thing for which many men would sell all that they have, but it is not 'a way of gain.'"

That is bad exegesis and worse reasoning. Paul says that "godliness with contentment is great gain." If it is not a gain, if it yields no advantages, what in the name of wonder is the good of it? The object of the article under discussion is to show that godliness is not a gain, that the people who have it are no better, and many of them not as good, as many of those who have it not. We agree, and beg to submit that this admission furnishes an irrefutable argument not simply for the valuelessness of godliness, but for the non-existence of the God in whom the author of the article seems to believe. A play-acting Deity, such as we have here, is wholly unworthy of the allegiance of mankind.

Men are just exactly what heredity and environment have made them, and their power over either is extremely small, and works with exceeding slowness. Many ages of the best education could effect but slight changes. And yet it is in individual and collective effort that the only hope of real improvement lies. It is the godless good who will be the saviors of the world, while the godly good and bad alike are doomed to disappear.

J. T. LLOYD.

Dr. Saleeby on Materialism.

"The myth of a First Cause obviously originated in that confusion of ideas, common to past ignorance and perpetuated by present pedantry, which confounds the philosophical first cause with the scientific or cosmical first causes; the linear hypotheses of beginnings and ends with the true cyclic facts of unending evolution and devolution. What man is really anxious to ascertain is, not who the Causer of the laws of the universe is, for the Causer would have to explain his own origin and existence, but what the laws themselves are."—REDCOTE DAWAR, From Matter to Man, 1898, p. 12.

"Man is free when 'Man is to man the supreme being.' So it belongs to the completion of liberalism that every other supreme being be annulled, theology overturned by anthropology, God and his grace laughed down, 'Atheism' universal.....Therefore the individual's God, 'my God,' must be put an end to."—MAX STIRNER, The Ego and his Own, 1912, p. 189.

"When Zarathustra was alone, however, he spake thus unto his heart: 'Can it actually be possible! This old saint in his forest hath not heard aught of God being dead."—NIETZSCHE, Thus spake Zarathustra, 1896, p. 4.

OUR readers will regret to learn, on the authority of Dr. Saleeby, that nemesis has at last overtaken Materialism.

When we opened our Daily Chronicle on Feb. 11, and read Dr. Saleeby's announcement, we shuddered at the gloomy prospect. A dreadful foreboding filled us with despair. Should we, indeed, have to return to the hideous chapel of our childhood? Must we seek out an official agent of religion—a Methodist parson, for instance—to make our peace with God?

But, upon second thoughts, we fancied we had heard similar reports before. In fact, now we come to think of it, there is scarcely a day passes but what some paper or parson reports Materialism as dead or discredited. When they are slack in the Daily Mail office, they put the office boy on to do a column on the death of Materialism; like Paul, it dies daily. Jesus Christ is said to have risen from the dead once; this is a trifle, for Materialism has risen from the dead thousands of times, and, like Hercules after his falls to mother earth, arises more vigorous than ever.

But let us see what Dr. Saleeby's nemesis consists of. He first calls attention to the fact that several years ago Sir William Ramsay made the sensational discovery that the atom, so far from being indivisible, as it name implies, was really of a complex nature and could be split up into simpler atoms. Yes; and we can remember there was great jubilation over the splitting of "the mighty atom" in pious circles—Materialism being regarded as now doubly dead. Whereas the truth was, that the theory—expounded by Clerk Maxwell and endorsed by Professor Tait and Balfour Stewart—that the atoms were indivisible, indestructible, and all of exactly the same size, therefore they bore the stamp of the manufactured article, and so bore testimony to the existence of a manufacturer or creator of atoms—that is, to a God—was completely demolished by the new discovery. Strange to say, Dr. Saleeby overlooked—no doubt inadvertently—this phase of the discovery of the divisibility of the atom in his Chronicle article.

After telling us of the splitting of the atom, Dr. Saleeby goes on to report that Sir William Ramsay, Professor Collie, and Mr. Patterson have now succeeded, or claim to have succeeded, in manufacturing atoms themselves from energy. Upon this Dr. Saleeby remarks:—

> "It is the very nemesis of Materialism to discover that the solid atoms on which it built are not material at all. If there should be no such thing as matter, Materialism would appear to be only the latest of many superstitions. That which we call energy is seen to be the ultimate reality of the physical universe, a reality which takes many forms, including those which we call the atoms of the elements. And what, then, is energy? the puzzled philosopher may ask; and I know no better answer than has been left us by all the honest and profound thinkers of the past—that they only know what energy does, not what it is; but that it makes manifest the Universal Being,—
> 'Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
> And the round ocean and the living air,
> And the blue sky, and in the mind of man;
> A motion and a spirit, that impels
> All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
> And rolls through all things.'"

So Materialists like Buchner, Helmholtz, Berthelot, Clifford, and Sir Ray Lankester are the really superstitious people, while "all the honest and profound thinkers"—like Dr. Saleeby, for instance—believe in the "Universal Being" who dwells in the light of the setting suns, etc.

It would have been much more to the purpose if the honest and profound Doctor had condescended to explain how energy, any more than matter, "makes manifest the Universal Being," instead of discharging Wordsworth's poetry at us and leaving the field. Apparently, Dr. Saleeby keeps this quotation constantly by him, ready for his hour of need, for we find it quoted in his Cycle of Life; 1904; p. 260; where it is described as the belief of modern philosophy and of "the greatest minds of the past."

Now, let us consider the real facts upon which this diatribe against Materialism is founded—for Dr. Saleeby is in too great a hurry to reach his conclusions to give a clear statement of them—the facts are these: Sir William Ramsay, Professor Collie, and Mr. Patterson, during a series of experiments, came to the conclusion that when cathode rays are passed through pure hydrogen gas in a certain manner, there appears in the hydrogen tube considerable quantities of neon, one of the rarer elements of the atmosphere; and further, by some changes of conditions, the element helium is substituted for neon. There are, Sir William Ramsay observes, three explanations for this phenomena: (1) The gases may be derived from the aluminium cathode or from the numerous elements present in the glass. (2) Or, that hydrogen is converted into these gases. (3) Or, that electricity itself is responsible for the birth of these elements. Of these three explanations Sir William believes the last to be the correct one.

However, Professor J. J. Thompson and Mr. Frederick Soddy, who have themselves experimented in the same direction, deny that these gases are the result of transmutation of hydrogen, or the product of electricity.

Sir J. J. Thompson has himself observed that the gases neon and helium appear in the tube at the commencement of the experiment; but that, after the experiment had been in progress for four days and the apparatus pumped out, none of the gases neon and helium could be detected. But upon replacing the old iron electrodes with new ones, they reappeared; and he comes to the conclusion that the gases are present in the metal, and are liberated by the action of the cathode rays.*

Mr. Soddy also states that other investigators have also obtained exactly similar results when using aluminium electrodes. Sir Oliver Lodge is of a similar opinion.

So much for Dr. Saleeby's mare's-nest. But suppose that it could be proved that matter was a product of electricity, how would it affect the position of the opponents of Materialism? When it was thought that proof had been found of the indestructibility and conformity to size of the atom, that was a proof of a Creator and the downfall of Materialism. Now, when it has been demonstrated that the atoms are not indestructible, and it is claimed that atoms can be manufactured by man, that also proves—according to Dr. Saleeby—the existence of a Creator and the nemesis of Materialism. With Dr. Saleeby it is "heads I win, tails you lose." No doubt, if it were possible to prove that atoms were neither created, evolved, or indestructible, Dr. Saleeby would detect—with the help of Wordsworth—still stronger proof of creative power.

As for Dr. Saleeby's idea, that if matter is a product of energy that would prove the nemesis of Materialism, this only proves his incompetence to deal with the subject. He evidently looks upon matter as something distinct from energy. That energy is harnessed to matter something like a horse to a cart, or, rather, in the same manner that he believes the body is inhabited by a soul; which shows that he has never taken the trouble to find out what Materialism really means.

Buchner devotes the whole of the first chapter of his Force and Matter to the demonstration that matter and force are indivisible; that there is no matter without force, and no force without matter. And when Dr. Saleeby talks about the production of matter from electricity being the nemesis of Materialism, he merely demonstrates his utter lack of knowledge of the subject. For, look you! Sir William Ramsay himself has declared that "it is almost certain that negative electricity is a particular form of matter; and positive electricity is matter deprived of negative electricity—that is, minus this electric matter." And again:—

> "Recent researches make it probable that what used to be called negative electricity is really a substance. Indeed, the relative weight of its particles has been measured; each is about one seven-hundredth of the mass of an atom of hydrogen; and the mass of an atom of hydrogen is the smallest of all masses of what we have been used to call matter." †

So that electricity itself is really a form of matter—not even a quotation from Wordsworth will alter that fact. No nemesis is required to deal with Dr. Saleeby; he rambles on to his own destruction. The Athenæum (March 30, 1912), in noting his Natural Ethics in Theory and Practice, observes: "These three short lectures cannot be said to be enlightening. Dr. Saleeby touches great subjects lightly and without sufficient knowledge. The lectures sound like sermons which might have been delivered from a pulpit." His religiosity entitles him to be termed the Marie Corelli of science.

Acid Drops.

Lord Roberts appealed the other day to the Churches to help dissipate the view that there is anything unchristian in preparing for war. The Guardian readily responds to the appeal, and puts in a couple of columns of editorial in favor of conscription—under the name of compulsory service. For our part, we quite agree with Lord Roberts and the editor of the Guardian that there is nothing—certainly so far as historic Christianity is concerned—unchristian about war. Quite the contrary; for Christianity has done more to consecrate war, to foment war, and to perpetuate warfare than any other religion in the world. Look at the present situation. The peace of the world is not threatened by any non-Christian nation. Our huge armaments, and the armaments of other countries, are all piled up—to put the matter in its most favorable light—against the aggressive cupidity of Christian nations. And no one ever looks to the Churches to alter this state of things. They will continue to pipe the tune that is popular for the moment, whatever it may be. The Guardian says the one thing certain is that compulsory service will be imposed upon us by adversity if we do not adopt it voluntarily. Well, all things are possible with a people ready to go into hysteria over a few fire-balloons, mistaken for airships, and who are crazy enough to picture an enemy's airship secretly spying out the land with flaming searchlights hung fore and aft; but we hope that there are yet enough level-headed people in the country to prevent our taking that step.

The Albanian Committee, writing under a full sense of responsibility, endorses the reports of the massacres by the Balkan Allies, and especially the Bulgars, in Albania—for whose freedom they pretend to be fighting. We take the following passage from the Committee's manifesto:—

> "Behind the veil that hides so many Balkan truths, a desperate effort has been made from Belgrade to limit Albania's right by reducing the number of Albanians competent to urge it. Wholesale massacre of unarmed men, together with women and children, has been resorted to as a deliberate policy, especially in Prizrend, Uskub, Mitrovitza, Luma, Prishtina, and Djakova; a part of the terrible story has been told by the Daily Telegraph, but what has been told is insignificant in measure to what remains. Political massacre has been one of the most formidable weapons in the armory of the Allies and has been used with terrible effect against the Albanians, whose sole offence is that they exist, and being in existence, need a place on the earth."

The Turk massacres in hot blood. The Bulgar massacres on a cool calculation.

"Sunday is being lost," sadly says the Church Times, "and churchgoing is a decaying habit." This is only too true, in spite of the offer of a great reward—in heaven.

Canon Ottley says that a telegram received from Harry Lauder, "With you safeguarding Sunday. Wish you all success," was "worth more than half-a-dozen messages from great ecclesiastics." How have the mighty fallen! Consider, a message from a music-hall singer of the mental calibre of Harry Lauder being worth more than half-a-dozen messages from great ecclesiastics! We have a poor opinion of great ecclesiastics of to-day, but we were inclined to think better of them than this. Even if Canon Ottley means that it impresses the Christian portion of the populace more than would a message from leading Churchmen, it merely changes the issue without materially altering it. We are left wondering at the mental quality of the people affected by the message. Still, it is a sign of the times when a dignitary of the National Church finds the word of a singer of comic songs more powerful that half-a-dozen bishops.

At Middlesbrough, the other day, the County Magistrates granted a seven-day license to a new picture palace. Presumably, this means that the Bench did not extract from the proprietors a promise not to open on Sunday. The police superintendent supported the Sunday opening on the ground that they took young people off the streets, and kept others out of the publichouse. Since the halls had opened, he said, the streets were much quieter than they used to be. Clergymen, who are always protesting their desire to keep people moral and well-behaved, ought to have endorsed the police superintendent's support. What several ministers did was to object to the seven-day license. One of these clerical objectors said there was a rush from churches to the halls after evening service, which was unseemly. Well, if people only went to the picture palaces after going to church, most clergymen would think themselves very fortunate. Their trouble is that people go before the service, and stay during the time that they are preaching the gospel to empty benches. This particular parson will be the envy of his brethren if his people only rush for the picture palace after they have had their dose of theology.

Rev. F. B. Meyer did his best to spoil the chance of the Progressives in the London County Council elections. On the eve of the poll this clerical busybody wrote a letter to the Westminster Gazette hoping that the London ratepayers would vote for the Progressives because they were opposed to the Sunday picture shows, which he regarded as "the all-important issue in the forthcoming election." So it may have been to Mr. Meyer and the profession he belongs to. But how much good that view of the matter is to the Progressives is shown by the result. They are seven fewer than they were. We strongly advise them to let Mr. Meyer and his fellow professionals go their own way. At present these gentlemen talk as if they were the Progressive party.

Rev. R. J. Campbell reminds us of the clerical gentlemen who always go to see anything very naughty at the theatre in order to be able to warn their congregations against it with all the power of knowledge and experience. Being in Spain, Mr. Campbell went to see a bull-fight. He says it was a cruel spectacle—but we believe that is generally known and needs no further testimony. The reverend gentleman says that he never wants to see another bull-fight. Our puzzle is, why did he see that one?

Rev. Gilbert Allen Grace, clergyman of the Almshouses, Waddington, Yorkshire, appears to be a good Bible Christian. He has been fined ten shillings and costs for beating a naked choir-boy with a stick, and leaving the marks of ten strokes on the lad's body. According to the evidence given in court the reverend gentleman has a taste for taking the law into his own hands in this way. It must be admitted that there is something clerical about it. But we dare say that this offender will be more careful in future.

The mad monk Innocentius has been arrested in Russia. He led a lot of people as mad as himself—mostly women and children—out into the snow to seek the New Zion somewhere. They were soon frostbitten and starving, and many of them died during the pilgrimage. It is alleged that Innocentius is not only mad but immoral. This may be a slander; but there has generally been a close connection between religious fanaticism and sensuality.

Rev. Dr. Orchard says, "You will find that the men who are sucking England lifeless to-day do not go to church." We do not know on what Dr. Orchard bases this statement, or how he can possibly know that it is true. We think that if an inquisition could be made it would be found that the vast majority of those referred to are upholders of some Church or other. Certainly great landowners like the Dukes of Westminster, Bedford, or Norfolk cannot be accused of being enemies of the Church. But the main point is that, whether they go to church or not, they believe in the people going to church. Funds are always forthcoming to build churches and to induce people to attend them. They believe in keeping the mass of the people religious because they know that in religion they have the most valuable instrument for keeping them in order—that is, for preventing improvements that would strike at their own privileged position.

The Westminster Gazette devoted a paragraph announcement to the Essex Hall meeting called by the Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. It gave a list of the speakers "expected"—including everybody but Mr. Foote. This is really too silly—even for Christians.

Professor Denny discovers two things that mark off the Jesus of the New Testament from such gods as Osiris, Attis, and Adonis. The first is that Jesus died once for all, and death had no more power over him. But, as a matter of fact, Osiris and Attis and Adonis also died once for all. The annual festival commemorated their death, exactly as the annual festival of Easter commemorated the death and resurrection of Jesus. The second point of difference is that Osiris and Attis and the rest of the nature-gods were ideas, while Jesus was a character. This is one of the distinctions that Christians are very fond of drawing, with complete indifference to the facts of the situation. The Christian Jesus is as much an idea—that is, a subjective creation—as any of the nature-gods named. It almost passes comprehension that sane men, at this time of day, should question the statement. Suppose Professor Denny had, for the first time in his life, come across the Christ legend; would he have hesitated at dismissing it as pure myth? Years of religious training and apologising simply prevent him, with thousands of others, from facing the question in a sane manner. It almost passes comprehension that educated people, claiming to be called civilised, should be found seriously discussing whether the miraculously born, miracle-working, resurrected Savior of the New Testament is an historical character or not. Amongst really civilised people there should be no room for discussion on such a topic. The whole set of ideas belong to savagery, and one might as reasonably discuss whether the fairies and witches of mediæval Europe actually existed.

After all, the discussion concerning the New Testament is only following the usual lines. There are plenty of people old enough to remember when the discussion concerning the Old Testament was in the same stage as is the present discussion concerning the New Testament. First of all people were discussing whether Moses wrote the Pentateuch, and whether its stories were veritable history or not. Theologians were up in arms, and discovered many elaborate reasons for placing the Jewish religious legends in a class by themselves. Eventually criticism told. The Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch was exploded, Moses himself was reduced to a myth, and no scholar of repute would venture to champion the views that obtained in the Churches fifty or sixty years ago. So far as the Old Bible is concerned, the work has been done once for all. But the New Testament rests on no better foundation than the Old. Essentially, it is a product of the same type of mind—the mind that sees the supernatural everywhere, that finds miracles as a matter of course, and which moves on the level of sheer savagery so far as religious belief is concerned. And this, we repeat, leaves no room for discussion as to the veracity of the story. There is room only for discussion as to the nature of the conditions that create such legends and lead to their perpetuation.

A new religious journal, the Constructive Quarterly, has just made its appearance. The object is to bring together all sorts of religious views, Roman, Protestant, Greek Church, etc., etc., in order to discover and establish a common basis of agreement. It is a fool's dream, for the simple reason that there is no common ground on which religious people can meet, unless it be hatred of someone outside their ranks. There is no common ground in religion, because there is no common basis in fact to which each may appeal, irrespective of personal speculations. Religious people only agree together on the tacit understanding that little shall be said about their religious beliefs. A full and frank expression of personal religious opinions would break up every Church in Christendom. And when religious people appeal for unity of action, it will usually be found that what they agree upon is not the really religious items in their program, but the secular items that have been incorporated with it. It is the common social or secular life that provides the ground of unity; religion merely provides occasion for division. The proof of this is seen in the fact that when religious people of different sects are found working together it is always in connection with some social object that lies quite outside their creed.

A writer in the Southend Telegraph speaks of the "stock objections on pseudo-moral grounds to the story of Sisera and Jael." The journalist would have seen things in a different light had Jael caught him bending.

The Lord, we are told, counts the hairs of our heads and watches the tumbling of sparrows. If he had left those pleasing pastimes alone for a short time, and paid some attention to John Norton, of Grays, the newspapers would not now be telling of the man's terrible death by falling into a boiling vat.

A religious revival is being carried out at Johannesburg. The principal feature is street processions, with the clergy togged up professionally. The Bishop of Pretoria opened the ball in what is called "full fig." "Fellow citizens," he cried out at the corner of a street, "we are out to-night for God." But he did not produce his credentials, and the crowd doesn't appear to have taken him at his own valuation.

Dr. Mawson, another Antarctic explorer, has been in great straits. He lost his companions, his dogs, and most of the food on the way back to winter quarters. "I alone arrived at the hut," he says, "having travelled through snow and fogs, miraculously guided by Providence, through heavily crevassed areas." Providence allowed Lieutenant Ninnis to disappear down one of those crevasses, with a dog-team and the bulk of the provisions. According to Dr. Mawson's logic, Providence was having a game with that expedition.

They can't sell the Jezreel Temple on the top of Chatham Hill. It was built for the 144,000 of the elect who are referred to in the book of Revelation, who were to be gathered together there, and, under the shelter of its massive walls, survive the ruin of the rest of the world. But the end of the world did not arrive; and the Jezreelite founder, John White, ex-Royal Marine, who was never to die, did die, and the Jezreelites mostly dispersed; but a remnant of them still stuck to the wonderful building—which is of no use for any other purpose, and is too solidly built to be demolished without great expense. So there it stands, and is likely to stand—one of the many monuments of human folly.

"With God's help" the King of Montenegro has made a fresh promise to capture Scutari. God hasn't helped him to capture it yet. The Montenegrin Deity may be sure; he certainly is slow.

Why does the Rev. E. J. Houghton, of St. Stephen's, Bristol, cry stinking fish so loudly? Instead of showing the moral influence of religion, he does his best to prove the opposite. He represents the ladies of his congregation as inveterate thieves. They will even steal a parish magazine or a powder-puff. And the poor parson suggests that he will be obliged to have plain-clothes detectives as well as church officials.

Rev. Sir William Macdonald Honyman, of Coton Hall, Whitchurch, Shropshire, left £80 571. Rev. Arthur Brinckman, Chaplain of St. Savior's Hospital, Osnaburgh-street, left £20,516. Rev. Prebendary Edmund Ironside Gregory, of Exmouth, Devon, left £9,731. Poor Christites!

One of the London halfpenny papers recently organised a doll show. We wonder if it included the dolls used in Catholic churches.

The newspapers have published a lot of delirious nonsense concerning foreign aircraft. It would be better if they devoted their columns to the more deadly dangers of priestcraft.

The Kaiser follows the footsteps of his pious grandfather, who praised God so lustily for the crowning victory of Sedan. A parodist of the time represented the old monarch as singing to his wife:—

> "My dear Augusta,
> We've been and gone a regular buster:
> Ten thousand Frenchmen sent below!
> Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

The new William has just been reminding the inhabitants of Bremen of the "Divine Providence" of 1870. He prophesies that God will enable them to be at the French again. But the divine assistance will have to be supplemented by £50,000,000 fresh war taxation. The divine assistance generally works out in that way.

The German Emperor has been harking back to 1813 again. What on earth does he think the world cares for 1813 now? Who wants to live backward—in ancient history? The forward view is wanted to-day. We are al sick of the constant cries of "Back to this" and "Back to that." Prussia won back her independence in 1813. What on earth is it she, and the rest of Germany, want to win back in the twentieth century? The whole of Europe was overrun by Napoleon. There was no peculiarity in the case of Germany. He would have overrun Great Britain, too, if it had not been for that strip of silver sea (with Nelson on it) that kept him back. And the Kaiser may take it that if another Napoleon were to turn up, at the head of victorious armies, all the military pedantry and bloated armaments of Germany would go down before his genius. On the whole it is about time that the Kaiser stopped his annual heroics. But if he must "keep on doing it" he might go back further than Napoleon and come to Frederick the Great of Prussia, who was as much a conqueror, in his own degree, as Napoleon was. Somehow or other, the Kaiser never gets beyond the wicked French. How about the wicked Germans—the Germans of Frederick's conquests, the Germans of Bismarck and Moltke, the Germans of the attack on Denmark, the Germans of the attack on Austria, the Germans of the attack on France—for although Napoleon the Little declared war it was Bismarck who manœuvred him into doing it, and by all sorts of means, including a forged telegram? Emperor William might lay to heart a text from the Bible he is always praising. "All have sinned"—it says—Germany included as well as France.

The Kaiser was bound to end his "patriotic" speech by appealing to God. "God be with us," he prays. But it is easy to see he has no doubt about it. He is unable to conceive the possibility of God having any other favorite.

Some imaginative person invented the story of Queen Victoria having styled the Bible "the source of England's greatness." So far as we know, the only reference to the English in the sacred volume is the text. "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." Mark Twain identified that text.

Christians do not like too much religion. Even the ladies get tired carrying complete church services, and abbreviated editions are much in favor. A few more years and the dear creatures will feel too tired to carry books at all.

How they love one another! It was thought necessary to announce that the Bishop of Newcastle would extend a welcome to the Free Church Council Conference. Good fellowship of that sort couldn't be taken for granted—amongst Christians.

Some of the Daily Citizen's readers, we fear, must have squirmed on Tuesday when they saw a letter from Mr. H. B. Dodds, of Newcastle, calling attention to Mr. Foote's article in the English Review on "George Meredith—Freethinker." Fancy being told that the article was "written with all the vigor and ability of that arch-enemy of Christianity," and that Meredith not only believed that the cause Mr. Foote was fighting for was "the best of causes" and "destined to victory," but actually had more sympathy with the Freethinker methods than with the methods of the more "respectable" heretics.

We invite special attention to the following extract from Monday's Daily Chronicle:—

> "After spending three years interned in the Ghebbi, the Empress Taitu, Menelik's Consort, has been granted her freedom, says a telegram from Addis Abeba. Lidj Jeassu, the heir to the throne, has also restored her domains in the vicinity of Addis Abeba.
> "It is just three years since the Empress was deprived of all authority and made a prisoner. It was stated at the time that she was suspected of having plotted to prevent the young prince Lidj Jeassu from coming to the throne.
>
> "The Empress Taitu is in many respects a remarkable woman. She is without fear, as she showed by leading a regiment of cavalry against Italian infantry at Adowa.
> "She has had more than her share of husbands. Born in 1853, she was married at an early age to a General in Theodore's army, but the couple were caught conspiring against the Emperor John. As a punishment Taitu was given a common soldier as her husband. After Theodore's death she married another fighting man, whom she divorced in order to wed the governor of a province.
> "When the governor died she entered a convent, but tiring of this seclusion she left to marry the chief Zekargatcho. In 1883 she won the affections of Menelik, who, after repudiating his first wife, and ordering the assassination of the husband of his enchantress, raised her to the throne. The goal of her ambition was in sight, and in order to secure the succession of her own family, she married her widowed daughter to Ras Michael, a scion of the house of the late Emperor John. She also secured high appointments for her relatives, and built up a political machine, selecting with great astuteness those ras who represented the old dynasty.
> "Since Menelik, owing to ill-health, receded to the background, the Empress schemed to secure full control of Abyssinia's destinies, and plotted against Menelik's grandson, Lidj Jeassu (but no relation of the Empress), whom the Emperor had designated as his successor."

The country referred to is Abyssinia. Most readers would regard it as a "heathen" country. It is, however, one of the oldest—perhaps the oldest—Christian countries in the world. Its kings boast of being descended from Menelik, the son of the Queen of Sheba in co-operation with Solomon. Abyssinia has no literature and no education. But it has a superabundance of the most orthodox Christianity. Which shows that Christianity is not the secret of civilisation, which is due to other influences of a purely secular character.

Parsons don't like losing their trade perquisites. We cannot be angry with the Rev. H. W. Bradley, vicar of Wenbury, for resenting the provision, through the will of the late Mr. A. Starkey, of a burial-ground near the parish churchyard, to be under the control of no clerical authority but only that of the local Parish Council. The reverend gentleman pities the dead who will not be buried "in the time-honored and consecrated burying-place of their forefathers" (good old forefathers!) but "buried in a Parish Council back garden." Not even a front garden, observe! All this means, of course, that a rival cemetery means the loss of burial fees to the vicar of the churchyard. Still, we can't be angry—as we said. Clergymen, as well as other men, must be expected to fight for their livings.

Lieutenant Clark and Mrs. Fulham, the Agra murderers, have been sentenced, the former to death, and the latter to penal servitude for life. They were equally guilty, but the woman is about to become a mother. They were also equally religious. Pious expressions abounded in the letters they wrote to each other while they were poisoning the woman's unhappy husband. "God," said the woman, "is bringing us together." Such is the way in which religion and criminality can get on very amicably together.

A new piece of music bears the title, "Always Gay." Evidently not "sacred music."

A contortionist at Glamorgan Assizes stated that his antics affected his memory. This may account for the clergy being such slow-witted folk.

RIBALD SOCIALIST.

Capitalist: "Well, Parson, have you spoken to the brethren about supporting me at the next election?"

Parson: "Kind and glorious sir, but there are a lot of Socialists among my congregation now."

Capitalist: "What! Don't you tell 'em regularly about 'Blessed be ye poor,' and about obeying those who have rule over you?"

Parson: "Yes, I told them that, and a lot more. I told them about envying not the rich their great estate, and about the perishable nature of gold, and about the virtues of contentment, and about the meek inheriting the earth, and about Lazarus getting to heaven!"

Capitalist: "Yes!"

Parson: "But they only laughed."

Capitalist: "Great snakes! Then am I undone."

"THE YUKONER."

He burned a hole in the frozen muck,
He scratched the icy mould,
And there in six-foot dirt he struck
A sack or so of gold.

He burned a hole in the Decalogue,
And then it came about—
Fortune's only a lousy rogue—
His "pocket" petered out.

And lo! it was but a year all told,
When there in the shadow grim,
But six foot deep in the icy mould,
They burned a hole for him.

REASONS FOR NOT IMBIBING.

The Rev. John K. Sawyer met abroad an acquaintance who said to him: "Wouldn't you like to join me in a little drink?"

"No," answered Sawyer; "I'm sorry, but there are two good reasons why I cannot take a drink with you. The first one is that I don't drink. The second reason is that I have signed the pledge. A third and most important reason is that I have just had one."

ON ROOSEVELT.

Another true story has been told about "Ananias Ted."

He approached the heavenly gate.

George Washington asked admission.

Saint Peter said: "What have you done to earn heaven?"

"I freed America from English rule. I am the father of my country."

"You may enter," was the immediate command.

Abraham Lincoln stepped up, and upon stating that he had freed the negro, secured admission.

"Ananias Ted" then pushed his way up.

The saint again said: "Who are you, and what have you done to earn a heavenly reward?"

"None of your damned business! Where is God?"

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £72 10s. 4d. Received since:—Dr. Martin, £3 3s.; A. H. Smith, 10s.; S. Hudson, £1; Mr. and Mrs. Riglin, 2s. 6d.; R. Taylor, 5s.; M. P., 5s.; J. P., 5s.

A. H. SMITH.—Pleased to have your good wishes and your "congratulations on the fine Captain Scott article."

EDWARD LINDLEY.—We wish you success at the antipodes. Glad to hear that the Freethinker has influenced your mind "more than we could imagine," and that you are grateful to Mr. B. H. Tubbs, of Sheffield, who introduced it to you. Our shop manager is writing you about obtaining this journal at Melbourne.

S. L. PAGE.—We have read your appreciative letter with much interest. It is always pleasant to us to hear from lady readers.

J. H. GARTRELL.—Glad to see the letters in the Cornishman against the stoppage of Sunday concerts at Penzance. Your own letter is a model one. We wish Freethinkers would make use of the press in this way in all parts of the country.

S. HUDSON, subscribing to the President's Honorarium Fund, "sincerely hopes it will grow larger than ever."

H. DE BIRKETT.—May be useful when the subject crops up again. The Christian public is too busy just now in discussing war and armaments. Delighted to hear of "the pleasure and profit" you and your wife "derive from the Freethinker week by week."

G. CROOKSON.—We are too busy to deal with the "Baconian Heresy," as Mr. J. M. Robertson calls it, again at present. It will be dealt with in our book on Shakespeare, which we shall try to finish this summer. Suffice it to say, at present, that every Baconian argument is founded on ignorance. For instance, the argument so labored by G. E. Sternbridge in the Sheffield Telegraph, that Shakespeare was illiterate because he signed his name in different ways, could be extended to Sir Walter Raleigh, who wrote his name at least twelve different ways, though he was a scholar and a gentleman. The fact is that the idea of regular spelling had not entered men's minds then. The same word was often printed in different ways on the same page even in learned volumes. The American millionaire who set the office safe to "door" and spelt it "dore," so that the chief clerk couldn't open it, wouldn't have suggested any fun whatever to the most learned men of Shakespeare's age. That one Baconian argument is typical of the whole lot.

W. J. KING writes: "I much enjoyed your English Review article. It is to be hoped it is only the beginning of a wider ventilation of much-needed truth on such matters."

J. A. GREENWOOD thanks us for thirteen years' Freethinkers. "I ceased to be a Christian," he writes, "at seventeen years of age, when I had endeavored to qualify myself for a defender of the faith; but it was not until I met with the Freethinker some twelve years later that I realised that I was an Atheist. I have taken it ever since; and while I have been unable to help much financially I have secured several new readers."

"A THORNTON HEATHEN."—Your useful letter in the Star nails down another Bradlaugh fable. There is something unspeakably funny, to anyone who knew Bradlaugh, in the idea of his "climbing Snowdon" and calling upon his companion in the ascent to "hold on, Jack" to the idea of God. According to these fables Bradlaugh spent most of his time in opposing his own opinions. But the Christians were always deficient in humor.

W. M. HARDIE.—Thanks for the reference.

E. A. WYKES.—Pleased to hear that your father, your brother, and yourself enjoyed our speech at the Leicester Secular Hall. It is interesting to know that your father attended the opening meetings thirty-two years ago.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are always welcome.

VAUGHAN GREY.—No more colds up to now. Thanks for the picture postcard of "Galileo's lamp" which stands for more than "Dreadnoughts" and Creusot guns.

J. B.—Your generous offer to pay for fifty copies of the English Review is appreciated, but the magazine was sold out within a few days of publication.

RATIONALIST (Johannesburg).—Your advice is very good, but why not tender it to the assailant instead of the self-defender? We never pretended to the Christian virtue of answering a gratuitous blow by inviting another to keep it company. Insults and injuries behind the scenes we disdain to notice, but when they pass the curtain and face the footlights they must be dealt with. Some good things may be found even in the Bible, and there is a great deal of truth in Matthew xviii. 7 and Luke xvii. 1. We can't throw any light on the pamphlet you send us. It reads as if it ought to be dated from a lunatic asylum.

E. B., to whom we are obliged for cuttings, etc., writes: "Your George Meredith article is excellent, and ought to be the means of removing much misapprehension regarding his real views; for it seems to be a point of honor with the ordinary reviewer and journalist to burke any and every incident which goes to show that a man of note was a Freethinker. I congratulate you upon your triumph in breaking down, by the help of the English Review, the contemptible and malicious boycott which has existed so long against your courageous and outspoken demands that we must have the truth, and nothing but the truth, when dealing either with public men or public matters."

S. E. BEARDALE.—Both your cuttings have been dealt with already in our columns.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

This number of the Freethinker will be in the hands of most of our London readers before Friday evening (March 14), when the public meeting, convened by the Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws, will be held at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand. The chair will be taken at 8 o'clock by the Rev. Copeland Bowie, and the list of speakers includes Sir W. P. Byles, M.P., Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Mr. G. W. Foote, Lord Harberton, Mr. A. L. Atherley-Jones, K.C., M.P., Sir Hiram Maxim, and Mr. G. Bernard Shaw. We appeal to our London readers to make this meeting a great success in point of numbers. We should like to see the Hall crowded.

Mr. Cohen pays Liverpool another visit to-day (March 16), delivering two lectures, afternoon and evening, at the Alexandra Hall, Islington-square. District "saints" will please note.

Mr. Lloyd closes the winter season at the Manchester Secular Hall to-day (March 16) with two lectures, afternoon and evening, on subjects that should prove attractive.

Mr. F. J. Gould is expected back in London a few days after this number of the Freethinker goes to press. We hope he has had a good time in India. We know he has been busy during his absence from home, and we are pleased at his finding (or making) time to contribute three articles to our columns during that comparatively brief period.

The March number of the Positivist Review contains some interesting articles, including some well-written contributions by the editor, Mr. S. H. Swinny. There is an important note by Professor Beesly on "The Situation in Mexico." We hope this little magazine has an improving circulation.

Mr. H. S. Salt has added to the list of useful publications issued by the Humanitarian League. Fallacies of Flagellants is a brilliantly written and unanswerable reply to the champions of flogging as a remedy for social evil. Mr. Salt has no difficulty in showing that flogging is a social evil in itself. It is not a deterrent from crime; if it were it should be extended to women, for procuresses are even worse than procurers, and the bawd is indispensable to the whole business in what is called the White Slave traffic. We wish this powerful pamphlet (it is only a penny) could be circulated by the myriad—or the million.

A devoted admirer of George Meredith, a scholar, and a powerful writer himself, says:—"Your Meredith article is a perfect gem, nothing so good on the subject having appeared before."

Occasional extracts from correspondents' letters have appeared in this department of the Freethinker with much acceptance on the part of our readers. We venture to make the following extract from a recent letter:—

> "Though a stranger to you, I feel I have known you since boyhood in the columns of the Freethinker and on public platforms. In my teens (1883 and onwards) what delightful Sunday evenings the old Hall of Science furnished! I recall (if I may) a debate of yours with (I believe) the Rev. Fleming Williams, in which you traversed the idea of man's duality—body and soul—in an extraordinarily vivid and scholarly way. The effect of that debate has been ineffaceable. Then, too, the stirring days of 'The Lie in Five Chapters,' when the alleged Atheist's family appeared to refute the West London Missioner's fibbing. That grand evening after the opening of the Shelley museum remains in my memory—when Shaw spoke, and when (thanks to you) I heard 'The Ode to the West Wind' as I have never heard it since. I mention these recollections to indicate what a large part you and your message have played in my life, and I feel that my case must be one of many hundreds."

"Finally," this correspondent adds, "let me thank you for your outspoken article on George Meredith. It was badly needed. I read with delight your further evidences of the nobility of one of my heroes." This interesting letter closes with a reference to Frank Cole, who was Meredith's "man" for thirty years and who "has many a relic and many a reminiscence of the Master."

"M. M. Mangasarian, the lecturer of the Independent Religious Society of Chicago, is a man of remarkable character and power. He passed from the orthodox pulpit through the liberal churches and Ethical Culture to complete Rationalism, growing in influence and popularity as he progressed. His success in Chicago is unprecedented in the history of the Rationalist platform. For many years he has crowded a theatre every Sunday, and interest in his lectures has never ceased to grow. And to us the gratifying feature of this is that he has adhered to Rationalism, to Freethought, made no other appeal, and conducted no mixed propaganda. Not that mixed propaganda is necessarily to be discouraged, but Mr. Mangasarian's success is proof of the vitality of the cause of Freethought."—Truthseeker (New York).

We beg to call attention to the N. S. S. scholarship scheme, of which an announcement appears on another page. It should specially concern the younger lecturers in the Freethought movement.

The Transformation of Matter.

THE most refined methods of inquiry utilised by modern science render imperative the conclusion that ponderable matter and the attenuated ether represent the extreme limits of the phenomena which constitute the universe. These limits are connected by intermediate modes of matter which have been recently studied with almost incredible patience by our leading physicists. As yet, we possess no positive evidence of the evolution of matter out of ether, but the converse transformation of matter into ether is regarded as a highly probable phenomenon by a steadily increasing number of men of science. The discovery of the cathode rays, in the first instance, and of the X rays in the second, led the way to the eagerly prosecuted research work which is now proceeding in innumerable laboratories in connection with radio-activity.

That bold and incisive philosopher, Gustave Le Bon, conducted an elaborate and extensive series of experiments which he unhesitatingly claims as clearly establishing the dissociation of ponderable matter. It is undeniably difficult to escape the main conclusions of Le Bon when the facts are carefully considered. The phenomena of radio-activity can no longer be confined to the generally recognised radio-active substances, such as radium, thorium, actinium, etc. These substances merely manifest in a high degree a power which all matter possesses in a minor degree. Professor J. J. Thomson, a physicist of world-wide fame, has demonstrated that water, clay, brick, sand, and numerous other substances are all capable of radio-activity.

The atom is, of course, the unit of matter, and when, writes Le Bon,—

> "We study the structure of the atom, we shall arrive at the conclusion that it is an immense reservoir of energy solely constituted by a system of imponderable elements maintained in equilibrium by the rotations, attractions, and repulsions of its component parts. From this equilibrium results the material properties of bodies, such as weight, form, and apparent permanence. Matter also represents movement, but the movements of its component elements are confined within a very restricted sphere." *

Viewed from this standpoint, matter must be interpreted in terms of energy. To the recognised modes of energy—heat, light, etc.—another must be added—material, or intra-atomic energy. This is distinguished by its immense force power; by the emission by all material bodies of particles endowed with an enormous velocity, and these particles are capable of making the air a conductor of electricity, and possess the power to pass through material obstacles, but are deflected from their paths by a magnetic field.

If the foregoing be regarded as established scientific truths, then matter must be pictured as one, or many, modes of energy which manifest themselves under certain conditions in the form of electricity, light, or other semi-material states. All aspects of existence are in constant process of transformation. When these changes proceed slowly, they appeal to our senses as material bodies which present the attributes of weight and mass. When rapid transformation is in progress, the existences which display this rapid change stamp themselves upon our consciousness as light, heat, or electricity. In each and every instance we become conscious of the existence of natural phenomena in terms of force or energy. It is a necessity of thought that the multitudinous sensations of which our waking lives are made up have an answering reality in the objective universe. The material universe builds up the consciousness, the consciousness does not create the material universe.

The atoms, so long pictured as the immutable corner stones of the material universe, are now more and more realised as the seat of activities previously unsuspected. Whatever the precise architectural arrangement of the atom may turn out to be, no physicist doubts that its structure is marvellously complex. The structural unit of biology—the cell—from which all plants and animals are developed was, in the early days of cytological science, regarded as a comparatively simple phenomenon. But, with the progress of microscopical research, the vastly increased power of the microscope itself, and with the employment of various chemical re-agents in cytological inquiry, it is now quite obvious that the biological cell is a structure of profound complexity. And with the unit of inorganic existence it is the same. Physicists differ widely in opinion concerning the precise structure of the atom, but all are agreed that its architecture is almost inconceivably complex. Scientists, gifted in a high degree with the noble power of disciplined imagination, picture the atom as a miniature solar system, made up of, and moving with immense velocity around, a centre of force. According to the theory of Le Bon, and of those who are reluctantly following him, the elements, which in their aggregate constitute the atom, continue to revolve in their appointed paths until their courses are stayed by the retarding influences of antagonistic forces. At this point, radio-activity, or intra-atomic energy is manifested, and the atom proceeds to radiate its particles into space. It is also inferred that when highly radio-active bodies, for reasons so far unexplained,—

> "have reached a certain degree of instability, or artificiality, as in ordinary bodies when brought under the influence of various excitants—heat, light, etc.—excitants act in such cases like a spark on a mass of powder—that is to say, by freeing quantities of energy greatly in excess of the very slight cause which has determined their liberation. And as the energy con> densed in the atom is immense in quantity, it results from this that to an extremely slight loss in matter there corresponds the creation of an enormous quantity of energy."

Although all forms of matter appear to some extent radio-active, the particles they discharge make no appreciable difference to the weight of the bodies in question. In almost all instances, no differences can be detected by the most delicate chemical balance in the periods over which the observations extend. Nevertheless, it must be realised that under these conditions ponderable matter slowly dematerialises, and, therefore, must ultimately cease to exist in that special form. The atoms, as atoms, are not eternal, and the spirit of inquiry craves an understanding of the processes which led to their evolution, and which are also involved in their dissolution. What, for instance, were the former states of what are now lead, silver, or gold? In our quest for a solution of this imposing problem, we instinctively turn to astronomy for guidance. The spectroscope has strongly corroborated the conclusions of the supporters of the nebular hypotheses of Kant and Laplace. Those nebulæ which present the spectra of permanent gases, such as hydrogen, or the products of carbon, are regarded by many eminent astronomers as representing the initial stage in the evolution of celestial matter. Through condensation these pass into more complex conditions of matter, which give rise to the evolution of stars. The starry orbs themselves vary in age and constitution. The dazzlingly white stars are the hottest, and spectrum analysis proves that they are composed of chemical elements, small in number. The less youthful red and yellow stars betray a lower temperature, and in them other chemical elements appear. In the still older stars, which have radiated the larger part of their initial heat into surrounding space, bodies may be detected which are absent in the white, red, and yellow stars. Heat and pressure probably suffice to account for these phenomena. In any case, the observations of astrophysicists have made clear the evolution of the "atoms" and the genesis of numerous simple bodies as a consequence of this evolution. Le Bon writes:—

> "Our nebula, like all those shining by night, must perforce have come from something. In the present state of science there is only, as far as we can see, the ether which can have constituted this starting point; and this is why all investigators always bring us back to consider it as the fundamental element of the universe. Worlds are born there and return thither to die."

But, surely, the theory of the collision of two dead or dying suns in space furnishes a more reasonable explanation of the origin of the present phase of nebulous masses, from which celestial systems are born, than the one above set forth.

One of Le Bon's leading contentions is that all ponderable matter is constantly dematerialising, and that the products of this dissociation are intermediate in character to solid matter at one end of the series of natural phenomena, and to that most attenuated of all existences, the ether, at the other end of the series.

What are the modes of this dissolution of ponderable substances? When inquiring into the evolution of electricity, Le Bon conjectured that this was probably one of the most usual forms of the disintegration of matter. This surmise was supported by the fact "that the final products of the dissociation of the radio-active bodies were formed of atoms of electricity." It is thought that these disengaged electrical atoms are ephemeral in their nature:—

> "If the existence of those elements [the electrical atoms] had persisted, since their formation, under the influence of the various causes which produce the slow dissociation of matter, they would finally have accumulated to the extent of forming a new universe, or, at least, a kind of nebula."

It is therefore argued that the electric atom gradually parts with all its energy, and when this stage is reached it vanishes into the ether. It seems established that electrical atoms in motion are invariably accompanied by ethereal vibrations. These vibrations—the inseparable companions of the electric atoms—very probably "represent the form under which they vanish by the radiation of all their energy." Thus it is that these vibrations constitute the final stages of matter before it plunges into the ether. When the vibrations cease, matter has been re-absorbed into the bosom of its ethereal mother,—

> "from which, hundreds of millions of ages, and forces unknown to us can alone cause it to emerge, as it emerged in the far-off ages when the first traces of our universe were outlined on the chaos. The beginning of things was, doubtless, nothing else than a re-beginning. Nothing leads to the belief that they had a real beginning, or that they can have an end."*

The evolution of the starry systems, of which the material universe is made up, presents two widely dissimilar phases. Giant energies are condensed to form atomic existences in the first phase, which are broken down through the expenditure of these energies in the second. It is sometimes said that the new physical concepts which contemporary investigation is forcing upon us, have overthrown the doctrine of the indestructibility of matter. This, superfluous to say, is ridiculously untrue. That mode of existence which we term matter, even if it slowly change—first, into radiations of an electrical nature, and ultimately into ether—does not, on that account, cease to exist. All modes of existence may undergo slow, but certain, transformations; but the hidden energies, which in static or dynamic states are presented by ponderable matter, imponderable matter, or by ether, abide for ever. These forces or energies, whether active or in repose, constitute the ultimate reality from which every aspect of the constantly changing, but never-ceasing, universe is evolved.

Hush!

RELIGION frequently has the effect of making people maudlin. We have had several instances of this in the press over the Antarctic disaster. The dear old Times marvels that in an age of "depressing materialism" men can be found to prove themselves heroes—the inference being that heroism is confined to the supernaturalists. The Christians are, of course, always thorough-paced heroes; though, so far as the accredited exponents of and apologists for Christianity are concerned, we usually find from experience that they are in the mass the veriest cravens. Orthodox speakers and writers speak and write sadly of the growing influence of "materialism" and "paganism," though they have very nebulous ideas as to the meaning of these terms. But their testimony to the decay of religion is something which Freethinkers must welcome as proving the growth in the minds of many of an atheistic instead of a theistic conception of the universe.

It is a pity that a man like Mr. Blatchford should make any concession to the enemies of free speech. Almost concurrently with his ill-advised counsel to Freethought speakers, we have an effusion from "Claudius Clear" in the British Weekly, commenting upon Freethought propaganda. In effect his observations amount to this: that the great bulk of anti-Christian propaganda is conducted by writing, and if there be any public speaking against religion, one hears very little of it. Still, however "Claudius Clear" may choose to blink the fact, there is a good deal of public speaking every week against Christianity and all forms of supernaturalism. But how is "Claudius Clear" or any other obscure citizen to hear of it—publicly announced, that is to say? Everybody knows that the whole orthodox press—and how small a part of it is heterodox!—is in league to boycott the utterances of all those who are hostile to religion. You don't find the Times or

* Evolution of Matter, p. 314.

Standard or Daily News giving four or five columns of a verbatim report of an atheistic lecture at the Queen's Hall. And nobody would expect these eminent organs to be such "mugs." How would it pay them to alienate the sympathies—and subscriptions—of the mass of their constituents?

Militant Freethinkers know perfectly well that for one man that you can reach with the pen, you can reach ten with the tongue. Does Mr. Blatchford suggest that the great majority of speaking advocates of Freethought are other than tolerant, courteous, and calm? Surely a good many of us have listened to socialistic tirades that could not well be dignified with either of these adjectives. Street oratory, according to the Clarion oracle, is useless to the cause of truth. Mr. Blatchford, like a certain Dickens character, is a great stickler for "ter-ewth." But there is something antecedently more important even to the attainment of truth itself, and that is freedom of speech. Street speakers need all the latitude they can get in view of organised attempts on the part of local authorities to suppress free speech.

Yes, religion has a lot to do in making people maudlin. It makes no heroic appeal to men and women. A great many people are cowed and bullied into identification with religious organisations.

National Secular Society.

REPORT OF HALF-YEARLY MEETING OF LONDON MEMBERS.

In accordance with the resolution passed at the last Conference, the first half-yearly meeting of the London members of the N. S. S. took place on Tuesday, March 4, at Chandos Hall, Strand.

The attendance was fair, though it was somewhat disappointing to find that very few members of the Branch originally responsible for the resolution were present.

The President, Mr. G. W. Foote, in opening the meeting, remarked that personally he was not quite clear as to the object of this meeting, but he was willing to learn, and hoped that some ultimate good to the Society might result.

Mr. Rosetti, in moving the following resolution,—

> "That the attention of Branches be called to the feeble efforts employed in taking up collections, in order that the financial burden of Branches may be lessened by a more thorough canvass of audiences at outdoor meetings,"— called attention to the half-hearted methods usually employed by collectors, resulting, in some cases, in nearly half the audience being passed over, and suggested a more thorough canvass of audiences. He somewhat deprecated the system of "throwing in" the collection practised in some of the Parks, and thought a personal and polite request more effective.

Miss Pankhurst, who seconded, related the experiences of herself and her sister as collectors, stating that she found the audience invariably polite and responsive.

Mr. Neate explained that the system of "throwing in" had been practised by his Branch for many years, where, unfortunately, there was a dearth of lady collectors.

Mr. Wood thought that the success of a collection depended largely upon the appeal from the lecturer.

Mr. Hecht considered that in poor districts the pushing of the sale of literature, which was in the nature of a quid pro quo, was perhaps more important.

After further discussion, in which Messrs. Barry, Davey, and Lawrence took part, the resolution was carried.

Mr. Stewart inquired if the meeting had been properly convened, seeing that members had not received individual notices, and was informed that adequate notice had appeared in the Freethinker and in the Guide Notice, and that each Branch delegate had been specially written to, requesting him to advise his Branch of the meeting, and that it would be necessary to show membership cards. Those present agreed that due notice had been given.

Mr. W. Davidson suggested a method of extending the outdoor propaganda and finding fresh material by existing Branches widening the present area of their work by trial meetings held in such places as Hackney, Kingsland, Enfield Chase, Walthamstow, Watford, Ealing Broadway, etc., and finally moved the following resolution:—

> "That, with a view to extending the Society's work, Branches be asked to break new ground by holding public meetings at least once during the coming outdoor season in likely places adjacent to their present stations."

Mr. Heaford, seconding this resolution, suggested that this work might be greatly helped by the formation of a cycling corps whose members, on their rides for pleasure, might hold impromptu meetings and distribute tracts, old numbers of the Freethinker, and other literature. Assistance in this matter could also be given by Sunday League and other excursionists leaving literature in waiting-rooms, trams, trains, etc.

Mr. Lawrence and Mr. Samuels also offered suggestions as to sale of literature, and the resolution was finally carried unanimously.

Mr. Horace Dawson then moved the following resolution:—

> "That this meeting of London members of the N. S. S. considers it imperative that the Executive appoint an Organiser to visit London Branches, and gather information and report to the Executive proposals for bringing the rank and file into closer touch with the Society; and further to suggest plans for the better development of the London organisation. For the experiment, the organiser to be engaged for whole or spare time, as circumstances suggest"— entering fully into the reasons prompting it.

It was seconded by Mr. Greyton.

After some discussion, showing that the feeling of the meeting was somewhat against it, the President summarised some of the points raised, and remarked that the present environment was different from that of thirty or forty years ago. Though man was a social animal, he had only time for a limited number of societies and meetings. A large and continuous membership could scarcely be expected. He thought Mr. Dawson rather underestimated the progress made, and he was proud to know that vital propagandists in nearly all progressive bodies had passed through the ranks of the N. S. S., and retained their Freethought principles though now working in other channels of activity.

Mr. W. Davey supported this view, and remembered many leading Trade Unionist, Club, and Municipal officials who had graduated in the N. S. S. Many years ago work of this description was far more effective than a large and silent membership.

Messrs. Thurlow, Heaford, and Moss also spoke in support of the President's remarks, the latter indicating the lines upon which he hoped to see the propaganda of the future conducted.

The resolution was then put to the meeting, and lost, only six voting in favor of it.

Mr. Samuels suggested that the General Secretary should call, at an early date, a meeting of the London secretaries to discuss and arrange for a more equal distribution of the lectures for the season; and the Chairman promised that the suggestion should receive attention.

Other questions as to the action of the L. C. C. re permits for collections, and also outdoor demonstrations, were discussed, and the President, after giving the fullest opportunity for the discussion of all questions, closed the meeting, promising that the result of their deliberations should be placed before the Executive.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

N.B.—If the foregoing suggestions as to the giving of lectures at new stations and the distribution of literature, as suggested by Mr. Heaford, commend themselves to any individual members who were not present, and they could offer any assistance, I shall be pleased to hear from them.—E. M. V.

Inspiration.

THERE is a silence that is more eloquent than words. There is a lull in the noise of life when the mechanical heart-beats of the clock sound forth with solemn accuracy and distinctness. There is a turning point—if we will but wait for it—at the end of doubt, despondency, despair, when a man rises above common thought and common feeling. It is that moment when hope returns like the first faint flush of dawn. In a great sentence, in a great book, by a great man, perhaps, he catches that first sublime ray. Care is scattered to the winds. Real human greatness bursts upon his vision, to illumine like the sun, to lift his breast, and brace him for what may come. Life is full of joy and hope, unshaded by a future fear, and the wellsprings of truth sparkle in the risen orb of reason's day.

AVON DALE.

THE REMEDY.

An old lady, leaving church after a service which had been attended by a crowded congregation, was heard to say: "If everybody else would only do as I do, and stay quietly in their seats till everyone else has gone out, there would not be such a crush at the doors."

An Emotional Orgy in Ohio.

As a silent swat at the advocates of Woman Suffrage who have been heard through the Truthseeker, Mrs. Helen M. Lucas, of Ohio, who is not a Suffragist, puts this clipping in an open envelope and addresses it to the editor:—

> "Columbus, O., Feb. 1.—Columbus women went the limit of wild frenzy in their desire to hear Rev. Billy Sunday, evangelist. They stormed about the tabernacle throughout most of the day and evening. It is estimated that 36,000 women heard him. He delivered the sermon for women only, 'Is It Well With Thee?' three times. At the first meeting the women, in their wild desire to gain entrance to the tabernacle, fought with hatpins, trampled upon one another, overran a cordon of police and 100 ushers, and rushed the doors."

We hear Mrs. Lucas say: "Imagine a lot of silly geese like these voting." But we can't imagine it. Women so brainless as to swarm about the "Rev. Bill Sunday" or any other preacher in that way do not know enough to want to vote.

The worst does not appear in the dispatch above quoted, which is from a Marietta paper. The State Journal, of Columbus, the home paper of the hysterics who debased themselves before the blackguard evangelist, thus describes the deplorable exhibition:—

> "Pushing, mauling, kicking, jostling, fussing and fuming, 20,000 women tried to fight their way into the Sunday tabernacle on Goodale-street, Friday morning. They beat upon the doors, they screamed, they yelled, they fainted, revived and fainted again. They put aside all those attributes that commonly clothe the sex—they were a fighting, howling mob, a riot of femininity, a crowd of 'Baahi Bazoukesses,' gathered there determined to hear Sunday's famous sermon to women only.
> "Hatpins flashed, were driven home in pressing elbows, furs were ripped from heaving shoulders and trampled in the mud, hats snatched off and flung wide of the crowd. A London Suffragette demonstration was as a Chautauqua salute, compared with this feminine gathering. Meanwhile thirteen thousand were crowded inside the building, occupying every available seat, hundreds squatted in the sawdust, pre-empted even the pulpit, and huddled under the choir platform where, if they couldn't see, they could at least hear. The women had begun to assemble at daylight, and the tabernacle was filled to overflowing shortly after 10 o'clock."

We should not think of connecting this degrading spectacle with Suffragism, for it does not show woman in the attitude in which she approaches the question of votes for her sex.

The orgy that took place at Columbus is altogether a religious manifestation, and one of the sort that only religious emotion produces. The occasion was unusual in its strength of appeal to the emotional females of Columbus. They tell us that woman is religious with the same faculties that she falls in love with; so that the call of the evangelist was of double force when it brought those faculties into exercise first by the religious touch and again by the erotic suggestion that inheres in a talk "for women only." Surrendering to these feelings, with their primitive curiosity played upon by the notoriety of the evangelist, the Columbus women were all in. There was no fencing them out of the tabernacle where Parson Sunday was yarded. Still, the fact that the Rev. Sunday professes to be a woman's rights advocate makes this exhibition in one view a serious blow to the cause.—George Macdonald. "Truthseeker" (New York).

NEITZSCHE ON CHRISTIANITY.

I condemn Christianity. I bring against it the most terrible accusations that ever an accuser put into words. It is to me the greatest of all imaginable corruptions. It has left nothing untouched by its depravity. It has made worthlessness of every value, a lie out of every truth, a sin out of everything straightforward, healthy, and honest. Let no man dare to speak to me of its humanitarian blessings. To do away with pain and woe is contrary to its principles. It lives by pain and woe, it has created pain and woe in order to perpetuate itself. It invented the idea of original sin. It has bred the art of self-violation—repugnance and contempt for all good and cleanly instincts. Parasitism is its praxis. It combats all good red blood, all love and all hope for life, with its anæmic ideal of holiness. It sets up "the other world" as a negation of every reality. The cross is the rallying post for a conspiracy against health, beauty, well-being, courage, intellect, benevolence—against life itself.

This eternal accusation I shall write on all walls. I call Christianity the one great curse, the one great intrinsic depravity, for which no expedient is sufficiently poisonous, secret, subterranean, mean. I call it the one immortal blemish upon the human race.

"After Life's Fitful Fever."

I ASK no other boon of you that love me
When comes the hour that Life and I must part;
But that, sometimes, a thought of me you'll cherish
Within some secret corner of your heart.

Grieve, if you must, yet grieve not you unduly;
The dead, who sleep in peace, need no lament
Their joys and pangs for evermore are over;
Their wealth of time is then forever spent.

Death has no terrors of itself to frighten;
Priests' lies no more need agonise men's hearts.
No hell awaits the erring sons of Nature,
When that, which brought to life, from Life departs.

Rest, perfect rest, within the grave awaits us:
Pain, envy, hatred, sorrow, come there not:
Back go we to the source whence came our being;
Forgetting, and, save by our works, forgot.

Meanwhile, oh friends, e'er sleep eternal claim us,
Something remains as debt all freed minds owe:—
The fruitful lies that brand Death's brow with horror,
We must refute where'er their reapers sow.

Then, when our end at length full time approaches,
Tho' we, maybe, would still prolong the fight;
We shall have left, as great hearts have before us,
The world more free and happy for Truth's light.

ONE WAY TO HELP.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to make an earnest appeal in the Freethinker to all lovers of truth and intellectual honesty? This seems to be the season of the year for special self-denial on the part of the Churches in order to furnish the means for the perpetuation of the old superstitions. Cannot we Freethinkers make a special effort to show our love for "the best of causes"? I think we can, and we ought; so I suggest to all subscribers that the best way of showing their enthusiasm at this particular time is to forward a few pence for the purchase of one dozen copies of your pamphlet, The Passing of Jesus, and judiciously place same in the hands of Christians, who know absolutely nothing of the origin of the great superstition which forms the basis of their belief. The pamphlet is so apropos to the coming farce of the Churches, and is such an eye-opener, that I feel compelled to ask all the "saints" not to neglect this opportunity of sowing the good seed of OUR GOSPEL. As you know, I have started the ball rolling with an order for several dozen, and I sincerely hope that all Freethinkers who read this will respond to my appeal, and clear out every copy of The Passing of Jesus.

I feel I must most heartily congratulate you on at last having your talent recognised, and by a periodical of such standing as the English Review. I say Bravo! to the Editor for his pluck, and I sincerely hope it will prove the beginning of a new order of things—the breaking down of the shameful press boycott from which you have suffered so long Scholarship Scheme of the National Secular Society.

UNDER the above Scheme, in order to secure a Diploma as an accredited Lecturer of the N. S. S., a candidate must gain two-thirds marks in an examination in Biblical Knowledge, Theology, General Science, and Evolution, as illustrated in Astronomy, Geology, Biology, and Sociology. The examination papers will be prepared by a Committee specially appointed for that purpose.

In the event of any candidate receiving 90 per cent. of marks, he shall receive a prize of £10 and a Diploma; 80 per cent., £5 and a Diploma; two-thirds marks, a Diploma only.

The Committee of Management are now prepared to receive applications from candidates for examination on forms to be obtained from the Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

All applications must be received at the office not later than April 7, 1913.

Candidates will be duly advised of the date and place of the Examination.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 12 SUNDAY, MARCH 23, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

The Christian nations are the warlike nations of the world. The most destructive weapons of war have been invented by Christians. The musket, the revolver, the rifled cannon, the bombshell, the torpedo, the explosive bullet, have been invented by Christian brains. Above all other arts the Christian world has placed the art of war.—R. G. INGERSOLL.

The Consumptive Churches.

As a rule consumptives are confident, almost to the last, that they are going to recover, though all their friends are fully aware that they are gradually dying. All who think are sensible of the fact that Christianity is far gone in consumption, that this most dreadful and fatal of diseases has been steadily developing within it for at least a hundred years, and that to-day the symptoms are more hopeless than they ever were before; but, strangely enough, the physicians who treat this unfortunate sufferer, and practically all its friends, firmly believe that its vitality, stimulated by the various remedies administered, is strong enough to win a glorious victory over the forces of death at work upon it. The Rev. F. B. Meyer recently predicted that before many months are past it shall have completely recovered its health and vigor. The Rev. R. J. Campbell reports that while attending a religious conference of two thousand men held a few weeks ago in Rouen Cathedral, he inferred that there is going on at present in France "a sort of reaction against the irreligion of a generation ago." "There is something like a revival of religion taking place," he assures us. Then he explains: "I do not mean, of course, a revival in the ordinary evangelical sense of the word, but a general quickening of interest in religion, an increased passion and vitality and power in religion; and there is also more attention to the observances of worship." Other visitors to France, notably the Rev. F. Hastings, confess, some of them sorrowfully, that they can see no sign of a revival of religion in that most interesting country. Mr. Hastings, speaking as chairman of the London Congregational Union, admitted that in France all interest in religion was practically a thing of the past, and that in this country also it was rapidly disappearing. Indeed, there seems to be a general conviction that just now religion everywhere is in a most deplorable state, though a strong hope is entertained that almost immediately a decided change for the better shall occur.

At the recent meeting of the Free Church Council, held at Newcastle-on-Tyne, the address from the Chair was almost throughout in the minor key. The Chairman is himself an exceptionably able and successful minister. Mr. Connell was for many years in charge of the Regent-square Presbyterian Church, London, where he proved himself to be a worker that needed not to be ashamed, and now is equally prosperous as successor to the late Ian Maclaren at Sefton Park, Liverpool, one of the strongest Presbyterian congregations in England. And yet, though personally he has achieved signal success, Mr. Connell is obliged to acknowledge that religion in this land is at a painfully low ebb. As reported in the Daily News and Leader for March 12, he said:—

> "We have somehow lost our grip of God. The Churches seem to have lost the old impressiveness of their appeal. Vital religion has suffered depression and decline in visible strength. The Christian testimony on great issues of morals and religion seems to lack something in depth of gravity and authority, and we do not seem able to command the energy, or the means, or the men, for the shouldering of urgent duties which yet we dare not refuse.....The fact seems to be that we have been caught in the undertow of a civilisation which, with all the material excellences it may rightly claim, is the product of forces that are largely non-Christian, and, in some cases, definitely anti-Christian. There is not a country in Europe to-day which does not, in its approved international policies, frankly lean its confidence on the arm of flesh, on human genius, and the assiduity of human enterprise. Civilisation has never yet acknowledged that it should serve a spiritual ideal. It has never admitted the need for reverence and submission to the will of God."

All that is perfectly true, and most illuminating. Nothing can be truer than that "we have somehow lost our grip of God"; but we wonder whether or not it occurred to Mr. Connell that, in making such a statement, he was exposing the fundamental and fatal weakness of the Theistic creed. We have lost our grip of God; but why? Because God has never gripped us. We have lost our grip of him because it lacked reality. The grip itself was always real enough, its one defect being that its object was purely fanciful. In other words, the loss of grip is due to a corresponding loss of faith. At one time in our lives we had a vice-like grip of ghosts; but to-day, with the majority of us, that grip is simply a thing of memory. Our grip of them ceased with our belief in them. To be permanent, grip must be mutual. Had ghosts existed their grip of us would have been so tight that we could never have released ourselves. So, likewise, had God existed as our Maker and Father, there would have been no danger of our ever losing our grip of him, for the initial and more potent grip would have been his of us. The infinite unreality of the Theistic creed appears the moment we look it in the face. A little while ago it was solemnly announced from a prominent London pulpit that "God's need of us is immeasurably greater than ours of him." That was said of a Being who is Biblically described as "doing according to his will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth." A similar statement is frequently made concerning God's love of man as compared with man's love of God. If God needs our love more than we need his, why has he not got it? The late Dr. George Matheson's famous hymn begins thus—

> "O love that wilt not let me go."

As a matter of fact, however, God's love not only lets go of many people who believe in him, but never once touches people who lack faith in him; and this is only another way of saying what we have often said before, namely, that God exists only to those who believe in his existence.

Another illuminating utterance that fell from Mr. Connell relates to the non-Christian character of civilisation. Formerly it was customary to boast of Western civilisation as a distinctly Christian product. Some twenty years ago, when Robert Buchanan made his dramatic attack upon the Christian religion, innumerable pulpits sneered at him, asserting that Christianity and civilisation were synonymous, so that if we renounced the former we would be compelled to part with the latter also. The present writer is ashamed to confess that, being in London at the time, he had the audacity to join in that irrational sneer. But even the pulpit, as represented by such men as the Chairman of the Free Church Council, is to-day wise enough to perceive that civilisation is, generally, non-Christian and, in particular cases, anti-Christian. And in this attitude to civilisation the modern pulpit is amply justified. For all its accomplishments civilisation depends upon human skill, human genius, and human enterprise. Civilisation, as such, does not recognise religion at all except as a factor that has hindered and retarded its progress. Guizot, who remained through life a deeply religious man, and who published a work entitled Meditations on the Christian Religion, will not be suspected of any anti-Christian prejudice in the following definition:—

> "It seems to me that, by general consent, civilisation consists essentially of two facts: the development of the social state and that of the intellectual state; the development of the exterior and general condition and that of the interior and personal nature of man; in a word, the perfection of society and of humanity" (Histoire de la Civilisation en France, vol. i., p. 6).

In studying the history of European civilisation we shall discover that it was for many centuries diverted from its natural channels, and consequently delayed in its forward movement, by the influence of the Church, and that its accelerated progress in modern times is traceable to the fact that it has succeeded in releasing itself, more or less thoroughly, from that baneful interference. "Spiritual ideals," "the will of God," and "Divine reverence" are elements which civilisation, as such, does not recognise, and which, if left to itself, it would ere long eliminate from the sphere of influence. It is this gradual emancipation of civilisation from the bondage of religion that is causing Christian leaders such depression of spirits and dark forebodings. They are not really opposed to human progress, but they cannot bear the idea of its taking place without their being its chief agents. They are not genuinely opposed to social reforms, but they cannot help denouncing all schemes for securing them from which their predominant co-operation is excluded. The only fault with Socialism is that it is not Christianised, and with civilisation that it no longer goes on its knees. When they shall have Christianised the former, and brought the latter to its knees, all will be well.

