THE Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—No. 1 SUNDAY, JANUARY 4, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

If we had done as the kings told us, we would all have been slaves. If we had done as the priests told us, we would all have been idiots. If we had done as the doctors told us, we would all have been dead.

—R. G. INGERSOLL.

Who Made God?

WHATEVER "blasphemy" there is in this question does not belong to us. It belongs to Mr. Booth-Clibborn, one of the great Booth family, though only by marriage. We once saw it at the top of one of his lecture posters.

When the good Christians hear that explanation their anger will cool down. The Blasphemy Laws were intended to prevent "infidels" from making Christianity ridiculous; Christians may make it as ridiculous as they please—and it must be allowed that their efforts are crowned with considerable success.

We remember what happened at our trial for "blasphemy" before Mr. Justice North, at the Old Bailey, more than thirty years ago. (Lord, how the time flies!) We made a long list, which was published in the report of our trial, of the vituperative epithets that Christians applied to each other during the controversy between Catholics and Protestants at the time of what is called the Reformation. It was a tremendous list in every way, and would really be useful to political opponents in the approaching elections. Nothing was omitted that Christian charity could prompt or pious ingenuity suggest. It constituted a perfect debater's slang dictionary. No wonder the judge looked half-mad when we presented those flowers of religious courtesy to the jury; especially when we suggested that anything complained of in the pages of the Freethinker was but a poor and feeble imitation of orthodox achievements. But the judge lost his temper entirely when we proceeded to show that the "blasphemy" in our indictment was pale and vapid in comparison with the red and pungent samples we culled from recent numbers of the War Cry.

Mr. Booth-Clibborn, having been a Salvationist, and being now "on his own" in the same line of business, is a licensed "blasphemer." If he were an "infidel" the authorities would soon be down upon him. The question at the top of his poster caused a terrible rumpus at Birmingham some years ago. The Secularists were holding Sunday evening meetings in the Bristol-street Board School, and one of their lecturers dealt with the question, "Did God make Man, or did Man make God?" This awful query stirred Birmingham to the very depths. The School Board turned the Secularists out of the building they had profaned. Letters and articles appeared in the local newspapers. There was Hades to pay. Yet the pious Mr. Booth-Clibborn puts "Who Made God?" on a poster in a little strait-laced, clergy-ridden town, and not a dog barks at it. The policeman looks at it and passes on as if it were "Aladdin" or the "Forty Thieves."

We do not deny that Mr. Booth-Clibborn's question is a very sensible one. We are also prepared to say that it admits of an answer.

There is a text in the Bible story of Creation which runs thus:—

> "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them."

The grammar is mixed, but the meaning is clear. God made mankind male and female. That was the ancient idea. But a great deal has been learnt since then, and the modern idea is very different. The declaration of primitive ignorance has to be read upside down in the light of present knowledge. Man thought that God made him. He could not think otherwise. It was the only way of explaining how he came here. And the guess of ignorance satisfied him while he remained ignorant. But he is better instructed now; having investigated and discovered, he has no more use for guesses; he accepts the teachings of Evolution; he knows that the world came, and all that is in it, including himself, in a perfectly natural way; and the more he studies Evolution the more he suspects, or actually perceives, that God did not make him, but that he made God. The old text, therefore, will eventually read in the true Revised Version of the Bible:—

> "So man created God in his own image, in the image of man created he him; male and female created he them."

Yes, them. For the world has been populous with gods. Down in Egypt, which Shaftesbury so finely called the motherland of superstition, a Greek wit said that it was often easier to find a god than a man. There were gods of every aspect of nature; gods of the sky, gods of the stars, gods of the mountains, gods of the woods, gods of the rivers, and gods of the seas. Lastly, there were gods of every aspect of human nature; as in the splendid Greek pantheon, with its Mars, the god of war—Apollo, the god of light and song—Juno, the goddess of marriage—Venus, the goddess of beauty—and Cupid, the god of love, who is blind because love is blind, and winged because love is swift, and eternally young because love is always young; for time touches all else, but love it cannot touch, and the fragrance of youthful days still linger in old hearts, and when the passions have burnt themselves out the light of affection gleams in aged eyes, whose possessors are tottering down the hill they once climbed together, and will soon be sleeping together at its foot. Yes, love is youth; we are young to the extent that it remains with us; and without it we are dead, though we are not buried.

The one God of monotheism is no more an actual existence than whiteness or virtue is an actual existence. Whiteness and virtue are general terms, denoting qualities common to many objects and actions. God is also a general term, denoting certain qualities common to the multitudes of deities of all ages and climes. We may change the illustration, and say that it is crude supernaturalism refined to the last degree. Supernatural beings have disappeared, and left behind them the conception of supernatural personality. Nature is no longer mapped out in separate provinces; man recognises that it is one and indivisible; consequently the mob of rival gods become incredible; man drops them out of his mind, and accepts one great God in their place. Religion teaches him nothing; his religion is always modified by his growing knowledge, and purified by his growing morality.

Christmas Cant.

FOR publishing reasons this article is written before Christmas, although it will not be in the reader's hands until the holiday is over. It is not, however, necessary for one to wait until the Christmas holiday is done in order to find out what kind of sermon will be delivered in thousands of Christian pulpits concerning the meaning and influence of Christmas. There will be all the customary verbiage about "glad tidings of great joy," of the wonderful Christmas dawn at Bethlehem, of the profound moral influence exerted by Christianity upon the world, and of the degree to which it has fostered love and brotherhood among men. All these things will be looked for much as children used to look for the clown's "Here we are again!" and will be accepted without question because they are just part and parcel of the religious entertainment. Everything will be dwelt on except the one pregnant fact that Christmas was a Pagan festival long before it was a heathen one, that it is part of a very widespread nature-worship, and that it has no more to do with the birth of a Jewish child at Bethlehem than it has to do with the cultivation of cabbages.

Christmas—to use the name of this ancient festival—was always a season of rejoicing; it was left for Christianity to convert it into a saturnalia of cant. Disregarding historic fact and present circumstances, the familiar shibboleths are repeated just as though their veracity were beyond question. And, with senses dulled by the narcotising influence of tradition, people hear them with only here and there a faint feeling that the history and influence of Christianity may be open to a different interpretation from that usually given. The cant of the pew re-echoes the cant of the pulpit. From the church it is carried into the outside world; and the church, far from being a centre of enlightenment and good fellowship thus becomes one of the chief centres from which radiates ill-feeling, misrepresentation, and opposition to genuine enlightenment.

The charge is sweeping, but not difficult to substantiate. Christianity has had an official existence of over fifteen hundred years. During that time it has wielded tremendous power, enjoyed unique social influence, had at its command almost fabulous wealth. No other system has ever had such opportunities for moulding the world to its desires, and with what result? Comparing the Christian world of to-day with the Pagan world of antiquity, what do we see? It is claimed that the world of to-day is the better of the two. Let it pass as such, although a great deal might be said on the other side. Fifteen hundred years is a long while; and as progress is not a Christian invention, is there not reason for assuming that the world would have grown better had Christianity never appeared? Instead of talking like an ignorant pulpiteer, let us apply another test. Taking the art, the science, the literature, the social life of antiquity, with the capacity for development latent in human nature, allowing for all these factors, are we so much more advanced than the peoples of antiquity that normal human forces cannot account for the difference? Not what we are, but what we might have been; not whether we have improved, but how much have we improved, are the questions by which the influence of Christianity must be tested.

Tried by that test, Christianity stands fairly condemned. Christmas Day, instead of the anniversary of a beneficent event, becomes that of the greatest disaster that ever overtook the civilised world. For a thousand years Christianity rode roughshod over the learning, the science, the culture of the ancient world. This might have been forgiven had it possessed an art or culture of its own. But it had none. Literature was replaced by monkish legends, social activities by religious exercises, medical science by miracle cures, the conception of this life as an end in itself by that of the world as a halting-place on a long pilgrimage, during which man showed his greatness by ignoring its beauties and trampling on its pleasures. The period of Christianity's unquestioned rule represents so much time lost to the world's progress. It is a blank over which the progressive tendencies of the Renaissance reached to affiliate with the suppressed life of pre-Christian times. For the last five hundred years the story of European progress has largely been the story of an attempt, more or less successful, to throw off the cramping clutch of the Christian Church. First directed against the Catholic Church, then against this or that section of the Protestant Church, then against the general influence of Christianity itself. But always there has been the recognition—more or less conscious as enlightenment was more or less complete—that organised Christianity must be kept firmly in check if progress was to be permanent and its results conserved.

What amount of goodwill did Christianity bring into the world? It talked much about love and brotherhood; it still talks much about them. Parsons slobber about love in the pulpit, and journalists write columns on the same topic in the religious press. Again, what are the facts? In the very earliest notices we get of Christian communities, we find the qualities of slander, ill-feeling, and hatred to the front. It is found even in the pages of the New Testament. It accompanies Christianity right through the ages; it is strong in current Christianity. Listen to the members of one denomination attacking another, and then reflect how much encouragement is given to good-fellowship by Christian belief. Why, it is chronicled as a great achievement when members of different denominations stand on the same platform on behalf of some common purpose. The mere sight of Christians belonging to different sects fraternising arouses astonishment—and more cant about the power of Christian love.

More than this, the rancor awakened by religious feelings is the bitterest of all. People will sink their differences on all other topics sooner than they will on religion. In every other direction a man will minimise his dislike, and take it as something of which he ought to feel ashamed. In religion alone he counts his hatred as a virtue, and feeds it diligently. In all civilised society there is no force so divisive and so disruptive as religion. In Ireland this remains true, whether we take the side of the Catholic or that of the Protestant. In either case, we see how it is religion, and religon alone, that prevents two bodies working amicably together, and each confesses that it is the religion of the other which is the cause of their separateness. And both talk with equal glibness about the religion of love.

The cant of it all! And the strangest fact of all is that the failure of Christianity is admitted by Christians even in the very act of glorifying their creed. When preaching their "purity crusade," the Bishop of London and his colleagues draw pictures of Christian London such as few other cities in the world's history could produce. If one were to be guided by these pornographic moralists, one would have to believe that every girl who ventures abroad without a sturdy male relative runs the greatest possible risk of abuse, and that sexual immorality in all its worst forms flourishes with us almost unchecked. Of course, these clerical diatribes are full of gross exaggeration, but things are bad enough in all truth. And, being bad enough, what becomes of the boasted influence of the Christian faith? Surely, by this time, a religion such as it is claimed Christianity is, and controlling, as it has done, whole generations from the cradle to the grave, ought to have completely moralised the social medium. And now they are crying out for the policeman to step in and save our women folk from disaster. Could any other system, after so many centuries of rule, chronicle a more disastrous failure?

Not only good will, but peace. Christian peace, when all over the civilised world it is the Christian Powers, Christian greed, and Christian bad faith that provides the occasion for nine-tenths of the world's wars and the insane competition in armaments. What nation of pre-Christian times could compete with Christian countries of to-day, allowing for all corrections due to difference of time and situation? Where, in pre-Christian times, would there be found highly organised corporations engaged in fanning war and talk of war for the mere purpose of financial gain? And how could this be unless there existed a vast mass of uncivilised feeling to which these war-mongers could appeal? Christian Europe forced non-Christian Japan into militarist channels, and it is forcing non-Christian China along the same road. It has compelled Turkey to devote its main energies to militarist preparations if it would be secure against Christian greed and bad faith. Every Christian nation openly proclaims that nothing save huge armies and enormous fleets will induce other Christian nations to act honestly or to respect treaties. Every Christian nation is groaning under the burden of armaments, while Christian leaders assure us that things will have to become worse before they can get better. And these same people have the insolence to talk about "Peace on earth and good will to all men"!

Let it be granted that all this, with the poverty, the misery, the vice, and the crime of present-day existence, has not resulted from Christianity. The pulpit legend is that Christianity brought peace, and brotherhood, and good will, and love to bear upon all human relations, and so moralised life. Where are the proofs? Has there ever been a time when even preachers have not lamented the presence of all manner of evils, and the fact that Christianity failed to make society, as a whole, better? Christianity, if it did not induce these evils, did not remove them. That is the solid fact, shirked by all religious controversialists, and the one fact that completely demolishes Christian claims.

As a matter of sober truth, Christianity did encourage the persistence of all the social evils concerning which complaints are raised. It diverted social energies and perverted the social consciousness. It dulled men's sense of social claims in order to strengthen those of religious obligation. The whole history of Christianity has been that of an exploitation of man's social nature in the interests of supernaturalism. If to-day the clergy are adopting another tone, it is only because the social forces are too strong for them, and, in spite of suppression and distortion, can no longer be denied. And there should be no mistaking the significance that all over Europe earnest workers in the cause of reform—no matter by what name they may call themselves—are at one in claiming that this world and this life must come first, and that religion itself must be tried by the test of how far it promotes human happiness here. Man has been long enough judged by the standard of how far he pleased God; it is now the turn of the gods to be tried by the test of how far they please man.

So far as the Christmas of 1913 has a helpful message, it is this. Peace on earth and good will to all men is what we all need. But it will never come until we clear our minds of superstition and our mouths of cant, and judge life from the standpoint of a rationalised humanity.

C. COHEN.

Man's Descent from the Ape.

BETWEEN theology and science there is an impassable gulf. It is true that many theologians accept the conclusions of science, but they inevitably do so at the expense of mutilating their theology. The theory of evolution, for example, flatly contradicts the doctrine of creation; but the doctrine of creation is a fundamental article in the Christian creed, and no one can renounce it without rendering the Gospel simply ridiculous. If Darwinism is true Christianity is founded upon a lie. When a clergyman rejects evolution, therefore, he pursues the only consistent policy: he only becomes foolish when he attempts to disprove it. We are bound to respect those divines whose faith in their system is so strong that they positively refuse to have anything whatever to do with science; but there are a few whom we cannot but despise, not because they are anti-scientists, but because they have the temerity, while defending their own faith, to bitterly and ignorantly attack that of the scientists. The Rev. Canon Digby Berry is a well-known Christian apologist who, at one time, won great distinction as such in Australia. About a month ago, he preached a remarkable sermon in Christ Church, Johannesburg, which was afterwards published, on "The Supposed Animal Origin of Man." Having carefully perused it, a necessity is laid upon us to declare that its attack upon Darwinism is distinguished only for its utter futility. Canon Berry accuses evolutionists of passing over "in silence those immense differences between man and all other animals, those impassable chasms, which suggest most forcibly that man, though he has an animal nature, has also another nature absolutely distinct from that of all other animals." There is in this charge an element of deliberate disingenuousness. So far are scientists from passing over in silence the enormous differences between man and all other animals that they expatiate upon them with marked emphasis. Huxley refers to them again and again in his well-known masterpiece, Man's Place in Nature; but he also calls attention to the fact "that the structural differences which separate Man from the Gorilla and the Chimpanzee are not so great as those which separate the Gorilla from the lower apes." Now, we charge the Canon with passing over in silence the resemblances between man and the anthropoid ape. The skeleton in both is composed of two hundred bones. They both possess the same hair covering the skin, the same mammary glands providing food for the young, the same four-chambered heart, the same reproductive organs, and the same brain-structure. As Huxley says, "Whatever organ we take, the differences between man and the anthropoid apes are slighter than the corresponding difference between the latter and the lower apes."

Canon Berry has, therefore, no right whatever to call the differences between man and the apes "impassable chasms," or to jump to the conclusion that because of them man has "a nature absolutely distinct from that of all other animals." He might as well say that the anthropoid ape has a nature absolutely distinct from that of all the lower apes. The truth is that the differences cannot reasonably be advanced as objections to the evolutionary theory, while the similarities are wholly inexplicable on the special-creation hypothesis. Furthermore, the differences between civilised and educated man and a raw savage are greater than those between the lowest man and the highest ape. Discussing the important matter of cranial capacity, Huxley says:—

> "After making due allowance for difference of size, the cranial capacities of some of the lower apes fall nearly as much, relatively, below those of the higher apes as the latter fall below man. Thus, men differ more widely from one another than they do from the apes; while the lowest apes differ as much, in proportion, from the highest as the latter does from man" (Man's Place in Nature, pp. 54, 55).

Canon Berry does not understand what the theory of evolution really means, his definition of it being as fallacious as it can be. Referring to the question of priority between the hen and the egg, he says:—

> "Now if you choose to assume that because the full-grown hen develops from the egg, therefore the whole race of hens has developed from an egg, and that that egg had no hen for its parent, you must not expect me to believe this without proof."

No one with the most elementary knowledge of Darwin's teaching could put the case against it in so crude and erroneous a manner. Is not Canon Berry aware that the simplest living form known to us is unicellular, and that every individual living thing, including man, begins life as a single cell which multiplies into two, four, eight, sixteen, thirty-two, and so on, until there is an innumerable host of nucleated cells? If he is, his argument against evolution is infinitely absurd; if he is not, he has no right to talk on the subject.

Equally unfortunate is his allusion to the fact that "the body of the human being before birth passes through such a series of transformations that it belongs in turn to every family of animals on earth." This is an extremely faulty statement of the repetition or recapitulation doctrine, of the truth of which there can be no doubt. The truth is that the human embryo has to retravel the road followed by the embryos of its ancestors. Even Canon Berry has not the hardihood to deny this truth; but his inference is, not that man has descended from the animals, but that God created him to be the head and the shepherd of the terrestrial creation. "Is it not therefore quite natural," he asks, "that the Creator should have made man the flesh and blood relation of all those creatures whose shepherd he was to be?" We regard that question as the most foolish that could be asked, and certainly it suggests no explanation whatever of the fact that the development of the human embryo is a shortened recapitulation of the evolution of animal embryos.

It is now a truism that both in plants and animals there are minute and practically useless representatives of organs which are highly developed and of direct service in other forms. There are many vestigial structures in the human body, such as remnants of the muscles by means of which animals twitch their skin, move their scalps up and down, and draw the whole ear backwards and forwards at will, and such as the third eyelid, gill-arches, and the vermiform appendix. Canon Berry observes that "if it is true that there are useless organs in the human body, this, on the special creation hypothesis, would imply that mere utility, mere usefulness to the individual, is not the only principle followed in the construction of man's body." The Canon is inclined, however, to deny the existence of such organs. He admits that there are organs, the use of which we do not yet know, but contends that our ignorance is no proof of their uselessness. We much prefer to take the testimony of people who have made the human body a special study, which is that "our own body is a veritable museum of relics."

Canon Berry falls back upon two men of science as his authorities in the denial of man's animal origin, namely, the late Professor Rudolph Virchow, of Berlin, and the late Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace; but they are both authorities utterly discredited by the biologists of to-day. Dr. Wallace was a thoroughgoing evolutionist on all points except the origin of mind, while Virchow rejected evolution entirely in its application to man. Now, on what evidence does the reverend Canon deny the evolution of man? On no evidence whatsoever beyond the fact that the Genesis story of creation has been before the world for twenty-five centuries at the very least, and probably for fifty centuries, whereas the theory of evolution was invented only a few years ago. He hinted that if he were lecturing instead of preaching he would have offered his hearers a great deal more evidence; but we doubt it, as in the sermon he offers no evidence at all. To aver that the so-called missing link has never been found is not to demonstrate man's heavenly origin. The Canon declares that he prefers the one miracle of Genesis to a chain of thousands of miracles offered us by the evolutionists. As a matter of fact, however, the evolutionists believe in no miracle whatever, the evolutionary process being, in their estimation, perfectly natural, conducted under physical and chemical forces alone.

At the close of his sermon Canon Berry makes the following amazingly naive admission:—

> 'Why can we not believe that man was evolved from the lower animals without any prejudice whatever to our Christian beliefs? I will give you two reasons in answer to that question. In the first place the evolution of man from the lower animals implies and teaches that man is a risen and rising being, instead of a fallen being. I am convinced that if once men are possessed with the belief that they are a race risen from the lower animals, they will give up all belief in the Fall, and in original sin: they will, in fact, refuse to be treated as sinners in need of salvation."

That is, indeed, an exceedingly valid reason, from the Christian point of view, for rejecting the theory of evolution. To a Christian minister the Fall is indispensable. He lives on the belief that men are sinners in need of salvation. It is his business to induce that belief in all who listen to him. There is no getting away from the conclusion that if man has been evolved from the lower animals, the Genesis story is nothing but a legend. If we have risen, and not fallen, we are not sinners in need of salvation, but slowly growing and improving beings. What we need is not salvation from sin, but conquest over ignorance and weakness; not forgiveness, but uplifting and inspiration. It is a good sign for the future of our race that it is gradually losing the sense of sin acquired in times of ignorance and superstition. There is, therefore, nothing more natural than that a clergyman should shut the door against the doctrine of evolution, and give the lie to all the known facts of life. But the facts are bound to triumph, for all that, and to demolish every system not founded upon them.

J. T. LLOYD.

"Wait Till You Come to Die."—V.

(Concluded.)

> "Like Frederick's grenadier, the Salvationist wants to live for ever (the most monstrous way of crying for the moon);.....the man who has come to believe that there is no such thing as death, the change so-called being merely the transition to an exquisitely happy and utterly careless life, has not overcome the fear of death at all; on the contrary, it has overcome him so completely that he refuses to die on any terms whatever. I do not call a Salvationist really saved till he is ready to lie down cheerfully on the scrap heap, having paid scot and lot and something over, and let his eternal life pass on to renew its youth in the battalions of the future." — GEORGE BERNARD SHAW, Major Barbara, pp. 169-70.

> "It would not do for the Church to admit that they [Infidels] died peacefully. That would show that religion was not essential at the last moment. Superstition gets its power from the terror of death. It would not do to have the common people understand that a man could deny the Bible, refuse to kiss the cross, contend that humanity was greater than Christ, and then die as sweetly as Torquemada did after pouring molten lead into the ears of an honest man —or as calmly as Calvin after he had burned Servetus, or as peacefully as King David after advising, with his last breath, one son to assassinate another."—COLONEL INGERSOLL, Oration on Voltaire, p. 25.

IF the Church cannot retain the allegiance of men of genius while they are alive, they always strive to obtain possession of their bodies when they are dead. Charles Darwin, who laid the axe to the root of the tree of Christian superstition, lies in Westminster Abbey. This was owing to the manipulations of the late Dean Stanley—for which he was called "the body-snatcher"—in spite of much opposition.

Recently we have had to witness the spectacle of Freethinkers, like Swinburne and Meredith, buried with the rites of a Church which they rejected and despised all their lives.

As Moncure Conway—who was himself educated for the ministry—has truly observed:—

> "Many brave and independent lives are still included with the conventional world at those helpless periods. We were baptised when we could not help it; we renounced the Devil and all his works, and took the vows of orthodox faith through various sponsors, when we had no will or reason of our own. Advancing in knowledge and thought, we found those pious swaddling bands the shroud of our living selves. We burst those bonds of a gorgeous tomb. We came forth, and are trying to live our own lives, to think our own thoughts. But when we again sink into infant helplessness, or when death comes, the conventional world and creed will again come with its rites, its burial service, to say, 'This man is ours. He lived a heretic, but could not die so.' Or, if it cannot say that, it will manage to get friends and relatives to bury the dead thinker's body with a Christian service, in order that it may go forth to the world that his testimony was in favor of the conventional system. How many have we known who, from lives of faithful testimony against established error, have gone to their rest beneath its symbols? Their burial is with the rich. The Church rarely refuses to bury such in the odor of sanctity. It is but too glad, if they are respectable and eminent, to gain the prestige of their virtues and talents, and have their epitaphs weigh where their lives did not—on the orthodox side. This desire to appropriate lives, to have their tombs support error when their protests are forgotten, underlies the strenuous efforts made in all ages to extort from dying Freethinkers recantations of their heresies. And often where there has been no recantation, invention has come in, when the dead cannot repudiate it, to report some last word favorable to the old system."*

"Even were such inventions true," says the same writer, "what would they amount to? So far as the real man and his thought are concerned, they amount to nothing. They would only mean that so long as he was sound he was liberal; when unsound was credulous. Freedom got his health, dogma his disease. Stories of death-bed conversions, says Heine, belong to the department of pathology. 'After all, they only prove that it is impossible to convert the freethinkers so long as they move about under God's open sky, in the enjoyment of their healthy senses, and in the full possession of their reasoning faculty.'"

"When a man has spent the main force of his life; when the brain grows feebler, the nerves weaker, the energies not able to keep abreast of advancing inquiry, there is sometimes a tendency to reaction, or at least to nearer conformity with those around. The feeble one desires peace, wishes to please relatives, perhaps consents, for others' sake, to see the parson, and makes the interview as conciliatory as possible. He consents to be buried as his family desire; and that is too generally in a tomb of the Arimathean, which goes on announcing from its false marble lips that he was what he was not, and believed what he believed not."†

Unfortunately, all the arrangements for human burial are in the hands of a Christian society, and Conway tells how an eminent London barrister, a veteran Freethinker, a friend of Leigh Hunt and other literary men of a bygone time, wishing to guard against misrepresentation, had his tomb made and the epitaph engraved—an epitaph scholarly, dignified, weighty, ending with (in Latin) "Let truth stand though the priest fall." He was unable to find a cemetery which would admit such an inscription, and for some years he paid a shopkeeper in Regent-street to exhibit the stone in his window. But all his precautions were in vain. The Church triumphed in the end, and his body was buried in the conventional manner.

In France and Italy these tales of recantation became so common that associations were formed to defend dying Freethinkers from the priests, and to witness their last words and death. "Since that practice began such legends have nearly ceased in those countries, and they who die in freedom are not buried in Arimathean tombs."‡

With the decay of religion we are regaining the serenity and tranquillity of the ancient Greeks and Romans. Nature itself provides an anodyne for death. As a distinguished French author observes:—

"Illness and old age always make us set less value upon the joys of which they deprive us, which they first render bitter then impossible; and the last joy of all, that of bare existence, is as subject to the law as its predecessors. Consciousness of one's inability to live brings with it inability to desire to live; it becomes a burden to draw one's breath."

Egoism declines with declining strength.

"One sentiment alone survives, a sense of weariness. We long for rest, long to relax the tension of life, to lie at ease, to have done with it once for all. Oh! to be no longer on one's feet. The dying well know the supreme joy of looking forward to their last resting place! They no longer envy the interminable file of the living whom they perceive, as it were in a dream, vainly marching and counter-marching upon the surface of the earth where they sleep. They are resigned to the solitude and abandonment of death. They are like travellers in the desert—worn with fever and fatigue, and unwilling to make another step in advance; they are no longer borne up by the hope of revisiting familiar scenes; they are unable to surmount the remaining difficulties of the way and request their companions to leave them, to march on without them, and, stretched upon the sand, watch without a tear, without a desire, the departing caravan creeping away toward the horizon."*

No terrors, no gasps and struggles. "Let me die in peace" was the pathetic request of the dying Voltaire to the priests who disturbed his dying hours. To be let alone, that is the last request of the dying, and it is often denied them by pious relatives.

It is science, not religion, that frees man from the fear of death. It is science, not religion, that triumphantly cries, "Oh, death, where is thy sting? Oh, grave, where is thy victory?"

Listen to the testimony of a very gifted woman—one brought up in the Christian faith, but who emancipated herself from the bondage of religion. It is Harriet Martineau who speaks—in her old age, face to face with death. She says:—

"The release [from superstition] is an inexpressible comfort, and the simplifying of the whole matter has a most tranquillising effect. I see that the dying (other than the aged) naturally and regularly, unless disturbed, desire and sink into death as into sleep. Where no artificial state is induced, they feel no care about dying, or about living again. The state of their organisation disposes them to rest, and rest is all they think about. We know by all testimony that persons who are brought face to face with death by an accident, which seems to leave no chance of escape, have no religious ideas or emotions whatever.....to me there is no sacrifice, no sense of loss, nothing to fear, nothing to regret. Under the eternal laws of the universe I came into being, and under them I have lived a life so full that its fullness is equivalent to length."

"The fresh air of Nature, in short, after imprisonment in the ghost-peopled cavern of superstition—has been as favorable to my moral nature as to intellectual progress and general enjoyment. Thus, there has been much in life that I am glad to have enjoyed; and much that generates a mood of contentment at the close. Besides that, I never dream of wishing that anything were otherwise than as it is. I am frankly satisfied to have done with life; I have had a noble share of it, and I desire no more. I neither wish to live longer here, nor to find life again elsewhere. It seems to me simply absurd to expect it, and a mere act of restricted human imagination and morality to conceive it. It seems to me that there is, not only a total absence of evidence of a renewed life for human beings, but so clear a way of accounting for the conception, in the immaturity of the human mind, that I myself utterly disbelieve in a future life."†

This fearless and Freethinking lady concludes that "The real and justifiable and honorable subject of interest to human beings, living and dying, is the welfare of their fellows surrounding them or surviving them. About this I do care supremely" (439).

Lest the pious should accuse this writer of vainglory, it is as well to state that her Autobiography was not published until after death.

Yes, the real subject of interest should not be an absorbing struggle for personal advancement, or a life of selfish pleasure, but an attempt to leave the world a little better than it was before we came into it. As Guyau eloquently says:—

"Next to the joy of possessing a truth or a system which seems to be true, is that of disseminating this truth, of feeling it speak and act in us, of exhaling it with our breath. There have been more than twelve apostles in the history of humanity; every heart that is young, and strong, and loving is the heart of an apostle." ‡

In future articles we hope to deal with the origin of belief in the soul and a future life.

Acid Drops.

There was a rather curious sentence at the end of Professor Gilbert Murray's fine letter on the Stewart case, which we praised and quoted in last week's Freethinker. "Mr. Stewart," he wrote, "had served three months under the same law in 1911, a fact which probably goes some way to account for the ferocity of his anti-Christian feeling." Surely there is some mistake here. Stewart was not charged with any ferocity of criticism; he was accused of ridiculing the Christian religion. The ferocity was all on the other side. We suggest that Professor Murray should have written that Stewart's imprisonment in 1911 went some way—or a good way—to account for the ferocity of his Christian prosecutors. There is a real meaning in that. The more the appetite of bigotry is gratified the more it looks out for fresh victims. We have made this unquestionable fact the basis of our argument that the way to break down the Blasphemy Laws is not to go to prison, but to keep out of it; that is, by offering the most skilful as well as the boldest opposition to every indictment for "blasphemy." Our conduct of the Boulter case—for it was really our conduct—reduced the final result to a month's imprisonment. We called that comic-opera martyrdom. So it was. And it is to be noticed that "blasphemy" prosecutions left London for the provinces ever since.

The number of Catholic priests in Great Britain is 4,401; the number in little Ireland is 3,737. We hope the difference will continue, unless it alters for the better.

The Roman Catholic population of the world is reported to be as follows:—

Europe	...	...	190,352,931
Asia	...	...	6,059,572
Africa	...	...	2,769,604
America	...	...	90,268,391
Australasia		...	9,284,344

Who was it that said the fight between Religion and Freethought was over? To borrow a phrase from Charles Lamb, we should like to feel his bumps. Yet he persuaded a lot of timid or lazy (or both) "infidels" to say "ditto."

We noticed last week that Dean Inge had been singing the praises of "pain." We may add that the people who do that generally have the least of it, and are seldom energetic in obtaining more. But this is not uncommon to preachers. Most of them are like sign-posts. They point the way but never travel.

The Philosopher of the City Temple says that he receives many communications, written and printed, from people, pointing out that it will not be long before there is an end to Churches and creeds, and some of the writers are so reckless as to say they will be pleased when this occurs. This puzzles Mr. Campbell exceedingly, who cannot understand this frame of mind. So he comments on the phenomenon in this fashion:—

> "Suppose we were all forced by irresistible evidence to accept the conclusion that man is his body and nothing else, that there was no God and no future, and no room for belief in either, the news would not be good news; on the contrary, it would be very bad news, to be received with regret on the simple ground that there was no hope of anything better."

It is a pity that Mr. Campbell does not try to understand the communications he receives, for we have little doubt that the meaning of the writers is fairly intelligible. Freethinkers hail the dissolution of Churches and creeds because they see how these things stand in the way of the realisation of a more perfect human life. They do not contest the hope of anything better; on the contrary, their whole campaign is built on this hope. But while men expend their energies and base their aspirations on any form of supernaturalism, the result is wasted effort and frustrated hopes. And all history is behind the Freethinker in this assertion.

Mr. Campbell says he believes so earnestly in the future that he cannot accept the gospel of "Let us eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we die." Neither do we; but Mr. Campbell ought to know that this is merely a pulpit slander on the Freethinker. Of course, it has new Testament warranty, but it is a slander nevertheless. It was Paul who said that if there was no resurrection from the dead, then let us eat and drink and be merry, for to-morrow we die. But that was merely an illustration of the low moral standard of Paul and Christians generally. The only reason for not leading the life of a pig now was that you might live the life of an angel hereafter. If the life of the angel was not certain, "Then," the Christian said, "I am going in for a 'good time'"—and by that he understood wallowing in all kinds of sensual enjoyment. This has been the Christian teaching through the ages, and there is small wonder that with such a gospel the results of Christian teaching on human character were so disastrous. The poorest Freethought teaching has always been superior to this. If there be no future life, then all the more reason why this one should be made more worthy. There is really no need to bother whether there is a God or future life or not. It is enough that human life is real, and that the capacity for improving it is with us. The fault of the Christian is that he says to himself, "If I were not a Christian I should be a scoundrel," and then assumes that everyone else must be built on the same unfortunate lines.

Rev. R. F. Horton takes a more hopeful view of the situation—that is, hopeful for the clergy. He discovers that we are on the eve of a great revival of faith. We have heard about this revival of faith ever since we were old enough to trouble about such things, and have seen all the time churches emptying and Freethinkers becoming more numerous. But Dr. Horton brings forward proofs. Poetry, philosophy, science, and labor are turning towards religion. William Watson has written a poem confessing his return to a faith in God; therefore, poetry is returning to religion. Not a very convincing proof, this. Professor Eucken pleads for an alliance of religion and morality; therefore, philosophy is becoming religious. The evidence here quite matches that produced on behalf of poetry. And we can only say that when either Eucken or William Watson can produce evidence that they represent either poetry or philosophy on this point, we will agree with Dr. Horton's summary of the situation.

The movement of the world of labor towards religion is shown by Mr. Ramsay Macdonald. From this gentleman Mr. Horton gathers that the alienation of working men from church and chapel really means that they consider that the church and the chapel do not sufficiently embody the Christian ideal. We do not believe that five per cent. of absentees can be accounted for in this way. A good many of the labor men who do talk in this manner have got it into their heads that they can hoodwink the clergy and capture the Churches. And, on the other hand, the clergy imagine that by professing an interest in the labor movement they may ultimately harness it to the Churches. The first idea is simply stupid. No movement will ever be able to capture the Churches. It has been their business for so long to capture movements that they are up to every move in the game, and the cunning of threatened self-interest will always keep them on the alert. On the other hand, the Churches may capture the labor movement. They have succeeded in this direction more than once, and the result for the movement captured was extinction. Any Church will, in fact, eat the heart out of a reform movement, because its main function is to perpetuate the established order of things.

The conversion of science is, of course, shown in Sir Oliver Lodge—as though he had ever left religion! Only Dr. Horton adds some foolish flourishes of his own. For instance, he says that Sir Oliver Lodge disposed of the argument against prayer, based on the uniformity of nature, by pointing out that we interfere with the uniformity of nature every time we water a garden, and that the whole of human activity interferes with the uniformity of nature. Now, Sir Oliver Lodge has said many strange things, but he never said anything so hopelessly foolish as this. The merit of this observation belongs entirely to Dr. Horton. What Sir Oliver really said was that human ingenuity could "deflect" natural laws, as in engineering and other directions. But this is not contrary to the uniformity of nature; the process of deflection takes the uniformity for granted. When we water the garden we assume that the water will fall on the ground, not rise in the air; that it will nurture the plants, not kill them. The principle of the uniformity of nature does not say that things will happen irrespective of conditions; all it says is that, given certain conditions, certain consequences will follow. When a preacher shows an incapacity to follow a scientist on so simple a point as this, his opinion as to what is the real attitude of science towards life in general is not likely to be worth much.

Glastonbury's "holy" thorn, which tradition asserts has blossomed every Christmas since it was planted by Joseph of Arithmathœa, has this year no winter buds. We always considered this a rare "plant."

Lately there has been a revival of mediæval customs, and the election of boy bishops has taken place at Berden, near Bishop Stortford. Most of the bishops we are acquainted with are in their second childhood.

A working man received an invitation from a clergyman to attend divine service at a neighboring church, and the note contained a text, "Come unto me all ye that labor." The recipient wrote back, "Cannot attend, on strike."

The Bishop of London has authorised a Collect appealing for deliverance from dangers of riots in Ireland. Pity the sorrows of a poor old Deity! He'll have to go on strike too one of these days.

A strike of tailors has been settled at Johannesburg. We are glad to hear it, for people might have been compelled to imitate the primitive costumes of Adam and Eve, or the Tango dance of David.

The king personally selected all his Christmas presents, a society paper informs us. As far as we can judge, the "King of Kings" does not give presents, but only receives them—through the good, kind priests.

Is "Our Heavenly Father" a humorist? We ask this question in all seriousness, for, whenever his children are celebrating his "birthday," he replies with a disaster involving loss of life. The Tay Bridge disaster, the Messina earthquake, the Chicago theatre fire, the Ellcott Junction railway accident of 1906, and the Hawes Junction express wreck of 1912, are only a few of the noteworthy occurrences at this season of the year.

The Rev. R. J. Campbell said at the City Temple that "the mother of Jesus had done more for her sex than all other influences put together." How is it the "mother of God" waited two thousand years for Mr. Lloyd George and his colleagues to endow maternity? And why do women in Catholic countries till the fields and act as beasts of burden?

According to the Oracle of the City Temple, Protestants accord little honor to the Virgin Mary. They never forget to reverence "little Mary," as Mr. Campbell might notice in the City itself.

Another poor Jesuite! Rev. William Gay, of Ettrick, Blenheim-road, East Barnet, left £34,610. "These," as Johnson said to Garrick, "are the things that make death bitter."

The next poor Jesuite was the Rev. Canon John Miller Elvy, of Broughton Park, Manchester, who left £13,573. It does not equal the Rev. William Gay's leavings, but it is a pretty considerable "hump" all the same.

"Well done, Belfast," cries a correspondent of the Northern Whig. He congratulates that hub of toleration on showing itself not only "thoroughly Protestant" but "thoroughly Christian." And in what way? By refusing to let Mr. John Lawson keep the Palladium open on Sunday evenings with a program of pictures and orchestral music. Another correspondent, signing himself "Progress," suggests that an empty Palladium means the patronage of many worse places.

The churches of St. Louis, Missouri, advertise through the Church Federation, in the Post Dispatch, for "more." That is to say, for more money. We judge that their condition at present is a bad one. Yet they boldly announce, while begging for cash, that "The Church is all-powerful simply because the religion of Jesus Christ is back of it." That's all right, to start with, but something else is necessary. "The law demands that you pay your grocer and tailor," the advertisers say, "but greater by far is your debt to the Church." Maybe. But grocers and tailors deliver actual goods and can sue for the price of them. What do the clergy deliver, and on what basis could they sue for its value? As for Jesus Christ's religion being "a happy religion," we are willing to agree that it is—especially when it sends an "infidel" to prison or burns a sceptic at the stake. But the opportunities for such pleasures are not as frequent as they used to be.

The St. Louis clergy are competent at blowing their own trumpet. Take them out of St. Louis, they say, and "there would be no homes—no schools—no honor among business men." We had no idea St. Louis was as bad as that. Evidently the clergy haven't done much good there up to the present. "No matter—the time will come!" So plank down your donation for more of the same old medicine, and—wait and see.

Lord Halifax says that all the Church wants from the State is to be left free to manage its own affairs. So Church humbug replies to Nonconformist humbug. Really what Lord Halifax means is State support and State patronage minus any measure of State control. All take and no give.

Canon Gough has discovered a new proof that the Church and Labor are at one. Both, he says, desire that men may have life, and have it more abundantly. Quite so; but the life abundant of the Church is to be enjoyed after we are dead, and we hardly think that is the kind of life that Labor is anxious about.

Seven millions of money is spent annually in this country on hunting. The Christian upper classes have yet to learn kindness to animals.

The four Bible Societies last year had an income of £283,287, and 102 Home and Foreign Missions £8,881,094. This is only part of the economic basis of a religion "without money and without price."

"Half a century ago education consisted of the classics, with a little mathematics and Bible teaching," says Mr. A. C. Benson, formerly a master at Eton College. There was no doubt of the paucity of the mathematical teaching, for the majority of the pupils were taught that three gods were one, and one was three.

"Forty-one Years at One School" is the alluring headline to a paragraph in a daily paper. It does not refer to one of the Old Testament patriarchs, but to a modern schoolmaster.

The Daily Mail Year Book says that the Bible "is the supreme treasure house of literature told in stories and parables." Some of these stories are as true as the famous account of the Pekin massacres once published by the Daily Mail.

During the past ten years the number of voluntary schools has decreased by 1,564. Clerical influence has correspondingly decreased.

The clerical mind is a fearful and wonderful thing. Writing of Christianity in Lloyds' Weekly News, the Rev. W. D. Morrison, rector of Marylebone, says that "It is never made a test of discipleship with Christ that those who elect to follow him should assent to any elaborate confession or creed." Didn't the reverend gentleman sign the Thirty-Nine Articles? And hasn't he heard of the Athanasian Creed?

According to the dear Daily News, M. Anatole France took his stand during the Dreyfus struggle as "a natural Christian." What is a natural Christian? The village idiot is called a "natural." We fancy the Daily News has confused Anatole France with some members of its own staff.

"Vapid and salacious" is a New York parson's description of a play. The phrase fits some religious literature exactly "Manners are growing coarser," a contemporary publication tells us. Christian Evidence patterers will have to start a competition if this goes on.

However could we get on without religion, is the cry of the ordinary pulpiteer. The real question is, How can we get on with it? Ireland is an instance. We have over and over again pointed out the part played by religion in the Irish question, and just lately Sir Edward Grey said:—

> "I believe that the real root of the difficulty is the difference of religion, and that but for that religious difficulty you would not find there was any difference of race, or point of view, or anything else which made it difficult for the two parts of Ireland to work together."

As usual, the people from different parts of Ireland can work together, eat together, talk together, walk together, trade together; the one thing they cannot do is to be religious together. And, worse still, the intrusion of religion upsets all other relations. If Ireland were without religion the chief difficulties of the situation would be non-existent. The greatest obstacles are either religious or use religion as a cover. We repeat, the world's difficulty has never been how it could get on without religion, but how it is possible to get on with it in our midst.

Rev. C. Ensor Walters says that, "If the little Bethels would only stand one by another, we have a force that could turn men out at election times." Maybe; but the prospect is a most horrible one. Imagine Governments made and unmade by a combination of "little Bethels"! Once before in the history of England the "little Bethels" stood together and elected or turned out men, and the result was the return of the Stuarts. No one could ever stand the rule of the Church for long. Geneva, Scotland, America, England, it has been tried in all these places, and in the end the people preferred anything to the reign of cant and hypocrisy and intolerance that resulted. Just think of the Free Church Council as the responsible government of the country!

Christianity is becoming a harlequinade. What with Harry Lauder holding forth in the kirk, and the editor of Punch preaching at a chapel, and actors reading the lessons at churches, the religion of the "Man of Sorrows" promises to become funnier every year. The Daily Chronicle, recognising this tendency, published an article on "Christmas before Christ," and entrusted it to the humorous writer, Barry Pain.

Dr. Wentz, writing in the Daily News and Leader on "Fairy Tales," urges the instruction of children in "the historic tradition of divine knowledge." There is no need for the gentleman to worry, for the fairy tales of the Bible are taught in countless day and Sunday-schools.

According to the Jewish Chronicle, there are over thirteen millions of Jews in the world. Exactly! And half of Christendom worships a Jew and the other half a Jewess.

The advertisement hoardings contain announcements of a "Wonder Zoo." It will not be able to rival the Biblical collection with its talking snake and jackass, savings-bank fish, lodging-house whale, and similar curiosities.

An appeal has been issued by ministers of religion for united prayer for, among other things, "brotherly love to OUR peoples." People who profess to love their enemies usually hate their neighbors, if they do not attend the same tin tabernacle.

During Christmas the Salvation Army distributed 80 000 puddings through the "kindness of friends." There is nothing miraculous in this, for the "General" of the first "Salvation Army" is alleged to have fed 5,000 persons with three sardines and two bath-buns.

A jocular American, who knows something of both the Bible and English history, says that in the old days England used to burn the witches, but now the witches are trying to burn England.

A poor old gas-stoker, who had been blind for sixteen years, and who had been maintained by his wife, died recently at Pimlico from destitution. Both had often been in want of food. What has happened to the philanthropic ravens who fed Elijah? Are they as dead as the prophet?

A melodrama has been made out of the "story of the rosary." All over the world priests have for many centuries seen the commercial possibilities of a string of beads.

"Animistic belief," says a writer in the Daily News and Leader, is "the chief refining influence in every state of society, from the barbarism of the black man in Central Africa to the civilisation of the Archbishop of Canterbury." Yet this "refining influence" permits Christians to sing of "the blood of the Lamb," and Pagans to eat their neighbors.

"It was clearly God's will," the Bishop of London says, "that there should be men and women in the world." It was clearly God's will, too, that the Bishop of London should be one of them,—which some people think is hardly a matter for general congratulation. It was clearly God's will, also, that the world's human beings should be quarrelsome and murderous. The Bishop of London says no to this. We say no to his contradiction. Why? What is the criterion? Whatever happens is, and must be, the will of God. There is no other criterion possible. "I, the Lord, do all these things."

The late Cardinal Rampolla was called the "Vice-Pope" by the journalists. An ironic compliment.

More "Providence." A Salvation Army Home has been burnt down at Cincinnati. Eight of the inmates were burnt to death, and many seriously hurt in the rush to escape by doors and windows. "Providence" is no respecter of persons; that is, there is no "Providence." An undiscriminating "Providence" is a contradiction in terms.

It will be remembered that we took a bigot to task for sneering at Charles Bradlaugh on account of his statue at Northampton being near a public convenience. We were able to show, from an old friend's letter, that the late King Edward's statue in a well-known part of South London is in a similar position—and that the public convenience was there first. We now hear from an Aberdeen correspondent that the Prince Albert statue in that city has been similarly situated for the last forty years. There is also a public convenience just below the late King Edward's statue; and another (in fact, two) in proximity to the only granite statue in the city—that of the fifth Duke of Gordon. So the Bradlaugh "misfortune" seems fairly fashionable.

"A current 'joke' originating with the New York Globe runs as follows:—

> 'Your father is a religious man, isn't he, James?' a small boy was asked.
> 'Oh, yes,' was the naïve answer. 'He just hates anybody who doesn't go to church.'

The correlation of religion and hatred is no joke. Writing in the North American Review on 'The Problem of Ulster,' Sydney Brooks deposes: The tale is told of an old Orangeman who had been called as a witness to the peaceable disposition of a friend of his. 'What sort of man,' asked the counsel, 'would you say Jamie Williamson is?' 'A quiet, decent man.' 'Is he the sort of man that would be likely to be breaking windows?' 'No man less likely.' 'Is he the sort of man that you would expect to find at the head of a mob shouting, "To hell with the Pope"?' Witness, with great emphasis: 'No, certainly not. Jamie was never anyways a religious man.'"—Truthseeker (New York).

Mr. Robert Bridges, who is Poet Laureate, has written his first "official" poem in the form of a Christmas hymn. He should leave that kind of work to the contributors of the War Cry.

"The duties of the modern bishops are very onerous," says a religious contemporary. If they have to attend all the theatrical and music-hall shows in their dioceses in order to safeguard the morals of their flocks, they have our sympathy. We hope the Bishops of London and Kensington enjoyed their pantomime visits.

Evening classes for policemen are to be established in the provinces. We are glad to hear it, for the boys in blue will be able to follow more intelligently the addresses of the open-air lecturers on Freethought platforms.

"Horseflesh as Beef" is the heading of a scare paragraph in the Daily News. Our old friend, Ezekiel, dined on something worse—if more highly seasoned.

We have often called attention to the slow spread of Christianity in Africa and the rapid spread of Mohammedanism. We now see that the Bishop of Uganda has raised a storm by declaring that the various Christian Protestant sects doing missionary work in the Dark Continent will have to close up their ranks and make common cause against the Mohammedan danger. This is not the first time that "the Arab thief," as John Wesley called the Prophet of Islam, has worsted the Prophet of Nazareth.

The fated missionary asked to be allowed to sing a hymn before being killed and eaten, and the cannibal chief replied that it was not their custom to have music with meals.

D. E. B.—You will find our views on "Agnostic" and "Atheist" stated at length in our pamphlet entitled What is Agnosticism? We do not answer questions in sociology as a rule, but we don't mind saying (for once) that when poetry and romance and passionate love have died out in the world there may be room left for "trial marriages." Romeo and Juliet and the wonderful chapter "A Diversion Played on a Penny Whistle" in George Meredith's Richard Feverel will illustrate our meaning. Love is an exclusive preference. Those who do not know it have never loved.

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

BIRMINGHAM "SAINT."—We understand that no reply but a formal acknowledgment has been received to the Petition for Stewart's release or better treatment in prison.

W. DAVINSON.—It is amusing, with a serious side; but the law of libel is a nightmare to a Freethought editor. Thanks for news of the progress at Edmonton.

C. C.—J. M. Robertson's Pagan Christs would serve your object, but you can't get books of that kind at 2s 6d. Forms of affirmation can be obtained at the N. S. S. office.

MR. AND MRS. G. L. ALWARD.—Your seasonable good wishes are reciprocated.

JOHN MATTHEWS.—There is a faithful history of the Crusades in a chapter of our Crimes of Christianity. We do not know of any cheap single volume on the subject. References in our footnotes would guide you to its literature.

J. B IRVINE.—Mr. W. T. Lee held several debates with Mr. Foote in former years. The last one must have taken place some sixteen or seventeen years ago. We are sorry to see Mr. Lee's bills now disfigured by "meetings for men only."

H. BLACK.—Much obliged for your very useful cuttings. We may take your hint as to our next visit to Manchester.

RICHARD ALLEN.—Your letter and enclosure reached us on December 22—in time, you see. Thanks for your new year's good wishes.

DEUCALION (New Zealand).—It is not our province in this journal to deal with Labor questions, although we wish well to all men who are seeking to raise themselves in the scale of being. So many journals deal with Labor questions already, and so few are devoted to the work we are doing. We believe you will agree with us on second thoughts.

J. ROSS.—You say that "to believe that Shakespeare wrote 'Shakespeare' is to believe in a miracle." We answer that to believe that Bacon wrote "Shakespeare" is to believe in a bigger miracle—and an utterly incredible one. We have Bacon's acknowledged works, and we know his character, for he was a public man; and to assert that he wrote "Shakespeare" is to assert not so much the wonderful as the impossible. As a matter of fact, genius always is a "miracle." It is really what the biologists call "a sport." And that the greatest genius is the greatest sport is just what might be expected. All this will be dealt with fully in our book on Shakespeare, which we hope to finish during 1914. For the other matters see paragraphs.

G. W. (Birkenhead).—Charles Bradlaugh did not debate publicly with Celestine Edwards in the Manchester Free Trade Hall—or elsewhere.

H. ROBERTS.—We do not know of a book called God's Funeral. There was a poem bearing that title in the English Review, by Thomas Hardy. We do post copies of the Freethinker to persons prominently mentioned in it week by week.

C. J. P.—Glad you were so pleased with our attitude. Thanks for the reference and the pamphlet. Both may be useful.

E. B.—Your cuttings are always useful.

D. BERNSTEIN.—See paragraph. Thanks.

R. L. M.—We understand. Thanks.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for cuttings.

AVON DALE.—The theme is too egotistic. What can it matter to the world which of us turns out to be a genius? There are things that do matter to the world. Why not try to sing them?

T. M. BROWN (U.S.A.).—Glad to hear that you "get the Freethinker every week" and that you "agree with some other correspondents that it seems to get better every time."

H. BLACK.—Thanks for fresh cuttings, which we find useful. We cannot join in any newspaper correspondence on the Stewart (or any other) case. Such a work would be endless. We should have no time for anything else. We really must leave it to the local "saints."

WELSH RATIONALIST.—There is some truth in your criticism, but it does not really affect the general truth of our observation that the Catholic Church is Christianity,—the Christianity of history, of doctrine, and development—the Christianity of the Western World. What are Russia and a few Balkan States to all the rest of Europe proper—to say nothing of America?

J. BOSTOCK.—Better late than never, and better little than nothing.

R. H. W.—We answered the Hugh Price Hughes book, by his daughter, at the time it was published, and showed that she had only made the case worse for her father—and, we are sorry to say, for Mr. Holyoake.

E. A. H.—A clever compliment.

The London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner, under the auspices of the N. S. S. Executive, will take place this year at Frascati's, on Wednesday, January 28. There are several reasons for the change in place, but they need not be entered upon now. The change in time, it is believed, will prove beneficial to the gathering. On the first occasion of the change, at any rate, the dinner will be associated with two great names in the history of Freethought. Thomas Paine was born on January 29—Charles Bradlaugh died on January 30. The Chairman will devote his address mainly to the principles, achievements, and examples of those English heroes of humanity.

The Annual Dinner tickets are the same price as before (4s.), but the room available at Frascati's will not accommodate more than 200. Those who wish to ensure their seats at this function should therefore apply for their tickets as early as possible.

There will be several speakers at the Annual Dinner as well as a good musical program. The list will include Mr. Cohen and Mr. Lloyd for certain, and other names will be announced next week. We note a general satisfaction at the changes made in this year's arrangements, especially in the matter of the date.

We reproduced last week an excellent article from the Manchester Guardian against the revival of the Blasphemy Laws in the Stewart case. Our contemporary returned to the subject, and we have pleasure in reproducing its second leaderette:—

"BLASPHEMY AS AN OFFENCE.

"We publish to-day a letter on what we said yesterday about the Blasphemy Laws in which a correspondent argues (we believe we represent his views fairly) that, though right is on our side in the matter, we have chosen a bad case to fight on. About Mr. Stewart we know nothing whatever; it may be, as our correspondent suggests, that his language on the platform was such as to constitute a breach of public decorum sufficient to warrant criminal proceedings; but, even if that were so, that does not in the slightest degree excuse the authorities in having based their action on the Blasphemy Laws. If a man attacks Christian doctrine, or even ridicules Christian beliefs, the proper place to bring him to book is not a court of law; he ought to be dealt with, as our correspondent has himself dealt with such people, in public debate; if in the course of such attacks he lapses into obscenity, then by all means let him be summoned and punished, but for the concrete offence of obscenity, and not for the nebulous, indefinable offence of blasphemy. We choose the case of Mr. Stewart because he happens to have been the only man recently convicted and imprisoned under the Blasphemy Laws. His conviction proves that these laws are regarded as still in force. We want to see them either repealed or allowed to lapse and we are confident that when they are removed there still remains ample, and, indeed better protection for the decencies of public controversy than they can provide."

We should like to strengthen this appeal by pointing out that while the Blasphemy Laws continue to exist, even if no prosecutions take place under them, they will still operate indirectly by raising a prejudice against any Freethought speaker who should be prosecuted merely on account of "bad language."

Further letters on the Blasphemy Law, with reference to the Stewart case, have appeared in the Manchester

Guardian. One is from Sir W. P. Byles, who concludes with an appeal to his fellow Nonconformists. "Free Churchmen especially," he says, "whose fathers have suffered persecution and imprisonment for preaching the faith which is now freely spoken, are bound, in my judgment, to defend for others who differ from them—yes, even for Stewart—the freedom which they have inherited from the sufferings of those who have gone before."

"Secularist's" letter in this correspondence is an extremely good one. He points out that "Liberal Governments have no reputation for leniency in these affairs," and adds that "there is only one case of a pardon on record, and that was obtained through the death of the prisoner's wife." Here is another pertinent passage:—

> "Professor Murray is in error in stating that no efforts have been made to secure Stewart's release. Unfortunately for him, his immediate friends bungled the case very badly at the first, declining proffered help and expert advice from the National Secular Society, otherwise the case would have been carried to the Court of Appeal and the verdict in all probability overruled."

This is really the crux of the whole question. Fighting involves leadership. Even a defective leadership is better than no leadership at all. And the leadership of such a fight as this naturally devolves upon the President of the National Secular Society. No matter who he is. His being in that position is the all-important fact. Not "Providence" but the course of events has placed him there. Private feelings or silly little personal ambitions should not stand in the way of the cause. We might have had a big fight, and perhaps a successful one, over this case For the first time a "blasphemy" sentence might have been carried to the Court of Appeal, and the whole question of the law might have been argued for us by eminent counsel. But the time for that, alas, has gone by.

Mr. Mark Melford sent us notice some time ago that he was a dying man. He had about three weeks to live, and he wished us farewell. But there is always a risk in prophecy,—a function which is better performed after the event than before it. We are glad to see the dying old histrion turning up again as the author of Life in a Booth (Hendersons, 1s.), an interesting and by no means uninstructive account of his chequered career during sixty years as "dramatic actor, author, and variety artiste." Mr. Melford does not hide his Freethought; he even places an advertisement of the Freethinker at the end of his book. We have much pleasure in commending it to our readers' attention. Many a shilling is laid out to very much worse advantage.

We occasionally print special letters from our readers, who, by the way, are to be found in all parts of the world. The following letter is from Bethulie, in the Orange Free State, South Africa;—

> "Dear Mr. Foote,—We, the Freethinkers of Bethulie, wishing to show our gratitude to you, who do so much for our good cause, have made up a small collection towards your Honorarium Fund, and beg you kindly to accept our small gift. May Freethought spread more and more over the earth, and may mankind soon break the chains of superstition and become free.—Yours truly, P. HAMEL."

The details of the "collection" appear in our list of acknowledgments in another column. The above letter, dated Dec. 4, reached us on Dec. 23, so the subscriptions fall well within 1913. We thank the subscribers and assure them how glad we are that our work is appreciated in all parts of the English-speaking (or English-reading) world. We also cordially reciprocate their good wishes for the new year.

"Lord Haldane, greatly daring, ventured to speak the truth about education the other day when he said: 'The supporters of denominational education on the one hand, and on the other those who thought that everybody ought to be content with Cowper-Temple teaching—his view was that the one was just as sectarian as the other.' That is the crux of the whole religious difficulty. Cowper-Templeism, or 'simple Bible teaching,' is just as sectarian to the Anglican and to the Roman Catholic as the Church Catechism is to Nonconformists. Until Nonconformists recognise this elementary fact there will, and can, be no settlement in education. If justice is to be done the State must subsidise all religious views or none at all."—Reynolds' Newspaper.

We are glad to quote the foregoing paragraph from our Radical contemporary. We should have been better pleased however, if some reference had been made to the non-Christian members of the community, whose rights are infringed not only by "sectarian" religious teaching in the public schools, but by any religious teaching at all. No agreement between the Churches in the form of what is called "a compromise" can alter that fact.

Christmas Morning, 1913.

CHRISTMAS morning was gloriously bright. Hard frost had preceded a heavy fall of snow, and nature smiled, like a girl child, in happy amazement at finding herself dressed in a soft, spotlessly white, new frock, all glittering in the sunlight, when she arose in the morning. Every branch of every tree was motionless with astonishment; there was no breeze to shake off its ridge of winter beauty. The rhododendron bushes had been transformed into minature snow palaces. The delicate twigs of the flowering currant bush were bowed beneath their heavy burden of loveliness. The wallflower rows were like minarets rising above a desert of white, glistening sand. The firs and pines philosophically objected not; and the big plane, standing in the centre of the lawn, seemed to feel conscious of a great accession to its natural majesty and dignity. And above the snow-roofed wood the hill sloped, its white summit rivalling the few fleecy clouds that drifted slowly in the light amethyst of the sky.

It was a morning to be happy; and when someone suggested tramping to the service the idea was laughed to scorn, and the proposer joined in the objections. Going to church would have eaten a goodly portion out of the day; besides, on a week-day, the thing was preposterous. And so Christmas was spent at home, with snowballing, sliding, tobogganning, snow-figure making; and the old snow-man of the skies, had he shown himself, would have melted in the genial warmth of our boisterous play.

It was good to see the merriment of the boys when they discovered what Santa Claus had not brought them. It was better to feel the pleasure their awkward thanks gave you. And it was better still to know that their young minds had not the least trace of religious coloring as they thought of the joyfulness of Christmas. There were no morning prayers to throw the day out of joint; but there was a mighty ringing of deafening bells, that would have frightened all the ghosts of Christendom into purgatory for peace and quietness. There was no thanking God for what we had given them; but there was, in each little mind, a grim determination not to disturb the happiness of the day by fighting; and the difficult resolution was faithfully carried out. When bedtime came, Christmas, a year ago, was voted a great success, the boys wishing it would come every month.

But my thoughts, this Christmas, are not so pleasant. A different environment surrounds me. There is no quiet, snow-draped country to dull my mind to the happenings of the busy world. I can see what is going on amongst the mass of men; and many things make this Christmas tainted. All over the land priests and pastors will be declaiming on the brotherhood of Christ; how it has encircled the earth with a belt of wondrous glory; how the Child Christ has enwoven the mirror-like strands of memory around Christmas; how Christianity has succeeded in entering the hearts of the people by opening them to the marvellous light of its homely love. Christmas is the time of the year when the Christ spirit bursts from the bonds that enchain it, the bonds of selfishness, of hardheartedness, and indifference, and goes winging its way amongst the people, bidding them think of others rather than themselves. Christmas is the time of memories, of new interests, of new regards. By his ineffable sacrificial example Christ has hallowed Christmas with a power that no human energy can shatter. Christ died for others. In imitation of his divine example, we live for others, on his birthday. Our present-givings, our remembrances, our well-wishes, are homage paid to the Divine Man, the Son of God, whose life we, in our little way emulate on Christmas Day. So the story runs.

Thousands of poor people enjoy a decent dinner—on Christmas Day. Thousands of the pauper brothers and sisters of the Lamb of God are treated as if they were human beings—on Christ's Day. Thousands of the little ones the Savior presumably loved so much, little ones whose daily lives are so unlovely that they seem like rank weeds growing in mire, receive toys, and have their starved hearts stunned by a sudden shaft of dazzling light—on Christ Jesus' birthday.

Christ is the prodigal son, who returns once a year to celebrate his birthday. The rejoicings are terrible in their hateful resemblance to the rattle of skeleton finger-bones on coffin-lids. The cynicism of the farce is a damnable disclosure of the ugliness of the putrefaction of death. The Christmas pauper smile is the grin of triumphant immorality. The unctuous smickerings of priests re-echo like the smacking of the fangs of wolves on a snowclad social prairie.

Brotherhood! Once a year! Good God! And such brotherhood, the fraternity of spiritual horrors! And there are social reformers amongst us who look on, amused or indifferent.

Perhaps it is unpardonable, perhaps it is an intellectual crime against reason; but when the mind realises the full significance of these things the blood goes raging in furious riot through one's veins.

Piety, what a horribly contorted thing it is, on Christmas Day. Saintliness, what a disgustingly sick thing it is, on Christ's day. Christianity, what a mocker of human virtue, what a reviler of human justice and reason, it is, on Christ's birthday. Extravagantly dressed ladies hand round bags of stale cakes to city urchins, and an agent gives parcels of cast-off clothing to the parents, because their Lord and Master bade them remember his little ones. This is piety. Priests and pastors move about blessing the multitude who live on the upper circles of the social abyss, and keep on smiling the seraphic smile—which is saintliness. The multitude, having fed, scatters, the many to hovels, the benevolent few to mansions; and this is the boasted activity, the vaunted social valuableness of Christianity.

To-day, Christianity discards its one loosely clinging, Eastern robe, its hypocrisy, and reveals a body covered with ulcers and sores. Like the Paphnutius of Anatole France's Thaïs, it stretches itself upon its phallic-like column of falsehood to bless the assembled people, all stricken with the divine mental malady.

"There are, Lucius," said Aristeus, the doctor of Lucius Aurelius Cotta, the perfect of the fleet of Alexandria, as they stood in the crowd looking at the stylite, Paphnutius, the holy man who vainly endeavored to escape from the sex desire, "certain forces infinitely more powerful than reason and science."

"Which?" asked Cotta.

"Ignorance and folly," replied Aristeus.

And it is just now, at Christmas time, that we understand more acutely the nature of the stuff that is the staff of life to Christianity. It is just now, perhaps, more than at any other time, that we realise to the greatest degree the anti-social character of the national religion. Almsgiving comes like an army of courtesans, the countless reincarnations of Thaïs, seductively smiling, bewitching the hearts, bodies, and brains of the foolish and ignorant. Charity flaunts its purple and gold around the human cesspool. The Church licks the wineglass of the wealthy, presses its wet lips on the dry mouth of poverty, and murmurs "blessed are the poor."

It is just now, at Christmas time, that we Freethinkers realise the gravity of the responsibilities our beliefs impose upon us. Amidst the carrollings and hymnsingings there sounds the whirr of our weapons against the grindstone of reason. And, breaking the sanctimonious solemnity of the foolish prayer, there rises the strong battle-call of Reason, "Glory to Man in the Highest, for man is the master of things."

Rampolla's Dream.

"The vain crowds wandering blindly, led by lies."
—LUCRETIUS.

CARDINAL RAMPOLLA, who died recently, was for sixteen years the Papal Secretary of State, and largely inspired all the later policy of Leo XIII. It was his daring diplomacy which during the years 1887 to 1903 sought restlessly for the means of restoring the Pope's political power; and it was he who suggested the Church's remarkable overtures to Republicanism and to Socialism. When Leo XIII. died, Cardinal Rampolla would have been elected to succeed him but for the veto of the Emperor of Austria, which was communicated to the conclave by a Polish Cardinal. While the Cardinals hesitated to accept this reactionary veto, Rampolla, with rare dignity, himself accepted it, and the present Pope was elected, and Rampolla's dream of the restoration of the temporal power came to an end. He lived thenceforward in retirement, and his diplomatic combinations crumbled into nothingness, and with them went the last hopes of the Catholic Church.

There was a time when the Catholic Church was as liberal as her younger Anglican sister. She once had her broad wing, her rationalists, her scholars, and thinkers, who found her borrowed mummeries and stolen creeds susceptible of mystical interpretation. The ignorant, evangelical party gradually prevailed over these, and exterminated them by fire and sword, rack and gibbet, leaving themselves more ignorant and bigoted than before. Gradually the whole Church was made over to their "leprous likeness."

It required centuries to produce this result. The very triumphs of Freethought indirectly contributed to this end. Every Catholic who became a Freethinker assisted this process. The more brains that were drawn out of the Church, the more did the huge mass part with its intellectual leaven, and tend to flatten and harden down to a mere mass of ignorance and intolerance. What constitutes the obstructive character of the Catholic Church is the abyss which now separates it from the highest intelligence around it; the live, alert intellect of science, and the leaden, moveless stereotype of dogma.

There has been of late a revival of interest in the Catholic Church since the Ritualistic party in the English Church has waxed fat and strong. The Ritualists have not done all that was hoped by themselves and dreaded by the timid Nonconformists, but they have secured a firm foothold, and the Bishops cannot turn them out. It is now certain that there is a very strong party of the Anglican Church who play fast and loose with the authority of the Church in its entirety. At this hour there are covered by the English Church's banner men who hold the extremest doctrine of the freedom of the individual, and men who are willing to submit to the utmost doctrine of priestly control. How long will this divided house stand? That a large and increasing number of the Anglican clergy are coquetting with Rome has caused attention in the Catholic Church. The Pope has hopes of reconverting England, of reimposing the yoke which our ancestors threw off. But much water has flowed to the sea since the English acknowledged Papal supremacy.

In darkened and superstitious times the power of the Catholic Church was great, but it finished with the yellow glare of the fearful fires of Smithfield. It was never as unquestioned and unresisted as in Italy, Spain, and France. There is a wholesome tendency to resistance in British blood, which is cooler than that of the Latin races. It shows itself whenever any specially arrogant claim on obedience is heard, as Charles I. and James II. knew to their cost, and as the battlefields for the free press also prove. The Church of Cardinal Rampolla may do its worst. We shall never as a people permit the cesspool of the confessional. We shall never submit to the poisoned weapons of priestcraft, its hypocritical affectations of celibacy, its tyranny in the home, its officiousness in public affairs, its menace and robbery at the death-bed. Ecclesiasticism had not a safe seat on English shoulders even before the days of the Reformation; it is an impossible dream now that there is an organised Freethought party, which has inscribed on its banners that significant phrase, "Crush the Infamous."

Where Rampolla failed his Church will fail too. Science expands in search of light and truth. The Christian Church is still entombed within the covers of the Bible. Men ask for the bread of knowledge; the Church offers but the sawdust of superstition. The Church's teaching is no longer of any practical use, and represents but a backwash in the river of human knowledge. The great river of human thought rolls on, and bears us further and further away from the ignorance of the past, further and further from the shadow of the Cross.

MIMNERMUS.

Some Little-Known Freethinkers.

X.—JOHN STEWART.

JOHN STEWART, commonly known as "Walking Stewart," and in his own day characterised as "Philosopher Stewart," has been several times written about, yet remains very little known. De Quincey consecrated an article to his memory, but dwelt rather upon his eccentricities and exploits than his opinions. It is, of course, chiefly as a Freethinker that he is here considered. Of Scotch origin, though born in London in 1749, John Stewart possessed characteristic Scotch hardihood, relentless energy, and independence. Educated at Harrow and the Charterhouse, at the age of sixteen he entered the service of the East India Company, and went out to Madras. Disappointed of advancement, in two years, he quitted this employment, writing to the directors that "he was born for nobler pursuits than to be a copier of invoices and bills of lading to a company of grocers, haberdashers, and cheesemongers." Smitten with what Leslie Stephen ventures to call "the characteristic passion of the wise and good—the passion for walking," which perhaps is mainly atavism from a nomadic state, he went on foot all over Hindostan "to become acquainted with the customs, laws, languages, and temperament of the inhabitants." He entered the service of Hyder Aly, first as interpreter, and afterwards as military officer, rising to the rank of general. He was wounded in battle, and applied for leave of absence to consult a surgeon at one of the European settlements. The request was acceded to by Hyder, after some hesitation; but his escort had orders to kill him, which design Stewart penetrating, he made his escape, seizing a favorable moment to plunge into a river and swim across. His swiftness of foot enabled him to outstrip his pursuers. He subsequently entered the service of the Nawaub of Arcot, became his private secretary, and eventually Prime Minister. He was not paid at the time, but many years after, when the East India Company liquidated the Nawaub's debts, he received £10,000 for his services. He walked from India through Persia, Armenia, and Turkey, to Europe. Crossing the Persian Gulf, a storm arose, and the crew were for casting him overboard like Jonah, but he persuaded them to compromise by immuring him in a hencoop, and suspending him by the yard-arm till the storm abated. He had many adventures, and gave his testimony that, in all countries, it was safer to travel unarmed. To the credit of human nature, he relates that whenever he made people understand that he trusted them they showed no disposition to do him injury. He travelled on foot through Germany, Italy, France, and Spain, settling for a while in Paris. Having walked through England, Scotland, and Ireland, he crossed the Atlantic in 1791, and perambulated the United States and Canada.

When he came into his fortune, he settled down in Cockspur-street, Pall Mall, that he might be "in the full tide of existence, and gave private Sunday evening concerts. Among his personal friends and acquaintances were the Freethinkers, Thomas Paine, Clio Rickman, William Godwin, and Robert Owen.

Hogg, in his Life of Percy Bysshe Shelley (ii., 328), mentions the famous "Walking Stewart" as "a tall, hard-featured, middle-aged man, impatiently forcing his way through the crowd that commonly impedes the passage across Westminster Bridge," and says "his chief delight was to walk at the rate of five miles an hour, straight on and, as long as it was light. In the evening he sought literary and scientific conversation, and the commerce of wits." Hogg gives what is probably a highly colored anecdote concerning his parties. He says:—

> "He complained to William Godwin: 'You, and the other great wits of the day, seldom come to my evening parties, and I know why you do not come. It is because you are afraid that the good things which you say will be lost; but, I assure you, you are mistaken. Not a single word will be thrown away; nothing will be lost. I have taken effectual precautions to prevent it. I have engaged twelve eminent shorthand writers; they are placed behind screens in different parts of the room very judiciously posted. They take down whatever they hear, and report it to myself; nothing can escape them. So fear not; not a word will be lost; talk your best!"

A more veracious account is given in The Reminiscences of Alaric Watts, who describes him as an ascetic epicure. He was a vegetarian, eschewing, like the Brahmins, meat and intoxicants, yet concerning himself with the delectation of his guests. Watts says:—

> "One of his most cherished friends was Robert Owen, of New Lanark, who was always welcomed with greater cordiality, and was a general favorite with the younger guests. His manners exhibited the beau ideal of bonhomie, genial to all, and to the young most kind and paternal."

Stewart in 1803 gave "Lectures on the Human Mind and the Study of Man," and he wrote numerous books expounding his philosophic views. They had strange-sounding titles, such as The Siphiometer, The Tocsin of Social Life, The Revelation of Nature, The Revolution of Reason, The Book of Intellectual Life, and Opus Maximum. The books were as strange. A solitary thinker wandering among many nations, Stewart had acquired a thought and language of his own. As De Quincey remarks: "Potentially, he was a great man." But he lacked power of popular exposition and expression.

De Quincey, who was much struck by the eloquence of his conversation, lays his finger on a damning fault of his writings, in saying "he was everlastingly metaphysicising against metaphysics." A few quotations may illustrate both his views and his style:—

> "With what weakness is it asserted that matter is inert, while each atom proves to the contrary. Where do we discover matter destitute of power? Is it in the minute particles of the virulent poisons? or is it in the atoms of inflammable air buried in the earth, which precipitates whole cities into ruins? And where is the particle that does not possess electrical power, chemical affinity, and gravity? And this partial power, energy of nature—the great whole of power in its component parts."

Speaking of man, he says:—

> "Man is formed of particles of matter, organised so as to resemble a corded instrument of music of five strings, which correspond with the five senses. The intellectual faculties hold the bow and play, and the passions form the stops upon the handle of the instrument; and if just tones are produced, simultaneously or successively, their harmony of melody forms what is called an agreeable tune or air, or well-being and happiness, of which man himself possesses consciousness; and in this power he is superior to, and differs from, the inanimate instrument."

He advocated what he called "the philosophy of Materialism" and the "perfectibility of human nature." De Quincey says:—

> "Like the late Mr. Shelley, he had a fine vague enthusiasm, and lofty aspirations in connection with human nature generally and its hopes; and, like him, he strove to give steadiness, a uniform direction, and an intelligible purpose to these feelings, by fitting to them a scheme of philosophical opinions."

Alaric Watts (ii., 282) gives the following account of his opinions:—

> "His theory seemed to involve the rejection not only of revealed, but also of natural, religion, truly so-called. Kind-hearted and benevolent to the highest degree, it was his whim to ascribe his sympathy for his race to feelings of mere selfishness. He supposed that there was a continual transmutation of constituent atoms between all bodies brought within the sphere of reciprocal influence, and that the process was regular and invariable. He denied that there was any manifestation of intelligence in the structure of the globe, or of the bodies on its surface, and disclaimed wholly any belief in the existence of a superintending deity."

De Quincey said in Tait's Magazine, though he did not reprint the observation in book form:—

> "In fact, he was as deliberate and resolute an Atheist as can ever have existed; but for all that, and although wishing, for his own sake, that he had been a more religious man, or at least had felt a greater reverence for such subjects, and a closer sympathy with that which for so vast a majority of the human race must ever constitute their sole consolation under sorrow and calamity, still I could not close my eyes to the many evidences which his writings and his conversation afforded of a true grandeur of mind, and of a calm Spinozistic state of contemplative reverie."

Among his eccentricities, both of thought and diction, are many good things. He said with Spinoza: "To think is to identify ourselves with nature." He was himself a thinker, at times original and deep, but without method. He insisted that the mind should be regarded, "not as a sack of science, but as an instrument of sense." Travel and observation he preferred to books and knowledge. He says:—

> "The most important action of my life was to uneducate myself and wipe away the evil propensities and erudite nonsense of school instruction. I soon discovered that the maxims of virtue would avail little against the untutored dispositions of violence, fraud, cruelty, falsehood, and superstitious insanity."

He thought that most minds carried over-much sail with too slim a rudder. So he says: "The human mind should be taught to think before it is taught to know, and the rudder of reason should be fixed before the mind is launched into the ocean of life." Virtue and vice, he said, are synonymous with wisdom and folly. Christianity he calls a more ridiculous system of superstition than the Pagan Pantheon. "This Christian superstition," he continues, "brought on the long period of the dark ages, which now exists in defiance of all the progress of science, literature, and travels." He says: "All appeal to supernatural or universal power is downright insanity. Man can profit only in an appeal to the intelligible and communicative power of reason in his own species." "Intellectual discernment," he says, "would avoid the excess of wealth, which always produces corresponding poverty, and often the most frightful evils. It would seek to deduce good from evil, so to modify war that it may become the means of peace, coercion that it may become the means of liberty, and civil government that its power may become the means of national prosperity in reconciling public interest with private good."

Sometimes he shows a touch of wit, as when he says the Irish Catholics have "only Father Murphy's supper in the clouds to allure them." His travels gave him a good opinion of his own countrymen. He disputes their being phlegmatic, and says "an Englishman would buy a house before a foreigner would finish the bargain of an egg." He divided society into seven classes—viz., savage, pastoral, agrestic, scientific, confederate, and perfectible life. He advocated missions to the lower classes from the superior ones, "not to teach them, as has been the practice, the silly doctrines of mythology and metaphysics, to make fools of them, but practical secular education in useful arts and sciences." He notes how the offer of a reward for a chimney-sweeping invention did away with the cruelty of children sweeping chimneys, which religion was unable to effect. "Religion," he remarks, "demands implicit assent to all propositions upon pain of punishment, which disposes the mind to indolence of examination, ignorance, and a breach of probity." "Reflection, rising superior to the narrow confines of religious creeds and mythological dogmas, and comprehending the vast circle of nature's laws relative to man, discovers the end of his being to be the improvement of the mundane system in time and futurity."

De Quincey, who knew him well, says:—

> "He was a man of extraordinary genius. He has generally been treated by those who have spoken of him in print as a madman. But this is a mistake, and must have been founded chiefly on the titles of his books. He was a man of fervid mind, and of sublime aspirations; but he was no madman, or, if he was, then I say that it is so far desirable to be a madman."

In describing his own characteristics, Stewart, in his Opus Maximum, says:—

> "I have learnt to pity, and not to resent, the passions of others; and when to an angry or illiberal observation I reply with complacent language, it is but marking my own superiority of moral temperament, and showing that I am not to be infected with moral as with physical contagion. A philosopher may catch the small-pox, but if he catches his passions, he must be a fool."

Stewart died February 20, 1822, and left by his will a thousand pounds to Edinburgh University, which he esteemed the most liberal institution of the kind. His works remain a curious, ill-shapen, rugged mass of unrefined ore, whence, with much smelting, precious metal can still be obtained.

Correspondence.

A CORRECTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Kindly permit me to correct a trifling error in last week's selection from the late Mr. Wheeler's "Some Little-known Freethinkers."

Judge Strange—my brother-in-law—was 76 years and 7 months old—not 75—when he died.

ELPHINSTONE BEGBIE (Major-General).

MUCH BETTER THAN CURSING.

Two Irishmen, the eldest of whom was badly club-footed were tramping along a country road. At noon they stopped under a tree to rest and have a nap. The club-foot man took off his shoes and placed them near him. In about an hour they awoke to find that some thief had made away with the shoes.

Immediately the young man made the air sulphurous with curses of the thief for fully five minutes. Then the club-foot man cried out: "Ah, ah! Mike, don't curse him so, but pray. Down on your knees and pray to the Virgin with me that inside of an hour my old crooked shoes'll fit him."

EXPERIENCED.

During an Episcopal convention in Boston, one of the bishops had an experience he will long remember. He was a portly man, weighing over 300 pounds. One afternoon while walking through Boston Common he sat down on one of the benches to rest. When he attempted to get up, he failed in the effort. He tried again and failed. About this time a little girl, poorly clad, came along and was attracted by the struggles of the bishop. Stepping up to him, she exclaimed:—

"Don't you want me to give you a lift?"

The bishop gazed at her in amazement and exclaimed:

"Why, you can't help me. You are too little."

"No, I am not," she replied, "I have helped my pa get up many times when he was drunker than you are."

It had been a trying day in the nursery, and nurse had had occasion several times to call for assistance in the management of what that day had proved a very unruly little miss. The child seemed conscious of her fall from grace, and it was with a very sober face that she came to ask forgiveness. After repeating the time-honored, "Now I lay me down to sleep," she continued, as was her wont, "An' now, Dod, please bess mamma an' papa, an' make me a dood dirl —" Here she paused, and, with the seriousness which convulsed the other members of the family and completely won her mother's forgiveness, she added, "An' if at first you don't succeed, try, try, try again!" It is to be hoped le bon Dieu took it as good-humoredly as her parents, and was encouraged to another almighty effort.

In a "Methodis' 'vival" once, attended wholly by enthusiastic darkies, there ensued so much commotion during the hysterical excitement that the red-hot stove was overturned. The result was a small panic, but the white-wooled pastor rose up in the pulpit, and, stretching out his arms, shouted: "Pick it up, Brudder Granger, pick it up! De Laud won't let it burn yuh!" Brother Granger, full of faith which was inspired by the revival, rushed forward and started to pick up the stove. A veil must be drawn over the details of the natural consequences that followed; but it was impossible not to hear Brother Granger's first remark, which was: "The hell he won't!"

A clergyman in an Eastern town warned his hearers lately "not to walk in a slippery path, lest they be sucked, maelstrom-like, into its meshes." This metaphor suggests that of another clergyman, who prayed that the word might be as a nail driven in a sure place, sending its roots downward and its branches upward.

"You might put on thar," said the bereaved husband to the rural sculptor, "that she died peaceful, an' that we wouldn't call her back." "Anything else?" "She never spoke a cross word in her life." "All right." "Bein deef an' dumb an' of a quiet an' retirin' natur'." "Is that all?" "Well, you might throw in a little scriptur'. Jest say, 'Her children rise up an' call her Betsy.'"

A country rector complained to a well-known dignitary of the Church that he had received only £5 for preaching a sermon at Oxford. "Five pounds!" ejaculated the dignitary. "Why, I would not have preached that sermon for fifty."

Sunday-school Teacher (after telling the story of David): "And all this happened over three thousand years ago." Little Clara: "Oh, my; what a memory you have got!"

The Sinner had been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

Whereupon the attorneys for the Sinner filed a motion for a new trial on the ground that the scales were out of order.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 2 SUNDAY, JANUARY 11, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Liberty means responsibility. That is why most men dread it.—G. B. SHAW.

The "Blasphemy" Case.

THE Petition to the Home Secretary in favor of the release or better treatment of Thomas William Stewart, the latest prisoner for "blasphemy," came to what I thought it would do—nothing. But as I signed it myself, in a soft moment, as I explained, I cannot be hard on those who engineered it. They are now getting up another Memorial, this time to Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister, practically asking him to supervise and rebuke a member of his Ministry. I have not signed that. It appears to me unwise to attempt what we know must fail. One does not help any cause, however much one may gratify oneself, by a waste of time, means, and energy.

Mr. McKenna's reply to the Petition was belated enough to be uncivil, and its character is such that he may live to regret it. It seems to have been written without the slightest sense of responsibility. It betrays a very hostile feeling towards the prisoner,—which, to say the least of it, is injudicial, and it shows no sort of respect for the more or less distinguished people, closely associated with the intellectual and moral life of England, who signed the Petition.

Mr. McKenna's reply to the Petition was as follows:—

"Home Office, Whitehall, December 27, 1913.

"Sir,—I have laid before the Secretary of State the petition on behalf of Thomas William Stewart which you forwarded on the 2nd instant, and am directed by him to say that he has carefully considered all the circumstances of the case and consulted the learned Judge before whom the case was tried, but regrets that he has failed to find any sufficient grounds to justify him in recommending any reduction of the sentence.

"Mr. McKenna thinks it right to point out that the prisoner is not punished for holding certain opinions, nor for seeking to support his opinions by argument, but because in his speeches, which were uttered in a public place so as to be heard by all manner of persons, he held up to contempt the religious beliefs of others, and made use of language which was calculated to wound, and cannot have been uttered without the intention of wounding, the feelings of others.

"Mr. McKenna would further point out, what may not be known to the signatories of the petition, that Stewart also delivered lectures on 'family limitation' and the treatment of venereal diseases, and was engaged in the sale of the appliances for the prevention of conception; and it would appear, from his own words and from his sending his wife among the crowd which he attracted to distribute handbills and to solicit orders, that the purpose of his speeches on matters of religion was that he might use the publicity so obtained to advertise, for his own profit, his lectures and the appliances he sold.

"I am to add that the prisoner was entitled, within ten days from his conviction or sentence, to bring his case before the Court of Criminal Appeal; and he may still do so if he can satisfy the Court that there are sufficient reasons for allowing him an extension of time.

"I am, Sir, Your obedient Servant,

"E. BLACKWELL."

No doubt Mr. McKenna felt he was in a position to assume a lofty attitude. He had the petitioners "on toast"—to use the expressive language of the man in the street, which is always disdained by authoritarians and pedants when it first emerges into public notice, but is frequently admitted afterwards into the most respectable dictionaries.

Even if his reply were followed by questions in the House of Commons, he could foresee his own triumph there. For all the Christian bigots of all parties would support him against the handful of adversaries who were bent on doing justice even to an "infidel."

I propose to answer Mr. McKenna, and deal with the "blasphemy" case, and with the whole law of "blasphemy" up to date, on Sunday evening at Queen's (Minor) Hall, which I have had engaged for the purpose through the agency of the Secular Society, Ltd., into whose exchequer the proceeds will go after the payment of the necessary expenses. I have views of my own on this subject, and I will express them with sincerity and fearlessness, whoever is pleased and whoever is hurt. Mr. Herbert Burrows has kindly promised to take the chair.

Sunday happens to be my birthday. I don't know that I could devote it to any better object.

Meanwhile, I venture to reprint a new view of "blasphemy" first published when I was under prosecution myself in 1882.

G. W. FOOTE.

CHRIST THE BLASPHEMER.

It is rather singular that Christianity, whose founder was put to death after being arraigned as a blasphemer, should be so fond of flinging that epithet at every man who dares to expose its dogmas and ridicule its pretensions. One would think that after the charge of the priests, the scene before Pilate, and the crucifixion on Calvary, the Christians would banish the word as an opprobrium. Yet they have employed it more than all the other religionists of the world; they have made the vile principle of persecution involved in it a constitutional law; and although the ferocity of their faith is controlled by the growing spirit of humanity, they still howl "blasphemer" at plain-spoken heretics; just as they did centuries ago, when their power was as unlimited as their brutality, when they burned Freethinkers at the stake, broke them to pieces on the wheel, tore them to shreds with the rack, or boiled them alive in oil, for the benefit of man and the greater glory of God.

However they may shirk the fact, these malignant zealots must be reminded that Jesus Christ was a blasphemer. Let them not say that he was only accused as such without being guilty; for as the crime is impossible, or, if possible, only to be judged by God himself, the accusation is everything. Blasphemy is entirely a matter of opinion; it varies with time and place; but whenever a man is charged with it, we may be sure that he is in open antagonism to the established creed and its professional teachers.

Jesus Christ was in the same position as we are. He was not a learned rabbi, but a man of the people; not a courtly critic, but the sedition of the streets.

Digitized by Google

And his enemies were the same as ours. The Scribes and Pharisees were the orthodox scholars and priests; and Jesus had set them against him by going, as we have, to the masses with ideas dangerous to priestcraft and privilege. It was "the chief priests and all the council" who sought for witness to put him to death, and they acutely fixed on blasphemy as the surest accusation.

When the high priest got something to lay hold of he rent his clothes, and said there was no need of any further witness.

> "Ye have heard the blasphemy: what think ye? And they all condemned him to be guilty of death. And some began to spit on him, and to cover his face, and to buffet him,.....and the servants did strike him with the palms of their hands" (Mark xiv. 64-5).

We all know the rest. These Jewish priests were sharp practitioners. The orthodoxy of Athens let Socrates live to seventy, but they got rid of Jesus Christ at thirty-three.

The Prophet of Nazareth had been called a blasphemer long before the tragic close of his career. We find the Jews saying "thou blasphemest" in John x., 36, and trying to stone him to death. He had evidently a bad reputation in that line. And it is remarkable that whenever the Jews uttered the word "blasphemy" they always wanted to do something vicious. It never expressed their love of God, but their hatred of somebody who differed from them and touched their prejudices to the quick.

It may, of course, be objected that Jesus Christ never ridiculed the priests. Quite true, but he denounced them. His utter incapacity for satire rendered this his only weapon of attack. No character was ever so deficient in humor; he often wept, but we never read that he smiled. It is not surprising, therefore, that he never satirised his enemies; but what he lacked in irony he certainly atoned for in invective. Listen to this fierce diatribe:—

> "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers: therefore ye shall receive greater damnation. Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves.....Ye fools and blind. .....Ye blind guides.....Ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and all uncleanness. .....Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" (Matthew xxiii. 15-33).

There's elegant invective for you; we yield the palm to Jesus in this game. But we rather think we have the advantage of him in sarcasm, and we think we have as much right to use one weapon as he had to use the other. Nay, we claim a right to use them both; and we shall not be frightened from our purpose by the fulminations of the pulpit or the terrors of the law.

We are quite aware that Pilate would not consent to the death of Jesus until the priests accused him of sedition; blasphemy being a crime unknown to the wise Romans, and any such charge being esteemed by them as only the bitter wrangle of sects. Yet the fact is plain, that the charge of sedition was preferred in the last extremity, so that the victim might not escape. Blasphemy was the original charge, and it led to the death of the Nazarene. Are we not justified, then, in speaking of Christ the blasphemer? Have we not the right to taunt the Christians with hurling at us the epithet that struck Christ on the brow, and drove the nails into his hands and feet? Let them dread the verdict of history, and tremble lest they share the execration meted out to those who murdered the founder of their faith.

G. W. FOOTE.

The Outlook.

REFORMERS are naturally optimistic. Their hopes lie in the future, and their ardor for reform is commensurate with their faith in the power of the ideas they represent, and in their belief that ultimately these ideas will triumph. Yet, because of this optimism, none are more ready to overvalue the actual progress already made. They shout, and mistake the absence of a counter cry for the non-existence of an enemy. They do not always reflect that the enemy, although silent—or comparatively so—may still be there, and that ideas that are backed up with a number of subsidiary interests, and resting upon a traditional basis, always have in them the possibility of a reaction. The number of people who take a genuine interest in advanced ideas is very small when compared with the rest of the world; and at any moment a combination of circumstances may present itself that would tempt threatened established ideas to make a last desperate struggle for unquestioned supremacy.

In other words, the possibility of a reaction is always present, and it is a possibility which reformers do not sufficiently take into account. Nor are there wanting signs that this process of reaction is already afoot. What, for example, has become of the Republicanism of fifty years ago? A half century since, with a woman on the throne—a circumstance that would not be without its appeal to male chivalry—one could have said with safety much more against Victoria than could now be said against George the Fifth. I do not, of course, refer to the personal character of either, but solely as Queen or King. During the past fifteen years the primitive superstition of the sanctity of the reigning monarch has made a strong and not altogether unsuccessful bid for re-establishment, and our glorious free press has, in general, worked hard in its behalf. Militarism is, apparently, more firmly established than ever; for if we do not have actual wars—although these have been plentiful enough of late—we have what is almost as bad, elaborate preparations for them, without the benefit of the object-lesson that a war provides. Both these things are enough to prove that the primitive man and the primitive mind are still with us, and that when the retrogressive section of society sets itself seriously to work, it is not impossible to neutralise the efforts of rationalistic workers.

In the religious world—in spite of all our talk about the advance of Freethought—we have seen within the last six or seven years a number of masked punishments inflicted for attacks on the Christian religion, and at least one man sent to prison avowedly for the Christian-made offence of blasphemy. Naturally protests have been made against this, although it is worth noting that the section of the Christian world which prides itself upon its liberality has remained practically silent. Prominent men in science and literature have raised their voice in protest, but prominent men did this in the case of the Freethinker prosecution of thirty years ago; so that this fact can hardly be chronicled as an advance. The important fact is that these prosecutions are still possible, that the mass of the people acquiesce in their existence, and that bigotry is powerful enough to set in operation this clumsy engine of suppression. In this respect we are practically where we were thirty years ago. Thought has broadened in the meantime, but has it deepened? What I mean is that there are unquestionably more disbelievers in Christianity than there were a generation since; but are there more disbelievers of the kind that really count on a critical occasion? One may well feel doubtful on this point. Non-religious scientists, politicians, and men of letters are as reticent now as they were a generation ago—perhaps more so. The real fighting is still left to a handful, and in this conflict there is hardly any such thing as a genuine neutrality. In England to-day the man who is not openly helping Freethought is covertly assisting its enemy. His very silence gives Christian bigots a confidence and a strength they would not have if he were outspoken; and so long as religion can by any means enforce silence it is doing for itself the next best thing to suppression.

In England the great medium of popular education—perhaps one ought to say of popular misinformation—is the press. And there is little or no improvement regarding its attitude towards avowed Freethought. You may liberalise in its columns, within limits. If Christianity is attacked, it must be in the name of some ridiculous "higher Christianity." News of Freethought meetings is still rigidly suppressed. For all that the general public can learn from the daily press, anti-Christian societies and publications and speeches might be non-existent. Each member of the public must discover them for himself, and when he discovers them he usually keeps his discovery to himself. We talk of Spain or Ireland as priest-ridden countries, in reality we are almost as priest-ridden as either Spain or Ireland. Not by the same order of priests, but that matters little. For it is organised religion that is behind this press boycott; it is organised religion that decrees silence to so many of our public men. And what is this but the rule of the priest. Religion still exerts a commanding influence over numerous avenues of social advancement, and so long as this influence remains, so long we are priest-ridden. We shall only be really free when this power is broken for ever.

So far, the black side of the picture. But there is a brighter side. In spite of boycott and suppression, the critical study of fundamental religious beliefs has progressed. A small army of workers, whose right to speak authoritatively cannot be questioned, have demonstrated that our ideas of God and the soul take their origin in the fear and ignorance of primitive humanity. This speculation, which is at least as old as the days of the ancient Greeks, has now received positive proof by the careful collection and classification of religious beliefs amongst existing tribes of primitive peoples. It is too often forgotten that god-making is really not a lost art. It still flourishes. Gods are still being brought into being, fashioned by the same methods which have always fashioned them. One can see the gods, first in a larval stage, and later on in full maturity. This study of religious origins has been so well done that, in its main outlines, it may fairly be considered complete. Our present great need is to affiliate past and existing primitive religious ideas with modern religious beliefs and doctrines. At present this task is shirked by our chief writers. They stop short at the very point where their labors become of supreme interest. That is, in showing that all religious beliefs, no matter how refined or how advanced, really rest upon the discredited superstitions of the savage. They have no other basis. And the man who accepts the origin of the belief in God and the soul in the ignorance of primitive mankind, need not bother about modern theories concerning them. He knows that they are falsehoods, and that no amount of apologising can convert an established falsehood into a possible truth.

Next to this, we have the help derived from a saner conception of historical growth and of the nature of the social forces. The average man cares but little for subtle points concerning doctrine. His interest in religion is of a more general character. So far as he values religion, it is because he believes it to have a beneficient influence on life; and, as his attention becomes directed to the real nature of the social forces, and to the part played by religious beliefs in social history, religion is contemplated from an altogether different point of view. It is then seen that religion, as such, can never give an impetus to reform. It never gives anything new; that is quite beyond its power. Its gods are always the shades of dead men; its heaven always a picture of the earth of yesterday, with its more disagreeable features eliminated. It is also being realised that the world-wide fight between religion and progressive ideas is not an accidental conflict. It is inevitable. The great social function of religion is to conserve. It aims at perpetuating the past because it is only by this means that it can live. All the fashionable talk about growth in religion is quite fallacious. Man does not grow in his religion, he grows out of it. His ghosts, his gods, his heavens and hells become less substantial with each generation. What is called growth in religion is really civilised common sense criticising the beliefs of the past, but without the moral courage for a complete break.

But, above all, the force working on the side of the reformer is the insistent, but largely unconscious, pressure of a changed social and intellectual environment on established beliefs. Against this force it is difficult for religion to guard because it does not express itself at any particular place or in any particular person. It is felt rather in the altered tone or temper with which religion is faced. Thousands of people who are not susceptible to a direct attack, yield to the insidious proselytising of a changed environment. Their beliefs slip from them without their knowing how or why. And it is precisely because of this fact that the immediate work of the Freethinker is to create a full consciousness of the nature of these changes. It is only by this method that Freethinkers can protect themselves against the dangers of reaction. It is not enough to merely note the broadening of thought and congratulate ourselves on the disintegration of religion. So long as people are not conscious of the full significance of the change, they represent a mass of material that may at any time be exploited by religious reactionary organisations.

This is more than a possible danger, it is in actual existence. The various "liberal" movements in the Christian churches, the new-born enthusiasm for social reform, and the like, really means this: large numbers of people have outgrown the old creeds, and were they fully conscious of the nature of their own growth they would be in the ranks of avowed Freethought. But they are not conscious, with the result that they offer the opportunity for exploitation by the Churches, and one which they cannot afford to neglect. And in any really decisive struggle, it is this class that will turn the scale. Conscious orthodoxy is no longer strong enough in this country to work its will. Neither is conscious Freethought. But between the two lies this large and growing body of people, dissatisfied with the old and not enlightened enough to take on with the new. They are easy slaves to phrases and catchwords. The cry of reform satisfies their ears, and their minds are not acute enough to see whether what is being offered them is genuine reform or not. It is this class that has, historically, always been the obstacle to reform, and it remains so still. We are not, as I have said, sufficiently advanced to be beyond the danger of a reaction; indeed, I believe that this reaction has set in. But how far this reaction is to go, to what extent it is to meet with success, will, I believe, be decided by our efforts in rousing this intermediate body of public opinion. We cannot convert the genuinely orthodox—at least, to any considerable extent—but we can awaken the minds of others as to where they really are and why they are there. The immediate question of the future is just this: Can Freethought enlist on its side the immense body of partly emancipated opinion that undoubtedly exists, or will it be captured by the pretended liberalism of the Churches, and so made the instrument of reaction and disaster?

Is Religion a Necessity?

NATURALLY the Pulpit assures us that in the absence of religion human life would be dark and miserable in the extreme, decidedly not worth living. Without a doubt religion is a necessity to the clergy of all denominations, for if it were suddenly to disappear their means of subsistence would be gone. And yet we are told of some ministers who are convinced that the common people could not possibly live without it, though they themselves do not believe in it. The "Man in Black," who figures so largely in Borrow's Lavengro and Romany Rye, was a Catholic missionary, entrusted, among others, with the reconversion of this country to Catholicism. Borrow described him to Isopel Berners as "a prowling priest," who could quaff an enormous quantity of cold gin and water with a lump of sugar in it. Isopel was instructed to keep the dingle well supplied with hollands, so that the "Man in Black" might quench his endless thirst and be induced to talk whenever he honored the strange couple with a visit. On one occasion the subject under discussion was Religion, and this is how Borrow introduces it:—

> "He proceeded to tell me that the experience of countless ages had proved the necessity of religion; the necessity, he would admit, was only for simpletons; but as nine-tenths of the dwellers upon this earth were simpletons, it would never do for sensible people to run counter to their folly, but, on the contrary, it was their wisest course to encourage them in it, always provided that, by so doing, sensible people could derive advantage; that the truly sensible people of this world were the priests, who, without caring a straw for religion for its own sake, made use of it as a cord by which to draw the simpletons after them" (Romany Rye, p. 9).

The "Man in Black" despised and reviled the very Church whose servant he was, and admitted his unbelief in the Christian religion itself. He called it a "ferocious" cult, which could have given all other cults "a lesson in the art of persecution." "None but Christians," he said, "have ever been good persecutors; well, the old religion succumbed, Christianity prevailed, for the ferocious is sure to prevail over the gentle." He was anxious to enlist Borrow as a partner in his mission, in spite of his unbelief in the Catholic Church; but having patiently listened to all he had to say, Borrow answered:—

> "'I will not entertain your proposal; I detest your schemes; they are both wicked and foolish.'
> 'Wicked,' said the man in black; 'have they not—he! he!—the furtherance of religion in view?'
> 'A religion,' said I, 'in which you yourself do not believe, and which you contemn.'
> 'Whether I believe in it or not,' said the man in black, 'it is adapted for the generality of the human race; so I will forward it, and advise you to do the same'" (Ibid, p. 20).

Here we have a man advocating the necessity of religion because it enabled the only sensible people, the priests, who did not believe in it, to live in luxury upon the simpletons who did. We know that many priests are sincere believers in the Gospel which they preach; but we also know that there are hundreds, if not thousands, whose private creed is of much smaller dimensions than the one they avouch in public. In other words, the religion which many clergymen preach from the pulpit is not the religion by which they live from day to day. The common people must have a religion, they declare, and it must be much larger and fuller than their own.

But do the so-called common people need a religion? What has religion ever done for its professors? Of what benefit has Christianity been to the inhabitants of the United Kingdom, for example? Read their history, contemplate the present conditions of life among them, and specify, if you can, the good which their belief in God and a future life has done them. It is our vaunted boast that we are the most Christian people under the sun, which no doubt we really are; but are the conditions of life amongst us just and humane? Do we live together in perfect peace and happiness as brothers and sisters in the Lord? No man of God has the temerity to answer those questions in the affirmative. The truth is that socially and economically we are more backward than some non-Christian nations. Are not capital and labor at perpetual war in our midst? There is no lack of religion in Dublin and Leeds, and yet in both cities employers and employees are at daggers drawn. God is powerless to keep order among his children, whom he is said to love with boundless affection. To safeguard life and property in London we require a Police Force numbering upwards of twenty thousand men and costing nearly two million pounds a year. We have fourteen Police Courts, presided over by twenty-six magistrates, and many other Courts, in which prisoners and litigants are dealt with. With these facts in mind, we wish to know what Christianity has done for British and Irish people. It has certainly not united them in the bond of brotherly love, abolishing class distinctions and antagonisms, and establishing economic justice and harmony.

It is safe to affirm that religion has conferred no benefit whatever upon mankind; and it is also safe to declare that it has done our race incalculable harm. So far has it been from promoting our progress, that it has even acted as a retrogressive agent. It is universally admitted that war is a terrible curse; and the majority of the wars in Christendom have been religious. Who can read the story of the bloody conflict between Presbyterianism and Episcopacy in Scotland without being forced to the conclusion that the Scottish people would have fared much better had they been without any religion at all? The battles of Rullion Green and Drumclog, and the fearful persecutions which lasted for years, were distinctly anti-social and anti-progressive in their direct and indirect influence. The same remark applies to the wars waged in this island between Protestantism and Catholicism, now the one and now the other being victorious. When Catholicism held sway Protestants were cheerfully put to death as dangerous heretics, and when Protestantism was in power, Catholics were treated in the same way. Whether in the Catholic or the Protestant form, Christianity has always been a disturber of the peace. Even in the twentieth century, religion, though it has lost most of its ancient power, is still setting its champions at loggerheads. Religious controversies are as acrid and heartless now as ever they were; and the people who engage in them never escape unscathed. Of necessity, they exert an injurious, degrading influence upon character. The Kikuyu controversy, now raging in the Anglican Church, only shows how Christian belief cramps and corrupts the mind, making it impossible for those who cherish it to act naturally and spontaneously in any given circumstances. The Bishop of Zanzibar may be a most excellent Christian; but his excellency, as a Christian, has engendered an exclusiveness which is fundamentally inconsistent with any rational doctrine of human brotherhood. Indeed, the brotherhood of man is not, never has been, a Christian tenet; and in practice Christians are the least brotherly of all people. Episcopalians cannot sit at the Lord's table in company with non-Episcopalians without being subjected to the charge of heresy—a charge which the Bishop of Oxford seems to justify. To non-Christians the Kikuyu controversy is infinitely ridiculous; and certainly nothing could be more calculated to alienate thoughtful people from the Christian Church.

The only conclusion to which we can come is that religion, so far from being necessary to mankind, is detrimental to its highest interests. It is a notorious fact that Christianity and intolerance have always gone hand-in-hand. Catholics hate Protestants, and treat them as schismatics. Different sections of Protestants are constantly unchurching one another, and not much love has ever been lost between them. Yes, the religion of the Galilean has been eminently successful in setting "a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law," and in causing a man's foes to be "they of his own household." The idea that we need such a religion is so absurd as to be intolerable. If we could but free our minds from prejudice we would see clearly that religion is an enemy of progress, a hindrance to the development of manhood, and a destroyer of social union. Like the vermiform appendix it is a useless vestigial structure, and often proves harmful. We have outgrown it, and the wisest thing we can do is to cut it off and fling it away. They who have managed to do this rejoice in their deliverance. Life has become a new thing to them, and the world is clothed with fresh glory. They are no longer under the dominion of false fears, neither do they harbor illusive hopes. The earth has become their home which they love and never wish to leave. Their ideal is soundness of mind and body, which is the one condition of individual and social happiness. Our worst foe is disease, mental and bodily, and our first and supreme duty is to fight it. It is in disease that all the wrongs and ills of life have their root, and once we have got rid of it our greatest problems will be solved.

The Unregenerate Kaffir.

IT always comes as a great surprise to the earnest observer of the Kaffir to find no evidence of the existence of that innate predilection towards belief in a Supreme Being which most Britishers have been taught is universal among savage races. No South African native language has any word descriptive or even suggestive of God or an after-life. Colenso and some of the German Lutheran missionaries have interpolated certain words and phrases which are intended to do duty for those religious ideas, but they are not in general use, and not understood outside certain mission stations.

I have had twenty years' intimate relationship with the Zulu, Basuto, Swazi, and Shangaan, both raw, civilised, and Christianised, and have never met one who could be said to comprehend the spiritual. Their ideas of an after-life, even after a course of missionary instruction, is childishly vague, and confirms the assertion of some that the Kaffir is incapable of grasping an abstract idea. Their idea of God is always that he is a severe white boss whom it is better to keep out of the way of. Jesus is still more incomprehensible. As an intelligent Swazi put it to me, Jesus was the favorite son of a great chief. Therefore it was foolish of him to go away from his father's kraal to live with a tribe who did not want him, and who tried to assegai him.

The hope or fear of an after-life, if it be entertained at all, certainly does not influence the Kaffir's present life in the slightest. In my official capacity I had charge of a native awaiting hanging for a murder. He had escaped after arrest, and was only recaptured after much trouble and nine months. After sentence he was assiduously attended by a young Lutheran missionary. I asked the native what the missionary talked to him about. He gave me a summary of the discourses, adding, "He says that I shall come alive again." I suggested that would be satisfactory. "No, they would only hang me again," he objected. I hinted that God being a white man, as all Kaffirs are taught, he would not hang twice for the same offence. With perfect sincerity, he answered, "That may be, but Inspector Clarke would not let him interfere." Inspector Clarke had shown great zeal in effecting the re-arrest and conviction. The natives stood in great awe of his detective and authoritative capacity.

A dying Swazi, who had been comforted by the missionary's assurance that he would meet his father in heaven, confidentially assured me that he had no wish to meet his father, as they always quarrelled, and "he is very clever with the sticks, although he is so old."

The "converted" Kaffir always regards his association with the mission as a business investment. I say, with a full sense of the weight and meaning of words, that I never knew a native Christian who did not retain his connection with a mission because of some material advantage. It might be only the privilege of grazing his goats on the mission reserve, or getting blankets a little cheaper than from the store, but there was always a tangible, material result. It is a matter of local history that I made a bet that I would empty a mission church one Sunday by the offer of a shilling and a feed of sheep meat to all absentees. I lost the bet, but 22 out of a congregation of 36 came ten miles on Sunday morning for the shilling and the feed. I believe that I would have won had not an old native insinuated that the affair was a sell, or a pretext for collecting arrears of hut-tax.

Those who have had experience of the incisive logic of the Kaffir can easily understand how Bishop Colenso was set thinking and eventually converted by the unanswerable questions of the old Zulu who had been unable to make the genealogy of Genesis harmonise. The Kaffir is strong on genealogy, and can trace his family tree through the tangles of a score of generations. Here are a few gems of Kaffir criticism and comment that I have heard from natives:—

"God and Jesus are white men. No white man can get on without Kaffir servants, therefore we natives will be servants in heaven as we are on earth."

"If God can mend a broken leg if you ask him, why can he not restore one that has been bitten off by a crocodile?"

"Why cannot God cure the bite of a black mamba?" [The black mamba is the most deadly African snake. Recovery from its bite is exceedingly rare.]

"The Boers prayed to God before they fought, and were beaten; the Tommies [British] never prayed, but drank and swore, yet beat the Boers."

"When a native chief becomes a kolwa [Christian], he gets drunk oftener and always dies soon."

"The missionary tells us that hard work is good, but he never does any himself, but makes the Kaffir do it for very little pay."

The year 1896 was disastrous for South Africa. We had the Jameson Raid, the terrific dynamite explosion at Braamfontein, lost a million cattle by rinderpest, had a severe small-pox epidemic; locusts appeared in record swarms and ruined many farmers, and the Boer Government enforced several vexatious laws against the natives. An influential chief in the Spelonken district, claimed by the missionaries as a model native Christian, was discussing affairs with me. In the most reverential tone, he asked if I did not think God was getting too old to look after so many things, adding, "I think he ought to let Jesus do more than he does to help him."

These remarks may sound flippant, but they were not so intended. The native is never jocular in discussion, or for that matter in anything else. He has no perception of humor apart from physical buffoonry, and sarcasm or irony are lost on him. His criticism is the genuine reflex of his thoughts. Reticence or regard for the feelings of the person criticised he knows not, as witness these remarks made to my face by natives who were "nobodies" in the kraal, while I represented the majesty of the law:—

"God does not love you so much as he loves M'futa [the chief magistrate] because he lets you do all the work and you do not get so much money. You are foolish to love Jesus for so little money."

"Why do you not pray to God to teach you to speak better Zulu. Is it because he cannot?"

"Why did God let you, who are a Christian, be nearly drowned, but keep Masupa, who is not, safe?"

This related to my being carried down a river in flood, while my Kaffir servant, who could not swim, escaped without risk.

I enjoyed a fairly good reputation among the natives as a humane official. Most of my colleagues with me in our Volunteer company during the late Boer War were regarded as the reverse. I was the only one of the party severely wounded. When the news reached the Native location, the Chief Induna remarked that he did not think much of God in letting me be shot in the stomach while Captain So-and-So, who was much fatter and wickeder, was not hurt.

Acid Drops.

It is amusing to see the Archbishop of Canterbury and other members of the episcopal bench calling for special prayers against the calamity of civil war in Ireland. The right reverend fathers in God never trouble about civil war unless they think their "pals" will get the worst of it. We say deliberately that their calls for prayer at this particular juncture are simply a part of the organised Tory campaign to frighten John Bull into fits over the Home Rule Bill. "King" Carson keeps a solemn face over the farce, but even he must envy the preternatural seriousness of the head jokers of the Protestant Church of England.

Don Quixote, the wise madman, told Sancho Panza that there were only two parties in the world—the "haves" and the "have-nots." That is the key to all political battles. With it the secret of all political questions is unlocked. We may say this without going any further in the Freethinker. But this is enough for readers of common sagacity. Before any question enters into the field of practical politics you can always say which side Bishops will take.

The prayers for Ireland are "special." This does not mean that they will make a special impression on the Almighty. It really means that the object in view is one of special importance—to the ladies and gentlemen who do the praying.

The Humanitarian, the monthly organ of the Humanitarian League, is not a comic paper, but there is an intensely comic paragraph in the January number's editorial notes:—

> "The late Mr. Montague Crackanthorpe, K.C., was, in one way, the most remarkable man the world has seen. He did a thing that no one else has yet done. Having asserted that garrotting was put down by the lash, and having been confronted with the absolute proofs to the contrary, he actually admitted that he was wrong! Dozens of eminent persons, from the late Sir Walter Besant to the present Mr. Plowden, and scores of anonymous journalists of every grade, have found themselves in Mr. Crackanthorpe's position, and have taken refuge, as the case might be, in evasion, or in silence, or even at times in abuse; but none of them, as far as we remember, has ever owned his mistake. We suggest that a statue of Mr. Crackanthorpe should be erected."

We repeat that this is intensely comic. We add that it is also intensely tragic. What a satire it is upon human nature!

We are glad to see the Humanitarian continuing its crusade against the beating of children in public elementary schools. It is not called beating, of course; it bears the highly respectable designation of "corporal punishment." It is simply abominable that parents who would not strike their own children for the whole world, should be compelled to place them at the mercy of other people, and be told to mind their own business when they complain of vulgar ill-treatment. For beating children is a most shockingly vulgar performance. No further proof is wanted than a look at any person engaged in it. Why the teaching profession still uphold the necessity of this vulgar performance in the schools passes our comprehension. In doing so they deliberately rank themselves on a lower level than the teaching profession in other civilised countries. The plea that a small cane is used only in a small way upon small boys is all nonsense. Serious injuries are sometimes inflicted, and slighter injuries are quite common. The Humanitarian cites a recent case in which the medical evidence was to the effect that fifteen or sixteen blue and black weals were on the boy's back, painful and tender to the touch, and two on the arm—and that one of the blows must have required considerable force, as there was a bruise beneath a vaccination scar. The magistrate, however, "did not think any unnecessary violence was used." Of course not. Magistrates never do. State functionaries stand by State functionaries. One policeman's word, for instance, outweighs the word of a dozen citizens in every Police Court in England.

The South Normanton school managers have taken action in this matter. They protest against the "growing tendency of the staff to inflict corporal punishment." Some of the managers spoke of boys and girls having been shockingly treated, some of them having fingers swollen to double their ordinary size and discolored. It was stated that in one case a finger was stripped one inch, and that in some cases the punishment was "fearful." Mark that the "tendency" to beat children is "growing." Naturally. The appetite for cruelty grows by what it feeds on. It grows from a luxury into a lust. Teachers may rail at this as much as they like. It is the simple truth. It is a universal law of moral pathology.

James Woods, the sexton and parish clerk of Billingford, Norfolk, committed suicide in the vestry of his church, which had to be reconsecrated by a special service, at which the Holy Ghost must have been present, for all consecrations are effected through that personage.

The Bishop of Thetford was responsible for that reconsecration. Thetford is where Thomas Paine was born. They haven't made much progress in that district during a hundred and fifty years.

Some thirty years ago (we have not the exact reference by us at the moment) a Freethinker named Gilbert Easton shot himself in St. Paul's Cathedral. His case was hopeless. He was suffering from creeping paralysis. His suicide necessitated the reconsecration of Wren's great masterpiece.

Journalists are often jovial theologians. A writer in the Southend Standard, speaking of Christmas, said recently that "a truth to be found alike in the dicta of a Colonel Robert Ingersoll and in the teachings of the founder of Christianity is that the way to be happy is to make other folk happy." This is, indeed, the newest theology. We shall expect to hear presently that the Man of Sorrows wrote the Mistakes of Moses.

The Daily Express recently pointed out that "Jericho was a very important city, situated on a caravan road, which led, probably, due north and south, or, perhaps, east and west." When told to go to Jericho, our contemporary will have difficulty in making an express journey.

The editor of Howe's Directory of Metropolitan Charities estimates the income for 1914 of the charitable institutions in London at over eight millions of money. Of this huge sum no less than three millions will be devoted to missionary work, and £373,320 to Bible and tract societies. Not a bad economic basis for a superstition alleged to be "without money and without price," and the founder of which was a pauper.

Dr. Clifford has discovered another reason why he supports religious teaching in State schools. He believes, he says, in Cowper-Templeism because it is democratic in tendency. It gives voters a measure of control over the religion taught. This apology is rather worse than the others with which Dr. Clifford has sought to befool the public. In the first place, the voters are not allowed to say what religion they will have taught. They may not choose Roman Catholicism or any other 'ism. All the State says is that, if a district requires religion, it must be of an "undenominational" character. And, in the next place, Dr. Clifford should remember that it is one of the professed principles of Nonconformity that the State should have nothing to do with religious teaching in any form. It is not a thing that should be decided by vote. Imagine putting it to the vote whether religious doctrines are true or not! Why, in some parts of the British Empire Christianity would be hopelessly "snowed under." Really what Dr. Clifford wants is the State to teach a religion that is agreeable to him, but he lacks the candor to say so. And, after all, this is only what the Roman Catholic and the Episcopalian, and all the other odds and ends of the religious world, desire.

Meanwhile the Church Times remarks that it is strange to find the "descendants of the Puritans" wishing to impart a "residual" religion through teachers ranging from Romanists to Atheists, about whose convictions no questions must be asked. Nonconformists are not quite so simple as the Church Times assumes. It is true that on the surface no questions are asked concerning the religious opinions of teachers. Nevertheless religion does very frequently enter into the appointment of teachers, and more frequently still into the question of their promotion. Everyone knows, who knows anything about the work of local bodies, that in the choice of teachers the sect to which they belong plays a very pronounced part in appointments. And all over the country there are thousands of teachers who are fully aware that to let it be known they are Freethinkers means an absolute bar to promotion. They are not rejected on this ground, of course; others are appointed—that is all. And so long as religion is in the schools, so long this will continue. Christian members of an Education Committee would no more vote for the advancement of a teacher known to be an Atheist than they would support an Atheist in any other direction. The facts are patent. To deny their existence argues either deliberate lying or an almost incredible stupidity.

On the other side of the hedge the Catholic Times seems to be getting nervous about the approach of Secular Education. It remarks in a recent issue that "either Cowper-Templeism must go or other religions must come. More than likely Cowper-Templeism will go and Secularism will come." Secularism, as a distinct "ism," will not come, nor do Freethinkers desire that it should. But we may take the above as the Christian way of saying that the abolition of all religious teaching in State schools is not only the logical, but also the inevitable issue to the present controversy. We welcome the admission, and we hope that the Catholic Times will turn out to be a true prophet.

When the Churches found that they were unable to stop Sunday concerts, a good many of them started Sunday musical entertainments of their own, either in conjunction with, or following the ordinary service. The same thing seems to be taking place in connection with Sunday cinematograph displays. The Y. M. C. A. has now announced a series of "Electric Picture Services for Men." The idea, apparently, is to get people to a picture show and sandwich a sermon in between. The Christian gospel is truly a powerful instrument when it has to play second fiddle to the film.

The Middlesex County Council has forbidden Sunday picture shows. This is not only bigotry, but impudent bigotry. As a matter of fact, they have no legal power to grant a seven-days' license or to interfere with a seven days' performance. The question of Sunday entertainments, with a charge for admission, falls under a special Statute.

Christian missionaries of any kind are kept out of Afghanistan. What a wicked country! It ought to be wiped off the map.

Dr. A. C. Dixon (the libeller of Ingersoll) has been preaching some special sermons on "Heroes and Heroines" at the Metropolitan Tabernacle lately. One was on Joseph —of course. The Potiphar's wife's temptation of this "purity" hero "was dealt with in a frank and plainly spoken address." Something like the lady's own address to Joseph, we suppose. Three words expressed all that she desired and expected of him. It was a model of brevity. Not one preacher in a million could equal it.

We have received the report of a sermon on "The Future Life of the Soul," by the Lord Bishop of Down; and, after glancing over it, we must confess that his lordship appears to know as much about the subject as anyone else. The Lord Bishop observes that it is only a very few sophisticated people who are capable of imagining that death ends all, and their minds have been warped by modern Materialism. We quite agree the number of those who reject the belief in a future life is small compared with the rest of the world, but "very few" is rather a misleading expression. Between six and seven millions returned themselves as Atheists at the last census in France, and there are probably as many unbelievers in this country. And these are certainly not the least thoughtful among the population.

Quite unwittingly, however, the Lord Bishop stumbles on a truth when he points out that only the minority are capable of imagining death as the end. This psychological fact contributed in no small measure to build up the belief in a future life. Death, although it has always occurred, yet stands as one of the discoveries made by the human mind. The savage does not conceive death as a cessation of personality because his mind is not capable of a conception of this character. The majority cannot conceive it even to-day. How many people talk of the "terrors of annihilation"? What they have in mind is, obviously, themselves as spectators of their own annihilation, and imagining themselves living to see themselves quite dead. So the savage does not think of death as death, but as a mere change of existence. The man is somewhere still. The human mind cannot picture its own non-existence, and this inability forms one of the foundation stones of the whole doctrine of immortality. But our difficulty in thinking a thing as true is a very long way off demonstrating it to be false.

For the rest, the Bishop of Down is just full of the usual "ifs," which, like a true theologian, he takes as the equivalent of demonstrated truth. If there is a good God, if human beings are the special objects of his care, etc., etc., it is impossible to believe that he will let them perish. Well, but God—if there be a God—does neglect his children. And if he neglects them now, there seems no reason why he should not go on neglecting them to the end. It is, of course, admirable to think the best of people, even of God; and so one may hope that—if there is a God—he will behave himself better in the future than he has done in the past. But his past record does not provide very strong ground for such a belief. The Bishop asks the unbeliever, "What about the wrongs that are never righted, the sorrows that are never assuaged, the tears that are never wiped away?" etc. Exactly; what about them? This is not a question that Christians should put to Freethinkers; it is one that Freethinkers should put to Christians. It is their God that made the world; he made it so that things run in an unsatisfactory way; and then his worshipers argue that there must be another life because the Divine Creator has so badly bungled this one. And this is their great argument for another life—the fact that God has arranged this one badly. Of course, the belief gives God one more chance to redeem his reputation. But suppose the next world—if there be a next world—is as bad or worse than this one. What then? It is at least possible. The Creator who bungled once may bungle twice. God is the only one who gets credit for good work in the future because the samples already supplied are admittedly unsatisfactory.

Rev. Alfred Barff, vicar of St. Giles, Cripplegate, London E.C., fell in getting out of a train at Hammersmith, on Christmas Day. He struck his head and never regained consciousness, dying at the West London Hospital. The Bishop of London called to see Mr. Barff who was a personal friend of his, but the unfortunate gentleman had already expired. The Bishop offered a prayer in the ward, however, but what good it did is not ascertainable. Somebody, perhaps, will inform us how the hand of "Providence" is to be traced in this sad incident.

Nearly 25,000 persons have formally seceded from the National Protestant Church in Berlin during December. The Church authorities are at their wits' end how to deal with the movement. All they can think of at present is to get the police to stop public meetings against the Church.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton is getting tiresome in his assumed rôle of defender of the faith. In the current issue of Nash's Magazine he girds at the Higher Critics, and suggests that these gentlemen are incomprehensible. They are not nearly so incomprehensible as the faith they try to explain.

Mr. G. S. Street has been appointed censor of plays in the place of the late Mr. Charles Brookfield. A brilliant critic, he is austere in his use of language, and has been described wittily as "the Street which is called straight."

The Bishop of Carlisle has expressed his astonishment at London fashions. Laymen have been more astonished for centuries at the fashions of parsons. It was John Stuart Mill who declared that he would not say that every bishop was an impostor, but every bishop looked like one.

"Minister as Fire Fighter" is a bright headline in a contemporary. That sub-editor was asleep, for that is exactly what parsons are paid for.

A new society for the encouragement of pure English, both written and spoken, has been formed. Christian Evidence lecturers kindly note.

Mr. James Bryce has been lamenting the decline of a knowledge of the Bible amongst all classes of the population. The same thing, he says, is observable in the United States, from which country he has just returned. He also asserts that the loss of knowledge of the Bible—if only from the standpoint of education—would be an incalculable loss to the country. We see no reason why there should be an absence of knowledge of the Bible, nor do we believe that this will occur. But it is a very different thing to have a knowledge of the Bible as a part of the world's literature in a special direction, and giving the Bible a place in education above all other books, and to which it is certainly not entitled. The Bible was given the supreme place at a time when the Christian religion dominated everything. But it was inevitable that, with the growth of a more rational view of life, other interests should arise and receive attention. All this talk about the supreme value of the Bible in education is pure nonsense. It is no more indispensable than is the Koran. It has its place in a complete education, just as the Koran has; and from this point of view it will always receive attention. Freethinkers have not the slightest desire to prevent the Bible exercising any legitimate influence it may possess. But they do object to it being given a fictitious importance, and other things woefully neglected, in order that this fictitious importance may be maintained.

The Christian world, or at least the English part of it, makes the most of anything in the writings of eminent men that can be twisted, by hook or crook, into lending some sort of sanction to their doctrines. The Rev. Dr. Warschauer played this little game for all it was worth, in his debate with us at the Caxton Hall. He must have known if he had read Dr. Russel Wallace's writings, even with the care he devoted to the morning newspaper, that the great biologist's views on the subject of religion were as much like his as cheese is like chalk. Nevertheless, he put Dr. Wallace forward as a sort of champion of orthodox Theism. The fact was even concealed that Dr. Wallace was avowedly not a Christian. The honesty of this proceeding is, of course, only what might be expected from any practitioner of the art of priestcraft. But it is a useful thing to draw attention to the mala fides of practically all the members of this profession—which begins in ignorance, continues through mystery, and ends in fraud. We suggest, therefore, that Dr. Warschauer and the rest of his fraternity might exercise their great intellects in dealing with a startling statement of Dr. Wallace's which was published not very long before his death. It runs as follows:—

> "I have come to the general conclusion that there has been no advance either in intellect or morals since the days of the earliest Egyptians. Everything is as bad it possibly can be. There exist in our midst horrors and dreadful diseases never known before. Our whole social environment is rotten, full of vice and everything that is bad."

What a terrible result of nearly two thousand years of "Christian" civilisation. We say "Christian" advisedly. It is the simple truth. Christianity has been the dominating power. It has been so at every point—from the coronation of kings and queens down to the laws of Sunday observance. Only Christians—and in England only Churchmen—could go to a university. Since that state of things was altered national education has come in, and Christian religious teaching exists in elementary schools at public expense and under public authority. It is perfectly true, then, that Christianity still controls education—as it really controls almost everything else. And the result is—well, we need not repeat Dr. Wallace's indictment. "Call you that backing of your friends?"

Dr. Wallace's estate was of the gross value of £5,823, the net personality being £2,884. Put the savings of a lifetime (only ten years short of a century) against the Archbishop of Canterbury's £15,000 a year, or some of the big fortunes left by Church parsons! Science is not as grasping as theology.

Rev. John Clough Williams Ellis, Glasfryn Llabgybi, Carnarvon, left £41,989. Dr. Wallace was quite a poor devil compared with this wealthy man of God.

Rev. William Smith, Edge-lane, Liverpool, left only £9,968. But even he throws Dr. Wallace into the shade.

Here is another poor Christian. Rev. Prebendary James Fraser, of Chichester, left £16,160. How will he get through the needle's eye?

The Rev. R. J. Campbell receives almost as much advertisement in the public press as Saint Bernard Shaw. Only the other day a paragraph announced that the pastor of the City Temple was a grandfather. But why did one newspaper writer head it "The Campbells are Coming"?

The special new year's number of the Daily News opened with a characteristic article by Mr. Bernard Shaw on "The Peace of Europe"—obviously written for the public entertainment. We wish Mr. Shaw could be more serious. War itself is a very serious thing. It is an ill-subject for jesting. It often occurs to us that many professed friends of peace do not realise the horrors of war. Mr. Shaw appears to us to be one of them. He is capable of writing ably and vehemently against wrong and wrong-doers, but we feel the lack of sympathy and imagination. There is cleverness and logic, but little of what is not inaptly called "human nature." Curiously enough, the same number of the Daily News contains a report from Mr. William Willard Howard, of New York, who had just arrived at Paris in returning from his visit of investigation to Albania. The Balkan war is supposed to be over. But this only means the Great Powers cry "Peace" loud enough to drown the cries of strife. He reports as follows:—

> "Mr. Howard said that civil war was imminent between the forces of Essad Pasha and those of Ismail Kemal Bey, President of the Provisional Government of Albania.
> "Great distress, he also declares, exists in Northern and Middle Albania. During the past ten weeks 100 Albanian villages have been destroyed by Servian troops; 12,000 houses burned; 4,000 men, women, and children killed or burned to death; more than 100,000 made homeless. Of this number, Mr. Howard estimates that 30,000 will starve and freeze to death."

This horrible state of things should be put an end to at once. The great Christian Powers could do it. They are like Mr. Shaw in one thing,—they are not in earnest.

There is only one way to be good, and that is to do good. We venture to say that one practical resolution of the European Powers to terminate the Albanian tragedy would do more for international peace than all the books written and all the meetings held in its favor from one end of Europe to the other. The logic of peace won't save us from war; only the love of peace will save us from it. And love, like every other emotion, strengthens with exercise. A real act of kindness by the European Powers to a gallant but hopeless people would soften the heart of the western world in a way that nothing else could do. And it is to the development of moral qualities that we must chiefly look to stop the barbarities of war. One does not keep one's hands from one's neighbor's throat because one believes one would gain more by letting him live in peace and comfort. One abstains from attacking him out of respect for his right to life and liberty, and out of sympathy with him as a brother man and a fellow-citizen.

American statesmen seem more ignorant, ill-mannered, and silly than our own—when it comes to anything outside politics, and especially when it comes to religion. Most of our readers will remember Roosevelt's description of Thomas Paine as a "filthy little Atheist"—which we branded as "three lies in three words." Paine was not "filthy" but a remarkably clean and well-dressed gentleman until he was rendered helpless by a painful bodily affliction. Paine was not "little" but five feet ten inches high; that is, several inches taller than Roosevelt. Paine was not an "Atheist"—in fact, he wrote eloquently against Atheism. It follows, therefore, that Roosevelt deserves to be called a "filthy little liar" much more than Paine deserved to be called a "filthy little Atheist." Yet this vulgar libeller has been President of the United States of America, and wants to be so again.

Roosevelt has frequently been asked to justify or withdraw his printed description of Paine. But he never answers. He takes no notice. He stands upon his dignity. And what that is worth is obvious to anybody who takes a fair look at him.

Roosevelt has just published his Autobiography. We cannot afford time to go through it. One or other of our readers may be blessed with greater leisure. It would be interesting, in its way, to know whether "Teddy" shows any repentance for his abominable lies about a far better man than himself.

Bryan is another U.S.A. statesman. His party are now in power, but they won't have him as President. Still, he has a minor office, and is well paid for it, but he eks out his salary with some public lecturing, his idea being that a good Christian like himself cannot possibly live on less than £4,000 a year. Bryan is not to our knowledge a libeller of "unbelievers" except in a general way. He has always been fond of preaching—even when he is supposed to be lecturing; and it is sad to say that his pious platitudes are accepted by "believers" as grand oratory. His mental calibre is of the very lowest. He is reported to have lately given a "crushing" answer to Atheism. It takes the form of a question: "How does a red cow, fed on green grass, produce white milk?" The way to answer some questions is to propose another. We submit the following: "How does Infinite Wisdom produce so many Bryans?"

"More than 2,000 persons work in Somerset House, and not a soul sleeps on the premises," the Daily Express informs us. What terrible Materliasts there are in London.

There were 2,285 novels published during 1913; but no work of fiction approached the circulation of the Bible. Nor were all the books together so outspoken on sex matters as the sacred volume.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, January 11, Queen's (Minor) Hall, London, W.; 7.30, "Mr. McKenna and Prisoners for Blasphemy."

To Correspondents.

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings, and new year's good wishes to "al connected with the splendid Freethinker."

A. Baidoks.—Thanks, but the Esperanto writer is not very witty; the thing were better left to imagination.

J. M. Gibson, J. T. Griffiths, L. Gumbs, and Others.—1914 acknowledgments will be started a little later on.

J. Ellison.—Always glad to see wives joining husbands in salutes and good wishes to the Freethinker.

W. P. Ball.—Thanks again for useful cuttings.

Sydney Smith (Canada).—Passed on to our shop manager.

E. Norwood.—We have more than once stated that, except as printer and publisher, Charles Watts's share in the Heroes and Martyrs of Freethought was confined to the title page. Mr Foote wrote every word of the book, and also of several numbers that were issued after the publication of the bound volume. There was some idea of Watts's co-operating at the outset, but it never approached to realisation. This is obvious to any judge of composition. It is not a question of good or bad, but of individual style.

H. Black.—See paragraph. Thanks.

W. C. T. J.—Stupid Christians, who invented the "watch story," charged Bradlaugh and other Freethought leaders with blasphemously giving God five minutes to prove his existence by striking them dead on the public platform. Now your Christian daughter wants to know why they don't use that argument. It is no argument at all. The result would prove nothing either way. Surely she has sense enough to see that.

R. C.—The report of a funeral on December 30 ought to reach us before January 6 (Tuesday!).

When the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

Lecture Notices must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Orders for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

The Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Tickets (4s. each) are now on sale for the London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner at Frascati's on Wednesday evening, January 28. Mr. Foote presides, and the toast list includes many well-known London speakers. Mr. Cohen and Mr. Lloyd, of course, will be present.

Frascati's will not be able to accommodate more than two hundred diners on this occasion. Those who want to be absolutely sure of tickets should therefore purchase them early. They can be obtained of Miss Vance, N. S. S. secretary, 2 Newcastle-street, E.C., or at the Pioneer Press shop at the same address.

The Annual Circular re the President's Honorarium Fund will not be sent out until the end of the month, after the Annual Dinner. Mr. Foote will also have something to say on the subject. Meanwhile, subscriptions that arrive for 1914 (and they are coming in already) will be acknowledged privately—and held over otherwise until the first list is published.

Our good friend and highly valued colleague, though so distant in space—Mr. George Macdonald, editor of the New York Truthseeker—has been expending some of his humorous criticism on a suggestion of the veteran J. E. Remsburg's. The said suggestion is as follows:—

> "Freethought needs something to arouse it to a greater activity, and if the imprisonment or hanging of an Infidel editor will effect it, I know you are willing to be used as a sacrificial offering."

Mr. Macdonald retorts, with perfect good humor, that his old friend Remsburg should speak for himself on a subject like this. "Whenever have we," he asks, "shown any such recklessness of life and liberty as would justify a conclusion like that?" And why expect that the imprisonment or even the hanging of an Infidel editor would stir up a lot of so-called Freethinkers? All that could reasonably be expected of them, in view of their monotonous stagnancy, is that "they would submit the whole matter to the jurisdiction of evolution and the judgment of posterity." These people are "gifted with absolute self-possession; nothing rattles them." Mr. Macdonald most positively declines, if he is left any choice in the matter, to play the part of a scape-goat in "the vain hope of waking them up." He thinks he ought to require an assurance that at least one inactive Freethinker would open his mouth, the day after the hanging "without saying that the religious issue is settled." We confess that we agree with him in this matter. Those who yearn for martyrdom should be allowed to seek it—and enjoy it. But others should be equally free to adopt the attitude of the old lady who had an ill-selected portion of Scripture read to her by a district visitor. It had reference to painful exercise of the teeth by the inhabitants of hell, and the old lady remarked, with a mixture of indignation and reassurance, that it didn't apply to her. "Let them gnash 'em as has 'em," she exclaimed.

> "Mr. McKenna and the Blasphemy Laws.
> "The sentence of four months' imprisonment for blasphemy passed by Mr. Justice Coleridge at the Stafford Assizes on Thomas William Stewart was difficult to defend in any case; and to that extent Mr. McKenna is to be pardoned for his failure to defend it successfully. But his reply to the petition for the reduction of the sentence not only fails as a defence of the Blasphemy Laws but does something much worse. It leaves it to be inferred that at any rate a certain type of offender who happens to be unpopular may be punished in the last resort not for any offence of which he may have been found guilty, but for actions or speeches of which he has been definitely acquitted or which are not illegal at all. All the suggestions which Mr. McKenna advances in defence of the imprisonment of Stewart belong to one of these two classes. He was tried and acquitted on the charge of publishing an indecent pamphlet, and it is most improper that this particular charge should now be brought up against him by the Home Secretary himself to palliate the sentence passed upon him on another count. Other alleged offences imputed to him by Mr. McKenna are not legal offences at all; it is not a crime to preach Malthusianism or to sell the appliances which Stewart is stated to have sold. As to the actual indictment, it is manifest that it is almost impossible to attack the fundamentals of Christianity without, in Mr. Justice Coleridge's words, 'ridiculing, outraging, and scandalising the feelings' of devout Christians. Much that Stewart said seems to have been mere vulgar nonsense; he is most probably weak-minded That is no reason why the administration of the law shoul be so too, or why the public generally should be exposed t the perils which leap to the eye if Mr. McKenna's letter is t be allowed to pass unchallenged."

This protest will, of course, have no effect on Mr. McKenna. On a matter like this he is backed by the Christian bigots of all parties, and they are an overwhelming multitude.

It may almost go without saying that the Star had a good article on the "blasphemy" case. We are glad to see that "Sub Rosa" devoted his column in the Daily News on Tuesday to the same case. His treatment of the matter was eminently satisfactory from beginning to end. He calls for the "repeal" of "the stupid law."

The Inquirer's leaderette on the Stewart case is as follows:—

> "The Home Secretary has refused to interfere with the sentence passed recently on Mr. T. W. Stewart for blasphemy. We should like to have some explanation of his reasons. The petition to which we referred last week was one of great weight. It was not the expression of popular clamor or of sentimental pity for a man who has received a severe sentence, but of the clear convictions of a large body of men who represent much that is finest in the intellectual and religious life of the country. No one will suspect them of sympathy with obscene or disgusting language. It is a case in which a natural feeling of distaste for the whole subject has not been allowed to interfere with the high demands of freedom and equity. It is clear that the matter cannot be allowed to rest where it is. The next step must be taken in the House of Commons."

With regard to the last sentence we have something to say in our own article this week.

In another paragraph the Inquirer speaks of 1883 as "the date of the famous Bradlaugh prosecution." What a peculiar reluctance some people have to mentioning Mr. Foote! The real explanation, of course, is that Bradlaugh is dea and cannot profit from any compliment or courtesy. Very little of either was shown to him when he was living—not even by Unitarians. The story of the Freethinker prosecution and imprisonment has been out of print for many years. One of our publishing ventures in the new year, and as early as possible, will be a new edition. It is positively necessary to prevent misunderstandings and misrepresentations.

Professor Geldart's letter in the Manchester Guardian contains the following passage:—

> "This recrudescence of prosecutions for blasphemy is an extremely disquieting symptom. It suggests that there is a diminution in the public, or at any rate in the official, mind of the value set upon fredom of speech, and that the police believe that their efforts to secure convictions for blasphemy will be viewed with favor."

We have been saying this all along. The more "blasphemy" prosecutions we have the more we shall get. Going to prison is not the shortest cut to the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws; keeping out of prison is the shortest cut; that is to say, by making it difficult or impossible for the bigots to obtain convictions. The real fight is in the court before the judge and jury. Everything else is only auxiliary.

A further article on the "blasphemy" case appeared in the Manchester Guardian on Friday, January 2, under the heading of "Mr. McKenna's Strange Letter"—which is described as "mischievous." "The question," it says, "after Mr. McKenna's letter, cannot be allowed to remain where it is. We look confidently for further explanation from him, and not only for explanation but for action, too."

Mr. George Greenwood, M.P., who has been out of the advanced fighting line for some time in consequence of a surgical operation, and is still awaiting another when the doctors give the word, was not able to refrain from writing to the Daily News on the Stewart case. Mr. Greenwood, who is a lawyer himself, says he has read a full report of Stewart's trial. "And I found," he continues, "that he had used language very foolish and vulgar and in very bad taste, but that he had said nothing which, in my judgment, having regard to the best interests of the community, ought to have subjected him to a single day's imprisonment." Mr. Greenwood asks "where is our boasted freedom of speech?" and what of our boasted Liberalism?" Echo answers "what?"

Last week's Reynolds' contained the following leaderette:

"Poor Mr. McKenna.