Now, the question is how the Church is going to perform that miracle, and after the Chairman's address, this was the first question to which the assembly addressed itself. Three well-known reverend gentlemen read papers on the subject; but if Christianity is true such papers were an insult of the deepest dye to its Founder and his Apostles. Mr. Connell had said that "we never can create save as we steep ourselves in the life-giving essences of New Testament revelation." On consulting the New Testament we learn that "spiritual power," or "power from on high," or "the Holy Ghost," is to be had merely for the asking, and in the ecclesiastical ceremony of clerical ordination we are informed that the Holy Ghost is infused into the ordained by the laying on of episcopal hands. According to the latter idea, properly ordained ministers have no need to ask for power, their only duty being to exercise it, while, according to the former notion, no clergyman has the power until he asks for it in faith; and we are assured that the prayer of the believer is heard and answered. In any case, merely talking about "spiritual power" does not bring it, and history teaches us that neither does praying for it. What then? The only indisputable fact is that whatever power the Church once possessed and wielded, it has now, on its own showing, almost entirely lost. At present Christianity is utterly unable to substantiate its own claims. "True," say its champions, "to-day it seems to be under eclipse, but to-morrow it will shine in superlative glory, and drive away for ever the darkness of unbelief and sin." We have heard that prophecy many times before, without once seeing any sign of its fulfilment. Mr. Meyer and others have uttered it again and again with amazing confidence, but as for the fulfilment we are quite content to "wait and see."

J. T. LLOYD.

Religion and Sex.—III.

IN the two preceding articles I have been concerned with tracing the close connection that existed with primitive peoples between religion and the manifestations of the sexual life. So far I have tried to fix attention on the normal expressions of the human sexual impulse, in order to show how inevitably it becomes associated with religious ideas and with religious ceremonies. So long as we restrict our survey to uncivilised life, the connection between the two is direct and obvious. As a force that arises in the life of each, and which intrudes, as it were, into consciousness, the phenomena of sex fills man with amazement and terror. As a supernatural force of unequalled intensity, it becomes inextricably bound up with his religious convictions. The connection is so close that the language and feelings peculiar to the sex life seems to serve equally as an outlet for religious feeling and conviction. And, paying religious honors to sexual impulse, man naturally comes to identify its manifestations as both an expression of the supernatural and as an act of worship towards it. To this we have to ascribe the widespread vogue of religious prostitution in India, Greece, Persia, Egypt, Judea,* and elsewhere. We have to seek along the same lines for an explanation of the religio-sexual festivals of Isis in Egypt, of Baal-Peor in Judea, and of Eleusis in Greece, to say nothing of the corresponding festivals that meet us all over the uncivilised world. In these cases, sexual self-surrender corresponds to the devotion with which the mediæval fanatic submits himself to torture, or tortures himself, in the fervor of his religious belief. Frankly accepted as an indication of the divine, the uncivilised mind sees an endorsement of the religious idea in every manifestation of sex life.

It is when we take man in a more advanced social state that obscurity gathers and difficulties thicken. Man no longer universally and frankly yields to sexual promptings as the voice of Deity. Symbolism and mysticism develop; a more complex social life provides disguised outlets for primitive and indestructible feelings. Sexualism, instead of being something to be glorified, and, so to say, annotated by religion, becomes something that must be hidden or denied. But man cannot escape the incidence of those forces upon which rest the perpetuation of the race. They may be ignored, but they cannot be denied. They will find expression in one form or another. Every attempt to suppress them only results in a more savage outburst. Every endeavor to disguise their operation only leads to their more unhealthy manifestation. The history of Christianity offers numerous illustrations of the truth of what has been said. Few religions have struggled harder to consciously suppress the power of the sexual life, and none have been more successful in producing unhealthy expressions of the force it strove to regulate or crush. With a great many of its leaders and teachers the consciousness of sex has been so strong as to become an obsession. Like the thirst-tormented traveller who is so apt to see visions of pools of clear, sparkling water, the Christian ascetic has been so obsessed with the idea of sex that he has often seen but little else. And the result has been that, instead of a developing social life providing a healthy outlet for the sexual impulse, and so minimising, by regularising, its strength, it has found expression in all sorts of unhealthy ways in connection with religion, which has thus ignorantly encouraged the force against which it proclaimed a crusade. So we find right through the history of Christianity the constant uprising of curious religio-erotic sects, the operations of a perverted sexuality in religious epidemics, and the distortion of normal sexual feelings in the interests of religious organisations.

Although there is an understandable disinclination, amounting with some to positive revulsion, to recognise the sexual origin of much that passes for religious fervor, the fact is well known to competent medical observers, as the following citations will show. More than a generation since a well-known medical authority said :—

> "I know of no fact in pathology more striking and more terrifying than the way in which the phenomena of the ecstatic—which have often been seized upon by sentimental theorisers as proofs of spiritual exaltation—may be plainly seen to bridge the gulf between the innocent foolery of ordinary hypnotic patients and the degraded and repulsive phenomena of nymphomania and satyriasis."*

Dr. C. Norman also observes :—

> "Ecstasy, as we see in cases of acute mental disease, is probably always connected with sexual excitement, if not with sexual depravity. The same association is seen in less extreme cases, and one of the commonest features in the conversation of acutely maniacal women is the intermingling of erotic and religious ideas."†

This opinion is fully endorsed by Dr. Francis Galton :—

> "It has been noticed that among the morbid organic conditions which accompany the show of excessive piety and religious rapture in the insane, none are so frequent as disorders of the sexual organism. Conversely, the frenzies of religious revivals have not unfrequently ended in gross profligacy."‡

A German authority remarks :—

> "I venture to express my conviction that we should rarely err if, in a case of religious melancholy, we assumed the sexual apparatus to be implicated."§

Dr. Beavan Lewis points out how frequently religious exaltation occurs with women at puberty, and religious melancholia at the period of sexual decline.‖ And Dr. Charles Mercier puts the interchangeability of sexual and religious feelings in the following passage :—

> "Religious observances provide an alternative, into which the amatory instinct can be easily and naturally diverted. The emotions and instinctive desires, which finds expression in courtship, is a vast body of vague feeling, which is at first undirected.....It is a voluminous state of exaltation that demands enthusiastic action. This is the state antecedent to falling in love, and if an object presents himself or herself, the torrent of emotion is directed into amatory passion. But if no object appears, or if the selected object is denied, then religious observances yield a very passable substitute for the expression of the emotion. Religious observances provide the sensuous atmosphere, the call for self-renunciation, the means of expressing powerful and voluminous feeling, that the potential or disappointed lover needs. The madrigal is transformed into the hymn; the adornment of the person that should have gone to allure the beloved now takes the shape of ecclesiastical vestments; the reverence that should have been paid to the loved one is transformed to a higher object; the enthusiasm that would have expanded in courtship is expressed in worship; the gifts that would have been made, the services that would have been rendered to the loved one, are transferred to the Church."¶

Dr. Auguste Forel, Professor of Morbid Psychology in the University of Zurich, also points out that—

> "When we study the religious sentiment profoundly, especially in the Christian religion, and Catholicism in particular, we find at each step its astonishing connection with eroticism."

And Dr. Kraft-Ebing, after dwelling upon the substantial identity of sexual love and religious emotion, summarises his conclusion by saying :—

> "Religious and sexual hyperæsthesia at the acme of development show the same volume of intensity and the same quality of excitement, and may, therefore, under given circumstances interchange. Both will in certain pathologic states degenerate into cruelty."††

Even so orthodox a writer as the Rev. S. Baring-Gould points out that :—

> "The existence of that evil, which, knowing the constitution of man, we should expect to find prevalent in mysticism, the experience of all ages has shown following, dogging its steps inevitably. So slight as the film that separates religion from sensual passion, that uncontrolled spiritual fervor roars readily into a blaze of licentiousness."‡‡

No useful purpose would be served by lengthening this list of opinions—at least for the present. What has been said is enough to show that amongst those well qualified to express an opinion, there is a general, and one may add, growing recognition of the important truth that the religious and sexual emotions are not only interchangeable, but may actually spring from a common source; and, further, that the operation of one may be, and often is, mistaken for the operation of the other. It has also been pointed out that asceticism, which assumed so developed and so extravagant a form in the Christian Church, far from being a disproof of this, affords the strongest possible evidence of its truth. Very frequently the ascetic presents us with an unmistakable case of erotomania, expressing itself in terms of religion. It is highly significant that so many of the leading characters in early Christianity should have been persons of avowedly strong sensual passions, and that in the visions of the saints temptations by nude women should play so large a part. The care taken by the monks and by celebrated saintly characters to avoid contact with women, even with mothers and sisters, is equally significant.§§ We are obviously dealing in such cases with men who were obsessed with the fact of sex. And the result was that the early and mediæval Christian writers brought to the consideration of the subject a concentration of mind that resulted in detailed disquisitions of such a nature that it is impossible to more than merely refer to it. To the normal man, whose natural desires find their legitimate expression and satisfaction, a consciousness of sex is but one of the many phases of his conscious life. But with the ascetic it was constantly active. He dwelt upon it by day, it haunted his dreams by night. Sexual feeling, suppressed in one direction, broke out in another under disguised forms. Feelings that were perfectly normal, because of repression and misdirection, became pathologic; with the result that on the one side, among those to whom religious exhortation made no appeal, there ensued an increase of vice in its more coarse and brutal forms, while among those to whom religious exhortation did appeal a vast volume of sexual feeling was interpreted as supernatural illumination and communion.

Sinai and Suez.

THE dark sea was smooth except for the soft roll made by our homeward-bound ship, and the night sky, all even of hue, was cloudless entire, and sprinkled with stars that gleamed as in our northern time of frost. Though only at the crescent, the moon traced a bright way over the waters. What apter phase than the crescent could the pilgrim see in this ocean-channel, guarded by two Moslem shores, Arabia and Egypt?

Yonder, those hills of the twilight were the peaks of Sinai, where once a God, now little else but a name gilded in church missals, flung the red bolts over the wilderness, and thundered a moral law for a nation of nomads. Then, Gods were in their valiant prime and bushes burned with their divine flames, and their bounteous hands dropped nourishing manna on the waste.

Gods pass with the circling years. After Yahveh of Sinai arose Allah of Mecca; that Allah whom the visionary camel-driver found behind veils innumerable. The Arabs of these barren valleys and table-lands still kneel at his footstool five times a day. A few decades will lapse, and Allah, too, will be ranked as a memory in a tomb as tranquil as the mummy-chambers of the Egypt which this sea laves.

"Wandering Arabs," I mused, "have lit a camp-fire behind the mountains."

But it was the foretoken of the dawn,—a faint, dull russet in the Arabian east, over the black horizon.

The north sky was yet a livid grey, as if with the smoke of a manufacturing town, half hiding its grime in the night; or as if a storm was creeping away by stealth, leaving a ghostly blur and shadow of death in its train. The sea was creased as gently as a lake in Westmorland, or a loch that slumbers amid the boulders of the Grampians.

"Gold," said I, "appear and match the red."

The gold did not hasten. The red paled slowly, and the end of the hesitation was a change to saffron. Self-effacing, the modest stars had slipped into nothingness. Like the million Yesterdays of history, they were no more. The crescent was fading. Meanwhile, black Sinai had crowned itself with a band of yet deeper crimson below the saffron. If color could shout, the Arabian crimson would have raised a pæan. But the silence of the glorious morn was superb; and the waters flushed red, and straight silver lines were ruled across them where the shadow of the mountains fell.

"Wordsworth, thou shouldst be living at this hour!" The poet who longed for Milton would have spoken nobly had he been here to-day to repeat the chronicle of this pageant of splendors.

As the light grew, the sable ridge resolved itself into a nearer range and a further range, and a misty vale lay between; and the sea glistened yellow and clear like the heaven, as if all secrets were ended, and lucidity was the watchword of the coming day.

"Come!" prayed I.

In a niche of the yet sombre horizon, the brightness of the sky brightened more, and it was for all the world as if a crowd of courtiers bent towards a door, and a curtain over it was about to lift, and the king would enter and salute the saluting court.

A dolphin suddenly broke from the limpid sea,—symbol of the living things that live their life by the sun.

Then a blazing star shot its unequalled ray across the rocks of Sinai, and, in two moments, the star had become the manifest lord of the cosmos; and the grey north was no longer grey, and creation had opened its daily evolution.

Glad am I, before the last dimness shall gather over my eyes, to have beheld this drama of the morning, prompting one to a gaiety such as no comedy of artist-genius could evoke, and to tears that purge more finely than the tragedies commended by ancient Aristotle.

I smiled when I suddenly recollected that this historic sea on which I sailed, and whence I had admired the rising sun, was the place of the Israelite emigration from Egypt, the terrors of the Ten Plagues, the terrors of the Pillar of Fire, the terrors of the broken chariots of the Egyptian pursuers, the terrors of the drowning of the armed hosts of Pharaoh. All these terrors had transformed themselves into innocent folk-lore. For such indeed is most of the narrative of the Bible, and, read as folk-lore, the stories have a message, a human interest, and a value. The sun in whose coming forth I had rejoiced is, to our age, the centre of an understood astronomical system, whose movements are predictable by science, and whose very origin is relatively known. We who study the story of the nebular unfolding of sun and planets need not deride the simple and natural folk-lore which saw in the sun the God of Fire and of Battles, and accounted the planets as mere lamps set in the crystal firmament to light our central world.

And the honor and praise once rendered to the Lord of Hosts may now be offered to the Heroes of Work who create the wonders of the human world. Here at Suez begins the grand canal which threads its way through the desert for ninety-nine miles, and links the Indian Ocean with the Mediterranean. As I write, our ship glides along this marvellous passage. An hour or two ago, we floated past the bust of Waghorn, at Suez; Waghorn, the organiser of the Overland Route. In a few hours more, we shall emerge at Port Said, where the statue of Ferdinand de Lesseps points to his masterpiece, the Suez Canal.

Ere long, a cry of joy from civilisation will greet the inauguration of the canal at Panama.

Beyond that, there await yet other triumphs of humanity, outshining the achievements of to-day as the engineering of the Nineteenth Century outshone the efforts of Primitive Man.

Mr. Yoshio Markino and the Missionaries.

"Hankow itself swarms with missionaries 'who are unhappily divided into so many sects that even a foreigner is bewildered by their number, let alone the heathen to whom they are accredited' (Medhurst).....The Chinese 'Rice Christians,' those spurious Christians who become converted in return for being provided with rice, are just those who profit by these differences of opinion, and who, with timely lapses from grace, are said to succeed in being converted in turn by all the missions, from the Augustins to the Quakers."—DR. G. E. MORRISON, An Australian in China, 1902, pp. 5-6.

"So far as I can see, the tutor missionaries have succeeded in their enterprise of making scholars by the thousand, but then those scholars neither are nor will become Christians.....The educated natives (of India), so far from accepting Christianity, think it as much a fetter on the free movement of the intellect as Hindooism is, and are proud to be as much in advance of their tutors as they are of their countrymen. Christian ideas and Hindoo ideas are both to them ideas of the populace, and they have left them miles behind."—MEREDITH TOWNSEND, Contemporary Review, July, 1889.

THE testimony of travellers has often been cited in these pages to the fact that Christian missions to primitive and uncivilised races are, as a rule, productive of more harm than good; and that missions to the more civilised races, the Indians, Chinese, and Japanese are a failure. It is only the scum of these races—corresponding to the submerged tenth of our country—that they are able to lay hold of, and then only through a bribe in some form or another.

The apologists of the missionaries retort that these travellers are prejudiced; that they are infidels; that they have no intimate knowledge of the subject, but rely upon what is told them by the traders, who are prejudiced against the missionaries.

We have just been reading Mr. Yoshio Markino's book, When I was a Child, which confirms in every particular the charges made against Christian missions in the Far East. We can now see, thanks to the revelations of Mr. Markino, what goes on behind the scenes in the missionary world. We have here the testimony of one who has actually been through the missionary mill, and has figured as a convert in missionary statistics. We can see why he was attracted to the mission, and how it affected him.

But, to begin with, as our readers doubtless know, Mr. Markino is a Japanese. Born at a time when Japan was acquiring Western civilisation and preparing for the gigantic struggle through which we have seen it emerge so victoriously, the boy Markino was seized with an intense desire to become better acquainted with this marvellous Western civilisation. He first went to America, and endeavored to study art while acting as a house servant. Driven from America by hardship and ill-usage, he then came to London, where he came within an ace of starving to death while trying to earn a living as an artist; indeed, it was only the acceptance by Mr. Spielman of some of his work on the very day that he had determined to end the struggle, that saved him from a death by suicide. Mr. Markino is now famous; he has held an exhibition of his works at the West End. He is much sought after as an illustrator of books. He himself is an author whose books—My Idealed John Bullesses—A Japanese Artist in London, and When I was a Child—have had a phenomenal success, being universally reviewed and quoted wherever books are known. Mr. Markino has achieved a success very rarely attained even by English men of genius, and it is marvellous in an alien, speaking volumes for his courage, determination, energy, and resource—characteristics which many people regard as peculiarly British. If we consider the opposite possibility, of an English boy learning Japanese and going to make his fortune in Japan as an artist, the magnitude of Markino's achievement can be seen in its true perspective.

Yoshio Markino was the child of well-to-do parents living at a village nine miles from Nagoya in Japan. His desire for European travel, which we have noticed, was increased by the arrival at the village of Professor Ban, of the Japanese Educational Department, who had just returned from a tour of America and Europe, upon which he gave lectures, illustrated by lantern slides. "That," he says, "made me quite mad with my ambition to come out to America or Europe more than ever." *

The first step was to learn the English language, and for this purpose he used to walk to Nagoya, nine miles away, twice a week! The boy was at this time thirteen years of age. Unfortunately, his father, originally well-to-do, became financially embarrassed, and was unable to continue his education, whereupon his Japanese teacher, Mr. Iinuma, advised him to attend the Missionary College, where he himself was a teacher, and, as the American missionaries were in want of a boy to sweep the schoolrooms, he could have his tuition free. The offer was gladly accepted, and the boy used to get up at four o'clock in the morning, run to school in the dark, and sweep the schoolroom by lamplight.

During the morning he worked for another native Japanese teacher, in residence at the school, who paid him two shillings a month for his services:—

> "I was almost starving [he observes of these times], but I did not worry about my poverty. For I was too delighted with my post. They had the night school. I attended to it as well. It was always 12 p.m. when I went back to my inn."

After three or four months of this, an arrangement was made for him to sleep at the school and receive six shillings a month. He tells us:—

> "I lived entirely on the boiled rice and pickles. There were two couples and one old lady American missionaries. I used to look upon them as very civilised and very honorable people, because they were from such a great country. And I thought the Christianity must be the most superior ethic, because all the most civilised nations in this world belonged to it. So I decided to investigate the Christianity, notwithstanding the surrounding people used to hate it and call it 'Yaso.' The word 'Yaso' came from Jesuit (I think), but it had a double meaning—'mysterious and unpatriotic religion.' Many of my friends asked me seriously, 'Are you really going to be a "Yaso"?' I said 'Yes.' And they were shocked very much." †

However, Markino attended the meetings at the missionary's private house, held especially for those who desired to become "Yaso." There were fifteen altogether. Mr. Iinuma, his former friend and teacher, acted as interpreter. Now, Markino was so earnest to learn English, and so curious to hear how the interpreter translated each word out of English into Japanese, that he confesses his "mind was quite absent from the religious matter."

One evening the head missionary said: "Now, seeing all of you so earnest, I shall baptise you on next Sunday. But to-night I shall ask each of you to tell me exactly what you feel." Some of them flattered the missionary so unnaturally and so insincerely that Markino was disgusted with them. When the missionary came to him, Markino said:—

> "'Your honorable religion must be the best one in the world, but I am so miserably ignorant about it. Now I have only one fear, that your honorable God might not be pleased with my present mind.' He said, 'Excellent, splendid!' I said again, 'Is it not a wiser way for me to wait until I study the Bible thoroughly?' He said, 'Not necessarily at all. Your sincere faith is worthy to be baptised, and you see it is so much better to study the Bible after being a Christian. The Bible is most difficult to understand. Only God will help you when you have faith in Him.'"

On the following Sunday, after service, the missionary read a paper before each one of them, but, says Markino,—

> "His Japanese pronunciation was rather bad, and I could not catch the meaning well, but he whispered me that I ought to say 'Yes' each time. So I did, and he poured the water from the bowl upon my head. Thus I became a 'Yaso.'"

That throws a good deal of light upon missionary methods, but there is more to follow. A few days later he went to see his friend the Japanese teacher, Mr. Iinuma, who said:—

> "'Now you are a Christian, can you believe your future life?' I said, 'What? What do you mean by "Future Life"?' He smiled and said, 'I thought you did not quite understand the Christian's faith. You see, all those missionaries are so happy, because they think that when they do good deeds in this world, they shall be sent to Paradise in their next life as their reward!'.....'But tell me how they believe that.' 'Well, they believe they all shall meet each other in heaven and live for ever!'
> "I sighed deeply, and I was astonished beyond the words. Now I will tell the readers why. I thought in my boyish mind that all the civilised Westerners were scientific, and they treated every philosophical question with their own science. I was often afraid that the Westerners might laugh at our Buddhists, because they were quite superstitious enough to believe in the future. What a great surprise to me to hear the Christians believed in their future life too! 'Are the Christians so superstitious then?' I asked him. He said, 'You must not call them superstitious. They shall be offended!'
> "'And they do good deeds because they simply want to go to heaven?' This last question came into my mind so naturally, because it is the spirit of Samurai to think that if it were the will of God, we are perfectly willing to suffer in hell" (p. 82).

Then he put his final question to the teacher: "And have you yourself the Christian faith?" He said: "Yes, I have. But very differently from that of the missionaries." And, upon Markino pressing for an explanation, Mr. Iinuma shook his head and replied, "No, my faith is only for myself," and advised him to study from the missionaries and read the Bible.

What he learned by this method we shall see in our next.

The Pagan Poets of Persia.

> "What I write is not written on slate; and no finger, not that of Time himself, who dips it in the mist of years, can efface it."—LANDOR.

PERSIA itself is an interesting country, and has had a past history of varied fortune. Owing to her geographical position, she may also have an historical future. Even now European diplomats are keeping sharp eyes on Persia and her politics. Poetry and politics are sufficiently remote; but the life of a people is as much concerned with the one as with the other. Whilst the diplomatic relations of Europe and Asia are of immediate interest to but a small circle, the poetry of an old-world Power may claim more general attention.

The Golden Age of Persian poetry lasted five centuries, from the eleventh to the fifteenth, and includes such great poets as Firdausi, Sadi, Hafiz, Jalaluddin, and Omar Khayyam. Interest in Persian literature was never keen in England before the time of Fitzgerald, the Victorian poet. There are not many who have taken the trouble to ascertain for themselves that the pearls of translation are to be had for a small price. Omar is the best known to English readers. Seven hundred years after the astronomer-poet's death a manuscript of some of his incomparable quatrains came into the hands of an Englishman of genius who was pleasing his scholarly leisure with the study of Persian. Edward Fitzgerald's magnificent verses have made the thoughts of Omar Khayyam a possession for all time of English speech. No translation in the world, except the subsidised version of the Bible, has ever achieved such popularity.

But, among Persians, Hafiz is far and away the best-loved singer. In all lands where the beautiful Persian tongue is spoken he is loved and appreciated. Five hundred years after his death his verses are still chanted by the boatmen of the Ganges and discussed by the learned at Constantinople. They are copied in ornate manuscript for the wealthy noblemen of Delhi, and lithographed for the poorer lovers of literature in Calcutta and Alexandria. The poetry of Hafiz concerns itself, not only with praise of love and wine, but with sceptical speculations on religion. Indeed, the same may be said of nearly all Persian poetry. Hafiz was an Epicurean, and the way he enforces his opinions is, of course, by praising wine —a deadly breach of orthodoxy, for he was a Persian and a Mohammedan. Hafiz has been called the Anacreon of Persia, and some of his poems bear out the comparison. Here is a taste of his quality:—

"Boy, let yon liquid ruby flow,
And bid thy pensive heart be glad.
Whate'er the frowning zealots say,
Tell them their Eden cannot show
A stream so clear as Rukuabad,
A bower so sweet as Mosalay."

Small wonder the priests demurred to say prayers over the poet's dead body.

These old Persian poets were very ironical gentlemen, if their mysticism is to be taken seriously. Jalaluddin, one of the greatest of the mystic poets, makes a lover exclaim to his beloved:—

"With thee a prison would be a rose garden,
O thou ravisher of hearts! With thee Hell
Would be a Paradise, O thou cheerer of souls!"

This is pretty blasphemy, and, let us hope, pleased the lover as much as it pained the priests.

Omar Khayyam, after all, interests us most. He is the Voltaire of Persia. There is no doubt about his Freethought and his Materialism. He fails to find any Providence but Destiny, and any certain world but this, which he advises us to make the best of.

"Oh, threats of Hell and hopes of Paradise!
One thing at least is certain—This life flies.
One thing is certain, and the rest is lies:
The flower that once has bloomed for ever dies."

He voices with no uncertain sound the scepticism at the bottom of all thoughtful men's minds, and makes splendid music of it.

"The moving finger writes, and having writ,
Moves on: nor all thy piety nor wit
Shall lure it back to cancel half a line
Nor all thy tears wash out a word of it.
And that inverted bowl we call the sky,
Whereunder crawling coopt we live and die,
Lift not thy hands to it for help, for it
Rolls impotently on as thou or I."

Across more than half a millennium of time and thousands of miles of space, across the far deeper abyss of thought and faith, of inheritance and aim, of art and language, the golden-mouthed Persian nightingales sing to our ears. Under the witchery of their genius we scent in our western winds the aroma from the lovely Eastern gardens. We gaze on the brilliant colors of the roses, the perfect flame of the tulips. We taste the Persian wine, and wind our longing fingers in the tresses of the beloved. Oh, immortals of literature! The old Persian poets saw their visions and their dreams, and wrote them, and many centuries after the tired merchant, forgetting for a little space his counting-house and ledgers, lives a freer and a fuller life in the wonderland of the poets' genius. Here are nymphs and roses, grotesque imaginings and human memories. This is immortality indeed! Under the poets' opiate wands he dreams their dreams for one little hour, and is refreshed.

MIMNERMUS.

A Dumb Lie.

"IT'S all a dumb lie; God's dead."

I rubbed my eyes. Phew! How could God die? Who would bury him? What a tremendous funeral it would be! What would happen to heaven, and the angels, and the never-ceasing psalms? Where would the Holy Ghost discover a headstone big enough and grand enough for God? And my young mind gaped at the thoughts.

The words first reached my eyes many years ago, when I was a boy, nine or ten years old. They were spoken by Cleg Kelly in a tale of the same name by S. R. Crockett. Only the incident, of which the words form the climax, comes back to me; the rest of the story is lost.

Cleg was an Edinburgh urchin, a city waif, who had, in some way or other, found himself in a Sunday-school. It is, or was, the custom in Scottish Sunday-schools for the superintendent to address the children either before or after their class lesson; and Cleg had perforce to listen to a sermonette on the living God's great goodness, or something similar. But Cleg Kelly was "gleg i' the uptak." Besides, he knew what it was to be hungry and homeless and forsaken. The little fellow's restraint gave out; and he leapt to his feet and yelled, "It's all a dumb lie; God's dead."

In half a minute the little, impudent Atheist was at the other side of the holy door.

Cleg and his adventures disappeared in the oncoming waves of yarns; but sometimes, looking back to the blurr of white surf that lies, for me, on the eastern horizon of literature, the ever-moving waste of episode, adventure, and wild excitement, with their crowds of conquering heroes, I think I can see the dim upright figure of a street wayfarer, in a Sunday-school, facing the superintendent and telling him his fairy-tale was a dumb lie. If the form of my youthful friend cannot clearly be determined through the distance of years, there still remain for me his brave words, as sharply decisive now as then; and my regret is I cannot trace this influence upon my mental life.

It was my introduction to Freethought—or so I like to name it. There was a fascination in the words that rooted them deeply in my mind. They rang out often at the most inopportune times; and, as a consequence, they frequently got me into trouble. When saying my prayers at night the concluding phrase, "for Jesus' sake, Amen," would extend itself into, "it's all a dumb lie; God's dead." During prayer spasms in church restlessness would seize me, to my discomfiture later, when I discovered that a parental reprimand did not come within the minister's advice, to be forgiving in all things. Often, too, the words served me as a source of extenuation. We got ha'pennies to put into the Sunday-school mission-box. Very solemnly we were told we were giving them to God (which was not quite true). But if God were dead he would not miss them. And we fairly enjoyed the toffee we bought with those ha'pennies.

When I became older, and learned to appreciate fine words and eloquence, Cleg Kelly's verdict would pop into what seemed a glorious piece of pulpit oratory, and take the shine out of it. I began to have boyish suspicions that many things were off the straight; that the teachings on Sunday were too absurd to be crystallised in conduct on the Monday; that our Sunday-school superintendent was a funny fellow, because he helped to send his brother Christians to hell on Saturday by making drunken brutes of them, while he instructed their children, on Sunday, in the gentle art of getting to heaven; that because a man was a Christian was no guarantee he would be considerate and just to us, his pupils. These wavering suspicions gradually massed themselves around Cleg's words, giving them firmer support; and when, every Sunday, I saw a man, dressed in a black silk night-shirt, trying to convert Christians to Christianity, the farce of the whole thing often tickled my boyish mind to such an extent that I could hardly contain myself. When my mind became illumed with the flash of the words, the inclination to laugh aloud invariably possessed me, the whole affair seemed to be so ludicrously funny.

But, as Time marked me, Cleg Kelly's condemnation deepened in its significance. It came to mean something that demanded serious thought. The words became the springs of many long rivers of reflection. When I was forced to study the stained pages of the book of man, the words became bitterly sad in their relationship to the sufferings of the past and present. When the cry of anguish tore the night in twain, and the pain-prayer, ascending to empty skies, rejoined the aching, ragged parts, at the back of my mind were the words, "It's all a dumb lie; God's dead." When the mother's sorrow was intensified by her appeal to the great wound-healer, Christ, to pardon her erring daughter, and guide her feet from the miry clay, the words, "It's all a dumb lie: God's dead," throbbed and heaved in my mind.

When I understood that Religion was no friend in need, but a foe in disguise; that it contorted minds with its insistent repetition of dull dogma, and poisoned thought with its mirage "to-be," and drained the body social of much courage, strength, and effort, that might have gone to purify it; that instead of hastening the increasing wellbeing of society, it delayed and hampered by consorting with lower life; that it was, in short, a social evil, Cleg's words took a harder and sterner meaning. I changed the adjective, making it, too, harder and sterner, and felt justified.

A dumb lie! Perhaps; but with a million tongues whose power for evil has outweighed their power for good in the history of mankind. They have poured the vitriol of hate on progress in the past; in the present they seem to be dropping honey. But their fawning suavity can only be understood by their conscienceless malignity. That was too successful then; and it would seem as if their detestable sycophantic sophistry, so soft and sweet, to-day, were to be equally successful. So remarkable is the sway of the dumb lie that even professed Agnostics, with sober face and omniscient counsel, bid us bear patiently the constant wagging of those lying tongues, and advise us not to irritate the poor, irresponsible waggers of them by publicly voicing our condemnation of a lie.

Lying creeds, whose influence upon society is in every respect evil, demand public chastisement; and will get it. The wellbeing of society must rest upon recognition of truth. A lie is corruption and contamination; and no lie was ever dumb until it was dead and forgotten. Falsehood simply asks honest minds to whip it. It seems that Freethought has much work to do yet.

Acid Drops.

"The fact that they had to face to-day was that what they called civilisation was not the handmaid or the ally of Christianity, that it rejected Christian principle largely in practice, and some thought wholly in spirit." So says the new President of the Free Church Council, and, so far as genuine civilisation is concerned, it is only what we are always saying. All the same, we quite expect to find the same preacher pointing out, when occasion serves, that civilisation owes all that is good in it to Christian influence. Indeed, the President goes on to indicate the directions in which civilisation fails. Thus, civilisation leaves men careless how dividends are derived so long as they get them, social economists are in despair how to enlist the youth of the country in desirable pursuits, etc. Quite so; but the question is not whether the secular civilising forces can at present do all that is desired, but whether religion can do it more effectively. And religious organisations have had every opportunity to show what they can do. They have had charge of people from childhood to old age, and have consciously manipulated social forces to their own advantage. The evils deplored are not products of civilisation at all; they are the products rather of religious interference with normally civilising forces. The conscious control of social life in the interests of a rational secular civilisation has never yet obtained. The conscious control of social forces in the interests of religion has; and the result is seen in the evils deplored by the Rev. Mr. Connell.

Rev. Charles Brown, also addressing the Free Church Council, rejoiced in the provision of better salaries for ministers, since it would put an end to ignorance in the pulpit. Not a bit of it. Ignorance in the pulpit is not created by low salaries, and will not be destroyed by high ones. It is part of the inevitable character of the situation. The ministry becomes more ignorant—in the deeper and wider sense of the word—with each generation. Look at the leaders in any of the Churches, and see what one discovers. How many of them are of real and unquestionable capacity? Where else but in the pulpit would men like Bishop Ingram, Dr. Clifford, Mr. Campbell, F. B. Meyer, etc., occupy positions of eminence? Higher salaries cannot create capacity; they can only decorate native incapacity. Men of real ability do not go into the pulpit; they find occupations in other directions. The proof of this is that there is not a Church in Europe that is not raising the same complaint as to the lower mental calibre of such as present themselves for ordination. A religion that is not intellectually respectable cannot hope to command the support of intellectually respectable men.

Dr. F. B. Jevons says that thousands of people will buy a shilling handbook on Comparative Religion because they feel that science could tell them something about religion. Exactly; science is the only thing that can tell them anything about religion. Preachers of religion are, of all people, the most ignorant of this subject. They can tell you all about the difference between partial and total immersion, or the right kind of dress to wear, or candles to burn, or formulæ to use. But when it comes to giving any real knowledge about religion, they are quite at sea. One goes to ministers of religion to find out what religious people believe; but when one wants to find out what religion is, how it began, and how it developed, then one turns to the scientific investigator, whose religion is usually a minus quantity. In fact, you cannot at the same time understand and believe in religion.

Dr. Jevons himself illustrates how his own belief interferes with a complete understanding of religion. He says: "The great reassuring and comforting fact that emerged was that all men, however low they stood in point of culture or civilisation, were without exception seeking after God." Now, to commence with, the use of the words "reassuring" and "comforting" betokens anything but a scientific turn of mind. A scientific inquiry is concerned, not with what is comforting, but with what is true. Nor is there anything really comforting in finding that certain of our own beliefs are shared by savages. This is far more frequently an indication of error than of accuracy. And, in the next place, we altogether deny that men in a low culture stage are "seeking after God." Savages do not seek gods any more than they seek a pestilence. The gods find them, and the savage seems to spend no small part of his energies in dodging them. This is really one of the vital facts of the situation, and without an appreciation of its significance, one's study of religion is robbed of a deal of its value. The search for God only commences at a later date, when people are taught to express their feelings in terms of religion, and also to believe they cannot get along without God. And Dr. Jevons might pay some attention to the fact that if people are looking for God, a large number lose him, and those who lose him are amongst the most thoughtful and the most educated in the civilised world.

The last sentence is, perhaps, open to misapprehension. Its truth and its significance is often lost because religious people make contrasts in a quite unjustifiable manner. Freethinkers with small opportunities are contrasted with religionists who have had social and financial opportunities that others lack. This does not affect the expression of capacity, but it does affect the form in which it is cast, and form counts for much with superficial observers. But we say boldly and plainly, that class for class, the Freethinkers of any country are markedly superior to their religious fellow countrymen. Take a hundred Freethinkers, haphazard, from any class, and contrast them with a hundred Christians from the same class, and taken in the same manner, and their general superiority will be evident. Class for class, Freethinkers do actually represent the better type. It may sound conceited to say this, but it needs saying, and it is easy to test its truth by actual observation.

What a pretty lot the native Christians in the Balkans are! First of all their war of liberation resolved itself into a mere struggle for more territory. Then their crusade for religious freedom manifested the usual characteristic of religious crusades—wholesale butchery. Then their brotherly love for each other was shown by the Greeks and Bulgarians going for each other before the common enemy was out of the way. And now Mr. Claude G. Montefiore and Mr. D. L. Alexander, in a lengthy communication to the Daily Telegraph, calls attention to what Christian Roumania understands by religious freedom. A condition of Roumanian independence, as guaranteed by the Berlin Treaty, was that religious freedom should be permitted, and that "the difference of religious creeds and confessions shall not be alleged against any person as a ground for exclusion or incapacity in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil and political rights, admission to public employments," etc. In spite of this, practically all Jews are to this day unemancipated. They are not even admitted to belong to the land of their birth, and in various ways are insulted and persecuted. First of all, the Roumanian Government tried to evade its treaty obligations by pleading that the Jews were illiterate—this in a country where 88 per cent. of the Gentile population cannot read or write. Further, as aliens could not claim political rights, the Jews were declared aliens—although the vast majority of the Jewish population are native born. They were thus in the position of unprotected aliens, as they had no country to which they could appeal for protection. Finally, the Roumanian Government agreed to treat the Jews as natives where letters of naturalisation were taken out. That this was a mere subterfuge is shown by the fact that in thirty-five years, with a Jewish population of nearly 300,000 only 200 have been granted naturalisation.

Thus the operation of Christian bigotry was made easy. Under the laws that dealt ostensibly with aliens in general, regulations were framed that were intended to harass the Jews in all directions. They were affected in their rights of residence, their trading rights, their access to schools, professions, and the public services. In 1902, it was actually proposed that all foreigners should be prohibited exercising handicrafts in Roumania unless they could show reciprocity in their own country. But the Roumanian Jews had no other country, and the Roumanian law declared them aliens. This measure would have brought about 200 000 Jews to face starvation had not European intervention brought about its withdrawal. Still, an attempt was made to reintroduce the same law last year, and there is hardly another country, except Russia, where Jews are persecuted as they are in Roumania. So stands the record of the sleeping partner in the Balkan confederation of Christian peoples. And one can only say that Roumania is worthy of her confederates.

The question of the moment, says Professor Gardner, is, whether Christianity can survive the immense increase of our knowledge of man and society? Professor Gardner thinks it can; because, when faced with changes of knowledge in the past, "In every case Christianity showed itself capable of such changes as enabled it to escape what looked like irresistible forces of destruction." This is the kind of statement often made by Christian apologists, and it is wholly false. We are told that Christianity survived the attack of Voltaire, and of Paine, and of many others. And this also is false. The Christianity against which Voltaire and Paine fought is substantially defunct. What has become of the Christianity of the sixteenth century, or of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries? It is the same with all that we have left; but the doctrines against which the older Freethinkers fought are now discarded by educated believers. Professor Gardner himself would be more at one with an educated Freethinker of to-day than with a staunch believer of two hundred years ago. Christianity itself is not capable of great changes, but Christians have shown themselves first of all capable of imprisoning, and even killing, men and women for attacking Christian doctrines, and afterwards of preaching the very things that were denounced. The advanced thought of the Christian world to-day is only the alphabet of the Freethought of fifty years ago. A religion of greater intellectual strength and sense of rectitude than Christianity would have died defending its doctrines. But religious organisations that are capable, under pressure, of swallowing anything and of teaching anything, may drag on a more or less dishonorable career until such time as outraged decency drives it finally from the field.

A religious census of the prison population of South Africa is included in a Blue-book just issued by the Department of Justice. The East London Daily Dispatch tells us that "the Church of England produced the largest number of criminals, the Wesleyans being a fair second, and the Dutch Reformed Church third. Among the 'also ran' is the Free Church of Scotland, which is credited with ten offenders; but it is not clear whether the 'Wee Frees' or the 'United Frees' are entitled to this doubtful honor." The clergy are always prating of the ethical value of religious teaching; but their statements are rarely put to the test.

The clergy of Peterborough have issued a public protest against Good Friday football. It is this sort of mediævalism which so endears the parsons to the general public.

Le Revue, the French newspaper, has been collecting the opinions of public men on deforestation in France. President Poincaré, in his reply, said "I am frantically fond of trees, and should like to have the power to behead those who cut them down." This is almost as bad as the sentence passed on Adam and Eve for meddling with the tree in Eden.

"Serpent in the Garden," read a headline in the Evening News recently. It referred to a proposed railway across Hampstead, and not to the devilish reptile of Eden.

An American minister, writing in Faith and Doubt, the new theological magazine, pleads for a restatement of Christianity. In the land of the almighty dollar this means flattering the Rockefellers and ignoring the fellows on the rocks.

The Rev. Mr. Selbie, Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford, charges preachers with holding and expressing uncertain views on religion. The charge is doubtless true, and may be held partly responsible for the decay of interest in religion; but the Principal forgets that religion deals with subjects concerning which nobody possesses any knowledge whatever. Even he, though a trainer of young preachers, is as ignorant as all the rest. Who knows anything about God, Christ, the soul, and immortality? It is easy enough for wholly ignorant men to dogmatise, but they cannot teach. Such is the case with all parsons, Principal Selbie included. Their "messages" are myths manufactured by themselves.

An attractive bioscope poster on the London hoardings reads, "Satan, at enormous expense." The Ecclesiastical Commissioners might be able to supply some idea of the cost of exploiting his Satanic Majesty.

Dr. W. E. Barton, writing in the magazine, Faith and Doubt, on "Christian Claims," says he has "gone to the edge of the precipice and looked over, to discover if I might, into what abyss I might be plunged by any discovery of modern science or Biblical criticism to-morrow or the day after. I have looked unterrified, and have returned to find my feet upon a rock and a song in my heart." Evidently that song was not "Let me like a soldier fall."

A Bill to establish fishing as a legal Sunday pastime has recently been introduced into the Pennsylvania Senate on the grounds that angling affords opportunity of rest and relaxation. Fishing for money is already extensively practised by the clergy on that day.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £78 0s. 10d. Received since:—N. M. X., £1; George Taylor, 10s.; John Grange, £2 2s. Per Miss Vance: J. Carruthers, 2s. 6d.; Manchester, 5s.; Chas. E. Hearson, £1 1s.

A. M.—We quite understand your indignation at the ordinary press boycott of Mr. Foote. He, however, feels no indignation, but only contempt. The creature you bring to our notice, after mentioning every article in the English Review except Mr. Foote's, has the pious effrontery to say there is no boycott in that. When he says that Meredith's letters don't amount to much he simply speaks like a—Christian. It is because the letters do amount to a great deal that he was silent on the subject. Meredith praised Mr. Foote for "fighting for the best of causes," told him that the said cause was "destined to victory," and sent him a cheque (with his name) in support of the Freethinker in the very last letter he ever wrote—and all that amounts to nothing! If that is all it amounts to, why not draw attention to "harmless facts"? The reference to the feelings of the Meredith family is hypocritical—and Scotch at that. He was a public man, as poet and novelist, he does not belong to any family, but to the world. The family represent him legally; they may be the natural guardians of his honor, but not of his genius and convictions. They had and have, apparently, no share in either.

H. D. WOOLLEY.—"My earnest and sincere desire," you say, "is that you may discover your awful mistake ere it is too late." Thanks. We believe you mean well. But what a God you worship! Fancy a Deity damning us for differing from you! The comedy overwhelms the tragedy.

J. TOMKINS.—Thanks for the Daily Herald cutting. We have a very small opinion, as you have, of the brains and style of Free Church "literature." Heaven save the mark!

VAUGHAN GRAY.—Thanks for the Bruno postcard and the stamp upon it of the Giordano Bruno Associazione at Rome as a message of friendship to the President of the N. S. S. We had a picture of the Bruno statue already; a photograph taken on the spot, with the N. S. S. delegates to the great World's Freethought Congress, some ten years ago.

AFTER reading the Editor's "Personal" it will be easy to understand why the bulk of this week's correspondence has to stand over till next week. This applies to subscriptions as well.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Personal.

ON Tuesday evening, March 11, I attended the Annual Meeting of the Secular Education League. There was an excellent gathering, and a really good audience when the time for the public meeting arrived. Mr. Halley Stewart, whose health had broken down, was compelled to resign the Presidency of the League; and, with many warm thanks for Mr. Stewart's devoted service, Mr. George Greenwood, M.P., was elected as Mr. Stewart's successor.

I should have strained a point to be present at that meeting, and I did strain it. I had a cold upon me, but I was in London on the Tuesday on the paper, and I stopped for the League meeting while I was there. I was grieved to see my younger colleague, Mr. Cohen, showing traces of his recent illness, and I gave him some fatherly advice about taking greater care of himself. By this time, I suppose, he is thinking that I need some such advice myself.

I went up on Friday evening to London again, in order to speak the distinctive note of the Freethought party at the meeting convened by the Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. It was a grand meeting, with a curious variety of view represented on the platform. When my turn arrived to speak, I received a very striking reception. I told the meeting that I had almost left my bed to attend, and I threw myself upon their indulgence. But I forgot my indisposition as I went along, I threw myself into the work, and the audience was unstinting in its applause. It was a great effort, in the state in which I then was; and the weather was wretched, and by an odd series of accidents things were made worse than they might have been, and I was completely upset when I arrived home at one o'clock in the morning. I had to put myself into the doctor's hands on Saturday, and there I am still. I am getting a bit better, but serious work or going up to London is out of the question.

On former occasions I have called Mr. Cohen in to sit in the editorial chair in my absence. I could hardly have done so this time; partly because of his own recent illness, and partly because of his lecturing on Sunday at Liverpool. "Mimnermus" happens to be living near me. He promptly went to London at my request, and did his best on Monday,—hoping on Tuesday to be assisted by Mr. Lloyd. This hurried arrangement leaves the Freethinker—and naturally leaves it—somewhat short of its usual attractions. Beyond this "Personal" and a few small items that were in type beforehand, my hand on the paper is paralysed this week. But I must be careful. The doctor says I have been overdoing it, and warns me to get rest and change as soon as possible.

G. W. FOOTE.

Sugar Plums.

The annual meeting of the Secular Education League was held on March 11 at Caxton Hall, Westminster, London. Excellent speeches were delivered by Mr. G. Greenwood, M.P., who presided, and by Mr. G. W. Foote, Mr. F. S. Swinny, and the Rev. W. Bell. Sir H. Cotton moved a vote of thanks to the chairman. The Rev. W. Bell, who is a Nonconformist minister, pointed out the disloyalty of the Free Churches to their own principles in opposing Secular Education.

Mr. John Grange, sending his annual cheque to the President's Honorarium Fund, writes:—

> "As years roll by, it is a joy to behold the tenacious loyalty and devotion and vitality that always characterise your advocacy of Freethought. The perennial freshness of the Freethinker is, in my judgment, incomparable. Its brainy breeziness is a mental tonic indeed. The frothy nature of current literature impels one to relish it all the more in this regard. I fondly hope its publication will outlast my life's span, otherwise lament and gloom would possess my being. May you live long as the bearer of the Torch of Reason."

We promise our old friend—who is not old in years though—that we shall try to keep alive as long as possible, if only for the sake of the cause which we have already been serving for more years than we care to count.

Here is an extract from another letter that may interest our readers—especially the older ones:—

> "I hope your article in the English Review on George Meredith will be followed by others from your pen on Freethought topics in the same or similar quarters. They are badly needed. I think I remember seeing some years ago in one of your articles that your appreciation of Cardinal Newman had been included in a collection of tributes to his memory published by the Roman Catholics. If my memory is not at fault, I should be glad to know the name and price of this book. I have read your tribute to Newman many times, and have also lent it to friends. This, the tribute of the 'batant' Atheist to the great Cardinal, is one of the few fine things in literature."

We regret that we are unable to give the title and price of the Catholic collection of tributes to Newman in which our own was included. The book was in our possession once, but we have missed it of late years. It is curious how books can go missing, but they do. Perhaps it will turn up again some day.

Richard Carlile.

[We have often been asked for a brief biography of Richard Carlile, the bravest and hardiest of the fighters for a free press in England. The following may supply the need. It was written by Mr. Foote some thirty-seven years ago. He has no time to rewrite it or revise it. It tells, at least, the story of Carlile's great fight, as it stands.—Editor.]

In proportion as we value a free press, so ought we to be grateful to those who achieved it for us at the cost of personal comfort and public repute. Their number is great, and the memory of most must perish; but others will never be forgotten; their splendid championship or loyal devotion being their passport to deathless fame. These memorable ones are of two kinds—those who have adduced impregnable arguments for the cause, adorned with the eloquence of conviction, and those who have practically striven for it in actual warfare. Of the former John Milton is the supreme English type, of the latter Richard Carlile.

In England the ruling classes always dreaded freedom of discussion and criticism, and were ever ready to exercise a rigid censorship over the press. When arbitrary suppression was possible it was invariably employed; since then, until quite recently, invidious legislation has been resorted to. The nineteenth century witnessed the trial of each method and the final extinguishment of both. During the first twenty years of it high-handed acts of power were levelled against authors and publishers; during the second twenty years stamp duties on newspapers were imposed to obstruct their sale among the poorer classes. Fortunately, both evils were broken down by the resolute opposition of noble-minded men, who valued "the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely, according to conscience, above all liberties"; of whom Richard Carlile was the noblest, the most sincere, the most intrepid.

Richard Carlile was born at Ashburton, in Devonshire, on December 8, 1790. Of his parents not much is known. His father possessed some talent as an arithmetician, and published a collection of arithmetical, mathematical, and algebraical questions. His trade was shoemaking, but he early quitted it to become an exciseman. Intoxication beset him in that profession, and he betook himself to teaching as a schoolmaster. Subsequently he became a soldier, and died at the age of thirty-four, "nobody's enemy but his own," leaving his wife with three infant children, Richard and two sisters. The widow was for several years in a flourishing business, but the hard times about 1800 greatly diminished it, and alternate sickness and poverty afflicted her. She was through all changes an indulgent mother and a virtuous woman. At the age of sixty she died, being supported by her son until then, from the time when he was able to earn a living for them.

Carlile's education was but scant; it comprised reading, writing, arithmetic, and sufficient Latin to read a physician's prescription. On leaving school he engaged in the service of Mr. Lee, chemist and druggist, in Exeter; but he soon left it on account of being put to do things deemed derogatory to his office. Following that he idled away three months at home, where he amused himself with coloring pictures to sell in his mother's shop. His mother's principal customers, says Mr. Holyoake, were the firm of Gifford & Co., which consisted of the brothers of that Attorney-General who had such extensive dealings with the son afterwards, in a different line. Carlile was then apprenticed to the tin-plate business, and, although he never liked it, he continued to work at it for many years. His apprenticeship lasted seven years and three months, and was marked by great hardships, and consequent conspiracies and rebellions. His master, a Mr. Cummings, allowed five or six hours for sleep, but no leisure for recreation. On being released from this galling bondage, he determined to forsake the trade as soon as possible; but for a long time he was compelled to follow it, and thereby earn his subsistence. After travelling in various parts as a journeyman tinman, he came to London in 1811, but he returned to Exeter the same year. In 1813 he was in London again, working at Benham & Sons, Blackfriars-road. During the interval he had formed an acquaintance with a lady who, after two months' courtship, became his wife, she being then thirty years of age and he twenty-three. This union does not seem to have been productive of great happiness. Mrs. Carlile was a woman of considerable personal attractions, and possessed all the business qualities necessary to a tradesman's wife. In after years of persecution she bravely stood by her husband's side and shared his imprisonment. But their tempers were ill-matched, their ages disparate, their mental characters irreconcilably diverse. By mutual consent they parted in 1832. No blame is legitimately ascribable to either; their conflicting idiosyncrasies were their misfortune, and not their fault.

During the years of his labor as a tinman, Carlile had not been mentally quiescent. He was ambitious to win a public reputation and to earn his living by his pen. Very early in life he had dreams of purifying the Church, which certainly needed purging. Heresy had not found a home in his mind, and necessarily his reforming tendencies concerned themselves with what he was acquainted with. He relates how, in his youth, he gathered faggots to burn "Old Tom Paine," instead of Guy Fawkes, being then totally ignorant of Paine's writings, and, like other people, incensed against him by irrational prejudice. Not until 1810, in his twentieth year, did he even see a copy of the Rights of Man. But towards 1816 he read Paine's works and the writings of other reformers; his mind became excited by his newly acquired ideas, and he essayed public life. Cobbett and other editors were plagued at first by his literary scraps, which were uniformly refused. But in the following year, 1817, Wooller's Black Dwarf made its appearance, and, being more to Carlile's taste than Cobbett's Register, which did not go far enough for him, he determined to push it amongst the newsvendors, as the sale was very low. "The Habeas Corpus Act," says Mr. Holyoake, "was suspended, and Sidmouth had sent forth his circular; there was a damp amongst the newsvendors, and few would sell. This excited Carlile with a desire to become a bookseller. The story of Lackington beginning with a stall encouraged him. He resolved to set a good example in the trade of political pamphlets. Finding the sale of the Black Dwarf very low, he borrowed £1 from his employer, and invested it in one hundred Dwarfs, and on the 9th of March, 1817, he sallied forth from the manufactory, with his stock in his handkerchief, to commence the trade of bookselling. He traversed the metropolis in every direction to get newsvendors to sell the Dwarf, and called every day to see how they sold. He inquired also after Cobbett's Register and Sherwin's Republican, but, finding that they did not want pushing, he took none of those round. Indeed, he refused to avail himself of the profit he could have made by taking Cobbett's Register, because it did not go far enough. He carried the Dwarf round several weeks, walking thirty miles a day, for a profit of fifteen or eighteen pence. At length an information was lodged against the publisher, and Mr. Steill was arrested. Carlile at once offered to take his place. Mr. Wooller, however, arranged the matter, and Carlile's offer was declined. Mr. Sherwin, then a young man editing the Republican, perceived Carlile's value, and offered him the publishing of his paper, which he accepted. Carlile guaranteed Mr. Sherwin against arrest, which left him free to be bold without danger. The shop on which he now entered was 183 Fleet-street, which Mr. Cobbett afterwards occupied. Carlile's first ideas of politics were, that neither writers, printers, nor publishers were bold enough; and he now commenced to set the example he thought wanted."

Those were stirring times, and Carlile stepped into the ranks of publishers just at the moment when his sturdy independence and resolute will were needed to stem the torrent of Government prosecutions.

The Tory Government made war upon the press, and to effect its designs furbished up every rusty instrument of tyranny. "It is difficult," says Knight, "to imagine a more degraded and dangerous position than that in which every political writer was placed during the year 1817. In the first place, he was subject, by a Secretary of State's warrant, to be imprisoned upon suspicion, under the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. Secondly, he was open to an ex-officio information, under which he would be compelled to find bail, or be imprisoned. The power of ex-officio information had been extended, so as to compel bail, by an Act of 1808; but from 1808 to 1811, during which three years forty such informations were laid, only one person was held to bail. In 1817 numerous ex officio informations were filed, and the almost invariable practice then was to hold the alleged offender to bail, or, in default, to commit to prison. Under this Act Mr. Hone, and others, were committed to prison during this year. To complete a triple cord with which the ministers believed they could bind down the 'man mountain' of the press, came forth Lord Sidmouth's Circular." Sidmouth's famous Circular to the Lords-Lieutenants of Counties, urging the importance of preventing the circulation of blasphemous and seditious pamphlets, stated that he had obtained the opinion of the law officers, "that a justice of the peace may issue a warrant to apprehend a person charged before him, on oath, with the publication of libels of the nature in question, and compel him to give bail to answer the charge." This was practically a deprivation of every particle of liberty, and placed every writer at the mercy of informers and unpaid magistrates. It did away with trial by jury, and substituted for it the arbitrary caprice of judges. Earl Grey, in the House of Lords, asked: "If such be the power of the magistrate, and if this be the law, where are all the boasted securities of our independence and freedom?" These proceedings were the most daring invasion of public liberty that had been attempted since the time of the Stuarts. The reformers, however, stood firm; only one fled—William Cobbett. But no cowardice dictated his movement. He sacrificed an incredibly profitable business, and departed with his family to America, being determined not to be gagged by judges, or magistrates, or Secretaries of State. There he continued to write his Register, the first numbers of which, dated from Long Island, preserve as an indelible brand on the oligarchy the story of the Last Hundred Days of English Freedom.

Carlile vigorously set to work at printing and publishing works under the ban of legal prohibition. He was determined, at whatever cost, to defy the Government, and resolved to publish, on principle, every forbidden book. His first step was to resist Southey's attempt to suppress his early poem, Wat Tyler, composed in former days of Republican and Communistic convictions, when, with Coleridge, he fondly contemplated the progress of extreme principles, and longed to see them put into practice. Of that poem Carlile sold twenty-five thousand copies in 1817. His next publication was the prosecution and defence of Wooller, of the Black Dwarf. Next came a reprint of Paine's political works, edited by Carlile and Sherwin conjointly. Immediately afterwards he reprinted William Hone's suppressed political squibs, called The Parodies on the Book of Common Prayer. This forced on the trial of Hone for blasphemy; but happily the old book-worm, after making one of the most remarkable defences on record, was acquitted. The publication, however, of the Parodies cost Carlile eighteen weeks' imprisonment in the King's Bench Prison, from which he was liberated on the acquittal of Hone.

By the end of 1818 Carlile had published the theological works of Paine, which, with the political writings and miscellaneous pieces, were collected in two handsomely printed volumes, forming the only complete edition of Paine ever published. No expense was spared to render the collection as complete as possible. The prosecutions set on foot against him gave to these works an unprecedented sale; and other publications of a similar character were proceeded with, such as the Doubts of Infidels, Watson Refuted, Palmer's Principles of Nature, and the God of the Jews. By the month of October, 1819, six indictments were pending against him, two of which were tried from the 12th to the 16th of that month. "When he came to trial," says Mr. Holyoake, "he had no clear understanding of the subject of his defence; it was compiled from the pleadings of others for toleration and free discussion." His defence, however, so alarmed the Emperor Alexander of Russia that he issued a Ukase, forbidding any printed report of it from being brought into his territory. The verdict was gained against him, and he was sentenced to fifteen hundred pounds fine, and three years' imprisonment in Dorchester Gaol, whither he was driven off, handcuffed, in the middle of the night. This imprisonment was, of course, endured with no grateful feelings, but it produced a good result in affording opportunity for patient study of religious questions. "He had taken the impression," says Mr. Holyoake, "from the hint of an aged political friend, that all the evils of mankind rooted in the superstition and consequent priestcraft practised upon them, and was resolved to devote the solitude of his imprisonment to the study of religious mysteries, and fearlessly and faithfully to make the revelation for the common good of man." The brave man was true to his resolve. He did study those questions, and very speedily saw reason to disclaim all belief in dogmas and creeds based on revelation.

The first thing he did after the close of his trial was to publish a report of his defence, in which he had taken care to read the whole of Paine's Age of Reason. The sale was immense, and to stay it a prosecution was begun against Mrs. Carlile, but was dropped on her declining the sale. She was not, however, long unmolested. "Under pretence of seizing for Mr. Carlile's fines," says Mr. Holyoake, "the sheriff, with a writ of levari facias from the Court of King's Bench, took possession of his house, furniture, and stock-in-trade, and closed the shop. It was thus held from November 16 to December 24. Rent became due, and it was then emptied. Under Mr. Carlile's desire, Mrs. Carlile renewed a business, in January, 1820, with what could be scraped together from the unseized wreck of their property. In February she was arrested; but the first indictment failed through a flaw in its construction. She was immediately proceeded against by the Attorney-General, and became her husband's fellow-prisoner in Dorchester Gaol in February, 1821." The sentence passed upon her was two years' imprisonment, not one jot of which was abated, although her accouchement in gaol without proper attendance seemed so terrible to her husband that he did for her what he never did for himself, and begged of Peel to grant her a release.

Carlile's sister Mary Ann carried on the business after Mrs. Carlile's imprisonment. She, likewise, was prosecuted by the relentless Government, and in November, 1821, found herself a fellow-prisoner with her brother, under a fine of five hundred pounds. The business was continued by Mrs. Wright, and a troop of other assistants, whose names should be put on record: George Beer, John Barkley, Humphrey Boyle, Joseph Rhodes, William Holmes, John Jones, Joseph Trust, Charles Sanderson, Thomas Jeffries, William Haley, William Campion, Richard Hassell, Michael O'Connor, William Cochrane, John Clarke, John Christopher, and Thomas Riley Perry. All of these were imprisoned for terms varying from six months to three years. A second seizure of house and stock was made, on pretence of satisfying the fines. But no abatement was made from the amount of fines, and, notwithstanding Carlile's persistent application to "Christian Judge Bailey," he was obliged to serve out the extra three years' imprisonment in lieu thereof.

Carlile's imprisonment was rendered as irksome to him as possible. Inside the gaol the utmost indignities were practised upon him, his wife, and his sister. The chaplain laughed at their complaints, and more than hinted that no degradation could exceed their deserts. He even professed a fear that the thieves confined there might be contaminated by communication with a heretic and Republican, and suggested precautions against such a deplorable contingency. The prisoner's opportunities of exercise in fresh air depended on the caprice of the gaoler; and even when permitted that luxury he was led out as a caged animal, and exhibited to the gaze of the passing curious. In consequence of this he passed two years and a half in his own chamber, for which he paid two guineas and a half a week, without going into the open air. During the whole period he continued to edit the Republican as vigorously as before, and made it more decided on theological questions. To spite his persecutors, he dated it in the era of "the Carpenter's Wife's Son." None of his publications had been suppressed, and the Cabinet was reported to have acknowledged Carlile invincible in his course of moral resistance. When he was liberated from Dorchester Gaol in 1825, the freedom of the press was virtually complete so far as Government was concerned. His incarcerated shopmen had still to finish their terms of imprisonment, but no fresh arrests were made. One brave, unflinching man had done battle against the power and wealth of the oligarchy, and issued from the contest victor. His practical sagacity, even while imprisoned, provided against every unfavorable contingency, and devised means to surmount every obstacle. When he found that the Government could not be beaten by straightforward means, he adopted others; laws which could not be broken he eluded. The intention of Government to exhaust his means of resistance by repeated arrests of his shopmen he frustrated by providing a mechanical process of sale. Books were sold through an aperture, so that the buyer was unable to identify the seller. Afterwards they were sold by clockwork. On a dial was written the name of every publication for sale; the purchaser entered, and turned the hand of the dial to the book he wanted, which, on depositing his money, dropped down before him without the necessity of anyone speaking. The circulation of his books was quadrupled, and cheering crowds assembled daily around his shop windows. In the provinces, at public dinners, the health was drunk of "Carlile's invisible shopman." The number of copies of Paine's works sold was amazing; from December, 1818, to December, 1822, 20,000 copies were sent into circulation. While in prison his friends liberally supported him; subscriptions to the amount of £500 a year were acknowledged in the Republican. The profits of the business also amounted to about £50 per week. Occasionally the trade was prodigious; in one week, while a trial was pending, Mrs. Carlile took £500 over the counter. On his leaving Dorchester Gaol, one friend lent him £1,000 to extend his business in the new shop at 62 Fleet-street. The triumph was on the side of Right against Might; the war had lasted six years, and Might was worn out and obliged to retreat. Henceforth, although newspaper duties, or "taxes on knowledge," still continued to impede the sale of literature amongst the working classes, Bourbon misrule was absolutely impossible. Editors and publishers enjoyed a pleasant peace, won for them mainly by Carlile's invincible hostility to oppression.

Love your parents. Do not let the family which springs from you make you ever forget the family from which you sprang. Too often indeed the new ties relax the old, whereas they ought only to be a new link in the chain of love which should bind together the three generations of a family. Surround the white heads of the mother and of the father with tender and respectful affection till their last day. Strew their way to the grave with flowers. Breathe over their weary souls a fragrance of faith and immortality with the constancy of your love. And may the affection which you keep inviolate for your parents be a pledge of that which your children will keep for you.—Joseph Mazzini.

To End the Blasphemy Laws.

CROWDED MEETING FOR REPEAL.

A STRONGLY worded resolution, urging that immediate steps be taken to secure the early repeal of the ferocious and inhuman Blasphemy Laws, was carried unanimously at a crowded and enthusiastic meeting held at the Essex Hall, Strand, London, on Friday evening. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie presided, and was supported by an imposing array of speakers, including Lord Harberton, Sir W. P. Byles, M.P., Sir Hiram Maxim, Mr. G. G. Greenwood, M.P., Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. G. W. Foote, Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner, and the Rev. Stewart Headlam.

Mr. Herbert Burrows also occupied a seat upon the platform, and letters of sympathy with the objects of the meeting were read by Mrs. Bonner from the Rt. Hon. Thomas Burt, Mr. Joseph King, M.P., Mr. Athelstan Rendall, M.P., Mr. Holt, M.P., Mr. Philip Snowden, M.P., Mr. H. Verinder, and others, together with resolutions of sympathy from a number of Secular, Ethical, and Socialist societies.

The Rev. Copeland Bowie opened with a vigorous speech, in which he pointed out that the gravest matter in the administration of the Blasphemy Laws was the discrimination exercised. There was small chance of a scholar being sent to prison for profanity; but a speaker at an open-air meeting would be promptly sentenced. This was not only unjustifiable, but it was iniquitous.

The Rev. Stewart Headlam, white-haired and dignified, moved the resolution, and recalled the stormy days of "the 'seventies," when Charles Bradlaugh was in the forefront of the battle for free speech. It was, he said, the treatment of Bradlaugh by Christians that caused him (Headlam) to support the abolition of these odious laws. Unfortunately, legislation was delayed because members of Parliament were greater cowards than members of the County Council. For forty years he had advocated the abolition of these laws, and before he died he hoped to see them abolished.

Mr. Bernard Shaw, who followed, was clever and cynical. He immediately raised a laugh by saying that he had himself given satisfaction all round. He was received at the City Temple as the last refuge of Christianity, and was applauded by Secularists as a super-Atheist. The Blasphemy Laws were out of date. When England was a Christian country these laws were not undemocratic; but Christians were now in an insignificant minority in the British Empire. There was something worse than uproarious blasphemy, and that was a dead and terrified silence. Hardly any public man would to-day tell the truth on any subject whatever. At present he or any other dramatist would be prevented from producing a play upon the subject of Mohammed. The Blasphemy Laws should be uncompromisingly abolished.

Mr. G. G. Greenwood, M.P., was unusually grave, and he referred in detail to the legal aspects of the Blasphemy Laws. He said that judges had ruled that if the decencies of controversy were observed, the fundamentals of religion may be attacked. But a British jury would be scared by a lively song of Beranger's, and who was to judge as to what were the decencies of controversy?

Mr. Foote's rising was received with prolonged applause. His speech, which was in his happiest vein, was a sustained piece of oratory, and bristled with good things. Very happy was his reminder to Mr. Shaw that Voltaire had written a play on Mohammed. He hoped to see Mr. Shaw's production, for the two might be bound together, and the wit of the eighteenth century compared with the wit of the twentieth. He himself stood for absolute freedom of thought and speech. Mr. Stead had pointed out that the editor of the Freethinker was the only English journalist who had protested against the extreme treatment of the Church in France under the Separation Law. He had also used his pen in favor of the Peculiar People. He remembered a rosy-faced man named Senior introducing himself in a tramcar at Stratford and thanking him for his efforts on behalf of the Peculiars. Senior said, "We ought to know one another. You have been imprisoned for not believing in the Bible and I for believing it." The Blasphemy Laws simply meant the prosecution of dissidents. Such prosecutions never fail, because the Freethinker stands in such a position that brains cannot save him. If, for example, Mr. Greenwood were tried by a jury of Tariff Reformers, he would get twelve months. What right has a man to feelings if he is afraid of honest controversy? The only restrictions needed were the restrictions placed on the discussion of every other subject. Freethinkers asked for equal rights with other citizens. They asked for no more and would be satisfied with no less.

Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., said that the Blasphemy Laws were a survival of barbarism, which had disgraced the statute book for three hundred years. Only Atheists were now punished.

Sir Hiram Maxim followed with a witty speech, which he humorously said he had had type-written in case of a Government spy being present.

Sir William P. Byles, M.P., said that the right to express thought was the greatest of all causes. Darwin, Tyndall, and Huxley had utterly destroyed the faith of millions. It was high time the statute book was cleansed of the intolerable Blasphemy Laws.

Lord Harberton stated that he supported the resolution with a whole heart. The function of government should be to protect the individual and not to imprison him. Ridicule was an extremely effective weapon, and the Blasphemy Laws simply deprived Freethinkers of the use of that weapon.

The resolution was then put, every hand being held up in favor. So ended a memorable meeting, noteworthy for the enthusiasm and number of the audience, and also for the very representative character of the speakers.

Sir Hiram Maxim's Protest.

SPEECH AT ESSEX HALL, MARCH 14.

IT is certainly a most extraordinary fact that right here in England and to-day the wisest and best among us are liable to be arrested and imprisoned with hard labor for long terms for expressing our honest opinions regarding certain impossible and silly fables invented by depraved and ignorant barbarians in the very childhood of the world. We cannot control our own beliefs. To many of us it is absolutely impossible to believe in talking snakes and jackasses. We could not torture our minds into believing that a barbarian general stopped the rotation of the earth for a whole day in order to give him time to murder the whole of another barbarian race—all except the young women. To us it is not a question of belief at all; we know that these ancient stories cannot be true. Still, in England, and in the high civilisation of the twentieth century, we have on our Statute-books laws which make it possible for foolish and superstitious bigots, and some other evil-minded persons, to persecute and imprison those of us who are wise and honest enough to express doubts as to the truth of the most extraordinary fables that were ever invented by a diseased imagination.

For many ages attempts have been made to enforce uniformity in religious belief. Every possible form of torture has been tried, and still there are more heretics in the world than ever before. Dogmatic Christianity, as we know it to-day, did not originate in Jerusalem nineteen hundred years ago, as many suppose. It was manufactured at Rome at a much later date, and consists for the most part of a crazy mosaic, or rather a patchwork of many colors. When the priests and monks who had produced this remarkable new religion presented it to the people, it was found to be a misfit religion; many were quite unable to believe such extraordinary tales relating to devils, demons, fish, and snakes; but the priests, instead of remodelling their religion to make it fit the intelligence of the people, sought rather to reduce the intelligence of the people to fit their new religion, and this was accomplished by killing off all unbelievers. Hundreds of thousands were tortured to death, generally by being burnt alive over a slow fire; and this went on for more than a thousand years.

The article in the Christian faith that led to the greatest number of burnings was the doctrine of Transubstantiation. Many people were unable to believe that a priest could hold up a bit of bread, and, by repeating certain hocus-pocus, transform it into the flesh of someone who had long been dead. If one killed his father or mother, and murdered innocent children, there was yet hope for him if, at the eleventh hour, the priest was able to give him a through ticket, a golden harp, and a halo; but to disbelieve this utterly absurd and impossible priestly hocus pocus was regarded as the crime of crimes, and for such a sinner there was no hope—he was doomed to spend an eternity in fire and brimstone.

If the Blasphemy Laws that were in force in England in the time of Henry VIII. were put in force to-day, every member of the Established Church of England would be burnt alive to-morrow. From this it will be evident that, though we are a slow-moving people, we are really making some progress. Religion is, and always has been, in a constant state of transition. We have already modified the interpretation of the Blasphemy Laws in England, and in some of the very highly civilised countries like France they have disappeared altogether. It is only a question of time when the last vestige of these old, cruel, and barbarous laws will disappear from our Statute-books.

The changes in religion are slow when considered in terms of a human life, but when considered in terms of geological epochs they are rapid indeed. It is the duty of every honest thinking man and woman to put their shoulder to the wheel and do their utmost to have these old and disgraceful laws repealed—modern civilisation demands it. Many laws have been made and millions of mankind have been tortured and put to death for not believing manifest falsehood. But no laws have ever been made and no one has ever been tortured for not believing a manifest truth. It requires no faith to believe a fact. Truth does not have to be protected by law. All our Blasphemy Laws are for the protection of what is known to be untrue.

I approve of the resolution.

"George Meredith—Freethinker."

THE claim made by orthodox religious people that Meredith was a sort of Christian philosopher, a "Defender of the Faith," is a pretty impudent one. How often he is quoted in the interests of a discredited creed! Every allusion to religion which he puts upon the lips of his characters is heralded as an item in Meredith's own dogmatic faith. This game or pretence is just splendidly exposed by G. W. Foote in the March number of the English Review. The article is of great significance on the subject of the novelist's religion. It is wonderful how anxious Church ministers are to nobble Meredith. They are so thankful for the support of big personalities, especially now when the drift from the Churches is generally admitted (not at all frankly by those who run orthodoxy). By hook or crook every possible genius must be roped in.

MEREDITH AND BRADLAUGH.

Mr. Foote shows that Meredith, up to the end of his life, was a courageous helper of the Freethought movement. That means a great deal. It is a sign of intellectual weakness and of cowardice, of a diseased spirituality and of ecclesiastical snobbery, to ignore or depreciate the movement for a humanist religion. And militant Rationalism has done a considerable work in opening the eyes of the people to the tyranny and falsehood of Christian dogma.

Incident after incident is given of Meredith's position. In 1869, he writes to John Morley, "You see how they dealt with Bradlaugh. I spoke to Greenwood about him, insisting that he was a man of power, and was not to be sneered down." Writing to Maxse in 1870, he says, "The Parsonry are irritating me fearfully, but a non-celibate clergy are a terrific power. They are interwound with the whole of the Middle Class like the poisonous ivy." Mr. Foote quotes from the poems of Meredith in support of his case.

LETTERS TO FOOTE.

The personal testimony of Mr. Foote is of peculiar interest. "My own correspondence with Meredith—I should rather say his correspondence with me—did not run to many letters, but they cover some thirty years of time. I was far from forcing myself upon his attention. Words of encouragement that he sent me from time to time were never solicited, but always spontaneous." In the middle seventies, when Foote was fighting for Freethought, Meredith was watching him, and later on promised to write for his new magazine. He sent a cheque to assist the propagandist in his work. He was "not frightened with me because of the evil reputation fixed upon me by orthodoxy." "'I admire the fight you are making,' Meredith wrote in his first letter to me. 'You carry on a brave battle for the best of causes, personally profitless, as you must know it to be, and my good wishes are with you.'"

MEREDITH'S LAST CHEQUE.

In April, 1909, Meredith sent a cheque "as a contribution to the Freethinker." On being asked whether he wished his name to appear, he wrote, on April 23, "As a question of supporting your paper, my name is at your disposal." This was the last letter he ever wrote, but it was omitted by the editor in the official collection. These facts deserve to be recorded.

This article should be widely read.

UNSOCIALISED WEATHER.

Lambert Caspers, a Chicago attorney, told this story at a recent Y. M. C. A. banquet:—

A Kansas farmer, a Dane, applied for naturalisation papers. The judge asked him:—

"Are you satisfied with the general conditions of the country?"

"Yas," drawled the Dane.

"Does the government suit you?" queried the judge.

"Yas, yas; only I would like to see more rain," replied the farmer.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—No. 13 SUNDAY, MARCH 30, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

Among all forms of mistake, prophecy is the most gratuitous.—GEORGE ELIOT.

The Waiting World.

DR. PARKER was in the habit of saying, in his own extravagant style, that he saw Christ, and nothing but Christ, in every page of the Old Testament. One is not surprised at such a statement by a man whose boast it was that he could see and commune with the Invisible. To ordinary people there is no trace of Jesus in the Old Testament, and present-day apologists do not speak of its Typology, its Messianic Prophecy, and the argument it yields for the Savior's divinity. What these discover in it is the spirit of Christ. Principal Smith, of Aberdeen, admits that "the fancy that to discover some type or prediction of Christ where nobody else had seen one before was to honor Christ and confound his enemies, has been the besetting sin both of mediæval and of Protestant styles of exegesis" and that "nothing has been more guilty of rendering sermons on the Old Testament artificial and unreal." Dr. Orchard, however, excelling even Dr. Parker in the art of exaggeration, informs us that the entire ancient world "called out for Christ." In a sermon that appears in the Christian World Pulpit for March 19, he defines history as "a garment woven from the will of man on the loom of time by God." Unfortunately, the weaving is being done so very badly that it is "not always easy to discern the pattern or read the meaning," which is not exactly a compliment to the Divine Weaver. And yet Dr. Orchard describes the process as if he knew all about it. With an air of omniscience he sets both the scientific and the theological students of history right:—

> "The one neglects to look for the increasing purpose, and so presents us with a confused tangle; the other fails to remember the nature of the task, and so often falls into despair at the long delayed consummation. For the task is to weave the will of men and the will of God into one perfect pattern without breaking the one or bending the other."

With all due deference to the reverend gentleman, we venture to suggest that he has overstepped the bounds of knowledge. He cannot discern the Divine elements in history, because, for one thing, he has no means of ascertaining what the Divine is, or even that there is a Divine.

Paul says that "when the fullness of time was come, God sent forth his Son" (Gal. iv. 4), and Dr. Orchard observes that this statement is "an intuition which history wonderfully confirms." We fail to see where the "intuition" comes in, and certainly history does not confirm the sending of God's Son. History knows neither God nor his Son, any more than it knows Osiris, Adonis, Attis, and Mithra, except as mythical beings. The Christian Father and Son belong to precisely the same category as the Pagan deities just named. Dr. Orchard alludes to what he terms the "entanglement" of Christianity in history, which is felt to be one of its "difficulties." Whatever the reverend gentleman means by "entanglement," nothing is more indubitable than that history is Christianity's chief discreditor. History is judge and jury in one, the verdict is Guilty, and the sentence Death. Now, this religion which history condemns for its incompetency is the religion for which, according to Dr. Orchard, the ancient world loudly called out. Here are his own words:—

> "Purely literary criticism and purely historical criticism may reduce the teaching of Jesus Christ to uncertainty and his personality to a myth. The corrective for that is to study history as a living thing, a chain of experience, a growing institution, a new kind of life. Not only does the study of history show that Christianity is an Idealism rooted in reality, a philosophy which springs from personal experience, but it is the greatest help to the interpretation of our times. For there is a sense in which history repeats itself."

Let us now see what history yields to the investigator when it is taken as "a living thing." According to Dr. Orchard, pre-Christian history was a preparation for Christ. All the religions of antiquity, each in its degree, made ready the way of the Lord Jesus. Their gods were false, it is true; but their worship created an appetite for the "one living and true God," revealed by Jesus Christ. The curious thing is that the Governor of the Universe is supposed to have led mankind to the knowledge and worship of himself through corrupt and corrupting heathen cults. Professor Gilbert Murray tells us that Greek religion passed through four stages in its evolution, and was a failure in each. Then the Græco-Roman world was inundated by several Eastern religions which nearly destroyed the old national faiths. Does Dr. Orchard imagine that the four stages of Greek religion and the introduction of the Oriental cults into the West were ordained in order to show how keenly the world hungered and thirsted for Jesus of Nazareth? The truth is that the Greeks and Romans were always in the process of outliving their religions. The Stoics had scarcely any theology at all, but their system of ethics was exceedingly fine. Dr. Orchard admits that Stoicism was "what to-day we should call Ethicism," and then adds:—

> "Its failure was its inability to commend itself to men or produce character in the common people. It produced Seneca, who was insincere; Epictetus, who was too hard; and Marcus Aurelius, who was a Pharisee; and for all its high doctrines it did nothing for the world."

In that extract Stoicism is unfairly criticised, and some of its chief champions are misrepresented. Seneca, like all men, had his weaknesses; but he was not a hypocrite. To call him insincere is to do him gross injustice. According to all accounts, Epictetus was one of the most beautiful characters the world has ever seen. Marcus Aurelius is not to be compared with Epictetus either as a thinker or a character; but there is no justification for sneering at him as a Pharisee. Stoicism was not a failure. It did commend itself to thousands, and it did produce beautiful and noble characters not a few. Only inveterate prejudice can describe it as having done nothing for the world. Why, it is doing a great deal for the world still through the immortal writings of its best representatives. Professor Gilbert Murray, who is quite as competent to judge as Dr. Orchard, to say the least, advocates a revival of the ideals of the Greeks, of their sane and cheerful outlook upon life, of their love of poetry and art and philosophy. Instead of being a preparation for Christianity, the Greek ideals rendered life abundantly worth living. They insisted upon freedom, virtue, generosity, kind-liness, and a disciplined spirit; and it is safe to assert that the Greek Golden Age in the fifth century B.C. has never been surpassed, if equalled, under Christianity.

The truth is that Christ is not, has never been, and is never likely to become, the desire of all nations. It is overweening egotism alone that enables Christians to represent the Heathen as profoundly yearning for a saving knowledge of him. Not only mankind did not eagerly wait for his coming, they emphatically rejected him when he came; and "he is despised and rejected of men" to this day. In John's Gospel we are told that "he came unto his own, and they that were his own received him not," and we venture to think that John is a safer guide in this matter than our reverend friend. Instead of finding the world anxious to embrace it, Christianity had to fight its way to the front with carnal weapons. Its deadliest opponents were Neo-Platonism and Manichæism. These three religions had many ideas in common — revelation, redemption, ascetic virtue, and immortality; and for a long time it was highly problematic which of the three would win the victory. Dr. Orchard seems to be under the impression that the outside world was partial to Christianity, that God had prepared the way for his Son by inspiring the Romans to make roads everywhere, to cultivate the Greek language, and to establish an empire that was co-extensive with the Western world; but he shrewdly forgets that all these facilities were equally at the service of the other religions. The three religions were very much alike, and they had alike borrowed largely from older cults, and were constantly borrowing from one another. As a borrower Christianity surpassed the other two. Harnack says that "unconsciously it learned and borrowed from many quarters," and that "indeed it would be impossible to imagine it existing amid all the wealth and vigor of these religions had it not drawn pith and flavor even from them." It was its alliance with Hellenism and its skill in accommodation that helped to turn the scales in its favor. Of Gregory Thaumaturgus we read that he excelled his master, Origen, as a Hellenist, and "accommodated himself as a bishop in a truly surprising way to the Pagan tendencies of those whom he converted." It was worldly wisdom, not Divine guidance, that carried Christianity to the throne.

What has Christianity done to justify its existence? Dr. Orchard tacitly admits that it has done nothing. "The conditions are wonderfully parallel," he says, "with those when Christ first came." Listen:—

> "There is a tremendous decline in definite religious beliefs. The great theological systems constructed under different conceptions of the Universe and society no longer win acceptance. They no longer hold the imagination, or suffice to direct conduct in the new conditions and problems of industrial life, and the ethic that they enshrine is either not comprehended or is challenged as inadequate.....Meanwhile the people are either genuinely perplexed at existence or dimly aware that somehow human life has lost its sense of purpose and its possession of inward peace."

A more humiliating confession a Christian minister could never make. By making it Dr. Orchard plays into the hands of his opponents with a vengeance. Fancy a preacher seriously asking in the twentieth Christian century, "Can Christ meet these new conditions?" and not being quite sure what the answer is. We exhort him to face the facts honestly, and ask himself whether or not they are such as to justify his hope that Christ shall come and set the world right. We are convinced that Christ and the world are perfect strangers to each other, have never once met, and are never likely to make each other's acquaintance.

Religion and Sex.—IV.

BEFORE pursuing the subject further, it may be as well to utter a word of caution; it is not unlikely that some who have read what has been said may jump to the conclusion that I am seeking to prove religion to be no more than a study in pathology or in perverted sexuality. This, however, is not the case. Neither could have given rise to religious belief, which, as I have tried to show, has a perfectly natural origin in conditions that normally accompany uninstructed primitive intelligence. But once the religious idea is established, it derives nutriment from numerous sources. Its fundamental characteristic—the belief that phenomena are determined by superhuman intelligences—finds support, not alone in normal natural processes, but also in abnormal nervous states, and again in the mysterious and ill-understood phenomena of sexual life. Here, as elsewhere, current experience is interpreted in terms of established ideas. And being so interpreted, these ideas are apparently confirmed by the recurrence of these experiences. Thus it is common to find religious people treating an attack on the validity of their religious beliefs as the equivalent of an attack upon the existence of certain emotional and intellectual states. But the emotional states of a religionist no one disputes. The ecstatic state of a mediæval monk or nun, or the exalted feeling of the modern convert, are facts, however we may interpret them. It is in the interpretation that issue is joined.

Consequently, we are not concerned with an inquiry as to the origin of religion, or of the nature of religion, as such. What we are concerned with is the nature of those conditions and forces that have served to keep religion alive and to strengthen man's sense of communion with spiritual powers. And I think it has been shown that the recurrence of abnormal or pathologic nervous states, at first accidentally occurring, then deliberately induced, has been a powerful factor in this direction. One has only to eliminate in thought the part played in the history of religion by visions, trances, and various forms of natural or induced hallucination, to realise how materially they have contributed to this end. And, further, when we examine the sexual life of the race, we find that in exactly the same manner the characteristic phenomena met with here has again been ignorantly used to bolster up religious belief. My main thesis is, then, that religion has been maintained largely by claiming as its own states of mind that have no connection with it. Whether these states be of a normal or abnormal character makes no material difference to the issue. The fact remains that all upon which religion lives and has lived, from the physical universe of primitive man to the more obscure and more complex actions and reactions of the nervous system, can be, and is, being explained without any reference whatever to religion.

We can now return to the point at which my last article concluded. It was there shown that many reliable medical authorities were at one in recognising the close connection between sexual and religious feeling, and that not infrequently the two were positively interchangeable. When we come to deal with the phenomena of conversion we shall be able to see that the time of life at which this occurs is practically coincident with the period of adolescence. This fact has been established by numerous statistical inquiries during the last twelve or fifteen years, and may be taken as authoritative. And what is true of present-day converts is equally true of famous cases of conversion in the past. Thus Mr. G. S. Hall has compiled a lengthy list of noted characters, with the ages at which strong religious conviction was experienced. From his list I take the following examples. Religious conviction came to St. Thekla at the age of 18, to St. Agnes at 13, St. Antony at 18, Martin of Tours at 18, Euphrasia at 12, Benedict at 14, Cuthbert at 15, St. Bernard at 12, St. Dominic at 15, St. Collette at 20, St. Catherine at 7, St. Teresa at 12, St. Francis of Sales at 11.* The significance of these ages is that they represent a period during which not only is the organism extremely plastic and open to suggestion, but they are the years during which the nature of the individual reaches sexual and social maturity. The development of new organs, functions, and feelings is taking place, and there can be little doubt to those who study the facts closely that the proneness of the individual, under suitable suggestion, to profess religious conviction is very frequently no more than a misinterpretation, and often a perversion, of a developing sexual life.

A study of religious autobiographies, from the earliest times to the latest revivalistic mission, makes this very clear. Thus of St. Gertrude, a Benedictine nun of the thirteenth century, we are told:—

> "One day at chapel she heard supernaturally sung the words, 'Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus.' The Son of God, leaning towards her like a sweet lover, and giving to her soul the softest kiss, said to her at the second Sanctus, 'In the Sanctus addressed to my person, receive with this all the sanctity of my divinity and of my humanity.'.....And the following Sunday, while she was thanking God for this favor, behold the Son of God, more beauteous than thousands of angels, takes her to his arms as if he were proud of her, and presents her to God the Father, and in that perfection of sanctity with which he had endowed her."†

Of Juliana of Norwich, who was granted a revelation in 1373, we are told that she had for long "ardently desired" a bodily sight of the Lord upon the cross; and, again, that Jesus appeared to her and said, "I love thee and thou lovest me, and our love shall never be disparted in two."‡ So, again, in the case of Sister Jeanne des Anges, Superior of the Convent of Ursulines of Loudon, and the principal character in the famous Grandier witchcraft case, we have a detailed account, in her own words, of the lascivious dreams, unclean suggestions, etc.—all attributed to Satan—and alternated with impressions of bodily union with Jesus.§ Marie de L'Incarnation addresses Jesus as follows:—

> "Oh, my love, when shall I embrace you? Have you no pity on the torments that I suffer? Alas! alas! My love! My beauty! My life! Instead of healing my pain, you take pleasure in it. Come, let me embrace you, and die in your sacred arms."‖

Veronica Juliani, beatified by Pope Pius II. took a real lamb to bed with her, kissed it, and suckled it at her breasts. St. Catherine of Genoa threw herself on the ground to cool herself, crying out, "Love, love, I can bear it no longer." She also confessed to a peculiar longing towards her confessor.¶ Santa Teresa, who died at the early age of thirty-three, and whose family presented more than one case of developed neurasthenia, was troubled by "messages" at an early age. These she believed were temptations from the Devil suggesting an "honorable alliance." At the age of twenty she entered a convent, was subject to fainting fits, and aggravated her illnesses by her longing for them as proofs of the divine favor. And one need only add that, with all her reading and longing for personal communion with Jesus, her first conviction of having attained the ecstasy of divine love was experienced after discovering and dwelling upon "a very realistic picture" of a martyred saint—St. Joseph. Medical men who have studied the subject would be the first to perceive the significance of this contemplation of a tortured body—possibly nude—by one whose sexual nature was undergoing a process of suppression.

It is idle to attempt to evade the significance of these cases by sneering, as does Professor James, at "medical materialism." It is not a question of materialism, medical or non-medical. It is a question of the application of knowledge and common sense to the cases before us. And a rational analysis of the circumstances will take notice of the nature of the feelings excited and expressed, rather than the object towards which they are directed. As a matter of fact, if we were to eliminate the name of Jesus from the effusions cited, no one would have the least doubt as to their real nature. Nor can there be any doubt among competent students that had the women cited, with thousands of others unnamed, lived under conditions that would have favored their finding an outlet for their feelings in rational social activity and in the company of the opposite sex, culminating in marriage and motherhood, their religious ecstacies would have been non-existent, and society would have been the better for their absence. What we really observe in these outbursts is the perverted expression of feelings that are denied their legitimate outlet. The case has been well summed up by Dr. Henry Maudesley:—

> "The ecstatic trances of such saintly women as Catherine Sienne and St. Theresa, in which they believed themselves to be visited by their Savior and to be received as veritable spouses into his bosom, were, though they knew it not, little better than vicarious sexual orgasm; a condition of things which the intense contemplation of the naked male figure, carved or sculptured in all its proportions on a cross, is more fitted to produce in young women of susceptible nervous temperament than people are apt to consider. Every experienced physician must have met with instances of single and childless women who have devoted themselves with extraordinary zeal to habitual religious exercises, and who, having gone insane as a culmination of their emotional fervor, have straightway exhibited the saddest mixture of religious and erotic symptoms—a boiling over of lust in voice, face, gestures, under the pitiful degradation of disease.....The fanatical religious sects, such as the Shakers and the like, which spring up from time to time in communities and disgust them by the offensive way in which they mingle love and religion, are inspired in great measure by sexual feeling; on the one hand, there is probably the cunning of a hypocritical knave, or the self-deception of a half-insane one, using the weaknesses of weak women to minister to his vanity or his lust under a religious guise; on the other hand, there is an exaggerated self-feeling, often rooted in the sexual passion, which is unwittingly fostered under the cloak of religious emotion, and which is apt to conduct to madness or to sin. In such cases the holy kiss owes its warmth to the sexual impulse, which inspires it consciously or unconsciously, and the mystical religious union of the sexes is fitted to issue in a less spiritual union."*

Mr. Yoshio Markino and the Missionaries.—II.

"Nations are poor judges of one another; each looks upon itself as an exemplar to the world, and vents its philanthropy by forcing its infallible system or systems upon its neighbors. How long is it since popular literature has began to confess that the British Constitution is not quite fit for the whole human race, and that the Anglo Saxon has much to do at home before he sets out a colonelling to regenerate mankind?"—SIR RICHARD BURTON, Mission to Gelele; 1864; vol. ii., p. 207.

"We spend millions of pounds in the vain endeavor to Christianise remote savages of all kinds; human beings to whom the elements of Christianity are incomprehensible. We have millions of people in Europe in want of the necessaries of life, of education, and of all that makes life endurable."—W. KNIGHTON, Struggles for Life; 1888; p. 13.

"The missionaries, though good and devoted, do not succeed. The best among them would be the first to acknowledge the fact. Those who preach 'conversion' get perhaps the adhesion of outcasts, who adopt Christianity as a last resort, while their doctrines and their methods win the contempt of the thoughtful and dignified majority."—REV. S. A. BARNETT, Contemporary Review, April, 1892.

MARKINO now began to diligently study the Bible, and immediately many doubts and questions began to arise; but he kept silence until he had been right through the book.

Then there came a "Revival" in one of the churches, and one of the members called on him at one o'clock in the morning, arousing him from sleep, and exhorting him to be converted.

Markino, at this time, had come to the conclusion that it was quite impossible to understand the Bible by means of his own common sense, and the only way to get the Christian faith would be in some such fashion as St. Paul is recorded to have received it; so he attended the revival meetings, which were of the same type with which we are familiar in our own country. He describes the proceedings as follows:—

> "The missionaries had tears flowing so freely, and they were singing the hymns loudly. Some Japanese were crying and praying, while some were exclaiming that their souls were saved! It was such a hysterical meeting. One evening they all came to me and said, 'You always say you are very sincere to become a Christian. Now, God is in this room, pray him to save you.'
> "I earnestly prayed. They asked me if I felt that I was saved. I said 'No.' Then they surrounded me and said, 'You are an evil. You are not sincere at all.'
> "Although I had certain philosophical brain in my early life, I was only a little boy after all. I did not know what to do, and I cried. Some of them shouted, 'This boy is saved, because he is crying!'"*

But the boy's keen intelligence was very far from being drugged by such crude means as these, and his interest in the "revival" turned to disgust when, as he tells us,—

> "To my surprise, I found out many dirty immoralities among them. One school-teacher was a 'revivalist' because he wanted a higher salary from the missionary, and some had improper behavior with other's wife, etc. I got sick of them after all" (p. 90).

The boy then fell back upon the study of the Bible, of which he tells us his first impressions. He enjoyed Genesis and Exodus, not for any religious sentiment, but "because they are so primitive" and resemble the Japanese Kojiki, the primitive history of Japan. About Solomon's judgment, he observes they have a similar story in their own legends. He enjoyed the Book of Job immensely; and observes: "Perhaps we all Japanese boys like Ecclesiastes most because it is very like our philosophy, and, from the literature point of view, it is nearest to our own way." This is because, as Dr. Dillon has shown in his Sceptics of the Old Testament, Job and the author of Ecclesiastes are—in spite of the orthodox tampering with the text—seen to be thoroughgoing sceptics, or, as we should call them to-day, Agnostics.

But the character who made the greatest impression was that of Ruth. "Even now," says Mr. Markino,—

> "her sweetness and loyalty to her mother-in-law is one of the great revelations to my ethical mind. By the way, Japan has had many wonderful histories of the loyal wives, when the latter performed the Bushido beautifully; and, indeed, Ruth was a real Bushido too."

Bushido, which has been called "the soul of Japan," corresponds to what we mean by altruism, courage, and self-sacrifice.

Here we touch upon one of the great fundamental differences between the ideas of the East and the West. What English woman would sacrifice everything, including her religion, for the sake of her mother-in-law, who is the butt of the music halls and the so-called comic papers in this country? but who, in Japan, is held in the highest respect. Reverence for authority as exemplified in the head of the family, is the leading motive, the pivot of the national life in the far East. The ancestor worship of the Japanese and Chinese is merely an extension or continuance of this reverence from the living to the dead.†

With the Psalms he was frankly disappointed, and observes:—

> "I heard a great deal of it as 'the most beautiful writing.' If one reads it with full religious faith, it may sound sweet and beautiful to him. To me the literature value of Shi-kyo (the ancient Chinese Odes) seemed far above the Psalms" (p. 92).

From the Old Testament he proceeded to study the New. Here, again, he was greatly disappointed, especially with the Sermon on the Mount, which Christians regard as the priceless pearl of the New Testament. He points out, as Freethinkers have pointed out times without number, that there is nothing in the ethical teachings of Jesus Christ that was new. He observes: "Of course, the Sermon the Mountain is very high ethic, but these were not new lessons to me. Many Oriental philosophers have talked about the ethics equal to that sermon long, long ages before" (p. 93). And Mr. Markino gives a translation of some passages in proof.

Further study of the New Testament gave rise to many questions. The more he learned of the Christian faith the more outrageously absurd it appeared to be. "Why," he asks, "was the blood of Jesus Christ needed for the salvation of our souls?..... here in the New Testament Christ talks of saving the souls by His own blood! And what? He calls himself God!"

From a careful study of the marginal references in the Bible, Markino discovered that the Jews used to sacrifice animals to worship God and obtain forgiveness for their sins, and that Christ came to take the place of the animals. But, he objects:—

> "Buddha himself hated to kill even a small insect. Then why should a precious human be sacrificed to save our souls? I felt that the Christian God who needed the blood sounded rather savage! At least I thought it was savage to imagine the God in that way" (p. 96).

Then he came to the conclusion to ask this question, among many others, of the missionary:—

> "If the blood of Christ was so necessary for the salvation, why has the Almighty God sent Christ in such a small district alone? Don't you see, we, the Eastern nations, have had quite thick population long time before Christ? Were those souls not saved then? And why?
> "But now, admitting the salvation of Christ, hadn't Judas Iscariot and those soldiers who crucified Christ fulfilled the will of God to kill Christ? You say the crucifixion of Christ was necessary, and yet do you say those who killed Christ were sinners? Don't you think you are contradicting your own logic? Some [of the] missionaries were going to 'pray.' I said, 'No, no, no. Don't make such an awful artificially trembling voice in front of me. But kindly teach me!' Some missionary said, 'You have read too many bad books. That has made you an evil. Give up all those horrible philosophical books and read only the Bible.'
> "One of them expressed his suspicion that some 'bad' Buddhist priest or philosopher was backing me and persuading me to put them into a great trouble. One old lady missionary called me 'very insincere' boy, and she said, 'Perhaps you believe Darwin's theory too much. You know Darwin said we, the humans, are the descendants of animals. I think you are a descendant of pigs or donkeys, but we Americans are the children of God.' I never forgot her insincerely sneering face. I was almost crying. I said, 'Why are all you honorable missionaries suspecting me in that way? Can't you see how sincere I am? Have I ever tried to oppose against the Christianity? Nay, I am studying the Bible with all my heart and soul. I am trying to make myself a Christian. Only I cannot understand the Bible, and I am asking what I could not understand with my own knowledge.'"

One missionary advised him to pray to God to show him the way. Another one seemed rather angry and said, "The best way for this sickening boy is to send for the doctor. He is not quite right." Then Mr. Iinuma, the Japanese teacher, came to the rescue, and asked them to treat the boy more kindly, as he was so young and so much in earnest, and he might become a useful evangelist later on. Then, taking Markino to his house, he observed: "Such are those ignorant missionaries," and confessed that his version of Christianity was really Buddhism.

After this, although Markino often wanted to put questions to the missionaries, he kept silence; something seemed to whisper to him, "No, no; wait until you grow up." And the missionaries seemed very pleased because he gave them no more trouble. "At the same time," he says, "I studied my English lessons very hard."

What a revelation of missionary enterprise! What a different tale to the enthusiastic reports of the missionary magazines! We see here how the boy was attracted to the mission in the first place by the desire to learn the English language. How he was made into a convert and baptised while he was yet utterly in the dark as to what the religion really was. And in the background is the sinister figure of the Japanese teacher, paid to teach the new religion while secretly remaining a Buddhist, and discussing the ignorance and stupidity of the missionaries with his pupil behind their back.

W. MANN.

(To be concluded.)

Richard Carlile.—II.

"THOUGH the freedom of the press," says Mr. Holyoake, "was accomplished in 1829, something more remained to be accomplished, which was the freedom of public oral discussion; and on this subject Carlile set his thought. When Mr. Taylor was prosecuted and imprisoned, in 1828, Carlile was called into action in his new character. He immediately converted a large room in his house, 62 Fleet-street, into a Sunday-school of Free Discussion, and introduced a public debate on all useful and political subjects on the Sabbath Day. This had not been done before by anyone anywhere. By a subscription he got Mr. Taylor well supported in prison, and on his liberation accompanied him to Cambridge, as an Infidel missionary, to challenge the University to public discussion. They passed from Cambridge to Liverpool, presenting a printed circular of public challenge to every priest on the road. Only one accepted it, the Rev. David Thom, of Liverpool, who quailed at the very onset and withdrew. This was done in 1829. In 1830 he sought a larger sphere of action for public meetings than his own dwelling house, and engaged a series of buildings and theatres called the Rotunda, in Blackfriars-road. Soon after he gained possession of this building the second French Revolution broke out, which gave a new impetus to political feeling in London. Giving to every man liberty of speech in his theatres, the Rotunda was attended by all the public men of note out of Parliament; and the public meetings there became so frequent and so large that the Government took alarm, and the prophecy of the day was that the Rotunda would cause a Revolution in England. While the Tories remained in office they did not molest him [probably they were sick of former fruitless attempts], but the Whigs no sooner took office than they very foully made war on him, and caused him thirty-two months' imprisonment in the Compter of the City of London. The Rev. Robert Taylor [author of Diegesis and Devil's Pulpit] was also prosecuted under the Whig Administration, and filled out two years in Horsemonger Lane Gaol, for his preaching in the Rotunda."

Those were the days of Church and State tyranny, and Carlile was destined to feel the claws of the ecclesiastical part of that bifold monster. In 1834 and 1835 he passed ten weeks more in the Compter for refusing to pay Church Rates assessed upon his house in Fleet-street. When his goods were seized he retaliated by putting into his window two effigies —one of a bishop, and the other of a distraining officer. Subsequently the trinity was completed by the addition of a devil, who was jovially linked arm-in-arm with the bishop. This curious sight naturally attracted the attention of large crowds, which led to Carlile's being indicted as a nuisance. He was sentenced to pay a fine of 40s. to the King, and give sureties in £200 (himself in £100, and two others in £50 each) for good behavior for three years. He refused, however, to involve anyone in his troubles; no security would be give, neither would be truckle to the minions of power. "They have sentenced me," said he, "to three years' imprisonment. So much for their leniency! It is a mockery to say that I may, if I please, purchase my liberty. I cannot do it. I shall have more liberty in prison than in walking the streets at the discretion of one set of men, and at the hazard of £100 penalty to two others. It is a case in which I will not interfere to abate one hour of my imprisonment. When the gates are open to me I will walk out, but I will not pay or do anything to procure release." Carlile's total of imprisonment amounted to nine years and four months.

Carlile had always been Republican; even at the outset of his career, when traversing London to find customers for the Black Dwarf, he had disliked Cobbett's Register because "it did not go far enough." Before his imprisonment he had identified himself with the extreme party of reformers. He was present at the Manchester Massacre (Peterloo), and narrowly escaped being captured. The ignorance of his person on the part of the soldiers and police secured his safety. He was threatened with dangers from other quarters also. Edwards, the Government spy, the main instrument in hatching the Cato-street conspiracy, attempted to inveigle him into secret illegal practices, which, however, his native good sense rejected. Edwards took a shop next door to Carlile, where William Hone had published his famous Parodies, and under various pretences courted Carlile's society. He talked to him about meeting the Archbishop of Canterbury in Windsor Castle, as a modeller, and undertook for him a bust of Paine. Speaking of this, Carlile says: "I revere the name of Thomas Paine; the image of his honest countenance is constantly before me. I have him in bust in whole length figure; for which I have to thank the late Government of Liverpool, Castlereagh, and Sidmouth, who appointed Edwards the spy to this task—he who, when he failed to get me hanged, caused the death of Thistlewood and others." Secret practices had no attraction for Carlile; he preferred to do everything openly in the light of day. Not, indeed, that there was any tincture of timidity in his composition; no more resolute, intrepid man ever breathed. When other reformers shrank back he always pushed forward. Said he: "Timidity may be seen sitting on the countenance of almost every politician. He speaks and speculates with a trembling which generates a prejudice in others. As it is the slave who makes the tyrant, so it is timidity in the politician which creates the prejudice of the persecutor." Even a resort to physical force he would have approved and assisted in, if no other method of remedying abuses had been possible, although he never did see reason to sanction any particular act of violence. "In the beginning of my political career," he wrote, "I had those common notions which the enthusiasm of youth and inexperience produces, that all reforms must be the work of physical force. The heat of my imagination showed me everything about to be done at once. I am now enthusiastic, but it is in working where I can work practically rather than theoretically; and though I would be the last to oppose a well-applied physical force, in bringing about reforms or revolutions, I would be the last in advising others to rush into useless dangers that I would shun, or where I would not lead. I have long formed the idea that an insurrection against grievances in this country must, to be successful, be spontaneous and not plotted, and that all political conspiracies may be local and even individual evils. I challenge the omniscience of the Home Office to say whether I have ever countenanced anything of the kind in word or deed. I will do nothing in a political point of view which cannot be done openly." These surely are wise words, and evince that Carlile had learnt a lesson of political wisdom a whole generation before many more ardent but less sagacious reformers.

Carlile's Republicanism was of a purely practical type. "Liberty," says he, "is the property of man: a Republic only can protect it"; and on behalf of that Republic he ever faithfully labored. Even against the powerful disparagement of William Cobbett he boldly championed it. Yet he would never listen to Socialistic schemes, no matter by whom propounded. "Equality," said he, "means not an equality of riches but of rights merely." He once discussed Socialism with Mr. Lloyd Jones, and, as might be expected, treated it as chimerical in the present stage of human progress, and probably of but little advantage in any.

As an editor Carlile was industrious and indefatigable. His literary ability was never transcendent, but he wrote nervous terse English, and always showed a thorough knowledge of his subject. Thomas Paine was his model; for Paine's practical spirit much resembled his own. But he depreciated other writers with unjustifiable severity: their impassioned prose seemed to him flighty, because he was not a man of passionate nature. Of Milton he wrote with graceless asperity, apparently forgetting that it was nothing wonderful that the great Republican should be ignorant of political reforms deemed advisable by people who had the advantage of living nearly two centuries later.

Carlile's deficient education was at first a deplorable detraction from his editorial efficiency, but he gradually remedied the defect by dint of assiduous self-culture. During his long imprisonment in Dorchester Gaol he continued to edit the Republican with increasing success. The circulation reached as high as 15,000; and in all fourteen volumes were issued. After its discontinuance he edited other periodicals, the Lion and the Christian Warrior; and each of them with ability and success.

In theological matters Carlile professed various shades of belief. Indeed, he graduated from Deism to Atheism insensibly. In his first controversy with Cobbett he avowed himself a believer in a great controlling power in nature; but not long afterwards he observed: "I may have said that changes observed in phenomena argue the existence of an active power in the universe, but I have again and again renounced the notion of that power being intelligent or designing." By that time he had reached the stage of thought of our great modern philosopher, Herbert Spencer, who declares that "the power which the universe manifests to us is utterly inscrutable." After his imprisonment he boldly avowed himself an Atheist. He reached the climax of his Atheism, as Mr. Holyoake remarks, on the title-page to his tenth volume of the Republican, where he declared "There is no such God in existence as any man has preached; nor any kind of God"; and this declaration was so far carried out in detail as to exclude from the Republican the terms God, nature, mind, soul, and spirit as words without prototypes.

A Scottish paper complains that the Scots are within a measurable distance of the time when they will be unable to read Burns. The writer forgot to add that when they did read the great Freethinking poet many failed to understand him.

The Co-operative News tells a good story about the Insurance Act. A woman asked for an "eternity benefit form." The clerk explained that the benefit applied to the incoming and not the outgoing generation. "Aye well," replied the woman, "my husband said the Act doesn't go far enough."

Rev. F. B. Meyer has been giving his opinions on "The Church and the Stage," and these are exactly what one might expect from Mr. Meyer. Their only significance is that they embody common opinions among a certain type of Christians. For example, Mr. Meyer repeats the common falsehood that the Puritan opposition to the stage arose out of disgust at the "debauchery" of the theatre in Charles II.'s reign. This is simply false. The Puritan opposition had little or no relation to the moral character of the theatre, and it commenced long before the reign of Charles II. It began as early as 1577, and quite a number of books and pamphlets were written against the theatre by Puritans during the next thirty years. And the attack was only part of a general assault on all sorts of enjoyment—hunting, maypole games, sports, and general amusements. The Puritan attack was not essentially on the ground of morality, it was against what was called "worldly indulgences," in the interests of a form of religion so repulsive that even modern Puritans are ashamed of it.

When the Puritans said "immoral" they really meant "sinful," and anything was sinful that disagreed with their religious prejudices. Mr. Meyer does not believe the theatre is sinful; that, he says, would be a mistake; but he believes the theatre has a bad effect on character. When a man is attracted by the spectacular, his soul "forfeits the power of its subliminal consciousness." We wonder what on earth Mr. Meyer imagines the subliminal consciousness to be. Probably he uses it as a phrase likely to overawe those among his readers whose knowledge of a scientific psychology is on the same level as his own. Or perhaps he imagines that he is preaching that religiously fashionable thing, mysticism, when all his language really represents is mistyism. And the cream of the joke is, that Mr. Meyer knows nothing whatever about theatres. He judges them from the standpoint of the Bible-banging, non-theatre attending Puritan. Most people would be ashamed to express opinions on subjects of which they confessedly know nothing. But parsons are not as other men—for which the other men ought to be duly thankful. For identity works the same from either side.

We have seen plays that we thought highly of, and plays we thought little of. We have seen plays that dealt with unsavory subjects, and plays of a quite opposite character. And, making full allowance for all that may be said about objectionable plays, we beg to say very deliberately that the harm done by the worst play does not approach in virulence the harm done by clergymen gloating on their favorite topic of sexual vice, and their indiscriminate denunciation of things of no real harm in themselves. The most indecent of plays or exhibitions would be limited in its power for evil. If evil is there, it is very thinly disguised. If it appeals to the vicious, it only affects the vicious. Opposite types remain untouched. But your crusading clergyman does not appeal to the vicious in his campaign against a special vice; he appeals to the opposite class. He preaches to the simple and to the ignorant; he gives them a false and jaundiced views of life. He teaches them to see vice and temptation where the first does not, and the second need not, exist. He saturates the mind with vice in his professed endeavor to permeate it with purity. He rarely succeeds in making the vicious less vicious; he frequently succeeds in creating a dangerous consciousness of vice in those who are affected by his preaching. Influence for influence, we scarcely think that the stage need fear comparison with the pulpit, nor the bulk of our actors with the mass of clergymen.

A clergyman was explaining to a lady that in certain savage regions there was only one missionary to 15,000 natives. "Dear me," replied the lady, "the missionaries must be very large men, or the savages must have poor appetites."

Mr. G. B. Dibblee, writing of journalistic work in the Newspaper, says, "The practical task of the editors and sub-editors in making up their daily issues consists not in scraping together material for the printer but in rejecting it." Unfortunately, the practical result is that all the unsavory details of divorce and criminal cases are given at length and an important meeting such as that at Essex Hall for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws left out. It is not that editors are religious men. Sensationalism means circulation; and that means £ s. d., the only trinity the newspaper proprietors care for.

"Cleanliness," according to the popular proverb, "is next to godliness," but gluttony is not far behind. The hot-cross bun trade is as much an integral portion of Easter as turkeys are associated with Christmas. Indeed, the merry festivals of the "Man of Sorrows" show that twenty centuries of Christianity have failed to eradicate the light-hearted features of the older superstitions.

Mr. Hector Macpherson has a rare capacity for misunderstanding many of the subjects with which he deals. We have before now commented on his flounderings in the realms of both biology and history; and when he sets out to champion Christianity there is every inducement for him to be more than usually inaccurate. In a recent issue of Everyman, Mr. Macpherson spent a couple of columns in contrasting what he called the Pagan ideal with the Christian ideal. Paganism, he says, "reduced to its last analysis"—an expression which often covers the fact that there has been an utter absence of analysis—"stands for the self-assertiveness and self-sufficiency of humanity, on the basis of sensuous enjoyment." Imagine anyone with any appreciation of the writings of Æschylus or Euripides, to say nothing of the various schools of philosophy, writing the last clause in the sentence cited. Half an hour with Epictetus or Marcus Aurelius would be enough to teach one better than this. And Mr. Macpherson thinks so little of what he is writing that a little further on he can quote approvingly from a writer, that among the Greeks "we find the finest spirituality with the crudest Paganism," and later, that Paganism "has another ideal besides that of sensuous pleasure—the ideal of beauty." What, then, becomes of the "last analysis"? It is a purely parsonic trick, this saying that Paganism thought of nothing but sensuous enjoyment, while Christianity, for the first time, gave scope to the higher and finer qualities of man; but it is wholly false. Combined with a frank and healthy delight in human strength and beauty, Paganism, in its best expression, gave scope to the highest qualities of the human mind. Pagan literature and philosophy proves this to the hilt. For those who read neither, let them visit a museum, study the type of face depicted in Greek statuary, and then consider whether a people who could even conceive these types had anything to learn from a religion such as Christianity.

The new President of the Free Church Council doubtless considers himself as very keen on social affairs. He takes a warm interest in social betterment. Thus:—

> "Poverty is a dreadful evil. Gloss it over as you will, lend the romance sentiment to its voiceless suffering..... In spite of all, poverty is a living hell, and the man who has looked into the abyss can never forget what he has seen."

This is doubtless what the clergy will call the deliverance of a man with a "vision." And the conclusion is the query, "Where are the just hopes of depressed humanity safe, except as they lie on the bosom of God?" And that is where the President's message ends. They are to rest their hope on God. But as "God" hasn't prevented their becoming poor and sinking into the abyss, there doesn't seem any special reason why one should expect him to pull people out again.

A Dartmouth vicar, as reported in the Exeter Flying Post, expresses thanks that farthings don't circulate in his town. He says that on a recent Sunday there were no less than 72 halfpennies in the collection, and he is evidently thankful that there is no chance of still smaller coins being contributed. The Bishop of London said once that people were content to put threepence in the plate, and consider their duty done. Our Dartmouth vicar envies the Bishop. His church possesses a vicar, two good-looking curates, and a peal of bells. He will be delighted, he says, to supply these at a contribution of threepence per head from the congregation, and throw in an organist, fire, and light. But he adds he is a Tory, and he won't give 9d. for 4d. In other words, the gospel business, at a halfpenny per head can't be run.

David Livingstone, the missionary, whose centenary has just been celebrated, was an intrepid explorer. On one occasion he entered a native settlement at the peril of his life. Tired by a long day's march, he lay down in the midst of the savages and fell asleep. That saved him. "He has trusted us," said the chief; "no harm shall come to him." The chief kept his word, and Livingstone left that camp unharmed. The story has been quoted as an example of Livingstone's courage; but it is also an instance of "heathen" chivalry.

The medicine-chest was as much in evidence as the Bible throughout the course of Livingstone's travels in Africa, and there can be no doubt that his medical knowledge was a most important factor in his success as an explorer. Christians are to-day buying apostates all over the heathen world by means of medical missionaries. Such secularistic aids as coals and blankets are not unknown in work among the heathen at home.

According to the British and Foreign Bible Society's reports, the Gospels have been published in "cannibal dialects." Were those portions of the sacred Word selected because of the text, "Except ye drink of my blood and eat of my flesh"? This seems to be acceptable doctrine for a "cannibal" brother.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton is a true-blue Catholic, and in his latest book, The Victorian Age in Literature (Home University Library), he displays a considerable amount of theological venom. Swinburne is accused of writing "a learned and sympathetic and indecent parody on the Litany of the Blessed Virgin," Malthus is described as "a thing," and Thomas Hardy as "a sort of village atheist brooding and blaspheming over the village idiot." Queen Elizabeth is called a "highly cultivated and complicated liar." Pessimism is described as "a thing unfit for a white man." It is only fair to add that the editors state that the book is not put forward as "authoritative," and is a "free and personal statement of views and impressions." We quite agree that the views are very free and very personal; but let us hope that the readers do not neglect other and less homely universities in their search for knowledge.

The Rev. D. Ewart James, one of the most distinguished Essex Congregational preachers, in the course of a recent address, admitted that churches were no longer filled. He reckoned the Anglican and Roman Churches were dying, and the Free Churches were not crowded. He gave a number of reasons for this state of affairs, including theological unrest, love of ease, the pursuit of sport, and the absence of the spirit of Jesus. Surely, if Christ has left the Churches, it is time for the congregations to file out.

The present Government has had no less than four Ministers of Education, and the present one, Mr. Pease, has announced that he is to try his hand at an Education measure. We are concerned at present only with one aspect of it. When a man finds a problem insoluble, the only sensible plan seems to give it up. Instead of doing this, Mr. Pease announces that the forthcoming Bill will deal with what he regards as an "insoluble problem"—the religious difficulty. We quite agree with him that so long as it is taken for granted that the State must make some provision for religious instruction, the problem before legislators is insoluble. This is because you cannot satisfy one religious party without dissatisfying its religious rivals, and, even if you could satisfy both, it would only be by inflicting an injustice upon a large and growing party in the State. We agree with the Schoolmaster that to allow religious education in denominational schools, to pay for these schools out of public funds, and yet prevent ratepayers contributing to denominational religion, is impossible. "It involves a flat contradiction in terms and in facts." All we need add is that the position remains essentially the same, whether it is denominational religion in certain non-provided schools, or what is called undenominational religion in provided schools.

We admit that the problem is hopeless. So is the problem of finding the philosopher's stone or the search for perpetual motion. So is the problem of forecasting what would happen if an irresistible force encountered an immovable object. But sensible men no longer discuss these topics. And the so-called Education difficulty is only insoluble because its very nature involves injustice to a smaller or greater number, and goes beyond the legitimate duties of the modern State. The Congregational Union said the other day that "given adequate supply of civil schools, the religious difficulty will to a considerable degree solve itself." This only means that if Councils supply enough schools in every district, there will be no need to use other schools, and no need to subsidise them. Quite so; but these provided schools will be also giving a religious instruction, with which Nonconformists agree, and so all that is changed is the incidence of the injustice. The Christian World says: "It looks as if we were on the eve of a great betrayal." In the mouth of Nonconformists this is the language of conspirators. We are betrayed, because the Government does not promise to subsidise the sectarian interests of dissenters. It is the lament of a party of freebooters that the result of their labor is not being awarded them. The great betrayal is really that of the rights of citizenship, and, above all, the rights of the child.

The Christian World adds the usual hypocritical comment that things can "never be satisfactory so long as so many thousands of appointments of teachers are in the hands of Denominationalists." The Christian World must know quite as well as we do that so long as there is any religion in the schools sectarian tests cannot be abolished. Teachers who are known to be Freethinkers are denied promotion in the vast majority of cases. And there is not a Council in the country under which teachers feel at liberty to say what they think about religion—so long as their opinions differ from the Councils under which they serve. With the teachers it is at present only a question of a change of tyrants. Large numbers of teachers are forced into playing the hypocrite, and neither Nonconformist nor Churchmen complain so long as they stand to profit from the situation.

When children are not religious, says Rev. J. G. Stevenson, it is nearly always the fault of the adults. This is not quite true. Children very often outgrow religion in spite of all that adults may do to stunt their growth. We should prefer to put the matter the other way about, and say that when children are religious it is nearly always the fault of the adults. And the proof of this is that if children are cared for in other directions, but left alone in matters of religion they do not grow up religious. Mr. Stevenson says that the "little people turn to God as naturally as flowers turn to the sun." Rubbish! If that is so, why all this concern that adults shall surround them with a religious atmosphere, give them religious instruction, and keep them clear of anti-religious influences? The truth is that childhood is the mythologising age. Children are all more or less animistic, but let alone they advance beyond it in the same way as they outgrow fairy tales. When the environment was different the fairy tale stage persisted right through life. And the fact that some children carry religion into maturity is evidence only that the social environment is not yet as rational and as civilised as it might be. The Churches dare not leave the children alone for a single generation—for that would mean a generation of parents disinclined to misdirect the mental life of their offspring in the interests of either Church or Chapel.

"What to do with the Freethinker" is the heading of a paragraph in the Methodist Times for March 20. The paragraph is concerned with the alleged conversion of a Wigan Atheist who was "converted by a vision," and who has since presented the Rev. W. Rushby, the author of the paragraph, with twelve years' issues of the Freethinker, with the suggestion that they might be pulped up again "to print this report upon." All we can say is that if another miracle could be worked, and the articles in the Freethinkers be made to reappear on the new paper, Methodist readers would have more common sense put before them than they ever had before in their lives. At any rate, Mr. Rushby might do worse than read the Freethinkers' before he destroys them.

We quote the report with all reservation, as we have no means of knowing, at present, whether it is true or false. In either case it will affect us, and other Freethinkers, very little. If the conversion of a Christian to Freethought were as rare as the conversion of a Freethinker to Christianity, we would also write a special paragraph when it occurred. As it is, if we chronicled every case at length, we should have room for nothing else. Moreover, we observe that this particular Freethinker was converted by a vision; so that it is more a case for a doctor than anyone else. We sincerely pity the poor fellow, whoever he is; and hardly anyone but a parson would be in such a hurry to make capital out of a fellow-creature's mental affliction. Seeing visions is as good a way as any we know of to make a Freethinker believe in Christianity. Our consolation is that while they remain sane they continue Freethinkers. When a man begins to see visions, all things are possible. And we have never claimed that Freethought makes a man immune to those mental afflictions that beset ordinary humanity.

The Daily Mail has been suggesting a remedy for too early Easters, and proposes that the holiday should be fixed by law at a later season of the year, when more kindly weather conditions might be reasonably anticipated. It is highly significant that this suggestion for the disassociation of Easter from ecclesiastical precedents should come from such a source.

The Daily Telegraph on Saturday traced a curious parallel between the fanaticism of the Suffragettes and that of the early Christians. Our contemporary pointed out that Origen was driven to declare from the pulpit that it was wrong to insult or box the ears of idols, and that it was no merit to throw statues to the ground. The mentality of those who disregarded this rule must have been very similar to that of the militant women of to-day. The young Suffragette who hurled a book at the magistrate had her prototype in St. Eulalia, who spat in the judge's face. When devotion to a great cause leads to firing buildings, and to the vulgar conduct of the "drunk and disorderly," it shows that spiritual and spirituous intoxication may sometimes be nearly allied.

While the evangelist "Billy" Sunday was holding a revival meeting in Columbus, the capital of Ohio, he was brought into the House of Representatives to offer prayer. Thereupon, twelve members of the Cuyahoga County delegation got up and walked out. The members who thus protested against the presence of the evangelist are described as "Baker men." Baker, who is called "Newt," is Mayor of Columbus, and appears to be a Secularist. A while ago a body of citizens, styling themselves Baptists, came to the City Hall to make some kind of representations, and were told by the Mayor that he could have nothing to say to them as Baptists, but could receive them only as citizens. Mr. Baker is not in good standing with the religio-political people, who seem to have got Sunday and his lieutenant, evangelist Milford Lyon, in Columbus for the purpose of attacking the Baker administration. — Truthseeker (New York).

The Age (Melbourne) relates the following illuminating incident illustrating the real opinion which their flocks entertain of the priests when temper gives them courage to express it:—

> "A wild scene disturbed the ordinarily peaceful serenity of St. Joseph's Roman Catholic Church, Fitzgerald-street, South Yarra, yesterday morning. The parish priest, Rev. Father Benson, took occasion to admonish a female member of his flock, an old aged pensioner, for some alleged dereliction of spiritual duty, when the old woman, stubborn and rebellious, though perfectly sober, became defiant, and exceedingly offensive. She was thereupon run out to the street by her spiritual adviser, and was told that if she came there again she would be given in charge. 'Go to h——!' Go to h——!' cried the old woman, greatly enraged; adding, 'I can kneel to Almighty God without coming here.'
> "Taking up a position in front of the church, she indulged without the least restraint an infinite capacity for vituperation, and abused the priest with extraordinary vehemence, telling him that he 'only wanted her there for her pension money,' and also openly declaring that the good priest would be better if he abstained himself before accusing her of 'spending her money in drink.' As a last shot she declared that in future 'she would confess her sins to God, not to him.'"

The Times refers to a hunger-strike as carried out by a bishop in Palestine 1900 years ago. The English bishops of to-day are not likely to starve, or even to go on strike.

The new theological magazine, Faith and Doubt, quotes a telling paragraph from a recent Freethinker article written by Mr. J. T. Lloyd. If Freethought is adequately represented in its pages, the champions of orthodoxy will have their work cut out.

"Dollar-diplomacy" is the policy of the new President of the United States. It seems strangely like the policy of the Christian Churches.

Swinburne, according to Sir Robertson Nicoll, once described Kipling's "Recessional" as like Longfellow's "Psalm of Life," "but not so good." Atheists do not often indulge in psalm-smiting.

According to the Italian papers, the Pope is in a dying condition. The Holy Father's state is no worse than that of the religion of which he is the "corner stone."

"Science from an Easy Chair" reads a headline in a daily paper. In the ages of Faith the chair was of plain wood, and it was placed in a prison.

"A botanist," said the Daily Mirror recently, "has discovered that plants, shrubs, and trees are often emotional in the same way as women are." What agonies that tree in the Garden of Eden must have endured! Or the one to which "Omnipotence" was fastened with three tenpenny nails.

There are many ways of worshiping "God"; but the following suggestion, made by a contributor in the Co-operative News, strikes us as being novel. The writer is referring to Easter. "There was among us a new cap, or a new coat, or a new feather, or a bright ribbon, or even as much as a new sixpenny tie was enough to make us feel that we had done something to show our respect to all that Easter means and the God that makes it green."

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £83 1s. 4d. Received since:—G. Backhouse Church, £1 1s.; H. T. C., £1 1s.; Mrs. C., £1 1s. Per Miss Vance: Arthur H. Sizer, 3s.; E. T. Jarvis, 5s.

G. BACKHOUSE CHURCH, subscribing to the President's Honorarium Fund, writes: "Will you permit me to indulge myself by expressing my admiration for your great ability, your honesty, your perseverance, and above all your courage in the face of persistent and unscrupulous foes."

In reply to several applicants, under Mr. W. Bailey's kind offer, we can only repeat our statement that the English Review was sold out at the publishing office before we could apply for any.

A. D.—Thanks for your good wishes. The note has been handed to "Mimnermus."

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings.

T. HODGSON.—The story of the hymn-tune played on the Titanic when she sank has been denied by a number of people.

P.—Much obliged for the reference.

W. E. PAGE.—Sorry to hear of your bereavement.

T. P. W.—Thanks for list of addresses. The papers will be sent as desired.

G. BAZIN.—We understand that the statement did appear in the Freethinker in common with other papers; but cannot give the date at this distance of time. At the function you refer to the collection boxes were busy.

A. G. VAN ELDEN.—Accept our thanks for newspaper clipping.

J. W. RAPTON.—Thanks for MS. which we will read. In writing for publication, please remember to write on one side of the paper only.

G. R. BALLARD.—Much obliged. The Meredith article has been widely noticed.

MISS VANCE wishes to obtain copies of the Freethinker during its earlier years, preferably unbound, for office purposes. No. 1 is particularly needed. Those who have them for disposal will oblige by writing as soon as possible.

J. W. GOIT.—Pleased to hear of your success in distributing Freethinker at Manchester. Your subsequent experience is not surprising. We are not astonished at "Christian Socialists" keeping their Christianity well to the front. Our surprise is that Freethinking Socialists are not equally keen in circumventing them instead of playing into their hands by a policy of passive acquiescence.

S. SMITH.—Mr. Foote is quite unable, even when in working trim, to undertake outside newspaper correspondence, except under special circumstances. At present, as you will see, he is unable to attend to the work that falls within his proper sphere.

R. MCNAIRN.—Order handed to shop manager. We hope that your desire to hear Mr. Foote will be gratified when he resumes platform work, who will be as pleased to find you among his audience.

E. HOLLIDAY.—Thanks for "best wishes for the Freethought movement." One cannot expect to convert the world suddenly, nor would such a conversion really be worth much, were it possible. The progress of the movement is, however, steady and continuous, and that is the all-important and gratifying fact.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Personal.

WRITING to me with reference to the Essex Hall meeting in favor of the total abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, my valued friend, Mr. J. T. Lloyd, says:—

> "I am extremely sorry that you have been so very ill, and trust that your recovery will be expeditious and complete. It would have been an infinite loss if your speech had not been given, for it was far and away the speech of the evening; but the penalty inflicted has been much too severe."

I hope my recovery may be complete; I am afraid it will not be expeditious. The blow was heavier than I realised at first. I have a pretty stiff battle to fight. And the weather is all against me.

I thank Mr. Cohen for taking the editorial responsibility in my absence—and "Mimnermus" and Mr. Lloyd for rendering valuable assistance.

G. W. FOOTE.

The Annual Conference of the N. S. S. will be held at Queen's Hall, Langham-place, London, W., on Whit-Sunday, May 11. Secretaries of N. S. S. Branches are reminded that the books close for 1912-13 on April 12, and that all notices of motion for the Conference Agenda must reach the General Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, by April 7, and will be published in the Freethinker a fortnight prior to the meeting.

A course of three lectures, under the auspices of the Secular Society, Ltd., has been arranged to take place in the Stratford Town Hall. Mr. Cohen opens on April 6, to be followed by Mr. Lloyd and Miss Kough. It is hoped that local Freethinkers will do their best to make these meetings successful. Small slips, giving titles of lectures, etc., have been printed, and Miss Vance will be happy to supply them to all who will undertake their circulation.

The N. S. S. has just issued two tracts, entitled Christianity a Stupendous Failure, by J. T. Lloyd, and Why Be Good? by G. W. Foote. The latter is an extract from Mr. G. W. Foote's writings, specially selected by the late Dr. E. B. Foote for publication in tract form by the New York Truthseeker Co. The distribution of these tracts will be found to be one of the most effectual forms of propaganda.

Steady progress is being made with the National Secular Society's Scholarship Scheme, as announced in the Freethinker for March 16. Several meetings have been held by the Committee appointed by the Executive to consider details of the scheme, and a number of applications from intending candidates received. To all of these forms of application have been sent. Those who propose entering themselves for the necessary study and examination should apply to Miss Vance at once.

Councillor A. B. Moss, who is a stalwart Freethinker asked the Camberwell Borough Council recently to erect a hall or temple at the cemetery for burial services for unbelievers. In supporting the motion, Councillor Moss pointed out that the National Secular Society and the Ethical Societies used beautiful funeral services; but when a Freethinker was buried the service had to be conducted at the graveside, no matter what the weather conditions might be. He asked for the erection of a temple in which the Jew, the Unitarian, the Deist, the Positivist, and the Secularist might each conduct his funeral rites. Freethinkers were ratepayers and respectable citizens. Councillor Lucas, who seconded, urged that all considerable sections of the ratepayers should be considered. After discussion the motion was lost; but it is a happy augury for the future that such a matter should be discussed by a London Council.

Mr. Foote's article on George Meredith in the English Review is the subject of a critical paragraph in the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette for March 15. The writer asks:—

> "Has Mr. Foote treated George Meredith quite worthily in his anxiety to claim him publicly for his sect? George Meredith sided generously with Mr. Foote against his enemies, because he himself was altogether in favor of freedom of thought and against bigotry and intolerance, especially against unintelligent and interested bigotry. So on more than one occasion he gave Mr. Foote assurance of his sympathy, and did, moreover, what not every sympathiser does, he sent money. Mr. Foote and his friends on each occasion asked in addition, for the advertisement of his name; and on each occasion George Meredith disdained to deny his name. But Meredith not being a sectary, but being gifted with a catholic insight into humanity, distrusted iconoclasm as much as he distrusted idolatry. Yet because he was a freethinker in the true sense of the word, Mr. Foote is bent on exhibiting him as a freethinker in his sense of the word. Meredith's generosity merited a more generous comprehension."

The obvious reply to this absurd criticism is that, although Meredith's correspondence with Mr. Foote extended over a period of thirty years, and much might have been made of Meredith's sympathy with the Freethought movement, Mr. Foote kept the correspondence private until after Meredith's death. Had Mr. Foote wished for publicity he need not have consulted Meredith. The writer of the paragraph admits that Meredith was "a freethinker in the true sense of the word"; but had it not been for Mr. Foote's article in the English Review few persons would have been aware that Meredith was a Freethinker at all.

The Procreant Cradles of Feathered Bipeds.

As we near the vernal season of the year, thoughts of opening buds and leaves, sunshine and sweet flowers, and the melodies of feathered minstrels return to cheer us as the days increase. The starling has sung his simple song, and the thrush has heralded the dawn and made glad the eve through February's dull decline, and now that March has come, the blackbird has begun to pour forth his wondrous melodies from the shelter of evergreens, or even from the, as yet, bare boughs of oak, ash, chestnut, and elm. The house sparrows are gathering straws for their ragged nests in nooks and crannies provided by the habitations of man.

In our urban parks and gardens, the chief enemy of our feathered friends is the sly and stealthy cat. Of course, the bird-nesting boy must not forgotten, and the squirrel, which is an expert tree climber, and builds its own nest in trees, is very partial to the eggs and nestlings of birds. Indeed, as Professor Chalmers Mitchell pointed out quite recently, the American squirrels which have been set at liberty by the authorities in Regent's Park have in all probability seriously reduced the birds of that formerly favored spot. "Wood pigeons, thrushes, and blackbirds, and all the small songsters that build in shrubs and hedges have had their nests pulled to pieces and their eggs and young destroyed."*

This illustrates on a very minor scale the pitiless destruction of the eggs and fledglings of birds which is nature's everyday performance in regions where her steely coldness is unrelieved by those humane influences which protect these most beautiful and fascinating products of evolution. Various lizards and numerous snakes prey upon their eggs, and devour their helpless broods. No spot is sacred to the ravages of these rapacious reptiles, who penetrate the densest thickets and ascend the tallest trees. Rats, stoats, and weasels are never to be trusted in the company of eggs, and the writer has himself seen a rat descending from a thrush's nest which it had just plundered of its five eggs. Our near relations, the apes and monkeys, have a distinct weakness for eggs, and the same is true of ourselves. The human consumption of eggs throughout the world is stupendous. Then there is the civil war which rages among the feathered tribes themselves. Fish-eating and flesh-devouring birds plunder the nests, and destroy the broods of other feathered creatures without the slightest mercy.

If one were to permit oneself to speculate as to the forms of life which coming ages may bring to our planet, one would soon in all probability be driven to the lame and impotent conclusion that all conjecture is utterly vain. When the reptiles were the sovereigns of life the most philosophical among them were incapable of the faintest imagination of the fact that their order was destined to give rise to those reptilian birds who became the begetters of all that wondrous wealth of avarian life which has existed for many millions of years. Nevertheless, the descent of birds from reptile ancestors is one of the most firmly established conclusions of modern biology. The affinities between birds and reptiles are so strongly marked that comparative anatomists include them in a common class—the Sauropsida.

In the springtime the vast land areas of Northern Europe, Asia, and America become the cradling grounds of countless migrant birds. Those very notable visitants to the British Isles, the swallow and cuckoo, never fail to reappear with spring. In the South of England, any mild March will witness the nest-building operations of the hedge sparrow, chaffinch, blackbird, and thrush. The linnets, most finches, pigeons, starlings, pheasants, and partridges breed somewhat later in the season. The cuckoo appears to be the only bird that breeds in Britain which has lost the nest-building instinct. This bird drops her eggs in the nests of other birds. She usually chooses the nest of the hedge sparrow for this purpose, and, having laid an egg in it, leaves it for the unsophisticated sparrow to hatch out among her own clutch. The young intruder—a model of ugliness when newly hatched—never rests until he has evicted all of the four or five legitimate offspring of his foster-mother. A further phase of the loss of the nest-building aptitude is furnished by Mr. W. H. Hudson, who has watched the American starling unsuccessfully striving to erect a dwelling-place for its eggs. These starlings, or "cow-birds," wait about with the object of annexing the newly-built nests of other birds, and seize the first opportunity that presents itself. More impudent varieties of "cow-birds" coolly lay their eggs in the already occupied nests of other birds, and their nestlings, when hatched out, play the same ungrateful pranks as the sparrow-fostered cuckoo.