> "Really we are almost inclined to pity Mr. McKenna. He has an unfortunate genius for saying the wrong thing. If he had simply refused to interfere with the sentence of four months' imprisonment passed upon T. W. Stewart for blasphemy he would have disappointed many Liberals. But he goes out of his way to add to his refusal a statement of his reasons which are quite irreconcilable with any idea of justice. Stewart must serve his sentence for blasphemy because, in addition to blasphemy, he was charged with indecency (of which he was acquitted) and because he sold appliances for the limitation of families, which is not a legal offence. He has placed himself in an absurd position from which he had better withdraw as quickly as possible."

Mr. McKenna won't withdraw. But the rest of this leaderette is very good.

There are so many demands for photographs and mementoes of the late Charles Bradlaugh that Freethinkers will be glad to know that a unique statuette of the great Freethought leader is now obtainable. The original and only existing bust, modelled by the sculptor Burvill in 1881, is in the possession of Mr. Victor Roger, who has permitted a model to be taken and to become the exclusive property f the N. S. S. Mr. Thos. Judge, a member of the N. S. S. Executive, and a professional modeller, is supplying the statuette as a labor of love, at the bare cost of material. Mr. Foote is also kindly giving the statuette a gratuitous advertisement in these columns, and it can be seen at the offices of the Pioneer Press at 2 Newcastle-street, E.C.

The January English Review is well up to the mark. Mr. Aleister Crowley provides the opening poetry, which is a feature of this periodical. He is certainly a poet, but many people, unused to his symbolism, will probably find him none too intelligible. Mr. Gosse's paper on Laurence Sterne is both laudatory and discriminative. Mr. Ernest Newman has an excellent article on The Piano-Player and the Music of the Future. The editor's article on the State and the Family should arrest attention. Among the rest of the contents is a brief, bright, satirical article on the dinner given to M. Anatole France.

Natural Atheists.

CHRISTIAN conduct is a wonderfully made coat of many colors. In the various lights and shades of life it assumes many peculiar shapes, many strange assortments of color. To the Freethinker, whose sensitivenesses are easily aroused, it affords an all-round experience in human emotions. Let his enthusiasm for the cause be never so little, he need not search for uncommon mental experiences beyond the limits of his own restricted sphere. Close at hand he will discover, in Christian conduct, sufficient incentives to give his mind a taste of nearly every emotion that has swayed mankind from its earliest dawnings of mentality. Cynicism, amusement, anger, hate, revulsion, fascination, wonderment, amazement, hopelessness, will all crowd upon him, like little multi-colored angels, from this coat of many colors. And in every mental state he passes through laughter and wrath will struggle hard for supremacy. Christian conduct has its funny side, but it has also its serious side; and the Freethinker will often be at a loss to determine which is the stronger.

Some time ago I had a good opportunity to indulge in this weakness of mine for studying the Christian's wonderful ethical arrayment. Congregations of people go under many names. This one was called "a party."

Everyone was in the merriest of moods. Laughter was the reigning sovereign, and drew great tribute from all present. The room was large enough both for dancing and the usual party games; and old people and young people were carried away on the wings of happiness into that unnamed country where we are our real selves.

Sometimes, in private argumentation with our friends, we are met with great astonishment when we say that man, regarded homogenically, is naturally good. So accustomed are they to dwell on individual trivialities that their minds cannot comprehend Humanity as an entity apart, and yet inseparable from the unit. They shake their heads dubiously when we suggest that Humanity survives because it is innately good; if it were inherently corrupt it would perish. They are too concerned with the personality of life to fathom the deeper and grander truths latent in the impersonal Humanity. Surrounded, as they think, by innumerable petty faults and failings, feeling their own weaknesses perhaps, their own tendencies to deceit and dishonesty in many paltry ways, they conclude that the shortcomings predominate over the virtues. When we base our endeavors at social regeneration upon our conviction of man's soundness of nature, nearly invariably they tell us our experience of life must have been miraculously pleasant. They wish their outlook could be so optimistic; but they have all passed through the hards, toiled through disillusionment and despair, tasted the bitterness of human misdemeanor, and they know what life is; our ideas are filmy filagrees of theory, dreams that stand us in no good stead when we are assailed by adversity; which is untrue.

How much is Christianity responsible for this attitude? Mankind required a savior. To predicate a savior entailed a notion that man was bad, so bad that he could not save himself from his own degradation. In the process of salvation the individual casts aside his nature, becoming born again, as it were, with a totally different "heart," into a completely different life. But man was naturally evil. His real nature was bad. He could only achieve redemption by being saved through something absolutely foreign to him, something over which he had no control, but that could elevate him from his old and natural self into a new and unnatural self.

Christianity's keystone is man's vility; and in the face of that fact it seems a pitiable display of contradictoriness on the part of our pastors to exude so much puerility regarding moral impurity. Consistently has Christianity taught that Humanity was evil in the very heart of it; and so strongly emphasised has the teaching been that some of our friends, whom we know to be as near the hall-mark of human perfection as one could wish, will gravely inform us that the love of God alone keeps them from sin. Religion has built in their minds the idea of the necessity of a savior, with all its correlations, and with all its socially disastrous results.

It is extremely difficult for them to understand that the existence, the survival, of Humanity depends upon the high level of its morality; and that, if this be true, it disposes of the need of an unnatural savior. Disposing of a savior, you logically annul Christianity. Discovering that Humanity is naturally inclined to goodness, you discover also the falseness of the teachings of Christianity. But the Christian idea rises up in the minds of our friends to confuse these plain truths, to fill the path with obstacles.

When we say that the impregnation of religious falsehood into the communal mind has been socially disastrous, we mean that the upward social movement has been, and is being, seriously handicapped by Christianity.

Had religion retained its mediæval power, very probably Europe would have lapsed into savagery. Against the restricting influences of religion the forces of civilisation have fought, sometimes openly, when great minds came to suffer for their championship of the natural; often quietly, silently, in the unwritten lives of little people, when the demands of the commonplace relegated the claims of religion, for the time being, to the Never-Never Land. These forces of civilisation have kept the level of human goodness intact, proving themselves as strong as, if not stronger than, their enemy. Over the ordinary happenings of the ordinary day the power of religion has gradually lessened; but, some of us think, if the religious idea of man's natural evilness were assailed as it ought to be, the plane of national morality would be an inclined one, tending more and more to a wider angle as religion disappeared and reason came into its own.

These disconnected, fragmentary thoughts passed through my mind as I sat in the garden in the starlight, while the others kept laughter reigning merrily in the room. For them all the little worries and grievances and anxieties of ordinary life, the irritations that arise, so many of them, from our irrational manner of living, and upon which religion feeds, were forgotten. For a few hours these people were living their real selves. No one even dreamed of inflicting the least hardship upon the other. The welfare of each was the unconscious endeavor of all. Happiness gave the gathering a communistic character. In the absence of all the conflictions that spring from the cutting of life from a hideous slab of leaden necessity, they were good friends. If evil were the unconquerable element in man's nature, as religionists din into our ears, it was strange that these people betrayed no deliberate and painful attempt to subdue it. Evil, in fact, had fallen into so profound a slumber that one might have said, quite justifiably, that it was dead. My friends were living their real, unfettered, happy, natural selves. More strangely interesting still: sleeping side by side with evil, was religion.

Naturally these friends of mine were Atheists: they were living without the least recognition of God. Happiness had banished an idea enforced upon their minds by environment. Had I entered the room and rudely interrupted the merriment by drawing their attention to this, I should have cast the whole party into a fit of the blues.

Decidedly religion is a socially dangerous thing. When it stalks upon the stage there comes with it an unnaturalness that proclaims its antihuman character. People lose their real selves. Their attitudes are stiff; their manners are strained; their deference is forced; their words ring hollow. Everything partakes of unreality. Religion, even despite the habituality of it, brings an unintrinsic element in its train. To the acute observer the operations of this intruder are always visible. To Christians, even those whose minds are particularly susceptible to the influences of religion, the presence of the foreign spy is equally and similarly evident.

In their attempts to harmonise an instinctive feeling of repulsion—for, after all, the word most truthfully describes their feeling—with their beliefs, they find refuge in the delusion of sacredness. This sacredness casts a holy glow over themselves and their environment; it coats their objection with religious sugar. But the intruder does not settle itself comfortably in a moment. It does not enter and instantaneously eject the previous resident. A gradual, if sometimes speedy, process takes place; and, ultimately, the mind, having first resigned itself to the inevitability of the heavenly spy's determination to abide for a time, loses its repulsion. Custom and training assert their power; the mind bows itself humbly; and, if the circumstances are not too awfully embarrassing, it imagines itself in the presence of God.

I returned to the room to rejoin the merrymakers, to assist my Christian friends to forget God; and in my mind were the thoughts that the coming of happiness meant the going of God; and that, some day, Freethought would be hailed as one of the greatest influences in making the way to happiness safe.

ROBERT MORELAND.

Seeking the Light.

I.

WE met in one of the loveliest parks in South London—and there are many; but the one which, I think, in the summer-time, is the most picturesque and beautiful of them all, viz., Peckham Rye Park, with its old English gardens, its shady nooks, its glorious avenue of trees, its beautiful flowers. We met after many years, two old schoolfellows, and we sat beneath an old oak tree and talked of the happy days we spent at the dear old school in Tooley-street, then known as Queen Elizabeth's Grammar School, but now known throughout the length and breadth of the land as "St. Olaves."

II.

We had both been brought up as Christians, and attended Sunday-school and church with unerring regularity in our youth. When we started to earn our living I went into the commercial world, and my friend did likewise. Neither of us were very successful, and my friend went into the Army, but I continued in the commercial world, going from occupation to occupation, until I finally landed in a berth that seems likely to last until I give up the regular pursuit of earning an income altogether.

III.

Many years elapsed before I met my friend again. He had had a most adventurous career—had fought in two wars, and had come out of both encounters unscathed. When we met in the Park, we fell into talking of old times. While he had been away he had heard, from a very reliable source, that I had joined "the wicked infidels." At first he could not realise how I could have taken such a step; he knew how earnest I had been in my early belief, and he could not understand what motive could have induced me to give up a belief in which I was trained from my childhood. But while he was away in South Africa he heard of the name of Charles Bradlaugh and read of his great parliamentary struggles. Then his interest was awakened. This Charles Bradlaugh, he said, was the famous Freethinker, and his old friend and schoolfellow was one of his disciples. Bradlaugh was a disbeliever in the Bible, and, what seemed to my friend at that time a great deal worse, "an Atheist." And so my friend thought he would look into the Bible to see what was the matter with it, and see what great men like Bradlaugh, and earnest, intelligent men like his old schoolfellow, could find in it to upset their early belief. And light came before many years. One of the young sergeants in the same regiment as my friend had some of the works of Ingersoll sent out to him; my friend borrowed them, and read diligently.

What a revelation to be sure! The Bible, then, was not God's Word at all: it was the word of man—in short, it expressed only the primitive ideas of our early ancestors. But, thought my friend, "if the Old Testament is unscientific in its statements, if it cannot be relied upon in its history or its morality, how stands the New Testament—is that any more reliable than the Old?"

A year or two later my friend, while still in South Africa, received some more pamphlets from the old country. He read Ingersoll's pamphlet on What Must I Do to be Saved? and then he began to get some larger works, such as Samuel Laing's Modern Science and Modern Thought, and these helped very much in dispelling the old superstitions that had found a place in his young mind in the old country. Two or three years later my friend went to India, and subsequently to China, and learned something of other great religions that not only had a larger number of adherents than all the sects of Christians put together; but some of them, like Brahminism, Buddhism, and Confucianism, were more ancient than any form of Christianity.

IV.

As we sat under the shadow of the glorious oak, my friend at length observed: "How different our meeting would have been if either of us had remained a Christian. We should probably have exchanged greetings; but if I had known that you were a Freethinker, while I was a Christian, I should have tried to be friendly, but I should have felt all the while that you were a person to be avoided, and that the very air would have been polluted with your infidel expressions, and that I should have run the risk of contamination. But now we can both speak with perfect freedom. I can show you my thoughts on any subject without reservation. That is a great gain, is it not?"

"It is indeed," I replied; "and that is the condition of mind I have been trying to bring about all my career as a Freethought advocate. Freethought purifies the atmosphere. A man who has once become a Freethinker could never again live in an atmosphere of superstition."

"What was your first step towards intellectual freedom?" my friend inquired.

"The first book I read on the subject was Thomas Paine's Age of Reason. That convinced me that Christianity was not true. You see, I have always had a logical turn of mind, if I may say so; and when Thomas Paine demonstrated to me that the story of the Fall of Man in Genesis was purely legendary and absurd, I saw at once that if the first Adam did not fall, there was no necessity for the atonement by the second Adam."

"That destroyed the whole scheme at one stroke?"

"But I was not satisfied to remain there. I wanted to know something of the origin and development of man from the point of view of science. I studied Darwin and Haeckel and a large number of other writers who had written on the subject, and I became convinced of the truth of the doctrine of evolution. That gave me a firm platform to stand upon, and, as a propagandist I did my best to popularise the facts upon which the great doctrine rests."

"Ah, but," said my friend, "do you not believe that there was some such person as Jesus Christ—a good man who went about doing good—and who was betrayed by one of his disciples, condemned for sedition or blasphemy, and crucified?"

"No, I am satisfied that no such person as the Jesus of the Gospels ever lived—that the character is purely mythical. That is, I do not believe that there ever was a Jesus who was born of a Virgin, whose date and place of birth are doubtful; a Jesus who fed five thousand hungry people on five loaves and two small fishes, who made the lame to walk, the deaf to hear, and the dead to come out of the grave at his command, who was crucified and rose again from the dead. No, I do not believe that there ever was such a person as the Jesus of the Gospels, and no other Jesus concerns me. There may have been hundreds of other men named Jesus (it is merely Joshua, you know) among the Jews in the early centuries of the Christian era, but I am convinced that there never was one who was capable of performing the wonders attributed to the Jesus of the Gospels, and that is enough for me."

"I am glad to hear you upon that point," said my friend, "because that is a point upon which so many persons get confused. That, however, is because they know nothing about the gods of other religions. They have probably neither heard of, nor seen, representations of the Vedic virgin Indranee, wife-mother of the savior-god Indra; nor of the Hindu god Vishnu, nursed by his virgin wife-mother Takshmi; of Devaki and Christna; or the Hindu god Siva, nursed by his virgin wife-mother, Parvati; and numerous other gods alleged to have been born of virgins."

"Quite so. And I may as well tell you that all these virgin births, and many others, are mentioned by Dr. Harwicke in his very rare and valuable work on Evolution and Creation. I have a copy which was presented to me by the author, which I value very much, and which I will show you when you pay me a visit."

"But what about the teachings of Jesus—what do you think of them?"

"I could not answer such a question in a few words. This, however, I can say, that I do not recognise any originality in the teachings of Jesus. A good deal of what he is alleged to have taught, especially in the Sermon on the Mount, had been taught by others hundreds of years before the alleged birth of Jesus. Recollect, I am not saying that some of the teachings of Jesus are not good, and some of them beautifully expressed; but I do say that many of them are absolutely impracticable, and some of them positively pernicious, and I do not think that one ought to be able to say with truth such a thing of the teachings of one who claimed to be one with God."

"No, I cannot agree with you altogether on that," said my friend, "because the Jesus of the Gospels appears to me to have been a very fine character and a bit of a Freethinker in his way."

"Well, I was not discussing his character—which I have said I regard as mythical—so much as his teachings, and it was to some of those that I found exception. But, never mind, we will discuss these questions at greater length when next we meet. And now let us walk through the park. It contains some spots of rare beauty. Let us walk over this rustic bridge, and then through this shady wood, to the old English gardens, and then through the main avenue of trees to the cricket grounds. We shall probably see some sport. In any case, I am glad that we have met after all these years; and I am still more glad that you are 'seeking the light,' and that you have cleared your mind of many an old superstition. Get on, my friend, in the path you are pursuing; persevere, there is a great deal for us all to learn; we can help one another. What do you think of the park? Is it not charming? Well, till we meet again, good-bye."

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

He gazed around the cheerful and comfortable-looking apartments; then, addressing the widow, he said: "Your husband's been dead over a year now?" "Yes," she answered, with a sigh; "over a year." "I remember reading his obituary," he said, "and I thought it contained a misstatement of facts." "A misstatement of facts?" "Yes; it said he had gone to a better home. In my opinion, it would be impossible for him to find a more cheerful, more comfortable, and, with you in it, a more charming and desirable home than this." The widow smiled sweetly, then he was accepted.

Some Little-Known Freethinkers.

XI.—HENRY HETHERINGTON.

How many of those who enjoy the benefit of a cheap press know anything of the labors, dangers, and sufferings of those who made the cheap press possible? Not least among these must be counted the name of Henry Hetherington. Born in Compton-street, Soho, in 1792, he was apprenticed to Hansard, the parliamentary printer. He was one of the most energetic working men engaged with Dr. Birkbeck in establishing the Mechanics' Institution in London. In 1830 he drew up a "Circular for the Formation of Trade Unions," which formed the basis of the "National Union of the Working Classes," and led eventually to Chartism. On July 9, 1831, he first issued from his house in Kingsgate-street, Holborn, the Poor Man's Guardian, price one penny. On the title appeared the words, "Established contrary to the 'Law,' to try the power of 'Right' against 'Might.'" In place of the Government fourpenny stamp was a picture of a printing press, with the words, "Liberty of the Press," "Knowledge is Power." The Poor Man's Guardian was issued to fight the Battle of the Unstamped. It consisted of but eight small quarto pages; yet, immediately on its appearance, obtained a circulation of 50,000 copies, and when prosecution began it run up to double that number.

Only those who know the tyrannical censorship exercised over the newspaper press when it first became an influence in this country can rightly estimate the work of men like Carlile, Watson, and Hetherington in establishing for us a cheap and free press. Little more than a century ago publishers of papers were fined and imprisoned whenever they as much as mentioned the name of a peer of the realm. Press prosecutions were numerous. Hardly any paper ventured to exercise independent judgment. Anything and everything relating to politics or religion was at the mercy of the Attorney-General, who had the power of summary arrest for seditious or blasphemous libel. As the demand for newspapers increased the tax upon them was enhanced. In 1765 the newspaper stamp duty was three-halfpence; in 1789 it was raised to twopence, in 1797 to twopence half-penny, in 1804 to threepence, and in 1815 to fourpence. Here it remained until, through the agitation of Hetherington and his co-workers, it was in 1836 reduced to one penny, at which figure it remained until abolished by the exertions of men like Austin Holyoake and S. D. Collet in 1857.

Hetherington's Poor Man's Guardian was the chief instrument in the battle for the removal of taxes upon knowledge. It was the first penny newspaper in the country, and was followed by Cleave's Gazette and other unstamped papers. The general price of newspapers at that time was sevenpence. The first number of the Poor Man's Guardian coolly cited the law under which it was liable, and which it defied. Three convictions were soon obtained against Hetherington; but the Bow-street magistrates were unable to enforce their order for some time. With provoking coolness Hetherington sent them a note to say he was "going out of town," and went on a tour spreading the Poor Man's Guardian in the provinces. On returning to London to his mother, who was dying, he was dragged off to prison while knocking at his own door; and in prison he was kept for six months. Hibbert, Watson, Cleave, O'Brien, and others, saw that the Guardian with its outspoken policy was maintained, and as soon as Hetherington came out he was again directing affairs.

Mr. James Grant, in his work on the Newspaper Press (vol. ii., p. 302), says:—

> "Hetherington was in many respects a remarkable man. He was intelligent and clever, but it was in the qualities of determination and courage that he chiefly excelled. Nothing daunted him. He knew not what fear was. In the army he would have been a hero. Of all men in London at the time, he was just the man to fight the great battle of an Unstamped Press."

To courage he added resources. He evaded arrest by disguise. To distribute his paper dummy parcels were made up, duly labelled "Poor Man's Guardian," and sent off in one direction by persons instructed to make all the resistance they could to constables who seized them; while the real parcels were sent off by another exit. He got his friends to dress in his clothes, and again and again they were arrested in mistake for himself. In 1832 he was again convicted and imprisoned, together with his friend, James Watson, for six months. During the progress of the "unstamped" agitation fully five hundred persons were arrested for selling the Poor Man's Guardian. Their pertinacity gained the day in 1834.

The case came for trial before Lord Lyndhurst, who, says Mr. James Grant, was then a thorough Republican. In charging the jury he took up a copy of the Poor Man's Guardian, and, looking at it with an aspect of pity and contempt for its poor appearance, said, with a peculiar expression in his countenance, and no less peculiar in his tones: "Gentlemen of the jury, that is what they"—meaning the Government—"call a newspaper." All in the court then saw that the triumph of Hetherington, and the defeat of the Government, were certain. The jury returned a verdict that the Poor Man's Guardian was not a newspaper. No. 159 bore these words: "This paper, after sustaining a persecution of three years' and a half duration, in which upwards of five hundred persons were imprisoned for reading it, was declared in the Court of Exchequer to be a strictly legal publication."

The veteran William James Linton, in his Memoir of James Watson, has the following on Watson's friend, Hetherington:—

> "For four years he bore the brunt of the battle for a free press. Ever busy in the interest of his class during the Whig Reform ferment, he was among the most zealous as well as the wisest leaders of Chartism afterwards. A ready speaker, bold and fluent, passionate, sarcastic, or humorous on occasion (he had a spice of fun in him through all his trouble), he was deservedly popular in those days; and in the Chartist Convention of 1832 sat as delegate for Stockport and for London."

In 1840 Hetherington was arrested for selling Haslam's Letters to the Clergy. To test the impartiality of the law, some of Hetherington's friends commenced prosecutions against four high-class publishers—Moxon, Frazer, Richardson, and Saunders—for the publication of Queen Mab. The law was clear. Shelley's poem was a blasphemous libel, and, despite the eloquent defence of Serjeant Talfourd, Moxon was declared guilty. It remained for the prosecutors to call him up for judgment, which was never done, their object being merely to call attention to the state of the law, and to advertise Queen Mab. This course obtained for Hetherington the mildest sentence then given for blasphemous libel—four months' imprisonment. While in prison Hetherington wrote Cheap Salvation, a tract showing that all the advantages ascribed to religion could be retained, while dismissing priests and their theology. On coming out, Hetherington resumed Freethought publication, issuing the first translation of Strauss's Life of Jesus, The Existence of Christ Disproved, by a German Jew, A Few Hundred Bible Contradictions, A Hunt After the Devil and Other Odd Matters, by P. Lecount, tracts by Emma Martin, etc. He also devoted himself to the spread of Chartism and Socialism. He died August 24, 1849, leaving a will, signed shortly before his death, in which he says:—

> "I calmly and deliberately declare that I do not believe in the popular notion of the existence of an Almighty, Allwise, and Benevolent God, possessing intelligence, and conscious of his own operations, because these attributes involve such a mass of absurdities and contradictions, so much cruelty and injustice on his part to the poor and destitute portion of his creatures, that, in my opinion, no rational reflecting mind can, after disinterested investigation, give credence to the existence of such a Being."

He was buried in the unconsecrated portion of Kensal Green Cemetery, where lie the remains of many other worthy Freethinkers.

(The late) J. M. WHEELER.

Three of our "admirers" at Grahamstown, S. Africa—H. E. Griffiths, E. W. Stoyell, and D. H. Priest—have "taken the liberty" to send us a case of pines. "May the new year," our correspondents add, "bring you increased vigor for the cause you so splendidly champion is the wish of all three of us."

Mr. George Macdonald, of the New York Truthseeker, with some other "saints," has been trying to revive Freethought platform propaganda in "the empire city." A strong effort was made last winter, but it does not seem to have been very successful. The effort is renewed this winter, and we wish it every success. This is not a mere form of words. We mean all that the expression involves. We would much rather, though, that the wish were a hope. But a hope has to rest upon some certitude—and we confess that we see none in this case. It appears to us that the difficulties of regular platform propaganda in New York are nearly, if not quite, as insuperable as they are in London. Plenty of money, of course, would alter the aspect of affairs. If a fine central hall could be thrown open free on Sunday evenings, and a decent fee guaranteed to the lecturer or lecturers, the enterprise might succeed in all senses of the word in a few years. We throw this opinion out for what it is worth. We do not presume to instruct Mr. Macdonald and his colleagues in the problem of New York as New York. They know it a great deal better than we do. But we have had as much experience as anybody in the general problem of Freethought propaganda in big cities, and they will pardon what would otherwise be obtrusive advice on our part.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

That which violence wins for us to-day, another act of violence may wrest from us to-morrow.
—FRANCISCO FERRER.

Canon Horsley on Blasphemy.

CANON HORSLEY is, of course, a Christian gentleman. But this is an adjective which often spoils the substantive. We remember his look of disdainful astonishment, a good many years ago, when we told him at a public meeting that he knew nothing about prison life. His reply was meant to be withering. He informed us that he had been a prison chaplain for ever so long. "Yes," we said, "but you have been on the right side of the cell door. It is only the man on the wrong side of the cell door who knows what prison life is." He took the correction in very ill part. But the audience took the point against him, and their applause was disconcerting to the cocksure ecclesiastic.

We expected to see Canon Horsley joining in the Daily News correspondence on the Blasphemy Laws, and we were not disappointed. We have not joined in it ourselves, partly because we have at our command an organ in which we can say exactly what we mean, and partly because we have long given up courting the insolence of hireling journalists and Liberal newspapers. We could not depend on any letter of ours, on any subject whatever—even though it were one on which we might reasonably regard ourselves a specialist—being inserted in journals like the Daily News or the Daily Chronicle, or being inserted, if at all, without serious and calculated mutilation. From one point of view this is an honor. The President of the National Secular Society, the editor of the Freethinker, the ex-prisoner for "blasphemy," is quite naturally selected as an object for Christian malignity. To be hated and insulted by some persons is the price one has to pay for the affection and praise of others. In a certain sense, therefore, we are rather proud of our isolation; though the wish is natural that we might occasionally enjoy the pleasure of applying the whip to a bigoted fool, or a foolish bigot, in the very presence of the audience before whom he has perpetrated his capers. But all that is by the way. Our real subject is Canon Horsley's letter. Here it is without the alteration or omission of a single word except the formalities—which, by the way, is the Freethinker tradition:—

> "Does not Mr. Leon give his case away when he argues that 'Stewart is punished not for blasphemy, but for the way he did it; therefore, the Home Secretary should at once order his release'? A bigamist is punished not for marrying, but for the way in which he did it. A drunkard is in prison not for being drunk, but for being drunk to the annoyance of the public. A motorist (ought to be) in prison not for driving quickly, but for the way in which he did it. What public opinion, what code of laws, has ever allowed action or speed without any limit at all when such action or speed is to the annoyance or injury of the majority?
> "Some rationalist speeches or writings make me desire to reason amicably with the writers or speakers. Some others make me desire that 'some layman would express my feelings for me'—with his boot.
> J. W. HORSLEY."

Such is the wisdom, such is the logic, such is the good-nature, such is the toleration, of a high-placed Christian clergyman, who is at least old enough to have learnt that it is only vanity that makes a man demand special respect to be paid to what happen to be his opinions on religion—or any other subject.

Look at the confusion in the bigamy illustration. Each of the two marriages is a separate act—not the same act done in different ways. The first marriage is legal—it is a marriage; the second marriage is illegal—it has no validity at all, in other words it is not a marriage. It is simply a fraud. Canon Horsley's other illustrations might be disposed of just as easily. We agree that no one should be allowed to act to the injury of the public, though it is done every day of the week with perfect impunity—by the classes against the masses. But in the case of criminal prosecutions the "injury" should be clear and unquestionable; and no such injury was alleged in the Stewart case,—or, for the matter of that, in any former "blasphemy" case. In our own case, thirty years ago, it was alleged that we had acted "to the great displeasure of Almighty God," which no attempt was made to prove at the trial. When it comes to "annoyance" still greater care is necessary. Especially in matters of controversy. It is a sufficient annoyance to some people that you differ from them at all. They overlook what is an obvious fact, that precisely as much as you differ from them they differ from you; so that the fault or the impudence on the one side is exactly cancelled by the fault or the impudence on the other. But bigots are built on lines that are a constant challenge to humor; and to "annoy" these people is the easiest thing in the world. You annoy them by inhabiting the same planet. Hosts of other people, of course, are not so bad as the born bigots; but they have their prejudices and prepossessions, and it is a wonder if some of these are not "wounded" in the course of controversy on any live topic. It is hard for a Liberal not to annoy a Conservative, it is hard for a Conservative not to annoy a Liberal, and hard for a Socialist not to annoy both. Many speakers, on all sides, cultivate the habit of annoying their opponents. It is not the man who says the best things for his own side, but the man who says the worst things of the other side, that is most applauded at public meetings. To talk about "annoying" people in this way is quite atrociously absurd in a country where the Prime Minister speaks of his "convictions" and the Leader of the Opposition bawls across the House "You haven't got any."

If it be argued that religion is a subject on which speakers should be specially careful—on the ground, apparently, that it is a subject on which people are specially tetchy—we reply, "Very well, then; let us have a definite law to this effect; and let it be the same for all." Why should the feelings of Christians on the subject of religion be assumed to be any more tender than the feelings of Freethinkers? Very often, as a matter of fact, they are decidedly not so. The present law is really directed against one disputant and in favor of the other. It is always the Freethinker who annoys the Christian—never the Christian who annoys the Freethinker. That in the Christian is a choleric word which in the Freethinker is flat blasphemy.

To put the case in a nutshell. The present law of "blasphemy" no more protects religion than it protects astrology or alchemy. The speeches and writings that do most damage to religion are out of the reach of danger. (We do not say they always will be; we say they are now.) The law does not protect Christianity—it protects Christians. When they find it practicable they lay a street lecturer by the heels—especially if he appears to have no friends, and talks east-end instead of west-end English. Everybody knows that they are doing Christianity no good; but they are "getting their own back," which is a great comfort to the human nature that is a product or a survival of two thousand years of Christian civilisation. The present law of "blasphemy," indeed, is nothing but mob law, and is none the better for being carried out under judicial forms.

Canon Horsley's talk about the "majority" does not mend matters. The moral rights of the majority are not universal and absolute, nor are the moral rights of the minority dependent on their good will. Morality rests not upon numbers but upon reason. Canon Horsley ignores this altogether. His ethical position is that if the minority annoy the majority—no matter what the annoyance consists in—they must pay the penalty; but if the majority annoy the minority—that is what they are entitled to do if they please, just because they are the majority. Which is the most vulgar, insolent, and dangerous criterion ever propounded,—and would compel Canon Horsley to side with the mob that cried out "Crucify him! Crucify him!" on a famous occasion.

In spite of all this, however, it will be noticed that Canon Horsley does not plainly commit himself to the support of the Blasphemy Laws. He appears to lack the courage of his intolerance. His last sentences only imply what he dares not proclaim. Some rationalist speakers are meek enough to satisfy this reverend gentleman; some others call for a reply with a "boot." Not the Canon's boot, but a layman's: a policeman's, a judge's, a prison warder's. For this, of course, is what the angry man of God means.

The Bishop in the story who asked a layman to say what was appropriate to a trying occasion, did not suggest that suitable language had to be invented. There was no need for that. The Bible is still a handy book, and is quite a treasure-house of strong, vehement, and even violent language. The most savage speaker need not go beyond the vocabulary of Holy Writ for his boldest effects. The most reckless outdoor propagandist of Atheism would find it difficult to exceed the vituperative language of Jesus during the brief period of his last visit to Jerusalem.

We might have ended here. But we have yet a final word to Canon Horsley. Does he really mean us to believe that he is totally unaware of the kind of discourse so much indulged in by Christian lecturers in the open-air? We will take his word for it if he tells us so; but in that case we must tell him that it is high time he extended his investigations. If he favors the continuance of the Blasphemy Laws, after listening to the abominable and malicious talk of many of his co-religionists, it will be because he is a hopeless bigot and an incurable partisan.

G. W. FOOTE.

Religion and Morals.

SEVERAL weeks ago I made a passing reference to Mr. Harold Begbie's shocker, the Weakest Link. Mr. Begbie's book is concerned with the "White Slave" traffic, and as it provides a delectable feast for all those pure-minded people who delight to read of vice—real or assumed—around them, it has doubtless enjoyed a good sale. The author himself would say that he wrote the book in the interests of morality; and, indeed, he has a deal to say about morality in the course of his essay. But like most religious writers, he labors under a fatal delusion. Somehow or the other he has got it into his ill-instructed head that morality is the special concern of religion, and that good conduct can only flourish under its patronage and protection. I use the term "ill-instructed" deliberately, because a man who can write as Mr. Begbie writes is ill-instructed—one might almost say uncultured. For culture is not a question of mere scholastic attainment. One may have plenty of this, may boast of any number of degrees, and still remain, in the truest sense of the word, uncultured. It is the use to which one's knowledge is put, the ability to see life with its true measure of light and shade, and to see life as a whole—that is the sign of a true culture.

Now, the assumption that morality is the peculiar concern of religion, that it began under the shelter of religion, and flourished under its patronage, is one of the stock poses of the modern religious teacher. And the reason for this is that, with a declining interest in purely theological matters, the preachers of religion are driven to profess a concern for things in which a more living interest is shown. There is no justification whatever for the clergy posing as authorities in morals, either in teaching or in practice. They do not teach a better morality than other people, and they are certainly no better behaved. Generally speaking, their teaching is scarcely as good; and their conduct will not compare favorably with that of other educated classes. I do not mean by this that they are more often in the Courts than other people, although they are not strangers even there. But in their behavior towards each other, or towards those who disagree with them, in the habit of making reckless and unfounded assertions, and in cultivating the petty, non-legal vices of social life, the clergy evidence a somewhat lower standard than do most other classes of the community. A collection of testimonies from tradesmen and domestic servants, for instance, concerning the clergy, would be very illuminating reading for some people.

It is, however, almost doing the clergy an injustice to bracket Mr. Begbie with them. For many of the better ones would hesitate to say what he says on the subject of morals, and some might flatly contradict him. At least, one hopes so; for Mr. Begbie's view of morality is that of the most ignorant type of Salvation Army preacher. To him morality appears to be nothing more than animalism plus piety. Take piety away from animalism and morality disappears. Connect the two and you have morality again. Nothing, he says, can give man the courage to be moral save a "strength from outside us, a supernatural strength.....this it is alone which can cleanse the heart and fortify the soul in virtue." And this, I repeat, is making morality consist of a mere animalism with piety as a restraining force. For, like many Christian writers, with Mr. Begbie morality is all a matter of restraint—a case of denial. A man is moral because of a supernatural strength that enables him to crush the desire to have a "good time." It never dawns upon him that morality may not be a matter of self-denial but of self-expression, and that the man who behaves morally is having a genuinely "good time." That would be to make morality a matter of natural growth, and in that case the function of religion would be gone.

Here, again, is Mr. Begbie at his best—and worst. No man, he says,—

> "will dispute that animalism has a just right to preach its gospel and organise the life of the nation to suit its real and living principle, if we abandon faith in God..... Therefore, the salvation of humanity lies absolutely in God. Rescind the divine hypothesis, set democracy to think only of physical well-being, educate that democracy to believe in the naturalness of lust, and the right, nay the duty of every individual to extract from animal existence as much animal pleasure as he can comfortably assimilate,—do this, and in a generation you will have halved the population, you will have wrecked flesh and blood, you will have struck a deathblow at family life, you will have destroyed the vital instinct for transcendence."

Stupidity and slander are well harnessed here. Of course, if people think only of animal or sexual gratification, and sacrifice everything to this, the result is bound to be deplorable. But who teaches this? Who are the teachers of this gospel of animalism? They really have no existence outside Mr. Begbie's imagination. The notion that anybody or anything desires to organise national life on a basis of sheer animalism is almost too ridiculous for discussion. Probably the negation of religion means this to Mr. Begbie, but that is his fault. His own conception of human nature is so poor and so inadequate that he sees it as a mere bundle of gross appetites unless it is constrained by some "strength from outside of us." Thus, he dispenses slanders with the air of one scattering moral truisms. If he were in business and discussed his trade rivals with the same carelessness as to truth, he would soon find himself in the Courts. In social life he would find every door closed to him. Even in politics he would become a pariah. In each of these departments a higher standard of rectitude is imposed than is usual in religious controversy. Mr. Begbie confesses that he has written "with blood rather too heated for a nice discrimination in language." It is well to detect some glimmerings, however faint, of uneasiness. But no amount of heated blood can excuse a writer showing gross ignorance of the subject about which he is writing, and for slandering people whose ideals of life are at least as high as his own. The world would have survived had Mr. Begbie deferred writing his essay until his blood was cooler. It is not likely to benefit much now that it has been written.

When Mr. Begbie runs up against what might prove to be an instructive fact, he shows a complete inability to appreciate it. He cannot help but see that good conduct is not confined to religious circles, and if he were pressed he would probably admit that those outside were often better than those within. This is a very awkward fact for the religious advocate, and Mr. Begbie's way of meeting it is anything but original. He says:—

> "The long heredity of religion has exercised in the souls of men, however tolerant or base they may have been, an influence tending towards respect for virtue. Thus it has come to pass that reversions to barbarism have been rare among nations, and that the story of the human race, after the foreword of Christianity, is, for the most part, a tale of progress in respectablity."

There has been progress, but only after the foreword of Christianity! Well, was there no progress before Christianity? Let anyone read the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, the writings of Cicero, or Plutarch, or Epictetus, or Aristotle, in the light of Mr. Begbie's comment, and he will realise how supremely ridiculous it is. And what has the heredity of religion to do with it? Morality has not, and never has had, any really vital association with religion. On the contrary, the greatest disturbing force in morals has been religion. Had men and women been always in the habit of measuring right and wrong by reference to some commonly accepted fact of daily experience, ethical theory and practice might have been more uniform than has actually been the case. But, by resting the theory of morals upon a belief in some supernatural power, confusion was made inevitable. And so it has happened that there is scarcely a virtue that religion has not somewhere and at some time branded as a vice, hardly a vice it has not at some time declared a virtue. People have robbed, and killed, and lied, and slandered in the name of religion, and they are at the same game to-day.

The driving force behind morality is not religious but social. Man is not an ethical animal because he is often a religious one, but because his nature is moulded by and for constant association with his fellows. Strictly speaking, there is no such thing as an individual ethic. Truthfulness, chastity, honesty, kindness, etc., are expressions of a relation. Destroy this relation and morality disappears. This is really why there is, on the whole, progress, and why human society can no more exist and disregard the virtues than an individual can flourish on a diet of prussic acid. And consequently the heredity that does operate is not that of religious teaching but that of social selection. The dice are loaded against vice because vice is the name for what are fundamentally life-destroying actions, just as virtue is the name for actions that are fundamentally life-preserving. The Freethinker knows this, and is therefore not afraid that morality is going to die out because this or that theory is propounded. Morality does not spring from theories, but from life. It is actual before it is theoretical. Mr. Begbie's foolish outbursts simply illustrate the truth that the worst possible teacher of morals is the ardent religionist with "blood rather too heated" for either discrimination in language or patience to acquire knowledge concerning the subject on which he writes.

The curious thing is that these religious writers seldom realise that all their attacks on contemporary life and manners are so many indictments of religion. When someone objected to Ruskin attacking the clergy because, he said, the clergy were the only friends the poor man had, Ruskin replied that that was the very worst thing ever said about them; for it meant that the clergy had played their part as moral instructors so badly that, with all their influence, they had not impressed upon people the most elementary notions of duty towards each other. So also with the moral condition of the world. So far as morality is a matter of conscious reflection, of action following upon theory, it has hitherto been mainly under the influence of religion. Had that influence been a healthy one, the world would have been moralised long since. Each newcomer would have found himself in a world where, if evil was not unknown, it would have been a negligible quantity. Our social heredity would have been thoroughly moralised. The world complained about is a world that has been under religious tutelage for thousands of generations, and its evil features are so many evidences of the failure of religion. "If human life is to be organised," says Mr. Begbie, "without reference of any kind to a God, then for a certainty civilisation may perish." To which one may well reply that a civilisation that has lived in spite of the rule of the gods may well consider itself indestructible.

C. COHEN.

The Quintessence of Irrationality.

ONE never ceases to wonder at the utterly and palpably irrational manner in which Christian apologists endeavor to justify the belief in the supernatural. Surely nothing can be more contrary to reason than the claim that science is at last lending substantial support to it. Mr. Hugh Capron is certainly wrong when he states, in his Anatomy of Truth, that to-day "we see the very weapons of religion being forged in the arsenals of science." Assertions of that kind are very easily made, as the readers of Mr. R. J. Campbell's sermons are well aware; but they are wholly insusceptible of verification. Indeed, Mr. Campbell, quoting Mr. Capron's wild averment as his sole authority, assures his public that he has been a true prophet in the prediction that we "should soon be witnessing a rehabilitation from the side of science of belief in the so-called miraculous—namely, of the occasional supersession of what we are pleased to call natural laws by the operation of facts and forces not hitherto included in that category, facts and forces only to be explained on the hypothesis that there is a spiritual as well as a material world." Without fear of any intelligent contradiction, we pronounce the reverend gentleman an entirely false prophet. He cannot name the science, or mention the scientific discovery, which furnishes the slightest bit of evidence that an immaterial world exists. We know of some scientists who believe in the supernatural; but they are honest enough to admit that they can find no warrant for their belief in science. Dr. Osler, the Regius Professor of Medicine at Oxford, quotes the following passage from Sir Thomas Browne's famous Religio Medici, which he regards as a beautiful expression of what he calls "this old Platonic and orthodox view":—

> "Thus we are men and we know not how: there is something in us that can be without us and will be after us; though it is strange that it has no history what it was before us, nor cannot tell how it entered into us."

The remarkable fact is that Dr. Osler, whilst firmly holding this theological view, frankly confesses that it "has no place in science, which ignores completely this something which will be after us." Then he adds:—

> "The new psychologists have ceased to think nobly of the soul, and even speak of it as a complete superfluity.....Modern psychological science dispenses altogether with the soul" (Science and Immortality, pp. 47-50).

According to Mr. Campbell, what we have in the Gospel Jesus is the supernatural tabernacling in the natural, the most wondrous Being wearing human flesh. The portents and prodigies which preceded, accompanied, and followed his birth are looked upon as "what might be called a thrusting into our dark and narrow earthly conditions of something which belongs intrinsically to another and far higher mode of being." This may be exceedingly good theology, but we unhesitatingly affirm that from the side of science it derives no attestation whatsoever. Not a single religious weapon has ever been forged in the arsenals of science. Mr. Campbell himself tacitly acknowledges the truth of this in the following amazing utterance:—

> "As to the mystery of the Divine Incarnation, what can we say but that the glory before which angels veil their faces has revealed itself in terms of our own humanity? It is a mystery to be adored, but not understood; the intellect fails before it, but the spirit rises on the wings of faith into a joyful apprehension of its truth."

Thus science is shut out, the intellect beats an undignified retreat, and the spirit soars aloft on imaginative wings. How beautifully is the game given away. Curiously enough, Mr. Campbell says that it does not follow that "all that is recorded in the New Testament about the annunciation, the angelic appearances both before and after the holy birth at Bethlehem, and the like, is literally exact." "These winsome stories," he continues, "are rightly described as the poetry of the Nativity. But poetry is not less true than prose; quite the contrary. The very essence of poetry is that it suggests what literal and exact statement cannot convey; it is the language of the inexpressible." If this is not juggling with words we know not what it is. Jesus was born of a virgin or he was not; shepherds watching their flocks by night were informed of the wonderful birth by angels, or they were not; wise men from the east came to Bethlehem led by a star, or they did not. All the marvellous events related either happened or did not happen. Science insists upon it that all things must be either true or false. Until the advent of geology the Genesis story of creation was accepted as literally true; now it is taken for a beautiful legend, embodying poetically some great but inexpressible spiritual truth. Until the New Theologians appeared the narratives of the Nativity were either believed or disbelieved; now they are treated as partly true and partly untrue, as lovely poems essentially though not literally or exactly true. No science on earth will ever approve of such a shilly-shallying system of interpretation.

Mr. Campbell has the disagreeable knack of ruling out of court all schools that differ from the one to which he now belongs. A few years ago he used to declare that Jesus was Divine only in the sense that we are all Divine. To-day he pronounces him "essentially super-human." "The old Protestant liberalism," he announces, "is out of court." Is Unitarianism out of court simply because Mr. Campbell happens to be opposed to it? Are the views of such distinguished scholars as Schmiedel, Arno Neumann, Harnack, and Bacon out of court merely because the minister of the City Temple no longer sees eye to eye with them? Their teaching, he maintains, is "ruled out by the facts of history and of spiritual experience"; but this is sheer pulpit nonsense, because the illustrious divines just named are quite as competent to interpret "the facts of history and of experience" as Mr. Campbell, and yet they teach that Jesus was "essentially human," but in no sense "essentially super-human." Besides, science has no knowledge, direct or indirect, of superhuman beings.

This brings us to another illustration which the reverend gentleman supplies of the absolute irrationality of his position. His contention is that we are "witnessing a rehabilitation from the side of science of belief in the so-called miraculous—namely, of the occasional supersession of what we are pleased to call natural laws by the operation of facts and forces not hitherto included in that category, facts and forces only to be explained on the hypothesis that there is a spiritual as well as a material world." But further on in the same discourse he admits the immutability of the laws of nature. Listen:—

> "The physical universe is a closed system, complete in itself so far as its processes are concerned. We know, roughly speaking, how life has come to be what it is on this planet, what stages it has passed through, and what conditions have governed its growth. We should be all at sea if we suddenly found that that line of development were no longer being followed.....If the world were really as inconsequent and whimsical, and its happenings as unpredictable, as they are represented to be in the fairy books,.....we should be entirely different beings from what we are now. These things are all very well in works of imagination, but if they were sober facts we should have to revise all our means of acquiring knowledge; such a world would not be the world we know, and its ways would not be our ways."

We are in full agreement, and of course, such a view rules out the miraculous completely. "The physical universe is a closed system, complete in itself so far as its processes are concerned"; and being such there can be no supersession of its laws by the operation of any facts and forces of a higher order. And yet, in spite of this undoubted truth, Mr. Campbell still believes that Jesus Christ came from another and better world than this.

We now reach another glaring example of the fundamental irrationality of theological teaching. There is another world, Mr. Campbell oracularly informs us, infinitely higher and better than this, from which the Gospel Jesus claims to have come. Now, on the unverifiable assumption that there is another world, how on earth can anybody tell that it is better than this? The reverend gentleman entertains a shockingly bad opinion of the one we all know:—

> "Our lot in this world is very sad and dreadful. I hope my outlook is not becoming more sombre with advancing years, but I seem to perceive with ever-increasing clearness as time goes on the pitiousness of humanity. What a welter of sorrow and pain! What pathetic, futile dreams, baffled purposes, foiled endeavors, tragic defeats! What wonderful gains succeeded by miserable losses, as if some mighty, mocking demon watched our vain castle-building in order to have the pleasure of throwing it down! And what is there in this world that is worth our seeking that is lasting and secure? Nothing at all."

We beg to call Mr. Campbell's special attention to the highly significant fact that, according to his own teaching, the world he denounces in such eloquent and scathing terms is God's. God made it and God governs it, and it inevitably follows that he both made and governs it very badly. Now, what guarantee have we that if there is another world, also God-made and God-governed, it is one whit better and happier than this? None whatever, except the bare word of people who know nothing at all about it. A stronger and more irrefutable argument for Atheism than Mr. Campbell's sermon furnishes does not exist. It robs the Deity of every scrap of his character. To preach a just and loving Heavenly Father in a world such as the discourse under discussion depicts is the quintessence of irrationality.

J. T. LLOYD.

Saint Patrick Nothing but a Popish Myth.

THERE are several ancient lives of the saint, all written, as Miss Cusack admits, for edification—that is, to stir feelings of devotion, not to awaken intelligence or to give information. Not one of those lives reaches back to within two hundred years of the alleged death of the saint; and there is no evidence to carry us farther back.

Patrick cannot be regarded as a historical character. He belongs essentially to the class of beings known as Irish giants, or giants of any other land; and his deeds are all on a par with those of necromancers, wizards, fairies, genii, etc. His whole career is one of miracle—that is, of fudge and falsehood, borrowed from old mythological tales, worked up in their present garb, and located here and there to suit the purpose and improve the trade of the priests. The Irish fairy-tales are quite as real history as the legend of St. Patrick; and Puck or Titania is just as historical a reality as the Irish saint.

The miracle Patrick is best known for is the expulsion of all demons, snakes, and toads from Ireland. Supposing it were a true story, still Patrick introduced into Ireland and established there the worst vermin and the worst reptiles the world has ever yet been cursed by—namely, the Romish priests and their agents.

But the clearing of Ireland of snakes, etc., is ascribed also to Joseph of Arimathea, an older fiction located in the first century, or 400 years before Patrick's time. Solinus, a geographer of the third century, or 200 years earlier than Patrick, mentions the absence of reptiles, etc., from Ireland.

Patrick employed a drum to frighten away the venomous reptiles of Ireland, as Booth does now to scare devils. It must be pleasant for Booth to remember that he but follows the Popish saint in the use of the drum. Patrick beat his drum so vigorously that he knocked a hole in it. However, an angel, who had probably been brought up to that trade, soon mended it for him, and he banged away again.

One cunning old serpent refused to budge, do what the saint would. At length Patrick made a box, and told the serpent he could not get into it. This led to a controversy, and the serpent was foolish enough to get into the box to prove to the saint that he could get in. The saint clapped on the lid, fastened it, and flung box and contents into the sea—which proves that serpents are no match for Romish saints in point of cunning.

Another reptile, a monster, Patrick chained up in Lough Dilveen, and told him to remain there till Monday. There the poor thing still remains, and every Monday morning he calls out, in good old Irish, "It is a long Monday, Patrick." The people around the Lough are said still to believe that. And why not? It is as true as anything else they say of Patrick (Credulities: Past and Present; W. Jones; 1884).

Patrick began his fight with the demons of Ireland before he landed there. When he approached the island he found a cordon of devils (no one else saw them) on the shore to prevent his landing. He made the sign of the cross, and they fled.

In Christian art Patrick is represented with a staff, around which a serpent is coiled. Exactly. Patrick is merely the Pagan god of healing, Æsculapius.

Patrick is said to have blessed the shamrock, and to have used it to prove to an Irish chief that the conundrum of the Trinity was a true doctrine. But this yarn did not see the true light until about 700 years after Patrick's death. In sober truth, the Irish reverence for the shamrock has survived from the old Pagan times—as everything else now called Christian has done.

But I must pay particular attention to Patrick's miracles and miraculous experiences. We are told that he went in early life to Lerins, an isle in the Mediterranean. Here he found a very old woman. A blooming young man appeared and claimed the old woman as his daughter. Patrick was astonished. The young man explained that Christ had bestowed upon him the gift of perpetual youth; that this precious gift he had forgotten to ask for his children as well as himself; consequently his children grew old and died, while he himself was ever young.

From this island Patrick bore away with him the staff of Jesus—a miraculous crozier, or walking-stick; and with that he performed the miracles and signs he showed to the Irish.

When the blessed saint went to Ireland, he sailed thither upon his altar-stone, which he seems ever to have borne about with him, and which was quite capable of taking a trip through the air much better than any bird could fly.

Another version of the stone-yarn is given by Miss Cusack. She says that when Patrick was leaving the coast of Gaul a poor leper on the beach begged to be taken on board. The crew refused, but the saint flung his stone altar within reach of the leper, who sailed thereon in the wake of the ship until they reached Ireland; there the leper was the first to land.

On one occasion Patrick kindled a fire by five drops of water that fell from his fingers; and on another he performed the same trick with icicles. This happened while he was yet a child. He raised five cows to life and one man, while still in his boyhood. During the same early period he turned a bucket of water into the purest honey. Bee farmers would be delighted with a boy like that.

The fisherman at Wicklow refused to give the saint some fish, and he cursed the river to that degree that the fellow could never find fish there again.

A staff fell from heaven for Patrick—if it wasn't from a tree it fell.

Patrick had a furious contest, at the court of Tara, with the king's Druids. He raised one of them high in the air, and let him fall and killed him. Then an earthquake shook the place, and a furious storm came on, and a mysterious darkness surrounded the Pagans. Like Christ, he passed through the keyhole into the palace, much to the fright of the king and his people.

The Druid, not able to poison the saint, brought down a mass of snow, which covered the ground up to the waists of men. Patrick swept it all away in a moment. The Druid then covered the land with dense darkness; and Patrick dispelled that also.

Patrick then offered to shut up one of his converts in a hut with a Druid—the Druid clad in the Christian's tunic, and the Christian wearing the Druid's. The hut was set fire to, after being piled on one side with dry faggots, on the other with green wood. The Christian took his place on the dry wood, the Pagan on the green. The Christian came out quite unhurt, but the Pagan garment he wore was reduced to ashes. The Druid himself was burned to death, but the Christian garment he wore had not the least sign of fire upon it.

The king was not converted, but he might as well have been. There was no resisting a juggler like Patrick.

Patrick's stone altar, when an outrage was committed near it, emitted three streams of pure blood; but they do not say what animal's blood it was.

Patrick, in his travels, came to a cross erected over a grave. He went to the grave, and asked the corpse who he was. "A poor Pagan," replied the corpse. "How came the cross here then?" demanded the saint. A certain foreigner was buried not far off, and his mother came to erect this cross on his tomb. Grief blinded her, and she put the cross on the wrong grave. The saint thereupon rectified the mistake.

He lost his horses in the darkness, and he held up five fingers which illuminated all the plain like an electric light, and the horses were found.

Near Limerick they show a stone marked by the impress of Patrick's knees and body.

I have given a selection of the incidents and juggler-tricks in what is called "St. Patrick's Life." The Romanists believe all that wretched stuff—and gape for more.

That Patrick is but one of the heroes of the nursery tales, or of fairy tales, or of household tales, must be clear to all unbiassed people. Fin McCoul, the ancient Irish giant, was as historical as Patrick, and his miracles quite as edifying. Irish and other popular tales preserved by the peasantry are of exactly the same character and equally true.

And this ridiculous fiction the Irish Romanists yearly celebrate as the most important "personage" in their history! Such is one result of priestly tuition.

(The late) JOS. SYMES.

A Deathless Tragedy.

IT was quite by accident that we came to read Foxglove Manor. We had known George Buchanan by some of his terrible and arresting poems, and also by his melodious and pleasing "Wedding of Shon Maclean"; but his fiction to us was a closed book until we strayed across this exquisite specimen of a satirical and venemous attack on the Church. Whether it be through the medium of the novel, the pamphlet, by speech, or by scientific discourse, that the "Mother of Lies" is exposed and annihilated, any means is commendable. As Nietzsche says in one of his fierce indictments, no methods are too petty to use in attacking Christianity—the one immortal blemish on mankind. Messrs. Chatto and Windus are responsible for the publication of this little Voltairean gem; this does not in any way surprise us. Publishers who were prepared to be the medium of Swinburne's works would not strain at George Buchanan.

In a prefatory note, the author announces that the tragedy in fiction must not be construed into an attack on the priesthood generally. This, we venture to say, may be interpreted to suit the taste of any reader. If he happens to have orthodox inclinations, it will be quite acceptable; but, on the other hand, if he should be a reader of wider tastes than are found in Christian limits, he will smile; the powder is there in spite of the jam in the preface. Rabelais knew how to administer the powder; he did not convey it through his prefaces, but in what the superficial might consider coarseness and vulgarity. In a similar manner, Buchanan, working within limitations well known to creative artists in England, accomplished his task of writing a novel which, at an earlier date, might have meant burning at the stake for its author. Nowadays, kind Christian people freeze the unorthodox to death by many forms of social ostracism just for a little difference of opinion about the soul or other abstract questions.

The book opens with a pretty sketch of the parish of Oomberley, and in the village church we are introduced to the vicar of St. Cuthbert's, who is preaching a sermon. The Pagan richness of his discourse could never have emanated from any clergyman, we feel sure; we are indebted to the author for that. From a magnificent dissertation on the Greek gods, the preacher, of course, makes the inevitable transition to the Christian God, and terminates in an impassioned burst of rhetoric, which conveyed no definite meaning to the majority of his listeners. The pretty church organist, Edith Dove, is in love with this immaculate saint, and he, for spiritual reasons (this is a delightful stab), will not consent to having the engagement made public, and it therefore resolves itself into a liaison, with the usual clandestine meetings. On the day of the sermon there appears on the scene a Mrs. Eilen Haldane, who has attended the church, and the vicar recognises her as his favorite pupil when he was a teacher of classics in a seminary for young ladies. The beautiful girl of years ago is now wife of the owner of Foxglove Manor. This reappearance of the vicar's old love spells disaster to his amors with the pretty organist, and his time is now very well occupied with uninvited visits on the least pretence to see his former sweetheart. In a few words our author powerfully sketches her husband, who is—and we whisper it gently—an Agnostic.

> "His face, especially in repose, was by no means handsome. His grave, large, strongly marked features expressed decision, daring, and indomitable force.....a grim, self-sufficing, iron-natured man, one would have said, until one had looked into his blue-grey eyes which lit up his strong, rugged face."

Between George Haldane and his beautiful wife there is much conversation about religion, which all Freethinkers will enjoy. In one part of the book he asks her, "Why cannot you Christians dispense with incense and allow smoking instead—at least during the sermon?" There is also much argument between him and the vicar; and, when the husband has at last realised the intentions of this holy man, he declares vehemently to his wife:—

> "Mr. Santley is like all his tribe—a meddler and a mischief-maker. That is the worst of other-worldliness; it gives these traders in the Godhead, these peddlers who would give us in exchange for belief in their superstitions a bonus in paradise, an excuse for making this world unbearable. Well, my atheism, if you choose to call it so, against his theism. Mine at least keeps me a man among men, while his keeps him a twaddler among women."

There is a perfect little quotation from Lucretius, that splendid old Pagan, who knew what religion was:—

> "Which with horrid head > Leered hideously from all the gates of heaven!"

We think now that we have quoted enough to prove that it will well repay reading by Freethinkers, who, as a class, are not so well provided with fiction as they might be. In these days it would almost seem, to judge by modern productions, that mental robustness in fiction is dead. The novel closes with a wise dispensation of poetic justice; and although it is tragedy in fiction, no one is killed.

Many Freethinkers may have read Foxglove Manor; some may not have heard of it; and others may not be able to procure it from their local libraries, those fountains of intellectual supply, whose needs are supervised very often by old gentlemen who would be better engaged in trimming rose-trees.

George Buchanan has been dead about twelve years. In the present day we read panegyrics of the latest work of genius from Manxland, The Woman Thou Gavest Me. It is difficult to pass an opinion on such works as this without a little heat. Given a supply of Christianity and a subject of illegitimacy, and lo! we have fame and a huge following. What a decline and fall from Foxglove Manor! We understand the symbol of the cross now. It should be, in all conscience, the cross of the Phallic worshipers.

The present writer once jokingly asked a friend of his why he did not read Hall Caine's novels. He replied: "I cannot work for my living and read his novels too"! Foxglove Manor will be a splendid antidote to this production, if anyone has been inveigled into reading it. We shall be most happy to send it to any Freethinker who would like to read it. If the writer were a millionaire it would give him much pleasure to circulate, free, ten thousand copies, say, in Leeds; afterwards we might try the Isle of Man.

WILLIAM REPTON.

I shall pass through this world but once; therefore, any good thing that I may do, or any kindness that I may show to my fellow-human creatures, let me do it now; let me not neglect it, or defer it, as I shall not pass this way again.—Carlyle.

Acid Drops.

The greatest torturer of the age is dead. We refer to Lord Cross. He invented the plank bed for prisoners when he was at the Home Office under a Tory administration. He never achieved anything else worth mentioning. He was reckoned a good Christian and an exemplary man. In reality he was one of the worst criminals on earth. He was not called upon to inflict sleepless agony on his already unfortunate fellow-men. He did it by choice. We wish we could add that he has his reward.

Lord Cross did not patent the plank bed—he presented it to the nation, which accepted it and still uses it. But he obtained his payment in another way. He joined the band of political pensioners. Having filled three offices under the Crown, it was impossible to live afterwards on his own resources with adequate "dignity." He signed a paper to that effect and got his £2,000 a year accordingly; and he drew it for twenty-seven years. £54,000 was therefore the price of the plank bed. For that is all the nation ever got out of Lord Cross for it.

The Archbishop of Canterbury cries off from a correspondence on the Church and Sport with the Rev. J. Stratton, an active member of the Humanitarian League. He says it is "impossible." Quite so. If he says anything against fox-hunting, etc., he annoys his dearest friends. If he says anything in favor of it he deepens the modern hostility to the Church. So mum's the word now,—though he was indiscreet enough some time ago in the speech that occasioned Mr. Stratton's challenge.

For stealing umbrellas from Westminster Abbey a woman was sentenced to a year's imprisonment last week. It was her third offence at that church. Evidently she believed in putting something aside for a rainy day.

The Essex Weekly News tells us that "An Essex Vicar, writing in his Parish Magazine a description of the evening service on Christmas Day, says:—'The carols were nicely sung, although some of the choristers had apparently succumbed to Christmas fare.'" Comment is superfluous.

Three prisoners were confirmed by the Bishop of St. David's in Swansea prison chapel recently. The Church must get hold of men somehow.

What is there in the wit and wisdom of the Nonconformists that makes their ideas on the school question the standard and norm for everybody else? asks the Catholic Times. We can only reply, nothing but sheer impudence, only the question has a much wider scope than is given it here, and applies to all classes of Christians. What is there in the wit and wisdom of Christians as a whole that their ideas on life should be made the standard and norm for everybody else? When the question of divorce is under discussion, we are deluged with information about the "Christian ideal," what Christ taught, and what are the teachings of the Christian Church. So also with all other questions. Christians talk as though it was their duty to lay down rules and everybody else's to observe them. The attitude of Nonconformists on the education question is only part of the general Christian attitude. All other than Christians are calmly ignored. And this, we repeat, is just impertinence. It is part of the lack of consideration for others that is so striking a feature of Christianity wherever it is planted.

Consider the impertinence of the common expression, "Christian civilisation." Our civilisation, such as it is, has been built up by all kinds of men and women, holding all kinds of opinions. Inventors and discoverers, artists, musicians, and men of letters, philosophers and scientists, hewers of wood and drawers of water, have all played their parts. Many of the things that have contributed to our civilisation—the printing press, the steam engine, the telegraph, etc.—have no more connection with religion than with the inhabitants of Mars. And yet the whole is claimed as a part of Christian civilisation. Even the virtues do not escape; for we hear of Christian kindness, Christian truth, Christian charity, etc., as though anyone who possesses these qualities must be either a Christian or a poacher on the Christian preserves. Of course, there is only one adequate explanation, and that may be given in the words of Dr. Johnson. When Johnson was asked how he came to give a faulty definition of a certain word, he promptly replied, "Ignorance, madam, pure ignorance."

There was a keen fight the other day before the licensing authorities of Middlesex over the Sunday opening of cinematograph shows. The Middlesex Council has made it a condition of granting a licence for six days that the proprietors shall not open on the seventh. The cinematograph proprietors exhibiting within the County of Middlesex applied to have this condition struck out, and in support of their application produced a letter from Scotland Yard to the effect that the police had received no complaints concerning the conduct of these places, either as regards the character of the pictures or the behavior of the audience. Against this request Mr. Blacklock, on behalf of the opposition, urged that the opening of places of amusement on Sundays "flagrantly violated the dearest convictions of a considerable section of the population." This may be the case; but as no one suggests that they should be compelled to attend, it is difficult to see the relevancy of the objection. There is no noise made outside a picture show, things are admittedly well managed within, and the general testimony of the police in all parts of the country is that the conduct of young people has improved where these Sunday entertainments are given. Nevertheless these Sabbatarians object, and the Middlesex authorities prefer to please them rather than allow a perfectly harmless form of entertainment to be carried on.

We are glad to learn, however, that the proprietors of thirty picture shows have decided to open on Sundays without the Council's permission. Moreover, the Secretary of the Cinematograph Exhibitors' Association declares that if any action is taken by the Council the proprietors will receive the Association's support, and the matter will, in the event of a conviction, be carried to appeal. This is the proper course to adopt, and we are surprised that it has not been taken before. The position of the Council on this matter is far from secure, and a little courage on the part of those who have permitted the bigoted section of the Council to bully them into submission may result in teaching these catspaws of Church and Chapel a much-needed lesson.

Y. M. C. A. picture services are being held in London "for the benefit of young men who have no home in London." A film of the "last supper" would be an appropriate finale.

Mr. George R. Sims, writing over the signature of "Dagonet" in the Referee, has some amusing and pertinent remarks on the latest ecclesiastical rumpus. He says, "You made me Kikuyu; I didn't want to do it, is the refrain which is threatening to shake the Anglican Church to its foundations. I am wondering whether I am right in coming to the conclusion that the Anglican argument is that the confirmed murderer is more worthy of recognition than the unconfirmed Methodist."

"A Baptist Minister," writing in the Daily Chronicle, refers to Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister, as "a good Old Testament saint." Decidedly a back-handed compliment.

Canon Ottley, the Secretary of the Imperial Sunday Alliance, was interviewed by a representative of the Daily Telegraph, and brought forward the usual greasy objections. Feeling was very intense against Sunday opening, of course. But, he said, they were not kill-joys.

> "If the people cared to open their places and give a pure, uplifting exhibition without charge, we would rejoice. We have no objection to cinematograph exhibitions in themselves. I would like to see the cinematograph adopted by every religious body in London, and in fact attached to Sunday-schools all over the country.....But we are out against these shows being run for profit on Sunday, entailing as they do much Sunday labor."

The humbug of this is painfully evident. In the first place, there is no more justification for asking cinematograph proprietors to work for nothing on Sunday than there is for asking all parsons to preach without payment. Second, whether a profit is made or not makes no difference to the labor employed. Third, the running of a picture palace involves no more labor than the opening of a church. Fourth, if they are attached to "religious bodies" and Sunday-schools, as much labor will be required as under present conditions. Finally, the whole of the apology rings false from beginning to end. What Canon Ottley wants is Sabbatarianism pure and simple. His is sheer bigotry plus cowardice.

It is concluded, by a writer in one of the weeklies, that because more "conscience money" is paid into the exchequer in England than in any other country, Englishmen have a more sensitive conscience. The circumstance is open to an exactly opposite inference. It may be that the exchequer is defrauded of more here than elsewhere.

Some extracts from a privately circulated note in favor of a new religion, by Sir Francis Younghusband, appeared in a recent issue of the Daily Telegraph. Sir Francis's new religion is of the Imperialist variety, and, so far as it aims at uniting people in all parts of the world in a common ideal of well-doing, no fault can be found with it. The mistake made is the common one of assuming that any such possible bond must be called, or deserves to be called, a religion. Sir Francis's career has brought him into direct touch with all, or nearly all, the principal religions of the world, and on reflection we think he would admit that nothing so fails to produce a common working bond as does religion. Of course, people of the same form of religion will unite, but their union only serves to make their separation from others sharper and more deadly. Men will sink their differences, in favor of some elements held in common, on any topic sooner than on a matter of religious belief.

Curiously enough, Sir Francis bears testimony to the truth of what has been said. He says that he has no desire to force men's faiths into a single groove, but aims at "a common recognition by all creeds of the essential identity of their ethical aims." Exactly; the religious basis is impossible as a means of union, but ethics or sociology may supply what is needed. Why, then, call the appeal religious? It is ethical, or humanitarian, but it is not religious. For thousands of years teachers have been striving for union on a basis of religion, and the end is as far off as ever. Such union as the world has realised has been brought about by the spread of humanitarian ideas and ideals, which have also forced religion to become more humanitarian in its teachings. Sir Francis's appeal cannot possibly bring union among people of different religious beliefs, and his lavish use of the word "religion" can only cool the ardor of those who might take some interest in his proposals.

The Central Y. M. C. A., Tottenham-court-road, intends starting a series of Sunday evening Picture Services. We beg to protest. This will involve much Sunday labor, and, besides, collections will be taken up—even if there is not a charge for seats. Moreover, there remains that large section of the population whose feelings are so terribly outraged by Sunday cinematograph shows.

The hero of the "Curate's Slander Case" won an easy victory on Monday. Rev. Thomas Ghent, curate of St. Andrew's Church, Stockwell Green, pursued Mr. Arthur Fitzgerald, a police-sergeant, of Stockwell, for slander—the said slander being that the reverend gentleman had misconducted himself (in the sense of adultery) with the defendant's wife. After a trial of nine days the jury disagreed. Mr. Ghent arranged for a new trial as promptly as possible, and the case came into court again on Monday. Mr. Fitzgerald appeared in person, but said that he could not conduct the defence himself. The first hearing had cost him £592, a good deal of which was still owing to his solicitors. He had no money to employ solicitors and counsel again, or to bring his witnesses into court, and was therefore bound to ask for an adjournment, which the prosecution opposed and Mr. Justice Lush refused. When the case was ordered to proceed, Mr. Fitzgerald, while not withdrawing his defence, walked out of court, saying "He must take his judgment, that's all. He is a man of means." Then the prosecution, the judge, and the jury went to work, and in a very short time judgment was given for the plaintiff, with £1,000 damages. Which shows that England is indeed a free country, with one law for the rich and the poor.

It appears that subscriptions were opened in the Church Times and the Guardian to assist Mr. Ghent in carrying on his action. The regulations of the Metropolitan Police prevented Mr. Fitzgerald from procuring assistance in the same way. Happy curate! Poor constable!

The clergy are not always in the wrong. According to last week's Observer the Rev. W. Temple has made the following statement. "I suppose," he said, "that no nation has ever been so indifferent and negligent of truth as the English nation." The only criticism we wish to make is that the reverend gentleman need not "suppose" this.

Rev. Evan Edwards, the oldest Baptist minister in the world, has just died at Torquay, at the age of ninety-nine. He started early as "the boy preacher" and continued until Christmas 1911. It is computed that he preached 8,080 sermons altogether. He will be glad to sit down a bit where he is now—if he can only find the floor. Another Welsh preacher, Rev. E. Morris, of Dyffryn, Merioneth, who died at ninety, is reckoned to have preached 10,000 sermons. He would be company for Mr. Edwards. Fortunately they belonged to the same denomination.

Rev. William Francis John Romanis, of Homefield, Godalming, Surrey, left £40,295. A big lump to thread the old needle's eye with. But the clergy seem to discount all that difficulty.

Rev. Canon Arthur Henry Sanxay Barwell, of Blechingley House, Blechingley, Surrey, left estate valued at £72,789 gross, with net personality £65,823. Not bad for a "Blessed be ye poor exhorter."

Mr. J. M. Robertson lectured at South Place Institute last Sunday morning on Carlyle and Diderot. An interesting subject, of course, and no doubt treated in an interesting manner. But a more seasonable subject might have been Mr. McKenna and the Blasphemy Laws.

The Bible has done mischief in many ways. Here is a new one. Copies printed in small type, and used in schools by children, are responsible for much injurious eyestrain. Dr. Lydia Towers, one of the schools' medical inspectors for Shropshire, has just made a serious complaint of this evil.

"Laughter as a Crime" runs a headline in the Daily News. It is considered so when it is directed against Christian superstition.

Mr. Balfour began his Gifford Lectures on "Natural Theology" at Glasgow on Monday. He is a very clever word-spinner and he attracted a vast audience—of the "classes" of course. A headline in the Daily News report indicated that Mr. Balfour wanted "A Social God"—which might suggest "A Smoke-Room God" to a good many people, and raise a vision of pipes and glasses. It seems to us that Mr. Balfour will have to take whatever "God" there is—and that his own wishes will count for nothing in the matter.

GOD'S APOLOGIES.

Small Boy: "Does God make apologies?"
Clerical Visitor: "Certainly not."
Small Boy: "Didn't he make you?"
Clerical Visitor: "Certainly."
Small Boy: "Well, pa says you are only an apology for a man."

She was a lone widow, and was spending her last day upon earth. The mild young curate at her bedside remarked that the end was very near. "Yes," she responded, "it's very comforting to think that before to-night I shall be folded in Beelzebub's bosom." "My good lady, you mean Abraham's bosom," corrected the young apostle. "Ah, well," responded the departing one, "it doesn't matter. After twenty years of widowhood, I'm not particular as to what the gentleman's name might be." And in this sweet truthfulness she died.

A clerical gentleman was the other day walking along the main street of a village where he had once been minister, and, on meeting one of his old parishioners, paused to speak with her. "How are you, Mrs. Block?" said he, kindly. "Vera weel, sir," replied the woman, plaintively. "And how is your husband?" "My man, sir, is in heaven, sir, this twa year." "In heaven? I am very sorry to hear it," responded the clergyman absently, as he passed on, leaving the poor woman dumb with astonishment.

An old Yorkshire woman being much distressed at the sudden loss of her husband, the dissenting minister assured her consolingly: "He is now with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." "That's the worst of it," she sobbed; "and he always was so shy among strangers."

The Blasphemy Case.

THERE is not much more to be said on this particular case. We propose to deal with the whole question of the Blasphemy Laws at an early date. Even now there are misunderstandings all round. We speak, of course, as an expert in this matter.

Mr. Stewart will evidently serve out his sentence. We never really hoped for any good from a petition. We signed it in a soft moment, so that what was being done in that way might have the best possible chance of success. The second petition to Mr. Asquith seems to us a mere waste of time—at least as far as this Stewart case is concerned.

Mr. McKenna's first reply to the petition was a caddish one. His second reply is purely controversial, and his ace of trumps was played rather skilfully. Why petition the Home Secretary now that there is a Court of Criminal Appeal? Stewart knew he could appeal and he has not done so. Mr. Asquith may urge the same objection to his petition.

What has been done in this case is all very well in its way. We congratulate those who have engineered the Petition on their conversion since the Boulter case, and we hope the change will be lasting. But the two things that ought to have been done have not been attempted. There should have been the biggest possible protest meeting of all advanced parties in London, and the case should have been taken to the Court of Appeal. The latter point was absolutely vital; as our readers will see presently—when we return to the subject.

G. W. FOOTE.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote was quite right in arranging for his Sunday evening's address at the Queen's (Minor) Hall on "Mr. McKenna and Prisoners for Blasphemy." In spite of the bitter cold snap that had set in so suddenly a large and enthusiastic audience assembled to hear the President of the National Secular Society on a subject in regard to which he might claim to be the first specialist in England. His address was listened to with profound attention, and the applause was very marked when he resumed his seat. Mr. Herbert Burrows, who is not a member of the N. S. S., but is an old enemy of the Blasphemy Laws, made an excellent chairman, and explained the "abolitionists'" position in a compact little speech, which was loudly cheered. Mr. Arthur B. Moss occupied a seat on the platform. A resolution of protest against Mr. Stewart's imprisonment was carried unanimously. It was short and sharp, and ran as follows: "That this meeting protests against the imprisonment for blasphemy of Mr. T. W. Stewart, and calls upon the Government to release him forthwith and put an end to the possibility of such an outrage on personal liberty occurring again."

The London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner takes place at Frascati's on Wednesday evening, January 28. Mr. Foote will take the chair as President of the National Secular Society, and will be "supported" by Mr. Cohen, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Moss, and other well-known speakers. There are special reasons for a good rally this year, and the President hopes to see old friends as well as new ones. The reference to two hundred diners being all that Frascati's people can arrange for in the room engaged should not frighten any friends away. It was merely a friendly hint to certain friends, especially to those at a considerable distance, to make quite sure of their tickets.

Miss Vance asks us to invite friends who have tickets to dispose of to return those they feel assured of not getting rid of as early as possible, in order that she may make use of them otherwise.

A Burton-on-Trent subscriber writes as follows in renewing his Freethinker subscription:—

> "I read a great many papers and periodicals, but as a constant reader of the Freethinker (every word of it!) for more than 30 years I have to say of it that it is the best, the purest, the brightest, the clearest, the truest, the bravest, the cleverest, the wittiest, the most thoughtful, intellectual, honest, outspoken, truthful, and unbribable of them all. My debt to it is untold, incalculable, and can never be discharged."

This is a full measure of praise, pressed down and running over.

It is a sign of the times that Mr. Bottomley dealt with the "Kikuyu" trouble in last week's John Bull. His pointed and outspoken article ended with a laugh at what the Bishops are quarreling, and a quotation from Ingersoll to the effect that the mystery of things is understood by chimpanzees as well as by cardinals, by apes as well as by popes.

Without talking politics we venture to express our belief that the final and decisive retirement of Mr. Chamberlain from public life will allow the breath of a greater freedom to blow through the City of Birmingham. There seems a foretaste of this in the Gazette's editorial on the Stewart case, which we reproduce for our own pleasure and we are sure the pleasure of the great majority of our readers:—

> "Mr. McKenna's letter refusing to modify the sentence of four months' imprisonment passed at the Stafford Assizes on William Stewart for blasphemy is a keen disappointment to those of us who had supposed that Liberalism stood for freedom of thought, liberty of Press and platform, and equal treatment for all offenders. When men of eminence like Canon Cheyne, the head of the critical school in the Established Church, Dr. Clifford, and Dr. Estlin Carpenter join in protesting against such a sentence, it seems strange that a Liberal Home Secretary should lag behind them. Mr. McKenna's plea is that Stewart was sentenced, not for his opinions but because he expressed them publicly in a manner calculated to wound the feelings of others—a contention which is only another disguise for the old principles of intolerance by which the Blasphemy Laws were inspired. 'Bad taste' and 'vulgarity' are to be deprecated in all controversialists, but they are not the monopoly of one form of opinion. The Home Secretary makes his case worse by trying to palliate the sentence on the ground that Stewart was engaged in a neo-Malthusian propaganda. A pamphlet of that character formed the subject of a second indictment at Stafford Assizes, on which Stewart was acquitted, and Mr. Justice Coleridge specifically stated that in his sentence he was punishing Stewart only for the offence of blasphemy of which he had been convicted. It is grossly unfair that the Home Secretary should justify Stewart's sentence because of a charge of which he was acquitted by the jury."

The Birmingham of the old days speaks in that leaderette.

The Gazette did even better than that. It not only printed an excellent letter from Mr. John Breese but it returned to the subject on its own account. Two days later another editorial appeared, from which we make the following extracts:—

"It may not be easy for Mr. Asquith to censure the Home Secretary by reversing his judgment, but the principle involved is of more vital importance than Mr. McKenna's official status or personal feelings.....Nobody pretends that Mr. Stewart used nice language, or language that we should like to see made common in controversy. At the same time, vulgarity is neither a crime nor a monopoly. It is one of the abominable absurdities of the musty law under which Mr. Stewart was convicted that it only protects the established religion. 'Not only are some Christian religions entirely unprotected,' said Professor Geldart recently, 'but the peculiar doctrines of non-established Christian bodies, such as the Roman Catholic doctrine of the Mass or the beliefs of Unitarians, may be wantonly insulted so far as the law of blasphemy goes.' No Liberalism worth its salt will tolerate the pernicious discrimination and punctilious application of a law so self-condemned on all grounds of religious and civil fairness."

Stands Birmingham where it did? No. It is moving forward—and at a good pace too.

One point in Mr. Breese's excellent letter deserves special notice. After mentioning the high character of so many of the signatories to the petition for Mr. Stewart's release he continued: "But all these were ignored, and will be ignored, until one of these cases is taken to the Court of Appeal. The President of the National Secular Society offered to do this in the Stewart case, but, unfortunately, his proferred help and expert advice were declined." Mr. Breese recognises the vital point of the whole case, which was bungled from the very first. It was his own fault originally in thinking too much of himself, and too little of the Freethought party's interest in the fight for the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. And it was the fault afterwards of the extraordinary ineptitude of the "friends" who got around him. Mr. Stewart himself does not always seem to be in his right senses; of his "friends" one must go to Dante for the proper words to say of them—Non ragionem di lor, ma guarda e passa.

We have pleasure in quoting the following paragraph from last week's Inquirer (Unitarian):—

"It is hardly necessary for us to add that we do not for one moment palliate the conduct of Stewart, or underestimate the danger to public morals, if he has offended in the way suggested. We wish that we could have made our protest against the Blasphemy Laws in a case which had not so many unpleasant features associated with it. But we must ask our readers to keep the distinction clearly in their minds between a public attack upon the Christian religion—the technical offence of blasphemy—and offences of an entirely different kind, which may deserve severe punishment when they can be brought home to the offender in a court of law. We object to prosecutions under the obsolete blasphemy laws as contrary to public policy and the true interests of religion, whether the accused be a scoundrel or a saint."

The last sentence hits the right nail well on the head.

We have often thought of making a collection of Ingersoll's best bons mots. We come across new ones now and then, even at this time of day. Ingersoll said once, in conversation, that England reminded him of a burglar with a white necktie. A palpable hit at John Bull's behavior in all parts of the world where anything is to be appropriated.

TRUE COURAGE.

I honor the man who is willing to sink
Half his present repute for the freedom to think;
And when he has thought, be his cause strong or weak,
Will sink t'other half for the freedom to speak;
Not caring what vengeance the mob has in store,
Be that mob the upper ten thousand or lower.

Professor Bonney on Religion and Science.

"A man may reach the loftiest pinnacle of scientific glory whose heart has never heaved with one religious emotion. He may penetrate to the very holy of holies in nature's temple, and yet retain his Atheism, in spite of the hallowed influences that surround him. Nothing is plainer in theory, and, alas! nothing has been more surely confirmed by experience, than that the possession of science is not the possession of religion."—PROFESSOR HITCHCOCK, The Religion of Geology, p. 303.

"It is unfortunate to have a religion against which every good and noble heart protests. Let us have a good one or none. O! my pity has been excited by seeing these ministers endeavor to warp and twist the passages of Scripture to fit some demonstration in science. These pious evasions! these solemn pretences! When they are caught in one way they give a different meaning to the words, and say the world was not made in seven days. They say 'good whiles'—epochs."—COLONEL INGERSOLL, The Dying Creed, p. 18.

PROFESSOR BONNEY'S new book, The Present Relations of Science and Religion, is an interesting work, as any work needs must be, coming from one who is a Professor of Geology and a Canon of the Church of England. Here we shall have the reasons by means of which the author is enabled to run with the Church hare and follow with the hounds of science. It used to be the hare of science and the hounds of the Church, but the position is reversed now.

A good idea of the devastation wrought by science among religious beliefs may be gained by comparing this work with Professor Hitchcock's work on The Religion of Geology, written seventy years ago,* with precisely the same purpose; the author of which was also a Professor of Theology and Geology. This work was written before the advent of Darwinism, although the author laments the spread of Materialism and the use made of geological discoveries in attacking the Bible, and reluctantly confesses that the Deluge could not have been universal; yet, on p. 327, he gives a diagram, or geological column, beginning with the creation of the earth on the first day, the lowest forms of life on the second day, plants and fishes on the third day, and sun, moon, and stars on the fourth day! No more need be said. Every astronomer and geologist knows that millions of stars existed before the sun, that the sun existed many millions of years before the earth, and that the moon was thrown off from the earth while it was yet in a molten state, ages before any sign of life appeared on the earth's surface.

The writer also remarks that, in spite of the surrender of the universality of the Deluge,—

"the Bible has remained unaffected. The infidel felt confident that the arrows which he drew from this quiver would certainly pierce Christianity to the heart. But they rebounded from her adamantine breastplate, blunted and broken; and no one will have the courage to pick them up and hurl them again" (p. 99).

Let us see how the Bible stands to-day. Professor Bonney—who, by the way, admits nothing which he is not obliged, and takes refuge in all the holes and corners not yet explored by science—surrenders the scientific accuracy of the Bible, as follows:—

"The opening chapters of Genesis were formerly supposed to give the history of the early days of the earth more accurately than the Annals of Tacitus do that of his own age. We must frankly admit that at the present day no geologist of any repute would accept the narrative of the Deluge, or that of the episodes of the Creation, as actual history. Records of both of these are to be found on the clay tablets which once formed part of an Assyrian library, and they may be traced back from the later days of that monarchy to the times when the Semetic had hardly began to blend with the Sumerian race."†

Not only does the Professor give up the Creation and Deluge stories, but he candidly admits that the Darwinian theory of the origin of species is scientifically proved. He tells us that when Darwin published his Origin of Species, he frankly acknowledged that the geological evidence, though strong in some places, was weak in others, attributing this to the imperfections in the geological record, and suggesting that the missing links would be found by later discoverers. "That," observes Professor Bonney, "has been done to an extent to satisfy the expectations even of the most sanguine" (p. 53). And further:—

* Published in 1851, but mostly written, says the author, "eight or ten years ago"; preface, p. 5.

> "Thus, the past history of plant-life, though on the whole it is rather less complete, confirms that of animal life, and we can confidently affirm that the facts which have been discovered since 1859 show that the gaps which then existed in the Geological Record have been largely filled up, and that evidence has been obtained which justifies the assertion that a process of evolution holds good in all parts of the earth, among all forms of life, both high and low, and throughout the whole course of terrestrial history."

Upon this point Professor Bonney speaks with authority, as, being a Professor of Geology, it lies peculiarly within his province. It is worthy of note that, in the science with which he is familiar, and in which he is an expert, he can find no support, but positive contradiction, to the Bible. Therefore, whatever support the writer gives to religion cannot be said to be founded upon his independent discoveries and researches in science; for he himself says, "I cannot venture to speak as an expert outside the particular branch at which I have worked. I have therefore preferred, in dealing with these results, to quote from some recognised authority rather than put his opinion into my own words" (p. 8).

In his chapter on "Recent Advances in Physical Science," Professor Bonney relies wholly upon such writers as Sir Oliver Lodge, Mr. Whetham, and De Tunzlemann, all theologians disguised as scientists, the only one cited on the other side being Professor Haeckel, but only cited for the purpose of attacking. In this connection we should like to point out that while the Nonconformist clergy—with a mixture of ignorance and malignity—treat Haeckel as though he was some ignorant little schoolboy, and they were schoolmasters, Professor Bonney knows better, and, though he accuses Haeckel of begging the question, he acknowledges his "wide knowledge of and valuable researches in biology" (p. 29); although we are sorry to see that he reproduces some insolent remarks regarding Haeckel, by De Tunzlemann; also the remark of Sir Oliver Lodge that it is impossible for a physicist to discuss, "within the terms of courtesy, the physical hypothesis which forms the basis of" Haeckel's Riddle of the Universe. Well, there is nothing remarkable about that; very few Christians are able to discuss Atheism "within the terms of courtesy," and, although the tone of Professor Bonney's work is far above the scurrility of the common or garden Christian Evidencer, yet even he cannot avoid the following flash: "A bald and blatant Atheism does, unfortunately, find more favor with the quarter-educated crowd." If Professor Bonney had studied the writings of the opponents of Christianity and religion as much as he has studied the apologists of them, he would have left this unsaid. In fact, he never really comes to grips with the Atheist at all, and those who go to the book for a confutation of Atheism will find nothing of what they want. In the meanwhile, he grants the evolution of plants and animals, and, indeed, finds the origin of the world and all its inhabitants, in the atoms of the Materialist, and he grants that these, in turn, are evolved from the ether; but his mind oscillates between science and religion. Replying to the objection that the evolutionist is prevented from accepting any revelation which is not gradual in its action, like the processes of ordinary growth, he observes:—

> "But we must remember that there are not a few authorities in zoology who would strongly repudiate anything like creation, as this was formerly understood, and yet believe that there are occasionally 'jumps' in the passage from one species to another, and many suppose, that notwithstanding a recent discussion, a break can still be found between the animate and the inanimate, between living and dead protoplasm, and even if we admit that, as we have endeavored to indicate, everything may be reduced to ether and electricity, yet even then a gap exists between that ether and its 'granulated' state as matter." *

That is to say that in all those problems of which science has not yet discovered the natural cause, the believer is entitled to say "it is the work of God." Very well, so be it; but in that case his religion has but a precarious existence, subject to constant alarms lest science should penetrate these mysteries upon which his religion depends. The past history of the warfare of science with religion proves this. At one time it was asked "Who made the world?" And when the nebular hypothesis solved the problem of the origin of stars and plants, the believer was ready with another mystery, "Who made the animals and plants?" And when Darwin solved that question with his book on the Origin of Species, the question was shifted to, "Who made man?" which he answered by his Descent of Man. Now, they ask, "Who made life?" The scientists reply, "If you will have a little patience and wait, we shall probably be able to explain the natural evolution of the living from the non-living, as we are actively engaged upon the problem now. And, as we have been so successful in explaining the natural origin of worlds, plants, animals, and man, so we have not the least doubt that we shall ultimately solve the problem of the origin of life."

The "gaps" in our knowledge are closing up. The fortress of religion is beleaguered. The advance guard of science is ever pushing forward; it is gradually encircling the walls of superstition, and when the circle is complete, there will be no gaps—as Professor Bonney calls them—by which the supernatural can intrude into the ordered domain of nature.

Further on, the claim for the interference of God at certain stages in the course of nature is altogether abandoned, as follows:—

> "Pantheism in some important respects comes nearer to the truth than that vague and indefinite dualism which contrasts God and His works and regards the universe as an elaborate piece of mechanism which, though once devised by Him, is not adequate or adapted for all possible contingencies, but requires Him to 'interfere,' as an engineer must occasionally do with a complicated machine, either to adjust it or add some temporary contrivance" (p. 138).

We shall come nearer the truth, he continues, if we say that in one sense all things are equally natural, "for they are all the outcome of law"; while in another sense "everything is supernatural," because we can follow the evolution from the complex to the simple; yet "we come at last to the cloud of impenetrable mystery, and begin to realise the significance of that phrase in the Book of Exodus, "Man shall not see me and live."

But if the universe and God are one and indivisible—as the Pantheist asserts—it is difficult to understand how anyone could see God, whether he lived or died as the consequence. For the rest, it is true that modern religion, pursued by its enemies, at last takes refuge in a "cloud of impenetrable mystery," being, in this respect, not unlike the cuttlefish, which surrounds itself with an inky fluid to escape observation. But it is the business of science to clear up mysteries; and religion will maintain but a shivering existence among these clouds.

Of the Pantheism of the ancients, Epicurus and Lucretius—who held that the gods had created the universe and then left it to its fate—he observes: "This, of course, is not Atheism, but so far as any practical results are likely to go, it is no great improvement" (p. 93); yet he thinks a form of Pantheism possible in which God and the universe might be regarded as one, and yet "that this God might love the world as, and because, it was a part of himself." The rock upon which Pantheism—as a religious system—splits, is the fact that if God and the universe are one, then man, who is a part of the universe, is also a part of God, and if he prays he is partly praying to himself. In other words, it does away with the personality of God; for you cannot have God and the universe as one and yet regard God as a person who sees and hears, and who can be prayed to and supplicated. As Schopenhauer truly remarked—Professor Bonney gives the quotation from Haeckel's Riddle of the Universe:—

> "Pantheism is only a polite form of Atheism. The truth of Pantheism lies in its destruction of the dualist antithesis of God and the world, in its recognition that the world exists in virtue of its own inherent forces. The maxim of the Pantheist, God and the world are one, is merely a polite way of giving the Lord God His congé."

The chapter entitled "The Credibility of Christianity" is a peculiarly futile performance; the Professor appears to think that if it can only be proved that the Gospels were written by, or during, the time of the Apostles whose names they bear, then we ought to believe in them as historical documents. He appears to be quite unaware that criticism has long passed this point. That it is not a question now of the authenticity of the Gospels that Christians have to defend, but whether there ever existed such a person as Jesus Christ or not. Professor Bonney has performed the feat of writing a defence of Christianity without mentioning Robertson's Pagan Christs, Professor Drew's Christ Myth, and Professor Benjamin Smith's Ecce Deus, to say nothing of Dr. Frazer's Golden Bough, which—in spite of its author's concession of the historical existence of Jesus as a man—is calculated to raise insuppressible doubts upon the subject. Whether this is due to an ostrich policy of burying the head in the sand to escape its enemies, or because Professor Bonney does not study his opponents' case, and has found no mention of the subject in the numerous apologetic works he cites from, we are unable to say; but the fact remains that this part of the work is about twenty years behind the times.

For a man of Professor Bonney's ability, the whole book is an exceedingly poor one. In spite of the rush of Rationalist and Freethought works from the press of late years, Haeckel's Riddle of the Universe is the only one noticed, and that only slightly. All the others works cited are apologies for religion or neutral. Professor Bonney, instead of coming as a scientific champion to the assistance of religion, appears to us as one who has himself had to wrestle with doubt, and has eagerly sought fresh air for faith in the apologies offered in defence of Christianity.

The work is more likely to raise doubts than to still them; especially the chapter—founded upon White's Warfare of Science—in which he, metaphorically speaking, stands in sackcloth and ashes; and proves how the Church in all ages has been the deadly opponent of science. We would welcome a few more chapters upon this subject—there is plenty of material—from Professor Bonney.

W. MANN.

The Locomotive Organs of Animals.

PLANTS possess the power of assimilating lifeless substances such as carbonic acid gas (carbon dioxide, CO_2) and mineral salts. Animals, on the other hand, require a supply of complex, living matter for their nourishment. As these organic foods do not come to animals, there arose the necessity for the power of movement, and to this end innumerable devices have been developed in the zoological kingdom.

As animal organisms developed in structure and function, the need of movement from place to place became essential. In consequence of this, the organs which assumed the responsibilities of transferring the animal from one spot to another usually took the form of elongations or processes projecting from its body. Moreover, in connection with these processes, which, in the higher animals take the form of fins, wings, arms, and legs, special muscular tissue was evolved for the purpose of securing the motion in question.

The energy essential to this power of movement is derived from the decomposition of the complex food substances which animals assimilate.

In some of the simpler animal creatures movement is secured through the protrusion of protoplasmic processes, as in the well-known instance of the amœba, whilst in other single-celled organisms it is made possible by the presence of minute filaments, resembling hairs, which are termed cilia or flagella. These processes move to and fro, and in this way propel the tiny creatures through the running brook or stagnant pool in which they dwell. But in the more advanced forms of life muscles are the chief agents in producing movement; they are, indeed, the driving forces of the various organs employed in locomotion.

As we ascend the ladder of life the more specialised become the instruments which secure motion. And among those vertebrate organisms, of which man is the highest product, some of the most remarkable locomotive adaptations are to be met with. As muscles render the fullest service when they have some rigid body to pull against, special hard parts of the animal frame were evolved for their support. With invertebrate animals the same result has been reached through the development of a hardened integument such as shells and leathery skins. But with backboned creatures, however, internal supports were evolved in the form of bone. The skeleton of these is a bony structure which not only provides greater play for the muscles but also serves to support the weight of the body and to preserve its shape.

Locomotion being so essential to the well-being of multicellular life, the bodily forms of vertebrates are so fashioned that they easily overcome the antagonistic incident forces of their environment. In other words, the shape of the body is such that it offers the least resistance to the medium in which the animal lives, whether its habitat be aquatic or terrestrial. With fishes, for instance, the body and its organs are specially adapted to meet the requirements of their watery home:—

> "Their bodies are elongated and flattened laterally, pointed in front and tapering behind, to offer as little resistance as possible when moving through the water. The head joins the trunk directly, so that no appearance of a neck is seen. The tapering hinder end of the body expands into a powerful tail set on vertically. The paired fins correspond to the front and hind limbs of the higher classes of vertebrates, but are much simpler in form; unpaired fins are also present. Locomotion is effected principally by the waving of the tail and the flexion of the body, the fins serving chiefly for balancing purposes."

Various very striking adaptations to their medium are afforded by the penguins, seals, porpoises, and whales. The modifications which these last have undergone are indeed remarkable. Those sea-dwelling mammals, the porpoises and whales, which are justly regarded as the descendants of four-footed terrestrial ancestors, have assumed such a fish-like appearance that until comparatively recent years they were regarded as fishes even by students of nature, a circumstance which still survives in the term "whale fisheries."

Every vertebrated animal possesses a long bony axis which is known as the vertebral column. This runs through the length of the body, and thus forms a firm foundation around which the body is built up. At one end the backbone terminates in a bony chamber, the brain-box or skull, which contains the brain and sense organs, whilst at the other extremity it usually tapers off gradually to form the tail. As a rule, two pairs of appendages are attached to the bony column, whose duty it is to perform the function of locomotion. Whether these appendages assume the form of fins, arms, legs, or wings, the paired arrangement of the limbs enables the organism to maintain its balance; although, as previously intimated, fishes are furnished with additional unpaired fins.

Further interesting phenomena are disclosed by a fuller and more detailed examination of the anatomy of the animal body. Not for purposes of locomotion alone is the power of movement required. The comforts and conveniences of general life also demand adaptive power, and as a result endless modifications have arisen to meet this necessity.

The mechanical contrivances contained in the body of that faithful and intelligent creature, the dog, afford an excellent illustration of this. The canine body is composed of an axial portion (head, trunk, and tail) and an appendicular portion (limbs), the foundation being the backbone. Hence, if this foundation were formed of one unending bone, its rigidity would necessarily seriously incommode the bodily movements of the animal, and would render the body liable to sudden shocks and jars. To avoid such inconveniences, while at the same time securing a sufficiently firm support, the backbone is made up of a chain of bony rings termed vertebræ, "fitted end to end, so as to form a canal or tube, which contains the spinal cord." Lying between these rings are pads of gristle, which deaden shocks, and, in addition, the bones are bound together by tough ligaments. Thus, the vertebral column, though essentially one body, has been so adapted that it permits a certain amount of pliability.

The skull is attached to the first vertebra, or atlas, and this attachment is so arranged that the head is at liberty to move up and down just as if it were on a hinge. In addition to this, the head and the atlas together are capable of moving from side to side around a projecting pivot on the second vertebra—the axis. In this way the head is enabled to nod or to shake.

The skull is divided into the brain cavity and the facial section. The brain-box is built up of flattened bone plates, which form a rigid covering for that delicate organ, the brain. In the facial portion of the skull, the only movable part is the lower jaw bone, which is joined to the base of the skull, and its power of movement is essential to the mastication of food.

When we examine the structure of the chest, we discover that its expansion and contraction are essential to the process of respiration, and the ribs are so arranged as to provide for the necessary movement. As Randal Mundy writes in his excellent Biology :—

> "This freedom of movement is brought about by the rounded top of each rib fitting into a hollow cavity on the outside face of a vertebra, and by the lower end of the rib being either fastened to the breastbone by flexible gristle or ending freely without any attachment."

The upper and lower extremities, the arms and legs, are attached to the trunk by means of bony girdles. The fore limbs possess a wider range of movement than the hind limbs, and in consequence of this the hand and arm have become of vast importance to such animals as monkeys and men. Even in the case of the scratching dog, the fore feet are of far greater service than the hind feet to the animal.

Although the skeleton of a frog is built upon the same general plan as that of dogs and apes, it displays several distinctive features which mark it off from the anatomical arrangements of these higher vertebrates. These differences have arisen from its unlike mode of life. The frog is a poor and lumbering walker, but it leaps well on land and swims readily in the water. We therefore find that the amphibian's hind limbs have been splendidly adapted to these special modes of movement. The hind limbs are unusually long, are well provided with strong muscles, and are bent back upon themselves so that the frog may move forward by their sudden extension. The frog's strongly developed webbed feet, again, furnish an excellent leverage for leaping and swimming alike. And, in addition, the vertebral column has been so modified that it provides an increased support to the hind limbs. To a squatting and leaping animal a tail is an unnecessary burden, and the caudal appendage which the frog carries during its tadpole period is discarded as soon as it reaches its land-dwelling stage.

In surveying bird life we meet with other adaptive devices for purposes of locomotion. In handling a bird's skeleton the attention is at once arrested by its surprising lightness. This structural feature is an immense advantage to birds that are constantly on the wing. The following noteworthy adaptations present themselves in connection with the power of flight. The tail and wing feathers are well-developed; many of the bones are hollow and contain air, instead of marrow. In most cases, these pneumatic structures are the wing bones, breast bone, and some of the cranium bones. In some birds, however, the ribs, pelvis, and thigh bones, and even the vertebræ, are hollow also. With birds the head enjoys a freer movement than that of the dog. The neck is usually longer than in mammals, thus securing a wider range of movement for the head. Long legs are correlated with long necks, and greater facilities are in this way afforded for feeding. Various other adaptations occur, all tending to bring the animal into harmony with its environment. When walking or roosting, a bird is a biped, and in consequence the leg-bones and the pelvis have to bear the weight of the body, just as they do with ourselves. The toes betray a dwindling tendency, and they vary considerably in structure in different species. Some are furnished with talons, while others have been modified for running, hopping, perching, or for swimming.

Among backboned organisms the caudal appendage is almost universal. In man and the manlike apes it survives as an attenuated relic of former utility. Whether all life arose from the primitive oceans or not, the earliest vertebrates were most certainly aquatic creatures. In the fish family the tail is employed as a means of propulsion through the waters in which they dwell. All vertebrate denizens of the seas and lakes are provided with tails, which they utilise for forcing their bodies through the water, as well as for steering purposes. With the evolution of higher forms of life, many animals struggled to the shore, and their tails underwent those transformations which were rendered imperative by their changed surroundings. Where no longer necessary, their tails became rudimentary, or were modified so as to serve some new need. In the contemporary horse and cow the tail is used as a whip to drive off troublesome insects; among other animals it serves to shield the rectum. Climbing animals employ the appendage as a balancing organ; with monkeys and other creatures it has been modified into a prehensile organ which enables these animals to cling to the branches of trees; while in birds it fulfils the function of a steering apparatus.

We thus see that from the pseudopodia and cilia of unicellular organisms all the most highly elaborated instruments of animal locomotion have been evolved. Every available scrap of evidence points to these evolved products as the outcome of purely natural causes, and of these alone. The power of the adaptive process is everywhere manifested, but for the exercise of creative energy or guidance no particle of evidence is anywhere to be found.

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 4 SUNDAY, JANUARY 25, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

To grow up in a narrow creed and to grow out of it is a tremendous trial of one's nature.
—OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

Dodging Persecution.

IT seems strange that anybody should be prosecuted for libelling a Ghost, and stranger still that the aggrieved Ghost should not be required to appear in court, or even to send a blood relation. But this is a strange world, and the unexpected is always happening. Things may be ordered differently in some other part of the universe; but this planet of ours is, and always has been, the home of as much folly and stupidity as could well be concentrated in so small a space. The fool-crop, as Heine said, is perennial; if you reap it down in one generation it springs up almost as lively as ever in the next.

Matters, however, were worse once, so we need not absolutely despair. Time was, that if you breathed a word against a Ghost, you were not even treated with the ceremony of a trial, but just had your brains knocked out on the spot. Now you are treated less summarily, and there is a chance of "the law's delay" mitigating the savagery of superstition. Yet the Ghost's friends are still so powerful and numerous that, if they once taste the pleasure of hunting down heretics, they are likely to continue the pastime until they are thoroughly satiated.

Now all hunted creatures, if not rapidly exterminated, perforce develop a capacity for evasion. Even philosophers, said Voltaire, should have plenty of holes to run to when the priests are on their track. And that supple and dexterous heretic certainly practised this doctrine to some purpose; for he doubled and shifted like any old fox, and led his persecutors a wild dance for more than fifty years; during the whole of which time he ravaged their territory without their ever once getting properly on his scent.

If you wish to visit a certain spot, and there are two ways of reaching it, one direct and the other circuitous; and if by taking the straight route you are sure to meet a large band of well-armed assassins; you naturally take the other route; for although it is a long way round, you do reach your object at last. And if the assassins got wind of your movements, and shifted accordingly, you would naturally find out, if possible, a third way to avoid them. Always providing that as soon as you have friends enough to meet the rascals on equal terms, you will walk boldly up the straight road, and blow them to Hades, or whatever place in the universe affords hospitality to the souls of murderous blackguards. This proviso saves your valor from being all discretion, and makes your prudence honorable.

It will not be amiss to take a brief historical survey of the strategy of sceptics, and to point out how one might carry on a covert war on the Christian superstition by opposing cunning to force.

If we go back to the Renaissance we shall find the soldiers of progress fighting against terrible odds with nothing but a pen. But how they plied that weapon! Not daring to assail God, they struck at his friends. Merry tales were circulated at the expense of priests. The greatest fool, drunkard, glutton, and profligate of the story was sure to be a monk. These predatory vermin are satirised in scores of French fabliaux and Italian novelle, and even the gentle Boccaccio ridiculed them on page after page of his golden book, playing about them the soft summer-lightning of his wit.

His countryman, the fiery-souled Bruno, followed a somewhat different plan, as did many of his French contemporaries. He quizzed the gods of Paganism in such a way that the wise reader could apply the satire to the gods of a later faith. When, in The Expulsion of the Triumphant Beast (Spaccio de la Bestia Trionfante) he wrote of deities who could "walk on the water and do other pretty tricks," his readers would naturally think of the natatory feat which Jesus Christ is alleged to have performed on the sea of Galilee. Bonaventure des Periers slants at the Christian deities in like fashion when he is making riotous fun of the Pagan gods and goddesses in his Cymbalum Mundi.

Poor Des Periers, however, was after all not astute enough to keep out of mischief. The keen-nosed priests scented his heresy and denounced him. Père Mersenne called him an "impious rogue"; M. De L'Estoille said he was "an Atheist, and unworthy the name of a man"; and Pasquier declared that he was "only fit to be thrown into the fire." This is how the beagles of persecution spoke of one of the finest writers of that epoch. His end is wrapped in some obscurity, but it seems that he fell on his own sword in prison to escape being roasted alive for the glory of God.

Rabelais was more fortunate. He dodged the enemy to the very last, and his Jovian laughter rang over the baffled pigmies. "After any particularly deep thrust," says Coleridge, "as if to break the blow, and to appear unconscious of what he has done, he writes a chapter or two of pure buffoonery." Rabelais had no taste for martyrdom and objected to dying out of bed. No doubt he expressed his own sentiment when he made Pantagruel quit the bigoted city of Toulouse, where they "stuck not to burn their regents alive like red herrings," saying: "Now God forbid that I should die this death, for I am by nature dry enough already without being heated any further." This grand thinker and humorist evaded many perils by his inexhaustible adroitness, and continued to a ripe age overwhelming the enemies of progress with a constant flood of irony.

We have already referred to Voltaire, who imitated Rabelais to some extent, three centuries later. Voltaire published many of his attacks on Christianity anonymously, and sometimes he attributed his pieces to other authors; as in the case of the Epitre à Uranie, which was ascribed to Chaulieu, and the Examen, which was ascribed to Bolingbroke. Condorcet justifies Voltaire's conduct in this respect. He writes (Vie de Voltaire, p. 32):—

> "The necessity of lying in order to disavow any work, is an extremity equally repugnant to conscience and nobleness of character; but the crime lies with those unjust men, who render such disavowal necessary to the safety of him whom they force to it. If you have made a crime of that which is not one; if, by absurd or by arbitrary laws, you have infringed the natural right which all men have, not only to form an opinion, but to render it public; then you deserve to lose the right which every man has of hearing the > truth from the mouth of another; a right, which is the sole basis of that obligation, not to lie. If it is not permitted to deceive, the reason is, that to deceive anyone, is to do him a wrong, or expose yourself to do him one; but a wrong supposes a right; and no one has the right of seeking to secure himself the means of committing an injustice."

Carlyle calls this Jesuitry in disguise, and sneers at Condorcet for putting forward such a plea. Yet we humbly opine that Carlyle's judgment in this matter is not worth very much. Both he and Mill kept back from the world a good deal of their convictions, although they had to face no greater foe than Bumble and Mrs. Grundy. Condorcet was an exceptionally honest man, and he was not likely to screen Voltaire or anyone else with a false plea. He knew the difficulties of the case, and could properly estimate the dangers in Voltaire's path. We agree with him that the persecutors' party have no right to complain. Their brutality is responsible for all the evasion. Voltaire's high courage was proved too often to be doubted. Who shall accuse the protector of Sirven and the vindicator of Calas of cowardice? Voltaire was assuredly no coward. But he had to fight single-handed an unscrupulous and powerful enemy. He matched his wit and finesse against all their strength—and won!

Mill somewhere (was it in a conversation with John Morley?) indulged in a cheap sneer at Gibbon's "insincere style." This is simply absurd. Gibbon's irony was necessitated by the Christian law, which sent Woolston to gaol for saying that the miracles of Christ were allegories, and Peter Annett for saying that the Pentateuch was not inspired. Everybody fit to read the Decline and Fall could understand exactly what Gibbon meant. He deceived nobody, but simply protected himself against a brutal law. When he wrote "it was not in this world that the Christians expected to be either happy or useful," his readers understood him as plainly as if he had said that "they were unsocial fanatics."

The same criticism applies to all the great eighteenth-century Deists; to Anthony Collins, to Lord Bolingbroke, and especially to David Hume, whose grave satire, in the Essay on Miracles, is simply inimitable. In plain language his last paragraph comes to this: that Christianity is a religion of miracle, and that no man can believe it without having a miracle worked inside him. Hume had an eye to the Blasphemy Laws. And there could be no doubt as to the danger; for when Thomas Paine put the scepticism of Bolingbroke, Gibbon, and Hume into direct and vigorous language for the common people, the cry of "Blasphemy" was raised by the Church and its dupes, as if Silenus and his ass had joined in a common bray.

Recurring to France, we may notice a delightful bit of strategy on the part of Diderot and D'Alembert. They once had a long chat on religion in a café, and in order to baffle a listening police-spy they agreed to call the Trinity by fictitious names. God the Father, if we remember rightly, figured as Monsieur Lepère, and Jesus Christ as Monsieur Lenfant. When the conversation ended the spy came up and politely asked who were the Messieurs Lepère and Lenfant that had been described as such dreadful characters. "Oh," said Diderot, with an innocent look, "they were two police spies."

Might we not, if the worst came to the worst, go in for something of that kind? We might even dispense with names altogether, and use algebraic symbols. (x) would do capitally for God, the great unknown. The minus sign ($-$) would do for our old friend Jahveh, as signifying that he is worse than no God at all. The plus sign ($+$) would serve for Jesus Christ, as signifying the cross on which he had his last cold spread. And if we were put to it we should probably succeed in working out appropriate signs for all the heavenly host.

Richard Carlile, whose untameable heroism is alone enough to inspire men with courage, tricked his persecutors in a way which we have no doubt sent a laugh through Hades, and even made old Monsieur Lepère smile upon his throne. The much prosecuted publisher, after he and his family and a dozen shopmen had gone to prison, devised a dial with a revolving hand and a list of his publications. The customer turned the hand to the name of the work he wanted, and it was passed through an aperture. No vendor was seen, and therefore sale could not be proved. Mrs. Carlile did a roaring trade, and all over the country the reformers toasted "Carlile's invisible shopman."

If one were only prosecuted and punished under the Act of William the Third, what a splendid comedy might be performed! The last clause of that Act provides that any offender may obtain a discharge from all penalties and disabilities by going to the court within four months after conviction, and making acknowledgment and renunciation. Suppose one took advantage of this proviso; what a howl would go up from the bigots all over the country, like a pack of hounds who have lost the game!

G. W. FOOTE.

When They Find Out.

ONE of the speakers at a religious conference held in Islington the other day said that the Rev. Dr. Forsyth had told him that in his opinion there were troublesome times in store for the Churches. The congregations, said Dr. Forsyth, had not as yet begun to realise the full bearings of modern criticism, and that before the ultimate adjustment took place there would be a very trying time in the Churches. It was not reported what this ultimate adjustment would be like. Apparently it was assumed that when people did understand the meaning of modern critical attacks on religion there would be a passing "shindy," and then there would emerge that much-talked-of "purified" faith, with the clergy re-established in full possession, and unbelief surviving as a mere intellectual curiosity.

The confession was, however, interesting. It was an admission of the truth, so often pointed out in these columns, that the great mass of religionists have really no conception either of the nature of modern critical attacks on religion, or of the way in which these have completely shattered the orthodox Christian structure. They know, in a hazy sort of way, that Christian doctrines are called in question, but they do not fully realise why, and the clergy—Dr. Forsyth among them—take care that their ignorance shall be as complete and as long sustained as possible. One need only study those sermons in which attacks on religion are dealt with to see how this ignorance is maintained. Anti-religious criticisms are presented by the preacher in the crudest possible manner—generally he retails a form of attack that was current a century or so ago, and the congregation depart in the full belief that they have heard the worst that can be said against their creed. In reality they have been told just enough to keep them from inquiring further, and that is generally what the preacher is aiming at.

The confession was also interesting because it, quite unconsciously, displayed the clergy in their true colors. Dr. Forsyth was not referring to the general public, but to "our congregations"—to the people, that is, who had been under the direct influence of the clergy, and had looked to them for light and leading in matters of religion. It was they who were in the dark, and it was from them that trouble was expected when they began to appreciate the position. But suppose the clergy had dealt honestly and faithfully with their congregations; suppose they had kept them informed of the results of modern scholarship and the trend of modern criticism; what cause would there be to fear trouble? Obviously, none. They would not only be aware that their beliefs were questioned; they would know why—on what grounds; and their remaining in the Church would be an evidence that they considered these attacks ineffective. At present their remaining

Church-worshipers is proof only that they do not know. And their not knowing is indisputable evidence that the clergy have been hiding the truth from them—not always telling them direct lies, but always suppressing part of the truth.

For here is the essence, and the evil, of the situation. To "our congregations" the clergy are the recognised authorities on religion. When a newspaper refers to an "authority on religion" it has not in mind a man like Frazer, or Tylor, or Spencer—any one of whom knows more about religion than any number of parsons; it is thinking of some well-known theologian whose knowledge consists of dogmas and doctrines, of church ceremonies or ecclesiastical frills. Of course, this is sheer superstition. It is a survival from the time when priests were believed to be, in a very peculiar sense, the representatives of Deity. They could then give information about religion because they were the only ones "in the know." To-day conditions have changed. The people who know all about religion are those who do not believe in it. Those who believe in it do not know. Our knowledge about religion has been derived, in the main, from outsiders—or, rather, they became outsiders because of the knowledge they acquired. And these authorities use Christianity and its clergy exactly as they use savage cults and their priests. The one illustrates and illuminates the other. We know the meaning of Christianity only when we appreciate the workings of the savage mind. We understand the savage mind only when we note its survival in current Christianity. That is why there is likely to be trouble when "our congregations" grasp the full meaning of modern criticism.

But Dr. Forsyth and his kind are here; and their business is to delay the coming of that knowledge as long as may be. Between the congregation and the expert on religion stands the parson. He is, consciously or unconsciously, all the time engaged in a conspiracy that aims at keeping his people in ignorance. Consider for how long the very alphabet of Biblical criticism was kept away from the congregation by the pulpit. And even when the truth, or some of it, is reluctantly admitted, the game of mystification is still pursued. In sermon after sermon preachers refer to what our Lord said, or what Moses said, or what someone else said, and the scenes and circumstances are described direct from the Bible as though their genuineness had never been questioned. And the net result of this procedure is that the ordinary listener leaves the Church with his mind practically undisturbed as to the accuracy of the Biblical account. It is true he knows that criticisms are offered, but the constant use of the Bible in the old way, its habitual treatment in church and chapel as a trustworthy historical narrative, prevents him seeing the bearings of this criticism on his belief.

Anyone who understands the present position of the study of religion knows that the essential issue rests with the anthropologist. If his account of the subject is correct, nothing else matters. If the belief in a God owes its origin to a personification of natural forces, or to the savage fear of the ghost; if the belief in a soul has a similar origin, what is the use of all this discussion about man's consciousness of God and the like? The forms of religion, the various beliefs about God and the soul, are still interesting subjects of study, but their value is precisely the value of a classification and study of folk tales and fairy legends. It is instructive to know how they originated and what influence they exerted, but that is all. They remain delusions, no matter how fervently they may have been believed, no matter how refined or rationalised. You cannot rationalise a lie into truth, or a delusion into a reality. At most you can only befool yourself as a preliminary to befooling others. How long will it be before "our congregations" realise this? And what will happen to the Churches when they do?

A century ago a vital question at issue was "Is the Bible true?" To-day, the question to an informed mind is largely without meaning. That it is not true, as a sober record of historic fact, is obvious. The utmost that one can grant is that it is psychologically true—that is, it faithfully reflects the ideas and beliefs and the knowledge of those who wrote it. Well, we need not question it. It is hardly worth discussing. Suppose someone called Jesus—to whom was given the title of "Christ"—actually lived. Suppose that Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, actually lived at the same time, and wrote the Four Gospels that we possess. Suppose they believed all the miracles recorded, and faithfully recorded their convictions. Suppose all this, and more, what does it matter? It does not in the least prove these stories to be true. The belief of a present day Salvation Army convert proves as much as St. Paul proves, and his testimony is quite as convincing. Both of them believed these things. That is really all there is in it. And no one disputes the belief. The only question at issue is why these things are believed. It is not a question of historical verification of fact, but of the prevalence of certain psychological conditions. And these may be understood more surely by studying primitive Christian history in the light of a Salvation Army meeting, than by explaining a revival meeting in terms of some assumed supernatural happenings of two thousand years ago.

Modern criticism does not attack by mere denial, but by explanation. Mere denial was the first crude revolt of the intellect against an absurd proposition. Faced with the demand to believe in the reality of events that were contradicted by everyday experience, the bolder minds simply denied their truth. Later came a more sustained examination and the cultivation of a more scientific frame of mind. It was seen that the question of questions was not whether certain things really happened, but why people believed they happened? It is not a vital question now whether witches travelled through the air on broomsticks a couple of centuries ago, but how people came to believe in this method of locomotion? It is not a question of whether the "Holy Ghost" spoke to the disciples, but how they came to believe it? We need not trouble whether it is a supernatural influence that is responsible for the conversions at a revival meeting, but how people came to entertain such a ridiculous notion? Once these questions are answered, nothing of any vital consequence remains.

Now, suppose that by some miracle all the church congregations of the world realised that this was really the essence of modern criticism, how much of Christianity would there be left in the course of a generation or so? They would realise that it was not a question of religious facts versus scientific fancies and theories, but the other way about. It is the scientist who has all the facts, the religionist who wallows in mere fancy. It is a fact that, given certain psychological conditions, the result is the prevalence of certain beliefs. We see it in the superstitious customs and beliefs of savages, the beliefs of childhood, and the superstitions of adult life. The facts that constitute the raw material of religion are not denied, it is the interpretation of these facts that creates an issue. To listen to the average parson, one would imagine that the modern critic proposed taking everything out of the religious man, and leave him a mere bag of emptiness. He aims at doing nothing of the kind. He takes him just as he is, only furnished with a new and more satisfactory understanding of himself.

Suppose, further, that "our congregations" realise that the great obstacle between them and the understanding of modern criticism is the parson. Suppose they awaken to the important truth that the policy of the pulpit is not to educate, but to confuse. That it first denies, then hides, then minimises; and, lastly, confuses the truth. What then? The ordinary layman has, obviously, no direct interest in believing a lie. The parson has an obvious interest in teaching one when its acceptance is the condition of his supremacy. Or, if that expression is considered too harsh, his interest lies in preventing his congregation knowing the whole truth about the religion he preaches. He may disguise this, even from himself, by vague talk concerning the duties of the pulpit, or the pulpit not being the place for the discussion of such questions, but the bald fact remains. But for the clergy the truth about religion would now be as common as the truth about geology or astronomy. It is they who stand between large numbers of people and its acquisition. And Dr. Forsyth may well feel that when Church and Chapel congregations realise the truth, there will be trouble. All the religions of the past have died of being found out, and there are signs that the Christian religion is seriously attacked with the same complaint.

C. COHEN.

Religion a Superfluity.

IF we consult any modern Dictionary we shall find that "religion" is a word the central meaning of which cannot be mistaken. In Nuttal's Standard Dictionary it is defined as "a habitual, all-pervading sense of dependence on, reverence for, and responsibility to, a higher power; or a mode of thinking, feeling, and acting, which respects, trusts in, strives after, the Divine, or God; any system of faith and worship." Webster's definition is practically identical, though more fully expanded and illustrated. The New Standard Dictionary, issued last year, is in substantial agreement with both Nuttal's and Webster's, but puts greater emphasis than either upon the supernatural character of religion. In theological books we read of two special kinds of religion, namely natural and revealed; but in both kinds man's dealings are with the supernatural. It is to be borne in mind, however, that attempts are being made, at present, by Positivists and Ethicists, to strip the term of its supernatural connotations. Whether such efforts are likely, or deserve, to be crowned with success or not, is a point with which this article is not in the least concerned. Our present purpose is to call attention to, with a view to condemning, a wholly illegitimate and vicious use of the word "religion" by professional exponents of its conventional signification. In the British Congregationalist for January 15, there was a notable article under the title of "Compulsory Moralities," from the pen of the Rev. A. C. Hill, of Tollington Park Congregational Church. Mr. Hill is an ingenious and resourceful thinker as well as a master in the art of expression. With two-thirds of the article under consideration we are happy to confess that we are in entire agreement. It is perfectly true that if a man is to live comfortably in society he must be loyal to the fundamental principles of social life. There are certain rules which require to be carefully observed, no matter what position one may occupy in society. Mr. Hill supplies a short list of situations in which sobriety, honesty, fidelity, and truth are indispensable virtues, and then adds: "Until one recognises the moralities, one can confer no benefit upon society." At this point, however, we are forced to part company with the reverend gentleman, and set ourselves in direct opposition to him.

Clever and, in some respects, far-seeing as he is, Mr. Hill is laboring under the commonest and most deplorable of religious delusions. We suspected this at an early stage in the progress of the article, when he referred to "a commissionaire connected with some big bank receiving £70 or £100 a year—probably less, certainly not much more." We asked ourselves, "Why this allusion to the smallness of the man's salary?" Though in receipt of such meagre pay, a commissionaire, when entrusted with perhaps a thousand pounds in Bank of England gold, is expected to watch over that amount with as much fidelity as if it were his own, to protect it from a thief, perhaps, even with his life. There is also a reference to a policeman who played the hero under most unfavorable conditions. He was in middle life and by no means strong. He was in charge of a certain factory. One night, at about one o'clock, a noted burglar entered, and at once the two men came into a conflict which lasted until half-past five. The result was that the burglar was ultimately taken to the police-station and the policeman permanently invalided. Having related that incident, Mr. Hill observes: "Now, that is an example of fidelity purchased at about thirty shillings a week." Again, we ask, why thus harp on the smallness of the pay? Here is the explanation:—

> "I wish that men would think about these things. For to think about them will lead inevitably to conclusions which are implicit in them, but do not appear on the surface. How can a man be a moral man and yet not believe in God, who is the foundation of all morality? How can a man talk about being loyal when he does not believe in a Divine Being, who rules the world, and has the first claim upon our loyalty? What right has an employer to say to me that I must respect the money in his till unless he and I believe in something that is infinitely more important than the cash?.....If the shopkeeper or business man understood he would know that the claim he makes upon the lowest office-boy in his employ is really an argument for religion."

Here is the delusion in all its shamelessness, and the mystery is how any sensible person could ever have become its victim. To see it in its native ghastliness we need only reverse some of Mr. Hill's questions; for example: How can a believer in God be an immoral man? How can a believer in a Divine Being, who rules the world, and has the first claim upon our loyalty, be yet continually guilty of disloyalty, not only to God, but to the essential principles of social life? Surely, Mr. Hill must be going about with his eyes closed if he is not aware that the majority, the overwhelming majority, of immoral, vile, and criminal people in Christendom are firm believers in God and a future life. The truth is that religion and morality are two entirely different things, and ought to be kept distinct. This is how Professor Peake treats the subject:—

> "I have sought to vindicate the radical distinction between religion and morality. They spring from wholly different instincts in our nature, and are often found acting in antagonism, or viewing each other with mutual distrust and disdain.....Religion and morality have each their due places in human life.....There are the people who have genuine religious feelings and desires, but combine with them a low moral standard. Partly this is due to the fact that they are much more developed on the religious than on the ethical side. To some extent it is due to sheer blindness of perception. There were many holy people not long ago who thought that it was quite right to keep slaves. And I have heard of a director who was so religious that he would not read a newspaper on Monday because it had been printed on Sunday, who yet was responsible, with his colleagues, for a colossal financial disaster which plunged thousands into ruin. But we must fall back on our principle of the radical distinction between religion and morality and the frequent antagonism between them in the lower stages of their development" (Christianity: its Nature and its Truth, pp. 13, 14, 17, 18).

We go much further, and affirm that, on innumerable occasions during its long history, the belief in God has been the direct cause of many of the darkest and most dishonorable crimes ever committed. Has Mr. Hill the courage to read the history of the Christian Church and deny the truth of this? On the other hand, multitudes of completely non-religious people, as we have again and again pointed out, are great luminaries in the moral firmament. Mr. Hill admits this:—

> "They take the rules of their profession and obey them. They accept the government of the principles that rule in their own particular business. They would consider themselves permanently disgraced if they gave you thirty-five inches for a yard or fifteen and a half ounces to the pound."

The reverend gentleman declines to acknowledge that such good people are quite honest in their non-profession of religion, which is exceedingly polite of him. Read this :—

> "There is a famous person in French literature who made a discovery. One of his friends explained to him the difference between poetry and prose. 'Why, then,' said this man, 'I have been speaking prose all my life, and did not know it until now.' That was a discovery for the Frenchman. But there is an even more remarkable discovery that some of our modern men may make—the discovery that they are really religious without knowing it."

That is the most cowardly and dishonest way out of a difficulty imaginable. Put in a nutshell, the argument is this : "These eminently good people imagine that they have no religion, that they do not believe in a Divine Being who rules the world, but I know them much better than they do themselves, and I unhesitatingly declare that they do have a religion, and do believe in God, though as yet they do not know it." Well, all we can say is that the argument is utterly fallacious, a black lie and a studied insult, and that Mr. Hill ought to be above identifying himself with it.

Our conclusion is, not only that there is a radical distinction between religion and morality, but that religion is an imaginary something beyond morality, and without any vital bearing upon it. In its Christian form it is an alleged reality which infinitely transcends morality. The claim is that we have a spiritual nature to which religion alone can minister. But we maintain that that claim is false. We are convinced that there is a sufficient number of well-attested facts to completely disprove it. In civilised countries no one ever becomes religious naturally, or without training. It is an incontestable fact that those who are unaffected by religious influences in their childhood and youth scarcely ever pick up a religion in later life. It is not true that religion meets and satisfies a need in our nature which nothing can do. Some of the greatest and noblest people in this country are conscious of no need which only religion can supply. George Meredith was as happy a man as any that the nineteenth century produced, but he had no religion. It is wondrous kind of Mr. Campbell to look down upon and compare him to "a small boy in the dark, whistling to keep his courage up"; but, then, the oracle of the City Temple pretends that he has had supernatural assistance to show him the value of religion. From the giddy height of spirituality he condescendingly admits that the philosophy of life contained in Meredith's poems "is about the best that can be furnished by the mind of our age apart from religious faith." As for us, we are quite content to go through life seeking to live up to the best that human wisdom can tell us, while regarding religion as a complete superfluity, and on the whole much more harmful than beneficial. We wish to calmly bend

> "To read the lines dear Earth designs
> Shall speak her life on ours."

And what is her speech to us? This :—

> "Accept, she says; it is not hard
> In woods; but she in towns
> Repeats, accept; and have we wept,
> And have we quailed with fears,
> Or shrunk with horrors, sure reward
> We have whom knowledge crowns;
> Who see in mould the rose unfold;
> The soul through blood and tears."

J. T. LLOYD.

Pioneers and Persecution.

> "Rough work, Iconoclasm, but the only way to get at Truth."—OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

POETS and apostles are ever prophets. Swinburne saw and sang "A Vision of Spring in Midwinter," and before that Shelley asked the question, "If winter comes can spring be far behind?" Happy are the pioneers who can ignore the mistakes of the past and the present and fix their gaze on the promise of the future. For them the darkest night is jewelled with the brightest of stars. For them there is a budding to-morrow in every midnight. For them there is nothing irrevocable, for their eyes are ever looking forward.

The other day Mr. Lloyd George, turning aside from the pettiness of party politics, related to an astonished audience the drawbacks of a political career. He spoke of the calumnies to which the politician was exposed, and in a characteristic passage explained the seamy side of politics :—

> "Some people talk enviously about a Minister's lot, as if he was basking eternally in a comforting sunshine. I can assure you that there is not much basking, but a good many burdens. Sunshine, indeed! They forget the heat, and they forget the midges and the mosquitoes. We cannot, for they swarm and buzz around the head of every Minister, stinging when they can.
> "Do you know what a Minister's life is like? Tradesmen have their worries and anxieties; but suppose that in addition to their ordinary troubles they found a constant mob of detractors standing outside their doors, some doing it for hate and some for hire, yelling into every customer's ears as he entered their shop : 'Don't go there, whatever you do. You will be robbed and cheated at every turn if you do business with those fellows. They are all thieves, rogues, and liars.'
> "Every time they get a glimpse of you behind the counter they shriek at you opprobrious epithets. When they see you weigh a pound of sugar they call out that three-fourths of it is sand. When you measure cloth they swear that it is rotten shoddy. You have, moreover, the whole time while you are attending to your customers to dodge bricks, clods, and worse hurled at your head.
> "Most of you, I think, would rather give up business than endure all this, even if you had to break stones for a livelihood."

Undoubtedly there is much truth in this frank avowal, but if there is sacrifice in the case of the politician, what is to be said in the case of a leader of a really unpopular movement, to whom sacrifice is a science and denial an art. Freethought is a far wider and nobler creed than a merely political one. It has its roots in intellectual necessity, and, deeper still, in ethical right. It is based on the psychological law of human development, only apprehended by a few choice spirits for ages, but latterly taking on a new significance and a fresh urgency. Perpetually reaffirmed from generation to generation by unnumbered examples of unselfish martyrdom, from the days of Hypatia to those of Ferrer, it is to-day changing the direction and character of the ideas of the civilised world.

The Freethought leaders are the most potent forces of progress. No other men are discussed so widely as these apostles of freedom; but magnificent as is their life-work, the men are greater. Hissed at by the superior people, stoned by the vulgar, they have many trials to submit to. Perhaps the hardest which can be mentioned is that of seeing charlatans ride by in their carriages, or, in other words, to mark the success of humbug, whilst they find that intellectual honesty is not a paying career. Yet good and true men and women have had to submit to this treatment. Bradlaugh, prematurely aged by his fight for liberty, saw honors showered on men not fit to black his boots; Ferrer, fronting the rifles of the soldiers, had to find his triumph in his own heart. Mr. Foote had to listen to the mocking voice of the judge telling him he had devoted his talents to the service of the Devil. Yet in their hours of apparent failure these men had triumphed. They were martyrs who missed the palm but not the pains of martyrdom, heroes without the laurels, and conquerors without the jubilation of victory. Laboring not for themselves, but for the universe and for the coming generations, for them shall be influence as far-reaching at the utmost reach of the great wave whose crest they sometimes were.

When Mr. Lloyd George carries on a campaign against the landed privileges of the nobility, he necessarily encounters the resistance of only a small portion of the people, whereas Mr. Foote, directing his force against entrenched ecclesiasticism and the hundreds of thousands of dupes of superstition, has to bear the brunt of an enormously greater opposition. No enmity is more relentless, or more venomous, than religious hatred. The abuse directed against Mr. Lloyd George and his colleagues is politeness itself compared with the assault and battery made upon Mr. Foote's reputation. The politician has at least the support of half the press of the country; but the Freethought leader is boycotted by Liberal and Tory and Socialist papers alike. Accused of almost every crime in the calendar, this well-nigh intolerable animosity is in reality a tribute to his influence. The man, against whom a hundred thousand pulpits and platforms constantly fulminate abuse, will have his reward in the coming time. Thanks to his courage and devotion, heterodoxy is no longer the disgrace it once was to the citizen, and open speech has nearly lost its danger in our land. He has given seriousness to Freethought advocacy, placed its exponents on a strong platform, organised its forces, justified its rights to equality of citizenship. Through the religious prejudices of our time he has knocked a hole large enough for the heretic to pass through in future, and in many other directions our lives will be easier because of his life-work.

For our part we must not be content with idle New Year wishes in this connection. There is an object to be achieved towards which all may contribute. The Freethought movement has been attacked, and is threatened with a monstrous recrudescence of persecution. There was never a time when it was more clearly the duty and the interest of the party to resist the "mailed fist" of the Churches. Mr. Foote has told us that it is for the Freethinkers to stop this plunge into mediævalism, and it is certainly time that the party took a definite and final stand against the flouts and gibes at its deepest convictions. Persecution will offer no insuperable obstacle if we face the enemy with a full war-chest and up-to-date equipment. Our leader begins the New Year with high hopes, and it is our task to see that he is supported adequately, so that his wishes are fulfilled.

The keynote of the movement might well be, "Close up your ranks and stand shoulder to shoulder." Forgetting trivial distinctions in the face of the common enemy, let us secure the movement from attack. To-day the situation is critical. Let to-morrow and all to-morrows find it becoming less so, and those who have given their mites will be judged worthy.

A Rebel.

I HAVE ever been a Rebel from the time
When conscious first of Right and Wrong I grew,
And looking on the world around me knew
That I was born into an alien clime:
I saw men tolerant of bitter wrong,
Too timid to assert their rights as men;
Willing for gold to barter tongue or pen,
The weak betraying, flattering the strong:
And thus I saw that Force rules over all,
And Right and Faith are little more than names;
That most men steer their course towards mean aims,
Though much of truth and honor they may bawl:
Rebel against these things I must be still While in me lives a conscience and a will.

LIFE'S HUMILIATIONS.

How many sad necessities must we
Submit to merely for existence' sake,
From which mankind no more itself can free
Than can the ape, the tiger, or the snake!
Slaves of imperious appetites, are all
Who would preserve what oft is worthless—life;
And none may disregard that humbling call
That is with all aspiring thoughts at strife.
Half-Deity a man perchance may be,
Yet he must be half-Caliban as well;
Nor can he live the life of flower or tree
In whose clean course there is nothing to repel:
Ah! why must Man, Life's masterpiece and crown,
Be with so many grievous ills pressed down?—B. D.

Acid Drops.

We have to criticise ourselves in this paragraph. We allowed Robert Buchanan's name to pass as George Buchanan in an article in last week's Freethinker. How we managed to let it pass we can hardly understand, except that the article had been standing in proof for some time, and was hurriedly fitted into the make-up at a late hour, thus escaping our usually close attention. We take all the blame for the "howler." Mr. Repton, the writer, had no reason for knowing Robert Buchanan as well as we did.

"When every allowance has been made," says the Free Church Year Book, "it is evident that the Free Churches are not keeping pace with the growing population, or even replacing the annual loss by death." And yet we are always being told of the great revivals of faith all over the country, and of the powerlessness of modern thought to kill religion in the hearts of men. The truth is that under anything like fair conditions of competition religion would become a negligible factor in our social life.

In Bethnal Green six Churches have united to hold a week of prayer. So as not to enter into competition, services were held in one church at a time. The result was that never less than 200 people were present. We are not told what was the maximum number, but a congregation of 200 as a result of six Churches "pooling" their prayers doesn't seem a wonderful result.

The Salvation Army has opened a café at New Jersey. It is on the American bar system, with free lunches with the drinks, which are all "temperance." "We use the Devil's ideas," the major says, "to perform God's work." Then why not throw in a little whisky?

Dr. C. Bullard, a noted New York Presbyterian minister, in a farewell sermon, described his congregation as "whited sepulchres, ingrates, and hypocrites." Well, he knows them, and they no doubt know him, better than we do.

The Salvation Army International Congress meets in London on June 11. Delegates will speak in thirty-four different languages, and presumably the Holy Ghost will understand them all, but how on earth will they understand each other? Two native gods will be brought from Java and will be carried about at the head of the Congress processions—a blasphemous proceeding which ought to be put a stop to in a country with stringent Blasphemy Laws. What would be said if Father, Son, and Holy Ghost were carried about in a Freethought procession?

The Daily Chronicle says that the various parties in the Church of England were "aptly" summed up in the House of Commons a few years ago as "the low and lazy, the broad and hazy, and the high and crazy." Aptly!

Aged 100, Miss Jane Bird, a pious old lady, who had only once seen a train and had never travelled in one, has died at Little Laver, Essex. Not a bird of passage; but now a bird of Paradise—if the Bible be true.

"Record January Heat" is an editor's headline for the modest record of 54 degrees in a religious paper. He might have given more exciting figures concerning the place so often mentioned in sermons.

Rev. Dr. Len Broughton is not what one would call a profound thinker; but, religiously, that must be counted to his credit. It prevents him seeing the absurdity of his faith, and so does away with the need for elaborate and half-insincere apologies. Accordingly he will have nothing to do with the theory that Jesus was a natural product, winning men by his goodness. "The mere naturalness of Jesus," he says, "exemplified in his beauty and goodness, was not enough." What the world needed was the supernaturalism of Jesus, "for he had come to establish a supernatural religion." Now that is the right note—that is, the honest note. It was Jesus the supernatural magic-worker, not Jesus the benevolent social reformer, that the early Christians, and all Christians until recently, worshiped. Good teaching and good men were common enough; but no one ever built a religion out of these, and no one ever will. They are very good as extras for a sophisticated community, but they are no use as essentials. A religion to thrive must have a core of supernaturalism—and supernaturalism is doomed.

Another sentence from the same sermon is worth recording. It is only noticeable because of the dishonesty of Christians of the water-drinking variety. "I am often asked," says Dr. Broughton, referring to the wine used in the communion during apostolic days, "if that was unfermented or fermented grape juice. If you read the account of its use you will not have to ask. It was fermented wine they used in the days of the apostles. It was so fermented that the people got drunk on it." Quite so; exactly what we have always said. But if Dr. Broughton keeps on blurting out the truth in this fashion, he will lose caste with his fellow-preachers. They are quite ready to prove that among the other things originated by the primitive Christians was a Blue Ribbon Army.

"George Washington to-day" is the bright idea of a Yellow Press newspaper-man concerning the arrival of a boat of that name at Plymouth. The real George is, if the Yankee preachers are right, giving the glad eye to the angels.

"Greenland is covered with ice to a depth estimated at 5,000 feet." Just the place for a "hell-fire" campaign.

"Kings rarely get on well with their eldest sons," is a sage observation of Mr. A. G. Gardiner, of the Daily News. Some of the Biblical monarchs get on remarkably well with other people's daughters.

Hereditary monarchy is a superstition. This truth is amply proved in Professor Frazer's great work the Golden Bough. It is also proved in practice by royal families—especially in countries where monarchy is a reality. Look, for instance, at the Crown Prince of Germany. What a wonderful combination he is of wisdom and dignity. His divine patron should be proud of him.

A Mrs. P. Gaskell, the Suffragette informs us, has circularised the clergy in her district with copies of Miss Pankhurst's book, The Great Scourge, and it is hoped that this example will be followed in other districts. For example, Brixton.

According to a recent issue of the Suffragette, no less than £519,676 has been raised on behalf of the militant women. If this sum of money were raised for Freethought, the doom of the Churches would be at hand.

A man named Joshua Maden, of Bacup, who died recently, arranged the details of his own funeral. Some Christians really believe that Moses wrote the account of his own interment, and other pious people pretend to believe it.

Mrs. Albert Midlane, of the Isle of Wight, who died last week, was the widow of the author of the popular hymn, "There's a Friend for little children." We once saw this hymn referred to as "A Fiend for little children" through the carelessness of a compositor. Yet one expression was as true as the other.

"Dagonet" (Mr. George R. Sims) has a ghost story in last week's Referee. There are sufficient ghost stories in the Bible to raise the human hair quicker than Tatcho.

Wireless telegraphy has scored again. The lost Royal Mail liner Cobequid was located after all by the rescue ships and all on board were saved. It was another triumph of science and humanity. Praying for help from "above" will soon be forgotten.

Flaming headlines advertised the "Heroism of the Women" on board the Cobequid. What does the reader think they did? They went down below and prayed! That's all. Prodigious!

Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner's controversy with Mr. Philip Gibbs on the question of the Portuguese political prisoners is not very convincing on either side. What we wish is that the friends of the present Government of Portugal would recognise that the sins of a Monarchy are worse when imitated by a Republic. What is the use of change if it brings no improvement and no relief? We should like to see the situation investigated by some independent person, who is not a partisan of Freethought or the Catholic Church, nor of the Republic or the Monarchy. There must be something wrong somewhere when a Government, which came into power by revolutionary means, has not settled down enough in three years to abolish military tribunals and bring prisoners up for trial within ten or twelve months of their arrest.