The breeding structures of birds betray all the evidences of gradual evolution. Reptiles pay scant attention to their eggs after they have been safely laid. In almost all extant birds, however, parental care and sacrifice are highly evolved. Primitive birds in all probability bestowed little attention upon their progeny. And wide differences are to be met with among contemporary species. Certain megapodes, or brush turkeys, merely lay their eggs, cover them with sand, and leave the rest to the chance warmth of the sun. The parrot of New Zealand prepares no nest, and merely places her eggs in any available hole or tunnel. Among ostriches, a number of females make a depression in the sand, in which they deposit their eggs. Auks and other seafowl lay their eggs on the bare ledges of rocks. Birds of the most diverse species in every part of the globe simply select unfrequented spots for the deposition of their eggs, and some place a few leaves or bits of soft material under or around their clutch, while others make no preparation of any kind. Nests and nurseries of the most primitive character seem to satisfy the requirements of puffins, petrels, owls, wild ducks, and most of the parrots.

Further progress is displayed by pheasants, partridges, and other game-birds, which collect dried ferns, leavee, soft sticks, etc., out of which they make a comfortable ground nest. The skilfully constructed nest of the moor-hen, which reposes among the pond reeds, perfectly warm and dry, indicates a still further advance. The nest of the wood pigeon, however, remains extremely rude, consisting, as it does, of a few black sticks, arranged platform-wise, on a forked tree branch or bough. The magpie's nest is raised on similar foundations, but it is surrounded by a fortification of thorns, and sometimes roofed over with a covering of twigs. In the Zoological Gardens two tufted umbres were observed constructing a nest which is more elaborate than that of the magpie. "They made a platform of sticks, cemented with mud, and then covered it with a huge dome of sticks nearly two feet in height, leaving a small entrance at the side." The structures erected by the European blackbirds and thrushes are cup-shaped, mud or dung being utilised to form the walls of the nest. The blackbird usually lines its nest with soft material before the eggs are laid, but the song thrush places her four or five eggs on the hardened mud of the nest's interior, and does not line her nursery with a carpet of comfortable moss or lichen until the young are hatched. Among our native birds the art of nidification attains its greatest perfection with our small songsters, warblers, and twitterers. The cradling edifices of the chaffinch and the linnets are marvels of woven ingenuity, as is also the remarkable dome-covered home of the tiny wren.

From the standpoint of nidification, the bird world may be broadly divided into two groups—the ground-builders and the tree-builders. It is among the latter that the most finished products are to be found. Taking the bird population of the globe as a whole, the small singing species erect the most elaborate nests. With them,—

> "the use of mud as a cement is discarded, and the whole nest is woven of the finest hairs, vegetable fibres, > and wool, softened during the process of building by saliva from the mouths of the builders.....The ingenuity and diversity of the various woven nests are endless, and allied species show all the traces between rude structures and exquisitely finished houses. There are so many instances of different formations of the nest according to the different environments in which the birds live, and so many cases where it seems plain that the instinct is partly degenerate, that it is impossible to arrange a parallel series between the complexity of the nest and the position of a particular species in its family. Types of construction run through the nests of allied species, but appear in all stages of perfection and degeneration." *

All leading ornithologists admit the justice of the foregoing generalisations. The innumerable modes of nest construction display such endless variety that no definite order of development can be established in the present fragmentary state of our knowledge. Birds possess considerable mental power, and their great plasticity is proved by their ready response to environmental change. It has frequently been noticed that the nests of the Baltimore oriole, when built near human dwellings, are very different to those of their kind which are erected in their native wilds. The nests vary both in shape and structure, and the birds that nest near towns and villages appear to realise that there is less need for concealment from hawks and snakes. Swallows and swifts everywhere promptly abandon hollow trees, cliffs, or caverns for the barns, cattle sheds, and chimneys in homestead or village. In a constant environment the form and texture of bird's nests vary very little. "Children and savages imitate before they originate; birds, as well as all other animals do the same."

Many transitions may be observed between nests constructed mainly of fibrous substances, both animal and vegetable, partly cemented, or mixed with clay and saliva, and nests which are formed out of mud and saliva almost entirely. Various nests, built with plastic materials, correspond in outline with shapes which arise naturally through the employment of fibrous material, and it has been most ingeniously suggested that birds which now use plastic materials in fashioning their nests, formerly employed fibrous materials such as stems, hair, and wool, instead. An interesting analogy is furnished by the course followed during the evolution of the potter's art. Wicker-work vessels were anterior to utensils compounded of clay. But so soon as early man discovered that he could strengthen his baskets by anointing them with clay, he began to realise that clay alone would meet his requirements better; and, as a result, the wood work was abandoned in favor of pottery. Primitive pottery is often seen to be ornamented with rude patterns which point to its origin from smeared fibres.

Another aspect of evolution resides in the circumstance that, where the receptacle for the eggs is simply a hole scratched in the soil, this preparation is made by the hen bird only. But whenever elaborate nests are constructed, both sexes participate in their building. In some instances, the communal spirit prevails, as in the case of rookeries and the massed nests of swallows and house sparrows. Sea and shore birds have general breeding stations, and will make a united attack upon enemies that threaten their eggs or young. One of the most remarkable breeding grounds in Britain is to be found along the shores of the Farne Islands. That eminent authority, Charles Dixon, has given us an animated description of these nurseries. Countless thousands of oyster-catchers, cormorants, guillemots, terns, gulls, plovers, eider-ducks, and puffins congregate on this favored spot every spring. Dixon writes:—

> "On approaching some of the islands, the first impression is that this gull [the lesser black-backed gull] monopolises the whole of the ground, as it occurs in such vast abundance. The air seems full of them, the ground and bare rocks are crowded; and, as our boat finally grates against the rough beach and we eagerly jump ashore, all becomes noisy excitement—a perfect babel of protesting cries that is persistently kept up until we leave the place." *

To sum up. The nests of birds are partly the result of environing circumstances, and largely the outcome of the comparative strength or weakness of the newly hatched broods. The brush turkey is the only bird which devotes no attention to its offspring. But the chicks are so well developed when they emerge from the egg that they can run about and get their own living. An elaborate nest is unnecessary to pheasants and partridges, lapwings, and other ground-breeding birds. With these, the young wander from the nesting spot as soon as they leave the egg. In the case of the lapwing, the eggshell may be seen adhering to the back of the newly hatched chick as it runs along the furrows.

The evolution of the nest proceeds, pari passu, with the initial immaturity of the young. Where nests are skilfully constructed, the nestlings are sometimes blind, frequently naked, and always quite helpless, at birth. The higher birds excel all other creatures in the art of cradling their progeny, and it is somewhat important to remember that, despite occasional departures here and there, the more advanced the species in structure and intelligence, the greater the necessity for parental guardianship and food provision for the defenceless broods.

A Note on Religion in the Army.

IT appears from the King's Regulations that a soldier must "have some sort of religion." Paragraph 912 says: "A soldier will be classed under the following denominations:—Church of England; Presbyterian; Wesleyan; Baptist or Congregationalist; other Protestant denominations (name of denomination to be noted); Roman Catholic; Jew." Paragraph 1821 also says: "Every soldier, when not prevented by military duty, will attend divine service, but a soldier will not be obliged to attend the service of any other religious body than his own." Once a man enters the Army and is "sworn in" under one of these religious denominations, there is small hope, if he is a Freethinker, or becomes one afterwards, that he will ever be excused from divine service. I have not heard of a single instance of a soldier being attested as an Atheist, Agnostic, or Freethinker; neither have I heard of any soldier being permitted to drop his religion in favor of Freethought after his attestation. I speak on this matter with authority, having made special inquiries some three or four years ago at several large recruiting and regimental record offices, from officials who have dealt with hundreds of thousands of soldiers' attestation and discharge papers.

I am of opinion, however, that a Freethinker desiring to join the Army has a legal right not to have any of these religious denominations imposed upon him. I believe he could enforce this by taking advantage of the Oaths Act (1888) at his attestation. This Act distinctly lays down that "affirmation" is allowed for every person and in all places. That it is permissible to make an affirmation instead of taking the oath is even backed up by the Army Act (sec. 190, para. 28), which says: "The expression 'oath' and 'swear,' and other expressions relating thereto, include affirmation or declaration."

If a recruit is permitted to make an affirmation on the ground "that he has no religious belief" (vide Oaths Act), I do not see very well how the authorities can compel him to accept any of the religious denominations scheduled on his attestation papers, unless he goes down under the heading of "Other Protestants"; and when asked to specify the particular denomination, let him say he "protests" against all the others on the list.

How to Break the Boycott.

IT has been repeatedly pointed out in these columns that the Freethought movement suffers from the boycott which is applied in the press, booksellers' and newsagents' shops, and at the public and private libraries. With rare exceptions, Freethought publications are ignored in the former and kept out of the latter. Hence, it becomes incumbent upon every Freethinker to assist in breaking down this boycott and to assist actively in the propagation of the literature of the movement. With this idea, Freethinkers should ask for Freethought publications at the libraries which they use, and see that they are supplied. An excellent beginning could be made with Mr. Cohen's Determinism or Free Will? and with Vivian's Churches and Modern Thought. In extreme cases, the books might be presented to the library; but care must be taken that the volumes are not placed on a top shelf and forgotten. So far as pamphlets are concerned, it is, perhaps, better to hand or post them to likely readers. Orthodox persons are often interested in controversial literature, and such introduction often means that regular readers are obtained. Remembering that, in spite of a most rigorous boycott, many thousands of pamphlets are already in circulation, it must be apparent that, with the added publicity, these figures may be largely exceeded in the immediate future.

With regard to the Freethinker, it is useful to order the paper with other publications, so that the tradesman is faced with the dilemma of accepting or refusing a good customer. In posting copies to people, it is always desirable to use envelopes, for frequently, in these days of advertising circulars, newspapers receive scant attention. Another useful suggestion is for Freethinkers to join in any likely discussion in local papers. These organs often give more space to readers' opinions than the large London journals. Letters should be terse, strictly to the point, and courteous, and should be written on one side of the paper only. Back numbers of the Freethinker should never be wasted; but should be left in trams, trains, and 'buses, or otherwise distributed. In order to prevent an improper use being made of these copies, it is wise to clip a piece from one of the corners, so that they may not be used as newsagents' returns. If these few hints are acted upon by our readers, it should prove of permanent benefit to the movement. We should be pleased to hear from any readers who have any useful suggestions to offer in this connection.

Tales of Our Times.

BY A CYNIC.

THE King and Queen of the loyal little kingdom of Adulatia were returning to their capital after a visit to a foreign Court. The railway journey had been long and tiring, and the king and queen were feeling and looking very weary as they drove through the streets to the palace, but this in no way damped the enthusiasm of their subjects. Every yard of the two miles or so between the railway station and the palace was thronged with a seething multitude, a continuous roar of cheering accompanied the royal equipage on its progress, the military escort could scarcely keep the roadways clear, and sometimes the carriage had to proceed almost at a walking place.

"What a fuss!" observed the King to the Queen as he leaned back in sheer weariness, and gave his right arm a little rest from the arduous work of raising his hat. "I wonder, really, why they do it."

"So do I," said the Queen, stifling a yawn and deftly turning it into a smile towards her loyal subjects. "I wish they would let us get along a little faster. I'm positively perishing for a cup of tea."

Before they reached the palace, their Majesties were so weary that they had almost ceased to notice the plaudits of the populace, and when eventually they did get there, they were so relieved at finding themselves at home that they quite forgot to carry out the customary formality of appearing on an upper balcony and giving their loving subjects a final bow and smile.

Next day the Prime Minister requested a special audience of the King, and was ushered into his presence wearing a very grave expression of face.

"I regret to inform your Majesty," he said, "that the people are making severe remarks on the apparent indifference with which your Majesties received their loyal welcome yesterday. Their disappointment and vexation are great, and have given rise to a feeling of disaffection which I fear will spread."

"Didn't take off my hat quite often enough, eh?" said the King airily. "Well, you can let it be known that I was abominably tired, and so was the Queen."

"I am afraid it is more serious than you think, sir," replied the Prime Minister. "If your Majesties could make it convenient to drive through the city this afternoon and —"

"Sorry that is impossible," said the King shortly. "Neither the Queen nor I feel inclined for a drive this afternoon."

Next morning, the leading Radical paper of Adulatia came out with a strong article on the King's growing arrogance and disregard of his people's wishes and feelings. Other Radical papers also commented severely on the King's behavior, and a Socialist paper let itself go in a most scathing and sarcastic leading article, which concluded as follows:—

> "Monarchs have always been notorious for their criminal neglect of the duties of their position, and even now, when their position in the modern State is that of mere ornamental puppets, their characteristics are the same. Even puppets on a mimic stage are expected to smile, and bow, and go through their appointed antics when the strings are pulled, but our royal puppets, in their hopeless inefficiency and laziness, fail even to do this. Away with them!"

The Prime Minister visited the palace again that evening with an even graver air than before.

"Your Majesty has no doubt seen the papers," he said. "The feeling of vexation is spreading rapidly and becoming more intense. Radical agitators are inflaming the minds of the people. When Parliament meets next week I fear the Left will make much of the incident for political purposes. If your Majesty and the Queen would graciously condescend to take a short State drive to-morrow morning —"

"No, we won't," said the King emphatically. "I am not to be intimidated by Radical newspapers and Radical agitators. After all, I suppose I have a right to share in the liberties of my country, so why should I be the only individual in the land who must go for a drive against his will, and take off his hat several hundreds of times on compulsion?"

As the King seemed so determined, the Prime Minister withdrew, and could only wait in some trepidation till the meeting of Parliament. Very soon after this took place, the leader of the Radical Opposition rose to call the attention of the House to a matter of grave public importance, and to move a resolution which practically amounted to a censure of the Throne. In the course of his speech, he described the royal drive from the railway station to the palace, and gave details showing how inappreciative their Majesties had been of the people's loyal welcome. Between the railway station and the Square of Nicholas IX., he declared, the King raised his hat only fourteen times and the Queen bowed only eleven times. Between the square Nicholas and the park of Ferdinand XV. the King looked at his watch twice, and once was distinctly seen to frown. He also raised his hat only nine times the whole way, while the Queen gave her devoted subjects only five rather listless smiles. Between the park and the palace both their Majesties leaned back in the carriage almost regardless of the cheering crowds, and on reaching the palace they failed to show themselves on the balcony to give the people a final opportunity of saluting them—an instance of royal neglect unprecedented in the history of Adulatia.

The Radical side of the House voted solidly for the resolution of censure, and, as many of the Conservatives were of the same opinion, it was carried by a large majority. But the Clericals voted on the other side, thus nobly maintaining their ancient reputation for supporting the Throne in every national crisis. They solemnly declared that to bow or not to bow, to smile, to frown, or to yawn were matters strictly within the divine rights of monarchs which should not be rudely interfered with by their subjects. The Socialists refrained from voting at all, their leader taking the view that it didn't matter a snap of the fingers whether kings and queens bowed and smiled to the populace or not, and that the people and Parliament of Adulatia were making egregious fools of themselves in raising such a fuss over it.

The Prime Minister was now in despair, and at his next interview with the King implored him to issue a conciliatory message to the people, dignified, yet gracious in tone, which would be certain to dispel all bitterness and bring his loyal subjects to their allegiance once again.

The King laughed. "In fact you want me to say I am sorry I was so naughty, and to promise to be a good boy in future. A pretty attitude for a King, forsooth! I will see my people in—well, a warmer climate than Adulatia before I do anything of the kind. Good morning."

But the punishment of this arrogant monarch was not long delayed. The people took the matter into their own hands, and their method of bringing their sovereign to a sense of his duty was as effective as it was novel. It simply consisted in entirely ignoring his existence. Whenever the King and Queen of Adulatia went out among the people, whether to view a military parade, to open an exhibition, to lay a foundation stone, or for any other purpose, no notice whatever was taken of them in the streets. People went about their business just as usual, no one ever turned to look at them, and many deliberately turned their backs on the royal carriage and pretended to examine the shop windows.

This was a quite impossible position for monarchs to exist in for long. It is a well-known aphorism that obsequious applause and servile flattery are the very life-breath of kings, and the King and Queen of Adulatia soon had bitter experience of its truth. There was nothing for it but to issue a Royal Proclamation in almost abject language, expressing their regret for the past and promising amendment for the future; so their humiliation was complete.

Thus did the spirited and resolute people of Adulatia impose their authority on their sovereigns, and thus too did they demonstrate a great principle which, had it been recognised in past ages and applied to all the despotic monarchs of history, might have obviated much violence and suffering. For instance, if our ancestors who had the misfortune to live under the rule of that pious "martyr" Charles I. had merely ignored him whenever he appeared amongst them, they might have been spared the disagreeable necessity of cutting off his head.

THE YELLOW-JACKETS GOT BUSY.

It was long before the Civil War that a man named Langham Brown, a Methodist preacher, lived in the little town of Edwardsville. The people of that time were not as dressy as they are now. In summer time they wore linen breeches and in winter time they wore buckskin breeches; that is, the men folk did. Springtime came, and the Rev. Mr. Brown took off his buckskin breeches and put on his linen ones. His good old wife took his buckskin breeches and hung them in the loft. During the summer the yellow-jackets built a nest in the seat of them. Fall came, and, like all good Methodist preachers, Brother Brown was to have a quarterly meeting. The time came for the meeting, this being in October. The weather was quite cool, so Brother Brown said to his wife, "I think I will put on my buckskin breeches." Mrs. Brown climbed up into the loft, got the preacher's buckskin breeches, and he put them on and went to church. A big crowd of people had come, and two or three brother preachers had taken seats on the platform before Brother Brown arrived.

He walked bravely up, took up a hymn-book, and lined a hymn, which the audience sang. Then one of the brothers led in prayer, after which Brother Brown gave out his text, the words of which were, "The wages of sin is death." "This, my hearers, is the word of God, spoken to the children of men, warning us of the price of sin. The soul that sins must surely die, for that is the price of sin. The nation that sins must pay the price." "Amen!" shouted Deacon Strong.

By this time Brother Brown got warmed up, and the little chaps in the seat of his pants got stirred up and became busy with their business end, which caused Brother Brown to step around pretty lively, at the same time proclaiming with a loud voice, "The wages of sin is death, saith the Lord," at the same time clapping the seat of his buckskin breeches with much force. This alarmed the brethren sitting with him, who rose up and said;

"Brethren, our good brother is crazy."

"I am not crazy," said Brother Brown. "The spirit of God is in my heart and the word of God is in my mouth, but I believe the very Devil has got in the seat of my breeches." "Amen!" shouted Deacon Strong.

Mr. Dunnybrig affected one book beside the Bible.....The full title of the book was the contents in a lurid sentence: "Horrors and Terrors of the Hour of Death and Day of Judgment that seize upon all Impenitent and Unbelieving Sinners, to which are added Sundry Examples of God's Dreadful Judgments against Violent Breakers of His Holy Commandments."—Eden Phillpotts, "Widecombe Fair."

The Bishop's Miracle.

The Bishop of London has added to his other attractions by becoming a worker of miracles. A little girl was ill, and the Bishop went to see her. She was unable to sleep, and was suffering from nervous breakdown. Bishop Ingram straightway knelt down at her bedside, anointed her forehead with oil, placed his hand on the girl's head, gave her his blessing, and the girl sank into a deep sleep that lasted for hours. And the Bishop was quite sure that Jesus was personally with him. This is not the first time we have heard of prayers as a cure for insomnia, and we quite believe the Bishop of London to be simple enough to honestly credit that a miracle was worked on this occasion. Other people will be at no loss to find a much simpler explanation of the occurrence.

The Christian World does not accept the Bishop's explanation of what occurred, which may be due to his belonging to another denomination than their own. Above all, it does not believe that the anointing with oil had anything to do with it. It says this is mere superstition on the Bishop's part. But we beg to point out that he was accurately following the New Testament prescription. It was the prayer of faith and the anointing with oil that was to save the sick. If it did it in apostolic times, why not now? If it cannot do it now, why believe it was done in apostolic times? And if it could not be done at any time, what becomes of the New Testament teaching on the subject? That is the worst of placing simple-minded men like F. W. Ingram in positions of prominence. They are silly enough to take their religion seriously, and so provide laughter for the ungodly.

Encouraged by his experience, the Bishop of London stood in the pulpit of St. Peter's, Eaton-square, offering prayers for cases that had been handed to him. He prayed for a schoolboy who was fighting temptation, young teachers with intellectual difficulties, ladies with nervous breakdowns, sick children, men in financial straits, etc., etc. All you had to do, apparently, was to send up a prayer about it. He was a kind of receiving agent for God Almighty, or a clearing house for Providence. It was a fine exhibition, a perfectly unique example of what a long way from real civilisation a large number of our fellow-citizens really are.

Obituary.

We regret to report the death of Mrs. T. Goulding, of 10 Gordon-road, Manor Park, which occurred on Wednesday, March 12, after a long and painful illness. Like her husband, Mrs. Goulding was a convinced and outspoken Freethinker. She was an ardent admirer and follower of Charles Bradlaugh, and was on the active list at many of his meetings. She died in the faith wherein she had lived; and, as her bereaved husband testified, her death was beautiful. The interment took place in Manor Park Cemetery on March 19, when a Secular Service was conducted. We tender our sincere sympathy to Mr. Goulding and family in their loss.—J. T. L.

South-West London Freethinkers will regret to hear of the death of another veteran, Mr. L. D. Hewitt, formerly a constant attendant at the Hall of Science, for many years resident in Wimbledon. Over seventy years of age, and feeling that his end was near, some ten days before his death he wrote me a letter of sympathy, and assured me of his strong adherence to the principles he had held for more than forty years and his never-failing interest in the Freethinker. He passed away peacefully on February 28, and was buried at Brookwood on March 4, the funeral being a silent one, in accordance with his wishes.—E. M. Vance.

It is our sad duty to record the death of yet another London Freethinker, namely, that of Mr. Ezekiel Turkington, of 64 Bury-road, Noel Park, which took place on Sunday, March 16, in the fiftieth year of his age. He was one of the oldest supporters of the National Secular Society in Wood Green, and for years rendered the cause most valuable service. He was one of those who acted as Mr. Cohen's bodyguard many years ago when intolerance reigned supreme in the minds of the disciples of the meek and mild Redeemer. The burial occurred on March 22 at the Tottenham Cemetery, when a Secular Service was read. We extend to the widow and her children our heartiest condolence.—J. T. Lloyd.

Dr. Foote's books have been the popular instructors of the masses in America for fifty years (often re-written, enlarged) and always kept up-to-date). For twenty years they have sold largely (from London) to all countries where English is spoken, and everywhere highly praised. Last editions are best, largest, and most for the price. You may save the price by not buying, and you may lose your life (or your wife or child) by not knowing some of the vitally important truths it tells.

Most Grateful Testimonials From Everywhere.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—NO. 14 SUNDAY, APRIL 6, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

To be wholly devoted to some intellectual exercise is to have succeeded in life.—ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

M. Jean Dons.—In Memory of an International Freethinker.

THE cause of Freethought in Belgium and of international Freethought throughout the world have suffered an irreparable loss in the death of Monsieur Jean Dons. At all the International Freethought Congresses, from Madrid in 1892 to Munich in 1912, he was the central but silent figure of the organisation, a man with absolutely no pretensions as an orator, but with the mighty energy of a cheerful, untiring worker. Personally, I feel all but crushed under the discouragement of this unexpected blow, which has happened so soon after the lamentable death of that other great Belgian worker for Freethought, Professor Eugène Monseur, both of whom I loved and admired. The loss of two such men, happening within a few short months, might suffice to ruin any other national movement of Freethought; but, happily, the cause for which Dons labored so long, and to which Monseur gave his genius and splendid courage, is rich with men of first-rate capacity and unrivalled devotion amongst the sturdy Rationalists of Belgium.

At his death, at Saint-Gilles, Brussels, on March 2, our excellent friend Dons was 67 years of age. Born on December 30, 1845, he was barely 18 years of age at the foundation of the Brussels Freethought Society, which has just celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its glorious existence. Already, at that early age, he had made application for admission as a member of the Society, but in accordance with the rules as to terms of membership had to wait for his majority before his desire could be gratified. He waited, but worked for Freethought in the meantime in the junior section.

In 1880, acting on the initiative of Dr. César Paepe, the organised Freethinkers throughout the world founded at Brussels an International Federation. Jean Dons' name figures amongst those of other founders of that organisation, which ultimately achieved the great triumph of the Rome Congress and moved the conscience of modern civilisation when the Church and the bigots thought they could murder Ferrer with impunity. Jean Dons, who loved the international side of Freethought with all his strength, became the Treasurer of the International Bureau at Brussels, and occupied that position at his death.

Five years later, when at the National Congress held at Charleroi in 1885, it was decided to form the Belgian Freethought Societies into a National Federation, Dons was appointed General Secretary, and remained in the discharge of those important and onerous functions at the moment of his decease. According to the recent report presented by M. Dons on the state of the Freethought movement in Belgium, the number of federated Rationalist Societies now amount to 370, and the roll of membership of these several groups shows more than 26,000 personal adherents. These statistics, which are the silent witness to strenuous labor continuously pursued, and which compare so favorably with the figures of 25 years ago, when the federated groups amounted only to 35 and the total members to 2,000,* reflect in no small degree the embodied results of the energy and intelligence with which our friend Dons watched over the operations of Belgian Freethought.

In 1893 Jean Dons took part, with others, in founding the Orphelinat Rationaliste, and ultimately became the administrator, the Treasurer, and constant friend of that admirable institution. He loved the happy orphans more than most fathers love their natural offspring, and on his retirement in 1911 from his honored career as an official in the Railway Department of State in Belgium, spent the major part of his leisure in attending to the details of the Orphanage management The last time I saw Jean Dons was in November, 1911, at the Orphanage, where I spent some time discussing with him and the teachers the different educational and practical aspects of their eminently secular work. The smartness of the children (they are 70 in number), their general bearing, and especially their affection for M. Dons, were touching proofs of the humanitarian principles on which this well-kept, handsomely situated Rationalist Orphanage is conducted. Madame Dons, who survives her husband, identified herself with all his Freethought aspirations, and especially with the work of the Orphanage. English and American Freethinkers, on their visit to the beautiful Belgian capital, should not fail to make a pious pilgrimage of love to the white house in the Chaussée d'Alsemberg (at Forest-Uccle, just on the outskirts of Brussels) in order to see the Orphanage for themselves. They will receive a hearty welcome, and find that some of the teachers can speak to them in very good English.

Side by side with the pick-and-spade work of direct Freethought propaganda, our friend Dons recognised that the social, literary, musical, and artistic appeal has also to be made, perhaps, in certain cases, more effectively, by the indirect attack on the orthodox entrenchments of superstition. Many years ago he and other Freethinkers in Brussels founded the Cercle des Soirées Populaires Rationalistes, under the auspices of which the largest halls in Brussels were, and are, taken and crammed Sunday after Sunday during the winter months to hear the best artists, the finest singers, and the best orators in the capital. On one occasion the Cercle held a most successful gathering at the Theatre de la Monnaie—answering in Brussels to our Covent Garden Theatre. In this way the social influence of the movement spread, and gained fresh adherents, and among the signal achievements of the Cercle is the number of young people who become attached to Freethought and escape, by civil marriage and the secular recognition or naming of their children, from the entanglements of theology.

All these tasks and achievements during 46 years or more of devoted and disinterested attachment to Freethought won for Jean Dons a wide circle of friends and admirers at home and abroad. His name is known wherever organised Freethought forms its phalanx against superstition and stretches out its hands to kindred spirits who are fighting the same foe in other lands. To thousands of militants who remember that quiet and determined organiser at our periodical gatherings in different parts of the world, a sense of deep loss will come and a pang of bitter privation.

My first remembrance of Dons was at Paris in 1902 at the International Congress. In 1903 I travelled with him and Madame Dons—his invariable companion on these distant pilgrimages—from Brussels to Geneva, in order to attend the Congress held at the University. I had many, and pleasant, opportunities during our journey, first to Strasbourg, and during our visits over that fine old city, and later, on our way to Berne and thereafter for about a week at Chamounix, and in different parts of Switzerland, to appreciate his great goodness of heart and his keen, active intelligence as a Freethought worker. Pleasant memories of these forays for Freethought and in search of the curious and picturesque have in these last few days risen unsummoned in my mind, the ghost of the past rising, as it were, to admonish those who would mourn, that the emptiness of death is but a mirage as compared with the fullness of life when the fascinating beauty of high ideals and the imperishable glory of art and natural loveliness have poured forth their treasures for the enrichment of our experience of men and things.

If ever the funeral of Freethinker demanded and deserved pomp and circumstance to bespeak admiration of the honored dead, it was due in the case of Jean Dons. And right royally—and with deeper sincerity than most royalty can elicit—did Freethought in Brussels mark its appreciation of our friend Dons when the parting came and death paid its tribute to earth. At the mortuary Dr. Hector Denis read a moving discourse in the name of the International Bureau, and M. Emile Royer spoke a touching address on the Orphanage. The funeral cortège then started on its journey, led by the flags of the National Freethought Federation, followed by those of all the Rationalist Societies in Brussels, those of Liége, Mons, etc.; and then came the Orphans, who immediately preceded the funeral car, which was literally buried under floral crowns and wreaths. An immense crowd of delegates from provincial societies and a considerable number of deputés, senateurs, municipal officers, bourgemestres, town councillors, etc., followed the hearse. At the cemetery five addresses were delivered in honor of the deceased, depicting his life in summary.*

And so the procession moves on its way; the warriors of the good fight fall down, smitten in the battle; but the living follow after, and the wreaths and flowers, and the young generations; renewed hopes and fresh inspiration spring from the open grave; and death is swallowed up in victory.

William Heaford.

Religion and Sex.—V.

(Concluded from p. 195.)

If we turn from biographical narratives to manuals of devotion, we find the same kind of evidence. As examples of this I may cite, first of all, from a collection of old English Homilies, dating from the thirteenth century:—

> "Jesus my holy love, my sure sweetness! Jesus my heart, my joy, my soul-heal! Jesus, sweet Jesus, my darling, my life, my light, my balm, my honey-drop! .....Kindle me with the blaze of thy enlightening love. Let me be thy leman, and teach me to love thee..... Oh, that I might behold how thou stretchedst thyself for me on the cross. Oh, that I might cast myself between those same arms, so very wide outspread..... Oh, that I were in thy arms, in thy arms so stretchedst and outspread on the cross."†

Or this, from the same collection:—

> "Sweet Jesus, my love, my darling, my Lord, my Savior, my balm, sweeter is the remembrance of thee than honey in the mouth. Who is there that may not love thy lovely face? Whose heart is so hard that may not melt at the remembrance of thee? Oh! who may not love thee, lovely Jesus? Jesus my precious darling, my love, my life, my beloved, my most worthy of love, my heart's balm, thou art lovesome in countenance, thou art altogether bright. All angels' life is to look upon thy face, for thy cheer is so marvellously lovesome and pleasant to look upon.....Thou art so bright, and so white that the sun would be pale if compared to thy blissful countenance. If I, then, love any man for beauty, I will love thee, my dear life, my mother's fairest son" (p. 268).

Although this kind of language is more plentiful in Roman Catholic books of devotion than elsewhere, it is not peculiar to them. In illustration of this we may take the following outbursts from one of Wesley's female converts, as given by Southey in his Life of Wesley:—

> "Oh, mighty, powerful, happy change! The love of God was shed abroad in my heart, and a flame kindled there with pains so violent, and yet so very ravishing that my body was almost torn asunder. I sweated, I trembled, I fainted, I sang. Oh, I thought my head was a fountain of water. I was dissolved in love. My beloved is mine, and I am his. He has all charms; he has ravished my heart; he is my comforter, my friend, my all. Oh, I am sick of love. He is altogether lovely, the chiefest among ten thousand. Oh, how Jesus fills, Jesus extends, Jesus overwhelms the soul in which he lives."

In the following canticle, composed by St. Francis of Assissi, it is simply impossible to distinguish any substantial difference between it and frankly erotic poetry:—

> "Into love's furnace I am cast,
> Into love's furnace I am cast,
> I burn, I languish, pine, and waste.
> Oh, love divine, how sharp thy dart!
> How deep the wound that galls my heart!
> As wax in heat, so, from above,
> My smitten soul dissolves in love.
> I live, yet languishing I die,
> While in thy furnace bound I lie." *

The erotic note is here clear and unmistakable. And it would be possible to furnish exact parallels from volumes of secular verse that would be strictly taboo among those who see no harm whatever in these verses when used in connection with religion, and who quite fail to recognise that their attractiveness really lies in their erotic character, as they owe their origin to the strong sexual feelings of the writers. Moreover, we are dealing here with more than language selected because of an artistic perception of its fitness to express strong feeling, and so far symbolic. It is the spontaneous expression of strong sexual feeling in its most natural form. That the object of devotion is a heavenly instead of an earthly person matters not. Psychologically, we are dealing with the same kind of feeling, springing from the same kind of organisation; and whether this feeling expends itself in the one direction or the other is a sheer environmental accident. How is it possible to resist the implications of the following from a French devotional work widely circulated amongst the women of France:—

> "Praise to Jesus, praise his power,
> Praise his sweet allurements,
> Praise to Jesus, when his goodness
> Reduces me to nakedness;
> Praise to Jesus when he says to me,
> My sister, my dove, my beautiful one!
> Praise to Jesus in all my steps,
> Praise to his amorous charms.
> Praise to Jesus when his loving mouth
> Touches mine in a loving kiss.
>
> Praise to Jesus when his gentle caresses
> Overwhelm me with chaste joys.
> Praise to Jesus when at his leisure
> He allows me to kiss him."†

As a parallel to this we may take the following hymn sung at an American camp meeting of some thousands of persons between the ages of fourteen and twenty-five :—

"Blessed Lily of the Valley, oh, how fair is He;
He is mine, I am His.
Sweeter than the angels' music is His voice to me;
He is mine, I am His.
Where the lilies fair are blooming by the waters calm
There He leads me and upholds me by His strong right arm.
All the air is love around me—I can feel no harm;
He is mine, I am His."*

The chief significance of this last quotation lies in the age of the congregation. Fourteen to twenty-five covers the years during which distinctive sexual qualities are developed; and in place of these receiving a quiet and regular direction into social and harmless channels, we have the contagious excitement of a revival meeting. It is no wonder that observer after observer have complained, sometimes with wonder, that instead of the religious gatherings being followed by a decrease of sensuality, the reverse has been the case. The whole atmosphere of such gatherings is sensual in the highest degree, and one ought not to be surprised if the normal consequences follow. It should be the most obvious of truths that the attractiveness of such, with the keen delight taken in the pictures suggested, lies in their yielding—all unknown, perhaps, to the singers—satisfaction to feelings that are frequently imperious in their demands, and are astonishingly pervasive in their influence.

Much light is thrown upon the subject by a study of human behavior in cases of actual disease. Of late years a flood of light has been thrown upon normal psychology by a study of abnormal mental states,† and in cases of unmistakable disorder it is possible to see very clearly how readily the sexual feelings find expression in religious phraseology. If the reader will turn to Sir T. S. Clouston's Clinical Lectures on Mental Diseases, he will find on p. 584 of that work an example in point. The author quotes there a poem written by one of his patients, and which is reproduced in order to illustrate "the common mixture of religious and sexual emotion." I forbear reproducing it because of its grossly obscene character; and yet it is not, in its mingling of religion and eroticism, substantially different to many of the citations already given. In such cases disease helps to an understanding of human nature in its more normal aspects. We are able to trace the operation of tendencies and qualities unobscured by the disguises and restraints forced upon them by social convention and education.

Professor Granger, who at times very nearly hits on the truth, says :—

> "There is something profoundly philosophical in the use of The Song of Songs to typify the communion of the soul with its ideal. The passion which is expressed by the Shulamite for her earthly lover in such glowing phrases becomes the type of the love of the soul towards God."‡

One fails to see the profoundly philosophic nature of the selection. The Song of Songs is a frankly erotic love poem, and but for the accident of its being in the Bible, would never have been selected at all. There can be no question that, had it appeared in the religious books of a non-Christian people, we should have had it cited as evidence of the moral inferiority of their religious writings. And as a matter of fact, similar effusions have been cited by Christians from non-Christian writings to that end. But being in the Bible, its use has been sanctioned, not really because it typified the union of the soul with God, but because it gave expression to feelings that were diverted from their normal channels. The true lesson of the selection is that sexual feeling cannot be suppressed; it can only be diverted or disguised. Some expression it will find—here an open perversion in outbursts of vice, there an obsession that results in an insane asceticism, and elsewhere the creation of the unconsciously salacious, with an unhealthy fondness for dabbling in the question of the illicit relation of the sexes.

"One of the reasons why popular religion in England," says Professor Granger, "seems to be coming to the limits of its power, is that it has contented itself so largely with the commonplace motives which, after all, find sufficient exercise in the ordinary duties of life." Here, again, is a striking obtuseness to a plain but important truth. For the truth is that religion, whether of the popular or other variety, will always lose power as soon as the nature of the forces it utilises is recognised and the proper channels opened for their expression. This has been the case right through human history. We see it in the gradual emancipation of the physical sciences from religious control. We see it also in the growing liberation of sociology and morals. In each case human activity expressed itself in a religious form only so long as the religious idea was associated with a particular subject. If men think of the planets as living beings or as controlled by spiritual powers, their reasoning on astronomy cannot escape a religious form. While moral impulses are regarded as due to supernatural inspiration, ethics is a department of theology. Given more complete knowledge, both the scientific and the moral impulse find gratification apart from religion, which weakens accordingly. And I have tried to show in these articles that exactly the same principle holds true of the play of the sexual impulse, in both its normal and abnormal aspects, as well as in the case of obscure nervous diseases. Here also we find enlisted in the service of religion, phenomena that must admit of a thoroughly non-religious explanation. It is not a question of religion losing power because it has contented itself with commonplace motives, and because these find satisfaction in the ordinary duties of life. It is really a case of providing a scientific explanation of the whole of human nature, in its most complex as in its most simple phases, and a consequent dismissal of the religious theory as a mere survival of the most primitive savagery.

Fanatics.

WHEN we call anyone a fanatic what do we mean? Do we intend to bestow praise or blame upon the person so described? Etymologically a fanatic is one moved or inspired by a deity. In Rome there used to be people who attended the temples and fell into what we in modern times speak of as trances and became mediums through whom important predictions were supposed to be made. In Latin, fanum is the word for temple, and it naturally follows that fanatics is a term applied to people who are temple-mad. In the French fanatique is often used interchangeably with bigoted. Thomas Fuller, writing in 1660, says :

> "There is a new word, coined within a few months, called fanatics, which by the close stickling thereof, seemeth well cut out and proportioned to signify what is meant thereby, even the sectaries of our age."

Generally speaking, by fanatics we of to-day understand people who harbor and express wild, extravagant views on any subject, but chiefly on that of religion, or people who are governed by imagination, or emotion, rather than by judgment or reason. Moore says :—

> "But Faith, fanatic faith, once wedded fast
> To some dear falsehood, hugs it to the last."

Fanaticism denotes the sovereignty of unreason, the supremacy of superstition. You cannot argue with fanatics, the art being utterly unknown to them. If you ask them calm questions they fly into a passion and pelt you with vulgar abuse. If they had their way people who differ from them would never be permitted to open their lips. They are the only people who know because they are guided by right feelings. One of them addresses himself to a Sceptic, who has seen many sorrows, thus:—

> "Hold! I challenge you in the name of the Lord. I bid you listen in the name of the crucified, glorified Christ. And I tell you that your good will not stay in any tomb; you could not make it do so, no matter how hard you tried. I tell you that there will be a glorious resurrection. That which has been worthy to know a Calvary shall know an Easter morning. You may not believe me now, but you will believe me by and by."

Such an appeal can only issue from one whose intelligence is in slavish subjection to his religious emotion; and you can no more conduct an argument with him than with a house on fire.

In our judgment all Christians are fanatics, and cannot be anything else. When a telegram was handed to the President of the Duma announcing the fall of Adrianople there ensued a wonderful scene of wild rejoicing. According to Reuter's message from Petersburg, M. Krupensky stepped into the tribunal and cried out, "Adrianople has fallen! Hurrah!" "The deputies and the public rose as a man, and for a long time the hall echoed to their cheers. The sitting was then suspended." Here was an assembly of unreasoning fanatics beside itself with joy because the Cross was rapidly driving the Crescent out of Europe. The bloodshed had been horrible, but what mattered that when the victory was Christ's? To break faith with Infidels has ever been a Christian virtue, and this is what the Great European Powers have done with the Turks. They gave their solemn word that whatever the result of the war might be there would be no geographical changes, and that word they have conveniently ignored. Pierre Loti, in his admirable little book, Turquie Agonisante, expresses the strongest detestation of such conduct. Writing in December, he used these words:—

> "Alas, as the events precipitate themselves, which we contemplate with supreme emotion, the European nations, Prussia in particular, their ex-friend, show a facility in disowning the given word and an easiness in deceit which are more and more stupefying" (p. 60).

The wish to see Europe entirely Christian overmasters every other sentiment, and honesty and fidelity and truth are of only a secondary importance. What is this but fanaticism of the deepest dye?

Fanaticism blinds the eye of the mind so that its victims cannot see the truth. Christians never hesitate to put the Bible, with all its contradictions, absurdities, atrocities, immoralities, indecencies, and obscenities, into the hands of innocent, little children. The theatre is of the Devil, but the Bible is of God. The dance is indecent, and no genuine Christian can take part in it without injury to his piety, but the perusal of Bible stories tends to elevate and ennoble the moral sense. Everybody knows that there are chapters in God's Book which cannot be read in public; but that fact is no hindrance whatever to its being eulogised as Holy Writ. There are plenty of persons about still who boast of their ability to accept every sentence in it as God's truth. Is not this fanaticism at its lowest and worst? There are even men of learning who, while acknowledging that the volume contains much mythological and legendary stuff, still persist in declaring it to be a perfect revelation of the Supreme Being, and of the way of salvation through faith in Christ. Only the other day, a Vicar, preaching in Halifax Parish Church, Yorkshire, said that we owe a debt to the Bible which we can never pay, and part of this debt was indicated by the statement that this Book teaches us to look away from ourselves, even to despise our own faculties, and to glorify God by putting our entire reliance on him. According to this principle, self-reliance is the sin of sins, and any man who tries to find refuge in himself is utterly lost. For this glorious teaching, the good Vicar assured his hearers, we are indebted to the Bible alone. Then he added:—

> "In the writings of Buddha [though it is well known that Buddha never wrote a line!], for example, the central idea is to throw man back for all ultimate help on to Nature, or on to himself. Listen to the revelation given by Gotama many ages ago, 'Be ye lamps unto your own selves, be a refuge unto yourselves. Betake yourselves to no other refuge, the Buddhas are only teachers, look not for refuge to any beside yourselves.' This is the heart of the Buddhist theology [though it is well known that Gotama frowned upon all theologies]—'no Divine love save the love of man for man, no All-Father, no Savior, no angel-guardians, no possible refuge save in ourselves.'"

We boldly avow a decided preference for the condemned but rational teaching of Gotama; nor are we ashamed to affirm that the world owes a much bigger debt to it than to the Bible.

Another instance of the blindness of fanaticism is furnished by the estimate which Christians form of and the attitude which they maintain towards all non-Christians. According to the New Testament, the sin that damns a man absolutely and for ever is unbelief. It was "an evil heart of unbelief" which kept the Israelites wandering aimlessly for forty years in the wilderness, concerning whom Jehovah said, "I sware in my wrath, They shall not enter into my rest." Then the author of Hebrews concludes, "We see that they were not able to enter in because of unbelief." With this fact in mind, we are not surprised to discover that Christian teachers are very fond of expatiating upon the evils that follow in the train of unbelief. The Rev. J. T. Forbes, M.A., minister of Hillhead Baptist Church, Glasgow, describes unbelief as a sin for which there can be no justification, which is another way of saying that to differ from Christians is to be wicked. Mr. Forbes says:—

> "The inexcusableness of it comes from this, that at bottom, when you get to the true man, beneath all motives that temporarily sway the soul, there does remain in hearts a persuasion that Christ is right, that Christians have the best of it; that because Christ is right, he has right over lives, and that because he is the truth he is king."

We pass an exceedingly light censure upon that kind of talk when we characterise it as being essentially impudent and rude. What right has Mr. Forbes to think and publicly say that in his heart of hearts every man is convinced that Christ is right and that Christians have the best of it? We deliberately hold the opinion that Christ is wrong and that Christians have the worst of it, and we defy Mr. Forbes to disprove this conviction. Did not the Gospel Jesus discourse almost exclusively about God and our relations thereto, about heaven as the abode of post-mortem bliss, and about an impossible kingdom in which poverty, mourning, hatred of relations, non-resistance of evil, and the use of the sword would be accounted virtues? We venture to express the view that nobody, in any age or country, has ever spoken, with a single scrap of knowledge, of God and heaven and a future life, and that, therefore, only fanatics can possibly preach the Christian Gospel, and condemn those who refuse to believe it. Unbelief in such a Gospel, if at all intelligent, is a sign of mental strength and independence. As a rule, unbelievers are intellectually the superiors of believers, and morally at least their equals.

Our chief objection to Christian fanatics is that they are shameless busybodies. "We know you far better than you know yourself," they tell everybody; "and we are ready to prescribe for your malady, which otherwise is incurable. You try to make out that you are an Atheist and an opponent of Christ; but in reality you are only the victim of moral cowardice. You are afraid of your own conscience, and to silence it you attempt to banish the thought of God and hell-fire from your mind. Man, you are deplorably self-deceived; you are no more of an Atheist than we are; and in the central deeps of your being you reverence Christ." Holding such views, they officiously sit in judgment upon all who differ from them, and thrust themselves and their wares upon them. All heathen countries are perishing for lack of the special knowledge of which they claim to be the heaven-appointed custodians. But at last their day of reckoning is dawning; and instead of the Gospel of Christ, which history has long ago discredited, we are promised the Gospel of Humanity, which will concern itself with the Kingdom of Man and his righteousness. For the speedy and full coming of this Kingdom may we all faithfully and strenuously labor.

Shakespeare and the Bible.

"Shakespeare was in the genuine sense, that is, in the best and highest and widest meaning of the term, a Freethinker."—SWINBURNE.

SHAKESPEARE is the supreme genius of literature. Compared with him, Homer nods and Dante stutters. And this man, who was "not of an age, but for all time," is England's greatest son. There is nothing new to be said of his genius. The whole world has acknowledged it for many generations. The most exhaustive criticism has been brought to bear upon his writings. The whole vocabulary of eulogy has been used in praising his work. But there is one point, which, though recognised by many of his ablest critics, has not been brought into sufficient prominence. Shakespeare was a Freethinker. A great moralist he is universally admitted to be; but the popular idea associates morality with the orthodoxy of the moment.

There have been many guesses, founded mainly on passages in his plays, concerning the speculative belief of Shakespeare. Credulity has represented him as an evangelical Christian; a Churchman of the type of that buffoon, James I.; as a Protestant bigot; as a Spiritualist; and even as a member of what Carlyle calls "the great lying Catholic Church." Shakespearean commentators are adepts in bringing startling meanings out of a Shakespeare text, as a conjurer brings eggs, ribbons, and rabbits from an empty hat. But these attempts to prove Shakespeare a bigot or a crank leave real students of the Master's work unconvinced.

Shakespeare was a world too wide for any theology. He never fretted and fussed about the salvation of his soul. He was no more a Christian than Lucretius or Omar Khayyam, Montaigne, or Rabelais. Indeed, Shakespeare never hesitated to make his characters jest as Biblical subjects, or to treat with indifference, and even irreverence, the most sacred features of the Christian faith. The sceptical note is not confined to raillery, it finally merges in iconoclasm. He puts plenty of Biblical allusion in the mouth of Sir John Falstaff. Listen! "In the state of innocency Adam fell, and what should poor Jack Falstaff do in a state of villainy." Bardolph's face reminds him of hell-fire and Dives that lived in purple, and of the devil's kitchen where he does nothing but roast malt worms. Then Sir John ridicules hell-fire, "I think the devil will not have me damned, lest the oil that is in me should set hell on fire." When Falstaff dies, trusty Bardolph exclaims, "Would I were with him, wheresome'er he is, either in heaven or hell," and Mistress Quickly replies, "Nay, sure he's not in hell; he's in Arthur's bosom," substituting, with subtle sarcasm, the legendary English hero for the mythical Jewish one.

Mrs. Page tells Mrs. Ford to dispense with such a trifle as going "to hell for an eternal moment or so," thus casting derision on the eternity of everlasting punishment. The clown in Measure for Measure burlesques St. Paul's ideas of the subordination of women:—

"Come hither, sirrah. Can you cut off a man's head?"

"If a man is a bachelor, sir, I can; but if he be a married man, he is his wife's head, and I can never cut off a woman's head."

King Richard compares himself to Christ, and even exalts his own misery above that sacred person. He has "three Judases, each one thrice worse than Judas." So Judas did to Jesus, "he, in twelve, found truth in all but one; I, in twelve thousand, none." The Royal Hunchback in Henry VI. flippantly says, "For you shall sup with Jesus Christ to-night." In the same play the Duchess of Gloster remarks:—

"Could I come near your beauty with my nails, I'd set my ten commandments in thy face."

In Twelfth Night, when Olivia says of her brother, "I know his soul is in heaven, fool," like a sword-thrust comes the rude answer, "The more fool you, madonna, to mourn for your brother being in heaven."

Shakespeare, like Huxley, ridicules miracles. In the scene in Twelfth Night between Malvolio and the Clown, he caricatures the idea that madness is occasioned by demoniacal possession, and is curable by exorcism. Not contented with iconoclasm, Shakespeare explains miracles:—

"No natural exhalation in the sky
No scope of Nature, no distempered day,
No common wind, no customed event,
But they will pluck away his natural cause,
And call them meteors, prodigies, and signs,
Abortives, presages, and tongues of heaven."

The explanation is the more forceful by being put in the mouth of a Cardinal of the Catholic Church.

Helena, in All's Well, says:—

"In religion
What damned error but some sober brow
Will bless it and approve it with a text."

Timon tells us caustically that gold "will knit and break religions," and elsewhere Shakespeare warns us in lines of Lucretian bitterness:—

"Our remedies oft in themselves do lie
Which we ascribe to heaven."

The dying words of Hamlet, "The rest is silence"; the speech of the Duke in Measure for Measure," whilst silencing Claudio's imaginary fears of death,—

"Thy best of rest is sleep,
And that thou oft provokest,
Yet grosely fear'st
Thy death, which is no more."

—also indicate Shakespeare's heterodoxy.

The Master took the beliefs and superstitions around him as his material. Ghosts, fairies, witches, gods, and goddesses, the mythology of the Ancients, and the dramatis personæ of the Christian religion, are but the machinery for appealing to the popular sentiments. When they have served their turn they appear no more. The permanent direction of his thought was towards Secularism. On the deeper grounds of religious faith his silence is most significant. Often as his questionings turn to the riddle of the universe, he leaves it an enigma to the last, disdaining the common theological solutions. He makes Prospero say:—

"We are such stuff
As dreams are made of, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep."

Sleep before birth, sleep after death! What Christian could have written it? Take King Lear, the tragedy "too deep for tears," touching the root-springs of human nature. The whole tragedy is an impeachment of Providence, and is summed up in the biting lines:—

"As flies to wanton boys are we to the gods—
They kill us for their sport."

The same iconoclastic note sounds in The Tempest, when Miranda says, while viewing the shipwreck:—

"Had I been any god of power, I would Have sunk the sea within the earth, or e'er
It should the good ship so have swallowed, and
The freighting souls within her."

Serenely the great dramatist leaves human nature to expound in its own being the mystery of existence. His philosophy is taken from the heart of life:—

"Nature is made better by no mean,
But nature makes that mean."

Had we only his plays to refer to, it were sufficient to prove Shakespeare's heterodoxy. Fortunately, we have another source from which his views may be drawn. In the sonnets the Master "unlocks his heart." Throughout the whole series, in which the subjects of love strong as death and the bitter irony of destiny are treated with fullness, allusions to the Christian mythology are absent. Orthodox dogmas are thrown to the winds. The Voltaire of Persia might have written the following lines:—

> "When in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes,
> I all alone beweep my outcast state,
> And trouble deaf heaven with my bootless cries,
> And look upon myself and curse my fate."

It is in the very spirit of that "large infidel," Omar, and who but a Freethinker could have written "deaf" before "heaven"? No other immortality is suggested but that through offspring:—

> "And nothing 'gainst Time's scythe can make defence
> Save breed, to brave him when he takes thee hence."

The epitaph on Shakespeare's eldest daughter clearly implies that the Master's life had not been one of piety:—

> "Witty above her sexe, but that's not all,
> Wise to salvation was good mistris Hall;
> Something of Shakespeare was in that, but this > Wholly of Him with whom she's now in blisse."

Shakespeare deals in his masterpieces with the deepest issues of life and conduct, but he never points to the Cross as a solution. In an age when religious wars and schisms were convulsing Europe, and in England when the old faith was in its death-struggle with the reformed religion, it is remarkable that Shakespeare turned his back on Christianity.

When we compare Shakespeare's works with the Bible, the absurdity of supposing that the world's greatest poet drew literary inspiration from that Oriental medley is apparent. The Bible comes from the same Eastern background as the Arabian Nights, and the characters of the latter are mere puppets and their stories are a mere succession of incident and event, unbroken by any attempt at characterisation. This is true of the Bible. When the clergy boast of the unparalleled literary value of the Scriptures, it is well to remember this fact, and to enter a strenuous, and, if possible, a serious protest. Compared to the great master of literature, Shakespeare, the anonymous authors of the Bible are poor of resource, limited of range, commonplace in execution. These Orientals mostly pour out floods of lust, anger, and pietism; largely utter hoarse cries of fear, revenge, and worship. Wit and repartee were closed doors to them. From the first error in Genesis to the final absurdity in Revelation, there is not a spark of humor. Much of their best work is only mellifluous prurience presented in exotic forms of verse. At other times their verse is filled with the turmoil of battle, the champing of horses, the flashing of spears. Only on rare occasions does the still, sad voice of humanity make itself heard. Thus, in the last analysis, the Bible simply contains the ordinary stock-in-trade of almost all Oriental writers. Compare the elementary barbarisms of the Bible with the opulent originality of Shakespeare. Place side by side Romeo and Juliet with the Song of Songs; Lear with Job; and the songs and sonnets with the Psalms. Confronted further with the masterpieces of Homer, Sophocles, or Dante, the books of the Bible become merely the works of minor writers. If they had not been associated with a very heavily endowed system of religion, they would, centuries ago, have consumed to nothingness in the echoless temple of universal silence.

Mimnermus.

The late Mr. Clifton Bingham, the popular song writer, who died last week, wrote quite a number of lyrics about dying children and angels, which caught the public fancy. At length he tried the patience of Mr. Cowen, the composer, who, in a pleasant letter, asked the author if he did not think that between them they had killed enough little children. Mr. Bingham agreed and afterwards chose happier subjects.

The Bishop of Winchester, preaching at St. Paul's Cathedral at the Livingstone Memorial Service, referred to such biographies as that of the famous missionary as being "the best shot in the Church's locker, the best tonic in her store." So one of the latter-day functions of the Church of Christ seems to be either to blow you up or buck you up.

Acid Drops.

Mr. Foote's English Review article on Meredith has roused the ire of an anonymous writer in the Antidote, a publication of the existence of which we have only just become aware. We can only guess the writer's personality, and, whether we are right or wrong in our surmise, we beg to congratulate him on having at least the grace to refrain from disclosing his name to the world. Had he pursued the same policy with his article, the public—or the small portion of it that reads it—would have been all the better for the suppression. The larger part of the article is taken up with Mr. Foote's contribution to the Review, and we may be pardoned suspecting that it is Mr. Harrison's publishing this that inspires the general attack on his editorial policy. The wisely anonymous writer in the Antidote does not deny that Meredith was a Freethinker; he does not challenge any of the facts stated about Meredith by Mr. Foote; he has not the wit, or knowledge enough of Meredith's work, to even suggest a different interpretation of the facts. His is an undisguised appeal to the snobbery, the pseudo-morality, and the intolerance of the British public. And after reading it, we feel that what we need is not an antidote, but an emetic.

The writer twice drags in the name of Lord Roberts, whom he assumes will not "be less disgusted than ourselves" at finding his contribution in the same issue as an article "by no less a literary luminary than Mr. G. W. Foote, who himself informs us that he was prosecuted under the Blasphemy Laws on account of the Freethinker, and that a Roman Catholic judge sentenced him to 12 months' imprisonment." We do not know whether Lord Roberts will be disgusted or not, and we can assure everybody concerned that we do not care. For Lord Roberts' own sake we hope that his character is less contemptible than the Antidote writer (who naturally sees the world reflected in the mirror of his own mind) imagines. We can hardly picture him risking imprisonment for the sake of an opinion; hence his inability to appreciate the character and conduct of those who do. Had Jesus Christ escaped from the hands of his captors after a term of imprisonment, we feel sure that people like the writer we are dealing with would have warmly protested against an ex-prisoner being tolerated by decent society.

The real offence of the English Review seems to lie in its being allowed to say in its pages that Swinburne and Meredith were Freethinkers. The Antidote quotes Mr. Foote's comments on the funerals of the two men, and then proceeds:—

> "Happily neither Swinburne nor Meredith will sleep the less soundly in consecrated ground.....It will take more than Swinburne's youthful blasphemies, and than Meredith's mature cheque for the Freethinker, to make reasonable people cry 'Scandalous!' because these great men were given Christian burial. There should be grace enough in the sweet heaven for both of them, and the English Review does an ill-service to letters when it allows them to be dubbed Freethinker and Anti-Theist."

We pass this cowardly falsification of facts with the bare comment that Meredith's favorable attitude to the Freethinker was not confined to a "mature cheque"—his endorsement of Freethought covered many years of his life; nor were Swinburne's "blasphemies" (if by that is meant his Anti-Theistic opinions) confined to his youth. Swinburne and Meredith will, indeed, sleep as soundly in consecrated ground as elsewhere—that lies beyond the control of even the bigotry of the Antidote. The issue is not one of the dead sleeping soundly, but of the living acting honestly. And Mr. Foote's protest was against the horrible and disgusting farce of reading over a man's dead body opinions and doctrines that he repudiated when living. We agree that it will take more than has been said to make some people ashamed of this practice of religious body-snatching; but we have good reason for believing that even among Christians many are ashamed of these tactics. In any case, Mr. Foote's protest was intended for those with some sense of honor and honest dealing with the memories of the dead, and from that category the Antidote writer stands self-excluded.

It is not an "ill-service to letters," but the best of all services to letters and to life, when an editor places within reach of his readers all sides of the character of those who worthily represented while living the higher life of man. It has always been one of the disgraceful features of English journalism that it has systematically suppressed the truth about the opinions of prominent men. For once in a way this cowardly game of silence, and dishonest work of misrepresentation, has been rudely broken in on by the more manly policy of the English Review. We welcome the change, quite apart from the fact that Mr. Foote happened to have written the particular article under notice. We should have been none the less pleased had the truth been told by someone else. We quite appreciate the alarm of characters such as the writer in the Antidote at this innovation. For with truth comes enlightenment, and with enlightenment comes breadth of view and sanity of vision. And with these comes not only the decay of worn-out institutions and baseless ideas, but the disappearance of that army of scribblers whose pens are always at the command of any interest that cares to purchase them directly or indirectly.

Dr. Orchard says, "That Jesus has been so entirely appropriated by the Western world, where animosity to the Jews is still only faintly concealed, is the measure of his triumph. The modern world has managed to forget that Jesus was a Jew." The reverend gentleman is entirely mistaken. To the Christian world Jesus has never been a Jew, but always the Son of God, or the God-man, and the Jews have been so violently hated and so cruelly persecuted throughout the centuries in Christendom because they rejected and secured the crucifixion of the Savior of the world. Until they disowned their own Redeemer and got him removed they were Heaven's Chosen People. Hatred of the Jews is a product of Christianity.

Mr. and Mrs. Carleton Wolsey Washburne, a young couple of Los Angeles, California, were married by a clergyman some seven months ago; but after the ceremony they published a contract they had entered into, in which they agreed to join together in a seven months' trial of matrimony, and to allow each other full liberty for other alliances the moment their love grew cold. It was an odd experiment, but it has turned out all right as far as the lady is concerned, as may be seen by her letter to the newspapers. "I am my husband's equal partner," she says. "I have my separate bank account and a half of all his earnings. I am in no way subject to my husband's will. Our love is absolutely without bonds. The result is that there has been no ripple on our married life." Was there ever a marriage founded on a less romantic basis? "I have half his earnings and a bank account of my own." How pretty! We might add how petty! And when offspring come, and the real basis of marriage asserts itself, what then? We are rather glad that these people are religious.

"I cannot conceive," writes a pious Daily News correspondent, "that Christian England will really agree to a decision which finally bars the Allies from Constantinople, and leaves Sophia a Moslem mosque." This reminds us of the reverend gentleman who, at the outset of the war, said that he was happy at the thought that the flag of Christ would soon be flying over Sophia. That was enough to compensate for all the bloodshed, suffering, and misery.

In reply to protests against the forcible conversion of Albanian Catholics to the Orthodox Greek Church, Montenegro replies that she has a right to do what she likes in conquered territory. Such are the soldiers of the Cross! And if anybody can point out how they are at all better than the soldiers of the Crescent we should be glad to see him do it.

At the recent meeting of the Free Church Council one speaker exclaimed, "Ours is not to reason, but to obey Christ." That is the pulpit style to perfection. If a man reasons he cannot possibly be a Christian. At the bar of reason Christianity completely breaks down. Leaving reason out of it altogether, who ever obeyed Christ? Who ever put the Sermon on the Mount into practice? Christians are notorious for their systematic disloyalty to what they believe to be Christ's teaching. Their obedience is an emotion which never materialises into deeds.

Two articles recently appeared on the Resurrection of Christ, one in the Baptist Times and Freeman and the other in the Christian Commonwealth. The former came from the pen of the Rev. F. C. Spurr, of Melbourne, and the latter from that of the Rev. J. Bruce Wallace, both Christian ministers; but the amazing fact is that Mr. Spurr believes that Jesus rose from the dead and Mr. Wallace does not. We can quite understand Mr. Spurr's position, though we could never occupy it; but to comprehend the New Theology doctrine of the Resurrection is absolutely impossible. The body of Jesus never left the tomb; and yet in some mysterious manner Jesus convinced his disciples that he was still alive; and it is upon that conviction, so produced, that the whole fabric of Christianity rests. Each of these ministers prides himself upon having within him the Holy Ghost, whose mission is to lead them into all truth concerning Christ; and yet there is a fundamental difference between them on so all-important a subject as the Resurrection of their Lord. Despite all this, the marvel of marvels is that there are people wicked enough not to be Christians.

The Rev. J. Phillip Rogers is an exceedingly knowing gentleman. He is able to tell us that "the whole material universe is brought into being, and prepared through countless ages, in order that it may be the habitation of man." This is an item of knowledge which the greatest scientist living does not possess, and we should very much like to be told when, where, and how Mr. Rogers acquired it. The reverend gentleman has made another startling discovery, namely, that the man for whose comfort the whole material universe was brought into being and so carefully prepared, "has a body, but is a spirit." Again, we ask him for his authority. What is a spirit? Has Mr. Rogers ever seen one? But the reverend gentleman's amazing store of rare knowledge is not exhausted yet. He is evidently exceptionally intimate with God and the animals, as well as with man. He informs us that "there is a kinship of being between God and man which does not exist between God and the brute creation." This is rather rough on the poor animals, and looks so utterly unfair that we must request the preacher to give us his authority, and inform him that until he does so we shall regard him as a barefaced quack, whose object is to bamboozle the public.

Mr. Harold Begbie, who has been busy of late making an exhibition of himself in a number of small volumes, perpetrates the following in his most recent effusion:—

> "Religion must sweep out of Parliament the wasteful, discredited, and now nearly exhausted system of party faction. She must organise the constituencies and send up to Parliament men whose one object is to realise in the national life those central facts of the Christian revelation, God's Fatherhood and Man's Brotherhood. She must not ask a man whether he is a member of the Carlton Club or the Reform Club; she must challenge him to say whether he believes the teaching of Christ. And when she has won the constituencies, as she could do at the first assault, she must go up and down the land, without cessation, proclaiming the existence of God and the peril of a life lived contrary to the Will of God. She must prepare a Christian nation for a Christian Parliament."

That is all! All candidates for Parliament, and we presume elsewhere, are to be asked, "Do you believe in Christ?" None but Christians need apply. Lord Morley, John Burns, and Mr. J. M. Robertson, not to mention others, must be pushed out. What a happy place England would be if men like Mr. Harold Begbie really had their way. That is, if Mr. Begbie really means what he writes. The probability is that he has not even troubled to think out what it means. He just writes it. And so long as such writing pays there will be no falling off in the supply.

"J. B.," of the Christian World, says that "there is neither priest nor sacerdotalism in the New Testament." As everybody knows, priest is but a contracted form of the Greek presbuteros and the Latin presbyter; and naturally priesthood simply means the office and character of a priest. It is unfortunate, however, that in the Authorised Version of the New Testament presbuteros is translated into elder, though elder is, etymologically, its English equivalent. In Acts xi. 30; xvi. 4; 1 Tim. iv. 14; v. 1, 17; Titus i. 1; 1 Peter v. 1-5; James v. 14; 2 John i. 1; 3 John i. 1, and numerous other passages that might be cited, where in English we have elder or elders, in the original it is presbuteros, or presbuteroi. Sacerdotalism, again, signifies the system or order of the priesthood, sacerdos being the usual Latin word for priest.

A truce to etymology. "J. B." will retort by claiming that he only intended to affirm that the Catholic and Anglican conception of priest and sacerdotalism is not found in the New Testament. But even on this point he is clearly wrong. The priestly and sacerdotal idea is in the New Testament with a vengeance. A preacher, according to Paul, is a specially appointed officer who mediates between God and mankind. The Gospel, that apostle tells us, is God's power to save the lost; but an essential condition of salvation is that the saving message must be heard and believed. To be heard it must be preached. For some unknown reason God cannot preach it himself; therefore he must have a vicar or vicegerent who will preach it for him. Is not this the essence of priesthood and sacerdotalism? We recommend "J. B." to read carefully and inwardly digest Romans x. 3-15.

The Rev. Pulford Williams, B.A., of the Willesden Presbyterian Church, finds fault with Theosophy because it has no place for divine forgiveness. The funny thing is that just before blaming it for that omission, he had bestowed praise upon it for its doctrine of the Karma. "Karma," he said, "is an immutable law of Nature; it relates cause and effect in the actions of men. In the New Testament language, it asserts, "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." It seems never to have occurred to this man of God that Karma flatly contradicts the Gospel of forgiveness. If forgiveness means anything at all, it teaches that a forgiven sinner shall not reap what he has sown. His sins are remitted, the laws of cause and effect in his case set it aside, his evil past is blotted out, like a cloud from a morning sky; and though his repentance be delayed till the very last hour of a long and entirely bad life, he is assured of a free entrance into the bliss of Paradise straight away. This is the most detestable and damnable doctrine ever heard of; but it constitutes the very essence of Christianity. We will have none of it.

A number of more or less silly letters have been published in the Daily Telegraph on the subject of "Is London Pagan?" As usual, Christians are having a good innings, but nothing of any consequence appears on the other side. Those who say that London is Pagan, and those who say it isn't, are equally defenders of religion—mostly of the Christian variety. There is, in fact, a general expression of regret that London is not more Christian than it is. Now, we can hardly believe that this absence of letters from those who are Pagans—to use the Telegraph's own descriptive term—and who are proud of it, is due to their not having contributed to the correspondence. In fact, we know it is not. The correspondence is, as usual, carefully edited, and the letters selected so that the readers of the paper will get the impression that if London is losing its religion this is a thing greatly to be regretted, but that, after all, there is no clear proof that such is really the case. The correspondence is, in brief, as hollow as it is intellectually inept. The outstanding characteristic is the poverty of the religious intelligence.

The correspondence, useful enough if it were only sanely conducted and pursued, took its origin in an interview with a returned missionary. After twenty-three years' absence, this gentleman returned to find that "the Londoner has ceased to read his Bible," and that London "has become frankly a pagan city." On this the Daily Telegraph wrote a leading article in its most flatulent manner, and opened its columns to letters, and interviewed parsons and others. Of course, the parsons could not agree that London was non-Christian. To admit that would argue little for the effectiveness of their work. Rev. Richard Free offered two striking proofs of how religious London still was. He was preaching in the East End, and someone came along and attacked him for believing in God. The audience "confounded" the intruder by saying "Mr. Free is quite right. There is a God and we believe in 'im. You shut up." After that brilliant episode, no further proof was needed; but Mr. Free piles Pelion on Ossa by telling how, when he was passing some young men playing a lively tune on concertinas, so soon as they caught sight of him changed the tune to "There is a happy land." Sarcasm is evidently wasted on Mr. Free. Rev. J. T. Philips does not believe that there is a lack of interest in the Bible among "thoughtful men," but when a boy comes home from school and says, "Please, my teacher says the incarnation of our Lord is a debatable question," it is not surprising the Bible is not where it was. Mr. Philips probably thinks the incarnation beyond controversy.

Some of the clergy cited the largely attended Good Friday meetings as proof that London was not Pagan. This was very neatly capped by a correspondent who gave the Good Friday admissions at a few football grounds. These were:—

Chelsea'.....	70,000	West Ham ...	15,000
Tottenham ...	33,000	Watford	6,000
Clapton	13,000	Brentford	6,000

It should be added that these paid for admission.

Mr. Forbes Robertson, interviewed, said that in his opinion Atheism was not spreading. This opinion was endorsed by Rev. Watts-Ditchfield, who said that there "was decidedly less Atheism of the theoretical character than there was some years ago. The great mass of working men are not Atheistic." We really are at a loss to know on what ground Mr. Forbes Robertson asserts that Atheism is not spreading. We are not aware that he has any means of telling whether it is so or not. Playing in The Passing of the Third Floor Back hardly gives one the right to express opinions on the subject. The statement of Mr. Watts-Ditchfield that there is less Atheism now than some years ago is simply not true. Atheism was never so prevalent as it is to-day, and we really have much better means of knowing this than either parsons or actors. That the mass of working men are not atheistic may be true; but we are not aware that they ever were. Atheists have always been in the minority, and are so still. And to both Mr. Forbes Robertson and others we would recall the words of Coleridge: "Little do these men know what Atheism is. Not one man in a thousand has either strength of mind or goodness of heart to be an Atheist. I repeat it. Not one man in ten thousand either has goodness of heart or strength of mind to be an Atheist."

The International Sunday School Lesson for to-day is exceedingly savory. It is found in Genesis xxvii. 22-34, and is entitled "Jacob and Esau." Judging by the expositions of it which have appeared in various religious journals, it is clear that the scholars will be instructed to regard Jacob and Esau as wholly historical characters. Even the violent struggle between the two prior to their birth is treated as a literal incident. It is well known that many Christian scholars look upon Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob as eponymous names; that is, names of tribes rather than individuals; and most of the incidents related are depicted as mere traditions, or legends. On the supposition that the story of Jacob and Esau is true, what a sad picture it presents of Hebrew family life in primitive times, and also of the strange relation that existed between Jehovah and his people. Not one of the characters alluded to is worthy of imitation; and, on the whole, most readers would prefer the frank, straightforward, and generous, though profane, Esau to the very pious but deceitful Jacob of the narrative.

The Bible teems with contradictions. Here is one: "I know that the way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps" (Jer. x. 23); "A good man shall be satisfied from himself" (Prov. xiv. 14). The one verse gives the lie direct to the other; and both cannot possibly be true. And yet no man of God will admit that there is any discrepancy between them at all. As a matter of fact, when a clergyman's attention is drawn to them, he will instantly say, "Is this a contradiction? On the contrary, we have here the two halves of a whole truth." Now, join these so-called two halves, and tell us what the whole truth is. No sane man can do it. But, says the preacher, if you only read the second verse properly—"A good man's way is from himself"—you will see how beautifully it harmonises with the first. "A good man. Now, the Master says, 'There is none good but one, that is God.' Then if a man is good, it is God who has made him so. The root meaning of 'good' is 'God.' A good man is God's man." How easily and beautifully the trick is done. Who will dare hint, after this, that there are contradictions in the Bible? Why, they exist alone in the uninstructed and unillumined imagination of wicked Atheists!

Some excellent stories are told of the late Father Stanton, who died last week after fifty years' service at St. Alban's, Holborn. He was an advanced Ritualist and had no sympathy with milk-and-water Christianity. A visitor to his church once complained of the stink of the incense. "I am sorry," said Stanton, "there will be only two stinks in the next world—incense and brimstone—and you must choose between them." Once, a bishop said "I don't like your incense, Father." "I regret that, my lord," replied Stanton, "it's the best I can get and costs 3s. 6d. a pound."

Amongst the recent wills of departed servants of the Lord we notice that of the Rev. W. West, London, who only held starvation at bay with a reserve of £5,650, and the Rev. R. S. Blacker, Northampton, better protected with £25,773. Canon Greenside, Carnforth, Lancs., ran this Mr. Blacker very close with £25,059, while the Rev. H. M. West, Wokingham, came in an easy first with £60,859.

The Rev. F. Dormer Pierce, the Vicar of Southend-on-Sea, speaking at the Easter vestry meeting, said he hoped that the church debt could be cleared without using "squalid methods of mendicity." One cannot call the clergy absent minded beggars.

Referring to the correspondence in the Daily Telegraph on "Is London Pagan?" the Record, the organ of the Evangelical party, says, "It is not the first time that this great journal has rendered distinct service to the cause of faith." Probably Lord Burnham does not wish to hear the sentence, "Burn 'em," when he goes to another place.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £86 12s. 4d. Received since :—A. D. Corrick, £1; William Stevens, £1 1s.; Blackheath, 5s.; J. Roeckel, £1 1s.; A. E. Maddock, £5; H. C. B., 6s.; S. C. Cudmore (Brazil), £1; P. H. F. Vincent, 5s.; J. Palphreyman, 5s.

WILLIAM STEVENS.—Thanks for good wishes. We want them just at present.

A. D. CORRICK, subscribing to the President's Honorarium Fund, writes: "Any hint or rumor that you are ill gives me a personal shock. Personal because it was principally through you I gained my mental emancipation; and also because I realise your priceless value to the Freethought movement..... Many congratulations on your English Review article. I am looking forward to your book on Shakespeare. I sincerely trust the circulation of the Freethinker is increasing."

S. G. BEARDELL.—Thanks for cutting, which has been utilised. Far from "boring" us, correspondents who send serviceable items of local news render valuable assistance in our work.

H. R. WRIGHT.—The entrants for the examinations are confined to members of the N. S. S. The matter is under consideration, and each candidate will be communicated with as early as possible giving the course of reading recommended.

SPICER.—The words "as might be expected" refer solely to Carlile. We do not discuss Socialism or other politico-social theories in the Freethinker. Our work is a crusade against superstition—including the superstition that superstition is dead. We regret we cannot recommend a book dealing with "sex problems" as you desire.

A. E. MADDOCK (Ceylon), subscribing to the President's Honorarium Fund, says: "I hope the Fund will meet with fuller support this year than it did last. Anyhow, the distant and widely scattered addresses of some of its supporters show how widespread is the sympathy with the Freethought movement as represented by the N. S. S. and with yourself as its leader."

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

T. H. ELSTON.—Pleased to have your very sympathetic and encouraging letter.

J. PARTRIDGE.—The Birmingham Branch's unanimous vote of sympathy is very welcome.

F. T. JONES.—Much obliged for the suggestions in your letter, which will receive our careful consideration. Pleased to hear that during the past year you have secured seven new readers and induced eleven friends to attend lectures. Such practical help as this is of the utmost value to the movement.

A. DAVIS.—Have handed your letter to the person you refer to. Doubtless he will write to you.

J. TOMKINS.—Thanks for cuttings.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Personal.

MY recent illness was almost as bad as it could be, and once or twice I wondered whether my work in the world for "the noblest of causes" (as George Meredith called it) was over. Happily that was not the writing of "the Moving Finger." My naturally strong constitution, with the aid of a sound doctor, asserted itself again to good purpose. I turned the corner, as Burns told the Scottish clergy he would, when they said the Devil was after him, and escaped. One can joke about it afterwards, but it was no joke then. I felt the truth of my doctor's verdict; I was dreadfully run down, for I had been overworked, and to some extent overworried, for a considerable time. I must heed that warning when I am once more myself. Meanwhile I must recover my strength to a great extent at home before I can go further afield. I sleep badly anywhere, but better in my own house than in any other; and hotels and lodging-houses at this time of the year, and in unpropitious weather, are sad resting-places for a sensitive invalid. My old friend, Mr. J. W. de Caux, says "Come to us at Yarmouth, and drink in our life-giving breezes." He means it; he is as hospitable (to me, at any rate) as his body is broad and his heart is big. I have no mistrust of him, but I have of the Yarmouth breezes at this time of the year. There is too much "east" in them for my taste and requirements. In the summer, I grant you, Yarmouth air takes a lot of beating.

I was cheered on Sunday by a visit from Miss Vance. She came to talk over some matters of imperative business. But not for that only. She wanted to satisfy herself that I was really mending. I found her visit a tonic. There are few women like her, and not many men. Her coming added light to a sunshiny day.

I have again to thank Mr. Cohen for occupying the editorial chair in my absence, and Mr. Lloyd and "Mimnermus" for continued assistance.

G. W. FOOTE.

Sugar Plums.

We hope that London Freethinkers—particularly those living in the East End—will do their best to make the present course of lectures at the Stratford Town Hall a complete success. The meetings are well advertised, but the best of all advertising is that which takes the shape of Freethinkers bringing along those who have never been in the habit of attending such meetings. Stratford Town Hall is easy of access; tram and 'bus both passing the door. Mr. Cohen opens the course on Sunday evening (April 6) and will be followed by Mr. Lloyd and Miss Kough. Admission is free, but there will be the usual collection. The chair will be taken at each meeting at 7.30.

We trust that N. S. S. Branches are making preparations to secure a good representation at the Whit-Sunday Conference. There are many reasons why a special effort should be made this year to secure a good gathering of delegates, and those who wish to combine pleasure with business might easily find a worse place than London at Whitsuntide. The business meetings will take place at the Clavier Hall, Princes-street, Regent-street. The evening (public) meeting will be held in the Queen's (Minor) Hall. Other arrangements in connection with the Conference will be announced later.

We are asked to state that the Partridge Testimonial Fund will close on Sunday, April 20. Those desirous of subscribing will oblige by kindly sending in before that date to Mrs. Annie Bolt, 68 Brougham-street, Lozells, Birmingham.

The Truthseeker (New York) of March 15, contains a reprint, with acknowledgment, of "Mimnermus's" article on "A Pioneer Schoolmaster," contributed to our columns.

Some 268,486 persons of British origin left this country during 1912, the larger part of this total coming under the head of emigrants. And one may safely assume that these emigrants include some of the best types of our industrial population. Indeed, emigration agencies assure us that only the better types are desired or sent. The idle, the drunken, the wastrel classes are left behind to recruit the home population. It is impossible that the full danger of this should not be seen by people at the head of affairs, and it is significant that little or nothing is said concerning it. Anyway, a country that goes on year after year denuding itself of the most desirable portion of its industrial population is really committing political suicide.

Mr. Yoshio Markino and the Missionaries.—III.

"My own conviction, and that of many impartial and more experienced observers of Japanese life, is that Japan has nothing whatever to gain by conversion to Christianity, either morally or otherwise, but very much to lose."—LAFCADIO HEARN, Glimpses of Unfamiliar Japan, Preface.

"This question of missionaries is a delicate one. The most sensitive feelings of a large number of people in England and America are so liable to be hurt. I have seen the subject gag the mouths of diplomats, politicians, prominent army officers, and in all manner of high official positions. If the sympathisers and supporters of missionaries in America were not such a strong body as they are, some leading American politicians and diplomats I have met would not be afraid to ventilate the sentiments which I know they entertain on this subject. It is curiously interesting what different opinions you hear expressed in private by sensible men throughout the East compared with those which appear in any of their public utterances, printed or otherwise."—GEORGE LYNCH, The War of the Civilisations, 1901, pp. 254 4.

THERE are many different Christian missions in Japan—Methodist, Presbyterian, Episcopalian, and many others—and Markino tells us "They were all mocking, fighting, and attacking each other. They often told us, the schoolboys, about some bad thing of their own brothers and sisters in the different sects. It was simply sickening."*

Then, in money matters, their behavior was still worse. For instance, a rickshaw ride, for which Japanese gentlemen paid 15 to 20 sens, and even the poor schoolboys paid 12 sens,—

"those missionaries always engaged rickshas without settling the payment, and when they got off they paid only 10 sens, and banged the door and went into their house. The ricksha men shouted 'Tarimasen, Tarimasen!' (Not enough, not enough!) They would knock the door. The missionaries never took any notice of that. I often heard some rough ricksha men shouting, 'O you Hon. Foreign thieves! Fancy you treat us like this, and then on Sundays you preach with crying voices in the Church! Who would believe you, the Hypocrites?'"†

Markino says it was unbearable for him to listen to, and he several times begged the missionaries to pay the proper fare, but it was quite hopeless. The only reply he got was "You too noisy."

Then the head missionary imported a wife from America. Now, the Japanese consider it very vulgar and rude for married people to display their affection in public. They are much more particular in these matters than the Western nations are. But the average missionary knows nothing of the manners and customs of the people he comes to teach, and Markino observes of the missionary and his wife:—

"Their awfully sticky behavior was too irritable to Japanese eyes. During the lesson hours in the classrooms the wife was always sitting on her husband's lap, and they embraced each other and were kissing all the time, so busy to kiss that the teacher could not answer to the questions by the students. Some schoolboys were very indignant They said, 'It is beyond the words. They must be thinking us, the Japanese, no more than cats or dogs, because before the humans they ought not to show such behavior.' Most of them began to strike, and left the school altogether.

"I said, 'Let them think we are cats and dogs if they like. At the present moment I myself find no other way to study the English lessons, so I shall persevere.'"‡

At last the missionary told them that he was going to close the school, as he came to Japan only to preach, and he could not find time to teach English. "That," says Markino, "was the end of everything, and I had to go back and join to my father and brother in a deep mountainous village" quite out of the world. But in two months' time he had a letter from Mr. Iinuma to say that they had decided to reopen the school, and Markino returned.

The missionary required a copy of his "preaching-book" in Japanese. It was a book of about ninety pages, and he suggested that Markino should do it for a few sens, and he wanted it done within a week. Says Markino:—

"I thought a whole week lessons were far more valuable than a few sens. But I could not refuse because my head was quite Japanese then, and I thought I must be very loyal to my Hon. teacher. Yet I could not waste a whole week. Therefore I decided to get rid of it in a night. I started my work at five or six in the evening, and I tried to write as quick as possible for all night. The whole book was done by eight o'clock next morning."

Mr. Iinuma was amazed, and said: "'My dear child, you must not kill yourself.' He took that book to the missionary. The missionary said quite thoughtlessly and heartlessly. 'If Markino could work so quickly, let him do more copies.'" But Iinuma was very indignant, and explained what the boy had done, saving him from another task. Notice, too, the unconscious irony of that line, "I could not refuse because my head was quite Japanese then." What have the Japanese to gain from Western teaching?

A few months later they received the good news that some more American teachers were arriving. "But," says Markino, "those new American teachers were disappointing, for they were quite uneducated, ignorant people, as usual" (p. 117). They did not understand the books they had to teach from, and were the laughing-stock of the young Japanese.

Markino says that he always had a great objection to the prayer-meetings. He argued that if God is Almighty, he ought to know our wishes before we express them.

"Then why," he asks, "should we waste our precious time for such prayer-meetings so often? Nay, not only wasting time, but I found out most grievous fact in the prayer-meetings. Those so-called earnest Christians secluded themselves in the churches, and began to leak out loudly all their own private troubles. They started with these words, 'O Almighty God,' etc., etc., in their crying voices. But in fact they were not praying to God, but only to buy others' sympathies. Indeed, I heard more than once some of them talking thus, 'Did you hear Mr. So-and-so's prayers to-night? He must be suffering very much. Let us help him.'

"I said, 'Certainly not. He was praying to God only. That was all. If he needs our help he ought to come to us and beg our help.' How coward! How hypocrite! I was awfully angry. Our beautiful 'Bushido' teaches us to persevere all difficulties in silence. And now this Christian prayer-meeting was giving terrible injury to Bushido. I exclaimed, 'Surely the prayer-meeting will make our nation into weak-minded hypocrites who don't know the word 'shame.'"*

The missionaries also enjoined them never to touch alcohol or spend money on Sundays. But Markino discovered that they did not observe these rules themselves.

To these hypocricies must be added the vice of cowardice. For when the first shock of the great earthquake of October, 1891, occurred, a native Japanese teacher was reading the Lord's Prayer to the kneeling congregation; but he calmly continued, although the walls were falling. A young friend of Markino's, hearing someone moving about, lifted his head in time to see the cowardly missionary sneaking out, and leaving his flock to perish! Mr. Iinuma forbade him to repeat it for fear of bringing trouble upon the mission from the outside world.

What a different picture from that of the heroic martyrs, braving hardships, privations, danger, and death, we hear so much about at missionary meetings and in missionary magazines! Mr. Markino's revelations fully bear out the statement made by Sir Henry Norman in his Peoples and Politics of the Far East (1900), who says the Protestant missionary,

"in a majority of cases, looks upon his work as a career like another; he proposes to devote a certain amount of his life to it, and then to return home with the halo of the Christian pioneer. He has, in most cases, his comfortable house, his wife, his children, his servants, and his foreign food; and it is even stated that his stipend increases with each addition to his family.....He is jealous of his Protestant rivals, between whom and himself there is a perpetual warfare of pious intrigue to secure converts. So far as education goes, both men and women among Protestant missionaries are often quite unfitted even to teach at home, where there would be little danger of serious misunderstanding; in their present sphere of work they are often not too hardly described by the phrase which has been applied to them, 'ignorant declaimers in bad Chinese.'" (Pp. 305-6.)

Mr. Markino's strictures on the Christian religion are "frequent and free." He does not mince matters. When the missionaries explained to him the parable of the Rock of Ages, "where one woman is climbing up the Cross of Rock, while her sister was washed away by the waves, simply because the former had faith while the latter had not," he says:—

"It sounded to me awfully selfish religion. For the Christianity is always persuading you to individual salvation. That is to say, you must save your soul, notwithstanding about your parents' or children's or wife's and husband's souls at all. It naturally sounds very selfish to the Japanese, whose heart is far too mutual to accept it.....The (Japanese) tradition says some filial son was sent to the Paradise after his death. He was eagerly searching his own mother there. But he was told that his mother was so wicked, and therefore she was sent to the Hell. He preferred the Hell with his mother than to stay in Paradise alone, and he went into the Hell. Such is the ordinary Japanese idea. To my childish mind, the Rock of Ages was simply shocking. I believe it was not only myself alone, but there were many Japanese who shrugged their shoulders about this parable. I believe this spirit makes us so patriotic." *

And so, he tells us,—

"I could not become a Christian at all. For I am keeping myself most sincere to my own conscience, which forbids me to call myself a Christian. I may be able to deceive my neighbors if I want to, but I cannot deceive my own conscience."

And, as he further remarks, Europe has been Christian such a long time that Christianity and reverence for the Bible has become an instinct with Europeans, it is bred into their flesh and bones. But to him who had never heard of the Bible until he went to the missionary school, it was different. He says:—

"The Bible to me is no more than Byron is to you. You cannot stop me putting many 'why's' to every page of the Bible. For it seems to me so many unnatural, illogical, and impossible things are written in it—especially about the salvation of our soul by the blood of 'Emmanuel,' and his resurrection," etc., etc. (p. 237).

Again, he says, he has carefully observed the conduct of Christians for the last eighteen years, and he asks, who really practises the Sermon on the Mount? As he points out, "Christians modify the words of Christ conveniently to themselves." And at church, he says, he has heard the clergyman—

"trying hard to explain all those superstitious words in the Bible in a 'scientific' way, saying that those miracles were merely allegorical. I was rather amused and curious about his cleverness. But there are many of this sort of man in Japan, too" (p. 239).

Christians, he observes, derive much comfort and consolation from their belief in the Bible and in religion, and in this respect he compares religion with chloroform as an anodyne for the pains of life, but adds:—

"I must say that the chloroform called religion does not suit my conscience; therefore I shall have to go through all my life in this world without it, even if I suffer more than those religious people. I cannot be intoxicated with any religion. I am always quite sober and ready to persevere any pain with the full sense" (p. 244).

So in the end Mr. Markino abandoned all religion, Eastern and Western, too. As Lafcadio Hearn has well said—and it should be remembered that Hearn became a naturalised Japanese, married a Japanese wife, and lived in Japanese style:—

"Those who hope to substitute their own Western creed in the room of one which they wreck by the aid of knowledge borrowed from modern science, do not imagine that the arguments used against ancient faith can be used with equal force against the new. Unable himself to reach the higher levels of modern thought, the average missionary cannot foresee the result of his small teaching of science upon an Oriental mind naturally more powerful than his own. He is therefore astonished and shocked to discover that the more intelligent the pupil, the briefer the term of that pupil's Christianity. To destroy personal faith in a fine mind previously satisfied with Buddhist cosmogony, because innocent of science, is not extremely difficult. But to substitute, in the same mind, Western religious notions for Oriental. Presbyterian or Baptist dogmatisms for Chinese and Buddhist ethics is not possible. The psychological difficulties in the way are never recognised by our modern evangelists."*

In conclusion, Mr. Markino observes that several years' travel among other Christian nations has shown him that some among them can lie and deceive no less than Orientals. Upon which he remarks, "I have come to the decisive conclusion that the honesty of the Anglo-Saxon race is not the merit of the Christianity, but it is the merit of their own race itself"; and concludes:—

"Suppose if the Christianity had not invaded into England, and suppose the Buddhism or any other religion had been in England for all those long ages, I feel quite confident that the Britons' simpleness, sincerity, and honesty would remain exactly the same to-day."†

We recommend Mr. Markino's book to all those who are in the habit of supporting Christian missions.

Richard Carlile.—III.

Later in life Carlile degenerated into a kind of Swedenborgian mysticism. Not, indeed, that he discarded his Atheism; he was virtually an Atheist to the last; but he chose to veil it under a delusive nomenclature, and to employ, to express his own Naturalism, the very supernatural terms he had previously discarded. He professed to have discovered "that the names of the Old Testament, either apparently of persons or places, are not such names as the religious mistakes have constructed, but names of states of mind manifested in the human race, and that, in this sense, the Bible may be scientifically read as a treatise on spirit, soul, or mind, and not as a history of time, people, and place." In editing the Christian Warrior he professed himself a Christian, defining the appellation as "a man purged from error." His conduct scandalised his friends, who deplored his seeming departure from the old, clear ways, and when he proceeded so far as to take out his diploma as a preacher, their indignation and sorrow knew no bounds. Carlile, however, was not to be deterred from pursuing his own independent course; the same sturdy spirit which impelled him to resist the minions of power in former days induced him now to disregard the adverse representations and reproaches of his friends. And beneath his mystical phraseology there were undoubtedly concealed truths of vast importance. The following passage, for instance, is pregnant with meaning: "Science, thrown into the Church as a substitute for superstition in the education of the people, begins at once to regenerate the people, the institutions, and the throne. It is the substitution of the known for the unknown, the real for the unreal, the certain for the uncertain. Religion is the erroneous mind's chief direction. It must be corrected by and through the medium which it most respects. It rejects all other opposing conditions, and increases its tenacity for its errors. To reform religion by science is to regenerate fallen man, and to save a sinking country." In this passage he seems to have been straining after some positive conceptions as substitutes for the old negative notions of Freethought, and dimly to perceive that every system claiming human adherence and aiming at extensive, permanent success must satisfy the natural emotions of the human heart, and direct them to some ultimate purpose capable of being apprehended and aspired to.

It is a mistake to suppose that Carlile ever really departed from the Atheism of his maturity. Thirteen days before his death he penned these words: "The enemy with whom I have to grapple is one with whom no peace can be made. Idolatry will not parley; superstition will not treat on covenant. They must be uprooted for public and individual safety." Neither is there any truth in the story of his recantation. He lost his power of speaking long before the near approach of death. The story is simply incredible, and could only have proceeded from the inventive charity of some over-zealous religionist.

"Carlile's habits," writes Mr. Holyoake, who can here speak with authority, "were marked by great abstemiousness. Seldom taking animal food, he refused wine when offered a dozen at Dorchester Gaol, preferring good milk. He was morally as well as physically particular. In the rules of the Deistical Society he provided that only persons of good character should be eligible. 'It is important to you Republicans,' wrote he from Dorchester Gaol, 'that, however humble the advocates of your principles may be, they should exhibit a clear, moral character to the world.' He never sold a copy of any work which he would hesitate to read to his children. He expressed a hope, when fairs were popular, that fairs would be put down all over the country. He was one of the first thus to oppose what the pious then approved." His large charity also was conspicuous. He would assist even a struggling and unfortunate foe, and stand by his friends to the last. When George Jacob Holyoake was tried at Gloucester, Carlile sat by his side for fourteen hours, and handed him notes for his guidance. After Mr. Holyoake's conviction, Carlile brought him the first provisions with his own hand. As a speaker, he was direct and perspicuous. Generally he was not eloquent, but occasionally he was as eloquent as the best speakers. Bold as a lion in fight, he quailed before a public audience, and only after long practice was he able to conquer his diffidence. At first his friends believed he never would make a speaker, but by dint of patient cultivation he contrived to falsify their unfavorable predictions.

A few words will be necessary respecting Carlile's domestic relations, and the publication of his Every Woman's Book. A tract issued by the Bible Institute charged him with having "exhibited his harlot on the public platform during the lifetime of his wife," and with "having made proposals concerning the thinning of the population, the most beastly that ever polluted paper." These charges, preferred before a public ignorant of Carlile's life and character, are calculated to mislead, as probably the malignant libeller who penned the tract well knew; but they are entirely groundless, and fall away before an impartial examination. Already we have alluded to the disparity of temper between Carlile and his wife. "Their difference in education, in age, in intellectual aspiration, and their opponency in disposition, early converted their union into an intimacy tolerated rather than prized." In 1819 their separation was arranged, but it did not actually take place till 1832, because until then an independent provision for Mrs. Carlile could not be made. They parted in 1832 with mutual consent, and, besides the separate maintenance for the wife, she took with her all the household furniture and £100 worth of books. Afterwards Carlile allied himself with a lady by whom he had two children, and doubtless would have married her if the holy laws of England had permitted him to do so by granting a divorce from his first wife. But the law refused, and still refuses, to grant a divorce on any ground except adultery; and Carlile very properly observed his own counsel without a legal sanction. He was not the man to desert his wife, but when they mutually desired separation he was just the man to burst through the cobwebs of ecclesiastico-political restraint, and even to defy worldly conventionalities. Herein he has the approval of one of the sternest moralists of any age or country—John Milton; who in his tractate on divorce censures the legislators who impose marriage bonds upon mutually rebellious souls, and pronounces the union unholy and desecrate when unsanctified by love. The legislation of England is not yet level with this teaching, which is two centuries old. The reader will now be in a position to estimate aright the accusation urged against Carlile by Christian scribes who are everlastingly maligning our sacred dead in order to bolster up their own creed.

The other charge concerning "beastly proposals" is equally groundless. It refers to Carlile's Every Woman's Book, which is a plain statement of his opinions on "the all-important question of population." He believed in Malthus's law of population, which, as Professor Huxley observes, has never been and never will be disproved; and he was anxious to induce his fellow men to adopt means to prevent the bringing of redundant children into life, so as to obviate the slaughter of them afterwards by nature's positive checks on numerical increase. Possessing the courage of his convictions, he set forth his views in print, and described preventive human checks on the growth of families. His intent was humane and pure, and, even if he were erroneous, he could not deserve to be stigmatised as immoral or beastly. He had as much moral right to publish his book as Dr. Acton had to publish a work on Prostitution, or Dr. Bull his Hints to Mothers. Dr. Acton and Dr. Bull were justified by the fact of their being physical physicians; and Richard Carlile was justified by being a moral physician. He had earned the right, by his courage on behalf of righteous causes, to address the public on any question he chose.

"Carlile's death," writes Mr. Holyoake, "took place on this wise. He had come up from Enfield to Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, to live on the field of war, and edit the Christian Warrior. While a van of goods was unpacking at the door, one of his boys strayed out and went away. Carlile was fond of his children, and he set out anxiously to seek his child. The excitement ended in death. On Carlile's return he was seized with a fatal illness. Bronchitis, which he was told by his medical advisers would soon destroy him if he came to live in the city, set in, and the power of speech soon left him. Dr. Lawrence, the author of the famous Lectures on Man, whom Carlile always preferred in his illness, was sent for. He promptly arrived, but pronounced recovery hopeless; and Richard Carlile expired February 10th, 1843, in his fifty-third year.

"Wishing to be useful in death as well as in life, Carlile devoted his body to dissection. Always above superstition, in practice as well as in theory, his wish had long been that his body, if he died first, should be given to Dr. Lawrence. At that time the prejudice against dissection was almost universal, and only superior persons rose above it. His wish was complied with by his family, and the post-mortem examination was published in the Lancet of that year.

"Carlile's burial took place at Kensal Green Cemetery. He was laid in the consecrated part of the ground, nearly opposite the Mausoleum of the Ducrow family. At the interment a clergyman appeared, and, with the usual want of feeling and delicacy, persisted in reading the Church Service over him. His eldest son, Richard, who represented his sentiments as well as his name, very properly protested against the proceeding as an outrage upon the principles of his father and the wishes of the family. Of course, the remonstrance was disregarded, and Richard, his brothers, and their friends left the ground. The clergyman then proceeded to call Carlile 'his dear departed brother,' and to declare that he 'had died in the sure and certain hope of a glorious resurrection.'

"Carlile left six children—Richard, Alfred, and Thomas Paine, by his wife, Mrs. Jane Carlile; and Julian, Theophila, and Hypatia, by 'Isis,' the lady to whom he united himself after his separation from his wife. Mrs. Carlile survived him only four months. She died in the same house and was buried in the same grave."

Thus ended the life of this sturdy warrior for freedom of thought and speech. It cannot, of course, be pretended that Richard Carlile was a man of great genius, or that his writings are destined to survive; neither can we admit, with Mr. Holyoake, that such workers as journalists, orators, and politicians, who popularise ideas and principles, confer greater good on mankind and more powerfully promote progress, than the great creative minds; for if those minds did not originate ideas it is certain that the writers and speakers of smaller calibre could not popularise them. But this, at least, may be claimed for Carlile, that he spent one-fourth of his mature life in prison as the consequence of his manly persistence in the course of conduct which his conscience approved; that he never once flinched from danger, never temporised with the oppressor, never once looked back after putting his hand to the plough. There was no contemporary publicist who wrote so boldly as he, no one who shrank less from the freest expression of principles the most extreme. The example he set is worthy of emulation; and his courage and endurance, while they give fresh ardor to the wavering, ought also to shame those who are persuaded that superstitions abound, and yet will lift no finger to remove them, who perceive a great work of reformation to be performed, and yet never bestir themselves in any degree to assist it. When Carlile wrote and spoke and struggled he stood face to face with an almost implacable enemy that gave no quarter, showed no mercy. The blows of oppression rained upon his devoted head at every step of his march, and the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune constantly assailed him; but he never quailed before any danger, nor was deterred by any difficulty. His life of incessant warfare deprived him of the sense of literary taste, and occasionally he was guilty of a violence of expression which would be deemed unjustifiable by the present generation. But our censure need not, therefore, be severe. As Mr. Holyoake observes, Christians who persecute with relentless zeal have no right to demand of their victims a perennial delicacy of treatment in return. If Carlile dedicated a volume of the Republican to Castlereagh, "who did that for himself which millions wished some honest man would do for him—cut his throat," that statesman had given good cause for public execration. If he dated in the era of "the carpenter's wife's son," the professors of Christianity had done their best to induce in his mind the utmost contempt and hatred of their creed. Society has no right to require soft speech of a man whom it loses no opportunity to ill-use.

At the time when monuments are impartially reared to celebrate public benefactors one will be apportioned to Richard Carlile. The work he achieved for Freethought was impossible of accomplishment by any other man; no other possessed at once so dogged a courage and so clear a conception of principle. "I have accomplished," wrote he just before his death, "the liberty of the press in England, and oral discussion is now free. Nothing remains to be reformed but the ignorance and vices of the people, whose ignorance cannot be removed while their bodies are starved, and their Church remains a theatre of idolatry and superstition." These words both express his own achievement and indicate the reformatory method of those who were to follow him. Theirs is the task to spread knowledge, to uproot error, to destroy superstition, to feed men's bodies before canting about their souls; his was to prepare the field for such labors, to remove obstacles, to make straight and plain the paths. While we do battle with the noxious evils of society to-day without oppressive sense of personal danger, let us now and then remember the pioneers who went before, who toiled weary and footsore where we now travel so easily, who bore the first shattering brunt of war, and left for us the defeat of an already half-conquered foe.

PROVIDENCE.

"It will be a surprising dispensation of Providence," says State Secretary Burke to the Governor of Ohio, "if there are not 10,000 dead." Mr. Burke is referring to the awful storm and floods in the United States, and is evidently under the impression that "Providence" will be easily satisfied if content with less than 10,000 corpses. We can make nothing else out of the statement. If there is a Providence, it must be responsible for the death of the 10,000; or if Providence is to be thanked for saving people after the 10,000 mark is reached, one would like to know what is to be said of the long array of corpses that were necessary for it to wake up and get to business. If the loss of life had been due to any State official, he would probably have been lynched. As it is due to "Providence," good Christians go down on their knees and thank it for its activity.

Look at this horror in the news from flooded and fire-scourged Dayton:—

> "There are many expectant mothers among the refugees, and their condition after the horrors and privations which they have gone through is critical. No fewer than five babies have been born in the Cash Register building during the past thirty-six hours."

It is enough to make a heart of stone bleed. The worst man on earth would stop this sort of thing if he could. Yet the theologians want us to believe that the Dayton catastrophe was all planned and carried through by a powerful, wise, and good being, who is (as usual) quite proud of his handiwork.

THE BISHOP EXPLAINS.

The Bishop of London is not pleased with the papers talking about his praying over the sick girl as "The Bishop's Miracle." He explains that it was not his miracle, but God's. Moreover, he only prayed and anointed the girl after the doctor and nurse had done their part. So the performance was after all a bit mixed, and one cannot be quite certain that it was a miracle. It may only have been the drugs working. Moreover, the Bishop explains that it would not be wise to lead people to depend upon prayer and anointing as a method of cure. He explains that if children were kneeling round a sick mother, and the mother died, it might shake their faith. Quite so. What the Bishop's counsel amounts to is this: Pray over the sick and anoint with oil, but have also a doctor and a nurse. If the patient recovers, proclaim a miracle, and never mind the doctor. If the patient dies, let the doctor take the credit, and say it was not God's will that a miracle should be worked. Heads I win, tails you lose. An old game, particularly in the religious world.

The Rev. Albert Knight, vicar of Christ Church, Hunslet, who disappeared with a lady of his congregation, has been formally deposed from Holy Orders. The pursuit of frocks has led to his own unfrocking.

Mr. W. St. Chad Boscawen, writing in the March issue of the Open Court on "The Egyptian Element in the Birth Stories in the Gospels," makes some very significant admissions. Speaking with the authority of twenty years' study of the subject, the distinguished Egyptologist says, "I am convinced that not only these two Gospels (Matthew and Luke) are derived from Egypt; but the same is true of a large element in all Christian teaching." This is laying the axe at the root of the tree.

The Rev. J. Watts-Ditchfield has been unburdening his mind to a Daily Telegraph man, and he said that "an exceptionally low percentage of persons is buried without any religious ceremony." The clergy buried Darwin, Huxley, Swinburne, Burton, Buchanan, and a host of other Freethinkers; but they never convinced anybody that these men were Christians. The farcical funeral services only showed that the Christian relatives of the departed Freethinkers did not respect the dead.

A new book bears the curious title, In God's Nursery. Evidently we live in stirring times. The last "boy" must be two thousand years old by this time.

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS SOCIETY was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

W. R. PATERSON (Benjamin Swift).

The Pathology of Conversion.

THE physician whom Voltaire described as knowing a little about everything—even about medicine, might be matched by clergymen who know a little about a variety of subjects, and who sometimes know a little about religion. Unfortunately, their number is very small. What the vast majority understand by a knowledge of religion is a certain familiarity with religious formulæ and doctrines. For a knowledge of religion, such as will help one to understand its real nature, one must forsake the professional theologian altogether, and turn to those who have pursued the study of religion in exactly the same way, and by use of the same methods, as they have pursued other studies. The professional theologian, and the professed apologist for religion, doom themselves to sterility from the outset. Instead of taking religious phenomena as a part of phenomena in general, and by seeking in what way and in what manner the part can be affiliated to the whole, religion is treated as a thing apart. It may affect other departments of life but it does not belong to them. The result is, that what are called religious studies move round and round the same circle of ideas, and a revolution is mistaken for progress.

What has just been said holds with peculiar force of the subject of conversion. While not peculiarly a Christian phenomenon, it is yet one that bulks very largely in the history of Christianity; so much so, that conversion is declared by some theologians to be essential to each individual's religious maturity. The result of this has been that conversion has been emphasised as a cataclysmal epoch in the life of an individual, and professional evangelists have cultivated the art of working upon the emotions of people—quite as ignorant as themselves of the real nature of the forces at work—in order to induce a desired state of mind in relation to religious beliefs. They have spent their lives in officiating at what was a veritable debauch of unreasoning and unreasonable emotion, and subjects more fit for the hands of the physician than for anyone else have been acclaimed as striking evidence of the "workings of the spirit," and in other cases qualities of the mind that should have found a harmless and natural outlet by participation in the larger social life, have been very often injuriously misdirected into religious channels.

During recent years the phenomena of conversion has been approached from a more scientific standpoint. Statistics have been compiled and analysed, with the result that the salient features are apparent to all those who care to study the matter.* One outstanding fact of these inquiries has been to demonstrate that what is called conversion is almost exclusively a phenomenon of puberty and adolescence. In a previous article it was pointed out that on taking the period at which illumination or conversion came to well known religious characters, the ages varied between childhood and just over twenty years of age. This list might be greatly lengthened, but it would be little more than repetition. It is worth noting, however, Keim's remark, that although some of the disciples may have been married, most of them were probably about twenty years of age.* That this coincidence is neither accidental nor spasmodic, more detailed inquiries prove. Thus, Prof. Starbuck made detailed investigations in the case of some 1,300 converts. The result of a scrutiny of the figures was to show that while conversions begin to occur as early as at eight years of age, their most rapid occurrence is between twelve and sixteen, they occur less rapidly after twenty, and very rarely found after thirty. In girls, the period of conversion antedate that of boys by about two years.† Starbuck's conclusion is the perfectly valid one that conversion "belongs almost exclusively to the years between ten and twenty-five," and is a distinctly adolescent phenomenon.

These figures, it may be added, are quite borne out by an examination of the ages of converts in almost any revivalistic mission. At the conclusion of a mission by the notorious American evangelist, Dr. Torrey, in this country in 1904, the British Weekly obtained an expression of opinion from a number of ministers in the towns visited, and published the results in its issue for October 27. The ages of all the alleged converts were not given, but one may safely assume that a large proportion of those not indicated fell within the ages stated. The striking feature of the reports was the number of cases in which the youthful nature of the converts were noted. Thus, Rev. T. Towers, Birmingham, records that sixteen out of twenty-five were children. Rev. A. Le Gros, Rugby, reported "a number of our youngest members, especially amongst the young girls, were amongst those who professed conversion." Rev. H. Singleton, Smethwick, says, "the bulk of the names sent to me were children, under thirteen years of age." Rev. W. G. Percival, Lozells Congregational Church, says of the "inquiry" meeting held after the preaching, "the dear little things followed one another for inquiry until the place was a scene of utter confusion." Other reports of a similar nature came from other places. The ages were pointed out quite incidentally, it should be noted; conversions of young men and young women of seventeen or eighteen years of age would not arouse comment in the case of these observers.

Professor James quite accepts Starbuck's conclusion, but accompanies it with the question-begging comment that "Conversion is, in its essence, a normal adolescent phenomenon, incidental to the passage from the child's small universe to the wider, intellectual, and spiritual life of humanity."‡ I hope to

* The most elaborate study of this character known to the writer is Mr. G. S. Hall's Adolescence, two volumes. But the bulk of the work is terrifying to some, and its cost prohibitive to many. For the general reader the main facts are well presented in Starbuck's smaller volume, the Psychology of Religion. It should be added, that the majority of writings on this and similar aspects of religion seem to originate in America, where—apart from the question of origins—the scientific study of religion appears to move with greater freedom than with ourselves.

* Life of Jesus, vol. iii., p. 279.

† Psychology of Religion, ch. iii. Hall's figures, which agree with Starbuck's, and are based on the reports of a number of investigators, are given in the second volume of his work, pp. 288-92.

‡ Varieties of Religious Experience, p. 199.

show that conversion is only normal in the sense that in an environment where religious influences are powerful human nature is normally exposed to it. In this sense, contracting a disease may be normal during the existence of an epidemic. In reality the abnormal character of conversion is indicated by the fact that a large number of people never experience it, and also that where human nature is allowed to develop without special direction from religious sources, conversion does not occur. The truth in James' comment is its association with the passage from "the child's small universe" to the wider life of humanity, but the nature of this association is quite ignored by him, as it is by his religious guides.

Apart from statistical inquiry, the connection between adolescence and religion has been noted from the earliest time. In later times this has been taken as the most favorable time to direct human energy into religious channels because the developing social and sexual life of the individual gave opportunity for a religious interpretation of feelings very inadequately understood. But in earlier times the connection was of a more genuinely religious nature. Puberty did not mark, as a modern religionist would say, the awakening of the religious consciousness, but the direct contact of the boy and the girl with supernatural influences. The consequence is that all over the world we meet with pubic ceremonies, commencing with the most primitive savages and ending with the modern practice of confirmation.* Amongst the North American Indians, for example, the following description seems characteristic:—

> "When a boy has attained the age of fourteen or fifteen years, he absents himself from his father's lodge, lying on the ground in some remote or secluded spot, crying to the Great Spirit, and fasting the whole time. During this period of peril and abstinence, when he falls asleep, the first animal, bird, or reptile, of which he dreams, he considers the Great Spirit has designated for his mysterious protector through life."†

Much the same ceremonies are described by Livingstone as existing among the South African tribes.‡ In nearly all cases there is an enforced separation of the sexes, much more elaborate in the case of girls than that of boys—the phenomena attaching to girls being of a more terrifying description. Frazer has brought together a very lengthy list of customs of this character, and has shown that in the case of girls the main idea is to guard the rest of the tribe from what is believed to be a most malignant supernatural influence.§ Although these ceremonies centre round the fact of sexual development, it would be quite a mistake to imagine that they are mainly concerned with initiation into what are called "the mysteries of sex." The governing idea is that puberty marks the direct association of the individual with a spiritual world, to the influence of which the functional changes are due. At a later date, when rational ideas concerning the nature of these functional changes exist, other interpretations of the utilisation by religion of the period of adolescence are given. But it may safely be assumed that these later interpretations would never have been fashioned had not the primitive basis been provided. Then we hear much of the development of a consciousness of religion, of the "soul's awareness of God," and similar nonsensical phrases. All of these only serve to disguise to careless or uninformed people the fact that religious agencies seize hold of the developing social nature of each, and give a religious explanation to what is taking place. In this respect all modern religious theories are upon precisely the same level as the more primitive ones. We have the same absence of a rational explanation—in the one case because no such explanation was possible, in the other because prejudice or self-interest prevents its use. At any rate, the connection of a developing sex nature with a "quickening" of the religious consciousness can no longer be denied by those who carefully study the facts.

The following opinions are worth noting:—

> "Passing over the fact that the period of adolescence is noticeably a period of susceptibility and personal vanity, we may take as an example of the intrusion or persistence of the sexual element in conditions of a non-sexual kind the frequent association of sexual with religious excitement. The appeal made during a religious revival to the unconverted has psychologically some resemblance to the attempt of the male to overcome the hesitancy of the female.....In the effort to make a moral adjustment, it consequently turns out that a technique is used which was derived originally from sexual life, and the use, so to speak, of the sexual machinery for a moral adjustment involves, in some cases, the carrying over into the general process of some sexual manifestations."‖

Dr. Mercier is still more explicit:—

> "In connection with normal development a large body of vague and formless feeling arises, and, until experience gives it shape, the possessor remains ignorant of the source and nature of the feeling. If the circumstances are appropriate for the natural outlet and expression of the activities, they are expressed in affection, and are a source of health and strength to the possessor. But if no such outlet exists, the vague, voluminous, formless feelings are referred to an occasion that is vague, voluminous, and wanting in definite form—they are ascribed to the direct influence of the Deity, and assume a place in religious emotion."†

(To be continued.) C. COHEN.

The Christian Religion.

A FEW weeks ago we discussed the first of the Rev. Dr. Orchard's "Modern Tracts on Religion." From our point of view the second called for no comment; but the third, which appeared in the Christian Commonwealth for April 2, and was entitled "The Christian Religion," challenges the closest critical examination. The reverend gentleman starts off by making several candid admissions. One is that "the characteristic expressions" of Christianity, whether in the Catholic or in the Protestant Church, are difficult, if not impossible, to believe. It seems unreasonable to declare that a piece of bread is, or after certain words have been pronounced becomes, the body of Jesus Christ, or that a cup of wine is, or similarly becomes, his blood. It sounds incredible to assert that the man Christ Jesus is "very God of very God." Then comes the admitted difficulty of defining Christianity. Dr. Orchard says:—

> "It is the most difficult of all religions to define. After nineteen hundred years of exposition and experience we can still ask, What is Christianity? and get a variety of answers. Many efforts have been made to simplify Christianity into such statements as that it is a personal cleaving to Jesus Christ, or that it is sharing in the spirit of Christ, or that it is believing what Jesus taught about God; only to raise the objection that this is not what Christianity has been in the past. On the contrary, it will be replied, it is a great scheme of doctrine taught by the Apostles and developed by the Church."

Another admission is that "it is the most difficult religion to practise." Instead of "difficult," "impossible" would surely be the more appropriate adjective here. Many of the so-called virtues insisted upon in the Sermon on the Mount are contrary to invincible human instincts. We fail to practise them not because of "our own moral impotence," but because our humanity revolts from them. However, be the cause of the nonconformity what it may, the fact of it is beyond controversy. Says our divine:—

> "You stick at the first beatitude. And the efforts that have been made to incorporate Christianity in a > society, whether you think of the Catholic Church, the monastic system, or our modern Christian civilisation, they are nothing so much as magnificent failures."

So far as the facts are concerned we are in complete agreement with Dr. Orchard. They are facts which we ourselves have emphasised and employed evidentially times out of number. We wish to call special attention to the following pregnant extract:—

> "Here, then, is a religion to present to a man in a hurry. It staggers his reason, it presents a vast complication, both in thought and history, which it is only a further complication to attempt to simplify or reform; and there is no guarantee that it is ever going to succeed. It cannot be put into a nutshell; it cannot be stated without dragging in all the controversies the mind of man has ever started, and it stands unwittingly alone as the one great religion that has failed. Who has ever met a Christian?"

Once more we express our entire concurrence. What we have here set before us is a number of undeniable truths; but having frankly stated them Dr. Orchard immediately proceeds to set them aside as if they were of no account, and to make the usual apologetic appeal to experience. First of all he gives a wholly imaginary description of the experience of Jesus. He tells us that Jesus was in the world to do a higher will than his own, and that the consciousness of this fact constituted his religious experience; but he also informs us that the higher will "could be done by discharging the most ordinary duties and obeying the commonest impulses of life." Then why speak of it as a higher will? If "human life in time is a fitting expression of the Divine life in eternity," on what grounds can any distinction be made between them, or how does anobody know that there is "a Divine life in eternity"? Is not human life the highest known to us, and is it not true that the highest will-power is man's? On the assumption that the scene in the Garden of Gethsemane actually happened, did it not consist in a conflict between the higher and lower in Jesus himself? He believed that he had a Father in heaven whose will he was doing and to whom he prayed for strength to conquer temptation; but it is not on record that he did anything he could not have done in his own strength, or that many a man before and since has not so done. The appeal to the experience of Jesus is therefore evidentially valueless. The talk about a higher will "moving behind our own" and presenting itself for our acceptance, is the merest religious cant, and at best can only be a misinterpretation of the conflict between the better and the worse in our own character. "Unless one knows something of this experience," Dr. Orchard asserts, "Christianity must remain sealed against all further understanding." The experience which the reverend gentleman so grossly misinterprets is an experience common to all mankind. In every man there are higher and lower tendencies, and the joy of life consists in the triumph of the former.

This is a point of enormous importance, and we feel bound to enlarge upon it. There are thousands of people who have seen the error of the Christian interpretation of the struggle between the higher and the lower in character. For thirty or forty years some of them advocated it as the only satisfactory explanation of the phenomenon. They had a vivid and joy-yielding experience of what is falsely called communion with God in Christ. They prayed in secret and in public, they gave themselves with much enjoyment to the devotional study of the Bible, they were by no means strangers to the consolations of religion, and their love for Christ was a glowing passion; but a time came when they discovered that they had been hugging illusions for realities, and that the whole of their religious experience was as completely a hallucination as any dream of the night. To say of such people that when they write about Christianity and urge their friends to give it up they know nothing whatever about it is to be guilty of bearing false witness against them. This is a charge which we must bring against Dr. Orchard. Some of his opponents do know right well, as the result of years of closest and most prayerful study and happy experience, what Christianity is, and what ardent faith in it can and cannot do. When doubt first assailed them, they strenuously fought against it, dreading above everything the loss of their faith. Doubt, however, turned out to be but the thin end of the wedge which reason was driving under both their creed and the experience to which it gave rise. The wedge did its work most thoroughly, reason won a glorious victory, and, believing themselves wide-awake at last, they make the solemn declaration, based upon knowledge and experience, that the Christian religion is utterly false, and that those who cherish it are but mental dreamers.

In justification of the last statement let us scrutinise a few of Dr. Orchard's utterances. He talks of "an experience of God which began in Jesus Christ," and then later on says that "God and Jesus Christ are of the same order of beings." The curious thing is that he comes to this conclusion concerning God and Jesus Christ on the testimony of the latter, whom he describes as "a peasant," "an unlearned man," and "one who owed little or nothing to birth, race, training, or singular endowment." How does Dr. Orchard know that Jesus Christ knew God and told the truth about him? He admits that "the attempt to explain why it [the revelation of God] came in Jesus Christ is as futile as the attempt to explain why two human beings fall in love." "Why in Jesus Christ?" he asks, and answers, "Why not?" This looks uncommonly like trifling with a great subject. "It is a case of love," he tells us; "not a matter of argument, but a matter of love." The testimony of the New Testament is entirely ignored, and systematic theology positively despised, the sole appeal being to feeling. Under the guidance of emotion the reverend gentleman imparts to us various items of information. For instance, he startles us by affirming that "the material universe and Jesus Christ are all of a piece; in fact, that to put it symbolically yet in the only adequate way, we do not live in the universe, but in Christ." What an infinite pity that it is all a case of love. A man in love has the reputation of seldom talking sensibly. We are perfectly willing to admit that Dr. Orchard loves Jesus Christ very sincerely; but his love for Christ does not prevent him from misrepresenting the effect of such love upon the lives of men. St. Bernard was one of the great figures of mediæval Christendom, and his love for Christ was an all-consuming flame; but he was the author and instigator of the most cruel persecutions for all that. With what insatiable spite he hunted down the great Abelard. Benvenuto Cellini was at once a wonderfully versatile genius and a passionate lover of Christ; but neither his genius nor his piety held his fiery temper in check; and his crimes were preceded and followed by the most ecstatic spiritual experience, as he himself unblushingly tells us. It is a sheer delusion to imagine that love for Christ transforms character. It creates piety; but piety and character are not necessarily associated. It is simply not true to say that a Christian life is not fortuitous but providential; not a perplexity but an opportunity. We have never known a Christian who did not try his best to be his own providence, or to whom life was not often a terrible perplexity. Dr. Orchard's usual retort is, "You know nothing about it"; but it is a cowardly retort, and quite unworthy of a serious-minded person. We do not doubt the reality and sincerity of the passion for Christ in numerous instances; but we do claim that it is merely a passion for a wholly imaginary person. It is very possible that Dr. Anderson, of Dundee, loves Christ quite as passionately as Dr. Orchard; but the former frankly acknowledges that the Christ he loves is not a historical character, but the creation of the religious imagination. What we maintain is that the Gospel Jesus is worthy of neither worship nor imitation, and that those who profess to love him love not him but a transformed and glorified image of him that lives alone in their fancy.

Like all his brethren, Dr. Orchard cannot eulogise his own religion without vilifying all other cults. "Christianity," he says, "is the only religion which provides a basis for democracy, and secures the sanctity, permanence, and value of personality. Other religions have to get rid of man." Does he really believe that in his heart of hearts? When and in what country has democracy ever thriven, or even existed at all, under Christianity? Which religion tries to get rid of man, and what nation professes it? Has the reverend gentleman never read Professor Giles's Chinese Sketches, China and the Chinese, or Historic China? If he has, he knows that what he says is absolutely false; if he has not, he has no right to make such an assertion in the absence of knowledge. The claims he makes for Christianity have never been verified, and now Christianity is dying without ever doing a single thing to justify its existence.

Notre Dame de la Garde.

On a hill at Marseilles rises a Catholic church, and on the tower of the church stands a gilded image of the Mother of Heaven, and the Marseillaise call her the Guardian Lady,—Notre Dame de la Garde. Now this Lady is the symbol, to us of the new age, of the genius of Humanity, which guards the evening and the morning and the hours of the night.

The lighthouses glow on the rocky capes, and the red and green lamps sentinel the harbors; and the searchlights throw their quivering rays over the midnight waters. Countless miles of streets in the cities of the world are illumined by the labor of the gasworks and electric power-stations, and, amid the shades of millions of lanes and squares and avenues the police maintain their patrol while whole nations slumber. Humanity watches in the gloom, shields the prone multitudes, and wearies not of her vigil.

When dawn blushes, she—Notre Dame de la Garde—quickens, and not slackens her care. She kindles the hearth-fires in hamlet and in city, and spreads the table in ten thousand times ten thousand households; and her ministers are the hands of women. Her spirit guides the ploughing of the furrow, the casting of the seed, the gathering of the crops, and the grinding of the mills. Where the wine is pressed, where the olives are shaken, where the mulberry trees feed the silk-worms, and where the cotton whitens in the plantations, she toils to provide.

The mean garments of the proletariat she bestows with regret and tears, for they are but the squalid tokens of the fair apparelling of the days to come. Through the factories she hurries, and weaves for entire communities; and with the business of her tanneries, and dyeworks, her cutting-out and her sewing, her laundering, and her mending (praise to the loyal fingers of the armies of menders!) the towns throb and hum from the rising of the sun to the mustering of the silver stars.

She chooses helpers from the immense kingdom of the animals; from these countless forms of life,—terrible, tender, uncouth, graceful, venomous, innocent,—she chooses the meek-eyed cow, the spirited horse, the sociable dog, the playful kitten, the homely ass, the milk-yielding goat, the sagacious elephant, the plodding camel; and the fowls peck in her compounds, and the doves fly in and out of her cots, and the bees murmur in her gardens and hives; and by the magnetism of her taming art she enlists these naïve tribes for companionship, for ornament, for the yoke, the burden, and the nourishing of her children. She knows the tragedy that often blots their speechless life, and she raises her maternal arms, and protectingly utters the holy words of mercy,—"for these living things," she says, "are part of my own soul."

Nor, for the sake of her children, does she disdain to delve in the crevasses and corridors of the underworld. Lamp in hand, and with words of sagacious warning against the perils of earth, air, fire, and water, she regulates the industry of the miners, the quarrymen, the sulphur-gatherers. But, as she surveys the wondrous piles of glittering metal and stone, and the treasuries of precious gems, torn from the rock by the energy of searchers in the dark or in solitary valleys, she sighs as only a mother can sigh. "Ah, my sons and daughters," she says, "reflect, whether you do not place too high a value on some of these jewels, which cost so dear in human life and health; reflect, whether you justly comprehend and justly requite the service rendered by the laboring hearts and arms in the caves of twilight and jeopardy."

How proudly she smiles over her works of forethought and thrift. On many a mountain slope and on many a mighty plain grow the forests which her sons conserve with scientific skill, and increase by wise plantation; and here is the womb to produce fleets for the sea, and houses without number, and the wealth of household furniture and amenities. These broad fields of rice, she has irrigated them with a network of channels. A massive barrage has been built by her engineers across this flooding stream, and the waters are retained for the blessing of the lands of a widespread peasantry. Carriers of fertility and grateful moisture are her vast canals cut in the arid waste; and her waterways through sand and stone bear the gliding ships from sea to sea.

And she glories in the swift passage of her trains on the steel roads that lie in green landscapes, and thread the depths of hills, and skirt the tide-beaten beaches, and roar through the crowded markets, and knit the far-sundered nations, and take and give the wares of the continents. By starlight and sunlight, her ships, with pulsing engines, convey an opulent commerce, and waft to remote shores the builders of new commonwealths. Aloft, in that crystal sphere whence she draws her vital breath, her venturous sons launch their air-boats, and gaily coast the heavens.

Health and fitness are in her keeping, and she,—Notre Dame de la Garde,—oversees the sanitation of the planet. She tunnels the soil with drains, spreads the sewage of cities on the sweetening earth, wars on minute vermin, arrests the consumption scourge, beats back the foul malaria and yellow fever, and makes league against alcohol and opium, and the ghastly ills of sex, and the sad lunacy which mocks her genius and her existence. Each century finds fresh purity in the food she draws from the abounding land and water, and more divine is the blood in her veins, and ever more and more she expands her passion for the gracious light, and the quickening air, and the activities of the sportive hour. Blow, winds of the world, upon her mantling cheeks; shine, sacred sun, upon her labors; and surround her, infinite skies, with a silent and harmonious presence.

"My children," she says (and never was song more wise, more melodious, more mystical), "I climb to the Highest only through you, therefore learn to serve me." Hence, at her bidding, the schools raise their turrets over the murmuring towns and the tranquil villages; the colleges invite the troops of serious men and women; the universities gleam amid their lawns, and offer a stately roof to the sciences. Youth cons the book, heeds the message of old experience, and scales the rugged and happy path of knowledge; and knowledge and the willing heart consecrate themselves to the service of Humanity. The arts also are summoned to crown the achievements of the craftsman and the scholar. Here is the grotto or the shady pine-wood for the poet; here is the great orchestra for the musician; here is the spacious area for the pile of the architect; here is the canvas spread for the painter; and here the marble awaits the sculptor's touch; and here she,—Mother imparadised by our homage,—presides over the eternal unfolding of truth and beauty.

Here are the civic disciplines. She assembles the elected ones in the senate and the parliament, dignifies the judge on the bench, and whispers the command of the public law in the ears of citizens as they pursue the daily task, engage in strenuous trade, and mingle in the social throng. Where men and women associate for mutual aid, for the consolation of the suffering, for the strengthening of the weak, the uplifting of the depressed, the awakening of the ignorant and sordid, the establishment of peace, and the revealing of visions, there she lives and strives and hopes.

Noble is her history. She was born in the wilderness, and has been wounded in a thousand tragic ages, and imperilled by embattled hosts of savagery and lust. She is strong in the victories of the past; she is the inspiration of the present; she will pass on—in her children aiding, in her children co-operating, we her children one with her in purpose and ideal,—to the splendid era of love, order, and progress; she—Notre Dame de la Garde; she, the genius of Humanity.

"The viewless arrows of his thought were headed And winged with flame."

—TENNYSON.

HEINE'S genius almost defies analysis. He is, and must ever remain, a problem. He is multifarious, luminous, brilliant, like a diamond giving light from a hundred facets. He appears as a youthful champion tilting against the enemies of humanity; but it seems well-nigh impossible to reach the roots of the man's nature. He is a bundle of contradictions. A Jew who despised money; a convert without zeal; a model of resignation, and yet no Christian; a poet living amidst the sternest conditions of prose; a comedian whose life was a tragedy!

Heinrich Heine gathers in one vivid personality all those influences of his time which are the live forces to-day. He was born at a great crisis in European history. The long and terrible period during which the vampires of Church and State had sucked away the life-blood of the world was rapidly ending, and before his tenth year little Heinrich had lived through, and seen, great events. It was the day of Napoleon, and, as Heine puts it, "all boundaries were dislocated." As a boy, he found it hard to learn Latin declensions, which he was sure the Romans never did, "for if they had first to learn Latin they never would have had time to conquer the world." Young Heine was so troubled that he prayed an earnest but heterodox prayer, "O thou poor, once-persecuted God, do help me, if possible, to keep the irregular verbs in my head."

One memorable day the impressionable boy saw Napoleon ride through Dusseldorf on his famous white horse, and he never quite lost the glamor cast over him by the "Emperor." Republican as he afterwards became, Heine always had a tender place in his heart for the great despot. As he laughingly explained, he always had the gift of "loving both ways." Heinrich was a precocious child, and loved reading. His favorite books were, characteristically, Don Quixote and Gulliver's Travels. At the age of seventeen a rich uncle at Hamburg tried in vain to induce him to choose a business career; but it was useless. The young poet regarded money-grubbing as an accursed thing. Later he studied law at Bonn, Gottingen, and Berlin, and he fell under the influence of Hegel. Years afterwards he caustically referred to this period as that in which he "herded swine with the Hegelians."

With the appearance of his first volume of poems he began to take his true place. He still talked of becoming a lawyer, but his thoughts were on far other things.

"Red life boils in my veins. Every woman is to me the gift of a world. I hear a thousand nightingales. I could eat all the elephants of Hindustan and pick my teeth with the spire of Strasburg Cathedral. Life is the greatest of blessings."

His energies were devoted to writing and not to pleading. Instead of cultivating his clients he wrote his Travel Pictures, a book so full of word magic that it showed Heine to be as great an artist in prose as he was in poetry. Its irony was so mordant, so disrespectful, that it was at once placed on the Index Expurgatorius. As a writer, he never elected to dwell beside the still waters. To think of his career is to think of excursions and alarums, of church calling unto conventicle, of pamphlet answering pamphlet, of recriminations and vituperations manifold, and all the joys of literary battle. With all his love of fighting his enthusiasm ever burned for noble ends. The love of liberty shines through the mist of his dreams. And let a man love Freedom and live long enough, and there is no doubt with whom his place must be at the end.

In The Romantic School he lashed out at the literary chiefs of reaction in their tenderest spot. He compared their reversion to mediævalism to the hallucinations of Charenton, the Bedlam of Paris. This is how he ridicules Tieck: "He drank so deeply of the mediæval folk tales and ballads that he became almost a child again, and dropped into that juvenile lisping which it cost Mdme. de Stael so much effort to admire."

There came an inevitable stage in which the poet could no longer

"sport with Amaryllis in the shade,
Or with the tangles of Nedera's hair"; but when the sad days arrived he never complained. For seven long years prior to his death he lay sick and solitary on a "mattress grave," his back bent, his legs paralysed, his hands powerless, his sight failing. His ungrudging nature found excuses for his friends' desertion of his sick chamber in the reflection that he was "unconsciously long a-dying." As Matthew Arnold sings in his fine dirge:—

"Oh! not little, when pain
Is most quelling, and man
Easily quelled, and the fine
Temper of genius so soon
Thrills at each smart, is the praise
Not to have yielded to pain."

"God's satire weighs heavily upon me," said Heine.

"The Great Author of the Universe, the Aristophanes of Heaven, was bent on demonstrating with crushing force to me, the little earthly so-called German Aristophanes, how my weightiest sarcasms are only pitiful attempts at jesting in comparison with His, and how miserably I am beneath Him in humor, in colossal mockery."

The untamable humorist kept his most wonderful jest for the last. "God will forgive me," he said; "it is his trade."

Such a nature as Heine's was bound to be misunderstood. The puritanical Carlyle called him a "blackguard"; the pious Kingsley thought him "a wicked man." Thackeray, on the other hand, admitted his "great genius"; and Matthew Arnold regarded him as the mouthpiece of his generation. These different estimates are typical of the general attitude. He kindled enthusiasm or roused repulsion wherever he was read.

If we would seek a comparison, we may find it in Voltaire. Both men championed Liberty, and produced the deepest effects on their generations, and left immortal legacies to posterity. The writings of both ring with a defiant note. They are both inspired by devotion to Freedom as true as ever burned in man's heart.

Heine, after all, was a poet. He is at his best in his verse. His melodies are as various as they are faultless. The cadences are now caressingly tender; now lulling, lingeringly mournful; now resonant as the blare of trumpets. The verse now rolls majestically, now dances airily, now rings like a peal of fairy bells, now sweeps along with the fury and clamor of a storm.

> "O lyric voice, half angel and half bird,
> And all a wonder and a wild desire."

Fundamentally, Heine was a Freethinker, and he hated priestcraft with every drop of his blood. He never wearied of pouring scorn on "the molly-coddle homœopathic soul-doctors, who pour the thousandth part of a pint of reason into a gallon of morals, and send people to sleep with it on Sundays." He loathed that "abortion called State religion, that monster born of the intrigue between temporal and spiritual power." He was not "over partial to anthropomorphism." The bolt of his unerring irony is frequently directed towards the most sacred characters in the Christian mythology. In an oft-quoted passage he says that God is dying, and, in a daring figure of speech, suggests the administration to him of the last sacrament. On another occasion he insinuates that perhaps the parvenu God of the Christians is angry with Israel for reminding him of his former obscure national relations.

In the lambent flames of his sardonic humor he scorched everything that the Christian counts dearest. Writing of Kant's Critique of Pure Reason, he says:—

> "Since his time Deism has vanished from the realm of speculative reason. It may, perhaps, be several centuries yet before this melancholy notice of decease gets universally bruited about; we, however, have long since put on mourning. Immanuel Kant has pursued the path of inexorable philosophy; he has stormed heaven, and put the whole garrison to the edge of the sword."

Even the idea of immortality did not escape his satire. He mockingly suggests that the notion of living for ever must have first occurred to some lover in the arms of his mistress, or to some worthy citizen sipping his beer in the cool of a summer evening.

As a poet, Heine's fame has attained to that height in which praise has become superfluous; but in the character of iconoclast he has a yet higher claim on the attention of Freethinkers. Heine said he knew not if he were worthy of a laurel wreath. "But," he proudly added, "lay on my coffin a sword, for I was a brave soldier in the war of the liberation of humanity." No one will deny the laurel wreath, and assuredly to Heinrich Heine belongs the sword of a valiant soldier of liberty.

MIMNERMUS.

"I don't say 'tis right, and I don't say 'tis wrong," answered the metaphysical laborer. "But I do say 'tis natural. The bud was no more made for you than the bird. 'Twas made for itself—to take its chance of success, like everything else."

"But 'twas me made it, you might say. 'Twas me, under God, for didn't I grow it, and nurse it and prune it and feed it?"