The Bishop of Yukon has arrived in England. His object is to "raise funds for his vast diocese." But what the vastness has to do with it we fail to see, unless his lordship wants to paint the landscape. Fortunately he will not suffer as much as some people would if he goes back rather empty-handed. He was once reduced to eating his moccasins. But the worst of that sort of meal is that it can't be repeated. Nor could it be very inspiring in the way of saving souls. In one of the Anti-Jacobin songs, if we remember rightly, a besieged officer had to boil his boots and eat them, but the diet was not exhilarating. He was bound to admit before he sampled the menu that:—

> "Looking at that melancholy food,
> It may be eaten but it is not good."

We hope the Bishop of Yukon will be able to take back some tinned stuff.

Religious freedom is a foreigner in Spain. Colonel Juan Labrador was lately sentenced to six months' imprisonment for refusing to attend Mass before presiding at a court-martial. Vain efforts are being made to obtain his release.

Elijah has been selected as the patron saint of Russian aviators. Not a bad choice, either. The hairy old prophet was the first Bible hero who sailed away to Kingdom-come, and his flying machine was something splendid—a chariot and horses of fire. Jesus Christ's voyage to heaven was poor in comparison. He went up in a cloud—a most rheumatic conveyance.

Mrs. Besant is appealing to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council against the order of the Supreme Court of Madras for the return of two boys transferred to her by their father Mr. Narazaniah, who wants them back because he is dissatisfied with their moral training under Mr. Leadbeater. It appears that the elder boy is to be trained for the spiritual leadership of the world of Theosophy. The next Messiah perhaps.

Mr. Bonar Law is one of your pious believers in miracles—if he is not a pretended believer. In his last pessimistic speech about the Home Rule Bill, he said: "We have given a pledge that if Ulster resists we will support her in her resistance. We intend, with the help of the Almighty, to keep the pledge." Yes, but suppose the Almighty doesn't help, what then? The pledge is off, we presume. Mr. Bonar Law really offers Ulster (or the three-fifths that he calls Ulster) a miracle. We hope the "Covenanters" will note what it is that they are relying upon.

More "Providence." Earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and tidal waves, are reported to have killed a hundred thousand people on a small area in Japan. "He doeth all things well."

Rev. Wm. Moore, of Appleton Rectory, Abingdon, Berks, left £8,696. Rev. Charles Henry Bowly, of the Rectory, Toppesfield, Essex, left £7,120. Not so big, as clerical fortunes go, but enough to make the cashier of the first Salvation Army stare.

"Troops of Sweated Women" was a headline in the Daily News lately. It was well-meant, of course, but mightn't it have been put a little more politely, not to say elegantly?

Some of the ladies, on the other hand, might try to curb their impatience a bit, especially in public,—as they would have to if they were not women, claiming all the privileges of their sex. At the Economic Circle dinner at the National Liberal Club lately it was announced that a letter had been received from a lady well known in literature on the ground that she could not take part in arguments on the subject of woman's work and wages; if she came at all she would have to bring a stone. At which there was much laughter, even from the women present, one of whom sensibly read a paper as the basis of discussion. "Pretty Fanny's way."

Three new Bishoprics are being launched—Sheffield, Chelmsford, and Ipswich. According to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners the necessary endowments and residences have been provided; that is, several thousands a year in each case, and a large handsome house to live in—fit to receive the Lord if he ever looked in at dinner time as he did to old Abraham. Meanwhile, people perish by the thousand of sheer destitution in this Christian country. "Feed my sheep" is evidently a text that requires very careful interpretation.

When the Chinese Government invited—about a year ago—the Christians in China to join in a day of general prayer, we pointed out all that was meant by it. In the first place, the Government, not being Christian, was tolerant enough to place all religions on the same level. Secondly, it was a 'cute move to enlist the sympathies of missionary advocates all over the world on behalf of the newly established Government. Whether the missionaries and the leaders of the Christian Churches saw through the move or not is doubtful. At all events, they professed not to. And they interpreted the invitation in a peculiarly Christian manner. The invitation to pray to the Chinese Christians became an invitation to Christian Churches all over the world. And it was issued because the Chinese Government felt that the prayers of Christians were all-powerful. So ran the story, with all the Christian trappings and pious disregard for the truth.

Now for the sequel. The value of the Christian prayers was seen by the fact that things worsened in China as soon as the Christians started praying. If there is any efficacy in prayer, we must not forget to put that to the credit of the Christians all over the world. Next, the other day an Administrative Conference was called at Pekin to consider a proposal that the President should worship Heaven in the Temple of Heaven, and wearing the old ceremonial robes. The Conference began to discuss the question. Discussion was more or less of a farce, and the Conference was told that it had simply been called together to register the Government's decision, which was the re-establishing of Confucianism and Heaven Worship. The decision was registered, and the much-talked-of golden opportunity for the wholesale conversion of China disappears. The Daily Telegraph correspondent says that this decision will estrange missions of all denominations, who are already disappointed by the progress of events. We do not doubt it. The idea that China would ever embrace Christianity was one that only a fool or a fanatic could have entertained. The pity of it is that neither is likely to learn anything from what has just occurred.

Mr. Balfour's fee for his present series of Gifford lectures is £500, which comes from what a daily newspaper calls "an old bequest." This is a somewhat ancient way of talking of the Gifford Trust, seeing it was established within the memory of people who can hardly be called more than middle-aged. But that is by the way. £500 is what Shylock would call "a good round sum." No wonder the Christians keep the monopoly of this lectureship. Lord Gifford enjoined perfect fairness upon the Trustees. They were not to have revealed religion dealt with at all, but only what is called "natural religion,"—and that was to be treated in a scientific way like any other subject, and even Atheism was to be no barrier to a competent man's appointment to the lectureship. We need not say that there has been no rush of Atheists. We don't recollect that one Atheist has been allowed to handle that £500.

What is commonly called English literature now is mainly in the hands of farceurs. Mr. G. K. Chesterton having left the Daily News, and the Daily News having pitched into the Daily Chronicle's sweet insurance scheme, the latter retaliates by working up a boom for Mr. Chesterton's drooping play Magic at the Little Theatre. This has been further promoted by means of a carefully arranged discussion at the same theatre on the question "Do Miracles Happen?" According to the preliminary announcement—

> "It is understood that Mr. Chesterton has promised to be present and will take part in the discussion. The debate, however, will not be upon the play, but deal solely with the question it has raised regarding miracles—do they happen, or do they not?
> "Already Mr. Kenelm Foss is in communication with many well-known authorities, representing all shades of both lay and clerical opinion, and one of the most remarkable gatherings ever known in a theatre may be looked forward to."

Representing all shades, eh? Mr. Kenelm Foss (any relation to Sam Foss?) has not extended an invitation to the President of the National Secular Society or to the Editor of the Freethinker. Knowing too much about anything is worse than knowing too little—at least in a public debate. Moreover, it was easy to see that the discussion was to be a sham. The Bible was to be left out of it altogether. And as the Bible contains all the miracles of Christianity per se, leaving the Bible out is leaving Christianity out. So that's all right. It is what the Chronicle calls "eliminating all possibilities of offence." Well, if that is what the debaters want they could secure it still more certainly by keeping their mouths shut altogether.

"Do Miracles Happen?" Everybody knows they don't—even if they did. Everybody, that is, but the most docile and orthodox Catholics. So it seemed likely beforehand that the debate may sink into a fine old shindy between Catholics and Protestants. If Atheists were let in they would have to say "A plague on both your houses." Theoretically, the whole thing was a farce; practically, it is an advertising dodge.

Monday's Chronicle made it appear as if the question about miracles happening or not was going to be put to the vote. It was observed that "the verdict" to be given at the Little Theatre would be one of "quite unprecedented significance." What nonsense is this! The question was long ago discussed, not in the Little Theatre, but in the Great Theatre of civilisation. It is nearly fifty years since Matthew Arnold was able to announce, in a book written for Christians, that miracles were doomed in educated and thoughtful society, and that all miracles were fairy tales, including those of the Bible. That has been taken for granted for the past half-century; yet here are a lot of jokers raising the question again, as though it still possessed actuality. What ought to be discussed now is not whether miracles happen, but whether there is a God? This question, however, is too strong for the Chronicle and its scratch debating forum. They prefer something that looks brave but involves no danger.

When the Chronicle announced that "practically every phase of opinion on the subject" was represented in its list of speakers it must have known that it was imposing on its readers,—unless its ignorance was as incredible as it was inexcusable. The only name worth printing in the whole list, in this special connection, was that of Mr. Maskelyne the conjurer. But that word is too vulgar for the Chronicle, which calls him an "illusionist."

Atheists were ruled out of this farcical debate to begin with. There were two rigorous conditions for all disputants; first, the inspired authority of the Bible was not to be challenged (which we have criticised already), and, secondly, an "equally reverent attitude towards the Divine will" was to be "taken for granted in every case." A very nice muzzle for the bulldog!

Our readers might like to see the definition of a miracle adopted (from the New English Dictionary) for this fantastic discussion:—

> "A marvellous event occurring within human experience, which cannot have been brought about by human power or by the operation of any natural agency, and must therefore be ascribed to the special intervention of the Deity or of some supernatural being."

Not bad. But who ever knew Christian debaters stick to a definition? Even their own?

The debate (heaven save the mark!) took place on Monday. It was a perfect farce. The Chronicle reporter seemed ashamed of it himself.

If the Chronicle is ready to organise a real debate on Miracles, and will put forward Mr. G. K. Chesterton as the orthodox representative, a practical debater can easily be found to represent the other side. The President of the National Secular Society and Editor of the Freethinker is available.

To Correspondents.

BIRMINGHAM "SAINT."—We have not noticed anything from the pens of tip-top Socialists about Stewart's imprisonment for "blasphemy." Their heads seem too big for such trivial things. "G. B. S." himself has denounced the Blasphemy Laws vigorously enough, between prosecutions, but we hear very little from him when bigotry is on the rampage again. It is a strong point of the joke that those who have been prosecuted for "blasphemy" of late years, from Boulter to Stewart, have nearly (if not quite) all been Socialists.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for cuttings.

M. E. PEGG.—See paragraph. Manchester and district ought to give a man of Mr. Lloyd's ability and eloquence crowded audiences.

E. B.—Best thanks for weekly cuttings.

G. H. BARKER (New Zealand).—So you first heard us lecture at Norwich in 1871. We are honored by the recollection. No doubt the book you mention will arrive safely. We thank you in anticipation; also for your good wishes.

A. J. MARRIOTT.—We don't endorse your theory that the "blasphemy" prosecutions under Liberal Governments are instigated by their opponents. We rather think that the Liberals are glad to have it proved that there are worse than they; that they draw the line somewhere, as the saying is. Moreover, it is a safe thing to persecute Freethinkers when you are sure of the support of the Opposition in the House of Commons as well as your own side.

J. F. JACKSON.—Our shop manager will attend to your requests. Glad to hear of the good you have done by distributing back numbers of this journal, and hope for the same result in the future

W. A.—We should be glad if Mr. Heaford would take your suggestion and straighten out this Portuguese tangle again.

A. MARTLAW.—We had corrected the blunder, as you will see. Pleased to find you read this journal so closely, and glad to hear you are "grateful for the brilliant articles which appear in it each week."

Sugar Plums.

Freethinkers are so numerous that if they all spoke out there would be a very considerable abatement of Christian insolence. Unfortunately it is only here and there that persons of social or industrial distinction openly avow their Freethought. One of these is Sir Hiram Maxim, who has been giving orthodoxy a good shaking lately. We are pleased to say that he will attend the London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner at Frascati's next Wednesday (Jan. 28), and will speak if called upon by the Chairman—which may be taken for granted.

We are sorry to learn that the change in the date of the Annual Dinner has prevented a few of the older "saints" from attending. It will be unpleasant to miss some welcome faces, but, alas, it is not possible to suit all conveniences. We wish it were.

Mr. Lloyd lectures, afternoon and evening, at the Secular Hall, Rusholme-road, All Saints, Manchester, to-day (Jan. 25). We hope the local "saints" will give his visit all the publicity they can. People can't go to hear him if they don't know he is lecturing, and ordinary advertising is so expensive that it can only be done in a very limited way.

We reproduce on another page an article on "The Blasphemy Case" from the Daily Chronicle. It is so important, in its way, that we wish our readers to see the whole of it. We quite agree that it was no use petitioning the Home Secretary, and we said so at the time. In former years that was the only thing to be done if the "blasphemer's" friends desired to shake the verdict or mitigate the sentence. But there is a Court of Criminal Appeal now, and the real centre of the battle should have consisted in carrying the case thither. A correspondence between the Rationalist Press Association's secretary and Mr. McKenna may or may not be interesting, but it is certainly of no value; whereas there would have been very great value in the Law of Blasphemy being argued by competent counsel in the Court of Appeal, and followed by a responsible decision of the Judges who happened to be sitting. We pointed this out, and we believe we were the only person who did point it out. We did more than that. We offered to take the full responsibility, financial and otherwise, of taking the Stewart case to the Court of Appeal. And we would have spent any amount of time and trouble in giving the appeal the benefit of our own knowledge and experience. But it was not to be. "And fools rushed in," etc., etc.

The passage that the Chronicle quotes from Macaulay is very good in its way, but it is a wonder that our contemporary did not perceive its weak point. It is called a crime to give other people "pain and disgust." What other people? Christians, and Christians only. And who are to decide whether the culprit, who must necessarily be a Freethinker, shall be prosecuted? Christians. And who are to try him and find whether he is guilty or not guilty? Christians. And who is to pass upon him the proper sentence? A Christian. And who is to keep him in prison during his term of punishment? Christians. This "pain and disgust" is a very one-sided affair. When the Christians once set about him, the poor Freethinker stands about as much chance as a sheep before a tribunal of butchers.

We are glad to see the Chronicle urging the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. That is the one thing to be done now. But will the Liberal Party help to do it? We wish we could say Yes.

Mr. Asquith's answer to the second petition was exactly what might be expected. We see by the newspapers—for that is our only way of obtaining information on these matters—that Mr. Asquith "is unable to intervene in a matter which lies wholly within the competence of the Secretary for the Home Department."

We ask our readers' attention to a final point. Lord Coleridge and Mr. McKenna both say that Stewart is not suffering for his opinions. That is all nonsense, of course, for if he had advocated any other opinions the "violence" or "vulgarity" of his language would never have caused his imprisonment. But the anxiety of both the Judge and the Home Secretary to assure everybody that Stewart is not suffering for his opinions, shows that the judgment of Lord Chief Justice Coleridge in the course of the Freethinker trial in 1883 holds the field beyond any possible challenge. The result is, as we have declared any time the last fifteen years, that Freethought funds are perfectly safe under an Incorporation like the Secular Society, Ltd., but at the same time Freethinkers are still liable to prosecution on account of their want of proper respect for those undefined "decencies of controversy."

The following is from John Bull:—

"THE BLASPHEMY LAWS.

"We respectfully suggest to Mr. Asquith that he should give favorable consideration to the appeal now being made to him for the repeal of the stupid and antiquated Blasphemy Laws, as they are called. Matters of taste—and that is all that it comes to—should not be made the subject of legal enactment. Besides, there is just as much blasphemy talked by persons nowadays as there is by street-corner orators. Mr. Foote sealed the doom of this relic of ecclesiastical domination twenty years ago."

Twenty years, Mr. Bottomley? No, thirty.

The following resolution has been passed by the Committee of the Humanitarian League:—"That inasmuch as a very large number of birching sentences are passed by magistrates upon working-class children, often for trivial offences, and as these police-court punishments are much severer and more degrading than the correction administered in schools to the children of the well-to-do, we strongly condemn the attempts now being made to secure an extension of the age of limitation from 14 to 16, and we would express the hope that the Labor Party and all democratic organisations will resist the proposal."

Goethe.

ONE of the most extraordinary men of genius our planet has ever produced was the mighty Humanist and Freethinker, Johann Wolfgang Goethe. The mental product of antiquity and of modern philosophical, literary, and scientific thought alike, the creator of Faust has exercised an enormous progressive influence throughout the civilised world. Much of the Freethought, and many of the other progressive ideals which distinguish modern Germany are vastly indebted to Goethe's life and work. Among his intellectual parents are to be numbered Lessing, Herder, Voltaire, and Rousseau, while his religious conceptions were more largely moulded by the teachings of the serene and patient pantheistic philosopher, Baruch Spinoza, than by those of any other mortal man.

Goethe first saw the light which he came to love so well at Frankfort-on-the-Main on August 28, 1749. His grandfather was a tailor who had risen from a working class family, whose second wife was a comely widow, who kept an inn. Husband and wife were happily mated, and were above the average in intellect and character. Three children blessed their union, of whom the father of the poet was the youngest. As the fortunes of the family improved, the parent of Goethe was sent to study law at Leipsic and Giessen and took the degree of Doctor of Jurisprudence. After practising in Wetzlar and journeying in Italy, he settled in Frankfort. His easy circumstances enabled him to secure a position of honor and dignity, and he became an imperial councillor in the city. Dr. Goethe was a man of strong character, was a sincere lover of art and letters, was well versed in Italian, and was an enthusiastic student of Tasso, the Tuscan poet. At the age of thirty-eight, he wedded the daughter of Textor, the chief magistrate of Frankfort. This lady, the mother of Goethe, was then a mere girl of seventeen. But she was bright and beautiful, a lover of music and poetry, and had a remarkable aptitude in inventing that kind of story which delights and captivates children. From such a stock as this, very fruitful issue might have been predicted, and the birth of Goethe as the first child of the marriage affords a striking instance of the importance of a sound and healthy pedigree.

Of the succeeding children, one only survived long enough to influence Goethe. This was his sister Cornelia, just fifteen months younger than himself, who loved him dearly, and influenced him for his good during his fiery youth. From his mother Goethe inherited his wealth of brown hair and dark lustrous eyes which, from childhood to old age, arrested by their brilliancy the attention of every beholder. As a little child he was deeply imaginative, and, as he tells us in his autobiography, he was happy when seated at the window of the Frankfort house, which commanded a fine view of a fertile valley stretching beyond the city walls. From this coign of vantage he could view storms and sunsets, and watch the children at their shouting play in the gardens near. Doubtless many of his nature pictures had their birth in his childish musings here. And when the house was rebuilt, as it was by Dr. Goethe, it was made both convenient and tasteful with maps and engravings, and the numerous objects of art he had collected in Italy. During the rebuilding Goethe and Cornelia were sent to a relative, and the boy now became acquainted with the sights of his native city.

> "As the town in which the Emperors were elected and crowned, Frankfort held a position of high honor among the free imperial cities of Germany. Within its old walls and gates it still retained, in its architecture and customs, many traces of the troubled picturesque life of the Middle Ages."

The crowds in the market-places, the boats laden with merchandise, the gilt weathercock, and the famous Council Hall, all interested and stirred the impressionable boy, and probably helped to color the first part of Faust, although the legend itself seems to have become known to him through the German folk-books he devoured as a child.

Goethe was about seven years old when the wars of Frederick broke out, and great were the diversities of view concerning the merits of the Prussian king and his antagonists. Bitter family differences arose in the Goethe family when the Seven Years' War began. Dr. Goethe was a stout supporter of Frederick the Great, and when some two years later Frankfort was basely betrayed into the hands of his French enemies, the doctor was compelled to receive Count Thorane, one of the French officers, into his dwelling. Thorane proved a polished gentleman, and he and young Goethe soon became excellent friends. The lad was enraptured by the whirl of excitement which the presence of the military occasioned. The artists who came to execute work for Thorane aroused a passion for draughtsmanship in Goethe, and he zealously practised drawing with marked success. He likewise learnt French, and listened to the reading of the French plays which were now being presented on the Frankfort stage. In this school he grew to like the Gallic people, and that liking did not desert him even at that later time when his fatherland was trodden under the iron heel of the great Napoleon.

The tutors who had been employed to teach him found their duties sadly hindered during the two years' residence of the French in Dr. Goethe's house. Irregular as the boy's schooling had been, he had gained a fair acquaintance with several languages, ancient and modern, and to these he now added English.

In accordance with the prevailing custom, Goethe was confirmed in his twelfth year. As a very little boy, he was puzzled by the problems of pain and evil. In 1755, the terrible Lisbon earthquake filled his mind with misgivings. Such a catastrophe appeared hard to reconcile with God's justice and mercy. Even at this early time the Pagan spirit asserted itself, and the child set up an altar to the orb of day in his sleeping room. In 1765, just after his sixteenth birthday, he was sent to Leipsic to study law, but the professors had nothing to offer which their new pupil was willing to accept. The whirling student days which followed were attended by the inevitable love episode, the second in Goethe's lengthy amorous career. He had many acquaintances, good, bad, and indifferent, but by far the ablest man with whom Goethe came into personal touch at Leipsic was Oeser, the director of the Academy of Drawing, Painting, and Architecture. Oeser was a disciple of the famous Winkelmann, who, although his own artistic work was of minor importance, was, nevertheless, a man gifted with the power of creating interest in all that appertained to art, and of stimulating all his pupils to do their very best. Goethe now became a passionate student of art, and he carefully studied every picture of moment in Leipsic. These exhausted, he spent a holiday at Dresden for the purpose of studying the treasures of its celebrated art gallery.

But this enthusiasm for art was soon eclipsed; the claims of literature gained the ascendancy. He had already read Wieland's rendering of Shakespeare, and he now eagerly devoured Dodd's Beauties of Shakespeare, although he was still far from realising the overwhelming greatness of the mighty English poet.

Wieland, having outgrown the piety of his uncritical youth, began to set forth his easy-going philosophy in prose and verse, and from him Goethe learnt much. But a deeper influence was exerted by the humane and freethinking Lessing, whose Laocoon and Minna von Barnhelm were regarded by Goethe as triumphant masterpieces of German literature. In 1768 Lessing spent a month in Leipsic, but the fates decreed that the two humanists were never to meet. About the same time, Goethe received the grievous tidings of Winkelmann's tragic death, and he sincerely mourned the loss of the master whose writings had so materially contributed to his mental and artistic evolution.

During the whole of the Leipsic period, Goethe was an assiduous attendant at the play, sometimes as spectator, and occasionally as an actor, in private performances. The enthusiasm engendered by these experiences induced him to try his hand as a dramatist, and he wrote two small plays, Die Laune des Verliebten (The Lover's Humor) and Die Mitschuldigen (The Accomplices). Both plays are confessedly autobiographical, but are too closely imitative of conventional French models to rank as anything but promising failures.

At this period an affair of the heart wounded the poet deeply, and all his efforts to silence his sad emotions proved unavailing. In this instance distraction did not prove a panacea, and Goethe became seriously ill. His sickness was made bearable by the affectionate care of his male and female friends, but as he made but poor progress towards recovery, it was decided that he should return to his father's house. There he became convalescent, but soon succumbed to another dangerous ailment. But he slowly regained his health, and never again was he visited by any serious malady.

In his twenty-first year, Goethe went to Strasburg to take his degree, and while in that cathedral city he met the rationalistic philosopher, Herder. The latter was then twenty-six years of age, only five years the senior of Goethe. But Herder had been matured by hard discipline, and two volumes of essays had already appeared from his pen. A painful eye disease, coupled with a somewhat overbearing disposition, made Herder a harsh man to deal with. Goethe, however, discerned a fine nature beneath a rugged exterior, and made light of his occasional boorishness, and was ever willing to solace and assist him. Goethe's virtue was well rewarded, for from Herder he learnt to appreciate the good contained in the messages of Rousseau and Voltaire. He also grew to value Shakespeare at his proper worth, for in the creator of Hamlet, so said Herder, Nature had met her profoundest interpreter; and,—

> "returning in earnest to the study of his dramas, Goethe was impressed, as he had never been impressed before, by their power and beauty, and felt more and more strongly that it would be impossible for him ever to exhaust their meaning."

Herder also made him realise the position of the true Freethinker. No set of doctrines, however sacred, was to be accepted as a complete and irrevocable canon of truth. Goethe now looked around him, and strove to free his mind from all preconceptions and to judge every phenomenon on its merits alone. Having once mastered this great lesson, he made strenuous efforts to hold fast to it through life.

This great formative epoch was constantly lit by the light of love. Goethe had been smitten by the beauty of Friedereke Brion, an Alsatian pastor's daughter, and although he was parted from her, her affection and beauty inspired some of his loveliest lyrics. In after days she might have wedded joyously and well, but her unvarying answer to her adorers was: "The heart that Goethe has loved can never belong to another."

To gratify his father—for to Goethe law was dry and barren—he became a Frankfort advocate. In a few weeks he received his first brief, and judgment was recorded in the courts in favor of the youthful Goethe's client. But the attractions of Shakespeare proved more potent than those of jurisprudence. A Shakespeare festival took place in his father's house, and Goethe, with flashing eye and eloquent tongue, described the plays as masterpieces in which "the history of the world sweeps on before our eyes on the invisible thread of time."

In a literary sense, the period from 1771 to 1775 was the most productive of the poet's life. He penned Goetz, Werther, Clavigo, and other works in rapid succession. The reception accorded Goetz von Berlichingen was enough to turn the head of a weaker man. Goethe was hailed as a marvellous genius, and the success of this, his first tragedy, confirmed his confidence in his own power, and he never doubted that his future creations would completely fulfil the most sanguine predictions of his most enthusiastic admirers.

Blasphemy.

ONE of the many libellous charges that Christians are continually bringing against Freethinkers is that of blasphemy. The wicked doubts of the Atheist may be ignored, but directly he speaks candidly upon the Christian religion, then the whole of Christendom is up in arms loudly protesting against a so-called "blasphemy." Accordingly, it would be well to discover whether Christians, in making this charge, are following out any consistent moral code.

The world in which we live contains a vast amount of evil. The Christian believes this, for he is constantly deploring the depravity of the world. The Freethinker also recognises that immorality is common to most parts of the globe, but, at the same time, he lays emphasis upon such remediable evils as slums, poverty, dirt, and ignorance. It is an established fact that a high degree of morality will not be attained until these material evils have disappeared. But there is one evil that, apparently, can never be removed; the evil referred to is that brought about by nature's law of "the survival of the fittest." Evolution is the cause of much pain, suffering, and waste.

Now, the Christian doctrine teaches that God is omnipotent, that is, he has complete control of the universe. Consequently, God is responsible for all the evil that exists in the world. He possesses power over the Devil, and if this is not so, then the term "Almighty God" is a misnomer and ought never to be used. The Christian believes, at one and the same time, that Almighty God is the loving Father of mankind, and that he not only allows evil to exist, but that he invented a system of evolution, which brings untold pain to all species of life. Surely, this is one of the most despicable and lying blasphemies ever uttered! It is an insult to an intelligent person's conception of a Deity. It is a paradox that is both ludicrous and immoral, and one which would hardly be perpetrated even by Mr. G. K. Chesterton. Is there one man in a hundred who would allow evil to exist if he possessed the power to prevent it? No. The position is untenable to the rational person. He must take one of three courses:—

(1) He must acknowledge that God is not almighty, and that his power is limited (he would presumably share the control of the world with the Devil).
(2) If he still holds the conviction that God is almighty, then he must acknowledge that he worships a Deity who, in his opinion, is an immoral being.
(3) He must throw overboard the whole doctrine, and become an Agnostic.

One can easily speculate on the line of thought that will be taken by the majority of present-day Christians in the near future. They will discover that the idea of the Christian God was founded upon a blasphemy, and they will look back with astonishment upon the time when the truth was considered as being blasphemous.

THE MAN IN THE STREET.

There never has been a "Fall of Man" from which he could be saved by the suffering and death of God or man upon the Cross, and the preaching of such a mode of salvation constitutes a miserable mockery. It is an utterly misleading aside from the real work of the world that remains to be done; and the money spent in sustaining the great delusion at home and propagating it abroad might suffice for the extinction of poverty if preventively applied.—Gerald Massey.

Literary Gossip.

How often a good reader is tempted to say to a critic "Physician heal thyself." And when a man makes a mistake himself in correcting the mistake of another, he is approaching, if he has not entered, the region of comedy. I have just been reading an interesting and suggestive little volume in the "Home University Library," by Wm. T. Brewster, A.M., Professor of English in Columbia University. Professor Brewster is one of the four editors of this excellent series of books. One would have expected from him greater care in composition and proof-reading than from most of his colleagues in this enterprise, for the title of his contribution is The Writing of English. Yet as early as p. 15 one finds the following lapse:—

> "So precise a person as Matthew Arnold misquotes Keats's 'Pure ablation round Earth's human shores' as 'cold ablation' without a blush and under circumstances that called for great accuracy (Maurice de Guérin, in Essays on Criticism)."

Professor Brewster, in correcting Matthew Arnold, was himself called upon for great accuracy. But in calling attention to one blunder he perpetrates a worse one. Keats, of course, did not write "ablation" at all. What he wrote was "ablution." The passage occurs in probably the last of his sonnets, written on a blank page in Shakespeare's poems, facing A Lover's Complaint—and runs as follows:—

> "The moving waters at their priestlike task
> Of pure ablution round earth's human shores."

That is John Keats at his very best, as we might expect when a great poet is apostrophising the greatest of all poets. And it is over the two lines enshrining this superb image that two writers like Matthew Arnold and Professor Brewster both stumbled. * * *

I hesitated to believe that Matthew Arnold had turned that beautiful "pure" into that terrible "cold." But on turning to his fine essay on Maurice de Guérin I found that he had done so. When I read the essay before I must have taken the Keats quotation for granted as I knew the lines so well. It was really performing an act of memory instead of an act of perception. And the worst of it is that Matthew Arnold let that shocking misquotation stand for more than twenty years. My own copy of the book is a part of the collected edition of his works dated 1886.

Arnold's mistake was a perfect "howler." I hope his publishers may yet be able to set it right. Professor Brewster's may perhaps be called a slip in proof-reading. Yes, but an author should read his proofs more carefully, especially in such circumstances.

The Positivist Review for January opens the new year well. There are excellent articles by Professor E. S. Beesly, Mr. Frederic Harrison, and other well-known contributors to this ably conducted magazine. Mr. S. H. Swinny, the editor, writes a brief, eulogistic review of Professor Bury's History of Freedom of Thought, which has been noticed at considerable length in these columns. "The book," Mr. Swinny concludes, "contains a weighty protest against the recrudescence of prosecutions for blasphemy." I expected more reference than this to the agitation around the recent Stewart case. But the one fault I have to find with Mr. Swinny's monthly is that his staff of writers seem to live out of the present world. This comment does not apply to Mr. Swinny himself, whom I meet (with pleasure) on many committees.

Talking of "blasphemy," I notice a belated discovery on this subject. Professor Bury, in his admirable little book, remarks that passages of "blasphemy" be quoted from Swinburne's Songs Before Sunrise were surely open to prosecution if they had been expressed in prose, and in the prose of the common people. This remark is taken up by Mr. J. M. Robertson in a recent article on Toleration and patronised as no doubt true. I happen to know from personal observation that Mr. Robertson was alive in 1883, when I was prosecuted for "blasphemy," and made what the Times called "a remarkable speech in defence" before Lord Chief Justice Coleridge. I can hardly imagine, for special reasons, that Mr. Robertson can have forgotten the character of my address to the jury, which caused a good deal of excitement at the time. Now it happens that I read to the jury those very passages (with others) which Professor Bury quotes from Swinburne, and I asked them if these passages were not as "blasphemous" as anything in my indictment? Lord Coleridge answered that question himself in the affirmative. Some of the passages I read were in his opinion free from such criticism, but with regard to others he said:—

> "They do appear to me to be open to exactly the same charge and the same grounds of observation that Mr. Foote's publications are. He says—and I don't call upon him to prove it, I am quite willing to take his word—he says many of these things are written in expensive books, published by publishers of known eminence, and that they circulate in the drawing-rooms, studies, and libraries of persons of position."

Lord Coleridge went on to say that if the writers of such things, using language "not fairly distinguishable from that used by Mr. Foote," were ever brought before him, they "would find but one rule of law laid down in this court."

Professor Bury's suggestion, adopted by Mr. Robertson, is therefore some thirty years behind date. The point now raised was thoroughly discussed at my trial.

Mr. H. S. Salt's new volume, the Humanities of Diet, is published by the Vegetarian Society, 257 Deansgate, Manchester. It is neatly got up, and I fancy the price must be sixpence, but I cannot find any statement to that (or any other) effect. With the exception of the first article, reprinted from the Fortnightly Review, the contents of this little book are all gathered from the Humanitarian, the Vegetarian, and other propagandist journals. Some are in prose, some are in verse, and all are entertaining; for Mr. Salt is not always solemn,—he is often witty, humorous, and jovial, when the occasion calls for such treatment of the subject. Mr. Salt in his lighter vein will be an agreeable surprise to those who only know him in his serious moods. A wide circulation of this volume would be a good thing for the cause of Humanitarianism.

One may add a few words to the comments on Mr. Campbell at the end of Mr. Lloyd's article in this week's Freethinker. It is George Meredith that one has in mind, and for whose reputation one is concerned. Mr. Campbell is a very small matter in comparison. He is a born sentimentalist, and was bound to shudder when he came up against the sternest elements of Meredith's philosophy. Faith is a good thing if based upon reason, but not without reason, and still less in spite of reason. "You want to live for ever, do you?" says the strong man to the weaker one. "Well, nobody can add anything to what Nature has given you. I cannot add one day to your life, here or hereafter; and I do not know that I would if I could. Who are you? Who am I? that Nature should be strained to gratify our vanity and selfhood? We must just share the common lot. And if you like to dream of personal immortality, do so; I shall not quarrel with you, though I do not propose to join you. All I can offer you is what Nature offers you, if you choose to accept it,—an immortal life in the life of the race. Live in your children. Live in posterity. You owe something to the past; pay it to the future. It is the only way in which you can discharge the debt." But that is not good enough for sentimental egoists like Mr. Campbell. He calls it a "melancholy prospect." It is to him. It was not to Meredith. That is the difference between the two men. Character, like water, cannot rise above its own level. It takes a Danton to cry, "Let my name be blighted, so that France be free." It takes a Paul to hope that others may be saved even if he be lost. It takes a Moses to rejoice in his nation entering the promised land, though he is doomed never to set his foot upon its holy soil. These are instances in Mr. Campbell's sacred book. He will remember them. And perhaps he will think over again the matter of that "melancholy prospect." * * *

So far there is no particular harm done, but Mr. Campbell goes on until self-contempt makes him insolent. He says that Meredith's words of courage in face of the fact and thought of death remind him of "a small boy in the dark whistling to keep his courage up." Mr. Campbell reminds us of a street urchin who rings his superior's front-door bell and runs away. * * *

Human reason will never take us beyond Meredith's position. Mr. Campbell admits it, he asserts it, he emphasises it. Something more than human reason takes Mr. Campbell along the pleasant way he wants to go. He looks to the Cross of Christ. And what were the last words of Christ himself on the Cross? "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Wasn't that a "melancholy prospect"?

By the way, Mr. Campbell supposes that Mr. G. M. Trevelyan is writing a book on George Meredith. He wrote one nearly eight years ago—the Poetry and Philosophy of George Meredith. Mr. Trevelyan is not frightened at Meredith's teachings. If it causes terror at the City Temple it must be because of the plethora of shop assistants in the congregation.

G. W. FOOTE.

The Blasphemy Case.

In common with all true Liberals, we loathe prosecutions for opinion. It is the pride of Englishmen that they live in a land where a man can say whatever he will. Milton desired, above all liberties, the liberty to utter and argue freely. Holding these opinions, we have an instinctive aversion to prosecutions under the Blasphemy Laws. Not only do such prosecutions encroach on liberty of speech, but they almost invariably defeat their own object. Recently a petition influentially signed was presented to the Home Office urging the release of the man, Thomas William Stewart, who was convicted at the Staffordshire Assizes on November 18 for blasphemy at Wolverhampton, and was sentenced to four months' imprisonment. The Home Secretary declined to accede to the prayer of the petitioners, and for his refusal he has been bitterly assailed by some newspapers, notably the New Statesman. Now what is the duty of a Home Secretary in such a case as this? He is, of course, the Minister responsible for the exercise of the King's prerogative of mercy. That prerogative has to be exercised with the greatest circumspection. It certainly does not entitle a minister to arrogate to himself a dispensing or suspensive power in regard to the law of the land. The essence of the prerogative is that it must only be exercised with great rarity and under exceptional circumstances. Of those circumstances the Home Secretary is the only competent judge, for no one else has all the facts before him; no one else is able to consult the judge who passed sentence. In the Stewart case Mr. McKenna had to bear in mind that the prisoner had been found guilty by a jury, and that he had been tried before a judge of liberal mind and humane traditions like Mr. Justice Coleridge. He had necessarily to consider the nature of Stewart's language at the open-air meetings he addressed. The evidence showed that this language was coarse, ribald, vulgar in the extreme.

Mr. McKenna was evidently influenced, too, by the fact that after Stewart had attracted a crowd by his attacks on religion, it was his custom to send his wife to distribute handbills among his listeners advertising certain appliances. That in itself is no offence, but the Home Secretary seems to have asked himself: "Is this the sort of man in whose behalf I ought to take the exceptional step of exercising the prerogative when he has been lawfully convicted by a jury of his fellow countrymen?" He decided that he was not. Mr. McKenna himself is utterly free from all suspicion of intolerance, but he probably takes the same view in these cases that was taken by Macaulay, as good a Liberal as ever lived, in the following passage:—

> "If a man in a place of public resort applies opprobrious epithets to names held in reverence by all Christians, such a man ought to be severely punished, not for differing from us in opinion, but for committing a nuisance which gives us pain and disgust. He is no more entitled to outrage our feelings by obtruding his impiety on us, and to say that he is exercising his right of discussion, than to establish a yard for butchering horses close to our houses and to say that he is exercising his right of property. He must use all his rights so as not to infringe the rights of others."

For our own part, we wish Stewart had not been prosecuted. We would leave speakers of this type alone, confident that the public's good sense is the best prophylactic against any abuse of free speech. But it is unjust to make a rancorous attack on a Minister because he has refused to release Stewart. The Secretary of State in these matters must act on his own judgment. To attack him for his decisions is easy, but fruitless. In order to avoid prosecutions for blasphemy, the effective way is not to abuse the Home Secretary, but to obtain the repeal of the Blasphemy Acts. We would like to see them repealed to-morrow. Religion would be in a poor way if it could not withstand the vulgar language of itinerant orators.

—Daily Chronicle, January 17, 1914.

Mark Melford: An Appreciation.

"Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note."

THERE were only three or four of us gathered within the little chapel of the Crematorium, which the leaden clouds of a grey January day rendered even more sombre than usual. No organ pealed forth a melody of mockery upon ears close-sealed to earthly sound. No meaningless words were babbled from hired lips of a vague and theoretical future; not a tinge of morbid curiosity intruded within the mournful area of regret rendered sacred by its sincerity. The last tragic farewell had been spoken when the curtain fell at the close of the Matinée at the Little Theatre a few weeks ago.

The last dignified exit took place when, at a given signal, the frail shell was slowly drawn along the catafalque until it passed from view within the oaken doors, where "Neither foe nor stranger would tread o'er his head."

It was the perfect realisation of the solemnity of silence. One and all felt the passing of a mighty intellect paramount above all physical suffering; and as we stepped into the outer air the gentle drip, drip, of falling rain only seemed a fit accompaniment to our mood and surroundings.

Truly no man could have a more enduring epitaph than that he was ever a protector of the defenceless and a faithful friend; and it was thus that we "left him alone with his glory."

ANNIE BRADSHAW.

SHELLEY AN ATHEIST.

In religion, Shelley was an Atheist. There is nothing uncommon in that; but he actually called himself one, and urged others to follow his example. He never trifled with the word God: he knew that it meant a personal First Cause, Almighty Creator, and Supreme Judge and Ruler of the Universe, and that it did not mean anything else, never had meant anything else, and never whilst the English language lasted would mean anything else. Knowing perfectly well that there was no such person, he did not pretend that the question was an open one, or imply, by calling himself an Agnostic, that there might be such a person for all he knew to the contrary. He did know to the contrary; and he said so. Further, though there never was a man with so abiding and full a consciousness of the omnipresence of a living force, manifesting itself here in the germination and growth of a tree, there in the organisation of a poet's brain, and elsewhere in the putrefaction of a dead dog, he never condescended to beg off being an Atheist by calling this omnipresent energy God, or even Pan. He lived and died professedly, almost boastfully, godless. In his time, however, as at present, God was little more than a word to the English people. What they really worshiped was the Bible; and our modern Church movement to get away from Bible fetishism and back to some presentable sort of Christianity (vide Mr. Horton's speech at Grindelwald the other day, for example) had not then come to the surface. The preliminary pickaxing work of Bible smashing had yet to be done; and Shelley, who found the moral atmosphere of the Old Testament murderous and abominable, and the asceticism of the New suicidal and pessimistic, smashed away at the Bible with all his might and main.—G. B. Shaw in the "Albermarle" (Sept., 1892).

RELIGION AND INSANITY.

We frequently see persons in insane hospitals sent there in consequence of what are called religious mental disturbances. I confess that I think better of them than of many who hold the same notions, and keep their wits and appear to enjoy life very well, outside of the asylums. Any decent person ought to go mad if he really holds such and such opinions. It is very much to his discredit, in every point of view if he does not ..... Anything that is brutal, cruel, heathenish, that makes life hopeless for the most of mankind, and perhaps for entire races—anything that assumes the necessity of the extermination of instincts which were given to be regulated—no matter by what name you call it—no matter whether a fakir, or a monk, or a deacon believes it—if received, ought to produce insanity in every well-regulated mind. I am very much ashamed of some people for retaining their reason, when they know perfectly well that if they were not the most stupid or the most selfish of human beings, they would become non-compos at once.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

A HOLY POPE.

When in 1474, the death of Sixtus IV. was received in Rome with a pæan of joy, people commented not so much upon his selling benefices to the highest bidder, and his other devices of extorting money, as upon the manner in which he rewarded the boys who served his unnatural lusts by granting to them rich bishoprics and archbishoprics.—H. C. Lea, "History of the Inquisition."

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

—SHELLEY.

Laws Against Religious Liberty.

THE present age boasts of its freedom. Civil and religious liberty is almost a commonplace among Englishmen. Catholics, Dissenters, and Jews have all been enfranchised. They enjoy the full rights of citizenship; their propaganda, worship, and property are fully protected by the law. But there is one exception to this rule of toleration. Freethinkers are still victims of oppression. They may vote for members of Parliament, and other representatives of the people; they may even sit in Parliament without hypocrisy or subterfuge under Mr. Bradlaugh's Oaths Act; but they are still insulted as jurymen by ignorant or bigoted judges; and they are liable to penalties for propagating their principles.

Many persons who are not Freethinkers are unaware of the grievances under which they suffer, and the following statement is intended for their benefit. It is believed that, when they understand the facts of the case, they will, for the most part, be favorable to an alteration of the law, so that all forms of opinion may enjoy a legal equality.

Under the old English law, heresy, blasphemy, schism, and other such offences, were tried and punished by the Ecclesiastical Courts. By the writ de heretico comburendo atheists, heretics, blasphemers, and schismatics could be burnt to death. This penalty was only abolished in 1677 by the Act 29 Charles II., cap. 9. The Act did not, however, take away the power of the Ecclesiastical Courts to deal with such offenders by "censures not extending to death." But in the course of time, by a gradual change of practice, the Ecclesiastical Courts have lost actual jurisdiction except over clergymen of the Church of England.

As heresy dropped out of sight attention became fixed on blasphemy. Lord Coleridge said that "the law of blasphemous libel first appeared in our books—at least the cases relating to it are first reported—shortly after the curtailment or abolition of the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in matters temporal. Speaking broadly, before the time of Charles II. these things would have been dealt with as heresy; and the libellers so-called of more recent days would have suffered as heretics in earlier times.

This law and practice continued till the passing of an Act known as the 9 and 10 William III., cap. 32, called "An Act for the more effectual suppressing of Blasphemy and Profaneness." It declares that "any person or persons having been educated in, or at any time having made profession of, the Christian religion within this realm, who shall, by writing, printing, teaching, or advised speaking, deny any one of the persons in the Holy Trinity to be God, or shall assert or maintain that there are more gods than one, or shall deny the Christian doctrine to be true, or the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be of divine authority," shall upon conviction be disabled from holding any ecclesiastical, civil, or military employment, and on a second conviction be imprisoned for three years and deprived for ever of all civil rights.

Lord Coleridge and Sir James Stephen have both called this law "ferocious." But it still disgraces the Statute Book. So much of it, as affected the Unitarians, was ostensibly repealed by the 53 George III., cap. 160. Lord Eldon, however, in 1817, doubted, whether it was even partially repealed; and Chief Baron Kelly and Lord Bramwell, so late as 1867, held that a lecture on "The Character and Teachings of Jesus: the former Defective, the latter Misleading," was an offence against the Statute.

This "infamous" Act was drawn up with such stringency that it defeated itself. No prosecution ever took place under it. But it largely guided the judges in their view of the Common Law of Blasphemy, under which scores of Freethinkers have been imprisoned.

The Act of William III. specifies certain opinions as blasphemous; it says nothing about the language in which they are couched. The crime was not in the manner but in the matter. And this view of Blasphemy was held by all our judges up to 1883, with the single exception of Lord Coleridge. In Woolston's case (1730) the Court "would not suffer it to be debated whether to write against Christianity in general was not an offence at Common Law." In Carlile's case (1819) the Court "was bound not to hear the truth of the Christian religion questioned." It declared that "if the defendant wished to produce authors to show that the Christian religion might be denied, that could not be allowed." Lord Chief Justic Abbott said "it was not competent in a Christian court, in a court of law, to rise up and say that the Christian religion was not a religion of truth." Mr. Justice Best went still further. He said: "The Act is not confined to those who libel religion, but extends to those who, in their most private intercourse, by advised conversation admit that they disbelieve the Scriptures." Lord Ellenborough, in the case of Eaton (1812), who was prosecuted for selling Paine's Age of Reason, said that "to deny the truth of the book which is the foundation of our faith, has never been permitted." In the case of Hetherington (1841), it was decided by Lord Chief Justice Denman that "an attack upon the Old Testament is clearly indictable." In the case of Paterson (Edinburgh, 1846), the Lord Justice Clerk said that the law expressly provided that "they who publish opinions contrary to the known principles of Christianity might be called to account and proceeded against by the civil magistrate." When the late Mr. Charles Bradlaugh was illegally arrested at Devonport, in 1861, for intending to lecture against the Bible, he brought an action for false imprisonment, and obtained one farthing damages; Lord Justice Erle, holding that the policeman, although he acted illegally, had really conferred a benefit on the plaintiff by preventing him from disseminating infidel opinions. Precisely the same view was taken by the Court of Exchequer in the case of Cowen v. Milbourn. Baron Bramwell said "it was unlawful to deny the truth of Christianity or the divine authority of the Scriptures." Lord Chief Baron Kelly added that to call the teaching of Christ misleading was "a violation of the law and cannot be done without blasphemy."

The Clergy.

LAST week's article was hardly out of my hands before I received a lengthy letter from a correspondent, which, curiously enough, dealt with an issue raised therein. The writer complains of what he calls the "habit" of Freethought writers dealing with the clergy as though they were all either rogues or fools. He says that he is personally acquainted with many intelligent and worthy men in the ranks of the clergy, and protests against the habitual injustice to which they are subjected. He adds that he does not call himself a Christian, although from the tone of his letter I do not think he is a Freethinker. Still, he is within his rights in ventilating what he considers a grievance, and I purpose dealing with his complaint in the same tone in which it is raised. I do not intend dealing with the rest of his letter at length, as it merely illustrates and enforces the point noted.

First of all, as to the facts. It is not true that writers in the Freethinker are in the habit of classifying clergymen as either rogues or fools. They know better. They know that such a statement would be false, and they would be themselves fools to make assertions, the consequence of which, would be injury to their own case. What they do protest against—or, to put the matter on a personal basis—what I have always protested against is the assumption that the clergy are better, morally or intellectually, than other people. They are not. On the contrary, there are circumstances connected with their training and status that tend to dull their sense of moral discrimination and intellectual rectitude. I am not prepared to say that the clergy, as a class, are worse than any other class. I do say they are no better, that their assumption of superiority is a relic of the old magic-working days, and that no man is made a better man by becoming a clergyman. However good he may be, the probability is that he would have been better had he never entered the pulpit.

Let us stick to two facts—facts that can be accepted by both sides. As a class, the clergy represent a body of educated men. They have all been carefully trained—too carefully trained. A large number of them carry degrees, and, whatever their faults may be, they cannot be due to want of education—using that word in a purely scholastic sense. Yet what proportion of new ideas, of advanced ideas, spring from their midst? What sort of a welcome is given by them to new ideas when advanced by other people? It is notorious that in both respects they make a poorer show than any other class in the community. And they make greater claims than any other class. Doctors do not profess to guide the community save in the matter of health. Lawyers only profess to guide in matters of law. But the clergy profess to guide in all the larger and more serious issues of life. The clergy not only fail to originate or to respond to new ideas in science, in ethics, or in sociology, it is the same with regard to their own special subject. They do not lead in matters of religion. The last century saw an enormous revolution of opinion on religious subjects; yet this was forced upon the clergy from the outside, and many have not accepted it yet. For over 200 years the clergy fought against the truth concerning the Old Testament. They were instrumental in getting men and women imprisoned, pilloried, whipped, and slandered for teaching the truth, and they only admitted they were in the wrong when denial became more dangerous than admission. To resist as long as may be, to denounce the investigator as an enemy to all that is worth preserving, and to minimise the importance of new ideas when they can no longer be denied, is the historic policy of the clergy of all the Churches.

Putting on one side the opposition during early years to Copernicus, Galileo, Newton, Buffon, and Lyell, let us take the clergy in relation to the theory of evolution. Darwin's work was met by them with universal vituperation. It was not that they rejected Natural Selection as untrue; that would have been a legitimate ground of objection, although the clergy were quite incompetent to express an opinion. Their objection was that it was contrary to their religion. So far, I agree with them; and this was the one grain of truth that figured in their mountain of abuse. It deposed God, they said, and established Atheism. In a very few years the more astute among the clergy saw that the game was up. Accordingly a new discovery was made. Christianity implied evolution. Darwin became a teacher of Christianity as Bradlaugh was—after his death—made a religious character. Evolution placed religion on a scientific basis. Science became the handmaid of theology.

Were the clergy quite genuine, even here? Did they, do they, even now really welcome scientific advance and investigation? If science and all its works could be banished, would the clergy complain? I have my doubts. In the sixteenth century the Jews of Spain were faced with the alternative of conversion or exile and death. Thousands became converted and were regular attendants at Church. But from the Church service many hurried home to carry out the Jewish ceremonies in private. If one could have watched the converted Spanish Jew in his home one would have found how genuine his adherence to Christianity was. When one watches the clergy carefully one notes how real is their attachment to scientific advance. Let a scientific worker challenge any presentment of the doctrine of evolution; above all, let him point out that there are certain limitations to science, that on some topics our ignorance is indestructible, and nowhere is he hailed with such glee as in Christian pulpits. Everywhere else ignorance is regarded as a misfortune. In the pulpit it becomes glad tidings of great joy. Now, as ever, the clergy show that they feel general ignorance to be the surest guarantee of their own rule.

Still more facts. Two hundred years ago, even a century ago, the clergy had the same beliefs that they had possessed a thousand years before. They believed in special creation, in Providence, in prayer, in miracles, in inspiration. So far as mere words are concerned, they have these beliefs still. Now I say deliberately that the majority of the clergy do not believe in these things at all. Press them to explain what is meant by a miracle, and they will reply ancient miracles were misunderstood natural happenings. Ask them whether prayers are really answered, and they will reply, Yes, subjectively. That is, one derives a mental solace and strength from the belief that one is in contact with a higher Power. The names are here, but their old meaning has gone. And the chief objection is that even now these definitions are only submitted on compulsion. When they can, the clergy keep up the delusion. Will any of them have the courage and the honesty to say plainly from the pulpit that the course of nature is unalterable? That disease is not to be cured by prayer, that prayer will not produce a good harvest, send a ship safely to its destination, or bring an army success? Will they tell their congregations plainly that the only benefit from prayer is that it gives those who pray a mental tonic, so long as they believe? My correspondent knows as well as I do that they will not do this. They will continue to keep the old illusions alive by the use of the old language and the old forms. Men may believe in all the things named and be stupid; they cannot accept the better knowledge of to-day, and continue preaching the old doctrines, and still retain a sound title to honesty.

Here, then, is the plain issue. A man of small culture and intelligence—there are plenty such in the pulpit—may retain a character for honesty and still preach the old doctrines. But in proportion as his culture and intelligence is enlarged, so his straightforwardness is diminished. Either he deliberately preaches things he knows to be false, or he gives a new meaning to the old doctrines—a meaning which they never did bear, and cannot now be fairly made to bear. That is the reason why with each generation the occupancy of the pulpit becomes more and more distasteful to men of genuine ability. Lesser men get their chance. And the religion that once found its leaders in a Hooker, a Jeremy Taylor, a Butler, and a Newman, now finds it in a Dr. Dixon, a Bishop Ingram, and a R. J. Campbell.

Do I mean, then, that the bulk of the clergy are hypocrites? Not a bit of it. They are, many of them, humbugs, but not hypocrites. Human nature could not sustain so elaborate an hypocrisy, or even so large a humbug, if all were conscious of the part they played. The humbug is sustained because it is largely unconscious. It is moralised because it springs from a class ethic. Given a body of men whose whole interest in life is bound up with the maintenance of a particular institution, let them be specially trained for service in or on behalf of that institution, and they inevitably come to measure things by different values to that which attach to other matters. We see something of this in the professional ethic of lawyers or doctors; but we see it most clearly, and with its evil features most pronounced, in the case of the clergy. For religion is by its very nature less open to the influence of new knowledge and needs, and more dependent upon the maintenance of the beliefs and intellectual atmosphere of bygone generations. It is, consequently, more alert to detect innovating tendencies, and more ferocious in the opposition offered. Not, be it noted, on the real ground that they threaten the interests of a class and the security of an institution, but on the fictitious ground that they weaken morality, degrade humanity, etc., etc. In this way bigotry and self-interest shelters itself behind a cloud of moral phrases, and does this so effectively that it imposes upon the clergy themselves. Strongly as I believe in the humbug of the modern clergy, and their utter uselessness to the State, I also believe that large numbers persuade themselves that they are working in the interests of society at large. Education and self-interest combined have taught them to identify the welfare of the Church with the welfare of the State, and so prevents their looking at things from the standpoint of a rational, healthy, social life. There are, of course, other types of clergy, about whom the less said the better.

Well, then, here are the facts that must determine any rational judgment concerning the clergy. A body of educated men, at least 50,000 strong, shows itself to-day, as of old, absolutely unproductive of new or progressive ideas. In the main, they show themselves hostile to their introduction and propagation. They are trained, not to search for truth as a scientist is trained to seek truth, not to use the supposed truth already possessed as a means of acquiring more, but simply to teach a body of doctrines already established. The consequence of this is that the whole of their real interest lies in maintaining things as they are. Identifying themselves with their Church and the welfare of their Church with that of the nation, the clerical mind operates under the influence of an ethic that is false in theory and dangerous in practice, and only those who thwart them know how the peculiarities of the clerical ethic express themselves. For a clergyman to be intellectually straightforward means that he must be either stupid enough to close his mind to developing knowledge and life, or he must leave the pulpit altogether. If he does not belong to the first class, and lacks the courage to follow the last course, his whole life becomes a series of evasions, apologies, and intellectual shuffles such as hardly any other educated body of men would stoop to. It may well be that the clergyman is not always consciously dishonest in these tactics. Personally, I should say that the vast majority are not. But the fact remains. And the fact that the mental crookedness is unconscious, that it can be concealed under the cover of a moral duty is only the more conclusive proof of the evil of the profession. No Freethinker need deny the existence of many good men among the clergy. The more numerous they are, the stronger is his case against the order. To paraphrase Ingersoll, our quarrel is not with the man beneath the priest. It is with the priest that almost inevitably strangles the man.

C. COHEN.

Sin.

THE Church is beginning to realise the vast importance and incalculable value of the doctrine of sin. In its absence the Church, in its present form, could not exist, and the significant fact is that the sense of sin is undoubtedly weakening everywhere. This was frankly admitted by the Right Rev. George Nickson, Bishop of Jarrow, in a paper which he read at the Islington Conference at Mildmay Hall a few weeks ago. Whilst stoutly contending that sin is a fact in human experience, his lordship was bound to recognise the grave danger of its ceasing to be such a fact. He bluntly stated that the piety of the best Christians to-day is an entirely different thing from that which prevailed even a generation ago. As a well-known scientist said a few years ago, "the higher man of to-day is not worrying about his sins, still less about their punishment." For this ecclesiastically mournful state of things Dr. Nickson blames the growth of luxury and the pursuit of power which are characteristic of the present age. Those are what he calls material causes of the decay of the sense of sin. Evolutionary science, too, has to bear its share of the responsibility, because its natural tendency is to "obliterate the impression of a Personal God," without which impression sin, in its theological meaning, becomes an impossibility. Now, the Bishop tells us that it is the bounden duty of the Church to "make it clear that sin is a fact of human experience."

The Rev. E. A. Eardley-Wilmot, M.A., also read a paper on sin at the Islington Conference which ran on similar lines to that by the Bishop. Both clergymen deplore the fact that sin is either openly denied or thought so lightly of at the present day. Mr. Eardley-Wilmot quotes the following passage from the pen of Bishop Gore:—

> "There will be no revival of vital religion among us on any large scale, or with any adequate results, except through a deepening of the sense of sin—a return to the properly Christian severity of view about the meaning of sin and its consequences."

Dr. Gore is perfectly right; but the revival for which he looks and works is not likely ever to take place, because the sense of sin, instead of deepening, is rapidly becoming shallower and shallower. "What has decayed among us rapidly," said Dean Inge many years ago, "is the reality of sin," and what was true then is much truer now. On this point there can be no two opinions. Bishop Nickson admits that if Massillon, one of the greatest of French preachers, lived to-day instead of two hundred years ago, he could not paralyse his hearers with his vivid description of men's sins and of their terrible consequences, as he so easily did then. The days for frightening people in that manner are past, never to return, because the sense of sin, being the product of superstition, is being destroyed by knowledge. The Bishop was quite right when he held science partly responsible for the change which he so ardently deplores; but we go a little further, and declare that science has been the chief agent in bringing it about. Professor David Smith, in his Correspondence Column in the British Weekly for January 22, asserts that, whilst the theologian is bound to accept all its findings in its own domain, science has no right to invade that of the theologian. "Its province is strictly limited," he assures us. "It takes cognisance of things as they are, and investigates their genesis and relations. Beyond this it cannot travel." Are we to infer that the theologian deals with things as they are not? This is what Dr. Smith says about the man of science:—

> "When the Scriptures affirm an initial catastrophe he holds his peace. 'Of that,' he says, 'I know > nothing. It is only things as they are that lie within my ken, and I cannot tell what may have preceded or determined them.'.....The moment he goes further in the way of affirmation or of denial, he invades the province of theology and ceases to be a man of science. Thus it is open to the theologian, while accepting the legitimate verdicts of science, to assume that initial catastrophe denominated the Fall, and the question is whether there be evidence to justify the affirmation."

What a horrible caricature of the man of science that extract is. To deal with things as they are and trace their evolution is to discover that there is absolutely no record of an initial catastrophe. Geological remains disclose no sign whatever of the Fall. What is the use of quoting Coleridge on the subject? Coleridge never investigated the genesis and relations of things, nor had he the means of doing so, such as we possess. Dr. Smith imagines that there is at least a two-fold evidence of the sinful condition of mankind. Let us hear and examine it:—

> "The presence in man's life and within the orbit of his influence of moral disorder and the suffering which it entails. In an otherwise orderly universe it is impossible to regard this as normal, and thus, to my mind, the doctrine of the Fall is a corollary of the scientific axiom of the orderliness of Nature. Human lawlessness is a dislocation of natural law."

That extract is chock-full of scientific errors. "Human lawlessness" is a figment of the theological imagination. A dislocation of natural law is a natural impossibility. The unbreakability of Nature's laws is a scientific truism. Heredity is insusceptible of dislocation. It is a law that works in a thoroughly orderly manner. Imperfection also seems to be a law from which Nature never departs. What the Professor speaks of as "moral disorder" is nothing in the world but natural imperfection, which throughout the animal kingdom entails suffering. "Disorder" is a wrong term in such a connection. All human actions are so far from being disorderly that it is possible to predict them. Whether good or bad, they are always orderly. That is to say, all deeds are determined by the laws of heredity and environment.

We now pass on to the second fold of the alleged evidence:—

> "The testimony of our moral instincts. If sin were merely the natural imperfection of an incomplete development there would be no sense of guilt; for, as Erasmus puts it, we would have no more reason to lament that we are sinful than a horse that he is ignorant of grammar. But the sense of guilt is here, demanding explanation; and, to my mind, there is no explanation apart from a primal Fall."

This is the worst fallacy of all, though sound theology. The sense of guilt, in the theological sense, is not here by nature. It is a sense whose genesis is due alone to religious instruction. It is not a moral instinct at all, but a religious emotion peculiar to believers in God. Atheists are devoid of it, and their offspring know of it only by hearsay. Professor Smith's illustration undermines his case:—

> "When a beggar sees a rich estate he covets it; but it is a more painful emotion that is stirred in the breast of a spendthrift by the sight of the broad lands which he has lost through his own wickedness. He curses himself and blushes for the folly which has robbed him of his heritage. The problem lies in this sense of shame, this instinct of self-reproach in the human breast; and the doctrine of the Fall is its solution—the only and, to my mind, the inevitable solution."

We confess our utter inability to comprehend the last sentence in that extract. Why, the sense of shame after committing a harmful act is entirely natural, and to reproach one's self for it is certainly to furnish no proof of "an initial catastrophe." We are acquainted with a sheep dog and a fox terrier who are bosom friends. They have been together for years without a single quarrel. Occasionally the terrier attempts to steal his friend's biscuit, when naturally he gets punished; but no sooner has the penalty been inflicted than the transgressor is affectionately licked. Now, is it not a sense of shame, or an instinct of self-reproach in the sheep dog's breast, that induces him to kiss his offending brother? But surely there is no problem here the only solution of which is to be found in "an initial catastrophe" that overtook the canine race some four thousand years ago. It is the social instinct that solves the problem involved in the sense of shame. Man's sense of shame on account of a wrong act is so much stronger than a dog's simply because the social instinct in him is immeasurably more fully developed, and should be regarded, not as suggestive of a Fall in the far distant past, but as the outcome of a succession of ascents.

That we are fallen sinners needing redemption through the shed blood of an innocent Christ is an essentially degrading doctrine. The truth about us is that we have risen, not fallen, and that we need education, self-development, not restoration by an outsider. Divested of its theological connotations, sin denotes social offence, and is a sign of imperfect adaptation to environment; and in this sense, deliverance from sin is possible only as the result of our own efforts.

J. T. LLOYD.

Science and the Soul.

> "As to the other great question, the question what becomes of man after death, we do not see that a highly educated European, left to his unaided reason, is more likely to be in the right than a Blackfoot Indian. Not a single one of the many sciences in which we surpass the Blackfoot Indians throws the smallest light on the state of the soul after the animal life is extinct. In truth all the philosophers, ancient and modern, who have attempted, without the help of revelation, to prove the immortality of man, from Plato down to Franklin, appear to us to have failed deplorably."—LORD MACAULAY, Essays, vol. ii., pp. 541-2.

> "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; and man hath no preeminence above the beasts: for all is vanity. All go into one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again. Who knoweth the spirit of man whether it goeth upward and the spirit of the beast whether it goeth downward to the earth? Wherefore I saw that there is nothing better than that a man should rejoice in his works; for that is his portion: for who shall bring him back to see what shall be after him?"—The Holy Bible (Revised Version), Ecclesiastes iii. 19-22.

> "Just as our consciousness comes out of nothing in the first months, or years, of our life, so it will pass into nothing at the end of our life."

> "Science cannot admit the immortality of the conscious soul, for consciousness is a function of special elements in the body that certainly cannot live for ever."—PROFESSOR METCHNIKOFF, The Nature of Man, pp. 160-285.

THE majority of people, in this country, are taught from earliest childhood to believe that they possess an immortal soul. So deeply rooted is this idea—like most of the ideas authoritatively taught during childhood—that people are surprised when first they meet with someone who has doubts upon the subject, and still more so at one who denies the existence of an immortal soul altogether.

Yet there is not a scrap of scientific evidence to prove that man possesses a soul that will survive the death and dissolution of the body. Even Professor Fiske, the author of Through Nature to God, regretfully admits: "It is not likely that we shall ever succeed in making the immortality of the soul a matter of scientific demonstration, for we lack the requisite data. It must ever remain an affair of religion rather than of science."* And if scientists know nothing of a soul, the philosophers have been equally unable to supply evidence of its existence. Upon this point we have the express testimony of Bishop Watson, who, in his Apology for the Bible, written in reply to Paine's Age of Reason, declared:—

> "Notwithstanding the illustrious labors of Gassendi, Cudworth, Clarke, Baxter, and of above two hundred other modern writers on the subject, the natural mortality or immortality of the human soul is as little understood by us as it was by the philosophers of Greece or Rome. The opposite opinions of Plato and Epicurus, on this subject, have their several supporters amongst the learned of the present age, in Great > Britain, Germany, France, Italy, in every enlightened part of the world; and they who have been most seriously occupied in the study of the question concerning a future state, as deducible from the nature of the human soul, are least disposed to give from reason a positive decision of it either way. The importance of revelation is by nothing rendered more apparent than by the discordant sentiments of learned and good men (for I speak not of the ignorant and immoral) on this point. They show the insufficiency of human reason, in a course of above two thousand years, to unfold the mystery of human nature and to furnish from the contemplation of it any assurance from the quality of our future condition."*

Moreover, the idea of an immortal soul and a future life is not only rejected by millions of the more enlightened inhabitants of Europe, but it always has been rejected by millions of the followers of a religion which numbers more adherents than Christianity—namely, Buddhism.

Mr. G. T. Bettany tells us that "Buddhism even does not allow that there is a soul distinct from the body. Practically, it only recognises the combined being that is seen or is conscious of itself, and that suffers; and it has no explanation beyond."† This is confirmed by Professor Rhys Davids—our highest authority upon the subject—who says: "Buddhism does not acknowledge the existence of a soul as a thing distinct from the parts and powers of man which are dissolved at death, and the Nirvana of Buddhism is simply extinction."‡

The ancient Jews themselves had no idea of a future life. The Bible did not give us the idea of immortality, says Ingersoll:—

> "The Old Testament tells you how you lost immortality; it does not say another word about another world from the first mistake in Genesis to the last curse in Malachi. There is not in the Old Testament one burial service. No man in the Old Testament stands by the bed and says, 'I will meet them again'—not one word. From the top of Sinai came no hope of another world."§

In Genesis we read that God placed Adam and Eve in a garden, giving them permission to eat of the fruit of every tree except the tree of knowledge—knowledge appears to be as much feared by God as it is by the priests. Adam and Eve having, in spite of this arbitrary command, eaten of the tree, we are told,—

> "the Lord God said, behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil: and now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever.....he drove out the man; and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden cherubims, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life" (Gen. iii. 22-24).

We read nothing whatever of any promise, or hope, of a future life after death. Later, in the Hebrew God's covenants with Abraham, all the good things promised are to take place in this world, his seed will outnumber the stars in the heavens and the sands of the sea (Gen. xxii. 1-7), he is to be the father of many nations, and in return Abraham, to fulfil his part of the contract, is to see that "Every man child among you shall be circumcised" (Gen. xvii. 10), Abraham's own reward being, "And thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age" (Gen. xv. 15). Again, in the Ten Commandments delivered to Moses, the Lord tells the people to honor their parents, not that they may inherit eternal life, but "that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee" (Ex. xx. 12).

Plenty of children, wealth, and a good old age were the rewards held out to the Jews if they placed all their religious business with the house of Jehovah, and had no dealings with disreputable firms like Baal, Moloch, Dagon, and other competitors.

Bishop Warburton wrote a great work—great in size, we mean—entitled The Divine Legation of Moses, to prove that God did not reveal the idea of a future life to Moses. Voltaire describes Warburton, in this work, as "ranging through a hundred labyrinths, and fighting all he met with on the way."*

When the translators of our Authorised Version of the Bible came to the passage in the book of Ecclesiastes which declares that man, in his death, has no pre-eminence over the beasts that perish, they were shocked that the Holy Ghost should have inspired the writer with such infidel sentiments, calculated to cut at the very roots of religion. So they quietly altered the inspired words to read, "the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth" (Eccle. iii. 21). The true reading is rendered in the Revised Version, as given at the head of this article.

They also accomplished many other pious frauds, notably the celebrated passage in Job, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," which the Revised Version has not corrected, although every Hebrew scholar knows that the original says nothing at all about a Redeemer, but speaks of an Avenger who will put a curse upon Job's enemies in this life. In fact, Professor Dillon, in his learned and scholarly work, The Sceptics of the Old Testament, has demonstrated that the authors of the book of Job, Ecclesiastes, and of the sayings of Agur, in the book of Proverbs, were thorough-going sceptics when divested of the orthodox trimmings added by priests and translators. The Messiah, whose coming is foretold by the prophets, was not regarded as a heavenly ruler, but as a victorious king upon earth, who would restore the kingdom of Israel and place the Gentiles under their feet; and, in fact, the Jews still look forward to the coming of this Messiah, steadfastly rejecting the claims of Jesus Christ to that title, through nearly two thousand years of blood and fire.

Even so orthodox a defender of the Bible as Mr. Gladstone, the author of The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture, admits that "the truth concerning a future state does not appear to have constituted a specific element in the divine commission entrusted to the Hebrew race."† And when Gladstone abandoned an orthodox defence, the case was indeed a hopeless one.

"THE LIGHT THAT FAILED."

A generation or two back badly lighted churches were the rule. In one of Edward Fitzgerald's letters to Fanny Kemble, he narrates the following, which was told him by "a pious but humorous man":—

Scene.—Country Church on Winter's evening. Congregation with the "Old Hundredth" ready for the parson to give out some dismissal words.

Good old parson, not at all meaning rhyme: "The Light has grown so very dim, I scarce can see to read the Hymn."

Congregation, taking it up: to the first half of the "Old Hundredth":

> "The Light has grown so very dim,
> I scarce can see to read the Hymn."

(Pause, as usual: Parson mildly impatient): "I did not mean to read a Hymn; I only meant my eyes were dim."

Congregation, to second part of the "Old Hundredth":

> "I did not mean to read a Hymn;
> I only meant my Eyes were dim."

Parson, out of all patience, etc.: "I didn't mean a Hymn at all—I think the Devil's in you all!"

Two little girls, returning from Sunday-school, were discussing the progress they respectively had made.

First girl: "I'm past original sin."

Second girl: O! that's nothing, I'm past redemption!"

Acid Drops.

Mr. Winston Churchill never suffered from attacks of modesty. He put it on record that divine aid was consciously vouchsafed to him when he escaped from captivity by the Boers. He promised to explain the whole incident some time in the not too distant future. But that time has not arrived yet, and probably never will, unless the right honorable gentleman lives long enough to be senile. At that stage of life it is common to indulge in pious reminiscences.

One would like to have had Kruger's opinion of Mr. Winston Churchill's escape. The old man would in all likelihood have sneered at the young Britisher's story of heavenly assistance. That sort of thing was, of course, enjoyed exclusively by the Boers, and mainly by their godly President, who occupied a prominent place in the celestial visiting book.

Whoever goes to the Admiralty will spend more and more millions—if he can. What is wanted is a great body of Navy Scouts, all good Christians, and all able to imitate Jesus by walking on the sea—as Jesus said they would if they only believed. That would be an immense saving in ships. At present the members of the British Navy cannot walk on the sea at all, and sometimes not on shore.

Miss M. Edith Durham, in a letter to the Nation, quotes the following passage from a communication from an inhabitant of Kortcha in Albania—where the Greeks are said to be doing so much good:—

> "Pen can never describe the misery and discontent which prevails among the poor population. The above-mentioned incidents are insignificant as compared with the cruelties which I can never write down on paper. The world must surely be amazed that nations, calling themselves Christians, can, either through anger or greed, commit such barbarisms on their brethren. What we expected from the Turks we got in abundance from these Christians. Instead of the liberty and peace for which we fought during so many years, they brought all the debasing elements of their 'civilisation,' with unbridled passions, which are a great disaster to all our invaded places. Yes; the 'Allies' fought side by side simply for the extermination of our nation, and is it surprising, when I say the plain truth, that the population at present under the Servian and Greek banners are calling for the rule of the Crescent and not the Cross?"

Miss Durham used to be a light-hearted friend of the Balkan Christians. She recognises now with a sad heart that they are inferior to the Mohammedans.

Cassell's Saturday Journal is bound to provide its readers with something religious in the list of contents. In the last issue a Mr. Parkes Withers answered the question "If We Lost Our Religion?" He thinks we should lose very little for a time, but afterwards there would be a hell on earth, such as he fancies existed before Christianity was introduced. But the fact is that there never was such a hell on earth as this gentleman imagines; and there is hell enough on earth now, after nearly two thousand years of Christianity, to satisfy the appetite of the worst devils conceivable. Christian civilisation seems to be finally winding itself up in a war fever, although it is always declaring that its Founder came to bring Peace on earth, in spite of the fact that he himself said that he came not to send peace but a sword. More of the fruit of man's labor is spent every year on preparations for war. Huge armies of anti-social celibates are maintained at the cost of the better elements of human society, which is cursed and impoverished thereby. And when fighting actually takes place, as in the Balkans lately, it is found that the "Soldiers of Christ," as they call themselves, easily outdistance all rivals in cruelty, murder, and lust. The real truth is that nothing could be worse than Christianity, and almost anything else would be better.

Why did the great Christian Powers keep out of that Balkan cockpit? Simply for their own advantage. All other alleged motives were hypocritical pretences. The combatants were restricted to certain areas. That is all. There was no compassion or humanity in Western diplomacy. The Concert of Europe did not save one man's life, or one woman's honor, or one child's future promise. Yet it might have prevented the whole evil if it had only been minded to do so.

Mr. Parkes Withers argues—if it can be called arguing—that if we lost Christianity altogether "We should without a doubt speedily degenerate into a set of human furies, resorting to all the disorder, violence, and ruthless gratification of our basest animal nature." That is precisely what happened in the case of the Balkan armies, not without Christianity, but with it. And it has been happening in Albania since what is supposed to be the conclusion of the war. Soldier of Christ has always meant Soldier of Hell.

Dr. J. J. Willis, one of the two bishops whose action in Uganda has led to the Kikuyu controversy, preaching at Westminster Abbey recently, said that the missionary pioneers "died a thousand miles from anywhere." How exact! It reminds one of the customary opening of fairy tales, "Once upon a time."

Lord Charles Beresford, writing in the current issue of Nash's Magazine, says that "religion is an accident of birth." It is an accident that leaves lifelong traces.

"You may live anywhere now," says the Rev. A. C. Hill, "from Cornwall to John o' Groat's, and no one will ever suggest to you that you should go to chapel." We beg to differ. We receive scores of circulars during the year, and so do most other people, inviting us to church or chapel and suggesting a grave infringement of duty if we stay away. And what about the house-to-house canvassing that is every now and then attempted? Mr. Hill's excuse for small attendances is too thin. And if it were not, the phenomenon would need explaining. Why is it that, whereas attendance at "Divine Worship" was once thought indispensable it is now negligible? Does it not look as though people are discovering that whether they go to church or stay away, pray or cease to pray, makes no real difference? When people have got hold of a really good thing they usually stick to it. That they have not done so in the case of church attendance speaks volumes to those who read things aright.

Mr. Hill says that no man is now religious for what he can gain either in loaves and fishes or social position. And he adds that social prestige is outside, not inside, the Church. The Church is the home of the poor and the lonely, as it always has been. Well, this is simply not true. It may be admitted that in very many cases a man may stay away from church, and, if he is silent, not suffer. But let him open his mouth about religion. Let him exercise the same freedom of speech about the falsities of religion that other people do about its assumed truths, and then see what will happen. In a very large number of cases he will find that social prestige is all on the side of a respectable hypocrisy that aims at pretending to believe in the truth of religion even while it is known to be false.

How else are we to explain the silence of so many public men who are known to be anti-Christian, even anti-religious, in opinion? Are they silent because they do not desire to speak? We do not believe it. Very few men are willingly hypocrites, or remain silent when they might speak. Certainly it is untrue of men who show by their whole life that they have a deal of the propagandist in their make-up. No, the truth is that their social position would be ruined if they spoke out. Religious bigotry does not always approach the heretic with the jailor's key, or with the bribe of solid cash. It would succeed if it did. But the pressure of social boycott tells where other things would fail; and it is only the few that can stand out against that.

As for the Church being the home of the poor and the lonely, Mr. Hill knows better. The one cry of the clergy is that they cannot get the poor to attend Church. Let anyone stand outside a church or chapel on Sunday and note the entrants. How many poor and forlorn will be see enter? And who supplies the funds? Do these come from the poor and lonely? Mr. Hill must try again. His next attempt cannot easily be worse.

"Good Americans, when they die, go to Paris." It seems as if Ella Wheeler Wilcox is bound for the same goal. She has a poem on "Heresy" in Nash's Magazine which should guarantee the lady a free ticket. A stanza runs:—

> "The world has a thousand creeds, and never a one have I:
> Nor church of my own, though a million spires are pointing the way on high.
> And heretic, though I am, outside of the pale of creeds,
> I have love in my heart for god and man: and I think it is all one needs."

A lengthy discussion has been going on in the Guardian respecting the supply of the clergy. The complaint is that the quality is poor and the quantity inadequate. The general agreement arrived at by the correspondents and by the editor is that the question is almost entirely one of funds. If better incomes can be provided, better men and more men will be attracted to the ministry. We do not quarrel with this conclusion, save that no amount of money will ever again be able to purchase the kind of intellects that once figured in the Churches. Life has become too vast, and theology too obviously artificial, for that to occur. Money may purchase advocacy, but it cannot buy convictions. And the really great men of the past had sound convictions. That has now become almost an impossibility for men of first-rate intelligence. The Church to-day must either "suffer fools gladly," or buy the ability of men who are for sale, and who fail to convince others because there is no sincerity in themselves.

Apart from this, we quite agree that the question of the supply of the clergy is a question of funds. And no one has even the moral right to object to a clergyman being paid by those who require his services. But if this is so, why keep up the hollow cant about the clergyman being "called" to his work, as though it were a species of supernatural selection? Why not admit plainly that the profession of a clergyman is adopted exactly as that of a lawyer, or a doctor, or a banker. It is one of many methods of gaining a living. Once a man is a clergyman, the profession involves quite enough of self-stultification without its being initiated by an act of hypocrisy.

We don't know what is to be done with the Committee of the Swinton Poor Law Schools. Probably something in the boiling oil line might meet the case. Anyway, this band of reprobates has actually gone so far as to provide the children under its care with cinematograph shows on Sunday evenings. The Guardians have been asked by the Bishop of the diocese to consider the seriousness of "training the children committed to their care to consider attendance at picture theatres as a proper way of spending Sunday evenings." We don't know whether the Committee is considering the gravity of its offence, but obviously its duty to the Bishop and the clergy is to provide customers for the clergy as far as they can. Picture shows on Sunday evening! And for poor-law children too! If they cannot be made to attend church on Sunday, then the situation is indeed hopeless.

The Church Family Newspaper deserves some special award for its daring. Commenting on the coming performance of Parsifal, it remarks that Wagner's opera stood for something more than art and music even at its best; "it was the outcome of fervent religious devotion at its best." Wagner the Atheist as an exponent of religious devotion at its best! It would be a pity to spoil such a gem by further comment.

The Rev. Allen Edwards of South Lambeth, has published an appeal in the Daily Mail for Sunday clothing for 3,500 Sunday-school children. This appears to be an English adaptation of the manufacture of "rice Christians," so well-known in the mission fields.

Bishop Tucker has had a fit of mock heroics. Speaking of the present Bishop of Uganda, he said that "if he is sent to the stake I am prepared to go with him." Christians are not martyred for their opinions nowadays. They prefer to penalise Freethinkers.

The death of General Picquart recalls the Dreyfus trial, for the dead soldier took a prominent part in that affair. The great hero of the Dreyfus case was the Atheist, Emile Zola, whose swift live pen set Europe ablaze with indignation, and led to the reinstatement of the unfortunate Jewish officer.

The authorities, who found that Westminster Abbey was too full at the deaths of Herbert Spencer, Swinburne, and Meredith to permit of further burials, have promptly offered to the family the privilege of having Lord Strathcona's remains interred in the Abbey. The clergy do so love the "poor."

The so-called debate held at the Little Theatre on "Miracles" by Mr. G. K. Chesterton was referred to as the "Magic Debate" by the Daily Sketch. The whole performance was a miracle of politeness, for few of the speakers ever got near the subject in discussion.

One of the principal jokes in the farce of the "Do Miracles Happen?" debate at the Little Theatre was the presence and participation of the Rev. Dr. J. Warschauer—the gentleman who debated with Mr. Foote at Caxton Hall and made such an exhibition of himself by losing his temper. It was gravely announced in the Chronicle that Mr. Warschauer came up all the way from Bradford on purpose. His purpose, we presume, was to save London from being misled. With characteristic modesty he concluded that London was likely to suffer that calamity if he were not there to avert it. So he "came," and we dare say he added the rest of Cæsar's boast "I saw," "I conquered." We understand that the reverend gentleman returned to Bradford. We shudder to think of what might have happened there if he had not done so. To save one place and lose another is such doubtful economy.

"There are things in nature," says Mr. A. C. Benson, one of the most interesting of present-day religious essayists,

> "which one cannot see without a horror of indignation. One sees weak, innocent, well-meaning, harmless people tortured by disease, by miserable delusions of the mind, by wretched misfortunes. I am not now speaking of the victims of the cruelty of man, but of what seems to be the cruelty of nature. No effort of reason, no easy optimism, no ingenious hypothesis is of the smallest avail to explain away these things."

Quite so; but need we try? We can accept them—we must accept them—as part of the order of things, and do our best to remedy them. But need we bother about explaining them? We do not "explain" why, if a man's head gets in the way of a falling brick, the man gets damaged. We accept the circumstances as in themselves sufficient. But if we knew that a man's hand threw the brick so that it would encounter the head, then we should want to know why he did it. So with nature. Eliminate the idea of an intelligence behind nature ordering events, and Mr. Benson's perplexity disappears. It is a problem that owes its whole existence to an accepted theory. And there is not the slightest need for the theory. That is why Atheism is by far the more hopeful and helpful position. It does not create difficulties, but it learns to face obstacles boldly. The same problems face Atheist and Theist, but the Atheist is not depressed by feeling himself the sport of an intelligent force quite beyond his control, but apparently quite callous to human suffering.

Mr. Benson finds some "help" in the reflection that sometimes some of our greatest trials have ended well, "and if that is so in one single instance, it is a basis for faith." We do not think so. Granted that in one case out of a large number we benefit from a trial or a misfortune. How can we reconcile that (1) with the idea of a Deity who could as easily have given us the benefit without the misfortune, and (2) with the fact of others getting the same benefits without the misfortune? Besides, it is not true that one case of goodness emerging from evil gives a basis for faith. The reverse of this is the case. One case of undeserved suffering, one case of unmerited disaster, destroys the basis of faith. It certainly destroys all basis for belief in a Deity whose love and mercy is over all his works. At most it leaves man the sport of a capricious intelligence that could have made him better had it chosen to do so, and even now awards favors and punishments with little or no regard to individual merit.

Mrs. T. R. Ferens, wife of one of the Nonconformist M.P.'s, offered a year ago a sum of a guinea to all mothers in Hull with newborn babies, if their children were living a year hence. Mrs. Ferens has now been called on to pay nearly four hundred pounds. The Methodist Times says that this is just one illustration of the effect that may be produced when public attention is directed to any particular matter. In the course of our weekly newspaper reading we come across a deal of rubbish, but this is a gem. We wonder that the mothers of Hull don't rise up and lynch the editor of the Methodist Times. Does he imagine that these four hundred mothers only kept their babies alive for a year in the hope of getting a guinea from Mrs. Ferens? If any of them did this, we strongly decline to discriminate between the mothers who allowed their children to die, and those who kept them alive for the sake of a paltry guinea. Of course, we do not believe that the offer of a guinea made the slightest difference to the infant mortality in Hull. The incident only shows what an exalted idea of human nature Christians possess.

Mr. Cresswell, M.P., the labor leader in the House of Assembly, was arrested at Johannesburg under Martial Law, and has since been sentenced to a months' imprisonment for what he might have done in England with absolute impunity. Evidently the authorities must have considered him a very dangerous character; nevertheless they thought a month's imprisonment a sufficient punishment for his offence. Over here, in the old country, a judge calls it a lenient sentence when he gives a mere nobody four months' imprisonment for certain vulgar words about the Christian religion. The truth of what he said is not disputed; the charge against him is made on grounds of taste and feeling.

How much the people of England, and especially the Liberals, really care for religion, may be measured by the following incident. Sir John Simon, M.P., the Attorney-General, in the course of his recent speech at the Oldham Reform Club, made some gibing observations on several Conservative leaders, including Mr. Balfour. What would be the surprise of a political Rip Van Winkle who fell asleep in 1905 and had only just returned to consciousness? "He would find," Sir John said, "the old, ingenious, astute, and delightful leader of the Conservative party lecturing on religion at Glasgow." This was greeted by the audience with loud laughter. There was something irresistibly absurd in the drop down from the Tory leadership to lecturing the British people on religion. Oh what a fall was there!

Truth, like murder, will "out" sometimes. Some of it was uttered at Plymouth the other day and got reported in the Western Daily Mercury. There was a large congregation in the Union Congregational Church to hear a special sermon by the Rev. G. E. Darlaston, of Crouch End, London. We quote the following passage from the Mercury's report:—

> "He remarked that hundreds of people did not believe in Christ because of the terrible condition of their big cities. An embassy was recently sent from Japan to study the social conditions of our country with a view to adopting Christianity. They, however, saw the awful conditions of the slums, and went back to Japan and told the Mikado that Christianity in England was a failure. In their slums there was a terrible scene; immorality, vice, and drunkenness reigning supreme."

"How were they going to stop it?" the reverend gentleman asked. Ay, there's the rub. His own recipe was Christian unity. But how is that to be obtained? There's another rub—and the worst of all.

"Mack, the Sky Pilot" is the subject of a report in the Daily Mail. He is collecting money "to alleviate the lot of the camp-worker in Canada and other parts." What are the employers doing? We rather suspect it is the "spiritual" lot of these hard workers that "Mack" is seeking to improve.

John D. Rockefeller, who follows Jesus Christ's teaching about the blessings of poverty by becoming and keeping the richest man in the world, delivers pious addresses as a Christian amateur. Having a mania for saving, at anybody's cost, he has been advising the Sunday-school boys and girls to save all they can, and contribute the result to missionary work. Some of them must have winked. They were listening to one of the greatest jokers of the age.

Rev. R. J. Campbell seems to be sailing on a new tack. He preached the other day at the Digbeth Institute, Birmingham, and spent a good deal of his time in disparaging the human intellect. He quoted the old text about increasing knowledge increasing sorrow. To think, he said, is pessimistic. "The shadow of tragedy," he said, "was over all we do; he defied anyone to say otherwise; intellect was calamitous. There was Swinburne the poet, no man had been able to write more passionately than he, but he saw no glorious to-morrow for mankind." Indeed! It was not thus that we read Swinburne in the days of our youth. Forty years ago, on the title-page of a little book called Heroes and Martyrs of Freethought, we put the following verse from Swinburne:—

> "Have we not men with us royal,
> Men the masters of things?
> In the days when our life is made new,
> All souls perfect and true
> Shall adore whom their forefathers slew;
> And these indeed shall be loyal,
> And those indeed shall be kings."

Forty years have rolled by and we say "Amen" still to that noble verse. Let it be remembered that the death of the old Lord God in the Hymn o Man was accompanied by "the love-song of earth," that Swinburne sang of—

> "Reason and love, whose names are one, > Seeing reason is the sunlight shed from love the sun."

that he sang, not to the fancied deities of a dreamland faith, but—

> "To the pure spirit of man that men call God,
> To the high soul of things, that is > Made of men's heavenlier hopes and mightier memories."

And now let Mr. Campbell read the magnificent finish of the splendid "Epilogue" to Songs Before Sunrise, and then ask himself whether what he said of Swinburne was really true.

Mr. Campbell commits a blunder which is very common to "believers." They fancy themselves with their present feelings and a different set of beliefs. But a little reflection would convince them that this is an impossibility. You cannot go on fearing you will lose heaven, for instance, when you have come to believe that there is no heaven to lose; neither can you dread going to hell when you once believe there is no hell to go to. Your feelings adjust themselves to your beliefs in all cases. You may suffer in all sorts of ways—personal, domestic, social, and political—by a change in your convictions; but you cannot suffer in the way that Mr. Campbell imagines. You may suffer while the change is going on, but you cannot suffer when the change is completed.

The feelings that gather round anti-theistic convictions—for that is what Swinburne called himself—are naturally very different from the feelings that gather round convictions like Mr. Campbell's. And the preacher might have seen, if he had read the poet more attentively, that the psychological adjustment was as complete in the one case as in the other. Not believing in God or in a future life, Swinburne had to look (and did look, and was satisfied) to natural instead of supernatural "consolations." His ideas of life and its meaning were more stoical than the preacher's, they were also less egoistic, and one is puzzled to see how they were less "glorious." Take this stanza, for instance, from the "Prelude" to Songs Before Sunrise:—

> "For what has he whose will sees clear
> To do with doubt and faith and fear,
> Swift hopes and slow despondencies?
> His heart is equal with the sea's
> And with the sea-wind's, and his ear
> Is level to the speech of these,
> And his soul communes and takes cheer
> With the actual earth's equalities,
> Air, light, and night, hills, winds, and streams,
> And seeks not strength from strengthless dreams."

Swinburne, like Meredith (in a letter to Mr. Foote) had no love for "smoking priest's opium." Mr. Campbell, with the cheap tears in his eyes, and the cheap grief round his mouth, seems unable to find comfort in anything else. But he is not a Swinburne, and not a Meredith; and a little calm reflection on that fact might do him a great deal of good.

Father Bernard Vaughan has been chuckling over the fact that the Church of England was created by Act of Parliament, and he prophesies that it will die by Act of Parliament. Yes, and there will be no vacancy created—not even for the Catholic Church.

We don't understand the surprise caused by the Abbé Lemiere's resigning one of the four vice-presidencies of the Chamber of Deputies, in deference to the Pope's objections. A Catholic priest is a priest first, and a citizen afterwards to say nothing of the separation of Church and State.

Seats in the pit were sixpence in Shakespeare's time. Prices were doubled on Sunday afternoon when new plays were introduced.

Canon Sutton ought to find the Holy Ghost quite enough in the ghost line to preach to the Church people of Dearham, in Cumberland. One old-established ghost might be forgiven. But when the reverend gentleman starts a ghost-shop of his own he goes too far for an age of cheap books and compulsory elementary schools. The one about the girl with the sealskin coat in the moonlight, which he saw on the roadway when riding home after dining at Davenby Hall, suggests a number of questions, which we prefer to leave to the reader's imagination.

London dealers took advantage of the prolonged bitter east wind to raise the price of coal several shillings a ton. They then denounced the greediness of the coal porters who demanded an extra penny a ton for their share of the business. And this is a Christian country.

March 1, Glasgow; 22, Manchester.

To Correspondents.

ROLAND WOOD.—See paragraph. Thanks.

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

JOSEPH BAYCE.—Proof in due course. Always glad to hear from you. We hope the pressure of business has its compensations.

E. B.—Your cuttings are always welcome.

J. B.—Probably he was "associated with Bradlaugh and Foote" as a man in the street watching the royal procession might have been associated with Queen Victoria on Jubilee Day. Thanks for the cutting. We daresay the man Musgrave has found it "better to be with Jesus."

J. W. BURGESS AND OTHERS.—We are not passing your letters over to Mr. Repton. There was no need for the promise he made at the end of his article. We understand that there is a sixpenny edition of Buchanan's Foxglove Manor. That price puts it within the reach of everyone who wants to read it, without troubling Mr. Repton or anybody else in the matter.

W. DAVIDSON.—We are much obliged. We wish others would take as much interest in promoting our circulation. See also paragraph.

A. J. MARRIOTT.—We see no analogy. Your letter was not ignored, it was answered, all the pith of it being given in the reply. This has always been our policy, and nobody is deceived. We have never laid ourselves open to publish a lot of correspondence; our space is insufficient to do anything of the kind; nor is it within the scope of our object in carrying on the Freethinker.

A. E. MADDOCK.—Received and shall appear.

G. HULL.—Figures reprinted from a publication dated 1892 are not exactly up-to-date in 1914. Are they?

H. R. E.—We have printed official figures again and again after Christian Church Conferences. The decay of the Churches, in point of numbers, is a common-place of every Annual Meeting.

W. DODD.—See paragraph in "Sugar Plums." Thanks.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. J. Atherley Jones, who has retired from North-West Durham, after representing it for so many years, has taken the post of Judge in the City of London. He was a good Radical and his father was Ernest Jones, the famous Chartist leader. Mr. Atherley Jones was engaged by the National Secular Society's solicitor as senior counsel for the defence of Harry Boulter in the "blasphemy" prosecution six years ago. He called upon the jury for an acquittal, which he did not obtain, for the judge was evidently in favor of a conviction. But it is certain that Mr. Atherley Jones's speech—which was reported verbatim at the time in the Freethinker—had a great deal to do with the lenient way in which Boulter was treated. He was allowed to give an undertaking not to repeat such language as he had been prosecuted for, and was liberated on his own recognisances. Even when he broke his undertaking, a year or so afterwards, he was only sentenced to a month's imprisonment.

Mr. Foote conducted his own defence at the time of the Freethinker prosecution in 1883, but Mr. Avory and Mr. Cluer were retained to watch the case on points of law. Mr. Avory has become a "red" judge, and Mr. Cluer is a well-known and highly esteemed London magistrate. It is curious that the court he presides over is situated in Old-street. The Hall of Science, Bradlaugh's headquarters from 1869 to 1890, was situated in the same street. It has long ceased to exist, having been demolished to furnish a portion of the site of the huge Bovril block of buildings.

Our principal point has still to be pressed home. All who have stood, even legally, against the Blasphemy Laws, have made their way in the world. In spite of all the bigotry in England they have gained honor by serving the ends of justice. There were K.C.'s who declined to accept a brief in the Boulter case. It is to Mr. Atherley Jones's honor that he accepted it as a matter of duty.

Mr. Lloyd visits Glasgow to-day (Feb. 1) and delivers two lectures (noon and evening) for the local N. S. S. Branch in the North Saloon, City Hall. We hope the local "saints" will give him the audiences and the welcome he merits.

The President's Honorarium Fund Circular will appear in next week's Freethinker, together with acknowledgment of all subscriptions for 1914 received up to date. Those who desire to be in the first list should remit by Monday, February 2.

Commissioner Lamb, of the Salvation Army, had a long puff of the Army's work in Canada—a long puff and a very brazen puff too—in the Edmonton local newspaper—the Weekly Herald. It was followed, in the exigencies of make-up, perhaps, by a bright little letter from Mr. Walter Davidson, leading up to the announcement that he intends to offer to supply the Edmonton Free Library with a copy of the Freethinker every week. Mr. Davidson will also "place at the disposal of our opponents a ten years' file of the Freethinker, for anyone of them to point out the passages which render the paper unfit for the public. If they fail (he adds) to make their case good no reason will then remain for refusing the offer." What answer can there be to this offer? It shows Mr. Davidson's absolute bonâ-fides.

We are glad to hear that Mr. Aneurin Williams, the Liberal candidate at the North-West Durham by-election, is in favor of "religious equality for Wales." We hope he was also heckled about religious equality in England. We mean with respect to the prosecution, which is also persecution, of Freethinkers. The woes of Nonconformists are always being trumpeted; listening to the Rev. Dr. Clifford, you might imagine that every Church parson kept a Dissenting minister a captive in his cellar; but one hears very little, even from them, of the wrongs and sufferings of Freethinkers. We confess to feeling our ardor somewhat damped by Nonconformist selfishness. We do not mean that all Nonconformists are indifferent to the rights of others. Mr. Halley Stewart, for instance, is a friend of justice and liberty all round.

HUMAN AND DIVINE JUSTICE.

Surely the perfection of human justice is measured by its efficiency. That system is best which most diminishes crime. But if we apply this rule to divine justice we get into hopeless difficulties. We must suppose that the Creator wishes to diminish wickedness as much as possible, for otherwise he would inflict useless suffering. Yet we have to suppose that he inflicts punishments—infinite and eternal, according to the most logical theologian, in such a way that the reforming influence is a minimum and the suffering a maximum. If a human ruler admitted that the punishments inflicted by his laws had very little deterrent effect, but argued as a set-off that he kept the greatest part of his subjects in perpetual confinement and incessant torture, we should certainly say that, whether by his misfortune or fault, he had a very ill-regulated kingdom. Yet, when we try to reconcile ourselves to the existing evils by assuming the existence of this supernatural balance, we necessarily present the universe after this fashion. Whether it is an edifying theory or not I cannot say. I do not see how it helps to strengthen our belief in the safeguards of morality. The explanation is simple enough. The world is what we see it, abounding in misery and wickedness. If you believe in a moral governor you are bound to put extraordinary limitations upon his power to vindicate his benevolence, or to limit his benevolence in order to vindicate his power; and, in either case you take away with one hand that safeguard to morality which you give with the other. Meanwhile, in any case, you have to stop all logical gaps by talking about mystery. It is simpler to admit that the whole is a mystery, and to cease the effort to play ourselves with words.—Leslie Stephen, "Science of Ethics," pp. 455, 456.

The Cross Roads.

HE was playing on an old string of the ministerial lyre—a string, I imagined, that had been played done. There were two-and-a-half newspaper columns on the Cross Roads of Life; and, according to the news-note, the sermon had been preached to a large audience mostly composed of young people. Evidently they had enjoyed a debauch of verbosity. My first thoughts after reading the sermon were smothered in the awful perils these cross roads presage; the stress and trial; the courage and glory and renown; the strength and grandeur of character; the weakness, humiliation, darkness, and despair; the unutterable hardships, and disgrace, and sorrow; all these things, and many more, came sweeping around my mind from this fantastic place named the Cross Roads of Life.

It is, or was, a favorite subject with our enemies. Instinctively you connect it with young men, who are always invited particularly to be present. Girls do not matter. Their road is always a straight one to the household and the pew. When the supply of young men becomes more limited, and the ministry is on the rocks for human raw material, perhaps it will be discovered that girls have cross roads.

We see a wide road stretching before us, delightfully shaded, in places, by rich foliage. It is the way of youth. There are fields on both sides where the happy days speed quickly, passed in the sunshine; and the shade, what is it but the close safety of the home, with the strong paternal arms around us, and the deep love to mellow our young lives? But the trees are growing farther apart as we walk along; the fields are not all free; some even have barbed wire fencing; and the clouds often obstruct the sunrays. The shadowy places are not quite so safe nor so comfortable; and the road is often rough and wearies the feet. Self-reliance comes as a substitute to the fatherly care; but its coming is frequently fitful, and often frightens us. As yet we are too timid. And then the trees are left behind. Rocks and morasses guard the roadway. The glare of the sun fills our eyes, and the rain comes plashing down. The road curves, too; and often we feel as if we toiled through a foreign country. And then, suddenly, we hesitate, afraid; for before us are the Cross Roads.

Up to this interesting point the young man never knows where he is going. Without warning the necessity of selection comes into his unprepared mind. He is called upon by circumstances to exercise faculties of which he has been more or less unconscious. Difficulties have to be met and overcome; dilemmas that harass and confuse the brain have to be tackled; conclusions have to be reached; conclusions upon which a life's happiness may rest, or from which a life of misery may ensue; all of which represent rather a strenuous undertaking for a brain entirely untrained in the unravelling of the intricacies of human affairs.

The peculiar strain of the circumstances is intensified also by the strange lack of verifiable data. Although so much depends upon the direction in which the young man will go, the information regarding the various roads is exceedingly lean. And what there is of it possesses the weak character of the unprovable. It appears to be a fairish amount of assumption backed up by a goodly amount of dogmatism, and not very much else.

However, be that as it may, the young man has reached the cross roads. Before him are three finger-posts; and the pastor has a fine opportunity for picturesqueness of language. Never yet have I been disappointed in this respect. When you strip off the verbiage you discover that one road leads to Worldism—that is, Materialism, the place where there are plenty drinks, plenty gambling chances, plenty women, and evil things like these. It is an enjoyable place, for a time; but it is Hell. The finger-post that points the other way bears no instructions. It just points. That road leads nowhere at all; and only young men who "don't care a hang" go there. Needless to say, the road is crowded; and the pastor implores his young hearers to think well ere they start to traverse the way of apathy and indifference. He waxes woeful on the soul-destroying influences of thoughtlessness. While the hell-road kills the soul quickly, the unassuming perils of the unnamed road accomplish the same result slowly. The pastor is not very sure whether the lingering death is not the more terrible.

The third road is the one that leads straight on. It is but the continuation of the happy road of youth. The finger-post says, "To Heaven," mystic words, out of which so much courage has been drawn, and from which so much refreshing hope has been obtained after the hardships of early manhood!

With many flourishes of arms, and with many passionate intonations of voice, young men are strongly advised to overcome the alluring fascinations of the road that leadeth to destruction, to despise the easy way of apathy, and to choose the path of Godliness, that which bringeth peace of heart passing all understanding, and by the side of which floweth the waters of everlasting life. Despite this advice, the young man must e'en make his own choice. Upon his own soul rests the responsibility of his selection. He, himself, must decide upon eternal life or eternal death.

It is a fairy tale. As a matter of fact, young men simply do not have cross roads to throw them into a state of extreme mental exhilaration. They drift into religion and drift out of it. They slip into human indiscretions and into the mire, if they have been born out of it, just as they slip into moral strength if they happen to have been born outside virtue. The process is generally a slow one. Choice never exists. Ninety-nine per cent. of young men are sublimely unconscious of any struggle previous to finding themselves on this or that road; and the one per cent. suffers from delusion.

The picture of a young man standing, chin in hand, head downcast, in the orthodox attitude of deep thought, at the hypothetical cross roads of life is pathetic. "Perhaps," says the cynic, "the poor pastor refers to other things beside religion. Mayhap he means love. But here again he is slightly off. The young man in love is never out of cross roads."

The cross roads of life, in the pastor's estimation, are really named Religion and No-Religion. Their existence is imagined, and then forced upon minds more or less religiously receptive. When the youthful eyes begin to sweep wider and ever wider ranges of the activities of life; when the home influence is superseded by the more powerful outside environment; when the young mind finds within itself the potentiality to weigh things in the balance; and when it discovers that there are many contradictions to the teachings of the fireside; then it is that the ministerial fraternity tremble at the possibility of another loss. They imagine a stopping-place where none exists. They dream of pitfalls on a smooth road. They vision an upward path and a downward where there is really the one broad highway of human life.

Young men, as a body, obey the law of averages. The majority of them never escape from the average mentality. They never experience the intellectual anxieties imagined and exploited by priests. The exceptionally gifted young man may pass through many mental crises. He may be drawn up sharply by a startling absurdity in his beliefs, and a shadow may be cast upon his mind. New knowledge may pull a foundation-stone from the temple of sacred truth, as he deems it, and he may feel the first shiver of the falling building. A swiftly flying shaft of criticism may penetrate to the deeps of his most cherished opinions, and he may writhe as he finds himself secretly at war with his best friends. But, even for him, there are no cross roads, as the priest pictures them. His Freethought is a slow process of evolution. It needs time, study, patience, and perseverance. Ordinary reasoning can dispose of an example of religious fatuity; but much study is required to satisfy the mind regarding the genesis and survival of that fatuity.

The cross roads fallacy is a religious fly-paper hung from the pulpit to catch the unwary; but thanks to the teachings of Freethought the average intelligence of young men to-day is more 'cute than it used to be; and there are fewer flies on the paper.

ROBERT MORELAND.

YET, despite this proud beginning, Goethe was musingly mournful. This was not traceable to love, say some, or blank despair, or unrequited affection. "He had longings," says James Sime, "which the actual world seemed incapable of satisfying, and the more he reflected on life, and sought to comprehend its meaning, the more he was oppressed by the old, old mysteries which have baffled and saddened so many a noble mind." He seems to have been as melancholy as Hamlet, without that brooding thinker's tragic excuses. In all likelihood, however, Goethe's despondency was mainly attributable to the semi-morbid emotions which so frequently accompany the generative phenomena of adolescence.

In addition, his idolised sister Cornelia was at this time married, and her loss was no small matter; his loved Lotte also took to herself a spouse, and his friend Merck went away. He also quarrelled with his truculent friend Brentano, and all these untoward circumstances conspired to give birth to a clever, if morbid, work from Goethe's pen. This story, The Sorrows of Young Werther, is a fragment of highly colored autobiography in its main outlines. The incident upon which the suicide of Werther turns is as old as the world. We are confronted by the usual three, husband and wife and lover, and the lover shoots himself, and the lady lives unharmed. Charlotte is cutting bread-and-butter for the children when Werther sees her for the first time; and if Thackeray is to be trusted, she went on with this same congenial occupation after Werther's body was borne before her on a shutter, lying cold and dead.

Werther gave Goethe a European reputation. It ran like wildfire through Germany. In was enthusiastically acclaimed and it was sternly reprobated. Napoleon read it over and over again. Various governments—so like governments—gave it a splendid advertisement by attempting to suppress it. As Oscar Browning writes :—

> "It was printed, imitated, translated into every language of Europe, criticised in every periodical, with the fullest meed of praise or scorn. It made the round of the world, and penetrated even to China. The Werther fever wrung the hearts of men and women with imaginary sorrows; floods of tears were shed; young men dressed in blue coats and yellow breeches shot themselves with Werther in their hands. It opened the floodgates of pent-up sentimentalism.....which the calamities of the next generation were sternly to repress."

Crowned with the laurel leaf of fame, the author of Goetz and Werther now produced various trifles such as Clavigo and other immature pieces. He was now a man of consequence, and could afford to make literary experiments. Men of letters eagerly sought his society. Klopstock was too woodenly religious for Goethe's taste. The scoffing Basedow he found interesting. Lavater, the celebrated physiognomist, decidedly attracted him, despite his dogmatism and intolerance. In a way, Lavater's religiosity formed a bond of union between the two men. Goethe was able to compare the theological ideas of Lavater with the spiritual strivings of Fräulein von Klettenberg, the friend of his youth, whose religious aspirations and meditations are immortalised in Wilhelm Meister in the "Confessions of a Beautiful Soul." Her influence on Goethe, then and subsequently, was undeniably great. But this, as Lewis states, "was not so much the effect of religious discussion as the experience it gave him of a deeply religious nature. She was neither bigot nor prude. Her faith was an inner light which shed mild radiance around her."*

That Goethe's attachment to Lavater was purely psychological in character, and that he in no way sympathised with his quaint religion, is made manifest enough in the comic pen-picture the poet painted, in which he sits like a worldling with a prophet on each side of him. Goethe eats a chicken with epicurean relish, "while Lavater explains to a country parson the mystery of the Revelations, and Basedow astonishes a dancing master with a scornful exposure of the inutility of baptism."

Goethe was still sweet and twenty; a quarter of a century of his life had rolled away. Jacobi saw in the wild and wayward youth an extraordinary creation of God, endowed with a nature "which develops itself as the flower does, as the seed ripens, as the tree grows into the air, and crowns itself." Speaking of him at the same period, Heinse said, "Goethe was with us, a beautiful youth of five-and-twenty, who is all genius and strength from head to foot, his heart full of feeling, his soul full of fire and eagle-winged." The youth had yet to attain the full proportions of manhood, but the ripened experience which procures this was materially assisted in Goethe's case through the influence of Spinoza.

He had read one of the innumerable "answers" to the Jewish philosopher. But, as he says, "It made little impression upon me, for I hated controversies, and always wanted to know what a thinker thought, and not what another conceived he ought to have thought." He now re-read Bayle's malicious essay on Spinoza with pronounced dislike. He was prepared to judge the tree by its fruits, and the philosophy which nourished and sustained such an ethical personality as Spinoza's must, so Goethe reasoned, be vastly different to that execrated by its assailants. Goethe now studied Spinoza himself, and he writes of him :—

> "This man, who had wrought so powerfully on me, and who was destined to affect so deeply my entire mode of thinking, was Spinoza. After looking around the world in vain for the means of developing my strange nature, I met with the Ethics of that philosopher. Of what I read in the work, and of what I read into it, I can give no account; but I found in it a sedative for my passions, and it seemed to unveil a clear, broad view over the material and moral world. But what especially rivetted me to him was the boundless disinterestedness which shone forth in every sentence.....The all-equalising calmness of Spinoza was in striking contrast with my all-disturbing activity; his mathematical method was the direct opposite of my poetic style of thought and feeling, and that very precision which was thought ill adapted to moral subjects made me his enthusiastic disciple, his most decided worshiper."

At an earlier period Goethe had been attracted by the luckless Italian humanist Bruno, whose life, labors, and martyrdom he had read of in Bayle's imperfect sketch. And now he for the first time began to realise the grandeur and glory of Bruno's greatest disciple and successor. At the same time he was anxious to form an impartial judgment of the merits of the Christian faith. The influence which Fräulein von Klettenberg and the Moravian Brethren had exerted over him began to wane. The Christian doctrine of the fall of man was repugnant to him, and he found that he was really of the company of those who, while "admitting the hereditary imperfections of man, ascribed to nature a certain internal germ of good which, animated by divine grace, was capable of growing up into a joyous tree of spiritual happiness."

These and similar thoughts led him towards the idea of writing an epic on the Wandering Jew, in which he intended to rationalise the story of Jesus' mission and death. But although the subject long recurred to him, his contemplated treatment of the legends of Ahasuerus and Christ in poetic form was never realised.

Another theme at this time haunted his mind. Goethe meditated long and deeply over man's position in relation to Nature or God, and he was more and more impressed with the importance of human individuality. What more natural, then, than that he should turn to the Greek myth of the Titan, Prometheus? As he himself tells us:—

> "The fable of Prometheus lived within me. The old Titan web I cut up according to my own stature, and began to write a play expressing the incongruous relation in which Prometheus stood with respect to Jupiter and the later gods, in consequence of his making men with his own hands, giving them life with the aid of Minerva, and thus founding a third dynasty."

Although the Prometheus of Goethe remains a fragment, it is a fragment of such splendid quality that had it been completed it might have rivalled Faust itself. It rises to height of grandeur that extremely few of his subsequent writings approach. As George Henry Lewes pointed out, the Prometheus of Æschylus glories in his audacity, but

> "while glorying he complains: the injustice of the tyrant wrings from him cries of pain, cries of physical and cries of moral agony. The whole tragedy is one wild outburst of sorrow. The first words he utters fling his clamorous sorrow on the air, call on the Divine Ether, and the swift-winged winds, on the sea springs and the multitudinous laughter of the waves, on the Universal Mother, the Earth—and on the all-seeing Eye, the Sun, to witness what he, a god, must suffer."

In the Prometheus of the modern poet the Titan never indulges in self-pity. He defies the unjust Zeus in terms of sublime scorn. Inscrutable Destiny, which creates Titans, is likewise the parent of the gods, and will witness their decline and fall. Prometheus knows full well that the brutal tyranny of Zeus is not eternal, and he looks forward with calm resignation to the better and the brighter day. It is also true that the Titan of Shelley's Prometheus Unbound never flinches, as witness the wondrous lines:—

> "To suffer woes which Hope thinks infinite;
> To forgive wrongs darker than earth or night;
> To defy power which seems omnipotent;
> To love and bear; to hope till Hope creates
> From its own wreck the thing it contemplates;
> Neither to change, nor falter, nor repent."

And now note the even grander majesty of conception which leaps in Goethe's sublime lines:—

> "Curtain thy heavens, Zeus,
> With clouds, with mist!
> And like a boy that crushes thistle-tops,
> Loosen thy rage on oaks and mountain ridges,
> Yet must thou leave
> Me my earth standing;
> My hut, which myself built;
> My hearth with its bright flame
> Which thou dost envy.
> I know nought so pitiful
> Under the sun as ye gods!
> Scantily nourishing
> With the forced offerings
> Of tremulous prayer
> Your divinity!
> Children and beggars,
> And fools hope-deluded,
> Keep ye from starving!
> Who gave me succor
> From the fierce Titans?
> Who rescued me
> From slavery?
> Thou! thou, my soul, glowing
> With holiest fire!
> Yet didst thou, credulous,
> Pour forth thy thanks to him
> Who slumbers above!
> I reverence thee? Wherefore?
> Hast thou lightened the woes
> Of the heavily laden?
> Hast thou dried the tears
> Of the troubled in spirit?
> Who fashioned me man?
> Was it not almighty Time—
> And Fate eternal,
> Thy lords and mine!
> Here I sit and shape
> Man in my image:
> A race like myself,
> That will suffer and weep,
> Will rejoice and enjoy,
> And scorn thee,
> As I!"

Freaks of the Saints.

ONLY those who, like the unfortunate writer, have waded through the refuse rubbish heaps of blood, mire, and putrefaction known as ecclesiastical history, and turned over, in the hopes of discovering the lost secret of Christianity, the records of folly and fanaticism in the lives of the saints, can fully realise the mingled atrocities and absurdities which go to make up Christian history. Christianity always seems to me like the brigand of the story, who, after accumulating wealth by the most nefarious means, sets up as a millionaire prince, posing as a philanthropist, and imposing on those who knew not his past history. The records of Christian sectarian strife, of the crusades and other wars of religion, of the persecution of Jews, witches, science, and torture of the Inquisition, and other items of past Christian history, are so abominable and appalling that no sensitive mind can even read its red record without trembling and tears. Fortunately, with the long tragedy there is mixed some elements of comedy and even of broad farce. As it is probably better to smile at Christian folly than to frown at its fanaticism and fraud, we may look back on these with some amusement, even though the knowledge of the sombre background forces sobriety into our mirth.

The student of the humors of Christianity might find a wide field in the comicalities of its sectarian disputes; the quarrel between the Homoousians and the Homoiousians, whether the Son was the same or similar to the Father; whether he is co-eternal as regarding his sonship; whether he has one or two natures; and the great split between the Greek and Latin churches on the momentous question, whether the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father or from Father and Son combined. Gibbon, the great master of the lofty sneer, has touched on many of these points, but in the records of synods and councils there is an extensive field of humor which even Gibbon did not completely explore, or at any rate did not expose.

What a field of mirth might be found in the questions solemnly discussed by learned bishops and divines, such as whether Christ was not an hermaphrodite; the method by which Mary was impregnated; whether Christ resumed the portion of his person which he lost by circumcision when he resurrected; and many similar delicate subjects, in which celibate priests and monks have ever delighted. Then the philosophical questions of the schoolmen in regard to quiddities, essences, remission, intention, proportion and degree, nominalism and realism, the nature of God and angels.

> "Whether angels, in moving from place to place,
> Pass through the intermediate space;
> Whether God himself is the author of evil,
> Or whether that is the work of the devil.
> When and wherefore Lucifer fell,
> And whether he now is chained in hell."

One learned synod, over which Pope Boniface IV. presided, resolved the question as to whether monks, being dead to the world, could perform episcopal functions. It was demonstrated that they could, because monks were angels, which was proved by the following "sillygism": "All animals with six wings are angels. Monks have six wings, the cowl standing for two, and the four extremities for four more—ergo, monks are angels."—Q.E.D.

But the most amusing records of Christian insanity are to be found in the stories told of the Christian saints. The forthcoming writer of the Comic History of Christianity will here discover matter enough, not only as Fabian says, for a May morning, but to occupy many volumes. Some of the Gospel miracles, as, for instance, turning water into wine and devils into pigs, are comical enough, but they are beaten by the miracles of the saints. Here are a few instances:—

St. Paul, of Thebes, outdid Elijah, who is now said to have been fed by Arabians instead of by a raven. We are told by St. Jerome he was fed daily for sixty years by a crow. When St. Anthony, he who the Devil tickled at night and tempted in the shape of a nude female, visited St. Paul, the obliging crow always brought a double allowance. Probably it was like manna, the angels' food baked in heaven after the prescription for Kosher baking supplied to Ezekiel.

When St. Catherine of Sienna visited the tomb of St. Agnes of Monte Pulciano, and the living saint sought to kiss the feet of the dead one, the latter lifted up her leg through an excess of humility, so that St. Catherine might not bend too low to perform the osculation.

St. Bonaventura, not being able to take any food in the ordinary way, by reason of a violent disorder in his internal regions, had the pyx placed outside, and the holy wafer thereupon penetrated into his bowels. Who that believes that Christ fed five thousand on a few loaves and fishes, should doubt it?

St. Clare, of Montefalco, had meditated so constantly upon her Savior's passion, that all the instruments—cross, hammer, nails, scourge, and crown of thorns—were found engraved upon her heart after death. These stigmatics are quite common, and the effect of mind on matter is further shown in an image of Christ at Naples, which an impious wretch stabbed. So sensitive and sensible was the statue that it put its hand to the wound, and it has stayed there ever since.

St. Barbara's father was a heathen; and when he discovered that she had become a Christian, he drew his sword to kill her. She prayed to God, and a large stone opened itself and received her body into the cavity, and carried her to a mountain full of caves. She was discovered by a shepherd, who, for his insolence in approaching the virgin, was turned into a marble stone, and his herd into locusts. This is, perhaps, as true as that Lot's wife was changed into a pillar of salt.

The Devil was always tempting the saints and getting the worst of it. He once impertinently intruded his person into the chamber of St. Juliana, at an unseemly hour. It was a dangerous thing to do. To intrude into female saints' chambers at unseemly hours is ever perilous. He found it so. She engaged Beelzebub in a pitched battle, and fought tooth and nail, throwing him down on the floor and trampling him with her feet, till he was glad to escape with his tail between his legs, howling all the way back to hell. St. Juliana ought to be the patroness of the prize ring.

The devils, unable to obtain any triumph over the chastity of Marie Angelique, resolved, with refined malignity, to insult her modesty by standing her on her head in the presence of credible witnesses. They did so, but an immediate and truly extraordinary miracle was wrought simultaneously. The law of gravitation was suspended with regard to her clothes. They remained stiff and immovable around her virgin limbs, as the marble drapery of a statue. The blood may have been drawn into her face by her peculiar attitude, but there was not the slightest occasion for a blush.

The usual method of meeting the assaults of the Devil was by self-flagellation. One saint, when he saw a female, rolled himself in snow. Another went naked among briars. St. Macarius, having one day killed a gnat, by way of atonement went into the marshes, and there for six months exposed himself to all winged and creeping insects, till his flesh was swollen and ulcerated. This legend is one which shows that Christian monkery was brought westwards by the monks of Buddhism. In the full odor of sanctified filth, St. Macarius once returned to his monastery humiliated by the sense of his own inferiority, exclaiming: "I am not yet a monk, but I have seen monks." He had fallen in with two of these wretches stark naked. The saint was accustomed to carry about with him eighty pounds of iron. His disciple, St. Eusebius, outdid him, carrying one hundred and fifty pounds of iron, and living for three years in a dried-up well. Some, however, objected to nakedness, also to soap and water. The latest addition to the Romish calendar, St. Labre, never washed himself for forty years. St. Athanasius boasts of St. Anthony's holy horror of water, with which he never contaminated his feet, save in the direst necessity. St. Euphraxia joined a convent of one hundred and thirty nuns who never washed their feet and who shuddered at the mention of a bath. St. Ammon had never seen himself naked. On one occasion, coming to a river, he was too squeamish to undress. He prayed to be spared this indignity, and an angel transported him to the other side. No wonder Jortin remarks of a miraculous monk, whose corpse was said, like that of St. Philip Neri, to emit a heavenly perfume, that it was not surprising that he should smell like a civet-cat when dead, who had smelt like a pole-cat when living.

But the subject of the freaks of the saints is too extensive to be comprised in a single article.

(The late) J. M. WHEELER.

IMMORTALITY.

On no subject, perhaps, has so much weak reasoning been permitted to pass current as on this of the immortality of the soul; partly because men had already a faith secured to them on quite other authority, on quite other grounds, than those reasonings which served very pleasingly and eloquently to fill up the page. In old woodcuts one sometimes sees a vessel in full sail upon the ocean, and perched aloft upon the clouds are a number of infant cherubs, with puffed-out cheeks, blowing at the sails. The swelling canvas is evidently filled by a stronger wind than these infant cherubs, sitting in the clouds, could supply. They do not fill the sail, but they were thought to fill up the picture prettily enough.

Most of these arguments resolve themselves into passionate wishes to prolong some experienced delight, or to gratify some thwarted desire. A fragment of this present life is torn from all its necessary conditions, and perpetuated in the future world. Sometimes the action of the drama, broken off on earth, is to be carried on elsewhere; the revenge is to be completed, the calamity to be redressed. Sometimes the happiest scene of all the drama, alas! so transitory here, is represented as stationary and eternal there. Loving souls love on for ever. They see themselves like a group of beautiful sculpture, placed, safe and changeless, in Elysian bowers. Beautiful sculpture it must be; for life, as we know it—the very life they would transfer into eternity—is perpetual change, is growth and decay, extinction and reproduction; and our present human consciousness is built on, or interlaced with, the incessant movements of a vital form, that grows, blossoms, and dies like any other flower of the earth.—William Smith.

PROPER SELF-RESPECT.

At the gates of Heaven an angel prest,
An angel newly and properly made;
And she was—and she knew it—so very well drest
That nothing in Heaven could make her afraid.

Through the gates of Heaven she peered at the Blest,
As through Paradise streets they wandered and strayed
And gave audible thanks that she was well drest—
For they were in garments most shockingly made.

Every angel she saw—and to see them thus drest
Brought a blush to the cheek of this à la mode maid—
Wore a radiant garment, cut, it must be confest,
Like that in which mortals in sleep are arrayed.

A positive pain wrung her sensitive breast
At the sight of this garb, which decorum forbade—
And the dread that she also must be thus undrest
On her sensitive face cast a visible shade.

Saint Peter advanced with a bow of the best
(For the Saint liked the looks of this trim little maid),
And he graciously said: "When you're properly drest,
Your harp is all ready, and waits to be played."

Just one glance all disdainful she cast on the Blest,
In their garments of white, to Saint Peter salaamed,
And replied: "If in Heaven one can't be well drest
I'll go—Somewhere Else, and be well drest and damned!"

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE

Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 6 SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

As men's prayers are a disease of the will, so are their creeds a disease of the intellect.—EMERSON.

The Child—and Religion.

IN the Sunday Chronicle for January 25, "Hubert" discusses the question of "What is the Salient Characteristic of Our Time?" He concludes that it is the changed attitude of society towards the child. In this I am strongly inclined to agree with him, although not for quite the same reason that "Hubert" gives, and at the same time very strongly dissenting from some of the statements made by him in the course of his article. Here is one statement, for example, that specially challenges contradiction:—

> "Religion is not changing, that's flat. It is changing its forms, but change is not necessarily decay. There is probably more interest taken in religion in this twentieth century than there has been since the sixteenth; there is more interest taken in it in this year 1914 than there was in 1904. In the eighteenth century there really was a decay of religion; then practically all cultivated persons were sceptics. To-day even the most prominent men of science are freely uttering doubts about Darwinism and the mechanical theory of the universe.....Roughly we may say that if the nineteenth century was a period of doubt diversified by faith, ours looks like being a period of downright credulity diversified by doubt."

This is a very positive statement of the present position, and yet nearly every sentence admits of serious question. "Hubert" accepts interest in religion as equivalent to religion being a living force. But there is really no necessary connection between the two. For reasons that will appear presently, I take a very keen interest in religion; but I hardly think that anyone would cite me as evidence that religion was alive. Religion is only alive and healthy when it exerts a distinct influence on human life. When a savage consults his tribal deities before venturing on an expedition, when a Spanish or Italian peasant kneels before a roadside shrine for much the same reasons, these are proving that with them religion is really alive. But how is it with ourselves, or with any other advanced community? We do not look to religion for any real help, we do not trust to it in any great emergency; prayers for rain, for the averting of disease, or for national improvement, are openly smiled at; and in a hundred-and-one ways we see that, while numbers still accept religion as a mere theory, very few seriously attempt to guide their life by it. And if this does not prove decay, what, in the name of all that is reasonable, does it prove?

Unquestionably there is great interest shown in religion. Studies of religion were never more elaborate than they are now, and never called keener brains to the work. But between studies of religion and belief in religion there is a world of difference, and the difference is vital. Consider the significance of a man like Professor Frazer devoting ten large volumes to one work on religion, with another work on religion, also in several volumes, in course of issue. It is not that Professor Frazer is religious. He would probably call himself an Agnostic, while I should certainly describe him as an Atheist. All that his study of religion proves, all that the awakened interest in religion proves, is that people have discovered that the key to understanding many social and other customs lies in a knowledge of religion in all its phases—particularly the earlier ones. Religion is very early in the field. It is one of the earliest, if not the earliest, of man's conscious attempts to subdue nature to his needs. Our social institutions, from kingcraft to matrimony, begin amid a perfect welter of superstitious beliefs. For many, many generations, religion maintains a strong ascendancy in social life. And the consequence is that the man who would understand life must understand the nature of the beliefs in the light of which human nature has endeavored to map out for itself a safe course. No man would insist more strongly upon a thorough study of religion than an educated Atheist. It is not at all a question of believing it—merely one of understanding it.

A consideration of the subject from this point of view would have saved "Hubert" from his curious confusion about the eighteenth century and afterwards. It is not true that then "all cultivated men were practically sceptics." There were very many who were not. And even then the scepticism of the large majority was only in relation to Christianity. They would nearly all have professed some sort of a religion. And revolting from Christianity merely as untrue, they naturally ceased to interest themselves in it. But that was before the rise of a really scientific study of social evolution. The science of anthropology was unknown. With the growth of that branch of knowledge men were forced back upon the study of superstition as essential to a right understanding of social phenomena. Interest in religion revived, but it was the interest of scientific curiosity, not that of the convinced believer.

In passing, I may also say, that I do not know the prominent men of science who "are freely uttering doubts about Darwinism." I do know many who are doubtful as to whether Natural Selection alone is adequate to explain the origin of new species; but that is quite a different question. As to doubts about the mechanical theory of the universe, I can only say that men of science were never more "mechanical" than at present. The only reasonable significance of the mechanical theory in this connection is that of the operation of forces that are invariable and ultimately calculable. And far from that view being rejected, the tendency is to bring even the operation of "spirit" within that category.

I have been a long while coming to the child, but it was necessary to say first what has been said, because "Hubert" suggests in an oblique manner that the growth of interest in the child is in some way connected with the revival of religion. Of course, this is not the case. Historically, religions have shown precious little interest in children, and the concern of the modern Church to capture them is, in itself, symptomatic of religion's decline. While religion really controls life there is no need for the Churches to bother about children, because social life impresses religion upon them as they grow up. With the decline of religious belief there arises the need for secluding children, as far as possible, from the influence of contemporary life and thought. The child has to be captured or the adult will be lost. Consequently, the interest of the modern Churches in the child is no more than that of a number of corporations anxious to secure clients.

The rise of the child originates from a quite different quarter. As a subject of profound educational, sociological, and racial significance, the study of the child is mainly post-evolutionary. "Hubert" thinks that part of the present significance of the child is due to the fact that we have ceased to appeal to the past. This is partly true, but it is also true that it is in a way due to our recognition of the profound importance of the past, and that the child here gives valuable help. When the rise of the doctrine of evolution taught men that the origin of our civilised institutions was to be found in savage life, that both biologically and psychologically growth is always from the simple to the complex, and that, in a general way, individual growth is a resumé of racial growth, it was soon seen that the child offered unexpected opportunities for scientific exploitation. Watching the growth of a child's intelligence, of its attempts to grapple with the various phases of life as they successively present themselves, observers were the better able to reconstruct for themselves the part played by religion in the mental evolution of the race. The child became a veritable human document, however blurred some of the pages might be.

One aspect of child study inspired by evolutionary teaching had this reference to the past. Another had reference to the future. This latter was too obvious to have ever been ignored, but it is safe to say that evolution gave it an altogether new significance and importance. Discussions on heredity—Lamarckian, Mendelian, or other, questions as to the selective or modifying power of the environment, all bore directly on the possibilities and capacities and significance of childhood. Even so simple a thing—apparently—as the play of children became a deeply interesting problem, fraught with great possibilities of race culture. The problem widened and deepened the more closely it was studied. Nature and nurture became the key-words of all who dreamed of putting racial development on a really scientific basis. First, the perfecting of the stock, next the preservation of desirable types once we had secured them.

I agree with "Hubert" that the emergence of the child is the most characteristic feature of our time. But with this religion has had nothing to do. The concern of all the Churches in the child is a purely sectarian one. That is the problem there. The scientist has a higher and a better purpose. His object is not sectarian, it is not even national. It is racial. The breeding of a better race is the purpose here, and whether that better race is predominantly British, or German, or Latin, or Slav, is a question of quite subordinate interest. But the main thing I wish to stress here is that the great humanistic and humanising impulse has come from science—which is so often called by short-sighted people and by hide-bound theologians, "cold," "heartless," "materialistic," etc. Materialistic in the ethical sense of the word it certainly is not. Materialistic in the philosophic sense it is and must be if it is to remain science. But it is ultimately the great civiliser and the great humaniser, because it is the great truth-bringer. It shows man what he is, what are his capacities, and what he may become. And beside that message, and beside these lessons, the gospel of theology becomes a mere idiot's tale—sound and fury, signifying nothing.

C. COHEN.

The So-called Christian Facts.

CHRISTIANITY is said to be a religion founded upon facts of history and productive of facts of experience which, it is claimed, is not true of any other religion under the sun. The so-called facts of history, so confidently gloried in by simple-minded and ignorant believers, are being seriously questioned by modern criticism. Indeed, there are Christian teachers not a few who no longer regard them as true. While adhering as firmly as ever to the conviction that Jesus actually lived, they have abandoned the belief in his miraculous birth and resurrection. That is to say, they have retained the human Jesus at the expense of renouncing the Divine Christ. Those of them who still believe in and worship the Divine Christ, regard him, not as a historical being, but as a theological creation. Of what service the alleged historical Jesus is to them it is difficult to understand, because, like all others, they wholly ignore his teaching and worship only the Christ. Of course, the majority of them, dropping the Christ altogether, call themselves followers of Jesus simply, although few, if any, really follow him, except nominally. Some divines, however, while nominally accepting the conclusions of criticism, yet cling wistfully to the stories of the birth and resurrection, treating them, if not as facts, at least as beautiful poems or parables. "There is a sense," they aver, "in which they are true, though it is almost impossible to express it in words." As we have no religious axe to grind, we do not hesitate to declare that criticism has completely undermined the historical foundation upon which Christianity was erected. Virgin births and resurrections are mythological fancies, not historical facts.

Now nearly all theologians are agreed that, even though the facts of history must be given up, the facts of experience cannot be disputed. "Christ lives," they exclaim; "we enjoy daily interviews with him; he is the way, the truth, and the life within us; and this joyous experience proves the truth of our faith beyond the possibility of a doubt." Again and again are we assured that the testimony of experience is absolutely conclusive, or that experience is the court of final appeal. In the estimation of some, religious experience is synonymous with knowledge. We have heard many a perfervid Christian's cry: "I know that Christ lives because I commune with him every day." Here and there, however, we do come across a theologian who is bold enough to cast a suspicion upon the reliability of the testimony of experience. Professor Peake says:—

> "When eminent religious teachers stake the truth of Christianity on the testimony of the religious consciousness, and say that this in itself is enough, though criticism do its worst against the New Testament, one may well stand aghast at the recklessness of such a position. The Christian consciousness is a very complex thing; it is rooted in certain historical facts guaranteed to us by the New Testament teaching. Cut the New Testament away, and sooner or later the Christian consciousness will vanish with it" (Christianity: its Nature and its Truth, pp. 146-7).

We venture to endorse Professor Peake's criticism. In our opinion the Gospel Jesus and Paul's Christ are identical, in the absence of whom there would have been no Christian experience. No sentence could be saner, or more logical, than the last in the above extract: "Cut the New Testament away, and sooner or later the Christian consciousness will vanish with it." The only rational inference is that Christian experience possesses no evidential value whatever. If a man believes the New Testament with any degree of enthusiasm he is bound to have the Christian consciousness; if he does not believe it, he is denied the experience. The ordinary apologist says: "Prayer and communion with God are as much facts as those of science, and of far greater importance, as affecting the whole man." Of course they are facts that affect the whole man, and no Freethinker ever dreamed of contradicting the statement; but they are facts entirely dependent upon acceptance of the Bible as a Divine Book. We candidly admit that religious experience is a fact which some people thoroughly enjoy, but our contention is that it proves absolutely nothing except that those who have it are supernatural believers, while those who are not are without it.

Professor Peake, we are aware, is a believer in God and the living Christ. To him they are both personal beings in personal relation with mankind. He believes that he has a blissful fellowship with his loving Heavenly Father and his all-merciful Redeemer. Of necessity, fellowship is the state or relation of being a fellow or associate, or companionship of two or more persons on equal and friendly terms. "Our fellowship," says St. John, "is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ" (1 John i. 3). "God is faithful," says another Scripture, "through whom ye were called into the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord" (1 Cor. i. 9). If language is to be relied upon, God and man are fellows, associating on terms of closest friendship, and God calls us "into the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord." Such is the Christian creed subscribed by all believers. Is it true? Professor Peake answers for us: "Cut the New Testament away, and sooner or later the Christian consciousness will vanish with it." Can this be a compliment to God as man's fellow? Surely a fellow worthy of the name would not withdraw from fellowship through the destruction of a book? Does not the Professor realise what a terrible insult he offers to God if God there be? Does he not see that in reality he paints God as the very worst fellow conceivable? Not only he will not enter into fellowship with us unless we know and believe the New Testament, but if by any chance this sacred book is destroyed, sooner or later he will cease to be our fellow. Why, the moment you throw the powerful searchlight of reason upon such teaching you discover how infinitely ridiculous it is. If God existed he could and would communicate with all members of his family without the instrumentality of any book or priestly order.

When Professor Peake wrote his memorable sentence, "Cut the New Testament away, and sooner or later the Christian consciousness will vanish with it," he little thought that he was playing beautifully into the hands of his opponents by furnishing them with a weapon whereby to crush the Christian faith. A God who can only come to us through a book or a church, a Savior who can only do his saving work through and up to the capacity of a professional priesthood, is not worth having—is, in fact, far worse than no God at all. Yes, Professor Peake deserves our warmest thanks for having forged in the arsenal of theology an arm of immeasurable strength to the soldiers of reason. We have often heard the statement made by preachers, more noted for zeal than intelligence, that if every copy of the Bible in existence were burnt to-morrow Christianity would be utterly unaffected, because Christ sat on the throne of the Universe and was resolved to bring the whole world to his feet. Being the head of the Church, he would not rest until she embraced the entire human race. But those champions of the Cross were fundamentally mistaken. Deprived of the Bible, the Church would be shorn of all her strength, and without the Church there would be no Christianity. The truth of this is being illustrated before our very eyes. It is a common complaint that people no longer read the Bible. The Sacred Book is so utterly neglected because it has ceased to be regarded as God's Word. The result is that the Churches are steadily emptying, and that with the decay of the Churches Christianity is losing the little hold it ever had upon the population.

The truth is that the Christian religion is supported by no facts. The nativity-narratives, the accounts of the miracle-working career and the sacrificial death, the resurrection and ascension stories, are so legendary as to be practically worthless, while the facts of experience only prove that those who enjoy them treat the legends as if they were literally true, which is absurd, especially in face of the undeniable truth that socially and morally Christianity has been a gigantic failure. All the proud claims made on its behalf have been flagrantly falsified all through the long and dark centuries. The facts are all dead against it. They rise mountains high, and testify in the clearest manner that the Cross has caused rivers of innocent blood to flow wherever its banner has been waved. Even to-day Christian Europe is a vast armed camp. All possible preparations are being made by every Christian country to shed blood on the largest possible scale. This is the state of things to which Christianity has brought us, and in which all the Churches acquiesce.

J. T. LLOYD.

Science and the Soul.—II.

> "The received doctrine is that God puts a soul into every human being at his birth—i.e., that whenever man makes a body God makes a soul, or sends a pre-existing soul, to inhabit it; or that, in some mysterious fashion, with the commencement of earthly life commences also the life of an immortal nature. On the assumption, then, of man's free agency (an essential postulate of all intelligible reasoning on moral questions) it would seem to lie in man's decision how many souls shall be created or incarnated, and when, and pretty much to what earthly conditions and influences. On his determination, or passion, or it may be on his indulgence of a momentary appetite, depends the question whether an immortal spirit shall be called into existence, and shall encounter—having no voice in the matter—not only the risks and sufferings of this short human life, but the incalculable and fearful chances of an unending life to come." —W. R. GREG, Enigmas of Life (1891), p. 214.

> "Can another body, then, avail to stay the hand of death, and shall man by a second nervous system escape scot-free from the ruins of the first? We think not. The laws connecting consciousness with changes in the brain are very definite and precise, and their necessary consequences are not to be evaded by any such means."—PROFESSOR CLIFFORD, Lectures and Essays, p. 175.

WHAT can science tell us of the soul or of a future life? Absolutely nothing. There is not an atom of scientific proof that the intellectual faculties can exist apart from the brain; they are extinguished with the life of the body. In the words of Professor Tyndall, in the famous "Belfast Address,"—

> "Divorced from matter, where is life? Whatever our faith may say, our knowledge shows them to be indissolubly joined. Every meal we eat, and every cup we drink, illustrates the mysterious control of Mind by Matter."

The belief in the existence of a soul apart from the body, and its survival in a future life, had been undermined by the Materialists of the eighteenth century. The advent of Darwinism and the theory of evolution shattered it for ever. It now remains a matter of faith, not of knowledge.

In the days when people believed the Bible to be the inspired Word of God, that the world was created in six days, and that God moulded the first man from the earth, it was easy to believe that God placed a soul in the clay whereof he had moulded Adam, as a sculptor fashions a model of the figure he intends to carve in marble.

But when it was discovered that man—instead of being specially constructed in this manner by a divine artist—was the result of countless ages of evolution, and that his ancestors could be traced back into the animal world, from which he had descended, the question at once arose as to where the soul came in? To this searching question the Churches have as yet made no intelligible reply. The case is well put by Sir Ray Lankester, as follows:—

> "No one ventures to deny, at the present day, that every human being grows from the egg in utero, just as a dog or a monkey does; the facts are before us and can be scrutinised in detail. We may ask of those who refuse to admit the gradual and natural development of man's consciousness in the ancestral series, passing from ape-like forms into indubitable man, 'How do you propose to divide the series presented by every individual man in his growth from the egg? At what particular phase in the embryonic series is the soul with its potential consciousness implanted? Is it in the egg? in the fœtus of this month or of that? in the new-born infant? or at five years of age?' This, it is notorious, is a point upon which Churches have never been able to agree; and it is equally notorious that the unbroken series exists—that the egg becomes the fœtus, the fœtus the child, and the child the man. On the other hand, we have the historical series—the series the existence of which is inferred by Darwin and his adherents. This is a series leading from simple egg-like organisms to ape-like creatures, and from these to man. Will those who cannot answer our previous inquiries undertake to assert dogmatically in the present case at what point in the historical series there is a break or division? At what step are we to be asked to suppose that the order of nature was stopped, and a non-natural soul introduced?"*

Again, if man has an immortal soul, why deny one to the animals, from which he descended. Says Archbishop Whately:—

"None of those who contend for the natural immortality of the soul have been able to extricate themselves from one difficulty, viz., that all their arguments apply, with exactly the same force, to prove an immortality, not only of brutes, but even of plants; though in such a conclusion as this they are never willing to acquiesce."†

John Wesley saw, and admitted the force of this argument. Southey, in his Life of Wesley, says:—

"Some teachers of Materialism had asserted that if man had an immaterial soul so had the brutes, as if this conclusion reduced that opinion to a manifest absurdity. 'I will not quarrel,' said Wesley, 'with any that think they have. Nay, I wish he could prove it; and surely I would rather allow them souls than I would give up my own.'"‡

In a footnote to this, Southey observes:—

"On this point Wesley's bitterest opponent agreed with him. 'I will confess,' says Toplady, 'that I never yet heard one single argument urged against the immortality of brutes which would not, mutatis mutandis, be equally conclusive against the immortality of man.'"