"You did all this," admitted Birkett, "but you didn't net it, you see, and the Lord would say, if He gave the matter a thought, He'd say, 'Well, old Harry Hawke, you very well knew bullfinches was about, and you very well knew their manners and customs; and 'twas your place as a thinking and immortal creature, to outwit 'em.' But you didn't, and so you won't get not gooseberries this year."

"Like your cheek, Johnson," cut in Pancras Widecombe, "like your cheek telling what the Lord would say, and what He wouldn't. You're as bad as Farmer Dunnybrig."

"Drat that man—I hate un!" cried Nicky Glubb from his corner. "So sure of himself as a donkey, and with just as much reason. The Lord this, and the Lord that! I said to him a bit ago, when he stopped and began to preach—I said to un, 'You mark me, Valiant Dunnybrig, you'll get hoofed from heaven yet, for chattering and taking the word out of the mouth of the Almighty!' He said I was past praying for, the old fool, and I said I'd be a shining angel up high above him some day."—Eden Phillpotts, "Widecombe Fair."

Acid Drops.

We are a little late, but not, we hope, too late, in noticing a comment of the British Congregationalist on the Essex Hall meeting for the Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws. The writer admits that, with slight exceptions, "the arguments for the abolition of these Laws were quite sound." He objects to the belief of Atheists "that Christians want the Blasphemy Laws retained as a prop for a weak and tottering religion." Then he adds, "They might be surprised to know how many of those whose beliefs they attack would vote with them for the removal of State protection from a faith which is well able to care for itself." We will not now discuss whether religion is "in a weak and tottering state," we simply ask, "If the Blasphemy Laws are not retained for the purpose of protecting religion, for what other purposes are they retained?" There are no special laws protecting politics, or science, or art, or literature from assault in any form. If a man gets into trouble with the authorities in conducting a crusade against teaching in any of these directions, it is because of his behavior or language, and not because of the thing attacked. And the prosecution completely ignores what is attacked, concerning itself solely with the language or conduct. This is really all that Freethinkers are asking for in connection with their crusade against the Blasphemy Laws. They do not ask that in attacking religion a man shall be allowed to do whatever he pleases and use whatever language he thinks fit. All they ask is that the same rules that hold good in controversy concerning other subjects shall hold good for religious controversy likewise.

The claim that a great number of Christians disagree with these Blasphemy Laws is, we feel bound to say, more or less hypocritical. If Christians wanted them abolished they could be abolished at once. While they are retained Freethinkers are perfectly justified in claiming that Christians desire their retention as a means of silencing attacks on their faith. The fact of some Christians being manly enough to support real freedom of opinion cannot relieve the bulk of Christians of responsibility for the maintenance of laws that rest upon a foundation of cowardice and intolerance. The writer's talk of the necessity for "the protection of the public—and of ladies and children in particular—against the profanities, the vulgarities, and the obscenities of the Park Agnostic," is simply puerile. The police have already, apart from the Blasphemy Laws, ample powers to deal with genuine cases of obscenity. Vulgarity is another question, and we do not know that it has ever been proposed to punish a man or woman for being "vulgar" except in attacks upon religion. One may be as vulgar as one pleases in preaching or defending religion, and instead of guarding "ladies and children" against this, they are invited to attend. The real protection against vulgarity must come from the public taste and intelligence, not from the maintenance of laws that elicit torrents of falsehood and hypocrisy whenever they are defended.

The reference to Agnostic vulgarities and obscenities, we must confess, yields us some amusement. So many people have preferred "Agnostic" to "Atheist" because they thought it more respectable, less aggressive, and more likely to disarm opposition. And we always warned them that so soon as Agnosticism became at all troublesome it would be met with exactly the same opposition as Atheism has been met with. Our warning seems fully justified. It used to be the Atheistic vulgarities and obscenities. Now it is Agnostic obscenity against which women and children must be protected. One really gains nothing by bending to bigotry; these Agnostics might just as well have called themselves Atheists at the outset.

It is a pity that people will not restrict their writings to matters with which they have at least a nodding acquaintance. The Modern Man, commenting on the demand for the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws, says that:—

> "Under the thinly veiled guise of various creeds there is already far too much of that which borders on the blasphemous to be heard every day in Hyde Park. The repeal of the Blasphemy Laws would result in a veritable tornado of blasphemous oratory. If that is liberty, we don't want it."

This is the kind of paragraph that the average irresponsible scribbler is given to writing, and unfortunately it suits only too well a section of the public against which the better-minded portion really do want protecting. The Blasphemy Laws are not used against "various creeds," but against one "creed" only. Religious people may be as abusive and as vulgar as they please. The man who does not know this, we should have thought, would have been too ignorant for even the ordinary catchpenny paper. Moreover, Hyde Park is not even the whole of London—and certainly neither the most respectable nor the most intelligent portion of London. If Hyde Park is so disreputable as the Modern Man thinks, it can be dealt with in other ways, quite apart from the Blasphemy Laws. We are of opinion that there is a much greater need to protect the public against floods of "spicy" paragraphs, served up in popular journals, than against tornadoes of "blasphemous" oratory.

Sir Hiram Maxim's able and interesting speech at the Essex Hall meeting for the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws contained one mistake. He spoke of unbelievers in the fables of the Bible, who said what they honestly thought about them, as "liable to be arrested and imprisoned with hard labor." This is not the case. "Blasphemy" is technically only a "misdemeanor," not a felony; and sentences under them cannot (and never did) include hard labor. Not that this is any great advantage, for the "hard labor" prisoners have the best of the bargain, being better fed and less confined to their cells than other prisoners.

The Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon, of Stamford-hill, speaks of God's sigh, which must be echoed within ourselves, if we are to be acceptable in his sight. But why should God ever sigh? Is it because of his failure as Creator and his non-success as Redeemer? And why should God's sigh have a place in us? Are we to sigh because we pity the Lord; because we are sorry that the works of his hand have turned out so badly?

The Rt. Rev. Father in God, the Lord Bishop of Winchester, has left Farnham Castle for Spain and will be away for some weeks. Christ died on the cross; but some of his followers live on it—very comfortably.

A play entitled "The Sin of David," has been produced at Johannesburg, and has created "a profound sensation." If the production follows the Bible story closely we are not surprised.

Although Mr. Chesterton goes out of his way to attack many Freethought writers in his recently published Victorian Age of Literature, he makes an exception in the case of James Thomson, the author of "The City of Dreadful Night." Says Chesterton, "Thompson was a fine poet; but his pessimism, combined with a close pugnacity, does not follow any of the large but loose lines of the Swinburnian age. But he was a great person—he knew how to be democratic in the dark." Chesterton cannot be accurate in the light, for he spells Thomson's name with a "p."

To make certain that he should end his own life, the Rev. James Alfred Nash, Chaplain at St. Marylebone Workhouse, took a dose of poison and shot himself. According to the revivalists, it is only Atheists who commit suicide.

Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence, who believes in the Baconian authorship of the plays of Shakespeare, now contends that Bacon also wrote the Introduction to the Authorised Version of the Bible, and besides that edited and verified it. That Bacon should have edited the "Jew Book" is the unkindest cut of all.

In the good old days people were pretty sharply punished for desecrating the "Sawbath," even though it went no further than kissing one's own wife. There is at least one parson in Britain who regrets that these days have passed for ever. Rev. Pulston Jones told a Pwllheli Free Church Council meeting that he would like to excommunicate any member who bought a paper on Sunday. We quite believe Mr. Jones to be in earnest, and we feel certain that an agitation to revive the old village stocks and place people therein for not attending church would meet with his warm approval.

The Christian World, in reviewing one of the numerous works devoted to the reconciliation of science and religion, remarks that it is "greatly to the good" that the author "refrains from buttressing his arguments with textual quotations." Our readers will remember the time when such a work would have been declared suspect had it refrained from this course. Nowadays, even Christians are beginning to recognise that to quote the Bible as an authority for a statement in science is about as helpful as quoting Hans Andersen.

The British Weekly, of all papers! is responsible for the following:—

> "Beer and the Bible were very prominent in the 1873 election for East Staffordshire, which resulted in the return of Mr. Allsopp, the Conservative brewer, by a large majority.
> "In the window of an hotel at West Bromwich, crowded with Mr. Allsopp's agents, appeared a remarkable sketch of two cherub-faced Sunday-school children bearing between them a banner which bore the strange device of a Bible ornamented with a crown and sceptre, with the following lines beneath:—
>
> "'Holy Bible, Book divine,
> Precious treasure, thou art mine;
> Mine to tell me whence I came,
> Mine to tell me what I am.'
> "Then came—
> "'Shall we have this blessing taken from us? No. Then vote for Allsopp.'"

The late Pierpont Morgan has at least two ardent defenders in Great Britain. Both the Church Times and the Guardian write in praise of the late financier. He was, says the latter journal, "fundamentally a man of high principle and singleness of purpose." He was also "a convinced, if not enthusiastic, Churchman." He did much for the American Church, and "to the day of his death he paid the lighting bill of St. Paul's Cathedral." We recall the name of another financier, Mr. Hooley, who presented a service of gold plate (afterwards, we believe, returned) to St. Paul's Cathedral. Evidently there is nothing in huge financial operations that stands in the way of devout Churchmanship. Rockefeller's piety is also, we believe, beyond question.

During the last ten years Canada has added to its religious capital twenty of what the Guardian calls "fancy religions." We see nothing to object to in this. If people will have religions, the greater the variety the better. With so extensive a variety of gods and creeds in the world, it seems remarkable that so many people find nothing in hand to suit them.

The special correspondent of the Daily Mirror, describing a bull-fight at Seville, included the following pious item: "All concerned in the actual fight drove to the ring in open carriages, and many made their way to the little chapel at the ringside to kneel at the altar before entering the ring."

Provincial papers are often more outspoken than their metropolitan rivals. Recently the Southend Standard, in discussing the decline in church-going, sharply criticised the statement of Canon Reay that such decline was to be attributed to golf, tennis, sea-bathing, and seaside attractions. "Suppose," said our contemporary, "all these agencies effective and operating together, they have no significance or relation to our working-class population, whose absenteeism is nigh to universal." This is a good shot which should cause the Canon to explode.

Miss Marie Corelli has an article in Nash's Magazine for April on "The Lordship of Love." In it she describes the militant Suffragettes as "a kind of lost tribe, self-exiled from every Garden of Eden." Members of the "lost" tribe are frequently discovered at country houses and beside pillar boxes. Besides, Adam and Eve were not "self-exiled" from Eden; but "fired out."

Among the recent wills of the poor clergy we observe that of a late Bishop of Japan, £1,596; Rev. E. W. Clark, Notting Hill, £2,399; F. W. Lang, Torquay, £10,184; G. C. Williams, Dublin, £13,031; C. Bell, Prebendary of Salisbury, £13,461; Canon Mrowbray Trotter, £13,717; C. Slingsby, Knaresborough, £18,493; J. Bent, Eastbourne, £26,154; and Rev. Sir W. Honeyman, Shropshire, £89,871. We rejoice to see that so many of the clergy were relieved from the pressure of absolute want during their lives. Nothing so interferes with a due condition of spiritual serenity as taking thought for the morrow, what one shall eat and wherewithal one shall be clothed. Freed from this anxiety, the above-named gentlemen were able, by the dispensation of Providence, to give undivided attention to the spiritual welfare of their respective flocks.

The Daily Telegraph sought the opinion of that popular actor, Mr. Forbes Robertson, on the question of the decline of Church attendance. Numbers of clergymen also aired their views in its columns. Why does the editor associate the actor and the clergy? Does he regard them as players?

Professor Samuel J. Jones, of the Gunter Biblical and Literary College, Texas, has published a book of "Mathematical Wrinkles." The volume contains no reference to that prize puzzle in mathematics—the Christian Trinity.

A girl revivalist has been making a sensation at Wimbledon. The papers say that "she spoke for half an hour without ceasing." Thousands of ladies could beat this modest record without "inspiration."

We see from the program description of Dante's "Inferno," as presented by animated pictures at the Albert Hall, Sheffield, that "Simony, in Dante's time, was considered a very serious offence, and was much more fragrant than now." We suppose this is a subtle reference to the "odor of sanctity" which often surrounded it.

Some remarkable miracles have been occurring at the Monastery of the Atonement, near Albany, New York. Quite recently the Abbot of the Monastery fed a wayfarer. His features were Jewish and resembled those of the Savior. He was asked to take two buckets and fill them at the well; but one of the sisters, noting that he looked frail, excused him the task. Then the man with the Jewish face departed. But when the Mother Superior stooped to pick up the pails she found them full. So full that "no mortal hand could have filled them so full, as the water would have splashed over the top in the carrying." In another case, three chickens were stolen from the monastery. At once the aid of St. Anthony was invoked, and the next night three chickens, different to the ones stolen, were put back. The Abbot explains that St. Anthony had worked on the thief's conscience to make restitution—perhaps, with someone else's chickens. Who now says that the age of faith is dead? It is a pity that the miraculously filled pails did not keep full, despite all attempts to empty them, or that the three chickens did not grab the thief and lead him to the nearest police station. It is the Abbot's careful abstention from additions of this kind that gives his story such a convincing air of unadorned truth.

A Reigate lady, Mrs. Oxley, was killed on Good Friday while preparing for church. She had gone upstairs, and while in her room was killed by a sudden flash of lightning. We wonder what bearing this has on the doctrine of a particular Providence. Had she been preparing for a Freethought meeting the moral would have been an obvious one.

Complaining of petty thefts in his church, the rector of St. James's, Colchester, says that "even the thermometer has been stolen, and now the verger cannot tell whether the congregation will be boiled or frozen." The virtuous verger is probably on the verge of vitriolic and variegated verbosity.

Christian England may be reassured. "Hubert," the great Hubert Bland, bourgeois Socialist and Catholic infidel, has just told it that it holds the promise of the future. So that's all right. "I venture confidently to predict," he says, "that the future of England is a religious, not an atheistic, future." Some people are always venturing to predict, and they always do it confidently. They always predict what their public wants to believe, and the game is worth a good deal to them from many points of view, including the financial. Wise people, of course, remember that prophecy is the most gratuitous form of error. But wise people are always few. Nobody knows that better than Mr. Hubert Bland.

Dr. Alfred Wilson has been telling the members of the Child Study Society that he had seen a human brain "which resembled the brain of a cat, and it belonged to a woman who was an idiot, who ate ravenously like a beast, and who, when irritated, spat like a cat." This medical relic should be of service to Christian Evidence lecturers, who are often hard pressed for proofs for the Design argument.

At the Lancashire Congregational Union meetings last month it was asserted that "the Church of Christ stands as a bulwark against the wilderness." And what a sorry bulwark it is! Though it has been in existence for nearly two thousand years, the majority of the inhabitants of Christendom are "in a waste howling wilderness" still. What has the Church ever done towards solving the problem of poverty? What has nearly always been its attitude to disease? Why, the Church succeeded for fifteen hundred years in arresting the progress of the world.

The Guardian still continues its crusade in favor of conscription, under the name of "Universal National Service." It does not believe that the early Christians were generally opposed to war, although it admits a difference of opinion on the subject. At any rate, after Constantine—that is, as soon as Christians as a body could wage war—

> "Religious scruples as to the lawfulness of war were no longer expressed. Bishops themselves appeared as leaders in battle, and crusades were preached as holy enterprises. Even the Reformation was followed by wars and massacres and by the mutual slaughter of Christians, and Cromwell could think of himself in his military exploits as a true and heroic servant of God."

Of the truth of this there can, we think, be no "possible, probable shadow of doubt," to use the words of W. S. Gilbert. The only difference between Christian warfare and warfare with other people is that Christians have always accompanied their wars with a perfect deluge of pious cant.

"Concert Supersedes Church" runs a headline in a daily paper, which goes on to say that at the Easter Vestry Meeting at St. Peter's Church, Hornsey, it was stated that the Sunday Concerts at the Alexandra Palace had seriously affected the attendances and collections at the services. That is precisely the reason why the clergy so bitterly oppose all Sunday amusements.

There is to be a Noah's Ark fair at the Albert Hall London, in June, and the animals are to be represented by well-known society people. Whoever represents the ass will not want much "make-up."

"Ghosts" are usually very serious; but, according to the Evening News, a spook has appeared at the Vicarage of Weston, Yorkshire, who seems to be gifted with a fine sense of humor. One of the maids saw the figure of a woman carrying a small coffin, and the maid heard the woman humming the hymn, "Peace, Perfect Peace." Then came a terrible noise of the smashing of furniture; chairs were upset, a washstand was broken, and a big wardrobe thrown down. A delightful transformation from perfect peace to imperfect pieces.

In connection with the funeral of Lord Wolseley, the Daily Mirror quoted some magnificent lines from Swinburne and Garibaldi's glorious address to his soldiers. When it comes to great ideas, Christians have to call upon the Atheists.

THE CURATE'S APE.

A curate had received as a present from a missionary friend in America an ape, which won universal admiration for his domestic talents.

One day, at the time of the feast of the patron saint of the village, the priest was honored by the visit of the bishop; and the curate took pains to exhibit the talented animal to him.

"Just see, your eminence; he imitates me in everything. See how he has decked himself out in my alb and my hat. And he is capable afterwards of kneeling and murmuring a prayer."

"Truly, he is very amusing. And what intelligence! And what precision in his movements! He resembles you exactly, reverend sir!"

"And see now! He sits down with us at the table; and before eating, he makes the sign of the cross."

"Incredible!"

"And he does like me in everything. Before eating the soup, he drinks a swallow of wine; then he adds a pinch of salt to his soup."

"We might think we saw a human creature."

"That is what I say, your eminence. He acts just like me."

During this conversation, the maid comes in with the soup-dish. The ape takes hold of her head, and plants a vigorous kiss on her neck.

The bishop is stupefied. Recovering himself, he turns to the curate with the pertinent question: "And who taught him to do that?"

SWEET REVENGE.

Judge: "It seems to me that I have seen you before."

Prisoner: "You have, your honor. I taught your daughter singing lessons."

Judge: "Thirty years."

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £96 15s. 4d. Received since:—John Deacon, 5s. 3d.; H. Kennedy, £3 3s.; C. H. M. Gronn, Australia (per H. Saill), 13s. 10d.; J. F. Aust, 5s.: A. Phillips, 10s.; Richard Johnson, £5; W. H. Harrap, 2s. 6d.; D. Stewart, 5s. Per Miss Vance: "Postman," 2s. 6d.

A. LYON.—The book dealt with by Mr. Cohen in his pamphlet, Deity and Design, is, you will see from the pamphlets forwarded, Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace's World of Life.

C. LOXTON.—We learn with regret the decease of Mr. Plackett, and congratulate you on the thoughtful and eloquent address delivered over the grave of your old friend. The note of sincerity in such Secular services must serve as useful object lessons to all Christians capable of appreciating their significance.

H. KENNEDY, subscribing to the President's Honorarium Fund, is glad to see we have "jonked the Deil" again. He hopes we shall "get back rejuvenated" to "do battle for the great and good cause" of Freethought.

ROBSON PAIGE.—You were treated as Freethinkers usually are treated by the "glorious free press." Your letter would have been inserted otherwise. Thanks for your congratulations and good wishes.

E. P. (Canada).—We see nothing in Pastor Russell's utterances calling for special treatment in the Freethinker. We think Dr. Talmage was spoken of in the past tense. We know he is not in Brooklyn now—for he has been dead some years. He took all the money referred to when he was living.

A. STAPLES.—Humor is not the strong point of the dear Daily News. Thanks for your personal good wishes.

E. B.—Much obliged for cuttings.

H. DAWSON.—There is really only one Coleridge, the Coleridge, Samuel Taylor Coleridge—a great poet, and as Shelley said, with his usual felicity, a "subtle-souled psychologist." The passage you inquire about occurs in his Table Talk, a volume included in Bohn's Library.

L. GREENWOOD.—Mr. Foote was too ill to write about Mark Rutherford (Mr. William Hale White) at the time of his decease, a few weeks ago, but he may find an opportunity of dealing with that fine writer shortly.

A. PIMLEY.—Thanks for paper. The immediate source of the rev gentleman's ideas may be as you say; but the idea that the universe has undergone a preparation for man is really an old one. Moreover, it is the central idea of Dr. Wallace's World of Life. It is, of course, a pure assumption, absolutely incapable of proof, and quite reversing the logical order of events. Grass does not exist for the cow to eat; the cow exists because it eats the grass. Mr. Foote is, we are pleased to say, making good progress, and we hope to see him in his usual form in good time for the Annual Conference.

S. RICHARDSON.—We really do not think that Bergson is worth the time and attention that has been given him. He is enjoying a certain vogue, but in our opinion it is a vogue only. And it is so easy to become fashionable by disguising animistic ideas in philosophic language. Time is the great test, and within ten years we expect to see M. Bergson go the same road as many of his predecessors.

R. CHAPMAN.—So John Sanderson is dead! We knew him for more than thirty years. He stood in our mind for all that was manly.

J. F. AUST.—You are right. "Mimnermus" should have ascribed the passage to Bassanio instead of Helena. But we all make mistakes at times. Thanks for your good wishes. We note your hope to read our "pages on the Master."

SPICER.—We don't recollect it, and fancy you must be mistaken.

A. PHILLIPS (S. Africa), subscribing to the President's Honorarium Fund, writes: "My desire is to make it £5 by the end of the year, as a token of my admiration for your grand efforts."

RICHARD JOHNSON, subscribing to the President's Honorarium Fund, says he is "sorry to see how slowly the Fund progresses." "I do hope," he adds, "that those who can afford a 'fiver' or more will hurry up at once." Our old friend, a well known Manchester veteran, says he was "quite upset" by our "Personal" note, and begs us to heed our doctor's warning and take more care of ourselves in future.

S. NOAKES.—We are pleased at your efforts to spread the light, and the letter you enclose does credit to both yourself and your convert. We have allocated your P.O. for 8s. 2d. as desired. A selection of pamphlets, likely to be useful, will be forwarded by our shop manager.

J. W. ROBINSON.—Your query is answered in our advertisement columns. A letter to this office will secure all the information you require.

T. C. HOLDEN (U.S.A.).—Thanks for name of probable new subscriber. Form and paper sent as requested.

T. M. MOZLEY.—Thanks for cutting. Mr. Arthur Henderson is a politician and a local preacher—two avocations not very favorable to clear thinking or helpful speech. Responsible people are not likely to take his deliverances on Unbelief or Determinism very seriously. Mr. Foote, as you will see, is fast shaking off his indisposition.

J. BYRNE.—Obliged for epitaph, which may be useful later. We are very pleased to hear from one whose acquaintance with the Freethinker dates from 1886. That a paper can be read with interest for so long by one person is a high compliment to those that have helped to fill its pages.

"DORCHESTER."—The trick of lumping together "Drunkenness, gambling, immorality, and infidelity" is a very common one, although Sir Algernon Coote probably thinks it to be original. We should have no hesitation in saying that Christians have nothing to learn from "Infidels" in the shape of drunkenness or immorality or gambling, and if every Christian abstained from all three, what remained would be of a very manageable character.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Personal.

SOME friends are expressing a fear that they may not see me at the N.S.S. Conference on Whit-Sunday. I think they may set their minds at rest on that point. I am on the road to recovery now,—though it is a longer road than I like, for I am not as young as I was and I was very badly shaken. My severe illness put a strain upon the heart, which takes time to get its old tone back; so that I must move gently along a quiet road for a bit. But it is only a question of time now, I think; and if the north-east wind will only give place to something more summery and salubrious (Meredith's "sou-wester" would suit me to a nicety) I should make more rapid progress than I am doing just at present. I really ought to be myself again by Whit-Sunday.

G. W. FOOTE.

Sugar Plums.

The course of lectures in the Stratford Town Hall opened well on Sunday evening last. There was a good attendance, and the lecture was listened to with close attention throughout. At the close of the lecture, on the chairman, Mr. R. H. Rosetti, inviting questions, a local clergyman did his best, with the aid of a small group of supporters, to create a disturbance. Not content with being permitted to ask questions, he mounted a seat and kept up a series of interjections during the whole of the time that Mr. Cohen was replying. Eventually this ill-behaved representative of the faith was reduced to silence, although we may safely say that none but a Freethought audience would have refrained from forcibly ejecting him. However, as he appeared to have come for the special purpose of creating a disorder, it was well that he was frustrated. He will probably not try the game a second time.

To-day's lecturer at Stratford is Mr. Lloyd. We hope that local Freethinkers will do their utmost to secure the large attendance he deserves, with as great a sprinkling of strangers as is possible. Mr. Lloyd's lectures are always worthy of close attention, and those who hear him for the first time will certainly not regret their visit. Those who have heard him before will need no inducement to come again. The chair will be taken at 7.30. Tram, train, or 'bus will land visitors at the door of the hall.

Dr. J. G. Frazer, the author of that great work The Golden Bough, which has grown under his hands, since the first edition, into so many splendid volumes, is a most indefatigable worker. He has just published, through Macmillan & Co., the first volume of an entirely new work —The Belief in Immortality and the Worship of the Dead, which will receive attention in our columns presently. Meanwhile we quote the following striking passage, which will be of great interest to most of our readers :—

> "Whether other men from a simple contemplation of their own nature, quite apart from reasoning, know or believe themselves intuitively to be immortal, I cannot say; but I can say with some confidence that for myself I have no such intuition whatever of my own immortality, and that if I am left to the resources of my natural faculties alone, I can as little affirm the certain or probable existence of my personality after death as I can affirm the certain or probable existence of a personal God."

The religious papers may be relied upon not to give this important passage a gratuitous advertisement.

One of the leading articles in the April number of the English Review is "The Christian Drum," by the editor, Mr. Austin Harrison. It is boldly and vigorously written. "From the year one," the writer says, "this religion of mercy, charity, humility, forgiveness, and repentance has stood as the citadel of conscience and moral government, yet in its name the drum has always beaten fiercer and fiercer to arms and conquest; and there have been more wars waged in the name of Christianity than in all the annals of mankind during the thousands of years previous to the Crucifixion, and there has been more human blood shed for the Cross than for any other cause in history; and now, after nineteen hundred years of warfare, Europe is turned into a drill-ground of utterly wasteful armies of destruction going they do not know where, seeking they do not know what, primed for mutual slaughter in the name of the 'very God,' justified by the supreme hypocrisy of self-defence."

"The Church, Christianity," Mr. Harrison says later on, "will follow the drum as it has always done through the ages. War! It has lived on war. Every battle since the Crusades has been fought in its name. Assuredly there is no hope there, though in England alone last year eight thousand books on theology were written and published."

The Bible as a Guide.

In this glorious country of ours we have one book which is considered by Christians to be of more value than all the rest of the literature of the world. It is the Authorised Version of the English Bible. This book is a State-protected book. It is not only alleged to be inspired by God, but it is protected by Act of Parliament, and everybody who dares to criticise it adversely runs the risk of fine or imprisonment in this world, and the glorious prospect of a particularly warm corner in the next. This book is the foundation of the Christian belief, and Christians are so much in love with its contents that they insist upon it being taught in the schools, and moral lessons inculcated from its stories and precepts. Further, it is alleged to contain a true and faithful account of the origin of the universe and of man, and its teachings form the foundation upon which all the sects have built up their religious and moral theories, upon the right understanding of which, they declare, depends the welfare of the human race. In other words, the Bible is alleged to be a safe guide for man in this world, and the best of all guides for the world to come; for its commands are unerring and its teachings infallible. These, at least, were the teachings of the Christian Church up to a little more than a quarter of a century ago; but they have undergone some changes and modifications in recent years, and it is now doubtful how much or how little of the Bible it is necessary to believe in order to be considered a true Christian. Even now, however, the Bible is considered to be the safest guide for man, although Christians acknowledge that every word of it is not divinely inspired; it nevertheless contains the word of God, although every Christian must discriminate between the mere language of the author and "the direct utterance of the Most High."

In the exercise of his reason, however, the rational thinker finds ample excuse for doubting the capability of this Christian guide to fulfil its claim; he finds its directions deceptive, and its guidance contradictory and mischievous. In fact, the man who would place absolute reliance upon the Bible would find himself being driven hither and thither through a maze of faith, never able for a single moment to plant his foot firmly upon the impregnable rock of science and experience. What, then, is the Bible? It is a book composed of a series of pamphlets written in distant ages, nobody knows precisely when, or where, or by whom. These books or pamphlets express the opinions of the writers upon a variety of topics, and many Christians still credulously regard these opinions as though they were the infallible utterances of an all-wise and all-good God. The Bible contains a history of the cosmogony of the earth and also an account of the alleged creation of man and of the alleged "fall" in the Garden of Eden.

A critical examination, however, of the first and second chapters of Genesis will make clear to any discriminating mind that the writers were ignorant of the most elementary and demonstrable facts of astronomy, geology, and palæontology, and that they had not the remotest idea of the evolutionary processes by which animal life had developed from lowly forms through crustacea, fishes, reptiles, and birds, lower mammalia, up to man.

In fact, upon the face of these documents, they carry no greater authority than the views of persons living in a primitive age and giving expression to the best thoughts of the age in which they lived. Moreover, the Bible, as we have it, is by no means a complete compilation of the books which originally composed its contents; indeed, a large number of books or essays which are mentioned in some of the books are left out altogether.

In Numbers, for instance, there is a quotation from a book called "The Book of the Wars of the Lord." In Judges and Samuel we read of "The Book of Gasher," and among other books that are mentioned are "The Books of the Acts of Solomon," "The Account of the Chronicles of King David," "The Book of the Chronicles of the King of Judah," and "The Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel." These are only a few of the books which once formed part of the Bible and are now omitted from the Authorised Version altogether; indeed, some writers have declared that the present volume only contains about one-twelfth of the original records which made up its contents. By what process of discrimination have these books been left out? If the Bible at any time contained the "direct utterances of the Most High," if at any time it was, what a former Bishop of Ripon declared, "pure, unadulterated truth—truth without the admixture of error," was it not a gratuitous piece of impertinence on the part of the learned revisers to make thousands of alterations in the text, and leave out records that had hitherto formed part of the holy volume? It is too late in the day for the Christians to try and reconcile the statements of the Bible with the observed order of phenomena, and to pretend that the primitive guesses of our early ancestors are in perfect harmony with the undisputed facts of modern science. To make any such declaration in these days is only to bring upon the affirmers the ridicule and contempt of the most intelligent members of the Christian world, as well as the whole of the Freethinkers of the country. Some, however, seem to think that a good deal of guidance may be derived from a study of the pages of Holy Writ; and though many of them are aware of the fact that the Bible statements are in many respects unscientific and unhistoric, and many passages distinctly immoral, they nevertheless insist that it is necessary that the children in schools should be taught to regard these things as true, and that no suggestion or hint of the untrustworthy character of such teachings should be allowed to enter the minds of the rising generation. But if we take the narratives of the early books of the Bible, what spiritual guidance can we get from them? There is nothing specially edifying in the story of Adam and Eve's encounter with the talking serpent in the Garden of Eden, and, although we are told that our first parents were very wicked in not resisting the temptation of the Devil himself, who appeared in the form of a serpent, I cannot see how they can be held responsible for their actions on this occasion, when they did not know the difference between good and evil until after they had eaten of the forbidden fruit. It is true that they were informed by Jehovah, according to Genesis, that on the day they ate of the fruit they would surely die, but as they did not die until hundreds of years afterwards, I fail to see that there is any moral or spiritual lesson to be learned from such a narrative. The story of Cain and Abel is interesting enough as a narrative, but I am not able to see what spiritual guidance a good Christian can get from it. Abel was a sincere believer in the Hebrew God, and Cain was a firm believer also: but Abel offered lamb as a burnt offering to his Deity, and Cain, not to be outdone in his homage, offered up "the fruits of the earth," which, to him as a farmer, was the best he had to offer. Jahveh showed favor to the younger brother and frowned contemptuously upon poor Cain. Cain felt this slight most keenly. He could not endure such manifest partiality. His blood was up, and in a fit of rage, instead of laughing to scorn this petty exhibition of a Deity's favoritism, he met his brother in a field, wrangled with him, and in a moment of uncontrollable passion murdered him. Abel was a saint. What good thing he ever did is buried with him in the tomb of oblivion. Cain was a sinner.

But who, having read his story, has not had pity for him. Abel may have been a very provoking fellow. Who knows? At all events, it is certain that Cain would never have assaulted his brother if it had not been for his sensitive nature and the keen feeling of injustice he experienced from Jahveh, to whom we must refer as the primary cause of the murder. What moral or spiritual lesson is to be learned from his story? Is it that we must be careful of the kind of God that we worship—that he is just and upright and impartial in all his dealings with his children? Or must we take care that, if we offer him any sacrifices, we must be careful to ascertain beforehand whether they will meet with his approval? Or is the moral that we must not under any circumstances lose our temper? Then why did God give man such feelings and passions if he knew beforehand that many of them would not able to keep them under control?

The story of Noah and of the giants who fell in love with the daughters of men and seriously corrupted their morals may form food for reflection for many beside Christians, but I doubt whether they could find from such narratives any serious spiritual guidance worthy of the name. I pass over the absurd stories of the Flood and the Tower of Babel as being so manifestly fairy tales as to be unworthy of the credence of intelligent Christians, and ask what spiritual guidance they can get from the Biblical stories of the careers of such mythical persons as Father Abraham, "the Father of Nations," Isaac, and Jacob? The story of the early career of Moses is not very inspiring, nor his appearance, with his brother Aaron, before Pharaoh, and the wonderful story of his tricks of legerdemain, in order to convince the Egyptian monarch or potentate that he represented Jahveh, especially when we are told that this God had hardened Pharaoh's heart so that he would not let the children of Israel go. The story of the plagues and the terrible sufferings to which the poor Egyptians were subjected may be interesting enough to the untrained imagination of young children, but I fail to see what food for moral or spiritual guidance a good Christian can obtain from the study of such narratives; or what useful purpose is served by insisting that such stories contain an inspired message from God to man.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

What Do Freethinkers Believe?

FREETHINKERS are not Christians; for Christianity is based on dogmas that are repugnant to reason and common sense.

The Bible tells us that "in the beginning God created the heaven and the earth" (Gen. i. 1). This statement, by whomsoever it was first made, is pure assumption. Is it not more reasonable to believe that the universe—that is, illimitable space, with all its myriads of stars and planets and comets—has existed from all eternity than to believe that at some epoch of the misty past it was created by some unknown and incomprehensible Being? One fact is beyond all doubt—that infinite space never had a "beginning," and must, therefore, have always existed

The Bible tells us that, some 6,000 years ago, God created a man and a woman named Adam and Eve (Gen. i. 27); that he placed them in a garden called the "Garden of Eden" (Gen. ii. 23); that there they disobeyed his commands (Gen. iii. 6); and that then he drove them out of the garden and cursed the ground upon which they walked (Gen. iii. 17-24). And the Christian doctrine declares not only that these statements are true, but that Adam and Eve were the parents of the human race; that the sin which they committed against their Maker has descended upon all their posterity; and that every human being will be burned in the "everlasting fires prepared for the devil and his angels" (Matt. xxv. 41) if they do not believe in one Jesus Christ, who is said to have been the Son of God.

Are these statements true? They are not. Such persons as Adam and Eve never existed; and mankind has been upon the earth, not a mere 6,000 years, but for tens of thousands of years. The story of the Fall is a story, and nothing more; and, therefore, all the religious dogmas that are based upon it are untrue.

What, then, do Freethinkers believe? They believe in that which is just; in that only which can be proved to be true. They know that the religious dogmas which are taught by the priests of all the numerous sects are born of ignorance and superstition; for, as Whately says, "on those mysterious points which are inscrutable to man, the learned can have no advantage over the ignorant and the simple, for in utter darkness the strongest sight and the weakest are on a level." They know that mankind are the children of nature and the creatures of circumstances.

The Bible teaches predestination—that is that, before this earth was created, God knew and determined what should be the life of every creature upon it; but Christians aver that mankind are free agents, that is, that they can determine for themselves what their future shall be, both here and hereafter, if an hereafter there be. But these statements are utterly irreconcilable; for God is Omnipotent and Omniscient, or he is not. If he be not omnipotent and omniscient, he is a myth and nothing more; but if he be, all the woes and miseries and crimes which beset mankind and blacken the pages of history are to be attributed to him and to him alone.

That mankind are the children of nature and the creatures of circumstances is beyond all doubt. It goes without saying that the country in which a man is born, the social status of his parents, his physical powers and mental endowments, and all the circumstances of his environment are due to some unknown power or force, the idea of which can only be expressed by some such word as "Fate." And throughout life every man discovers for himself that he is the creature of circumstances over which he has little or no control. This fatalism is commonly known as "Luck." And so potent is this power or force that the belief in it has been embalmed in the aphorism that "it is better to be born lucky than rich."

But do not Freethinkers believe in an hereafter? Have they no hopes and fears—that is, wishes and desires—regarding a future state of being? Certainly they have! But they differ from Christians in this respect. They have no fears of infinite injustice—no belief in, and therefore no dread of, eternal pain and misery. The Christian doctrine is based on fear—on mortal terror that is engendered by ignorance and superstition. Christians believe in hell, and all its hideous surroundings. They worship an Omnipotent Being who, if their doctrine be true, is an Omnipotent Fiend—an Omnipotent Being who created mankind in order that he might torture the greater part of it in hell throughout eternity. For are we not told that "many be called but few chosen" (Matt. xx. 16); that "straight is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it" (Matt. vii. 14)? To Freethinkers this belief is a hideous nightmare. If there be one thing of which they feel absolutely certain, it is that in the next world, if there be another world, there is no such place as hell.

To the Freethinker the hereafter means eternal happiness, or eternal annihilation. It means, if the grave be the entrance to another world, that that world will be a world of light and gladness, unclouded by the horror of an everlasting hell. And what sane man will say that eternal annihilation is not preferable to, and more just than, eternal woe and misery? Who can believe in eternal woe? It means, horrible to relate, not eternal death, for that is simply annihilation, but eternal dying! It means excruciating agony that shall last for ever—a never-ending fiendish miracle; for the tortured quivering flesh of the victim must be re-created even whilst it is being destroyed. Who can believe such a blood-curdling doctrine? Who can believe that such a fiendish doctrine was enunciated by one who, we are told, taught that man should forgive his fellow-man not "seven times, but until seventy times seven" (Matt. xx.)?—which means always. Surely the creature cannot feel and show more pity for, and sympathy with, suffering humanity than the Creator! If there be a Creator, is it not the rankest blasphemy to attribute such fiendish cruelty to him?

The Freethinker feels that such a doctrine is false—feels that it cannot possibly be true. He knows that such persons as Adam and Eve never existed, that the story of the Fall is mere legend; and that, consequently, as there never was such a crime as Original Sin, the pathetic drama that is founded upon it is a tale, and nothing more. Strong in this knowledge, therefore, the Freethinker goes down to the grave in peace—to the grave where "the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest" (Job iii. 17). For this reason, too, we who are alive sorrow not for the dead, but for the living. Our hearts go out in sympathy with those who have been bereft of their loved ones. We sorrow not with the "dead who know not anything.....for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave" (Eccle. ix. 5-10). To the living we speak words of comfort; but to the dead, when bending over the grave, we simply say "Good-by!"

The sun hath set;
But golden beams still linger in the sky—
Fond memories of the time when first we met;
Good-by!

The tree is dead;
Riven by forkéd lightning from on high;
But still its green boughs, lifelike, wave o'erhead;
Good-by!

Never again
Shall evening twilight glad his weary eye;
The shadows darken, night comes on amain;
Good-by!

J. W. DE CAUX.

Freethought Abroad.

THE London Mail of February 22 is responsible for an anecdote of the Spanish Monarch which exhibits the royal gaucherie in an acute form. The statement, heading and all, is as under:—

"ALFONSO GETS THE OISEAU.

"The Spanish King's gallant habit of sending round bouquets to the stage door—very often, of course, out of courtesy pure and simple—jarred badly the other night. His Majesty was motoring back to San Sebastian after one of his frequent consultation with Dr. Moure, the Bordeaux throat specialist, and broke the journey at Pau, where he booked a box at the local Opera House. Halfway through the show, 'Kreutzer Sonata,' an A.D.C. was sent behind with a bouquet for the prima donna. He returned with the flowers and clearly agitated. 'Who is she? Why has she refused them?' asked Alfonso, consulting his program. 'The name conveys nothing to me. Find out from the management who she is!' The A.D.C. did as he was bid. Presently he returned, more agitated than before. 'Well, who is she?' demanded Alfonso. 'She is not singing under her real name,' ventured the officer. 'Any fool knows that,' interrupted the King, now thoroughly roused. 'What is her real name?' 'Senora Paz Ferrer, Your Majesty!' replied the A.D.C. And Alfonso was silent, marvelling at his own stupidity. Had not the girl gone on the stage after vainly begging her father's life of the King? Though a first-rate singer, Senora Ferrer finds it impossible to obtain an engagement in Spain."

King Alfonso would have been better inspired if he had placed a penitential wreath on Ferrer's grave.

The report in the English papers (notably in the Observer of March 9) of the experiences of an Englishman in a Spanish prison sends the mind back, as our contemporary remarks, to mediæval days. The victim was brought before the Leeds Assizes on March 8, and the cross-examination of the Chief Constable of Halifax revealed a horrible state of affairs in the prison in which the man had been lodged. These particulars, as reported, deserve to be placed on permanent record as showing what is possible in a reputedly Christian country:—

"Mr. Waugh, K.C., who defended, questioned the Chief Constable of Halifax, who said he knew that when Robinson was arrested in Spain he was not allowed to put on his overcoat. The cell in which he was kept was a large bare room, the windows of which were in such a bad state that it was full of draughts.

"'Do you know,' Mr. Waugh asked, 'that for five weeks he was subject to the cold of the night without any extra clothing?'

"Witness: Yes.

"Do you know that he was not allowed a change of linen?—Yes. I made application myself and was refused.

"Do you know that the cell communicated directly with a sewer?—I do not know, but it was in an insanitary condition.

"There was an abominable stench?—Yes.

"Do you know that when he was finally taken from prison he was marched through the streets with thumbscrews upon his hands?—I understand that he was marched through the streets. I saw him come aboard with them on."

The private letters (still in my possession) which I received from Ferrer before the royal warrant was signed for his death disclosed even worse abominations as daily and hourly inflicted upon Ferrer during the many weeks of his incarceration in a cold, filthy, and verminous cell. No wonder Senora Paz Ferrer spurned the royal bouquet.

The Rationalist Peace Association has evidently not been launched in vain. In the Peace Movement (March 15), the English organ of the International Peace Bureau at Berne, it is announced that a French Rationalist League of Peace has just been founded in Paris. Its avowed intention is to follow in the footsteps of the Rationalist Peace Association, which, as our readers will know, has now been in full working order during the last two years, with Mr. John M. Robertson as President, Mrs. Hypatia Bradlaugh Bonner as Chairman, and a Committee consisting of Mr. Foote and other well-known Freethinkers.

The names of the Provisional Committee, which has been constituted at Paris, includes several well-known Freethinkers. It is hoped that similar societies will be formed in other countries, and that a close bond of sympathy and co-operation will be formed between these different Rationalist Leagues for Peace.

The strong note of Rationalism sounded by Mr. Norman Angell in his recent Conway Memorial Lecture is a significant indication that there is a distinct need for a purely philosophical and avowedly secular presentment of the peace question.

The Peace Movement also contains an interesting notice of the last Annual Report of the Chinese Imperial Maritime Customs, which was issued last April by the Inspector-General of Customs, Shanghai. The notice is headed "China as a Pacific Force," and its statements confirm the view which I endeavored to present of the New China in my Freethinker article of February 16 last. Since that article was written, I have seen Mr. Hain-Jou-Kia again in London, and found him, after journeyings far and wide through Europe founding new Sinophile groups, full of faith in the future peaceful development of the great Chinese Republic. That view finds unexpected and authoritative confirmation in the above-mentioned report, which is signed by Mr. Paul H. King, Statistical Secretary of the Chinese Imperial Maritime Customs (the Chinese Imperial Maritime Customs is a body composed of nearly a thousand Europeans and Americans controlled by an Inspector-General). The following citation from the report is worth volumes as a contrast between Chinese and Christian civilisation, and as such deserves to be placed on permanent record. Mr. King says:—

> "So far the revolution has been one of the quietest in the history of the world; and if the new era now dawning should bring, as we all hope it will, increased prosperity to China, it will surely also mean increased prosperity to foreign nations as well. Her undeveloped resources are enormous, and the potentialities of her purchasing power, under favorable home conditions, are sufficient to stagger the imagination. Again, the rise of China into a world power will make for peace. The West has long felt the burden of its armaments; and China may yet be in a position to teach her common-sense view of the folly of war to willing, because exhausted, listeners. Trade in the past has often been despised by the warrior, the aristocrat, the artist, and even by the priest; and the shopman is a type far removed in popular imagination from anything elevated or heroic. Yet trade is the real measure of civilisation in the strict sense of the word; and where civic virtue flourishes, there will be found prosperous and expanding trade. Trade conquers in a peaceful spirit and improves while it conquers. When mankind is better instructed, civic virtue will come first, and in that respect China has ever excelled. Trade makes for life and the means to enjoy it; while many other things—disguised with splendid pomp and circumstance—make for death. Corn fields are better than parade-grounds; cotton mills than arsenals; and an up-to-date 'floating palace' is a more pleasing sight than a bristling battle-ship. The earth teems with wealth of all kinds, and it may be safely assumed that the new China—with the same fine instinct for commerce which animated the old—will teach all the world to use that wealth for the happiness and not for the devastation of mankind. Poverty has caused war and war caused poverty; but when people are busy with buying and selling, they lose interest in the clash of arms.
> "Nothing is more hopeful or of better augury for the human race than to see people making things and growing things and selling things, and the millennium may yet be brought about through the honest trading instincts of man. If we should visualise a great pageant of humanity, there would be many stately and brilliant figures to personify Science, Invention, Art, and so on; but in a correct perspective all those would be seen to circulate round quite a humble-looking masque, Commerce, who served them and used them and paid them. It is not impossible that this masque would be best typified by a Chinese merchant in the new and vigorous Republic of China and of Peace!"

This description of the secular spirit of new China is nobly conceived and very beautifully expressed. A leaven of Freethought is evidently at work in the new Republic. If it were possible to eliminate from the Peace movement throughout the world the Freethought element thinking and working for the realisation of humanitarian weal based on human brotherhood, the Pacifist cause would be brought to a very low ebb.

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON APRIL 3.

Mr. Cohen was elected to the chair. There were also present:—Messrs. Baker, Barry, Brandes, Cowell, Cunningham, Davies, Leat, Moss, Neate, Nichols, Roger, Samuels, Schindle, Silverstein, Rosetti, Thurlow, Wood, J. W. Wood, and Miss Kough.

A letter was received from Mr. Foote explaining that he had only partially recovered from his recent severe illness, and was therefore unable to be present. The Secretary was instructed to write Mr. Foote a letter of sympathy conveying the unanimous wishes of all present for his speedy and complete recovery.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed.

New members were received for the Preston Branch and the Parent Society.

Mr. Cohen reported upon the meetings of the Board of Management of the Scholarship Scheme, and said that a syllabus and list of text-books for the use of candidates was being prepared.

Mr. Brandes reported on behalf of the Sub-Committee elected to deal with the exchange of visits between French and English Freethinkers.

Notices of motion by the Executive for the Conference Agenda were prepared, and Messrs. Cohen, Lloyd, and Davies were elected as the Agenda Committee.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

Obituary.

The remains of Mr. John Sanderson, a veteran Tyneside Freethinker, were interred with every token of respect and sympathy at Jarrow Cemetery last Sunday afternoon. Mr. S. M. Peacock, Vice-President N. S. S., read the Secular Burial Service in the presence of a large gathering of relatives and friends, among others representing South Shields Branch being Messrs. Thos. Lumley, G. White, J. T. Horsman, W. R. Bowe, Chapman, Thos. J. Fothergill, and J. Hannan. Mr. Sanderson was virtually the founder of the Branch, and was secretary for a while. In the early days of the Bradlaugh struggle he was an active and brave-hearted fighter in the ranks of progress. During last year health and strength had gradually declined until finally, on Wednesday, April 2, a man noted with friends for honesty and sincerity of purpose, the stalwart of our Branch in the earlier days, passed away peacefully and firm in the faith at the residence of his son, 158 St. Paul's-road, South Shields.—R. CHAPMAN.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIII.—No. 16 SUNDAY, APRIL 20, 1913 PRICE TWOPENCE

It is not from one argument only but from the whole of modern science that the tremendous result is derived. "There is no such thing as the supernatural."

—ERNEST RENAN.

Reason and Intuition.

THE contention of M. Bergson is that the intellect cannot explain the phenomena of life, because it is merely "the faculty of manufacturing artificial objects, especially tools to make tools, and of indefinitely varying the manufacture," "the faculty of making and using unorganised instruments." Instinct, on the contrary, uses and even constructs organised instruments, "plainly deals only with things upon which it reacts." Such is the distinction M. Bergson makes between intellect and instinct. Inasmuch, then, as the intellect is concerned with forms, and instinct chiefly with matter, it follows that, in the attainment of knowledge, these two faculties "occupy separate provinces, the one seeking out the forms of things, the other the substance." In this manner the great metaphysician tries to convince us of the utter inadequacy of the intellect to deal with life. It is acquainted only with solids, and its noblest work is to fabricate. "Whatever is fluid will escape it in part, and life will escape it altogether." Poor old intellect, it "cannot grasp mobility," its dealings being almost exclusively with the "discontinuous." In reality everything is mobile, immobility being at best but apparent and relative. Hence, the only object on which the intellect can form a clear idea is seeming, deceptive immobility. In other words, it is fit only to contemplate and be fascinated by so-called dead matter. Life is too much for it altogether; it puzzles and bewilders it even to madness. "The intellect is characterised by a natural inability to comprehend life." How vastly superior is instinct. "While intelligence treats everything mechanically, instinct proceeds, so to speak, organically." Now, what is intuition? It is instinct glorified, "grown disinterested, self-conscious, capable of reflecting upon its object and of enlarging it indefinitely." "Intuition is mind itself, and, in a certain sense, life itself." Consequently, intuition is the only safe guide of life.

It must be frankly admitted at once that the intellect is extremely restricted in the scope of its operations and in the quantity of its results. It cannot explain vital phenomena. There are innumerable problems which it is incapable of solving. In consequence of this, M. Bergson takes for granted that intuition may be taken as a perfectly adequate guide in all questions touching life and its interests. But this is an inference unsupported by a single fact. Throughout Creative Evolution the author attacks theories of which he disapproved, and having demolished them to his own satisfaction, he assumes the truth of his own theory, and speaks of it as if it had been victorious all along the line. Such is this savant's method in all his books, and we are bound to characterise it as a false and mischievous method. As a matter of fact, all knowledge comes through the intellect, none through intuition. There are, it is true, self-evident truths, such as mathematical axioms, and general principles, deduced without trouble from logic. What is called intuitive knowledge belongs to that category. Truths of perception are also self-evidenced, and have no need to be formally demonstrated. Intuition, in this sense, is but the handmaid of the reason, not its supplanter.

We have furnished the above slight sketch of M. Bergson's theory in order to expose the fallacies in it as applied to theology. Mr. R. J. Campbell is evidently a diligent student of the Parisian Professor's works, as is shown in a sermon of his published in the Christian World Pulpit for April 9. Two-thirds of this discourse may be described as a series of attacks upon the human intellect. Its great fault is not that it cannot find God, but that "its tendency is towards a simple unbelief in matters of religion." There is a long quotation from Newman's Apologia, in which the great writer refers to the world as giving the lie to the Christian doctrine of God, and to himself as tempted by "the sight of the world which is nothing else than the prophet's scroll, full of lamentation, and mourning, and woe," to become an Atheist, or a Pantheist, or a Polytheist. Newman was of opinion that "the unaided reason, when correctly exercised, leads to a belief in God, in the immortality of the soul, and in a future retribution"; but Mr. Campbell doubts it, and says that it is "a contention which would not be admitted by the scientific mind of to-day." Then he adds:—

> "If we had nothing but the intellect to rely upon in our quest for God, we should never find him. Can you imagine anything more antecedently improbable on rational grounds than that from all eternity a single being should exist, all-wise, all-powerful, all-perfect in every way, and the author of all things, visible and invisible? Why, the proposition is far too stupendous to be grasped by any rational being. We are obliged to do our thinking in terms of cause and effect, and we cannot grasp the idea of an uncaused cause of all existence, especially if we are to predicate of it that it is infinite in intelligence and creative energy."

For a believer in God that is a terribly humiliating admission to make, considering that the reason, as well as every other faculty, is supposed to be a gift from God. Mr. Campbell makes a more naïve statement still:—

> "As Cardinal Newman says, the difficulty becomes intensified when we look at the state of creation. In the name of all that is reasonable, why is the world so wretched, and why—supposing that there is a God—has it been allowed to remain so for unnumbered ages? I do not know; nobody knows. To all rational seeming such a God as the Christian believes in might have been expected to create a better and happier world, and it is no explanation to say that he did so, but that his plans were vitiated by the perverseness of his creatures; we want to know how or why they could be vitiated. Would it not have been as easy for God to secure to his creation perfect immunity from pain and evil, as to make it at all? And, in any case, why has he chosen to remain so strangely silent about the matter? Why should anyone in the wide world be left in any doubt as to what God is doing and what is expected from us?"

All that has been said, and much better, innumerable times before, by prominent Freethinkers. What is remarkable about the present expression of it is that it was uttered from a Christian pulpit. Mr. Campbell, however, tries to break the force of the wonder felt at the failure of the intellect to find God by pointing out its limitations when confronted by the problem of man's existence. What he means by that remark is not clear, for the existence of man is an ascertained fact. No one has ever been fool enough to ask for proofs that he himself exists. And at this point the reverend gentleman shows how imperfect his understanding of the scientific conception of the Universe is. While accepting the theory of evolution, he wants to know "how it was that there was anything to evolve." He speaks of "the tiniest speck of matter that first occupied the limitless void of space," and asks, "How did it come there?" He wants his uncaused First Cause, after all, because, without it, it is to him inconceivable how the evolutionary process was ever set going. He must have his Almighty Starter, who created the first tiny speck of matter, and then gave it the Original Push. But science recognises no beginning, knows nothing of a current of consciousness flowing down into matter as into a tunnel, endeavoring to advance, making efforts on every side, forcing its way through hard, rocky materials, and at last breaking out into the light once more, and has not even the faintest idea what is meant by such unscientific phraseology. Mr. Campbell's point, of course, is that the reason can no more explain the existence of man, or of Nature, than it can that of God; but he forgets that he must prove God's existence before asking for an explanation of it. "To postulate the existence of God," he says, "is not a more staggering proposition than to account for the existence of man." Man's existence is an established fact; that of God is not. Why postulate an existence of which no evidence can be adduced? There are mysteries in abundance in the Universe the existence of which nobody doubts —why introduce another mystery, which is greater than, and only calculated to deepen, all the rest?

Just here Mr. Campbell becomes simply a Bergsonian. What instinct, matured into intuition, is to M. Bergson, that faith is to the City Temple oracle. He even has the temerity to assure us that instinct is a much more wonderful thing than reason, though admitting that the latter has largely superseded it in man. If he is right, the lower has largely superseded the higher, which is inconceivable. He confesses that he finds it rather difficult to knock such an idea into people's minds, and we are not surprised, for it is an essentially incredible idea. Faith, we are told, is instinct spiritualised, which is surely the very worst thing that could have happened to instinct. What does faith do? Nothing but imagine and abnormally excite the emotions. Translated into feeling, faith says, "O taste and see how gracious the Lord is: blessed is the man that trusteth in him"; but reason says, "That is a lie; look at the world and see how terribly out of joint with that declaration it is." Calm, enlightened reason flatly contradicts the falsely comforting assurances of "the spiritual instinct," and ought by all means to supersede it. Newman had firm hold of the truth when he said:—

> "If I looked into a mirror and did not see my face, I should have the sort of feeling which actually comes upon me when I look into this living busy world and see no reflection of its Creator."

And yet while no reflection of God can be seen in this living busy world, faith ignores the fact, and cries out, "O taste and see how gracious the Lord is." This is an irrefutable demonstration of the essential hypocrisy of all supernatural beliefs. If a Creator existed, how infinitely humiliated he would be to know that there was no reflection, not even the slightest hint, of himself in the work of his hands. Far better have no Creator at all than such a Creator. Christian emotionalism is a sort of mental enebriation and is, in the long run, much more injurious than bodily intoxication. Mr. Campbell acknowledges the fact emphasised by Newman; and yet, like Newman, he can shut his eyes to it and sing the praises of him who, if he exists, is directly responsible for it. We prefer to believe that such a Being does not exist, and to put our trust in Monarch Reason, who, in spite of all the parsons, is slowly coming into his kingdom; and under his sagacious and benevolent reign we shall ere long enjoy a new earth, in which justice and love shall join hands and secure universal peace and plenty.

The Pathology of Conversion.—II.

IT was shown in my last article that the state of mind religiously described as "conversion" is practically confined to the period of life that falls between the ages of twelve and twenty-five. That this was the case has, naturally, been always recognised by religious organisations. The pressure of facts has compelled them to adjust their methods to the situation; and these methods, as will be seen, offer a first-rate example of the manner in which religion distorts and diverts to its own interests feelings that have, normally, a purely natural significance. Apart from professors of religion, the fact of conversion being an adolescent phenomenon has been recognised of late years by a number of psychologists, who have found the experimental method a useful and powerful instrument of research. But even with these the full significance of the facts is not seen, or, if seen, not acknowledged. There has been a too great readiness to accept the religious explanation of the subject, even after the mechanism of it has been made plain. Instead of asking why physiological and psychological changes that are common to all human beings are expressed by some —it may be the majority—in terms of religion, writers fall back on such expressions as "the awakening of the religious life," the "development of the religious instinct," etc., which are not only hopelessly unscientific, but which really miss the vital point disclosed by their own investigations. Once the real significance of adolescence is recognised, there is not alone no need for a religious explanation of what takes place, but it is not difficult to show that, from the point of view of social and individual wellbeing, religion represents a distortion of human values.

From several points of view the period of adolescence is the most important in the life of the individual. It is a time of significant organic growth, bringing about the development of new functions, with a corresponding change in both the emotional and intellectual output. Before puberty, one may say that the individual has been mainly concerned with growth or acquisition. After puberty vast tracts of nerve tissue are awakened into activity, and an era of rapid development occurs. This is strikingly true of the brain, which up to that point increases more in bulk than it develops in function. There is probably a rapid growth of new nerve connections, which occasions both physiological and mental unrest.* With the physical changes there come even greater and more striking psychological changes. The nature of the individual undergoes what is little less than a transformation. He or she is less concerned with self, and more concerned with others. They become susceptible to impressions, to sights, to sounds, by which they were formerly but little influenced. Each is conscious of new feelings, strange desires, unusual attractions, all of which find expression in that feeling of unrest, the desire to do and to spend oneself, the need for the company of the other sex, which are characteristic of youth in both sexes. The childish desire for protection weakens; the mature desire to protect expresses itself.

Now, the whole significance of these changes, physical and mental, is fundamentally sexual and social. On the one hand, it may be said to be nature's plan for the perpetuation of the species. On the other hand, it is society's method of perpetuating itself. And it is part of the "plan," so to speak, that there shall be developed instincts and capacities suitable to each phase of life as it develops. Thus it has been shown that the lengthening of infancy—the time, that is, during which the young human being is dependent upon its parents, which is much greater than that of any other animal—is nature's method of preparing the human animal for a greater degree of the capacity of adaptation or adjustment. In the same way it has been shown that the play instinct, universal throughout the whole animal world, is again nature's method of preparing the young for the more serious business of adult life.* So, in a similar manner, as childhood is being left behind and maturity approaches, there is a development of both structure and feeling, all of which find their legitimate field of operation in family and social life. If society and the race is to continue, it is essential that there shall be an emergence from the world of childhood that so largely centres around self, into that larger world in which the co-operation of others, and association with others, takes on the character of an organic need. This is the fundamental nature of what appears in the religious world as sacrifice, or, in a more normal form, the desire to serve. The whole significance of adolescence is, then, the entry of the individual into the life of the race. Its connection with religion is purely accidental.

Now, it is a statement quite beyond disproof that if we eliminate religion from the environment there is not a single feeling experienced at adolescence that cannot receive adequate gratification, not a single function that cannot be adequately exercised. It is idle to say that some people have a craving for religion at this time of life. Where an individual is in complete ignorance of the nature of his own development, and those around him are no better informed; where, moreover, there are others in a position of authority ready with a special interpretation, it is not surprising if the religious explanation is accepted. But in reality we have to form a judgment, not on the basis of what some declare they cannot do without, but on the basis of what others actually do without, and show no real loss in consequence. The value of alcohol is decided by the ability of people to go without it, not by the craving of some for it. So with religion. That some, even though it were the majority, express themselves in terms of religion proves little or nothing. It is far more significant that so large a number should find complete satisfaction for their whole nature in purely secular activities.

Leaving this aspect of the matter for the moment, let us see what is the real nature of the religious process of conversion. It has already been pointed out that the central feature of adolescence is that it is a period of rapid change and numerous fresh adjustments. But all periods of change are periods of instability and of susceptibility. While the individual is in a condition of what a scientist would call unstable equilibrium, he is peculiarly susceptible to the suggestions of those around him. In Starbuck's collection of cases, 84 per cent. of the females and 29 per cent. of the males described their conversion as being directly due to imitation, social pressure, and example. From the descriptions one reads of revival meetings, it is probable that this is an underestimate of the percentage of conversions due to these causes. Religion, like dress, has its fashions, and people moving in the same social circle are as likely to imitate in the one direction as in the other.

The full power of suggestion would be more properly considered in dealing with religious epidemics; but it is not out of place here to call attention to this factor in such a recent case as the outbreaks in Wales under the influence of semi-demented persons such as Evan Roberts. Here, apart from the suggestion and imitation operating in the actual meetings themselves, it is quite evident that people went to the gatherings in many cases quite prepared to act in accordance with the published reports. And behind this particular revival, there were numerous other revivals which had handed down the tradition of certain behavior as the characteristics of an "outpouring of the Spirit." In America, these outbreaks seem to assume a more extravagant form than amongst us. Mr. Stanley Hall, for example, thus describes a Kentucky camp meeting, in which the prevailing feature was "jerking." He says, quoting from an eye-witness, that as the meeting progressed:—

> "The crowd swarmed all night round the preacher, singing, shouting, laughing, some plunging wildly over stumps and benches into the forest, shouting 'Lost, Lost!' others leaping and bounding about like live fish out of water; others rolling over and over on the ground for hours; others lying on the ground and talking when they could not move; and yet others beating the ground with their heels. As the excitement increased, it grew more morbid and took the form of 'jerkings,' or in others the holy laugh. The jerks began with the head, which was thrown violently from side to side so rapidly that the features were blurred and the hair almost seemed to snap, and when the sufferer struck an obstacle and fell he would bounce about like a ball. Saplings were sometimes cut breast high for the people to jerk by. In one place the earth about the roots of one of them was kicked about as though by the feet of a horse stamping flies. One sufferer mounted his horse to ride away when the jerks threw him to the earth, whence he rose a Christian. A lad, who feigned illness to stay away, was dragged there by the spirit and his head dashed against a wall till he had to pray. A sceptic who cursed and swore was crushed by a falling tree. Men fancied themselves dogs, and gathered round a tree barking and 'treeing the devil.' They saw visions and dreamed dreams, and as the revival waned, it left a crop of nervous and hysterical disorders in its wake." †

We have nothing quite so bad as this to show in British revivals, although the home phenomena is not different in its nature. Thus, a medical observer of some of the earliest Methodist revivals thus describes the symptoms attending these "divine" seizures:—

> "There came on first a feeling of faintness, with rigor and a sense of weight at the pit of the stomach; soon after which the patient cried out as though in the agonies of labor. The convulsions then began, first showing themselves in the muscles of the eyelids, though the eyes themselves were fixed and staring. The most frightful contortions of the countenance followed, and the convulsions now took their course downwards, so that the muscles of the trunk and neck were affected, causing a sobbing respiration, which was performed with great effort. Tremors and agitations ensued, and the patients screamed out violently, and tossed their heads from side to side. As the complaint increased, it seized the arms, and its victims beat their breasts, clasped their hands, and made all sorts of strange noises."

In other instances connected with the early days of Methodism, one girl is described as "lying on the floor as one dead." Pews and benches were broken by the struggles of the converts. One woman "tore up the ground with her hands." Among the children who felt "the arrows of the Almighty" was a boy "who roared above his fellows, and seemed, in his agony, to struggle with the strength of a grown man. His face was as red as scarlet; and almost all on whom God laid his hand turned either very red or almost black." John Wesley personally interviewed a number of the people who were seized in this manner, and was quite convinced of the supernatural nature of the attacks. He said he had "generally observed more or less of these outward symptoms to attend the beginning of a general work of God," although he admitted that in some cases "Satan mimicked the work of God in order to discredit the whole work." † But whether God or Satan, there was no question of the supernatural origin of the phenomena.

"The Religious Bad."

"To a Protestant apprehension there will appear something unnatural in the earnest and perpetual sentiment of the relations between God and man which pervade the tragedy of The Cenci. It will especially be startled at the combination of an undoubting persuasion of the truth of the popular religion with a cool and determined perseverance in enormous guilt. But religion in Italy is not, as in Protestant countries, a cloak to be worn on particular days; or a passport which those who do not wish to be railed at carry with them to exhibit; or a gloomy passion for penetrating the impenetrable mysteries of our being, which terrifies its possessor at the darkness of the abyss to the brink of which it has conducted him. Religion coexists, as it were, in the the mind of an Italian Catholic, with a faith in that of which all men have the most certain knowledge. It is interwoven with the whole fabric of life. It is adoration, faith, submission, penitence, blind adoration; not a rule for moral conduct. It has no necessary connection with any one virtue. The most atrocious villain may be rigidly devout, and without any shock to established faith confess himself to be so. Religion pervades intently the whole frame of society, and is, according to the temper of the mind which it inhabits, a passion, a persuasion, an excuse, a refuge; never a check."—Shelley, Prefsce to The Cenci.

It is a common belief that because a man is a religious man he is also necessarily a good man. One of the hardest tasks of the Freethinker is to convince people with a religious training that a religious man may also be a bad man. The conviction that morality is the result of religious teaching has been so dinned into him that the belief in it has become a second nature. They will argue that a bad man cannot be religious; that a bad man who professes religion is a hypocrite—that he uses religion as a cloak for his badness. Or, when driven to the last ditch, they say that the religion of such a person is only superstition. In effect, they argue, all religious people are good, and all good people are religious!

Now, according to the statistics of our huge prison population, the unbelievers in some kind of religion are very few. Are we to say, then, that all these thousands are destitute of religion, or hypocrites, or the devotees of idle superstition? Put in this form, the question answers itself with all rational thinking people.

We seldom look at the Spectator; it is usually so old-fashioned, conservative, and pharisaical in its religious views that we have long given it over as hopelessly fossilised. But, glancing listlessly over the contents index of the issue for March 15, our interest was arrested by the title of an article upon "The Religious Bad." Turning to the article—which was anonymous—we were surprised to find that not only was the existence of the religious bad admitted and deplored, although the writer of the article in question is a believer in religion, yet the facts of the case are rammed home in a fashion not unworthy to adorn the pages of the Freethinker—which some of it will do before we have finished.

In the whole course of our reading we have never met with such a whole-hearted abandonment of a position which has been, and is still, so stubbornly defended by apologists for religion. The exclamation of the pious upon reading the article will be, "An enemy hath done this."