In one of his Sermons, Wesley conjectures:—

"What, if it should then please him, when he has made us 'equal to angels,' to make them what we are now,—creatures capable of God, capable of knowing and loving and enjoying the Author of their Being?"§

He thought that their appearance would be changed into their "primeval beauty," their corruptible body put on incorruption, when "they shall enjoy happiness suited to their state, without alloy, without interruption, and without end" (p. 71).

There is not a single argument used to prove the natural immortality of man that cannot equally well be used to prove the immortality of animals.

But suppose it be admitted that the horse, the dog, the elephant, and the higher anthropoids share this gift with man; where are you going to draw the line? Why deny it to the rat, the scorpion, the flea, and yet lower vermin not usually mentioned in polite society?

Then, again, no hard-and-fast line can be drawn between the plant and the animal kingdom. Some organisms, like Æthalium septicum, a fungus common on the surface of tan-pits, under other conditions exhibits all the characteristics of an animal. As Professor Huxley says, there is "an intermediate kingdom, a sort of biological No Man's Land for all these questionable forms."‖ The plant world merges, by insensible gradations, into the animal world, just as the animal, by insensible gradations, has emerged in man.

Suppose we grant a soul all round, then we must suppose that, after death, the spirit of man will support the spirit of a flea while riding a spiritual horse, followed by the spirit of a dog—the horse supporting itself on spiritual grass.

Then, again, to cite Ludwig Buchner:—

"Life in eternity, according to the tolerably unanimous opinions of theologians and philosophers, is to be a continuation of or an improvement upon the life in this world. It must therefore seem to be indispensable that each individual soul should at least have reached on earth a certain stage of formation as a groundwork for its further development to proceed upon. But now only think of the souls of children dying in infancy, of old people who had lapsed into second childhood, of insane persons, of idiots, of badly trained individuals, of irresponsible beings, of savage nations, or of those standing on the lowest rungs of our European society. Are the defects in civilisation and education to be continued in the other world on the same or on a higher scale."*

There are other problems to be considered. For instance, it is reported in the Gospel of Matthew (ch. xxii.) that Jesus, upon being asked regarding the case of a woman who had buried seven husbands, as to whose wife she would be at the resurrection, evaded the question by stating that at the resurrection they would neither marry, nor are given in marriage. Closely connected with this is the question of recognition in the future life, which, as Professor Bonney remarks, "often causes perplexity." He observes:—

"Suppose a married couple to have been parted by death while both were comparatively young, and the survivor to die at an advanced age, how is that one to be recognised by the other; or the child, which has been taken away when its parents were in their prime, to know them when they also, after thirty years or more, cross the dark river—to the 'land of the leal.'"†

The Professor hobbles out of the difficulty by hazarding the conjecture—

"the same person may wear a different aspect to different individuals. Parents may seem young to the child whom they lost in the earlier years of their married life, and old to those who, some forty years later, had been the solace of their age."

So that mothers who died leaving infants in long clothes will know them in that state; those who died when the infants had reached twenty years of age will know them as young men; while others who knew them as old men will know them in that condition. So that the same person will appear to different people as an infant, as a young man of twenty, and as an old man of eighty or ninety.

Such are some of the inextricable confusions and absurdities into which we are led by the theory of an immortal soul.

Goethe.—III.

IN the winter of 1774 Goethe was presented to the young Prince of Weimar, Karl August, and this led to his visiting him at Mainz. In the following year the Prince became the ruler of the Grand Duchy of Saxe-Weimar, and shortly afterwards, while on a wedding journey to Stuttgart, he pressed the poet to visit him as soon as he returned to Weimar with his bride. As the invitation was delayed, Goethe became restless and dissatisfied, and decided to depart for Italy. He had reached Heidelberg when the summons arrived from the Court, and Goethe retraced his steps and appeared at Weimar in the autumn of 1775. This visit he regarded as a brief holiday with a friendly ruler, while in reality circumstances so shaped themselves that his whole future career was completely altered.

Weimar is now a famous city, but before Goethe and his circle made it so it was a mere uninteresting speck on the map of Continental Europe. An old-world walled town, its architecture and inhabitants were reminiscent of the Middle Ages. The city gates and portcullis preserved the defences of wild warlike days. "Saxe Weimar," in the words of Lewes,

"has no trade, no manufactures, no animation of commercial, political, or even theological activity. This part of Saxony, be it remembered, was the home and shelter of Protestantism in its birth. Only a few miles > from Weimar stands the Wartburg, where Luther, in the disguise of Squire George, lived in safety, translating the Bible, and hurling his inkstand at the head of Satan, like a rough-handed disputant as he was. In the market-place of Weimar stand, to this day [1854], two houses, from the windows of which Tetzel advertised his indulgences, and Luther afterwards in fiery indignation fulminated against them."

Arrived in Weimar, Goethe and the Duke were soon on terms of the closest intimacy. Envy, hatred, and uncharitableness sent the whisper abroad that the poet and his royal friend squandered their days and nights in graceless gaiety. The ligneous Klopstock sent Goethe a sermon on the subject, and the meddling moralist was politely but plainly informed that he was prying into matters that in no way concerned him, the real facts of which had been grossly misrepresented.

Whatever the true circumstances were, the whirling gaities of Goethe's early Weimar weeks were certainly exciting, and may have led to a serious waste of precious time. As a matter of fact, the young Duke was a gifted man, and his favorite was a brilliant genius. There is hardly a man of outstanding ability in the whole realm of history and biography who has not a dash of the Devil in his nature. Among these Devil-endowed mortals the prince and the poet must be included. But that their sins were serious, or that Goethe led the Duke astray, are the inventions of the poet's scandal-loving enemies. No one who has studied the facts can resist the conclusion that Goethe was the Duke's guardian angel, and that he strenuously exerted all his powers of persuasion to curb the wild, passionate craving for pleasurable excitement which Karl August had inherited from his fierce and warlike ancestors. Both by precept and example, Goethe provided a pattern that any ruler who realised that the prince is but the first of his subjects might copy with advantage. As a result, the Duke became one of the best and most enlightened of German princes.

The young Duchess for a time regarded Goethe with disfavor, but she soon appreciated him at his proper worth, and it fell to the lot of the poet to compose the domestic derangements of the newly-wedded pair. The Duchess Amalia, the young Duke's mother, recognised Goethe's extraordinary abilities from the first, and she was untiring in her efforts to induce him to remain in Weimar.

Wieland was already there, and he and Goethe again met. Despite an old grievance, Wieland was soon won over to Goethe's side, and, as he said in a letter to a friend, he was soon "as full of Goethe as a dewdrop of the morning sun." The post of Court Preacher falling vacant, Goethe earnestly recommended Herder as an excellent candidate for the office; but the clergy, who regarded that philosopher as being little better than an infidel, were by no means willing to welcome him. All opposition, however, was ultimately overcome, and Herder was installed at Weimar in 1776. And it is only just to point out that Goethe secured this favor for his friend at a time when Herder was most bitter in his language towards him.

Karl August's attachment to Goethe was so strong that he was anxious that they should never be sundered. He therefore sounded the State officials as to Goethe's admission to the public service. The sage councillors were aghast at the suggestion; they one and all regarded the idea of a dreaming poet entrusted with the responsibility of State business as utterly preposterous. The Duke and his mother, nevertheless, swept all official opposition aside, and Goethe began his wonderful government career.

At this period Goethe's friendship with the Frau von Stein commenced, a friendship that lasted some ten years. Whether she was highly intellectual or not, she was certainly a woman of culture and character. Goethe's senior by six years, she had been eleven years a wife, and was the mother of seven children. Baron von Stein was a sensible man of the world, who regarded his wife as a honest woman, which she unquestionably was. Her advice—and very good advice—was always at Goethe's service amid all his cares and anxieties, and to such a nature as the impressionable poet's the sympathy and affection of an intelligent and handsome woman were of incalculable value. Her children, in common with all other children with whom Goethe was brought into touch, were never so happy as when in his company.

Goethe now experienced a profound change in his estimate of life's duties. He began to reproach himself with his desultory versatility. He sternly determined to master his imaginary weaknesses and immolate his passion for pleasure on the altar of self-sacrifice. He became conscientious to a degree in the manner in which he carried out his official duties at Weimar, and he performed his functions like one to the manner born. He was a constant attendant at the meetings of the Privy Council; he mastered every public matter submitted to him; he reformed the currency; he reopened the disused mines of Ilmenau; he brought the ducal army into a state of efficiency; he acted as diplomatist, and he modernised and did much towards rationalising the University of Jena. He employed considerable energy in promoting popular education in Weimar, and established a precedent which afterwards enabled Haeckel to speak his fullest and freest thoughts from the chair of a university which is probably less hampered by sacerdotal interference than any other in the world.

During this laborious period he commanded universal respect. His benefactions were boundless, and he performed his works of charity in secret. Even among Germans the warm-hearted poet is commonly pictured as a cold and austere man. The stately dignity of his old age is to some extent responsible for this, but Goethe's lack of insularity appears to be the chief cause of this misconception. The author of Faust was too universal in his outlook to make a good patriot, and he had small faith in the general run of German rulers. To classic Greece and Imperial Rome, to the English Shakespeare, the French Voltaire, and the Hebrew Spinoza he owed and acknowledged allegiance. He sang his songs in the temple of all-creating Nature, and his deity was coextensive with the universe itself.

Before Schiller knew and loved the man who was afterwards to mean so much to him, he was amazed to observe the reverential attitude which Herder displayed towards Goethe. But when Schiller's personal relationship with Goethe enabled him to form a juster judgment, he confessed that—

> "It is not the greatness of his intellect which binds me to him. If he were not as a man more admirable than any I have ever known, I should only marvel at his genius from the distance. But I can truly say that in the six years I have lived with him, I have never for one moment been deceived in his character. He has a high truth and integrity, and is thoroughly in earnest for the Right and Good; hence all hypocrites and phrasemakers are uncomfortable in his presence."

After ten years' strenuous service to the State, Goethe could no longer resist the day-dream of his youth, and he made preparations to visit the land of the olive and the vine. Almost in secret he set out on his Italian pilgrimage, and in the southern atmosphere his poetical and artistic powers reasserted themselves. He visited Verona, Vicenza, and Venice, and was enraptured with the splendors of the city by the sea. At Florence he tarried but a few short hours; the City of the Seven Hills beckoned him away. "If I am dragged to Rome on Ixion's wheel," he wrote, "I will not complain." He was fascinated with the capital of the ancient world. He strove valiantly to restore to his mind the palmy days of Rome. But as he mournfully confesses—

> "It is a sour and sad undertaking to pick out the old Rome from the new.....One comes upon the traces of a splendor and of a destruction, both of which go beyond our conceptions. What the barbarians allowed to stand, the architects of modern Rome have laid waste."

But this melancholy feeling soon passed away, and he began to picture in his mind's eye something near akin to the departed grandeur and glory of the Pagan mistress of the world.

The Apollo Belvedere and other masterpieces of ancient art he now studied at first hand, and for the first time realised the immense inferiority of the plaster casts to their inimitable originals. His old interest in anatomical science was revived by his studies of the ancient marbles, and he meditated more and more deeply over the problem of the metamorphoses of plants.

The semi-Pagan art of the renaissance also impressed him profoundly. He was lost in admiration for Raphael's Vatican masterpieces, but he bowed down before Michael Angelo's paintings in the Sistine Chapel. "I could," he said of these sublime creations, "only gaze and stand amazed. The inward sureness and manliness of the master, his greatness, go beyond all expression."

Goethe led a retired life in Rome. He made himself known to a few choice spirits, and enjoyed happy intellectual intercourse with Tischbein and Meyer, the artists, with Moritz, the author and traveller, and with the famous Angelica Kaufmann. For a time he essayed to become a reputable artist, and took great pains to improve himself in painting, modelling, and drawing. At the outset he was gratified at his progress, but was ultimately driven to the reluctant conclusion that Nature had denied him the capacity which enables the artist to create things of enduring beauty.

To Italy he had carried various writings to complete or recast. His prose Iphigenia, a drama to some extent founded on the play of Euripides, he determined to transform into poetry. In its present form Goethe's Iphigenia is a poem of wondrous beauty, but the friends in Rome to whom he read the manuscript were evidently disappointed with it. They looked forward to something more closely akin to the earlier Goetz von Berlichingen. Angelica Kaufmann alone appreciated the great merits of the poem. Most competent critics now regard it as a consummate work of art which is in many ways superior to its Greek prototype.

Having received an extended leave of absence from Weimar, Goethe journeyed with Tischbein to Naples, and observed with interest the smoking volcano Vesuvius. He enriched his mind with the art treasures of Naples, and recalled the departed glories of Pagan civilisation as he studied the ruins of Pompeii and Herculaneum. After a visit to Sicily, during which he half ascended Mount Etna, he reached Messina, whence he embarked for Naples. Once more in Rome, the attractions of the city of the Tiber frustrated his earlier resolve to return immediately to Weimar. For almost a year he lingered in Rome, and in the meanwhile he gave Egmont its final form, worked at Faust, and gave the finishing touches to some of his minor writings.

The immense services that art has rendered religion were made clear to Goethe when he attended the imposing ceremonies of Catholicism during Passion Week at Rome. The sacrament of the Mass in the Sistine Chapel, and the ceremonies in the same edifice on the morn of Easter Day, were doubtless responsible for some of the most marvellous scenes in Faust. At length the hour of parting came, and having enjoyed a moonlight ramble along the Corso, and after paying a farewell visit to the Capitol and the Colosseum, he passed northwards towards Florence and Milan, and in June, 1788, returned to Weimar.

Poor Old Father!

Tess of the D'Urbevilles on the films is a disappointment. From almost every point of view it is inadequate, and altogether unworthy of a remarkable book. And yet, even when this is said, Mr. Hardy's work has a central incident so vivid and so unmistakable in its purport that any kind of representation can hardly fail to have other than a salutary effect. The Christian consciousness has manifested itself in a few uglier ways than in its vicious assessment of the relative guilt of man and woman in all forms of sexual irregularity. The heartless treatment meted out to the mother of an illegitimate child, for instance, makes one almost despair of human nature, whilst the extension of the penalties to the hapless infant is surely the last word in meanness and brutality. To waken minds to generosity and understanding on such matters is one of the worthiest of objects. Surely no Englishman can be said to have accomplished more in this direction than Thomas Hardy.

In bringing home to the multitude the stupidity and inhumanity of current judgments on such matters this production should have an excellent effect. There is one respect, however, in which this picture-play is noteworthy and significant to Freethinkers. Readers of the novel will remember that portion of the book in which Tess, believing her baby to be dying, and accepting the Church's teaching that an unbaptised infant will suffer unending torments, seeks to have the state of affairs put right. The clergyman, however, in view of the circumstances of its birth, refuses to perform this office; and Tess, in her great distress of mind, herself performs a ceremony of baptism over the child, in the hope that it will conform to the divine specification. This pathetic incident is reproduced on the film, and, as an advertisement of the crude doctrine of infant damnation, serves a useful purpose. But the full force of the lesson is deliberately circumvented. Immediately preceding the amateur baptism, we are coolly told, by the letterpress, that the FATHER of Tess prevents her having the child baptised. This is outrageous enough to be ludicrous. We wonder whether the promoters, with a view to allaying the force of opposition to the Sunday picture show, have thought it expedient to prove their sympathy with religious sentiment (and methods) by doing the Church such a kindly turn? Or was it that the self-appointed Board of Censors, to whose dictates our picture firms appear to submit with laughable docility, asked for this amendment as a condition for their "fit for production" certificate? Whatever the reason, the presiding spirit over the fate of pictures has had his sport with Tess of the D'Urbevilles.

Freethinkers are too familiar with such happenings to be greatly irritated. On all sides we meet with evidences of a disposition to save Christianity from dangerous criticism at all costs. And criticism of the foregoing variety, which represents the Church's practice as an outrage on decent human feeling, belongs to a peculiarly effective type of criticism. The heart has a logic of its own, and when the Church comes into conflict with that, defeat is certain. The graveside scene in Hamlet, with its lashing the "churlish priests," who had refused the fair suicide "Christian" burial, has been doing its share towards disintegrating the Christian superstition for centuries. As the bigots may yet require further conciliation, we would suggest to the company exhibiting the Forbes Robertson Hamlet that this scene be prefaced with the explanation, "Laertes refuses to allow his sister to have Christian Burial." This, and a few other improvements on similar lines, would surely convince the most rabid opponent of Sunday pictures that they are capable, in judicious hands, of making for righteousness and assisting the cause of Jesus.

The Christian Church was never a pleasant institution; but once upon a time it had a little dignity. Their doctrines, they admitted, sounded brutal, but they were true; therefore, they couldn't really be as brutal as they seemed. So they put them forward in their nakedness, and were not ashamed. But nowadays they are very much ashamed, and the demand for fig-leaves and any kind of decent covering is extraordinary. The Oracles of God are up for alteration and repair.

Acid Drops.

It is reported that the Pope will remove his embargo on the Tango if it is called something else. That reservation is supposed to save his infallibility.

Papa Sarto's opinion on photography will be solicited next, we presume. Ladies—most of them, no doubt, good Christians—are already having their bare backs taken; some for friends, and some for publication in the newspapers. It is difficult to see how they can go much beyond this. His "back parts" were all that Jehovah ventured to display to Moses. But you never can tell. Female enterprise is remarkable for great boldness nowadays. A word from Papa Sarto may save us from the "altogether."

What a way truth has of finding its way out! A very pious member of the Government—none other than Mr. Runciman, who became Minister of Agriculture after serving an apprenticeship as Minister of Education—the other day thanked heaven that "cows and swine had no religion." His meaning was that if they had there would be the same quarrels among them as among human beings. And in this we quite agree with him. If cows and swine had religious beliefs they would become a nuisance to everybody—even to Mr. Runciman. The reverse of this truth is that when human beings lose theirs they will probably behave themselves better.

The Methodist Times recognises the imputation, and resents it. It says that the questions at issue are hardly religious, but are restricted to the political questions that are raised by the State establishment of religion. Nonsense! The fundamental question is a religious one, and nothing else. It is the question of how to make the rising generation religious before it finds out what is being done. Religion cannot afford to wait. It must catch people young if they are to be turned out good Christians. Leave them alone till they reach years of judgment, and there will be more churches on the market for picture-palace investors.

It is astonishing how eagerly all the religious papers are pursuing the subject of the evil influence of the cinema on young people. One journal, the Guardian, remarks that the tendency is for young children to steal money to go to picture palaces; even members of Church Brigades spend their pence that way instead of contributing to the Brigade funds. Pictures are also bad for the eyes and generate a craving for excitement, clothe villainy in an attractive guise, etc., etc. Of course, the moving film may have an injurious effect on sight—we are not sure; but there is a deal of humbug about the rest. We fancy we have heard of children stealing money for sweets and marbles; and even adults occasionally steal for other purposes. And, of course, there are always chuckle-headed magistrates and other people who will put it into youngsters' mouths, when they have done wrong, to say that it was due to the cinema. We used to hear the same story about boys' books and other things. For ourselves, we always found "boys' bloods" painfully moral, and picture shows seem on the same line. The villain always gets badly used in the end, and virtue is rewarded in a way that doesn't always happen in everyday life. Really, however, the religious papers are not directly concerned about these things. There are plenty of causes for childish wrongdoing about which they remain silent. The real cause of offence is that the picture palace opens on Sunday. It is a rival to the Churches. That is the whole secret of the situation.

Mr. Edward Lovett, a member of the Folk Lore Society, has been investigating the extent to which charms are used for various purposes among Londoners. He finds love charms, charms against the evil eye, and various forms of ailments are still made and sold to an extent not dreamed of by many. Personally, we are not surprised at the result of Mr. Lovett's researches. There is a tremendous mass of superstition current and latent in our population, and, as Professor Frazer once reminded us, its being there provides all the material for a really dangerous revival of superstition. It was the growth of the kinds of superstition noted by Mr. Lovett amongst the people of the disintegrating Roman Empire that gave Christianity its opportunity, and it is not quite beyond the bounds of the possible that a similar thing might not happen again. The only safeguard is the growth of positive or scientific habits of thought, and against that religion in all forms offers the strongest opposition. Religion as it is taught in the Churches does not, it is true, directly encourage the use of charms and magical incantations, but it does keep alive the frame of mind that considers these things of importance.

There is a general agreement among those who ought to know that drinking amongst women is on the increase. A drunken man is bad enough, but a drunken woman is infinitely worse. And when all is said and done, drunkenness remains one of the peculiar vices of Christian countries. Mohammedanism has at least managed to keep its followers sober, and this appears to be true of the conversions made in Africa, while the Christian black convert takes to drink easily and quickly enough. We wonder what an intelligent Mohammedan would say to the increase of drinking amongst women in this Christian country? We know what some of them have said about drunkenness amongst Christian men, and their opinion of it among women would be worth hearing.

The following is from the Daily Telegraph (Jan. 28):—

> "Jerusalem is in the immediate future to be lighted by electricity. A tramway line is to be constructed from Jerusalem to Bethlehem, and a new water supply will be provided. These works will be undertaken by a French banking firm, which has received a forty years' concession under the new Vilayets Law."

If the "Holy City" had been blessed with electric lighting, tramway lines, and a filtered water supply, nineteen hundred years ago, there wouldn't have been a ghost of a chance for Christianity—which was founded on the story of a spectre. That sort of story never prospers in the densest civilisation. Ghosts never make a reputation in Cheapside, Fleet-street, or the Strand. They have to make it in the semi-rural suburbs of London. "The Charing Cross Ghost" is an absurdity. "The Finchley Ghost" has a possible career.

"There have been times in the world's history," says Prebendary Grane, "when Western civilisation practically meant the Church." Quite so; but Prebendary Grane omitted to point out that this was precisely the time when Western civilisation was at its lowest. Hallam pithily said that the darkness of the Dark Ages was darkest when the power of the Church was greatest. And no one who knows the period will seriously dispute the statement. And the generalisation is the more damning because the Christian Church inherited a civilisation. It took over the civilised Pagan world, with the result that one after another its social institutions decayed, its learning lost, its culture forgotten. And the change for the better began, not with a greater growth of religion, but with the development of unbelief and the rediscovery of all that the Christian Church had neglected for centuries.

A great deal of discussion is going on in the religious press as to whether the population of Wales is mainly Nonconformist or Episcopalian. From statistics collected by the Bishop of St. David's it appears that the Nonconformists number forty per cent. of the population. The Bishop apparently claims the remaining sixty per cent.—which is rather more than others will admit, as no allowance is made for those who have the good fortune to be outside both parties. The discussion is connected with the question of Disestablishment, and quite fails to touch the real issue. Churches were never established by a majority vote, and have never really been disestablished by one. Formally, the last statement may be said to be inaccurate, since it can be pointed out that votes are actually taken whether a Church shall be disestablished or not. This is correct, but does not touch the point we have in view, which is the real significance of an Established Church and of the vote that formally depose it.

Mr. Gladstone often said that the Church Established was the representative of the collective religious life of the nation. In this he was quite correct. But it is even more than this. It is a visible expression of the idea that religious belief is essential to the well-being of a nation, and that there is the same need for a government providing religious instruction as there is for providing schools or anything else. And so long as this belief continues an establishment of religion in some form is inevitable. That is why the earlier generation of Dissenters very rarely claimed that religion should be separated from the State. All they asked was that a particular Church should be removed. Even to-day this is all that a very large number of Nonconformists have in mind. Not the disestablishment of religion, but the deposition of a Church—which means, in practice, the establishment of some other Church, or of all Churches.

The growth of the more logical idea that the State should not interfere in any way with religion, and should treat

Churches as it treats all organisations—that is, merely protect them in the exercise of their lawful rights—is really due to the conviction that a State, like an individual, can get on very well without religion. If we believe that religious belief is vital to human well-being, it would be nothing less than national suicide to insist that the State should leave it severely alone. And as a matter of fact, although only the minority have actually reached this conclusion, the majority feel that whether a man goes to church or stays at home, prays to God or does not pray, makes very little difference. The logic of facts are too strong for the logic of theory. Life is more powerful than doctrine. Civilised countries all over the world are slowly realising Disestablishment because they are being driven to realise the unimportance of religion to the work of understanding life or establishing a mastery over nature.

Dr. C. F. Aked, once of Pembroke Chapel, Liverpool, afterwards of Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York, and since of the First Congregational Church, San Francisco, is very likely put on his metal by the movements of the Oracle of the City Temple in London. He is reported to have just given his congregation a new "shocker" in a sermon "of extreme Modernist views," wherein he "avowed his disbelief in the doctrines of the Trinity and the Miraculous Birth." We didn't suppose that this would frighten any Church in the Californian Capital. Mr. Campbell went as far as that in his New Theology—which, by the way, was published some seven or eight years ago. We are afraid that Dr. Aked always had more brag than bravery.

The Papacy has just discovered Maeterlinck. After all these years! Just like it. Also just like it to put his books in the Index, and give the people who haven't already perused him an opportunity of doing so. Maeterlinck should give the Pope a bow and a smile for his advertisement.

Maeterlinck tells an interviewer that the Pope's ban is "a prehistoric phenomena without importance." Quite so. But the value of the advertisement remains.

Mr. Hubert Bland is asked a few plain questions in the Sunday Chronicle by a casual correspondent. One of them is the following. "Who are those 'prominent men of science' who are freely uttering doubts about Darwinism and the mechanical theory?" That is something for Mr. Bland to go on with. We hope Mr. B. T. Brierley, the writer of the letter, will jog "Hubert's" memory if the performance is needed, as it very likely will be.

Mr. Hubert Bland is an ex-military man and, we believe, a Roman Catholic. He is also a dilettante Socialist of the ultra-Fabian variety. His real value to progressive thought is easily estimated. His journalistic success depends a great deal on the "classy" people he is supposed to know. The English mob, of all parties, do so like the flavor of aristocracy. Any kind of aristocracy will do.

Mrs. Barclay, the sentimental novelist, who doesn't look it, tells an interviewer that "The Bible is true, not only in its theology and ethics, but ——." We may spare the rest. What is the use of reading on? The Bible is true. Mrs. Barclay says so. That settles it. Perhaps the lady will now tackle another topic, and tell us whether she has mended that Broken Halo.

The Bishop of Oxford, speaking at a Peace meeting in London, said that the first thing they must look to for the promotion of their object was "the spread of democracy"—the second was "the spread of intelligence and knowledge." Where does Christianity look in?

A muddle-headed Christian, who dates from Lower Edmonton, justifies the exclusion of the Freethinker from the local Free Library on the ground that he does not consider the National Secular Society deserves the first adjective in its name. The connection between his one-legged premiss and his two-legged conclusion is not descernible by secular logic. Nor has he any right to call this journal "a paper of the National Secular Society" at all. It gives the N. S. S. free publicity. That is all. It was never owned or controlled by the Society.

CARLYLE AND HELL FIRE.

Professor Tyndall, in his paper of "Personal Recollections of Thomas Carlyle," contributed to the Fortnightly Review, gave a very vivid and most interesting passage on the Abolition of Hell Fire, being the setting forth of a conversation he held with Thomas Carlyle. It is as follows: "I accompanied Carlyle to Melchet, the beautiful seat of Lady Ashburton, and rode with him through the adjacent New Forest. We drove to Lyndhurst to see Leighton's frescoes. We frequently walked together. One day, the storm being wild and rude, a refuge from its buffets was thought desirable. He said he knew of one. I accordingly followed his lead to a wood at some distance. We skirted it for a time, and finally struck into it. In the heart of the wood we found a clearing. The trees had been cut down and removed, their low stumps, with smooth transverse sections, remaining behind. It was a solemn spot, perfectly calm, while round the wood sounded the storm. Dry dead fern abounded. Of this I formed a cushion, and, placing it on one of the tree stumps, set him down upon it. I filled his pipe and lighted it, and while he puffed conversation went on. Early in the day, as we roamed over the pastures, he had been complaining of the collapse of religious feeling in England, and I had said to him, 'As regards the most earnest and the most capable of the men of a generation younger than your own, if one writer more than another has been influential in loosing them from their theological moorings, thou art the man!' Our talk was resumed and continued as he sat upon the stump and smoked his placid pipe within hearing of the storm. I said to him, 'Despite all the losses you deplore, there is one great gain. We have extinguished that horrible spectre which darkened with its death-wings so many brave and pious lives. It is something to have abolished hell fire.' 'Yes,' he replied 'that is a distinct and enormous gain. My own father was a brave man, and, though poor, unaccustomed to cower before the face of man; but the Almighty God was a different matter. You and I do not believe that Melchet Court exists, and that we shall return thither, more firmly than he believed that, after his death, he would have to face a judge who would lift him into everlasting bliss or doom him to eternal woe. I could notice that for three years before he died, this rugged, honest soul trembled in its depths at even the possible prospect of hell fire. It surely is a great gain to have abolished this terror.

EXIT CHRIST.

Since thou hast quickened what thou canst not kill,
Awakened famine thou canst never still,
Spoken in madness, prophesied in vain,
And promised what no thing of clay shall gain,
Thou shalt abide while all things ebb and flow,
Wake while the weary sleep, wait while they go.
And treading paths no human foot hath trod,
Search on still vainly for thy father, God.
Thy blessing shall pursue thee as a curse
To hunt thee, homeless, thro' the universe.
No hand shall slay thee, for no hand shall dare
To strike thy godhead, death itself must spare!
With all the woes of earth upon thy head,
Uplift thy cross and go. Thy doom is said.

—Robert Buchanan, "The Wandering Jew."

THE FAMILIAR GOD.

The manner in which all religions talk of God revolts me; they treat him with so much certainty, levity, familiarity. The priests, who have this name always on their lips, irritate me above all. It is with them a kind of chronic sneeze—"the goodness of God, the wrath of God, to offend God," these are their phrases. It is considering him as if he were a man, and, what's worse, a middle-class man. They are further wild to decorate him with attributes, as savages put feathers on their fetish. Some paint infinity blue, others black. Utter savagery, all that. We are still cropping the grass and walking on all-fours in spite of balloons. The ideal that humanity forms for itself of God does not go beyond that of an oriental monarch surrounded by his court. The religious ideal is, in fact, several centuries behind the social ideal, and there are heaps of mountebanks who make a pretence of falling down faint with admiration in its presence.—Gustave Flaubert.

BETTER LATE THAN NEVER.

A bishop was celebrating his golden wedding, and among the guests was a foreigner, who was puzzled over the term, so asked his hosts to enlighten him. "Well," said the bishop, "this good lady and myself have lived together for fifty years." "Oh! I see," replied the foreigner, "and you now get married."

Mr. Foote's Engagements

March 1, Glasgow; 22, Manchester.

To Correspondents.

J. W. O'LEARY.—We fear it would not tell. Christians are licensed blasphemers; it is only Freethinkers in whom "blasphemy" is a crime. Besides, it is too late for an appeal in the Stewart case now.

J. BROCKBANK.—No doubt you would make a better and wiser editor of the Freethinker than we are, but we don't quite see how the change is to be effected.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for cuttings.

E. B., sending his weekly batch of cuttings, adds a note pointing out that the sixpenny edition of Robert Buchanan's Foxglove Manor is published by Chatto & Windus, and, not being a nett book, can be bought for 4½d.

W. C. T. J.—We cannot advise you or your daughter at all in the matter. She proposes to make herself a nuisance in public places in order to call attention to the falsity and wickedness of religion. We have nothing whatever to say on that proposal. It is no business of ours. When you ask "Would she get into trouble?" we can only reply, "Isn't that what she aims at?"

J. BREESE.—Enthusiasm is no substitute for business particulars. Will somebody be cool enough to send us details of Mr. Cohen's coming visit to Leamington to open a debate for Mr. Walsh? Shouting "hoorah" up our office staircase conveys no information.

W. BAILEY (Manchester).—We note that it is desired to close the Fund to which you are Treasurer by (say) February 16, so as to deal with it a few days later.

P. G. BARNFORD (Christchurch, New Zealand).—It is an ordinary newspaper letter on a local topic, and would hardly be of interest to distant readers.

C. A. TURNER.—Glad to hear that a copy of the Freethinker is presented weekly to the Battersea Public Library. Also that the Library contains "more books of advanced thought" than most.

NORTH LONDONER.—Christian Evidence speakers are never to be trusted. It is not true that the Freethinker pictures were dropped after our imprisonment. They were dropped during our imprisonment—and necessarily so. They were resumed as soon as we were at liberty again, and continued for several years. The file of the paper at that time speaks for itself.

W. PALMER.—Next week. The rank and file, as you say, might be a little brisker with their subscriptions. But they don't do so badly, after all. Small incomes have relatively great claims.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

Sugar Plums.

Changes go on in the personnel of the Freethought party, by death, removal, and the hundred and one happenings and accidents of life. Younger faces come forward at the Annual Dinner and older faces disappear. But some of the older faces are very obstinate in their defiance of time. We were delighted to see the veteran Mr. H. Side, of Walworth, once more. He was not able to attend the dinner last year owing to the very inclement weather, although the Side family (several generations of them) were well represented. They were represented again this year, and he himself took advantage of the milder spell of weather and looked in to see his old friends once again. He has just turned ninety, and has entered what we may call his last lap. "I don't suppose I shall see you often again now," he said, as he shook hands with us—perhaps, as he smilingly suggested, for the last time. But the smile rather belied the prophecy, and the hand was singularly firm for such a great age. We hope it was not for the last time that we wished him good-bye; but, in any case, nothing can alter the fact that he belongs to the small body of human beings who are venerable by age and by character—marked from first to last by courage, constancy, and conviction.

Sir Hiram Maxim was a welcome and pleasant figure at the dinner. His old age is not austere but jolly. Although he has lived in England so long he is still very American, with the twang and dryness of the seventeenth century puritan turned into the twentieth century humorist. We are able to give some extracts from Sir Hiram Maxim's speech on another page. He read from manuscript to make sure of what he was saying, for he is obviously very deaf, and he says that time is making inroads on what was once a capital memory. There was much laughter during his speech and much applause when he sat down.

Amongst the provincial "saints" at the Annual Dinner we noticed Mr. G. L. Alward, of Grimsby. Time is telling upon the color of his hair, but it hasn't diminished the breadth of his smile. Another that we noticed was Mr. W. Bailey, of Manchester, who has always been a bountiful friend of the Secular movement—we may say "at home and abroad," in the language of one of the toasts of the evening.

Mr. Foote regrets that he was unable to travel up from home to London in time for a chat with the "saints" in the anteroom before the Annual Dinner. Unfortunately the arrangement of the tables prevented his getting a chat with many of them afterwards.

The President's Honorarium Fund circular is delayed another week. We did not desire it to start in the new year early enough to conflict in any way with the completion of another fund to which we wish every success. Further postponement is neither necessary nor desirable.

Mr. Cohen pays Glasgow another visit to-day (Feb. 8) and delivers two lectures (12 noon and 6.30 p.m.) at the N. S. S. Branch's interim meeting-place (North Saloon, City Hall). We hope fine weather will be favorable to fine audiences. Nothing else is necessary.

There was a muddle of some sort, we forget exactly how, over the announcement of Mr. Heaford's last visit to Manchester. We have pleasure in stating now (let the printer look out!) that Mr. Heaford lectures to-day (Feb. 8) at the Secular Hall, Rusholme-road, Manchester, in the afternoon at 3 and in the evening at 6 30, his subjects being "The Meaning of Freethought" and "Why Christianity Has Failed." We hope to hear of good audiences.

We desire to draw special attention to "An English Note-book of Voltaire" in the February number of the English Review. The document is said to have been recently discovered at St. Petersburg. Extracts from it are printed in Voltaire's own English, including the spelling. Here are specimens: "England is meething of all relligions, as the royal exchange is the rendez-vous of all foreigners." "When I see Christians cursing Jews, methings I see children beating their fathers."

"The Blasphemy Laws, of which a good deal has lately been heard, are, like the Vagrancy Act, one of those tyrannical Statutes which are odious in the judgment of all fair-minded men, yet still permitted to disgrace our civilisation. Why did a Liberal Government allow them to be revived and re-enforced, instead of consigning them to oblivion? It is noteworthy that Mr. McKenna, who has done so much to encourage the recrudescence of the flogging craze, should have also been the Minister to defend the recent operation of these atrocious laws—and by arguments as grotesque as those by which the lash itself is defended. How long is this weakest of Home Secretaries to be entrusted with such grave responsibilities?"—Humanitarian.

The conclusion of Mr. Foote's article on "Laws Against Religious Liberty" stands over unavoidably till next week. It is impossible to fit it in without breaking it—and at a very inconvenient point—which would largely defeat the writer's object.

The Rev. F. Ballard on the Bible.

"And Agrippa said unto Paul with but little persuasion thou wouldest fain make me a Christian."—Acts xxvi. 28 (Revised Version).

SEEING the advertisement of a "Great Christian Defence Mission," by the Rev. Frank Ballard, to be held at the Darlington-street Wesleyan Church, Wolverhampton, under the auspices of the Wolverhampton Free Church Council, I thought I would take the opportunity of hearing what this champion of religion had to say for his faith.

Choosing the subject "The Bible in Modern Light," which seemed more definite than the others, especially the previous one, "What is Christianity?"—to which a hundred definitions might be given—accompanied by a friend, I attended the church.

The lecturer is a man past middle age, with a close-cropped beard. To begin with, his voice was so low that the lecturer seemed to be talking to himself, and though it gained in volume later on, it was never loud.

Probably many came to the lecture with the idea of loading up with ammunition, to repel the infidel attacks upon the authority and truth of the Bible. My friend himself, whose position might be described—if I may say so without offence—as "sitting on the fence" with regard to the Bible, had been brought up in the old orthodox views, but had lately come in contact with the new gospel of evolution, and now declared that he wanted to know whether the Bible was true or false—and he did not care which. What he wanted was certainty. He had heard something of the Freethought attack, and now wanted, quite praiseworthily, to hear the best defence that could be put up on the other side.

Those who came for arguments to defend the Bible, soon had a rude awakening. Not only did the lecturer abandon the defence of the Old Testament, but he delivered a slashing attack upon the sacred volume himself!

He mentioned the names of Colenso, Ingersoll, and Bradlaugh, and evidently had all their arguments at his finger's end. Nor is the lecturer one of those who believe in tempering the winds of criticism to the shorn lamb. His attack upon the Old Testament was as vigorous and drastic as a Freethinker could desire, backed up by a somewhat rasping and supercilious bearing which he displays to two parties: to the believers in the inspiration and authority of the Old Testament on the one hand, and to Atheists and Materialists on the other.

The lecturer, holding the Bible in his hand, told us that it was not the Word of God. That in all the years of his ministry he had never spoken of it as the Word of God. There were hundreds of mistakes, errors, and contradictions in the Bible, he declared. And it was not true, as some defenders said, that these were introduced by the translators. There were as many errors in the originals as in the translations. Ingersoll had written a book on the Mistakes of Moses. What did he, the lecturer, care about the mistakes of Moses? The Old Testament was a Jewish book, and it was no part of the duty of a Christian to defend it. Let the Jews defend it, it was their book.

You walk into a Christian Church and you see the Ten Commandments on the walls, he continued; What are they doing there in a Christian place of worship? Nobody kept the Commandments. You haven't kept them, pointing an accusing finger at us. Nobody ever had kept them; nobody ever could keep them. Away with them from our places of worship. Nothing happened. The roof did not fall in. The blasphemer was not struck dumb or dead. He was not even rushed off to Stafford Gaol to join the last blasphemer who lectured in this town.

The lecturer then told us the story of Bishop Colenso and the Zulu. How the savage, pointing out one of the atrocities in the Bible, asked the Bishop if that was inspired by God; which opened the Bishop's eyes and led to his celebrated attack upon the Pentateuch.

He went on to say that he himself had been led to take up apologetics through going with a friend to hear Bradlaugh lecture. Bradlaugh, the lecturer said, challenged any Christian to come and read a certain chapter in the Bible aloud, and no one responded. No one could. The lecturer declared himself horrified at that meeting; but it opened his eyes; for which, by the way, he shows no gratitude, if we judge by the rough way in which he caricatured Charles Bradlaugh's voice and gesture.

Then we were told how many thousands of innocent women were burned as witches because the Bible declared, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live" (Ex. xxii. 18).

The lecturer next pictured to us the slave owners of America defending slavery from the Bible; quoting texts to show it was a Divine institution, ordained by God himself, and making the Bible the bulwark of American slavery. If he had shown how the weapon of religious intolerance had been forged from the Bible, and given a short history of the obstacle this book has been to scientific progress, his lecture would have been a comprehensive indictment of the sacred book.

What would they have thought of all this at our chapel twenty-five years ago? Why, they discharged one minister because he uttered a few hesitating doubts as to whether the torments of hell were eternal.

Why this sudden change of front with regard to the Old Testament? Why this unconditional surrender of the citadel once so vigorously defended? Mr. Ballard proceeded to enlighten us upon this point, as follows:

In Sheffield, we were told, crowded open-air meetings are held, in which the contradictions, mistakes, and immoralities of the Old Testament are held up to ridicule. "And I cannot always be there to answer them," said the lecturer pathetically. Then the Rational and Secular press has flooded the country with millions of volumes of anti-religious literature, and it is getting into the hands of the man-in-the-street, and he is beginning to find these things out for himself; and he says "These ministers know all about it and say nothing." Then he loses confidence in them and stays away from their services, and that is why the Church membership falls away every year. So says Mr. Ballard, whom we will leave to fight it out with the religious papers, who are always declaring that Secularism and Atheism are dead and done with.

The lecturer was also very severe on those clergy who still teach the old orthodox view of the Bible, and who allow their followers to learn the truth from the enemy.

Mr. Ballard takes his stand upon the life of Jesus as portrayed in the New Testament. The Gospels he considers to be historical and authentic documents, and he thinks that by abandoning the Old Testament to its fate, and concentrating on the New Testament, he will be able to save the situation. Is that possible? Is it probable? It is not. Nothing can now prevent the man-in-the-street from becoming acquainted with the criticism of the New Testament, which is quite as drastic as that of the Old.

Mr. Ballard did not persuade the friend who accompanied me to come down on his side of the fence. But what time has one to consider such matters, with picture palaces springing up on every hand. Perhaps, when football is over, he will go into the subject; it does not do to be too hasty in such important matters.

In conclusion, we wish to offer our hearty thanks to Mr. Ballard, and hope he will continue to spread the glad tidings, and that his labors will be abundantly blessed. For his method seems, to a mere Rationalist, as hopeful as pumping in water to save a sinking ship, or using oil to extinguish a fire.

Walt Whitman.

HORACE TRAUBEL, in his delightful book, With Walt Whitman at Camden, has recorded many sayings and opinions of the sturdy old author of Leaves of Grass that must be as shocking to the unco' guid as they are refreshing and interesting to the reader of open mind. Traubel, who was on intimate and most affectionate terms with the old poet, played the rôle of Boswell during some months at Camden in the later years of Whitman's life. And, aware that Traubel would one day make public use of the material he was gathering, Whitman was anxious that the literary picture should be a faithful one, that his failings should not be excused nor his virtues exaggerated. "Be sure to write about me honest; whatever you do, do not prettify me; include all the hells and the damns." Such was the poet's charge to his young friend, who tells us that in the preparation of his narrative he never lost sight of that command.

Referring on one occasion to the gratuitous visit of a Christian minister, who had come a considerable distance to give him his opinion of Leaves of Grass, Whitman remarked: "The ministry is spoiled with arrogance; it takes all sorts of vagaries, impudences, invasions, for granted; it even seizes the key to the bedroom and the closet."

Traubel one day found a visitor with Whitman, a Mr. Corning, who was a candidate for the pulpit at the Unitarian Church on Benson-street. "And what may be the subject of your sermon to-morrow?" the old poet inquired. "My subject? Why the tragedy of the ages." "And what may be the tragedy of the ages?" "The crucifixion." "What crucifixion?" "The crucifixion of Jesus, of course." "You call that the tragedy of the ages?" "Yes. What do you call it?" "It is a tragedy. But the tragedy? O no! I don't think I would be willing to call it the tragedy." "Do you know any tragedy that meant so much to man?" "Twenty thousand tragedies—all equally significant."

They were speaking one day of newspapers, when he called Traubel's attention to a remark of a Methodist minister at a recent conference: "I propose to discuss this subject from a minister's point of view." "What in hell's name," he said, "is a minister's point of view?" If he did not approach life as a man, or as an American, or as a lover, or even as a hater, Whitman failed to see in what other way he could possibly deal with the subject.

In answer to the question put to him by someone: Do you think the Church could be safely destroyed? Whitman replied, "Yes, why not? Men make Churches; men may destroy Churches. I see no use for the Church; it lags superfluous on the stage." "I always feel," he said on another occasion, "that to one in the swim—in the swim of modern science, democracy, freedom—the atonement, the Mosaic records, are not worth the dignity of consideration, of a reply. To any man who thinks, to any man who is alive to the revelations of modern science—it is an insult to offer the doctrines of the Church; it is as if you approached him to say: 'What a damned fool you are, anyway!'"

Speaking once of his family history, he mentioned to Traubel the fact that his father knew Thomas Paine, remarking: "Did history ever more thoroughly victimise a man? The most of things history has to say about Paine are damnably hideous. A good deal that gets written once is repeated and repeated, until the future comes to swear by it as gospel. I have always determined that I would do all I could to help set the memory of Paine right." Something Joseph Cook had been saying about Paine, Traubel says, aroused Whitman's ire. "It is always so," he said; "the tree with the best apples always gets the worst clubbing."

One day, at their friend Harned's house, Whitman got hold of a San Francisco portrait of Ingersoll from the mantel and regarded it long and intently. "That is a grand brow; and the face—look at the face (see the mouth); it is the head, the face, the poise of a noble human being. America don't know to-day how proud she ought to be of Ingersoll."

Harned told Whitman that Gladstone had come out with a reply to Ingersoll. This excited Whitman's humor. He laughed gently, and said: "Gladstone is no match for Ingersoll—at least, not in such a controversy. Of course, he is a great man, or was—has had a past—but in questions of the theological sort, in questions of Homeric scholarship, he is by no means much. Oh! there will be a funny time of it." Here he put his hands together scoop-wise. "Bob will take him up this fashion, turn him over (all sides of him), look at him sweetly, ever so sweetly, smile, then crunch him!"—to illustrate which he worked his two hands together as if to crush their imagined burden—"yes, crunch him, much as a cat would a mouse, till there's no life left to fool with."

Someone present demurred somewhat to Ingersoll. "Ain't you exaggerating his importance, Walt?" "Not a bit. Ingersoll is a man whose importance to the time could not be over-figured; not literal importance, not argumentative importance, not anti-theological Republican party importance, but spiritual importance—importance as a force, as consuming energy—a fiery blast for the new virtues, which are only the old virtues done over for honest use again."

Traubel read to Whitman a letter written by Ingersoll to the friends of Leonard Whitney, dead. (Published in Unity, Chicago. Whitney was a Unitarian preacher. In the Civil War was Chaplain of Ingersoll's regiment.) Whitman said: "How graphic, touching, powerful that is! What a substantial, rounded fellow the Colonel certainly proves himself to be! He is in a way a chosen man. There always was something in the idea that the prophets are called. Ingersoll is a prophet—he, too, is called. He is far deeper than he is supposed to be, even by radicals; we get lots of deep sea fruit out of him. Read that once again: I want to hear it again."

He had been reading Gladstone's reply to Ingersoll in the North American Review. Whitman shook his head: "It won't do, Mr. Gladstone; you may try: you have the right to try—you try hard; but the Colonel carries too many guns for you on that line." On the appearance of a later article: "Gladstone is neither here nor there: he is long-winded and indefinite—he doesn't make his mark clear and then drive to it: he goes all over the country looking for his game. Ingersoll is every way different—knows exactly what he wants and gets it at once."

Whitman, strangely enough, had little taste for religious controversy. On one occasion he even returned unread a copy of Winwood Reade's Martyrdom of Man lent him by a Philadelphia Quaker. He said to Traubel: "I hate theological, metaphysical discussion so heartily that I run at the sight of a controversial book—always, of course, excepting Huxley and Ingersoll, as you know." He had been looking over a Huxley book just out—controversial. "It is far more crushing of its kind even than Ingersoll's—it is superb. It does seem as if Ingersoll and Huxley without any others could unhorse the whole Christian giant. They are master-pilgrims with a fighting gift that would appal me if I was in the opposition." His admiration of Ingersoll is seen in all his references throughout the book. "Ingersoll," he said to Traubel, "could not come to my reception in New York; was out of town or busy; but he sent a note containing excuses and some fine things (witty, beautiful things) better than excuses. The Colonel is always my friend—always on the spot with his goodwill if not in person."

Traubel incorporates in his book many interesting letters from literary celebrities which Whitman at different times gave to him. One of these is from Ernest Rhys, describing a round of studios, etc., with a friend in New York. They began by breakfasting sumptuously (fried shad, omelettes, tomatoes, buckwheat cakes, strawberries, coffee, etc.) and then turned in to see Colonel Bob Ingersoll. Referring to this letter, Whitman said: "I don't envy Rhys his big breakfast and dinners and all that—I only envy him his call at Colonel Bob's! I am told those nights at Bob's are halycon nights. Next to being lucky enough to be there yourself is being lucky enough to hear about them from others who have been there."

Whitman seems to have been a source of much anxiety to the pious, and was often pestered with their offensive attentions. When he related to Traubel the visit of the Christian minister already mentioned, and his insistence on a hearing, Whitman said: "I don't believe anybody but a minister of the Gospel would do such a thing—would have been guilty of so egregious an impertinence. I told him I had plenty of opinions of Leaves of Grass nearer home—all sorts of pros and cons, damns and hallelujahs. But he didn't even laugh or seem deterred, he went right on with his message." Having a suspicion that Whitman wasn't listening to him, the preacher said, "I don't believe you're hearing a word I say, Mr. Whitman." To which the old man replied: "I shouldn't wonder—I shouldn't wonder." Rising to take his leave, the minister again said, "I was told you wouldn't take any advice, even good advice." "I shouldn't wonder—I shouldn't wonder," added Whitman. He laughed as he related the incident, exclaiming, "That's a tale worth putting down in the book."

Traubel said he could match that story. His grandmother, who was well on to eighty, was one day sitting on the front step, quietly looking about at things. A clerical came along and saw her, stopped and sat down on the step at her side. "Madam," he said, "you are very old; are you prepared to die?" She was, of course, annoyed, and said to him tartly: "Sir, if you were half as well prepared to die as I am you would be a happy man!" Whitman was very much amused. "Yes, that's a good match; that's worth being put down in the same book."

And in this simple way did Traubel gather his material for a very interesting volume. Innumerable little items get "put down in the book" which show the homely and amusing side of Whitman's character, and form as pleasing and truthful a piece of biography as will be found in the realm of literature.

JOSEPH BRYCE.

London Freethinkers at Dinner.

THE Annual Dinner of the London Freethinkers, under the auspices of the National Secular Society, was held at the Restaurant Frascati, on January 28, and was remarkable for the extremely large number of ladies who graced the tables. The handsome dining-hall was filled comfortably, and many veterans in the movement were present. Mr. G. W. Foote, President of the N. S. S. and editor of the Freethinker, occupied the chair.

A graceful tribute to the popularity of the President was a singularly charming collection of artificial roses and greenery which graced the top table.

At the outset Mr. Foote put everyone in a good humor by quoting a sentence from Shakespeare in the way of "grace," and the dinner passed off splendidly, the catering leaving nothing to be desired.

In his "Chairman's address," Mr. Foote was extremely felicitous, his introductory remarks concerning his unhappy "immolation" raising much laughter. In a different vein he said he was getting rather tired of taking the chair, and yet when he went like an ordinary diner and filled a plebeian chair, it did not please everybody. Nobody could be quite sure of anything. He himself might turn Christian; nobody knew what softening of the brain might do. His contemporaries, he added with fine scorn, got softer and softer in that direction. So great a man as Swift "died from the top downwards." Swift's Tale of a Tub, by the way, ought to be reprinted for use in the Kikuyu controversy. Secularists like to make the most of the life left them, because when a man is dead he is dead a long time. There is always the great drama of life left even when one is weary of the fight, and he could always think of that man who lay on his bed of helplessness at Leamington, who was stricken down as a Christian, and yet thought himself into Freethought, and to-day found the highest pleasure in watching the fighting of others. The torch of progress did not drop into oblivion when it passed from the older hands; it was held aloft by younger hands and gained greater brilliancy from the increased rapidity of its flight. Remember great men. Shakespeare, Cæsar, Cromwell, Darwin, Shelley, Meredith, Bradlaugh, Ingersoll; these great men redeemed the world from commonplace. They are our greater brethren. "Our loftier brothers, but one in blood." Refreshment was to be found in the biographies of great men. If Shakespeare could be so great and Bradlaugh so brave in this very world, victory was bound to come in the end. The next day was the birthday of Thomas Paine. Conway's Life was a masterpiece of industry, but Paine's life had yet to be written. Paine was a cosmopolitan by nature before he was a cosmopolitan by principle. When a boy of eight he was shocked at hearing a sermon on the atonement. At eighteen he was a finished Freethinker, and at the close of his career a sublime example for the world. Born in England, the only thing this country ever did for him was to try to hang him. America gave him his first task. Whether a tax is eighteen shillings or a pound is an unworthy subject to engage the genius of a nation; but not the question as to the rights of the men demanding the tax. Pym, Hampden, and Cromwell fought for a principle. The English people had cut off the head of a king. There have been kings since full of divine right, even to the Kaiser, but they have walked gingerly. Paine was the first voice in America that was imperial, and he told the Americans to call themselves the United States. There will never be peace in Europe until Victor Hugo's words of fire, "The United States of Europe," is realised. It was the pen of Paine as much as the sword of Washington that founded the United States of America. Never listen to the cackle of the old monarchies concerning the great republic across the Atlantic. The republic is laying the bases of a great civilisation. Every man of genius in England, for a hundred years, has found his first real supporters in America. Bradlaugh was the lineal descendant of Paine. Paine was the penman and Bradlaugh was the great orator of Freethought. He went one step farther than Paine, because he came a hundred years after. Bradlaugh was an Atheist, and was brought to Freethought through the Carlile family, who had passed years in prison championing the right to print the Age of Reason. Genius was a question of foresight. Bradlaugh and Paine both saw that the world had been cheated, the baby in the cradle and the boy and girl in the school had been deceived. Paine found out that the Age of Reason must precede the Rights of Man. Bradlaugh's name is as sure of immortality as any name in the century he adorned.

To Mr. Arthur B. Moss fell the toast of "The National Secular Society," which he described as the oldest society of its kind in the world. He said that a book had been published with the title, What are the Churches Doing? He knew, however, what they were not doing. They were not converting Freethinkers to Christianity. The Freethought aim was to dispel superstition from men's minds, and all the great educational forces were on the side of Freethought. The more men knew of the universe, the less they believed in gods. It was the fault of Freethinkers that lecturers were not always at work. That great organ, the Freethinker, ought to be read by every man and woman in this country. He desired to make the National Secular Society one of the greatest organisations in the country.

Mr. C. Cohen responded in a humorous and philosophical speech, in which he said the toast of the Society was an equally old toast with the Chairman's address. It was difficult to say anything fresh on the subject. He looked forward to an encounter with some parsons at Leamington, who belonged to the same Society as Mr. Walsh, who was bedridden. He had rashly promised to go and lecture on the trifling subject, "The Existence of God," and, if he could get the door locked before he began the debate, he anticipated a really pleasant evening. If he disappeared towards the end of the month, his friends would know what had happened to him. Life itself was the greatest enemy of the Church. Christians might stamp out the National Secular Society, but they could not stamp out life, and the force pulling the Churches to pieces was life. An idea that depends on a man can only be galvanised into life by a man. Freethought is independent of men. Ideas use men more than men use ideas. He had had a quarter of a century's battling against religion, and there was no better work than fighting for an idea. One thing comforted him. Where the great Catholic Church failed to arrest Freethought, the petty, mean, little Churches of to-day were not likely to succeed.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd also responded. He stated that religion was dying, and the Churches were being weakened year by year. At the Islington Conference all the clergy agreed that the religion of fifty years ago was no longer preached to-day. Christianity was dying before Christians have discovered what it was, and nobody will ever know that now.

Freethought is destined to conquer and to bring reason to its throne.

The toast of "Freethought At Home and Abroad" was in the hands of Mr. Heaford, who said that metropolitan Freethinkers did not confine their attention to Londoners, but thought of the countless workers under the noblest banner that ever waved over the heads of humanity. Such a toast put them into communion with thousands throughout the world who were working to emancipate humanity from the thraldom of priestcraft. There were heavier clouds overhead than a year ago. An English Freethinker was languishing in prison, and he feared he would not be the last. A wave of reaction had set in, and who knew but that next year Sir Hiram Maxim and Mr. Foote might not both be deported to Africa as undesirables? Reaction was sweeping throughout the world, and the attack against the Freethought Republic of Portugal was an example. The clergy were doing their utmost to prevent the 1915 Freethought Congress taking place at Prague, which it was hoped to hold on the five hundredth anniversary of the death of John Huss. Wherever the Freethought flag waves the principles of Freethinkers are being defended. The message was that all should work, strive, and educate for the dawn of a better day.

At this point Mr. Foote introduced Sir Hiram Maxim to the company, and Sir Hiram immediately responded to the toast. He said that Lord Salisbury had remarked that he (Sir Hiram) had prevented more men from dying of old age than any other man; but although his inventions had commended themselves to people, his ideas had not. At Worthing the local vicar did not like his sermonettes; and when he was in the Bosphorus, and his boat bumped a Turk's, the Oriental cursed him as a miserable, unbelieving dog of a Christian. As a fact, there was no religion that did not make the believer an infidel in three-quarters of the world.

A selection of passages from Sir Hiram's speech appears in another part of this week's Freethinker.

During the evening a fine program of music was rendered by Miss Haidee Hamilton, and Messrs. E. W. Harrison, Keith Woods, and Will Edwards, jnr. Madame Lucie Thomas was the accompanist, and also played selections.

Sir Hiram Maxim's "Remarks"

AT THE LONDON FREETHINKERS' ANNUAL DINNER.

MR. CHAIRMAN, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—I do not know why I, practically an outsider, should be called upon to speak to the toast of "Freethought at Home and Abroad" when there are so many others present who are much better able to deal with the subject.

I, however, have received instructions from Miss Vance—"God bless her!"—who tells me that speakers generally wander from their subject and spin it out too long. This, of course, is a hint that I should not occupy too much of your time.

I think we may say that Freethought is booming at the present time—not so much on account of what we are doing ourselves as from what our religious friends are doing for us. There have been several cases in the United States where parsons and priests have gone to the extent of murdering their sweethearts in order to get rid of them, and one murder of this kind does more for our cause than a thousand lectures in favor of Freethought. There are also numerous cases in Europe where the priests and parsons have gone wrong, and all these count in our favor.

Recently the Bishop of Madagascar has been pitching into the Bishop of Bungleboo because Bungleboo placed little wafers of bread on the tongues of people who did not belong to his particular brand of religion. The Bishop of Madagascar looked upon this transaction very much as railway officials would look upon passengers who are travelling with bogus tickets. These people, who did not belong to the Episcopal High Church, of course had no right to get into heaven at all; but it appears that, by having this little bit of bread placed on their tongue, they swallowed a part of the body of Jesus Christ, and therefore were able to slither into heaven without paying for their tickets. This underhand way of getting into kingdom-come was not approved of by the Bishop of Madagascar, and the result is a devil of a row. All this does a lot for Freethought.

A very pious Roman Catholic priest, with the appropriate name of Furniss, has written a little book entitled A Sight of Hell. I have bought hundreds of these books, and circulated them where they would do the most good. Of course, the good priest thought he was doing a lot for his Church by bringing out this publication, but as a matter of fact the whole idea is so ridiculous that it does a great deal more for Freethought than it does for superstition.

Only a relatively short time ago the French nation was so intensely religious that their priests were able to murder seventy-five thousand heretics in one day. This, however, did infinitely more for Freethought than for religion, and to-day France is the leading Freethought country in the world.

A few years ago, when I was travelling in Northern Italy, I found that the large crucifixes erected at the corners of the roads were nearly worn out by being stoned. There were bushels of stones about each of them, and it would appear that nearly everyone in passing picked up a stone and had a fling at the image on the cross, or what there was left of it. This indicates that the Italians, especially in the north, have commenced to think. The very fact that the Pope has been deprived of his temporal power shows that some advance is being made even in the Holy City itself.

Every little thing that sets people thinking on religious subjects brings grist to our mill.

I have not, and do not, in the least dispute the efficacy of the bit of bread that the Bishop of Bungleboo placed on the tongues of the people. I am quite satisfied that none receiving this bit of bread will ultimately find a place in the lower regions to be burnt for all eternity, but I do dispute that the Bishop of Bungleboo or any other bishop, has any more power to prevent people from going there than I possess myself; I am also of the opinion that bread is no more effective than many other substances. Having made a profound study of this subject, I now propose to administer the Holy Communion myself.

I have here a new form of wafer that is a great improvement on the old one; they have been duly consecrated by a machine driven by a steam engine, and I can assure everyone present that if those who are only moderately wicked will take one and swallow it in the ordinary way, they will never get even a smell of burning brimstone, they will surely be saved, and that is what we are all after. I would, however, advise who are very wicked to take more than one wafer; take three or four, just in proportion to their wickedness; take enough so as to make a good job of it.

[The wafers were chocolate creams.]

GENERAL GRANT ON SECULAR EDUCATION.

The following is from what is perhaps the most famous speech ever delivered by General U. S. Grant. It was made at a soldiers' reunion at Des Moines, Iowa, in 1876: "In a Republic like ours, where the citizen is the sovereign and the official the servant, where no power is exercised except by the will of the people, it is important that the sovereign—the people—should possess intelligence. The free school is the promoter of that intelligence which is to preserve us as a free nation. If we are to have another contest in the near future of our national existence, I predict that the dividing line will not be Mason and Dixon's, but between patriotism and intelligence on the one side, and superstition, ambition, and ignorance on the other. Now, in this centennial year of our existence, I believe it a good time to begin the work of strengthening the foundation of the house commenced by our patriotic fathers one hundred years ago at Concord at Lexington. Let us all labor to add all needful guarantees for the most perfect security of free thought, free speech, and free press, pure morals, unfettered religious sentiments, and of equal rights and privileges to all men, irrespective of nationality, color, or religion. Encourage free schools, and resolve that not one dollar of money appropriated to their support, no matter how raised, shall be appropriated to the support of any sectarian school. Resolve that neither the State nor nation, nor both combined, shall support institutions of learning other than those sufficient to afford every child growing up in the land the opportunity for a good common-school education, unmixed with sectarian, pagan, or Atheistical tenets. Leave the matter of religion to the family altar, the Church, and the private school, supported entirely by private contributions. Keep the Church and State forever separate. With these safeguards, I believe the battle which created the army of the Tennessee will not have been fought in vain.

Obituary.

We regret to record the death, which occurred on Thursday night, January 29, of Mr. Wordsworth Donisthorpe, the well-known Freethinker, philosophic Anarchist, and Social Economist. Mr. Donisthorpe's writings were brilliant and incisive, but they were somehow or other far less influential than they once promised to be. Despite his great abilities he did not find a "career." Perhaps he found something better.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 7 SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

The simple diminution of the freedom of the press is is enough to diminish the stature of a people.
—VICTOR HUGO.

Certainty.

AGNOSTICISM is a term that is open to all sorts of misunderstanding. To many people it signifies simply the doctrine of nescience, or the theory that no real knowledge is acquirable. Freethinkers are often described colloquially as nothingarians, that is, people without belief, knowledge, aim, or purpose. It is conveniently ignored that, as originally employed by Huxley, Agnosticism applied only to the supernatural. In point of fact, however, Freethinkers are earnest seekers after knowledge, knowledge being to them the staff of life. Even in relation to the supernatural, perhaps the majority of them are not willing to be called Agnostics, because they are so sure that there is no supernatural. An Atheist is the opposite of a Theist. It is the latter term that gives to the former its signification. A Theist is one who believes in God, and whose belief is sometimes so strong and blind that he is emboldened to say, "I know God." An Atheist believes that there is no God, and his belief, too, occasionally runs away with him until he is tempted to exclaim, "I know that there is no God." His claim to knowledge is, to say the least, quite as valid as that of the Theist. But in the absence of knowledge can there be any certainty? By certainty is meant assured conviction, conviction so strong that it completely shuts out all doubt. It is incontrovertible that without certainty life would be scarcely worth living. As Bonar, in My Old Letters, so aptly says:—

> "That which is certain can alone set free;
> It is uncertainty that makes us bondsmen."

It is a notorious fact that Christians are often in a state of the profoundest uncertainty. Their sky is frequently overcast with dark and heavy clouds of doubt and despair. At experience meetings the disciples are always bemoaning the weakness of their faith. Usually they put all the blame upon the Devil. Being a liar and the father of lies, he is openly accused of constantly trying to make them forget God and turn away from the Savior. There are very few Christians who are not at times tormented by unbelief, doubt, and fear. We have again and again heard the cry: "O! if I only knew; if I could but subdue this monster, doubt; if I were quite sure!" The religious life is generally full of such uncertainty. We find it sorrowfully expressed in the works of the most illustrious saints. Freethinkers, however, are entirely free from this mental torture. They have fought their doubts, "and gathered strength"; they have "faced the spectres of the mind and laid them," with the result that they now dwell in an atmosphere of serene peace and rest. It is customary to speak of them as Sceptics, but taking that word in its etymological meaning it cannot legitimately be applied to them. A genuine Freethinker is in no sense a doubter. With him certitude has become "a habit of mind," and certainty "a quality of propositions."

Take the existence of God. Atheism is the negation of every form of Theism. A Theist is not merely a person who believes that there is a God, but rather a person who believes in and has a doctrine of God. Correspondingly, an Atheist is not simply one who disbelieves in the existence of God, but one who rejects every doctrine of God. When a man says, "I believe in God," he gives expression to no intelligible idea. As we listen to him we do not know what he means. Before we can either believe or disbelieve we must ascertain what definition he attaches to the word God. As everybody is aware, Greece had sixteen Gods and Goddesses, all of whom were supposed to be supernatural beings, which is equally true of such Oriental deities as Osiris, Adonis, Attis, and Mythra. No doubt all Christians are convinced that all those divinities were purely mythical; and we fully share their conviction. But when they repeat their own creed, saying, "We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth and of all things visible and invisible," we beg to ask them, "Wherein does the God you believe in differ from those deities you reject as myths?" Time was when this Supreme Being, too, was one of many, when he was small enough to be carried about in a wooden chest, when he was known as "a man of war," and when his moral character was a disgrace to the tribe to which he belonged. In the Old Testament we find numerous instances of his anger, injustice, cruelty, and immorality. As a sample of the orders that came from him we take the following:—

> "Of the cities of these people, which the Lord thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth; but thou shalt utterly destroy them; namely, the Hittites and the Amorites, the Canaanites and the Perizzites, the Hivites and the Jebusites, as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee" (Deut. xx. 16, 17).

When we point out that Jehovah, who was once believed to be capable of perpetrating the darkest and most criminal deeds, and the Christian God are one and the same being, it will be seen that in all the stages of his career he was a human creation. His worshipers have always been busily engaged on the task of reforming his character, or of bringing him up to the standard of the age. In reality the task is incapable of accomplishment. The consequence is that the divines are everlastingly making futile apologies for the object of their worship. Well, clearly, a Deity for whom his devotees have to be offering endless excuses cannot be an object of sane belief. Of his non-existence we are in no doubt whatever. We are absolutely certain that he is a myth. His very name is mocked at by the world he is said to have created.

We are equally certain that mankind are children of the earth. They are differentiated from the earth's other children only by the size and educability of their brain and the faculty of speech. In all other respects the resemblance between us and the higher animals is of the closest kind. The belief that we possess a soul or spirit, which all other animals lack, is utterly groundless. We are born, we grow and develop, and then decay and die in precisely the same manner as all other living things. The so-called desire for immortality is only a theological interpretation of the natural love of life which we share with all the animals. When we cry for help to some unknown, mysterious Power we only make fools of ourselves in Nature's eyes. Metaphorically speaking, she pities the man who is entangled amongst "the fables of the Above":—

"She hears his wailful prayer,
When now to the Invisible he raves
To rend him from her, now his mother craves
Her calm, her care."

How well Meredith understood this great truth, and how beautifully he expresses it. One can easily realise of what enormous value the soul-theory has been and is to the Churches. Soul-saving and soul-feeding have proved their most profitable line of business. Special soul-catching campaigns are every now and then resorted to, when professional soul-catchers give exhibitions of their powers. When a revival is in progress everybody in its vicinity is asked, "Is your soul saved?" or "Is it well with your soul?" People brought up in the Churches take it for granted that they are endowed with souls which are naturally lost, and that their most pressing duty is to go and get them saved. After they have found their souls and got them saved, they will certainly lose them again unless they attend churches and chapels two or three times a week to have their requirements seen to by specially appointed soul-nourishers. Pastors of churches are shepherds of souls, and, judging by innumerable pulpit utterances, souls are as fond of wandering as sheep, and as difficult to find. At the present time they are extraordinarily wayward and perverse. They disappear from the fold in crowds, and the majority of them positively decline to be coaxed back. The truth is that the soul-theory is breaking up with great rapidity. People are beginning to perceive that the Buddhist no-soul theory is much truer to the facts of life. When Wordsworth sang—

"The Soul that rises with us, our life's Star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting like Plato, he was only drawing upon his imagination. Both men believed that as long as the soul is in the body she is undergoing punishment of some sort, with the result that she loses her pristine purity and loveliness. That neither of them knew anything about the subject is proved by the fact that they flatly contradict each other. Plato maintains that after her incarnation the soul is trying hard to remember the life she lived and the things she knew prior to it, while Wordsworth is equally sure that whilst in the body pent she is quickly forgetting all about her previous existence. Well, we are quite as certain that man, in the totality of his being, is a child of the earth; that he begins his existence at birth and ends it at death; and that his chief duty is to make the most and best of his present life. On this point we do not cherish even the shadow of a doubt. All possible knowledge lies between birth and death. So far as the individual is concerned, birth begins and death ends all. With Freethinkers this is an absolute certainty.
And cometh from afar,"

God and the unseen world are creations of the fancy alone. Even ardent believers are often by no means sure of them, and they are nearly always aware of the possibility that their beliefs are not well founded. We are never worried by such misgivings, because we know that this earthly life, in proportion to its degree of conformity to Nature's laws, is well worth living; and its value depends, in each case, upon the benefit it confers upon the race. According to Meredith, Nature says to every one of us, "Live in thy offspring as I live in mine." In other words, we are instructed so to live as to leave the race a little stronger and richer than we found it. That this is man's chief end is an undeniable certainty; and as for Nature—

"Meanwhile on him, her chief Expression, her great word of life, looks she."

J. T. LLOYD.

The Failure of Science.

WHEN someone remarked to Douglas Jerrold that the winters were not like they used to be, Jerrold replied "they never were." One is reminded of this story when one reads long rigmaroles about the present being a time of change, or that the foundations of civilisation are threatened, etc. To those who lament that things are not now as satisfactory as they used to be, one feels inclined to reply "they never were." Was there ever a time when a certain number of people were not remarking that all things were changing, and looking back mournfully at the more settled times that had gone? You can find the same alarms, the same fears, the same doleful prophecies, any time during this last five hundred years at least. They are due, perhaps, to a want of perspective, perhaps to an over-developed egotism, perhaps to a want of grasp as to the real nature of national growth and intellectual development. Most probably all these things have something to do with the phenomenon.

Mr. Raymond A. Coulson has just brought to a conclusion a series of articles on the general failure of everything—including, one may observe, that of Mr. R. A. Coulson. For all that Mr. Coulson has made clear is that there is unrest—which has always been the case; that moral ideals are being questioned—which also is no new thing; that politics have not solved all our social problems—which, in the nature of the case, it can never do, and never really claims to do. We should all come very much nearer failure if there did not exist unrest, or if we were quite content that we had reached perfection in any of the directions noted. Change is one of the indications of life, and dissatisfaction with things as they are does not necessarily mean that all that has been done is a failure. It may mean, and often does mean, no more or less than the possibility of still further improvement. And there is nothing easier, cheaper, or less helpful than to dwell upon the shortcomings of science, or art, or sociology as though we had reached a state of intellectual bankruptcy. I admit it is a popular plan, because it requires no great penetration on the part of writers, and no great mental strain on the part of readers. One could point out more than one playwright or writer who has managed to achieve considerable popularity by these means.

Mr. Coulson's concluding words on the failure of everything in general is concerned with the failure of science. And his words here are just those of the average journalist who, because his business is to write glibly of any subject that turns up, has come to take himself quite seriously as an authority. Mr. Coulson explains that "about thirty years ago there was a tendency to imagine that science could give man an explanation of the universe," and "it was popularly supposed that 'scientific fact' and 'scientific proof' were the most unassailable of things, and that what science gave us we might at least be sure of." This turns out to have been quite a delusion. "Science is very useful as a tool by which we may take hold of the universe, but when it comes to presenting us with an idea of what the universe really is, there is no pea under the thimble."

> "Modern science confesses that it does not know what light is, what heat is, what electricity is, what magnetism is, what matter is, what life is, what anything is. Radium, and subsequent discoveries of the the radio-activity of many bodies, have played havoc with Dalton's Atomic Theory, which was the foundation of chemistry. Biology knows nothing of the origin of life. Physics has lost the laws of matter in a new world of doubt.....The great laws of Nature, which up till a a few years ago were regarded as unassailable and proved beyond question, are now held in doubt. For example, it is now admitted that Newtonian mechanics, on which our system of astronomy and much more of our knowledge is based, may not be absolutely true for the universe as was once thought, and that things may really work on a quite different system of laws."

Now, here is a style of writing that is very common, very mischievous, and quite false or misleading. It is the kind of chatter that results from knowledge that is only half digested, and gives ill-informed readers the impression that they are acquiring useful information. Above all, it gives a helping hand to those who are only too ready to seize upon an assumed scientific failure as grounds for encouraging pure superstition. Let us take as an illustration of half-digested knowledge the statement that "Radium, and subsequent discoveries of the radio-activity of many bodies, have played havoc with Dalton's Atomic Theory." Mr. Coulson may be surprised to learn that this conclusion is pure nonsense. Dalton's Atomic Theory—the foundations of modern chemistry—remains exactly where it was and is quite unaffected by the discovery of radium. Dalton's laws of definite, multiple, and equivalent proportions are as true now as ever, and are not questioned by a single chemist. The statement that the Daltonian Atomic Theory has been upset by radium or by anything else, is simply absurd. What has been disturbed is the notion that the chemical atom was ultimate. Dalton thought it was; but his thinking so did not affect the laws of atomic action propounded by him in the slightest degree. Just as science advanced from the molecule to the atom, so it now advances to a still finer form of matter—the corpuscle, which builds up the atom as the atom builds up the molecule. As one of our foremost scientific writers remarks, the foundation of the atomic theory "is none the less firm because it is now realised that these indivisible atoms.....are themselves composed of smaller particles." If Mr. Coulson had submitted his article to the judgment of a friend with a little scientific knowledge, he would certainly have advised the deletion of the passage criticised.

And this brings me to another very common fallacy which Mr. Coulson popularises in his article. There are no "great laws of nature" that were a few years ago regarded as unassailable, but which are now held in doubt. A scientific "law" once established is true, so far as it goes. It may turn out, and sometimes does turn out, that other laws are discovered of a wider and more comprehensive character. It may also happen that the value of certain generalisations is at first over-estimated. This seems to be the case, for instance—although the point is not yet demonstrated—with the theory of natural selection. In this case, all that happens is that the operation of natural selection has to be supplemented by other processes. And even though it were true that the "Newtonian mechanics" may not be absolutely true for the whole universe, this would not affect the value of the "Newtonian mechanics" so far as they do extend. There is no proof of failure in any one of these instances. Scientific men are not at sea, and physics has not, as Mr. Coulson suggests, "fallen through the bottom of the cosmos." All it really means is that scientific generalisations are being continually enlarged. One stage is reached, and some people hastily conclude that it is ultimate. Then a further step is made, and the assumed ultimate is seen to be only a stage in a process. But this is not failure, and no one who understands scientific methods and appreciates scientific ideas considers it as such. It is only part of the growth of scientific certainty. The generalisations left behind are not discarded; they are usually the foundations on which wider ones are built.

One gets a little tired of correcting the delusion that science is ignorant on matters that admit of neither knowledge nor the opposite, but it must be done. Where is the modern science that confesses "it does not know what heat is, what electricity is, what magnetism is, what life is, what anything is"? Of course, I know that this is continually being said by all kinds of people; but it is sheer folly, nevertheless. It is all a question of "What went ye out for to seek?" If anyone goes about looking for light and heat and electricity, etc., apart from the special group of phenomena covered by those terms, it is certain his search will not be rewarded, and science will be unable to help him. And this for the simple reason that light and heat are not things apart from the phenomenon thus called, they are the phenomena. All that science means by light is vibrations that exceed a certain rate per second. And when we have been told what this rate is, under what conditions it occurs—in other words, when we have the laws of the phenomenon stated—we really know all there is to know about it. Light is not something apart from vibratory phenomena, it is vibratory phenomena. There is no "is" apart from this. The question of what light is, or what heat is, apart from laws describing their occurrence, is not a scientific question at all; it is not even an intelligible question. It is a survival of metaphysics, which in turn was only a survival of the animistic theory of things. There is more to learn, true, about light and heat and other things, but to say we do not know what light and heat are, is downright nonsense.

It is, in brief, quite useless coming to science with a number of manufactured conundrums, and expecting an answer. To such questions no answer will be forthcoming. When a man like Sir Oliver Lodge says that even though the chemist were able to manufacture living beings, and describe accurately all the conditions under which vital phenomena are manifested, this would not be saying what life is, only describing the conditions under which life manifests itself, he is not talking science, but nonsense. The statement is scientifically unintelligible. It is exactly equal to saying that when we know under what conditions H_2O produces water, we have not shown what water is, but only described the conditions of its manifestation. Speculation on these lines is exactly equal to speculating as to what will happen when an irresistible force encounters an immovable object. It is easy to spend time on this question, but it is much more profitable to realise that it is downright nonsense. So also with talk such as has been noted concerning the failure of science. It is easy enough, but it is sheer futility. Its only positive consequence is the encouragement of frames of mind that are simply fatal to the spread of rational thought and orderly progress.

Science and the Soul.—III.

"Consciously or unconsciously, most men are influenced in all their general views, and, therefore, in their theory of life, by the dogma of personal immortality; and to this theoretical error must be added practical consequences of the most far-reaching character. It is our task, therefore, to submit every aspect of this important dogma to a critical examination, and to prove its untenability in the light of the empirical data of modern biology." — PROFESSOR ERNST HAECKEL, The Riddle of the Universe (1900), pp. 192-3.

"The idea of a future life is supported by not a single fact, while there is much evidence against it.....It is easy to see why the advance of knowledge has diminished the number of believers in the persistence of consciousness after death, and that complete annihilation at death is the conception accepted by the vast majority of enlightened persons."—PROFESSOR ELIE METCHNIKOFF, The Nature of Man, pp. 161-2.

"The thoughts to which I am now giving utterance, and your thoughts regarding them, are the expression of molecular changes in that matter of life which is the source of other vital phenomena."—PROFESSOR HUXLEY, Lay Sermons, p. 138.

"In the eye of science the animal body is just as much the product of molecular force as the stalk and ear of corn, or as the crystal of salt or sugar."—PROFESSOR TYNDALL, Fragments of Science, p. 417.

MODERN science knows nothing of the soul; it teaches that the mind is a product of matter, and that the higher intellectual faculties are a function of the grey matter of the brain.

No mysterious spiritual being lurks within us, forcing us to obey its imperious will, and surviving the decay and destruction of our bodily frame. Man's mind, like his body, is the outcome of the blind evolutionary forces of nature, and we can trace the path by which it evolved. As Professor Calderwood has observed:—

"The novelty of the situation lies in this, that man's alliance with all animal life has been established with a clearness and fullness of representation never before possible in the history of the world. The long-hidden secrets of nature are disclosed, and behold! man has his heritage among the beasts of the field. The discovery is indeed a large one; the demonstration has been worked out in minute detail till no place is left for doubt."*

Or, as Lester Ward, the American evolutionist, puts it:—

"One revolution of the wheel of organisation evolved the living vegetable world; another culminated in the creation of sentient beings. Higher and higher has arisen the type, finer and finer has grown the product, till brain has become the ruling force, and man has emerged from that darkness which hitherto had never permitted Nature to contemplate herself."†

Mind, the highest product of evolution, which, he says, has been described as that which "sleeps in the stone, dreams in the animal, awakes in man."

The brain depends for its working upon the blood supply. If the blood circulates too rapidly, as in the case of drunkenness or fever, the ideas become confused. If a drop of water passes into the cranium, loss of memory follows. If the brain is flooded by the bursting of a blood-vessel, we have an apoplectic fit. Dr. Buchner asks:—

"If the mind, as spiritualists contend, be a thing independent or self-existing, and controlling or utilising matter, why is it so little able to defend itself against or repel these attacks? Why does it yield or succumb to a blow on the head, the commingling of a few drops of blood with the substance of the brain, a sunstroke, a few inhalations of chloroform, a few glasses of wine, or a few drops of opium, prussic acid, or other poison?"‡

Mind is a purely material product; more blood is supplied to the brain than any other organ. One-fifth of the blood in the body is constantly traversing the brain; and Professor Bain tells us that "thought exhausts the nervous substance as surely as walking exhausts the muscles."§ Gavarret found that "the blood which comes to the brain red and oxygenated, returns by the capillaries black and charged with carbonic acid."‖

The ingenious researches of Dr. Byasson have shown that every brain cell in working expends its phosphorised materials, and that wearisome intellectual labor is followed by the presence in the urine of sulphates and phosphates, the waste products of the brain at work, "which serve as a chemical measure of the intensity of cerebral work done in a given time."¶ Dr. L'Heritier has also shown that "in old age and in a state of idiocy, the phosphorus contained in the brain is but one-half in quantity of what it used to be, and recedes in point of fact to the proportion contained in the brain of an infant." These facts were summed up in the famous phrase of Moleschott, "Without phosphorus no thought!"

Then, again, the brain generates heat, when at work, just the same as the muscles do, although it never exceeds the twentieth of a degree Centigrade. Lombard, who was the first to experiment in this direction, gave reasons for thinking that "Every cause that attracts the attention—a noise, or the the sight of an object or a person—produces elevation of temperature," which also occurs under the influence of an emotion, or during an interesting reading aloud.†† These experiments were conducted outside the cranium. The brain was not directly investigated. It remained for Professor Schiff, by directly experimenting upon the brain itself inside the skull, to demonstrate by means of thermoscopic instruments of extreme sensibility, that Lombard was right. Dr. Luys says:—

"Schiff, in his recent experiments, as ingeniously contrived as delicately executed, succeeded in demonstrating in a precise manner, that in the animal under experiment, the cerebral substance was subject to local increase of temperature, according as it was successively excited by such and such kinds of sensorial impressions, and that thus, in the brain of a dog, which was made to hear unexpected sounds, such or such a region of the cortical substance was heated, and that in another, in which tactile, olfactory, or gustative sensations was excited, other regions of the brain were reciprocally erethised and heated in an isolated manner."*

Which, being interpreted for the plain man, means that a different part of the brain was brought into action, and rose in temperature, for every sense that was exercised. Thus, one part of the brain was brought into action by hearing, another by seeing, another by feeling, another by taste, and another by smell; which proves, as Luys remarks, that this inward labor of the mind reveals itself by sensible signs, and "the brain, like a muscle in action, manifests its dynamic power by a local increase of heat, appreciable by the instruments of the physical laboratory" (p. 76).

Thus we understand, says the same writer, how prolonged efforts of the mind, and "sustained intellectual work is accompanied by a loss of phosphorised substance on the part of the cerebral cell in vibration, that it uses it up like an ignited pile which is burning away its own essential constituents." He points out that "Sleep is to the brain what needful repose is to our fatigued limbs, the necessary condition of its health," and numbers have sown the seed of brain disease "who through reiterated vigils and exaggerated expenditures of activity, have thus passed the physiological limit of the resources at their disposal, and incurred expenditure above their receipts." The same author cites the case "of a celebrated lawyer, who lost his memory in consequence of too-long-continued intellectual work"; and of "a similar case which occurred in a German savant, after an intense concentration of mind"†

When the brain becomes weary, its energy diminishes, the flow of blood to it becomes less, and the brain tissue becomes insensibly bloodless. The condition of comparative bloodlessness in the brain during sleep, says Dr. Luys,—

"has been directly proved by different observers; thus Coldwell, in the case of a wound in the head, with loss of substance in the bones of the cranium, observed that when the patient was plunged in deep and peaceful sleep, the brain remained almost immovable in its envelope, but that when he was dreaming it increased in volume, and when the dream was vivid it protruded through the opening. Blumenbach, in an analogous case, similarly remarked that the brain subsided during sleep, and that waking was accompanied by a more or less considerable afflux of blood, and an augmentation of volume" (p. 75).

The same writer records a case which came under his personal observation. "In a patient affected with melancholia, with prolonged stupor ending with death, I succeeded in discovering a most characteristic condition of anæmia of the cerebral substance, which was as it were washed clean and deprived of sanguine material" (p. 248). Now, the crucial question arises—Why, if our thoughts are due to an immaterial soul, or spirit, should they be affected by the quantity, or quality, or rate of circulation of blood supply to the brain? Why should the power of thought, and the intellectual faculties, cease altogether with the withdrawal of the blood from the brain?

RECENTLY, in my portion of the country, the solemn-faced gentlemen have been greatly distressed. Not that this deserves comment: they are easily perturbed by the fluctuations of the pew rents; but some of the mental margarine they produce while in this state is of the well-advertised, heavy-weight quality, and gives occasion for the presence of an inspector.

It seems that the majority of the people, who are factory workers and miners, are gradually becoming more and more demoralised. Pleasure is eating into the heart of their life, like a cancer germ; and the pastors would like to operate and destroy it. There is too much frivolity; too much demand for excitement; too great a request for amusement nowadays. This, we are told, leads to a social instability directly antagonistic to the teachings of Christianity. It means that the serious aspect of life as an aviation garage and training field is being very sadly neglected. It means that the vision is dulled with tears, and the heart crinkled with care, and only ignorance mistakes those tears for the pearls of the laughter of fools, and the crinkles for the physical contortions of merriment. It means that Religion is losing its supremacy.

Of course, we do not accuse Christianity of being responsible for this social demoralisation; not at all, despite its supremacy. We are only now discovering what real Christianity, and real Religion, are. Hitherto, the people have been blinded by sectarian prejudice. Although convinced of the truth of their beliefs, our forefathers had not the educational resources afforded us, and consequently their attitude towards the divine wisdom was rather constrained, and, in many cases, led to a false interpretation of the Word of God. Logically, therefore, one cannot very well impute to the true Christianity of to-day the responsibility for the existent social evils.

Anyone who suggests that the Christianity of contemporary life and that of yesterday are practically the same is a monstrously bad logician, and the truth is not in him. Should he assert that the religion of our grandparents exercised so powerful a mental influence in favor of social conservatism that it delayed progress, he becomes a suspicious character. And if he assert that this real Christianity of the present is no more than divine "swank" of the ordinary Christianity of the past, and is as much responsible for the continuation of social degradation as anything else, economic or otherwise, he is a man who should be treated like a naughty child: hunger look-out.

Suppose you say that dirty horrible work coarsens the mind, and that the rough mind seeks rude pleasures. Suppose you say that ten hours' hideous monotony demands fleshly excitement, and that the cravings of an ill-educated mind can only be appeased by a glare and glitter the cultured mind would despise. Suppose you say that the child brain is moulded by its environment, and if the surroundings, mental and material, be unrefined, the child brain will become like them. And suppose you say that Christianity has flirted with, and fawned upon, in the past and in the present, nearly every influence that tended to prolong the coarseness of human life. Moreover, suppose you prove, as the Freethinker can prove, that the vaunted power of Christianity is indictment enough; then can you honestly say that Christianity is not in the least responsible for the very demoralisation its prating professors bemoan?

All this verbal whip-cracking about social demoralisation on the part of priests is so much sound, proving they are the same, yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Hope deferred invariably gave the religionist delirium tremens of the tongue if that organ happened to be loosely hung in the making, or creating, by God. Jesus Christ, according to modern interpretation, suffered from this deferred hope of an earthly paradise. So suffered they all, down through the centuries, viâ Savonarola to Mr. Campbell. Not contented with the prospect of an eternity of woodbines and threeha'penny, they wished cigars and champagne here; and they all took the same way in their irrational methods of ridding the world of its demoralisation.

Emphasising a good thing is, psychologically, an excellent procedure if one desires the ultimate realisation of it. Dwelling persistently on a bad thing accentuates it. Every priest who agonised under this deferred hope foolishly commanded the people to fling off long-accustomed habit, as one flings off an overcoat. In other words, his dream of regeneration could only be accomplished by a social miracle, absolutely impossible. Every tongue-twitching priest has laid all his verbal weight upon the bad thing, sublimely ignorant of the fact that only a long course of educational emphasis upon the advantages of the good thing will elevate the social mind to its level.

Society is only a child yet in many respects. Perniciousness over a fault evokes doorness, stubbornness. Emphasise evil and you manure it by increasing its influence; but emphasise the good and simultaneously the bad is relegated to desuetude and the influence of the good develops. The social mind can only be successfully treated in a similar manner.

Sometimes we are inclined to the belief that the religious idea of a sudden and complete conversion of the individual is responsible for the opinion of the possibility of a lightning-like removal of social degeneration by the grace of God. Ministers of the gospel seem to imagine the only requirement to be a turning to God. They forget that the customs of centuries are stronger than the power of deity. God may rule angels; he does not rule humanity. He may reorganise the population of paradise by a wave of his mighty arm; but the same method is useless with the people of the earth.

It is an extremely difficult thing to aver that the typical representative of the "Have-nots" of contemporary times is rougher in the grain than the Chinese peasant of the year 9999 B.C., or the Egyptian carpenter of the same year, or the Assyrian tent-dweller of 2345 B.C., or the Roman slave, or the Gallilean fisherman of the time of Jesus Christ. It is an extremely dangerous assertion to say that the masses of to-day are more demoralised than the masses of any other semi-historical period in the evolution of society. It is futile to dogmatise on the subject in the absence of sound knowledge.

The ministerial rumpus concerning the "Materialism" of the people is as ancient as the first fully credentialed medicine-man, who, very probably, used the wickedness of his fellow-barbarians as an excuse for surrounding himself with legions of bad spirits. It is a trick of the trade, a survival of religious savagery.

Priestcraft has always aspired to be socially dominant. When it discovered inimical forces in operation, immediately it endeavored to raise a dust around them to distract attention. And what was more convenient at any time in the world's history than the social degradation of the "Have-nots"? The Holy Bible is prolific in examples of this religious characteristic. Every prophet was missioned to lead the people to a land flowing with milk and honey. Christ is the best instance of all. His estimation of the people's Materialism was concentrated in the opprobrious phrase "generation of vipers." Like them all, he suffered from hope deferred. Like them all, past and present, his mission in life was miraculously to cure the masses of their Materialism. And, like them all, he failed.

If the name "Have-nots," and its inevitable social coarseness, have to disappear from the memories of man, the change will certainly not be accomplished successfully by emphasising the black places; nor by painting a fancy heaven on the skies of poverty's hope; nor by keeping men's minds supernaturalistic; nor by enshrining autocracy on a purple throne in paradise. But the change may take place after centuries of the application of materialistic science, after centuries of the teaching of Humanism, when the average mind has been taught to honor human justice, when it has been taught to be rational.

Acid Drops.

The Pall Mall Gazette says that "Mr. Balfour has laid the country under an obligation by the delivery of his Gifford Lectures." We should have thought that he was fairly well paid by the £500 he received for the "delivery." Besides, he ought to feel easier after it.

Mr. Balfour is back from his Glasgow lectures on "God" and once more engaged in fanning the flames of religious bigotry in Ireland. The "classes" have always used the "masses" in this way. Comte was right when he said that "God" was the figure-head of a hypocritical conspiracy against mankind.

Drop religious bigotry and what "Irish question" would be left? "To hell with the Pope!" and "To hell with King William!" cover the whole wretched situation.

Without arguing the question of Home Rule, which is a political question, and outside the scope of this journal, we once argued that it was a mistake, in any case, to assume that "Home Rule meant Rome Rule." That aspect of the case is quite within our province. If it isn't we have no province at all. We have no time to argue the point again now, but we abide by what we wrote then. Imagine our astonishment at finding this made almost an excuse, by a "saint" we should never have expected to take up such an attitude, for not attending the recent Annual Dinner under the auspices of the N. S. S. The gentleman's language was sufficiently emphatic. We overlook that fact, however, for it is really not Freethought but politics that breeds too little regard for what the late Lord Chief Justice Coleridge called "the decencies of controversy." What we wish to say is that the "saint" in question is quite wrong in stating that the N. S. S. has committed itself in any way to any solution of the Irish or any other problem of party politics. It has been one of the President's most difficult duties to maintain this neutral policy, but he has always been supported at critical moments by the good sense of the party. Secularists are not all of one way of thinking in politics, sociology, and ethics; and if they are to keep together and work together as Secularists it must be exclusively upon the grounds on which they are not only practically but necessarily agreed. Humanism as opposed to superhumanism—understanding the words in a fairly wide sense—is the basis of combination amongst Secularists. There are other Societies for the promotion of other objects, and Secularists are free to join them individually just like other citizens. This is the only sensible and successful policy in a complicated life of modern civilisation.

It cannot be deduced, however, from this wise principle of action that the editor of the Freethinker—which, by the way, does not belong to and is not in any way controlled by the N. S. S. or any other Society—is debarred from holding and stating a view of what is but incidentally an aspect of the Home Rule question; holding that view as a Freethinker and stating it to his readers as Freethinkers. The purely religious and ecclesiastical part of an Irish problem is as open to our criticism as the same part of an English problem is. Supppse a Secularist who happened to be a Conservative called upon us to abstain from hostile criticism of the Church of England. Suppose a Secularist who happened to be an orthodox Liberal called upon us to abstain from hostile criticism of a Government Education Bill. Suppose the same person rebuked us for speaking more or less contemptuously of Mr. Lloyd George's excursions in the region of Nonconformist religion. What should we say in reply? We should say, of course, that these things were what the Freethinker existed for—that we were strictly attending to our own business—and that it might be as well if such correspondents tried to do the same. We fight religion, we fight churches, we fight priesthoods, and we are really not going to be warned off our work by apprehensive political partisans of any variety whatsoever. We may displease even friends now and then, but that is the highest form of courage. Displeasing your enemies is rather a luxury.

The Government promises a new Education Bill in the present session. Four bills have already been introduced and either lost or dropped by Mr. Asquith's lieutenants who have occupied the Education Ministry. Another lieutenant is to be responsible for the fifth bill—which will almost certainly share the fate of its predecessors. This is well known to the Government, but it is bound to do something to keep the Nonconformists quiet. The new measure is to be something short and sweet, dealing with single-school areas only, and virtually giving the Nonconformists control of the Church schools—and, indeed, all other schools—in such districts by establishing "Cowper Temple Teaching" and making Anglicans, Catholics, Jews, Freethinkers, and all other bodies, fight or finesse for any other kind of education they may prefer. Dr. Clifford is not ashamed to patronise this detestable swindle. And the Government is not ashamed to patronise Dr. Clifford.

A correspondent advises us to test Dr. Clifford's shibboleth of "no tests for teachers" by getting an Atheist teacher to apply to give the Bible lesson and then to tell the children the plain truth. If the Nonconformists mean what they say they would let him go on without interference. Quite true. But we know they don't mean what they say, and that the teacher who tested their honesty would soon be out of employment. If he could afford it, or others could afford it for him, he might try the experiment. Not otherwise.

How stupidly people will talk when religious ideas dominate their thinking! Here is Mr. Lloyd George assuring a Glasgow audience that "one deep, underlying principle" of all sound land laws is that "the land in all countries was created by Providence for the benefit of all those who dwell therein." Providence means one thing, but the Dukes determine another! What a Providence! What a Chancellor! How presumptuous to think that, if the Dukes can get the better of God Almighty, they can't get over the Liberal Government! Really what Mr. George is saying is, "It was all very well while these great landowners only had God Almighty to bother about. Then they did as they liked. But now they have me; and God plus Lloyd George is a combination they will not so easily get over." And it is these men who complain of Freethinkers treating God disrespectfully!

Over a hundred years ago the French people found that the aristocracy had also overcome Providence, as Mr. Lloyd George says that our own aristocracy has done. So they put Providence on one side, rightly deciding that that kind of Providence was not worth bothering about. And they settled the land question in the name of Man. We are still lagging behind, troubling our silly heads about the designs of Providence. As though the Dukes are not as much part of those designs as Mr. Lloyd George.

"Many a Christian minister," says Dean Inge, "found in politics a welcome refuge from preaching dogmas in which they no longer actively believed, and which bored their congregations." This is only a polite way of saying that Christian preachers are being paid for preaching what they don't believe, and that some of them evade this by preaching what they are not paid for. And Dean Inge, being one of the trade, ought to know. Of course, everyone knows this to be the case; but is there any other profession save that of the ministry about which such a confession would be made? People in other professions may be equally dishonest, but they do not openly admit it. The striking thing is that the dishonesty of the clergy in this direction is accepted as something that is part of the established order.

Dean Inge added that "a man must be either a saint or a humbug to preach the gospel in its pure unalloyed form." "Either a fool or a liar" is the plain English of this sentence.

We wonder under which class of parsons Dean Inge himself comes when he says that the groan of horror that went up over the loss of the Titanic, and the question how one could reconcile that with the belief in a good God, carried humanitarianism "to an unmanly absurdity. Christianity was, after all, an austere creed. It taught them to be ready to suffer, and was not always reluctant even to inflict pain for a higher good." Well, will Dean Inge tell us what "higher good" was achieved by the loss of the Titanic? Does he really believe it did good? If so, why not arrange for a few more ships to be wrecked in the same way? As a matter of fact, no one believes the loss of the Titanic was a good thing. Dean Inge himself does not believe it. And such unadulterated nonsense could find a place nowhere but in the pulpit.

Truthful James once asked the question, "Is Our Civilisation a Failure?" and Dean Inge, the gloomy follower of the Man of Sorrows, laments that laymen think for themselves instead of obeying their pastors without question, and that the pulpit is invaded. Worse remains, for all this means fewer threepenny-bits in the collection plates.

New York Spiritualists are claiming to have received messages from the late Mr. W. T. Stead. It refers to the "beautiful and touching tribute to his memory paid by those who strewed flowers on the waters of the Atlantic at the spot where the Titanic went down." We should hardly have thought that so trivial a thing would be occupying Mr. Stead's attention; and the flowers squandered on the Atlantic might have been more sensibly and humanely bestowed upon hospitals or other public institutions, where a gleam of beauty may lighten even the load of pain. Besides, messages of this kind are easily made up on the present side of "the great Beyond." Mr. Stead's ghost should communicate something more original. But this is the worst feature of all the messages in the world from "the bourne from whence no traveller returns." They reveal nothing—they inform us of nothing we did not know before—they give us no real tidings of the alleged future life. They leave unbroken the silence and the darkness of the tomb.

Not one of the occult people has been able to throw a ray of light upon the recent murder mysteries. They and their supposed instructors in the spirit world are just as ignorant and helpless as other people. Yet it ought not to be so. If the late Mr. Stead can see flower-strewing on the Atlantic, some other spirit could see the murder of the little boy Starchfield in a railway train. But the police get no help from that quarter. They have to rely upon their own researches. And if they fail a murderer is allowed to walk about freely in human society.

It cannot be too often mentioned that the late Mr. Henry Labouchere kept a £1,000 Bank of England note locked up in a safe for many years, and publicly offered to give it to any Spiritualist, Theosophist, or other "occult" person who could discover its identity. None of them could read it. None of them had a "spirit" friend who could supply the requisite information. "Labby" knew his note was safe.

A lady, seeing a portrait of the Bishop of London in full episcopal rig-out in a shop window, said, "How original." Her husband, who was with her, rejoined, "You mean aboriginal."

We have the Bishop of London's word for it that 243 churches have been consecrated in his diocese during the last fifty years. We beg to remind his lordship that there has been a great increase in lunatic asylum accommodation during the same period.

The Bishop of London appears to be about to imitate St. Simon Stylites. Speaking at a Temperance Demonstration at the Queen's Hall, he said he "was not going to sit down with a £161,000,000 drink bill and a public-house at the corner of nearly every street." He may resume his seat almost immediately by advising churchpeople to discontinue the use of "Communion Port" at one and-three a bottle. Something at about ninepence would enable believers to take up their crosses and follow their Savior.

At a recent concert in a provincial town the program included "Star of Eve" and "Adam's 'Comrades' Song of Hope.'" The latter should have been written as a duet, unless the talking snake volunteered to make it a trio.

Lecturing at Forest Hill, a returned Congo missionary told the audience how to be a witch-doctor, assuring them that a man must be cunning, unscrupulous, and have a knowledge of human nature. He need not have troubled about the recipe, for we are plagued with 50,000 of the creatures in England.

An ex-South African missionary writes in the Christian Commonwealth apropos of the Kikuyu controversy:—

> "Next to the importation of 'Christian' vices and immorality, and 'Christian' ardent liquor, the worst evil that Christianity has imported is its 'sectarianism.' Tribal jealousy and rivalry were innocent enough in days when the different Bantu racial sub-divisions clubbed each other in dispute of the possession of the earth, compared with the rivalry that sectarian Christianity has brought into the hearts of the black people of Africa."

This missionary, Mr. H. E. Sampson, describes at length the quarrels, the ill-feeling, and the exclusiveness of rival "kraals," the denizens of which have been converted by missionaries of different sects. One thing appears plain. In general good fellowship the natives can give the proselytising Christians "points."

Rev. Professor D. S. Cairns is delivering a course of lectures at Aberdeen on "The Reasonableness of Christian Faith." Their value may be gauged by his laying great emphasis on the fact that "Science has once and for all established that religion was practically a universal thing." This is what one may call an example of the pulpit art of telling the truth while suggesting its opposite. Of course, science has shown religion to be universal. But it is not the universality but the truth of religion that is denied. And Professor Cairns carefully abstained from telling his hearers that while science had shown religion to be universal, it had also shown that it was based on pure delusion, and that, with the removal of the delusion, the basis of religion crumbles. Universality proves nothing—except universality. Lying is universal, so is theft, so are various diseases. These things have always been, they are still, and will remain for a long time yet. All we can hope to do is to diminish their range. And this is really what the world is doing all the time in the case of religion.

We are surprised it doesn't strike thoughtful religionists that the universality of religion is a much stronger argument for its falsity than for its truth. God and the soul, heaven and hell, ghosts and goblins, are not things that man discovers as he increases in knowledge. He finds them while he is steeped in ignorance. He does not doubt them while he is ignorant; doubts only begin as he acquires solid knowledge. The savage who blunders everywhere else, is assumed to be on the right track here. He could not understand his body, but he knew all about his "soul." He could not understand this world, but he knew all about the next. Now, if the savage were ignorant of religion, and the civilised man discovered it, or invented it, a much stronger argument could be made out on its behalf. Religion is only universal because the majority of the world's inhabitants are still uncivilised or only partly civilised. And it is least universal—if the expression be permissible—where learning and civilisation are greatest.

Mr. Bob Sievier says that "The Disestablishment of the Welsh Church is a sin." We may take his word for it. He is considered to be something of an authority on that subject.

What a dear little word is "more" in uncertain accents from the lips of baby when she (by preference she) appreciates something you have given her. Poor Oliver Twist was not allowed to ask for "more" of anything he liked, and that was one of the worst signs of the child's misery. But it mustn't be supposed that Mr. Bumble and his fraternity are dead even yet. A film of scenes from Oliver Twist has been prohibited by the Censor. The gentleman is afraid that Charles Dickens would corrupt the good people of Munich and give any amount of trouble to the authorities—not to mention the clergy.

Tit-Bits—of all papers!—has been collecting opinions as to whether picture palaces should open on Sunday or not. Father Vaughan replies, "Why not?" He adds that no place of amusement should open on Sunday morning, that "ought to be left sacred for Church services." Quite a charming reservation in favor of a special trade interest. Besides, to do the Catholic Church justice, it has always favored a more "human" Sunday than the other Churches. Sir John Kirk, representing the other Churches, thinks they ought to be closed, because of their "probable influence upon the morals of the country." As though they could exert a worse influence than Church and Chapel. Mr. William Le Queux, Mr. John Hassal, and the Manager of Pear's Soap, also favor their opening. So does Sir Joseph Lyons, although, as he happens to be a Jew, we do not see what status he has in the matter. It is a funny world! A Jewish Lord Chief Justice had to decide recently a religious dispute between two sections of the Christian Church, and might even be called upon to sentence a Freethinker for ridiculing the Christian religion; and another Jew is asked his opinion about the Christian Sabbath. Oh for a sense of humor among the people! Most of our troubles would soon be at an end.

Meanwhile, we are surprised that some journal does not collect the opinions of the proprietors of picture shows as to the opening of Churches on Sunday evenings. We feel certain they must keep a lot of people away from the cinemas. And we are also convinced that a very strong case could be made out for presentation to the Home Secretary.

The Chosen People have for a good many years been deserting the old world for the new. There are said to be nearly a million Jews in New York. It is calculated that 40,000 mourners walked in the funeral procession behind the corpse of a Jewish comedian named Mogulesco the other day. A choir of 1,000 voices sang funeral dirges. Evidently the conversion of the Jews to Christianity is too tough a job for the present machinery and its operators. Jesus will have to pay them another visit, and even that won't be of much use unless it is a great deal more successful than the first appears to have been.

Fashionable Paris is running after Bergson. Ladies faint in the panting crowd. One knows what the end of this must be. And it is never very long between "Hosanna!" and "Crucify Him!"

It appears that the latest heresy of the Rev. Dr. Aked—first of Liverpool, then of New York, and now of San Francisco—has aroused the ire of the Presbyterian Association, which has intimated that his resignation would be acceptable. What will he do next? He might leave the pulpit altogether if he took Freethought in less homœopathic doses.

The Dean and Chapter of Canterbury have sanctioned the holding of a musical performance in the Cathedral with a charge for seats. The Free and Open Church Association calls it a "desecration" of the holy edifice "thus to convert it into a music hall." But suppose it gets used by-and-bye for a cinema show? It may. You never can tell.

Mackirdy's Weekly, a new periodical, has exalted aims, among which is to preach "that God is just, and to show that Christianity is good to work on, good to rest on." The first proposition is, we fear, beyond the powers of a lady journalist, and our dear friends, the clergy, have shown their flocks how to rest on the Gospel very comfortably.

February 1 was a "go-to-church Sunday" in the United States. Invitations to attend were accompanied by milk-bottles, bread, and other gifts of eatables, and the result was the Brooklyn worshipers rose from 300,000 to 500,000 and the Chicago worshipers from 500,000 to 1,500,000. America seems to beat India in the matter of "rice Christians."

According to the Berlin correspondent of the Christian World, Otto Boruska, a Protestant watchmaker in Austria, was recently sentenced to a week's imprisonment for not falling on his knees at the passing of the "host," carried by a priest through the streets. The sentence was appealed against, and the heretic won his case, because the Court of Appeal considered that he had done nothing which was offensive. The revival of persecution is not confined to England.

According to orthodox apologists, civilisation is itself owing to the prevalence of the Christian religion. What do they make of the fact that during the few years of its existence the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has dealt with two and a-half millions of cases of cruelty against little ones, very many of whom were under two years of age? The putting in force of the Blasphemy Laws by the authorities is a clear proof that the Government is a religious one.

It is stated that Canon Fleming's sermon, Recognition in Eternity, has realised £1,760 since its publication in 1892. The clergy, who have made millions out of the Sermon on the Mount, will not think much of the canon's little explosion.

Although some of the daily papers have discreetly avoided mentioning the fact, the trouble in the Herefordshire schools has arisen in Church schools, where the staffs are as wretchedly underpaid as organists, bellringers, choirboys, and pew-openers. Strikes have caused the closing of over sixty schools, but in a few cases the dear clergy have attempted the rôle of strike-breakers with the assistance of lady friends, whose only qualification seems to be that they are "over fifteen and vaccinated."

A woman fortune-teller has been sentenced at Guernsey to eight days' imprisonment for witchcraft. What with blasphemy prosecutions in England and a recrudescence of trials for witchcraft, "God's Englishman" seems to be slipping back to "chaos and old night."

The Daily Mail recently devoted a column to Voltaire, and wound up by declaring "that he was the greatest master of irony the world has ever known." Exactly! And he wouldn't have thought much of the scrap-irony of Carmelite House.

Reviewing the newly-found notebook of Voltaire's, published by the English Review, the Daily Mail says that "there are also touches of the boyish blasphemy which justified the hatred that all believers cherished for the philosopher." Voltaire lived to be over eighty years of age, and he was profane most of the time, and we believe that Christians liked the profanities of the master less than the efforts of his 'prentice days.

Some of the passages from Voltaire's private notebook are strong enough; the following, for instance, which embodies an old story about a tough piece of the "body of Christ" in the holy communion—and which it must have taken a good deal of courage to print in the English Review:—

> "There was a parson in France, who for to saunter away the time was playing one day in the morning at piquet, with his own whore. In the meantime, some good countrymen, and great many devotious women were at loss round about the altar, in order to communicate, and waiting upon their kneels for their parson. The clerc of the church comes in a great hurry to his master. Make haste, says he, good sire, come to administer god to your people. The parson rises on a sudden, leaves off his game, kiss his whore, takes up his wafers box, but by mistake, he puts in some counters of ivory of the same figure wherewith he plaid, and he runs to the altar as he was distributing god in wafers to the people. He gives to one old woman an ivory counter instead of a wafer. This old jade, after having received her portion of god, sneaks into a secret part of the church to pray and collect herself; she wonders at first she can't swallow up the host. She endeavours to chaw it, but in vain, at last she goes to the priest in the vestry: Good sir, sais she, I believe you gave me god the father, so he is tough and hard."

There are many variants of this pious old story, but they are all essentially similar. The unchewable wafer is, as the Dutch communicant said, "de ole man himselben."

Bedford brewers attempted a 'cute bargain and failed. They applied for a full licence for a house to be erected on a new estate, and they let it be known that if it were granted they would give a site for a church on the same estate. But the magistrates were not to be caught so easily. Perhaps they concluded that one church was a poor offset to one public-house.

Adversity makes strange bedfellows, and newspapers make strange companions. There were two headings and two portraits in contiguous columns of the Daily Chronicle on February 7. One heading was "Sack Murder Verdict"—the other was "Three New Bishops." One portrait was George Ball, the Liverpool murderer—the other was the Rev. Watts-Ditchfield, the new Bishop of Chelmsford. So singular are the methods of the "great Creator" that the murderer was the better looking of the two.

For the first time in the history of Winchester Prison, a confirmation service has been conducted by the Bishop of Winchester, eight candidates being presented. The Bishop of Rochester conducted a similar service at the Borstal convict establishment. It will be a pleasant distinction not to be a Christian presently.

Evan Roberts's poor old mother is dead at last. The operation she underwent a short while ago could not save her life. She wanted to see her boy before she died, but he would not see her. He had the impudence to tell her that her sin had separated her from him; her sin being no more than her inability to believe the spiritual claims he set up on his own behalf. The vain creature hugs himself still as God's favorite. And if the New Testament be true he is a thoroughly sound Christian. He realises the terrible text about hating one's father and mother for Christ's sake.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

March 1, Glasgow; 22, Manchester.

To Correspondents.

W. PALMER.—We have friends enough, if the deed were as good as the will, to be free from all financial worries.

J. D. JOHNSON.—Received. We are writing to you on the matter.

P. M. W.—Acknowledged as desired. Thanks for personal good wishes.

A. E. WILLIAMS.—See paragraph.

R. WALLIS.—May your good wishes be realised.

E. W. COOPER.—Your subscription is passed on to our publishing department. Glad to hear you "look forward eagerly" to the Freethinker every Thursday and "consider it an intellectual treat." We don't see what can be done in the lecturing line in South Wales at present. People care there for little else than party politics, prize-fighting, and football. Another revival might give Freethought another opportunity.

W. DAVIDSON.—It seems impossible for these Christian Evidence people to quote anything correctly.

E. B.—Much obliged for cuttings.

D. C. DRUMMOND.—Thanks for your warm good wishes.

"LEMINGTON."—It has been a difficult "tiller" to hold, but we have done our best, as Bradlaugh knew we would when he passed over to us the President's hammer.

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

F. S. L.—Mr. Foote's booklet Darwin on God, price 6d., contains what you want. Pleased to hear you like this journal so much that you wish it were published oftener.

JAMES NEATE.—With Mr. Quinton as M.C. you should have a good time on March 1.

R. OGILVIE.—We have read your encouraging letter with pleasure.

A. WELLS.—Your efforts to promote our circulation must surely have had some success; if not, they deserved it.

P. C. H.—Thanks for your pleasant message through Miss Vance.

W. H. MORRISH.—Glad to see your signature after "Your old chum." Good old comforting word used in our boyhood!

S. B.—Thanks for "best wishes and keen appreciation" of our work.

BRANDON T. BRIERLEY.—Acknowledgment may not be "necessary," but we prefer it when not forbidden—for many reasons. "No better literature than our Freethinker ever enters my doors" is good reading at this end.

J. BREESE.—No one gave us a hint that publicity was not desired. That would have prevented all the trouble. We are sorry that you think we meant to be personally offensive. You are one of the last men in Birmingham that we should have chosen to insult.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

The President's Honorarium Fund.

To the Freethinkers of Great Britain.

January, 1914.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—

We renew our appeal on behalf of the above Fund, which is now so well known to the Freethought party that its object may be stated in a very few words. It is sought to relieve Mr. G. W. Foote—President of the National Secular Society, Chairman of the Secular Society (Ltd.), and Editor of the Freethinker—of his worst financial worries, so that he may be as free as possible to devote his time and energies to his work as the leader of the militant Freethought movement in this country. We suggested that £800 a year might be raised in this way and placed at his disposal. We are happy to say that the average has reached that amount.

A generous subscriber made up the deficit of some £20 in 1912, and another friend offered to make up any deficit in 1913. Happily but £8 odd was necessary. Perhaps it will become a fashion for the £800 to be made up fully in this manner.

Mr. Foote's income from other sources at present is more restricted than ever. He intends to explain this matter himself very shortly. In the meanwhile we have to assure the Freethought party that the time has not arrived when they might think of diminishing their subscriptions to this Fund.

With regard to the Freethinker, we are sorry to learn from Mr. Foote that it still yields him no salary. The business of the Pioneer Press (including the Freethinker) has turned the corner from loss to profit; but the latter is as yet scarcely worth a mention.

All subscriptions received have been acknowledged week by week in the Freethinker, and will continue to be acknowledged in that way.

Subscriptions for 1914 can be forwarded to either of the undersigned. Those who prefer to do so can send, as before, direct to Mr. Foote himself, at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Subscribers who do not wish their names to appear in print should state the form of acknowledgment they prefer.

We are aware that all subscribers cannot conveniently respond to this appeal at once, but we hope a great many will do so as early as possible.

Yours faithfully,

J. W. DE CAUX, J.P.,
92 St. Peter's-road, Gt. Yarmouth.

R. T. NICHOLS, M.D.,

Sugar Plums.

A military officer, writing to us from India, says that "Freethought could be advanced much more rapidly if there were a few rich Freethinkers among us who would give money when it was urgently needed." Of this journal he says: "The Freethinker interests me more than any other paper. If you will allow me, I wish to say that I think it improves from month to month. Writers appear to me to be bolder, and more pronounced, in their statements." A personal passage is very welcome. "I might mention," our correspondent adds, "how sorry we were to hear of your being ill last year. Every week we followed the accounts of your health in the Freethinker, but thought it better not to worry you with any letter. We are glad to know you are nearly restored to good health." May we observe that letters at such a time are not a worry. It is good to find that many readers are friends.

Mr. W. Heaford lectures this evening (Feb. 15) at the Secular Hall, Humberstone-Gate, Leicester, on "War, Religion, and Rationalism." The subject should prove attractive and provoke discussion.

Our attention is called to the fact that Mr. Cluer, whom we referred to as an esteemed London magistrate, gave up his work at the Police-Court some time ago and became a County Court Judge. "Curiously enough," our correspondent adds, "one of the Courts over which he presides is Shoreditch County Court, which is also situated in Old-street."

The Bethnal Green Branch holds a social party on Sunday evening (March 1) at the King's Assembly Rooms, Cottage-grove, Mile-end-road. Tea on tables at 5.45. Concert and Dance at 7. Tickets for both 1s.—for latter only 6d.—can be had of Mr. James Neate, 375 Bethnal-Green-road. Profits go to the Branch fund for further work.

Lady lecturers are all too few on the Freethought platform. There are reasons for this, which we do not enter into at present, but they are entirely honorable to the ladies who do venture to speak publicly for our cause. Miss Kough lectures for the West Ham Branch this evening (Feb. 15) at the Workman's Hall, Romford-road, Stratford. "Christianity—a Relic" is a challenging title. We hope to hear of a full house.

It must have been my bad illness in the spring of last year. Somehow or other it fastened itself in my memory that my old friend, Mr. H. Side, was not present at last year's Dinner on account of the weather. I find I was mistaken. There is a paragraph of mine in the "Sugar Plums" of the Freethinker for January 26, 1913, referring to the pleasure I had of seeing him at the Dinner. I repeat that it must have been that bad illness that muddled my memory, which has always been a pretty good one, but, of course, far from infallible. Friend Side will accept my apology for representing him as absent even once from the great festive function of our Freethought year.—G. W. F.

I am writing on this matter at my office on Thursday afternoon, February 5; I am ahead of the corrections that I daresay will pour in upon me from many sources. I am chuckling at being in front of them for once. Correcting your own mistake is a luxury in the world of journalism. You generally get put upon a pin, like an entomological specimen, by somebody else.—G. W. F.

Goethe.—IV.

ON his return from Italy, Goethe resolved to dedicate his life to science and literature. He resigned most of his public offices, but he retained his position as State Minister, and continued to direct the working of the Ilmenau mines.

Goethe was fully determined upon the maintenance of his friendship with Charlotte von Stein, but her old warmth had died down. And now an event occurred which gave the death-blow to their former relations. In 1788 the poet was strolling through the Park at Weimar when a young and pleasing woman presented to him a petition on behalf of her brother. The poet was more interested in the girl than in her message, and she entered his house as his true and faithful wife. No priest blessed their union; society was scandalised at Goethe's conduct in treating as a wife a woman so much below him in the social scale. He loved her dearly; the Duke stood as godfather to their son, and Goethe's mother received his chosen companion as her "dear daughter." For a time Goethe and his spouse—Christiane Vulpius—kept their union to themselves, but the secret soon leaked out. When she heard the story, the Frau von Stein was incensed beyond measure, and never forgave Goethe for his shameful conduct. Goethe meanwhile was happy with his Christiane, and they remained unmarried until 1806, when they received the perfunctory blessings of the Church.

Whatever may be thought of the poet's domestic arrangements, the period that succeeded his union with Christiane Vulpius was rich in literary production. The Roman Elegies rank among the supreme poems of the world's literature. Although they may be "Italian and pagan in form, in color, in sensuality," and would certainly have been placed on Mr. Podsnap's black list, as works of art they are above and beyond date.

Goethe now turned his attention to Tasso, and evolved from his prose fragment a stately masterpiece of poetic art. In the language of a discerning critic—

> "In Tasso Goethe reached a simplicity and limpidity of form which makes the words disappear behind the ideas they convey, and transforms the metrical movement of the language into a melody of the thoughts; and thus he succeeded in representing the most refined and delicate movements of the human soul with perfect clearness and great dramatical impressiveness."

One's interest in the story increases as the poem proceeds, and one is dimly conscious that the scene of action is that of picturesque southern beauty.

The tragedy of Egmont was now given to the world in its finished form. Despite much adverse criticism, this drama, in the writer's opinion, is a magnificent triumph. The characters of Egmont and Clärchen are as Shakespearean as George Meredith's immortal Richmond Roy. It is probably the most popular of Goethe's dramas, and still occupies the German stage. Nor does it detract from its merits to admit that the music which Beethoven composed for it has added to its original attractiveness.

"The first and last thing demanded of genius," said Goethe, "is a love of truth"; and this noble saying dominates the poet's ever-present interest in the wonders of nature. Recoiling in disdain from the sophisticated arts of mere word-spinning and mist-creating metaphysicians, Goethe sought to solve the secrets of Nature through a study of her phenomena. Constitutionally a realist, he never forsook reality for ideality. "Everywhere in Goethe," wrote Horn, "you are on firm land or island; nowhere in the infinite sea." No understanding reader of his works can dispute the justice of this verdict. The real, the living, and the concrete stand out in firm outline; the vaporous and vague are invariably rejected with something akin to repugnance. Nor was he sympathetic with the mystic religiosity of his friends. He said of Lavater that "When a great man has a dark corner in him, it is terribly dark." He looked upon Jacobi's metaphysical kink as something the gods had thrust upon him as a set-off against the blessings of "house, riches, children, sister, friends." "God," smiled Goethe, "has punished you with metaphysics like a thorn in your flesh; me he has blessed with science that I may be happy in the contemplation of his works."

"The achievements of modern science," wrote G. H. Lewes,

> "and the masterpieces of art, prove that the grandest generalisations and the most elevated types can only be reached by the realistic method; and that what is called the 'ideal school,' so far from having the superiority which it claims, is only more lofty in its pretensions; the realist, with more modest pretensions, achieves loftier results."

The foregoing passage is one that Goethe would have enthusiastically endorsed; Nature to him was objective and real, not subjective and ideal. From this materialistic standpoint the poet put his questions to Nature, and the excellence of his method is demonstrated by the richness of his discoveries. With Spinoza, he regarded the Universe as the sum-total of existence, and within that Universe he placed all that was, or is, or is to be. Nature is neither kernel nor shell, but is all-in-all at once. Her varying garments bear no traces of manufacture, but everywhere present the evidences of growth. Over the mind of Goethe the idea of evolution exercised a constant sway, and the poet is to be numbered among the very greatest of the pre-Darwinian philosophers and scientists.

When quite a youth, Goethe's scientific bent manifested itself, and this interest in science never deserted him throughout his long life. His studies were very various, but it was in osteology that he made his first discovery. He had long been convinced of the oneness of human life, and he was deeply interested in the resemblance between the human skeleton and that of other vertebrate animals. Among anatomists it was the accepted view that the intermaxillary bone (mid-jawbone), which is present in the upper jaw of most animals, is absent in man. In the presumed absence of this bone, Camper erected man into an order entirely distinct from other living creatures. This distinction proved in the sequel to be very unfortunate; for so far as the mid-jawbone is wanting in man, it is equally absent in the chimpanzee.

While working in the laboratory at Jena in 1784, Goethe noticed what appeared to be the intermaxillary bone in a human jaw. After carrying out a series of careful comparisons, Goethe established the truth of his discovery beyond all doubt. He wrote an essay on the subject which is a model of clear exposition, and this was submitted to several contemporary men of science. It was not published to the world, however, until some thirty years later.

Of far-reaching consequence was this discovery, as it completely overthrew the cherished dogma of man's select superiority to lower animal existence. When acquainting Knebel with his discovery, Goethe wrote :—

> "Indeed, man is most intimately allied to animals. The co-ordination of the whole makes every creature to be that which it is, and man is as much man through the formation of his upper jaw as through the form and nature of the last joint in his little toe. And thus is every creature but a note of the great harmony, which must be studied in the whole, or else it is nothing but a dead letter."

Goethe was now led to the further view that all organisms of the same class are formed on a general plan which Nature adapts to meet the requirements of varying conditions of life. This conception constitutes an epoch in the evolution of scientific thought; for, by directing attention to the verity that organisms of the same class, no matter how widely their organs may appear to differ from one another, nevertheless display a fundamental agreement in structure, it prepared the path for the evolutionary revolution of the succeeding century.

Animated by the idea of organic development, Goethe had long pondered over the problem of the genesis and evolution of foliar structures in plants. In his celebrated essay, The Metamorphoses of Plants, Goethe enunciated the doctrine that the foliar organs of flowering plants are to be regarded as various modifications of the simple leaf. These were not the idle thoughts of an empty day, but were the outcome of prolonged and patient study. With certain reservations, this doctrine has long since been accepted, and now forms part of the philosophy of evolution. That Linnæus and Wolff to some degree anticipated Goethe's discovery in no way detracts from the poet's merits as a botanical reformer. In every department of human philosophy we discover that our new thoughts have thrilled dead bosoms. To Goethe the circumstance that his theory had commended itself to other minds was additional evidence of its truth.

When Goethe had penned his treatise on Plants, he found that contemporary botanists regarded the excursion of a celebrated poet into the realms of science with as much astonishment and amusement as the wise men of Weimar when it was suggested that a man of letters could fulfil the functions of a successful statesman.

> "Had an obscure professor published this work, its novelty would have sufficed to render it unacceptable; but the obscurest name in Germany would have had a prestige greater than the name of the great poet. All novelty is primâ facie suspicious; none but the young welcome it; for is not every new discovery a kind of slur on the sagacity of those who overlooked it? And can novelty in science, promulgated by a poet, be worth the trouble of refutation? The professional authorities decided that it could not. The publisher of Goethe's works, having consulted a botanist, declined to undertake the printing of The Metamorphoses of Plants. The work was only printed at last because an enterprising bookseller hoped thereby to gain the publication of his other works. When it appeared, the public saw in it a pretty piece of fancy, nothing more. Botanists shrugged their shoulders, and regretted that the author had not reserved his imagination for his poems. No one believed in the theory, not even his attached friends. He had to wait many years before seeing it generally accepted, and it was then only accepted because great botanists had made it acceptable."*

In the light of the foregoing facts, the spiteful charge of brazen plagiarism which was brought against Goethe becomes as false as it is absurd.

While on his second visit to Italy in 1790, his stay in Venice was made memorable by yet another scientific discovery. He was walking with his servant Seidel in the Jews' cemetery, when the attendant took up a sheep's skull, and, handing it to his master, remarked that it was the cranium of a Jew. While steadily regarding it, the idea suddenly flashed across Goethe's mind that the bones which form the skull are of the same nature as vertebræ, and are in fact vertebræ transformed to meet a special need. Although this theory, in common with Oken's and Owen's speculations concerning the origin of the skull, is hardly to be accepted in the form advanced, it nevertheless occupies a high place in evolutionary science.

Goethe's physical inquiries were not so successful, and he appears to have lost his habitual self-command in his unfortunate attempt to overthrow Newton's theory of colors. Nevertheless, Goethe's Farbenlehre (Color Teaching) is a remarkably well-written and closely reasoned work, and contains much valuable matter relating to light and color which science even now has not completely explained.

No account of Goethe's career would be complete without some reference, however brief, to his friendship with Schiller. When first they met, each poet regarded the other with marked reserve. Goethe looked upon Schiller as a writer whose talents were exercised on behalf of the storm and stress school, whose ideals the greater poet had long outgrown. Schiller, on his part, derived the impression that he and Goethe were so dissimilar in nature that any genuine friendship between them was impossible. Still, Goethe was constantly on his mind, and he could not resist the temptation of enviously comparing Goethe's easy circumstances with his own abject poverty. The intimacy of the two poets began when Goethe secured Schiller his professorship at Jena, and remained unbroken until the author of Wallenstein's early death in 1805. Goethe's Freethought was part of his very being; Schiller's youthful piety slowly disappeared, until he was almost as completely emancipated as his greater contemporary. The realism of Goethe, combined with his incomparably higher genius, presented a striking contrast to the imaginative idealism of Schiller. They acted and reacted on each other; they took the greatest delight in each other's achievements; neither manifested the slightest jealousy, and Schiller spurred on Goethe to the triumphant completion of works which threatened to remain mere fragments.

ATTEND, my children! We have here a book entitled Life After Death; or, Reason and Revelation on the Immortality of the Soul. It is a popular treatise by the Right Rev. Monsignor John S. Vaughan, and we now take a second breath. In the author's introduction to this, the twelfth edition, he embarks on a joyous excursion in the barren fields of rhetoric; and, aided by the use of many capitals, he prepares us for a feast of divine consolation. "For Death [capital, please], to a faithful soul, is not the terrible ordeal that some imagine." Lest the reader may think that we are quoting from Ingersoll, we would remind them that the author is a good Catholic. Has it not been, in the past, the Christian cry that the last hour is the worst? Are not the most beautiful aphorisms on this phase of life gathered from the sayings of those partly or wholly unchristian in their attitude to life? Yet we have here a distinguished member of the Catholic Church stealing our arguments. Not content, however, with this exhibition of theft native to a religion which can boast of body-snatching, the author proceeds to say that "on the contrary, the death of the just is 'precious in God's sight,' and something to be looked forward to with longing, and even with a holy impatience." Remembering the ripe old age to which some divines live, it leads us to think that the good die young; at least, our opinion is somewhat strengthened after reading about the just and their impatience to die. But there are better things to come in this Arabian Nights' entertainment.

"Do not added years," the author asks, "often mean only added guilt and added responsibilities? If we are not now prepared, shall we be more ready, and better fitted, and less imperfect, in ten or twenty years' time? Such results cannot be guaranteed." We like the finish to this remarkable view of life; it reminds us of the jargon of shopkeepers about cheap articles. The only logical conclusion to arrive at is, that Christians should commit suicide with all speed and leave the world to those simple people who are content with one life at a time. With a fine peroration, the preface concludes with capitals well sprinkled, with the usual fustian about Death, Divine Summons, Angels, Saints, and a wish that "we, dear readers, one day, may meet in mutual charity." This traffic in death is almost too mean for words. The high priests of theology have worked this theme in a terrible manner; and now, when that fails, they turn and use the arguments the other way. We are inclined to believe in immortality, that is, immortality of the black brood of mankind that cajoles and threatens, that persecutes when powerful, and wheedles and insinuates when weak. When Rome rules the world, life after death will go begging.

Here we pick a plum. "As long as the Catholic Church is the guardian of Faith, so long must she continue to be the defender of Reason." We should be glad, as Freethinkers, to know when Rome began to defend Reason. Then we might examine her claim to the continuation of its defence. Did it commence after the Edict of Toleration? Did it start in the time of St. Augustine, who adopted that beautiful Christian attitude contained in the five words, "Compel them to come in"? Or was it really in full bloom in the year 1600, when Bruno was burned? We seek knowledge of the inception of this noble virtue in the history of a faith which in the present day is actively engaged in baiting Jews. Jew and Catholic ought to embrace if only through mutual reverence for their respective relatives who founded their religions, and Judas Iscariot ought to play no small part in the admiration of each.

We will not weary readers of this journal with further quotations. The author has advanced into new territory. We find that Byron, Shelley, Carlyle, and Buffon are all appropriated to fill out his book; we were rather surprised that the names of Rabelais, Balzac, and Voltaire were not included. It is significant that what these religious creatures cannot kill they annex; and who knows but that the name of our editor may not in the dim future back up some such similar work? Catholic impudence is always on the grand scale, and their industrious mischief on this earth only renders the idea of everlasting life revolting to those who are not swayed by sentiment and religious fear. For our part, we deny the cant that certain men are on speaking terms with a God who strives to hide himself from his children. We deny this sentimental rubbish about heaven colored to suit each individual's taste, and substantiate our denial by saying that priests have added terror to man's life to such an extent that he is in this respect worse than animals, and that the healing balm of heaven cannot compensate for a life lived in the shadow of religion from the cradle to the grave. Furthermore, heaven has no attraction for us; we should not be happy there. The unspeakable villain who lit the fire to burn Bruno would be there, so also would the dastards who ordered Ferrer to be shot, so would —— But why particularise? The riffraff and scum of the earth would all be there, and it is possible that we should ask awkward questions about thumbscrews and other beautiful instruments of the Catholic faith. Besides, we should want to see Omar Khayyam, Lucretius, and Swinburne.

As a constructive delusion, this Christian heaven will not do. It falls short in many respects; it is flyblown with inconsistencies, and will not even satisfy children, who would want to romp and play and have tea-parties. Take it away, ye black-robed desecrators of the earth, ye spoilers of human happiness, ye ghouls of existence! Black are your coats, and adders are black. And black is the most repulsive color in nature; if we did not know you, our natural abhorence of black would warn us.

As we write there is a west wind blowing, and the sun is shining in a blue sky beautified by banks of white clouds, and there is the promise of spring in the air. There are a few golden tulips in bloom near to us, and we find that we have waded through this book untouched by any sentiment of fear or hope, or even depression. The forces of life are stronger than those of death, and we are tempted to speculate on the religious position if man was in a physical sense immortal. As Robert Buchanan says in The Book of Orm:

> "I heard a voice from out the hollow ether,
> Saying, 'The thing ye cursed has been abolished—
> Corruption, and decay, and dissolution!'"

There would be such a rumpus in the rabbit-holes of religion that the end of the world would be as child's play compared with it, and the earth would not be afflicted with such works as the one under consideration. To its author we would say, "Hail and farewell!" Make hay while the sun shines, for as sure as the night follows day the time will come when all men will laugh at your descriptions of a place called heaven, and only believe you when you have been there and returned along with reliable witnesses.

WILLIAM REPTON.

Laws Against Religious Liberty.—II.

SIR JAMES STEPHEN, in his Digest of the Criminal Law, among alternative definitions of Blasphemy, gave the following: "A denial of the truth of Christianity in general, or of the existence of God, whether the terms of such publication are decent or otherwise." The same high authority, in a later magazine article (Fortnightly Review, March, 1884) held that the crime of Blasphemy consists in the mere expression of heterodox opinions; that it is only an aggravation of the crime to express them in "offensive" language; that "a large part of the most serious and most important literature of the day is illegal"; and that every bookseller who sells, and everyone who lends to his friend, a copy of Comte's Positive Philosophy, or of Renan's Life of Jesus, commits a crime punishable with fine and imprisonment.

Sir James Stephen detested this Law of Blasphemy. He even went to the length of drafting a Bill for its total abolition. He said that he preferred "stating it in its natural naked deformity to explaining it away in such a manner as to prolong its existence and give it an air of plausibility and humanity."

This view of the law is borne out by the language of indictments for Blasphemy. In the abortive prosecution of Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, and the successful prosecution of Messrs. Foote, Ramsey, and Kemp (1883), it was alleged against them in their indictments that they wickedly and profanely attempted "to bring the Holy Scriptures and the Christian religion into disbelief and contempt," not only "against the peace of our lady the Queen," but also "to the great displeasure of Almighty God."

Lord Coleridge, however, in summing-up at the trial of Messrs. Foote and Ramsey in the Court of Queen's Bench, while admitting that the law of Blasphemy "is undoubtedly a disagreeable law," let humanity get the better of the legal tradition. Against the decision of all previous judges, he laid it down that "if the decencies of controversy are observed, even the fundamentals of religion may be attacked without a person being guilty of blasphemous libel."

"Such a law," said Sir James Stephen "would never work." You cannot really distinguish between substance and style; you must either forbid or permit all attacks on Christianity. Men cannot discuss doctrines like eternal punishment, for instance, as calmly as they do questions in philology. When they feel deeply they will express themselves strongly; and "to say that you may discuss the truth of religion, but that you may not hold up its doctrines to contempt, ridicule, or indignation, is either to take away with one hand what you concede with the other, or to confine the discussion to a small and, in many ways, uninfluential class of persons."

John Stuart Mill expressed the same truth in an article on "Religious Prosecutions," in the Westminster Review of July, 1824: "To declare that an act is legal, but with the proviso that it be performed in a gentle and decorous manner, is opening a wide door for arbitrary discretion on the one part and dissatisfaction on the other. The difficulty is greatly increased when the act itself is offensive to those who sit in judgment upon the manner of its performance."

Such a law is a downright absurdity. It means that twelve Christians are to be put into a jury-box to decide whether a Freethinker has attacked Christianity in a "becoming" manner. What is the Freethinker's liberty worth in such circumstances? Would Liberal writers like to be tried by their opponents for attacking Conservatism without a proper respect for the "decencies" of controversy?

"There is one reflection," said Sir James Stephen, "which seems to me to prove with conclusive force that the law upon this subject can be explained and justified only on what I regard as its true principle—the principle of persecution. It is that if the law were really impartial, and punished Blasphemy only because it offends the feelings of believers, it ought also to punish such preaching as offends the feelings of unbelievers."

Unbelievers do not ask to have their feelings "protected." They demand—and sooner or later it must be conceded—that religious questions shall be discussed as freely as political and social questions. What has truth to fear from the wildest storms of controversy? "Let Truth and Falsehood grapple; whoever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter?"

Freethinkers will never be satisfied until the odious Blasphemy Laws are swept out of existence. A beginning has already been made. The late Charles Bradlaugh introduced a Bill to abolish them, and, in the face of acrimonious bigotry, forty-seven members of the House of Commons voted for the measure.

* * * *

Sir James Stephen was right as a matter of logic. Bradlaugh and almost everybody else agreed with him. We took the same view in the Preface to our Prisoner for Blasphemy published in 1886. We joined in the opinion that Lord Coleridge had acted generously as a man but weakly as a judge. We lived to recognise, however, that he was wiser than all of us; wise with that practical wisdom which is so necessary in human affairs. He plainly said it was "a disagreeable law" he was called upon to administer; it was pretty clear that he would have abolished it if he could; but he made up his mind to rationalise and humanise it as far as possible, and in one sentence he revolutionised the Law of Blasphemy. This he did by separating the matter from manner. Henceforth it was perfectly legal to attack the fundamentals of religion; blasphemy consisted entirely in outraging the decencies of controversy in discussing it.

This was illogical, of course; one must adhere to that judgment still. But it was all that Lord Coleridge could do, and he did it. It was worth doing—well worth doing; and at this distant date we thank him with all our heart. He was a great man—and he was a good man—and he was a wise man.

Years passed before we quite understood what had happened. Bradlaugh never understood it at all,—the sole reason being that his mind was too full of other matters. Other people never understood it—partly because they were incapable of doing so, partly because they could not understand any man's discovering what Bradlaugh had missed—and partly, we are sorry to say, for less respectable reasons. Holyoake would not admit to the day of his death that we were right. Everybody was against us. We had to convert them one by one, and always by the logic of fact. Lord Coleridge's judgment was not a temporary break in the legal definition of Blasphemy; it was final—it was revolutionary—it inaugurated a new epoch.

The more we looked at the matter the more we felt convinced that no single judge, in any future trial for blasphemy, would go behind the deliberate and reasoned decision of the Lord Chief Justice of England sitting on the bench in his own court in London. Lawyers were against us on that point, right up to the Boulter case in 1908. But they were wrong, and we were right. Judge after judge has since quoted Lord Coleridge's judgment as the Common Law of Blasphemy. The Home Secretary, in his reply to the petition for Stewart's release, was careful to remark that he was not imprisoned for the advocacy of his opinions. And in the latest memorial to Mr. Asquith, with regard to the abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, it is admitted that this view of the law "has prevailed"—the confessors of this fact including some whose conversion is only very recent.

PRIESTCRAFT.

The fundamental cause of all evil in the world is ignorance, and its yoke-fellow is superstition. As priestcraft is the promulgator and perpetuator of both these malign elements in human life, the one question which mankind has to solve is the superseding of priestcraft by something better. I make the assertion, and I wish to give it all possible emphasis and solemnity at this time, that the law of evolution would absolutely banish priestcraft from the world if the minds of men could be informed and convinced even to the extent that they have been informed and convinced that the earth is a globe instead of a flat plane, and that the earth revolves around the sun instead of the sun around the earth.

The priestcrafts which affect and afflict our generation are the heirs and successors of all the priestcrafts that have ever been since the mind of man began to reason, and since man himself emerged from a condition closely resembling that of the anthropoid ape. Evolution does not say that man descended from a monkey—but that priestcraft has made a monkey of him for several thousand years.—J. A. McKnight, New York "Truthseeker."

VACUUM THEOLOGY.

A colored Baptist was exhorting; "Now bredden and sistern, come up to de altar and hab yo' sins washed away."

All came but one man.

"Why, brudder Jones, don' yo' want yo' sins washed away?"

"I done had my sins washed away."

"Yo' has? Where yo' had yo' sins washed away?"

"Ober at de Methodis' church."

"Ah! brudder Jones, yo' aint been washed away; yo' has jes' been dry cleaned."

This has been the fatal curse of man to cherish
Customs that his better life no more demands;
In the dust of generations dead we perish;
We are strangled in our race's swaddling bands.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that Religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 8 SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Great is the debt of humanity to whomsoever can free it from the accumulated burden of its past.

—ALLEN UPWARD.

"Spoof."

A WELL-KNOWN journalist wrote a play, which he called Magic. But the play lacked the kind of magic that draws the public and gladdens the heart of author and manager. So the journalist's friends on the press came to his rescue. They "wrote up" the play. They told the public that it should go, and a good number went, and the hearts of author and manager were gladdened accordingly. Then as the play was called Magic, and dealt in some way with miracles, a debate was arranged on the subject of miracles in the theatre itself. Speakers were selected who might be trusted to say nothing very startling; the terms of the discussion were drawn up so that they might be called to order if they ventured on anything so reprehensible; and they talked, and talked, without ever coming within reasonable distance of the question at issue. Lastly, a journal published a report of the proceedings—24 pages, which would ordinarily have been sold at a penny or twopence—at the price of sixpence. And some bought it because of the well-known names that took part in the discussion, while others purchased because, like the present writer—perhaps as an expiation for sins committed in a previous incarnation—they must read the nonsense talked by present day defenders of superstition. No doubt Magic has reaped the benefit of all this advertising.

Such seems to be the real inwardness of the discussion on "Do Miracles Happen?" held recently at the Little Theatre. The participants were Mr. G. K. Chesterton, Mr. Joseph McCabe, Mr. H. Belloc, Dr. Warschauer, Mr. J. A. Hobson, Mr. A. P. Sinnett, and Mr. Cecil Chesterton. Mr. Kenelm Foss occupied the chair, and he was evidently struck by the odd arrangements made. He pointed out the difficulty of debating the subject of "Do Miracles Happen?" without discussing whether they ever did happen. In a discussion that really meant business this could not be done. Still, it would have been possible, even within the ridiculous terms of the discussion, to have presented the Freethought case against the belief in the miraculous in such a way as to shatter the Christian claims. But even this was not done. The Christian speakers were away back in the Dark Ages, and those who represented the Freethought view never seemed to get nearer contemporary times than the eighteenth century. It was, from this point of view, a noteworthy discussion; it served to show how solemnly an absurdity can be carried to a conclusion.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton contributed the first speech to the discussion, and for a moment or two touched bottom by pointing out that when a miracle did happen you were brought face to face with the result of a personal God. But he soon wandered away on to the question of evidence for and against, in which he was promptly followed by Mr. McCabe, who also spent his time discussing evidence—as though that has, or ever had, much to do with the belief in miracles. Dr. Warschauer, whose besetting fault is a desire to be scientific with hopelessly unscientific beliefs, also laid it down that the question "resolves itself simply and solely into a question of evidence," and pointed out, although it has little connection with this topic, that "the quantity and quality of the evidence required to prove any event varies in inverse ratio to the probability of the event." Quite a good rule in its proper place, but quite inconclusive here. Anyway, the one point upon which all the disputants were agreed was exactly the point that had least to do with the question. Evidence did not establish the belief in miracles, and the absence of evidence did not disestablish them.

Let us be quite fair to the Supernaturalist. Mr. Chesterton practically accepted the definition of a miracle as given in the Oxford English Dictionary: "A marvellous event occurring within human experience which cannot have been brought about by human power or by the operation of any natural agency, and must therefore be ascribed to the special intervention of the Deity or some supernatural being." This is a quite good definition. It is what miracles have always meant to everyone who really believed in them. A miracle must be something marvellous, that is, it must be unusual, and it must not be even conceivably explainable in terms of the operation of natural forces. If it is admitted that it may be so explained, those who make the admission concede the point that ignorance and miracles are convertible terms. This criticism is not removed by its being urged that some being greater than man may so control natural forces as to produce a miracle. The distance between man and his assumed superior being may not be greater than that which divides Edison from a Hottentot, and what this superior being does man himself, given the knowledge, may one day do. A miracle must not act in accordance with natural laws, known or unknown, it must contravene them.

So far Mr. Chesterton was correct in saying that a miracle is difficult to prove (he added it was also difficult to discuss, which it is not), and the request of his critics—Christian and Rationalist—for evidence, or their complaints that miracles could not be reperformed for their benefit, shows that they had not grasped the real point at issue.* The reply of the believer in miracles to such criticism is obvious. He says, A miracle is by its nature a rare event; it is performed under special circumstances for a special purpose. Where, then, is the sense of asking that this miracle shall be reperformed in order to convince certain people that it has already occurred? To arrange for the performance of a miracle is an absurdity. For it to become common is to destroy both its character as a miracle and the justification for its existence. A miracle must carry its own evidence, or it is not a miracle at all. Discussion on those lines must end in a stalemate for the Supernaturalist.

Fundamentally, the question is one of the belief in a God of the kind described by Dr. Warschauer—personal, purposing, intelligent, causal, creative, and almighty. I do not know how this is done—he might just as well have added a square, circular, eternal, evanescent being—but once a man professes to believe this a suspension or a contravention of natural laws, or uniformities, becomes always a possibility. There is nothing in our thinking or in our philosophy of things to prevent our believing in them. The personal, purposing, intelligent, causal, creative, almighty monstrosity believed in should be capable of anything. And if he exists, I, for one, am quite willing to believe he is. The man who believes this is capable of believing anything.

* The exposure of spiritualistic mediums has really nothing to do with the question of miracles. Spiritualists do not claim to perform miracles, and their performances, even if genuine, are only wonderful, not miraculous. All the Spiritualists claim is the ability to demonstrate the operation of certain forces not at present recognised by science. And that is a question of evidence. But with miracles it has nothing to do.

In the next place, miracles, as I have already said, are not established by evidence nor disproved by evidence. Evidence of a kind there may be (the ink mark on the wall caused by Luther throwing an ink pot at the Devil is evidence to some that the Devil really appeared), but nothing really worthy of the name exists. What amount of evidence does a Christian missionary produce to make a number of savages believe in the miracles of the Bible? What amount of evidence did the early Christian missionaries produce to convert the various tribes within the Roman Empire? What evidence was offered to make people believe in witches flying through the air on broomsticks? And, on the other hand, how many people have disbelieved in miracles because they set themselves down to weigh the evidence in their favor and found it wanting? I never heard of any such case, and can't easily conceive its having happened. The man who begins to weigh evidence for and against the possibility of miracles has already begun to disbelieve in them.

Look at young children. What evidence do they require of the existence of fairies, or of Santa Claus? What evidence is ever produced to make them give up the belief in fairies? At one stage of life it is there, at another stage it has gone. Not reasoned out, not "evidenced" out, but simply outgrown. In infancy the child's conception of life is so inchoate that there is room for all kinds of fantastic beliefs. In more mature years certain things are automatically ruled out by the growth of a conception of things that leaves no room for what during childhood seemed perfectly reasonable.

This is quite on all-fours with the question of miracles. The question here is essentially one of psychology. It is determined by the character of the psychological medium in which one is born and in which one lives. Given an intellectual medium which is, scientifically, at its lowest, and the belief in miracle flourishes. At the other extreme, miracle languishes and decays. Tell a savage that you can raise a man from the dead, and he may—other things equal—believe. Tell that to an educated person in the twentieth century, and he calls you a liar or a fool. Tell a peasant in some parts of our own country that an old woman has bewitched somebody's cattle, and he merely marvels at the wickedness of people. Tell a city dweller the same story; he does not inquire what evidence there is—he simply marvels at some people's ignorance. We do not reject the story of Jesus turning water into wine merely because there is a lack of evidence in its support. Evidence has nothing to do with it. We reject it because, with our knowledge of the constituents of water and wine, we know it to be a sheer impossibility; and because, with our knowledge of psychological evolution, we know the conditions that generate such beliefs. People who accept miracles believe in them before they happen. They would not happen if they did not so believe. People who reject miracles do so because their whole conception of nature forbids even the possibility of their occurrence. That is the sum and substance of the matter.

Of course, people go on talking about miracles long after they have ceased to believe in them. But they do not trust them. They will not fit in with what they know to be true. And so they bemuse themselves with much talk about our still extensive ignorance of nature, about the operation of higher and undiscovered "laws," and a dozen other things that have little or nothing to do with the question. The whole ground for the rejection of miracles, and the impossibility of their occurrence, might have been pointed out in a five minutes' speech at the Little Theatre had the people there meant business. But the promoters of the discussion knew what they were about. They know the public; and that is the high water-mark of journalistic and dramatic wisdom.

C. COHEN.

God's Risks.

GOD is represented as being the maker and governor of a Universe the fortunes of which are so uncertain as to be a source of perpetual anxiety to him! He does not know what may happen next. The possibilities of the future terrify him while the events of the past fill his heart with unspeakable grief. To be a God is thus to be at the mercy of the products of his own omnipotence. We do not even pretend to make such a statement on the authority of our own personal knowledge; but we do make it on that of one of the best-known of God's professional spokesmen. The Rev. Thomas Yates, of Kensington, is reported to have said, a Sunday or two ago, that the Divine Being is always running tremendous risks. He waxed exceeding bold and exclaimed: "There is not one of us who is not one of God's colossal risks." The report proceeds thus:—

> "He did not believe that God could be defeated, and if the Church fails in this great hour, which is a decisive hour of the world, Christ would shape for himself a new home, make for himself a better Church, but there is a risk that the great opportunities opening before the Church will fail to be used."

Mr. Yates had already referred to the fact that he and his hearers "believed in human freedom, and that the human will has a very real share in the making of history." Now, if man is free it necessarily follows that he is capable of defeating God. The assumption is that there are two wills at work in the Universe, the Divine and the human, and there is no possible escape from the conclusion that the latter has proved itself to be considerably stronger than the former. The Church also, it appears, is in possession of the same perilous freedom, with the result that the Church is another of "God's colossal risks." The utter fallaciousness of this argument is clearly seen the moment we begin to examine it. The Church is spoken of as the creation of Christ, but since it has failed to win the world for its Maker, we must infer that it was somewhat badly made, and Mr. Yates assures us that Christ could make for himself a better one. We venture to affirm that the reverend gentleman ran some risk in giving that assurance, because if the existing Church is Christ's institution we have no evidence that he can frame for himself a more efficient one.

This is a point which we must press. Father Wright, S.J., speaking at an important meeting of the Catholics of Preston, lately, sorrowfully admitted that there are thousands in this country who lose the Faith every year. There was an article in the Month some years ago in which it was stated "that in England and Wales there were 188,000 Catholics under twenty-one years of age needing different degrees of care in the matter of their religion, of whom 97,000 were practically lost to the faith." Father Wright continued thus:—

> "A well-known London priest gave it as his opinion that nine-tenths of the boys educated in Catholic elementary schools absented themselves from Mass and the Sacraments when they left school. It was worth while to see what this really meant. Statistics showed that there were in attendance at Catholic elementary schools in England and Wales 358,000 children; of these they might take it that about ten per cent., i.e., 35,000, left the schools annually. According to the statement of the London priest, then, over 31,000 of these were lost to the faith."

The same general statement might be made in regard to the various Protestant Churches. In these also there is annually a very serious leakage, in spite of the amazing perfection of the machinery and the ideal fidelity to duty of the officials. This has been the case for many years; yet there is no indication that Christ is about to make for himself a new and better Church. He prefers to run the risk of seeing it universally discredited and discarded.

Another of God's great risks is the present missionary situation. In point of fact missions have always been most risky enterprises. Indeed they were never successful on any large scale except when the alternative to conversion was death by the sword. Mr. Yates's treatment of this subject is commendably frank. He implies that Mohammedanism might never have been heard of had there been a decent Christian missionary in the fifth century to tell the boy Mohammed what Christianity really is; but it does not seem to have occurred to him that, in a God-made and God-governed world, the rise of a false religion, like Mohammedanism, as a dangerous rival to the true one, would have been entirely impossible. We conclude, therefore, that the absence of that decent Christian missionary in the fifth century shows that God, if God there be, was quite as favorable to Mohammedanism as to Christianity. Surely, from a religious point of view, there can be no other rational explanation of the appearance of Mohammed, on the one hand, and of the non-appearance of the Christian missionary on the other. Mr. Yates suggests, further, that "there may be in some obscure village in China or in India one whose career will alter the whole current of history." Very likely; but there is nothing whatever to show that he need be a Christian missionary. On the contrary, if and when he comes the probability is that he will be Nature's prophet, preaching a higher system of morality in the sole name of science. Both East and West have had more than enough of supernatural religion, and are yearning for that intellectual and moral emancipation which will bring them close to Nature's heart.

The idea of a God of infinite power, wisdom, and love running colossal risks is altogether too funny. To run a risk is to incur hazard, to encounter harm or danger. When an author publishes a new book he runs the risk of injuring his reputation. A soldier on the field of battle incurs the risk of losing his life. According to Mr. Yates, the risks God runs are "colossal"; but to say that is to put the Deity on a level with ourselves. Most certainly a being of infinite power, wisdom, and love would of necessity be absolutely above all risks. And yet, on the assumption, however inconceivable, that such a being created the Universe, or superintended its gradual evolution, reason drives us to the conclusion that by so doing he both risked and lost his title to the attributes of infinite wisdom and love, which is equivalent to saying he never had them, or, in other words, that such a being never had anything to do with the creation, evolution, or government of what we call Nature. The God-idea, in its Christian form, and Nature heartlessly give each other the lie at every point.

In reality, it is the theologian, not God, who runs risks. A theologian is one who confidently theorises in the total absence of knowledge, and then offers his wild theories as revealed truth to be fervently and devoutly held by the credulous. The preacher is a man who undertakes to speak for a Deity who has never uttered a word for himself, or afforded the slightest token of his existence. Nothing in the world is easier than to be oracular as the spokesman of an imaginary being. But the messengers of the Cross are impertinent as well as dogmatic. What greater insult can be inflicted upon the Jews, for example, than to organise a society the one object of which is to convert them to Christianity? Those of them who are religiously inclined are quite satisfied with their own religion, and resent the attempt to induce them to substitute Christianity for it. After cruelly persecuting them for so many ages, scornfully denying them the common rights of citizenship, it is nothing short of a piece of gross impudence to send missionaries to them, thus still treating them as inferior people. Are they not, on the average, as well-educated, as intelligent, honest, honorable, and socially well-behaved as Christians, and have they no teachers of their own who are fully as competent for their work as the Christian clergy? Well, particularly as regards the Jews, and generally with reference to all other nations, the proselytising policy pursued by the Christian Church only exposes its own narrow-minded and selfish bigotry. A growing realisation of this truth is the only thing that accounts for the persistent decay of interest in home and foreign missions. Thousands of Christians even are beginning to see the utter absurdity of endeavoring to Christianise China, India, and Japan, with the result that they no longer contribute to missionary societies.

Even Mr. Yates, Christian minister though he be, is not blind to the fact that foreign missions are in a parlous condition. He trembles as he peers on the threshold of the future. The signs of the times are by no means encouraging. It is true that the history of civilisation might have been very different had Mohammedanism never appeared, and there are those who even think that civilisation might have been in a more advanced state to-day had Christianity never arisen; but what the attitude of the East is likely to be to Christianity is a problem that puzzles the Church a great deal just now. Mr. Yates is of opinion that "the present missionary situation presents the aspects of one of God's great risks." If there were a God we would feel profoundly sorry for him because of all he suffered at the hands of his vicegerents. As we believe neither in him nor his colossal risks, we avail ourselves of the present opportunity to remark that the risks run by his champions are so colossal as eventually to inflict upon them fatal injuries. Escape is impossible. Such is the rush of modern knowledge that all supernatural claims are doomed to extinction. At last their days are numbered. At last the fruit of the tree of knowledge, so long sternly withheld, is being freely offered to all who have an appetite for it. The forbidding cherubim and the flame of a sword which turned every way have vanished, in consequence of which the life-imparting and life-nourishing tree is easily accessible to all. And they who enter and partake and grow strong RUN NO RISKS.

J. T. LLOYD.

Science and the Soul.—IV.

"Physiology declares itself decidedly and categorically against individual immortality, as against all theories in general which include the special existence of a soul. The soul does not enter into the fœtus, as the evil spirit does into the possessed, but it is produced by the development of the brain, just the same as muscular activity is produced by the development of the muscles, or secretion is produced by a development of the glands."—CARL VOGT, cited in Buchner's Force and Matter, p. 402.

"Instead of mind being, as assumed, a wondrous spiritual entity, the independent source of all power and self-sufficient cause of all causes, an honest observation proves incontestably that it is the most dependent of all the natural forces. It is the highest development of force, and to its existence all the lower natural forces are indispensably requisite."—DR. MAUDSLEY, The Physiology of Mind, p. 125.

"Unless arterial blood circulate in the brain, mental activity ceases. Not only is the blood needful for repairing the waste of tissue which follows cerebral activity, but arterial blood seems to be a necessary factor along with the nervous tissue in all manifestations of cerebral activity. The blood stands to the brain action as the acid does to the zinc and copper plates in a galvanic pile."—DR. W. IRELAND, The Blot upon the Brain, 321.

IF the thinking faculties are due to some unseen, immortal, spiritual being secreted in the brain, what becomes of this mysterious ruler when a person falls into unconsciousness?

M. Richerand, a French physician, had a female patient, who, in consequence of disease, had lost part of the bone of the skull, leaving the brain exposed. One day, while washing this part, M. Richerand—

> "chanced to press with more than usual force; and instantly the patient, who the moment before had answered his questions with perfect correctness, stopped short in the middle of a sentence, and became altogether insensible. As the pressure gave her no pain, it was repeated thrice, and always with the same result. She uniformly recovered her faculties the moment the pressure was taken off."*

Combe also cites another case, as follows:—

> "Professor Chapman, of Philadelphia, mentions in his Lectures that he saw an individual with his skull perforated, and the brain exposed, who used to submit himself to the same experiment of pressure as that performed on Richerand's patient, and who was exhibited by the late Professor Wistar to his class. The man's intellect and emotional faculties disappeared when pressure was applied to the brain: they were literally 'held under the thumb,' and could be restored at pleasure to their full activity."†

A still more remarkable case, as Combe rightly remarks, is that of a sailor named Jones, recorded by the famous surgeon, Sir Astley Cooper. This man was rendered unconscious by a wound in the head, while on board a vessel in the Mediterranean. He remained unconscious at Gibraltar for several months, and was subsequently removed to St. Thomas's Hospital, London, where, says Combe,—

> "Mr. Cline, the surgeon, found a portion of the skull depressed, trepanned him, and removed the depressed part of the bone. Three hours after this operation he sat up in bed, sensation and volition returned, and in four days he was able to get up and converse. The last circumstance he remembered was the capture of a prize in the Mediterranean thirteen months before."‡

What was this man's soul, or spirit, doing during those thirteen months? Did it go on a journey, and arrive back just in time to take possession of the body again directly the surgeon lifted the piece of bone from the skull?

Not a thought was evolved in this man's mind since he received his wound; for he took up the thread of his life just where it became a blank, thirteen months before. Is not this a proof that mind is a product of the brain, and that when the brain is thrown out of gear, intelligence ceases until the brain is restored to its natural functions? To expect the mind to survive the existence of the brain is as reasonable as to expect an electric battery to continue to generate electricity after its destruction.

How much mind is there in a child during the first few days of its existence? None at all: it has only the rudiments of one or two of its five senses; it has not so much mind as a dog. The mind commences to evolve and passes through successive phases of development; it follows by slow degrees the successive progress of the evolution of the nervous apparatus which are its basis. The average weight of the brain of man, among Europeans, is 49 oz. If the brain of a grown person, says Gratiolet, falls below 31 oz. the mind fails to develop; it is impossible for him to attain to ordinary human intelligence—in other words, he will become an idiot. Carl Vogt puts it somewhat higher. The result of investigations, he says,—

> "enables us definitely to assert that a certain weight of brain is requisite for the manifestation of intellectual faculties; that idiocy and mental weakness begin below this weight, and that this weight, as regards the white race, or central European nations, is about a kilogramme for the male, and about 900 grammes for the female."§

That is between 34 and 35 oz.

Dr. Marshall examined the brains of two idiots of European descent, and he found the convolutions to be fewer in number, less complex, and smoother than in the ape. In this respect, he says, "the idiot's brains are even more simple than that of the gibbon, and approach that of the baboon."

Dr. Wilder records the weight of the brain of an idiot woman, 42 years of age, as 10 oz. Says Buchner:—

> "Persons whose heads are less than 16 in. in circumference, are invariably imbecile or weak-minded. 'An exceptional smallness of head is always found in idiocy' (Valentin). The famous poet Lenau became insane and died in idiocy; his brain, atrophied and ruined by disease, weighed only 2 lb. 8 oz."*

To quote the same author again: "The convolutions of the brain of Beethoven, the great musician, were, according to Dr. J. Wagner's report, twice as deep and numerous as usual." On the other hand, Longet shows that in the brains of idiots, or creatures who are born imbeciles, the convolutions are less deep and the grey matter is less thick than in normal brains. A child, also, despite the large size of his brain in comparison with that of his body, has but very imperfect convolutions, and only develops these after reaching a certain age. Prior to the ninth month of pregnancy, the convolutions are not even visible; until then, the human fœtus has a smooth brain, like that of the lower vertebrates.†

The contents of the brain consist of nerve-cells, the grey matter of the brain, and fibrous tissue, dead white in color. The function of the fibrous, or white, matter is to carry messages to and from the nerve-cells—the grey matter—which has been termed the brain-mantle, because it covers the folds and windings of the convolutions of the brain. There are also islands of grey matter in the interior of the brain. There is not the slightest doubt whatever that it is the nerve-cells, or grey matter of the brain that must be regarded as the seat of all intellectual and mental activity, of mind, thought, and imagination. It varies in depth from the thickness of a pin to that of a pencil. It also varies greatly in thickness and quantity in different individuals. Says Buchner:—

> "Thus Dr. Jessen perceived to his great surprise that the brain of a female idiot, called Nasmer, 23 years old, showed numerous well-developed convolutions on the surface, but he soon found the solution of the difficulty when, on dissecting the brain, he saw that the grey matter had become atrophied, apparently from disease contracted in early childhood, and thence it had become very thin and narrow."‡

Therefore, a man may possess a very large brain, but if it has few, and shallow, convolutions, and is lacking in grey matter, it will be of no advantage to him; whereas a man with a comparatively small brain may make up the deficiency in the convolutions and excess of grey matter. But, as we have seen, there is a limit of weight below which the brain may not fall and the owner possess reason and sanity.

The average weight of the brain of civilised man is 3 lb. The brain of Cuvier, the famous naturalist, weighed 4 lb.—a proof that it combined weight with quality. As Dr. Maudsley remarks:—

> "It is strangely overlooked by many who write on this matter, that the brain is not a dead instrument, but a living organ, with functions of a higher kind than those of any other bodily organ, inasmuch as its organic nature and structure far surpass those of any other organ. What, then, are those functions if they are not mental? No one thinks it necessary to assume an immaterial liver behind the hepatic structure, in order to account for its functions. But so far as the nature of nerve and the complex structure of the cerebral convolutions exceed in dignity the hepatic elements and structure, so far must the material functions of the brain exceed those of the liver."§

Why should we place an immaterial soul, or spirit, behind the brain, any more than we require to place a spirit behind the liver to make it perform its functions? A shrewd thrust that.

From the foregoing we can see how it is that the ape and the chimpanzee cannot attain to the speech and reason of man, because a brain weighing only 15 oz. cannot attain the intelligence of one weighing 49 oz. It should also be borne in mind that the descent of man cannot be traced to any existing simian types, such as we see them to-day in the gorilla, the ape, the chimpanzee, or the gibbon. All these types branched off from the ancestral tree from which also man had his origin more than a million years ago.

The Flight of the Gods.

ONE Saturday afternoon in June, two or three years ago, I met my old school chum again, this time in Greenwich Park by appointment. We had a glorious time in the Park before we began to discuss any topic of interest to Freethinkers. There were hundreds of children in the Park, some poor, ragged, ill-fed urchins, shoeless and unkempt, from the poverty-stricken neighborhood of Deptford or the waterside population of Greenwich, and a goodly number of children from more prosperous districts, better cared for by their parents, who had come to spend the afternoon in innocent amusement in this grand, natural, old Park, on the hills or under the shadow of the trees, on this beautiful day in June. Children are very democratic and do not attach too much value to the philosophy of clothes.

It was, therefore, very pleasant to watch them at play on the hills. My friend and I could remember, too, the time when we had been brought to this Park as children on a day's excursion, and enjoyed our outing as much as though we had been taken many miles away into the country. What glorious sport children can have in Greenwich Park! And grown-up people, too, for a matter of that. Every form of enjoyment can be had there, or on Blackheath—which adjoins it—at holiday times.

And so we plodded our way through the Park, stopping now and again to take note of some particular object of beauty, until we came to the great avenue of trees and carriage-drive up to the Observatory. We looked at the quaint old twenty-four hour clock, and explained to some intelligent children who were anxious to learn the meaning of fifteen minutes past seventeen. I showed my friend many places of interest along the winding river, which we could see so well from our position on the famous hill. And then we sat down and talked.

For some time we spoke only of the great shipping trade that is still done on the banks of the Thames between Woolwich and London Bridge, and then we gazed at the Observatory, and began to talk of the wonders of astronomy.

At length I remarked, "Astronomy has always seemed to me to be the most atheistic of sciences. When I used to go to hear (the late) Sir Robert Ball lecture on the stars and the immense distance that divided them in the heavens, and the billions of miles that many of them were away from this little planet, I could not help wondering what point in space the Christian God, or the God of the Deist, occupied, from which he directed all the operations of these celestial bodies."

"Ah, but," said my friend, "Thomas Paine was of opinion that astronomy was the great science which unmistakably revealed the wisdom and goodness, as well as the omnipotence, of Deity."

"Yes," I replied, "but Thomas Paine never defined in precise terms what he meant by God. He used the word to express his belief in some intelligent kind of being, at the back of phenomena, who caused all the happenings in the universe as observed by man. But he did not seem to realise that in giving his God intelligence like unto man he was really making his God an anthropomorphic being, and that his conception of God was open to the same kind of objections that he himself applied to the old Jewish God, Jahveh."

"I suppose," remarked my friend, "that you believe that all the heavenly bodies move by virtue of their own inherent properties?"

"Certainly. They move with mathematic precision, which can be calculated with extraordinary accuracy by astronomers. For instance, they can tell, as you know, the precise day and hour upon which the next transit of Venus will take place."

"But, surely, you do not think that the material universe originated without some intelligent being to call it into existence?"

"The matter of the universe seems to me to be eternal—I can neither imagine it beginning to be or ceasing to be."

"Then you do not think much of the argument for a great 'First Cause'?"

"No. I cannot conceive of a First Cause. Cause is a word which represents that which precedes an effect, and which consummates itself in the effect; but every cause is an effect of some previous cause, in an endless chain of causes and effects, and in an infinite regression there can be no First Cause. But in what sense can God be said to be the 'First Cause'? To know whether he is 'first,' we must carry the inquiry further back, as the child frequently does, and ask, 'What caused God?' and if the theologian says that God is without cause, may we not ask whether it is not far more reasonable to suppose that nature—which appears to be infinite, and which it is impossible to conceive either as beginning or ceasing to be—is without cause—that is, infinite and eternal, than to say that God is the uncaused causer of nature without defining what is meant by God?"

"Thomas Paine and other Theists conceived of God as an infinite and intelligent being who created the universe and man, and who rules and governs the movements of the whole planetary system, including the little globe upon which we dwell," responded my friend.

"Yes, I am aware of that; but I do not understand what is meant by an infinite being—especially an infinite being who exists apart from the material universe, which is also infinite as far as we know. Moreover, in my judgment no man can have an idea of God, if by God is meant an infinite being."

"Why not?"

"Let us consider for a moment. What is an idea? It is an image of the mind. As an illustration, let me say that the human mind is a mirror upon which nothing is reflected but the external objects of nature. Man has never had any ideas but those which result from the study and observation of nature. For instance, if I were to say to a man, 'Think of a horse, or an elephant, or a man,' he would at once get a picture on the mirror of his mind of these beings; but if I were to ask him to picture some being he had not seen or heard described, he could not do it. In like manner, man can never give an intelligible idea of God, because in point of truth he has no idea of God. His highest conception is that of a big man, with amplified human qualities."

"I do not agree with you," said my friend, "that man cannot picture on his mind's eye, Horatio, things that he has not seen. What about ghosts?"

"Hundreds of human beings believe that they have seen ghosts, and if they have not seen them they certainly have heard them described. But most of the ghosts when they do appear come like the Ghost of Hamlet's Father, clothed in fine raiment, and, in his case, armed from top to toe."

"So that," responded my friend, "what you say is that all the gods are but ghosts—in other words, figments of the human imagination?"

"Precisely."

"What do you think of the 'Design argument'? I remember that John Stuart Mill said in his posthumous essay on Theism that he considered the design argument a very good one."

Digitized by Google

"Not quite that. He said it was a good argument of its kind, but he did not think much of the kind, otherwise he would have accepted it. Paley's argument from design is full of defects. First, it is alleged that things wrought by human ingenuity show marks of design; but they only manifest these marks to persons who know something of human workmanship. An intelligent man can see that a watch has been designed; he judges that its mechanism is arranged by an intelligent being to effect a certain definite purpose, but then he invariably concludes thus, because he knows something of the designers of watches. A savage would not conclude that a watch was designed by an intelligent being: he would be more likely to think it was alive. But what analogy is there between something made out of materials by man and a product of nature? Who would ever conclude that a blade of grass had been designed, or a tree, or a mountain? Surely, no one. Nature's process of growth is different altogether from the manipulation of some object of nature into a new form by the work of man."

"Yes, I agree to all that," said my friend; "and yet I cannot understand how all the races of mankind have come to some idea of a being whom they call God, who produces all the wonders we observe in the universe."

"You are not quite right there. Some races are so low down the scale of development that they have never yet formed any idea of a God; but when the savage man did for some idea of a being behind phenomena, he did not get into his untutored mind the idea which the cultivated Theist formulates today. No; what you have to study is the evolution of the God idea. You will see that it is all a matter of growth. It begins in the primitive ideas of our savage ancestors, who thought there were beings behind each and every occurrence; then from fetish worship up to the anthropomorphic conception of some of the writers of the Bible, and then through various stages up to the pure Theism of the late Professor Newman or the 'Social Deity' of Mr. Arthur Balfour. And so, one by one, the gods vanish—disappear—take their flight, so to speak, out of the human mind."

"That, then, is the end of the gods, according to your view," said my friend, after a pause.

"Yes, that is the end. After that, man finds nature performs all her wonders 'without the meddling of the gods,' as Professor Tyndall said in his address at Belfast as far back as 1876."

As the sun went down we walked over Blackheath to Morten College and on to New Eltham. In the evening, on our way home, my friend looked up into the heavens and remarked that the stars looked particularly brilliant that night. "Yes, I said, look at the millions of them. There are millions, my friend. As Sir Robert Ball used to say: 'there are millions. If you doubt it, they are up there, count them.'"

THE LATEST CHRIST.

Not Baal, but Christus Jingo! Heir
Of Him, who once was crucified!
The red stigmata still are there,
The crimson spear wounds in the side,
But raised aloft as God and Lord,
He holds the money-bag and sword.

A wondrous god! Most fit for those Who cheat on change, then creep to prayer;
Blood on his heavenly altar flows,
Hell's burning incense fills the air,
And death attests in street and lane
The hideous glory of his reign.

Acid Drops.

Mr. Phillip Carr, who is connected with the Little English Theatre in Paris, being interviewed by the Daily News, delivered himself as follows:—

> "I could not help seeing the extremely insular point of view taken by the French in regard to the achievements of other countries. The English are accused of insularity, but the French are a thousand times more so. Until quite recently they did not recognise the existence of the works of art or literature outside their own country. Even of Shakespeare they know little or nothing."

Clearly the speaker is talking from a plentiful lack of knowledge.

Some of Shakespeare's plays have always held the French stage—notably Hamlet, Othello, and Romeo and Juliet. Later years have seen the production of Macbeth, King Lear, and Julius Cæsar. Victor Hugo's son made a complete translation of Shakespeare into French, and his notes are often of the finest quality. Victor Hugo's own book on Shakespeare is one of extraordinary power. No such tremendous eulogy of Shakespeare was ever written in any other language. The tributes to Shakespeare from Diderot down to Flaubert and Taine are simply astonishing from that "insular" people. Diderot said of Shakespeare that the greatest of other writers might walk under him without bending. Flaubert said "this man overwhelms me." A hundred golden sentences of glowing praise might be quoted from Victor Hugo. Does Mr. Carr imagine that these great French authors are not read in France?

When it comes to translations the French show a better muster than the English do. France has, and has long had, good translations, not only of the great German philosophers such as Kant, Schopenhauer, Hartmann, and Haeckel, but also of the great English philosophers such as Locke, Berkeley, Mill, Spencer, Hamilton, and Huxley. She had able and accurate translations of Darwin thirty and forty years ago. No such translations of French thinkers existed in England. But why pursue this refutation of Mr. Carr's absurd statements?

We have said as much as we have on this point, not as a piece of literary criticism, but because we don't want to see the British philistine encouraged in his silly old notions of superiority over "infidel" France.

Our prophetic soul is not as good as Shakespeare's, but it has its merits nevertheless. Ever so many years ago, when we ceased to respect Christianity and took to ridiculing it, we remarked that Jesus Christ fed thousands of people on five penny loaves and a few sardines. The penny loaves are still hypothetical, but the sardines seem fairly well established—unless the Daily Mail's other name is the only appropriate one. Our contemporary's correspondent at Jerusalem telegraphs that a sardine factory is being established on the shores of the Sea of Galilee. Sardines abound there and are of the finest flavor.

By the way, if the sardines are as satisfying as those used in the Gospels to feed the five thousand, they should command good prices.

A lady writer in the Vineyard says that "religious Freethinkers," no less than Romans, Anglicans, and Puritans, need a Saints' Calendar. As it happens, Freethinkers have a better one than the Christians, and it includes such names as Giordano Bruno, Richard Carlile, and Ferrer.

"Some race-quality in the English blood, which escapes any risk of contamination by foreigners, differentiates the British from the rest of mankind." So says "Vanoc" of the Referee. And if "Vanoc" is a fair sample of the race quality in the English blood we should say it is profoundly (and sadly) true.

"Dagonet" of the Referee has annexed "God" to the "Unionist" party. He speaks of "Ulstermen who are loyal to their King, their country, and their God." It is a fairly practical demonstration that there is no God, that Mr. Sims is allowed to take his name in vain in this fashion. "Dagonet" writes this hypocritical stuff with his tongue in his cheek. He believes in it as much as we do.

"Breathings on the Glass" is one of "Dagonet's" subheadings. "Bleatings on the Grass" would be better.

The Christian World is responsible for the statement that at Beirut two gendarmes prevent women entering the picture palaces to see the Quo Vadis! film. This is because of the picture of Christian heroism in the arena, and the uplifting influence of Christian conversion has such a striking influence on the women who see it. We are greatly inclined to take the story with a grain of salt. By this time Mohammedans have had enough to do with Christians to know that when it comes to persecution Christianity can hold its own with anyone or anything. And these particular pictures are all "fake" in a double sense. First, because it is mere acting, and attendants at cinema shows know it. Secondly, because the alleged persecutions of the Christians are very largely part of an elaborate "fake" that Christian writers have foisted on the world. Most recent critical writers have been puzzled to account for the stories, and have invented more or less ingenious theories to account for the absence of evidence. Of course, for those who take their Roman history from Sunday-school tracts and cinema films questions of probability scarcely exist.

It is peculiar that Sienkiewicz should be known in this country chiefly by Quo Vadis! which is positively one of his worst and least trustworthy books. This is, of course, due to the fact that the author was here exploiting the Christian portion of the population. The same thing was seen with Wilson Barrett and the Sign of the Cross.

The Salvation Army—inspired by the profits made by its emigration business—is still booming Canada, and encouraging poor people to go out. It admits, now that it can no longer be denied, that there is a deal of unemployment in the towns and cities, but points out that the demand for farm labor is keen. Probably so; but it should also be pointed out that farm labor is only required during a few months in the year, and then the laborer is left stranded. For sheer self-preservation he drifts into the towns, and so helps to swell the already large number of unemployed. The official emigration agencies have for some months been warning people against emigration. The Salvation Army continues to cater for business. "We find you a situation," they say. Perhaps so, for a time. It is what happens afterwards that supplies the tragedy.

The Alliance News also booms the Salvation Army's temperance work in a recent issue. The information, we expect, is supplied by the Army itself, although to those unacquainted with the way in which the press is worked, it appears like independent testimony. As it is, the information is delightfully vague. About the Hadleigh Colony we are told that "many inebriates have been received, and these transformed into sober men." So also with other places. Bearing in mind the Army's fondness for statistics, when they serve its purpose, the vagueness of the above is instructive. What one would like to know is how many the Army get hold of, under what conditions they remain, and what proportion is cured? In New Zealand, we learn that the Army has control of two islands in the vicinity of Auckland Harbor, which are practically prison settlements. The residents are committed for from one to two years. Even under these conditions the Army only claims to make thirty per cent. cures. But why this should be placed to the credit of the Army is more than we can discover. It seems only part of the prison administration. We wonder how much per head the Army charges for the people it receives?

Rev. J. Cyril Walter has built and equipped a model theatre, costing about £700, at Averham, near Newark. It will accommodate 160 people. All that is wanted now is the appearance of J. C. and the Twelve Apostles on the stage. Prayer ought to be able to manage that.

Hans Schmidt, the Roman Catholic priest, at New York, who murdered Anna Aumuller in such brutal circumstances, is sentenced to be electrocuted. The press reports say that "He heard the sentence with apparent satisfaction." Many other people have heard it with similar sentiments. The wretched creature is now trying to turn poet. Here is a verse he handed to the newspaper reporters before leaving for Sing-Sing:—

> "Beyond this vale of tears
> There is a life above,
> Unmeasured by the flight of years,
> And all that life is love."

He overlooks the "life below." Pious people are generally egoists.

What with a large—and compact—Roman element, and its black population, the United States has two pretty problems for the future to deal with. And it is significant that two of the greatest dangers in the future may be closely connected with Christianity. For black slavery in the States was of distinctly Christian origin. It was taken there by Christians, developed by Christians, for the profit of Christians. When we are considering the influence of Christianity on civilisation, this should never be forgotten.

Noticing the new edition of the memoir of the late Very Rev. Sir James Cameron Lees, D.D., the Westminster Gazette printed the following:—

> "After Cameron Lees was 'called' to Edinburgh he had a stormy time for a number of years, but he kept a brave heart and a smiling face to all his troubles. He was a great traveller, and paid a visit to Australia, which he enjoyed exceedingly. On leaving Melbourne a stalwart farmer handed him a piece of bog-oak as a memorial. On the homeward voyage he looked over his treasures—for he had got many gifts at the Antipodes—and on examining the oak case found it had a screw lid, and when it was unscrewed a thousand Australian sovereigns glittered inside, and a card with the inscription—'A thank-offering for restoring the faith of Christ.' That money he unfortunately invested, with additional sums, in some of the Australian banks before the crisis, which many still remember, and lost it all."

We wonder if our contemporary saw the joke. It was in the land where he had restored the faith of Christ that the reverend gentleman lost all his money in rotten banks—including the money he got for the work of "restoration."

The London County Council is supplying a bowdlerised version of Charles Reade's Cloister and the Hearth, but it still allows little children to read the unexpurgated Bible, which contains accounts of unnatural vice, rape, and other abominations.

Our readers know that we have a great respect for the English language. We hate to see it abused, and it is that feeling, rather than mere pedantry, which prompts us to protest now and then against conspicuous instances of that offence. There is the word aggravate, for instance; it really means to increase the weight of a thing. It is possible to aggravate a crime or its guilt, but it is impossible to aggravate a human being,—there and then, we mean, though one of the advertised fattening processes might do it in a reasonable time. Yet people will say they are aggravated when they mean that they are annoyed, exasperated, or incensed. Charles Dickens himself, great writer as he was, used aggravation in that slipshod way. And now we see his son, Mr. H. F. Dickens, K.C., using it in the same manner. "Were you annoyed?" he asked a witness lately at the London Sessions. "I had no cause to be," the witness replied. "Was Atkinson's behavior aggravating?" was the next question. We know that this is very common slipshod, but a K.C. ought not to be guilty of it in an open court of justice.

There are so many dull, solemn, or pompous speakers in the House of Commons that a wit or humorist is thrice welcome, at least by a reader of the parliamentary reports in the morning newspapers. One likes to see Mr Birrell's name in the discussion; and he is none the less wise for being witty. He has to apologise to his more owlish fellow members now and then. This occurred during the recent Home Rule debate. Mr. Birrell begged pardon for having said that "a collision between a Catholic and a Protestant mob had no more religion in it than the impact of billiards." He was wrong—he ought not to have said it. But he could not resist adding, "You would not call such a collision a religious service." The knife was in and he turned it round. One likes to see the jester stab. It gives the fools a lesson.

Essentially, of course, we should agree with Mr. Birrell. Technically, we should differ. No religion in the collision of Catholic and Protestant mobs? That is just what there is. It is apt to be the sincerest of religious services. They mean what they say then. Yes, and what they do. And more.

The death of the Rev. J. Brierley—"J. B." of the Christian World—deprives Nonconformity of one of its ablest and most tolerant writers. He was not advanced enough to do much good in the outside world, but his influence in a good direction within orthodox circles must have been considerable. It is pleasant to admit that he was thoroughly opposed to the Blasphemy Laws. And not unpleasant to add that many of his articles have been dealt with in the Freethinker, particularly by Mr. Lloyd. We remember dealing with some of "J. B.'s" articles in the old National Reformer (Bradlaugh's journal) as far back as the eighteen-'seventies.

"J. B.'s" last article in the Christian World was on "Life's Loose Ends," and contained the passage: "You are in a world of loose ends—but the farther ends are not loose. They are gripped by a Hand, that is Love and Omnipotence." This is writing down to the lowest intelligences, for such religious teaching is vastly popular in the Gold Coast. As the Christian Evidence lecturer once said, "Everywhere you find the footprints of an Almighty Hand."

Mr. G. K. Chesterton says that he begins to believe in witch-burning. In time Mr. Chesterton ought to be a perfect Christian. But he'd have to train down a bit for the part of Messiah.

"The cricketing parson," it is announced, has accepted the living of Bermondsey. A theatrical parson lives at Brixton. Why are the clergy picked out for the bestowal of labels outside their duties? One never hears of a "golfing general" or "tennis-playing admiral." Is the soul-saving profession falling into disrepute?

Miss Edith Durham's recent lecture at Essex Hall was honorably plain-spoken. She said she was convinced by bitter experience that no Red Cross aid should ever be sent out in a war. Men's wounds were healed, and they were sent back to the front again as soon as possible, only to prolong the war indefinitely. All the "liberators" in the Balkan war were selfish and cruel. As for the cruelty of the Servians, she said, they burnt, in one outburst, twenty-six villages with petroleum, and prevented the people's escape with bayonets. Soldiers of the Cross!

Horribly cold and blusterous weather has increased the death-rate in New York. People have even been frozen to death in their beds. President Wilson has been confined to his bed, but his illness is not serious.

Rev. Henry Lewis, rector of Bermondsey, left £3,774. It isn't a big fortune in itself, but it is a lot for a Christian, and it must make Councillor A. B. Moss's mouth water. Mr. Moss, of course, is an Atheist, and Atheists are not quite as good as the "blessed-be-ye-poor" people at making money.

Rev. Arthur Thomas Chapman, Cambridge, left £12,195. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth."

Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., is a nephew of Mr. Charles Chancellor who was such a help to Mr. Foote and the Freethinker in the difficult days, early in the present century, when a gang of pretended friends and open enemies did their best to ruin both. We are glad to see the nephew as good a Radical as his uncle was, and especially glad to see him sound on the question of the Blasphemy Laws. But we regret to see him contracting a certain taint from the Nonconformist and other religious company he keeps. He spoke at Chatham Town Hall recently with the Bishop of Croydon in favor of Sunday Closing. We can understand a bishop playing that pious game. He has an interest in filling churches somehow, although he is mistaken in supposing that shutting public-houses will do it. But when a man like Mr. Chancellor plays this pious game we can only see the baneful influence of partisan politics on a capable and honorable public man.

Public-houses are already closed altogether on Sunday in Scotland. They are closed during most of the day in England. We defy anybody to show why they should be closed during the rest of the day except as a concession to the self-interest, the bigotry, or the fanaticism of the Churches. We are serious in saying that we should be very glad if a competent advocate of Sunday Closing would take up this challenge. Why not Mr. Chancellor himself?

Mr. Andrew Carnegie, after giving £2,000,000 to the Peace cause, is now supplementing it with a gift of £400,000 to promote the cause through the churches of the various denominations throughout the world. It looks like magnificent generosity. But it will be observed that Mr. Carnegie's gifts are always calculated to produce the greatest possible advertisement of his noble self. The Churches will all be talking about him now.

Rev. J. Scott Lidgett is one of Shakespeare's puritans who think "because they are virtuous there shall be no more cakes and ale." He voted (and spoke, of course) for the non-sale of intoxicants in the Crystal Palace grounds in the interest of "good order." Good order is the rule at the Crystal Palace already. Why then stop the sale of what Jesus Christ enjoyed? He was no teetotaler.

According to the Daily Chronicle, writing on Mr. Hardy's remarriage, he is "the only novelist on whom has been conferred the coveted Order of Merit." What of the late George Meredith? We may be mistaken, but we understood that he was a recipient of the "coveted Order." Perhaps the writer had only living novelists in his mind.

It takes two to make a marriage. That is presumably the reason why Thomas Hardy married his lady secretary in a church, when his own views of church doctrines and ceremonies are so well-known. And the deed was done a long way from his home and very early in the morning.

One sign of the decadence of religion is the altered form and tone of what we may call the benediction at the end of the King's Speech. Listen to the latest specimen:—

> "Your labors upon these and all other matters I humbly commend to the blessing of Almighty God."

Could anything be more formal and perfunctory? "Almighty God" in the House of Lords is just about as real and vital as the Speaker's Mace on the table of the House of Commons. Cromwell called the latter "a bauble." He might call the former so if he lived now.

The wish is often father to the thought in pious people. The authors of a book on the Churches and London tells us that "Agnosticism, which seemed to be gaining some hold on the working-man 10 or 15 years ago, appears, in London, at any rate, to have had its day. Blatchfordism is a spent force." How exact! Secularism captured the working-man, not Agnosticism, which appealed only to the classes. The National Secular Society is the oldest organisation of its kind and the Freethinker is the doyen of Freethought journals, both being secularistic. As for "Blatchfordism" (whatever that may mean) Mr. Robert Blatchford edits a Socialistic, not a Freethought paper. There are more Freethinkers and less Christians in the world than ever before.

American papers state that the bridge which is being constructed at Hell Gate, New York, will be the largest in the world. If Christianity be true it will need to be a record size.

It is rather amusing to find the Church Times presenting Christians as suffering from the intolerance of Freethinkers. In a recent pamphlet—which we hope to notice at some length later—Mr. George Trevelyan expresses his belief in a "society of sincere Christians and sincere heretics, living in friendly social intercourse with each other, working together for the innumerable objects that good men have in common, and sharing together not a few spiritual emotions." On this the Church Times observes, "We could so live with Mr. Trevelyan. But can he give us any guarantee that the heretics will tolerate us? They must have changed their temper strangely if they do." We are not aware that Freethinkers have declined either meeting or working with Christians on behalf of any objects they have in common. Quite the contrary; they have been ready to efface themselves almost to the point of censure, and allowed Christians to secure a credit that did not properly belong to them, so that the desired object should prosper. On the other hand, there are many cases on record of prominent Christians declining to meet Freethinkers on the public platform, and in private life this feeling is carried very much farther. It is really too late for the Church Times to convincingly portray the Christian as one whose humane and social sympathies overpower his religious and sectarian feelings.

A religious reviewer of the two concluding volumes of Professor Frazer's Golden Bough decides that the work is not a scientific study of man's religious ideas, because "it is not a critical investigation of the problems of Religion." We wonder what this writer would consider a scientific study of religion? Probably an examination of the validity of Anglican Orders, or a study of vestments, or some similar fantastic foolishness. In showing the roots of religious beliefs in savage ideas and practices, Professor Frazer gives us the only possible scientific religion, since he affiliates religious beliefs to frames of mind that are inevitably generated by the savage's ignorance of the nature of his surroundings. And this is certainly the only line of study that is of real value. That is, perhaps, the reason why professional religionists so carefully boycott it. They feel that if the truth of the analysis conducted by men like Frazer is admitted, the whole structure of religion is blown into the air. So the safest policy—for a time—is to pooh-pooh these investigations as of no value.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

March 1, Glasgow; 22, Manchester.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £29 15s. 8d. Received since:—R. B. Harrison, 2s. 6d.; Robert Avis, £1; James Moffat, £1; G. T. Hart (Canada), 4s. 1d.; George Smith, 10s.; N. M. X., £1; Thomas Robson, 10s.; John Sumner, £3 3s.; W. H. Harrup, 10s.; J. Burns, 15s.; F. M. (Ficksburg), 10s. 6d.; A. H. Deacon, 2s. 6d.; Edward Snelling and Wife, £1;

R. H. CHANDLER.—Glad to have your wife's good wishes as well as your own. "Exposure of G. W. Foote" is, as you say, amusing. Your hope that we may survive it is likely to be realised. Our "neglect" of Richard Carlile is quite a comical accusation. We have praised him hundreds of times. Scarcely any other man has been more the object of our eulogy. But we have praised him, not so much on account of what he said—for he was not a poet or a seminal thinker—but on account of what he did. He fought the battle of the free press like a hero—like a super-hero. He was as firm and tenacious as the oak and the granite of his native county.

C. W. THOMAS (New Zealand).—Quite right. We have passed it over to the treasurer.

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings.

JAMES MOFFAT.—We remember you in connection with Yeovil very well, and are pleased to hear from you again. We were afraid you had joined the majority.

W. P. BALL.—Cuttings are always welcome.

W. DAVIDSON.—They can safely be left to you.

E. SCHMIDT.—Glad to hear that Hamburg, at least, is civilised enough to let the children of Freethinkers be withdrawn from religious instruction in the public schools. Glad also to have your thanks for "the hours of pleasure the Freethinker gives you."

G. T. HART (Canada).—A secular (that is, a civil, non-religious) marriage is easily arranged in England. You give the legal notice on both sides, then you go to the registry office, and go through the usual ceremony of taking each other as husband and wife, in the legal sense of the words. That is all which concerns the public officials. The morality and the poetry concern yourselves only—except as the world is all the better for such things being present.

J. TOMKINS writes: "Will Mr. Mann kindly give the date of the Times containing the review of Sir Hiram Maxim's book which he (Mr. M.) referred to in his article?"

EDWARD SNELLING.—Obituary appears. We remember the family well.

S. BRANDALL.—There are other readers of the Freethinker than yourself in Nottingham, though they don't deal at your newsagent's. Still, we should like a good many more.

J. PARTRIDGE.—Tuesday is late, but we have strained a point in the circumstances. We had a paragraph already in type at Mr. Walsh's suggestion.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

Haeckel (we drop other designations as unnecessary) celebrated his eightieth birthday on Monday (Feb. 16). We do not choose to fill our columns with useless matter. Haeckel's name is enough for the present occasion. We salute the Grand Old Man of science and Freethought, and offer him our profound homage.

Mr. Foote's long postponed visit to Glasgow takes place next Sunday (March 1). There is pretty sure to be a rally of his friends from all parts of the South of Scotland. His subjects, also, are now—as far as Glasgow audiences are concerned, and should prove specially attractive in themselves.

Perhaps we had better announce Mr. Foote's subjects on this occasion. They are "Shakespeare's Humanism in the Merchant of Venice," and "Mr. Balfour on God." The local "saints" wish Mr. Foote to deal with the Gifford Lectures that Mr. Balfour has been delivering at Glasgow.

Mr. Foote will probably be lecturing again at Queen's Hall before the present winter season closes.

Mr. Lloyd lectures at the Failsworth Secular Sunday-school this evening (Feb. 22). District "saints" will please note.

Miss Kough lectures at the Manchester Secular Hall to-day (Feb. 22) both afternoon (3) and evening (6.30). This arrangement looks as though it might clash with Mr. Lloyd's lecture at Failsworth; but, after all, there are plenty of Freethinkers in the district to provide them both with good audiences.

We have not received any news from Liverpool lately. We should be glad to hear that the local "saints" are still doing good work.

The Secular Education League holds its Annual Meeting at Caxton Hall on March 25. After the formal business is transacted there will be a public meeting, addressed by various speakers, including Mr. Halley Stewart, the Rev. Dr. Walsh, and Mr. G. W. Foote. Fuller details will appear later in our columns.

Mr. Frederic W. Walsh, of Leamington, of whom our readers have heard lately, being physically incapable, as they well know, of delivering a public address himself, has arranged for Mr. Cohen to take his place at a projected meeting on Tuesday evening next (Feb. 24) at the Café Royal, Bath-street. The chair is to be taken at 8 o'clock by the Rev. Leslie G. Berrington, and admission is free, without a ticket. Mr. Cohen's subject is "God and the Soul in the Light of Science." Discussion will be allowed after the lecture. The arrangements are in the hands of the Leamington Literary and Philosophical Institute, of which Mr. Walsh is a member.

A party of "saints" are going over from Birmingham to Leamington, leaving Snow Hill Station at 6.20. Tickets (return fare, saloon) 2s. 8d., obtainable of J. Partridge, sec., 245 Shenstone-road, Rotton Park.

"Why Christianity Has Failed" is the subject of Mr. W Heaford's lecture for the West Ham Branch this evening (Feb. 22). There should be a good audience.

Mr. John Sumner, a constant Birmingham subscriber to the President's Honorarium Fund, sending his cheque for the new year, says:—

> "It is sometimes with mixed feelings that one signs one's cheques, but in writing mine for this excellent object, I only experience pleasure at being able to respond. Three hundred pounds is a poor enough sum at which to aim. Fortunately your rich natural endowments compensate to no small extent, enabling you to extract more from life than usually falls to the lot of wealthy men."

Once a year one may print these things. They show the perhaps too generous spirit in which one is regarded by one's friends.

Mr. William Repton pleaded for the insertion of some rather personal lines which appear from his pen. "I wish," he wrote, "you were not the Editor, for a time at least. If you can conquer that pride in yourself which I admire, you may perhaps let it appear; if not, please accept it as something in the nature of thanks for the joy of having read your paper for twenty years." We felt puzzled what to do, but good nature at last said "Print it." The writer's praise is not fulsome, but rational, even if exaggerated; and why should he not enjoy the innocent pleasure of expressing it? We have never suffered from a surfeit of eulogy, and at our age we are not likely to get the staggers.

There are special reasons for postponing the conclusion of Mr. Foote's article on the Blasphemy Laws. It must include considerations depending on things that may happen during the present week (Feb. 17 to Feb. 24). The explanation will appear in our next issue.

Goethe.—V.

IN the tragedy of Faust, the godlike genius of Goethe transformed an old puppet-play into one of the eternal glories of literature and art. The first part of the poem was not published until 1806. It was the outcome of thirty years' study and reflection. The folk-story was familiar to Goethe's childhood, and it was in 1770 that he began to think of embalming his life experiences in a modernised legend; and a few years later he sketched various scenes of the tragedy. During his tour in Italy he added the Witches' Kitchen, the Cathedral episode, and the opening monologue. In 1797 the entire work was reconstructed, and the two Prologues, the Walpurgis Night, and the Dedication were added.

Despite the fact that Faust is Goethe's supreme masterpiece, it is, and has long been, his most widely appreciated work. Its exuberent variety is to some extent responsible for this, but its overpowering fascination more largely resides in the circumstance that it is concerned with problems which compel and command universal interest and attention.

The reader is given a broad hint of the coming exuberence in the Prologue to the Theatre, in which he is introduced to a company of strolling actors which has come to delight the motley multitude with a play depicting the joys and sorrows of human life. The Poet, the Manager, and the Merry Andrew then hold high discourse concerning the general bearings of the drama. The Manager dwells on the importance of a good pay-box; the Poet is anxious to produce nothing that posterity will condemn, but the Manager thinks the receipts of greater consequence. The Merryman tells them both that the main thing is to please the public. The Manager agrees; the Poet places his art above all else, so the Merryman shrewdly advises him to prove himself a practical artist by amusing the audience. The Manager decides that something of a nature both dazzling and delightful is what is wanted. The spectators must be conducted "From heaven to earth, and thence thro' earth to hell."

After this Prologue of Earth comes the Prologue in Heaven. This last has been termed a parody of a similar scene in the Book of Job, and dull pietists have censured it as such. It has been reprobated as irrelevant and outrageous, as a blot on an otherwise irreproachable work, and as gratuitously insulting to God. A few translators have omitted it as "unfit for publication." Coleridge (not the living judge of that name, but a defunct relative) asked himself "whether it became his moral character to render into English, and so far certainly lend his countenance to, language much of which he thought vulgar, licentious, and blasphemous."

That dash of devilry in Goethe's nature to which reference has already been made was doubtless to some extent responsible for the impish coloring which characterises the Scene in Heaven, and one can picture the poet's smile as he penned it, just as one can imagine the sardonic appearance on the face of Anatole France when writing that similar scene in his Penguin Island. For all that, however, it must be borne in mind that the wager between the Lord and Mephistopheles formed part of the old folk-story, and Goethe's handling of the legend was entirely in accord with the spirit of the mediæval miracle plays. That the play-writers and actors of the Middle Ages were no respectors of divinities the following quotation from a popular miracle play abundantly proves. In this play God the Father dozes on his throne during the Crucifixion. An angel rouses him from his sleep, and the following dialogue ensues:—

> "Angel. Eternal Father, you are doing what is not right, and will cover yourself with shame. Your much beloved son is just dead, and you sleep like a drunkard.
> God the Father. Is he then dead?
> Angel. Ay, that he is.
> God the Father. Devil take me if I knew anything about it."*

It is thus seen that the Prologue in Heaven is a faithful rendering of the spirit which permeated mediæval legend, to which has been added the magical touch of genius. It is in perfect keeping with the Witches' Kitchen, the Brocken, and the supernatural characteristics of Mephistopheles.

When the play opens Faust is in his study, surrounded by his books and instruments of mystic lore. To the common mind, the master of those that know, he is to himself a learned ignoramus who is compelled to turn to the magic arts for the solution of the secrets of existence which have so far completely baffled his inquiries. The moon shines through the casement and causes his mind to return to the world of life outside.

> "Beautiful moon! Ah! would that now,
> For the last time, thy lovely beams
> Shone on my troubled brow!
> Oft by this desk, at middle night,
> I have sat gazing for thy light,
> Wearied with search through volumes endless,
> I sate 'mong papers—crowded books,
> Alone—when thou, friend of the friendless,
> Camest smiling in, with soothing looks.
> Oh, that upon some headland height
> I now were wandering in thy light!"†

In despair, Faust opens a volume of magic to summon a spirit to his aid, and, book in hand, he utters with a mysterious air, the sign of the spirit; and then from the red flame which rises, the spirit appears. Faust is appalled at the spirit he has called up, and turns away in affright. The spirit scorns the momentary fear into which Faust has been thrown, and asks him what has become of his soul's proud call now shrunk into a piteous cowardice?

> FAUST.
> "Creature of flame, shall I grow pale before thee?
> 'Twas I that called thee—Faustus—I, thine equal!
> SPIRIT.
> In the currents of life, in the tempests of motion,
> Hither and thither,
> Over and under,
> Wend I and wander—
> Birth and the grave—
> A limitless ocean,
> Where the restless wave
> Undulates ever—
> Under and over
> Their toiling strife
> I mingle and hover,
> The spirit of life:
> Hear the murmuring wheel of time, unawed,
> As I weave the living mantle of God!
> FAUST.
> Spirit, whose presence fills the wide earth,
> How near akin to thine I feel my nature!
> SPIRIT.
> Man, thou art like those beings which thy mind
> Can image, not like me! (Vanishes.)
> FAUST (overpowered with confusion).
> Not like thee!
> Formed in the image of the Deity,
> And yet unmeet to be compared with thee!"

Faust's pupil Wagner knocks at the door, but brings his master no comfort. Once more in solitude, Faust gives way to despair, and, seizing the poison resolves to die. He is about to drain it when he hears the Easter bells and the distant singing of the choir. These sounds awaken the remembrances of his youth; the natural longing for life returns and vanquishes his despondency.

> "And now am I once more a little child,
> And old Remembrance, twining round my heart,
> Forbids this act, and checks my daring steps—
> Then sing ye forth—sweet songs that breathe of heaven!
> Tears come, and Earth hath won her child again."

The scene changes for the beauties of an early day in spring. It is Easter Sunday, and the people are abroad to dance and drink and sing. Faust and Wagner come to gaze upon the people as they enjoy their holiday. They are intensely happy in the present; the high problems of origin, existence, and destiny which baffle Faust mean nothing to them. The philosopher sees in the people's happiness an asset of life which he has been denied. He mentally enters into their simple pleasures, and yearns to possess the happiness they enjoy. His companion Wagner, however, looks down with the loftiest pedantic contempt on the antics of the vulgar crowd.

The folk gather round Faust, "paying him the reverence always paid by the illiterate to the 'scholar.' Wagner sees it with envy; Faust feels it to be a mockery. Reverence to him, who feels profoundly his own insignificance!" Faust sits on a stone and watches the setting sun; the shadows of evening gather, and master and pupil quit the scene, a black poodle at their heels. Faust, accompanied by the dog, makes his way to the study. His mood is serious and solemn, and the poodle becomes restless and uneasy. Faust opens the Bible, and begins a translation of the sacred Word, at which the poodle is agitated beyond all endurance. Faust suspects that mischief is lurking in the animal, and performs mystical ceremonies, and the Devil himself makes his appearance. Faust's mood of disillusion prepares him for his compact with Mephistopheles, and he consents to barter his soul for the realisation of earthly happiness. Mephistopheles and Faust visit Auerbach's cellar, where they see the sots in the highest heaven they know—a condition of maudlin or quarrelsome drunkenness. This pleasurable sight exhausted, they pass to the Witches' Kitchen. From purgatory they have passed to hell. On the hearth a large cauldron is over the flames, and in the dense smoke are various weird figures. A female ape watches the cauldron, skims it, and sees that it does not boil over. The male ape, with the young ones, warms himself at the fire. A witch's potion is prepared, which, when drunk, Mephistopheles assures Faust, will make him see Helen of Troy in the first woman he meets. The old Faust is rejuvenated into a handsome youth, and all the passions of adolescence appear in full force.

The meeting with Margaret soon follows. A simple and devout girl returning from church is accosted by Faust, and she meets his advances somewhat curtly. But love triumphs over all obstacles; by fair means and foul the innocent girl's ruin is accomplished, and when Faust bitterly reproaches Mephistopheles and himself, he is coldly told that "She is not the first."

Margaret is one of the most beautiful and bewitching creations in the entire realm of poetic art. She stands in strong contrast with the worldly-wise Martha, and the charm of her character is in this way accentuated. As Lewes says, "The poverty and inferior social position of Margaret is never lost sight of; she never becomes an abstraction; it is Love alone which exalts her above her lowly station, and it is only in passion that she is so exalted."

The scene at the Well, where Margaret and Lizzy are filling their pitchers, is supremely touching. Lizzy asks Margaret whether she has heard of Hannah's trouble, and she answers "No."

LIZZY.

"Kate told me so to-day—there's not a doubt
Of its truth. This comes of airs and impudence:
I always said her pride would be her ruin.

MARGARET.

What mean you?

LIZZY.

What I mean all know but you—
Why, when she eats and drinks she's feeding two."

Lizzy points the finger of unpitying female scorn at her fallen sister. Margaret pities her from the bottom of her heart, and hopes that Hannah's lover will make amends by marrying her. Lizzy says he's no such fool, but if he should—

"'Twill be almost as bad,
We will so plague her—if she get the lad;—
The wedding garland, should she think to wear it,
From the mock virgin shall the children tear it:
And, at her door, what fun shall we have spreading
Chopped straw, to greet the promise of their wedding.
(Exit.)

MARGARET (returning home).

How I would rail when some poor girl went wrong!
How, when it was another's sin and shame,
Words of reproach would rise up to my tongue!
Oh, this was then a black offence, and I
Made it in thought more black; no words of blame
This virtuous scorn of mine could satisfy—
Others might fall, but I more proud became,
And I—who thus could feel—am I the same?
But could I—who could—have resisted here?
All was so good—all was so very dear!"

In the following scene Margaret is praying brokenheartedly before an image of the Mother of Sorrows. She places fresh flowers in the bowls standing in front of the image. Margaret's unanswered supplication to the Blessed Virgin is chokingly pathetic even in translation. She implores the benign Mother to remember her own grief for the death-agony of her Divine Son. The Virgin alone can pity and forgive a fallen and forsaken girl.

"The flowers upon my window sill,
Wet with my tears since dawn they be;
All else was sleeping, while I was weeping,
Praying and choosing flowers for thee.

Into my chamber brightly
Came the early sun's good-morrow;
On my restless bed unsightly
I sate up in my sorrow.

Oh, in this hour of death, and the near grave,
Succor me, thou, and save!
Look on me with that countenance benign,
Never was grief like thine,—
Look down, look down on mine."

Margaret's brother Valentine returns home; he discovers Faust serenading his sister, and attacks him with his sword. Mephistopheles stabs Valentine, who falls mortally wounded, and he dies bitterly reproaching and reviling Margaret. From this scene of slaughter we pass to the Cathedral, where, in the dim light, Margaret supplicates heaven amid the congregation—the Spirit of Evil by her side. This scene is the most terrible in the tragedy. There is something appalling in the poor grief-stricken sinner seeking comfort in the church only to experience a deeper and a deadlier despair. As the solemn words of the Dies irae are sung by the choir, the kneeling worshipers hear what they have so often heard before, but to the distraught Margaret they are pregnant with impending doom. The Spirit of Evil interprets the solemn words in their most dreadful sense, and the wronged girl shudders and faints with fear.

Passing over the Brocken scene, we find Faust remorsefully reviewing the past. Margaret has murdered her babe, and she is condemned to die. Three deaths lie at his door—Valentine's, Margaret's, and her infant's. Faust reproaches Mephistopheles for having kept him in ignorance of Margaret's misery. They ride over a dismal plain to rescue the girl from the executioner's hands, and as they approach they hear the men at work on the gibbet they are preparing for her death. Faust finds his love on a heap of straw, her mind wandering and her voice raised in wild song. All Faust's endeavors prove unavailing; the penalty must be paid, and the poor mad creature passes to her fate.

At intervals during many years Goethe was working at the Second Part of Faust, and in 1831 it was at last completed. Leaving behind him his first unhappy passion, Faust passes through all conditions of culture to a final state of noble service to humanity. Goethe's creed is summed up in Faust's reply to Care when she asks him whether he has ever known her:—

"'I have gone through the world,' he answers, 'seized every enjoyment by the hair—that which did not satisfy me I let go, that which ran away from me I would not follow. I have only wished and realised my wish, and wished again, and thus have stormed through life: first great and mighty; but now I take things wisely and soberly. I know enough of this life, and of the world to come we have no clear prospect. A fool is he who directs his blinking eyes that way, and imagines creatures like himself above the clouds! Let him stand firm and look around him here; the world is not dumb to the man of real sense. What need is there for him to sweep eternity? All he can know lies within his grasp.'"

Of Goethe's other works there is no space to speak. The barest mention must suffice for his Wilhelm Meister, Elective Affinities, Dichtung und Wahrheit, and his Hermann und Dorothea.

The poet's activities were not dimmed or diminished by age. The powerful intellect of the old man glows in his Conversations with Eckermann. As the evening darkness came on, sorrows crowded upon him. His older friends dropped one by one. Karl August died in 1828; the Duchess soon followed him to the grave. Goethe's sole surviving child, his much-loved son, died at Rome in 1830. Tended by his son's wife, and reverenced by all, Goethe lived till the spring of 1832. After a short illness, he passed peacefully to his death while sleeping in his chair. The body of this marvellous, many-sided man lies by that of Schiller in the Royal vault at Weimar.

T. F. PALMER.

The Church and Literature.

MUCH has been written of the services of Christianity to literature. The monks, we are told, were the preservers of ancient learning, and to their devotion must be ascribed our knowledge of the classics of Greece and Rome. How comes it, then, that so large a portion of those classics are lost? What became of the vast libraries collected by the Romans? Is it but a casual coincidence that the decline of learning and the triumph of Christianity went side by side?

In the Augustan era the library was as essential to the completeness of a house in Rome as the eating or sleeping room. Such men as Julius Cæsar, Crassus, Cicero, and Lucullus were renowned for the beauty and value of their collections of books. Authors were treated with the utmost respect, and rich men vied for their patronage. Asinius Pollio is said first to have formed a public library in Rome. The great Freethinker, Julius Cæsar, had in view a large scheme of this kind, which was defeated by his assassination. Trajan, Vespasian, and Domitian founded vast libraries. Books were common in Rome, and sold at comparatively low prices, for slaves were taught to write, and it has been calculated that in a librarian's shop a hundred copies of a work could have been written off by dictation as quickly as a compositor would set one in type. The great bulk of works then famous are now lost. Histories, epics, dramas, orations, books of philosophy and education, verses almost without number, have perished. We have but slight specimens of even the best known Latin authors. Take but the historians. Of Livy's history, once containing one hundred and forty books, all but thirty-five have disappeared. Pliny's history of his own time, in thirty-one books, is entirely missing. Of the thirty books of Tacitus we have but four and a part of the fifth. Of the Greco-Roman histories, the works of Polybius, which originally comprised forty-five books, now contain but five. Dio Cassius, once in eighty books, now shows but twenty-five. Of the history of Ammianus Marcellinus the first thirteen books are missing. Similar instances might be given in other departments of literature. The allegation that all that was of value has been preserved is sufficiently refuted by the instance of Tacitus, coupled with the fact that the five books we have are from one single manuscript, whereas we know that the Emperor Tacitus (275) ordered copies of the works of his illustrious namesake to be placed in all the libraries of the empire, with a special direction that ten copies should be made each year at the public expense. It is usual to ascribe the loss of these works to the invasions of the barbarians, but it must not be forgotten that these barbarians were remarkably amenable to the authority of the Church, and it was not until Christian asceticism had sapped the patriotic virtue of the Roman empire that the irruptions took place.

When Christianity came to power it found no young and vigorous civilisation to combat it, but an effete and decaying civilisation that had run its course. The polytheistic superstition was universal, yet the tolerance of Rome had done much to destroy the exclusive claims of any particular deities. Culture and freethought were the property of the few. Such a civilisation was the only one which Christianity could have overcome, the only one it could safely assimilate with itself. This it only did after smothering the few pulsations of life and freethought which it contained. Christianity did not triumph by its superior culture. On the contrary, it was despised by philosophers as the pernicious superstition of slaves and fools. It triumphed by its organisation, which could utilise and assimilate the credulity and fanaticism of its followers. Its very intolerance was a means of success. The indifferent polytheist, admitting it might possibly be true, was led by mere prudence to embrace a faith declaring that it alone possessed salvation. From the primitive ages a dislike of Pagan learning was general among Christians. Warned by their spiritual guides to beware of philosophy and the knowledge which puffeth up, they despised the vain learning of a world soon to pass away. It is true those of the early Fathers who were converted from Paganism did not at once quit the philosophic temper of mind. Such men as Origen, Clement of Alexandria, Augustine, and Synesius brought heathen learning to combat heathenism. But the victory once achieved, the philosophic temper declined. Claiming exclusive possession of truth, the Church was its enemy in all external learning. Physical science especially was held in avowed contempt as inconsistent with revealed truth. The Fathers exhorted the faithful to avoid all contact with Pagan culture. St. Antony, called the founder of Monachism, refused, when a boy, to learn letters, because it would bring him into too great intercourse with other boys. Under Theophilus, primate of Alexandria, the magnificent library of the Serapion was destroyed by the monks, and at a Synod held under this bishop all the works of Origen, the greatest glory of the early Christian Church, were interdicted. The fourth General Council of Carthage went so far as to forbid the reading of all Pagan books; and, says Jortin, "the bishops soon began to relish this good advice, and not to trouble their heads with literature." Mosheim also records that in the fourth century, although the emperors tried to cherish learning, their intentions were defeated by a numerous and powerful party in the Church, who "considered all learning, and especially philosophical learning, as injurious, and even destructive to true piety and godliness." The efforts of men like Julian were in vain. As Christianity extended, the number of works produced became fewer, and their merit less, so that from the sixth to the twelfth century there is scarcely an author of even the fourth or fifth rank.

Theodosius made a law (448) that the works of Porphyry should be burnt, and that all other works the doctrine of which did not conform to that of the Nicene Council, and of the Council of Ephesus, and to the decisions of St. Cyril, should be destroyed, and the concealers of them put to death. The original works of all the early opponents of Christianity, as well as of the heretics, are lost, and we have to trust to such representations of them as are found in the works of their opponents. Jortin remarks that many bishops in the General Council of Ephesus and Chalcedon could not write their own names. The learned Jerome condemned the study of profane authors, except for pious uses. He relates how, for having been too much addicted to such study, he fell into a fever, and was taken up in the night to the tribunal of Jesus, who severely reprimanded him for being rather a Ciceronian than a Christian, and for this offence he was flagellated by an angel.

Hallam, in his Introduction to the Literature of Europe, says: "A prepossession against secular learning had taken hold of these ecclesiastics, who gave tone to the rest; it was inculcated in the most extravagant degree by Gregory I., the founder, in a great measure, of the papal supremacy, and the chief authority in the Dark Ages." Saint Gregory is said by Brucker to have given orders that the collection of books formed by the Roman emperors, and kept in the temple of Apollo, adjoining the palace, should be burnt. In a letter to a teacher of grammar he severely censures him for polluting with hymns to Jupiter a tongue that ought to be employed in celebrating the praises of Christ. Gibbon is disposed to acquit Saint Gregory of the charge of burning the library, but certainly he was unfavorable to classical learning. Leo the Iconoclast is also accused of burning the library of the Basilica at Constantinople. One chronicler relates that he, not being able to gain the professors over to his views, imprisoned them in their college, and reduced them and their books to ashes. This improbable story has been doubted, if not disproved, by historians. Gibbon, however, believes that the library, which contained over thirty-six thousand volumes, was burned during the religious wars. Gregory VII. is also said to have burned a great number of ancient manuscripts. Even if these are only stories, their invention serves to throw some light on the spirit of the times.

Towards the close of the seventh century the manuscripts in the Papal library at Rome were so few that Pope Martin requested the Bishop of Maestricht to supply this defect from the remotest parts of Germany. Lupus Abbot, of Ferrieres, in a letter to the Pope (855), beseeches him to lend him copies of Cicero's De Orators and Quintillian's Institutions, "for, although we have parts of these books, there is no complete copy of them in all France." The monks, too, became careless as to preserving their collection of books intact. They allowed their libraries to dwindle away under their eyes. They sold their books, gave them away, or allowed them to be stolen. It was asserted, at a council held in Rome in 992, that scarcely a single person was to be found in Rome itself who knew the first elements of letters. Not one priest of a thousand in Spain about the age of Charlemagne could address a common letter of salutation to another. In England, King Alfred declared that he knew no single priest south of the Thames (the most civilised part of England) who, at the time of his accession, understood the ordinary prayers, or could translate Latin into his mother tongue.

"TESS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—If your contributor, Mr. T. H. Elstob, had, before writing, reread the intensely pathetic episode of the midnight baptism in Mr. Thomas Hardy's Tess of the D'Urbervilles, his article, "Poor Old Father," which appears in your issue for February 15, would doubtless have taken another form. It really is Tess's father who prevents her from sending for the parson to christen her child. These are Mr. Hardy's exact words: "No parson should come inside his doors, he [Tess's father] declared.....He locked the door and put the key in his pocket." Mr. Hardy, with his intimate knowledge of the clergy, many delicate hints of which are found in this very chapter, could not possibly have made the mistake of introducing a clergyman who refused to baptise the child because it was illegitimate. On the contrary, he says later on, "Hearing of the baby's illness, he [the vicar] had conscientiously come to the house after nightfall to perform the rite." Tess's interview with the vicar, and the latter's refusal to give the child a Christian burial, are doubtless introduced to lead up to and explain the intensely affecting conclusion of the chapter. Even in discussing the vicar's refusal, Mr. Hardy exhibits his full knowledge of the nicities of the theological distinctions made by the clerical mind when he says, "Unaware that the refusal to admit him had come from Tess's father and not from Tess, he could not, or would not, allow the plea of necessity for its [the baptism's] irregular administration." Of course, the moral which Mr. Hardy wishes to draw is found in the vicar's concluding words: "It will be just the same."

I am afraid that all films must be inadequate to represent the subtle beauties of Mr. Hardy's writings, but Mr. T. H. Elstob may take heart. The very episode of the midnight baptism was omitted from the Graphic as unsuited for its columns when Tess was first published, and had to find a place in the more liberal Fortnightly Review.

DEDICATED TO G. W. FOOTE.

For years now close upon a fleeting score
Gone but remembered with deep gratitude,
I have, with eager eyes and mind attuned,
Turned to the light that ever glowed from thee;
And here do I essay to pay my debt,
And would, with words touched by the Muses' fire,
Sing out thy praise, and scorn the epitaph,
The Christian sop, that moulders on the tomb.

Yet I must tread the winding path of praise
With wary feet; with careful footsteps light
Must I, this road of prickly, stinging thorns
Now travel to my goal of victory.
Gibbon hath said that praise from certain men
Would be an insult to his very soul;
Yet I shall hope that my sincerity
Will haply here escape such rough, rude words.
Nigh twenty years ago my mind did lie
In priestly bondage; I did hear thy name
And from that time the jaded Christian God
Receded, crumbled, vanished like a dream;
And thou did'st lead me on to walk with those Whose names are visioned splendor in the sky
Of Truth's fair world, where all her fragrant flowers
Are nourished by the blood and tears of men.

And who are they? The hungry wolves of hate
Have set their prey in Nature's brightest sphere.
Shelley and Byron will now shine serene
In that one Heaven, the one we know and feel;
And Swinburne, too, shall join them with his song
That scorched the robes of priests and burnt all Gods.
The realms of Truth are not so limited
That one more star could not find space to shine.
I'll mention not his name, but only say
I hate an epitaph, I hate smooth speech
When ears are closed for ever and a day;
I hate; yet stay, there are some things I love,—
The open sea, the smiling yellow fields,
Music of Brahms, the Poet's fiery song
That girds at wrong; all these things do I love,
And linked with golden chain is thy own self.

WILLIAM REPTON.

OUR HEAVENLY FATHER.

Our love and hate have aims, but Thine
Are idle bolts at random hurled;
Impotent, hidden, yet divine,
Brood o'er Thy broken-hearted world.

Cold to the prayer of human sorrow,
Deaf to the sob of human strife,
Thou workest grandly, night and morrow,
On Thy great masterpiece of life!

For Thine own pleasure is it done,
Since art's delight is in the doing;
Thine own enjoyment, slowly won,
Is the sole end Thou art pursuing.

Obituary.

At Nutley, Sussex, on February 8, in his eighty-eighth year, passed away William Barralet, an early friend of Charles Bradlaugh. He was one of the brothers Barralet, mentioned by Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner in the Life of her father, of whom one still survives, who, jointly with other Freethinkers, established the Warner Place Society, to which Mr. Bradlaugh was attracted in 1848. A disciple of Robert Owen in his earlier years, though he never weakened in his Freethought opinions. He was for many years a member of the South Place Society. Cremation took place at Golder's Green on Thursday, February 12.—E. S.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 9 SUNDAY, MARCH 1, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Truth is but Justice in our knowledge; and Justice is but Truth in our practice.—MILTON.

The Burning of Heretics.

De Haeretico Comburendo; or the Ethics of Religious Conformity. By G. M. Trevelyan, late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. An Address delivered to The Heretics in October, 1913. Published for the Society by W. Heffer and Sons, Ltd., Cambridge. Price 6d.

MR. G. M. TREVELYAN, who is honorably known in the world of literature, has launched this bold outspoken lecture on broader seas than those of the "Heretics" at Cambridge. We believe the "Heretics" are a liberal-minded body of students, who give "advanced" ideas a hearing, if not always a welcome; and that is a good deal in connection with an English university. There was once talk of getting the editor of the Freethinker to address the members, with a view to a good evening's discussion, but the idea never attained to realisation. We are agreeably surprised, therefore, to see that Mr. Trevelyan's lecture, now published for the world at large, is quite refreshingly honest and explicit.

Mr. Trevelyan's lecture had, of course, as a mere matter of chronology, no reference to the Stewart case. He refers to it, however, in a footnote:—

> "Since I gave this address, the latest Blasphemy prosecution has developed into a huge State advertisement for a particularly offensive man engaged, among his other activities, in a particularly offensive trade."

We neither endorse nor question this judgment. We print it as one which is widely held in educated circles, and will probably occasion some future controversy. Mr. Stewart must not suppose that people who maintain his right to free speech agree with all he says; nor can he expect that imprisonment alone will raise a man to a pinnacle of virtue.

What is left of the spirit of the old statute for the burning of heretics is more disgusting than dangerous. It must be very painful to be burnt alive, but there is no indignity about it. The victim is given a certain distinction and elevation. But to dress him in felon's clothes, and put him in prison with the scum of the earth, and subject him to every kind of humiliation which does not impair his health or shorten his life; this is a meaner and more contemptible bigotry than that which flamed from the fires of the stake; just as spitting in a man's face, for a difference of opinion, is a dirtier intolerance than cleaving him in two with a sword.

It is well to remember in these rather unheroic days that the "religious peace," as Mr. Trevelyan calls it, which is distant though in sight in England to-day, was bought with a great price; it "has been purchased for us by the blood of martyrs, men who died friendless and unhonored that we might have liberty."

Mr. Trevelyan congratulates his fellow men, including his fellow Freethinkers, on the progress they have made in toleration. But what is toleration? Goethe smiled cynically at the word, Thomas Paine denounced it as insulting, and it never has meant strict justice between majorities and minorities. Mr. Trevelyan puts it in this way:—

> "For real toleration is only brought about when people have got accustomed to the idea that the other side exists, and contains quite the average number of good people."

But is not this rather an effect than a cause? Does not "toleration" really mean the growth of confidence on the part of the minority, and a growth of indifference on the part of the majority? "Christian toleration" is a phrase that is often in use, but is it not simply another illustration of Johnson's dictum that the adjective is the natural enemy of the substantive? Is it not patent, both from logic and history, that toleration only increases as the dogma of salvation by faith decays?

It seems to us that Mr. Trevelyan is rather too optimistic. He notes that disbelief had gained the day, amongst the priests themselves, as well as among the educated classes in ancient Pagan society:—

> "The aristocratic Roman augurs used, for reasons of State and for the benefit of the multitude, to practise rites in the efficacy of which they themselves did not believe. No two augurs could meet without smiling. So, at least, we used to be told at school, as proof of the decadence of Rome. Yet by English standards there was nothing decadent about the business,—except the smiling."

Yet the Christian deluge came and overwhelmed all that insecure civilisation. The multitude were ignorant and credulous. They are so still. And a second deluge of superstition is not exactly unthinkable. Some of us never forget Clifford's warning.

The Blasphemy Laws are reduced to something like comic opera at present. But they still exist. That is the trouble. Who knows, if they are not repealed, what victims they may find in a time of general reaction? For "blasphemy" is not a definite crime: no man knows whether he has committed it or not until a jury tells him; and as their verdict is irresponsible and absolute there is no more real safety for scholars, with any vivacity of mind and style, than there is for the lecturer at the street-corner.

But it is from Mr. Trevelyan's own standpoint, not from ours, that his lecture must be judged. He warns Freethinkers against what may be called the bigotry of anti-bigotry:—

> "The belief in some quarters that heretics were intolerable bred in others the belief that Christians were despicable. Both were lamentable errors springing from the same evil root—the spirit of De haeretico comburendo. In a healthy society mutual relations are extremely little affected by religious opinions. Christians and non-Christians, we must all learn to recognise that an ever increasing variety of religious experience and belief is the rule of the modern world, that we have got to live side by side as friends, and that nothing save bad old traditions inherited from the middle ages makes difference of religious opinion a bar to friendship, even close friendship. My exhortation to you to-night is, first, to stand up for your rights of conscience and practice as matters of course, and not of favor, and, secondly, to be friends with those who believe more than you do and not to think that a barrier divides us from the orthodox. So far from being contradictory, these two duties are parts of one duty. For only where freedom of conscience is completely recognised as a matter of course, not of tolerance, only there are friendship and peace possible."

We shall criticise the main idea in this passage presently; it occurs again and again in Mr. Trevelyan's pamphlet. Meanwhile, we wish to thank him for replying to the upper-class argument that the lower classes want religion as a crutch for the weak legs of their morality and a tonic for their mental debility:—

> "The argument from the 'lower orders' is based upon two assumptions: first, that only the highly educated can thrive without dogmatic religion, and, secondly, that, unless the upper and middle classes set the example, the rest will in fact cease to be practising Christians. There are rich people who, in logical accordance with this view, seldom attend church in London, where their presence, being unnoticed by the masses, would be of no sort of use. But in the country the same persons attend the village church, where the presence of the gentlefolk is noted, and their absence might be remarked."

Mr. Trevelyan argues that Freethinkers should be more outspoken. If they were so they would be astonished at their own strength. He asks for honest treatment for young people:—

> "If people are brought up to suppose that the only reason for not lying and stealing is that God sees them, when they come to doubt the actuality of God's presence they will, perhaps, be more likely to lie and steal. The time of life when faith in a personal God is most often shaken corresponds to the age when temptation of all sorts is strongest and freshest to men and women, the time when life is new and untried before experience or routine have given safety. Just at that time the old beliefs are likely to be breaking up. But, fortunately, in many cases, there are other motives for morality at work besides cosmological creeds. The fear of the better aspects of public opinion is a deterrent much more real and effective with most people than the fear of God, and not really less noble. But the instinct towards morality is the noblest and most effective motive of all. At the ultimate moment of choice we feel that right is right, and wrong, wrong. This fundamental instinct, whether naked or draped in the form of a creed, alone saves the world,—so far as it is saved. This firm foundation of moral instinct is endangered by those who dig under it, striving to make it rest on a cosmological system, of which millions, even of Christians, are not at heart perfectly and constantly sure."

Our readers will see that Mr. Trevelyan's lecture is interesting and important, and will be glad to meet with it again next week.

(To be concluded.)

Why We Laugh.

THE other day I was asked why we Freethinkers took a delight in laughing at the religious beliefs of other people. As a matter of fact, I was not at the time laughing at religion or anything else, but simply arguing that religion was untrue, and pointing out, by the way, the absurd character of some of the beliefs in question. But I replied, offhand, that as I hadn't any religion of my own to laugh at I was compelled, if I wished to laugh at religion at all, to do so at the expense of other people. To this my questioner retorted, "But why laugh at religion at all?" and that I countered with the return, "Why not?" And the questioner gave it up as hopeless. He probably felt that with such a person as myself further argument was useless. Evidently he had been accustomed to people treating religion as something too solemn to be spoken about in the ordinary way, and in ordinary tones. And it was quite obvious that, so far as he was concerned, the removal of the conviction that religion was to be dealt with quite differently to the way in which we deal with other subjects, was essential to a rational consideration of the subject.

And this conviction was really at the bottom of my reply. It was not hasty, but deliberate. It is far too often taken for granted that one must not discuss questions of religion as one talks about politics, or science, or literature. Of course, this is all very well so far as the religionist himself is concerned. It is part of his mental outfit. His fear of religion is traditional, and even though that fear be modified by modern influences, there still remains the dregs of the feeling. But why should he expect those who do not share his beliefs to manifest the same mental inclinations? On the face of it, the Freethinker, because he is a Freethinker, does not consider religion to be either useful or truthful. To him it is something that began in falsehood, and has been perpetrated by methods more or less blameworthy, and which he is convinced, rightly or wrongly, is still responsible for a deal of evil in the world. Why should he, then, be asked to deal with religion in a way that all honest men and women reserve for that which they really respect? Actually the religionist is asking the Freethinker to treat religion as though he believed it were true, or might be true. He is to sacrifice his convictions in order to gratify the irrational demands of other people.

What is there about a belief in religion that should protect it from ridicule? In primitive times there does exist a primâ-facie case for such a demand. The gods are then believed to be without discrimination in the giving of benefits or the infliction of punishments. It is the tribe that benefits by God's pleasure, or suffers from his anger. If one person offends he may punish all. Under these conditions, and while this belief is actual, the rest of the community is so far entitled to demand that no single member shall act so as to injure all the rest. All being collectively responsible, each must act with a view to this collective responsibility. But we no longer have this belief. We do not believe, that is, religious people do not believe, that God will punish the whole of the nation because one person does wrong. Each is, as far as God is concerned, responsible for his own actions. My laughing at religion, my ignoring God, or speaking disrespectfully of God, is entirely a matter between myself and him. Anybody may be justified in pointing out to me the error of my ways, but no one is warranted in taking it as a personal affront because my ways are not his ways.

As a matter of fact, we all of us laugh at one another's beliefs, and in many directions it is considered quite legitimate that we should do so. I once knew a man who carried a potato about in his trousers pocket as a cure for rheumatism. I laughed at his belief in the virtue of the potato; he knew I laughed at it, and never questioned my right to be amused. There are plenty of people who will not sit down with thirteen at table. To them it is no idle fancy, but a matter of life or death. Yet they are laughed at, and there exists a club somewhere in London that sets itself deliberately to break down this and similar superstitions by holding a periodical dinner at which these things are ridiculed. The diners walk into the room under a ladder, they cross their knives, they upset their salt, they "outrage the feelings" of believers in every possible way. Yet no one ever blames them for their tactics; on the contrary, many who resent the Freethinker laughing at religion think they are doing a useful and much-needed work. And there exists, in addition, a whole host of superstitions—which really form the raw material of religion—at which the world generally laughs, and no one complains.

When one comes to think of it there are few beliefs at which some people do not laugh, and without their right to laugh being challenged. It is only in connection with religion that the right to laugh is seriously questioned. And even then it is a question of geography. We may all, in this country, laugh at Mohammedanism, or Hinduism, or the religious beliefs of primitive people. In other countries we might just as freely laugh at Christianity. The Christian forgets that the Freethinker is exercising a privilege of which he freely avails himself. I fully admit that people take their religious beliefs seriously. But so did my friend with the potato cure for rheumatism take his belief seriously. To say that we must not laugh at religious beliefs because other people take them very seriously is really stating the cause of laughter, not furnishing a reason for gravity. If they did not take them seriously there would be no occasion for laughter. It is not the belief itself, but its setting that causes mirth. A potato is a good thing in its way, and not at all a subject for mirth. Rheumatism is a reality by no means to be despised by those who are favored with its presence. There is no cause for mirth there. It is the conjunction of the two in the mind of a professedly civilised man that makes one smile. And this is equally true of religious doctrines. We do not smile at the doctrines but at people believing them. Oliver Wendell Holmes said that many people were saved from insanity by their stupidity, and therefore one ought to go mad once in a way to prove one's intelligence. So one might say of religious beliefs. Not to be able to laugh when one finds them taken seriously shows a lack of humor perfectly reprehensible in a civilised community. One ought to laugh at them—at least occasionally, to prove that one is free from thraldom. It would really be a much saner policy to lock a man up who could not laugh at religion than to imprison him for holding it up to ridicule.

It is very suggestive that we only laugh at what are called "living" religions. Dead ones are quite safe. No one wishes to laugh at them, and people would be astonished if one were to. The religious stories of the Egyptians, or the Greeks, or the Romans may be recited or read without causing any amusement. Nay, we even forget that they are religious stories, once believed in as fervently as any current Christian doctrine, and become interested in them as material for psychologic study, as poetry, or as yielding a lesson for moral guidance. We read all these ancient legends, and none of us laugh. We hear the Christian legends preached and many of us cannot forbear smiling. Why this distinction? Egyptian, Greek, Roman, and Christian legends all belong to the same class. Well, the answer is that we do not really laugh at the legends, but at those who believe in them. We do not laugh at the story of Jesus walking on the water or casting devils out of lunatics, or at the story of his ascension to heaven; we laugh at people believing these to be historical events. There is really nothing in the stories, as stories, to cause laughter. It is the Christian who is ridiculous, and he is never more ridiculous than when he is engaged in pointing out that other people must discuss him and his beliefs with a gravity that neither of them deserve. If the Christian were only out of the way, we could treat the Biblical legends exactly as we treat the legends of other people. It is the believer who blocks the way. He is the only obstacle to intelligent people getting out of the Christian legends all the interest and instruction that they might be made to yield.

Suppose the legends of the Greek gods and goddesses were believed in by twentieth-century men and women? In that case, there would be the same cause and the same need for laughing at them that there now exists for laughing at Christian doctrines. Nay, we know that when these stories were believed, people did laugh at them, and we also know that these laughers are now recognised as the liberators of their day. Turn back to Aristophanes, and you will find him driving people into Rationalism by a thousand and one digs at popular beliefs. Or, better still, read Lucian, and you will find him pouring ridicule upon the religious doctrines of Paganism. And Lucian knew perfectly well what he was about. He knew that the only way to cure people of a ridiculous belief is to make it appear ridiculous. When a belief is no longer capable of serious intellectual defence it is impervious to serious intellectual attack. And then the only weapon left, and the only weapon it dreads, is ridicule. That is why Christianity nowadays, through the mouths of parsons and judges, says, "By all means argue solemnly with us, if you will; but do not laugh, lest we die."

The last time I heard the late W. T. Stead speak at a public meeting, he said he had come there to uphold the right to blaspheme. He was a genuine believer, and was content to leave the matter between the individual and God—who are the only parties really concerned. We, likewise, uphold the right of man to laugh at anything he pleases. If he is laughing at anything good, the world will soon be laughing at him, not with him. A good thing will outlive laughter, a bad thing will succumb sooner or later. Laughter is the great cure for fools—and the fools know it. There is nothing healthier than laughter. Physically, it aids health. Mentally, it makes for sanity. It is the world's great purifier, not only in religion, but in social and political matters likewise. So long as a people cannot laugh at an absurd practice or a ridiculous belief, they are never out of danger. They are like Madame de Staël, who had given up the belief in ghosts without ceasing to be afraid of them. The world has had many different sorts of religions, but it has never had one that taught its votaries to laugh. To have taught laughter would have been to encourage suicide. And they who understand the nature of religion among a civilised people will not lightly forgo the use of a weapon that can be wielded with such deadly effect.

C. COHEN.

The Blindness of Christian Prejudice.

IT is the custom of the Pulpit to make special appeals to the young, particularly to young men. Preachers imagine that they, and they alone, can serve as competent guides to the rising generation. The Rev. R. J. Campbell, for example, in a sermon which appears in the Christian World Pulpit for February 18, poses as such a trustworthy guide for the young men who attend the City Temple. It is the object of this article to furnish proofs that he seriously misleads them on several most important questions. At the commencement of his discourse, the reverend gentleman admits that "there is a good deal to be said in support of the contention" that "a Christian profession in no way argues that the person making it is superior in character to others who make no such profession." He alludes to the late George Jacob Holyoake as "one of the finest men I ever knew." In spite of his confessed unbelief, there are few men to-day, or in any other day, who, "for sheer uprightness, nobility of aim, moral courage, and generosity of soul," can be said to equal him. "His magnanimity, conscientiousness, and earnest devotion to what he considered the public good could not well be surpassed." This testimony to the exceptional excellence of Holyoake's character is more significant than Mr. Campbell imagines. On the assumption that this testimony is true, the following question inevitably forces itself upon us: If a Secularist, pure and simple, can blossom into an exceptionally good and efficient citizen, of what conceivable benefit is a Christian profession when the overwhelming majority of those who make it are morally his inferiors? Naturally, Mr. Campbell deplores the fact that the celebrated Freethinker neither possessed nor adequately appreciated what the preacher calls spirituality; but the fact remains that the supposed lack did not prevent him from standing out among his contemporaries as one who could not well be surpassed. Consequently, spirituality is not essential or indispensable to the best and noblest character.

Mr. Campbell gives copious extracts from an article in the Hibbert Journal by Mr. J. Arthur Hill, the gist of which is that professing Christians are not, on an average, the best people. The following passage is eminently worth transcribing:—

> "I go on to affirm without hesitation or doubt, that the definitely twice-born people known to me are not specially admirable characters, as compared with the once-born. The obvious retort is that this opinion is due to my own unregenerateness; sinner does not appreciate saint; a hero is not a hero to his valet; not because the hero is not a hero, but because the valet is a valet. And so on. But it is not a matter of mere subjec> tive likes and dislikes. It is a matter of objective fact. I find that the twice-born—the converted ones, the saints, the 'professors'—are less trustworthy in carrying out promises, in telling the scrupulous truth, in punctilious justice and honesty in the minor affairs of life, than the once-born.....Consider the converted. Among these brethren I find great (yea, even smug) respectability, great regard for externals, regular attendance at public worship, much emotion at revivals and prayer-meetings, much quoting of Scripture, and much spiritual pride. But exceptional honesty and veracity I do not find.....It seems to me that their deviations, their little meannesses and unveracities and dishonesties, are the result of their general build. Their religious temperament carries with it moral instability."

Such has been the persistent contention of this journal from its first number down to the present one, and it is exceedingly refreshing to find it so vigorously and cogently defended by a man of Mr. Hill's position. Now, having fully cited Mr. Hill's argument, how does Mr. Campbell proceed to demolish it? As a matter of fact, he completely evades it, contenting himself with assuming, without even attempting to prove it, that "the morality of to-day in this country is largely Christian morality, though tainted and perverted to some extent by other influences, such as commercialism, which are not Christian." The utter groundlessness of this assertion is proved by Mr. Campbell himself when, later on in the sermon, he makes this remarkable but true admission:—

> "Christianity, pure and simple, has never yet been tried at all. What we have is Christianity mixed with a far less desirable inheritance from other sources."

How, in the name of reason, can the morality of to-day in this country be largely Christian morality when Christianity itself, in its pristine purity, has never yet been tried at all? Take the inhabitants of Christendom as they are to-day, and you will soon learn that they are not conspicuous exemplifiers of the moral maxims embodied in the Sermon on the Mount. The beatitudes pronounced by Jesus have never yet been verified in history, and they are as far from verification now as ever they were. The meek have never adorned powerful thrones, nor has the lot of the poor been blessed. Whatever the peacemakers may be in a hypothetical kingdom of heaven, upon this real earth they have always been a miserable minority, scarcely ever listened to. Like other people, Christians lay up for themselves treasures here below which, when they go above, they are obliged to leave behind them, often to be fought for in the courts by their surviving relatives and friends. The truth is that the religion of the Gospel Jesus has never yet been tried at all, and that the morality of Christendom has always been more Pagan than Christian.

What is the use of summoning the late Henry Ward Beecher and Dr. Horton as authorities on a subject in relation to which it is impossible to regard them but as hopelessly biased judges? According to them, outside Christendom and Christian influence cruelty and lust hold sway, while tenderness, honor, respect for womanhood, and consideration for the weak do not exist, and are not even understood as we understand them. Dr. Horton is stone-blind with prejudice when he says that if those who are lukewarm on the question of the necessity for foreign missions would only go and see with their own eyes the state of Heathendom they would soon change their attitude. Is not the reverend gentleman aware that many entirely unprejudiced European scholars have gone and lived for years in closest touch with Indian, Chinese, and Japanese Pagans, and afterwards have borne unmistakable witness to the fact that what those nations need is, not conversion to an alien religion, but undisturbed freedom to work out their own salvation in their own way? Dr. Horton saw India in the light of his Christian upbringing and long-cherished Christian prejudices, as well as through the eyes of the Christian missionaries there whom he so ardently admires. We prefer to trust the judgment of Lord Curzon, Professor Giles, Chester Holcombe, Eugene Simon, A. Smith, G. E. Morrison, and Fielding Hall, who have devoted many long years to the study of Paganism on the spot, as to the true condition of Heathendom, rather than that of a Christian minister or layman who pays a flying visit to a Pagan country and looks at it through colored spectacles, with a view to promoting fresh zeal for foreign missions on his return.

Extremely unfortunate is Mr. Campbell's allusion to John Stuart Mill because of its inaccuracy. Here it is word for word:—

> "The late John Stuart Mill, for example, declared that he could not imagine a better ideal of conduct for a man than so to live that Jesus Christ would approve his life."

What Mill did say on this point is contained in his famous essay on "The Utility of Religion," and is as follows:—

> "The thought that our dead parents or friends would have approved our conduct is a scarcely less powerful motive than the knowledge that our living ones do approve it; and the idea that Socrates, or Howard, or Washington, or Antoninus, or Christ, would have sympathised with us, or that we are attempting to do our part in the spirit in which they did theirs, has operated on the very best minds, as a strong incentive to act up to their highest feelings and convictions" (Three Essays on Religion, p. 50).

Mill did not exalt Christ above all other teachers, but distinctly declared that the Gospel Jesus at his very best was equalled by Marcus Aurelius, whom "we have no ground for believing to have been in any way indebted to Christianity" (p. 46). Indeed, John Stuart Mill taught a totally opposite doctrine to that set forth in Mr. Campbell's sermon. The main point of his Essay is that, however necessary and useful belief in the supernatural may have been in the dark ages of ignorance and inexperience, it is no longer required in order to achieve the very highest moral results. Mr. Campbell does not adduce a single fact in support of his wild assertions. It is the merest tomfoolery to exclaim that "Atheists, Agnostics, Materialists, Indifferentists, and all who for one cause or another are out of touch with the Christian Church, are yet the debtors of Jesus Christ." It is not what Christ brought into the world that we acknowledge as the standard for imitation, or as the goal to be aimed at both by the individual and society. Mr. Campbell knows as well as we do that the Gospel Jesus brought absolutely nothing new into the world. Moral principles are as old as the race, magnificent expressions of which were abroad and working in the world thousands of years before Jesus Christ was ever heard of. All that is true in Christianity is as old as the hills, and good men and true have lived by it in all ages and countries; but whatever is peculiar to it is notoriously false, and has been, on that account, quietly ignored, even by Christians.

We close this article in Mr. Campbell's own words, which occur, strangely enough, in the very sermon we have been criticising:—

> "To live together in anything like order there has to be give and take. If Christianity had never been heard of, we should still have been insisting on certain kinds of conduct as meritorious, and others as objectionable, the meritorious, in our view, being that which promotes social welfare, and the objectionable being the opposite, namely, anti-social in tendency."

Two or three sentences further on, however, the reverend gentleman deliberately contradicts himself by saying that if you take faith in Christ out of society you will destroy what has lifted it to its present level, and that it will only be a matter of time before it gradually reverts to its original savage state. And yet we are assured by those who know, that Pagan China is morally not one whit behind the best country in Christendom. We are quite aware that, as Emerson says, "a foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds"; but there is a wise, logical, and scientific consistency which a popular saying calls "a jewel," and this higher consistency the sermon under discussion repeatedly disregards.

Science and the Soul.—V.

"The effect of science upon philosophy is to simplify it, to bring it down from the clouds to the earth, to incarnate it, to dispel the mysticism that enshrouds it, and establish it upon the basis of reality—in a word, to materialise it. The facts of science are multitudinous and hard to find out, but when obtained they are always simple, rational, intelligible. So plain and homely are they that, when acquired by long and diligent labor, the world is not satisfied with them. They do not come up to its ideal standard reached by pure intellectual contemplation. The ideas of things before the facts have been worked out are always tinged with many-colored hues and trimmed with a golden border. This comes of poetic imagery common to mind itself. It is this that makes all truth so unwelcome when it is first announced. Truth comes unadorned. It is straightforward, plain, and reasonable. Therefore it does not satisfy."—LESTER WARD, Dynamic Sociology, vol. i., p. 422.

"The true rulers of men are the thinkers who advance knowledge; for just as it is through his superior strength that man bears rule over the rest of the animal creation, so among men themselves it is knowledge which in the long run directs and controls the forces of society. Thus the discoverers of new truths are the real though uncrowned and unsceptered kings of mankind; monarchs, statesmen, and law-givers are but their ministers, who, sooner or later, do their bidding by carrying out the ideas of these master-minds."—PROFESSOR G. FRAZER, Psyche's Task, p. 167.

WHEN you have explained, to one who has been brought up in the orthodox belief, how science dispenses with the soul, his first question is to ask how it is that so many people—including such distinguished men as Russel Wallace, Lord Kelvin, Sir Oliver Lodge, and Mr. Balfour—believe in its existence? This is easily answered. They believe it because the belief was instilled into their minds before they were capable of reasoning upon the subject. Their reasoning powers are like loaded dice—they always fall one way. As we have seen, the Buddhists, who are more numerous than the Christians, have no belief in an immortal soul, any more than they have a belief in the Bible, simply because they were not taught the belief during childhood.

Moreover, the beliefs of our intellectual aristocracy are not the same as those of the ordinary unlearned man, the plain man, the man-in-the-street. It is nothing less than a fraud, when apologists for religion compile lists of distinguished men who are said to believe in a God, a soul, and a future life, in order to keep in countenance the unlearned man in his superstitions. The names of the beliefs are the same, but the ideas they stand for are as far asunder as the poles. Upon this point listen to the testimony of a master of science. It is Dr. J. G. Frazer, the famous author of The Golden Bough, who speaks. Dr. Frazer, Fellow of Cambridge University, and Professor of Social Anthropology at the University of Liverpool, whose works are discussed in every quarter of the world where learned men are gathered together. He is addressing the highly educated classes; students of universities, people who can afford five pounds—the price of the last edition of The Golden Bough—for a book, as easily as a working man can afford sixpence for one. Dr. Frazer has been exploring the religious recesses of the popular mind. With bated breath he enlightens his audience upon the true state of affairs among the lower strata of society—that is, among those who have not been educated at colleges and universities.

The Professor observes that the reason why superstitions survive is that the better ideas always forming in upper classes of society are so slow in filtering to the bottom, if indeed they ever get there, that they are often obsolete and superseded by others at the top. He proceeds:—

> "Hence it is that if we could open the heads and read the thoughts of two men of the same generation and country, but at opposite ends of the intellectual scale, we should probably find their minds as different as if the two belonged to different species."*

* J. G. Frazer, Psyche's Task, pp. 168-9.

And, as he further remarks:—

> "The reason why the higher forms of superstition or religion (for the religion of one generation is apt to become the superstition of the next) are less permanent than the lower is simply that the higher beliefs, being a creation of superior intelligence, have little hold on the minds of the vulgar, who nominally profess them for a time in conformity with the will of their betters, but readily shed and forget them as soon as these beliefs have gone out of fashion with the educated classes. But while they dismiss without a pang or an effort articles of faith which were only superficially imprinted on their minds by the weight of cultured opinion, the ignorant and foolish multitude cling with a sullen determination to far grosser beliefs which really answer to the coarser texture of their undeveloped intellect. Thus while the avowed creed of the enlightened minority is constantly changing under the influence of reflection and inquiry, the real, though unavowed, creed of the mass of mankind appears to be almost stationary, and the reason why it alters so little is that in the majority of men, whether they are savages or outwardly civilised beings, intellectual progress is so slow as to be hardly perceptible. The surface of society, like that of the sea, is in perpetual motion; its depths, like those of the ocean, remain almost unmoved."*

That is how a Professor, speaking to the intellectual few at the surface of society, thinks of the religious beliefs of the millions beneath. It will be noticed that Dr. Frazer speaks of "the higher forms of superstition or religion" as though superstition and religion were convertible terms.

The result of the researches into the folklore of the peasantry of Europe, commenced by the brothers Grimm in Germany, are still more disquieting. They reveal, says Dr. Frazer:—

> "the astonishing, nay, alarming truth that a mass, if not the majority of people in every civilised country is still living in a state of intellectual savagery; that, in fact, the smooth surface of cultured society is sapped and mined by superstition. Only those whose studies have led them to investigate the subject are aware of the depth to which the ground beneath our feet is thus, as it were, honeycombed by unseen forces. We appear to be standing on a volcano which may at any moment break out in smoke and fire to spread ruin and devastation among the gardens and palaces of ancient culture wrought so laboriously by the hand of many generations."†

Dr. Frazer also cites the testimony of Renan, who in a letter to Berthelot, declares that, after contrasting the Greek ruins at Paestum with the savagery of the Italian peasantry, "I trembled for civilisation, seeing it so limited, built on so weak a foundation, resting on so few individuals even in the country where it is dominant." Was it not Professor Clifford who declared that:—

> "Every rustic who delivers in the village alehouse his slow, infrequent sentences, may help to kill or keep alive the fatal superstitions which clog his race. Every hard-worked wife of an artisan may transmit to her children beliefs which shall knit society together, or rend it in pieces. No simplicity of mind, no obscurity of station, can escape the universal duty of questioning all that we believe."‡

After being defeated on the field of science in his search for facts to establish the existence of the soul, the true believer retreats into what he considers to be an impregnable fortress, and from which he defies the Rationalist to oust him. He says, "Oh, yes, no doubt you have all the facts on your side, but you will never convince me that I am on the level of the animals." And, placing his hand over his heart, he triumphantly declares, "I feel, I know that I possess a soul. You cannot get over that."

Now, by the very action of placing his hand over the heart, he unconsciously revealed the irrational source of his conviction. For the ancients believed the source of the emotions and feelings lay in the heart; and among savage tribes the same theory prevails. The savage will eat the heart of the lion or tiger he has slain; or, among cannibals, the heart of his enemy, so that he may assimilate the qualities of strength and courage which he thinks have their origin in the heart. But, as we have seen, the seat of the emotions and feeling lies in the brain. Therefore, believers, when indicating the seat of the soul, should smite the head and not the chest.

And here, again, science is not at the end of its resources. The fortress is not so impregnable as the true believer imagines. Science shows incontestably how man arrived at the idea of a soul. It shows that religion, like the body and mind of man, has had a natural origin; that it was not revealed by God from some cloudy mountain top, but has evolved from the dreams and delusions of primitive man.

It has taken thousands of years for man to reach his present position of civilisation. But let us try and place ourselves in his position, shortly after he evolved from his brute ancestors. Nature would present innumerable pitfalls to his childish intelligence. As Lecky, the historian, remarks:—

> "We speak of the Divine veracity. What is the whole history of the intellectual progress of the world but one long struggle of the intellect of man to emancipate itself from the deceptions of nature? Every object that meets the eye of the savage awakens his curiosity only to lure him into some deadly error. The sun that seems a diminutive light revolving around his world; the moon and the stars that appear formed only to light his path; the strange fantastic diseases that suggest irresistibly the notion of present dæmons; the terrific phenomena of nature which appear the results, not of blind forces, but of isolated spiritual agencies—all these things fatally, inevitably, invincibly impel him into superstition. Through long centuries the superstitions thus generated have deluged the world with blood. Millions of prayers have been vainly breathed to what we now know were inexorable laws of nature. Only after ages of toil did the mind of man emancipate itself from these deadly errors to which by the deceptive appearances of nature the long infancy of humanity is universally doomed."*

To show the steps by which primitive man arrived at the idea of a soul, or spirit, will form the subject of our next article.

Acid Drops.

The Staffordshire Sentinel thinks it necessary to print the truism that "Atheists don't know everything." Neither do the editors of pious newspapers. The editor of the Sentinel commits himself to the statement that "the late Charles Bradlaugh never condescended to call himself an Atheist." That is precisely what he did call himself. The very last number of the National Reformer that appeared in his lifetime contained, right under its title and his name, the statement that its policy was "Atheistic."

The British Board of Film Censors last year examined 1,444 miles of pictures. They should feel like the Second Person of the Trinity after he had seen all the nations of the earth at a glance, at the invitation of the Devil.

The British Board of Film Censors enumerates the following amongst the films rejected during the past year:—"The irreverent treatment of sacred or solemn subjects." "Materialisation of Christ or the Almighty." "Holding up a minister of religion to ridicule." The last takes the cake. It appears that only ministers of religion require protection against laughter.

"Lord Radstock, the evangelical preacher, left £64,604," says a daily paper. From a Christian point of view, it is good that he "left" the money, otherwise his chances of climbing the golden stairs were very remote.

Mr. R. J. Campbell recently paid quite a handsome tribute to the late George Jacob Holyoake, in the course of which he said that "for sheer uprightness, nobility of aim, moral courage, and generosity of soul there are very few men today, or in any other day, to equal him." Of course, such praise could not be given without some qualification, otherwise there would be no room at the top for the Christian. Consequently, we learn that what Holyoake lacked was "spirituality"; he had no sense of fellowship with God. Well, if a man can be all that Mr. Campbell says Mr. Holyoake was, it seems to us that he can get along very well without "conscious fellowship with God." It is quite certain that this "spirituality" does not always make those who possess it either upright, noble, generous, or morally courageous. And it is little less than insulting to praise a man for possessing all these qualities and then to conclude with a sanctimonious whine, "But, alas, my dear friend, you lack spirituality." Such impertinent cant leaves a bad taste in one's mouth.

In an article in the Hibbert Journal, from which Mr. Campbell gives citations, Mr. J. A. Hill compares the Freethinker generally with those who have attained this "conscious fellowship with God." He affirms the "exceptional trustworthiness of those Freethinkers of his acquaintance." He says "They are as reliable as the force of gravity, both in their fulfilling of promises, the justice of their actions, and the veracity of their statements." On the other hand, among those "spiritually" alive,

> "exceptional honesty and veracity I do not find. I do not charge them with deliberate lapses, though it needs a robust charity to give them so large benefit of the doubt, in many cases known to me. It seems to me rather that their deviations, their little meannesses and unveracities and dishonesties, are the result of their general mental build. Their religious temperament carries with it moral instability."

This is precisely what we have said times out of number. Religious belief of the stronger emotional type is quite consistent with abstention from what the world reckons as vices from the legal point of view. But it is also commonly consistent—when it does encourage—with the manifestation of a hundred-and-one petty vices of character, which, while not legally reprehensible, do far more than legal offences to lower the general tone of private and public life. Veracity, for example, lies at the root of many virtues, and is an important constituent of nearly all; and it is precisely the one that counts for least in the "spiritual" scale of virtues.

Finally, Mr. Campbell declares that "what made Mr Holyoake, that is, what makes the goodness of every good man who lives amongst us," is the fact that our morality is Christian morality. This is a very stale plea, but it is quite false. There never has been a society on the face of the earth where the morality was Christian, and there never will be. Morality comes from life, not from creeds, and any good that Christianity teaches, or has taught, is to be placed to the credit of human association, not to religion. What has the love of parent for child, of friend for friend, what the conception of duty, the feeling of sympathy, the conception of honor or honesty to do with the fantastic doctrines that constitute the essence of Christianity? Why man's greatest work, from primitive times onward, has been to moralise his religion. And the proof of this is seen in that doctrines and teachings are only abandoned as wanting in morality when the moralised social sense has made them no longer possible. Gods are moralised by man, they never moralise man. It is far nearer the truth to say that Christians owe their improved character to Freethinkers than the other way about. For ourselves we prefer to have it that improved morality results from a keener intelligence, a livelier sympathy, and a better social environment. Freethinkers are apt to express this tendency earlier and better than Christians, simply because their freedom from superstition makes them more likely subjects.

The parish church of Haverhill, Suffolk, was recently restored. Services were held on Sunday morning and afternoon, Feb. 15, and although no fire had been lighted for more than a week, the place was burnt out by a fire starting in the organ loft. Incendiarism is suspected. Was it Jehovah, who rules the lightnings—or Satan, who is able to bring blazes from Hades? We pause for a reply.

Rev. T. H. Senior, vicar of Holy Trinity Church, Aldershot, attended a jubilee meeting of the local Presbyterian Church. He thought it necessary to explain his position—after nearly two thousand years of Christianity.

It is so strange for one Church to give another a leg up. What a religion!

Will those gilt-edged Agnostics who are always declaring that the war with Christianity is over kindly ponder the following figures? The cutting is from the Daily Mail of February 20:—

> "The following is a summary from the 'Official Year Book of the Church of England' of the voluntary offerings of the Church for the year ending last Easter:—
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | "For Home work ... ... | £814,808 |
> | ,, Foreign work ... ... | £933,981 |
> | ,, Philanthropic work ... ... | £609,010 |
> | ,, Parochial clergy ... ... | £863,802 |
> | ,, Elementary education ... | £573,647 |
> | ,, General parochial purposes ... | £3,829,118 |
> | Total ... ... | £7,900,230" |

The battle over—is it? Why with figures like these it hardly seems to have begun.

We don't answer for these Daily Mail figures. They are clearly wrong. But just as clearly they stand for an immense total.

"Mr. Roosevelt at Large" is the wording of a half-column notice in the Daily Chronicle. We are glad to hear it, and we may hope for that apology from the ex-President for his perfectly false and gratuitous insults to Thomas Paine.

The Paul Pry attitude of some of the puritanical United States officials towards the private affairs of Marie Lloyd is ludicrous. Probably the popular comedienne will retaliate on the Benighted States on her return to civilisation.

Lord Weardale should have the respect of all Freethinkers for his life's work on behalf of all sorts of "advanced" causes. He is still active in the International Peace movement. He was of great service to the Secular Education League in taking the Presidency for the first two years. Some of the Freethought members of the League will remember his admirable address as chairman of the fine St. James's Hall meeting, at which Mr. J. Ramsay Macdonald, M.P., the leader of the Labor Party, was one of the speakers—with Mr. George Greenwood, M.P., Mr. G. W. Foote, Mr. Cohen, and the Rev. Father Hole. Lord Weardale's face is one of great intelligence and refinement. He is sixty seven years of age, and his physique is not powerful. One could hardly have imagined him as the victim of a deliberate bodily assault. Yet such has been the fact. A female hooligan, twenty-four years of age, took a dog-whip with her to Euston Station, where she found him on his way to attend a family wedding. She struck him on the head from behind, and the blow, with others after it, brought him to the ground. The result was a visit of all the parties concerned to Clerkenwell Police-court. The female hooligan is in the prime of her young womanhood, and will not encounter unbearable suffering. Her victim is at a time of life when such assaults cannot be borne with impunity. It is positively sickening that such a man should be the object of such an outrage.

It appears that the female hooligan thought she was assaulting Mr. Asquith—as if that were a condonation of her offence. But she did not utter the least apology for her blunder. One of her leaders, Mrs. Dacre Fox, went to the length of calling this act of hooliganism "a magnificent protest." If Lord Weardale bears a resemblance to Mr. Asquith, that is his look-out. A suffragette with a dog-whip is not to be stopped by such a trifling question as to whether she is striking the right person. After all, somebody in the shape of a man gets it—and is barred by the laws of civilised society from giving it back, which is a comforting reflection to these members of the "downtrodden sex." Mrs. Dacre Fox suggests that Lord Weardale, and other men who resemble Cabinet Ministers, should "change their appearance." Otherwise they "must take their chance of being assaulted." These are the ladies who denounce the dominance of man. Fortunately, they form but a small, though noisy, portion of their sex.

It is not the cause of woman suffrage that makes certain women assaulters and incendiaries. It is their violent natures that are attracted by the violent section of the woman suffrage movement. They gain an opportunity of gratifying their personal inclinations in the name of their principles. They are the Thugs of their cause.

How some women resent having their own code of manners turned upon themselves! A pious American lady—for no reason whatever, except his public lectures against Christianity—called Ingersoll "a dog." He replied by asking her how she would like him to return the compliment, only changing the sex to suit the circumstances. The lady didn't relish that sort of "equality."

The old notion of the sentimental novel that man is usually a sort of a devil and woman almost always a saint is as far as possible from the truth of the case. In some things man is better than woman; in some things woman is better than man. Both the resemblance and the difference are the result of evolution—of the position and history of both in the life of the race. In some respects woman is better and worse than man. She is more tender-hearted and more cruel. It was noted in the Roman gladiatorial shows that the male spectators were kinder to the defeated gladiator than the females, who generally turned their thumbs down for the unfortunate man's slaughter. It is noticeable even now that nearly all the most abominable cases of cruelty to children, except, of course, where sheer lust is concerned—are the work of women. The latest case is that of Sarah Savage—an extraordinarily appropriate name!—of George's-road, Holloway, who has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment for keeping her three girls in the most inhuman conditions in a small room for sixteen months, so that they became half-imbecile, and the doctor thinks that they will never quite recover from the effects of their treatment for that length of time. That the woman was poor is true, but that is no excuse for her crime. It was not in any way necessitated by her poverty. It is here, indeed, that we come to a critical point of the discussion. Woman's maternity—and nothing else—clothes her with a certain sacredness. It is at the root of all her virtues, and of man's respect for her sex—which is otherwise only associated with his own egoism. And the perversion or frustration of woman's racial instinct is generally connected with her most odious failings. Once more the old Roman proverb is justified. The corruption of the best is the worst.

A New York Theatre is advertising its bill of six plays as ranging "from laughs to blushes." There are plenty of "laughs" in the Bible. As for "blushes" they swarm, and some of them are quite purple.

Dr. Charles Aked, president of the Californian Church Federation, is not to resign after all. He tendered his resignation, but it was not accepted. It is open, therefore, to any preacher connected with that body to deny both the miraculous birth and the miraculous death of Jesus Christ. All that is left is his sermons, which are praised and—neglected.

What is Christianity? This question is puzzling the ministers of religion as well as laymen. The Bishop of London has presented to Convocation a petition signed by 676 clergy of the London diocese expressing their grave anxiety at this present time "in consequence of the unrebuked denial of certain fundamental truths of the Faith by some who hold office in the Church, and in consequence of the widespread tendency to approach the problem of reunion among Christians in a way that is clearly inconsistent with the belief that episcopal ordination is essential to a valid ministry of the Word and sacraments." The petition proceeded as follows:—

> "We are driven to ask our spiritual fathers, first to repudiate the claim of some clergy to reject the miracles of our Lord's birth of a virgin and the actual resurrection of his body from the tomb, because we believe that these truths lie at the very centre of the faith, and that the statements of the Bible and the creeds with regard to them are perfectly plain and unambiguous.
> "And, second, to make it plain that, in accordance with the teaching of the Church in all ages, the Church of England has already taught, and must continue to teach, the necessity of episcopal ordination as a condition of exercising the ministry of the Word and sacraments."

"Our spiritual fathers," as the Bishops are called, are not likely to take this stiff job in hand. The safest course nowadays is to join hands with Mr. Facing-Both-Ways.

The Daily News hopes that Mr. Watts-Dunton's reluctance to publish his personal reminiscences of Swinburne may be overcome. We hardly know whether to say "Ay" or "No" to this. Mr. Watts-Dunton betrayed Swinburne at his funeral by allowing a clergyman to officiate at the graveside. What if he betrayed the Atheist poet in his reminiscences too? We are afraid that is what would happen. So perhaps it is best, after all, that Mr. Watts-Dunton should potter along peacefully now to his own last rest.

Some discussion has taken place in the pages of a contemporary as to whether Baron Munchausen, the famous author, was the most mendacious of writers. Surely the championship belongs to the Oriental scribe who wrote the account of Noah's Ark, although some of his imaginative colleagues run him very close.

Sir Owen Seaman, editor of Punch, says that "the true parodist must be reverent." Sir Owen is far too respectable to have read Hone's clever parodies of the Athanasian Creed; but a deal less reverence would make Punch less like a parish magazine.

Sir Oliver Lodge has predicted a very severe winter. We do not know if this is based on "spiritual" advice; but the weather has not justified the prophet so far. If Sir Oliver's forecasts concerning a future existence are not more exact, we may regard the prophecy as something like Old Moore's.

A provincial paper recently announced the death of a person as occurring on July 14, 1914. That is certainly previous; but on the Gold Coast, medicine-men prophesy deaths, and see to it that the corpse is ready for the funeral.

It appears that a sum of £3,000,000 was subscribed last year in the United Kingdom for Foreign Missions. It is a pity that this money was not applied to a better purpose at home, and it would be if only the mass of subscribers knew the truth about the movement. Such a sum spent on such a cause is enough to make one despair of human sanity.

Some few years ago one of the President of the British Association warned Englishmen that the German danger was not in either fleet or army, but in its more efficient educational system. He added that the German public had reached a far higher educational level than our own, and that it would take two generations of hard work for us to overtake them. The other day Lord Haldane repeated the warning. There is, he said, "a deadlier peril menacing these islands than any foreign army or foreign navy. It is the peril of ignorance, of mental inertia, of slipshod ways of thinking and acting, of a depressed average of intelligence." Lord Haldane added that when he went to the War Office he found that thirteen per cent. of the recruits could neither read nor write. They had passed through elementary schools, and had then forgotten even this small modicum of education.

These are striking statements, and we believe the root of the trouble is to be found in the fact that the English people have never taken seriously the idea of education. They have assented to its being rather than desired it. The public at large places small value on intellectual attainments, even while professing an admiration for them. Moreover, the squabbles of the sects to gain control of the schools in the interests of Church or Chapel have been a powerful factor in hiding from the public the importance of the subject. "The Education Question" has come to mean little more to a large number of people than the quarrel over the subject of religion. It is this that has perpetuated inefficient sectarian schools, and, as the late Lord Salisbury once said, induced sectarian leaders to obstruct improvements in State schools in order to diminish expenses in their own establishments. Lord Haldane must be fully aware of these facts, and it will be a great pity if he lends his support to any Government measure that promises to still further prolong the struggle of the Churches for the control of the children of the nation.

Miss Betham-Edwards' Home Life in France, just added to Methuen's shilling library. The lady, who may be depended upon for accuracy as well as impartiality in writing of French affairs, has words of praise for both Catholic priest and Protestant pastor. Within their own Churches they are often excellent men, poor but honest and paternal; but when it comes to other Churches than their own they are intensely bigoted. Miss Betham-Edwards says:—

> "Although the Catholic and Protestant population live harmoniously side by side, intermarriages are rare, and the rival churches neither gain nor lose adherents to any appreciable extent. Between Protestant pastor and Catholic priest in any part of France there is no kind of intercourse whatever."

No kind of intercourse whatever. What a terrible spirit! And this in genial, joyous France—the country of Rabelais and Voltaire. What is to be expected, then, of Orangemen and Puritans?

One cannot help thinking of the calm but awful statement of the great implacable Swift, that most men have religion enough to make them hate each other.

Gentle Jesus, A Book for His Little Children is a recent publication for the young. We never knew that the Man of Sorrows was a father. But you never can tell, and we are willing to learn of the clergy in these matters.

A new magazine has just been published under the quaint title, the Trinity Magazine. It has nothing to do with the popular three-headed Deity, but emanates from Cambridge University.

God's Own Country is the title of a new book on Australia. A land with such a name should have a Bible of its own. Should the humorists of the Sydney Bulletin have a hand in its production, it would prove a very interesting volume.

Religious statistics are often amusing reading. One of the funniest examples is that to be found in the current issue of Whitaker's Almanac, where the total population of the world is given as 1,623,000,000, and the population, divided as to religions, is totalled as 1,646,491,000, or 23,491,000 in excess of the world's inhabitants. A still more humorous result of the figures is that not a solitary Freethinker is included in the total. The pious statistician might have allowed a baker's dozen of sceptics to save his face; but maybe he thought thirteen an unlucky number.

An elderly woman collapsed and fell dead while Mass was being celebrated at the Roman Catholic Cathedral at Kirkdale, Liverpool. Was it a judgment or an accident?

The Bishop of Gibraltar has written a book on The Glory of Going On. There is a good deal of "glory" on the "Rock" at a bishop's salary; but some of the "stony" parsons elsewhere will have difficulty in perceiving it.

"One of the Christian doctrines I never had any difficulty in believing was that of original sin," says the genial Mr. Birrell, the Irish Secretary. Has he heard the peripatetic patterers of the Christian Evidence Society?

The strike habit has penetrated the Christian fold. Recently, at a large chapel in the Midlands, the choir "downed" hymn-books over the appointment of a new choirmaster, and a choir of "blacklegs" had to be recruited from the congregation. When these Christians get to heaven, they will be throwing each other over the battlements.

That sage person, the Bishop of London, considers that "The Church is becoming more human." It was about time.

We take the following news item from the Midland Evening News (Feb. 21):—

> "CIRCULATION OF 'LIFE OF CHRIST.'
> "At Festiniog Town Council, last night, Councillor Cadwaladr Roberts gave notice of motion in favor of withdrawing from circulation in the public library Renan's Life of Christ. A book of that nature, he said, tended to undermine the work and influence of the ministers of religion in the town. If a book like that was circulated in the public library, what was the good of paying scores of pounds weekly in salaries to ministers? It was the duty of the Council to see that the tone of all books circulated in the library were healthy. Councillor Evan Jones: I shall second the motion."

We hope to receive a report of the sequel—which ought to be interesting, especially in view of the age of Renan's book.

The Daily Mail recently had a column article on "The Value of the Street Mouth." It contained no references to the amiable babblers who, in company with a harmonium and several female friends, make the streets of our towns hideous on Sundays.

The Tailor and Cutter has fallen foul of some prominent statesmen for their laxity in dress. It would be interesting to hear our contemporary's views of the bizarre dresses of the twelve apostles.

"Kikuyu Tracts," a series of screeds on a live theological controversy, will soon be published, and will be written by a Bishop and some Nonconformists. Let us hope that they will not kick each other too much.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday March 1, North Saloon, City Hall, Glasgow; 12 (noon), "Shakespeare's Humanism in the Merchant of Venice"; 6.30, "Mr. Balfour on God."

March 22, Manchester.

To Correspondents.

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings and paper. There is a difficulty in the way of our noticing the latter—as we think you will have seen.

J. F. AUST.—See paragraph. Thanks.

WALTER DAVIDSON.—You are getting along all right. The Edmonton bigots have found a Tartar. We will see about the Lincoln matter and let you know.

Z. A. 2.—Your Italian postcard is no good at this end. Your personal trouble commands our sympathy, but we are not able to help you in the way suggested.

T. H. ELTON.—Mistakes on matters of fact are easily made if the memory is not refreshed with regard to books one has not read for many years. That you tried to refer to Tess, but failed to get a copy in time, was unfortunate; yet the essence of the matter, after all, seems unaffected.

W. MANN.—Tuesday morning; had to shorten.

R. STIRTON.—Thanks again for your constant service in this matter.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

The President's Honorarium Fund.

To the Freethinkers of Great Britain.

January, 1914.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—

We renew our appeal on behalf of the above Fund, which is now so well known to the Freethought party that its object may be stated in a very few words. It is sought to relieve Mr. G. W. Foote—President of the National Secular Society, Chairman of the Secular Society (Ltd.), and Editor of the Freethinker—of his worst financial worries, so that he may be as free as possible to devote his time and energies to his work as the leader of the militant Freethought movement in this country. We suggested that £800 a year might be raised in this way and placed at his disposal. We are happy to say that the average has reached that amount.

A generous subscriber made up the deficit of some £20 in 1912, and another friend offered to make up any deficit in 1913. Happily but £3 odd was necessary. Perhaps it will become a fashion for the £800 to be made up fully in this manner.

Mr. Foote's income from other sources at present is more restricted than ever. He intends to explain this matter himself very shortly. In the meanwhile we have to assure the Freethought party that the time has not arrived when they might think of diminishing their subscriptions to this Fund.

With regard to the Freethinker, we are sorry to learn from Mr. Foote that it still yields him no salary. The business of the Pioneer Press (including the Freethinker) has turned the corner from loss to profit; but the latter is as yet scarcely worth a mention.

All subscriptions received have been acknowledged week by week in the Freethinker, and will continue to be acknowledged in that way.

Subscriptions for 1914 can be forwarded to either of the undersigned. Those who prefer to do so can send, as before, direct to Mr. Foote himself, at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.

Subscribers who do not wish their names to appear in print should state the form of acknowledgment they prefer.

We are aware that all subscribers cannot conveniently respond to this appeal at once, but we hope a great many will do so as early as possible.

Yours faithfully,

J. W. DE CAUX, J.P.,
92 St. Peter's-road, Gt. Yarmouth.
R. T. NICHOLS, M.D.,
28 Park-road, Ilford.
A. J. FINCKEN,
66 Mount Grove-road, Highbury, London, N.

Third List of Subscriptions.

Previously acknowledged, £40 3s. 3d. Received since Isaac Jackson, £10; John G. Dobson, 5s.; E. A. H., 5s. J. F. Aust, 5s.; Robert Stirton and Friends (Dundee)—quarterly, £1 5s.; Lt.-Col. Stuart Graham, 9s. 6d.; Henry A. Lupton, £10 10s.

Sugar Plums.

Mr. Foote pays his long-expected visit to Glasgow to-day (March 1) and lectures for the local N. S. S. Branch at the North Saloon, City Hall (not far from the old Hall in Brunswick-street that was destroyed by fire). The first lecture is timed for 12 o'clock (noon)—the subject being "Shakespeare's Humanism in the Merchant of Venice." The second lecture is at 6.30 p.m.—the subject being "Mr. Balfour on God." This will be a criticism of Mr. Balfour's recent Gifford Lectures; one of the very few honest criticisms they are ever likely to receive.

It will be a great pleasure to Mr. Foote to meet his Glasgow friends once more. It is not the lectures that make him lose some of the old zest in these visits, for he takes nearly as much delight in them as he did twenty years ago. It is the ever-growing distaste of travelling, with its tiresomeness and frightful waste of time. Some people dread the speed of express trains. Mr. Foote wishes they went a thousand miles an hour. That would certainly prolong his work upon the Freethought platform.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd attends the anniversary meeting of the Leicester Secular Society at the Secular Hall, Humberstone-gate, to-day (March 1).

The National Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws has engaged Essex Hall for Friday evening, March 20, when a public meeting will be held, of which a detailed announcement will follow.

The Secular Education League holds its annual Members' meeting on Tuesday evening, March 24, in Room I of the Caxton Hall. The chair will be taken at 7.30. This will be followed by a public meeting at 8.15. It is hoped that Mr. George Greenwood will be able to preside, and the list of speakers includes Mr. Halley Stewart, Sir Henry Cotton, Lady Byles, Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., Rev. Dr. Walter Walsh, and Mr. G. W. Foote.

Mr. Henry A. Lupton, one of the "old guard" in North London, who did good work many years ago at Milton Hall, has done a thing which other Freethinkers might imitate. Sending us his regular subscription of 10s. to the President's Honorarium Fund, he adds £10 to it for the present year. He has had a stroke of luck, and he had made a vow that if it arrived he would remember Mr. Foote. He concludes that, as vows are registered in heaven, the Lord has something to do with this matter. "God can favor me in this way as often as he likes," he says, "and I will send you a contribution every time." We cordially concur.

Mr. Isaac Jackson, the friend in Burma who offered to make up any deficit in the President's Honorarium Fund for 1913, was agreeably surprised to find that only £3 17s. 5d. was wanted on the thirty-first of December. To cover this he has generously remitted £5, with another £10 towards the 1914 Fund. We cannot ask every intending subscriber to be as liberal, but we might wish them—or all who can—to be as prompt. It would be a considerable gratification to us if the Fund could be subscribed up fully, and removed from our pages long before the end of the year.

Mr. W. Bailey, the treasurer of a Fund that has been subscribed privately throughout the Freethought party, asks us to announce that the total amount collected was £278 16s. 8d.; that printing, stationery, and postage cost £5 13s. 11d.; and that the net balance of £273 2s. 9d. has been handed over to the recipient. This is a very bald announcement, but to say more would only violate the privacy which we were asked to regard as a sine qua non at the outset. Mr. Bailey, and all others concerned, will understand.

Mr. Allen Upward's very able and interesting book, the Divine Mystery, which was the subject of an article from Mr. Cohen's pen some time ago in our pages, contains many references to matters and persons with which our own readers, and especially the older ones, are more or less familiar. We note a reference (on p. 200) to the late Mr. R. M. Morell "the worthy founder of the National Sunday League." Mr. Morell was a founder of the Sunday League, but not the founder. There were others, though he might be called the principal one. The truth is that he lived to such an old age that he stood to a later generation as the founder, by subsuming, as it were, all his colleagues who had died. But that is by the way. Mr. Upward's point is in Mr. Morell's confession of his and his colleagues ill-treatment by religious bigots in the earlier days of the League's existence. "We struggled for over thirty years," Mr. Morell said, "against calumny, vilification, and even threats before we got our petition sanctioned by Parliament for the opening of the museums [on Sundays]. We were called atheists, Sabbath-breakers, and I don't know what." Being called these names is reckoned a serious part of their ill-treatment. Yet these names did them very little, if any, injustice—except as they may have been pronounced in a sneering or malicious way. Mr. Morell and several of his colleagues were Atheists, were Sabbath-breakers, and so on. Mr. Upward is invited to take notice of this point. We knew Mr. Morell rather intimately in the eighteen seventies, when he kept a newsagent's shop in Francis-street (we believe), off Tottenham-court-road. We often called in and had a chat with him,—sometimes with James Thomson ("B. V.," the poet) who lodged round the corner in Huntley-street. Mr. Morell might then have been called a "Holyoake-ite," and he was interested in the Secularist which we started with Mr. Holyoake, and to which James Thomson was a chief contributor. We can hardly agree, therefore, that Mr. Morell and his colleagues were badly persecuted by being called names which were quite accurate and really deserved. If they were not Sabbath-breakers, for instance, what on earth were they? Sabbath-breaking was the very head and front of their offending.

The third section of Mr. Upward's twelfth chapter is headed "The Good Tidings of Damnation." And a very good heading it is too. But if Mr. Upward had used such language, notwithstanding its accuracy, some thirty years ago (as we did) he would have been thought guilty of blasphemy (as we were). The real crime for which we suffered twelve months' imprisonment was that of being in advance of the time,—one of Whitman's "Pioneers! O Pioneers!"

Mr. Allen Upward—with our benediction, if he cares to have it—is presenting to a ten-and-sixpenny public much that we presented all those years ago to a penny public in Joseph Mazzini Wheeler's sound and learned articles in the Freethinker, and in the penny numbers of our own Bible Heroes and Bible Romances. We had convictions; we had boundless health and strength of body, and some, at least, of mind; we had read and studied in the right direction, that of evolution; and we were born for the fight. Where the guns roared, and the rifles pinged, and the smoke half choked the combatants, and the bayonets gleamed in the fierce attack, and swords clashed with the sound that always thrills those who have some of the old fighting instinct of the race in them—an instinct which reason should direct, and not destroy; there we found our place. And we do not regret it—though we have paid the price. For it is not in voyaging over halcyon seas that man feels most himself, and the pride and power of his nature, and his possible worth to the world, but in struggling with the storm when the sails split, and the masts go by the board, and the sky is a black abysm, and the sea a blacker one, save for the white-foaming wolves of the ocean driven on by the thundering storm. To live then is to live indeed. It purges a man of trivialities for ever.

Mr. Thomas William Stewart was liberated on Feb. 20 from Stafford Prison, where he had suffered three months and several days' imprisonment under the infamous Blasphemy Laws.

Christian Myth and Legend.