The writer begins by observing that "The religious bad are the worst enemies of religion," and goes on to explain that he is not speaking of hypocrites, or of those superstitious people who believe that luck lurks in the practice of religious formula, and who "might hesitate to plan a murder on a Friday lest the rope should reward their want of ceremony." But, setting aside the hypocrites and the superstitious, says the writer:—

> "There remain sufficient people who are religious but not moral to harass the minds of believers and fill disbelievers with scorn. As we have said, they are not hypocrites. The tenets of the creed in which they were brought up appear to them to be undeniable. Acts of worship give them pleasure. The spell of Christianity is upon them. The sacred literature of the Jews appeals to their artistic sense. They have a peculiar delight in enlarging publicly upon the (to them) very real sensations of the soul. Their religious experience is at everyone's service, and they have an unbounded curiosity to hear about someone else's. Their talk is of spiritual symptoms. Their religious bedside manners and their jargon impress many people but disgust more. If we come across them in business we shall find that they are 'not slothful,' and it is not at all improbable that they will take us in. They are as sharp as they are sanctimonious, yet we cannot say they are secular. Their minds are not bounded by the narrow limits of materialism, by birth and death, good living, and pretty things. They are aware of the things of the spirit. Their organism is sufficiently sensitive to perceive what to so many better men is imperceptible. It is the existence of such religious people as these which causes some men of affairs to say they trust no man who makes a profession of religion."

No, these men are not Secularists or Materialists—we are very glad of it—for they can perceive those things of the spirit which "to many better men" are imperceptible. The better men in this case being those who have no religion, the Secularists and Materialists.

The writer goes on to observe that money is not the only thing to which they give way. "When they yield to the sins of the flesh the scandal of their conduct is even more detrimental to the prestige of the Church." But worse still:—

> "Another grave moral defect is, alas! typical of the religious bad. They are too often pitiless. That pitilessness should accompany genuine religious feeling is unaccountable, but it is a fact that it sometimes does. Men and women who can accept the consolations of religion without its obligations become far harder than the ordinary indifferentist. For such an indifferentist the sorrows of life are common property. Suffering, separation, and poverty are the inexplicable burden of man, and end only, as they believe, with the quenching of the individuality; the secularists are often truly sorry for their fellow ephemeridæ. For the religious man, be he bad or good, the common lot is not without explanation nor without hope. The hard-hearted religionist looks upon pity as savoring too much of a criticism on the dealings of Heaven with men. To the bad religious man this is the best of all possible worlds, and he will rebuke an acquaintance for the want of faith which makes him unhappy."

Which, reduced to shorthand, means that Secularists are justified in their pity for their fellow-men, but the religiously bad, who believe that everything is ordained to happen by an Almighty God, will look upon such pity as a presumptuous criticism of God's actions; their creed, says the writer, acting like "an anæsthetic, destroying sensation in that part of the consciousness wherein kindness appears to dwell." The writer continues:—

> "Allied to these hard natures we find the religious tyrants. They are the lineal descendants of the persecutors. The law of the land is against them, but Satan can always find a job for their cruel hands—a weak person to crush, a child whose spirit they can break, or an old man or woman they may humiliate. We forget sometimes that the devil is a 'doctor of divinity.' They are no hypocrites, these hard religionists; they are honest, but they are bad; bad though they call their will their duty, bad though they hide their cruelty under a cause; yet they also may be spiritually minded, though Christians they are not.....Why it should have pleased Almighty God to reveal the truths of religion to unworthy persons who appear incapable of repentance we cannot say, but it is certain that a vast amount of truth—religious, scientific, and philosophic—is revealed to persons of very paltry character. So far as religion is concerned, the dispensation must be regarded as a mystery, and one on which the reason throws very little intellectual light."

So a man may be cruel, he may be a swindler and a sensualist, and yet a fervent believer in God. What, then, becomes of the argument so often addressed to Freethinkers that they do away with the moral restraints of religion? That if they destroy the belief in a God who will punish the bad and reward the good they will overthrow the basis of morality? Here we are faced with the fact that there are plenty of men who really and wholeheartedly believe in and worship God; they know that God sees all their actions, but they still persist in their wickedness.

Robert Louis Stevenson, the novelist, has recognised this fact of "the religious bad" in his novel, The Merry Men. After recounting how Markheim murdered the Jew for his wealth, and then becomes the prey to imaginary terrors: he fears the walls may become transparent and reveal his doings like those of bees in a glass hive; that the planks might yield under his feet and detain him in their clutches beside the body of his victim; that the house next door might catch fire and the firemen invade him from all sides. "These things he feared," continues Stevenson, "and, in a sense, these things might be called the hands of God reached forth against sin. But about God himself he was at ease; his act was doubtless exceptional, but so were his excuses, which God knew; it was there, and not among men, that he felt sure of justice." Yes, that is how the religious bad feel. About God they are at ease. He is on their side whatever they do, and all the time.

Again, in his novel The Ebb-Tide—written in collaboration with Lloyd Osbourne—when the two murderous ruffians, Captain Davis and Huish, are in the boat on their way to murder their benefactor Attwater—who, being a dead shot, they have decided to first blind by throwing vitriol in his eyes—the scoundrel Davis actually began a silent prayer:—

> "Prayer, what for? God knows. But out of his inconsistent, illogical, and agitated spirit a stream of supplication was poured forth, inarticulate as himself, earnest as death and judgment.
> "'Thou Gawd seest me!' continued Huish [his companion in crime]. 'I remember I had that written in my Bible. I remember the Bible too, all about Abinadab and parties. Well, Gawd,' apostrophising the meridian, 'you're goin' to see a rum start presently, I promise you that!"
>
> "The captain bounded. 'I'll have no blasphemy!' he cried, 'no blasphemy in my boat.'"

He did not mind helping to commit a horrible murder, but he would not allow blasphemy. That gives a true picture of the working of the mind of the "religious bad."

"But," it may be said, "these are only fictitious characters, and prove nothing." Very well, then; here is a character which is not fictitious—namely, that of Louis the Fifteenth, surnamed the "Well-beloved." Mr. Lewis Melville—himself a learned biographer and historian—in reviewing Colonel Haggard's book,* The Real Louis the Fifteenth, observes that Louis "had only two predominant interests in life—women and religion." His first mistress, the Comtesse de Toulouse, was followed by intrigues with several daughters of Madame de Nesle, and later with Madame de Pompadour, and after her death with the infamous Madame du Barri, who some years later paid for her sins in the tornado of the French Revolution, when she was borne shrieking to the guillotine and beheaded. But these were only leading ladies; there were a multitude of others. And through it all he was pious. The teachers of his youth had taken particular pains to instruct him in matters of religion, and Mr. Melville cites Colonel Haggard as saying: "These impressions never left him through life; even in the most libertine moments of his later years he would instruct the poor young girls whom he debauched, after having torn them from their homes or bought them for his pleasures." Such is the value of the restraints exercised by religion upon the lusts of the flesh.

W. MANN.

Tales of Our Times.

BY A CYNIC.

AN eminent High Court judge, travelling in the Holy Land, had gone through a very tiring day at Jerusalem, visiting the Garden of Gethsemane, the Holy Sepulchre, Mount Calvary, and other sacred spots, sanctified through past ages by the Gospel story, and made familiar to our own by Messrs. Thomas Cook & Son's excellent tourist arrangements. So deeply had the judge been impressed by the sight of these holy places, that on retiring to rest that night he had an extraordinary dream, fairly rational as dreams go, but so far incongruous and odd in that it presented some of the events of the sacred narrative in a strictly modern light, and under the sub-conscious influence of a modern judicial mind.

He dreamed that he was walking in Jerusalem some nineteen centuries ago, and, hearing the newsboys shouting the latest edition of the Jerusalem Evening News, he bought a copy of this paper. Glancing through its columns, he came across a judgment by a learned judge of the King's Bench Division relating to a case which had been tried by him in Jerusalem a few days before. So vivid was the dream that on awaking next morning the judge clearly remembered every word of this judgment, and, wishing to preserve from oblivion so curious a result of dream cerebration, he at once committed the whole production to writing. It was as follows:—

"This is a case in which the accused—an itinerant preacher, self-styled prophet, and alleged worker of miracles—is charged on three separate counts; firstly for brawling and creating a disturbance in the Temple, secondly for sedition and riot, and thirdly for armed resistance to lawful arrest and causing grievous hurt.

"I am of opinion that the first charge does not come within the jurisdiction of a civil court. The alleged brawl in the Temple seems to have arisen out of a difference of opinion between the accused and the priests regarding the rights of certain money-changers and sellers of doves to carry on their business within the Temple precincts. The civil power does not in any way interfere in the usages obtaining in the Temple of Jerusalem, and I must accordingly decline to give any further consideration to this charge, which should be dealt with by the Jewish ecclesiastical tribunal.

"The second charge is a serious one, and comes properly within the purview of this Court. The prisoner is here accused of proclaiming himself King of the Jews, of riding into Jerusalem in state, and of thereby causing a riot in the streets and a disturbance of the public peace. These are, indeed, grave charges, and if proved merit severe punishment; but on carefully weighing the evidence, it does not appear to me that the incidents really bear the serious interpretation which has been put upon them. It is true that the four principal witnesses agree broadly as to the facts, but their account of the affair convinces me that it should be regarded rather as the exploit of a foolish mountebank seeking notoriety for his fanatic notions than as a serious act of sedition. It is scarcely conceivable that a person really claiming to be King of the Jews would select such a ludicrous method of asserting his regal status as that of riding through the streets of Jerusalem on a diminutive donkey. The excitement of the populace, and the shouts acclaiming the prisoner as the 'Son of David' and the 'King of Israel' appear to me to be indicative not so much of a tendency to riot and rebellion as of a spirit of good-humored fun and a natural wish to make the most of a good joke. Seeing the self-styled 'King of the Jews' riding along on his little borrowed donkey, with a folded overcoat for a saddle, and surrounded by his solemn-visaged attendants, the populace seem to have thoroughly entered into the fun of the thing and to have given him all the adulation he expected, and perhaps even more. This view of the affair is borne out by the remarkable fact that the so-called riot seems to have subsided as suddenly as it began, and that the streets along which the mirth-provoking spectacle had passed relapsed into their usual sobriety as soon as the 'King of the Jews' had moved on.

"I now come to the third charge—that of armed resistance and causing grievous hurt. The evidence here is not at all satisfactory; indeed, there is no evidence whatever against the accused personally, and the whole account is discredited by several suspicious features. The first three witnesses mention the fact that soon after the party entered the garden the prisoner's attendants fell into a deep sleep, and yet we are given a circumstantial account of certain words and acts of the prisoner while the only possible eye-witnesses were buried in slumber. As to the so-called armed resistance, the first two witnesses stated that one of the prisoner's disciples cut off an ear of one of the arresting party. The third witness said it was the 'right ear' that was cut off, and that the prisoner miraculously healed the wound. This was surely a sufficiently striking incident to have impressed itself strongly on all the witnesses, yet the other three seem to know nothing at all about it. The fourth witness also specifies the 'right ear,' and gives the name of the owner of the ear as Malchus; but it is curious that the prosecution has not called this man Malchus, whose evidence would have been more decisive than that of all the other witnesses combined. The fourth witness, moreover, gives the name of the disciple who committed the assault, which none of the others do; and he makes a most remarkable statement to the effect that, on the prisoner inquiring of the officers who had come to arrest him as to whom they sought, the whole party 'went backwards and fell to the ground.' This is, of course, alleged to be another miracle, and the fact that it is mentioned only by the fourth witness throws considerable doubt on his veracity. Indeed, the whole evidence of this fourth witness is open to grave suspicion, and has to be received with the greatest caution.

"The prosecution has attempted to bolster up a weak case by bringing forward some incidents of the prisoner's past career which are supposed to prove that he was a Sabbath-breaker, a blasphemer, and given to wanton destruction of other people's property; and, before closing this judgment, I should like to make a few remarks on these points. The alleged Sabbath-breaking is of such a trivial nature as to be scarcely worth notice. The eating of grains of corn while walking through a field would appear to any rational mind to involve no greater desecration of the Sabbath Day than the eating of bread in one's house. And as to the performance of miracles on the Sabbath Day, the law prohibits work only, and it is doubtful whether the performance of a miracle would come under this description, as it seems to be the essential nature of a miracle that its performance requires no physical effort whatever—a mere act of volition on the part of the miracle-worker being sufficient to bring about the most stupendous results. The blasphemy alleged against the prisoner seems to have consisted in his declaration of a divine mission, and of a mysterious filial relationship to the Deity. Now, blasphemy really means an insult to the Deity, but I can find no element of any such insult in the prisoner's words or conduct. These seem to me to indicate, not blasphemy at all, but merely an exaggerated megalomania. As to the wanton destruction of property, the most serious case put forward is what the learned counsel for the defence wittily described as the 'Devilled pork affair.' To a believer in the reality of demoniacal possession, the prisoner's conduct in this case of the Gadarene swine should seem quite justifiable—indeed, it is difficult to see how he could have acted otherwise. It seems that devils have a strong partiality for occupying the bodies of human beings, and therefore to eject a 'legion' of them from a man without providing other habitation would be merely to court public disaster, for in all probability they would speedily invade the bodies of other people, and thus many would suffer for the relief of one. It was obviously the wiser and more humane course to accede to the devils' own request and permit them to enter the swine.

"To sum up, I find that no valid case has been made out against the prisoner, who seems to be not the seditious agitator, the dangerous rebel, the aspirant to the throne of David, which his enemies represent him to be, but merely an ignorant fanatic, believing himself to be charged with a divine mission, and to be possessed of supernatural powers. I accordingly acquit him of the accusations brought against him in this case, but would advise him carefully to avoid in future any breach of the public peace while propagating his opinions. In a free country, any and every opinion, however extravagant, may be openly proclaimed — any doctrine, however eccentric, may be freely taught; but this inalienable right involves the corresponding duty of respecting the existing conditions of social order."

THE BELLS.

An American tourist was contemplating—from the outside—a quaint old chapel in one of the cathedral towns of England. In a near-by spire the chimes began to ring. A venerable clergyman issued from the ivy-covered pile, and, observing the look of rapt attention upon the stranger's face, was moved, out of the goodness of his heart, to approach and engage him in conversation appropriate to the time and the place.

"My friend," he began, "does not the sound of those sweet bells fall like a benediction upon the soul?"

The American gazed at him blankly and cupped one hand behind his ear in order to hear better.

"Which?" he inquired.

The old rector raised his voice and shouted louder.

"I say that those lovely chimes seem to float down to us like a message of love and peace from on high. Do you not agree with me that theirs is a message from Heaven?"

"I'm sorry," said the visitor, "but still I don't seem to get you."

The clergyman made a funnel of his hand in front of his mouth.

"I merely wished to ask you if you too did not feel that the music coming from that tower yonder was truly celestial music, freighted with hope and beauty and glorious tidings?"

"Mister," explained the American, "the truth of the matter is that those damned bells make so much racket I can't hear a word you say."

Acid Drops.

If you start flogging for one offence there is really no reason why you should not flog for all. It is a short and easy method with offenders, a kind of universal cure for wrong-doing, and, above all, one that appeals powerfully to lazy minds and brutal natures. A witness before the Select Committee of the House of Commons, which is inquiring into the number of accidents in the London streets, said that in West Ham danger was incurred by children riding behind tramcars. The witness said that the West Ham Stipendiary entirely endorsed the view that the magistrates should be empowered to order the birch "as the only effective deterrent in the case of children." Again, we say, why not? The exercise of a brutal feeling cannot be curbed by an age limit. And there is no reason that we can see why this admirable Stipendiary's advice should not be carried still further. Nothing effective has yet been discovered that will stop children climbing trees, swinging on gates, shouting in the streets, or throwing snowballs at passers-by. May we venture to suggest the birch for all these things? And if anyone is of opinion that a birching will put common sense into the heads of certain advocates of the whip, he may put our name down as in favor of that recommendation also.

When the Government does take in hand the education question, it looks as though some kind of "right of entry" will be proposed. Lord Crewe, in the course of a semi-official speech said:—

> "I think it ought not to be impossible to devise means by which those parents who would prefer that their children should attend a school of an undenominational character should have a better chance of doing so than they have at this moment; nor do I altogether despair of the possibility of getting over what we all agree is the difficult fence—the giving of special religious instruction by a particular denomination."

We do not think that there is much hope of "right of entry" being agreed to by Nonconformists, and the objections to it from a purely educational point of view should be decisive. Still, it is just possible that by outlining a showy scheme of educational reform the Government might induce the rival religious sects to agree with their proposals. And in that case we should have the blunder of 1870 repeated. A new form of the religious incubus will be established, and it will prove itself as obstructive to educational progress as did the 1870 compromise. If only the Government could screw up its courage and end the religious squabble by proposing a measure of Secular Education, it is within the bounds of probability that it would pass, and the road be cleared for genuine educational development. At any rate, failure of the Government could not be more humiliating, nor its position more contemptible, than in connection with its previous attempts to please those whose really vital interest in the schools is to use them as training grounds for church or chapel.

Very late in the day the Christian Commonwealth awakens to the lying character of the orthodox religious tract. It says that "the stories themselves, the incidents they retail, are simply not true, and would not impose upon an intelligent frog. To hand such literature to chance wayfarers is equivalent to the exposure and sale of indecent prints." We quite agree; only we would point out that tracts of the kind described are written for neither intelligent frogs nor intelligent human beings. They are written by the congenitally religious for the incurably stupid. And it is really complimentary to class such productions with indecent literature. Indecent literature usually shows more intelligence than the average tract, and is not nearly so harmful in its effects. The harm in life is not done by the frankly indecent or by the obviously dishonest, but by indecency masquerading as purity, and by falsehood posing as truth. We agree with the Christian Commonwealth that "there is an obscenity of the spirit as vile as anything which the police have orders to suppress." It only needs adding that Christian circles have been unusually rich in the production of this kind of "obscenity."

The worst forms of misconduct are those which the law does not and cannot touch. The comparatively trifling offence of circulating bogus coins comes within the range of police activities, but the circulation of false notions on matters of morals and of the intellectual life are necessarily beyond them. There is no safeguard here save a keen sense of personal honor and of social responsibility. And we have always insisted that in this direction the pulpit occupies a fairly low position in the life of the nation. In no other department of public life are statements made with so little care for their accuracy. It is the simple truth that if a man carried into the political, or even into the business, world the practices of the pulpit, he would soon find his career at an end in the one case, and his credit ruined in the other case. The Christian Commonwealth says "we are beginning to think that what is most needed in religious journalism at the present time is the same standard of personal honor that we expect from secular journalists, which will prohibit them from writing what they do not believe." We do not think that "secular journalists" are very scrupulous on the subject, but their laxity here is very often traceable to religious influences. At any rate, it is quite true that religious journalism in general falls below journalism in other directions, just as pulpit veracity falls below the veracity of the Secular platform.

Rev. Lord William Cecil appears to rejoice that the Turks, "who in times past despised Christians," are now defeated. We do not know that being defeated will make intelligent Turks despise Christians less. It is certain that the treatment of the Turks by the Allies will not make them love Christians more. The West may overcome the East, but that is quite a different question as to whether the East is benefited or not by the subjugation. The West, says Lord Cecil, must inevitably conquer because she is the strongest, and "where she has been resisted, she crushed." This is quite true, and this is the sole ground of Christian advance. At present the balance of brute force lies with the Christian nations of the world, and Christians are not slow to press their advantage. It was sheer brute force, for example, that established Christian missionaries in China, a country in which Lord Cecil seems peculiarly interested. Apart from that, Christian missionaries would have had the same chance there as other propagandists, and would have given it up as hopeless. It is a mistake to imagine that the Chinese ever objected to peaceful propaganda by alien religions. What they did object to was the religion that came with the gunboat, and used the latter to set native laws at defiance and to trample upon native customs. Western civilisation, apart from Christianity, says Lord Cecil, is an awful thing. We beg to say that Christianity, using the resources of civilisation as a means of spreading its teaching, is a still more awful thing, and one that many of the weaker nations have good cause to remember, and hate.

Rev. Thomas Sheepshanks, of Harrogate, left £95,252. He couldn't have done much better (or worse) if his name had been Goatshanks.

From a special article in the Christian World, we learn that during the past ten years the Salvation Army has "helped" 400 men from the farm colony at Hadleigh to Canada. Some have come from "various unions, boards of guardians paying their expenses." This has been done, we are told, in accordance with the plan outlined in the late General's book. We beg to differ. The plan outlined was to get hold of the human refuse of the cities, bring them back to manhood on a farm colony, and then send them abroad. How many of those 40 cases per year represent human wreckage saved by the Salvation Army? Precious few; and of these the expenses have been paid by others, the Army merely getting its usual profit. Moreover, what proportion does this emigration of 40 per year bear to the Army's total activity in this field. For or five years ago the Army was boasting of sending out nearly 20,000 annually. On this number it received a capitation grant from the Canadian Government and commissions from the shipping companies. All of this represented a mere business. Consider the proportion of the 40 "helped" to the 20 000 total, and one gets a fair conception of the relations of the philanthropic activities of the Army to its business enterprise.

In the Burton Daily Mail for March 31, there is a report of a sermon preached by the Rev. A. Grafftey Smith in memory of the Rev. G. W. Allen, late vicar of Brethy Parish Church, in which he related that the late vicar was once upon a time a member of the Christian Philosophical Society, London, in connection with which he was said to have converted Atheist after Atheist to a saving belief in the Christian religion. Mr. Smith said:—

> "Instead of going to the finest services, he made his way Sunday evening after Sunday evening to Hyde Park, to convince souls as keen and intellectual as his own of the truth of the Gospel. He was successful in winning back some of those Agnostic intellectuals, and many in London would ever thank God that they came across that great mind which exposed the fallacy of their early belief."

Some of the world's greatest men pass their lives in obscurity, and we must confess our ignorance of the redoubtable Mr. Allen's existence, as also of the "Agnostic intellectuals" who have been led by him back to the faith. It is not by any means the first time we have heard of such wonderful conversions, and the brilliancy of the performance is only equalled by the modesty which refrains from giving verifiable names. Candidly, we are wondering whether the late Mr. Allen had been romancing on his own account, or whether Mr. Smith has been romancing for him.

We cut the following from the Leeds Mercury of Wednesday, April 9:—

> "Extraordinary scenes were witnessed in Barnsley last night. A man, quietly dressed in an overcoat and cap, mounted an orange-box on Market Hill, and commenced to speak on Atheism.
> "It was not long before he had raised a hornet's nest about his ears. He was pulled down from his stand by the crowd, who commenced to hustle him.
>
> "He tried to make himself heard, but it was of no avail. He was driven up and down the hill for a time, but eventually he moved in another direction. He tried to to go up Market-street, but found the road impassable. Still buffeted from one side to another he went along Cheapside.
>
> "By this time the crowd had attained alarming dimensions, and he was followed by thousands of men, women, and children, all hooting and yelling frantically. From Cheapside he turned up New-street and then along Wellington-street, across Peel-square, and to his starting place at the foot of Market Hill.
> "He unsuccessfully tried to break away, and it appeared as though he was going to have an even rougher passage, when the uniform of a police-inspector loomed in the centre of the crowd. The unfortunate man was escorted by the inspector, still followed by his enormous and unwelcome retinue, to the borough police-office, where there was another big shout as he entered.
> "The police could not say last night that any particular charge would be preferred against him, he had been locked up for his own safety."

"The unfortunate man" sends us the cutting himself. He is the young man who was sentenced to three months' imprisonment some time ago under the Blasphemy Laws. He had been lecturing under the name of Bullock, his real name being Stephens. He appears to have been holding meetings again lately, some being quiet and orderly, and some otherwise. He asks us to advise him whether he should return to Barnsley. We really cannot do anything of the kind. Everyone must decide for himself in these cases. We should have to say the same if Paul asked us whether to should return to the "beasts at Ephesus."

We are no friends of assassination or of any other kind of violence. If the evils of the world cannot be cured by reason, they will never be cured by armies and navies, battleships and big guns, rifles, swords, or other "respectable" agencies of wholesale slaughter; neither will they be remedied by the knives and pistols of assassins or other retail killers of their fellow men. But why should the low-class murderer be the object of unlimited denunciation while the high-class murderer is the object of unlimited praise. The King of Greece, to our mind, stood on no higher moral level than the obscure citizen who shot him. Each took life for his own purposes. The assassin, however, took but one, while the "valiant King" was taking the lives of thousands. In due course the assassin will be put to death by some "civilised" process of annihilation, or relegated to a death-in-life of continuous torture; while the dead King, after being buried with every mark of honor, including the blessing of God through the lips of hireling priests, goes down to history as a noble martyr. Such is human justice and human sense!

Neither the intellect nor the character of King Alfonso sheds any lustre upon Spain. But there seems no reason to suppose that the next King of Spain would be any improvement on the present one. Killing him, therefore, would be foolish as well as wicked. No doubt it will be firmly believed that his escape from the assassin's bullet was due to the intervention of Providence; but no explanation will be offered as to the lack of providential interposition in the case of the King of Greece.

Why do not English journalists try to reconcile their piety with a little attention to the English language? They persist in describing the action of the assassin, whether attempted or successful, as "dastardly." Now that is precisely what it is not. The man goes to certain death (or worse) himself. He knows his risk and runs it, he knows the penalty and pays it, he treats his own life as a pawn in the game. He may be stupid and immoral, but he proves he is no coward. We repeat that "dastardly" is the most inexact description of his conduct. That it is always used on these occasions shows the brainlessness of ordinary journalism.

"There could be no greater misfortune," says the Catholic Times, "than that reforms which would leave women without the protection assured them by the Christian religion should meet with success." We really do not know what protection has ever been assured to women by Christianity. Our social records show that it never protected them against the most villainous exploitation in mines and workshops, nor did it prevent women, when married, losing the legal protection they once possessed against brutal husbands. It is true that some measure of this protection was afterwards regained, but Christian opposition had to be beaten down first. Historically, Christianity has been fairly consistent in preaching the subordination of woman to man, and has powerfully assisted in getting that subordination legally expressed. All that the Catholic Times has in its mind is the possibility of the institution of marriage developing beyond the control of Christian Churches. But it will take more than the obscure warnings of religious papers to prevent the gradual secularisation of marriage. In all its essentials this is a social institution, and its precise form should, and must, be ultimately determined by social requirements. The interest of the Church in marriage is that control of it gives it the first clutch on the children. Release marriage from the control of the Church, and it will no longer be so easy to convert parents into the unconscious enemies of their children's welfare.

The late Pierpont Morgan was a very rich man, but his great fortune only represented acquisition; he produced nothing, he added not one cent. to the world's wealth, every dollar he made involved a dollar's loss to some other person or persons. His nose and mouth showed his place in the biological scale. We are quite pleased to know that he belonged to the Christian fold. He had even made his own arrangements for his funeral, including the services of three Bishops and a negro soloist. It is presumable that he is now in heaven. A French lady said that God would think twice before damning a gentleman of quality. No doubt the same Being would think thrice before damning a multi-millionaire.

The Welsh parson who threatened to burn the Welsh Church Bill on the steps of St. Paul's Cathedral put himself on the level of the women who throw filth into letter-boxes. In not carrying out his threat he showed that his courage was worthy of his intelligence.

It was Montenegro that first unfurled the banner of the Cross during the Balkans war. It is this same Montenegro that Sir Edward Grey accuses of pursuing a war of conquest in the operations against Scutari. That is really what the soldiers of the Cross have been doing from the very beginning. Turkish tyranny was only a pretence.

The Church of England Peace League recently made an endeavor to get clergymen to pass resolutions in their churches in favor of the Peace Movement. A thousand circulars were sent out, and only six felt that the matter was important enough to warrant reply. Only three passed resolutions in favor of peace. Three only out of one thousand! And these are the people who are telling us so much about Christianity being the religion of peace!

A lady, Mrs. Carus-Wilson, is delivering a course of lectures at the Church House, Westminster, on "The Present Crisis in the Church." Naturally she opposes Disestablishment, and quite as naturally she cites France as an awful example of what Disestablishment leads to. France, we are told, has suffered twice by Disestablishment—once at the time of the great revolution, and again within recent years. A less prejudiced student of the subject would be inclined to say that what France really suffered from was the establishment of the Church, not its disestablishment. It is simply beyond question that amongst the agencies that reduced pre-revolutionary France to a condition of almost unimaginable distress and degradation, so far as the mass of the people were concerned, none played a more sinister part than the Church. It held to its feudal rights with even more tenacity than the ordinary nobility, and, worse than that, dragooned the people to the service of the small governing class. It is true, as the lecturer said, that Napoleon re-established the Church; but this was not because Napoleon had any real fondness for the Church, but purely from motives of policy. Quite apart from the fact that Napoleon saw that the Church could materially help him at his own game, the Disestablishment of the Church did not mean the destruction of religion. The mass of the people were still religious, still Christian; and in the interests of social order it was felt that the Church must be controlled. This has been felt by great statesmen from the time of Constantine onwards. When the mass of the people have grown beyond religious belief, affairs can be left to look after themselves. But with the mass of the people intensely superstitious, the Churches possess a power of social disruption that ruling statesmen have always felt must be regulated if chaos is to be avoided.

The second awful example is supplied by the answer recently given to a question by a French schoolchild. Asked as to whom it owed breath, food, life, and all the privileges it enjoyed—a question to which "an English child would naturally have answered, 'God'"—the French child replied, "L'etat." We do not know whether the story is genuine or not, but we are quite prepared to affirm that the alleged answer of the French child is more intelligible and more justifiable than the assumed answer of the English child would have been. For we really do get all the privileges we enjoy from the State—or, as we prefer it, from Society. It is social life that gives us our language, our manners, our customs, and which protects us from the cradle to the grave. No one knows that "God" has anything to do with it. Society is a tangible fact; "God" is a mere hypothesis, and of no use to anyone or anything when we use it. Answer for answer, we vastly prefer to put our money on the French child's reply. And if a recognition of the power and reality of social intercourse is one of the products of Disestablishment, the sooner it comes the better.

A little time back, Southport, being an exceedingly moral and religious town, declined to permit anything so demoralising as Sunday trams. Sunday tides are still in vogue, but their cessation is more properly a matter for prayer than legislation. But we learn from the Vicar of St. Andrew's, of Southport, that the town is "notorious for its Sunday picture shows, in which concerns we have no doubt many of the Christians who voted against the trams running on Sunday have money invested. The vicar now calls upon all pious souls to be up and doing. He does not oppose "a clean, instructive cinema on weekdays," but he strongly protests against these clean, instructive shows on Sunday. Other towns do not allow them, he points out. "Liverpool, Bootle, and Birkenhead scout such an idea." The vicar might have added that many other towns do allow them, and there is a general testimony from the police that they have a wholly beneficial effect on the moral health of the town. But to have pointed this out would have been to have put the case fairly, and fairness is certainly not a marked characteristic of the "Christian conscience" to which the vicar appeals.

We see from the Christian that an American converted baseball player, Mr. Sunday, after one week's revival campaign, received as his share of the proceeds 21,000 dollars. There were 18,833 "inquirers," so that Mr. Sunday received over one dollar per head for each "inquirer." Mr. Sunday says that he would have worked just as hard if he hadn't received a cent. And he asks, "What do I want with the money?" We don't know, but it is clear that he got it. If Mr. Sunday finds its possession troublesome, we have no doubt that the churches in which he preached would be glad of it. We imagine, too, that Mr. Sunday finds a share in the gate-money of a revival meeting a little more remunerative than playing baseball.

The Executive Committee of the Protestant Reformation Society protested against the Admiralty placing a British warship at the disposal of the Papal Legate for the purpose of conveying him to the Eucharistic Congress at Malta. The Committee considers it an insult to "loyal Protestants" all over the empire. We do not see that the Admiralty is less justified in doing what it has done for Roman Catholics than it would be in doing a similar action for Protestants. Roman Catholics are as much part of the State as Protestants, and as long as the State is not sensible or logical enough to leave all religious sects alone, it is at least an approach to fairness to treat them all alike. All or none implies a sensible policy. A selection involves not only unwarranted favoritism, it is a direct encouragement to sectarian bigotry and stupidity.

I've been properly amazed to find how often I catch myself seeing eye to eye with the Almighty.....I've lived so near to God, that 'tis with me as it was with Moses on the Mount. I've caught a bit of the Shine.—Eden Phillpotts, "Widecombe Fair."

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £107 2s. 5d. Received since :—M. J. Charter, 10s.; Anno Domini (per C. Cohen), £2; R. Miller (delayed), 2s. 6d.; W. P., £2 2s.; W. W., 2s. 6d.; E. Adams, £2; G. L. Alward (per Miss Vance), £1 1s.

A. MILLAR.—"The still sad music of humanity" is Wordsworth's, not George Eliot's.

KATHERINE TIZNEY.—Pleased to have your sympathetic little letter. We are glad to know that many readers look upon us as "a very dear friend" without any personal acquaintance, merely for the work's sake.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for your well-selected cuttings.

R. N. MCNAIRN.—A pertinent illustration.

T. C. P. (Rhodesia).—We decline to soil our pages with such Christian filth. Contradicting it is merely giving it currency. We wonder you don't see this.

E. B.—Thanks for enclosures.

M. J. CHARTER.—Shall be pleased to see you at the N. S. S. Conference on Whit-Sunday—with other Tynesiders.

A. J. MARRIOTT.—Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary (in English) is not now in print, but can sometimes be met with secondhand.

JOSEPHINE M. HURCUM.—You can fully rely upon the "Personals." Mr. Foote is ever so much better. It is he who tells you so, and thanks you for your pleasant letter.

T. P. W.—We cannot recall at the moment any publication devoted to the subject and dealing with the period you name. Files of advanced newspapers might provide you with the information desired. With regard to your volumes of the National Reformer—1871-80, an advertisement in our columns might secure you a purchaser for them.

H. PHILLIPS.—Miss Vance has written you on some of the points in your letter. We regret, with you, that there has been a dearth of Freethought lectures in Cardiff of late, but there is no good reason why this should continue. We believe that a large part of South Wales is ripe for Freethought propaganda, but it lies with those on the spot to take the initiative. Glad you have derived so much benefit from the Freethinker.

E. RICHMOND.—Thanks. Crowded out this week, but will be used in next issue.

A. P., subscribing to the President's Honorarium Fund, writes:—"I shall be glad to find in next week's Freethinker that you are again in the saddle—though your supporters have no fault to find with the conducting of the paper during your illness. Would that the Freethinker could pay for a permanent 'sub' with anything like the ability, learning, and zeal of the late Mr. Wheeler."

W. DODD.—Certainly you could not claim exemption on the ground stated, as the law distinctly provides for the affirmation of those having no religious belief. Apart from that, your treatment by the chairman appears to have been ungracious enough. He, apparently, thought that courtesy was unnecessary with an Atheist; and Atheists must, we suppose, expect such treatment from those whose Christianity leaves no room for the exercise of either good taste or good manners.

S. E. NOAKES.—(1) We do not know the particulars of Cardinal Vanutelli's entry into the Roman Catholic Church, but there is nothing surprising in men sacrificing possessions in their devotion to an idea. Whether it be a religious idea or a secular idea matters little. And even the Church cannot live on interested folly. Disinterestedness has to play its part there as elsewhere. (2) We do not pretend to explain why certain scientists profess themselves devout Christians. We are content to assert that their Christianity finds no warranty in their science.

A. BONAR.—The pansy is the floral emblem of thought, and is the one generally adopted by Continental Freethinkers. The colors of the N. S. S. are as near as possible the old Northampton Bradlaugh colors.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Personal.

THE real winter of 1912-1913 is just upon us—in April. Balmier weather would do me, and many other people, a lot of good. But we must all wait for it with as much patience as we can. And I have always been fairly well provided with that quality since I waited twelve months for a door to open. So I go out of doors, and roam about as much as I am able, gaining a little fresh strength every day. And I shall want it soon—for I see some hard fighting before me in the near future. Meanwhile I have once more to thank Mr. Cohen for occupying the editorial chair in my absence. I think I may promise a front-page article in next week's Freethinker. I started writing one for this week's issue, but found I had not enough mental elasticity to do the subject justice. If it had pleased my readers it would not have pleased me.

G. W. FOOTE.

Sugar Plums.

The following message from the West Ham N. S. S. Branch arrived too late for last week's Freethinker:—

> "This Branch expresses its sincere sympathy with Mr. G. W. Foote in his grave illness, notes with much relief the improvement in his condition, and heartily wishes him a speedy return to health. May he live to enjoy many years of activity and leadership in the cause of causes."

Mr. Foote acknowledged this beautiful message by letter, but that does not preclude its publication for the readers of this journal.

There was another fine audience at Stratford Town Hall on Sunday last to listen to Mr. Lloyd. A little opposition was offered at the end, and a few questions asked, each of which was satisfactorily dealt with. The person who made himself so obnoxious on the previous Sunday wisely stayed away, and there was nothing to mar the harmony of the evening. To-day (April 20) Mr. Lloyd visits Leicester, and we hope that the Leicester folk will give him the large audience he deserves.

The last of the Stratford lectures will be delivered by Miss Kough. We trust that East End "saints" will see that the course finishes in good style and with a full house. Miss Kough's title is an attractive one, and it should be a good occasion for Freethinkers to introduce lady friends to the meetings.

"One of the speakers at a meeting held in London recently to demand the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws was George Bernard Shaw, the playwright. In order to maintain his reputation for eccentricity, Mr. Shaw 'referred to Atheists as genuinely religious persons because under this system of religious persecution in Great Britain nobody but a thoroughly religious person could call himself an Atheist. This, he admitted, might seem a paradox to superficial persons.' Mr. Shaw seems to be seized with the mistaken view that all sincerity of conviction is of necessity religious. This led him to say that 'the Blasphemy Laws, so far from being directed against persons who vilify Christianity, are directed against the persons who affirm the truth of Christianity.' If he had said 'the truth about Christianity' he would have scored, but if that was his idea he failed to get it over."—Truthseeker (New York).

Sir Hiram Maxim's volume entitled Li Hung Chang's Scrap-Book has for its sub-title "Missionaries and Opium—The Case for China." It will be published on April 25. Having seen an advance copy, we are already in a position to say that the missionaries and their friends will have something to answer. But will they do it? Or will they resort once more to the old conspiracy of silence? We shall see.

Cross and Crescent in the Balkans.

In my article on "Religion and Rapine in the Balkans" (Freethinker, February 2), I stated that the Balkan nations have sullied their triumphant career of conquest and racial revenge by a revival of the crusading spirit of the Middle Ages, and I drew attention to the massacres, rapes, and robberies inflicted upon the hapless Jews of Salonica as evidences of the brutalising influences of Christianity when motives derived from religious animosity are imported into modern warfare. If we may judge by the consenting silence of that amorphous thing which christens itself public opinion, the prayer of modern piety in this country (and other countries, too) is but a smug variant of the familiar petition: "Give us this day our daily press." Our daily press, with few but honorable exceptions, supplies the need of the hungry Christian soul for journalistic pabulum, and its voracious readers are fed, so far as the Balkans are concerned, with the bread that is either treacled over with lies or sodden with slimy half-truths. We hear little of the fatal leap back taken by our twentieth-century civilisation to the all-but-forgotten savageries of the Middle Ages, nor of the guilty connivance of our Christian governments—a connivance partly of soulless laissez-faire and partly of callous approval—in the nameless and all but unparalleled abominations that have marked the Bulgarian, Servian, Montenegrin, and Greek armies, which, in the conduct of the Balkan War, have taken Christ as their watchword and extermination as their guiding principle. The sensation created, a few weeks ago, by the wholesale forced conversions of Catholics and the brutal murder of the heroic Father Palic, who declined to be "converted," have indeed, brought the might of Austria into play against the mediæval Montenegrins, but, unfortunately, Austria's intervention is not made on behalf of humanity, per se, but for Jingo ends and for the protection of her Catholic subjects against the proselytising ferocities of the Greek Church.

The Albanian Catholics are lucky in having elicited the sympathy of Austria, but the raped, robbed, and murdered Jews of Salonica, and the murdered Moslems in the conquered country generally, have found no champion amidst the chancelleries of Europe. The outrages, therefore, are to go on, and the work of extermination is to be continued, so far as European governments are concerned—first, because the Turks are not Christians; secondly, because there is no national axe to grind on the millstone of intervention; and, thirdly, because of the avowed plea that, pending the final termination of the war, the nation that would seek to stay the hand of destruction would be open to the suspicion of intervening for base ulterior purposes.

No serious attempt has been made to deny the general accusation against the conquering Christians of terrible cruelty committed upon the Moslem "bottom dogs" in Thrace and Macedonia. Since my last article was written, these accusations found terrible expression in a Munich paper, Mars, in an article written by the well-known and respected Dr. Hans Barth. I am indebted to our Lausanne contemporary (La Libre Pensée internationale, March 1) for the heartrending particulars which this indignant eye-witness gives of these Balkan abominations. Dr. Barth's article is, unfortunately, too long for presentation here; I can only attempt to reproduce from his horrifying descriptions some of the more salient features of atrocity. Never, he says, has the shocking abyss that yawns between Christian doctrine and its putting into practice struck him more forcibly than during this war:—

> "In all their lives, Cæsar Borgia, Torquemada, and Tilly did not carry on so many ravages as the Balkan clergy, the true instigator of these horrors, have committed during these few months. Even the most furious Spanish fanatic must sink into insignificance when compared with these priests who cut Turkish throats in the name of Christ!"

In a vivid description, he shows us the filthy "popes" (or Greek priests), with their tresses of hair agglutinated by dirt, drinking heavily at the café, perhaps to drown the nauseating stench of the piles of corpses around, while offering their hands to be kissed by the soldiers, who, "with the benediction of the papà's," rush forth to the commission of fresh murders!

Dr. Barth states that at Salonica and its environs the work of massacre has gone on gaily. He cites a letter from a consul stating that (apparently in Macedonia only) "at least 240,000 Turks have been assassinated"! As a pendant to this, he declares that, at a lunch at which he was present in one of the Embassies at Constantinople, the statement—which he believes to be perfectly true—was made that at least 34,000 Turkish women and children were strangled by the Bulgarians alone, their sole crime being that they were not Christians! And Dr. Barth adds that neither for these victims nor for the 240,000 victims in Macedonia did the innumerable bands of priests who accompanied the Christian army raise a single finger to save the poor wretches!

If the enlightened reader imagines that the Middle Ages are a thing of the past, let him ponder this awful description of these "soldiers of Christ" who have risen and put their armor on. The words I now give are those of Dr. Barth:—

> "See how beautiful they are, these modern cavaliers of the Cross! The twenty thousand heads of hair tied with buckles dripping with grease, these men in a costume half bandit and half melodrama, with a poignard stuck in their clothes! Twenty thousand furious brothers in Christ, with whom it is not prudent to take two steps in the street, especially the Cretes, individuals comparable to the most savage brutes of all ages, and who, only two years ago, under the leadership of Greek officers, burnt the villages of their allies and impaled and sabred the inhabitants! But what are these Greek assassins as compared with the Bulgarian comitatjis? Perambulating arsenals, their heads like those of wild beasts, with hair on end, and all uncovered! Monsters than whom I would prefer to embrace a hyena! Alas! how these super-hyenas are mild, and tender, and supple when the priest comes near them. How they rush to lick the hands of the 'pope.' As for the pope himself, servant of Christ and minister of the doctrine of pardon, where and when has he, even once, uplifted his hand to pardon or to reconcile?"

Dr. Barth insists that it was not solely the so-called bandits, the non-military elements, who performed these atrocities. The regular troops were no less culpable. The Bulgarians were as bad as the Servians. As for the Greeks, go to Salonica, says Dr. Barth, and the German, Austrian, French, and Italian Consuls and the different European colonies there will give you a tale of horror that will make your hair stand on end with dismay.

Dr. Barth enters into the most painful particulars of these abominations. On the capture of Caralla, arrest was made not only of Turkish functionaries, lawyers, rich people, but of a lot of poor wretches whose crime consisted in not being Christians, together with a large number of Jews, "who were particularly odious to the Greeks because they are friends of the Turk and tolerant in religion and politics." Every night, at about 9 o'clock, some dozens of prisoners (the first batch consisted of 39) were taken out of prison, stripped of clothing to the waist, tied three by three, and flung into the dried bed of a river. Then came the atrocious butchery. With poignards, yatagans, bayonets, they slashed and cut to pieces the human heap of suffering until there was nothing left but an enormous mass of bleeding flesh. The ruffians left the still palpitating heap of convulsive bodies, and on the following evening came with a fresh number of victims. The Reign of Terror lasted for ten days, and during that time the mangled bodies remained without burial, empoisoning the air. The whole population went to the scene where these butcheries were transacted, and the European eye-witnesses of these horrors assure Dr. Barth that many of these poor wretches were hacked to pieces from head to foot. One of the specialities of Christian piety consisted in the mutilation of the sexual organs*—all for the crime of being Turks or Jews. Dr. Barth insists that these atrocities were known to the foreign Consuls, and although the ordinary diplomatic means of communication were open between the Consuls and their respective governments; although, in fact, two foreign ships of war were actually in the port of Caralla at the time, the murder and mutilation went on without protest. For this cowardly connivance with a great crime, history will call our twentieth-century politicians gravely to account before the eyes of posterity.

Confirmation of these atrocities is all too certain. An able Russian author, M. Pawlovitch, writing in Contre la Guerre,† cites a long series of articles in the well-known Russian review, Kijewskaja Mysl, giving terrifying pictures of executions en masse and without trial, of innumerable hangings and murder of wounded Turks while under the care of the Bulgarian Red Cross, and the systematic slaughter of entire columns of Turkish prisoners by the Christian soldiers who escorted them. Kijewskaja Mysl asks, despairingly, where are the thousands of wounded Turks which the Bulgarian Army Staff boasted before Europe that they had captured? According to Pawlovitch, the details published in the Russian review make it clear that all the excesses in the wars of the last five decades pale before the atrocious details of the Balkan War, in which the conquerors openly declared that everything was permissible in dealing with the Turks. If even a Liberal Russian writer, Doroschewitsch, could write that "it was necessary to tan the hides of the Turks"; if he could accept the doctrine that the Turkish prisoners should be "treated like caged hyenas, without hatred, but with all disgust"; and could enjoin upon the Slav armies to drench their natal soil with the blood of the infidel, "and pave the road to liberty with their corpses"; if all this could be written in the Russian "Liberal" press, not much stretch of imagination is needed to picture what would be the attitude of the Bulgarian and Servian press towards the "damned unbeliever," the traditional enemy of the Christian Church. All wars bring to the surface the savage atavisms of the primitive brute in man, and no war is exempt from atrocities, in spite of the "love one another" inculcations of a hypocritical two-thousand-years-old Christianity. The wars of the five last decades were, at least, sought to be conducted according to the conventional rules of butchery established by international compact. But in the Balkan War the Turks were kept without the pale of all human law; there was no limit and no restraint. This war of Cross and Crescent is a war of extermination; no distinction is made between combatants inflamed with the intoxication of fight on the field of battle and the unarmed and defenceless prisoners; between the army that fights and the peaceful population which, in many cases, has been exterminated by sword and fire and literally extirpated from the soil.

The same number of Contre la Guerre publishes at length a letter from Bulgaria, stating that in the villages Mimitly and Kroupnik, in Macedonia, all the Turks whose lives were saved by the Bulgarians were obliged to accept conversion into the orthodox religion. As for those who were unwilling to change their creed so easily, the civilising Bulgarians threw them en masse by night into the waters of the River Struma. More than 300 men and women perished in that manner! The writer goes on to say that in the churches of every village the "popes" openly deliver addresses against the Turks and preach in favor of massacring the infidels. No Gladstone arises to-day to thunder against the "atrocious" Bulgarians, because "our" Christian "charity" covers or condones the multitude of their sins.

There is, however, one great writer, Pierre Loti, whose mouth is not to be gagged, nor his pen silenced. His article on "The Savageries of War," in Contre la Guerre (March 15), should arrest the attention of our politicians, who have so long stopped their ears and sealed their hearts. He declares that "the Bulgarians, in absolute tranquillity, under the closed eyes of their accomplice, Europe, are proceeding with the systematic extermination of the Moslems in the invaded provinces." In proof of this terrifying allegation, he claims that "there are legions of unimpeachable witnesses, Austrian and German, functionaries, doctors, pastors, and officers." He mentions as his witnesses Doctor Ernst Jaeckh, General Baumann, Colonel Veit, Captain Rein, and Professor Dühring, whose well-documented reports, supported by hideous photographs, speak of pillagings, incendiarism, violations amidst aggravating circumstances of Sadism, and mutilations of indescribable horror; the massacre of non-combatants; old women locked in barns which are set fire to; Musselmen drenched with petroleum before being piled up in mosques and therein burnt alive.....! Then come these accusing words:—

> "Over all this savagery there brooded a base and bestial fanaticism. The funereal stelæ, having Koranic inscriptions, were broken and the tombs profaned. The name of Christ was mingled with these assassinations, and sometimes the murderers baptised by force before they began the massacre. More enraged still than the invaders, and more cowardly, the Ottoman Christians went forth to meet the conquerors and guided them to the Turkish houses, first of all towards the richer ones, and divulged the hiding places where money was concealed; or the young women pillaged along with them and took part in the killing.....A naïve detail, full of touching novelty, took place amongst these scenes of horror. The young Moslem women, from whose faces the veil had been torn away—their first great outrage—before they were driven forth to be pasture for the hungry lusts of the soldiers, had covered their faces with a deposit of thick mud gathered in the gutters by the road side....."

And all this vileness wrought in the sweet name of Jesus!

Pierre Loti concludes by saying that—

> "this is going on and will continue so doing as long as there remains in the province of Adrianople a single village that has not become a mass of burnt ruins, with corpses filling the streets. And all the Chancelleries know this with an absolute knowledge, and all of them keep silent, and everywhere the public conscience is wantonly deceived."

In this conspiracy of silence for the purpose of hiding the bankruptcy of diplomacy, the failure of civilisation, and the shame of our vaunted Christianity, the Freethinker will not join. We are not concerned to say that the Turks are angels of light, or that the Christians have not suffered bitter wrongs, either in this generation or in the historic past. But we are concerned to uphold and to vindicate, above all the rivalries of Cross and Crescent, of Christian and Mohammedan, the great ideal of an all-embracing Humanity; and it is because we feel that this beneficent ideal is trampled under foot by these armies of revengeful religionists, who, not for the first time in history, are made trebly brutal by their cruel and exclusive creed, we raise our feeble voice against these hideous revivals of mediæval bigotry as being of evil augury for the future.

WILLIAM HEAFORD.

* NOTE.—The Spanish bigot, even in our own modern times, loves this fiendish diversion, especially when he has unbelievers at his mercy.

† Contre la Guerre, March 5. (Paris: Bi-monthly; editor, Dr. Charles Rappoport.) To say that Anatole France, Pierre Loti, Alfred Naquet, etc., write for this paper is a sufficient indication of its quality.

"The Nation and Its God."

A NOTABLE feature of the address of the Chairman of the Free Church Council is its title. Nationality naturally enters into the conception of Deity formed by every Deist. The deistic inhabitants of these islands, particularly those with insular habits of thought and insular prejudices, cannot very well do other than regard their God as a Britisher who thinks in English. We may go further. Environment is bound to have an effect in determining the idea that people form of God. Thus each class has its own God. The orthodox squire has his God. The orthodox tradesman who supplies the squire with groceries has his. Some have even gone the length of saying that with regard to believers who have had the advantages of a liberal education and surroundings of refinement and culture, each man must make his own religion and his own God for himself. The Duke of Norfolk and Viscount Halifax cannot very well have formed the same idea of the Deity as, say, Mr. Keir Hardie and Mr. R J. Campbell. And one would suppose that there would be differences to be found in the conceptions of the Deity formed by, say, Mr. Rockefeller on the one hand, and an ignorant but enthusiastic iron puddler on the other.

Well; but with the increase of opportunities, the greater dissemination of knowledge, and the advance of freedom of thought, the multiplicity of ideas inevitably resulting must necessarily be embarrassing to a Christian apologist who adopts such a title for a sermon as "The Nation and Its God." The very title suggests inferentially that each nation may have its own particular God. Of course, the ardent British believer is satisfied that his God is the "one living and only true God," and that all other believers in other gods—of whatever nationality—are steeped in darkness. But the puzzling feature in the whole situation in just this: that there are millions who believe in their gods with all the firmness, temerity, and intensity of conviction that any Christian believer can believe in his God. For example, there are many devout and devoted believers in Allah and Mohammed as well as in Jehovah and Christ.

There is apparently, moreover, a sort of inexorable Salic Law which regulates the governance of the universe. The sex of the Almighty according to Christian doctrine has, it seems, never been challenged up to now. But, with the advance of women, may we not expect to find some feminine rival to the Ruler of the Universe? We have had queens as well as kings, all, indiscriminately, according to orthodox teaching, of divine appointment. Why, then, should a goddess not have supreme control instead of a god?

Now, the President of the Free Church Council (very free) had a good deal to say about his impressions of the nation and how it is getting on; but he gave precious few of his impressions of the nation's God. He was frankly pessimistic on many points, and was compelled to say certain things which, to put it mildly, could scarcely be regarded as flattering to the nation's God. Possibly, the features of our time upon which he deemed it necessary to animadvert at some length have been productive of a demand for change, and may thus account for the appearance of many new-fangled creeds and suggestions for new divinities. Christian Science, Theosophy, New Theologies, are features of the twentieth century. The Christian apologist does not fulminate nowadays. He—gentle creature—never gets angry with the enemies of his truth. He never gets the gloves on nor gives the enemies of his God some straight blows from the shoulder. No, he only gets sad, and sometimes lachrymose and maudlin. He sighs over and prays for the poor infidel, who, he trusts, will find out his terrible mistake before it is too late. The confident impudence and assurance of these worthy persons is too amusing for words.

But, at the end of it all, and notwithstanding all the discouraging signs of the times, the Christian has still—hope! Churches may empty, subscriptions go down, and distinctions gradually disappear between the orthodox and the heterodox—still, he has hope. Because, observe, says the occasional optimistic Christian of the Meyer type, while there are certainly things to discourage, there is a great advance in modern thought, and in the end it will be found that the Christian religion is sufficiently embracing to take in everything and everybody. If Atheists talk like that, they are pitied—or boycotted. From the lips of accredited representatives of Christianity, it would seem to be a happy and consoling utterance.

Of course, Christianity depends for its continued existence on its adaptability to changing and improving human requirements. But that just means that it loses all definite and distinct character of its own. A Bahai missionary lectures in our midst. Christian ministers appear on his platforms by the dozen and crack him up and clap him on the back. Why shouldn't they? The indisputable gullibility of the great British public is past finding out. The gulls don't think they are stupid. Let them learn this if they can: that in the supernatural hocus-pocus, they will never find one of our medicine men running down a fellow craftsman.

But this all-embracing kind of modern Christianity has not only the effect of robbing Christianity of its essential features. It makes God a vague, visionary, and withal futile and ungraspable personality, who may be anything that anybody likes, and it encourages the "intellectual twisters" in our midst to the disadvantage and prejudice of sincere inquirers: so true is it that to-day the average member of a Christian community does not know where he is—or where God is either.

We want less rubbishy cant talked and written against Materialism and Paganism. Materialists and Pagans have often been the friends and saviors of humanity. But, as Christianity has flourished in the past on downright mendacity, so in the future it is to depend on—adaptability. And is the "nation's God" of to-day at all like the "nation's God" of Cromwell's time?

SIMPLE SANDY.

The Eternal Priestess.

WOMAN stands on slippery places. Her position is not secure. For ages she has been represented as an inferior being—decreed and destined to be subject to man.

We call our civilisation Christian, we say the Bible is the foundation of our morality and the basis of our laws, and yet the despoiling of women presents a fearful indictment against both civilisation and the Bible upon which that civilisation is founded.

Upon the altars of the Church have been forged the chains that have bound woman for nineteen centuries. The Christian dogmas have insulted and enslaved the mothers of the race. The man-made religion of a man-god, administered by a man-priesthood, has dishonored and degraded woman through all the Christian ages. Nature is remorseless and exact; falsehood, injustice, and wrong bear their pitiless and inevitable fruit. In the degradation of woman we are reaping the harvest sown by the hand of the Church in the field of the world. The problem of the social evil is a world problem. It is as wide as Christendom. It is not peculiar to any nation, or city, or social condition. It is pre-eminently an adjunct of Christian civilisation. It follows the flags of all nations. Wherever the Christian armies of Christian Europe are stationed in Asia or Africa, heathen women are requisitioned for Christian soldiers. Methods of government may differ; social and political institutions vary, but throughout all the Christian nations in one respect, in one fateful feature, there is uniformity; it is the prostitution of woman.

Now and then a community awakens to a more or less vivid realisation of the sadness and the shame of it all. Commissions and committees investigate and report, raids are organised, arrests made, resorts closed, discussions and controversies maintained as to the evil and how to combat it. However well-intentioned these spasmodic expressions of the public sentiment may be, they nevertheless produce more hysteria than wisdom.

The attitude of society towards these unhappy women ought not to be one of condemnation and revenge, but rather of pity and compassion. She is there, maybe, through ignorance or weakness, or through the very excess of love and devotion; she is there, maybe, through no fault of her own, or at best through a fault but half her own; she is there, also, knowing full well that the door of hope and reclamation is closed to her for ever; there to hide behind a mask of abandonment and boldness an aching heart; there to suffer, to despair, to die, having no refuge but the grave, no friend but death.

Ah! who would add one drop to the bitterness of her cup, one pang to her grief? We can do little for her now. The way down is easy, the way up all but impossible; they go down as with wings, and up with broken hands and bleeding feet.

In pre-Christian times the position of women was more honorable and more secure than in any Christian land in this dawning twentieth century. Our orthodox friends never tire of telling that woman owes all she has to the Christian religion. The fact is, she owes her subjection and her age-long subjugation to the Christian religion.

Egypt, pre-eminent among the older civilisations, gives us the strange story of the Matriarchate, the mother rule. The Egyptians worshiped as their chief deity the goddess Isis. They revered the goddess Semiramis as the mother of their civilisation. One of their greatest monarchs, Rameses III., caused this inscription to be put upon monuments, "To unprotected woman there is freedom to wander throughout the whole country without apprehension of danger." There is no city or country calling itself Christian on the entire globe where that inscription could be made and safely followed. It is a keen and striking comment that hundreds of years before this era a pagan monarch should choose as a certificate of the glories of his rule the statement that woman was safe anywhere within his realms.

In pre-Christian Rome the people worshiped goddesses. The most sacred treasures, as well as the destinies of the empire, were kept and guarded by the vestal virgins. The tutelary divinity of Athens was a goddess. Wherever a people has a goddess among its deities, it has a priestess among its people, and wherever a religion has a priestess, the women are secure.

The Christian is masculine. There is no feminine element in the godhead. The Christian dogmatists had to violate the principles of interpretation in order to make their god masculine. The word "Jehovah" is susceptible of a translation that makes the gender male and female, or a mother and father god. The dogmatists left the mother off and have always called Jehovah "him." The New Testament words for the third person in the Trinity are all feminine in the Greek, but the Christian dogmatists made every one of them masculine and called the Holy Spirit "him" or "it." There you have the dogmatic god, a triune masculinity, a triple man, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. There is no place in the godhead for the mother or the feminine element—God the Father, and that alone, is the certificate and excuse for the Christian subordination of woman.

Until the Church is able to say "God the Father and God the Mother," it will not be worthy of the devotion and loyalty of women. In that prayer, "Our Father who art in Heaven, hallowed be thy name," "hallowed" means "whole, complete, integral, rounded, entire, self-supplementing," "Our Father, whole, complete, be thy name," wherein there is a hint of the lost word of occultism. Perhaps when the lost word is found, even Christendom will see and say "our father and our mother." Maybe when that lost word is found, an apostate Church will see that a masculine god and a masculine priesthood are things for women to shun.

The teachings of the Bible are explicit and unmistakable with regard to woman. She was created after man; she was not a part of the original plan, but was an afterthought; she was created for man, a doctrine which the Church has loved to reiterate. She was first in sin; she brought the undoing of mankind by her transgression, and through her came the curse and the banishment from Eden, and the doom of ultimate death.

Under the Old Testament dispensation she was not permitted to enter the inner circle of the temple; she could stand without while more righteous man entered in. When she gave birth to a child, she was compelled to pass through a period of ceremonial purification—forty days if the child was a son, twice that long if the child was a daughter.

The New Testament dispensation did not improve in the slightest the condition of woman. Indeed, the Apostle Paul took pains to make her subjection more complete. He said, "Wives, obey your husbands." Why should a woman obey the husband any more than the husband obey the woman? The idea of obedience on the one side and mastership on the other has its root in the fundamental conception of woman's created inferiority. "Be subject unto your husbands, sit in silence, keep the head deferentially covered, as a sign of humiliation, meekness, and subjection. If you wish to know anything, ask your husbands." These are the inspired utterances of the Apostle Paul. These are the teachings of the Christian Church, yet women revere that Bible as the Charter of their salvation. It is the declaration of their utter sinfulness, the certificate of their inferiority and the cause of their age-long subjugation.

OUR PAGAN SURVIVALS.

"Pagan London" is by no means a bad "Letter to the Editor" lay, and congratulations to the Daily Telegraph on its perspicacity in the matter of vacation variety. But are we not a little unfair to the Pagans in comparing them with Londoners? Most of our feasts and festivals and many of our season customs are Pagan survivals. Christian Rome borrowed many of its rites and ceremonies from Pagan Rome, and the Protestant Church keeps many of the festivals that were connected with Pagan celebrations. The Yule log of our Christmas time comes to us from heathen Saxons, who burned one on the night which is now our Christmas night, and burned it as an emblem of the returning sun and the increase of light and heat. And the heathen Saxons kept up the festival of sun worship until the twelfth night. It was the feast of the winter solstice and was the heathen worship of the Sun God.

I have seen in the newspapers that the old custom of beating the bounds is to be abandoned by the City of London. This parochial perambulation is also an old Pagan survival. The feasts called Terminalia were dedicated to the God Terminus, who was worshiped as the Guardian of Fields and Landmarks. The landmarks were not beaten with rods as is our custom to-day, but twined with garlands and occasionally sprinkled with the blood of human sacrifice. In our own Church the parish was originally perambulated by the clergy and the parishioners. The priest asked the blessing of God on the fields that they might bring forth the fruits of the earth in abundance.

The ceremony is associated with Rogation Week, the period which the Saxons called Gangdagas, or Days of Perambulation. And this will be the first year the custom has not been carried out in the City of London since its existence as a city. But it is a Pagan survival. The perambulation of the landmarks with sacrifices and offerings to the god Terminus was originated in the days of Numa Pompilius, and that philosophical monarch was born on the day that Romulus laid the foundation of Rome.

All the pretty emblems of May Day are Pagan survivals. Most of the ceremonies indulged in by the Pagans in honor of the goddess Flora are continued in the May Day celebrations of Christian England. There is no necessity to multiply instances. The fact is beyond dispute that many of our Christian festivals are directly descended from Pagan festivals. But where the old Pagans are injured by the comparison with our Pagan Londoners is that the Pagans feasted and made merry in honor of a god in whom they believed and whom they sought by their performances and their sacrifices to propitiate. Our modern Pagans feast and make merry entirely for their own gratification. Some of them "believe" in a kind of a sort of a way, and some don't. But all are indifferent.—G. R. Sims, "Referee."

What I want reminding, and what I go to the Bible and Hayward for, be just the other great truth, that he's a God of Justice too, and have his sword always drawn in secret for the sinner, though it be hid in his shining robe.—Eden Phillpotts, "Widecombe Fair."

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

The "Unspeakable" Turk.

Two Years Under the Crescent. By H. C. Seppings Wright. London: James Nisbet & Co. 10s. 6d.

DURING my recent illness—at least during a large part of it—I had no energy to read anything more than the newspapers. It was thus that I noticed a review of the above book in the Daily News, in which astonishment was expressed that the author claimed many virtues for the Turk, including the virtue of toleration. This seemed to strike the reviewer all of a heap. Fancy the Turk tolerant! He could not agree with the statement, neither could he answer it, so he just let the author's tribute stand. But my own curiosity was excited. I made up my mind to get a copy of Mr. Seppings Wright's book, expensive as it was. This I did as soon as I was well enough. I have read the book through, and I find that the author, like almost everyone else who has come into close personal contact with the Turk, regards him as a better gentleman than the great majority of his opponents, and as a constant sufferer from Christian abuse and misrepresentation.

A hundred years ago Byron, who knew the Levant so well, stated his own opinion very plainly, that whoever had dealings with a Turk would find him a gentleman, and that whoever had dealings with a Greek would find him a scoundrel. In a long note to the Second Canto of Childe Harold "On the Turks" he wrote with his usual force and decision:—

> "If it is difficult to pronounce what they are, we can at least say what they are not: they are not treacherous, they are not cowardly, they do not burn heretics, they are not assassins."

Byron also pointed out (it was before Catholic Emancipation was carried) that the Turks treated the Christians under their rule with far greater toleration than Protestants treated Catholics in Great Britain, and especially in Ireland. Byron, it must be remembered, was not a Christian himself. That makes all the difference. He could take a disinterested view of the matter.

Carlyle had a bad opinion of the Turks. But he had no knowledge of them. And although he was not really a Christian himself he was, paradoxical as it may sound, a Christian bigot. With his usual graphic power he advised Europe to get rid of "the unspeakable Turk." The epithet was splendid from a literary point of view, and extraordinarily serviceable from a partisan point of view. It suggested that evidence was not necessary or was too bad to print. Yet it was well known to Carlyle that Russia was far fuller of tyranny, bloodshed, and misery than Turkey was. But, I repeat, he was a Christian bigot, though not a Christian; so the Sultan was a devil, and the Czar was simply "drilling anarchic populations" into law and order.

For my part, I venture to say that the average Turk has all along been a far more good-natured and tolerant person than the average Christian. I admit that under sufficient provocation the Turk has been cruel after the general fashion of his age and locality. But I contend that what the Turk has done in hot blood the Christians have done in cold blood; what in the one was an outburst of temper was in the other a deliberate policy; and when the Christians have had an opportunity of imitating the Turk, as they blandly put it, they have always managed to better the example. Even in the present (or recent) war it is undeniable that the Christians have perpetrated shocking outrages upon the Mohammedans in Macedonia, Thrace, and elsewhere; while the evidence of outrages on the other side is of the flimsiest character. War correspondents in a position to know the facts—that is to say, who have been with the Turkish Army—deny that anything of the kind has occurred. Mr. Seppings Wright denies it too:—

> "It was not possible to go through this campaign without hearing in various quarters the reports which had been circulated with regard to the massacre of Christians by the Turks. Personally, I cannot believe there was ever any substantial foundation for these rumors, and the inquiries I made did not induce me to change my opinions in regard to these allegations."

Mr. Wright reports something very different in the awful retreat after the battle of Lüle Burgas:—

> "It is impossible to give more than a slight idea of the awful scenes witnessed on this retreat. A redeeming feature in it was the entire absence of mutiny or violence.
> "Mohammedan and Christian were knit together in the common bond of suffering. At least a third of the crowd were Christians. The way in which members of one creed helped the other contradicts to some extent the theory that it is impossible for people of two religions to live together in harmony.
>
> "The soldiers of Asia apparently did not resent the Christian refugees of Thrace sharing their troubles and lightening each other's burdens where it was possible to do so. Wearied children slept peacefully in the arms of rough soldiers."

Later on, when the refugees reached, or entered, Constantinople, Mr. Seppings Wright bears the following testimony:—

> "This dark and dismal picture of human misery, reaching down to the lowest depths, will never be erased from my mind. That these terrible scenes and experiences did not produce serious outbreaks and inroads upon private property, proved the respect which the Turks have for law and order, and for the philosophy with which they regard calamities. What impressed me more than anything else was the display of human sympathy and the charity shown by them to their more unfortunate fellow countrymen, even when they were Christians."

Mr. Seppings Wright stayed at an hotel kept by a Greek in Constantinople. His customers were Turks, Greeks, and Jews, and there was no quarreling. "I saw nothing," our author says, "of the objectionable demonstrations which were freely reported in the European journals—a fact which speaks volumes for the tolerance of the Turk." (This was the phrase that stuck in the throat of the Daily News reviewer.)