Mythes et Légendes. Etude sur l'origine et l'évolution des croyances religieuses par la comparaison des textes originaux. Par Edouard Daanson. (Bruxelles, 1913. 89 Avenue des Rogations.) Published by the Author, and sold by subscription at 10 francs. Pp. 412. (First edition of 1,600 copies, separately numbered.)

M. EDOUARD DAANSON, whose earlier work,* so full of pungent satire of Christian doctrine, is already known to readers of the Freethinker, has now enriched the literature of Rationalism with an admirable study of Myths and Legends in relation to the origin and evolution of religious beliefs. By comparison of the original texts with the myths and legends of Christianity and other religions he enables us to see the contact of creed with creed and the continuity and variation of myths and cults which form the subject-matter of the several religions which have figured on the world-wide stage of superstition and priestcraft.

M. Daanson has supplied a felt want, for his beautifully printed and lavishly illustrated book is an invaluable anthology of pre-Christian and other texts scattered through a vast body of specialist works dealing with the growth of religious ideas. Our author brings and compares these texts together in order to illustrate the march and development of doctrine and dogma from one world-religion to another. When, a few years ago, he wrote his Livre du Bien et du Mal, he had no idea of denying, or even doubting, the historical existence of Christ. His new and richly documented book, the fruit of assiduous research in the interval, shows how his conception of Christ passed away from the ideal man whom Renan and Loisy depict for us, to linger awhile for a temporary flirtation with the ideas of Dr. Binet-Sanglé, in order ultimately to adopt its present attitude, which regards the figure of Christ as a religious romance formed by the accretion or modification of many myths.

M. Daanson's book clearly shows that the minds of our ignorant forefathers were simply dustheaps for the reception and intermingling of heterogeneous myths and legends of gods, goddesses, demons, kings, heroes, poets, and saints. The miraculous was so inextricably blended with the natural processes of life that nobody could tell for certain how soon an ordinary mortal would become deified or how the ordinary man in the street could escape meeting the miraculous round the corner or evade the performance by his own act and deed of prodigies of supernatural import. It is not known, for instance, whether Homer was a real man or a myth; but this uncertainty did not prevent the Greeks from elevating him amongst the gods. In that respect the reputed author of the Iliad stands in the same ambiguous position as the alleged preacher of the Sermon on the Mount. The Greek poet and the Palestinian peasant met the same fate: they became gods. In ancient times, to have died and become immortal, it was not necessary to have ever lived at all. It is certain that no evidence can be shown of the historical existence of Christ; but the fact that nothing is known of his birth has not prevented the formation of an elaborately detailed legend concerning his tragic death, his sensationally miraculous resurrection, and his glorious ascension to heaven—to somewhere far beyond the regions where our unmythical contemporary Vedrenne and his numerous rivals, aided only by atheistic science, have yet been able to reach.

All this, and much beside, is treated with elaborate detail in the special chapter which purports to tell us "how legends are formed." This chapter sheds a flood of light upon the nature of legend, and especially of religious legend, without, however, doing more in most cases than presenting to us the legends as finished articles ready for sale or circulation for the exploiting of pious ignorance. In many cases, no doubt, M. Daanson does enable us to see the legend grow, notably in the case of the Poisson d'Avril and the legend of Dr. Faust. In these instances the problem is of comparative simplicity, inasmuch as here we are dealing with legends which start into being during well-known periods of modern history, during which the stages of legendary growth are clearly traceable. But when the hero of legend belongs to the twilight of history, as in the case of Attis, the Phrygian god, who was a cognate celestial with Jesus Christ, or in the legend of Orpheus, the deified poet, who is supposed to have taken part in the expedition of the Argonauts, and to have descended into hell, as Jesus Christ did (or did not) some hundreds of years afterwards—in these and similar cases we come face to face with legends fully grown. The parallels shown between the legends of Bacchus, Krishna, Buddha, Jesus, and the other savior-gods or deified men of antiquity are striking enough, but they would be more convincing if more were known or indicated of the points of culture-nexus between these varying types of legend and myth. Where (as on page 46 et seq., dealing with the manner in which the Vedas were composed) the learned author attempts a reasoned statement of the origin of the sacred books of the Brahmans, the explanation is evidently too severely summarised to enable us to perceive the successive steps in the evolution of the Indian Bible.

These and various other impressions of an attentive reading of this excellent repository of documents relating to the historical criticism of religion incline one to the view that the book itself is mainly a collection of data or preparatory notes in anticipation of a larger work wherein a fuller discussion and examination of religious origins would be attempted. But the richness of these data and the suggestive nature of these "notes" make M. Daanson's delightful and instructive volume a very encyclopædia of the facts and documents which cluster around the ever-fascinating subject of the early beginnings of culture and creed.

Whatever may be the foundations of faith at the dawn of history, whether based on the conscious fraud of priests or on the abject fears and superstitions of the pious, certain it is that the more modern developments of religion, as seen in the multiplication and exploitation of religious relics, are obviously based on deliberate fraud and imposture. The absurd and sometimes indecent nature of Christian relics (see pages 58-60) would alone suffice to impeach the sanity or honesty of the Church which waxed fat by exploiting the holy prepuce, of which a large quantity once pertaining to Our Blessed Lord is scattered throughout Christendom.

One of the most striking sections in this indispensable vade-mecum on religious origins is the very full and splendidly illustrated chapter (pages 66-136) on "the evolution of myths." These are chiefly the creation-myths of Egypt and Chaldea, but the whole literature relating to myths of creation is brought under contribution in order to show the developments of these myths under every variety of religious experience throughout the Old and New World. An enormous body of texts and documents is thus assembled in a handy form which is quite unique in Rationalist literature. The circumstantial detail with which the myth-makers of the prehistoric past ventured to described the precise modus operandi of God Almighty (or of confederated groups of God Almighties) at every stage in the creation of matter and life is here set forth in a series of extracts from the sacred documents of the old-world hierophants, who nearly all are in a position to record the exclamations of the Creator at the time or his conversations with his associated partners in the work of creation. The labor of collating the vast literature of this subject is not an inviting task, and the students of religious origins are under deep obligation to M. Daanson for the rich harvest of documents which he has so admirably collected in this intensely interesting chapter, which closes Book I. of this great work.

Book II. deals with the Jesus myth in relation to modern historical and scientific criticism. After passing in review a vast number of modern treatises on this theme, M. Daanson expresses his view that "this personage of whom no trace is found in the history of his country is merely a character invented and placed on the scene in surroundings more or less historic." His thesis is to show that the life of Jesus was a romance created by Greeks, and Jewish Cabbalists and Judaising Copts of Alexandria under the influence of the historic writings of Josephus and of the Septuagint translation of the Old Testament. In support of this theory a special chapter is devoted to the Egyptian analogies of cult and doctrine with the Jesus legend of the Christian Gospels, and though, as I think, some of these "analogies" are strained and stretched beyond the due limits of their natural significance, they are certainly indicative of many pre-Christian adumbrations of Christ in Egypt, as elsewhere in the Pagan world. It is especially in Egypt, that "paradise of legends," as M. Daanson calls it, where myths and superstitions of Savior-Gods and Holy Trinities were strewn in abundance in readiness for manipulation into Christian form and similitude. Many of these myths and superstitions are illustrated by a copious catena of exceedingly interesting documents, but I cannot quite convince myself that the Christian legends are historically affiliated, in every case cited, to the alleged Egyptian or other antetypes. On the other hand, the early outcrop of Christian heresies, and especially of Gnosticism and its numerous variants, point unmistakably to Egypt as one of the most fertile seed-plots of Christian mysticism, as the place, in fact, out of which God called his Son.

The ample materials of comparison furnished in the last two chapters of M. Daanson's book leave no manner of doubt in the mind of any reasonable student of Christian origins that all the root-ideas of Christian theology and ethics were current coin of the realm of speculation and belief in the Pagan world for ages prior to the date fixed for the miraculous birth of Christ.

I shall probably reopen later on the discussion o the intensely suggestive theories and conclusions contained in M. Daanson's excellent treatise. In the meantime let me say that the sumptuous illustrations (fifty in number) and the typographical beauty of the volume with which we have been dealing will naturally enhance the value and attractiveness of its appeal as a work which explores the whole ground of Christian origins with extraordinary erudition. M. Daanson is still a comparatively young man (he is a brand, once very pious, snatched by Freethought from the fires of a monastic career), and has already become one of the rising orators and men of letters in the ranks of Belgian Rationalism. His latest contribution indisputably stamps him as a fine scholar and fearless thinker whose fertile pen and encyclopædic learning are destined still further to enrich the literature of Freethought.

WILLIAM HEAFORD.

The Church and Literature.—II.

DURING the period rightly known as the Dark Ages the clergy were supreme. Proclaiming that the Church had the authority of God, they claimed control over minds and estates, and they demanded that their claims should be accepted without reasoning. To deny, or even to doubt, was to be a heretic, and to be subject to excommunication, fine, imprisonment, exile, and perhaps torture and the stake.

The Church only kept up so much of classic learning as was necessary for a literary education, and to give the clergy an elevated and imposing position among the barbarians. These tactics were especially successful with the northern tribes, who had a humble veneration for the Science of the Runes. Von Hartmann says:—

> "If, therefore, mediæval Christianity cultivated the study of the Greek and Latin authors, it was not from any appreciation of, or sympathy with, that culture which is to be derived from them, but solely in the pursuit of external and hierarchical interests. The old Pagan writings were looked upon as a necessary evil to which the Church submitted in order to give to the clergy a literary and theological training, but which, undoubted productions of the devil as they are, no man should take in his hands without first making the sign of the cross and trembling for his soul's salvation."

Lecky's testimony in his History of European Morals is that the literature of Christian asceticism "surpasses in its mendacious ferocity any that the world has seen." The Christians habitually spoke of those who deviated from the orthodox belief as demons, and exulted over the tortures which they believed were reserved for such miscreants. Lecky continues:—

> "The study of the Latin classics was for the most part positively discouraged. The writers, it was believed, were burning in hell. The monks were too inflated with their imaginary knowledge to regard with any respect a Pagan writer, and periodical panics about the approaching termination of the world continually checked any desire for secular learning. It was the custom among some monks, when they were under the discipline of silence, and desired to ask for Virgil, Horace, or any other Gentile work, to indicate their wish by stretching their ears like a dog, to which animal it was thought the Pagans might reasonably be compared."

Buckle declares that the learning of the Middle Ages only ministered to ignorance. He says:—

> "From the sixth to the tenth century there was not in all Europe more than three or four men who dared to think for themselves; and even they were obliged to veil their meaning in obscure and mystical language. The remaining part of society was, during these four centuries, sunk in the most degrading ignorance. Under these circumstances, the few who were able to read confined their studies to works which encouraged and strengthened their superstition, such as the legends of the saints and the homilies of the fathers. From these sources they drew those lying and impudent fables of which the theology of the time is principally composed."

Of course, the supply of literature was only proportionate to the demand. The classic works of the Pagans having fallen into disrepute, their manuscripts were erased and re-written with Christian legends. Copies of Cicero, Pliny, or Homer were valueless, and the parchments used for them were prepared by washing or scraping in order to make room for the ridiculous fables of the saints. These palimpsests or codices rescripti form a curious commentary on the zeal of the monks. Frequently the most valuable works were covered over with others now of no account. The long-lost treatise of Cicero, De Republica, was discovered written over with St. Augustine's Commentary on the Psalms. Within the present century Niebuhr discovered the Istitutes of Gaius, a work throwing much light on Roman Law, and which was believed to have perished in the confusion of the Dark Ages, beneath a second and even a third writing consisting of the epistles of St. Jerome. Hallam, in his Middle Ages, says: "So gross and supine was the ignorance of the monks, within whose walls these treasures were concealed, that it was impossible to ascertain, except by indefatigable researches, the extent of what had been saved out of the great shipwreck of antiquity."

The scarcity of books rendered their price so enormous during the palmy days of Christianity that even persons of fortune could not indulge in the luxury of reading. Private persons seldom possessed any books, and even monasteries of note had only one Missal. Persons who bequeathed a pious book to the library of a monastery were deemed thereby to obtain complete remission of sins. The Rev. Joseph Barrington, the Catholic author of the Literary History of the Middle Ages, admits that "in the most wealthy convents, where libraries were chiefly formed, a short catalogue was sufficient to comprise the number of their books; and the price to those who were disposed to purchase was exorbitant." Hallam tells us that contracts were made verbally for want of notaries capable of drawing up charters, and these, when written, were frequently barbarous and ungrammatical to an incredible degree.

At this time, be it remembered, the Mohammedan caliphs were giving every encouragement to literature and science. Bagdad in the east, and Cordova in the west, were the seats of learning and culture, and the dawn of the renaissance of letters arose from the contact with Arabian civilisation. The Jews also cultivated literature, and produced many of their brightest lights during the long night of the Dark Ages. Their works were, of course, proscribed. St. Louis ordered the Talmud to be burnt. All the Jewish libraries were destroyed, and twenty-four cartloads of valuable manuscripts committed to the flames. All Jewish books, Bibles excepted, were ordered to be burnt because filled with the blasphemies against Christ, and it is alleged that, at one time, twelve thousand copies of the Talmud were burnt at one holocaust in Cremona—a feat throwing into the shade the destruction of five thousand copies of the Koran by Cardinal Ximenes. All heretical works were hunted out and burnt. As early as the twelfth century, Pope Innocent III. prohibited the reading of the Bible in the common tongue. The Council of Toulouse (1229) forbade the reading of the Bible in any vernacular tongue, and decreed that no layman should have in his possession any of the books of the Old or New Testament. The Council of Terragona orders that any priest or layman who possesses a translation of the Bible, and does not surrender it within eight days to be burnt, shall be deemed a heretic. The famous Council of Trent affirmed that no Bible should be held or read except by priests, and this canon remains unrepealed. The Council condemned wholesale the works of the most notorious heretics—i.e., reformers. In 1557, Paul IV. published at Rome the first official Index Librorum Prohibitorum. His Index includes all Bibles in modern languages, enumerating forty-eight editions chiefly printed in countries still under the jurisdiction of the Church. Sixty-one printers, among whom are Stephens and Oporinus, are put under a general ban—all works, of whatever description, from their presses being forbidden.

The Roman Catholic Church has taken the trouble to register its relationship to literature by publishing lists of the works it forbids to its followers. For a long time the Index Librorum Prohibitorum was itself a forbidden work. It showed not only the nature of the forbidden fruit, but made manifest what it was the Church really feared. Since, however, bibliographers have published unauthorised lists, the society for the propagation of the faith has issued an Index from which, since it has the Papal imprimatur, there can be no appeal.

Voltaire Once More.

> "Of all the intellectual weapons which have ever been wielded by man, the most terrible was the mockery of Voltaire."—LORD MACAULAY.

VOLTAIRE'S name has ever been a terror to Christians, and, with the exception of Thomas Paine, none has been more hated, none more reviled. The reason is simple. A very great writer, he attacked Christianity, not in the dry-as-dust fashion of professors writing for the dozen superior persons scattered throughout the universe, but with wit and pleasantry which survive the winnowing of generations. He made bigots and tyrants appear ridiculous as well as odious, and those who felt the sting of his satire denounced him as a literary Mephistopheles, whose writings all should avoid as they would a plague.

A notebook of Voltaire's, written in English, has been discovered at St. Petersburg, and the English Review, to its own credit and the delight of all lovers of literature, has published it in its current issue.

The pages, now set forth in print for the first time, are of absorbing interest, for they give an insight into the mind of the young Voltaire, and they form the notebook of one of the most myriad-minded of men. "Monsieur Multiform" was his witty name for D'Alembert, and he himself had an equal right to it. In the eighty volumes of his collected works he has proved his mastery as historian, essayist, thinker, humorist, tale-teller, letter-writer, critic, and humanitarian. So strong is his appeal to literary men that Macaulay, one of the most omnivorous of readers, selected Voltaire's works for his reading on his lengthy sea-voyage to India.

It was in 1726 that the young Voltaire came to England on his release from the Bastille, where he had been imprisoned for challenging the Duc de Rohan. He looked across the Channel towards the country of Congreve, Pope, Bolingbroke, Swift, and other renowned authors, and he hastened to make their acquaintance. A true Frenchman, he only cared for the society of men of reputation. When he visited Congreve, the English dramatist hinted that Voltaire should visit him as a man of fashion. "I answered," said Voltaire, "that had he been so unfortunate as to be a mere gentleman I should never have come to see him."

The notebook is written in English, which Voltaire learned during his three years' stay in the country. With characteristic nonchalance he said, "I have done what we do every day at school when we write Latin and Greek"; but he had done what few of his fellow countrymen had achieved, and he was as notable in this respect as Gibbon, Hume, and Beckford were across the Channel. Many of the reflections in the notebook were afterwards used in his famous "English Letter," although the wit was more polished in the later version. As may be expected, the iconoclastic note often reverberates through the pages, as in the sarcastic remarks, "dunces are the founders of all religions, men of wit founders of heresies; men of understanding laugh at both." In another mood, recalling the quips and cranks at Bolingbroke's house, or Pope's villa at Twickenham, he compares the two men: "Pope is a dark lanthorn, and Bolingbroke is an ordinary lamp." A suggestion of his later style is found in the scathing lines: "A Carthusian kneels and prostrates himself before me; a Quaker speaks to me covered; both do so to follow the Gospel in the most rigorous sense." Thus, the notebook gives the first promise of that superb irony which made Candide the wittiest book in the world, and the Philosophical Dictionary more deadly to priests than regiments of artillery.

The abuse to which Voltaire was subjected by Christians was awful. Dr. Johnson, by no means a bad-hearted man, voiced this terrible prejudice. In a conversation with Boswell, he said: "Rousseau, sir, is a very bad man. I would sooner sign a sentence for his transportation than that of any felon who has gone from the Old Bailey these many years. Yes, I should like to have him work in the plantations." "Sir, you do not think him as bad a man as Voltaire?" inquired Boswell. "Why, sir, it is difficult to settle the proportion of iniquity between them." In artistic circles one meets the same insults. Sir Joshua Reynolds, in one of his most popular pictures, introduced Voltaire as the personification of sophistry. The clergy, naturally, out-Heroded Herod, and made Voltaire the helot of countless homilies, and lied to such purpose that whole generations of Christians firmly believed that Voltaire was responsible for the French Revolution.

The reason is not far to seek. Voltaire's crystal-clear understanding saw the absurdities and abominations of Christianity. His aim was straight to the fact, and he brought orthodoxy to the test of truth and common sense. Was it true or not that God had chosen Jewish savages as his chosen people? Was Omnipotence born of one parent only, and that one a virgin? Did God feed five thousand people with a few loaves and fishes, and did he come back from the grave? To ask these questions, and to press for answers, was to provoke inextinguishable laughter.

Voltaire was more than a sceptic, and his exquisite wit was employed as his principal weapon. His humanity was whole-hearted and sincere. He did not jibe at men being tortured and murdered for their opinions. At the legal murder of Jean Calas he was indignation personified, and he never rested till the foul wrong was undone. Voltaire not only fought intolerance and oppression, he protected the oppressed. His championing of the Servens and La Barre will never fade from the memory of men. A true humanitarian, he did more than any other man to put an end to judicial torture. This would alone suffice to prove how intense was his detestation of violence and fanaticism.

For sixty years Voltaire waged unrelenting war against the Great Lying Church, and when this eminent Freethinker died the Church refused him burial, hoping that he would be thrown into the gutter like the famous actress, Adrienne Lecouvreur. But he had carved his name too deeply on his country's roll of honor, and his remains now rest beneath the dome of the Pantheon, with its front glowing with the splendid words: Aux grand hommes la patrie reconnaisante. Here he sleeps undisturbed, and by his side rest the ashes of Rousseau. Shoulder to shoulder, these great soldiers of the Army of Liberty rest under their magnificent tombs:—

> "With the sound of those they wrought for,
> And the feet of those they fought for,
> Echoing round their bones for evermore."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—After Mr. Lyle's complete statement, my first impulse is to let judgment go by default, for there is obviously nothing to say by way of excuse for the confusion which has existed for years in my mind as to the attitude taken by the Vicar on the two points of the baby's baptism and burial. And yet I feel as if something more were necessary, and I would like to express my contrition for having misled any of your readers, and for any criticism of parties unknown based on the above confusion.

Mr. Lyle's remarks are too restrained, in fact, in view of the circumstances, and I hope I can thank him in the best possible way by telling him that his graceful note has impressed me with a heavier sense of responsibility.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In reply to Mr. J. Tomkins' request re Sir Hiram Maxim's book, I wish to say that there was no review of the book in the Times; but in the Times Literary Supplement—published every Thursday as a supplement with the Times—it appeared in the columns of books received, with a few lines—which are sometimes given when the book is not reviewed—giving a fair and unbiased summary of its contents. I did not make a note of it, or of the date; but when writing the article in question I remembered it, and mentioned it.

How little good and bad conduct were associated in thought with the intrinsic natures of right and wrong, and how completely they were associated in thought with obedience and disobedience to Jahveh, we see in the facts that prosperity and increase of population were promised as rewards of allegiance; while there was punishment for such non-ethical disobediences as omitting circumcision or numbering the people.—Herbert Spencer, "Principles of Ethics."

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

It is the misfortune of worthy people that they are cowards.—VOLTAIRE.

The Fear of Death.

TO religious people death is the King of Terrors, not because it puts an end to life, but because it does not. The continuity of life is a fundamental doctrine of theology. The only thing that death ends is man's duality. According to Plato, death signifies the soul's emancipation from the bondage of the body. In the Christian creed, it means the spirit's departure from earth into the immediate presence of God in the unseen world. Now, it is the dismal doctrine of sin that has made death so terrible. An unsaved soul is doomed to eternal damnation. On its arrival in eternity it goes down straight into the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone. Milton informs us that death is the offspring of sin, and is "black as Night, fierce as ten Furies, terrible as Hell." It is not death, however, but "the dread of something after death," that puzzles the will and unnerves the heart. To die is to fall into the hands of the living God, who "is a consuming fire," than which nothing can be more terrifying.

What a fearful weapon death has been in the hands of the preacher. How often has it been brandished, with shuddering effect, over the heads of timid children. "If you were to die to-night, where would you be?" "As this may be your last day on earth, make your peace with God this moment, and so be ready to meet him as your judge." Such was the language in which young people were addressed fifty and sixty years ago. Tracts were issued, with lurid titles, such as Are You Afraid to Die? Everlasting Damnation. Straight to Hell. Well do we remember being asked, on one occasion, "Do you not know that the Lord is angry with you because you forget him and neglect his house, and that unless you repent and turn to him he may cast you headlong into the Bottomless Pit, there to be in torment for ever and ever?" Death was thus the twin-keeper with sin of hell-gate; was indeed sin's offspring, her "inbred enemy." Milton represents sin as thus describing death's birth:—

> "At last this odious offspring whom thou scest,
> Thine own begotten, breaking violent way,
> Tore through my entrails, that, with fear and pain
> Distorted, all my nether shape thus grew
> Transformed; but he my inbred enemy
> Forth issued, brandishing his fatal dart,
> Made to destroy. I fled, and cried out Death!
> Hell trembled at the hideous name, and sighed
> From all her caves, and back resounded Death!
> . . . . .
>
> Grim Death, my son and foe."
> —Paradise Lost, ii., 781-789, 805.

It should be borne in mind that the Miltonic interpretation of death is simply Paul's expressed poetically. You will find the central idea in Romans v. 12:—

> "Therefore, as through one man sin entered into the world, and death through sin; and so death passed unto all men, for that all sinned."

Now, Dean Alford, a pre-Darwinian commentator, who took Scripture as it stood, candidly admits that by death, in that passage, is meant "primarily, but not only, physical death; and thus (by this entering in of sin and death—i.e., in fact, by this connection of sin and death) death spread through unto all men." Alford's exegesis is undoubtedly accurate. Paul verily believed that prior to the Fall death was unknown in the world, and came in only as the penalty of sin. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews shared that belief, for he refers to Satan as having the power of death, to bring whom to naught was Christ's object in coming into the world. The curious fact in this connection is, that the Devil is brought to naught not by the annihilation of death, which sin brought into existence, but by the deliverance of believers from the fear of it. From physical death there is absolutely no escape, believers being as subject to it as unbelievers; but it is falsely supposed that from spiritual and eternal death the Savior graciously releases all who put their trust in him.

At this time it is scarcely necessary to point out that both Paul and Milton were radically mistaken. Death is an immutable law of Nature. All living beings, whether vegetable or animal, are mortal. This is now a truism, to attempt to prove which would be a culpable waste of time. Knowing this, the newer theologians assure us that the death spoken of in Genesis does not denote physical, but spiritual, death. Nothing can be more certain, they allege, than that Adam did not physically die on the day he sinned, though spiritually he most assuredly did. At this moment all who do not believe in Christ are spiritually dead in trespasses and sins, and doomed to eternal death in the world to come. What makes physical death so great a terror is that it translates the soul into a realm in which, if unsaved, it becomes the victim of eternal death. This is the fear of death through which the majority of people are all their lifetime subject to bondage. Even believing Christians are slaves to it, because they are never absolutely sure that they are among the elect. There are very few so-called people of God who are quite free from it. But this modern interpretation of death was adopted by the divines in consequence of the fact that geological and biological discoveries had completely discredited the Pauline and Miltonic theory. That death can be treated metaphorically is true enough. It may legitimately be said of a man that he is poetically or artistically dead, or that he is dead to the higher feelings and instincts of humanity; but to describe us all as being by nature dead to spiritual and eternal realities is to build upon a rotten fabric of guess and speculation. Spiritual and eternal realities exist only in the imagination of speculative theologians. The Great Beyond, as it is called, is Shakespeare's "undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns"; that is, the country of which positively nothing is known, not even that it exists. This being clearly the case, it follows that the religious fear of death is utterly irrational. "The dread of something after death" is as groundless and absurd as any castle in the air, because, judging by all the evidence in our possession, death ends all for individuals.

Mark the fundamental inconsistency of Scripture in its references to God and the future. The author of Hebrews says that to die is a fearful thing because it is equivalent to falling into the hands of the living God, who is a God of vengeance. St. John tells us, on the contrary, that God is love, in whom is no vengeance. The truth is that both God and the future are unverifiable assumptions, while to die is the most natural thing in the world. Death is simply a return to the inorganic state whence all living beings have issued. Generally speaking, life is organisation, and death disorganisation.

We now confidently ask with Lucretius :—

> "What is there left for us in death to fear?"

for the only answer is :—

> "When once that pause of life has come between,
> 'Tis just the same as we had never been."

There is really nothing more to be said, because there is nothing left for us in death to fear. To anyone who still fears to die we can say, again in the words of the great poet, Lucretius :—

> "The worst that can befall thee, measured right,
> Is a sound slumber, and a long good night."

Dying, it is maintained by those who have studied the process most closely, is practically painless, almost like falling asleep, or being born. There has been a correspondence on the subject in the Times lately in which almost all the writers agreed that the fear of death is entirely groundless. On February 21, Professor J. Cook Wilson contributed a most interesting letter in which he described his father's death which occurred twelve years ago :—

> "My father, a hale old man, was struck down in his eighty-eighth year by influenza which ended in failure of the heart. In the last stages there began the rapid labored breathing which is a familiar feature of such cases. It was most distressing to hear and watch, but the doctors assured me that the patient knew nothing of it. One did not doubt that there was some ground for the medical opinion, but one could not help reflecting that it was at best a probable inference, and that the only decisive proof could be an experience which, in the nature of the case, it seemed impossible to have. However, my father, being an exceptionally strong man, survived the dreadful night. In the morning his breathing became much quieter, he recovered consciousness, and became able to speak a little. Knowing the doctor was coming, he managed to say quite clearly, 'Tell the doctor that I have had a very comfortable night.' I was astonished and grateful beyond measure to have the best evidence possible in the patient's own testimony."

Such a letter is bound to do much good. An eminent physician says that it will convince people that the medical profession does not deceive them when it gives the assurance that there is no such thing as the Death Agony. "The death rattle," he adds, "is a purely automatic and reflex action. The explanation of it is just this: In the dying moments the windpipe cannot deal with the secretions; it is merely a mechanical noise."

Thus, from every point of view, the fear of death is seen to be totally without excuse. The thought of leaving loved ones behind to mourn one's loss cannot in the nature of things be pleasant, and their keen sense of deprivation must be painful; but in death itself there is nothing to fear. The time is coming when science shall have banished disease from the earth, with the result that in every case death shall be perfectly natural, coming neither a moment too soon nor a moment too late, but only when life, and the desire to live, are physiologically at an end.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Revival of Religion.

A GERMAN preacher, at present on a visit to England, recently informed a representative of one of the religious papers that there were signs of a spiritual revival in Germany. He admitted that Christianity had lost its hold on the "intellectuals," and also on the working classes; also that the influence of Nonconformity was very slight; still he discerned—probably with the eye of faith—an awakening of religion in the near future. This kind of statement is not at all uncommon, in this country at least, and one has therefore the better means of seeing just what it is worth. When Dr. Clifford delivered his last New Year's address, he also discovered signs of a spiritual awakening in England. Dr. Horton reported the same tidings from America; and in ordinary matters one would take this concurrent testimony of, and from, different countries as being good evidence. But in this respect religion is not an ordinary matter. The testimony is itself suspect. We have heard it so often, and we have so much of it. And there is so much evidence on the other side. We see the Churches steadily emptying. We see the best brains, and the best character, steadily disassociating itself from religion. The slump in belief continues in spite of all the prophecies of a great spiritual awakening.

The very proofs advanced in favor of a revival of religion are evidence to the contrary. The German doctor referred to, for example, said there had been a decrease in Materialism in Germany because the younger generation have abandoned the belief in the efficacy of legislation, and are now inclined to place more emphasis on personal influence, and to "regard social reform from a more human point of view." That means, he says, "that religion will play a larger part than it has done in the past." Really! There is no mention that the younger generation is believing more fervently in a God, or a soul, or in supernaturalism generally; only that it is more inclined to regard reform from a human point of view. Well, if that is all, and nothing else is given, it looks suspiciously as if the new generation will be more deeply tinged with Freethought than the older one. For that is precisely what Freethinkers have been striving for, and precisely what the Churches have declined to do. Let us test everything from the human point of view, and we are quite content to abide the result. We may make mistakes even then; we probably shall do so. But our mistakes will be due to our want of knowledge, and our blunders will in time supply their own corrective. We shall not have our blunders hedged round with dogmas and doctrine, and worshiped as the outcome of a wisdom that passes human understanding.

This German gentleman had fallen into the cant of which all religious preachers—particularly when they call themselves "advanced" thinkers—are so fond. In this country we are perfectly familiar with the breed. Because there is a growing interest in social reform, because people are more alive than they were to the necessity of decent homes and decent lives, these things are made part and parcel of the religious revival. Any passing popular cry—an eight-hours' day, a living wage, the nationalisation of the land, old age pensions, the Insurance Act, are all made to do duty as proof of the revival of religion. One wonders why all these things were not accomplished facts during the days when religion was really strong. One wonders whether the scheme of Christianity really involves these things, and if so why none of the Christian leaders of the past ever found this out. It is quite an affecting series of pictures. Jesus Christ—very God of very God—coming to earth, being crucified, and rising from the grave, so that an Old Age Pension Act might be passed some eighteen centuries after he was dead Think of the early Christian martyrs dying in order that we might realise the importance of a living wage! Or the great historic Christian Churches, with all their legends of miracles and saints and martyrs, existing solely that we might look at things from a human point of view!

It is all cant, sheer cant! And unless we credit many of these preachers with almost miraculous stupidity, they must know it is cant. What aspect of religion is it that promises a revival? Is it the belief in God? How many of those who do not believe at present are likely to have a belief created?

Digitized by Google

Why even professed believers are busily engaged in so stating this belief that the God presented is hardly worth while anyone troubling about. He is no longer a God who does things, but a Deity who leaves things severely alone—and one must confess that if we must have a God that is the most desirable sort to possess. And, meanwhile, the number of people who disbelieve is unmistakably on the increase. So with the belief in the soul, so with the belief in all those forms of supernaturalism that were once universal. Does anyone seriously believe that any of these things are on the increase, or that they are likely to increase? If they do, where is the evidence? If they do not, what is the good of talking about a coming revival of religion? Morality is not religion. Social reform is not religion. These things have only been accidentally associated with religion, and their separation means the death of religion is every civilised community.

What we can observe in this and other countries is a continuance of the historic tactics of the Christian clergy. Ever since Christianity—essentially an Eastern creed—was forced upon the West, it has only managed to maintain itself in an unmodified form during those periods when it was able to exercise absolute coercion. Forced upon an alien population, its subjects have been more or less in revolt against it; and, what is more important, the forces of social growth have inspired the revolt. Even though outwardly submissive, the Western world has time after time modified Christian teaching, much as China has more than once seized and conquered its nominal conquerors. This was the case when the Church was compelled to accept the Copernican for the Ptolemaic system of astronomy. It was the case when it compelled the Churches to reject witchcraft as an idle superstition, or, in our own day, to reject the literal inspiration of the Bible, and to accept the general doctrine of evolution. The present is only another phase of the same movement. Living at a time when large numbers of people are beginning to realise the essential stupidity of theological questions, and also to realise the importance of social and ethical problems, leaders of Christianity are shrewd enough to see that they must accommodate themselves to the new spirit or disappear. Accordingly, they discover that Christianity contains a social gospel, just as the Church found scientific teachings in the Bible when it was no longer possible to suppress them, and no longer paid to denounce them as untrue. These concessions may deceive some—undoubtedly they do—but this does not prevent others recognising these for what they are—theological fool-traps.

There is a well-known passage in Gibbon's Roman Empire in which he speculates as to what might have happened had Charles Martel been beaten by the Mohammedans in the eighth century. He says that Mohammedans would then have overrun Europe, and we might have had the Koran preached in Westminster Abbey instead of the Bible. Very likely; but it by no means follows that by this time things would have been much different to what they are. We should, in all probability, have had much the same modification of Mohammedan teaching that we have had of Christian doctrines, with the same process of obstruction and final acceptance. Beliefs are as much subject to social selection as organisms are to natural selection. A society acts on any belief that is introduced into its midst much as food is acted on by the animal organism. It selects, assimilates, and rejects. And this selection, assimilation, and rejection is largely determined by forces that are beyond individual control. Force an alien belief upon a society, and what it cannot assimilate it rejects, and what it retains is inevitably modified to a larger or smaller degree. The whole history of Christianity proves the truth of this. The history of its successive modification is not, as apologists say, the discovery of a truer form—the truest form is the oldest and the deadest—it is the registration of the effect of social forces upon a religion that had to be modified or altogether perish.

There is at hand no revival of religion, still less is there a probable revival of Christianity. There is, it is true, an immense mass of superstition still latent in the community, and that always represents an element of danger. But religion in general has never been at so low a point as it is to-day. There is not a single department of life in which it can be said that religion is recognised as possessing genuine authority. It is not only that the leaders of thought, the "intellectuals," do not recognise the authority of religion; it is true of others. The average man does not go to the Churches for his science, his philosophy, or his sociology. He recognises for the best in these departments he must look elsewhere. All he can get in the Churches is a faint echo of the best that can be got outside. And he is so accustomed to look at the Churches from this standpoint that he has ceased to see in it anything peculiar. He does not realise that religion once ruled life, and that the Churches once laid down laws for guidance where it now begs for a word of patronage. But if he does not recognise the profound nature of the change that has taken place, he cannot avoid its consequences. He develops in a freer, healthier atmosphere than did preceding generations. Instead of religion being the controlling influence in his life it sinks to the level of a mere speculation or theory. If he reads, he discovers that he can get more benefit from an hour or two with a good book than from a score of sermons. If he thinks he realises what a game of make-believe the whole thing is. Religion loses it coercive power because daily experience drives home the lesson that the vital issues of life are being decided without the least reference to its teaching. Religion in social life is suffering from the fate that overtakes a disused organ in the individual body. It is a pure case of atrophy.

This talk of the revival of religion is, I repeat, pure cant. It belongs to the same gender as the fantastic reports of wholesale conversions published by evangelists of the Gipsy Smith type. It may soothe the dwindling faithful, but imposes on no one else. It may even keep up the courage of the leaders. Donkeys are said to lash themselves into a temper by the free use of their tails, and where tails are wanting tongues may perform the same service. But you cannot revive Christianity unless you can undo all that has been done during the past three centuries. If the united action of the Churches can convert the globe into a plane, if it can set the sun travelling round the earth instead of the earth round the sun, if it can destroy medical science and re-establish demoniacal possession, if it can destroy evolution and enthrone special creation, if education can be abolished and heaven and earth repeopled with an army of supernatural beings—if, in short, all the knowledge and discoveries and inventions of the last three centuries can be wiped out—then indeed will there be some hope for a revival of Christianity. But if these things cannot be done, then the case of the Churches is hopeless.

C. COHEN.

"He Ascended Into Heaven."

So he did. There was absolutely nothing else to be done if the Gospel were to be carried to its logical end. For the kingdom of Christ could not be established in the first century, is not established in the twentieth, and never will be established in any future century.

"India will never become Christian," I heard the late Romesh Chunder Dutt say. Dutt was a poet, a statesman, and, at one time, occupied the position of Prime Minister to the Gaekwar of Baroda. He observed, he reflected, and he knew.

If India, which is the most religious country on earth, will not accept the Christian faith, the refusal is an indication of the attitude of the whole world. But the loyal orthodoxists are very slow to recognise the hopelessness of the prospect. I rode in a train the other day with a simple-minded companion, shrewd at business but very wanting in acumen when he came to things theological. He had beamed with pride as he showed me one of the wonders of the United States,—the horseshoe curve in the Pennsylvania Railroad near Altoona. But when he fell to discussing the future of Christianity, and asked me if I did not think India would accept Christ, and I said "Certainly not!" his countenance fell, and I seemed to feel the chill of his atmosphere. What is one to say to the ignorant and unreflecting mind which knows so little of the world outside a narrow commercial circle as to imagine that scientific Europe and the proud old soul of Asia are going to dance in the train of the Salvation Army, or join in a Presbyterian rally, or march, to the sound of "Onward, Christian soldiers," to the Anglican or Roman baptismal font? Ask the leaders of the Chinese republic; ask the Indian passive resisters in South Africa; ask Mr. Gokhale and the Indian Nationalists, if Asia is likely to take up the cross and follow Jesus, and you will receive a most emphatic reply.

My Pennsylvanian friend had just come from a little city, which I had myself visited, in a remote corner of the Appalachian mountains. There had been a whole week of Revival services, and the hymns had proclaimed the triumph of Christ. Hundreds of hearts glowed with anticipations of the world-dominion. Already, the map of the world seem flagged all over with tokens of battles won for the martyr of Calvary. I had a glimpse of one or two meetings. A voluble mulatto from Porto Rico was telling of the victories achieved my missionaries in that West Indian island.

"Even the chickens fight no more," he cried; meaning, in his somewhat imperfect English, that the spread of humane feeling had put an end to cock-fighting. Indeed, I would heartily applaud any Christian, or anti-Christian, who assisted in fostering kindness to animals.

An hour or two later, I observed a group of young men,—well set-up and manly Americans,—listening to a fervid evangelist, not older than themselves, and as cocksure as he was ill-informed in his history and psychology.

"Fellows," he exclaimed, "send in your prayers to Christ. If wireless telegraphy can despatch messages to far-distant points, why should not the message of prayer reach the throne of God?"

The lads he addressed were destined to become engineers and farmers, and to do splendid service to the American commonwealth. I have met many such eager young spirits, who are the backbone of the commercial prosperity of the United States. I have met elder business men, whose genius for finance and law and organisation is eminent, and whose energy is the pride of their country. Yet I cannot help remarking that the American mind, taken as a broad average, moves on a lower level when it deals with the great intellectual and religious questions of the day. I remember the Moody and Sankey revival in London in 1873, and I believe that unwholesome scene is impossible of repetition in England. But such excitements are still feasible in the United States, where enormous material enterprises absorb so much thought-power, and leave inadequate capacity of judgment for the more delicate issues of religion and philosophy.

In the small city referred to, I attended service at a Methodist church, the windows of which blazed with colored pictures of Christ agonising at Gethsemane, Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene on Easter morning, and Christ ascending into heaven. I noticed with much pleasure that the preacher followed the beneficent trend of the times: he made no allusion to the mediæval doctrine of the Blood-atonement, and no allusion to the doctrine of Hell-fire. When the story of our age is penned by posterity, the record will tell, on the positive side, of the development of the Education movement, the Labor movement, and the Woman movement; and, on the negative side, of the happy decline and fall of these unwholesome and barbaric faiths. As a matter of fact, there is a correlation between the positive and negative movements.

Nevertheless, though an improvement on Spurgeon's low-plane creed, the Methodist preacher's message had no dynamic. I listened as a politician. My politics is an instrument that grips pretty hard. It grips at the evils of the factory and hovel, the mine and the slum, the docks and the foundry, the haunt of the prostitutes of the West, and the huts of the Mahars and Chandálas of India. These are my test cases. Whoever comes to me with a revelation or a program must show me how, in some reasonably effective manner, these evils will be assuaged. Whoever you are, O prophet, you must declare your thought about these infernal horrors of Benares, of Paris, of Pittsburg, of Johannesburg. Asquith or Woodrow Wilson, Jaurès or Christ, speak!

Well, I waited in patience while the Methodist preached on the alternative,—Either one must take sides for Christ, or against him. Very good. There was apparent value in the presentation, just as there was undoubted color,—most vivid red and blue and green—in the stained-glass pictures of Gethsemane, and Joseph of Arimathea's garden, and the Mount of Olives, and the ascending God.

Once, I thought my pulpit friend was becoming dynamic. His speech waxed warm; his phrases became crisper; he seemed to approach a proclamation; and presently, he cried out in a loud voice, and told us how the forces of Christ in the State of Pennsylvania were gathering for a grand attack upon.....the liquor traffic.

Was that all? The manifesto might or might not stir the brewing-trade. It made no impression upon me, though I have abstained from alcohol about forty years, and detest it as much as I detest (O smokers! pardon) tobacco. I glanced at the congregation. Those pretty American misses, those demure tradesmen and professional men, those feathery and silken mammas,—no! I swear they were little likely to succumb to the deviltry of rum or beer. Perhaps that was one reason why the pulpit carried on this holy war.

We doubters are so impatient. Why not give the good Methodist another chance,—twenty chances? I did; for I sat out the sermon and contributed to the collection. Once again, the volume of menace gathered; the eyes of the apostle sparkled; the fist was clenched; surely, the gates of sin will tremble at the word that is coming! It came, and it summoned all the chivalry and virtue of Pennsylvania to sally forth to the annihilation of.....the liquor traffic.

The sorrows of Benares, Paris, Pittsburg, and Johannesburg must, therefore, go on indefinitely so far as this Pennsylvanian cares. If this is the outcome of many centuries of theological and Biblical study of social needs and possibilities, I count it an excessively mean show; and, as a politician, I can rise to no enthusiasm on this platform. It is a miserable disappointment. I make no remarks on the questions that involve the future of art, of literature, of science. I just select the most obvious and the most tragic of human problems,—the problem of poverty; and I affirm, quite simply, that the gospel of Christ has not met it, and does not give any valid token of meeting it, and the people cannot wait. Whatever its merits may have been, the Christian system has not adapted itself to the terrible needs of earth.

"He ascended into heaven."

Of course.

Concealment regarding a question of such vital importance as the truth of Christianity is to be deplored; while an attitude of indifference on a subject that should be of surpassing interest to us all can only be characterised as amazing—unless, indeed, the real explanation be that men have ceased to believe.—Philip Vivian.

Science and the Soul.—VI.

"Civilisation has always and everywhere been evolved out of savagery. The mass of evidence on which this assumption rests is, in my opinion, so great as to render the induction incontrovertible. At least, if anyone disputes it I do not think it worth while to argue with him. There are still, I believe, in civilised society people who hold that the earth is flat and that the sun goes round it; but no sensible man will waste time in the vain attempt to convince such persons of their error, even though these flatteners of the earth and circulators of the sun appeal with perfect justice to the evidence of their senses in support of their hallucination, which is more than the opponents of man's primitive savagery are able to do."—PROFESSOR J. G. FRAZER, Psyche's Task, p. 162.

"The soul has given up its ethereal substance, and become an immaterial entity, 'the shadow of a shade.'.....There has arisen an intellectual product whose very existence is of the deepest significance, a 'psychology' which has no longer anything to do with 'soul.' The soul's place in modern thought is in the metaphysics of religion, and its especial office there is that of furnishing an intellectual side to the religious doctrine of the future life.....Yet it is evident that notwithstanding all this profound change, the conception of the human soul is, as to its essential nature, continuous from the philosophy of the savage thinker to that of the modern professor of theology."—E. B. TYLOR, Primitive Culture, vol. i., p. 501.

As we have seen, primitive man, in his first outlook on nature, was the prey to a multitude of deceptions, from which it has taken him ages to emancipate himself. Not only was he deceived by the workings of nature outside of himself, but also by the inward workings of his own mind.

His interpretation of the phenomena of dreams, of visions, of his shadow, of his reflection as shown in water; his interpretation of swooning, epilepsy, delirium, madness, unconsciousness, and death, were all wildly wide of the truth, and gave birth to the innumerable host of superstitions which have scourged mankind with whips of scorpions ever since.

No God guided the childish footsteps of primitive man, groping in the darkness and mists of ignorance. As Herbert Spencer has somewhere remarked, man has taken all the wrong roads before he found the right.

"In the eyes of the evolutionist—and we are all evolutionists nowadays—man springs from beast, humanity from animality," says that cultured Frenchman, M. Salamon Reinach,* and he adds, "We must look for the origin of religions in the psychology, not of civilised man, but of man the farthest removed from civilisation." But of this primitive man, before history, we have no direct knowledge; so, continues M. Reinach, "to supplement our information, three other sources have to be tapped: the psychology of the present-day savage, the psychology of children, and the psychology of the higher animals."

It is the glory of the English nation to be the pioneers in the work of explaining the origin of religious ideas. M. Reinach, with the modesty of true greatness, observes:—

> "Had I been the first to formulate them, I should rank with the first thinkers of my day, and modesty alone would preclude me from saying so on the housetops. As a matter of fact, I do not exactly know who made the discoveries. The names of Tylor, MacLennan, Smith, Frazer, and Jevons suggest themselves; but the one thing certain is that it was not myself. Mine has been a lowlier part,—to grasp the ideas of my betters, and to diffuse them as widely as I might" (p. 12).

On the next page, M. Reinach gives "thanks to the diffusion of the English works which have inspired me." Further on (p. 2) he also mentions the names of Lubbock and Herbert Spencer. This is a high tribute from one who is equally distinguished in art and science.

It falls to the lot of exceedingly few to be a pioneer in a new department of science; and forty-six years later, in face of the vast accumulation of new facts—mainly through the interest aroused by his book—and in the face of the most drastic criticism, to be able to claim, as Lord Avebury (Sir John Lubbock) does, "In the main it seems to me that the conclusions which I ventured to put forward have received additional support from the evidence which has since accumulated."† If a brand-new scientific theory runs the gauntlet, and survives for forty-six years, you may depend that it has a pretty solid foundation.

For this work, which required the study of the ideas and modes of thought of innumerable savage tribes and communities, our nation was peculiarly well qualified. Our travellers, explorers, and merchants had penetrated every part of the globe. Our colonies and dependencies, especially in Australia and Africa, had brought us directly in contact with the most primitive savages yet surviving, whose manners, customs, superstitions, and modes of thought had been minutely described in books, journals, letters, and communications to the various learned societies, thus accumulating a rich store of social facts, which only awaited the illumination of genius to marshal them into order and deliver up their secret.

To Sir John Lubbock—after Lord Avebury—must be awarded the palm of priority, with his Prehistoric Times, first published in 1865, and his Origin of Civilisation, in 1870. This was quickly followed, in 1871, by Dr. E. B. Tylor's great work, Primitive Culture. Tylor, however, was not in any way indebted to Lubbock, his important discovery that "Animism" was the clay, as it were, out of which religions evolve, was entirely original. As Darwin himself truly remarked, it is "a most profound work," and he added, "It will make me for the future look at religion—a belief in the soul—from a new point of view."‡ Herbert Spencer's powerful and masterly work, Principles of Sociology, also dealing with religious origins, was published in 1877. These works caused as great a revolution among men's ideas of the origin of religion as Darwin's works did, in their ideas of the origin of man and the different species of animals and plants.

Take, for instance, the origin of the idea of a soul. The savage has great difficulty in distinguishing between sleep, trance, swooning, unconsciousness, and death. A man falls asleep, to wake after a while refreshed; another time he, or one of his companions, falls into a swoon or trance, or is rendered unconscious by a blow; he cannot be awakened, he lies deadly pale and insensible, perhaps, for hours or even days, and yet, after all, he revives. Savages say that "such a one died for awhile, but his soul came back again," says Tylor; and—

> "they have great difficulty in distinguishing real death from such trances. They will talk to a corpse, try to rouse it and even feed it, and only when it becomes noisome and must be got rid of from among the living, they are at last certain that the life has gone never to return. What, then, is this soul or life which thus goes and comes in sleep, trance, and death? To the rude philosopher, the question seems to be answered by the very evidence of his senses. When the sleeper awakens from a dream, he believes he has really somehow been away, or that other people have come to him. As it is well known by experience that men's bodies do not go on these excursions, the natural explanation is that every man's living self or soul is his phantom or image, which can go out of his body and see and be seen itself in dreams."‡

The waking visions and hallucinations, which some men are subject to, would help to confirm this explanation.

Moreover, as Tylor further remarks:—

> "That men have such unsubstantial images belonging to them is familiar in other ways to the savage philosopher, who has watched their reflections in still water, or their shadows following them about, fading out of sight to reappear presently somewhere else, while sometimes for a moment he has seen living breath as a faint cloud, vanishing though one can feel that it > is still there. Here, then, in a few words is the savage and barbaric theory of souls, where life, mind, breath, shadow, reflection, dream, vision, come together and account for one another in some such vague confused way as satisfies the untaught reasoner. The Zulu will say that at death a man's shadow departs from his body and becomes an ancestral ghost, and the widow will relate how her husband has come in her sleep and threatened to kill her for not taking care of his children; or the son will describe how his father's ghost stood before him in a dream, and the souls of the two, the living and the dead, went off together to visit some far-off kraal of their people. The Malays do not like to wake a sleeper, lest they should hurt him by disturbing his body while his soul is out."*

This is not a theory evolved, like the German metaphysician's camel, out of the scientist's inner consciousness. It is founded upon a solid and indestructible basis. Williams, in his book on Fiji and the Fijians (p. 208), says: "I once placed a good-looking native suddenly before a mirror. He stood delighted. "Now," said he, softly, "I can see into the world of spirits."

Mr. Howitt, one of the best authorities on the Australian aborigines, says that the Kurnai believe every person has within him a spirit called Yambo; one of the Kurnai was asked if he really thought his Yambo could go out during sleep, and said, "It must be so, for when I sleep I go to distant places, I even see and speak with those that are dead."

Im Thurn, speaking of the Indians of Guiana, writes:—

> "The dreams which come to him in sleep are to him as real as any of the events of his waking life. He regards his dream acts and his waking acts as differing only in one respect, that the former are done only by the spirit, and the latter by the spirit in the body. When the Indian just awake tells the things which he did whilst asleep, his fellows reconcile each statement by the thought that the spirit of the sleeper left him and went out on its adventures."†

AND SO THEY WERE MARRIED.

Minister (to a man wishing to be married): Do you wish to marry this woman?
Man: I do.
Minister: Do you wish to marry this man?
Woman: I do.
Minister: Do you like the city as a place of residence?
Man: No, I prefer the suburbs.
Minister: Do you like the suburbs?
Woman: No, indeed; I prefer the city.
Minister: Are you a vegetarian in diet?
Man: No; I hate vegetables. I live on beef.
Woman: I can't bear meat. I am a vegetarian.
Minister: Do you like a sleeping room well ventilated?
Man: Yes; I want the window away down, summer and winter.
Minister: Do you like so much fresh air?
Woman: No; it would kill me. I want all windows closed.
Minister: Do you like a light in the room?
Man: No; can't sleep with a light; want the room dark.
Minister: Are you afraid in the dark?
Woman: Indeed, I am. I always have a bright light in the room.
Minister: Do you like many bedclothes?
Man: All I can pile on.
Minister: Do you?
Woman: No; they suffocate me.
Minister: I hereby pronounce you man and wife, and may the Lord have mercy on your souls.

CONFIDENCE.

A motorist, stopping his car at a country hotel, called to a man who was passing to look after the car. With much dignity the man replied, "Do you know that I belong to the Salvation Army." "Oh!" replied the motorist, "that doesn't matter. I'll trust you."

Acid Drops.

What a wonderful story of efficiency and success is that of the submarine A 7 which sank in Whitesand Bay on January 16. First of all, the "rescuers" couldn't find her at the bottom; and after spending a lot of time in searching for her, they found her—just below the spot where she disappeared. Ever since they have been trying to shift her, but her stern part is well embedded in some twenty or thirty feet of mud and sand, and naturally she refuses to stir a single inch. They tried to shock her out of her stubborn inertia by putting a battleship going full steam ahead on to a hawser to which she was attached; but she stopped where she was, and the hawser it was that went. This is all that Admiralty science can do at present, and it might have been recognised before. The play is not all over, however; for religion has got to have its look in before the curtain is rung down. The "last rites" over the quiet dead in the ship which remains their tomb are to be performed on board H.M.S. the Forth two days after we pen this paragraph. Much good the hocus-pocus will do them! The performance has been delayed two months. Suppose it were delayed for ever. Who would suffer? The answer to that question is "The clergy." They must be regarded as indispensable. If they are not that, they are nothing at all.

Profanity spreads even in unlikely directions. The London Teacher prints a story of a boy who constructed a cardboard church. Over the portal he inscribed what he thought a suitable text: "Thou wilt be done."

The Salvation Army is holding a "Self-Denial" Week. As their female soldiers beg money from all and sundry, it would be more correctly described as "Other People's Self-Denial," under the auspices of the Salvation Army.

The Birmingham magistrates have imposed a fine of £5 and costs for "improper patter" at a music-hall. If those J.P.'s attend a place of worship, the parson will have to be careful when reading from "God's Word."

Two new bishoprics have just been added to the Church. The poor fishermen-apostles put their nets into the seas; their wealthy disciples to-day draw their sees into their nets.

A Bill has been introduced into the House of Representatives, Washington, which aims at regulating the tide of immigration. Mr. Burnett, who introduced the Bill, told the House that it aimed at those aliens who have "no God, no law, and no master"—a rather comprehensive program. As the main provision seems to be a money qualification, we must assume that having a God, etc., is thought to be a question of dollars. Anyway, we do not see how any Bill is going to keep these people out. Certainly, if a confession of faith is required, it can only keep out those who are honest. Dishonest ones will lie just as much and as strongly as is needed. And that is the usual effect of religiously inspired legislation. It almost invariably sets a tax on honesty and a premium on humbug. Our own laws against freedom of thought and speech have never made a single man or woman honest, but they have manufactured liars and hypocrites by the thousand.

Nonconformists are explaining the Welsh Nonconformist protest against the Disestablishment of the Church in Wales on the ground that the signatures were obtained under pressure. People were afraid they might lose something if they refused to sign, or hoped that they might gain something if they did. We do not dispute this for a moment; on the contrary, we are quite prepared to admit that many signatures have been obtained in this way. But this is not a method that is confined to upholders of the State Church, and we are quite sure that the Disestablishment of the Church will not put an end to it. It is exactly the policy of all Christians when their position enables them to follow it. We know of scores of newsagents who are prevented displaying the Freethinker, for example, by the threat of boycott held out by their Christian patrons. And this is more or less true of all Freethinkers in a business that is susceptible to boycott. There are very few Christians who understand the meaning of fair play. They naturally squeal when this kind of unfair pressure is brought to bear upon them, but the experience never prevents their dealing in exactly the same manner with others when occasion offers.

not know on what Bishop Ingram bases his arithmetic, but it is evident that there is going on a fine game of holy hide-and-seek.

"Country Services Now Running," reads a big advertisement in the daily press. It does not refer to a revival of Christianity, but to omnibus trips, Sundays included.

Pancake carnivals are among the amusements of followers of the Man of Sorrows. Let us hope that the chefs employed do not use Ezekiel's memorable recipe for cakes.

A correspondent of a daily paper writes to say that at the church he attends the offertories amounted to precisely the same sum on two different Sundays. Buttons and bad coins included, we presume.

Truth (New Zealand) dated December 20, 1913, contained the following paragraph:—

> "Truth's representative was travelling from Christchurch to Rangiora a short time ago, and heard two men talking of bullock-driving as done at the Christchurch show. After a while a wiry-looking, tall old man chipped in. 'Driving bullocks. Not one of them knew how to drive—didn't know the language—none of them could get a team of lazy bullocks out of a bog. Bah!' The representative listened with interest, because he knew 'the language,' and knew that every bullocky in Australia in the old days had a pet name for each bullock—'Strawberry,' 'Creamy,' 'Milky,' 'Spud,' and what not. One day a well-known driver, noted for his animal vocabulary, got his team stuck in a bog-hole. His whip cracked and the surrounding air was lurid with language. A country parson rode up, halted, listened in horror to the volley of oaths, and watched, with pain, the cruelty of the whip. Unable to contain himself longer, he said, 'My good friend, it is painful to witness your cruelty to those poor, dumb animals! Why cannot you be more patient and trust in Providence?' The bullocky looked at him and retorted, '"Providence" be b——; "Providence" is the worst o—— bullock I've got in the whole b—— team!'"

Evidently they want Mr. McKenna out there.

One of the religious weeklies discovers that a great many people in these days think that they do not believe in Christianity when the real truth is that they do not believe its literal and historical interpretation. There is nothing startlingly new about this deliverance, and all it means is that modern thought has made many Christians more or less ashamed of the only Christianity that has ever existed. If historical Christianity is not genuine Christianity, what is it? If it has never yet existed, why claim anything for it? Nothing could be more ridiculous than to elaborate one moment the benefits that Christianity has given to the world, to dwell upon the value of this Church and that Church, and then turn round and say that these Churches did not teach Christianity, and that Christianity has never existed except in the mind of an enthusiast here and there. That Christianity will do great things in the future because it has done great things in the past is an intelligible proposition. But to argue that it will do great things because it has hitherto done nothing is a form of reasoning that it takes a "liberal" Christian to appreciate.

Of course, it may be said that it is all a matter of interpretation, and with this we agree. And it remains this whether we are dealing with the first century or the twentieth. To say that Christianity is a matter of interpretation is only to say that there is a doctrine and a man, and the former is what the latter understands it to be. Those who lived at the beginning of the Christian era, and who had the advantage of living in an intellectual environment in which Christian doctrines were fashioned, understood Christianity to involve a belief in a literal heaven and hell, in angels and devils, in miracles and vicarious atonement, and a number of other things that are now very generally rejected. That was the original interpretation, and in the main it was an essential part of the Christianity that ruled the world. Afterwards other interpretations were offered, not due to a better understanding of that religion, but entirely due to the need of squaring Christianity with its changed knowledge and sentiments. The twentieth century interpretation of Christianity is another stage of the same process. It is the pastime of such as have wit enough to see some of the faults of the old creed, but who lack the courage, or the insight, or both, to base their philosophy of life upon modern knowledge and needs.

Ball, alias Sumner, the Liverpool murderer, made a confession to the Bishop of Liverpool, who confirmed him as a penitent—so that's all right. Peter very likely welcomed him with a brass band. His sister told him not to cry; he would be better off in heaven. Nothing seems to have been said about the poor lady who was brutally murdered, and trussed up, and thrown into a dock. Her fate, of course, is too insignificant for consideration.

Mdlle. Gaby Deslys, the famous comedienne, has lost her pet monkey. Will she now adopt a tame clergyman?

Professor T. W. Gregory has assured the Royal Geographical Society that the earth is not drying up. The same thing may be said of the popular preachers.

During a recruiting week at Glasgow the clergy were asked to preach special sermons to enlist the sympathies of their congregations. As the majority of worshipers are women, we cannot see how that could help the Territorial Forces, unless it is proposed to raise regiments of amazons.

The following is from the Montreal correspondent of the Daily News (Feb. 26):—

> "Colonel Samuel Hughes, the Dominion Minister of Militia and Defence, has provoked a lively discussion by expressing the opinion in a public speech that more wars are caused by clergymen than by soldiers. The Minister, who declares that he has nothing to retract, says that he did not suggest that all churchmen were quarrelsome or aggressive, but merely called attention to the fact that more controversies have been caused by religious differences than by disputes on any other subject."

The black army don't have it all their own way, after all; not even in Catholic Montreal.

A play on the Biblical subject of Samson and Delilah has been produced in Berlin. In England, we fear, its career would be as short as Samson's hair after the lady had used the scissors.

Canon Rawnsley has left his self-imposed censorship of literature for the moment, and is busying himself with the tone of the picture exhibitions. He quotes some American teachers as saying that some pictures contain incitements to grossness, illicit passion, and homicide. The Canon ought to train his guns on the Old Testament, which children are compelled to read, and which contains many stories that dare not be filmed.

Apparently the Christian Commonwealth has only just discovered the famous—or infamous—Sight of Hell, a Roman Catholic manual for the use of children and young persons. Anyway, its issue for February 25 contains a description of the pamphlet, with some expressions of opinion about it. It says that the book is "a vile production, and ought to be suppressed by law. It must poison the mind, vitiate the moral sense, distort the vision, pervert the judgment of any child or young person who has the misfortune to read it." We are not fond of suppressing publications by law, otherwise we quite agree with the Commonwealth writer's opinion of the pamphlet. It is a horrible publication; it must have a bad effect on all who are influenced by it—save in the direction of laughter. Only we would beg the Commonwealth to restrain its indignation for awhile, and remember that it is a Christian publication—written by Christians for Christians and proclaiming what is the best attested of all Christian doctrines.

Let us keep before our minds the fact that for hundreds of years the Christian Churches preached this doctrine without the slightest suspicion that it was either untrue or evil. Some of the greatest writers and preachers in the history of Christianity taught it, in much the same language of the Sight of Hell, down to our own day. There is nothing in it, for example, worse than Spurgeon taught. Let us grant that it poisons the mind, vitiates the moral sense, and perverts the judgment; grant all this, and you at once frame a splendid indictment against the whole of historic Christianity. No Freethinker could say more; it is, indeed, only repeating what Freethinkers have said and have been denounced for saying. Then let the Christian Commonwealth reflect on the probable consequence of this poisonous, demoralising doctrine, taught generation after generation as beyond question, and try to calculate how much Christianity is responsible for coarsening and brutalising human character. And when it realises this—and if it does not it should apologise to the author of the pamphlet in question—then let it apologise for all its nauseous, sentimental claptrap about the sweetening and purifying influence of the Christian creed.

It is all right. Americans may take heart. Dr. R. F. Horton recently paid America a visit, and while there he found out what Americans were created for. The idea "stole" into his mind that the responsibility for saving the world "did not, after all, rest upon the effete nations of the Old World, but was being entrusted to the vital forces of the New." Then, he says, "a great sigh of relief seemed to go up from my heart." We are glad Dr. Horton gained this relief, but it seems rather rough on the "effete nations of the Old World." Hitherto, we have taken it for granted that this peculiar privilege of saving the world was reserved for the British Empire. That is why we have annexed so large a part of the earth's surface, solely to carry out our spiritual mission. Now it seems that we are to make way for America. It looks a bit rough on the Old World, but now we know, at least, why America exists.

Dr. Horton says they have one great advantage in America, which is religious equality. By this he means that they have no established Church. This is true, and so far there is equality between Christian sects. But it is not equality of religion that profits a nation, but equality of opinion. And America has not that yet. The legal dice are loaded in America against the Freethinker as they are elsewhere. But we daresay that Dr. Horton would take that as one of the proofs that God has designed America for a great spiritual work.

Rev. T. F. Bull, of Southsea, is a cleric of the good old sort. He writes that he is convinced "the growing laxity and demoralisation of civilised nations is due not to ignorance but to knowledge," and he warns reformers against thinking themselves wiser than God. We are not sure that there is a growing laxity and demoralisation. Manners change, and a change is often enough thought to be bad mainly because it is different from what we are accustomed to. All the same, Mr. Bull is a type of cleric that is becoming rare, and we salute him accordingly.

Mr. H. G. Wells has been giving his impressions of Russia. He says that in Russia he felt himself for the first time in a Christian country. The people—he is referring, of course, to what are called "the masses"—he says, are organically religious. We quite believe him. And those who know the state of Russia have not been slow to connect it with the hold religion has on the people. Were Russia a little less Christian it might easily be a little more civilised. The misgovernment of the people has been made possible by their eight centuries of religious dragooning, and the power of religion must be broken before liberty can be secured or progress made sure.

Referring to Mr. H. G. Wells' remark that were Nelson alive to-day he would not "be given the ghost of a chance of putting his gifts at his country's service" because of his relations with Lady Hamilton, the puritanical Daily News says that "there is no profession outside the Church in which conventional immorality is to-day the slightest bar to success." Our Nonconformist contemporary has soon forgotten Dilke and Parnell, who were both men of Nelsonian morals.

A correspondence has been going on in the Times on the subject of whether death is painful or not. The general opinion is that it is usually painless, which we can quite believe. Acute pain is generally a characteristic of acute vitality rather than the reverse. In normal cases death occurs when the body has been worn out by disease, and the capacity for feeling is therefore at its lowest point. The spasmodic actions that take place on the approach of death are more often than not in the nature of reflex action, and have very small psychological significance. It is a pity that so much religious legend should have gathered round the fact of death, and very often deliberately manufactured for religious gain.

The religious comments upon this painlessness of death are, as usual, amusing. The Church Family Newspaper has the usual fatuous remark about pain serving a useful purpose, and explains the painlessness of death by saying that "when death is inevitable pain ceases to have an educative value, and therefore death is unaccompanied by pain." Now, bearing in mind the fact that when death is painless it is probably because so much pain has already been experienced, the stupidity of the comment seems fairly complete. Let anyone consider in how many illnesses death is preceded by months of pain, and they will appreciate the value of the above quoted comment. Even if it were granted—what is not always true—that pain educates, what education is there in one suffering for months and then dying? Obviously the only possible education here would be if the patient recovers. But when the patient dies? Of course, there are the people who are left alive, and the believer in God may argue that the patient suffers to educate those who are well. It would be quite in line with the general run of Theistic arguments to put this plea forward. Where absurdities are so numerous, one more or less can make little difference.

Sir Thomas Dewar has been telling the public of his big-game exploits through the press under the title of "Lions I Have Met." Wouldn't the journalists like to meet the prophet Daniel and listen to his exploits?

"Always a Warm Welcome" reads an advertisement in the daily papers. It does not refer to hell, but to a new radiator.

"You pass into Euston Station as into a cathedral that is to convey you somehow directly to heaven," says a Daily Chronicle scribe. Isn't it smoky enough to suggest that the trains go to the other place?

Mr. A. C. Benson thinks that people are not so certain as to what is going to happen to them after death as they were in the past ages. Yet 50,000 professional, and as many amateur, preachers try to tell people the Bible "truths" every Sunday. Hell ought not to be "shut down" with so many "stokers."

For burning a maidservant's arm with a heated poker, a man was sent to prison for a month with hard labor by the Mansfield magistrates recently. Yet there are people who profess to believe that the majority of the human race will be subjected to eternal torment in the fires of hell.

Mr. H. G. Wells thinks that the extended use of the aeroplane will eventually lead to a floating population. It is, however, curious that the record for aviation belongs to a Jewish carpenter, who lived twenty centuries ago, and who "flew" without a machine.

A magistrate recently stated that it did not pay to joke with a police-constable. Especially when one is a Freethought speaker and the man in blue has no sense of humor.

A new Ingersoll story is going the rounds. Speaking of a person of enthusiastic character, but not conspicuous intellect, the Colonel said "he would go to the stake for a principle under a misapprehension as to the facts."

A CALIFORNIAN'S PRAYER FOR RAIN.

O Lord of Storms, be good anon,
And vindicate our trust;
Send down thy saving rains upon
The just and the unjust.
Alike they pray—upon their knees
Those, and upon their neighbors these.

Behold, thine earth is very dry
(And similar thy bard)—
We've naught to make it lighter lie,
Our very cider's hard.
Our fields so long have moisture lacked
They gape. Our preachers, too, are cracked.

They tell us that of righteous men
The prayers avail, but lo!
They take not their umbrellas when
To pray for rain they go.
But, Lord, in the resulting show'rs
Thy saints are sometimes seen with ours.

We've set apart with sweet accord
A day of gratitude.
(The Spaniard and the turkey, Lord,
Are dissident and rude)—
Our pious hearts are full, but pray
Take soundings in our wells to-day!

For next year's harvest fit our lands—
For grain and grape and peach;
This season's crops are off our hands—
Sold, and beyond thy reach.
Lord, from thy creatures turn this woe,
And let it fall on Mexico.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

March 22, Manchester.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £63 2s. 9d. Received since:—Alfred Delve, £1 1s.; H. Kennedy, £2 2s.; G. Raggett, 10s.; H. W. B., 3s.; J. Pendlebury, £2; W. Bailey, £6; R. S. P., 10s.; V. M. Crosse, 2s.; F. M. A., 10s.

J. WOOD.—Ingersoll's writings and lectures contain hundreds, probably thousands, of such epigrams. We cannot undertake to give reference to all or any of them.

J. SNOOTER.—We are quite unable to supply readers with questions or answers for use in debating societies. We should have no time left for our proper work. Glad you find the Freethinker interesting and informing. You might try to read some of the books we advertise or refer to from time to time.

JAMES WILLIAMS.—Sorry we can't oblige. We have not issued a weekly contents-sheet for many years. So little display was given to it that the game was not worth the candle. We have a permanent bill, which your friend might like to display. Please apply, in that case, direct to our shop manager. Thanks for your efforts to promote our circulation.

J. W. O'LEARY.—All the Sandwich family ever did, that we know of, was to give a name to a well-known "snack." His present lordship's prophecy about religion and science is of no importance.

J. ALLEN.—You mean well, but what interest can you imagine the enclosure could have for us? We would send the pious thing back, but it isn't worth the trouble or postage.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are always useful.

WALTER STEWART, compositor, aged 73, asks for the vote and interest of any Freethinker who can give the same to his candidature for election to the Printers' Pension Corporation. It is a deserving case, and this is his second application.

W. BAILEY.—We appreciate your generosity in relation to our Honorarium Fund.

R. S. P.—Better late than never, but better early than late—as you say. We wish all subscribers (who can) would remember it.

F. GATESHILL.—Lecture notices should be framed on the model of our printed list. We are glad to see the St. Helen's N. S. S. Branch holds its first meeting at 7.30 on March 7 in the Central Café, Bridge-street, the President giving an address.

C. T. SHAW.—Thanks but Tuesday is too late for this week's issue.

F. M. A.—Sub. acknowledged; letter next week.

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

The wet weather at Glasgow on Sunday did not damp Mr. Foote's ardor nor the enthusiasm of the fine morning audience and the crowded evening audience that assembled to give him another welcome after a long absence. Many ladies were present, and "saints" came from Kilmarnock, Paisley, the Bridge of Allan, Dundee, Aberdeen, and other places. Mr. Turnbull presided at both meetings and warmly invited new members, in which we hope he was successful. Several questions were asked after the evening lecture and suitably answered. But when a familiar voice started asking "What about Capital?" everybody knew it was time to wind up and go home.

Mr. Foote left home at 10.30 on Saturday morning, and arrived in Glasgow at 10.30. p.m. It was a long while to be "upon the road." Sunday's lectures were, of course, very heavy work. On Monday there was the journey back from Glasgow, leaving at 10 in the morning and arriving home at 9 in the evening. Really a good half of a week gone; a big inroad on the time otherwise available for the Freethinker, which suffers to some extent in consequence. Mr. Foote will, however, make up for this as far as possible in the next number. Meanwhile we are glad to state that the Glasgow visit made him rather tired, but did not affect him in any other way. The lectures themselves, and meeting old friends again did him good.

Mr. Cohen lectures at the Manchester Secular Hall, Rusholme-road, All Saints, to-day (March 8). Both afternoon and evening subjects should attract large audiences.

The Leamington Chronicle fairly reports Mr. Cohen's lecture before the Literary and Philosophical Society. In the editorial notes, however, it rather suggests that the Committee was "had." It is even hinted that Mr. Cohen's visit was rather a slight upon Sir Oliver Lodge. Tut, tut! Sir Oliver Lodge is only Sir Oliver Lodge. He is not everybody. There were thinkers before he was born, there will be thinkers when he is dead, and there are thinkers while he is living. This may sound odd in the Midlands, but it is true. We have what we hope is a proper respect for the Principal of Birmingham University, but when we hear his name used to belittle other men's names, we are inclined to say with Hamlet, "Something too much of this."

Mr. Lloyd lectures for the West Ham Branch at the Workman's Hall, Stratford, this evening (March 8). The local "saints" should see the place well filled. They can do this by advertising Mr. Lloyd's visit amongst their friends and acquaintances.

The Annual Meeting of the Humanitarian League will be held at the Westminster Palace Hotel on Thursday, April 2, when the chair will be taken at 7 30 p.m. by Mr. Ernest Bell. An address will be given on some points connected with the League's work, and the Annual Report for the past year will be submitted for adoption. The business concluded, a conversazione, with a short musical program, will follow. Members are invited to attend and bring friends. Mr. Foote has often wished to attend the annual meeting, and he will make an effort to do so this time.

The National Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws will hold a public meeting at Essex Hall on Friday evening, March 20.

The Secular Education League holds its annual Members' meeting on Tuesday evening, March 24, in Room I of the Caxton Hall. The chair will be taken at 7.30. This will be followed by a public meeting at 8.15. It is hoped that Mr. George Greenwood will be able to preside, and the list of speakers includes Mr. Halley Stewart, Sir Henry Cotton, Lady Byles, Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., Rev. Dr. Walter Walsh, and Mr. G. W. Foote.

The Rationalist Peace Society holds its Annual Members' Meeting at 167 St. Stephen's House, Westminster, on Thursday evening, March 5, at 8 o'clock. Report and Balance Sheet to be presented and Officers elected for the ensuing year. This is a very late announcement, but the fault is not ours.

We have only space and time for a few lines on the English Review for March. We shall give it greater attention next week. For the present we can only say that it is a full number and an excellent number, which we warmly commend to our readers' attention. We may mention the editor's capital article on "Crime and Punishment" now, as it deals with a passing topic—Mr. Frank Harris's imprisonment.

Mr. W. Heaford writes:—"In reference to my article of March 1 on M. Daanson's book, Mythes et Legendes, the author informs me that the price stated (10 francs) was the price for subscribers only before the work was issued. M. Daanson's publishers are, he states, Marcel Rivière et Cie, 31 rue Jacob, Paris, and the price of the book is now 15 francs (or 12s.), post free. It is but fair to our readers to put this matter of price right at once. I may add that M. Daanson has confirmed my impression that his present work is but the synthesis of a larger work. In elaborating his theory in definitive form, M. Daanson will devote some eight years to further research and classification, and at the end of that time he hopes to publish a work in two volumes, one on The Origin and Evolution of Myths, and the other on The Origin and Evolution of the Jesus Legend."

The Half-Yearly Meeting of the London members of the National Secular Society has been arranged for Tuesday, March 24, at Chandos Hall, Maiden-lane, Charing Cross. The production of a card of membership is sufficient to obtain admission. Members desiring to introduce any particular business should give previous notice to Miss Vance, the N. S. S. secretary. The chair will be taken, of course, by Mr. G. W. Foote.

The Church and Literature.—III.

JUST three centuries ago Pope Sixtus V. finally organised a special "Congregatio Indici," which is still in operation, and which, besides publishing a list of prohibited books the writing, printing, publishing, distribution, reading, lending, or having possession of any of which is visited with excommunication, publishes also an Index Librorum Expurgandorum—a list of books which may be read after being expurgated and freed from certain offensive passages. In the words of Milton, they "rake through the entrails of many an old good author, with a violation worse than any that could be offered to his tomb."

The latest edition of the Index Librorum Prohibitorum on the reference shelves of the British Museum Library is dated Rome, 1877. A later one has been issued by the present Pope. It gives a list of over a thousand names of persons, from Abaelardus to Zwinglius, whose works must be avoided by the faithful. The work is a curiosity from many points of view. Thus it contains the name of Erasmus Darwin, but the works of his more famous grandson are apparently unknown. Many of the works of the heresiarchs are not enumerated, but have simply the words opera omnia, so that it is an offence to read even an ordinary letter by these authors. The list of works deemed objectionable by the Church contains some of the most eminent names in every department of literature. Our historians are represented by such men as Hume, Gibbon, Robertson, Hallam, and even Oliver Goldsmith. Among foreign historians Macchiavelli, Guicciardini, Raynal, Sismondi, Botta, Mosheim, and Ranke are interdicted. Philosophy is represented by the most illustrious names: Occam, Bruno, Bacon, Campanella, Pomponatius, Hobbes, Descartes, Bayle, Pascal, Leibnitz, Locke, Voltaire, Rousseau, Helvetius, Comte, Hegel, Kant, Fichte, V. Cousin, and Vera. J. S. Mill is catalogued as Stuart, not for his Logic or Essays, but for his Political Economy. Archbishop Whateley's Elements of Logic is forbidden. Hume is inserted both as Mr. Hume for his Essays, and as David Hume for his History of England and opera omnia. Addison is down for his Tours in Italy, Swift for his Tale of a Tub, Lord Chesterfield for his Letters to his Son. That exceedingly chaste novel, Pamela, is interdicted, although, apparently, the Congregation of the Index do not know the name of its author, Samuel Richardson. Among novelists are George Sand, Balzac, Soulié, Murger, and Flaubert. Poets are represented by Ariosto, Petrarch, Milton, La Fontaine, Lessing, Lamartine, Béranger, Carducci, and Heine. Shelley and Burns are apparently unknown to the Congregation. Dante has the honor of a place, not for his epic, but for his treatise, De Monarchia, in which he argues against the Pope's temporal power. Hugo is catalogued for his Nôtre Dame, not for his Torquemada or Religions and Religion. Among theologians one finds, of course, the names of Wiclif, Hus, Luther, Melancthon, Calvin, Servetus, Sherlock, Tillotson, and Michaelis. The critical works of such learned Catholics as Father Simon and Dupin are interdicted, as are also Fenelon's Maxims of the Saints, the complete works of Molinos, and the reconciliations of Bordas-Desmoulins.

Of the Freethinkers, of course, all works are excluded as far as known. In the case of Voltaire an attempt seems to have been made to enumerate his objectionable works, but it does not exhibit much bibliographical knowledge. The well-known works of Dupuis, Volney, and Pigault Le Brun are inserted, as well as the treatise on Religion by Benjamin Constant, and the modern works of Rénan, Strauss, Péyrat, Jules Soury, Baissac, Larroque, and Jacolliot. The numerous translations of Draper's Conflict of Religion and Science, and Büchner's Force and Matter, have got those works inserted in the Index; but there is no mention of important Freethought works best known in England, possibly because it is understood that all works coming from heretics are forbidden.

There are also upon the Index a number of works such as most fathers would keep from their children. Rabelais, Boccaccio, and others, of course, are there. Among the smuttiest collections are the works of Aretino, who was a Cardinal's favorite, and the Facetiæ of Poggio, who was apostolical secretary to three popes. These are inserted, although, in several editions, Poggio is carefully concealed under the name of "Florentinus"; but we miss the works of Abbé Brantôme and others only too well known in the Church.

In addition to the published list of prohibited literature, bishops and priests are supposed to exercise a censorship over the reading of those under their charge. Peignot, in his "Dictionary of the principal works which have been committed to the flames," gives a ridiculous instance of the way in which this has sometimes been carried out. He says:—

> "In Styria the censorship of books is carried on in singular style, and one which shows that the function in Austrian states is not confided to very enlightened men. In the year vi, [i.e, 1798] one of these censors condemned as heretical two books, of which one was entitled Principles of Trigonometry, and the other the Destruction of Insects. The censor thought Trigonometry was closely related to the Trinity, upon which it is forbidden to write; and took Insects for Jesuits."

Let not Protestants lay the flattering unction to their souls that it is the Catholic Church alone that has made war upon literature. Penal laws against the full expression of opinion are yet in force in every Protestant country. Many heretical works have been burnt by the common hangman and summarily suppressed both in England and Germany. In the reign of Elizabeth the Independents had to have a private travelling printing press to issue their Marprelate tracts. Among works publicly burnt were all the early Unitarian and Deistic pamphlets, John Milton's Defence of the People of England, and Defoe's Shortest Way with the Dissenters. The works of Servetus were seized by Bishop Gibson, and burnt in 1723; and the same dignitary suppressed the second volume of Tindal's Christianity as Old as the Creation. In my Historical Sketches of Freethought in England I have, I believe, adduced sufficient evidence that it is to the labors and sufferings of the Freethinkers that we are mainly indebted for a Free Press, the palladium of civilisation.

No doubt, in the palmy days of Christianity, the Church could claim that such literature as there was bore the impress of Christian teaching. The only opening for talent was by entering the service of the Church, and the blighting influence of its creeds is evident in all the writings of the Middle Ages, when it has been said there was no such thing as philosophy, but only scholastic logic and theology. The nature of the Trinity, of the soul; "whether angels in going from place to place move over the intermediate space"—such questions as these formed the intellectual exercises of the cultured, while the mental pabulum of the unlearned consisted mainly of lying legends of the saints. With the renaissance of Pagan learning came a change for the better; Erasmus, Rabelais, Montaigne, Shakespeare, Spinoza, Hobbes, Descartes, Bayle, and Voltaire found new directions for the human mind. Gradually the affairs of this world took pre-eminence over those of a speculative world to come. Historical criticism, directed at first to "profane" matters, gradually trenched upon the domain of Jewish records labelled "sacred." Science, ascertaining more and more of the workings of nature and of the immutability of law, has gradually displaced "Providence"; and literature, despite the copious publication of unheeded sermons, becomes ever more and more secular in its character. Theology, which a few centuries ago commanded the attention of the highest minds, is now left to rhetoricians like Farrar or charlatans like Cook.

The world is beginning to give more heed to the opinions of the most insignificant journalist of the present than to the united pulpit speaking with the voice of a discredited Church of the past.

(The late) J. M. WHEELER.

Aphrodite and Adonis.

THE religious beliefs of all primitive peoples appear to have been greatly influenced by the constantly changing phenomena of the seasons. Ever at the mercy of the elements, early savage races were never without warning of their entire dependence on the ceaseless alterations which the rolling years disclosed. The wintry blast, the fallen snow, the bare and withered vegetation, the frozen rivulet and lake, the scarcity or disappearance of animal life with the departing summer, each and all conspired to impress upon prehistoric man his utter impotence while within winter's cold embrace.

There is much reason to believe that at an early stage of man's development the idea was almost universally entertained that the flight of summer might be stayed by the influences of magic art. There is positive evidence that among many races spells were recited and ceremonies conducted to cause the sun to shine, the rain to fall, the animals to abound, and the earth to give forth her fruits. This cultural stage was to some extent succeeded by another, in which a religious superstition born of wider knowledge and experience began to supersede the belief that the course of the seasons could be arrested by the potent spells of magic alone. A belief arose that higher and greater powers determined the coming of spring, the sweetness of summer, the tinted robes of autumn, and the darkness and cold of winter. The development and decay of plant life, the scarcity or abundance of animal organisms, now came to be more and more regarded as the rising and declining powers of divine creatures who passed from youth to old age, and who gave birth to offspring like common human mortals.

From direct magical exertion over the forces of Nature, men turned their attention towards the gods and goddesses they had themselves created, and strove to assist these divine creatures in their conflict with the dark and sinister powers of death and decay. It was therefore essential to do something to recruit the declining powers of the deities, and when at last they passed unto death to secure their resurrection from the grave. All the world over, magical ceremonies are based on the assumption that by simulating the end desired its accomplishment will be effected. There is in all probability no rural district in Western Europe—the most civilised area in the world—in which these superstitions are not commonly credited to this very hour. The extent to which these primitive beliefs prevail, even in England, is well illustrated in Hardy's Return of the Native and Wessex Tales.

So far as research has hitherto disclosed, the rites and ceremonies designed to assist the gods have been nowhere more elaborately observed than in the countries which environ the Eastern Mediterranean. In Egypt and Western Asia the birth, decay, and revival of animal and vegetable life were personified as divinities who died and rose from the grave. Adonis, Attis, Osiris, and Tammuz, not to mention a more modern divinity, were all gods of this kind. The details recorded concerning them vary, but in substance they are the same, and a study of the god Adonis will in reality embrace the others.

To the student of Greek literature the story of Adonis has long been familiar, and in Shakespeare's "Venus and Adonis" we possess a poem of deathless charm. But Adonis was not born on Greek soil. Under the name of Tammuz he was worshiped by the Semitic inhabitants of Syria and Babylonia centuries before his entrance into Greece.

> "The true name of the deity was Tammuz: the appellation of Adonis is merely the Semitic 'Adon,' lord, a title of honor by which his worshipers addressed him. In the Hebrew text of the Old Testament the same name Adonai, originally perhaps Adoni, 'my lord,' is often applied to Jehovah. But the Greeks, through a misunderstanding, converted the title of honor into a proper name.....We first meet with Tammuz in the religious literature of Babylon. He there appears as the youthful spouse or lover of Ishtar, the great mother goddess, the embodiment of the reproductive energies of nature. The references to their connection with each other in myth and ritual are both fragmentary and obscure, but we gather from them that every year Tammuz was believed to die, passing away from the cheerful earth to the gloomy subterranean world, and that every year his divine mistress journeyed in quest of him 'to the land from which there is no returning, to the house of darkness, where dust lies on door and bolt.' During her absence the passion of love ceased to operate; men and beasts alike forgot to reproduce their kinds: all life was threatened with extinction."*

So necessary was the goddess to the world of life that the great god Ea sent a messenger to restore Ishtar to the light of day. The difficulties of the lower regions overcome, Istar returns to earth, presumably with her loved Tammuz, and with their reappearance Nature resumes her garment of fertility. In some of the Babylonian hymns the death of Tammuz is deeply deplored, and he is compared with the plants that quickly die. His untimely death was commemorated with sad ceremonial every year, and the object of these observances was to awaken the god from the slumber of death. The legend of Adonis finds a fuller expression in Greek literature than in the Babylonian fragments that have so far been deciphered.

In the Greek myth the maiden Symrna had grown cold in her devotion towards the goddess Aphrodite, and was cursed by the angry divinity with an unnatural desire for her father. This part of the myth bears some resemblance to the story of Lot's chaste daughters, as Symrna was not above the practic of deceit in order to secure her desires. Assisted by a nurse, she succeeded in sharing her father's couch without being known to him. When he discovered his daughter's sin he determined to slay her; but she escaped, and when nearly captured she implored the gods to make her invisible. They were moved by her tears, and transformed her into a tree. At the end of nine months the tree opened, and Adonis was delivered. Aphrodite was so smitten by the loveliness of the child that she hid it in a chest, which she entrusted to Persephone's care. When, however, Persephone discovered the beauty of the treasure entrusted to her keeping she refused to part with it. After an angry dispute, the case was carried to the court of Zeus, and the great divinity decided the difficulty by declaring that for four months of each year Adonis should be free to himself, that for an equal period he should dwell with Persephone, and that during the remaining four months he should remain with Aphrodite. Adonis, however, elected to live with Aphrodite during his period of freedom, and thus was with her eight months of the year. Afterwards the beautiful youth met his death from the wound inflicted during the chase by the ferocious wild boar. When we remember that Aphrodite was the goddess of love, and Persephone the divinity of death, it becomes obvious that the contest between the two deities for the possession of Adonis personifies the struggle between summer and winter for supremacy.

The attributes and character of Aphrodite—the Greek equivalent of the Roman Venus—naturally excited the affections of Adonis. She was the divinity of love and beauty. Sprung from the foam, she was the personification of the procreative processes of Nature and the begetter of all living things. During the combat of Typhon with the gods, Aphrodite metamorphosed herself into a fish, and this denizen of the deep to the Greeks was the possessor of the greatest powers of fecundity. Zeus asserted that she ought to occupy herself with marriage celebrations and wedding feasts. The beauty and gracefulness of Aphrodite were beyond compare, and Paris awarded her the prize for loveliness. The myrtle, rose, apple, and poppy were sacred to her. Winged creatures were her messengers and chariot-drawers—the swan, the swallow, the sparrow, and the dove. The ram and the tortoise were especially associated with her worship, and sacred to the goddess were the planet Venus and the month of April. The characteristics of Persephone, her great adversary, were, on the other hand, those of gloom and darkness. Syria and Cyprus were leading centres of the worship of Adonis, and both on the mainland and in the island the cult long flourished. In Syria a great sanctuary of Aphrodite or Astarte stood at a spot on Mount Lebanon, a day's journey from Byblus.

> "The spot was probably Aphaca, at the source of the river Adonis, half-way between Byblus and Baalbec; for at Aphaca there was a famous grove and sanctuary of Astarte which Constantine destroyed on account of the flagitious character of the worship. The site of the temple has been discovered by modern travellers near the miserable village which still bears the name of Afker, at the head of the wild, romantic, wooded gorge of the Adonis."

This is one of the loveliest landscapes in the world, and it was upon this sacred spot that, according to the tradition, Adonis encountered Aphrodite for the first and final time, and here his mangled corpse was consigned to mother earth. "A fairer scene could hardly be imagined for a story of tragic love and death." In ancient times this splendid valley was sacred to Adonis, and broken weather-worn monuments still remain to testify to the piety of his worshipers. One of these records is at Ghineh, where a huge rock is carved with the forms of Adonis and his mistress. Adonis is represented awaiting the onrush of a bear, while Aphrodite is reclining in an attitude of grief.

> "Every year, in the belief of his worshipers, Adonis was wounded to death on the mountains, and every year the face of nature itself was dyed with his sacred blood. So year by year the Syrian damsels lamented his untimely fate, while the red anemone, his flower, bloomed among the cedars of Lebanon and the river ran red to the sea, fringing the winding shores of the blue Mediterranean, whenever the wind set inshore, with a sinuous band of crimson."

A sanctuary of Aphrodite at Paphos, in Cyprus, is one of the most celebrated. Whether reared to the worship of that goddess or to older deities, it was of extreme antiquity. In this instance, as in so many others, the names of the gods were changed, but the ideas underlying their worship remained immutable. The image of the goddess was a simple white cone, and the phallic ceremonies which attended her worship distinguish her as the divinity of motherhood and fertility. The sacred image was anointed with oil on certain solemn occasions, and "To this day," as Dr. Frazer says,

> "the old custom appears to survive at Paphos, for 'in honor of the Maid of Bethlehem, the peasants of Kuklia anointed lately, and probably still anoint each year, the great corner stones of the ruined temple of the Paphian goddess. As Aphrodite was supplicated once with cryptic rites, so is Mary entreated still by Moslems as well as Christians, with incantations and passing through perforated stones, to remove the curse of barrenness from Cypriote women, or increase the manhood of Cypriote men.' Thus the ancient worship of the goddess of fertility is continued under a different name. Even the name of the old goddess is retained in some parts of the island; for in more than one chapel the Cypriote peasants adore the Mother of Christ under the title of Panaghia Aphroditessa."

The resemblances to the legend of the Nazarene contained in the story of Adonis are certainly suggestive. Whether Jesus is to be regarded as an historical character or not, there can be little doubt that the main outlines of his story have been built up out of similar materials to those that went to fashion the myths and legends of Adonis, Attis, Osiris, and various other Oriental divinities.

T. F. PALMER.

Human Filth.

A MISERABLY cold wind was blowing from the east, a penetrative damp wind, with an unjoyful trait of discovering and assailing all the most susceptible parts of your body. A fortnight's rain had turned the road and pathway into thick mire. Darkness of the quality that miraculously descended from the land of light that people name Paradise, upon Jerusalem on a famous occasion, engulfed us, making the travelling heavier and more wearisome.

We were trudging along bravely, keeping up our spirits with visions of a cheery fire and an appetising supper in a cosy room, within an hour's time, when, on turning a bend, something white seemed to gleam in the grass by the pathside. My companion stumbled against some obstruction, and nearly fell. She gave a startled exclamation of fear, and through me flashed the unpleasant sensation that tells of sudden fright. For a second there was the shock of suspended consciousness. For a second I was a savage in the blackness of a primeval forest. For a second I unconsciously awaited the unknown terror.

In the piercingly brilliant rays of the electric lamp we saw the most pitiable, perhaps the ugliest, sight we have ever seen. Lying outstretched in the wet grass was the body of a woman. From the waist downwards her only garments were a pair of torn, bedraggled skirts and a pair of equally ragged stockings. This paucity of garments, when the night was so bitterly cold, in itself, made us shiver, and feel as if tears would be a relief. Her limbs were splashed with mire, ugly blotches of mud on the white flesh, that burned into the brain, and made us sick. In one place there was a deep, red tinge that meant blood. A beautiful statue defiled would evoke resentment in the least artistic sense; but those unsightly, horrible splashes of mud on the white limbs brought nothing but an all-consuming despair, and a pity as sorrowful as the utter loneliness of her death. Pity and repulsion struggled hard for mastery, and repulsion won; for they were as ugly as death—as repulsive.

The upper portion of her body was wrapped in a wet shawl, half covering her head. Her hair was loose, and damp, and stringy. Round her neck was a circlet of red beads. When I removed the shawl from her head I noticed that the rats and weasels had already feasted on the flesh of her face.

Quickly I put the lamp in my pocket and let the shawl drop over the hideous spectacle; but it was too late; for my companion clutched me nervously by the arm, saying in a choking voice, "Come on! Come on! I feel sick."

Hastily I pulled the poor body into the hedge, arranged the skirts, and laid an overcoat on top for protection against hungry animals. Then we resumed our tramp in silence, each engrossed with our own thoughts, towards home, and all the invaluable comforts home entails.

There was no sleep that night. My mind returned, in time, to a sermon I heard in my boyhood days, a powerful sermon by a powerful preacher. "Mary Magdalene" it was entitled. I remember it well. I remember the solemn stillness that filled the church and acted upon us as the religionist imagines the Holy Spirit would influence us. I remember how the minister gripped his congregation; how he held them by the strength of his words. I remember the emotion lights and shadows that sped rapidly over the faces of my friends. I remember the glowing peroration about the cleansing, redeeming, revitalising blood of Jesus. And I remember my sarcastic comments when the sermon was afterwards applauded. And I am still unrepentant.

With the vision of the lonely woman, lying out there in the cold on the wet grass, before my eyes in the darkness of the room, I was sorry I had not been able to speak more strongly. With the knowledge of the tragedy of her death, the awfulness of her condition, and the hateful position she occupied in Humanity's life, I wished, with a savage longing, I had been born a Shakespeare, a Shelley, a Voltaire. Unbefriended, uncared-for, dying like a dog left broken-limbed in a ditch, human filth that she was in the estimation of society, yet she represented, for me, the dark side of the cloud of Christianity.

Never needs religion ask for more proof of its monstrous failure while she and such as she live and die. Contrast her existence with the social power of religion. Reckon its secular power by its churches, its priests, its communicants. Gauge the opportunity ever before religion by the wealth, the position, the strength of its friends. Add the centuries of its life. Multiply the total by the omnipotency that religion professes to have as its chief lever, as its principal justification. And the abjectness of its dominion is of such a miserable degree that you cannot even laugh.

What mattered all their sublimely beautiful words, all their glorious perorations, all their throbbing references to a sympathetic Jesus? What mattered their wonderful language, their divine example, their verbal obedience to the commands intrinsic in that example? What mattered their influence, their power, their opportunity? They, these apostles of Christ, even the best of them, spoke plenty.

The people came forth from the pews, and their sensitive hearts were touched with divine pity, and their eyes were moist with the God-given tears of welling sympathy for the woman of whom their Lord and Master was not ashamed. And out in the cold, in the darkness, on the wet grass, the modern Mary Magdalene was lying, her body exposed to the rain and wind, and providing a meal for rats and weasels.

Listen to the pastors' championship of the love of God, to their joy at finding Christ, to the power of Christianity, to its achievements, to the necessity of its existence for the safety of society, and all the rest of the priestly lies. The ocean of oratory around the barnacled rocks of its accomplishments.

The story of Christ Jesus and Mary Magdalene has brought tears to the eyes of thousands, perhaps millions; but Mary still dies, unknown, forsaken, worn out, by the pathside of life. The story has awakened emotions by the million; but never a reasonable endeavor to rid the world of its Magdalenes. Priests and pastors still pray and preach; the secular power of Christianity is still capable, if used, to move society, almost to unimaginable lengths; religion's opportunity still remains; the Christian God, we are informed, still lives; his Son and the Holy Ghost still influence, we are told, the minds and lives of men; and Mary Magdalene still dies in the wet, cold grass by the wayside, her only companions the hungry rats and weasels.

The "Face" of God.

"When, by His Grace, I shall look on His face,
That will be Glory, be Glory for me."
But I think that the question is not out of place:
What sort of a face do you think you will see?

That is all right to sing, but a face is a thing,—
Whoever may own it, though he be by birth
A saint or a sinner, a clod or a king,—
That has special regard to the things of this earth.

Take a nose, for example, a feature that's built
To receive and expel the material air.
Be it straight or retroussé, whatever the tilt,
Without breathing or smelling it's no business there.

Now what use would a nose to a spirit be, pray,
Without air to breathe, or an odor to smell?
Yet a face, minus nose, would but scare one away,
And what if the face lacked a mouth, Sir, as well?

But a spirit, you'll say, needs a mouth when it sings.
Yet a mouth without teeth, Sir, would captivate few:
Steaks and chops and sea biscuits and similar things
Are for bodies. With spirits they've nothing to do.

It is open to question if eyes are of use
For the light that the substance called ether conveys;
But what will be said for the eyelids that serve
To protect mortal eyes from the sun's fiercer rays?

And what useless appendages ears would become
With no vibrating matter its sound-waves to send;
For the ear, as we know, from the lobe to the drum,
Has in this useful office its practical end.

Will the Lord be baldheaded and smooth at the chin,
Or will he rejoice in long hair and a beard?
If he favors a "Billygoat" many will grin,
And if "sideboards" are there the effect will be weird.

"Hold! 'tis blasphemy, thus to speak lightly of God."
But the crime is with you, Sir, who sing of his "face."
If the thing as a whole can be thought of at all,
To discuss its formation can be no disgrace.

The fact is, a spirit, whatever it be,
Can have nothing in common with you, Sir, or me;
And there's naught with a face in earth, heaven, or hell,
That doesn't possess, Sir, a belly as well.

THE LEAMINGTON MEETING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

Sir,—A crowded meeting at the Café Royal, Leamington, on Tuesday, February 24, listened to Mr. Cohen's lecture on "God and the Soul in the Light of Science." The lecture was in connection with the Leamington Literary and Philosophical Society, and had been brought about by Mr. F. W. Walsh, one of its members. Mr. Cohen was in very fine form, and he was followed by his audience with the closest attention. Several members of the Society spoke against Mr. Cohen's views, but their objections were effectively replied to by the lecturer. The best of spirit maintained throughout the evening, and, though this was the first lecture of its kind under the auspices of the Society, it should not be the last in Leamington. Mr. Walsh should be very pleased with his effort which brought it about. Among the audience were ladies and gentlemen from Birmingham and Coventry.

J. Partridge (for F. W. Walsh).

ATHEIST.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

Sir,—In your issue of the 1st inst., you refer to an editorial footnote to an anonymous letter in the Sentinel, in which it was stated that "even so distinguished a Freethinker as the late Charles Bradlaugh never condescended to call himself an Atheist." This was literally wrong, of course, as I perceive upon refreshing my memory by reference to my copy of Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner's Life; but without entering into details, perhaps you will allow me to say that what was really in my mind was that there was a considerable distinction between the Atheism of Mr. Bradlaugh and that of the correspondent calling himself "Atheist," to whose letter the footnote was appended and that is still my view.

The Editor of the "Staffordshire Sentinel."

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 11 SUNDAY, MARCH 15, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

The social question requires to-day, more than ever, to be examined on the side of human dignity.

—VICTOR HUGO.

Mr. Trevelyan's Pamphlet.

WE left off our review of Mr. J. M. Trevelyan's pamphlet a fortnight ago, having reached a point where he was considering the general question of toleration and compromise in human life. We will now finish what we wished to say on this subject,—quoting largely, as before, from Mr. Trevelyan's published lecture, so that there may be no mistake as to his meaning.

With regard to toleration within families, who are so frequently divided on religious matters in these days, Mr. Trevelyan takes a reasonable position. Young people, by a social law, are bound to show a certain deference to their elders. This is a good reason for courtesy, but not for betrayal. Mr. Trevelyan speaks very plainly on this point:—

> "Concealment from old people must not involve telling lies; or concealment from equals in age and from the world of one's daily life; and, above all, it must not involve the concealer in putting fetters on his or her choice of companionship, reading, or intellectual and moral development."

Taking the family as a whole, or the portion of it dwelling under the same roof—for it is personal contiguity that creates the greatest part of the difficulty—Mr. Trevelyan writes:—

> "It is still sometimes supposed that religious unity can be preserved at least in the family. But members of the same family often differ in temperament, intellect, and emotional character. In other words, they are, by nature, of different religions. And if natural growth is denied, the individual, whether man or woman, is stunted in development. Happy is that family where all the members think alike—happy, but not always vigorous. Unhappy is the family whose members have given up thinking because they cannot think in unison."

There is still discord because of difference in many families. But there is a great improvement in this respect within our own memory. In the days of our boyhood a whole town would be agitated by the presence of one Atheist. He was pointed at by adults, and mobbed and hooted by children, when he walked in the streets. We recollect the only known Atheist in our native town. To add to the horror of his personality, he was a chimney-sweep, and he was a perfectly awful figure when dressed in the garb, and covered with the blackness, of his profession. To have such a man in the house was like having the Devil for a lodger. As a member of your family he would, in most cases, be simply intolerable. But there would be a certain amount of humor mixed in the situation now. Scepticism and discussion have gone so far that the majority of families have to practise more or less accommodation in religious matters, as they have in politics and social affairs.

Mr. Trevelyan was bound, of course, to deal with the question of woman. Fortunately it is something else than woman's right to fight the police, or burn down her neighbors' buildings, or dog-whip old gentlemen, or hunger-strike against the indignity of imprisonment for what, according to the law of the land, are criminal offences—that Mr. Trevelyan has to deal with. He has no need to penetrate into that region of violent deeds and more violent casuistry. He is able to leave political and social discussions altogether aside. It is woman simply as a human being, in those fundamental relations to the world which her sex involves, whom he is considering. Is it necessary, is it right, to withhold from her the freedom enjoyed by men in respect to religious inquiry and speculation? Mr. Trevelyan answers as follows:—

> "In close connection with the argument from the family is the argument about women. The man may often stay away from Church, even in the country, provided he pretends that it is because he is lazy; but it is too often regarded as 'bad form' for women to be absent. This insult to women is sometimes excused on the ground that 'women can't do without religion.' If this saying means that no woman can lead a good or happy life without the Christian religion, it is disproved by countless examples. But, perhaps, it means that they care more about religious questions and are more emotional than men. Now, if psychology has proved the existence of a more emotional temperament in women (a point on which I have heard different opinions stated) we could only deduce that indifferentism and hypocrisy come less naturally to women than to their brothers; and we should therefore see an even greater wrong in the purely conventional conformity expected of them by family and social custom. Further, their emotional and poetical temperaments (if such they have) would do much to save Free Thought from the hardness that often besets the virile reaction against sentimentality. Therefore, to shut up women in a charmed circle of Christian dogmatics, would be no less injurious to the progress of the world than to place similar restrictions upon men."

The characters of Freethought women are a sufficient answer to the old argument that the "tender sex" are injured in some mysterious way by acquiring knowledge and learning truth—even in matters of religion. "I cannot understand, I love," sounded very pretty from the affectionate, submissive wife in Tennyson's In Memoriam. It was so flattering to male vanity. But, after all, it was never meant; and, in reality, it is opportunity that actually creates, by vitalising through a regular supply, the passion in women, as well as in men, for intellectual culture and the higher life. It has been discovered—or rather rediscovered, for it was known long ago, as long as the days of ancient Paganism—that a good wife need not be a dunce nor a good mother a fool—nor a good sister a mixture of both.

The idea that one part of human life can be benefited by the suppression of another is one of the worst delusions. Landor was right in saying that the price of the higher pleasures is abstention from the lower. Abstention, yes; but restriction, no. This development must necessarily be self-development. You cannot beautify a human soul by mere ignorance, or elevate it by mere thoughtlessness—or what the old divines used to call inconsideration. Certainly there is no real opposition between mind and morals. It was one of the great utterances of Socrates that wisdom and virtue were ultimately identical. Mr. Trevelyan is sound and clear enough on this point:—

> "For, in fact, morality and intellect are the two deities that preside over the human soul; it is not necessary that they should in every case be of equal stature, but it is necessary that neither should be deliberately mutilated to give life to the other. If intellect is sacrificed on the shrine of morality, morality itself becomes a Moloch, and loses its own virtue."

This is followed by a fine passage on the life that is left to men when they can no longer rely on the supports of the Christian (or any other) superstition :—

"The vast, unexplored fields of thought and poetry are not all closed up to us if one noble legend is found to be a legend—no more, and no less. The 'splendors and terrors' never cease to rise from the unplumbed depths of our own minds, until we ourselves have yielded up the life of the spirit to the pressing cares and vulgarities and amusements of daily life; and no one is more liable to this fate than one wrapped up in comfortable and conventional orthodoxy. Has our life ceased to be worth living because we no longer say we know its origin and its end? Must love decay on earth because hell is quenched, or pity because suffering here is without personal compensation hereafter, or energy because mankind can only be saved by its own effort? Is the good worth fighting for only if we are certain beforehand of conquest? Dare we serve only under a banner predestined to victory, and under an omnipotent general? The imagination should be used to illumine and spiritualise what is, and to picture what is not, but never to preach that which is not as though it were."

It is evident that, in Mr. Trevelyan's opinion, Christianity will long, if not always, present a problem of toleration by existing in the same society with Freethought, or Agnosticism, or the Religion of Humanity—or by whatever other name naturalism is called in opposition to *super*naturalism. This is his view of the future :—

"I deprecate the plea, however forcibly argued, that civilisation is 'at the cross-roads,' that it must turn either wholly Christian or wholly non-Christian. It is not going to do either. Civilisation is no longer an indivisible unit that must go down one of two paths. It was on one path in the middle ages, but now it is found on many paths. Diversity of religious experience and belief is the law of the future, and those who cry out that there is danger of our becoming wholly Christian or wholly anti-Christian, are unnecessarily perturbed. Christians and non-Christians will grow together to many harvests to come. It is only a question of how to get along together."

A pleasant prospect, in theory; but we may doubt its practical realisation. Society is always tending to unity of belief in essential things. When a religion like Christianity once gets found out, people cannot go on living as if they believed it. It comes to be entertained, in time, only by the intellectual and moral refuse of the community. Even its professional representatives are drawn from lower and lower strata of character and ability. Christianity must eventually go altogether, unless it regains its old position, just as its component parts go altogether. Take the case of witchcraft. People used to believe in it universally. It was given up gradually, of course, with the growth of knowledge and the scientific spirit. It has now entirely disappeared. People do not settle down in society, some believing in witchcraft and others denying and despising it—cultivating, all the while, a mutual toleration and respect for each other. And in our opinion it will be the same with Christianity.

But we do not deny Mr. Trevelyan his own glowing picture, if he chooses to cherish it. Freethinkers, at any rate, will sympathise with the fine spirit it enshrines :—

"What, then, are we to aim at as our ideal? Shall we try to create a society composed one half of sincere Christians and the other half of make-believe Christians, relieved by a few enraged anti-clericals stung to fury by the insincerity around them? Should we not rather aim at a society of sincere Christians and sincere heretics, living in friendly social intercourse with each other, working together for the innumerable objects that good men have in common and sharing together not a few spiritual emotions? The question concerns Christians and non-Christians alike, for, whether we know it or not, we are one body, and we flourish not at each other's expense, but by a system of wholesome rivalry and mutual reaction that can be actively friendly in its workings. Christians and non-Christians are no more 'natural enemies' than English and French, or English and Germans. But each side must admit the other's right to a 'place in the sun.' It is to be hoped that the Twentieth Century may see the growth of Norman-Angellism in religion, and the disappearance of the last relics of our bad inheritance from the Middle Ages, the spirit that once took form in the statute of De Haeretico Comburendo."

There is a valuable corrective on another page to what is perhaps the weaker side of this ideal :—

"To prevent misunderstanding, I should like to add this to what I said in the lecture: I do not mean that a person is to be blamed ipso facto if he attends the service of a religion in which he does not believe. I attend Christian marriages and funerals, provided I do not have to do so as bridegroom or corpse, and have no quarrel with others who choose to go further in the direction of 'occasional conformity.' My objection is made against—

"(1) Those who conceal their heretical opinions from the society in which they ordinarily live; if church-going is a part of this deception I think it wrong;

"(2) Those who try to make their spiritual life centre round rituals expressive of doctrines they do not believe.

"Of course, I recognise a distinction between these two classes. No. (1) seems to me an obvious social crime. No. (2) is a personal matter and is much more difficult to define and to appreciate in all the subtleties of each individual case."

Here, indeed, we do come up against a real difficulty. Where is one to draw the line? The fact is that no line can be drawn. We never have the absolute choice of good and evil in this world. We have to choose between various mixtures of both, and as the choice is necessarily personal we should not judge each other hastily.

The Limitations of Science.

IN the Inquirer, for February 7 and 14, there appear two articles reviewing Professor Bury's History of Freedom of Thought, published in the Home University Library. The articles are by Dr. S. H. Mellone, formerly examiner in Philosophy at St. Andrews, Edinburgh, and London, and author of several works on psychological subjects. With the general run of his review of Professor Bury's work I am not now concerned, although one may note that the great cause of complaint is that too much stress is laid upon the anti-theistic implications of modern science, and too little value placed on religious ideas. If this were true, it would be an excusable fault. With so much stress laid upon the religious side of the case, and so many studied endeavors to hide anything from the average reader that might suggest anti-religious conclusions, it would surely be permissible for a writer, with limited space at his disposal, to lay emphasis upon those aspects of thought usually overlooked. I do not say that this is the case with Professor Bury; I am only pointing out that under existing conditions it would be a forgivable offence in a writer wishing the general reader to know all the currents of modern thought.

My object in noticing Dr. Mellone's critique is to deal with what he has to say concerning the possibility of science regulating life. In this he follows a great many other writers, some of them entitled to rank as authorities on matters of scientific thought. And yet I am quite convinced that they are wrong, although it may sound rash for a layman to venture to correct the specialist. All I need plead in extenuation is that science is wholly democratic—the one real democracy in a world where many pseudo-democracies exist. Moreover, unfortunately perhaps, a man may attain great eminence as a scientific worker without being a great scientific thinker, with the result that when he comes to deal with subjects just a little off his regular path, he may be found stumbling through only partial appreciation of the scientific method. On the other hand, a man may be a genuine scientific thinker, and a fruitful one, without having at his disposal anything like the store of knowledge that many a scientific worker has. To take only two examples; neither George Henry Lewes nor Herbert Spencer were what one would call great scientific workers, but both were able to suggest to the ordinary man of science principles and conclusions that they would not have reached alone—at any rate, they did not.

There are many, says Professor Mellone, who claim that when the world has destroyed theology and metaphysics, it will find its salvation in an outlook on life based entirely on science. He adds:—

> "A strange illusion besets many men in this matter. They see that science has contributed to the destruction of a great deal of harmful superstition; they see that science puts into men's hands means of practical invention and achievement to which no limit can be set, and they run to the conclusion that because science has been or may be used for good, therefore science itself is good."

This illusion Dr. Mellone undertakes to dispel. He is convinced that "an obstinate attempt to think clearly dissolves the whole of it into smoke." This thinking clearly is crystallised into the following:—

> "Science is essentially limited, in the first place, to the endless ascertainment of facts and the physical conditions under which they occur, and in the second place to the criticism of error. This limitation is all-important. To understand it is to dispose once for all of the current cant about 'Science and Progress.' The facts and the laws of their causation exhaust the realm of science. Science belongs to the world of analysis. She can lay down no judgment of value or worth; all such judgments belong to a world beyond that of science—the "world of Appreciation." Her finding may, indeed, be turned to practical purposes, good and bad; but she knows nothing of goodness or badness. Her results may be employed equally to save life or destroy.....Science cannot demonstrate that.....one desire is any better or any worse than the other. Hence it is simple or rather complex nonsense to assume as 'scientific facts that the process of natural evolution leads to good, or that the increase of human life is good, or the stability of society good. If a man chooses to deny any of these statements, there is not a word, from the merely scientific point of view, to be said against him."

The statements made here are all more or less common. Similar statements have been made by Sir Oliver Lodge, they were made over and over again by Mr. Balfour in his recent Gifford lectures, as well as in his previous writings on religion. And they are all either false or misleading. That is, they either misstate the facts, or state facts in such a way that while they are accurate enough in form they give rise to quite misleading ideas.

First of all there is the attempt to impose limitations on science. The purpose here is obvious. By marking off a region beyond which science cannot travel, another region is secured in which all kinds of speculations, religious and other, may deposit themselves without there being any effective checks. There is a region in which science is supreme, and it is admitted that it leaves no room for religion here. But, they say, science has its limitations. There is another region in which scientific method and scientific tests do not apply. And here there is room for religion because there is no rule by which one can declare it to be wrong. It is the old game of the "Unknowable"—with a difference. Instead of there being a great "Unknowable," spelt with a capital letter and called "God," because, as F. Bradley said, we didn't know what the devil else it could be, we have a "knowable," but of a different kind to that with which science deals, and quite superior to scientific method.

Is it true, then, that science is essentially limited to physical facts? It is limited to facts, certainly; but why physical facts? And suppose one were to argue that there are no "physical" facts, and that in dividing the world into physical facts and psychical facts, we are only adopting a convenient method of classifying the sum of facts? In that case what becomes of Mellone, Lodge, and Balfour? Clearly, to use Dr. Mellone's expression, we have dissolved their arguments into smoke. Science, we can grant, is concerned with facts, with nothing but facts; but why with physical facts only? All facts are not physical. If I have a headache, that is a fact. If I feel hot or cold, angry or pleased, think one thing ugly and another beautiful, find one smell agreeable and another disagreeable, these are all as much facts as a chunk of granite or a bottle full of hydrogen. Nay, if I fancy and see a ghost, or a vision, these are also facts so far as my mental state is concerned. So also are my beliefs about all manner of things. There is nothing, in short, that does not come under the heading of "facts" so far as a sound science is concerned. The facts may be objective or subjective. They may exist in relation to all minds normally constituted, or they may exist only in relation to my own mind; or, yet again, they may exist only in certain states of mind, but they do not cease to be facts on that account.

Now the business of science is to collect facts—all facts—classify them, and frame certain generalisations that explain their groupings. It takes all the facts available, and divides them into two groups—one physical, the other biological, or inorganic and organic. It divides the former up into sub-groups, and it does exactly the same with the latter. It talks of the facts of the physical world, the facts of the biological world, and the facts of the psychological world. It finds this last group of facts made up of all sorts of feelings, beliefs, and experiences, some of which it calls true, some false—that is, they are true when they hold good of all men and women normally constituted; they are not true when they hold good of isolated individuals, and can be seen to be the product of misinterpreted experience or a temporary derangement of the nervous mechanism. But, true or false, they remain among the facts of the mental life. They have to be collected, grouped, and explained exactly as other facts are grouped, collected, and explained. They fall within the scope of science to be dealt with by the scientific method.

Now, on what ground can science be limited to the study of "physical" facts? Non-physical facts, it is said, cannot be tested and measured and weighed as physical facts may be. Suppose we grant this, it would only prove that the same tests cannot be applied to all classes of facts, and I am not aware that there is anything in the scientific canon why this should be so. The physical facts and the laws of their causation, says Dr. Mellone, "exhaust the realm of science." Emphatically, no. The causation of mental states, the relations between mental states and the effects of these relations between organisms possessing the same mental states, offer a quite legitimate field for scientific inquiry. What becomes of the whole science of psychology if science is chained to physical facts? It is true that our knowledge here is not so precise, and may never be so precise, as our knowledge of physical facts. But that is entirely due to the complexity of the facts themselves. It is true also that science is continually endeavoring to relate mental facts to physical facts. That is all part of the general scientific search for unity and continuity. But the identity of mental facts is not destroyed. As mental facts they remain, part of the material that it is the work of science to reduce to order. If mental facts cannot be weighed or measured, science must devise some other test; that is all. If we cannot weigh an emotion, we can test its intensity, note the condition under which it appears, and its influence so far as it affects the life of society.

There is, in short, no fact that lies outside the scope of science; and there is nothing that forms part of the world or of human life that does not rank as a "fact" of which science legitimately takes heed. Even Dr. Mellone's illusion about the scope of science is a fact. And that has to be explained in terms of a desire to find a region from which science is excluded, and so provide a safe refuge for religion.

What is Man?

IN the Articles of Religion the one living and true God is defined as a being "without body, parts, or passions." The Rev. Arthur Chambers, vicar of Brookenhurst, is an ordained minister of the Church whose creed is embodied in those Articles, and we naturally infer that he accepts and approves of that definition of the Divine Being. In our estimation it is the most absurd definition ever framed; but in the year 1562 the archbishops and bishops of both Provinces, and the whole clergy of the Anglican Church unanimously adopted it as the best that their united wisdom, guided by the Holy Ghost, could construct. And yet Mr. Chambers speaks with contempt of those "excellent Christians who only think of a spirit as a shapeless essence—a vague something without body or parts." The Bible tell us that God is a spirit, and Article One assures us that, being a spirit, he is "without body, parts, or passions." It inevitably follows, if Mr. Chambers is right, that the Almighty is "a shapeless essence—a vague something without body or parts." Of course, the reverend gentleman was not thinking of his Maker when he penned those words. He was absorbed in the advocacy of the peculiar theory that man, after death, exists in bodily form. In Man and the Spiritual World, he defends the strange notion "that it is possible there may exist bodies other than those compounded of material particles" (p. 57). What such bodies are like no one knows, not even Mr. Chambers. Is it not sheer nonsense to talk about bodily forms other than those compounded of material particles? Are not all forms of necessity physical?

Mr. Chambers contends that "man, while in the Earth-life, possesses certain faculties that point to an interior spiritual organisation." It never seems to strike the reverend gentleman that "organisation" cannot possibly be "spiritual." An organisation is a body composed of different organs or parts performing special functions that are dependent upon one another and essential to life. All known organs or parts are certainly physical in their nature, and perform physical functions. We are not surprised, therefore, to learn that the only faculties said to point to "an interior spiritual organisation" are the highly doubtful ones known as clairvoyance and clairaudience. This is how Mr. Chambers describes them in action:—

> "There are, at the present time, persons who can see and hear external spiritual realities that are near them, although those realities are imperceptible to the ordinary senses. There are others who can see and hear spiritual realities distant so far as to be absolutely beyond the range of material vision and hearing. And, further, there are many who can clairvoyantly see and clairaudiently hear external physical realities, under circumstances of time and distance precluding all possibility of ordinary eyes and ears being the media of the sight and hearing" (pp. 112-3).

"An interior spiritual organisation," "a spiritual body," and "spiritual realities," are purely imaginary objects, while clairvoyance and clairaudience are spurious faculties, in no sense super-physical. Mr. Chambers is evidently a spiritualist, who believes in mediums and their alleged trances; and it is from the phenomena of Spiritualism that he derives his proofs of the spirituality of man's nature. No other evidence whatsoever is adduced. Here is a fair specimen of the line of argument pursued in this remarkable book:—

> "Our existence, while on this earth, is a duplex one. We live in two worlds—the physical and the spiritual. By our material body, we are in conscious contact and adjustment with the physical world; while, by our spirit-body, we are consciously or unconsciously in relation to a spiritual universe that interpenetrates the physical and us. Further, while we are encased in flesh, the physical part of our nature predominates, in the sense that it is, more completely than is our spiritual part, in its own particular sphere. We can fully exercise our material faculties, but we cannot as yet fully exercise the faculties of our finer spirit-body. Nevertheless, the latter are within us, and they have been partially exercised by numbers of men and women while still in this world. The facts of clairvoyance and clairaudience bear witness to this" (pp. 94, 95).

The claim that we are threefold in our constitution falls to the ground through an utter lack of supporting evidence. Nothing is easier than to assume that "man, in his essence, in the basis of his being, is a spirit, even when passing the first phase of existence on the plane of matter," but nothing is more impossible than to produce a single fact in support of the assertion. "Spirit" and "spirit-body" are words that convey no intelligible meanings whatever.

What, then, is man? If he is not a spirit, encased in a spirit-body, how are we to define him? Let us examine a few undoubted facts concerning him. One is that when he begins life he is devoid of consciousness. He is much lower down in the scale than many of the higher animals. They possess in their maturity what he in his infancy is clearly without. In other words, he and they commence their careers at precisely the same point. An infant cannot feel "I am I," cannot distinguish itself from surrounding objects, and has no sense of right and wrong. Consciousness develops but slowly. The sense of personality is a product of evolution. Another fact is that consciousness can easily be destroyed. In sickness it is sometimes entirely lost for days and weeks together. Does not this prove that consciousness is not a spiritual entity resident in the material organism though perfectly distinct from it, but, rather, "a physiological function of the brain," which is common to all animals with a centralised nervous system and a brain? Now, if consciousness is a function of the brain, absent in infancy, lost in certain diseases, destroyed by any serious injury to the head, and utterly discontinued at death, on what ground can it be declared that man is more than a physical being? Mr. Chambers himself admits that, judging by appearances, we are bound to put him in the same category as the animals round about him:—

> "He seems no more than a higher class of physical being, who shares with other earthly creatures a common physical life. Those in whom the faculty that perceives the Spiritual is dormant, look at him and see no vital distinction between him and the brute, insect, and plant. The circumstance of death seems to make them alike. What befalls them also befalls him. Physically he and they appear to perish. To whatever ends, in the economy of Nature, the dead and the disintegrated particles of their material organisation may subsequently serve, it looks as if death obliterates their individuality. The man, the brute, the insect, and the plant, as such, seem to end their existence when death comes" (p. 54).

But the reverend gentleman declines to accept the verdict of appearances, preferring to believe, without a scrap of evidence, the testimony of the Bible. Without a moment's hesitation he pronounces the materialistic conception of man unworthy and disappointing, simply because it is contrary to the teaching of Holy Writ. He does not even understand what Materialism really is. He represents the Materialist as saying, "At death, our bodies are resolved into the physical elements of which they are composed, and ourselves will cease to be." No true Materialist would ever differentiate between our bodies and ourselves, because he believes that our bodies are ourselves.

Mr. Chambers builds his whole system upon unverifiable assumptions. He assumes the existence of a just and loving God while all the facts of life emphatically deny it. Man is by no means a being of whom such a Deity could feel proud. He assumes a human craving for a Hereafter which he calls "an implanted instinct." It is true that most religions teach a doctrine of immortality, and that the majority of mankind, being religious, have always believed in it; but there have been men and women in all ages and countries who rejected the belief in a future life, treating man merely as a child of the earth. The craving for a Hereafter is not an implanted instinct, but a distinct acquirement. The child is trained to believe in immortality and then to cherish the hope of it. Left to itself no child would ever think of a Hereafter or desire to live beyond the tomb. Mr. Chambers is fundamentally mistaken when he affirms that "unpoisoned by negative thought, and not drugged by vice or worldliness, the thoughts of a man turn as naturally to a Hereafter existence as the desire of a bird turns to the air, or that of a wild animal to the woods." The truth is that, uninfluenced by religious instruction in early life, no man would ever dream of either a God or a Hereafter, or have any craving that could not be satisfied on earth.

The Boy Who Said "Damn."

"We have a kindness for Mr. Leigh Hunt."—MACAULAY.

BY the death of Mrs. Jacintha Shelley Hunt Cheltnam, who died recently at Hammersmith at the age of eighty-six, a link with the literary giants of the nineteenth century has been severed. She was the last surviving child of Leigh Hunt, the friend of Shelley, Keats, Lamb, Byron, Dickens, Carlyle, and many another well-known writer; and Hunt's own literary work commands attention, for he was a poet as well as the friend of poets.

A man of letters, Leigh Hunt was almost a genius, and his excursions into literature included poetry, criticism, a novel, several dramas, and works dealing with religion. In conjunction with his brother he started the Examiner, and his robust Radicalism soon got him into trouble with the authorities. The two brothers were prosecuted and fined £500 each, with two years' imprisonment, for lampooning the Prince Regent, afterwards George IV. That Leigh Hunt called the Prince "a fat Adonis of fifty" may have been a pretty insult, but was certainly not his chief legal offence. He also called the Regent "a violator of his word, a libertine over head and ears in disgrace, a despiser of domestic ties, the companion of demireps, a man who had just closed half a century without one single claim on the gratitude of his country or the respect of posterity." It was largely true; but there was not a country in Europe where it would have been allowed to be said of the chief of the state, and similar things could not be said to-day without retaliation.

Leigh Hunt's imprisonment was not a holiday, nor was it a silent meditation among the tombs. He could not go beyond the prison walls, but he had rooms furnished by himself, and he enjoyed the society of his wife and family, and had frequent visitors. The learned Jeremy Bentham came and played battledore and shuttlecock with him. The imprisonment may have affected Hunt's health, but it was a comedy compared to the treatment of Holyoake and Foote, condemned to their cells and the prison yard. Besides, Hunt had facilities for writing, and composed "A Feast of the Poets," "The Story of Rimini," in addition to a vast amount of journalism.

Hunt's imprisonment brought him into unusual prominence. He had known Charles Lamb from boyhood, and Shelley some years. He now made the acquaintance of Keats, Hazlitt, and Byron. Indeed, he was always happy and fortunate in his friendships with men of genius. Later in life he added to his circle the names of Carlyle, Dickens, Macaulay, Lytton, and Lord Houghton.

For this reason Hunt's autobiography is excellent company, for he always writes naturally and unaffectedly, and his description of his famous friends is vastly entertaining. His account of his Italian travels, too, is an example of the best kind of such writing. His humor is never forced. A typical example is his youthful recollection of how he used, after a childish indulgence in bad language, to think with a shudder, when he received any mark of favor, "Ah! they little think I'm the boy who said damn."

An omnivorous reader, Hunt secured the rare commendation of Macaulay for his "catholic taste." Of all authors, indeed, and probably of all readers, Leigh Hunt had the keenest eye for merit and the warmest appreciation of it wherever found. An active politician, he was never blind to the genius of an opponent. Blameless himself in morals, he could admire the wit of Congreve, Vanbrugh, and Wycherley; and a Freethinker, he could see both wisdom and beauty in the old divines. It is to his credit that this universal knowledge, instead of puffing him up, only moved him to impart it. Next to the pleasure he took in books was that he derived from pointing out to others the pleasure in them. Witness his Wit and Humor and his Imagination and Fancy, two of the finest handbooks in English literature. Hunt was always genuine in his criticisms. It was nothing to him whether an author was new or old, an Englishman or a foreigner, for his sympathies crossed all frontiers. Nor did he shrink from any literary comparison between two writers when he thought it appropriate. Thackeray had this same outspoken honesty, and in speaking of Fenimore Cooper's hero in the "Leather-stocking" novels he says, "I think he is better than any of Scott's lot."

Few critics would deny Hunt's talent for poetry. There is no doubt that his verse had a very strong influence on his contemporaries, and that it inspired music much better than itself. After all, the poems, or some of them, form the only part of Leigh Hunt's voluminous literary work likely to survive. Perhaps his happiest lyric is the charming trifle:—

"Jenny kissed me when we met,
Jumping from the chair she sat in;
Time, you thief, who love to get
Sweets into your list, put that in!
Say I'm weary, say I'm sad,
Say that health and wealth have missed me,
Say I'm growing old—but add,
Jenny kissed me."

Some of his sonnets are excellent. Perhaps the best is the one on the Nile, which he wrote in rivalry with Shelley and Keats, commencing—

"It flows through old hushed Egypt and its sands, Like some grave mighty thought threading a dream."

This includes the magnificent description of—

"The laughing queen that caught the world's great hands," which is not only a very fine line, but the discovery of a cadence which has been imitated ever since.

His sonnet on "A Lock of Milton's Hair" is a splendid example of his enthusiasm for the great writers:—

"It lies before me there, and my own breath
Stirs its thin threads, as though beside
The living head I stood in honored pride,
Talking of lovely things that conquer death.
Perhaps he pressed it once, or underneath
Ran his fine fingers, when he leant blank-eyed,
And saw in fancy Adam and his bride,
With their rich locks; or his own Delphic wreath."

In "Abou Ben Adhem," the poem that has found its way into every anthology and every heart, he shows an unexpected depth and tenderness. It is Ariel turned Prospero, and showing in the transformation how antic and irresponsible a spirit Ariel is. It is appropriate that on Hunt's tombstone at Kensal Green should appear two lines from that fine poem which alone would make his name immortal:—

"I pray thee then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow men."

FINITE AND INFINITE.

Imagine a man who, with balances a thousand cubits high, should wish to weigh the sand of the sea. When he had filled his two scales they would overflow, and his work would be no further advanced than at the beginning. All the philosophers are at that point. They may say if they please, "Still there is a weight, there is a certain figure which we should know, let us try," the scales are magnified, the rope breaks, and always, always so!—Gustave Flaubert.

Literary Gossip.

Mr. Bertram Dobell, the well-known bookseller and book-writer, sends me a copy of his latest "catalogue of rare and choice books." I should like to order two or three hundred pounds' worth of them, but I haven't the money, and the prices are not for my purchase in any case. I note that George Meredith's earliest volume of poems, which is excessively rare, is priced at £30. It was published in 1851, with a dedication to Meredith's father-in-law, Thomas Love Peacock.

Mr. Dobell had a copy of that little volume of Poems in the middle 'seventies—nearly forty years ago. He lent it to James Thomson ("B.V."), the poet, who copied out the best of them, and returned the precious collection of Meredith's earliest poetry to Mr. Dobell. I copied Thomson's copy, and I still have the penny notebook in which I wrote. There were some very beautiful things in that little volume, including the original draft of "Love in the Valley."

The Herald of the Star is a monthly Theosophical magazine with the object of preparing for the Great One—the new spiritual Teacher—who is generally expected in the eastern part of the world. It is published at 19 Tavistock-square, London, W.C., and the price in this country is sixpence. It is beautifully printed, and some of the writers may be considered "beautiful" too—by their followers and supporters. Mrs. Besant is one of them. She is a sort of high priestess now, and she ventures to patronise persons who were at one time her superiors. Look at the following from her brief article on "Religion":—

> "It is, of course, possible that a man may remain in the sceptical stage, may not be strong enough to grow out of spiritual youth into spiritual manhood, and yet be too strong to fall back into the spiritual second childhood of dogma. Then, if he be of well-trained intellect and of clean life, if he feel that 'though there be neither heaven nor hell, nor any Gods to rule the world, virtue is none the less the binding law of life,' then such a man—like Charles Bradlaugh and William Kingdom Clifford—will learn, through the loss of the belief in man's immortality, the lesson of the purest altruism which man can acquire, and he will be the next best thing to the illuminated Mystic, the high-minded and tolerant Sceptic, equal to all that life and death can bring. He will be the gate-keeper of the Temple of the Religion of the future, and in another life shall cross its threshold and know the Hidden God."

Poor Bradlaugh! This is the most unkindest cut of all. To be patted on the back, intellectually, morally, and spiritually, in this condescending way, by the lady who, however unintentionally, was the cause of so much mental anxiety to him in the last few years of his life, is calculated to make him feel something worse than anxiety, if he were still within the reach of experience. So much I do not hesitate to say, knowing Bradlaugh as I did. I also knew Clifford, who had a clear keen mind and a sense of humor, with a particular contempt for all kinds of charlatanry. And I can guess what he would say about Mrs. Besant's pious charity. To him.

A further notice of the March English Review was promised last week in these columns. It opens with a powerful poem entitled "Tid 'apa" ("What does it Matter?") by Gilbert Frankau. I do not say a great poem, for the theme is not great enough, for one thing; and the psychology and style are not equal to the writer's story-telling faculty. But if this is the work of a young poet he should do very much better yet. He has force in him, and nothing is done without that. Frankly, I do not care for Mr. Wells' new serial, "The World Set Free," but one had better wait till the end for a safer judgment. Next comes a short bright article by Francis Grierson on "Offenbach and Hortense Schneider," reviving for a few minutes a peculiar society which existed in the 'sixties under the Third Empire (of Napoleon the Little), and never at any other time or place. The second instalment of "Prehistoric England" is devoted to "Housefinding," and is decidedly humorous. "Eve's Pigpen" is a translated profanity which I leave the reader to discover for himself. Mr. Norman Douglas, the sub-editor, who writes so well and could give points to some more popular writers, deals with the interesting and suggestive topic of "Dragons." Mr. Austin Harrison, the editor, follows with what I regard as a very able and sound article on "Crime and Punishment." Many years ago I said that punishment should be banished from the jurisprudence of civilisation. Mr. Harrison argues eloquently to the same conclusion—especially with reference to Mr. Frank Harris's imprisonment for contempt of court. I commend this article to the reader's best attention.

"Mimnermus's" pleasant article on Leigh Hunt in this week's Freethinker quotes that fine writer's delightful lines to "Jenny." They possess all the more interest to lovers of literature because "Jenny" was Mrs. Carlyle, who was very fond of Hunt, and overlooked the faults that Dickens and others drew into the daylight, in consideration of his good looks, his courtly manners, his pride of principle in public matters, and his nobly generous nature. Not only was Jane Carlyle "Jenny" but the incident was a real one. The kiss chased away the cloud of depression from the old man's brow, and its bestower was rewarded by what she valued more than money: an exquisite cameo of verse, expressing real gratitude, and conveying a superb compliment.

Acid Drops.

Rev. J. A. Shaw, of Wolverhampton, has been preaching on the want of a new religion. What he or other people want in this line is no concern of ours. We are quite able to do without any religion at all, and we know a great many people who can do ditto. But when the reverend gentleman mentions "Atheists" we begin to take an interest in what he is saying. This is what he is reported to have said by the local Express and Star:—

> "There was, after all, only one Atheist—he was not the man who declined to believe the creeds and nostrums of the Churches, but rather he was the man who pretended to believe and by his life gave the lie to his profession. The good man, the affectionate father, the upright citizen, the honest trader, the sincere worker, the genuine patriot, and the lover of mankind could never be dubbed an Atheist, no matter what his attitude towards Church dogma might be"

No doubt this is well meant, but it is very stupid stuff. The right people (and there are plenty of them) to say who are Atheists are the Atheists themselves. And they very decidedly object to receiving a present of all the hypocrites in the Churches. Before Mr. Shaw prepares to make a gift he should be sure that it will be cheerfully received. In this case he is mistaken. Atheists don't want his refuse, and don't mean to have it. He must keep it himself, or offer it elsewhere.

The following appeared in the Daily Chronicle of March 2 as "special" from its Berlin correspondent under date of March 1:—

> "Some extraordinary figures relating to Church attendance in Berlin are published in the Vossische Zeitung to-day.
> "On February 22 the united committees of the movement away from the State Church took a census in the seventy-eight churches of Berlin and Charlottenburg. These churches have seating accommodation for 120,000 and serve a population of 2,060,000.
> "On the date mentioned there were only 35,000 at two services, or under 2 per cent. of the population. Of worshipers present on that day, the journal declared, more than three-quarters were women and children.
> "The movement away from the Church is stated in another quarter to be growing seriously. Last year, in Germany, 12,000 persons severed their connection with the State Church, in comparison with 6,000 in the previous year and 3,000 in 1910."

Only 2 per cent. of the population attending church, and more than three-quarters of these women and children! "Great Pan is Dead" was shouted nearly two thousand years ago by voices in the air, as Plutarch relates. The time has now come to shout "Great Christ is Dead."

The Church party in Grimsby and Cleethorpes have held a meeting in Freeman-street Market and marched to Grimsby parish church "for solemn prayer" against the Disestablishment of the Welsh Church. We can hardly suppose they are stupid enough to imagine that their prayers, solemn or otherwise, will affect the fate of that Establishment. We surmise that they know the great game must be kept up, and that a public advertisement is absolutely necessary now and then.

At a City inquest on a sandwichman who committed suicide in the Thames, it was stated that clergymen had been know to carry sandwich boards in the streets. We have often thought that parsons are not much use in the open market.

"Telephonic conversations with England will cost fifteen shillings for every conversation," said the German Postmaster-General in the Reichstag. Our spiritualist friends will enable anyone to have a conversation in hell for about the same fee.

The King visited the Central Young Men's Christian Association in the Tottenham-court-road on March 4 to open the building, which has been in use for about two years. The "opening" was as belated as the superstition with which the Association is concerned.

According to a contemporary, Queen Alexandra has a fondness for patent medicines and quacks generally. This may account for her affection for the Salvation Army.

One of the witnesses to the will of Alfred Nobel has been protesting against the manner in which the Nobel trustees have awarded the annual prize—which, it will be remembered, takes the shape of a lump sum of money. The practice of the trustees is to award this to some world-wide celebrity, and this, says Mr. Leonard Hwass, is directly contrary to Nobel's intention. What the testator desired was an annual award to some struggling man, or woman, of genius, so that their life might be lightened of financial strain and encouragement given them in their work. We cannot, of course, say how far this really represents the wishes of Alfred Nobel; but it strikes us as infinitely preferable to throwing an award at a world-celebrity who has already achieved fame, and who is in no need of the money. A recognised genius can look after himself. It is the genius who is unrecognised, and whose work may be brought to an untimely end, who is most in need of encouragement. Of course, it is much easier to select a famous man than a comparatively unknown one, and this may be the reason why the award has taken its present form. But we hope that the protest referred to will receive proper attention, and the money available be spent in the direction indicated by Mr. Hwass.

The cavalier way in which Church dignitaries treat Freethought is worth notice. Writing in that intellectual periodical, Lloyd's Weekly News, Dean Inge, better known as the "gloomy dean," has been unburdening his mind on "Religious Doubts," and he says, "within the last few years three very able and capable gentlemen—an English Radical politician, an American professor of mathematics, and a German lecturer on philosophy—have tried their hands at critical investigations to prove that the historical Christ never existed"; and, he continues, the results are "simply comic." The gloomy Dean's own advice is to "wait till the clouds roll by," like the lady in the music hall song, which strikes us as being vastly more humorous.

The Church Army, a side-show of the Government religion, has had a "Self-Denial Week" on the same lines as the Salvation Army. Imitation is the sincerest flattery.

"A rancid and musty stench emanates from the stoats and polecats of the new literary insurrectionaries," says "Vanoc" of the Referee. If so, the odor from the Bible must be thick enough to be cut with a knife, for the filth in the Old Testament begins where the others leave off.

"Vanoc," of the Referee, has been wasting some metaphors. In a recent article he said "the cross-examination of the defenders of accepted beliefs" is one of the proofs that "the Hound of Heaven is on the trail of humanity." A wag might say that it was a proof that religion was going to the dogs.

Speaking at the Huntingdon County Hospital, Lord Sandwich referred to the power of faith healing, and added that "truth would always prevail." The very existence of hospitals is a proof of the limitations of faith healing; and, as for the power of truth, there is too much money on the side of error. The Christian superstition, for instance, has millions of money behind it.

People are very fond of talking about the man of genius forcing his way to the front, but so far as we can see the only ground for the belief that this will always occur is that some men of genius have done so. But there is no possibility of knowing how many other men of sterling ability are lost to the world for want of timely help, or because the fortunate accident does not occur. As a matter of fact, a fair proportion of works of ability are published by men who happen to be so placed that their livelihood is secured to them in some other direction. How much might be done, and by how many others, it is impossible to say; but it is easy to see that the loss to the world in sheer ability must be enormous. And it is worth noting that in his earlier years Herbert Spencer, more than once, was compelled to consider the probability of ceasing to issue his works, and was only saved by a fortunate legacy. Genius will tell, if it is given the chance of finding expression. But circumstances may be too strong even for genius. For the greatest genius needs bread-and-butter, and is never superior to all possible combinations of adverse circumstances.

Defenders of the Design Argument will be delighted to note the case of the "Siamese" twins, Suzanne and Madelaine, two baby girls in Paris, who were operated upon last week by M. Le Filiatre, the surgeon, and separated. The two babies were joined by the body, face to face, and cocaine was used during the operation, which, it is hoped, will prove successful. This is the ninth operation of its kind.

At the Chelsea Arts Club Ball many persons represented "gods" and "goddesses." Fortunately, none attempted to portray the Trinity.

"The Soul's Winning Fight with Science" is the heading of one of the pages in Public Opinion, summarising an article in the American Magazine. The writer of the article admits that the vast majority of leading scientific men do not accept the belief in immortality, but he points to a small group who believe as evidence of a movement in the contrary direction. These scientists, he says, admit all the materialistic facts, but correlate them with other facts and explain them in a new way. This new explanation is that the brain is "merely the instrument by which the soul—the feeling, thinking, remembering ego—secures expression." Really! We are under the impression that this explanation, instead of being a new, is a very old one. There has never been any other, so far as Animists are concerned, although it has found expression under various names. Nor do the small group of scientists who believe in immortality greatly impress us. The evidential value of those scientists who have reached disbelief in the face of all their early training and prejudice is far greater than that of those who continue to believe in spite of their scientific knowledge.

Rev. Dr. Orchard thinks that people are bothered too much about religion nowadays. He thinks that if they are let alone they will the more readily realise their need of religion. Well, if Dr. Orchard really believes this, he should prove it by giving up preaching and wait until people crowd to him to tell them all about it. It is all talk, however. The only time during which a people remain religious without being bothered about it is when the general environment enforces it. Savages do not need preachers to make them religious; they are made so by the general character of their environment. But under civilised conditions the environment saps religion instead of enforcing it. Religion becomes a thing of artificial culture, and the preacher is bound to bother people about it, or they would forget it altogether. A great many get rid of it as it is; leave a generation or so quite alone and religion would become a negligible quantity.

There is less crime now than twenty years ago. That is the consoling conclusion from a review of a Government Blue Book on crime. The spread of Freethought has none of the horrible consequences that the clergy predicted.

The subject of "Cinematographs" is to be considered at the forthcoming annual meeting of the Free Church Council. This looks as if picture shows were affecting the chapel collections.

"Funerals are becoming more cheerful," says Mr. C. C. Whitley, a director of the South Metropolitan Cemetery Company. This may be owing to the fact that people no longer believe the horrible Christian dogma of eternal torment after death.

Some of the comments on evangelistic work are really amusing. There has been a Chapman-Alexander mission in Edinburgh, and the reports run in the usual vein—thousands converted, etc., etc. Dr. Chapman's preaching has made a "wonderful impression," and, above all, "Edinburgh is waking up to the fact that Christ is a living reality." Wonderful! After all these centuries of Christian preaching, in Edinburgh of all places, the people are waking up to Christ as "a living reality"! Then these people deny that Christianity is a failure. All they ask for is a couple of thousand years to wake people up.

The Bishop of Oxford, Dr. Gore, has roused the ire of some people because he said, some weeks back, that the "critical school" think it legitimate for a clergyman to remain in office while repudiating in his published writings the miracles in which he must affirm his faith every time he says the Creed. Whether this is true of one particular school only, or of certain individuals—so far as the special subject of miracles is concerned—it is tolerably certain that it depicts the general attitude of a very large number of clergymen in relation to Christianity as a whole. Their faith is very often not that of the Church to which they belong, and which they are paid to preach. They may hold it in words, but they repudiate it in spirit. They give interpretations that are wholly at variance with what Christians have always held it to mean; and there is really no substantial difference between saying that a thing is false and saying it is true—only it means something entirely different to what people have been taught it meant. To say, for example, that Jesus was the Son of God, but only in the sense that we are all sons of God, is only another way of saying that the historic godhead of Jesus is false. That is the plain common sense of the situation; and it is one that people who have no interest in casuistry are quick to realise. The clergyman who does not believe in the plain interpretation of Christian doctrines has no moral justification for preaching them. This rule would be readily admitted in every other direction, and it should hold good here. But religion has a notorious knack of blunting one's sense of moral discrimination.

Cabourne is near Caistor, and Caistor is near Great Yarmouth, where our veteran friend J. W. de Caux, J.P., resides. It will interest him to learn that a parson at the first place (the Rev. Robert Thomas) has left £5,137 0s. 6d. But our old friend has heard that godliness is great gain, and he won't be very much surprised.

In two plays just on in London the principal attraction is an undressing scene, and there is commotion in clerical circles. The players, however, do not attempt to rival David's undress dance before the Ark, or the primitive costume of Eden.

Smoking is permitted in many American prisons. Pious people pretend to think that all persons will "smoke to the glory of God"—in the next world.

In an article in the Star on the Camp Hill Prison, Isle of Wight, it says that the prison library contains the works of Darwin and Montaigne, and similar literature, and that these volumes are "discouragingly clean and unthumbed," whilst popular illustrated magazines are well used. As the prison is one for habitual criminals, we are glad to note the preference.

An ex-Army man named William Jeffery, who was sentenced to fourteen days' hard labor at Eastbourne, said he had been in prison for about forty years, and had over 400 convictions against him. He calculated that it had taken 1,200 policemen to attend him. He did not say how many prison chaplains had been engaged in the same business.

The London Missionary Society's Chronicle for March boasts of the conversion of a press-man—a class of people whom General Booth once declared to be hopeless. "The ex-editor of the atheistic paper, the Sun," we read, "has become a staunch Christian and a powerful preacher." But this Sun turns out not to be Mr. Horatio Bottomley's old paper. It was published at Faraavohitra. We understand it is dead now. Perhaps, on inquiry, the converted editor would turn out to be dead too.—Here endeth the first lesson.

Rev. Dr. Jowett, formerly of Birmingham, and now of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, has declined to accept a "call" to Union Chapel, Islington. He is very comfortable where he is. His salary is £3,600 a year. Christianity as a business proposition has mightily improved since its founder had to send a lieutenant fishing for half-a-crown, to pay the tax collector.

Here are a few more destitute Christites. Rev. Joseph Mould Adcock, of Willesborough, Kent, left £1,672. Rev. Owen Evan Anwyl, vicar of All Saints, Plymouth, left £5,122. Rev. Robert Thomas, vicar of Cabourne, left £5,174. Very Rev. Charles Saul Brice, dean of Cork, left £4,263. Rev. Paulet Nichols, rector of Little Cheverell, Devizes, left £20,128. Rev. Philip Carlyon, Falmouth, left £18,945. Not so bad for the "blessed be ye poor" tribe.

Mr. H. M. Hyndman and Mr. Keir Hardie have "made it up." We hope the former will not contract the latter's bigotries. Evil communications, as the proverb says, are very apt to corrupt good manners. Mr. Keir Hardie has brought in a Bill to stop Sunday shaving in Wales. The honorable gentleman doesn't shave at all himself. See?

In a recent divorce case of William Barker, a local preacher, at Bolton, his wife testified that when she caught him in the servant's room he said he was plotting to catch a burglar. Did he give the burglar notice? He also said he was "seeking a kindred spirit in his higher aspirations." Both plots together cost him a separation with £1 10s. a week for the wife who wasn't invited to share his diplomacy.

RESURRECTION AND IMMORTALITY.

The idea of Resurrection arose from, and is closely bound up with, the practice of burial, the second and simpler mode of disposing of the remains of the dead. The idea of immortality arose from, and is closely bound up with, the practice of burning, a later and better innovation, invented at the third stage of human culture. During the early historical period all the most advanced and cultivated nations burnt their dead, and, in consequence, accepted the more ideal and refined notion of Immortality. But modern European nations bury their dead, and, in consequence, accept, nominally, at least, the cruder and grosser notion of Resurrection. Nominally, I say, because, in spite of creeds and formularies, the influence of Plato and other ancient thinkers, as well as of surviving ancestral ideas, has made most educated Europeans really believe in Immortality, even when they imagine themselves to be believing in Resurrection. Nevertheless, the belief in Resurrection is the avowed and authoritative belief of the Christian world, which thus proclaims itself as on a lower level in this respect than the civilised peoples of antiquity.—Grant Allen, "Evolution of the Idea of God," p. 54.

A COLD COLLATION OF DIABOLISMS.

People who honor their fathers and their mothers have the comforting promise that their days shall be long in the land. They are not sufficiently numerous to make the life assurance companies think it worth while to offer them special rates.

I once knew a man who made me a map of the opposite hemisphere of the moon. He was crazy. I knew another who taught me what country lay upon the other side of the grave. He was a most acute thinker—as he had need to be.

Benevolence is as purely selfish as greed. No one would do a benevolent action if he knew it would entail remorse.

Most people have no more definite idea of liberty than it consists in being compelled by law to do as they like.

The Psalmist never saw the seed of the righteous begging bread. In our day they sometimes request pennies for keeping the street corners in order.

It is wicked to cheat on Sunday. The law recognises this truth, and shuts up the shops.

If a jackass were to describe the deity, he would represent him with long ears and a tail. Man's ideal is the higher and truer one; he pictures him as somewhat resembling a man.

Camels and Christians receive their burdens kneeling.
—Ambrose Bierce ("Dod Grile.")

POETRY AND RELIGION.

The future of poetry is immense, because in poetry, where it is worthy of its high destinies, our race, as time goes on, will find an ever surer and surer stay. There is not a creed which is not shaken, not an accredited dogma which is not shown to be questionable, not a received tradition which does not threaten to dissolve. Our religion has materialised itself in the fact, in the supposed fact; it has attached its emotion to the fact, and now the fact is failing it. But for poetry the idea is everything; the rest is a world of illusion, of divine illusion. Poetry attaches its emotion to the idea; the idea is the fact. The strongest part of our religion today is its unconscious poetry.....More and more mankind will discover that we have to turn to poetry to interpret life for us, to console us, to sustain us. Without poetry, our science will appear incomplete; and most of what now passes with us for religion and philosophy will be replaced by poetry.—Matthew Arnold.

C. T. SHAW.—Glad to hear that the circulation of the Freethinker is improving at Wolverhampton, and that the local "saints" are arranging for Sunday evening meetings at the Magnet House, Worcester-street.

DONALD MCKENZIE.—Pleased you enjoyed our Glasgow lectures so much. Thanks for future good wishes.

POSTMAN.—As desired; thanks.

HARRY JACKSON.—Next week.

J. H. GARTRELL, subscribing to the President's Honorarium Fund, writes: "I believe I was the only one last year from this finest and last borough town (Penzance) in England to subscribe to it. I hope I shall not be the only one this year."

SYDNEY A. GIMSON.—Thanks for what we know to be your sincere good wishes for 1914. The "health" we value mainly for the "work." Dispirited is a feeling we never experienced. We are speaking of public matters, of course.

M. RAPHAEL.—We were writing for English readers, and were obliged to use their week and days. One cannot burden one's pages with frequent explanations for the sake of a quite unessential accuracy.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss Vance acknowledges:—Josiah Pendlebury, £1; Henry Foyster, 10s.—Miss Vance reminds members that parcels of cast-off clothing are always welcome for distribution.

W. BROADBENT.—Yearly subscription passed over to Miss Vance. Thanks for your very good wishes for the new year.

ANDREW MILLAR.—You say you heard us at Glasgow on March 1 "with wonder, reverence, and delight," and "with not a little sorrow" that you might see us "so seldom now." Perhaps not so seldom as you apprehend.

H. O.—We think the publisher is Duffy, Dublin; but you ought to get it at any Catholic bookshop.

NORMAN MURRAY (Montreal).—Thanks for cutting, which had already been noticed in our columns, the news having been telegraphed over to the English newspapers at the time.

J. F. A.—Yes, it brought the bird down.

J. W. WHITE.—Glad to hear from you again. It is a long way from West Stanley, Co. Durham, to Sydney, New South Wales. Thanks for your efforts to promote our circulation out there. We are sorry that there is no Freethought organisation at Sidney now.

J. BRODIE.—It is pleasant to hear from one who has read the Freethinker regularly ever since 1882 and with undiminished interest.

E. B.—Cuttings very welcome.

EDWARD OLIVER, sending cheque to the President's Honorarium Fund, hopes the full amount "may be reached earlier this year," and our mind "spared an anxiety" which will make us "freer for" our "great work."

WM. MITCHELL.—Sorry it was overlooked. Servetus was burnt alive at a slow fire on October 26, 1553.

W. P. BALL.—Thanks again for cuttings.

Sugar Plums.

There was a conflict of dates in last week's "Sugar Plums." Both the Secular Education League meeting and the London N. S. S. members' half-yearly meeting were announced for the same evening—Tuesday, March 24. The former remains the fixture it was; the latter has had to be shifted to Tuesday evening, March 31.

The Secular Education League's meeting—the seventh annual gathering of members and friends—takes place at Caxton Hall (Room I) on Tuesday evening, March 24. The annual business meeting starts at 7.45 prompt. It will be followed by the annual public meeting at 8.15; when friends of Secular Education are invited to attend, whether members of the League or not. In the enforced absence of the President (Mr. George Greenwood, M.P.) through illness, which his many friends profoundly regret, the chair will be taken by Sir Henry Cotton; and among the speakers will be Lady Byles, Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., Mr. Halley Stewart, J.P., Rev. Walter Walsh (the late Mr. Voysey's successor), and Mr. G. W. Foote. We hope there will be a crowded meeting. Admission is free, and no tickets are required.

The Essex Hall meeting under the auspices of the National Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws, which takes place on Friday evening, March 20, will be addressed by several members of Parliament (the list is not to hand yet), and by Messrs. Herbert Burrows, Harry Snell, and G. W. Foote. There are strong reasons why the hall should be crowded. We beg the friends of free speech in London, who read these lines, to attend and give weight to the public protest against those odious old laws.

Mr. Asquith has consented to receive a deputation from the memorialists who approached him with a view to moving in some way for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. The reception will take place probably on March 26.

A General Meeting of the Camberwell Branch N. S. S. will be held at the Committee Room, Lambeth Baths, Kennington-road, on Tuesday evening, March 17, at 8 p.m., for the purpose of arranging the summer propaganda, electing new officers, etc. The meeting will not be restricted to members. All local sympathisers are earnestly invited to attend. The chair will be taken by Miss E. M. Vance, the N. S. S. General Secretary.

Leicester "saints" will have an opportunity of hearing Miss Kough lecture at the Secular Hall, Humberstone-gate, this evening (March 15). We hope they will avail themselves of it, and bring some of their friends along to the hall with them. There is no charge for admission—though Miss Kough's eloquence may cost them something (in the collection) before they go out.

We beg to call attention to the very interesting first-hand account, in the letter we print from Mr. G. Peabody this week, of the state of Christianity, and some other things, at Jerusalem. The Holy City, as it is still facetiously called, is a standing proof of what Christianity has done for the world. Near it Christ was born, outside it he was crucified and buried, from thence (or somewhere else—it isn't certain which) he rose from the dead and ascended into heaven, and there the first Christian Church was formed, after the fall of the city to be scattered all over the Roman world. Jerusalem ought, therefore, to be a striking illustration of the uplifting power of Christianity. But look at it! Read our correspondent's letter. And all other travellers tell the same story.

A number of new things are now being got ready for publication by the Pioneer Press under Mr. Foote's editorship or supervision. The series of Pioneer Pamphlets will be continued. A booklet by Mr. J. T. Lloyd (issued for the Secular Society, Ltd.), similar to Mr. Cohen's on Determinism, will also appear shortly—on the subject of Immortality. A new volume of Mr. Cohen's may likewise be expected. Mr. Foote intends seeing several of his own works through the press; Bible Romances (now out of print again) and Bible Heroes, for a start. He is also contemplating a fresh collection, or more, of essays and articles in volume form. Altogether there will be movement at our publishing office during the next two or three months.

Science and the Soul.—VII.

"No indwelling deity now regulates the life of the burning sun, no guardian angels drive the stars across the arching firmament, the divine Ganges is water flowing down into the sea to evaporate into cloud and descend again in rain. No deity simmers in the boiling pot, no presiding spirits dwell in the volcanoes, no howling demon shrieks from the mouth of the lunatic. There was a period of human thought when the whole universe seemed actuated by spiritual life. For our knowledge of our own history, it is deeply interesting that there should remain rude races yet living under the philosophy we have so far passed from, since physics, chemistry, biology, have seized whole provinces of the ancient Animism, setting force for life, and law for will."—E. B. TYLOR, Primitive Culture, vol. ii., p. 167.

"If there is any natural knowledge of human immortality, it must be acquired either by intuition or by experience, there is no other way. Now, whether other men from a simple contemplation of their own nature, quite apart from reasoning, know or believe themselves intuitively to be immortal, I cannot say; but I can say with some confidence that for myself I have no such intuition whatever of my own immortality, and that if I am left to the resources of my natural faculties alone, I can as little affirm the certain or probable existence of my personality after death as I can affirm the certain or probable existence of a personal God. And I am bold enough to suspect that if men could analyse their own ideas, they would generally find themselves to be in a similar predicament as to both these profound topics."—PROFESSOR J. G. FRAZER, The Belief in Immortality and the Worship of the Dead, p. 26.

IT was only after long ages that primitive man developed the capacity to cultivate the food necessary to his subsistence. Before then he was a hunter. Now the savage hunter does not know the meaning of abstinence; many of our best observers of savage life have compared the savage to a child. He lives for the present and leaves the future to take care of itself; the lives of hunting tribes, therefore, alternate between a feast and a fast; between the extremes of gluttony and starvation. "The very inferior savage," says Letourneau, "like our own infant children, does not know what to-morrow means."* Topinard says of some African and Melanesian tribes, "if, after long abstinence, they get a windfall, they eat and think of nothing else."†

Waitz, the great German anthropologist, whose researches place him upon an equality with our best authorities in these matters, observes:—

"Hunting tribes require a great space, and are frequently in want, as they do not economise their provisions. The hundredth part of the game killed by the Zulus, observes Delegogue, would have been more than sufficient for him and all his companions. There are people who suffer annually from famine, and nevertheless neglect to lay in provisions or to cultivate the soil for their support. A characteristic trait, proving utter carelessness for the future, is mentioned by Labat, namely, that the Caribs sell their hammocks cheaper in the morning than in the evening."‡

Upon returning from a successful chase, the wild hunter proceeds to gorge himself to the fullest possible extent. Of the Esquimaux, it is said that after eating his fill, his wife will sit by him and press tit-bits into his mouth. On the rock-bound and inhospitable shores of the northern latitudes, says Lubbock, the sight may be seen of naked savages crawling in and out of the body of a stinking whale which has been washed ashore, eating their fill. Now, as Spencer points out, "Hunger and repletion, both very common with the primitive man, excite dreams of great vividness."§

The effect of eating a heavy supper in producing bad dreams and nightmares is too familiar to need dwelling upon.

Sproat, in his Scenes and Studies of Savage Life (p. 172) says—

"Owing to the quantity of indigestible food eaten by the natives, they often dream that they are visited by ghosts. After a supper of blubber, followed by one of the long talks about departed friends, which take place round the fire, some nervous and timid person may fancy, in the night time, that he sees a ghost."

On the other hand, the effect of fasting is equally productive of dreams and visions; the Shamans, or witch-doctors, of some tribes undergo voluntary fasting on purpose to produce dreams and visions. The Roman Catholic Church has always recognised this method of obtaining intercourse with the spiritual world; hence their fasts. It does not require much study of the lives of the Catholic saints to understand the true character of the beatific visions recorded by them after their long fasts and vigils. And if these men believed in the supernatural origin of their dreams and visions, how much more difficult it would be for primitive man to understand them for what they are? "To suppose him," says Spencer, "saying to himself 'It was all a dream,' is to suppose him already in possession of that hypothesis which we see he cannot have."*

Dorman says, "The influence of dreams is so great upon the life of American Indians that every act and thought is predicated upon this superstition."†

"A young Macusi Indian declared to Im Thurn that he had been taken out in the night and made to drag the canoe up a series of difficult cataracts. Nothing would persuade him of the fact that this was but a dream."‡

Herbert Spencer gives many instances of uncivilised tribes holding this belief. Among American Indians,—

"Morgan states that the Iroquois think dreams real, and obey their injunctions—do what they are told by those they see in dreams; and of the Chippeways, Keating asserts that they fast for the purpose of 'producing dreams, which they value above all things.'..... In Africa it is the same. The Congo people hold that what they see and hear in 'dreams come to them from spirits'; and among East Africans, the Wanika believe that the spirits of the dead appear to the living in dreams."§

The same authority also states that, according to Crantz, the Greenlanders believe "that the soul can forsake the body during the interval of sleep." The theory in New Zealand is "that during sleep the mind left the body, and that dreams are the objects seen during its wanderings"; and in Fiji "it is believed that the spirit of a man who still lives will leave the body to trouble other people when asleep." Similarly in Borneo. It is the conviction of the Dyaks that the soul during sleep goes on expeditions of its own, and "sees, hears, and talks." Among the Hill tribes of India, such as the Karens, the same doctrine is held, their statement being that "in sleep it [the Lá, spirit or ghost] wanders away to the ends of the earth, and our dreams are what the Lá sees and experiences in his perambulations."‖

Professor Frazer, in his Belief in Immortality and the Worship of the Dead, cites the high authority of Dr. Landtman, who, in his Wanderings of the Dead in the Folklore of the Kiwai-speaking Papuans, declares:—

"Undoubtedly dreams collected by me have largely contributed in supplying the natives with ideas about Adiri (the land of the dead) and life after death. A great number of dreams among the Kiwai people tell of wanderings to Adiri or of meetings with spirits of dead men; and as dreams are believed to describe the real things which the soul sees while running about outside the body, we understand that they must greatly influence the imagination of the people."

Similarly, the uncivilised man does not recognise his shadow to be merely the absence of light. To him it is a real thing, a part of himself, and he naturally connects this mysterious dark shape following him about with the equally mysterious thing which leaves his body in his dreams. Says Tylor:—

"Thus the Tasmanian word for the shadow is also that for the spirit; the Algonquin Indians describe a man's soul as otahchuk, 'his shadow'; the Quiché language uses natub for 'shadow soul'; the Arawac uɔja means 'shadow, soul, image'; the Abipones made the one word lodkal serve for 'shadow, soul, echo, image.' The Zulus not only use the word tungi for 'shadow, spirit, ghost,' but they consider that at death the shadow of a man will in some way depart from the corpse, to become an ancestral spirit. The Basutos not only call the spirit remaining after death the seriti or 'shadow,' but they think that if a man walks on the river bank, a crocodile may seize his shadow in the water and draw him in. While in Old Calabar there is found the same identification of the spirit with the ukpon or 'shadow,' for a man to lose which is fatal."*

As Herbert Spencer remarks: "The primitive man, left to himself, necessarily concludes a shadow to be an actual existence, which belongs to the persons casting it";† and points out that "The Benin negroes regard men's shadows as their souls; and the Wanika are afraid of their own shadows: possibly thinking, as some other negroes do, that their shadows watch all their actions, and bear witness against them" (p. 116). He also observes that the Abipones and the Indians of Cumana believed the Echo was the answer of the spirit of the dead to him that spoke or called.

This soul, or shadow, which is believed to survive the body, is not immortal, but is believed to die away with the body. Says Lord Avebury:—

> "To be eaten was the greatest misfortune that could happen to a New Zealander, since he believed that the soul was thus destroyed as well as the body. The chief who could kill and devour his enemy had nothing more to fear from him either in this world or the next; on the contrary, the strength, ability, and prestige against which he had to contend, were not only conquered, but, by this dreadful process, incorporated and added to his own."‡

The same writer also gives the testimony of the French traveller, M. du Chaillu, who says:—

> "Ask the negro where is the spirit of his great-grandfather? he says he does not know; it is done. Ask him about the spirit of his father or brother who died yesterday, then he is full of fear and terror; he believes it to be generally near the place where the body has been buried, and among many tribes the village is removed immediately after the death of one of the inhabitants" (p. 146).

Even the highly civilised Egyptians believed that the soul only maintained its existence so long as the body remained intact; that is why they embalmed the body with such care, and their kings built those stupendous Pyramids, to raise which, says the historian Buckle, "there must have been tyranny on the part of the rulers, and slavery on the part of the people."§ For, as he points out, "they were neither more nor less than tombs for the Egyptian kings!" whose embalmed bodies concealed in the heart of these immense masses of stone, were thought to be safe from destruction for all time.

The Divinities of Fecundity.

ASSOCIATED with the worship of the gods of fertility, a system of sacred harlotry was anciently prevalent throughout Western Asia, and was in Syria and in Cyprus conspicuously connected with the adoration of Adonis.

As a result of a wide survey of the accumulated evidences of modern scholarship, Professor Frazer was driven to the conclusion that among agricultural peoples the Great Mother Goddess became the personification of the procreative processes of Nature, and that she was worshiped under different designations, but with practically identical rites and ceremonies, by many races in Western Asia. The goddess was accompanied by a lover, or procession of lovers, with whom she united every year, the divine marriage being looked upon as indispensable to the growth and fruition of living things. Moreover, there is much reason to believe that the "fabulous union of the divine pair was simulated and, as it were, multiplied on earth by the real, though temporary, union of the human sexes at the sanctuary of the goddess for the sake of thereby ensuring the fruitfulness of the ground and the increase of man and beast." And if, as appears probable, the conception of the Great Earth Goddess was in classical times already very ancient—dating, indeed, from the far distant period when marriage was either unknown or just tolerated as a risky innovation, or regarded as an immoral interference with the sacred communal rights—we can, as Professor Frazer says, understand why the goddess herself was almost invariably pictured as unmarried and unchaste, and why her worshipers were compelled to follow the example she had set them.

> "For had she been a divine wife united to a divine husband, the natural counterpart of their union would have been the lawful marriage of men and women, and there would have been no need to resort to a system of prostitution or promiscuity in order to effect those purposes which, on the principles of homœopathic magic, might in that case have been as well or better attained by the legitimate intercourse of the sexes in matrimony. Formerly, perhaps, every woman was obliged to submit at least once in her life to the exercise of those marital rights which at a still earlier period had theoretically belonged in permanence to all the males of the tribe."*

With the evolution of individual marriage, however, the earlier communism and promiscuity fell into disfavor, and the occasional observance of the ancient custom came to be regarded with growing repugnance by the people, and they began to evade in practice a custom which was indelibly associated with their religious beliefs. This compromise assumed various forms. Women were sometimes suffered to sacrifice their hair as a substitute for their chastity; and a phallic symbol did duty in other instances for the reproductive act. But while the great majority of women were thus released from the old obligation, it was not deemed prudent to abolish the custom absolutely. Certain of the sex were in consequence set apart to maintain the ancient religious ceremony.

> "These became prostitutes either for life or for a term of years at one of the temples: dedicated to the service of religion, they were invested with a sacred character, and their vocation, far from being deemed infamous, was probably long regarded by the laity as an exercise of more than common virtue, and rewarded with a tribute of mixed wonder, reverence, and pity, not unlike that which in some parts of the world is still paid to women who seek to honor their Creator in a different way by renouncing the natural functions of their sex and the tenderest relations of humanity. It is thus that the folly of mankind finds vent in opposite extremes alike harmful and deplorable."

There is no reason to doubt that the gods of fertility were honored by all the Semitic peoples, including the ancient Israelites. Holy men lived in the Temple of Jerusalem, and were attended by women, who appear to have ministered unto them. Despite all the glosses put upon the sacred text, there can be little doubt as to the functions of these priests, who were not expelled from the Temple until the reign of Josiah. "In Palestine," writes Professor Frazer, "as in other Semitic lands, the hire of sacred prostitutes was probably dedicated to the deity as one of his regular dues: he took tribute of men and women as of flocks and herds, of fields and vineyards and oliveyards."†

In contemporary Africa and India sacred harlotry still survives. Every Tamil temple of any note in Southern India contains its bevy of sacred women. Twice daily they dance before and minister to the requirements of the idol. These dancing women are trained from infancy for their holy profession, dancing and singing being a necessary part of their education. Among the weavers of a small Madras town the first girl born of every family is dedicated to the service of the god. These females are wedded either to the idol or to a sacred sword ere they commence their career in the temple, and they are commonly spoken of as the wives of the divinity.

In Travancore the dancing women of the temple are regarded as the servants of God. Their union with the deity is supposed to imply a complete surrender to his desires, with the full renunciation of all family duties. From the standpoint of the pious Hindoo, these sacred women may fairly be compared with "a lady nurse at a hospital or a sister at a convent." They assist the priest, dance and sing to the divinity, are pensioned off as they advance in years and infirmity, and when overtaken by death the temple funds bear part of the funeral expenses. Whatever the real functions of these women may now be, the sexual side of their profession was in any case originally associated with the idea of assisting the procreative agencies of life.

Examples of kindred customs drawn from savage races conduct us nearer to the primitive conceptions which underlie them. With the Ewe peoples of West Africa sacred harlots are considered the spouses of the gods. During their novitiate they are specially reserved to the priestly caste; but, curiously enough, when this period is past they sink to the level of common strumpets. These unfortunate women, however, excite neither pity nor contempt, as they continue to be regarded as the wives of the god, and their licentious acts are generally attributed to the indwelling agency of the divinity who possesses them, while their offspring are looked upon as the sons and daughters of their divine husbands.

A West African serpent-god is presented by his worshipers with human wives. This divinity—the python-god—is wedded to these women in secret in his temple; their children are accounted his; but, needless to say, the priests appear to be the real parents. The natives seem to connect the abundance of the harvest with the successful union of the women with the serpent. When the millet begins to grow, the old priestesses secure new brides for the god. In seasons of flood and drought the sacred python is invoked with compelling earnestness; he appears to preside over the growth of vegetable life and the increase of the cattle.

> "Once in a bad season the Dutch factor Bosman found the King of Whydah in a great rage. His Majesty explained the reason of his discomposure by saying 'that that year he had sent much larger offerings to the snake-house than usual, in order to obtain a good crop; and that one of his viceroys (whom he showed me) had desired him afresh in the name of the priests, who threatened a barren year, to send yet more. To which he answered that he did not intend to make any further offerings this year; and if the snake would not bestow a plentiful harvest on them, he might let it alone; for (said he) I cannot be more damaged thereby, the greatest part of my corn being already rotten in the field.'"

Among the Slave Coast negroes, men as well as women are consecrated to the deity. This sacerdotal caste enjoys numerous privileges, and is obeyed with fear and trembling by the common people. Having been fully ordained, the priest is honored as the special mouthpiece of the divinity, whose commands he communicates to the people while in a condition of nervous excitement, which is taken as a positive proof of divine possession. Nevertheless, a modicum of scepticism appears to have put in an appearance.

> "Any crime which a priest committed in a state of frenzy used to remain unpunished, no doubt because the act was thought to be the act of the god. But this benefit of clergy was so much abused that under King Gezo the law had to be altered; and although, while he is still possessed by the god, the inspired criminal is safe, he is now liable to punishment as soon as the divine spirit leaves him."

But the natives in general still regard these priests with considerable fear, and their power over the people remains very great.

Also among the savage races of the Gold Coast are to be found singing and capering men and women who are reverenced as the messengers of the gods. The priests are not celibate, but marry like the ordinary people; and although the priestesses are denied this right, they are free to grant their favors to all who happen to strike their fancy. The "celibate condition" of these sacred women is a consequence of their supposed espousal to the divinities.

Just as in Africa and India the temple harlots were looked upon as the partners of the gods, whose licentiousness was to be pardoned on account of their acting under the influences of religious inspiration, so the sacred harlots of antiquity, in much the same manner, were regarded as the brides of the deity. The reproductive rites of religion appear to have been strictly confined to the sacred edifice itself, and seem to have been originally designed to promote the activities of the deities of fecundity while these were engaged in carrying on the multiplication of man and beast, and the increase of vegetable life.

With the civilised communities of the ancient world this idea, however much it may have been obscured by time and the changes which time carries in its train, undeniably underlies many of the ceremonies sacred to the divinities of Egypt, Assyria, and Babylon. In the temple of Bel or Marduk a female regularly reposed on the god's couch, and the divinity was believed to visit her by night. In Egypt the spouse of the god was supposed to share her slumbers in the temple at Thebes, her consort being the great Ammon himself.

In all probability that form of religion known as phallic worship, in which adoration of the generative powers plays so conspicuous a part, is to be traced to kindred conceptions. Phallicism is very common among savage races, and in its ruder forms is openly orgiastic; but with the development of civilisation the realism of the earlier ceremonies and beliefs gradually gives place to a more poetical recognition of the majestic powers of natural reproduction. But even in civilised and cultured Rome the women carried the emblem of fecundity in procession from one temple to another. The phallic sign was worn as an amulet, and this custom long survived the triumph of the Christian faith. The practice was common throughout the Middle Ages, and attempts were made to prohibit it at the Church Council at Mans in 1247, and at Tours in 1396.

CHRISTIANITY AT JERUSALEM.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I am in Jerusalem for my twelfth annual visit, having come here first in 1903, and every year since, the entire distance from my home in Boston, U.S.A., having been traversed each time. The brawls between the different sects and denominations here are well known, and I have witnessed many of them, even to the ghastly climax of seeing the dead in the street. This year, however, for the first time, I saw a party of courteous gentlemen violently and brutally expelled from the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; and, the incident being a typical one, and the circumstances being really instructive, it occurs to me that you may like to set it before your readers; in case you do, I here set forth the facts. I must first state that I can vouch for the precise truth of what I myself saw only; in this city of cruelty, misery, blindness, dirt, and Christianity, it is most difficult to obtain accurate information on any topic; least of all can one believe what is told him regarding religious brawls—all interests combining to hush them and have them forgotten; a hundred times, when inquiring about some detail, I have been abruptly asked, before my question was answered, "How did you find it out?" "Who told you?" Unless I am sure of my ground, I am always told that "no such thing occurred; it was a mistake." Now for the facts:—

Last Wednesday morning, at 8.30, I was passing across the courtyard in front of the church, not intending to enter, and not being within 100 feet of the entrance; a loud, angry, and continued shouting from the interior attracted my attention; a moment later, a party of about 20 to 25 gentlemen were ordered and pushed more or less violently out of the church. Baron Rothschild, perhaps the greatest living benefactor of this most wretched city, had arrived here the previous day.

On inquiring of six or eight of the generally best-informed merchants here, all of whom I know, I was told that these gentlemen were members of Baron Rothschild's party, some, or all, being Jews; they had gone to the church under the guidance and protection of one of the official dragomans; the general sentiment was that the Christians had acted with extreme, and most unprecedented (this I know to be true) kindness and gentleness, in not killing, or at least seriously injuring these Jews—it being so perfectly understood that Jews who attempt to enter the church, or even to walk across the courtyard, will absolutely be murdered by the infuriated lovers of the meek and lowly Jew of Palestine, that for a generation no Jewish resident here has even attempted it. That this treatment of Jews is based on cruelty, and not on principle, seems to be proven by the well-known fact that at least one well-known Jew is at times allowed, and requested to enter the church, because he is a skilled artisan, and the Christians need his services.

Doubtless the wealth and high standing of this party accounts for the small amount of violence used in this case. I am told that Turkey has long since advised all governments of its inability to protect Jews from Christian ferocity, and that an agreement exists to the effect that damages, in event of a Jew being murdered on account of his proximity to the church, will be fixed at thirty piastres—less than six shillings.

Now for the sequel. This morning, on inquiring of such friends as I chanced to meet if there were any further news of the event, one or two seemed to have wholly "forgotten" the incident and the conversation regarding it; at least two, who gave me the information I narrate herein, declared that the whole thing was a mistake, and had not occurred at all. On my reminding them that I had seen the affair, they said that the people were put out of the church because the monks were cleaning it. The fact is that no one is put out, or kept out; and that exit, or entrance, is not in the slightest degree affected in consequence of the cleaning of the church—with the exception of the weekly washing, which was not going on at the time, and which is done on Friday, not Wednesday. If the sweeping was going on, it would not account for the event; furthermore, it would not account for the shouting, screaming, and violent and blackguardly actions that were in evidence. When I spoke of all this, I was further told that "that is the way the Christians have of asking people to keep out during the cleaning."

The general poverty and misery are much the same as usual. The cruelty to animals—formerly absolutely indescribable, and said to be the very worst in the world (which I endorse, having crossed the Atlantic fifty-seven times, and travelled much in Asia and Africa)—is somewhat diminished; a very small group of English people—perhaps ten or less—having done devoted service. All are Christians, and one is secretary of the Y.M.C.A. here. I honor them all more than I can say.

Excepting these, no Christian, and few Moslems, take the slightest interest in the treatment of animals. When I say that a common method of "getting rid of" rats and mice, and a not at all uncommon method of similarly disposing of cats, and even dogs, is pouring oil on them, setting it on fire, and "seeing the fun"—without protest, unless one of the small group I mention make it, and his, or her, protest always being laughed at—I give a fair index of the general sentiment in this most religious city—a city, literally, of "religion run mad." The wife of a clergyman here tells me she was thus laughed at by one of the oldest employees in the office of Thos. Cook & Son for protesting against burning an animal in precisely this way.

"GENTLE JESUS."

Oh! what have sickly children done to share
Thy cup of sorrows? Yet their dull, sad pain
Makes the earth awful. On the tomb's dark stair
Moan idiots, with no glimmer on the brain.
No shrill priest with his hangman's cord can beat
Thy mercy into these. Ah, nay! Ah, nay!
The angels Thou hast sent to haunt the street
Are hunger and distortion and decay.
Lord! That madest man and sendest him foes so fleet
Who shall judge Thee upon Thy judgment day?

SKY PILOTS.

You have so debilitated the minds of men and women by your promises and your dreams that many a generation must come and go before Europe can throw off the yoke of your superstition. But we promise you that they shall be generations of strenuous battle. We give you all the advantages that you can get from the sincerity and pious worth of the good and simple among you. We give you all that the bad among you may get by resort to the poisoned weapons of your profession and your traditions—its bribes to mental indolence, its hypocritical affectations in the pulpit, its tyranny in the closet, its false speciousness in the world; its menace at the death-bed. With all these you may do your worst, and still humanity will escape you, still the conscience of the race will rise away from you; still the growth of brighter ideals and a nobler purpose will go on, leaving ever further and further behind them your dwarfed finality and leaden, moveless stereotype. We shall pass you by on your flank; your fiercest darts will only spend themselves on air. We will not attack you as Voltaire did; we will not exterminate you; we shall explain you. History will place your dogma in its class, above or below a hundred competing dogmas, exactly as the naturalist classifies his species. From being a conviction it will sink to a curiosity, from being the guide to millions of human lives it will dwindle down to a chapter in a book. As history explains your dogma, so science will dry it up; the conception of law will silently make the conception of the daily miracle of your altars seem impossible, the mental climate will gradually deprive your symbols of their nourishment, and men will turn their backs on your system, not because they confuted it, but because, like witchcraft or astrology, it has ceased to interest them. The great ship of your church, once so stout and fair, and well-laden with good destinies, is become a skeleton ship; it is a phantom hulk, with warped planks and sere canvas, and you who work it are no more than the ghosts of dead men, and at the hour when you seem to have reached the bay, down your ship will sink like lead or like stone, to the deepest bottom.—John Morley, "Miscellanies."

GOD.

I would not be an angel and with the angels stand,
To land a silly God, Sir, who fools with either hand;
I'd rather be a pumpkin, an oyster or a slug,
I'd rather be a tapeworm, a trichina or a bug;
I'd rather be the parasite of monkey, man or cod,
Than be a praying parasite of anything called "God."
That name denotes all folly, all vice and every crime,
That man has e'er exhibited in all the course of time!
Ay, choose from human language, from every babbling tongue,
From every speech e'er spoken, or clicked or growled or sung—
Select the word most pregnant with every evil sense,
Most full of downright wickedness, of folly and pretence—
You'll find, I'm very certain, when the round of tongues you've trod,
The word most direly hateful is the tiny nomen, God!

—Joseph Symes.

VOLTAIRE'S TASK.

Voltaire's task, however, was never directly political, but spiritual—to shake the foundations of that religious system which professed to be founded on the revelation of Christ. Was he not right? If we find ourselves walking amidst a generation of cruel and unjust and darkened spirits, we may be assured that it is their beliefs on what they deem highest that have made them so. There is no counting with certainty on the justice of men who are capable of fashioning and worshiping an unjust divinity, nor on their humanity so long as they incorporate inhuman motives in their most sacred dogmas, nor on their reasonableness while they rigorously decline to accept reason as a test of truth.—John Morley.

Obituary.

We regret to report the death, after a long and painful illness, of Mrs. R. Axelby, of 22 Wattisfield-road, Clapton, N.E., whose burial took place at Chingford Mount Cemetery on Saturday, March 7, when a Secular Service was conducted at the graveside. Mrs. Axelby was a devoted mother, a faithful wife, and an excellent neighbor. Though not an avowed Freethinker, she had much sympathy with the Freethought movement; but Mr. Axelby was a zealous worker for the cause in the Hall of Science days, and is loyal to its principles at the present time. We offer him and the family our sincere condolence.—J. T. L.

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

People will not look forward to posterity who never looked backward to their ancestors.—EDMUND BURKE.

Christian Self-glorification.

THE annual meeting of the Free Church Council held at Norwich last week was notable for the extraordinarily high estimate of Christians generally, and of Christian ministers in particular, to which it gave so emphatic an expression. While self-esteem is doubtless to be encouraged, being the faculty that adds dignity and power to a man's character, it is certainly anything but a virtue to exalt ourselves at the expense of depreciating others. The doing of this is by no means a sign of real greatness. Boasting always indicates moral littleness. It is true that Christians sing their own praises presumably in order to glorify God, because the better they are supposed to be the greater is the credit due to him. Briefly stated, the following is their position: "Not unto us, but unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father—to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever." Sheltered behind such a sentiment a man may and does indulge in self-glorification to his heart's content. But we must not forget that by God or Christ, in such a connection, is meant a glorified picture of the man himself. Analyse any conception of the Divine Being and you will find that it consists of an unnatural and ludicrous magnification of purely human attributes. It is this alone that accounts for the endless number of such conceptions, and the enormous differences and even contradictions which characterise them. The prophet Jeremiah informs us that the Gods of Israel were as numerous as his cities, which is equally true of the divinities worshiped in Christendom to-day. It follows from this that to glorify God is equivalent to glorifying self. Preachers talk very glibly about the Holy Ghost, the Great White Throne, and the words of the living God, as if they were objects of direct knowledge, when in reality their very existence is insusceptible of demonstration. The moment you examine the so-called words of the living God you learn that they are extremely human in their nature and origin.

Now, the retiring President of the Council, the Rev. Alexander Connell, preached a sermon from the text, "The word of God came unto John, the son of Zacharias, in the wilderness" (Luke iii. 2), in which he confidently asserted that the people who do not believe such a text are the biggest fools on earth. He said:—

> "The people most to be pitied in this generation, or in any generation, are the people who go about the world spiritually blind. They may be masters of many sciences, but the secret of all true knowledge eludes them. They may have much joy out of life, but life itself they never know. They may gather much wealth, but their eyes never rest on the pearl of great price. They may live their length of days, and see many a peaceful sunset; but they never see the world as God made it, or as God meant it to be. They may taste of human affection, and may value it above all else; but they miss the love that lies disclosed like a glory about the humblest inquirer who lights his way with the lamp of the Spirit and has his brow fanned by the faintest breath of the Holy Ghost."

What is it to be "spiritually blind"? Simply not to believe that John the Baptist was God's spokesman, not to regard the Bible either as being, or as continuing, a Divine revelation, or not to accept Jesus Christ as one's all-loving Savior. Well, we frankly admit that we are "spiritually blind," and we positively decline to accept any Christian's pity. We even glory in our blindness. Mr. Connell, himself a Christian minister, addressed a Christian assembly, saying, in effect, "We alone are truly good and wise; we alone know what life is, and how to live it; we alone can read history, and shall yet have to rewrite it from beginning to end; we alone are ever reshaping our ideals and recapturing our dreams, floating our barques on life's highest tides and having the light of the morning in our faces." No wonder that he was heard with gladness. It was eminently soothing flattery that flowed from his mouth, and like most flattery, it was wholly false. We boldly deny the intellectual and moral superiority of Christians. What knowledge does Mr. Connell possess of which an Atheistic scientist is destitute? What is that "secret of all true knowledge" which is said to elude an unbeliever? Does the reverend gentleman really think that Sir Ray Lankester, or Dr. Chalmers Mitchell, is ignorant of, while he knows, "life itself"? As a matter of fact, Christians are not knowers, but believers. The only genuine knower is the natural man whom Mr. Connell looks down upon. This despised species, we are told, may have much joy out of life, live on to a ripe old age, and witness many a lovely sunset, may gather much wealth, taste the sweetness of human affection, and value it as if it were the pearl of greatest price; but he can never see the world as God made it, or as God meant it to be, or experience "the love that lies disclosed like a glory about the humblest inquirer who lights his way with the lamp of the Spirit and has his brow fanned by the faintest breath of the Holy Ghost." That is perfectly true, as the natural man is proud to admit; but his contention is that what is true of him is, in reality, equally true of all others. Has Mr. Connell ever seen the world as God made it, or as God meant it to be, or does he know that the world was ever made at all, or is meant to serve any specific purpose? It is comparatively easy to write fine sentences about the lamp of the Spirit and the breath of the Holy Ghost, and thereby to stir the emotions of credulous people; but we cannot repeat too often that both the lamp of the Spirit and the breath of the Holy Ghost are but creatures of the fancy, absolutely unknown to unbelievers.

While Mr. Connell devoted his discourse to the glorification of Christians in general, and only incidentally to that of ministers, Principal Forsyth, a trainer of young preachers, confined his attention to the rights and privileges of the ministry. As reported in the Christian World for March 12, he said:—

> "The ministry had not to reform the world, but to create a Church for the world's reformation. The ministry was effective as it was creative. It was not there merely for the sake of decency and order in the Church. No wonder the ministry is lightly treated if it is viewed as a mere convenience, like a chairman, or the proposer of a motion. And in some quarters it is > so viewed. Some preaching is like proposing the health of the Gospel. Some prayer is like moving a vote of thanks to the Almighty. There are those who look upon the minister simply as one of the members of the Church—the talking or the presiding member. They think anything else spoils him as a brother. They believe a church could go on without a minister, only not so well, with less decency and order. That is all wrong. The minister is much more than a brother. He is neither the mouthpiece of the church, nor its chairman, nor its secretary. He is not the servant of the church. He is an apostle to it, the mouthpiece of Christ, the servant of the Word, and of the church only for that sake. The ministry is a sacramental office..... The ministry represents God. It carries the Word of his mercy to the world. Nay, more, it conveys God in his grace."

We are in full agreement with the erudite Principal. Preaching is essential to the existence of the Church, just as the Church is essential to that of Christianity; but preaching cannot be effective unless it is viewed as a Divine institution. A church's success is completely dependent upon the minister, and the minister's influence upon the belief that he is the mouthpiece of God. Indeed, the existence of God is conditioned on the belief in the minister as his vicegerent. As the Principal so aptly says, the minister conveys him. Now, such a belief in the minister is rapidly dying out, and in consequence churches and chapels are emptying. It is true that a few places of worship are still crowded, but in every instance that is due to the minister's superior gifts, by the prudent exercise of which he manages to keep the belief in himself as God's ambassador still alive. God has never filled a single church yet, nor has the Holy Ghost ever displayed his power in the conversion of sinners. All the work has always been done by the clergy and their supporters, and when their work fails the Church's life is endangered. It is all very well for Dr. Forsyth to say that "it is not an effective ministry when the crowds the minister drew melt whenever he goes, when they gather about a personality rather than about the Church"; but there is no doubt whatever but that the crowds do melt when the popular minister leaves, unless he is succeeded by an equally popular one.

Now our conclusion is that the self-glorification so ardently indulged in by Christians is sure to end in the disintegration of their creed and the entire loss of their hold upon the world. In any truly human sense they have never been better than other people, and assuredly they owe nothing to the so-called mercy and grace of God in Christ. It is to the advent and ministrations of Humanism that the world is indebted for whatever progress it has made during the last few centuries; and Humanism has come in and done its work almost in the exact proportion in which supernaturalism has been decaying.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Limitations of Science.—II.

(Concluded from p. 163.)

IT is nonsense, says Professor Mellone, to assume that natural evolution leads to good, or that the one desire is any better or worse than the other, because science cannot prove it. These things lie outside the scope of science. Therefore, it is vain to hope to build human life on "Rationalism" or on science:

> "An outlook on life based entirely on science means an outlook, which does indeed leave out every ground for accepting any religious belief as true, but it also leaves out every ground for distinguishing degrees of worth or goodness and badness in human purposes. The whole world of appreciation, that is, the distinctively human world, is dissolved into chaos. By implication, all the distinctive tendencies of human nature (as distinguished from animal nature) are disregarded, save the one ideal—the ascertainment of laws of cause and effect."

The cat is out of the bag here with a vengeance. So long as we base life entirely on science it leaves out all ground for accepting religious belief. Therefore, some other reason must be found for religion. Hence the desire to prove that science cannot cover the whole of life, but leaves untouched what is to human beings the most important part. The confession is interesting.

As I have already pointed out, it is not true that science is incompetent to deal with any part of life. Its method is equally applicable to every aspect. There is, however, a certain truth mixed up with Dr. Mellone's statements, and it is well worth while setting forth that truth as plainly as possible.

In what sense can we hold that some desires are better than others, that some things are good and some bad, or that the process of natural evolution is good? Eliminating ourselves and our standards of valuation, what right have we to call anything good or bad? The answer is, none at all. If Dr. Mellone had put the case in this way I should have agreed with him. As mere natural facts all desires are equal. As natural facts an earthquake is neither better nor worse than a gleam of sunshine. As natural facts a man is no better and no worse than a tapeworm. In truth, good and bad, better or worse, higher or lower, have no meaning once we put on one side the human standard of valuation. Things are. They are what they are because of all the circumstances that made them what they are. Good and bad are inapplicable to nature, because such terms are only valid in the region of intelligent purpose. This is the truth contained in Dr. Mellone's statement, although in setting it down he has quite lost sight of its real import, and has mixed it up with a lot of quite irrelevant matter.

This is the exact truth of the matter so long as we eliminate the human standard of value. But this standard exists, and as it exists, it becomes a fact of which a sane science duly takes note. In order to better group, and better understand existing facts, we agree to call certain things good or bad, higher or lower, perfect or imperfect. From our point of view we consider the preservation of the race, the health of the race, the happiness of the race, as good things. Consequently, anything that favors these ends we call good. As Dr. Mellone rightly says, "good" means good for something, that is, in relation to some ideal end or purpose. But so far as nature itself is concerned, there is no justification for assuming any end or purpose in particular. Given appropriate conditions, and the germs of tuberculosis develop as surely as the human embryo becomes a man or a woman. Nature shows just as much "care" in producing a poison as in furnishing an antidote. You simply cannot deduce any end or purpose from nature because it shows a constant war of antagonistic tendencies, a constant building up and pulling down, with just as much "foresight" or "care" or "wisdom" shown in the one direction as in the other.

Of course, it may be said that we have the growth of higher forms of life and their prevalence as so much evidence in favor of natural progress. But this phrase "higher forms of life" is a sheer begging of the question. Man is only perfect after his kind, as other animals are perfect after theirs. We say that the prevalence of the human, and of animals and plants that are useful or pleasing to man, is a sign of advance. But can anyone point out in what way, once we eliminate our standard of value, this is advancement? One may safely challenge all the logicians and scientists in existence to prove that the present earth is actually "higher" or "better" than it was in the Carboniferous epoch. They can show it is different; but difference in nature is only difference. It is we who make things better or worse, good or bad. We say that things are improving when they favor our ends and the realisation of our ideals, just as other forms of life might have argued that things were deteriorating when changing conditions threatened their destruction. Order, improvement, progress, are, in short, what logicians call methodological concepts. They are conceptions framed by us to express changes in the direction of realising our ideals. But they have no value apart from our ideals. And their inapplicability to nature at large is shown by the scientific certainty that just as death puts an end to the individual, so nature will write "finis" to all our "progress" by making the earth impossible for animal habitation.

Nevertheless, these ideals exist; they have their place and their value. No one denies either the one or the other; all that is needful is to understand their place and their character. Dr. Mellone's error lies in taking it for granted that because science declares our measures of "good" and "bad" to be purely ideal constructions, therefore they do not exist to science, and science can say nothing concerning them. This is absurdly inaccurate. Whatever the nature of these ideals, there is no questioning their existence, and they become part of the "facts" which influence human action, and with which science has, consequently, to deal. "Science," says Dr. Mellone, "cannot sit in judgment on human purposes and decide on their relative worth." As a matter of fact, that is exactly what science is always doing. Unless Dr. Mellone denies the possibility of a science of human conduct—and to do so would indeed mean that the "distinctively human world is dissolved into chaos"—he must admit that certain desires are preferable to others in order to achieve a given end—whatever that end may be. Most emphatically science can do more than ascertain "the natural conditions under which they occur"—although even this would go a long way towards destroying Dr. Mellone's case—she can indicate their consequences. That is, science can do here exactly what she does elsewhere. She can analyse and she can synthesise. She can show under what conditions desires occur, and indicate the consequences that will result from their operation. And that is only what is done when the question is concerned with purely physical facts and forces.

Now, common observation finds that people desire to live; also that they desire to live experiencing the minimum of pain and the maximum of happiness. And with these desires dominant, there goes the conclusion that any conduct that favors these ends is good, and a conduct that prevents their realisation is bad. Next, science, which is only common observation organised and elaborated, analyses the conditions of healthy and pleasurable life, and says, virtually, If you desire to live, and live happily, these are the things that must be done and these are the things that must be avoided. It goes further, and points out why there exists this desire to live, and why the desire for happiness. Without the first the race would long since have ceased to exist, and without the second there would be no guarantee that, having discovered what was beneficial, the race would have gone on practising it. The main functions of life are really carried on because people find an organic pleasure in their performance, and the reason for this is perfectly plain to those who care to go into the subject. Every reason that we have for calling one thing good and another thing bad remains, whether we base life on science or not. The real distinction lies in the fact that science enables us to say why things are called good, and the reason why we have come to regard them as such.

But, says Dr. Mellone, "If a man chooses to deny any of these statements, there is not a word, from the merely scientific point of view, to be said against him." It all depends upon how far his denials go. If he denies that certain things are considered good by most people, and that the movement of society is in the direction of what they consider good, then he is certainly in the wrong, and can be shown to be so. But if he denies that happiness is a good thing, if he asserts that the sooner life comes to an end the better, then one can only question the conclusion by challenging the grounds on which it is made. Really, no one does deny the distinction—between good and bad. The correctness of our classification may be questioned, but the possibility of a classification is admitted in the act of framing the indictment. Man is a bundle of antipathies and attractions, and these are inevitably expressed under the categories of good and bad.

But suppose some one does choose to deny that things usually accepted as good are good, and that from the "merely scientific" point of view, what then? It is only what may happen to Dr. Mellone's position. Dr. Mellone believes that good and bad exist in virtue of a belief in the decree of some "Supreme Reason." But suppose anyone chooses to deny this "Supreme Reason." What can Dr. Mellone do? He is obviously helpless. He can only say, "If you accept my premiss of a 'Supreme Reason,' then I can show that some things are good and others bad. If you do not accept the premiss, the conclusion cannot be accepted either." Well, that is really the position of the scientist. He says, "If you grant that my reading of life is correct, then there is an obvious standard by which you may determine what is right and wrong. If you deny my premises, I cannot expect you to accept the conclusions." So far the scientist and the religionist are on equal grounds. But now the scientist has a distinct advantage over the religionist. When all is said and done, belief in the "Supreme Reason" is an act of pure faith. The scientist asks for no such act of intellectual abnegation. He appeals to human nature as it is, as we know it in ourselves and in intercourse with others. He starts with facts, and his generalisations are in the nature of conclusions drawn therefrom. The religionist commences with a mystery and ends in a fog.

Finally, I do not think anyone can seriously read apologetics of the kind I have been considering without being struck by their unreality. The genuine ground of the criticism is not stated. This is not that science fails to supply grounds for ethical judgments, but that it offers no foothold for religion. It is seen, in spite of apologies offered to reconcile religion and science, that no genuine reconciliation is possible. If science does not pronounce against religion, it affords no reason for it. All that remains is to mark off a region and label it "Religion; No Admittance to Science." The subterfuge is patent, the policy futile. Science does not claim a part of life, but the whole. All knowledge, actual and possible, is its province; all facts, physical, biological, mental and moral, its material. Beyond these lies ignorance, deep, impenetrable, irremovable. Religion is welcome to that region; but it will have to release its hold on human nature, as it has already given up the physical universe.

C. COHEN.

Science and the Soul.—VIII.

"Of all our acquired tastes, the taste for living for ever is the one which will be found least deeply rooted amongst men, if for no other reason, because it has never been strengthened by indulgence. No mortal knows whether a resurrection to eternal life would answer his expectations or not."—EDITH SIMCOX, Natural Law, p. 359.

"Christians believe themselves to be the aristocracy of heaven upon earth; they are admitted to the spiritual court, while millions of men in foreign lands have never been presented. They bow their knees and say that they are miserable sinners, and their hearts rankle with abominable pride. Poor infatuated fools! Their servility is real, and their insolence is real, but their king is a phantom and there palace is a dream."

"What a state of society is this in which free-thinker is a term of abuse, and in which doubt is regarded as a sin. Men have a Bluebeard's chamber in their minds which they dare not open; they have a faith which they dare not examine lest they should be forced to cast it from them in contempt."—WINWOOD READE, The Martyrdom of Man, pp. 534-541.

"We may love the mystical and talk much of the shadows, but when it comes to going out among them and laying hold of them with the hand of faith, we are not of the excursion."—OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, Literary Friends and Acquaintance; cited by Osler, Science and Immortality, p. 25.

WE have now seen how man came by his ideas of ghosts, spirits, souls, and a future existence after death. Primitive man arrived at them, quite logically, in the same way that he derived the idea that the earth was fixed and the sun moved, from the evidence of his senses, although we know that the evidence of his senses was false.

Science gives no countenance to the crude idea that certain cunning men invented tales of ghosts and bogies to frighten their fellows into doing what they required them to, and so rule them through their fears.

It is true that priests and kings have used these superstitions, added to them and intensified them, to further their own ends; but they did not invent them, and, until comparatively recent times, they themselves believed in them.

It is only in our own time that science has succeeded in freeing man from the gigantic web spun from the brain of primitive man in his first childish attempts to explain the things he felt and saw. And if, as some scientists think, our world, in the course of ages, is again reduced to the primitive nebula, and passes through all the phases of evolution resulting in man, then these illusions will produce similar superstitions, with all their resulting miseries. It was this idea of the "eternal recurrence" of the past which struck Nietzsche with such unutterable horror that it is said to have been the main cause of the breakdown of that fine brain, from which he never recovered.

It remains to consider the ruling beliefs now held concerning a future life. The Buddhists have no such belief. Confucius told his followers not to trouble about it. The Mohammedan believes in a heaven of ease and voluptuousness. The Christian, with Chinese superciliousness, looks upon all other beliefs as unworthy of a moment's consideration.

And what are the Christian beliefs upon the subject? The early Christians believed in a material hell of endless torment for the wicked—the great majority—and a material heaven—for a select few—provided with mansions, golden streets, pearly gates, etc., where they will spend eternity in singing endless praises to God. These conceptions lasted throughout the Middle Ages down to our own times. The present writer was brought up in that belief, nor ever doubted it until he left home to go out into the world. The Salvation Army still teach this view in all its nakedness. Probably the vast majority of the old members of the Nonconformist Churches also hold this belief; also the majority of the women folk of the working classes.

The working man has got rid of the fear of hell—this is the real reason of the total failure of the religious revival missions to touch the masses, and their desertion of the Churches. The working man thinks, with old Omar, that, if there is a future life, God is "a Good Fellow and 'twill all be well," and dismisses the subject from his mind. For what is there in the conception of the Christian heaven to appeal to any civilised and intelligent being? Golden crowns, and harps, and streets might appeal to a Johannesburg financier, but who would not prefer a beautiful English lawn to the flashiest of golden streets?

As Mr. George Bernard Shaw remarked, the Salvationist looks forward to spending eternity "in a sort of bliss which would bore any active person to a second death."*

Sir William Osler also refers to—

> "the absence of features in the presentation which prove attractive, and the presence of others most repulsive to the Western spirit. What is there in the description in the Apocalypse to appeal to the matter-of-fact Occidental mind? The infinite monotony of the Oriental presentation repels rather than attracts, and the sober aspirations of Socrates are more appreciated than the ecstasies of St. John. Commenting upon this, Jowett says: 'And yet to beings constituted as we are, the monotony of singing psalms would be as great an affliction as the pains of hell, and might be even pleasantly interrupted by them.' How little account is taken of our changed attitude of mind on these questions."†

But not more absurd than the idea of singing the praises of God for ever is the idea that an intelligent omnipotent power would require, or permit, such a degrading and stupid performance. What earthly civilised king would submit to having his praises sung to his face for an hour?

But we must remember that Christianity is an Eastern religion and thoroughly oriental in spirit. As Winwood Reade observes:—

> "Heaven was invented in the East; and in the East to be a courtier has always been regarded as the supreme felicity. The feelings of men towards their god, in the period to which we have now arrived, are precisely those of an Eastern subject towards his king. The oriental king is the Lord of all the land: his subjects are his children and his slaves. The man who is doomed to death kisses the fatal firman, and submits with reverence to his fate. The man who is robbed by the king of all that he has earned, will fold his hands and say, 'The king gave, and the king taketh away. Blessed be the name of the king!'"*

And, as he further remarks, "Men resort to churches to fall on their knees and to sing hymns, from the same servile propensity which makes the Oriental delight in prostrating himself before the throne."

And where is this heaven supposed to be? No one knows. During the Middle Ages, the ages of ignorance and darkness, they knew. It was just above the clouds, not very far away; and hell was underground, and could be entered through volcanoes, which were entrances to it. But science has searched the skies for millions of miles, and the most powerful telescopes have not revealed the towers and battlements of the New Jerusalem. Even the most sensitive photographic plate, which reveals stars too faint to be detected by the telescope, has no better success; and, as Buchner remarked, "There is no theological or ecclesiastical natural science; and there will be none, so long as the telescope does not reach the regions where the angels dwell."†

The old conception of heaven as a place of eternal psalm-singing has almost faded away. Among the educated who still cling to the idea of a future life probably there are scarcely two with exactly similar ideas upon the subject. Where there are no facts to work upon, everything is nebulous and hazy. Each one moulds it to the heart's desire.

The conception of heaven, among the working classes, especially among the women folk, is much more definite. It is a place where everybody will be good and happy. There will be no more scrubbing and mending; no more washing days, in spite of the fact that everyone will be clothed in white. Everyone will be provided with a crown and a harp. All their friends and relations will be there, as God would never be so unkind as to exclude any friend they may have known on earth. In fact, it will be a continuation of the old earthly life, with all the dirt and discomfort, all the pain and sorrow and want taken out of it—an eternal Bank Holiday. And those who have suffered most in this life will receive a greater recompense in the world to come. It is a dream born of the hard struggle for existence. For as Leslie Stephen remarked, "The argument that because good and evil are mixed wherever we can observe, therefore there is elsewhere unmixed good, does not obey any recognised canons of induction."‡

Not only is there no foundation in science for the popular idea of a future life, but it is in opposition to the teachings of the Church itself. For the Church teaches that the soul is immaterial, and how is an immaterial father going to recognise an immaterial son; or an immaterial husband going to recognise an immaterial wife? How is an immaterial body going to be clothed in garments of white and wear a crown or play a harp. How can its immaterial feet walk the golden streets?

The nearest we can get to the immaterial is a vacuum, and even our most exhausted vacuum is full of the inter-stellar ether; if a glass bell-jar was exhausted of air, and we could exclude the ether as well, we should attain to the immaterial. No sound could be heard inside of it, no light could penetrate the glass walls, for light could not travel without the ether. And when the priest talks about an immaterial existence, he palters with us in a double sense to "keep the word of promise to our ear, and break it to our hope."

What would be the use of an immaterial life? A life where we could not look into the eyes of our wife, hear her voice, and touch her hand, would be a ghastly mockery. As Ingersoll well says, "If, when the grave bursts, I am not to meet the faces that have been my sunshine in this life, let me sleep on."*

The Savior.

WE are the rockfolk, who live in the caves on the mountains near where the clouds come to sleep. Men, women, and children there are of us, many—how many we do not know; nor do we need to care; for we have no foes to trouble us, and there grows plenty food on the slopes, and plenty birds are there to feed the young amongst us. And standing at the edges of the rocks there are piles of stones, built there that we may be ready for the enemy that never comes. So we live together amid the rocks, in peace one with the other, and the days of our lives are many, and many are the children that make the mountains ring with their laughter and playing.

Many snowfalls ago our people left the valley, and came to the caves to dwell, and their coming is the only story we know of the days that are gone and of the people who never come back. We shall never forget the story, nor shall we ever let it grow dim in the lives of our children.

On the day of memory, the day when the snow goes from the peaks of the mountains, we gather, all of us, in the great cave that is open to the light of the sun, to hear the story told by him who is softest of tongue amongst us. And as we sit in the great circle in the sunlight he tells us of our father who was the savior of our people, Ironhand, who was eaten by the strange beasts that came from the darkness of the trees to feed upon us, Ironhand who now lives in the great cave in the heart of the mountain that is open to the sun.

The singer tells us how Ironhand, he who was strongest and bravest of the men of his time, and more beautiful than a woman, was teaching the young men to use the stone-headed stick; for farther than any two men could he fling the stick, and no beast ever twice crossed his path, nor was he ever known to be foolish. As he was teaching the young men there was a mighty crashing of trees, and a great strange beast came rushing from the forest towards them. The foam dropped from its gaping mouth, and the noise of its roaring was like the voice of the mountains when the sky is black, and the men who live there shoot arrows of fire that blacken and shrivel and kill, arrows that cannot be found when afterwards we look for them. The young men fled in fear from the terrible beast, but Ironhand stayed to fight that he would let them reach the huts in safety. Bravely did he attack the beast, but the blows of his stick were like pebbles falling on the rocks; for, afterwards, when the beasts were stoned from the rocks, the biggest stone was useless to hurt them. And Ironhand, the bravest and best of the men who came before us, was caught in the jaws of the ugly monster, and carried away into the darkness of the trees, before the men could know what had happened.

And the air was full of the wailing of the women for Ironhand, the well-beloved, and there was misery in the hearts of the men. The bravest of them went to the edge of the trees, but were afraid to follow the tracks of the beast that had carried him off from amongst them; for the young men told with trembling of the size, and the strength, and the anger of it, and there were fallen trees to prove that they spoke only the truth. In woe and fear they returned home to their dwellings to tell what they had seen; and no one could understand. But when the weeping of the women was most sorrowful and the anger of the men was most bitter, a sudden shout of joy went up from one of the young men who, being ashamed, had ventured some little way from the huts. And Ironhand was seen flying from the trees towards them. He called upon the people to rush to the mountains, for the great beasts were coming from the forest to devour them. And as he called the joy was turned to woe again, for it seemed as if the trees were being torn to pieces by a mighty storm of wind, and the air was full of angry roarings that silenced the shouts of Ironhand. But he waved his hands that they might know to flee to the rocks.

Soon the huts were all empty, and the people were quickly flying to the mountain; all but Ironhand. Once more did the well-beloved turn to face the hungry monster that came first. Once more did he stay to save his fellows; and their hurried shouts of grief affected him not, nor would he have any to assist him, but he waved them all away, and they went. And so it was that those who lived before us reached the rocks in safety, while the great beasts fought each other for the flesh of Ironhand, and tore him to pieces, and devoured him. But they could not climb the mountain.

For many snow times the beasts made the valley their home, and often caught and ate the foolish of our people who were tempted by the fruits that grow there. And one day, when the snow was deep in the valley, the beasts disappeared into the trees, and came no more; but our people remained here, on the mountain side, living in the caves amongst the rocks, knowing not cold nor heat, nor lack of food, nor lack of drink; and the women gave birth to children that loved the rocks even more than did our forefathers for whom the rocks were the sacrifice of Ironhand, the brave and beautiful. The people were happy and lived in peace.

So it is that we gather, all of us, on the day of memory, in the great cave that looks upwards to the sun; and the singer tells the story I have told you. When the sun looks down into the great cave, when its rays first fill the darkness with light, we gather together to weep for Ironhand, the savior of our people, and the giver to us of peace. And on that day it often happens that the last snow goes from the mountains and we know that the sun-time has come; and that day we have made the day of memory, when we gather together, all of us, men, women, and children, to rejoice over the death of Ironhand, who died so that we might live, who gave his strong life to the hungry beasts that he might save those whom he loved.

And we have set up the rock that glints like the rays of the yellow sun near nightfall, and on it we have carved the life-giving of Ironhand, that our children, in the days to come, will weep and rejoice as we weep and rejoice in the days that are; and that they will remember and worship in the days that are yet to be as we remember and worship in the days that are now. For the name of Ironhand is sacred to us; and the memory of him is like the sweet clear waters that spring from the rocks near where stands the yellow-starred stone around which we gather on the day of memory in the great cave that looks to the sun.

Realism.

WHEN Nietzsche aimed at the Superman idea, he had thrown overboard the trappings of Christianity, and had set out on the voyage of life determined to find or create something better than the discarded book of theology. If Hyperion had never been written, the trend of thought which ever outgrows the God-idea would still make itself articulate. Thus man, at a certain stage, appears to tower above what were once his gods. So long as the unsatisfying objects of worship do not appeal to the intellect, so long shall we have them discredited and despised. In the evolution of deities, the theory of natural selection is reversed. This may at first appear a paradox, but when we consider that artificial interests keep alive the crude objects of veneration, we must not be surprised. Sun-worship for England would be unprofitable; so would Buddhism. Both would be too cheap and easy of access for everybody, and the gigantic interests of parsonic middlemen would be cut away. Therefore, it is to the benefit of the middlemen of heaven to keep alive the tradition and God-idea of Christianity, and so reverse the theory of natural selection in the religious sphere.

If we may divide society in three sections, and label them respectively, Philistines, Idealists, and Realists, we shall find that Freethinkers fall in the third category. We, as Freethinkers and Realists, should not mind if we only had the forces of hell against us; the galling part is, that we have also the heaven idea thrust in our path, and, therefore, we are Realists with no illusions. The advanced Christians, much against their will, have destroyed hell; it is our task to force them to dispense with heaven. And none but Realists could venture on such a super-quixotic adventure. If we are bespattered with mud in the process, we must not complain; it is for future generations that we build, and the superman's conception of immortality extends no further than that attained through future generations. Meredith was fully aware of this when he wrote—

> "Life begets with fair increase > Beyond the flesh if life be true!"

We shall break down the marble walls and golden pillars of heaven for the benefit of posterity, and, in doing so, prison gates shall open for us, slander assail us, and every vice invented shall figure to our names. With this sweet prospect in view, we cannot be accused of avoiding reality; we are Realists in the nethermost sense of the word.

This brings us to an interesting position. The Christian, through his hopes being centred in heaven, says, in theory, "Nay" to life. The Freethinker, having dispensed with such an illusion, says "Yea," and would probably say so again if the theory of eternal recurrence were true. He would come to the banquet of life and say, "Once again." The Realists are truly those who are not afraid to face life and everything the term connotes; to the Philistines we leave the prospects of heaven and any other delusion they may like to cherish.

In philosophy, in art, in science, it has always been the fate of those who had any length of vision to be execrated by the mob, that is, by the Philistines. Shelley pitched out of Oxford, Swinburne sneered at by the mid-Victorian school of milk-and-water poetry, Thomas Paine hounded from his country—these are but a few of the examples of the treatment received by pioneers or realists. And a list of such names could be carried on indefinitely. They are the men who light the torch, and it is our duty to keep it burning. They have made the path easier for us, and they have paid the price demanded by their respective generations of Philistines. The altar of Progress will always have its victims; where the high priests are Philistines this cannot be avoided.

Consciously or otherwise, Nietzsche trumpeted the Freethinker of to-day when he spoke of the Superman. Social reconstruction is nothing short of blasphemy if one truly believes in any of the hundred-and-one versions of the Christian God; to touch with desecrating finger the work of one who made "the world and the stars also" is an act too impious for words. For this reason alone we are of the opinion that a Christian, by his own creed, should not meddle with the betterment of society, but rather leave it to those who are quite willing to take their chance in the great hereafter. Nietzsche had nothing but scorn for those whose sympathies were for the weak and the botched, the inheritors of the kingdom of heaven. He knew that such conduct could not uplift a single human being, and therefore, in his vision of the superman, he places courage and hope as two chief virtues. And the first is as necessary as the second in the Freethinker's armory.

In the writings of Nietzsche Freethinkers will find much with which they can agree, and little that will meet with their disapproval. Freethought is eclectic; it is this very quality which makes it universal. And the realism of Nietzsche comes as no shock to us who have been face to face with realities ever since the Christian God was commercialised. Let him blow his mighty blasts through the pages of The Antichrist, or wither creeds in the aphorisms of Thus Spake Zarathustra—we are not amazed, for he is a man after our own heart, and the patriotism of Freethinkers knows no country. His reception in England is an index to his position; and we conclude by saying that there is work for many Biblical Samsons in this country before Nietzsche can claim a fair judgment.

CHILDREN OF FAITH.

Diana's children are of a distinctly religious turn of mind. I think most children are, and what a wonderful and curious thing their religion is.....

Hugh wants to know if God put in the quack before he made the duck? It is difficult, isn't it, to answer those sort of questions? On another occasion he asked Betty if God was alive? Betty, eager to instruct, said, "My dear Hugh, God is a spirit."

"Then we can boil our milk on him." That was a poser for Betty.

Diana was at a loss, too, when Hugh announced his intention of going to heaven. She asked him what he would do when he got there? "Oh!" said Hugh, "stroll round with Jesus, I suppose, and have a shot at the rabbits."....

It is the custom of Diana to read the Bible every morning with her children.....On this particular Sunday, Hugh marched through the hall with his Bible under his arm, followed by Betty, carrying a smaller Bible. He said to her, "I will teach you, darling."

Betty said, "Can you, Hugh?" and he said "Rather."..... "What's it going to be about?" she said.

"All sorts of things," said Hugh, grandly. "P'r'aps about Adam and Eve, and Jonah and the whale, and Samson and Elijah. Do you know the diff'rence between Enoch and Elijah, that's the first thing?"

"No, I don't," said Betty, reluctantly.

"Well, darling, you must remember the diff'rence is that Enoch only walked with God, but the carriage was sent for Elijah!"

"Was it a carriage and pair, Hugh?"

"More, I expect."

"What next, Hugh?"

"We'll just look until we find something," and Hugh opened the Bible.

"It's upside down," whispered Betty.

Hugh assumed the expression my spaniel puts on when he meets a dog bigger than himself.

....." Go on Hugh," said Betty, humbly.

"Now, Betty," he said, "you must listen properly, and not talk, because it's a proper lesson, just like mother gives us when visitors aren't here." A pause, then Hugh said in a very solemn voice, "You know, darlin', Jesus would have been born in the manger, but the dog in the manger wouldn't let him."

Acid Drops.

Father Furniss's Sight of Hell—a little penny book "for children"—has been denounced in Freethought journals for the last fifty or sixty years. It is now discovered by the Christian Commonwealth—"rather late in the day" as John Bull says. Our pious contemporary says it ought to be suppressed by law. That's it. Resort to violence against anything you object to. This is the Christian all over. What he once burnt you alive for denying he is now ready to burn you alive for teaching. And how, we should like to ask, does he know that he is right in either case. Father Furniss gives the children good New Testament pictures of hell. The alteration is not in the substance but in the reasoning.

Mr. Bottomley denounces Father Furniss's truly "hellish" teaching. But hasn't he found the very same teaching in the New Testament? If he hasn't he must have read it most inattentively. For our part, we prefer dealing with principals to dealing with subordinates. Moreover, if the doctrine of hell is true, let it by all means be preached; and, if it be not true, let it by all means be repudiated. Never mind the preacher's name. Jesus Christ or Father Furniss, what does it matter? A "damnable lie" is a "damnable lie" and comes from a damnable liar.

At a speechless dinner in honor of Sir Edward Carson at the Ritz Hotel on March 13 a presentation was made to him of a sword and a book of signatures. The sword was sheathed in a very useful silver scabbard; in order, we suppose, that the right honorable gentleman may shine on the field of the battle of Belfast like King Henry the Fourth on the field of Ivry. "And be your oriflamme to-day the helmet of Navarre." The blade of this fine weapon bore the following inscription: "Presented to Edward Carson by friends of Ulster in sure confidence that God will defend the right." Has it come to that? No wonder the dinner was speechless.

Readers of this paper will be quite familiar with arguments such as these:—

> "It is easy to say 'in the beginning,' but what was God doing before the beginning? A beginning of beginnings is inconceivable, and if God himself never began, a million million years would bring him no nearer the act of creation than he was at first. It is plain that what we call a beginning is not a beginning, but somehow a part of an eternal process.....Again there is an insuperable difficulty involved in the very conception of a purposeful artificer away at the beginning of time fashioning a universe; his own presence needs accounting for. Where did he come from? It is no easier thinking of God as existing without a creator than to think of the world and man existing without a creator."

This is from a recent sermon by Mr. R. J. Campbell. It is interesting to observe the way in which very old Freethought arguments are served up as advanced Christian thinking.

Mr. Campbell also comments on the design argument as stated by Paley, and says that "this kind of reasoning is quite useless nowadays; no one pays heed to it." We fancy we could show that Mr. Campbell's arguments for Deity are not a bit better than Paley's; are, indeed, only the Paleyan argument in a new form. But Mr. Campbell is quite wrong in assuming that the weakness of Paley's argument is shown by discovery of imperfection in the world. Imperfections would not prove the absence of design, but only the absence of perfect design. The real weakness of every form of the design argument is just that the evidence selected is the wrong kind of evidence. If everything in nature were of the most perfect and most admirable character, it still could not prove design. All that is proved by a scrutiny of natural process is that the result expresses the conditions that produced it. And this is true in every case, and cannot be otherwise. Design really implies purpose, and purpose is shown by the end reached realising the intention existing in the mind of the designer. The Theist has to assume a God, he has to assume a knowledge of God's intentions, and then he has to show that the ends reached the purpose. But he only knows the ends. He does not and cannot know that there is a God, or what his intentions were, and so cannot say whether these intentions are realised or not. This is the real fallacy of the design argument, and it is surprising that so many able men have missed it.

Dr. Gibson, Bishop of Gloucester, reports a gift from a Christian lady for foreign missions. She had no money to part with, but she handed over a pearl necklace, which the good bishop sold for over £800. We should like to know what difference it made to the heathen inhabitants of heaven—or hell.

At a recent fire in a tin tabernacle at Southend-on-Sea a notice-board remained intact with its contents. It contained the title of the previous Sunday's sermon, "Prayer to God Answered."

The outrage at the National Gallery, where a Suffragette attempted to destroy a masterpiece by Velasquez, recalls the time when the Christians destroyed priceless works of art because they saw in them sinful idolatry or sinful luxury. It was the same holy feeling which caused Christians to destroy their enemies, and to-day the persecution of Freethinkers under the Blasphemy Laws is a proof that godly people who profess to love their enemies usually finish by hating their neighbors.

"A Star Fish" runs an advertisement in the daily papers. It does not refer to the "fishy" monster who swallowed the prophet Jonah. That story is too "fishy" even for the journalists.

A London lady has just left £10,000 for church building in the metropolis. Who will provide the congregation?

The Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, speaking at the Free Church Council meeting at Norwich, said there were 5 villages with 1,000 persons and 16 chapels, a group of villages with 1,500 people and 19 chapels, and a small town with 6 Free Churches, 2 Brotherhoods, and the Salvation Army, and a total attendance of 800 people. We shall soon be fighting bricks and mortar and parsons, for the congregations are near zero.

The one great thing the Churches need, says Rev. Rhondda Williams, is to sink all ideas about the rights of property, the privileges of classes, etc., and "enter upon a campaign of righteousness." This is the kind of windy blather that does duty in the modern Churches for thinking. You are not to bother about anything else, only to preach righteousness. Anyone with genuine intelligence would realise that it is just these other things that determine righteousness. Current conceptions as to the rights of property or the functions of property, the existence of class privileges, the relations of classes, of capital and labor, of government and its functions, of housing, wages, education, etc., are the things that make a people either usefully and intelligently righteous or a mere collection of moral humbugs. Religion has been prolific in producing the latter; it has very seldom made for the former.

It is not difficult to see the reason why Mr. Williams offers this advice. The moment any genuinely social issue is raised co-operation among the Churches becomes impossible and their generally retrogressive influence manifest. But to unite in a general shriek for a vague, unindicated righteousness is perfectly safe. No one knows exactly what is meant, everybody can join in, and nobody is injured or benefited. For ourselves, we say deliberately we have never known a mere preaching of righteousness do any genuine or lasting good, and do not expect to see it accomplished by this method. To be quite fair to the Churches, there has never been any lack of the preaching of righteousness, and its ineffectiveness is patent. It does encourage the worst of all moral evils—a feeling of self-righteousness; it dissipates moral energy, it makes hypocrites by the cartload, and leaves real evils quite untouched. The religious prig is bad enough; the moral prig is even more nauseating.

Nothing like adapting theory to circumstances. Two stained-glass windows have just been sent out to the Kikuyu Mission Church, one of which represents Christ blessing negro children. We have no doubt that, if necessary, he could be found recommending some particular brand of patent medicine.

Judge Cluer, at Whitechapel County Court, has been asking why litigants lie so in the witness-box. He answers that they do it in order to give magistrates a job. Which shows that Judge Cluer can be facetious; also that he can forget what he has read in the Bible. We must freshen his memory a bit over Acts v. 3:—"Why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie?" The Devil has many names to himself in Holy Writ, and one is "the father of lies."

so amusing that the weather got out of hand in England, and the seasons a bit mixed.

The Rev. J. H. Shakespeare wants Free Church Bishops. We are not so keen as the prospective "fathers-in-god," who scent good emoluments.

The Westminster Coroner says the safest thing for taxi-cab drivers to do is to assume that all people are fools. The advice certainly has the merit of considerable success, for priests of all denominations have feathered their sacred nests on the assumption.

Sir George Alexander assisted a number of clergymen to unveil a monument to the Burbages and other "men of the theatre" at St. Leonard's Church, Shoreditch. How the clergy do like to drag in famous names to bolster up the Christian superstition. Not long since the name of Shakespeare was used to collect sixpences for St. Savior's Church, Southwark.

In godly Paisley we see that the local inspector of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has during two months investigated 45 complaints of cruelty, affecting 168 children, and implicating 65 adults. Three hundred "supervision" visits have been made. This is not a bad record for a Christian country. In a non-Christian country such a state of affairs would be a consequence of the absence of Christianity. In pious Scotland we must, of course, conclude that things would be much worse if Christianity were non-existent.

In many persons, says Sir Edward Russell, editor of the Liverpool Post, "religion or no religion was actually the dividing line between dormancy and intellect, the utter inaction of the intellect and the active employment of the intellect." We agree; although we feel sure we should relate the two differently to Sir Edward. What he means is that dormancy of intellect means with many the absence of religion. Well, that is simply not true. It is not a question of whether non-religious people are right; it is simply a question of fact. Under existing conditions, dormancy of intellect means falling in with ruling conceptions, and these are in form religious. The vast majority of people receive some sort of religious instruction, and dormancy of intellect means that they cannot outgrow it. On the other hand, giving up religion means activity of intellect. It does not mean that one is thinking accurately, but it does mean that one is thinking. Finally, look at the vast majority of believers in religion, and then realise the absurdity of talking about religion being due to a more "active employment of the intellect" than is observable with the non-religious!

Electric light is to be installed and trams are to be run in Jerusalem before long, as a Paris banking house has obtained concessions for those purposes. When Jerusalem and Bethlehem are connected by trams, and resemble Houndsditch, some of the glamor will be removed from the "holy places."

The Rev. S. Baring-Gould has been poking fun at the Nonconformist doctrine of sudden conversion. He says: "A man who is a child of Satan at twenty minutes to six, by a sudden internal commotion of the ganglions becomes an elect saint at six o'clock." When sky-pilots begin to slang one another, they sometimes let the cat out of the bag.

A country rector has been writing to the Times and the Daily Mail, pleading for the inclusion of the words "by air" in the Litany. He adds in his latest letter that he has had only two responses; one from an Atheist and the other from a Christian who thought that aeronauts deserved broken necks. We don't know which to admire the more—the religious Atheist or the irreligious Christian.

The connection between the advance of Christianity and the consumption of intoxicating liquors is an old one, and there seems no immediate danger of the connection being severed. The Transvaal Leader of February 25 reports a case in point. Two native ministers invited people to attend a "Grand Tea Meeting." Those invited were, of course, natives. When the guests arrived, they found a large box standing in the room labelled "Glass." The description was not altogether inaccurate, as the box contained about two dozen bottles of "dop" brandy. The bottles were handed by one minister to the other, who served out the contents to the guests "in the name of Christ." A detective, however, arrived on the scene, the ministers were arrested, and their trial fixed for March 3. As our readers are probably aware, the supplying of alcoholic drinks is forbidden to natives. White Christians may get drunk with impunity.

Bishop Ryle thinks that religion ought to be advertised. We fancy clergymen are sufficiently alive to the value of advertisement, and hardly need admonitions on this head. As a matter of fact, the business of modern religion is very largely built up on advertising. Its value and its beauties are the themes of countless puffs, and, like many another well-advertised article, if the advertisements were to be dropped the demand would rapidly diminish. We wonder what would be the position of religion in this country if for a single generation people were left severely alone—left, that is, to discover the beauties of religion for themselves? The whole thing, we believe, would then be in a state of social bankruptcy. Intellectual bankruptcy has already been realised.

With reference to the proposed alteration in the Litany, so that "by air" may be added to the "travel" portion, Rev. O. C. Legge-Wilkinson writes from Maidstone saying that he intends to do so, and the "sad fact that three more deaths of Army airmen have just occurred" confirms him in his intention. We do not see that it matters much anyway. Mr. Legge-Wilkinson surely does not believe that these military aviators would not have been killed if the prayer for their protection had been offered. And he will hardly claim that it would have been better for them to have been killed after their safety had been prayed for. That would have been to emphasise the uselessness of prayer. Besides God—if there is a God—knows these aviators are flying round. He knows they don't want their necks broken, and it is anything but gracious for him to allow them to break their necks because he has not been specially asked to preserve them.

Since last December a deputation of American parsons has been touring in Great Britain in favor of bringing the different denominations into unison. These gentlemen have just handed in their report, and the committee which received it is issuing a proclamation calling for "a truce of God among the sects of Christendom." This is not so bad. Centuries of rule, and then the Christian ministers begin to inquire whether it is possible for them to leave off fighting among themselves long enough to hold a "World's Conference." What a religion of love! And what a loving religion! We would suggest to some of these gentlemen that, instead of taking on the whole of Great Britain and America—which is a large order—they should experiment on a small scale. Reconciling Protestant and Catholic in Ireland would do for a start.

The Christian World observes that the Free Church Council appears to be suffering from lack of leaders. This means, we suppose, lack of men. It is quite true, but not peculiar to the Free Churches. All the Churches are suffering in the same way. The best men, men with the stronger brains and the better characters, do not and will not enter the Churches as leaders or preachers. Many religious authorities have lamented this lack of first-class men in the Churches, and the reason is simple. First-class men shrink from a profession which involves beliefs that the best contemporary knowledge declares to be of either doubtful veracity or altogether false.

The village of Nebo, Denbighshire, is evidently a stronghold of liberty—of a kind. At one of the local tabernacles a local preacher delivered a sermon on the vice of swearing. On the following Sunday, when the preacher ascended the pulpit, he found the church empty. His congregation had gone on strike as a protest against clerical interference with freedom of speech. The way of a modern preacher is unquestionably hard.

Some members of the Omagh Y. M. C. A. have been victimised by a clever adventurer, who represented himself as a millionaire traveller, journeying round the world for a wager and a wife. He asked for a loan and subscriptions were collected. The man told stories of adventures with lions in Africa, and of his being many days in the Sahara without food or water. He knew where to tell his tales.

The Rev. A. J. Waldron considers that "man is essentially divine, and that it is our cursed civilisation that defames God's image." This Brixtonian imagery is somewhat mixed, but does it imply that the Deity is uncivilised?

A church choir at Wetherafield, Essex, has gone on strike in defence of the eastward position during the recitation of the creed. This looks like going on strike for a relic of sun-worship.

Mr. Foote's Engagements

Sunday, March 22, Secular Hall, Rusholme-road, All Saints, Manchester: at 3, "Shaw Among the Prophets"; at 6.30, "Mr. Balfour on God."

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £96 13s. 3d. Received since:—Percy Main, 5s.; George Taylor, £5; Julius Rasmussen, 8s. 2d.; Prof. Charles Cadmore (Brazil), £1 6s.; M. Brown, 5s.; G. Harker, £2 2s.

PERCY MAIN.—You forgot to add your own name. We note your hope that "the rank and file will hurry up and complete the Fund," which is so "small in comparison with the Archbishop of Canterbury's £15,000."

E. B.—Much obliged for enclosures.

A. L. COATES.—Order, etc., passed over to the publishing department. We cannot say whether we have any other readers in the place from which you date. Thanks for your good wishes.

HARRY POWELL.—We have a cheque of yours; it has got separated from your letter, which has either been lost or mislaid. Will you kindly send us fresh instructions?

MANCHESTER BUSINESS MAN.—We have not seen the paper you refer to, and we have no time to hunt it up at present. Besides, the argument it sets forth has been answered again and again.

ADELAIDE REED (Canada).—If we were to deal with all the questions referred to in your letter we should wear out ourselves and puzzle, instead of enlightening, our readers. Secularism says "one world at a time." Common sense says "one thing at a time." Making men think about religion makes them think better on all other subjects they attempt.

R. H. ROSETTI.—Obliged to make one exception.

THOMAS FAWCETT (Liverpool) asks whether it is true that Mr. John Morley, now Lord Morley, once said that "Mr. Foote was the best writer of English writing to-day." We do not know, but we should imagine not.

S. CHARLES CUDMORE.—Glad to have your appreciation; thanks also for your efforts to promote our circulation.

G. BARBER.—Thanks for papers. The one you say is being circulated in Manchester is being sent round other towns in a similar manner. We do not know the character of the man who produces it, but there is no doubting the mental character of those who provide the funds. It helps one to realise what a poor thing, after all, is our boasted civilisation.

J. F. AUST.—It is a long time since there was any organised Freethought work in the Potteries, but not quite so long as you say. If your newsagents "cannot" supply the Freethinker of the date you require, it must be because they will not. That is part of the boycott from which we suffer.

F. PEARSON.—If you cannot get a copy of A Sight of Hell from the publishers, and will apply to Miss Vance, she may be able to oblige you.

L. S. MANN.—We cannot say where you can get a copy of the sermon noticed by Mr. Mann in our issue of February 8. Perhaps Mr. Mann will be able to give you the information.

Some correspondence and other items are unavoidably held over till next week.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Sugar Plums.

South Lancashire friends will note that Mr. Foote visits Manchester again to-day (March 22). His subjects should be very attractive.

There is just time to call attention to the Blasphemy meeting at Essex Hall on Friday evening (March 20). The speakers include Mr. F. W. Jowett, M.P., Rev. Walter Walsh, Mr. G. W. Foote, Mr. Herbert Burrows, Mr. Harry Snell, and Mr. G. H. Radford, M.P. The hall should be quite full, and, if London Freethinkers take the matter seriously, will be crowded. The list of speakers is attractive, and the subject important—one of the most important at present before the country.

The Secular Education League's meeting—the seventh annual gathering of members and friends—takes place at Caxton Hall (Room 1) on Tuesday evening, March 24. The annual business meeting starts at 7.45 prompt. It will be followed by the annual public meeting at 8.15.; when friends of Secular Education are invited to attend, whether members of the League or not. In the enforced absence of the President (Mr. George Greenwood, M.P.) through illness, which his many friends profoundly regret, the chair will be taken by Sir Henry Cotton; and among the speakers will be Lady Byles, Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., Mr. Halley Stewart, J.P., Rev. Walter Walsh (the late Mr. Voysey's successor), and Mr. G. W. Foote. We hope there will be a crowded meeting. Admission is free, and no tickets are required.

The half-yearly meeting of London members of the N.S.S. will be held at Chandos Hall, Chandos-street, Charing Cross, on Tuesday evening, March 31. Members' cards should be presented for admission. Any difficulty in this respect should be brought to the attention of the General Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, who will be in attendance. Notice should be sent to her, also, of any matter intended to be brought before the meeting.

The West Ham Branch holds a "social" at the Workman's (Small) Hall, Romford-road, Stratford, E., on Thursday evening, March 26—from 7.30 to 11 o'clock. Admission free; with collection in aid of expenses. Songs, dances, recitations, games, etc. We are asked to extend an open invitation to all Freethinkers and friends. We do so with pleasure—but with one exception. It is the N. S. S. Executive meeting night. We hope to see the members at the post of duty.

A debate on the subject of "Is Theism Rational?" is to take place at the Reformers' School-room, Crete-street, Liverpool, on Friday and Saturday, March 20 and 21. The affirmative is to be taken by Mr. H. D. Longbotttom, the negative by Mr. J. Hammond, President of the Liverpool Branch of the National Secular Society. Debates are rare nowadays, and this should make the discussion more than usually attractive. We do not know Mr. Longbottom, but Liverpool Freethinkers may leave their case in Mr. Hammond's hands with the utmost confidence. The chair is to be taken at 8 o'clock, and admission is free.

We have to thank Mr. Cohen for seeing the Freethinker pages through the press. The winds of March are very poetical in the writings of English songsters, especially in Shakespeare's magical passage on the daffodils. But a little of them goes a long way with our Editor. A catarrh has brought on a touch of asthma, which always lies in wait for him. He hopes, however, to shake it off in a few days. This is written on Tuesday.

The Bradlaugh Fellowship is holding a "Social Party" at the Shoreditch Radical Club, New North-road, on Wednesday, March 25. There is no charge for entrance to this function, which is timed to commence at 8.30. All Freethinkers will be welcome.

One of our readers in Newport (Mon.) made the offer of a free copy of the Freethinker, weekly, to the Free Library. This was declined on the ground that there was no public demand for the paper. This is an old excuse, and we agree with the gentleman who made the offer, it can easily be removed. The truth is that people do not usually ask for what they know is not there. Where the Freethinker is taken in the demand for it is large enough. That is why it is often kept out. We should advise that the offer be made again, backed up by a requisition from as many residents as it is possible to secure.

We are very much pleased to see a note from the pen of Mr. Franklin Steiner in the New York Truthseeker to the effect that Mr. Mangasarian still holds his large Sunday meeting at Chicago, and that it is usual for a number of people to be turned away. Mr. Clarence S. Darrow also lectures to good audiences in Joe Howard's theatre; and Mr. Percy Ward "has for three months been conducting a 'Mission' in Roseland, south of Chicago, with much success."

New Lights on Materialism.

THE attitude of the anti-Materialist towards the most recent developments of physical science affords an instructive example of that trick of "shifting one's ground" which is too often practised in philosophical controversy. In times past Materialism was vilified and abused as the "philosophy of dirt," and the Materialist was asked how any sane person could believe that "dead, inert matter" possessed within itself the potentialities of life and mind? Now that this despised matter is being found to be not dead or inert, but instinct with mighty and eternal energies; now that this revolting "dirt" is discovered to be nothing less than the embodiment and manifestation of the primal existence, the anti-Materialist at once shifts his ground, and, assuming a sort of proprietary right over the new aspect of matter, calmly asks the Materialist what is to become now of his attempt to reduce all existence to "blind material forces"—to the fortuitous concourse of "mere dead atoms"? To this the Materialist, of course, makes reply that the epithets "dead," "inert," and the like have never been applied to matter by him. This false and ignorant conception is entirely due to those who have opposed Materialism, not to those who have defended it. The ascription of all the marvellous properties of life and mind to the functioning of matter has meant to the Materialist, not the lowering and degrading of life and mind, but the elevating and glorifying of matter and all its powers and functions. The following pronouncement by the great modern apostle of Materialism, Ludwig Buchner, should be decisive on this point:—

> "It is for every man to decide whether he will continue to regard 'matter' as the beggar in rags it has hitherto seemed to the uncultivated mind, or whether he will recognise its true proportions and the splendid vesture of properties with which modern science has endowed it. The scientific mind of these latter days inclines to the assumption of a unified conception of the world, instead of the old dualistic theories, a faith in the simple monistic basis of all things, which remains one and the same in itself throughout all the changes and diversity of its phenomena. When that faith shall have conquered, there will be an end of the old unscientific depreciation of matter, and the world of the long misunderstood and despised Materialist will be grander and nobler than any of the imaginative and artificial structures of the theologian or the philosopher."

The recent investigations in radio-activity and the conclusions now being formed as to the intra-atomic constitution of matter do not in the least discredit the materialistic position—on the contrary, as I hope to show, they tend to strengthen it. The materialistic conclusion is, after all, an extremely simple one. It is merely this, that as all the activities of nature are expressible in terms of what we call matter and energy, these two entities constitute a manifestation of that ultimate reality whose existence we are compelled to postulate. The ultimate existence is known to us through matter and energy, therefore it is a matter-energy existence. If, on the other hand, all the activities of nature were expressible in terms of spirit, soul, or God, we should be equally bound to regard the ultimate existence as spiritual or divine; but, unfortunately for the idealist and the theologian, the cosmos, so far as we know it, absolutely refuses to be expressed in these terms. The materialistic conclusion seems, therefore, to any unprejudiced mind, to be forced upon us by the facts of the case, and no discovery as to the nature of matter or of energy can shake it in the slightest degree. This conclusion can no more be affected by a deeper analysis resolving matter into energy or energy into matter than, say, the chemical fact that water is produced by a combination of oxygen and hydrogen can be affected by a deeper analysis proving that oxygen and hydrogen are different forms of the same thing. The fact that water is produced by a combination of those two forms of existence which we call oxygen and hydrogen would remain as true as ever.

The sweeping generalisation—so startling in its utter novelty and so revolutionary in its philosophical import—that matter is nothing else than a form of energy, has been definitely and boldly affirmed by Gustave le Bon, and it seems to be the goal towards which the researches of other physicists are irresistibly leading them. The conclusions formed by this eminent scientist as the result of his investigations have been given by him in his work, The Evolution of Matter, in the form of seven plainly enunciated propositions, and in order to give the reader a clear idea of his views, I cannot do better than quote these seven propositions in full. They are the following:—

> "1. Matter, hitherto deemed indestructible, vanishes slowly by the continuous dissociation of its component atoms.
> "2. The products of the dematerialisation of matter constitute substances placed by their properties between ponderable bodies and the imponderable ether—that is to say, between two worlds hitherto considered as widely separate.
> "3. Matter, formerly regarded as inert and only able to give back the energy originally supplied to it, is, on the other hand, a colossal reservoir of energy—intra-atomic energy—which it can expend without borrowing anything from without.
> "4. It is from the intra-atomic energy manifested during the dissociation of matter that most of the forces in the universe are derived, and notably electricity and solar heat.
> "5. Force and matter are two different forms of one and the same thing. Matter represents a stable form of intra-atomic energy; heat, light, electricity, etc., represent instable forms of it.
> "6. By the dissociation of atoms—that is to say, by the dematerialisation of matter, the stable form of energy termed matter is simply changed into those unstable forms known by the names of electricity, light, heat, etc.
> "7. The law of evolution applicable to living beings is also applicable to simple bodies; chemical species are no more invariable than are living species."

These conclusions, forming the greatest generalisation ever reached in the whole history of science, are rapidly receiving confirmation, and will, in all probability, soon be fully confirmed. They will receive the whole-hearted assent of all Materialists, since they possess a significance for our monistic conception of the universe far transcending that revealed by all the past generalisations of science put together. This has been admirably expressed by an appreciative critic, M. Sagaret, in the following passage quoted in The Evolution of Matter (p. 79), and which I make no apology for reproducing here:—

> "No scientific theory has responded, nor can better respond, to our yearning for unity than that of Dr. Gustave le Bon. It sets up a unity than which it would be impossible to imagine anything more complete, and it focusses our knowledge on the following principle: one substance alone exists which moves and produces all things by its movements. This is not a new conception, it is true, for the philosopher, but it has remained hitherto a purely metaphysical speculation. To-day, thanks to Dr. Gustave le Bon, it finds a starting point in experiment.
> "The scholar has till now stopped at the atom without perceiving any link between it and the ether. The duality of the ponderable and the imponderable seemed irreducible. Now the theory of the dematerialisation of matter comes to establish a link between them.
> "But it realises scientific unity in yet another way by making general the law of evolution. This law, hitherto confined to the organic world, now extends to the whole universe. The atom, like the living being, is born, develops, and dies, and Dr. Gustave le Bon shows us that the chemical species evolves like the organic species."

The unity is indeed complete. From the immaterial, through the proto-material, to the material; from the inorganic, through the proto-organic (the colloids), to the organic, the continuity of existence runs unbroken. Nor does it stop short of the sphere of consciousness. If matter be but a mode of energy, and if mind be also a mode of energy—which few will be found to deny—then matter and mind are in essence the same. Hence would disappear that "fundamental duality of mind and matter," that "impassable gap between Thoughts and Things" which has ever been the favorite dogma of the orthodox philosophy, and hence would be established that unity of mind and matter for which Materialistic Monism has all along contended. But this is too large a subject to be entered upon here. It has been merely mentioned to show that even in this aspect of the question the new view regarding matter supports the materialistic position.

The evidences of continuity in the material and proto-material worlds are twofold and mutually confirmatory, being yielded alike by the researches of the chemist and the observations of the stellar physicist. To the chemist the term "element" is becoming almost meaningless. The spectra of many metals vary according to the intensity of the dissociative action to which they are subjected, and the more intense the dissociation the simpler in character becomes the spectrum. These partially dematerialised elements are called proto-elements, and furnish a series of gradations between the material element and the primordial energy of which it is merely a stable form.

Stellar spectroscopy yields exactly similar results. The less hot stars give, in general, spectra of the metals. Hotter stars give spectra of the proto-metals. The stars of highest temperature give spectra of those gases of lowest atomic weight forming what chemists call the "helium group." These elements of the helium group possess the common characteristic of having no combining power or affinity for other elements or for each other. They form the "non-valent" or "zero" group of the chemist, and come before all others in this periodic table of the elements—that remarkable system of grouping and classification in the inorganic world the significance of which has hitherto been somewhat mystifying, but which the new chemistry will probably show to be a product of evolution just as are the classifications of the biologist. It is obvious that in an evolution from the immaterial to the material these simple, inert, non-valent elements would appear first. The semi-material, proto-elements would first differentiate into the valent and non-valent types, and as the final stages of the progressive materialisation were reached the non-valent forms, by reason of their greater stability and resistance to combination, would stand out as the earliest distinct and separate forms of matter; and this is exactly what the researches in stellar physics reveal. Lastly, the coolest stars contain the elements of higher valencies, notably carbon, which, as is well known, is one of the principal constituents of living matter.

The process of evolution from the immaterial up to the organic seems, therefore, to be gradually revealing itself, and the physicist may in time be able to draw up a genealogical tree to represent a system of inorganic classification, as the biologist has done for organic classification. Even now the vague outline of such a system seems to be foreshadowed. The roots of the tree would lie deep down in the region of immaterial substance whose energy is in a condition of absolute instability—where no equilibrium whatever has yet been initiated. The main trunk of the tree would represent the semi-material forms of existence intermediate between substance and true matter—forms of energy-equilibrium gradually growing more stable, but not yet in that completely stable form manifested in matter. The summit of the trunk would represent the attainment of complete materialisation, and thence evolution would proceed along two main branches—one towards the production of elements of higher and higher atomic weight, and the other evolving elements of higher and higher chemical valency and intra-atomic complexity. The first would terminate in the spontaneously radio-active elements, uranium, radium, etc. The second, passing through ever-increasing complexities of combination and re-combination, atomic and molecular, would evolve first the great world of ordinary inorganic compounds, then the colloidal substances, and finally protoplasm. Both branches would thus terminate in conditions of unstable equilibrium, resulting in a final return to the non-equilibrium of immaterial substance, whence the same cycle of evolution would recommence.

So much, then, for what may be called the external aspect of the new theory of matter as revealed by those new facts of physics and chemistry which the researches of scientists have brought to light. Let us now examine the question, as it were, from the inside, and scrutinise the theory itself. I think that we shall here find an equally strong justification for the materialistic position.

The theory tells us that the entire material world is nothing but a manifestation of energy. Matter is a stable form of energy. The products of atomic dissociation—the emanations, the positive ions, the electrons, and the X rays—are forms of energy of increasing instability, till finally is reached that primal energy, presumably in a state of complete instability, which constitutes the fountain of all being. What, then, is this all-embracing and all-potent energy which bids fair to become the sole content of modern science?

Physicists conceive of two forms of energy—kinetic or moving energy, and potential or static energy. But the latter can always be expressed as a condition of equilibrium between two or more opposing kinetic energies; that is to say, a state of potential energy is merely a condition of more or less temporary equilibrium obtaining in some system of kinetic energy. For instance, the potential energy of a loaded cartridge is a condition of equilibrium between the atomic energies of the elements forming gunpowder. If the bullet be fired vertically upwards, this potential energy of the cartridge is converted into the kinetic energy of the moving bullet, till, at the instant when the bullet reaches its highest point, all the kinetic energy is retransformed into potential energy. This second condition of potential energy is again a state of equilibrium; this time an equilibrium between its own kinetic energy and that kinetic energy of the ether which we call the force of gravitation. If, instead of being discharged in the neighborhood of a gravitating body like the earth, the cartridge had been discharged in a void of infinite extent, it would never lose its kinetic energy, but would travel through space for ever with its velocity of discharge unabated. In defining energy, therefore, we need concern ourselves with kinetic energy only, and kinetic energy may be defined as the movement of substance.

Energy is, therefore, a dual conception, involving movement and something that moves. And in this dual conception of energy the notion of substance holds an indefeasible priority, for though we can conceive of substance independently of movement, no effort of the mind avails to form a conception of movement independently of substance. It is this fundamental necessity of human thought that constitutes the eternal and impregnable rock on which the materialistic philosophy is based. The notion of substance is inevitably involved in the notion of energy.

What conception, finally, can we form of substance? The foregoing considerations seem to lead to the conception that this primal existence is not discrete, but continuous and infinitely diffused through space—infinitely unstable—infinitely mobile; and that it generates by its eternal movement progressive forms of energy-equilibrium, ranging from absolute instability, through many intermediate degrees of imperfect equilibrium, to that form of complete equilibrium which we call matter.

But what substance is, and what its nature, we of course know not, since of an ultimate existence no definition is possible. All we can say is that substance manifests itself as energy, and energy in equilibrium is matter; or, to borrow the language of mathematics, energy is the "primitive function" whose "derived function" is matter—a derivative of which we have no means of finding the integral. But this very fact that substance can only be expressed in material terms amply justifies us in calling ourselves Materialists.

Thus the new lights on Materialism seem to reveal no weak points in its armor. The new conception of matter, besides furnishing a unifying theory of existence which bears out to the full the claims of Monism, leaves in the last analysis the position of Materialism unshaken. Hence there seems to be no occasion just yet to apologise for calling our philosophic system a Materialistic Monism.

A. E. MADDOCK.

Animal Enemies of Plants.

WHEN surveying the fair face of Nature one is deeply moved by her manifold beauties. A lovely landscape; the valley carved out by the meandering course of the river; the sweet blendings of color presented by the blossoms of summer and spring; the stately magnificence of the lords of the forest; and the multitudinous variety of plant life revealed by brake and copse; the clustering grape, the waving corn; the autumnal glory of the many-tinted apple, pear, and plum; the choice brown hazel nut and the sombre-hued blackberry, all conspire to lend to Nature a never-dying charm. From the darling of the gods—the human species—there almost instinctively arises a prayer of thankfulness to Nature for her unstinted gifts to her proudest and most precious production.

Many a Theistic homily has been written and countless sermons have been preached on the clear evidences of divine handiwork displayed to all who pause to reflect on the marvels and beauties of God's creation. But if we meditate with reverence and gratitude upon the beauties and blessings which our Mother showers upon us in such prodigal abundance, we must not on that account forget that the glories of Nature are the outcome of a pitiless struggle for supremacy which has most constantly accompanied all forms of living matter from the dawn of life many millions of years ago right down to the present moment of our existence.

Parasitic life is legion, and is responsible for incalculable misery and death throughout the entire realm of organic nature, from unicellular creatures to the highest of the backboned family. The subject is a vast one, and we will for the moment confine our attention to a consideration of a few only of the insect enemies of vegetable growths of outstanding economic value to mankind. A most elaborate study of the animal pests which attach themselves, to the detriment and destruction of the plants upon which they prey, has been carried out on the North American continent by an army of scientific investigators. Experts have come to the conclusion that the annual losses to American agriculturalists which are directly due to insect attack is 10 per cent. for ordinary farm crops, while the vegetable growers' losses reach the high average of 20 per cent. An evil of this magnitude called for serious inquiry, and as an evidence of the time and attention devoted to the study of the question in the United States we may mention that so far back as January, 1905, the various bodies interested in this inquiry had published over 12,000 memoirs containing about 72,000 references to noxious insects, and since that date the number has been constantly increasing.

From the moment a seed is sown until the vegetable is ready to undergo the processes of the culinary art, the plant is ever open to the onslaught of its insect foes. When seeds are "bad," and fail to germinate after planting, this "badness" is almost invariably to be traced either to the agency of injurious insects while still in the granary or to the destructive activities of insects contained in the soil. Weevils, wire-worms, and root maggots are pests of this character.

Asparagus is rendered unmarketable when ready for gathering by the asparagus beetle. Tubers, tomatoes, cereals, and other plants are all liable to the attacks of malign insect organisms. In fact, there is no cultivated plant of any kind that is immune to the depredations of animal parasites. These, however, are preyed upon in their turn; the vegetable fattens its insect enemies that these should afterwards fatten insectivorous birds, and carnivorous insects such as the ladybirds and other useful creatures. Animals useful to the husbandman are variously classified, but are best arranged in four divisions. In Dr. Chittenden's classification the leading forms are grouped as follows:—

> "(1) Predaceous insects consisting of those which feed externally on their prey; (2) predatory animals other than insects, such as birds and mammals; (3) parasitic insects which live in the bodies of their hosts; (4) fungi and diseases of bacterial origin."

Climatic conditions are as essential to the control of insect depredation as to the yield of the harvest itself. Intense frost and extreme heat, heavy rainfall or prolonged drought, exercise as great an influence on insect life as on that of the vegetation. The enormous increase of snails, slugs, and other pernicious organisms in our English gardens is very largely attributable to the abnormally mild winters of recent years.

Among the insects most valuable to the farmer and gardener, the ladybird occupies a pre-eminent place, as this useful creature destroys immense numbers of plant lice, while other forms closely related to it limit the destructiveness of scale insects. Ladybirds also feed on the eggs and larvæ of other insect pests. Several species of ground-beetles, spiders, wasps, and syrphus and robber-flies, are likewise instrumental in lessening the activities of noxious insects. Among birds, the quail is eminently useful as a destroyer of plant pests. Skunks and toads are both beneficial to the cultivator of the soil. Fowls, ducks, and turkeys devour incredible quantities of grubs, injurious worms, and similar pests.

> "The parasitic enemies of noxious insects are legion, but their activity as useful allies of the farmer is to a large extent dependent on atmospheric conditions. As a general rule, also, they seldom appear in their greatest numbers until their injurious hosts have done more or less damage. Their principal usefulness, then, is in so decimating the numbers of noxious species in one season that few are left to prey upon crops the following year."

The chief members of this useful group are related to the wasps; the ichneumon flies, braconids, and chalcis flies are salient examples of these. In referring to the economic importance of parasitic organisms as insect destroyers, Dr. Chittenden, of the United States Department of Agriculture, writes:—

> "An excellent example of the value of parasites is afforded by the imported cabbage worm. One of its parasites, Pteromalus puparum, destroys in some seasons from 80 to 90 per cent. of these 'worms.' Another parasite, Apanteles glomeratus, was purposely introduced by the United States Government about 1883. During the autumn of 1904 this species held its host under complete control in the District of Columbia, killing every 'worm' which came under the writer's observation."*

When pestiferous insects are classified as regards the nature of their food plants, we discover that many of these are specially noxious, inasmuch as they restrict their predaceous activities to particular vegetable growths. When parasitic pests display a particular predilection for exceptionally valuable plants, they become a standing menace to the raiser of crops. Some of these malign creatures strictly limit their attention to the cotton plant; others infest the tomato, tobacco, and other members of the same botanical family. Many insect pests, however, are quite cosmopolitan in their tastes; and although they may show a preference for certain plants, the fact remains that, when they have outrun their favorite means of subsistence, they calmly proceed to devour the next plant they meet with, and orchard, garden, field, and forest are all invaded in turn.

Fortunately for the farmer, this omnivorous group is less destructive than its more special-feeding colleagues. Its attack is spread over a far more extensive area; but the damage to crops for which caterpillars, leaf-beetles, green flies (aphides), and other general crop pests are responsible is still very serious. And it must not be forgotten that omnivorous vermin such as locusts and army-worms may swarm over an entire territory and completely ruin the harvest.

White grubs are deadly antagonists to agriculture. There are several hundred distinct forms of these grubs, and the majority are parasitic on cultivated plants. The wireworms, again, rival the white grubs as general farm pests.

> "Though not related to the white grubs, they have very similar habits, the injurious vegetable-feeding forms being strictly subterranean, and subsisting at the expense of various crops, especially corn, cereals, and grasses, but attacking, in the absence of these, various vegetables and other plants."

Important crops such as potatoes, onions, turnips, cabbage, beetroot, lettuce, carrots, and others, are ravaged by these miserable parasites. Plant lice are another scourge to the cultivator. There are numerous species, and all are injurious to plant life. Lucky is the gardener who is not troubled with their presence. In some seasons the hardiest products of the kitchen garden suffer severely from their baleful activities, while the ordinary vegetable growths—melons, cucumbers, peas, and young budding fruit trees—are among their favorite victims.

That choice garden growth, asparagus, is the host of various parasites. If America presented Europe with the potato and various other useful plants, the Old World gave asparagus to the New. This vegetable was carried across the Atlantic by the early European colonists, and appears to have remained immune to insect molestation for a couple of hundred years. Few edible plants have ever enjoyed such prolonged security; but now the plant is preyed upon by two leaf beetles which are both of European origin, and whose food is confined to this plant alone. The common asparagus-beetle appears in the list of English exports, and it is now firmly established in the States. This beetle is the chief enemy of the asparagus. It first attracted attention near New York in 1860, four years after its introduction into the country. Both in its larval and adult state this beetle damages and devours the tender shoots of the plants which are cultivated for the early season's markets. Later in the year it destroys the developing vegetable, and is seriously injurious to the seedlings. The larvæ, as well as the adult beetles, destroy the delicate parts of the plant, "but the latter gnaw with seemingly equal relish the epidermis or rind of the stems."

To the artistic naturalist unacquainted with its noxious character this beetle would appeal as a thing of wondrous beauty unalloyed. It is, indeed, a lovely object, "slender and graceful in form, blue-black in color, with red thorax, and lemon-yellow and dark blue elytra on wing-covers, with reddish border. Its length is a trifle less than one-fourth of an inch." From the site of its first settlement in Queen's County, New York, the beetle has spread very widely, and were it not for the immense numbers of adults which perish in severe wintry weather, and the very numerous predaceous animals which feed on its larvæ, it would be an even worse pest than it is. Among its inveterate enemies are the spotted lady-bird, sundry wasps, and small dragon-flies.

Another eyesore to the cultivator is the twelve-spotted asparagus-beetle, which has also spread widely over the United States, and, like the related form above described, is a beetle of great beauty. A third pest is the maggot of a small black fly which is only too well known as the asparagus-miner, a name derived from its habit of tunneling under the skin of the plant-stalk near, or just below, its base. An ingenious remedy for this untoward happening has been proposed by Dr. Chittenden, which is as follows:—

> "Permit a few volunteer asparagus plants to grow as traps to lure the female fly to deposit her eggs. Afterwards, in late June or early July, pull the trap plants and promptly burn them with their contained insects.
> "If this is carefully done over a considerable area, there will be little necessity for other methods, as few insects will be left for another season, unless, indeed, the insect has an alternative food plant. Co-operation and thoroughness are essential to success. This method will also operate against the rust which is often present in fields infested by the miner."

PILLS TO PURGE ORTHODOXY.

It is to be feared that, to most men, the sky is but a concave mirror, showing nothing behind, and in looking into which they see only their own distorted images, like the reflection of a face in a spoon. Hence it needs not surprise that they are not very devout worshipers; it is a great wonder that they do not openly scoff.

Piety, like small-pox, comes by infection. Robinson Crusoe, however, caught it alone on his island. It is probable that he had it in his blood.

Everybody professes to know that it would be difficult to find a needle in a haystack, but very few reflect that this is because haystacks seldom contain needles.

It was never intended that men should be saints in heaven until they are dead and good for nothing else. On earth they are mostly fools.

The influence of climate upon civilisation has been more exhaustively treated than studied. Otherwise, we should know how it is that some countries that have so much climate have no civilisation.

The symbol of charity should be a circle. It usually ends exactly where it begins—at home.

A four-footed beast walks by lifting one foot at a time, but a four-horse team does not walk by lifting one horse at a time. And yet you cannot readily explain why this is so. —Ambrose Bierce ("Dod Grile").

FAREWELL TO THE CROSS.

Straightway he raised the Cross high in the air;
Its shadow darkened space: into the deep
He threw it: then his terrible despair
Fell from him, as a sleep.

Falls from a young man on a summer morn:
Wondering and glad a lowly way he took
By pastures, flowers and fruit, and golden corn,
And by a murmuring brook:

And while were heard descending from the skies,
Or out of future times and future lands,
A bruit low and whispers, shadowy cries
Of joy and clapping hands.

—John Davidson.

So, when dark faith in faith's dark ages heard
Falsehood, and drank the poison of the Word,
Two shades misshapen came to monstrous birth,
A father fiend in heaven, a thrall on earth:
Man, meanest born of beasts that press the sod,
And dis: the vilest of his creatures, God.
A judge unjust, a slave that praised his name,
Made life and death one fire of sin and shame.

—Swinburne.

Obituary.

I regret to hear of the death of Robert Owen Smith, which took place rather suddenly on Friday, March 13—the cause of death being certified as rheumatism and heart failure. The funeral took place on the following Wednesday. It took place without religious rites of any kind. Mr. Smith is well known to the survivors of the "Bradlaugh" days at the Hall of Science. I did not hear of his death till Monday evening, and though I would write more, in the circumstances I cannot.—G. W. F.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 13 SUNDAY, MARCH 29, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

He who will not freely and sadly confess that he is MUCH a fool is ALL a fool.—FULLER.

Trust in God.

ONE of the speakers at the Norwich Free Church Congress complained that often in the Churches the man with the cheque-book was thought more of than the poor man. He thought this was one reason why the Churches lacked force, and had lost, or was losing, the confidence of the mass of the people. The complaint comes rather late in the day, because there never has been a time when the man with the cheque-book was not thought most of in the Churches—and one might add very generally outside the Churches. And, if he were sufficiently cynical to say so, the rich man might point out that in this the Churches were only doing their duty. They may preach to the poor, but they exist for the rich. How often are the wealthy classes told that they ought to go to church as an example to the poor? And what is the great work of the Churches but to maintain order, which is only another way of resisting change and of conserving established interests? A French writer said once that it was the duty of the poor to protect the property possessed by others. So one might also say that the stock teaching of Christianity to the poor has always been the duty of maintaining an order from which they benefit least of all.

The speaker referred to advised that we should trust less to the millionaire and more in God. But why? Why should we put more faith in God than we do in a millionaire? Millionaires may not be always admirable persons, although some of them do not seem to be at all bad fellows, but at least there is no doubt as to their existence. We do not have to read volumes or wade through miles of argument to find out whether they exist. And some of them do use their wealth in a way which they believe will benefit their fellows. But there is no such certainty in the case of God. We cannot be certain that he exists; we cannot be sure, even if he does exist, that what he does is for the best, or that we can rely upon his assistance. His existence is only a possibility, his benevolence a matter of mere inference. In the case of distress we might approach a wealthy man with a fair amount of certainty that he would render assistance. No one can approach God with the same degree of confidence. An American millionaire who some years ago met an appeal on behalf of the public with a "Damn the public," was generally condemned for his callousness. But, as a mere matter of fact, God doesn't say it, he does it. Thousands of people are tortured by disease or overwhelmed by disaster. And if we are to trust believers, it is God who is behind all. It is certain that if any wealthy man were to act with as little regard for human well-being as does God, he would stand before his fellows as a moral monster. This is not alone the opinion of an Atheist, a convinced Theist comes to the same conclusion. Mr. W. H. Mallock says that if Theists will look the facts of the universe steadily in the face,—

> "They will see that if there is anything at the back of this vast process, with a consciousness and a purpose in any way resembling our own—a Being who knows what he wants and is doing his best to get it—he is, instead of a holy, all-wise God, a scatter-brained, semi-powerful, semi-impotent monster. They will recognise as clearly as ever they did the old familiar facts which seemed to them evidences of God's wisdom, love, and goodness; but they will find that these facts when taken in connection with the others, only supply us with a standard in the nature of this Being by which most of his acts are exhibited to us as those of a criminal madman.....Habitually a bungler as he is, and callous when not actively cruel, we are forced to regard him, when he seems to exhibit benevolence, as not divinely benevolent, but merely weak and capricious, like a boy who fondles a kitten and the next moment sets a dog at it."

What encouragement have we that we should rely upon God? Of course, the clergy tell us we should; but that, as Heine said of another occasion, is their trade. Our trust in God is the only warranty for their existence. But what reason does experience furnish for this trust? If experience is to be trusted, God does nothing. Civilisation is not the gift of God, but the product of human labor and human wisdom. And civilisation, when one comes to look at it, largely consists in correcting God's handiwork, or directly reversing it. God furnishes poisons and diseases ready made, but man has to slowly discover the antidotes. God inflicts pain without the slightest regard for merit or demerit, and human society flourishes as it negatives this method. We do not willingly punish the innocent for the guilty, or the children for the parents' faults; but that is precisely God's method—that is, if we are to adopt the belief in a God who speaks through nature. If experience has taught us anything at all, it is that human development depends entirely upon our acquiring the qualities of self-dependence and co-operation, and treating God as a quite negligible factor in our lives.

Preachers often enough lament that people ignore God, without apparently realising the significance of the charge. That we do ignore God is true enough; but how comes it that we can do so? Facts are not things that can be ignored for long with impunity. Beliefs that are vital to human well-being cannot be lightly set on one side. A fact is the most stubborn of things. We may ignore its presence for a time; but it remains awaiting, and finally compelling, recognition. The Gradgrindian philosophy did not break down because it insisted on facts, but because it left out of account facts quite as important as those it recognised. It was the neglected facts that ultimately wrecked it, as they will sooner or later wreck all false conceptions of life. How comes it, then, that we can neglect God? And not only neglect God, but do so without anyone being able to show that we are the worse for our neglect? Does it not argue that in neglecting God we are losing sight of nothing of any genuine importance? For, after all, it is not the man who gets on with the belief in God by which its value is to be tested, but by the man who gets on without it. Health with whisky drinking cannot prove that it is necessary to prevent disease; health without it does prove that it is quite unnecessary. The testimony of a thousand believers is not nearly such good evidence as that of a single unbeliever.

Observe, too, that this neglect of God is not the case of a people who have not yet arrived at the stage of trusting God. It is the case of a people whose neglect is the expression of experience. Trust in God was once universal. People depended upon God as far as it was possible for them to do so. Historically and individually, trust in God represents a stage that has been outgrown in those who "neglect God." The believer too generally forgets when he lectures the unbeliever that we know all about it. We have been where he is. He has not been where we are. We know all his arguments, we have experienced all his feelings. We know what it is to trust in God, and we know what it is to go our way having put this belief behind. We really are in a position to lecture him. He is in no position to lecture us. He is in the position of a confirmed whisky-drinker lecturing a teetotaler on the necessity of whisky to perfect health.

Of course, the world generally ignores God. How could it be otherwise? Experience may not be always expressed in words or formulated in theory, but it is there in practice. We may express faith in the power of God to heal disease, but we do not refrain from calling in a physician or surgeon. We may profess to believe in the power of faith to move mountains, but we place infinitely greater reliance on engineers. We may pray for a safe voyage overseas, but we all know that a well-built vessel and a skilled navigator is more important. We pray in Parliament that God will direct the decisions of those present, but no single member believes that anything of the kind occurs. We say we believe that God is on the side of right in warfare, but we certainly place more reliance upon men and armaments. We go on trusting God in theory and ignoring him in practice, because nature does not mind what theories we hold so long as we do not practise them. It is practice that tells, and sooner or later experience compels us to adopt a practice that is consonant with our welfare, as it compels us to drop practices that make against it. Man does not trust God in practice, because experience has shown him what a broken reed this trust is. And mankind cannot go on fooling itself for ever.

In sober truth, while conscious Atheism may not be general, practical Atheism—that is, the setting on one side of God in the affairs of life—is fairly common amongst civilised people. And this is only what one might expect. Practice is before theory, nearly always. In the main, theory only expresses practice. It summarises life rather than directs it. Life precedes theory, and philosophy explains and systematises what is and what has been. And this divorce between theory and practice, this trusting God in theory and ignoring him in practice, only means, at bottom, that the forces of life are too insistent, too strong for religious doctrines. In practice, God is ignored because he has failed to justify confidence. All our beliefs, all our institutions are, like forms of life, ultimately amenable to the operation of the survival of the fittest. If they are inimical to welfare, they die out sooner or later. If they are useful, they flourish and increase. If they are merely harmless, they may persist for an indefinite time. But religious beliefs have not increased. On the contrary, there is no denying their general decline. It only remains for theory to summarise practice here as elsewhere. Life will then once more represent a consistent whole, while our perception of the nature of the forces involved in human development will make our progress at once more rapid and more secure.

Irrationalism Glorified.

THE term "Irrationalism" has two principal significations. It is employed to denote a philosophy which regards all the processes and conclusions of reason as practically valueless, and contends that the emotions alone furnish the tests of truth as well as the rules for individual and social conduct. It is also used to signify the denial or disbelief of the principles of Rationalism. In the present article we shall combine the two meanings of the word. Two outstanding metaphysicians of to-day, Bergson and Eucken, are uncompromising Irrationalists, though the latter is claimed as an advocate of rational spirituality. We maintain that the very notion of spirituality is entirely irrational, a contention in which Bergson is on our side. He argues that "the intellect is characterised by a natural inability to comprehend life." "Intelligence," he adds, "treats everything mechanically." Therefore "on intuition alone can we rely in dealing with life." To the famous French philosopher life is a spiritual entity or force bending matter, more or less, into conformity to its own will. This is a truth which the reason, according to him, cannot comprehend. We agree with him, but on wholly different grounds. We hold that our intelligence cannot deal with life as a spiritual reality simply because there is no evidence whatever that life is such a reality, and Professor Bergson makes no attempt to adduce any.

In a sermon which appeared in the Christian World Pulpit for March 18, the Rev. R. J. Campbell confesses that no theory of the Atonement of Christ that he has ever heard of seems to him to be completely exhaustive of the subject, in fact, that of all the innumerable theories not one has quite got at the heart of it. They all fall short, are all more or less inadequate to the greatness of the fact they try to explain. "There is a spiritual depth they never touch," he says, "but of which the soul can have direct experience all the same." Then comes the following remarkable passage:—

> "I believe I am right in saying that we all feel a power, a richness, an all-satisfying completeness in the Gospel of the atoning work of Christ, which are not fully accounted for in terms of the reason. You read what all the master theologians of the past and present have to say about it, and you rise from the exercise with the feeling that there is still something left unsaid, and that that something is the most important thing of all; in fact, I am not sure that the essence of the atonement ever could be expressed in terms of the human understanding. It eludes exact statement; it sublimates the moment you try to seize it with the forceps of the intellect. You can get hold of something, it is true, but that which you cannot get hold of is—or so one is almost forced to believe—just that which has most of all given the Gospel power over the hearts and lives of men."

Now, if all theories of the atonement have failed to get quite at the heart of it, how does Mr. Campbell know that it has a heart to get at? We have read what all the master theologians have to say on the subject, and we have risen from the memorable exercise feeling, not that there was still something left unsaid, but that it would been infinitely better if all they do say had been left unsaid. If "that something" has never been expressed by a single divine, living or dead, how on earth can Mr. Campbell so confidently assure us that it is "the most important thing of all"? But, the reply comes, it is a thing "of which the soul can have direct experience all the same." Fancy a sane person coolly asserting that he has a direct experience of "the most important thing of all," but that for the life of him he cannot tell us what it is! That is precisely what Mr. Campbell claims to be true of every genuine Christian. "It is a great mystery," he adds; "and it remains a mystery when the utmost has been said that can be said in answer to the questions of the mind concerning it." What a contemptible city of refuge to fly into!

Let us look for a moment into this curious subject of Christian experience to which Mr. Campbell continually alludes. After treating of the atonement as the infallible means of reconciliation between God and man, and of saving people from the penal consequences of sin, the reverend gentleman proceeds to quote from a letter sent him by an old friend of the City Temple, in which the writer describes the terrible experiences of "a very poor woman of about forty-two, worn and prematurely aged, rather deformed, partially deaf, with that look in her eyes which a dog has in his when suffering," who yet "looks after and attends to a father, who is suffering from softening of the brain and insomnia, and who is in consequence very irritable, a crippled brother and his son." This very poor woman toils and slaves day after day, month after month, her one desire being to sacrifice herself in the service of those she has in charge, and she never murmurs or complains, often going without food herself so that father, brother, and his boy may not go without. The writer of the letter concludes thus: "For patient endurance, for loving unselfishness, for bravery and heroism, for unrequited devotion and self-sacrifice, this poor, deformed, deaf, toiling woman seems to me to be a burning and a shining example." One naturally infers that the unfortunate woman makes no religious profession whatever, for the writer's purpose seems to be to use her case to put to shame the religion of the Churches. There is a great number of such women in London alone, who wear themselves prematurely out in loving devotion to those dependent upon them, and some of them, to our personal knowledge, are moved to such conduct by no religious motives or sentiments of any kind, but alone by wifely and motherly affection. And yet, wonder of wonders, this is Mr. Campbell's amazing comment on that letter:—

> "We have not far to look for evidence of the saving power of Christ. There it is, and in all such lives as this. The redeeming love of Christ finds opportunity through the self-sacrificing spirit thus expressed, and will in the end prevail over everything opposed to it, and lift mankind back to the heart of God."

Is not the reverend gentleman aware that the existence of the conditions which make it possible for good and loving women so to toil and slave and endure unspeakable privations in a Christian country is a conclusive proof of the utter failure of the Christian religion? Does he not know that in Great Britain to-day several millions of God's children, for whose salvation Christ is said to have died, are living in the miserable state of semi-starvation, and that every year scores actually die of hunger? This is what the atonement of Christ has done for our country, and it has done no more for any other.

But we are urgently pointed to the blissful experience of real Christians. The curious thing is that this "simply cannot be stated in terms of the intellect at all," which means that the highest Christian experience is unintelligible to rational people. Listen to this:—

> "One will have to use hyperbole in order to do it, for plain, matter of fact statement is inadequate. It is that which from the point of view of common sense is an impossibility, namely, making the guilty innocent. It is something that goes beyond even forgiveness as we ordinarily understand that word. It is putting the penitent sinner in the position of never having sinned."

Do you now see what hyperbole means? It is nothing but rhetoric, deliberate overstatement, intentional exaggeration, an affirmation that cannot be literally true. Here is a man who for fifty or sixty years has wallowed in the filthiest moral gutters, bringing irreparable ruin upon innocent young girls, swindling in business, defrauding those who trusted in him, and perpetrating many other dark deeds; but at the last hour he repents, gives his heart to the Savior, and, in consequence, is assured that he has received "something that goes beyond even forgiveness as we ordinarily understand that word," with the result that he jumps to his feet and excitedly exclaims: "Hallelujah! The man I was five minutes ago is dead and buried for ever; I am no longer that man in the sight of God; in relation to the eternal holiness I am as though I had never fallen; that load of transgression has nothing to do with me; I am as those who have never known it."

Such is Christian experience; and without the use of hyperbole we can honestly say that it is rooted in a lie, and can lead to nothing but the worst form of hypocrisy. According to Mr. Campbell's teaching in this sermon, Christians pretend to be what they are not, and so must be written down as play-actors. They are encouraged from the pulpit both to believe and act a lie. They are taught to persuade themselves that what took place at their conversion was, not merely a severance between them and their guilty past, but "the utter destruction of that past, so to speak." Such teaching is fundamentally immoral, and is bound to exert an injurious effect upon the character of those who accept it. It is Irrationalism glorified with a vengeance. We prefer Rationalism, apart from the Gospel of something "that goes beyond even forgiveness," completely divorced from Christian experience, which can engender nothing but the most intolerable and intolerant form of self-righteousness; and we prefer Rationalism because its supreme emphasis is on the great law of Nature that "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

Science and the Soul.—IX.

(Concluded from p. 181.)

> "Since the awakening of the scientific spirit in Europe, it has been recognised that the promise of a future life has no basis of fact to support it. The modern study of the functions of the mind has shown beyond all question that these are dependent on the functions of the body, in particular of those of the central nervous system."—PROFESSOR ELIE METCHNIKOFF, The Nature of Man, p. 159.
> "Each man born is but a living wave of matter curving over the ocean of being, to sink again into the unseen trough of the next, while the calm of obscurity settles over all in this Universe of Oblivion."
> "The soul which he inherits from the elements, whatever it may be, he also returns to them: his personal immortality consisting solely in great thoughts, words, and deeds, and the depth of their impression on the shifting sands of men's memories."—A. R. DAWAN, From Matter to Man, pp. 284-286.
>
> "Notably too I observed among serious people there (at Havana) what I have observed in other places, the visible relief with which they begin to look forward to extinction after death."—J. A. FROUDE, The English in the West Indies, p. 323.
> "I find that when a Christian loses a friend the tears spring from his eyes as quickly as from the eyes of others. Their tears are as bitter as ours. Why? The echo of the promises spoken eighteen hundred years ago is so low, and the sound of the clods upon the coffin so loud, the promises are so far away, and the dead are so near. That is the reason."—COLONEL INGERSOLL, The Dying Creed, p. 31.

IT is said that Frederick the Great, upon seeing one of his regiments hesitate to charge, at a critical moment, shouted, "Rascals; do you want to live for ever?" It is certain, as Miss Edith Simcox has remarked, that "the lust for living for ever is one which will be found least deeply rooted among men." Moreover, as the same writer points out, "No mortal knows whether a resurrection to eternal life would answer his expectations or not."*

Every believer is quite certain that he, personally, whatever may be the fate of others, is going to have a good time in the life to come. Like the old French nobleman who declared that God would never damn a person of his quality. But, as Leslie Stephen observed, "The argument that because evil and good are mixed wherever we can observe, therefore there is elsewhere unmixed good, does not obey any recognised canons of inductions."† And John Stuart Mill has remarked that, in a "happier condition of life, not annihilation, but immortality, may be the burdensome idea," and that we should "find comfort, and not sadness, in the thought that it is not chained through eternity to a conscious existence which it cannot be assured it will always wish to preserve."‡

It is religion—with its ghastly pictures of endless tortures—which has made the thought of death so distressing to men. It is as natural to die as to be born. And as men lose the groundless fears of religion, so they will lose the fear of death.

As the historian Froude remarked:—

> "Men used to pretend that the idea of annihilation was horrible to them; now they regard the probability of it with calmness, if not with actual satisfaction. One very interesting Cuban gentleman said to me that life would be very tolerable if one was certain that death would be the end of it. The theological alternatives were equally unattractive; Tartarus was an eternity of misery, and the Elysian fields an eternity of ennui.' *

Some men have even looked forward to absolute annihilation with pleasure. Mainlaender did so. Metchnikoff says :—

"Mainlaender describes the state of mind of a man who develops the will to die, and commits suicide. 'At first he glances anxiously and from afar at death, and shrinks from it with horror. Later, he draws nearer and walks round it in wide circles. Day by day, however, these circles become smaller, until finally he embraces death with weary arms and looks it straight in the face. Then peace comes; gentle peace!'

"It is absurd to expect anything to follow death but absolute annihilation, and the ordinary man faces this prospect with terror. 'But it is essential,' says Mainlaender, 'that man should dominate the universe by knowledge, and wise men look forward to total annihilation with joy.' 'In relinquishing Schopenhauer's will to live,' concluded Mainlaender, 'I have finally arrived at the will to die. I have raised myself upon the shoulders of Schopenhauer, until I have attained a point of view such as others have never accomplished. At present I am alone, but behind me all humanity is pressing on to freedom; and before me is the clear translucent vista of the future."†

Mainlaender, true to his principles, committed suicide when barely thirty-five years of age. We do not advocate, or approve, of Mainlaender's principles. Man should not cower down with terror in the presence of death, neither should he rejoice at its approach; he should relinquish himself to the inevitable without fear, and without joy, after the manner of the Greeks and Romans before the advent of Christianity, with its debasing superstitions of heaven and hell.

Among the Churches to-day there is a tendency to believe that everything will be all right in the end. Even among the old believers, the doctrine of hell-fire is not held as it used to be. Instead of the old fierce joy aroused by the idea of seeing unbelievers suffering indescribable torments, there is a tendency to keep this side of the "glad tidings" out of sight, to be ashamed of it, to regard it as a regrettable necessity, but taught by the Bible.

The more advanced section of the Churches now tend to the belief that everyone will be saved. The text now is taken, not from the Bible, but from Tennyson :—

"Oh yet we trust that somehow good
Will be the final goal of ill."

In Miss Marie Corelli's Sorrows of Satan even the Devil sneaks into heaven at last. Poor Devil! what a fate!

This future existence is pictured, especially by those who have been beaten and broken in the battle of life, as a floating, dreamy existence, careless and painless, where, bursting all bonds of habit, we shall be at liberty :—

"There to wander far away,
On from island unto island at the gateways of the day.
Larger constellations burning, mellow moons and happy skies,
Breadths of tropics shade and palms in cluster, knots of Paradise.

. . . . . .

Droops the heavy-blossom'd bower, hangs the heavy-fruited tree—
Summer isles of Eden lying in dark-purple spheres of sea."‡

They take all the best of life, eliminate all its badness and sadness, and then imagine it continuing for ever. For instance, a worker in a smoky town goes to the country or the seaside for a summer holiday. For a few days he leads a happy, careless existence, all smiles and sunshine. He forgets that he would soon tire of such an existence; those who dwell by the sea do not spend all their time in gazing upon it, and the agriculturalist would be more likely to agree with James Thomson ("B. V.") in his pessimistic mood, disgusted with—

"The same old solid hills and leas;
The same old stupid patient trees;
The same old ocean, blue and green;
The same sky, cloudy and serene;
The old two dozen hours to run
Between the settings of the sun," than with the raptures of a dweller from a London tenement. Even the existence described by Tennyson would soon begin to pall, and in the prospect of an eternity of it, we should, like the Wandering Jew, cry for an end to such a life. The Atheist, like others, regrets that he cannot recall past joys, but recognises the futility of attempting it, and resigns himself to the inevitable. Lafcadio Hearn, who abandoned Western for Japanese civilisation, and married a Japanese wife, was an Atheist and an unbeliever in a future life, but in a few pathetic lines he put more feeling than in all the millions of sermons that have been preached.