A Servian's tribute to the Turk, quoted by Mr. Seppings Wright, is worth quoting here. "The Turk," he said, "was the master of the Balkan nations for nearly five centuries. During all those centuries he consistently refrained from interfering with our national churches and with our village municipal life. From the liberty which the Turk left to our Church and our municipal life in the country, our political liberty was reborn."

The Pathology of Conversion.—III.

To the examples already given it may be as well to add this one from a missionary's account of a quite recent revival in India—July, 1906:—

> "There were people.....on the floor fairly writhing over the realisation of sin as it came over them..... Saturday we were favored with a wonderful manifestation of the Spirit. One of the older girls, who had had a remarkable experience, went into a trance, with her head thrown back, her arms folded, and motionless, except for a slight movement of her foot. She seemed to be seeing something wonderful, for she would marvel at it, and then laugh excitedly.....One girl rushed to the back of the vestibule and, lying across a bench, with her head and hands against the wall, she fairly writhed in agony for two hours before peace came to her."*

I do not know on what ground we are justified in calling people civilised who chronicle these outbreaks as "manifestations of the Spirit." Savages would do no more; our "civilised" missionaries do no less. Tylor well says that "these manifestations in modern Europe indeed form part of a revival of religion, the religion of mental disease."†

The morbid state of mind induced by these attempts at conversion—a condition that may very easily become pathological—is illustrated by a number of the answers to Dr. Starbuck's inquiries. Seventy-five per cent. of the males and sixty per cent. of the females confessed to feelings of depression and sadness before conversion. In all probability this was partly due to the harping upon a "sense of sin," which is itself of a wholly unhealthy character. The following confessions well illustrate both points. I give the age, where known, in brackets. One writes:—

> "I felt the wrath of God resting on me. I called on Him for aid, and felt my sins forgiven" (13).
> "I couldn't eat, and would lie awake all night."
>
> "Often, very often, I cried myself to sleep" (19).
> "Hymns would sound in my ears as if sung" (10).
> "I had visions of Christ saying to me, Come to Me, My child" (15).
>
> "Just before conversion I was walking along a pathway, thinking of religious matters, when suddenly the word H-e-l-l was spelled out five yards ahead of me" (17).
> "I felt a touch of the Divine One, and a voice said, 'Thy sins are forgiven thee; arise and go in peace'" (12).
>
> "The thoughts of my condition were terrible" (13).
> "For three months it seemed as if God's Spirit had withdrawn from me. Fear took hold of me. For a week I was on the border of despair" (16).
> "A sense of sinfulness and estrangement from God grew daily" (15).
> "Everything went wrong with me; it felt like Sunday all the time" (12).
> "I felt that something terrible was going to happen" (14).
> "I fell on my face by a bench and tried to pray. Every time I would call on God something like a man's hand would strangle me by choking. I thought I would surely die if I could not get help. I made one final effort to call on God for mercy if I did strangle and die, and the last I remember at that time was falling back on the ground with that unseen hand on my throat. When I came to myself there was a crowd around praising God."

A crowd around praising God! For all substantial purposes one might as well be describing a state of affairs in Central Africa instead of depicting events in a country claiming to be civilised. It is no wonder that so eminent an authority as Sir T. S. Clouston says revival services and unusual religious meetings should "on no account be attended by persons with weak heads, excitable dispositions, and neurotic constitutions."‡ Unfortunately, it is precisely these classes that are most attracted to them, and which furnish the revivalist with his largest crop of cases.

"Every revival," says Dr. Mercier, "is attended by its crop of cases of insanity, which are the more numerous as the 'revival' is more fervent and more prolonged."§ To actual insanity we may add all kinds of hysterical and nervous disorders; and it is not at all difficult to see a sound physiological reason for this. Let us bear in mind that the central significance of adolescence—the period during which nearly all cases of conversion occur—is that it is a time of instability and readjustment, physical, emotional, intellectual. It is a time of unavoidable stress and strain, of the impact of new mental associations and groupings, of new feelings that crave expression and new desires that press for gratification. It is because of this peculiarly unstable and impressionable condition that the organism needs to be shielded from undue stress, and also because of the neglect or the impossibility of doing this, that so large a crop of nervous disorders first show themselves during adolescence. Dr. Clouston says that about one-half the inhabitants of Scotch asylums are under twenty years of age, and gives a whole crop of diseases as first manifesting themselves during adolescence.†

Dr. W. R. Gowers, dealing with 1,450 cases of epilepsy, says that "Three quarters of the cases of epilepsy begin under twenty years, and nearly half (46 per cent.) between ten and twenty, the maximum being at fourteen, fifteen, and sixteen."‡ Of hysteria also the same writer says that of the total cases of hysteria, 50 per cent. occur from ten to twenty years of age, 20 per cent. from twenty to thirty years of age, and only 10 per cent. from thirty to forty.§ And, in view of the cases of converts cited above, it is well to note Dr. Gowers's warning that "Mental emotion—fright, excitement, anxiety—is the most potent cause of epilepsy," while "the profoundly disturbing effect of alarm on the nervous system, deranging as it does almost every function of the nervous system, enables us to understand its frequency as an excitant of epilepsy."

Yet is precisely at this stage of life when care ought to be exercised to protect the youth from all that is morbid or unduly exciting, and, above all, when the developing qualities of mind need to be carefully and wisely guided in order that the social qualities shall be exercised in the most useful manner, that young people are handed over to the ignorant ministrations of professional evangelists. It is small wonder that so large a proportion of the people grow up with such a rudimentary sense of social duty and obligation. The really golden years of their lives are wasted. What Professor Davenport says of the relation between certain brutal manifestations of social life and religious teaching in America, applies with equal truth to ourselves:—

> "It is well-known that lynching in the South is carried on largely by the ignorant and baser elements of the white population. It is also well-known that the chief method of religious influence and training of the black man and the ignorant white man is impulsive and emotional revivalism. It is a highly dangerous situation, and deserves the earnest consideration of the ecclesiastical statesmen of all denominations which work in the South. It will be impossible to protect that part of the nation, or any other, from the epidemic madness of the lynching mob if the seeds of it are sown in the sacred soil of religion.....Their preachers are great 'soul-savers,' but they lack the practical sense to build up their emotionalised converts into anything that approaches a higher life."‖

The truth indicated here is much wider than Professor Davenport imagines. It is true that so long as the revivalistic type of religion is encouraged we are unconsciously assisting certain very ugly manifestations in social life. But it is also true that so long as we allow the religious interpretation of life to prevail we can never make the most of the human material that lies at hand. For while the process of what is called "religious awakening" encourages, in its more sensational aspects, displays of morbidity which we should do our best to restrain, in its quieter and better aspects it amounts to a sheer misdirection and misuse of human energies. The increase of self-consciousness, the desire to spend oneself in the service of others, the craving for sympathy and communion with one's fellows, has nothing whatever to do with religion, although all these qualities are utilised by it and are classified as religious. They are actually and fundamentally belonging to the social side of human nature. As our hands are developed for grasping, and the various organs of the body for their respective functions, so the mental and emotional qualities are developed in their due course for a rational, social life. Biologically, male and female, at adolescence, are entering into a deeper and more enduring relationship with the life of the race. There is no other meaning to the process.

Naturally enough, men and women, whether they be old or young, but particularly if they be young, express their feeling in accordance with the fashion of their environment. If this were rationally non-religious, the language would be that of a non-religious philosophy. As, however, religion plays a large part in determining the form of the environment, we have, in the majority of cases, quite a contrary result. Only here and there is one found capable of analysing his or her feelings, and very few possess the knowledge that would make such an analysis profitable. The consequence is, that each newcomer is handed over, bound hand and foot, to organisations that are either incapable or unwilling to train a plastic human nature in the right direction. We do not merely sacrifice our first-born; we immolate the whole of our progeny. The ignorant past plays into the hands of the designing present; the past conspires with the present to rob the future of the good that might come to it from the growth of a wiser and a better race.

Were society really enlightened and genuinely civilised, the truth of much that has been said would be recognised as soon as stated. It would, indeed, be unnecessary to labor what would then be a recognised truth. But we are not genuinely enlightened, and a host of agencies conspire to prevent us becoming so. Thus it is that, instead of an explanation of development in terms of biological and social evolution, we have an explanation in terms of ideas that are essentially pre-scientific. Because the individual, as James says, emerges out of the narrow world of childhood into the larger world of humanity, we are given an explanation in terms of a religious or supernatural influence. Because this development involves a certain surrender of one's egoism to the needs of others, supernaturalism again claims to be the operative force. And when this diminished, or, more properly, transfigured egoism leads to the desire for service, or even sacrifice, we have once more an explanation in terms of religious conviction. In reality there is not a heightening of life by supernaturalism, but its exploitation. This is the central truth of the situation. And in ignoring this truth we hand over the care of a growing generation to the worst possible teachers at the very time when a wiser control would be preparing it for intelligent participation in the serious and enduring work of social organisation.

Evolution and Creation.

The supernatural origin of the Universe has always been regarded as a religious truism. Until very recently no theologian ever dreamed of taking the story of Creation as related in the Book of Genesis as anything but literal history. It was so accepted by Gladstone in his memorable controversy with Huxley in the Nineteenth Century, and it is so understood by the bulk of Christians to-day. Since the advent of evolution, the more scholarly among present-day theologians argue that the Biblical story is either a poem or a parable, and that its value consists not in its historical accuracy, but in the religious ideas that underlie it. This was the interpretation put upon it by Henry Drummond when he intervened in the Gladstone-Huxley debate. Towards the end of his life Drummond became an out-and-out evolutionist, as so many others have done since; but not one of the theologians who have adopted evolution is prepared to abandon the theory of creation altogether. Most of them readily enough admit that all existing species of plants and animals are products of evolution, and not special creations; but they all with one voice contend that the stuff out of which all forms of existence have been evolved was brought into being by a Divine act of creation. The essential point in this contention is that existence has had a beginning, or that there was a time when God existed alone. Now, the question is, if the Universe began to be, how did it originate? To say that God made it explains nothing. When a man makes anything it is not understood that he brings anything into being that did not previously exist, but, rather, that he takes some already existing stuff and fashions it anew. To affirm that God made the Universe in that sense is merely to complicate the problem. One instantly wants to know whence the original stuff came which he moulded into the Universe. There are, however, in the United Kingdom alone some two millions and-a-half people whose Catechism teaches them to believe that "the work of creation is, God's making all things of nothing by the word of his power."

Thus, on the assumption that God made the Universe, we are confronted with three distinct interpretations of the act. He either fashioned or shaped it out of an existing stuff, wove it out of his own substance, as the silkworm spins the threads of its cocoon, or created it of nothing by so many words of his mouth. The word create in Genesis i. 1 is not at all decisive, inasmuch as, according to Canon Driver, its root meaning is to cut, so that probably the proper signification of the Hebrew bara is to fashion by cutting, to shape; but, then, we are told that "in the simple conjugation, it is used exclusively of God, to denote, viz., the production of something fundamentally new, by the exercise of a sovereign originative power, altogether transcending that possessed by man." Whatever be the exact meaning of the Hebrew word bara as found in Genesis i. 1, the general Hebrew belief was that the heavens and the earth had been made out of nothing. In 2 Maccabees vii. 28, we read: "I beseech thee, my child, to lift thine eyes unto the heaven and the earth, and to see all things that are therein, and thus to recognise that God made them not of things that were." In Hebrews xi. 3, also, we find words of the same import: "By faith we understand that the worlds have been framed by the word of God, so that what is seen hath not been made out of things which do appear." Taking all things into account, it seems impossible to escape the idea of creatio ex nihilo, though it may not be necessarily implied in the terms employed.

Now, the Theist bases his whole argument upon the assumption that the Universe is a manufactured article of enormous proportions, a thing made once for all at a given time named "the beginning." In other words, the Universe is treated as an effect the cause of which must be chance or purpose. "Remember," exclaims the Theist, "there is no third alternative." On the assumption under consideration, we admit the truth of that exclamation; but then we repudiate the assumption because of its absolute unverifiableness. There is not even the shadow of evidence that the Universe ever began to be. Our solar system has doubtless had a beginning, but astronomy tells us of solar systems which have run their course and become extinct, and of others which are now in the process of formation. Solar systems may come and go, like drops of water in a river, but Nature goes on for ever. There is, then, a third alternative, namely, that the Universe is infinite both in extent and in duration. This also, we admit, is only an assumption fairly based upon scientific experiments. Using it meantime merely as an assumption, we claim that its services are altogether invaluable. It rids us of the illogical bugbear of a First Cause. We frankly admit that assuming a First Cause we are bound to believe in a Final Cause, because the former can only be justified by the latter; but in Nature we can find no trace of either. A First Cause is a contradiction in terms, because the law of causation implies the impossibility as well as the absurdity of an uncaused Cause. "Oh," objects the theologian, "you believe in an uncaused Universe, which is certainly an infinitely greater absurdity than an uncaused Cause." We are exultantly told that a certain well-known apologist "hits the nail on the head when he says that to demand a cause for a First Cause is only to assert that the First is second—which is absurd." To show how well he has driven the nail home, the said apologist adds: "Everything must have a cause, but God is not included in the everything, but is the Source of everything." How does he know that God is not included in the "everything"? We have only his word for it, unsupported by a single argument. We demand a Cause for the so-called First Cause, because we know of no exception to the law of causation; and all that the Theist can bring forward in defence of his position is the bald assertion that the First Cause is uncaused simply because it is the Source of all things.

Not only is the idea of a First Cause illogical and absurd, but it is also disproved by the facts of Nature, so far as they are known. In the first place, matter is both uncreatable and indestructible. As to its forms, it is in a state of perpetual impermanence, coming and going without ceasing, "but," to adopt the words of Sir Oliver Lodge, a reluctant witness—"but it can hardly be thought of as either going out of existence, or as coming into existence, at any given period, though it may completely change its form and accidents" (Life and Matter, p. 101). When you burn a lump of coal you only apparently destroy it; but in reality you only change it into carbonic acid gas by combining it with the oxygen in the atmosphere. No new matter has ever made its appearance, and we are confident that such an event is never likely to occur in the future. In the second place, the same statement is true of energy. Energy may be potential or active, but its sum never varies. You may change its form from time to time, backwards and forwards, almost endlessly, but you cannot destroy it. You can change motion into heat, into light, into electricity, and back again, without intermission; but when all your experiments are over, energy is the same in amount as before. As Professor Moore, of Liverpool, says:—

> "Energy may pass from one form to another, and the quantity present in any given form may and does vary, for it is the passage from one form to another, which constitutes all natural phenomena; but there is no manufacture or destruction of energy, there is the same quantity of energy in the Universe as was in the beginning, and shall be for ever. These two great tenets are fundamental in the orthodox faith of the scientific world of to-day" (Origin and Nature of Life, p. 29).

If these two wonderful laws—the persistence of matter and the conservation of energy—hold good in Nature, the idea of creation is necessarily excluded. If matter and energy are neither creatable nor destructible, it follows that Nature is eternal. Solar systems are but so many changing forms of matter and energy.

But there is a precious last straw at which the Theist, in desperation, always catches. Powerless to disprove the two great laws just described, he flies for refuge to the oft discredited argument that whatever is present in the effect must, likewise, exist in the cause. Inasmuch as we are intelligent and self-conscious, it is contended, the power behind the whole of the evolutionary process must possess intelligence and self-consciousness; else how could we have been produced? This is an entire fallacy. Anyone who understands Nature at all is fully aware that every effect exhibits qualities which are not present in the cause. The wetness of water is a characteristic which neither hydrogen nor oxygen displays: it is a quality that only results from the combination of the two. Life is the outcome of a specific combination of materials every one of which is to be found in inorganic Nature. As soon as the chemists discover the exact nature of the combination they, too, will doubtless be able to produce living matter. Intelligence is the natural product of the gradual evolution of living substance. When living matter first appeared it showed no signs whatever of intelligence; but as it slowly advanced from the simple to the complex, from the rude to the refined condition, resulting in a centralised nervous system and a brain, it gradually became more and more intelligent, until self-consciousness and personality made their appearance.

We therefore conclude that evolution, scientifically apprehended, excludes the idea of a creator and a creation, and in particular the idea of a purposive direction or conscious guidance towards a designed end. Evolution may be compared to a tree whose fruit is intelligence. If you were to investigate the roots and the trunk of the tree you would see no promise whatever of this incomparable fruit: it is not present at all in either roots or trunk, but is the ultimate reward of the combined action of soil and air upon roots and trunk. One is continually meeting people who labor under the delusion that because there is intelligence at the top of the evolutionary process, intelligence must have been present at the very bottom, and all the way through. They seem incapable of realising that mind, consciousness, personality, call it what you will, is the flower, the fruit, appearing for the first time after the process had been at work for countless millions of years.

Animal Metamorphosis.

As the most unsophisticated person is aware, the human infant is developed in the course of nine short months from a tiny protoplasmic speck. In a few weeks frog-spawn passes through various stages, which end with the evolution of the adult amphibian; and the metamorphic history of the countless insects commences with a minute egg. Yet these notorious facts, so obvious to all, have so far failed to impress their real meaning upon the mind of the ordinary average man.

One may still hear, as the writer quite recently heard, men of quite ordinary intelligence express their astonishment at the circumstance that not only the entire scientific world, but the vast majority of brain-workers in every department of civilised life, have calmly accepted a doctrine which manifestly implies that in the course of organic evolution living organisms have become so modified that they bear no outward resemblance to their remote ancestors.

Many, and probably most, animals live in surroundings widely dissimilar to those of their far-off progenitors. And their development from the eggs or spawn of their parents, up to the adult condition, is largely reminiscent of the evolutionary modifications which have marked their upward growth.

The metamorphic processes in toads and frogs are very extensive, and may be observed quite easily in any available pond. When the embryo emerges from the egg, it is composed of head and body only, but the tail makes its appearance in the course of a few days, and the tadpole stage is then attained. As the tail develops, the external gills begin to form, the mouth appears, and the intestine lengthens and becomes coiled. Numerous microscopic teeth arise in the mouth, and these are many times shed. As the tadpole is transformed into a toad or frog, the entire body is renewed. As the lungs develop, the external gills shrivel away. The permanent teeth develop; the intestine changes from its coiled form into a shortened and straightened organ. The feeding habits are also modified, and instead of subsisting on decaying vegetable and animal substances suspended in the water, the animal preys on snails and insects. The fore limbs now begin to protrude, the tail dwindles away, finally the hind limbs lengthen, and, with the absorption of the gills, the metamorphosis is complete. The frog now leaves the water and makes its way to the land, there to lead its terrestrial life. Most amphibians undergo somewhat similar transformations. In a small number of instances, however, the absence of water or other causes have necessitated direct development from the egg, and the consequent suppression of metamorphosis. Variations in temperature, or the scarcity of food, are sometimes responsible for the retardation of such evolutionary phenomena as those above set forth.

In all the vast range of insect life, the metamorphosis of the butterfly is most complete. The career of this interesting insect is distinguished by four distinct stages, the egg, larva, pupa, and imago or perfected adult. As soon as the egg is hatched, the emerging larva creeps over its food plant and voraciously devours the foliage. After a time, the gluttonous caterpillar changes into a fasting pupa or chrysalis, and remains almost motionless. Although no food is taken during this resting or pupa stage, very important structural changes are proceeding. With the completion of the pupa period of probation, the ugly creature is transformed into the peerless butterfly. The powerful jaws of the greedy caterpillar have disappeared, and the winged butterfly is provided with a suctorial proboscis, beautifully adapted for probing the corollas of blossoms. Although, as above hinted, these changes appear to occur suddenly, the internal transformations which lead up to them are constantly proceeding. From one to three days before entering the chrysalis stage, the larva appears impatient and restless, and ceases to feed :—

> "If a spinner it spins a cocoon, or if not it enters the earth to undergo its transformation into a chrysalis, or if a larval butterfly it attaches itself to some fixed object as a tree or fence. Profound changes now take place in the mouth parts as well as in the nervous, muscular, and other systems of internal organs." *

The various stages which make up the life of the privet hawk-moth afford a further example of insect metamorphosis. The moth lays her eggs on that common evergreen—the privet, and when the caterpillars hatch out they feed on the foliage. These are jointed worm-like larvæ, whose heads are provided with six simple eyes, a pair of minute three-jointed antennæ and biting jaws. The caterpillar moults three or four times, and before the final moult occurs it stops feeding and wanders aimlessly over its feeding plant. It has now reached its pupal period, and proceeds to search for a suitable spot for pupation. The privet hawk-moth caterpillar then descends to the earth and scoops out a dry burrow in the soil. There the final moult is carried out, the pupa or chrysalis emerges, and very shortly becomes stiff and brown. A careful examination of the chrysalis at this stage proves that it resembles a moth much more closely than the caterpillar from which it was derived. The chrysalis displays a head and body of moth-like form; it is provided with the appendages of a moth, and betrays the presence of short-folded wings. As soon as the moth is matured, its wings expand and its aerial life begins.

But immense as are the differences between the unsightly grub-like larva and the frequently beautiful winged moth, these are, nevertheless, not nearly so remarkable as those which separate the maggot of a blow-fly from the adult insect. The blow-fly drops its eggs on animal matter, and the insect displays a marked preference for meat which sends forth the odors of putrefaction. These eggs hatch out into small dingy-headed white maggots. These larvæ or "gentles" are provided with a pair of powerful jaws with which they gorge upon the meat in which they have been hatched. Their body integument is of a tough, leathery character, quite destitute of limbs. Twice or thrice these leathery, limbless maggots moult, growing larger meanwhile, and immediately after their concluding moult their body assumes an oval form, which continues to retain the larval skin, although the skin parts with its moisture and changes its color from white to brown. After the pupa has remained motionless for a day or two, the brown skin breaks, and the fully formed fly issues forth, and in a few moments is winging its way through the air. The adult insect is as utterly unlike the maggot which is hatched from the egg as any creature can conceivably be.

Nor is this all. In the words of Professor Chalmers Mitchell,—

> "With the exception of the nervous system and parts of some other organs, it seems as if the whole of the organs within the hardened skin of the larva were melted down and became rearranged to form the very different organs of the adult. Patient and extremely difficult dissections, however, have shown that there is an intelligible order in this transformation. Some time before the fly emerges it is surrounded by two delicate and transparent skins. The inner of these, if we can imagine it taken out whole, plumped up with air, and dried, would have the appearance of a fly with a head bearing antennæ, eyes, and mouth organs, etc., like those of a living fly, but rather simpler. This skin is the pale ghost of a former metamorphosis, of a true moult once passed through by the ancestors of the flies, but now on its way to being suppressed. The outer skin is the similar remains of a still earlier moult, and its structure, although fly-like, is less fly-like than the inner skin."

The foregoing phenomena may be regarded as salient illustrations of progressive evolution. In other instances, however, metamorphosis proceeds along paths of degenerative evolution. Professors Herdman, Haeckel, Ray Lankester, Kowalevsky, and other eminent naturalists have laboriously elaborated the developmental processes of the tunicates or ascidians. The well-known sea squirt is a member of this animal group, and the larvæ of these organisms are little tadpoles which swim actively in the sea. As the larvæ approach the adult sea squirt or ascidian form, their tails, and the main parts of the nervous system, with its organs of sight and hearing, disappear. The gullet, with its adjacent body parts, becomes much larger in proportion to the general size of the animal, until these mouth organs make up the greater part of the body, which now permanently settles down to a stationary mode of life. The wall of the ascidian's gullet is now modified into a sieve-like structure, provided with numerous orifices through which the sea water is strained, thus leaving behind the tiny particles which serve as the creature's food. Such are the changes which the energetic swimming larva, whose structure strongly resembles that of the lower vertebrates, undergoes as it sinks to the level of a stationary digesting sac which sucks in liquid at one opening and discharges it at another.

Before these metamorphic phenomena were discovered, no naturalist imagined that the adult degenerate ascidian had any close relationship to the back-boned animal class. This relationship, however, is rendered very obvious by the relatively advanced structure of the ascidian tadpole. The greater number of zoologists are now convinced that the active, free-swimming tadpole represents ancestral remembrances of the originally life-long condition of the organism. And they also regard the stationary and stagnant condition of the adult ascidian as an instance of utter degeneration. Embryological and anatomical considerations lead to the unavoidable conclusion that the sea squirts are lowly forms of the vertebrate animals, which, in their higher forms, completely dominate the world of life. The sea squirts have not participated in the progress which as a whole distinguishes the back-boned organisms.

Strenuous endeavor is to them unknown, but, despite their indolent habits, remembrances of their illustrious origin are made visible during their course of development.

Rising to a more exalted order of animal existence, we discover in the transformations which take place among flat fishes, such as the sole and the turbot, phenomena of a very remarkable nature. These fish metamorphoses appear to be directly conditioned by the circumstances which shape the lives led by the larvæ and adults respectively. Flat fishes form an important family, which are to be found in all seas, while some have adapted themselves to fresh-water life. The young forms of such fishes as brill, halibut, plaice, soles, and others present striking contrasts to the adults. Their general outline is that of ordinary fishes, such as the salmon or roach. In other words, they are bilaterally symmetrical, with an eye on each side of the head, with the right and left sides of the body alike in shape, coloring, and arrangement of the fins. "Whether they live near the surface of the sea, or haunt the bottom, they swim in the same sort of position as we do when we are using the ordinary breast stroke, that is to say, the back is upwards, the under side is downwards." The upper side, again, as in symmetrical fishes, is far darker is color than the pale under side. Not only are the larvæ of newly hatched flat fish identical in form with ordinary free-swimming fish, but like them, they pursue their prey in the normal predaceous manner. When the larvæ have grown to about half-an-inch in length, remarkable modifications occur. The right and left sides of the fish lose their original color. With the sole, plaice, and halibut the right side, and with turbot and brill, the left side darkens in color, whilst the opposite side of the body loses its color and becomes almost completely white. The skull of the larval fish is gristly and plastic, and the eye on the uncolored side of the body now begins to move partly round and partly through the head, until it reaches the other eye on the dark surface of the body. The two eyes remain close together permanently. While the above changes are taking place, the shape of the body and the position of the organs are modified, and the originally normal-shaped fish is transformed into a distorted adult. Thus it is that "what we would call at first sight the upper side, not being the real back of the animal, but the right side in some cases, the left in others." When the transformation is complete, the fish's mode of life changes. It no longer swims eagerly in the water, but falls to the bottom and lies amid the sand or mud with its dark side uppermost. "In these cases," writes a leading biologist, "there can be almost no doubt but that the larva, which is like the great majority of fish, is the ancestral form, and that the change to the adult condition is a condensed and rapid repetition of the slow ancestral history." *

Dr. Dixon, of Spurgeon's Tabernacle, is a master in the art of Christian begging. The other Sunday his subject was "Hilarious Giving." Giving, he represented as a species of sowing, saying, "He that soweth abundantly shall reap abundantly." Christian giving is giving in order to get. "God gives to those who give," exclaimed this servant of Jesus. It is an old dodge. "Give," cried a colored clergyman to his people, standing invitingly behind a table in front of the pulpit, "and the Lord will repay you fivefold." Ruminating on that at the back of the little church, a young Kaffir, with one sovereign in his pocket, rose and marched ostentatiously down the aisle, and with a magnificent swing of the arm, thrust the gold piece on the table and returned. Every day that week he expected to receive £5, but the Lord delayed the repayment, with that noble interest promised in his name by the minister. The young fellow waited anxiously for weeks and months, but at last his patience ran out, and he went to the minister and said, in a temper, "Give me back my money; you lied when you said the Lord would pay me back fivefold; he hasn't given me a farthing."

Acid Drops.

We are not at all surprised that the Home Secretary has seen it wise, in the exercise of such intelligence as he possesses, to prohibit the Suffragettes from holding meetings in Hyde Park and elsewhere. We are not concerned either to defend or attack the methods of the Militant Suffragettes, but we are vitally concerned with the right of public meeting, which has been attacked more than once during the lifetime of the present Government. When certain Freethought meetings were prohibited because Christians publicly declared that they would create a disturbance if they were held, the Home Secretary decided that the true policy was to threaten with imprisonment those who proposed to speak at such meetings. It was pointed out at the time that these tactics involved a serious breach of public freedom, but we are not surprised that further steps have been taken in the same direction. The real position at present is this: So long as a man is not a member of the Government—an exception was made in the case of Mr. Churchill's meeting in Belfast—any gang of ruffians who make up their minds to create a disturbance can prevent an opinion finding public expression. And this is really mob law with the full sanction of the Government. It is the mob that determines whether certain meetings shall be held or not, and the Home Secretary in a Liberal Government meekly announces that if it will only make its wishes known he will see they are enforced. For our part, so long as a speaker is expressing opinions that he or she has a right to express, adequate protection should be given, even though it involved the use of armed force. And if the opinions expressed are contrary to law, it is the place of the law to deal with them, not the mob. It is idle saying that the Government cannot maintain order if the meetings are permitted. A Government that cannot do this should resign or make room for more capable men. At all costs the right of public meeting should be upheld. It was the turn of the Freethinker yesterday; it is the turn of the Suffragette to-day. Who can say whose turn it will be to-morrow? King Mob has but to speak, and Mr. McKenna will see that his wishes are obeyed.

The editor of the Catholic Review contributes an article on "The Failure of Religion in England." "Religion," he says, "no longer counts as a factor in the life of the nation. It is true a diminishing section of the population worship at the ancient shrines; but an overwhelming majority simply pass them by, with that sort of benevolent indifference that is so much more hopeless than the bitterest hostility." "Even, perhaps, as an interesting archæological pursuit," the writer adds, "Christianity no longer exercises its influence on the generality of people, and such influence as remains to it is declining swiftly enough, even among that small section that still in some sort acknowledge its claims."

"Even the Celtic temperament of Wales," the Catholic editor points out, "is feeling the influence of the movement away from God." And the worst of it all is that "the religious leaders of the people" fail to "apprehend this great fact," they do not "grasp its meaning" or "propose any adequate remedy," which "only adds to the pitiful hopelessness of the situation." It is only the Roman Catholic Church that "maintains her position; she has progressed at Liverpool, for instance, while the Protestant Churches have all lost ground;" but she does not show "any great eagerness to fill the void" caused by the general failure of Christianity.

"The movement away from God" is, by the way, a very queer expression. If the existence of God is a fact, how on earth could anybody or anything move away from him? Would it not be just as sensible to talk of the planets of our system joining in a common movement from the sun? They all have a movement of their own, it is true, but they cannot resist the attraction of the great centre of the system they belong to. There is a centrifugal force, but the centripetal force is greater.

All sorts of by-reasons for the failure of Christianity are assigned by Protestant journalists. The Editor of the Catholic Review assigns but one. "The true cause," he says, "is to be found in this, that men no longer believe. They are not, with few exceptions," he adds, "hostile to religion; they have simply turned away from it as belonging to an age that has passed."

A demonstration of Catholics was held on April 15 at the St. George's Hall, Liverpool, on the education question. Cardinal Bourne, who was the principal speaker, said that the Government could deal with the education question in four divisions—one representing the Roman Catholics, another Nonconformists, a third the Church of England, and a fourth the Jews. Of course, it was beneath Cardinal Bourne's notice that a section of the British people, certainly larger than the Jews, were on principle opposed to the State teaching any religion in State schools. But either it does not suit the Cardinal's game—which in this instance is that of Christians in general—to admit that this class exists, or he was indulging in the common assumption that it was only the convictions of religious people that need be bothered about. This, we repeat, is the usual policy of Christians, and it indicates how much genuine concern they have either for education or for social justice. Education is treated as though it were no more than a mere scramble for church or chapel influence. So long as these are satisfied, everything is assumed to be all right. Nor ought one to blame either church or chapel overmuch for so acting. The real blame rests with the general public which allows the educational future of the children to be either sacrificed or made the subject of dishonorable "deals" between religious organisations and a Government that sees what is right, but lacks the courage to do its duty.

We quite agree with Cardinal Bourne that it is an outrage on Catholic common sense to ask them to be content with a religion in the schools that is "rank Protestantism." Protestants only agree to the religious instruction because, if it is not all they require, it gives them nothing they object to. On the other hand, the very form of the religious instruction is contrary to what the Catholics desire, and we believe they would prefer religious instruction being left out altogether. The truth is that neither religious party can get what they really want, because what they want can only be obtained at the cost of other parties in the State. Archbishop Whiteside said at the same meeting that Catholics were the real enthusiasts for education because of the trouble they took to educate their children. We beg to submit that the Catholic Church is enthusiastic for nothing of the kind. Its enthusiasm is best seen in a country like Spain, where education is in a more backward state than anywhere else in Europe. In England everyone is forced to send children to school, and the Catholic Church has to choose either between directing that education itself or handing the children over to schools in which no Catholic teaching exists. And the leaders of the Church know quite well what that means ultimately. Such sacrifices in money as the Church makes is, therefore, not for education at all. It is money spent in the interests of the Catholic religion. It must either educate the children, and pay something towards it, or it must refrain from paying, save by way of ordinary rates, and face the practical certainty of losing a large proportion of the rising generation. This is the essential fact of the situation. All else is mere cant.

Gravesend Sabbatarians have received a well-deserved defeat in their attempts to close the picture palaces on Sundays. The local clergy had been working hard to induce the Council to refuse a seven day's license, with the result that some pretty hard raps were given them by some of the councillors opposed to their efforts. One councillor said plainly that the licensed victuallers were the ones who had cause for complaint, and another councillor said that publicans had complained to him that they didn't do as much trade when the picture shows were open. The Chief Constable had also informed the Watch Committee that it would be in the interests of good order if the Sunday performances were continued. Councillor Cunningham said that he had visited the cinema himself on Sunday and found that "four-fifths of the people present were young men, many of whom might otherwise have been rollicking about the streets." Several councillors referred to the Sunday concerts at the Wesleyan Church at which collections were taken up; and one speaker said that, in his opinion, the only difference between the Church and the cinema was that one took a collection going in and the other on going out. The Mayor, in closing the debate, said rightly that the question of Sunday entertainments was secondary to that of the character of the entertainments themselves, and he showed his opinion of them by voting for their continuance. In the end, the vote in favor of Sunday opening was carried by fourteen votes to four—a handsome majority, on which we congratulate the Gravesend Council, also on the general level of the speeches delivered.

What a fuss is made over a Christian service being held at Pekin, at the request of the Chinese Government, to offer prayers for the success of China at the present critical juncture. The dear Daily News topped the report with the bold headline—"Christianising of China." But what, after all, does the Government's request amount to? Let us look at the text of this document:—

> "Prayer is requested for the National Assembly now in Session, for the newly-established Government, for the President yet to be elected, for the constitution of the Republic, that the Government may be recognised by the Powers, that peace may reign within our country, that strong, virtuous men may be elected to office, that the Government may be established upon a strong foundation.
> "Upon receipt of this telegram, you are requested to notify all Christian Churches in your province that April the 27th has been set aside as a day of prayer for the nation. Let us all take part."

This was sent to Catholic and Protestant bodies alike. It is simply another evidence of that spirit of toleration for which China has always been distinguished. "Let all take part"—that is the key-note of the appeal. If there is any good in prayer, let us have the benefit of it all round.

The very language of this document, apart altogether from its distribution, shows that it is not specially addressed to Christians. The Celestials know quite enough about Christian history, and Christian practice, to be aware that Christian prayers are not specially likely to secure the election of "strong, virtuous men" to office. Would anybody in his right senses imagine that this description could apply to our own House of Commons?

In the leaderette it devotes to the matter, the dear Daily News suggests that the Christian nations should show China a better example of Christian virtue. Good! But why doesn't our contemporary make a beginning in that line itself? It has so little regard for common veracity that it represents the Chinese Government's appeal as addressed exclusively to the Christians. What was it that Herder said? Christian veracity deserves to rank with Punic faith

---

The Christian policy is plain. If the Republic weathers this religious storm without any serious accidents, it will be looked upon as a direct answer to prayer; but if it gets on the rocks and is seriously damaged, if not utterly smashed, it will be regarded as a sign either that the prayers were faulty, or that China's day of grace has not yet arrived. In either case, a desperate attempt will be made to convince the Chinese that their only hope of individual and national salvation lies in their wholeheartedly embracing the Christian religion, which, in reality, is the vainest of all hopes.

Sir Robertson Nicoll is in tears because "a savage lust for talk" has taken possession of the Nonconformist Churches. The charge is quite true, but weeping over it will do no good. The truth is, that talking is the only thing left for the Churches to do. All other privileges they have lost; but the privilege of talking at large, being a comparatively harmless exercise, is still theirs. Hence the great multitude of conferences here, there, and everywhere, with infinite floods of nonsensical talk. Nearly all the talkers are professionals; talking is their trade. Sir William thinks they ought to stay at home and work, instead of wasting their time at conferences; but they are wasting their time anyhow. The Churches are dying, in spite of all attempts to revivify them; and so what can the poor parsons do but talk?

The British Weekly has been inviting a correspondence on the subject of "What are the Main Elements in Your Unhappiness?" The editor observes that "Religious reasons for unhappiness are the most numerous." We are not at all surprised, and the editor's discovery has an interesting bearing on the claim of the amount of happiness religion confers on people. The truth is that the more sensitive and the better the nature, the less likely is religion to confer a peaceful and lasting serenity of mind. Coarse and brutal natures are far more likely to find happiness in this direction. And it is a striking fact that the really better types of religionists have very often, if not usually, found their reasons for exaltation followed by periods of acute depression, and have dwelt as fervently upon their torments and doubts and unhappiness as upon their religious joys. And the curious thing is that the unhappiness caused by religion is purely artificial. It is a product of the belief that is supposed to confer happiness. When people write that their unhappiness is caused by doubts and fears of Christ's existence, by doubts as to the existence or providence of God, we are not dealing with sources of unhappiness which arise from the unavoidable conditions of existence, and are so far inescapable; we are dealing with beliefs that are a product of misguided education, and which for a really healthy mind would have no existence. It is religion that provides the element of unhappiness in such cases, and the better the man the more he is exposed to its incidence. That is why we find the coarse-featured, coarse-natured evangelist shrieking about his happiness in Christ, and the finer and more refined character sorrowfully confessing to the doubts and pains brought about by his religious convictions.

The Rev. R. Marks has a wonderfully ingenious mind. The other evening he delivered a lecture at the All Saints' School, Burton-on-Trent, the subject being "The Great Pyramid of Egypt." According to the Burton Daily Mail for April 11, the rev. gentleman described this pyramid as "a wonderful astronomical monument," and also as "a witness to the Bible truth." All modern Egyptologists are convinced that all the pyramids, without a single exception, are tombs of royal and august personages. Only a man of consummate inventive genius could find in them any witness, direct or indirect, to the truth of the Bible. But Mr. Marks' genius is inexhaustible. To him the Great Pyramid is not only "a wonderful astronomical monument," not only "a witness to the Bible truth," but also a storehouse of lessons to "our nation." We congratulate the reverend gentleman upon his apologetic ingenuity and prophetic skill, and we envy the Burtonians their great intellectual treat.

If we are to judge from an article in the Christian World by Mr. H. M. Wallis, who writes from Sofia, the world has seriously misjudged the Allied forces in the Balkans. Their course has generally been marked by forbearance, and appeals to the good sense of the conquered Moslem peasantry. Thus, in one village, after peace had been made with the villagers, "the victors insisted on baptising their vanquished neighbors and removing the women's veils. That was the extent of the reprisals, save that a few old grudges were worked off, and a man or two killed." In another village only three were killed, and the Bulgarians "passed on without burning, plundering, or ravishing." More than this, they were touchingly anxious for the spiritual salvation of the conquered. "Let us try persuasion," they said. So a committee made an appeal to the Moslems. "The hearers knew the appeal was honest, well-meant, and kindly." The two or three who protested "were told to go home if they did not want a thrashing." Then the whole village came to "running water," and was baptised. The women—Christian women—then went into the houses and the "womenkind were talked over." At another village, where those who "dreaded the coming of the schoolmaster, and enlightenment, and Christian ways," protested, "they were warned, and then beaten." After that, more conversions. But, on the whole, quite a beneficent proceeding. The Christian World says that Mr. Wallis is "anxious to speak up for his friends." He appears to have done so.

Meanwhile we note that other pictures of the amiable Allies continue to appear. Thus, in a letter to the Daily Chronicle, Mr. E. N. Bennett writes:—

> "The lives and properties of Moslems would appear to be outside the ethics of some of our Liberals nowadays. The infamous massacres perpetrated in Macedonia and Albania by the Christian Allies, the unprecedented claim of the conquerors to take possession of the private property of the conquered, the refusal of the Montenegrins to convey to Essad Pasha the orders of the Porte for the departure of the non-combatant population of Scutari—scarcely a voice is raised in England in condemnation of these things."

If Mr. Bennett will read Mr. Wallis's article he will see how grievously he has misjudged the Christian Allies. Why, whole villages rushed to be baptised! And does not that prove the kindly nature of the methods used? True, one or two were killed, and a few beaten, but such things will happen over a disturbed area.

Mr. A. E. Fletcher, once the Christian Socialist editor of the Daily Chronicle, and now the writer of "Notes on New Books" in Reynolds', labors under the notion—which is odder than odd in this case—that Secularism and Freethought are low "materialistic" things except when they spell themselves "Rationalist." He also labors under the notion that he understands Shelley, whom he regards as a Christian Socialist too—or, to be still more precise, a Fletcherite. Last week he had occasion to quote four lines from Shelley, though it is not quite clear that he knew the lines were Shelley's. This is how he managed the quotation:—

> "We look before and after,
> We pine for what is not;
> Our sincerest laughter
> With some pain is fraught."

It was shockingly bad taste to omit the lovely last line of the stanza:—"Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought." But the false rendering of the second line was sheer carelessness or vulgar impudence. There are twenty good reasons against beginning the line with "We," but the strongest reason of all is that Shelley wrote "And." The difference between the two words in this position is immense; all the difference, in fact, apart from elegance of composition, between the music of the skylark, singing out of sight in the blue heaven, and the creak of a cartwheel in a country lane below. Mr. Fletcher tempts us to quote another great poet. It was Coleridge who, after noting a certain emendation proposed in Shakespeare's text by one of his commentators, exclaimed "What a noble pair of ears the worthy Theobald must have had!"

Lord Alfred Douglas told the court in the recent libel case that in the days when he wrote certain articles, etc., used against him he "really had no religion at all," but for "two years past he had been a Catholic." What was he, we should like to know, when he took to crusading in the Academy against the Freethinker, and bombastically calling upon Messrs. Smith & Son to cease selling it? His attitude and his language were pious enough, anyhow. Then as now, also, he had too little common sense and too much self-esteem.

In the Lord Mayor's Court the other day (see Daily Mirror, April 18) the judge refused to hear the evidence of a boy because he was not taught about God. More knowledge, and perhaps more sense, might have satisfied the judge that the boy would make an exceptionally good witness. It was a wiser judge than this one who, when a K.C. was browbeating a youthful witness who was badly posted up in the matter of theology, and inquiring whether he knew where boys who tell falsehoods go to when they die, stopped the nonsense by saying from the bench, "I'm sure I don't know: do you?"

The Rev. Dr. Campbell Morgan cannot name the hour or place of his new birth, but he knows whom he has believed. Many people think they know when they don't. Furthermore, it is sheer nonsense to talk about knowing an object of belief. No doubt Dr. Morgan sincerely believes in Jesus Christ, and he has trained, disciplined, and prayed himself into the feeling that he knows him; but all genuine knowledge is intellectual, not emotional. Religious experience never yields knowledge, because it is experience not of actual realities, but of those objects which are realities only to faith. Why is Christ's saving power dependent upon faith? Simply because apart from faith it is non-existent, like Christ himself. Let Christ prove his existence and his power by snatching an unbelieving brand from the burning, and the whole world will be at his feet in no time; but he has never done it, and never will do it.

The Rev. A. C. Hill, of North London, is profoundly eager to preserve the Christian Sabbath. It is not as a day of rest and recreation, however, that he is so anxious to have it perpetuated, but as a day set apart for public worship. Being a conductor of public worship, he naturally thinks highly of its merits. It is a custom that induces people to be serious, conduces to reflection upon life, and teaches us "to be quiet while someone else is speaking." To our thinking, those are spurious merits, existing only in Mr. Hill's imagination. Then he assures us that "the men who are engaged in promoting it [public worship] are not afraid of their competitors." "The picture palace and the museum, the art gallery and the park, do not frighten us," he tells us. But, if they only want "a fair field and no favor," why do they use all their resources to have the picture palaces closed on Sundays? Why did they so strenuously oppose the opening of public libraries and art galleries on their parade-day? And why do they exhaust their eloquence in bitter denunciation of the least suggestion of Sunday theatres and music-halls? It is because they are afraid of competition, being well aware that in competition they would certainly go to the wall.

The Church Times announces "with regret" the death of the Bishop of Richmond. Unless the Church Times has room for doubt as to the ultimate destination of the late Bishop, we fail to see the reason for "regret" at his departure. From a Christian point of view the Bishop's friends ought to express pleasure at his translation.

A centenarian named Perkins, who has been married seventy years, has been the recipient of a congratulatory message from the King, in which he is informed that the event is "almost a unique record." His Majesty's daily Bible reading, of which we hear so much in the press, evidently has not yet extended to the lives of the patriarchs.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

(Lectures suspended till the Autumn.)

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1913.—Previously acknowledged, £115 0s. 5d. Received since:—Elizabeth Adams, £2 2s.; W. Wells (per H. Saill), 5s.; H. E. Voigt, 5s.; T. A. Matthews, £1.

MRS. MORRISON.—We are sorry in one way to hear of your husband's death, for though it was probably a great release to him, the survivors cannot but feel the blow of bereavement when it falls. We are glad to know that our small act of consideration in sending him the Freethinker weekly when he could no longer afford to pay for it brightened so many of his weary hours. We are also glad to know that the note we published brought him help from other quarters. And we add your address now, in case anyone should feel moved to "remember the widow and the fatherless in their affliction":—Bonnie Burn Cottage, Bonnyhill, Bonnie Bridge, N.B.

T. WIGG (New Zealand).—Thanks for your interesting and encouraging letter. It is pleasant to learn that your own efforts have increased the number of our readers in your locality from three to twenty-four. We are glad to hear also of the "powerful propaganda" carried on there during the last eighteen months by Mr. H. Scott Bennett, some time M.P. for Ballarat in the Victorian legislature. We note that one of your vivid recollections of the old country, which you left more than thirty years ago, is hearing us lecture in London. Also that the late article on "Charles Southwell" was much appreciated by yourself and your fellow readers.

ELIZABETH ADAMS.—Thanks for your "very best wishes." To some extent we think they may be realised.

W. J. WILDES.—Haven't you seen in the Freethinker that Mr. Foote has been very ill? The "Globe" Shakespeare would meet your case, but the type is very small. There is an edition in three one shilling volumes in the "Everyman's Library." If you want Shelley's prose as well as his verse you could get it at a feasible price only in Shepherd's edition in five volumes.

"SPICER."—We are obliged for your trouble in sending us the article, but we are afraid that we cannot bother about the Rev. Waldron on such a subject as "Personality." When such men gain prominent positions they are useful chiefly as illustrations of the dearth of mental ability in the Churches.

H. E. VOIGT.—We quite understand that it was not possible, even if it would have been wise, to confine the Sunday Athletic Club to Freethinkers. With regard to the difficulty of obtaining the Freethinker while travelling, we would gladly print from time to time a list of newsagents who supply it, but compiling such a list is a very great difficulty. We do not come in contact, in the way of business, with many local newsagents. Our business is mainly done with the wholesale agents who supply "the trade." And we have met with a very unsatisfactory response when we have asked our readers to send us the names and addresses of their own newsagents. We may make another attempt presently.

T. HUGH PERKINS writes: "I hope Mr. Foote is well again. Never was there more need for such outspoken sincerity as he always exemplifies. I should like to see the circulation of the Freethinker extended to equal that of the London daily papers, but I suppose that will never be until enough money for lecturing and educational work is forthcoming."

E. B.—Much obliged, but is it worth while returning to the poor creature? Many thanks for cuttings.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for cuttings.

ELIZABETH LECHMERE.—You will see that your wish is gratified.

OWING to pressure of space, answers to several correspondents are held over until next week.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months, 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Provincial and other N. S. S. Branches should by this time have their Conference arrangements well in hand. Delegates to the Conference should forward their credentials to Miss Vance without delay, so that their cards may be properly authenticated. Visitors requiring assistance in procuring accommodation while in London should write Miss Vance, who will do her best to meet their requirements. The class of accommodation and the length of time for which it is required must be stated. The Secretary and members of the Executive will be present at the Bay Malton Hotel, 160 Great Portland-street, W. (within three minutes' walk of Queen's Hall), on the Saturday evening before the Conference (May 10), at 8 o'clock, to receive visitors and delegates.

Mr. Forbes Phillips, the vicar of Gorleston, near Great Yarmouth, is known as an unconventional clergyman, and he was never more so than in writing the following postcript to a letter to our publishing office:—

> "I hope Mr. Foote is steadily improving in health. I do not agree with all his opinions, but I do admire his honesty of purpose, and his grit. Perhaps you will convey to him my sympathy and my hope that the enforced rest may mean more life. After all men like machines must have a rest sometime."

We feel that we are breaking no confidence in printing these sentences, for this is not the first time that Mr. Phillips has openly expressed himself to the same effect.

Mr. Foote has paid his first visit to the office to-day (Tuesday). But he is not quite able to resume the editorial chair yet, and he continues his thanks to Mr. Cohen for continuing to occupy it.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd lectures twice to-day (April 27), afternoon and evening, at the Alexandra Hall, Islington-square, Liverpool. We hope the local "saints" will rally round him in strong force.

Members of the Glasgow N. S. S. Branch are requested to note that their Annual Business Meeting takes place at 12 noon to-day (April 27). A full attendance is most desirable. The Branch has held no meetings for some time owing to the hall it used on Sundays being burnt out with the premises in which it was situated. Even the members' list was destroyed in the fire. Members will therefore see the importance of this notice. To-day's meeting takes place at the Ramshorn Rooms, 122 Ingram-street.

Mr. E. Morris Young is lecturing to-day (April 27) at the Secular Sunday School, Pole-lane, Failsworth. He has come over to the Freethought platform from the Anglican pulpit.

The course of lectures held at the Stratford Town Hall was brought to a successful conclusion on Sunday evening last with a lecture from Miss Kough. A few questions were asked, but there was no regular opposition. The audiences have been good throughout the course, and the local Branch naturally regrets that a longer course of lectures was not possible.

A South African reader of the Freethinker, who has been spending most of his time for several months in travelling and voyaging, hastens on his return home to renew his acquaintance with this journal and set himself right with it financially. "I have admired your journal very greatly indeed," he writes, "ever since I first got it, but I never really appreciated how much till I found out how keenly I missed it during my life on the ocean wave."

Our readers may remember an excellent notice of Mr. Foote's "Meredith" article in the English Review for March, which we reproduced from the columns of the Daily Herald. Soon afterwards we received a review copy from the Herald office of a collection of cartoons by Will Dyson (price sixpence), but we fell ill just then and we have only just been able to give the matter attention—in the hope that it is better late than never. The cartoons are powerful, and novel to English taste, being the work of a young Australian from the "black-and-white" school of the Sydney Bulletin. They deal with all sorts of social and political topics, with which we have no special concern in the Freethinker. But there is one cartoon, at least, to which we may call special attention. It is entitled "Cross and Crescent—Turkey, 1912." A typical Turk is nailed up on a Cross, bleeding at the hands and feet, and with collapsing body and drooping head, weighed down by intolerable misery. Birds of prey are waiting to devour his flesh, and underneath we catch the gleam of bayonets and the flattering flag of Christ. "And the meek shall inherit the earth," is the apt quotation clinching the meaning and moral of the picture. That one cartoon is worth the price of the whole collection.

In recognition of the many years' faithful service to the Freethought cause in Birmingham, the friends and admirers of Mr. J. Partridge are presenting him with a testimonial on Sunday evening (April 27) at a meeting to be held in the King's Hall, Corporation-street, at 7 o'clock. There will be speeches delivered in the course of the proceedings, with other arrangements that will make the evening a pleasant one.

The Clamor Against Portugal.

THE Times and the Daily Mail,* together with a number of other journals in this country, have just given a large mead of publicity to a sensational "Appeal to British Public Opinion" by the Duchess of Bedford. The appeal, on the face of it, is evidently a grossly exaggerated statement of affairs —I cannot say facts. For instance, we are told that in Portugal "spies are in every household"—a self-evident over-statement, at least, and a highly improbable, and practically impossible, condition of affairs, even if the friends of the Portuguese monarchy and of the Portuguese Church could take the country back to the times of King Carlos, or the good old days when the Inquisition ruled Portugal with an even firmer hand than that which it spread out to destroy Spain.

Two statements in this appeal are open to grave suspicion. First, take what is said in reference to the political prisoners in Portugal (these belong to two categories; actual rebels taken arms in hand when fighting and plotting against the established Republican regime; and, secondly, the priests guilty of infractions of the law with reference to the conditions of neutrality imposed in the conduct of hierophantic exercises). We are told that "convictions are determined beforehand; false witnesses can be had for the asking; an acquittal might be followed by murder." As to this, it is hard to believe that the lamented Pigott, so dear to the heart of the Times which is now ventilating this highly colored appeal, has sprung up afresh in Portuguese soil, and multiplied his progeny in the interests of a Republican form of government. The other statement is one the credibility of which will certainly not be accepted without scrutiny, and certainly not on the strength of a bare assertion, from whomsoever it may emanate. "It is well known"—we are told—"that judges repair from the provinces to Lisbon to receive their orders before passing sentences." Who knows this? Does Dame Rumor say so? If the facts can speak, then why are they kept in the background? All this smacks too evidently of partisanship. Fancy some Portuguese Suffragette writing in O Mundo that English judges repaired to London before passing sentence on the "Votes for Women" prisoners! One exaggeration is not more feasible or credible than the other.

Then there is the declaration that "since the fall of the monarchy the clergy belong to a doomed class." Well, the Church has been disestablished and disendowed, but the present holders of sacerdotal offices and endowments have been permitted, on conditions that presuppose their acceptance of the existing form of Government, to retain a life interest in their respective jobs. Unless the faithful come to their assistance later on and maintain the Altar and its ministers by free will offerings, certainly the "class" will be doomed, like any other class of public caterers and entertainers, sacred or profane.

When we read that "the chapel exists no more, and the name of God is forbidden," one can only remark that the first member of the sentence is flagrantly impossible, for the chapels exist galore, and as to the second member, the declaration has no meaning, and certainly has no real foundation. There is nothing to prevent a Portuguese from praising God to-day, all day long, in his own time and in his own place.

As regards the complaints made of the rigors of prison treatment accorded to the political prisoners, I am, quite frankly, not inclined to believe that prison accommodation in Portugal, after two years of a Republic, is as spacious and humane as an ideal penal administration would demand, nor am I concerned to defend any proved injustice or harshness of treatment, even against the conspirators of reaction and superstition who form the majority of those on whose behalf the appeal is made. When the inflamed language of the aristocratic article tells us that "the Republic has definitely undertaken the extinction of the Christian faith, and the children in the national schools are decorated with a little badge bearing the words 'No God, no religion,'" all this (apart from the legendary little badge) only means that education has been made secular; that the priest has been left outside the school precincts; that religion has been relegated to its proper sphere as a voluntary "extra" to be provided not by the State but by the parent, or by those directly paid and appointed by him out of his own pocket for that purpose.

The Daily Mail, of course, puts its approving imprimatur upon the appeal. It tells us that the Portuguese Republicans "are maintaining their rule by a system of more than mediæval inquisition." This, of course, is blatant editorial bunkum. If the editor had read a score or more verbatim accounts of mediæval inquisitorial trials he would probably moderate the violence of his senseless exaggeration. The Daily Mail demands, with threats of armed intervention and all kinds of pains and penalties, the release of the political prisoners—a demand that would smack less of the bully if addressed to Russia, where political prisoners are many and unfriended. "There must," says the Daily Mail "be an immediate amnesty for political prisoners"—a quite excellent doctrine which the Daily Mail might also address to our own Government as affecting "politicals," whether in England, Egypt, or India; it might also be addressed to Spain, Italy, Austria, Russia, and Germany; but perhaps it is safer, less heroic, and more easily befitting the imperial swagger of the Imperialist soul if addressed, as in the present case, exclusively to Portugal.

I am writing to Portugal for full particulars and explanations of facts concerning these ducal documents, and have entreated the friends of the present regime to make a full disclosure and an ample reparation if any proved wrong has been inflicted. Already, since these lines were written, O Mundo (Lisbon, April 11) has commenced a series of articles refuting the Daily Mail asseverations. I hope, later on, to return to this subject armed with more reliable data than the uncorroborated ipse dixits of the Duchess of Bedford.

WILLIAM HEAFORD.

The Eternal Priestess.—II.

(Concluded from p. 253.)

THE Christian world does not have, and never can have, so long as it founds its dogmas upon the Bible, the idea and conception of the absolute equality between the sexes. Such was the teaching of the Bible. The early Christian Fathers elaborated and emphasised those teachings; they carried them to their logical conclusions. They said, "Woman is the mother of sin and the door of hell." "They said, "She was subordinate and unclean by nature;" that she was a necessary evil; that marriage was an evil, but permitted as necessary for the perpetuation of the race; that it could only be solemnised by the Church, because the Church, by its act of officiating, lessened the inherent evil of marriage. Because Paul had said she was to keep silent in the Church, woman was not permitted to join in the singing. One of the offences charged against the Huguenots was that they permitted their women to sing at their religious services. On St. Bartholomew's Day thirty thousand men, women, and children were put to death—for what? For the enormous crime of women singing in churches.

The early Fathers did not allow a woman to take with ungloved hands the communion bread. Her touch would pollute the body of Christ. Some of the Church Fathers contended that woman had neither reason nor a soul. They held that she was an intermediate being, on a plane between brute and man.

From these teachings, there could come, there has come, but one deplorable result, the utter subjugation of woman through the Christian centuries. Neither her reason, nor her conscience, nor her will were her own. If she was married, her reason, her conscience, her person, her property, her children, all were her husband's. They went so far as to say that the children to whom a mother had given birth were not related to the mother—they were related solely to the father. Under those teachings the husband had the right of life and death over his wife. If he tired of her, he could put her out of the way, or hire an assassin to do it. Husbands sold their daughters, sometimes brothers sold their sisters; woman was a chattel, a wife was an "unhallowed thing." Her subjection by the civil and the ecclesiastical law became complete. It has not been fifty years; it has not been twenty-five years—the day has not arrived yet in some parts of this land, where woman stands on an even and equal plane of civil and political rights.

The old idea of inferiority and subordination of woman is in the blood of the Christian world. With such ideas regarding woman, it was but an easy and a logical step to the development of the celibate priesthood. The Roman Church worked long and arduously to establish that. It was not accepted universally by the Church until the fourteenth century. Until that time Roman Catholic priests, as a rule, were married men. When that doctrine was finally enforced, every priest was compelled to turn his wife and children as beggars out in the streets, while all of his and her possessions reverted to the Church. Women of wealth and possessions were impelled by the Church to renounce the world and enter the convents, in order that their property might revert to the Church. With the celibacy of the priesthood came immeasurable immorality. The celibate was a reprobate. In the centuries that followed, Europe reached a degree of depravity, an enormity of crime, a hideousness of disease, paralleled nowhere in the annals of any people since the writing of history began. The testimony of historians in these matters is uniform and explicit. So great was the moral corruption of the priests that the Church permitted them, after paying a tax to the Church, to keep concubines. They found ample authority and lofty precedent for this in the blessed Bible. So infamous were the practices of those centuries that the mothers and sisters of priests were not permitted to live in the same house with them. No ties of relationship were so sacred, no bond of kinship so close as to protect a woman. There was no respect by anyone, clerical or political, high or low, for woman as woman.

When the serf of the feudal lord took to himself a wife, the feudal lord under an old law claimed the bride for his own.

We are reaping the harvest. Ideas persist in their effects after they themselves have been abandoned.

Christian dogmas have dishonored and degraded the mothers of the race. I hope not to appear indifferent or callous to crime. I hope not to be counted unmindful of the shame and the disgrace of it all, but I hope to be clearly understood when I say that nothing we can do in the red-light district, nothing that we can do among the ranks of the proscribed, will have any other effect than to "skin and film the ulcerous places, while rank corruption mining all within infects unseen." We must strike deeper than at the symptoms or the superficial conditions. We must have more to do with the causes and less with the consequences. Woman must be restored to her original status. Man must be emancipated from the superstition that he himself is first or superior in the order of nature or in the sight of God. We are not giving woman anything. We have nothing to give. We are not making her the beneficiary of our masculine generosity. We are simply endeavoring to restore to her the rights, liberties, and justice that have been taken from her, and through the deprivation of which she has been crushed and disgraced. The restoration to woman of the heritage of which she has been robbed involves first her economic freedom and equality. If she does the same work that a man does, and does it as well, then she is to receive the same wages. And if she works at all for any wages, she must be assured of a decent living wage. Temptations will throng her path; without and within there will be dangers to encounter and foes to face. Let not those temptations be made tragic by privation and poverty. She must be absolutely free and equal with man in all civil and political rights, privileges, and responsibilities. It is not a question of expediency or sentiment. It is a question of simple justice—let us say, of two-fold justice, of justice to the woman, of justice to the man. No part of the race can subject another part without injuring itself. Master and slave descend together—woman must be freed from religion. She must be emancipated from the Church. She must be rescued from the priest. I am not saying that woman must be irreligious, or non-religious. I am saying that if she is religious at all, it must be by virtue of her own reason, her own convictions, and for her reason and her conscience and her faith she must depend on no authority save that of her own reason.

It is a matter of amazement that woman is not worse than she is. Consider what the Church has been to her. Think of the auricular confession. If woman will have religion, let her think it out. Let her not ask, as Paul said, "her husband." Let her not ask, as the Church says, "the priest." She must get and keep her own intellectual self-respect. If there are to be priestly confessors, then let there be women confessors for women. There never was a more formidable conspiracy against womanhood than that involved in a celibate priesthood and auricular confession.

When woman asserts her right to herself, to her own reason and conscience, and accepts the responsibility; when woman is capable of looking any priest in the world in the face and telling him to mind his own business, then the emancipation of woman is at hand.

I believe in the nobility of man. I believe in the nobility of woman. I believe in equality, freedom and comradeship. I believe that the interests of man and woman are mutual in all things, civil, religious, political, and inseparably one. I believe mankind can advance only as man and woman, standing erect and equal, side by side, mutually working, planning, achieving, and hoping, free, equal, unafraid, confident and glad, meet and greet the coming morning of the ever nobler day.

—Truthseeker (New York). J. E. ROBERTS.

The Irony of So-Called Revelations.

THE claim to be a revelation from the supernatural is a characteristic common to all religions. Patriarch, priest, seer, and prophet of all times and places have claimed to have received visions from the gods in which mysterious things of alleged momentous importance to man were revealed. Bible and Koran are proclaimed sacred books because they contain such revelations. We propose, therefore, to examine this claim, and see to what extent the contention is valid. There is nothing absurd in the idea that man was made the recipient of a revelation. Nothing could ever be more rational and fitting, for he stood in need, not only of one, but of many revelations. From the lowest rung of his nature to the highest—from his advent till now—he has always been destined, through lack of knowledge, to a heritage of suffering. This predicament is unique to the human race; for out of the million species of sentient forms which now tenant the earth, none but man needs a revelation, and none but man could use it if he had it. The birds of the air, the beasts of the field, the fish of the sea, and all creeping things possess the sure instinct that guides to life, detects danger, and avoids death. But man is practically bereft of these internal guides, and therefore needs to be taught and piloted from without. He wanted someone to point out to him—that is, to reveal to him—how to avoid those paths that would imperil his life, or would involve it in much suffering.

It is true that he had awakened to self-consciousness, and had become a rational being; but reason without knowledge is power of locomotion in darkness—the possession of feet without light to show one where he can plant them with safety. That was the pitiable condition of man for upwards of a million years—a plight that made the need of a revelation both desperate and tragic.

In urgency of want, in pitiableness of destitution, and in intensity of suffering man's predicament resembled that of Hagar and her child when sent forth by Abraham to wander in the wilderness of Beersheba. The little water provided in her bottle was exhausted, and, as the sandy desert stretched away in all directions to the far horizon, there was no means within ken of having it replenished. The two tales are wonderfully alike in their beginnings; are they also alike in their endings? That is our inquiry. We are told that an Angel of God called out from heaven to Hagar and drew her attention to a well that was close by. Did the like ever happen to man? Were his eyes ever opened to behold wells of urgent knowledge gurgling forth at his side at which he could quench his dying thirsts? To convey a very brief summary of the answer supplied to this question by man's own story is our present task.

Let us therefore pass in review the various channels through which any relief has ever come to him, be it in respect to his organic cravings, to his social needs, or to the hungers and thirts of his mental and moral nature, with a view to finding out whether their source was in heaven or on the earth. I propose to take them in the order of their evolution. His organic wants will therefore come in for first consideration.

1. Now, the lion of his bodily cravings is hunger. To have a continuous supply of food is the premier of the sine qud non conditions of his continued existence; yet for man the earth's surface truly resembled a vast barren Beersheba with only a few oases, scattered here and there, where he could replenish his wants. But now, in the light of modern science and industrial arts, we know that, as in the case of Hagar, the wells were close by. For Mother Earth is as bountiful in her supply of means to allay his hunger as she is to quench his thirst, if man were only supernaturally presented with the key which unlocked her larder. But alas! instead of being consoled and instructed by an angel, as in the legend, man was left, for untold aons, in his crass ignorance to eke out a miserable existence in cave and forest, and to subsist on any edible he chanced to find and which did not happen to poison him.

Until he stumbled upon the device of taming wild animals, and of converting the seeds of wild grasses into corn and bread, only few parts of the earth could, with any pretence or approach to plenty, provide for his daily wants—a fact which was the origin and the perennial cause of mutual hostility and of war.

I pass by the obvious moral obligation on the part of the gods to provide for man—which manifestly was their imperative and palpable duty if it were true that hunger and its pangs were implanted by them in his nature. For it is not man's sufferings, however acute or unjust, that reveals the irony of the so-called revelations, but the tragic hollowness of the remedies with which the priest attempted to appease his wants. It invariably aimed at stupefying his sensibilities by stultifying his mind. What was, then, the revealed secret with which he claimed to be able to unlock the golden treasures of the soil? Mirabile dictu! It was the potency of occultism and magic. Certain magical ceremonies had to be performed. And then—the crops would grow!

The priest, therefore, went forth to the fields, meadows, and vineyards, and blessed them in the name of the gods. He proclaimed, moreover, a national feast at sowing-time and harvest, and bade the people to celebrate them with great solemnity and awe. He further ordained that an impersonation of the earth-god should be annually slain, and that its blood should be poured over the soil to the accompaniment of incantation and magic gestures. At first the victim was a human being; but when man's conscience became more enlightened and humanised, an animal was substituted. In this manner people were taught that priestly invocation, conjuration, and sacrifice were an Aladdin's lamp with power to tap nature's store of vital energy, and to cover land and meadow with corn and pasture, and to laden their trees with fruit. That is to say, it was through the agency of magic that revelation assisted man to allay his hunger. It is a pathetic example of asking for bread and receiving a stone.

2. But man had other physical needs besides hunger and thirst. He was naked, and yet was exposed to all the inclemency and fury of the seasons and the elements. Nature had provided him with neither a fur coat nor with a thatched shelter; and what was still worse, he was not even endowed with the instinct or with the knowledge how to make them. Nevertheless, revelation never offered to teach this miserable, shivering wretch the arts of spinning, weaving, and building. He had to learn how to do these himself in the school of misery, suffering, and death.

But that neglect, though serious, is only a trivial charge compared to the wicked advantage the priest took of man's sorrowful plight; for lo and behold! he meanly used it to exploit the emotions of fear and terror to enthral the human mind. He taught them that nature's giant forces were instruments in the hands of the gods to punish mankind for neglecting its religious duties.