They were found in his desk after his death, and are entitled "Illusion." It is reminiscent of a beautiful Japanese scene, and of a child who is no more :—

"An old, old sea-wall, stretching between two boundless levels, green and blue. On the right only rice-fields, reaching to the sky-line; on the left only summer-silent sea, where fishing craft of curious shapes are riding. Everything is steeped in white sun; and I am standing on the wall. Along its broad and grass-grown top a boy is running towards me—running in sandals of wood—the sea breeze blowing aside the long sleeves of his robe as he runs, and bareing his slender legs to the knee. Very fast he runs, springing upon his sandals; and he has in his hands something to show me: a black dragon-fly, which he is holding by the wings lest it should hurt itself struggling.

"With what sudden, incommunicable pang do I watch the gracious little figure leaping in the light—between those summer silences of field and sea! And how softly vivid all things under this milky radiance—the smiling child-face with lips apart; the twinkle of the light, quick feet; the shadows of grasses and of little stones!

"But quickly as he runs, the child will come no nearer to me; the slim, brown hand will never cling to mine. For this light is the light of a Japanese sun that set long years ago.

"Never, dearest!—never shall we meet—not even when the stars are dead!

"And yet—can it be possible that I shall not remember?—that I shall not still see, in other million summers, the same sea-wall under the same white noon; the same shadows of grasses and of little stones; the running of the same little sandalled feet that will never, never reach my side?"

This, of course, is not a longing for a future life, but a desire for a repetition of the past, like the idea of the "eternal recurrence" which filled Nietzsche with such despair; but none knew better than Hearn the futility of such crying for the moon. Hearn could never resist the idea to put all his emotions into words; emotions everyone feels, but only men of genius can transcribe.

Lastly, we have to deal with the moral argument. We are told that if we do away with the rewards and punishments of a future life, everyone will give vent to their evil passions, and no man's life and property would be safe.

Well, the Buddhists, who are more numerous than the Christians, have no such beliefs to restrain them, yet they do not require an army of police to keep them from robbery and murder as the Christians do.

Leslie Ward says :—

"This is a question upon which men are very prone to err. Just as they imagine they would commit crime but for certain governmental restraints, so they think they would do wrong but for religious restraints, when in fact they would do just the same as now if neither existed. The moral sanction is in reality first, both in time and in authority, and it has therefore been lashed to religion as a means of carrying the latter through, and not the reverse. It is moral sanction which gives authority to religious dogma, and not religious sanction which gives authority to moral principle. It is morality which has saved religion, and not religion which has saved morality. Here, as so often elsewhere pointed out, the apparent is the reverse of the real."*

Heine mocks the idea of virtue being rewarded after death, in his Confessions, where he says:—

"One beautiful starlight night, Hegel stood with me at an open window, I being a young man of twenty-two, and having just eaten well and drank coffee, naturally spoke with enthusiasm of the stars, and called them abodes of the blest. But the master muttered to himself, 'The stars! Hm! hm! the stars are only a brilliant eruption on the firmament.' 'What!' cried I; 'then there is no blissful spot above, where virtue is rewarded after death?' But he, glaring at me with his dim eyes, remarked, sneeringly, 'So you want a pourboire (a tip) because you have supported your sick mother and not poisoned your brother?' At these words he looked anxiously around, but was reassured when he saw it was only Henry Beer."†

The man who practices virtue, only in order to avoid punishment and gain a reward in some future life, is not a moral man at all; he is only a bad man in chains; and, at the best, is only acting from selfish motives.

We cannot better conclude than by giving a verse from Swinburne's magical Hymn to Proserpine:—

"From too much love of living,
From hope and fear set free,
We thank with brief thanksgiving
Whatever gods may be.
That no life lives for ever
That dead men rise up never;
That even the weariest river
Winds somewhere safe to sea."

Wordsworth's Poetry of Life.

Wordsworth, A Lecture by George Bedborough. Price 3d. (Letchworth, Garden City Press.)

MR GEORGE BEDBOROUGH, in choosing Wordsworth for the subject of his lecture, was wisely inspired. There is far too much neglect of that great poet, a master of verse, to whom discriminating judges grant a very high place among English classics, and to whom Matthew Arnold and other poets gave the sincere flattery of imitation. Moreover, Mr. Bedborough, a most democratic critic, turned to Wordsworth as to a poet "whose message is for our day and our people." And with justice he defends the poet from the charge of disloyalty to liberty and ingratitude to his friends, besides removing other popular misconceptions.

The booklet is the more agreeable to read because its slender length gives its author small chance of analysing in detail the various phases of Wordsworth's genius. Mr. Bedborough was perforce content with a brief summary of the poet's career, and with a more lengthy appreciation, which contains some of the soundest criticism on the subject that we have had the pleasure of reading.

At times Mr. Bedborough puts his thoughts on literature in a dramatic form, and fits them with a proper background. How excellent is his method of explaining who were Wordsworth's contemporaries. "About the time that Wordsworth was born, a dozen children prattled and played unconscious of their destiny, bearing the names of Charles Lamb, Walter Scott, Landor, Coleridge, Campbell, Hazlitt, Moore, Southey, Hallam, and Ebenezer Elliott." The last name indicates Mr. Bedborough's democratic sympathies, for no ordinary critic would have recollected this singer of the people, or mentioned that "about the time that Wordsworth died, Walt Whitman was editing the Daily Eagle."

Mr. Bedborough has some excellent remarks on the theological opinions of Wordsworth, whose religious and moral orthodoxy has generally been taken for granted. Says Mr. Bedborough:—

"He [Wordsworth] had many relations in the orthodox Church. He never troubled directly to defy orthodoxy, and he frequently used orthodox phraseology. If his whole work does not undermine orthodox morality it is only because we are incapable of understanding the implications of philosophy.....Wordsworth's Christianity was neither his chief nor his second concern. He loved Nature more than he loved anything, and Nature included humanity."

"Wordsworth's message," he adds in another place, "is essentially joy for the life that now is, or, in the poet's own beautiful words:—

'Not in Utopia, subterranean fields,
Or some secreted island, Heaven knows where,
But in the very world, which is the world
Of all of us—the place where in the end
We find our happiness or not at all.'"

We thank Mr. Bedborough for a fine tribute to the abiding power of one of the greatest English poets. Not to care for Wordsworth is not to care for poetry. Byron has been described as the favorite poet of the unpoetical; Keats is by common consent the poets' poet; Wordsworth, like Shelley, cannot cease to be the fashion, because he never was the fashion. Wordsworth was never, for instance, a general favorite, like Tennyson, whose popularity was equally great with the half-educated many and with the educated few. He delighted lovers of poetry with "The Lotos Eaters" and "Rizpah," and he charmed ordinary people with his sugary tributes to Queen Victoria and the Prince Consort, and with versified novelettes.

Matthew Arnold rightly insisted that Wordsworth is one of the very chief glories of English poetry. The admirers of Wordsworth are the most cultured students of literature. Wordsworth owed his proud position to his truthful interpretation of nature, and it is this quality in his writings which gives them their imperishable strength. Wordsworth belonged to the philosophic school. He was, if anything, a Pantheist. In his inspired moments, he absolutely forgot the Christian tenets and communed with Nature, which existed before all creeds, and will outlast them all. Hearing oftentimes the "still sad music of humanity," his poetry is charged with the profoundest meaning. That is why he abides, for his poetry has the quality of inevitableness. It could not have been otherwise, and no one else could have written it.

The difference between Wordsworth uninspired and Wordsworth inspired is the transition from a drone to that of a silver trumpet. When the dross has been removed from Wordsworth's work, there remains a greater mass of the finest gold than can be put to the credit of any English poet save Shakespeare, the master of them all. At his finest moments, Wordsworth was Shakespearean in splendid simplicity, as when he said of the sonnet that—

"The thing became a trumpet."

He was the equal of Milton in eloquence, as when he spoke of the ruined tower wearing its crown of weeds through the centuries:—

"And yet cannot sustain
Some casual shout that breaks the silent air,
Or the unimaginable touch of time."

On occasion he was the peer of Keats, as when he wished to—

"Hear old Triton blow his wreathed horn."

His finest lines are "jewels that sparkle for ever on the stretched forefinger of time." But, better than all these tributes, he was Wordsworth, who, with eyes fixed on Nature's loveliness, saw all in "the light that never was on sea or land." His splendid genius is like a pure, white flame, which, seen amid the blackness of contemporary literature, is a beacon to those whose lives are "consecrate to truth and liberty."

Acid Drops.

The Manchester Evening Chronicle recently published a laudatory notice of the work of Dr. Knox as Bishop of Manchester. The notice is primarily concerned with the building of new churches and mission halls during Dr. Knox's tenure of office. Thanks to a committee appointed by him, in nine years £65,000 had been raised directly, and another £185,000 indirectly. In nine years, therefore, says the Chronicle, "£185,000 has been expended in extending Church work in the bounds of the ancient parish of Manchester and adjoining parishes." Now this is a huge sum of money, and it must be observed it was merely to extend Church work. All the pre-existing agencies have to be added before we exhaust Church activities. But the figures do bring home to one the extent of Church work, and one ought to look for striking results. Given any organisation other than the Church with these huge sums of money at command over a given area, and one can safely say that area would be transformed —for either good or ill.

What, now, has been the consequence of the extension of Church work in Manchester? Curiously enough, the Chronicle supplies an answer in another part of the same issue. Preaching in the Cathedral, the Rev. W. E. Kemp drew up a sweeping indictment against the morals of Manchester. In the factories, he said, "there was no deep realisation of the dignity of manhood and womanhood." Certain districts "were given up to organised vice."

> "Our church workers can tell you of outrages on children of a shocking character. In the district where I work the more decent mothers dare not let their children out at night, and only within the last fortnight a girl of eight was taken from the steps of the church and violated disgracefully. There seems to be no moral sense in the community."

There was much more said to the same effect, but the above will do to go on with. Now if the Rev. Mr. Kemp is not telling the truth, it is plain that the Bishop would do well to spend some of the money raised in training clergymen of a more truthful character. If he is telling the truth, or anything near the truth, how much has Manchester benefited by this expenditure of an extra £185,000 in nine years on Church work? Give any other body of men seriously interested in making things better in Manchester £20,000 a year for nine years, and is it not highly probable that they would be able to show much more in the way of improvement than the Bishop is able to show? The Bishop can point to more churches and mission halls. But his own clergy confess that the moral rot continues.

The Scotsman, in a recent issue, had some comments on the position of the Churches that have a direct bearing on what has been said above. Dealing with the returns of the United Free Church Presbytery, it points out that "In the crowded and poverty-stricken areas of the city [Edinburgh] the Churches have but a slender proportion of the population with them.....In the last twenty years eleven churches of the United Free Church have been extinguished in populous districts. It gives figures in support of its statements, and these fully justify the scathing comment: "They say, 'Pay so much per sitting and we will declare the glad tidings.' And when the people cannot or will not pay, then Morningside is filled with churches and the Canongate is left with only one church for every 5,000 of the population." The Church of Scotland has, in fact, only a membership of 3·3 per cent. of the population. "In other days," says the Scotsman, "the Churches were after men, but now they are after money." It is only fair to point out that the Scotsman attributes the present condition of affairs to the "senseless rivalry" of the Churches. It would probably not do for a leading Scottish daily to go any deeper into the question. But as all the Churches, not only in Scotland but all over the civilised world, are losing their hold on the people, one wants a better explanation of the facts. Of course, a deal of energy is being wasted in competition; but the real significance is that the Churches are competing for customers in a market that is rapidly declining.

Christians are getting squeamish. In the view of the National Peace Council there are grave objections to the use of lead soldiers for children. Some day tender-hearted pietists will cease telling little children of the horrors of hell—a far more serious matter than that of boycotting toy soldiers.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton, who has republished his amusing volume, The Defendant, says that "the Christian martyrdoms were more than demonstrations: they were advertisements." It would be more correct to say that they have been used as advertisements. The martyrs died on the cross; the exploiters live on it.

When our missionaries go abroad they usually carry with them all the prestige of a conquering race. They have, moreover, the advantages that are derived from advanced scientific knowledge and a generally higher social development. They are not slow in placing all the advantages derived from these sources to the credit of the religion that they preach. Very often the plan works. All people are not like the Japanese, who said quite openly, "We are quite willing to take any scientific knowledge you may have, but your religion you may keep." In a great many cases it is concluded that the advantages paraded by the missionary, and particularly the knowledge and skill of the medical missionary, are first-class evidence of the value of Christianity. We at home, of course, know better. We know how little connection there is between our really helpful knowledge and current religious belief, with the result that—even though all the stories of missionary conquests were true—Christianity is a declining force. And when natives of India, China, or Japan visit this country they are not slow to note the fraudulent character of missionary claims, and report accordingly.

The truth of this was admitted in a speech before the Free Church Congress, by Mr. Malcolm Spencer, Social Service Secretary to the Christian Students' movement. He said:—

> "In British universities more than 2,000 Eastern students are being turned against Christianity by the shame of our slums, the cruelty and materialism of our commerce, our behavior to each other, and more especially our attitude to the foreigner. When an educated Hindoo arrives in this country, he is at once impressed by the poverty and wretchedness of multitudes in our cities, particularly since he notices also a display of wealth and luxury, making it quite evident that poverty is due not so much to any want of material resources as to sheer lack of desire to overcome the difficulties."

In other words, intelligent non-Christian observers find that at home Christians fail miserably in developing a better human life. In India, religion is at least a disciplinary force, whether it makes for good or evil. In this country they see that religion is mainly used for the purpose of keeping one class in a state of subjection, and giving greed, lust, and cruelty a veneer of morality.

Mr. Silvester Horne says the British Parliament is only realising now what Moses realised 4,000 years ago—that man needs one day's rest in seven. Rubbish! Moses—or whatever the name stands for—realised nothing of the kind. The Sabbath has no connection whatever with the principle of rest. It is not the principle of rest, but the principle of taboo that is involved here. People were forbidden to work on a certain day because all work on that day was unlucky and offensive to the gods. Students of comparative mythology know this well enough, although it has become entangled with the question of necessary rest and recreation. How little the Sabbath has ever had to do with the need for rest is seen by the way in which men, women, and children have been worked like galley-slaves six days in the week, even in very recent times.

The Hon. Henry Cope has written a little booklet on Our Schools and the Bible. He speaks in it of the "pernicious influence of the popular notion that God is a Person." The Christian World objects to this as showing prejudice. As the question is an open one perhaps it would be more correct to refer to God as a "suspected" person.

The Master of Manchester Grammar School, Mr. Lewis Paton, says that the decreasing number of children in Sunday-schools is due to our shrinking from imposing endurance upon them for the sake of endurance. Maybe; but this is certainly not the only reason. Children are not at Sunday-schools in such large numbers as they once were mainly because the parents do not believe as keenly as they once did. And the better type of parent in the semi-religious world naturally and properly shrinks from forcing upon children views concerning the veracity and utility of which he is himself doubtful. Mr. Paton adds, that in the old days children who were in church were not necessarily joining in the worship. We fancy this applies to a great many adults nowadays.

The Westminster Gazette recently portrayed Mr. Lloyd George as a porcupine, some of whose spines were sticking in the trousers of a boy, under the legend "Not St. Sebastian This Time." This reminds us of the American who saw a picture of the saint, covered with arrows, at the National Gallery. "See here," the visitor said, "I don't mind the Venuses, but I can't stand this infernal pincushion."

It is seldom that those "Fathers-in-God" the Bishops have been subjected to such a fusillade of criticism as has been levelled at their devoted heads by the Rev. S. Baring-Gould, the author of the well-known hymn, "Onward, Christian Soldiers," and a number of popular novels, who, in his new book, The Church Revival, applies the red-hot poker with all the zest of a pantomime harlequin. According to the writer, Bishop Sumner, of Winchester, was a "narrow-minded Evangelical"; Bishop Davys, of Peterboro, was "as out of place as a corporal elevated to be a general"; Gilbert, of Chichester, was "hard and unsympathetic"; Sumner, of Canterbury, he calls "a mere nose of wax"; and Thorold, of Winchester, was a man "of little mental capacity." The gem is the description of Archbishop Tate as "a schoolboy set to work on a problem beyond his capacity." We don't presume to improve on the last, for it seems true of the whole bunch.

"Vanoc," of the Referee, referring to Mr. Kipling's remarks on the smells of different countries, says that "Smell follows religion. Burning peat or charcoal suggests the ancient faith of Rome. The smell of roast mutton, beef, and apple tart hint at Protestant Sundays. The sickly-sweet, luscious perfume of the lotus—speak of the Buddhistic philosophy." He might have added that the smell of burning heretics characterised Christianity for centuries.

"The Poems of Job, Translated in the original metre." Dear, dear! We have been told so often that Jehovah wrote those verses.

There must be freedom of the will says Rev. R. F. Horton, and "the meaning of the will being free is simply this: that we are perpetually choosing, and the choice which is made has a determining influence." All we can say is, that if that is what the freedom of will means, there is nothing to quarrel about, and Dr. Horton is threshing the air. But that is not what is meant by freedom of the will. No one denies the fact of choice. It is as obvious as daylight, and has never been questioned by anyone. It is the question of the nature of choice that raises the issue. Not whether we choose, or are free to choose, but whether we have the power to determine what shall be the nature of our choice. Or to look at the matter from another angle, whether our choice is determined by a freely moving will or not. It is a pity that so many writers and speakers should so often fail to grasp the truth of this subject.

Words show the nature and current of a man's thinking, and when Dr. Horton asks whether it is possible to conceive a perfectly unthinking, unconscious, material universe, "setting about to produce the lower animals"? he shows us how hopeless his thinking is. "Setting about"! There is everything in that expression. It is a form of thought that belongs to Central Africa rather than to a scientific age. He can only think of things occurring because some person or persons decide that they shall occur. Educated people by this time ought to be aware that nature does not "set about" producing anything. Nature does not "set about" arranging things to produce a storm; the storm occurs because the conditions arise favorable to its being. Dr. Horton thinks it remotely possible that the world might have occurred without God up to the point of producing life; but after that, God was needed. God had to be called in, like a vaccination officer, to inoculate the earth in order that evolution might advance a stage.

"We are all of us," says the Guardian, "in a condition of antagonism to nature." Very largely this is true. We only need add that nature is as God intended it—if there is a God. The moral is not a difficult one to draw.

The Christian Evidence Society, through its organising secretary, has discovered a very deeply laid plot against Christianity. He writes to several religious papers asking people to let him have reports of any attacks on Christianity that appear in the "professedly neutral papers." These attacks, he says, "often emanate from the chief anti-theistic societies, which carefully organise the attack upon Christianity." So Christian readers are asked to co-operate in defeating these deadly designs. This gentleman has discovered a mare's nest. There is no organised attack upon Christianity by this means, and we fancy he knows it as well as we do. We suspect that the real thing animating this appeal is the hope that people will enclose subscriptions along with the press cuttings. Christians need not be alarmed. It is not the attack on, but the defence of, Christianity that is illustrated by the press of this country. Unless from a man whose communication editors dare not refuse, attacks on Christianity are rigorously boycotted by newspapers. A well-known Freethinker stands about as much chance of getting his communications in the press as he does of getting appointed to a bishopric.

Pity the poor clergy! Here is a list of recent wills of clerics that calls for much sympathy. Rev. O. E. Anwyl, Plymouth, £5,122. Rev. A. Barff, Prebendary of St. Paul's, £3,679. Rev. C. S. Bruce, Cork, £4,263. Rev. E. Hughes, Oakham, £2,237. Rev. H. Lewis, Bermondsey, £3,774. Rev. R. Mole, £8,849. Rev. L. H. O'Brien, Limerick, £6,804. Rev. J. Robertson, Ripon, £5,235. Rev. A. V. Thornton, Truro, £8,201. These are only some of the —from a monetary point of view—smaller fry. Here are a few others. Rev. F. E. Broome, Gloucester, £30,811. Rev. C. Aubrey, Darlington, £20,729. Rev. T. Carlyon, Falmouth, £18,945. Rev. A. T. Chapman, Cambridge, £12,195. Rev. C. Hipkins, Banford, Derbyshire, £10,598. Rev. A. Jessop, Scarning, Norfolk, £11 817. Rev. V. Le Bas, Preacher of the Charterhouse, £16,175. Rev. W. P. Nichols, Devizes, £20,128. Rev. J. Porter, Blackheath, £13,838. Rev. J. Richardson, Sandy, Bedfordshire, £13,237. Rev. St. Aubyn H. Molesworth, St. Aubyn, £35,351. Rev. W. C. Sayer-Milward, Wallingford, Bucks, £110,109. That's all—for the present.

Wallasey, in Cheshire, will witness the opening of a women's church, and, say the papers, "a special church may be built." To be an entirely feminine production this sacred building should be planned by a lady architect, built by lady bricklayers under the direction of a polite forelady. The east window should have the blazoned figure of St. Jael with the little hammer, the patron saint of very advanced ladies.

The Daily Mirror has published a futurist menu, which shows that the cookery of the future will include tomatoes with brandy, and herrings served with jam. If the Christian superstition be true, the menu for most of us in the next world will consist of "something with boiling oil in it."

The Christian ideal of a heavenly father does not often fit the facts of everyday occurrence. Over 1,000 persons have been drowned in South Russia by the high tides; at one town alone 200 workmen were washed away in their sleep.

Emotional preaching is good on occasion, but it has its pitfalls. Recently a preacher, gushing over the Garden of Eden, said that it was "the apple of Adam's eye"; and a brother in the Lord, ranting elsewhere, declared that a missionary "went out with nothing but a torch to shoot a lion." These things could not be said before less stupid audiences without provoking uproarious laughter.

The few missionaries at work in the McKenzie River district, North West Canada, would have delighted those two ardent medical students, Bob Sawyer and his friend. One of them performed an operation for the removal of a man's leg with a butcher's saw and knife, owing to the lack of proper instruments. Why did they not rely on prayer? These Christians are always Secularists in their actions.

Still another account of George Muller, of the Bristol Orphanages, has been published with the sub-title of "A Record of Faith Triumphant." Muller pretended that prayer and faith were sufficient to carry through all his projects, and the obsequious press made him the most paragraphed man in the world, and he held the world's record for free advertising. As a consequence, he received a vast amount of money, which, of course, he attributed to his "faith."

America, the land of tall buildings and tall statements, has produced a Woman's Bible. The notes begin by blaming Adam, and end by denouncing all who wear trousers. Paul, we presume, has some special paragraphs devoted to his remark that women should keep silence in the churches. But what have the dear ladies done with those naughty stories in the Old Testament?

The notorious Billy Sunday, the American evangelist, whose ruffianism on the platform delights some Yankee preachers and disgusts others, has been calculating the cost of his converts. Dividing the amount expended by the number saved, he calculates the cost per sinner is in Indianopolis £125, in New York £109, Boston £90, Chicago £79, New Orleans £18, and Atalanta £15. At this rate the conversion of America promises to be an expensive affair; and, after passing through this evangelist's hands, we should imagine that it would be just a matter of opinion whether the converts deserved a prison or an asylum.

"We've got to resort to tricks that the Devil would be ashamed of to get money to fight the Devil with." This piece of wisdom was uttered by the Rev. Billy Sunday. Was he thinking of "Sermons to Men only" or church bazaars, where inflated prices are charged for inferior goods?

A Welsh vicar, of Whitchurch, near Cardiff, died recently whilst preaching at a church. As the deceased minister was not a Freethinker, his death was not considered a judgment of the Almighty.

A movement is on foot to establish an American church in London at a cost of £250,000. If this materialises it will constitute a Yankee invasion, for two well-known Free Church pulpits are already occupied by parsons from "over the herring-pond."

There exists some religious trouble in connection with the lunatic asylums under the control of the West Riding County Council. The Lunacy Commissioners report that the "Arrangements for Divine Service are very inadequate," and "the attendance of the patients both of the Church of England and Roman Catholic services are much below the average in asylums generally." Presumably, the inmates who profess other religious opinions are well up to the average in point of attendance. This, however, is poor comfort to Churchmen and Roman Catholics, who are naturally indignant at the loss of so promising a congregation. The Church Times demands that a sum of £30,000 shall be spent. The Council replies that the spending of such a sum for such a purpose would be "absolute lunacy." But the Church party remains firm, and we cannot avoid sympathising just a little with their desire to make the most of their opportunity and with such promising material.

Nothing is more amusing than the curious manner in which the men of God treat what they call "modern thought." They always seem to take it for granted that Christianity and modern thought are two entirely different things, though there need be no conflict between them. That is to say, the divines will tolerate modern thinkers so long as the latter pay due respect to the former. Principal Garvie, in a paper read before the recent meeting of the Free Church Council, was kind enough to say that the Christian Church "must allow its view of the earthen vessel of the Holy Scriptures as human literature to be modified even as regards the literary character or historical value of many of the writings, if the evidence carefully tested demands such a change." Nothing could be more delightful than this attitude of compulsory toleration towards modern criticism. It is as though the men of God said to the critics: "We do not like you; we have no confidence in you; but so long as you behave yourselves with reverent modesty we reluctantly give you permission to carry on your work."

How condescendingly considerate! But Principal Garvie sounds a solemn note of warning by telling us that the Church, being tolerant towards reverent critics, like Canon Cheyne or the late Canon Driver, "can the more confidently challenge the competence of criticism" when it is the hands of those who deny or depreciate "the heavenly treasure of the Divine revelation" alleged to be contained in "the earthen vessel" called the Bible. Does the Principal imagine that intelligent "young persons, maidens as well as lads," will not perceive that such an argument is rooted in conscious or unconscious hypocrisy?

There is a sharp conflict among Birmingham Jews over the question of the separation of the sexes in the synagogue. This reminds us of Ingersoll's jest that it took the Christian Church many centuries to understand that a man might worship God standing by the side of his own wife rather than by being next to a gentleman he had never been introduced to.

"Adam" and "Eve" are to be seen upon the London stage in an adaptation of Milton's Paradise Lost. The censor insists "that the costume of Adam and Eve before the Fall will be of such a character that no possible objection will be taken by anyone." Maybe they will come on backwards.

Canon W. L. Grane has published a book on The Passing of War. It would be more to the purpose if he could persuade his ecclesiastical superiors to discontinue blessing battleships and the flags of regiments in the name of the "Prince of Peace."

A New York commission, proudly calling itself a World Conference on Faith and Order, has asked the various Christian Churches to join in "a truce of God." This is a practical admission that they have been at war for twenty centuries. Unfortunately, leopards do not readily change their spots.

At the recent meeting of the Free Church Council a paper was read on "The Church as a Redemptive Fellowship," the underlying idea of which was that the Church is a society composed of superior people whose mission it is "not merely to improve the world, but to save it." A more ridiculous or egotistical idea never entered the human brain. In point of fact, the Church stands quite as greatly in need of improvement or salvation as the world outside. Envy, malice, jealousy, strife, competition, self-interest, sweating, and impurity are fully as rife within the courts of Zion as in the camps of the Philistines; and surely people who live in glass houses should never indulge in stone-throwing. When the maladies of the world are so minutely diagnosed by the Church the world can reasonably retort, "Physician, heal thyself, and leave me alone."

That unscrupulous maligner of dead Freethinkers, and peripatetic revivalist, Dr. Torrey, distinguished himself lately by claiming the Patron Saint of Ireland as a Protestant. This silly claim is as groundless as were his bitter and brutal attacks upon Paine and Ingersoll. Indeed, very little is known of St. Patrick but the fact that he was a devout and zealous Catholic. When we bear in mind that he flourished in the fifth century we can realise what a blessing it is that Dr. Torrey has not added an Ecclesiastical History to his long list of foolish blunders.

The parents were discussing the production of Paradise Lost at tea-time, and mamma said, "Of course Adam and Eve are going to wear clothes." The little girl expressed her opinion, "Then it won't be Paradise really, will it?"

"Nonsense is faith," says Mr. G. K. Chesterton. Maybe he was thinking of that arithmetical puzzle, the Trinity-in-Unity, or of the feeding of the five thousand—where the fragments left over exceeded the original menu.

A writer in the Daily Mirror advocates the founding of a Moral Inquiry Bureau. It would have to be on a comprehensive scale, for the clergy's shortcomings would occupy a lot of time.

A book has been published, entitled Lectures on the Icosahedron, Solution of Equations of the Fifth Degree, by Dr. Klein, Professor of Mathematics at Gottingen. It should be useful to Christian ministers, who are unable to understand that three and one are not identical.

"The Call of the Lord" was the title of a placard placed outside a suburban tin-tabernacle. Judging by the handful of people who attended, the Lord was a little husky.

Tramps sometimes carry mascots, such as cats, and leisured society people have a weakness in the same direction. Superstition is a hardy plant, which takes very little cultivation.

Mr. A. C. Benson, son of a former Archbishop of Canterbury, has confessed that he has always been hampered by fear. A recollection of his excursions into theology supports this view.

The Bishop of Manchester says that when he was eighteen years of age he had difficulty with a class of girls. The clergy of all ages, from eighteen to eighty, seem to find flappers a stumbling-block.

There are men in Wales, says the Bishop of St. Asaph, capable of saying, "Your dead shall not rest under the shadow of the cross they have worshiped all their lives." Bishops appear to think as profoundly at sixty years of age as schoolboys of sixteen.

McCluskey, £2 2s.; Henry Tucker, £1 1s.; M. Corbin, 10s. 6d.; Mr. G. L. Alward (per Miss Vance), £1 1s.; Mrs. Alward (per Miss Vance), £1 1s.; M. Deas (South Africa), £1.

G. F. H. MCCLUSKEY.—Glad to hear that you and old friend Tucker are pleased to express once more your "unabated confidence in the President."

DR. AND MRS. LAING.—Your subscription and your good words are both very welcome.

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks again for cuttings.

E. RAGGETT.—We cannot say what is the present exact position of Rev. Frank Ballard in the Methodist body. We have no doubt that the Methodist Times would inform you whether he is now on regular circuit work or not.

H. PAIGE.—The opposition of Christians to works of art was shown by the "Iconoclasts" of the early Christian centuries, whose special aversion was to images, etc., in the churches. Hence their name—the Image Breakers. We do not think the paragraph in question makes this applicable to all bodies of Christians. At a later date the Church used art as it used other agencies on which to float its supernaturalism.

Mr. W. MANN writes, in reply to a request from Mr. L. S. Mann for the whereabouts of a sermon referred to him in a recent article, that the quotation was from a sermon which he heard the Rev. F. Ballard deliver. So far as Mr. Mann is aware, the sermon has not been published.

E. B.—We note your correction that The Professional Aunt, from which we gave quotations in our last issue, is by Mrs. George Wemyss. Our reference made it appear as though the work was by a man. We cannot say whether the error was due to carelessness in transcribing or to the compositor. Anyway, we thank you for the correction.

C. ATTWOOD.—We cannot say where you could now procure a copy of Facts Worth Knowing. A very large special edition was distributed gratis by the National Secular Society, but the supply is now exhausted.

F. J. RILEY.—Letter to hand, but no cuttings. They have been omitted. Your news, all the same, is interesting.

Special.

I HAVE handed this week's Freethinker over entirely to Mr. Cohen's control. He has done this work well (and cheerfully) before, and he is prepared to do it again.

I contracted a cold, and it turned out to be something more serious. Not quite so bad an illness, apparently, as I suffered from last March, but then, as Shaw says, "You never can tell." I hope to pull through fairly early, if the weather will only be a little kind. At present I am in a very weak condition.

G. W. FOOTE.

Sugar Plums.

South Lancashire friends had doubtless been looking forward to Mr. Foote's visit on Sunday last. His sudden illness made travelling—to say nothing of lecturing—an impossibility, and at short notice his place was taken by Mr. Lloyd. We have no doubt that everything at Manchester went off in a perfectly satisfactory manner, but up to the time of going to press no report has reached the office.

We print in another column a brief report of the Essex Hall meeting in favor of the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. The meeting was a good one in point of numbers, and the letters read showed a very widespread opinion, among people of differing religious views, that the time had arrived when these survivals of mediævalism should be abolished. The resolution was moved by Professor Gilbert Murray in a speech of marked distinction, although one felt that he was inclined to take the antics of the Christian Evidence Society too seriously. Some emissaries of this body had been distributing a leaflet against the object of the meeting, and Professor Murray seemed to take them as enemies to be fought. They are not. They are merely people to be ignored.

There was an attempt made by a member of the Christian Evidence Society to move an amendment to the resolution proposed by Professor Murray. The Chairman ruled that there was no time for this, which ruling we are rather inclined to regret. It might have been better to have allowed that gentleman to put the amendment, as he and two or three friends came for that special purpose, and so have demonstrated that these specially imported ones were the only persons who supported it.

Some little disturbance was created during the evening by two or three ladies bent on interrupting the Chairman, Mr. G. H. Radford, and Mr. Arthur Lynch, both members of Parliament, and the interrupters had to be ejected. The interruptions were quite unjustifiable, but a little tact, and above all, strength, on the part of Chairman and speaker, might have obviated the necessity for ejection. Unfortunately, ejection from public meetings is in the air, and for this the Suffragettes have only themselves to thank. We do not get anything in this world without paying a price, but it is possible to pay too highly for what we get; and it is time Suffragettes took into consideration the question of whether even "Votes for Women" might not be too dearly purchased if the cost involves the right and freedom of public discussion. This is the most fundamental of all social rights, and without which even "Votes for Women" would never have emerged.

By the time this paper is in the hands of its readers, Mr. Asquith will have received a deputation on the subject of the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. We are not very sanguine as to what will result from this, but it will at least serve the purpose of advertising the injustice of these Acts remaining on the Statute Book. In this matter publicity and the education of the public intelligence are our great, if not our only, aids. Mr. Burrows said in the course of his speech that he was getting tired of meetings for this purpose. Well, so should we be if we saw any other way of achieving the abolition of these laws. But we do not see any other way. Parliament, it is true, must finally rule these laws out; but Parliament will do here exactly what outside opinion forces it to do. Freedom and justice rest ultimately upon education and enlightenment.

We again remind London readers of the half-yearly meeting to be held on Tuesday next at Chandos Hall, Chandos-street, Charing Cross. The gathering is confined to members of the N. S. S., who will please bring their cards of membership with them. Those not so provided may obtain admission by sending in their names to Miss Vance. We hope there will be a good rally of London Freethinkers on this occasion. The object of the meeting is to consider ways and means by which the propaganda of Freethought in the metropolis may be furthered. Some important resolutions may be forthcoming, and the meeting therefore should be as representative as possible. The chair will be taken at 8 o'clock.

A correspondent, writing from Sydney, informs us that a very resolute attempt is being made by the authorities to prevent free speech on advanced subjects. There is a Theatre and Halls Act which prohibits all except religious bodies from holding meetings on Sundays. That shuts out all who do not run a hall of their own. In the streets and open spaces the same one-sided legislation operates. Socialists and Freethinkers are being imprisoned for speaking at street corners on Sundays, although this privilege is freely granted to religious preachers. Attempts are also being made in Melbourne in the same direction. Christians in Australia have the same conception of liberty as they have elsewhere.

Life and Love.

Helen, the doctor's daughter, was the spring of the romanticism of the village, but she was more; for she was the women's nurse. Around her personality had gathered two completely different circles of ideas in the minds of the villagers. The first was colored with the yellow lights of suspicion. One had to be careful what was said in her hearing, especially if it related in any way to religion and the Church. Helen had a sharp and witty tongue; and very often even Solemn John, the registrar, had to pull himself up quickly, when it struck him he was laughing at religion and the sacred things of life and death and the paradise to come. Not that Helen could be accused of irreligiousness, nor of base levity, nor even of sarcasm. One never felt very sure of her; that was all. And then, she was quite frequently at church, where she always appeared decorous and serious and attentive. Still, the villagers could not manage to forget the funny things Helen had said about the very subject upon which the minister preached; and the sight of her pretty face bent upon her prayer-book did give one occasion to wonder a bit what kind of a girl Helen was.

Then would crop up the old romance, the minister affair, about which everyone knew so much and so little. She was practically engaged to the young man who came from London at the time when Mr. Wise was very ill. He was a very clever young fellow. His sermons were invigorating and delightful. He filled the church, too, in the forenoons; for people came from far and near to hear him.

Yes; they would have made a fine match; but after a bit, near the end of his stay, there must have been a difference. It was noticed that he didn't go so often to the doctor's house. And then, there was the awful sermon, the last one, about some people being like serpents and cunningly poisoning the simple love of God and God's Book; how they would laugh and joke at the beliefs of others, and in so quiet and friendly a manner that they could crawl silently right into the holy of holies of God's love, and drop their poison there. And hadn't the young minister gazed at Helen all the time? And weren't her eyes always looking down into her lap, as if she knew he intended it all for her? but her face was so serene and bonnie that day that no one could rightly understand what the minister meant.

The villagers liked to recollect all the incidents of the romance as they called it. It was part of the Helen they knew, and as incomprehensible.

For all this suspicion, Helen was the trusty friend of the women in their times of need; and the first question of the sufferers was always, "Is Miss Helen coming?" although they knew she was sure to come. Many a man had Helen to thank for the existence of his wife; and many a woman had Helen to bless for the safety of her sons and daughters. At these periods the suspicion died, to be remembered immediately the danger was passed and Helen's tongue resumed its quiet, funny work of making the Scriptures ridiculous.

The minister affair had happened some time before I came to the village; but I had never discovered the real thread of the story.

One evening, while reading aloud to Helen likely paragraphs of interest from the newspaper, I chanced across one that contained the name of our village. It referred to the wedding of a clergyman who had, as the news item said, spent a very successful year of his ministry in this part of the country.

"Imphm; that's very interesting; but you didn't read that because you had a dim idea in your head that I was personally interested?" she said quietly, when I finished.

"Good Lord! No," I replied. My embarrassment must have been so obvious and painful that she laughed.

Well, I'll tell you the story, Bob, if you'll light your pipe, and don't interrupt. Besides, it's getting too dark for reading, and the gloaming is the time for reminiscences, isn't it? And the news of his marriage has set the old memories moving in my mind. You mustn't think I'm worried, or sad, or feel any of the heart-stirring emotions we read of in the ordinary novel, you know. In fact, I'm amused. I would like to laugh. I always feel like this when I compare our nice, very cultured habit of overlooking the real facts of our existence with people's ideas of things; and Mr. Pastor's future experiences appeal to me rather comically. You know what I mean, Bob, I've spoken about it before to you, when we've been criticising books.

The novelist imagines a man and a woman cast adrift in a small boat. He speaks of the hardships and all that; but he always forgets the man and the woman are human, and have bodies, and that the natural forces of these bodies must be obeyed regardless of environment. The mental delicacy of the novel-reading public is awful. Of course, that's an extreme case; but it shows what I mean. We have made too many things sacred. And a woman's body is so sacred that we are told a man must not look upon it lest it be defiled. Out of this has arisen all that despicable hypocrisy and cant and humbug about things that are as natural as sunshine. I hate it.

Amongst a certain class of people, the protectors of our morals—and all pastors are members thereof—this "gingerly" attitude towards the so-called crudities on the one hand and the so-called sacred things on the other, is most appalling. My poor pet pastor was a good example.

Do you know that he once cut up rough because he happened to see me dressed in a short underskirt and long stockings, and I hadn't very much covering for my neck and bosom? He was so exquisitely refined that my appearance shocked him. He thought it was indecent. You see, every woman was a potential mother, and maternity being, oh, very, very sacred, it followed, I suppose, that woman was sacred too. Consequently, she should be hidden like all other sacred things.

Funnily enough, he could read the most detestably obscene passages in the Bible without a blush or a stammer. That brought on the trouble, for I chaffed him unmercifully on the subject. In fact, what I said shocked him more than my unladylike appearance. And we moved slowly into the waters of intellectual discord.

Up to then I suppose I loved him; and if a dog-like attendance is any guarantee of a man's fondness, I guess he returned the compliment. But a battle between brains is a good love-test, whatever type of love it may be. Mental warfare tests the steel of affection better than anything else, I think. All the flaws become apparent; all the weaknesses are made evident; and instead of ideals you get facts. A man reveals himself more at these times than any other. He cannot hide his real character. That's why I love the men who have championed intellectual freedom. You get to know them so well that they become friends.

Well, I discovered that the man I had nearly idolised was rather mean-minded. He never ignored an opportunity for subterfuge. He even told downright lies, perhaps because he didn't like to be cornered by a weak woman.

Things went from bad to worse, till, one evening, they came to a boiling point. His sermon the preceding day had been all of God's wonderful handiwork. I was feeling bad, because father had told me that Mrs. Higgins would die, and that her baby would be a monstrosity, and very probably would live. The pastor was irritable that night, and I was simply spoiling for a tussle; and when we set to I made mincemeat of his wonderful-loving-kindness idea. He got personal a bit; but father came in just in the nick of time, and told me to get my coat on and come immediately.

I contrived that the pastor should accompany us, and father, who had a quiet way of being cynical with all ministers, saw I meant something. The upshot of the matter was that Mrs. Higgins died, and her baby lived, and I asked my friend if he would kindly come into the bedroom for a minute. I wanted him to see an example of God's loving-kindness.

Father held the baby boy up so that the minister could get a good look at him. He was a hunchback. His head and his sex organ were abnormally developed. His wee arms and legs were crooked. Across one eye was a browny mole. He whimpered and squirmed in father's hands like a little animal. He was the most repulsive, ape-like child I've ever seen.

"Mr. Fernside," said father, softly, in the tone he uses when he's angry, "this boy is full of vitality. He will grow to be a strong man. Society will probably call him a born criminal. He is an ataviet. As a minister you are privileged to be here at this moment; but you will, I hope, keep what you have seen and heard entirely to yourself."

Mr. Fernside bowed, and went into the kitchen, where we heard him praying for God's solace towards the father and the motherless children.

He never spoke to me again; and that, Bob, is the romance of the doctor's daughter. Here comes father, and we'll have supper.

Animal Enemies of Plants.—II.

(Concluded from p. 189.)

CULINARY plants are preyed upon by weevils, which place their eggs on or within the pods of the growing vegetable, and these germinate within the seed. The leading parasite of the pea is the pea-weevil, that of the bean the common bean-weevil; and both these pests are widely and abundantly distributed, and are therefore to be regarded as particularly noxious insects. Immense injury is caused by the mischievous doings of these parasitic organisms. Until quite recently it was commonly supposed that the well-being of the plants was in no way threatened by the presence of the larval beetle in the interior of the seed, but this belief has been proved erroneous by careful scientific inquiry. The growing pods are also injured by the bollworm and pea-moth, and the foliage is destroyed by blister-beetles, leaf-beetles, caterpillars, and cutworms, while plant-bugs, aphides, and other vermin weaken the plants by sucking their juices. The seed pea suffers seriously from the depredations of the pea-weevil. In the eighteenth century the injuries inflicted by this pest were so great that pea culture was for a time abandoned in several American States.

This particular parasite appears to have come originally from the Orient, but it now accompanies the pea plant wherever cultivated, and no known area of pea production is now immune to its ravages. A cold climate, however, seems to check its activities. In the more rigorous atmosphere of Canada it is comparatively harmless, and in consequence much of the seed sown in the United States is purchased from the Northern territory.

To the bean grower the common bean-weevil is a formidable foe. Its place of origin remains a matter of dispute, but it has spread in every direction, and, like the cowpea-weevil and four-spotted bean-weevil, it is feared and execrated by every cultivator of leguminous crops.

The seed-corn maggot is a further stumbling-block to the doctrine of Design. After the seeds of peas, beans, cereal and other plants have been sown in suitable soil they sometimes fail to develop, and this failure has been traced to the mischievous propensities of the seed-corn maggot, which damages the delicate sprouts and stems of the germinating seeds. What the wireworms, white grubs, and other insects fail to accomplish, this pest frequently succeeds in doing. Where the corn-maggot operates, the seed decays and the plants perish. Entire plantations are sometimes ruined; but, fortunately, the evil is usually restricted to a relatively small number of plants. The early growths are the chief sufferers, but if these can be carried through the first stages of development they become more hardy, and are then enabled to withstand considerable attack without serious injury.

The bean-ladybird is another pest, but luckily its food-plants are few in number and its distribution is limited in range. This insect is one of the three ladybirds that are detrimental to the American agriculturalist; the remaining species are his friends, as they actively devour soft-bodied insect larvæ and wage relentless war on the detested plant lice. But the bean-ladybird is a deadly enemy of the bean crop, and its powers of destructiveness have not inaptly been compared with that of the damnable Colorado potato-beetle. It ravages the leaves, green pods, and blossoms of the bean with insatiable relish.

In the pea-growing districts of Canada a seed-destroying parasite called the pea-moth is very abundant, whose larvæ develop in the maturing peas within the pods. "This is a comparatively new importation from the Old World, and it is as yet unknown in the United States, but it will probably in time invade the Northern States."

Until the year 1899 the American pea crop suffered little serious injury save that inflicted by the pea-weevil. At this time, however, the pea cultivator was driven to desperation by a visitation of the pea-aphis, which destroyed the crops in every direction. In 1899 and the following year the pea-aphis—despite the energetic attempts that were made to overcome the pest—swept down upon and ravaged some 50 per cent. of the crop from Nova Scotia to Virginia and Maryland. The estimated loss to the American farmer in the Coast States for one year only reached the high figure of three million dollars. In the succeeding year of 1900

> "the loss over the same area was placed as early as June 15th at 4,000,000 dollars. Several cases of severe damage were reported, in which 80 or more per cent. of the peas on farms of 500 or 600 acres were completely destroyed. In short, pea-growers as far westward as Wisconsin sustained such severe losses as to give rise to the expression that the country had been visited by a veritable scourge."

These abominable plant "lice" begin their attack on the young plants; they mass themselves about the terminals, and as soon as the leaves are smothered they proceed to swarm along the stems. Scarcely a plant escapes, and in a few weeks the once promising crop is destroyed. The vermin hibernate in clover and vetches, and they fly from their sleeping quarters in April or May to commence their pestiferous work among the pea fields. As might have been predicted, the reproductive powers of plant lice are prodigious. The female insect at certain seasons produces living young. These attain maturity in from ten to fifteen days, or even sooner in favorable weather. Several generations arise each season, and Professor W. G. Johnson has estimated that the female pea-aphis gives birth to 110 or 120 young. "Calculating from the average number of insects produced each day (six), one individual would in one year become the progenitor of 482,912 'lice.'"

Other insects inimical to peas and beans abound in rich variety, but we will glance at the parasites which infest spinach and beetroot. The former plant is sadly harassed by the all too close attentions of the spinach leaf-miner, spinach flea-beetle, and other pests; but as this excellent vegetable is less cultivated than the beet, fewer of its enemies are yet known to science. In the case of the beet, however, some 200 species of parasites are its ascertained enemies.

Beetles and caterpillars of several species damage this valuable vegetable to a very serious extent. Of flea-beetles that attack the sugar-beet there are twenty forms. Some of these are widely distributed; others are local. The larger beet-leaf beetle preys upon its host both as larva and adult; hundreds may be counted on a single plant, with the result that it is either utterly devoured or so seriously injured that it shrivels and dies. The Western beet-beetle is responsible for much monetary loss to the farmers of the Pacific Coast. This parasite pierces the plant's leaves so that only a network remains of the naturally rich leaf, and this checks growth to so great a degree that the young roots wither away. Another terror is the blister-beetle, and at least eleven species of this pest are known to inflict disastrous injury upon the sugar-beet alone. These creatures also attack potatoes, beans, tomatoes, and other important crops, as well as destroying several flowering plants. Very troublesome pests are the army and webworms; plant-bugs, leaf-hoppers, and aphides, if at all numerous, are all a source of loss to the beet-grower.

The sugar-beet leaf-hopper first attracted notice as a beet pest in Utah and other States in 1905, and was in that year responsible for damage to the extent of half a million dollars. Strangely enough, this species (Eutettix tenella) was quite unknown to entomologists until 1900. The beet-aphis is another scourge to the cultivator; in the State of Oregon it destroyed upwards of 1,000 tons of beet in one valley in a single season.

As anyone who has striven to cultivate cabbages and other cruciferous crops in urban or suburban gardens is only too well aware, the insect pests that prey upon these vegetable growths are innumerable. No single moment in the life of a cabbage-plant is immune to insect attack. The cabbage-maggot destroys the roots; it devours the tender rootlets, and frequently penetrates the lower sections of the stalk. The American grower regards this destructive parasite with well-merited aversion. It is an imported pest, and has already wrought sad havoc among cruciferous plants, all of which it impartially attacks. Its destructiveness assumed serious proportions in 1902, and for some years afterwards its depredations steadily increased, and large field crops have not infrequently been ruined.

But the "Imported Cabbage Worm" is the worst pest of all. As Dr. Chittenden puts it:—

> "It is altogether too well known throughout North America and Europe, and the white butterfly is quite generally recognised as its parent. The caterpillar is velvety green, and measures, when full grown, about an inch and a quarter.....This species was first observed in the United States in 1865, and in about a score of years it had invaded nearly every state and territory in our domains."

Prior to the appearance of the cabbage butterfly, the Southern cabbage butterfly inflicted considerable injury; but for some reason or other this particular pest is now less plentiful than in previous years. The potherb butterfly, the cross-striped worm, the common cabbage-looper—these last the larvæ of moths—all wage unpitying war on the unfortunate cabbage. But this by no means crowns the iniquity; the already much-exasperated cabbage-grower has now to encounter a new enemy to his crops. This pest made its appearance in the Southern States a few years since, and there is every prospect of its spreading in every direction.

The turnip is the unwilling entertainer of the destructive flea-beetle; watercress is preyed upon by leaf-beetles and sowbugs; while the leaves of the radish, cabbage, and other cruciferous plants usually have to endure the presence of foliage-miners and other malignant pests.

Next to the universally persecuted cabbage, the worst-suffering garden crops are the cucumbers, melons, and related plants. From the moment they are planted until the fruit is ripe, nearly a score of species of parasites infest these growths. "It is no uncommon sight to see four or five distinct species on the same plant, and several others in the same field." A maggot assails the newly sown seeds, and prevents their germination. Where the seeds do succeed in sprouting, the young plants are harassed by the striped cucumber-beetle. Those plants that manage to escape the presence of this and other pests are liable to the attacks of the squash-bug, to be succeeded by that of the squash-vine borer. This baleful parasite frequently kills the plant outright. When the vegetable has run the gauntlet of this formidable array of parasitic enemies, the pickle-worm and the melon-caterpillar commence their operations against the persecuted plants. The parasitic organisms which damage and destroy sweet corn, potatoes and other tubers, the lettuce, onions and other bulbs, the tomato, celery, carrots, parsnips, and kindred vegetables, are all too numerous to mention.

Sufficient has been said, however, to show that the struggle for existence is bitter in the extreme, even in circumstances most favorable to the healthy development of plant life. On evolutionary principles, the presence of countless parasites on highly developed plant forms is open to a rational interpretation; but in terms of the doctrine of Providential Design their destructive and almost morbid activities point rather to a diabolical than to a beneficent biological scheme of things.

"Twopenny Torquemadas."

NOTABLE PROTEST AGAINST THE BLASPHEMY LAWS.

MR. G. H. RADFORD, M.P., presided at a crowded meeting held at the Essex Hall, Strand, London, on Friday (March 20), in favor of the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. The platform, which was an influential one, included two members of Parliament, Mr. G. H. Radford, M.P. (who was in the chair) and Mr. Arthur Lynch, M.P.; Professor Gilbert Murray, the Rev. Walter Walsh, D.D., and Messrs. Herbert Burrows, Harry Snell, S. H. Swinny, Mrs. Bonner, and others.

Mr. G. W. Foote, President of the National Secular Society, who was unable to be present, sent the following letter to the Chairman, which was read to the meeting:—

> "DEAR SIR,—I am on the list of speakers at this meeting, but I am sorry to say that I shall not be able to attend. My doctor forbids me to leave the house at present, and travelling and addressing audiences are quite out of the question. Happily you have a good list of speakers without me, and it affords me the highest gratification to know that the meeting must, from that point of view, be a thorough success.
> "I and my friends have done all we could to make it a success from the point of view of numbers. If the press treats you with common justice—which, however, I hardly dare hope—I shall see a report in Saturday's newspapers of what I have no doubt will be a magnificent protest against the most bigoted, odious, and indefensible laws that disgrace this boasted land of liberty.—Yours sincerely, G. W. FOOTE."

Letters of apology were also read from Sir W. Byles, Sir A. Quiller Couch, Mr. F. W. Jowett, M.P., Mr. Chancellor, M.P., Canon Scott Holland, Dr. Clifford, Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, and Mr. Israel Zangwill.

Owing to the presence of the members of Parliament, Suffragettes attended the meeting and created considerable disorder during the earlier part of the proceedings, cries being continually raised on behalf of "Votes for Women."

The Chairman, in his opening remarks, characterised the Blasphemy Laws as "fossils," which belonged to past ages.

Professor Gilbert Murray, who had a fine reception, in proposing a strongly worded resolution calling upon the Government to introduce a Bill for the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws, said that there had been a great modification of the law of blasphemy, and Judge Coleridge's ruling that religion might be attacked if the decencies of controversy were observed had been maintained. Although this was a humane and sensible ruling, it was a compromise. The Blasphemy Laws would never have lasted if they had not been explained in this manner. But if one party was condemned for the use of offensive language, so should all others. He objected to these laws because they made good manners the test, and good manners were not the test of crime; they punish one side only; and they create prejudice. It was difficult to carry on religious controversy without ridicule. The present interpretation of the Blasphemy Laws heavily weighted the scales of justice against uneducated men. Who is to be the judge as to language being offensive? The jury usually consisted of persons of all kinds of views, and in the main orthodox, and with a dislike of audacity of mind. The law exposed Christianity to ridicule. The main fight of Freethinkers must be against social sanction, widespread sentiment, ingrained feelings. At present the law steps in against the cause of enlightenment.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Arthur Lynch, M.P., in a speech full of good phrases, and who reminded the audience that Torquemada had burnt 10,000 heretics, and inflicted less drastic punishment on 100,000 others. The indignant comment made by Shelley remained true after a hundred years of enlightenment. He (the speaker) had drawn from Mr. McKenna the admission that it was not blasphemy to speak in offensive terms of Judaism or Islamism. Christianity was the only religion in the British Empire needing protection. The Christian religion was like an invalid, and has to be spoon-fed and nursed. Christians ought to invite criticism. If their religion was true, the touch of Thor's hammer or Ithuriel's spear would only make it rise greater from the test. We have outlived the era of imbecile inquisitions and twopenny Torquemadas.

He was followed by the Rev. Dr. Walsh, who spoke forcefully and well. No one, he said, knew what was meant by religion as defined by the Blasphemy Laws. It would need another bench of bishops to settle what was religion. The Blasphemy Laws were irreligious, and an infringement against the Golden Rule, which was found in all systems of religion.

A practical and business-like note was introduced by the veteran Mr. Herbert Burrows, who pointed out that the one constitutional way of abolishing the Blasphemy Laws was through Parliament. Freethinkers should be out to get votes. Society had no right to suppress free speech. The common law was quite capable of dealing with cases of indecency. You cannot punish a man for hurting another man's feelings, or we should all be in prison. The Blasphemy Laws are simply a relic of persecuting days. We have got rid of physical cooking, but still have mental cooking in its place. The Blasphemy Laws are a cancer in the social state, and the case of the repealers was good for civic justice and freedom.

Mr. Harry Snell roused the meeting with a capital speech. What a man believes, he said, he has a right to express. If a man is guilty of obscenity, let him be prosecuted for obscenity. Christians should be with us on this question. Hideous Blasphemy Laws put a premium on liars. The State's duty towards religion should be to let it alone. Orthodox believers do not love heresy the less because it is in a clean cup. Once Christians fought far higher men than they fight now. Formerly they attacked such giants as Carlyle, Holyoake, and Foote, and now it attacks only the outposts and the stragglers. The Blasphemy Laws should be abolished in the cause of our common humanity.

At this point the veteran, Mr. A. B. Moss, rose and asked the Chairman if, in the regrettable absence of Mr. Foote, he would permit another representative of the N.S.S. to address the meeting. There were loud calls for Mr. Cohen, who was present, and, in response to the wishes of the audience, he mounted the platform amid loud and continuous applause. His was a fighting speech, and brought the meeting to a triumphant conclusion. Although called upon at a moment's notice, Mr. Cohen was admirable in every way, and he roused the audience to a white heat of enthusiasm. He said he stood there as a blasphemer of twenty-five years' standing, and his view was that the Blasphemy Laws merely represented the orthodox hatred of Freethought opinions. The plea of obscenity was a cowardly evasion of the truth. When Mr. McKenna—that apology for a man—said that a blasphemer was locked up for his obscenity, it was a lie. The man was imprisoned because he attacked religion. We have no objection to people being locked up for indecent speech, but it must be fair-play all round. We could only admit one test as to the decencies of controversy. Language that was permissible elsewhere must be permitted here. We could not tolerate one rule of speech for politics and another for religion. At present a policeman decides what is blasphemy. His modest ears decide what deserves a five-shilling fine for mere profanity, and what language constitutes blasphemy and deserves four months' imprisonment. Once Christians burnt their opponents; but now their conduct was only cowardly and contemptible. A judge may be a Jew, and Lord Chief Justice Isaacs might have to decide if the Christian religion had been attacked with becoming taste. The Blasphemy Laws manufactures hypocrites by the thousand. The repeal of these odious laws rests with the people and not with the Government. They should be swept away as a remnant of barbarism.

The resolution was put to the meeting and carried with only seven dissentients.

THE SOUL'S SPRING CLEANING.

Yes, clean yer house, an' clean yer shed,
An' clean yer barn in ev'ry part;
But brush the cobwebs from yer head,
An' sweep the snowbank from yer heart.
Yes, w'en spring cleanin' comes aroun',
Bring forth the duster an' the broom,
But rake yer foggy notions down,
An' sweep yer dusty soul of gloom.

Sweep ol' ideas out with the dust,
An' dress yer soul in newer style;
Scrape from yer min' its worn-out crust,
An' dump it in the rubbish pile.
Sweep out the hates that burn an' smart,
Bring in new loves serene and pure;
Aroun' the hearthstone of the heart
Place modern styles of furniture.

Clear out yer morril cubby-holes,
Sweep out the dirt, scrape off the scum;
'Tis cleanin' time for healthy souls—
Git up an' dust! The spring hez come!
Clean out the corners of the brain,
Bear down with scrubbin'-brush an' soap,
An' dump ol' Fear into the rain,
An' dust a cosy chair for Hope.

Clean out the brain's deep rubbish hole,
Soak ev'ry cranny, great and small,
An' in the front room of the soul
Hang pootier pictures on the wall;
Scrub up the winders of the mind,
Clean up, an' let the spring begin;
Swing open wide the dusty blind,
An' let the April sunshine in.

Plant flowers in the soul's front yard,
Set out new shade an' blossom trees,
An' let the soul, once froze an' hard,
Sprout crocusses of new ideas.
Yes, clean yer house, an' clean yer shed,
An' clean yer barn in ev'ry part;
But brush the cobwebs from yer head,
An' sweep the snowbanks from yer heart.

CHILDREN OF FAITH.

One memorable Sunday, Betty did go to church as a great treat, and when the hymn, "Peace, Perfect Peace," was given out, a beatific smile illumined her face, and with her hymn-book upside down she was prepared to sing when Diana said, whispered rather, "You don't know this, darling." "Yes, I do, mummy, peace in the valley of Bong."……

Betty walked to church with me. "Aunt Woggles," she said, "you know the gentleman in the Bible who lived inside the whale?"

"Yes, darling," I said, "I do remember." My heart sank at the difficulties presented by Jonah as a gentleman.

"Well," she said, "what d'you suppose he did without candles in the dark passages of the whale?"……

At luncheon Diana cautioned Betty against swallowing a fish bone. "You might die, darling, if you did."

"Then I shall swallow every single bone I can," announced Betty.

"But, darling," said Diana, "why do you say that; you don't want to die? You are quite happy, aren't you?"

"Yes, I'm very happy, but I want to die all the same."

"Oh, darling, don't say that," said Diana; "there is a great deal for you to do in this world before you die."

"Yes; but you see, darling," said Betty, "if I don't die soon, I shall be too old to sit on Jesus's knee."—Mrs. G. Wemyss, "The Professional Aunt."

A CHILD'S LAUGH.

Strike with hand of fire, O weird musician, thy harp strung with Apollo's golden hair; fill the vast cathedral aisles with symphonies sweet and dim, deft touches of the organ-keys; blow, bugler, blow, until thy silver notes do touch and kiss the moonlit waves, and charm the lovers wandering amid the vineclad hills. But know, your sweetest strains are discords all, compared with childhood's happy laugh—the laugh that fills the eyes with light, and every heart with joy. O rippling river of laughter, thou art the blessed boundary-line between the beasts and men; and every wayward wave of thine doth drown some fretful fiend of care. O Laughter! rose-lipped daughter of joy, there are dimples enough in thy cheeks to catch and hold and glorify all the tears of grief.—Ingersoll.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

The Virgin Birth.

BISHOP GORE has just published a Tract in which the Virgin Birth is depicted at once as a veritable fact of history and an essential dogma of the Christian Church. Without such a stupendous miracle the Divine Incarnation could never have taken place, and without the Incarnation there would have been no Christianity and no Church. It is true that many present-day divines either openly reject or ignore the supernatural birth of Jesus; but we are of opinion that Dr. Gore is fully justified in maintaining that no Christian teacher has a right to do either. Like the Resurrection, the Virgin Birth is a fundamental doctrine and cannot be laid aside without undermining the whole creed. "Conceived of the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary," this is the phrase used by the Church in all ages as a fit expression of its belief. The now-famous Bishop of Zanzibar, Dr. Weston, preached an able and earnest sermon on the subject in Westminster Abbey, which appeared in the Church Times for March 20. To the Church, Dr. Weston observes, "the Lord Jesus Christ is God-in-manhood." The following is the gist of this remarkable discourse:—

> "From the first moment of his Incarnation until his ascension to his Father's throne, and from the day of his ascension down the ages, and through the ages to all eternity, he is God-in-manhood; God true and perfect, yet living under conditions truly and perfectly human, with all the human instruments of self-expression that we call soul and body; and Man, true and perfect, yet in no sense at all a man. In order to become a God-in-manhood the Eternal Word took flesh and received his soul in Mary's womb; and from her he came forth to be the new Head of the human race. Virgin he found her; he left her virgin; and she, the Virgin-mother, is henceforth Mother of our Lord and God."

Such is the doctrine of the Virgin Birth as taught by the Orthodox Church. Dr. Weston frankly admits that it would be "folly to pretend that the modern Christian easily accepts" it. Failing to see the spiritual meaning and value of the alleged fact, the modern Christian cannot give due weight to the evidence for it. "The Church suggests that we accept her creed on her authority"; and, unfortunately for her, the modern Christian is strongly tempted to rely on the authority of his own judgment. What we suffer from to-day is "private judgment run wild." The Church is wonderfully patient, long-suffering, and sympathetic, "but not for one moment will she approve of any the least claim to be to ourselves the ultimate measure of truth." We are not at all surprised at this statement when we compare it with another more extravagant still; namely, that the discernment of spiritual values is the work of faith, not of reason." And what, pray, is faith? Nothing in the world but the power to accept as final the judgments of the Church, "the primary power of self-suppression, of humblemindedness, without which no heavenly society can embrace sinful men of disordered minds." The duty of the individual, therefore, is "to cast himself upon the society, upon the family of the Lord God, who cannot deceive or be deceived."

According to Dr. Weston, Christianity is a religion founded upon facts, not upon ideas. The Virgin Birth is a fact, "the only mode of entrance into the world that is fit for, and proper to, him who is Eternal God." Of course, the conception was miraculous, but the Bishop assures us that the miracle was exceedingly simple:—

> "We are asked to believe that Almighty God, through the Holy Spirit, dispensed with human co-operation in setting in motion natural forces; that once set in motion by immediate Divine intervention, those forces moved according to their own original, God-given laws, and the Christ was conceived by Mary his mother. In this miracle there is nothing contrary to Nature, no hindrance of natural results due to certain causes, no element of destruction and negation. All bears witness to a mighty act of the Divine Life-giver, in the supreme movement of the Divine Love."

The curious thing is that Dr. Weston completely ignores the question of evidence. Not a single shred of proof does he adduce. He tells us that natural forces were set in motion within Mary "by immediate Divine intervention"; but how does he know that? The nativity narratives are peculiar to the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, and New Testament scholars are convinced that they were inserted in these at a later date, say, at the close of the first century, or early in the second. That the birth-stories did not originally belong to these two Gospels is clear from the fact that the rest of the New Testament does not contain the slightest hint that the birth of Jesus was in any respect different from that of anybody else. Yet the Bishop of Zanzibar exclaims: "What I know is this, that Christ came down from heaven to a sinless mother, because before he came down he gave her the grace to be sinless." We challenge him to inform us when, whence, and how he acquired this amazing knowledge. If he tells us that he obtained it by faith, we beg to remind him that faith and knowledge are two totally different things. Of course, a man who believes that when a duly ordained priest sprinkles a baby's face with water, an act of supernatural regeneration is accomplished, can believe anything. A baptised child shows no signs whatever of having been twice born, being, on that account, neither better nor worse than other children. Even in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, Jesus never shows the least consciousness of having been supernaturally born. In all his intercourse with his disciples and others he did not once convey the impression that he even suspected that there was anything extraordinary about his advent into the world.

Dr. Weston's facts are all fables. He believes in the sinlessness of Jesus, and accounts for it in the following strange fashion:—

> "The body and soul of Christ never had a moment's existence except in the person of the eternal God, the eternal Word of God. Therefore we claim perfection. And the Virgin Birth is necessary to this argument just for this reason, that had the body, had the soul of Jesus for a single moment existed in a human person, the whole process of the Incarnation would have failed, and our redemption would never have taken place. It is on this kind of lines that we defend the doctrine of the Virgin Birth."

The so-called fact of the absolute perfection of Jesus is an unverified and unverifiable assumption. His character even as portrayed in the Gospels is not without fault; but even if it were, the Gospels tell us so little about him that we cannot legitimately come to the conclusion that he never did any wrong. But Dr. Weston assumes his sinlessness, and then assumes the Virgin Birth to account for it. Here is another fact which, on being examined, turns out to be a fable:—

> "The Incarnation reveals the supernatural order in which we have become new creatures; in its power we find our foothold upon the supernatural plane along which we are to move upward and Godward throughout all ages; and in the Incarnate Person we find our own personal union with the Divine Being."

The supernatural order is a pure fiction. It exists only in the imagination of fanatics. We know only of one order, the order of Nature; and no one has ever shown us any other. Christians call themselves new creatures, but nobody else does; nor do they ever say or do anything to justify their so calling themselves. The supernatural plane is a sheer illusion, and we judge of it by those who claim to find their foothold upon it, for, surely, they are not superior people. Have they not their little quarrels, bickerings, and wranglings just like others? Is not Bishop Weston in this country now because of a bitter controversy which has agitated the Episcopal Church for months and threatened to disrupt her? Is such a state of things worthy of people who proudly aver that they have a foothold upon a supernatural plane? Dr. Weston says that Christians "date everything from the great miracle of the Virgin Birth"; but to what end and with what results? Read history, consult the conditions that prevail in society at this moment, and you have the answer. Like all his brethren, the Bishop indulges in Christian boasting, and hears not the mocking laughter of the facts.

The Virgin Birth is a decaying superstition. Even to the modern Christian it is scarcely believable. When he finds any record of it outside the Bible he does not hesitate to say openly that he rejects it. The time is coming when the Biblical record will be treated in precisely the same way.

J. T. Lloyd.

The Cant of Brotherhood.

If we attend to theory only, there is nothing with which the Christian is so much concerned as universal love and brotherhood. If we check theory by practice, there are no other qualities that he so completely ignores. Theoretically every Christian is ready to spend himself in the service of at least every other Christian, if not of every human being. In practice they show themselves certainly not better than non-Christians, and do not betray an overwhelming confidence in even their fellow-believers. They watch each other most carefully in all business transactions; they "wink the other eye" if they are asked to trust another merely on the ground of a community of religious belief. Clergymen of all denominations accuse each other of being animated by petty jealousies, greed, hatred, and of stooping to slander and misrepresentation to further their ends. In a corporate capacity Christian nations act towards each other in exactly the same way. Each one laughs at the notion of trusting to the other's sense of honesty, justice, or generosity. They say frankly that self-interest is the only motive by which they will be ruled, a display of brute force the only argument to which they may be expected to yield. And still the cant of love and brotherhood goes on.

Now I am not arguing that the conception of human love and brotherhood are bad things. No one does so argue. Quite the contrary; they are fundamental to human welfare, and their practical realisation is the true measure of social development. I am merely taking these qualities in connection with religious beliefs—particularly Christian beliefs—and trying to estimate their value. For Christians write and talk of human love and human brotherhood as though these were in some peculiar sense Christian products, and formed the very essence of the Christian faith. They have done this until the very words themselves have acquired a cant significance. They have gained the aroma of the pulpit, and evil associations have not yet lost their time-honored power to corrupt things otherwise good. Of course, they have no real connection with religion, although the forces of modern life have forced genuine religious beliefs into the background, and brought a number of accidental and extraneous qualities to the fore. And the fact remains that of all the failures that may justly be placed to the credit of religion, none is more marked than the utter inability of religion to induce a feeling of genuine brotherhood and good-fellowship. There is no question of opinion here; it is simply a statement of demonstrable fact.

Look at the case of Ireland. Whatever other factors may be at work here, this much is certain. The rallying cries of the two great parties in Ireland centre round a difference of religious belief. Remove that difference, and so far as one can see there would be no insuperable obstacle to the speedy solution of the Irish difficulty. Protestants declare that they can never trust to the sense of justice or brotherhood of Roman Catholics in a position of authority. Catholics declare that they have suffered, and suffer still, from the religious bigotry of Protestantism in power. Whichever one is right, or if both are right, the same fact emerges—the distortion of a sense of justice and fairplay by religious belief. Catholics cannot trust Protestants; Protestants cannot trust Catholics. They do not mean that they cannot trust each other in business—they do, as a matter of fact. They do not mean that, religion apart, the Roman Catholic Irishman and the Protestant Irishman are not as good as each other. What they each point out is that the religious convictions of the other narrows his outlook, stunts his sympathies, blinds him to a sense of national duty, and makes him a worse citizen than he would be otherwise. A Freethinker need not argue which one is correct; it is enough to point to the facts, and the facts are a decisive disproof of Christian claims.

Look at home, amongst ourselves. What is the most divisive, the greatest separative force that one can introduce into association of human beings? Clearly religion. Up and down the country are thousands of associations of various kinds. The almost universal rule among them is that discussion of religious opinions must be tabooed. It is not that the individual members do not believe in religion; quite the contrary. The more firmly they believe, the more they perceive the necessity of the rule. They believe in religion individually; individually they would assert that it was of all beliefs the most important; but they dare not discuss their differences of opinion on religion as they discuss differences in literature, or art, or science, or sociology. Do that, they say—permit the introduction of religion—and our association will break into fragments. They also will repeat the cant phrases about brotherhood as an essential part of religion, and the value of their assertions are shown by the fact that one thing they dare not introduce if they wish to continue in friendly and brotherly intercourse is religion. Still they believe that Christianity promotes brotherhood. Nothing seems able to shake that superstition.

It is useless arguing that men take their religious beliefs as the most serious they possess. That may be admitted without weakening the force of the indictment. The charge is not that religious beliefs are not taken seriously, but that they serve as a cause of division rather than as a bond of union. And side by side with this you have the complementary facts that there are other aspects of life that really do unite people, and other beliefs about which people differ and yet dwell harmoniously together. You can see members of various religious sects uniting for various social and ethical ends; they will be friendly together on points of difference about things that are unconnected with religion. It is only when religion is on the carpet that union becomes impossible. Why, it is even paraded as a great triumph of the spirit of religious brotherhood that representatives of various Christian sects can stand upon the same platform in amicable mood. But, even then, it must be observed that what brings them together is not their religious opinion. When Anglican, Catholic, Protestant, and Jew stand upon the same platform the appeal is to a common sense of justice, a common humanity, a common appeal to moral feelings. Never is the appeal to religion.

There is, indeed, one case in which the religious appeal becomes a bond of union—of a sort. This is in connection with Sabbatarianism. Here it has been found possible to bring the Christian sects together on the basis of an appeal to their religious feelings. And the reason for this is as plain as it is discreditable. They are all faced by a common danger, and there is a chance of exercising the old spirit of religious tyranny. The "desecration of the Sabbath" affects them all alike. It means a direct loss to the Churches. It means the encouragement of the spirit of Rationalism and Secularism. It involves the secularisation of life, and in sheer self-defence religion forgets for a time its divisions, and closes its ranks to the attack of an enemy that threatens all alike. Then they all believe that they are their brother's keeper. And they interpret "keeper" to mean gaoler.

This, indeed, is the only way in which religion, and particularly Christianity, ever develops a sense of solidarity. Faced by an enemy that threatens all alike, the natural tendency is for the threatened individuals to draw together for mutual protection. In the earliest centuries Christians only held together in the face of persecution. So soon as the persecution was relaxed, the divisive consequences of religious belief began to show themselves. And for centuries nothing but the most intolerable tyranny of one of the most powerful and one of the most brutal Churches that the world has ever known was able to preserve unity amongst Christians. When social progress broke the power of the Church, the evil power of religious belief began to show itself. Existing causes of hatred were intensified. New sectarian reasons for ill-will developed. Men hated each other for political reasons, class reasons, or national reasons. But these were comparatively mild expressions of malevolence. On account of religion their malevolence knew no bounds, and the limit to their antagonisms was marked only by death—and not always then. One might almost lay it down as a law of social progress that the stronger religious beliefs are the greater the divisions that arise. An attempted union of religious believers only becomes possible when social culture has relegated fundamental religious beliefs to a position of subordinate importance.

In strict truth, the brotherhood of man has never been a part of the Christian religions, any more than it has been a part of other religions. What has been aimed at has been a brotherhood of believers. A human being became a brother when he believed, he remained an enemy as long as he disbelieved. Even the propaganda of Christianity was not due to any feeling of brotherhood. It sprang rather from the lust of conquest, and from the intolerance of the fanatic who felt that the existence of a new religion antagonistic to his own amounted to a slight upon the majesty of his own Deity. The long-continued denial by Christians of justice and consideration to those outside their creed proves the truth of this. During more recent times, the operation of a number of causes, chief amongst which was the growth of communication between classes and peoples, have weakened the petty divisions of sect and nation, and so have given emphasis to the more permanent qualities of human association. Powerful as it has been, and still is, Christianity could not withstand the influence of these developments, with the result that Christian teachers have been driven to a presentation of the doctrine of brotherhood less in accord with Christian practice, and more in harmony with the sense of the modern civilised State.

Religion can form no basis for genuine brotherhood, for the reason that there is nothing in it fundamental and inescapable. All men have not religious beliefs, and among those that have them there is endless diversity and contradiction. Let the religious appeal be as wide as possible, it still remains, and must remain, a sectarian one. And sectarian union depends as much for its strength upon hatred of outsiders as upon love between its members. On the other hand, the non-religious appeal to brotherhood does touch on elements or qualities that are common to all men, and which are, indeed, fundamental to the associated State. There is no man without some sense of justice, however rudimentary. There is no man without feeling for his fellows, however imperfect may be its expression. Beneath all differences of sect, class, nation, or color, there are qualities—mental and moral—that all men have in common. A rational, a far-seeing doctrine of brotherhood seizes upon these as the elements upon which it is to be based if it is to be at all successful. And, as a mere matter of fact, it is in proportion as these non-religious qualities have been developed that the doctrine of brotherhood has become realisable in practice. It may be true that these qualities are not irreconcilable with religion; but it is certain that they are independent of it. And it is also certain that their association with religion has served only to hinder their fruition.

C. COHEN.

The "Shadow Show."

THE Shadow Show, by J. H. Curle, is one of the most remarkable books of travel it has been my good fortune to come across for some time. It differs from most books of the kind, however, in that the author seems to have been everywhere and seen everything, except perhaps the hidden bowels of the earth and the North Pole. During his professional career he inspected no less than five hundred mines, in every part of the globe. "To-day, at forty," he says, "I have seen the world from end to end. A favored one, I have stood in the wings all my life, and have seen the mounting of a thousand tableaux." And as the reader travels with him, viewing the varied and picturesque scenery of every land—a dawn on the Karroo, the higher Alps outlined by moonlight, a spring morning in Kashmir—he feels indeed that that "the stage setting of the Shadow Show is extraordinarily beautiful." "To some of us who have failed to find God among the theologians, Nature alone is left," says Mr. Curle; and surely no goddess ever found a more fervent adorer.

The curious reader may ask, Why the Shadow Show as the title of such a book? It represents the author's philosophic view of world phenomena. He looks back on all the wonderful sights he has seen as a great and splendid phantasmagoria:—

> "This world of ours is the Shadow Show. We men and women are the silhouettes on the curtain.....The stage is fantastic, and the players; the only real thing is that mechanism of wires which science calls the 'reign of law.'.....We are puppets. We are the sum of all dead men, the sport of all past happenings. We are present links in the endless chain of cause and effect, and as our structure is, so does our life inexorably unfold.
> "'For man is man, and master of his fate,' sings the the poet, and Smiles, Lubbock, and other genial and wealthy persons chortle in the same strain. But Old Omar knew better, and men of the calibre of Æschylus and Shakespeare and Ibsen have always known; free-will is very nearly an illusion."

If our author's philosophy, as stated in the Preface, should disturb the ideas of some of his general readers, it is likely that the first incident he relates will alienate the puritanical sympathies of many others. As he begins to write, it is the little incidents, he says, that crowd upon him. And he takes them as they come:—

> "On a Christmas afternoon, in the country behind Manilla, I watched cock-fighting. In a great bamboo structure some two thousand Filipinos and myself sat, lost to the world. There were a hundred cocks, the din was hideous, and the betting high. I have spent many a worse Christmas."

One of the charms of Shadow Show is the author's comprehensive grasp of the problems that confront present-day civilisation. He sees the minor races of the earth as the ordinary traveller sees them in their geographical setting and native environment. But he brings to the consideration of their well-being and future position a sympathetic knowledge of their racial characteristics and relation to the progressive forces among the stronger races. He appreciates, too, at their full value, the virtues and qualities of the so-called inferior nations, without a single trace of that insular prejudice which characterises the writings of so many of our travellers:—

> "As I sought out the world's beauties, so I have searched for the best peoples. The nations, first and last, have passed before me—good, bad, indifferent—to be judged, too, like men, with tolerance, for environment is the controlling factor."

Among the world's "best peoples," those to whom he finds himself closest—his "affinities"—he places the Chinese and the Zulus. This should give the supporters of missionary enterprise some food for reflection. For the writer is not only a broad-minded and cultured traveller, but he speaks from an intimate knowledge of both peoples. His memories of South Africa, he tells us, are full of the natives. "All the races interest me, but the Zulus I love. They are a race of gentlemen; they are, physically, the aristocrats of humanity." He speaks of them as a race who are as cheerful, kindly, and right-living a people as one may hope to see. "For many of the Zulus—laborers on farms, wagon-drivers, house servants, or quiet dwellers in their own kraals—I have the sincerest liking and respect. To the memory of N'Konjane ('the Swallow') and to Shingaan a 'kehele'—or head of a family—who came every year from the thorn country to the farm, and who, after many years of faithful work, at last came not, I raise my hat." Would that every traveller were as sympathetically appreciative of the virtues of these colored races.

Of the Chinese, he writes:—

> "The Chinaman was civilised while we dwelt in forests. He had evolved religion, philosophy, and the highest conceptions of art and beauty while we yet stained ourselves with woad and pursued our quarry with a meat axe. To-day, with all our blissful ignorance of China, we call the people heathen, and send a swarm of missionaries to preach doctrines that our ablest men have already discarded. These men preach twenty different creeds, they advocate love, peace, long-suffering; but let so much as one missionary be killed or injured, and the clamor for compensation and revenge, backed always by threats of armed retaliation, resounds through the land. The Chinaman, highly intelligent, sees the irony of it all. Our various creeds, jealous, narrow, preaching salvation through twenty channels, bewilder him. He wants none of our religion; he has told us so a hundred times."

Our author has an eye for the beautiful everywhere; and his comparative faculty, which often displays a touch of humor, sees the utility of many foreign customs and practices, as compared to the conventional methods of Europe. Speaking of the Hindu custom of burning dead bodies, he says: "There is no slow festering of the dead in the ground, no choosing of leaden coffins by old ladies, to whom the resurrection looms more physical than mystic. The burial rites of the Hindu must, indeed, become our own":—

> "And to Hinduism we owe a great architecture. Each cycle furnished its masterpieces—the rock caves, with their rich and original figuring, the temples of Mysore, Gwalior, fortress of the Mahrattas, Amber, and the palaces of Rajputana, and golden-templed Amritsar, of the Sikhs. Lastly, note the small sect of Jains, building at Chitoor that tower aforesaid, and at Abu, in the hills, a temple of white marble, whose glory will never die. I thought to write down the Jains as the Wesleyans of Hinduism; for in each is seen a revolt against sacerdotalism, a return to simple forms. But when I saw Chitoor and Abu, comparison was dead. To liken these princes of architecture to the men who can design Methodist chapels must be for ever impossible."

"Wanderings in South America" is not the least interesting of the chapters in the book. Our author depicts the effect of Catholicism upon the poor Indian races in language that does not spare their historical oppressors. The Indians of the Bolivian Andes, the degenerate descendants of the Incas, he describes as a people filthy in their habits, much given to strong drink, and of a deeply religious strain. On a Good Friday, he writes, I stood in the plaza of Oruro and saw the Holy Image carried in priestly procession. Thousands of Indians followed, reverent in mien: an Indian band played holy music, and the Host was raised; all hats were doffed; many fell on their knees muttering hoarse cries:—

> "Such is religion in the Andes—a religion of the senses, not of the brain. Next day, feast-day and holiday, these people, men and women, lay in the very ecstasy of drink. For days they wallowed in it; then got up and went about their business, good-natured, ignorant, superstitious, filthy—a little higher than the beasts of the field."

In the summer months, after the melting of the snow, one can cross the Andes, he says, from Argentina into Chili. The summit of the pass is at 12,000 feet, and on the boundary line, erected by Chili, stands a colossal figure of Christ. Some years ago, when the figure was unveiled, the ceremony was made the occasion for a demonstration, and many political and religious personages from Santiago attended. Afterwards, champagne was served, and, having drunk heartily, the company proceeded to break the empty bottles against the statue for luck:—

> "There are quite a number of statues of Christ in Chili. Their erection has been coincident with a marked deterioration in the national character."

In Lima, capital of Peru, the city he founded, Pizarro's corpse lies in the cathedral in a glass coffin:—

> "Standing by this, my thoughts went back to Atahualpa, last of the Incas, made captive by Pizarro, ransomed with the treasure of Cuzco, then brutally murdered. By this act of treachery Spain set her foot on the neck of South America, while Holy Mother Church, herself torturer of men's bodies, looked on and palliated.
> "'You brute, Pizarro,' I remember saying. 'I could kick your coffin to pieces!' The mummy's face grinned placidly."

In a chapter entitled "Women," our author presents us with perhaps the sanest estimate of the fair sex, and of the trend and meaning of the modern feminist movement, that has yet been written. His remarks on Spiritualism and Christian Science, under this heading, are an admirable summing-up of both these delusions:—

> "Spiritualism, a result of too general education on the half-baked, hysterical of both sexes, is becoming rampant, but it is mostly women who are drawn into the vortex. One is often told by this or that woman that she communes with the dead, or lives in the occult world, or is in time with the Infinite. As the female is not open to reasoning, one can only leave these women to their obsessions. The 'in-time-with-the-Infinite' feeling is no doubt due to indigestion; but just how much of the rest is due to hysteria, or how much to lack of mental clarity and the consequent attributing of abstract processes of thought to supernatural origin, would be hard to determine. The reality or otherwise of spirits we need not discuss; but that so many of the less intellectual sex should be really media, or occult, when the greatest brains among men fail to detect any such phenomena, is to me unthinkable."

The most interesting phase in this whole trend, he says, is the spread of Christian Science—by a woman. Mrs. Eddy, a woman of little education, of neurotic and hysteric tendency, swinging for hours together in a hammock, in earlier life divorced, he regards as altogether a poor type. But she is already in process of deification. In the "Mother's Room" of the Temple at Boston, candles are always burning above her picture, and it is no rare thing to see worshipers on their knees before it. Tens of thousands of the ignorant and hysterical already attribute to her supernatural qualities, while many look for her second coming.

> "If the Eddy tradition gathers much more momentum, it is bound to crystallise. After that, for a large section of mankind, it is fact, and she is a goddess. Let us picture a baptism in Boston, a century hence. The pastor, sprinkling the babe, will say, 'In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and of Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy, I christen thee—Will Power,' and the guests will sit down to beans and bacon, or whatever viands are eaten in those days, unconscious of irony. The greatest traditions of theology sprang up in this way."

Of the future of religion, he writes:—

> "All religions die in time. Their early virile conceptions become lost in a maze of mysticism, ritual, and dogma. Our religion is dying this way. She is but a shell now; and vestments and wafers and oriental genuflections and intonings and Athanasian creeds and burning candles are what she offers as the Waters of Life."
>
> "The Church has lost its hold. By refusing to come in line with modern thought, it alienates those who think. What signifies an audience of old women or flighty girls, when the brainy men of the community are in their libraries or out on the links?
>
> "Religion, as we have evolved it, is become a flabby thing. It is a creed for the well-to-do, a creed of the tall hat, whose votaries dare not peer below the surface of things. We are concerned with the supernatural, with miracles, with three Gods who are one God; scornful of science, we treat sin and misery as casual factors, removable by prayer, and ignore the reign of law through which we move from birth to death. Meanwhile, in our rich, Christian England, one-third of the people live on the border line of poverty, or below it, drinking raw spirit to deaden their thought."

Our author offers some very friendly advice to the Bishops in their blindness:—

> "One hundred and seventy-one bishops of the Anglican Church assemble at Lambeth, and they make decision, by 87 votes to 84, to deny the blessing of the Church to the innocent party in a divorce who may marry again. Pshaw! You old men are no doubt well-meaning, but you don't know. You must adapt yourselves to modern intellect, or it will presently pass over you like a steam-roller. Moreover, such a union is legal to the State, and yours is a State Church. Go carefully, if you would escape disestablishment! There are social dignities and fat endowments some of you would ill surrender."

These extracts will give the reader but a poor idea of the subject-matter of the book, which is a racy record of a life's experiences more wonderful than any fiction. They are merely the running comments of the genial author upon subjects or events as they arise in the course of the narrative. But they serve to show, I think, that he is a writer worthy of every Freethinker's appreciation and esteem.

JOSEPH BRYCE.

Old Noah.

WE are not so "touchy" these days. It is quite consonant with respectability to pass a joke about the Lord, to speak lightly of angels, and to display even a nodding acquaintance with the Devil. The stage property of Christianity has become worse for wear, and, despite the work of revivalists and other industrious people to spring-clean it, we find that sacred objects are receiving less veneration than usual. If a person hits his thumb whilst carelessly using a hammer, there are ten chances to one that his exclamation is of a Biblical nature. If anyone suddenly assumes a sitting posture as he walks down the street, he does not say, "Alas Æsculapius!" His household gods are invariably invoked in a crisis of this description, and common use becomes a custom. I would not be prepared to say that all believers bandy words about in this manner, but many do who would safely be included in that elastic term "Church of England." In most of our present weekly papers this easy treatment of characters from the Bible is very evident, and we can safely say that there has been a landslide from the stern, uncompromising attitude of Christianity adopted twenty years ago. Without laboring the point, the mild curate's "damn" has become something stronger with the layman.

I was extremely shocked (I think that is the correct expression) when I found on the cover of the New Witness some rather disrespectful things said about Noah. In conjunction with an advertisement, there are verses from that lovable lump of humanity, G. K. Chesterton. Putting aside the question of taste in this matter, I found that the old patriarch was cheerfully digged in the ribs, and not by any means treated with the respect due to one who, in an amateurish sort of way, saved the world from utter destruction. It is not my duty to defend Noah, but I feel that a protest is necessary, and also that the moral needs to be pointed out when one more or less identified with the secret of England's greatness should so far forget himself, and do with impunity what would have probably meant, a few centuries ago, either having the tongue torn out or burning at the stake.

My readers must bear with me: I devoutly believe that I have a stern purpose in this article; but, as I write, within a few feet of my chair is a Noah's Ark. Scattered around this gaudily painted box are various pieces of wood representing cows, horses, sheep, and the familiar animals of England, and I laugh. I really think that the man who made them, the shopkeeper who sold them, and those who bought them are all accessories to a flagrant act of blasphemy. Poor Noah! What a fall! Thy brave efforts to save the world parodied at prices from a shilling upwards!

But to my purpose. The odious verses in question are entitled "Old Noah." He may have been an old man, but this habit of speaking of him is certainly not reverential, and would not be tolerated from the young in Sunday-schools. But of that no matter; there are worse things to come:—

> "And Noah would often say to his wife, as he sat down to dine,
> I don't care where the water goes, if it doesn't get into the wine."

Are you listening my readers? This is not by any common person who calls himself a Freethinker. It is not by Shelley. It is not by Omar Khayyám. It is not by John Davidson. It is by one whom, as far as I know, has never belonged to the movement for the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. We must smile and enjoy the humor of the situation. The Freethinker must console himself that he goes to gaol for the benefit of the Christian.

I cannot but think that Noah was a selfish old man, if we are to believe the new version. The Ark to him was the Christian's idea of heaven. What did it matter to him so long as he did not die a damp death!—

> "And Noah cocked his eye and said, 'It looks like rain, I think.'"

This is truly shocking. Surely Mr. G. K. Chesterton has read Genesis vi. 17! Again, he would not have us believe that Noah had forgotten the Lord's terrible threat, and his method of carrying it out. I refuse to believe that the old salt (this disrespect is infectious) could overlook such a matter of importance. I refuse to agree that it is logical, as a Christian, to make fun of Biblical characters, and in all seriousness I warn the writer that it is but a short step from irreverence for Noah and his type to open blasphemy as interpreted by present-day "law and profits."

To Freethinkers there is a moral to this modern treatment of a famous boating excursion; but, unlike most morals, it is a pleasant one. It is a proof of the advance of Freethought, whilst at the same time it is not a proof of religious sincerity. Mr. G. K. Chesterton can poke fun at every character from Genesis to Revelations, but he shall not do so without being reminded that Giordano Bruno was burned by order of Catholics. For buffoonery? Good God, no! For accepting the theory that the earth revolves round the sun. At Toulouse (1619) Lucilio Vanini, a learned Italian, had his tongue cut out and was burned. For saying that Noah was not a nice person in the matter of clothes? Merciful heavens, no! For a little difference with the priests of his time, and his belief in natural philosophy. These are but two instances of intolerance by Catholics, but they will serve to point out the fact that in the present day Christians can be skittish or cynical in their treatment of Noah, without whom it would have been impossible to build up the elaborate forms and ritual of the Church of Rome. For, if Noah had disregarded his divine message, Catholics would be without their patron saint. Therefore, I plead for the reinstatement of Noah as a person not to be trifled with, but as a man who was the keystone of Christianity. I also draw attention to the fact that the Blasphemy Laws should be enforced impartially. If this could be achieved, Freethinkers would have no cause for fear. As James Thomson has pointed out, you cannot accuse an unbeliever of blasphemy no more than you can charge an unmarried man with infidelity.

A Sunday-School Story.

Over on Capitol Hill there's a Sunday-school where a young man is superintendent. He is an earnest, conscientious young fellow, and, disagreeable as it may sound to say it, he means well. Sunday before last he rose to give a little talk.

"Dear children," said he, "I am very glad to be with you this morning, and when I look into your happy faces I am sure that all of you rejoice with me in the privilege of gathering together this morning to sing our songs of praise, and to listen to the lessons your dear teacher"—but then you know what he said; you know what they always say. This particular superintendent said that this beautiful Sabbath was "only a promise of the blissful hereafter, of the happy land to which we all want to go."

"And what is that happy land?" he asked.

The small boys on the front seat kicked each other surreptitiously and viciously, but nobody spoke till little Georgie said, with a tone midway between a sniff and a gurgle: "Heaven."

"Ah, that's it! that's it!" said the superintendent. "Little Georgie knew it. It is heaven. And we all want to go there. And now, children, can you tell me what kind of little boys go there?"

George was emboldened by praise. His head was dizzy with success. He rose in his place.

"Dead ones," he bawled.

Scepticism and Progress.

Every advance in science, every improvement in the command of the mechanical forces of nature, every step in political or social freedom, has risen in the first instance from an act of scepticism, from an uncertainty whether the formulas, or the opinions, or the government, or the received practical theories were absolutely perfect; or whether beyond the circle of received truths there might not lie something broader, deeper, truer, and thus better deserving the acceptance of mankind.—J. A. Froude.

Acid Drops.

Here is a gem of a letter from a Christian judge which we think it best to print without mutilation. It was received by the secretary of the American Secular Federation in reply to a protest against the Bible being read in the State schools:—

"Probate Court, Franklin County.
"Samuel L. Black, Judge, Columbus, Ohio, Jan. 13, 1914.
"Mr. E. C. Reichwald, Corresponding Secretary,
"70 W. So. Water-street, Chicago, Illinois.

"Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 12th and in reply beg leave to say that it is only necessary to glance at your letter and circular to learn that you are a lot of damn fools.

"Personally I have no objection to reading the Bible in public schools or in any other place, if anybody wants to read the Bible. I have no choice or any power to prevent it or otherwise. The only excuse I have for answering such rot as you and your co-adjutors are circulating is the last paragraphs of your circular letter. Did it not contain that paragraph, I should have consigned it to the waste-basket without further consideration, but I am writing you and your co-adjutors to begin your propaganda as threatened and then go plum to Hell and take your propaganda with you.

"(Signed) Samuel L. Black."

We do not know whether Judge Black desires publicity, but he deserves it.

Mr. Arnold Bennett says his experience has caused him to lose all faith in the legend of literary talent going a-begging because of the indifference of publishers. Publishers are, in fact, looking for ability, and only too eager to utilise it. We have no doubt that this is, within limits, true. Publishers are quite glad to get a work of ability—provided it is not likely to seriously offend public prejudice. But let a man produce a work of unquestionable ability on, say, Atheism; let him state his case fairly, uncompromisingly, telling the truth so that any man of average education will be able to understand it; and then see what chance there is of any of the well-known publishers issuing it. We are not going upon mere surmise when we say that such a work would stand little or no chance of seeing daylight. We know it would not. The same influence that causes newspaper proprietors and editors to exclude Freethought news from the columns of their papers causes publishers to decline such works. They may admit the ability displayed, but they dare not publish. Sometimes they are honest enough to say so.

It is reported that six native mission teachers have been killed and eaten by the natives of Malekula Island, New Hebrides. One thing is fairly certain their place will not be taken by the white missionaries from home. It may, however, serve as a useful call for more subscriptions.

About three hundred English bluejackets were recently received in audience by the Pope, who expressed his pleasure at seeing the English seamen, who, he said, spread civilisation all over the world. That settles it. Hot-headed priests will note that the Head of the Church did not ascribe civilisation to the circulation of the Bible.

Nothing seems too silly for a newspaper correspondence. The Times has for some days been inserting letters on the subject of an additional human sense. Certain men are afraid of spiders, and some correspondents have been advocating the existence of a "spider sense." Others dislike cats, and another correspondent puts in a claim for a "cat sense." We do not see why there should be any limit to the number of senses we possess on these lines. Why not a whisky sense, a cold bath sense, a debt-paying sense, and so on? These things help one to realise how little genuine education exists among the "educated classes."

Rev. E. Griffith Jones complained at the recent Free Church Congress of the scarcity of children in the churches. He said "the truth was that children were not now being born"—quite a startling piece of news in its way. We have heard of a declining birth-rate, but that all births had ceased is indeed news. Still, we suppose the Churches must account for their losses somehow. "The serious point," says Mr. Jones, "is that it is affecting the Protestant Churches equally with non-churchgoing portions of the community." That is the parson all over. It is all a question of trade interest. He wants a large birth-rate so that there may be a chance of good pickings for the Churches. For ourselves, we are far more concerned with quality than quantity. We agree with Ruskin, it is not of vital concern whether a man has two children or four, but it is of very vital concern whether the children he does have deserve hanging or not.

Principal Garvie complains that the Churches are over much concerned about "the lapsed masses." He says they are too little concerned "about the lapsed class of the cultured, who, in large and growing numbers, are becoming more indifferent, and sometimes even hostile or contemptuous, to the Christian faith. The dominating tendencies of the age are science, philosophy, and criticism, and each of these might make Christian faith more difficult." A shrewd man is Principal Garvie.

According to that intellectual periodical, T. P.'s Weekly, the Moravians despatch wives to their missionaries where such articles are required, but not "on approval," for they must be kept, however unsuitable. One missionary had lost two wives in his malarial district, and he sent home an order for the third. On his first glimpse of his latest he gasped, "Oh Lord! Carrots again."

At this season of the year the proprietors of the picture theatres are hard driven to cater for religious folk. Accordingly they have been presenting films of The Messiah and Daniel. We fancy that the Annunciation would be more troublesome to screen than even Daniel in the lion's den.

Newly-minted coins and a copy of the Daily Mail in a sealed jar were placed under the foundation-stone of part of a new church at Spondon, Derbyshire. The churchwardens might have used a copy of Truth.

Rev. A. J. Waldron has written what he calls a "Morality Play" for a Brixton music-hall. He says it is "a contribution to present-day social reform," and calls it The Carpenter. Its central feature is the old and stupid notion of a man who works a beneficial influence on his fellows by the exertion of some supernatural influence. Any fool can write a play, or anything else, on these lines. Nothing is impossible to the supernatural, and so anything may be accomplished. And, unfortunately, there is enough latent superstition and general silliness abroad to make the running for this kind of thing easy. But it is the supernatural influence for good off the stage that most people would like to see. Producing it before the footlights is quite easy.

Providence still continues its unwelcome attentions. In Russia, as the consequence of a terrible storm off the Sea of Azoff, a township of 1,000 persons was overwhelmed. It is believed that only eight of that number were saved.

In the African Times and Orient Review, for March 23, Mr. F. Hugh O'Donnell points out that the motive underlying the Protestant side of the Kikuyu controversy is not the desire for unity or a feeling of brotherhood, but a simple device to hide Christian divisions from their Mohammedan competitors. He says:—

> "In order to hide this disgraceful state of misbelief, a large number of English missionaries, including some Anglican bishops, met at Kikuyu, in East Africa, some weeks ago. They said to one another: 'We cannot make any conversions, we cannot oppose the success of Islam, unless we agree to hide the points of belief on which we differ, unless we only mention those beliefs on which we appear to agree, and unless we lend to one another our different congregations so as to pretend to the Moslems that we have One Faith, like Islam, and that we have many converts who believe it.'
> "And all these contradictory and English Protestant sects agreed to pretend to have only one religion and to lend their different congregations and followers to one another. There were Anglicans, and Presbyterians, and Independents, and Baptists, and Anti-Baptists, and Congregationalists, and Quakers, and a lot of separate and contradictory sects, who all agreed to pretend to believe in one another's strange religions in order to deceive the Mohammedans! It was Sectarian lying made a religious virtue! Lying and deceit. Nothing more."

Mr. O'Donnell, it should be pointed out, is neither a Mohammedan nor a Freethinker.

A Christian World writer says that the many attempts to establish religion by State action are not encouraging, and asks "Where is there a case when such attempts have succeeded?" We agree with the first statement—for different reasons than the writer would advance, and in reply to the concluding question, would point out that the voluntary establishment of religion has met with even greater failure. True, the State establishment of religion has broken down sooner or later, but this was not really because of the action of the State in patronising religion, but because no State has ever been able to secure uniformity of belief. And this is equally true of religious establishments apart from the State. The same process of disintegration affects both equally. None of the sects that have been outside the State establishment show themselves better able to hold their own against the forces that make for the destruction of religion than does the Established Church. The State Church does exactly what all the other Churches do, it holds all it can and finds the number it can hold steadily diminishing. From a religious point of view it is as effective as any other Church. From the view point of human evolution they are all fighting an equally hopeless battle.

But it must not be forgotten that the Nonconformist Churches do actually benefit from the State patronage of religion. To begin with, the State patronage of religion kept religion alive as nothing else could have done. It saturated our public institutions with religion, and so encouraged the conviction that in some way or other religious belief was essential to the well-being of the State. Just imagine what a different state of affairs would exist to-day if religion had been kept as a purely voluntary affair. It would not be in schools, or in the courts, or in Parliament, or in any public function or ceremony. Religion would have been a purely personal, voluntary affair, and there would have been none of the social taboos against the non-religious man that at present exist. It is the State patronage of religion that establishes the social power of religion, and it is on that that all religions live nowadays in civilised countries. The sectarian outcry against the evils of the State patronage of religion is as shallow as are most other sectarian cries.

A sum of £2,046,126 was raised in the United Kingdom last year for Foreign Missions. This year it is proposed to expend an additional £50,000. With a tenth of this sum to be spent on a counter propaganda, we would undertake to diminish the contributions to the Foreign Missions Funds by one-half.

"The musical composer must be attended to," says Mr. Hubert Bath, musical director to the London County Council. We should like ourselves to attend to the genius who composed "Tell Mother I'll be There."

A simple life exhibition at the Royal Horticultural Hall, Westminster, has some novel exponents on view, including a married couple who have lived in a cart for years, and a man who carries a tent on his person. What a pity the Biblical king who ate grass is not alive.

"Empire Theatre: The Messiah" runs a startling announcement on the street hoardings in a well-known town. We are glad to hear it. Better late than never.

"Happily the God whom women worship is as unlike man as possible," writes a lady contributor in the Referee. Presumably a magnified and non-natural replica of Mrs. Pankhurst would be preferable.

Dr. J. S. Haldane has just published a book, entitled Mechanism, Life, and Personality, in which he dogmatically asserts that "we have parted company, once and for all, with the mechanistic philosophy—the notion of a real and self-existent material universe," but it is a notorious fact that at the Dundee meeting of the British Association, held a year and a half ago, this gentleman's "we" represented a miserable minority. At that time an overwhelming majority emphatically preferred the mechanistic philosophy, and certainly no radical change of opinion has taken place during the interval. Like Sir Oliver Lodge, Dr. Haldane woefully misrepresents the attitude of present-day biologists. Professor Loeb, a much more competent judge than either, agrees with Sir Ray Lankester in his oft-repeated declaration that the science of biology was never more materialistic than it is just now.

Calvary Reformed Church, Philadelphia, has just started a choir of boy whistlers to lead the singing, and Lincoln Baptist Chapel, Cincinatti, has a choir of canaries, who chirp to the accompaniment of the organ. Truly, a farcical ending to a tragic superstition.

Sunday's colleagues tell us there is no such station in the Church's time-table.

Thirsting After God is the title of a new book by Dan Crawford, the missionary. Most people prefer something more spirituous.

Mons. Scriabine considers there is a connection between color and speech. This may account for the fact that when Christian ministers discuss Freethought they always "see red."

The Land of Open Doors is a title which occurs in the booksellers' latest catalogues. It does not refer to Christian England, where there are so many thieves.

"Are Modern Preachers Inaudible?" is a subject discussed in a religious contemporary. We only wish it were true.

The Punjab Government has demanded a sum of money, equal to £133, from a Christian newspaper, the Ludhiana Missionary, as security for its future good behavior. The offence committed was the publication of an article which was considered likely to bring the Mohammedan religion into contempt. A case of Christians being hoist with their own petard.

How easy it is for a superstition to get established, and how difficult to overthrow it, once it is established! Mr. T. A. Glover, reviewing, in the Daily News, a recently issued life of Calvin, says:—

> "It is curious that a generation which is terrorised in its thinking by semi-scientists, speaking in a vague and large way about Heredity and Environment, till we have almost lost the sense of individual responsibility and thrown over everything for an indefinite Social Righteousness, should have forgotten that the first European city in which Social Righteousness became a deliberate civic aim was Geneva, and that Geneva was inspired and nerved to carry this aim into actuality by the rejected Calvin himself."

It is easy for the ordinary newspaper man to write columns in this strain. He is fairly safe. The bulk of his readers are already believers in the story he is repeating. But it is almost pure superstition.

In the first place, the evil state of Geneva before Calvin has naturally been exaggerated by his biographers, as well as the purity that followed his government. Many of their "sins" consisted in dancing, and women were punished for this serious offence. In the next place, the opposition to his rule came from the better classes, including his fellow ministers, and not from the lower orders. Finally, the very records of the city during Calvin's rule decisively dispose of the notion of Geneva as a City of Righteousness under Calvinism. A Genoese authority sums up his examination of Genevan records of Calvin's time as follows:—

> "To those who imagine that Calvin did nothing but good, I could produce our registers, covered with records of illegitimate children, which were exposed in all parts of the town and country; hideous trials for obscenity; wills in which fathers and mothers accused their children not only of errors but of crimes.....I could instance multitudes of forced marriages, in which the delinquents were conducted from the prison to the church; mothers who abandoned their children to the hospital, whilst they themselves lived in abundance with a second husband; bundles of law suits between brothers; heaps of secret negotiations; men and women burnt for witchcraft; sentences of death in frightful numbers; and all these things among the generations nourished by the mystic name of Calvin."

Still, we suppose these traditions of the immense good worked by Christian agencies are too valuable as assets to be given up on the testimony of mere official records.

There are numerous suggestions as to the best way of dealing with the Irish question, and of course the religious crank was bound to appear with his suggestion. In a letter to the Times, Mr. J. Currie Macbeth asks "Why have none of our great church dignitaries called for a day of national humiliation and prayer?" Perhaps the reason is that there is a limit to even the foolishness of "church dignitaries." As a matter of fact both sides have prayed, and how on earth can God Almighty answer so as to satisfy both? Very wisely, he does nothing. Mr. Macbeth concludes his letter by repeating the legend that when the Titanic was sinking the band played "Nearer, my God to thee." Nothing of the kind happened; but this story appears to have established itself in religious circles, and one can hardly expect that the fact of its not being true will be considered sufficient reason for not repeating it.

The absolute "bunkum" of these large revival meetings that one reads about was unconsciously illustrated by Gipsy Smith in the course of a Methodist Times interview. He confessed that all but few of the people at the large gatherings addressed by himself and the President of the Conference were already members of the Methodist Church. In an audience of 1,500, not more than fifty were non-Methodists. That being the case, one would like to discover the value of the meetings. True, they please the attendants. They are able to once more "give themselves to Christ," as they have been continually doing, and are ready to do again when a new revivalist comes along. But meanwhile the Methodist Church is losing ground. Gipsy Smith says he is not "looking forward to any big increase of membership." That, too, after addressing over 150,000 people!

Professor David Smith tells an inquirer who complains that whenever he is ill he gets no help whatever from religion, that Jesus had a similar experience on the cross when he cried, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" If God deserted his only begotten Son, in his most trying hour, is it any wonder that he abandons an ordinary person when in trouble? Think of that, says Dr. Smith, and be comforted. Surely this is to trifle wickedly with a real problem. The inquirer's difficulty is not dealt with at all. There are multitudes of religious people to whom the belief in Christ and his salvation never ministers the slightest comfort or joy. If Christ exists, why is this?

Now that Christians are compelled to admit George Meredith's Freethought they give some very grotesque explanations. The Daily Chronicle recently stated that Meredith had Secularist friends and he was curiously chary of offending their peculiar sensibilities." We hope this sentence was paid for at the usual rate.

Archdeacon Sinclair has been complaining in the Daily Mirror of the "disproportionate rating of the incomes of the clergy." The founder of the Christian superstition had no income to speak of, and was sold up for thirty shillings.

Still further proofs of the benefits of Christianity as a civilising force. The Archdeacon of Richmond said the other day that he had been told by one who had lived in San Francisco, Sydney, and Leeds, that the latter place was the most impudently vicious in the world. A Leeds clergyman added that the comment was fully justified. As a redeeming feature we have no doubt that Leeds contributes its share towards the two millions sterling raised for foreign missionary work.

Nothing is real, say the Christian Scientists, but mind. There is a division of mind generally into mortal mind and spiritual mind. The late Mrs. Baker Eddy, foundress and head of the sect, left a fortune of £518,126. This, we presume, goes to the "mortal mind" portion of the concern.

Russia, which already possesses a number of semi-erotic religious sects, has just added another one to their number. A woman, with her son and another man, have just been charged with blasphemy and swindling. The woman's offence consists in representing herself as the Mother of God, who had descended from heaven for the special purpose of revealing new truth to the people. Part of this new truth consists in the inculcation of very common everyday morality, along with the practice of certain rites that are reminiscent of some of the erotic sects of antiquity and of the primitive Christian ages. She is also accused of extracting money from her dupes, but in these cases that is almost always a feature. Her male companion was said to be an incarnation of St. Peter, and her son an incarnation of King Solomon.

The new Woman's Church at Wallasey Cheshire, arranges that at the afternoon service only women are to be admitted. In the evening men and women may attend. This is rather a queer way of exhibiting the equality of the sexes. It looks more like a reversal of the practice in the early Church that prohibited women approaching the altar under certain conditions. Sermons to women only seem almost as objectionable as sermons to men only.

After our last week's batch of clerical wills, it seems hardly worth while to notice that of the Rev. William Pope with £7,287, Rev. G. Stanley with £7,108, and Rev. H. Shepherd with £76,638. Still, they may as well go with the rest, and may the Lord have mercy on their souls.

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings, which we have found useful. We appreciate your point concerning the leopard changing its "spots." Many of us would like to possess the same facility for changing our "spot" for others more desirable.

C. HYLTON, of 32 Lancefield-street, Queen's Park, W., requests us to say that if C. Attwood will write him, he will gladly supply him with a few copies of Facts Worth Knowing. From another correspondent we learn that application to America has elicited the information that this pamphlet is quite out of print.

SECULARIST (Halifax).—There is no Branch of the N. S. S. in Halifax at present, but there is no good reason why there should not be one. Seven members are required before permission may be given to open a new Branch. The nearest one to you at present is Huddersfield.

A. J. MARRIOT.—We believe the usual effect of Christian settlement among a black people is that of "lightening" the population.

A. E. MADDOCK.—Thanks for cheque, which has been apportioned as you desire. Your MSS. came quite safely to hand, and is at present in type. We hope to publish in the course of a week or so.

D. MAPP.—Very pleased to hear that Mr. Lloyd's recent lectures at Manchester gave the audiences so much pleasure and satisfaction. We should have been glad to have recorded the success of the meetings earlier, but yours is the first letter that has reached us on the subject. Obviously, no one could have regretted his inability to lecture at Manchester on March 22 more than Mr. Foote himself.

CORRESPONDENTS will greatly oblige, and will also facilitate the dispatch of business, if they will mark all letters "Private" that are intended for Mr. Foote and are of a personal nature. Those containing editorial matter may be addressed in the usual manner.

J. N. LEARY.—Thanks for pamphlet. Several correspondents have written offering copies. Will they please take this as a general acknowledgment of their kindness.

T. L. BARRETT.—It is quite safe to assume that if Colonel Ingersoll declined to reply to Father Lambert his reasons were of a perfectly satisfactory nature. A man in Colonel Ingersoll's position could hardly be expected to publicly discuss with anyone who felt disposed to throw out a challenge. As a matter of fact Colonel Ingersoll did reply to Father Lambert, among others, but refused to be drawn into a lengthened discussion.

I AM happy to say—and a good many "saints" will be happy to learn—that the worst of my recent illness is over. Shorter and sharper was the motto on this occasion. I am now clothed and in my right mind, as the prophet says; and am even eating ordinary food with reasonable appetite. The question for me now is the weather. If I can get out of doors freely I think I shall soon be myself again. Sunshine and balmier air are what I want now. I shall be lucky, of course, if I get them. For the only certain thing about the weather in England, and at this time of the year, is that you have got to have it, anyhow.

Under the present conditions of parliamentary business the Prime Minister's reception of the deputation on behalf of the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws was all that could reasonably be expected. The case against these laws was put forward by Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner and Professor L. Dickinson, who were accompanied by Sir W. Byles, M.P., Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Mr. R. D. Holt, M.P. (who has charge of the Bill for repeal), Mr. Silas K. Hocking, and others. With Mr. Asquith were the Home Secretary and the Attorney-General. Replying to the deputation, Mr. Asquith said—we quote from the Daily Chronicle of March 27—

> "he was glad they realised that prosecutions in recent years were due not to any act of the Executive Government, but to the zeal of local authorities (the Boulter case excepted). A good deal of what had been urged was absolutely common ground among them. No one could defend the existing state of the law.
> Our statutes were absolutely obsolete, and he did not believe any recent prosecution ever took place under them. He agreed in thinking that the statutes might also be swept out of the book with very great advantage. The interpretation of the judges had varied from time to time, and of late years a more restricted view had been taken by them.
> 'I understand your desire to be that we should go a step further, so that even this attenuated fragment or relic of the old blasphemy laws should altogether disappear. I confess, speaking only for myself, that I am in sympathy with you. I see no good object, certainly no object which is bound up in any way with the cause of religion, which the maintenance and the enforcement of these laws provokes.
>
> 'They are partial. They are uncertain. They have been differently interpreted from generation to generation; and I am afraid that there is a certain amount of truth in what has been said to-day, that they are rarely enforced, except against ill-educated and humble persons. That adds a sense of special injustice to a grievance which is already a considerable one. I do not know of any object which they serve.
> 'I think that if the law is adequately defined and maintained against the use of any form of language which would be reasonably capable of creating a breach of the peace, the context or the purpose for which it is used is wholly irrelevant. I think this rather outworn and obsolete chapter in our law might very well disappear, not only from the statute, but from the common law. I see no reason to repent of the vote I gave in favor of Mr. Bradlaugh's Bill, and if the opportunity offered I should give a similar vote again. I do not know what more you want.' (Laughter.)
>
> A Voice : 'Government assistance.'
> Mr. Asquith said that was a very different thing. 'We have a pretty heavy cargo to carry at present.'
>
> Sir William Byles : 'This is a very little thing.'
> Mr. Asquith : 'But every little counts, and I am not sure there is any room in the hold of our ship for an additional legislative parcel, however small. I cannot honestly promise you anything in the nature of Government time. Sympathy and good will I do promise you in full measure, so far as I am personally concerned. You have many opportunities open to private Members to prosecute legislation which is beneficent in itself, and generally desired. If you can manage to find a nook or cranny for this little Bill of yours, we shall be very happy to support you to the utmost of our power.'"

Mr. Asquith deserves the highest praise for his uncompromising condemnation of these iniquitous laws, and for the straightforward declaration that he would repeat the vote he once before gave for their abolition should the occasion for so doing present itself. It now rests with those members of the House who are in favor of their abolition to see that the opportunity comes as speedily as possible. Unfortunately, there is small chance, in the present state of Parliamentary business, for any measure that is not a Government measure. The time of private members in the House is at best a precarious quantity, and at present is more than usually doubtful. Still, the Prime Minister's promise of "sympathy and goodwill," "in full measure," should inspire members to press the matter forward. We should imagine that there would be a clear majority in the Cabinet in its favor. For the rest, the description of the Blasphemy Laws as "absolutely obsolete," as "partial" and "uncertain," and adding "a special injustice" to an already considerable grievance, ought to give pause to possible opposition to the abolition of these laws.

Mr. Asquith stated that blasphemy prosecutions in recent years were not due to any act of the Executive Government—"the Boulter case excepted." The exception is of some little importance. It will be remembered that this case was taken up by the National Secular Society, and a considerable sum of money expended in its defence. And this was done on the broad principle that, whatever the kind of language used by the defendants in these cases, the real object in invoking the Blasphemy Laws was to suppress an objectionable opinion. The Executive of the N. S. S. declined to consider whether the language used was coarse or refined, so long as the attack was made in the shape of an indictment for blasphemy. In doing this the N. S. S. stood practically alone, and it is pleasing to record that its straightforward attitude commanded greater respect and support than one might have, at first, thought probable. The Boulter case has, therefore, some little historic value. It obviously taught the Government that even uneducated men could not be attacked with impunity under cover of the Blasphemy Laws. It drew from a judge of eminence the first ruling in confirmation of Lord Coleridge's interpretation of the law on the occasion of Mr. Foote's trial. Finally, it brought the whole Freethought world into line in protesting against prosecutions under the Blasphemy Laws whatever the character of the speaker or speeches.

The friends of Miss Vance—and that means almost everyone in the Freethought party—will be glad to learn that she has decided to undergo a course of treatment for rheumatism in one of the London hospitals, and we hope that systematic care will have a beneficial effect. Her complaint has been more than usually troublesome of late. During her enforced absence from the office, her correspondence, and all matters connected with the Society's business, will be dealt with by Miss Kough, who is perfectly familiar with the routine work, as she has been assisting the General Secretary for some time.

Owing to the date (March 24) on which the annual meeting of the Secular Education League was held being that on which our last week's issue went to press, we have had no opportunity of referring to it before now. The necessity for doing so now chiefly arises from the careful manner in which the London papers avoid reporting anything that might offend the more bigoted of their readers. Fortunately, this boycott did not prevent the Caxton Hall meeting being one of the best hitherto held. The hall was full and the speakers all in excellent form. In the absence of the League's President, Mr. G. Greenwood, M.P., the chair was taken by Sir Henry Cotton. Sympathetic reference to both the absence of the President of the League —due to disablement from a broken knee-cap—and of Mr. Foote from illness, was made by the Chairman and Mr. Halley Stewart, both of whom paid high tribute to the work of Mr. Greenwood and Mr. Foote on the Executive Committee. The leaders of the League were all in fighting form, and the annual report and balance-sheet were both satisfactory documents.

The principal resolution of the evening was moved by Mr. Halley Stewart, and seconded by Lady Byles in a speech that bristled with epigrammatic utterances. This is the first time that Lady Byles has spoken at these meetings, but we hope it will not be the last. Not the least interesting part of her speech was the reading of a hitherto unpublished letter from Thomas Carlyle. A second resolution was moved by the Rev. Dr. Walsh, who, in the course of some forceful remarks, bore testimony to the influence of the League in most out-of-the-way districts. Mr. Swinny seconded the resolution, and Mr. Cohen brought the speaking to a close with a brief speech that was highly appreciated by the audience. There is plenty of work ahead of the League, and the results of its past work will be best shown whenever the promised Education Bill brings the question once more prominently before the public. As it is, the League has succeeded in bringing together people of all classes and parties who are agreed upon the importance of confining education in State schools to secular subjects, and in providing literature that will serve as ammunition in the coming fight. We cordially commend the League to those of our readers who are not yet members. The secretary is Mr. H. Snell, 19 Buckingham-street, Strand.

Whether we consider cases where individuals have had to suffer out of all proportion to their deserts and without ostensible, declared, or conceivable reason; or whether we consider the terrible natural calamities which befall great numbers of men and deal suffering and destruction to both good and bad together; in all cases we find that that view of life which would maintain that we, either as individuals or as a race, are under the protection of some external Providence will not fit the facts of our experience.—Sir F. Younghusband, "Within. Thoughts during Convalescence."

A Three-Cornered Contest.

OFTEN when I have been arguing with Christians on some doubtful points concerning their faith, I have been in a minority of one, but I have never felt the least doubt that I should be able to hold my own against any number of them, if they only allowed me fair play. They have bombarded me with questions, and insisted upon me answering them to their satisfaction; but when I have returned the compliment, and told them that their replies were really no answer to my questions, they have generally lost their temper and become distinctly uncomplimentary, not to say offensive, in their remarks.

In the Council Chamber of Camberwell I have assailed the Christian belief in the efficacy of prayer under absolutely fair conditions, with a Mayor to keep order and insist upon my right to a fair hearing. I have also defended the Freethinker against the malicious and unfair charges of Christians, and been listened to calmly, though outvoted by an organised majority. Sometimes I have had the good fortune to have a friendly discussion with some Christians of various sects, a sort of round-table contest, in a room in which there was an audience of about twenty persons, mostly nominal Christians, or persons who might be more correctly described as "nothingarians." Of course, the great difficulty in such a discussion is to get the disputants to keep to the point, as most of them have a disposition to dodge about from one subject to another. There is also the further difficulty of keeping the spectators out of the discussion—especially when there is no chairman and no general rules of discussion are observed. In this little discussion I recently had, my opponents were a Roman Catholic and an active member of the Church of England. We discussed various questions relating to the Christian belief, but the main theme was "The Myths and Miracles of the Bible."

In this discussion I took the initiative, and opened the debate. The following dialogue will give the reader some slight idea of the matter and method of discussion:—

Freethinker: In my opinion the Bible, as a book, is full of myth and miracle; in fact, the whole story of Creation is one vast miracle.

Roman Catholic: But you do not deny that an Almighty God could create the universe in the manner described if he so desired?

Freethinker: No. I merely say that the story is so improbable and so contradictory that I cannot believe it.

Roman Catholic: Do you say that because you cannot believe it that therefore it is not true?

Freethinker: No, I do not take that ground. I take the ground that the story of Creation as given in the Bible is more likely to have been written by men who knew little or nothing of physical science than that it is an inspired production containing the utterances of the Jewish God—who, in my opinion, is a perfectly mythical personage.

English Churchman: But we are taught to believe that the Bible is the inspired Word of God, and for my part I see no reason to doubt it.

Freethinker: Which version of the Bible do you think inspired—the Septuagint, the Douay, or the Authorised English version?

English Churchman: Oh, the Authorised English version, of course.

Freethinker: But why of course, when there are other versions? Your Roman Catholic friend probably thinks the Douay version inspired?

Roman Catholic: Certainly as much as any other. But as Roman Catholics we do not accept the literal interpretation of everything we find in the Bible. We have an Infallible Authority at the head of our Holy Church in the person of his Holiness the Pope, and in all matters of theology we accept his authority.

English Churchman: As Protestants we have no such authority. We believe in the Bible generally, but we are allowed to exercise our reason in the interpretation of it.

Freethinker: You are a Freethinker, then, in a sense. You are allowed to pick and choose what you shall believe, but you must not call in question the fundamental doctrines of your faith.

English Churchman: What fundamental doctrines?

Freethinker: The doctrine of man's fall in the Garden of Eden, the miraculous birth of Jesus, his atonement for the sins of mankind by his death on the cross——

English Churchman: Of course not. We could not call in question these dogmas of the Church without giving up our belief in Christianity altogether.

Roman Catholic: We accept these teachings without question. Whatever our priests tell us on the question we accept, for we recognise the danger of allowing the ordinary lay mind to put his own interpretation upon them.

Freethinker: Exactly; the Roman Catholic is logical. He allows the priest to think for him; but the Protestant claims to exercise the right of private judgment. When, however, he comes up against his fundamental teachings, he gives up his reason and exclaims "I believe."

English Churchman: But there are a good many things in the Bible that I am not called upon to believe. I need not believe, for instance, in all the myths and miracles of the Old Testament.

Freethinker: Not now. But Christians had to believe a few years ago. Biblical criticism has knocked the bottom out of the incredible stories of the Old Testament; but I suppose you still believe the myths and miracles of the New Testament?

English Churchman: What myths and miracles do you refer to?

Freethinker: In my judgment the whole story of the birth, death, and resurrection of Jesus is founded upon myth and miracle.

Roman Catholic: Not so. Jesus Christ was undoubtedly a historical personage. Does not Josephus say so?

Freethinker: The passage in Josephus is an admitted forgery.

English Churchman: Who says so?

Freethinker: I can quote you plenty of Christian writers on that point. But what I say distinctly is this: There never was such a person as the Jesus of the Gospels. There never was a child who was born of a virgin; there never was a man who walked upon the sea, opened the eyes of the blind, fed thousands of people on five loaves and two small fishes, raised the dead to life, and finally, after being crucified, resurrected himself from the dead, and after showing himself to a few friends, ascended bodily into the heavens, and disappeared from the gaze of mankind for ever.

English Churchman: Oh! it's all very well for you to say there never was such a being as Jesus Christ, but greater men than you, even Freethinkers, say there was such a person. For instance, Renan, John Stuart Mill, and others.

Freethinker: Renan and John Stuart Mill, it is true, both believed that there was such a man as Jesus, but they did not believe that he was miraculously conceived and born of a virgin, and they did not believe in any of the miracles attributed to him.

Roman Catholic: All the great teachers of our Holy Catholic Church implicitly believed in the historical character of Christ. Why should we commence to dispute it to-day?

Freethinker: Because we have more information on the subject, and science and modern thought have changed the whole aspect of the question.

English Churchman: In what way?

Freethinker: Because we now know by a study of other religions that many of the great religious teachers of other countries are said to have been born of a virgin, delivered Sermons on the Mount, and were crucified and rose again from the dead—such, for instance, as Buddha, Christna, Indra, Vishnu.

English Churchman: Well, but what are these myths and miracles that you refer to in the New Testament other than those you have mentioned?

Freethinker: Have patience, kind friends. You must remember that the sacred books of Buddhists and Brahmins have their marvellous tales of the dead brought back to life, of incarnations and virgin mothers, of angelic appearances, visions, and voices, magical fish with money in their mouths, talking serpents, and other such extraordinary occurrences as those recorded in the Gospels.* People with no knowledge of science were always on the look-out for the marvellous. As Shakespeare says:—

> "No natural exhalation in the sky,
> No scope of nature, no distempered day,
> No common wind, no customed event,
> But they will pluck away his natural cause,
> And call them meteors, prodigies, and signs,
> Abortions, presages, and tongues of heaven."

English Churchman: Well, we are not bound, at this time of day, to believe in all these things. The English Church is very liberal in these matters; we are only bound to believe in the fundamentals.

Roman Catholic: And Catholics do not concern themselves about such mere details. We have our Articles of Faith and our Catechism.

Freethinker: Minor details, you call them. You might say they are minor details when speaking to me, but you would not tell your local priest or your more pious co-religionists so. It is wonderful how liberal-minded religionists of all denominations can be when they are speaking individually, and not as representatives of an organisation.

English Churchman: The clergy of the Church of England, especially the most distinguished scholars among them, are gradually giving up belief in the miracles of the Old Testament, and many of them have given up some of the miracles in the New, while few of them believe in a personal Devil or the old-fashioned idea of eternal torment in hell for the wicked.

Freethinker: Well, but what has caused this change to come over them? In my judgment it is the growth of scientific knowledge among the educated classes, and more important still, the growth of common sense among the masses.

English Churchman: To a certain extent, I agree; but surely you will admit that religious folk are not without intelligence, also.

Roman Catholic: There is plenty of intelligence among Catholics.

Freethinker: Yes, but they are not allowed to exercise it on theology or religion.

English Churchman: As far as I can see, you throw over everything that cannot be proved—cannot be settled at the bar of reason.

Roman Catholic: Reason is but a poor guide.

Freethinker: It is the best we have got.

English Churchman: And so you make yourself an outcast from your fellows upon the mere vanity of your superior reason.

Freethinker: I am bound to be true to myself. I cannot be a hypocrite. And if I must lose the society of some of my friends by being true to my convictions, I am willing to go out into a larger world in which I can breathe the pure air and exercise intellectual liberty in the pursuit of truth. Gentlemen, I thank you for your courtesy, and wish you a very good evening.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Organisms Antagonistic to Health.

THE wonders of life become the more wonderful the more closely they are studied. All diseases concerning whose genesis and development adequate knowledge is possessed are due to living germs, and doubtless all other ailments will be sooner or later traced to the malign influences of organic matter. As is generally known, the clearest water, which contains, or has contained, plant or animal organisms, soon becomes turbid and coated on the surface with a film. When the surface scum is scrutinised under a microscope, a multitudinous medley of lowly life leaps into view. Simple-celled animals, such as infusoria, will in all likelihood be seen, as well as unicellular plants. These organisms are minute enough, but they appear as giants in comparison with the dense masses of dwarf bacterial life by which they are surrounded. These bacterial creatures usually assume the appearance of minute spheres, threads, or rods which move amid their liquid home with the aid of delicate lashes, or they may lie in a condition of comparative repose in a jelly-like mass. The bacteria multiply with astonishing rapidity by cross division; one soon gives rise to a thousand, and the microscopic specks which first appear will, in suitable conditions of nutrition quickly form a mass which fills the containing vessel. Wherever organic matter is undergoing decomposition in infusions such as that instanced, in cases of disease or death, or within the body of the living organism itself, there these bacteria are gathered together.

* The Bible: What It Is and Is Not, Joseph Wood.

Throughout its historic period, and doubtless through many of the prehistoric periods which preceded it, the human family was familiar with the poisonous and death-dealing nature of many of the larger plants. But it was reserved for nineteenth-century science to discover that various simple plants, which lie far beyond the range of unaided vision, are the generators of the most terrible scourges which afflict mental and bodily health. These minute plants belong to the lowly group of bacteria, and that department of organised knowledge which concerns itself with them is termed bacteriology.

Strictly speaking, every bacterium is a one-celled plant. But bacteria, germs, micro-organisms, and microbes are all popularly regarded as various varieties of one fundamental living form. As a matter-of-fact, however, germs, micro-organisms, and microbes are not necessarily bacteria, which are plants, whereas the others may be, and frequently are, animals. All these forms are micro-organisms, but the bacteria are a special kind of such organisms. It is, of course, very convenient to employ the more general terms, as the following instance shows. The germ of typhoid fever is a plant (bacterium) while the germ of malaria is an animal, although both of them are micro-organisms.

The average rod-shaped bacterium is about 1-10,000th of an inch in length and about 1-50,000th in diameter; others are much smaller and are only rendered visible by the highest powers of the microscope, while many are probably too minute to be seen even with the aid of the most powerful instruments so far invented. The germs which cause foot-and-mouth disease are so minute "that they will pass through the pores of the earthenware tubes in a Pasteur-Berkefeld filter, which removes bacteria large enough to be seen with a microscope."

As already intimated, in conditions favorable to growth, a bacterium soon attains its maximum size, and then splits into equal halves. Each of these feeds, develops, and soon divides again. Some bacteria divide every twenty minutes, and it has been computed that if the descendants of a single bacterium were to divide once an hour only for two days, there would result a population of these plant organisms of more than 280 millions. If this rate of multiplication were doubled, and the descendants of the one original bacterium divided every half hour, in 72 hours there would be 4,772 billions, and their total weight would probably exceed 7,000 tons.

Fortunately for higher animal life, such a reproductive rate is seldom or never possible for any length of time. Nevertheless, the figures just given help to convey some idea of the danger from baleful bacteria to the human or other body that harbors them.

In normal cases the food supply of disease germs is soon exhausted, and their own waste products help to set up poisonous conditons, which inhibit any constant rapid rate of reproduction.

Spore formation is a distinguishing feature of some bacteria. Through providential care, perhaps, few spore-producing bacteria are responsible for human diseases. This is a gratifying circumstance, as spores are extremely difficult to kill; they are much more tenacious of life than the more mobile bacteria. Their death-resisting powers are well illustrated by the fact that spores from the bodies of cattle that have succumbed to the dread anthrax disease have been known to germinate several years after the dead cattle were buried.

The wide range of temperature through which bacteria live and reproduce their kind is very remarkable. Some are capable of multiplying at freezing-point; others abound in hot springs so near to boiling-point that they obviously flourish in conditions that are absolutely fatal to all high forms of life. Nor is this all. Intense cold is by no means fatal to some bacteria.

Several species of these, notably those of typhoid and diphtheria, have successfully resisted the temperature of liquid air (about —190° C.) for several days. When thawed out these germs have displayed every evidence of their power to multiply quite normally. The majority of bacterial forms, however, perish when congealed, and very few, indeed, can be restored to activity after water has remained in a frozen state for six months. Still, serious danger may lurk in ice procured from impure sources. At least one epidemic of typhoid fever has been definitely traced to ice kept in stock for fully seven months. As Dr. Bigelow, who records this case, very truly says, "All ice from waters contaminated with sewage should be regarded with suspicion. While most of the bacteria will probably die, the few which remain may multiply rapidly when taken into the human body."

The boiling-point of water is fatal to nearly all bacteria. One minute's exposure to ebullition suffices to kill the bacterial germs of both typhoid and tuberculosis. The hardier spore-forms of bacterial organisms are able to survive several hours' constant boiling, but when the method of discontinuous sterilisation is adopted, in other words, if the bacterial spores are boiled for a short time, and then allowed to cool, the spores germinate and are then easily sterilised by a little extra heating. It is a reassuring circumstance that contaminated water or milk very seldom harbors spore-producing disease germs, and a single boiling is thus usually sufficient to bring their inglorious career to a speedy termination.

It is also important to know that the direct rays of the sun are fatal to all bacteria. Some species succumb to a few minutes' direct exposure, and scarcely any can withstand an exposure of a few hours' duration. The services rendered by the sun in our streets and houses and other structures where disease-generating bacteria freely abound pass the limits of all ordinary calculation. The solar orb is, indeed, the supreme lord of light and life.

In all surface soils bacteria are abundant; no river, pond, lake, or sea is without its bacterial population; bacteria dwell in the bodies of plants and animals; the air is everywhere peopled with them except in the moteless atmosphere of high mountains, at the Poles at certain seasons, and possibly in some of the greater deserts.

Although it appears as if science long since rendered us familiar with the germ-theory of disease, this view of the origin of bodily ailments is of quite recent growth. Although much was suspected, little or nothing was definitely established until, in 1876, that great pioneer, Dr. Robert Koch, of Berlin, procured pure cultures of rod-shaped bacteria from the blood of sheep and oxen affected with anthrax, or splenic fever, and thus furnished the first proof that bacteria are responsible for disease.

Six years later, the same bacteriologist demonstrated the connection between human tuberculosis and a bacterium which he christened "Bacillus tuberculosis." In the following year he announced the further discovery that the fearsome disease of Asiatic cholera owed its existence to a specific bacterium. Many of the more progressive medical experts were quickly impressed by the remarkable results that Koch's inquiries had opened up, and in the comparatively short space of thirty years the important science of bacteriology has been evolved. And, if we base our expectations on the already vast achievements of this new science, we are not only entitled to the anticipation of the near approach of the period when all portions of the earth's surface will be rendered habitable, but we may also look forward with the utmost confidence to the coming day when all the more malignant diseases will be banished from the haunts of men.

The list of diseases demonstrably due to bacterial agency is now a formidable one, which steadily increases every year. The many forms of tuberculous disease, cholera, pneumonia, tetanus, meningitis, blood poisoning, leprosy, and a large number of other scourges are all contagious or infectious bacterial diseases.

Various diseases are now known to be due to the sinister influences of animal micro-organisms which are embraced in the unicellular group known as protozoa. Sleeping-sickness, dysentery, and malaria are to be numbered among the ascertained products of these animal organisms. Other diseases which are more than suspected of organic genesis, but whose specific causes as yet remain undetected, are small-pox, yellow fever, and similar complaints.

The most successful treatment of these diseases so far discovered has been based on the assumption of their microbic origin. It is now demonstrable that yellow fever has been transmitted by the bites of mosquitoes which have previously feasted on the blood of a victim to yellow fever, and this has led physicians into the belief that, by adopting the plan so fruitfully followed in cases where disease is most certainly due to organic infection, they will be enabled to secure the best results in cases where the organism responsible for the disease has so far eluded observation. The method in question is either to destroy the mosquitoes or to prevent their biting healthy subjects or patients afflicted with malaria or yellow fever. Similarly, in battling with scarlet fever, small-pox, measles, etc., experience has completely justified the assumption of their respective micro-organisms as the real generators of the various diseases. Those that are smitten with these disagreeable ailments are therefore isolated as far as possible, and the rooms they have occupied, and the utensils they have employed are thoroughly disinfected.

Diphtheria furnishes an excellent illustration of the manner in which bacteria generate disease, as the following instance advanced by Dr. Bigelow shows:—

> "A child is 'exposed' to diphtheria, perhaps in school where other pupils have shown signs of the disease, and after a number of days the symptoms of the disease may appear. Examination of the throat discloses certain peculiar spots, and microscopic examination of material from the surface of these spots shows thousands of bacteria of the diphtheritic species. The reason why the disease did not appear immediately after exposure is that it required time for the one or few bacteria which first lodged in the throat to multiply and form a colony."

The symptoms of this disease are not merely those of sore throat; many organs are affected. The explanation is that, although the bacteria are more or less confined to a given area of the body, they excrete toxins which enter into the blood circulation, and poison the system of the patient as a whole. When the sufferer has a sound constitution, the diphtheria toxin shows a lessening hold on the body in the course of a few days; the critical period is now past, and the patient begins to mend. Where the disease is overcome, this is due to the fact that the victim's body cells have slowly secreted a substance which fights the toxin; this substance is an anti-toxin. But in all cases in which the body fails to secrete sufficient anti-toxin, the patient dies.

Science, however, can cope with this difficulty. Diphtheria toxins are known to cause the tissues of the horse to form anti-toxin, which is contained in the animal's blood. Hence, the doctor injects into the human sufferer's blood a certain amount of this anti-toxin, and this prevents serious illness, and has proved a highly successful method in saving life.

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON MARCH 26.

Members present:—Messrs. Baker, Barry, Bowman, Cohen, Cowell, Cunningham, Davey, Davidson, Heaford, Judge, Neate, Nichols, Quinton, Samuels, Silverstein, Wood, Miss Kough and Miss Stanley.

A letter was read from the President, Mr. G. W. Foote, explaining his inability to attend in consequence of very serious illness, and making suggestions concerning the business to be transacted.

Mr. Cohen was elected to the chair.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed.

The monthly cash statement was presented and adopted.

New members were admitted for the St. Helens and West Ham Branches and the Parent Society.

The General Secretary reported as to the recent meeting of the Camberwell Branch.

The forthcoming Conference was discussed, and the final arrangements adjourned until the next meeting.

On the motion of Mr. Cunningham, certain business remitted by the Conference to the Executive was dealt with, and, in regard to the resolution:—

> "That one Sunday in the year be called the Charles Bradlaugh Sunday, and that all Branches be requested to arrange for lectures or readings to be given on this day, bearing on the life and teachings of Charles Bradlaugh, our late great leader."

—it was resolved to recommend that the day be the nearest Sunday to September 26, the anniversary of Charles Bradlaugh's birth, and that this year it be Sunday, Sept. 27.

In regard to a contemplated testimonial to Mr. W. J. Ramsey, after a statement by Mr. Davey, delegate from the Kingsland Branch, it was unanimously resolved that Miss Vance, the General Secretary, and Mr. Davey should, on behalf of the Executive, confer with the representatives of kindred and political societies, who intended to co-operate, and to report at an early date.

A vote of sympathy with the President concluded the meeting.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

THE SWORD OF BALAAM.

A Scotsman on a recent visit to Dublin went to see a private museum, which was advertised to contain the oldest and queerest antiquities in the world.

The Irish showman brought out a large sword and said: "This is the sword that Balaam slew his ass with."

The Scotsman, being well up in Bible history, here interrupted and said: "Balaam did not slay his ass; he only wished for a sword to slay it."

"Oh!" returned Pat, "then this is the very sword he wished for."

His evening prayer was notorious, and the reverend vicar of Postbridge had not seldom exhorted him to abandon such a narrow-minded petition. But Dennis would retort that he had but little time for devotion, and was not minded to spread his prayers thin.

"God Lord, bless me and my wife, and father and gran'-father and my girls—us six an' no more! Amen."

"That's all I've got to say, and 'tis enough," declared Dennis, "and as for t'other people in Postbridge, they've all got tongues in their heads, except old Drake Dicker, and they can pray for themselves."—Eden Phillpotts, "The Master of Merripit."

A mother noticing that her young son had omitted from his prayers a special favor she had impressed upon him to submit to divine sanction, said to him, "Archie, why did you not pray for what I told you?"

The little fellow then eagerly explained, "Because it's a secret; if I had asked God about it, he would be sure to tell Mrs. God, and then it would be all over heaven in no time."

THE SECULAR SOCIETY

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 15 SUNDAY, APRIL 12, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Some people's minds are like a place of public meeting —all kinds of opinions appear there in turn, and leave it just as they found it, empty and open to every comer.
—ARNOLD TOYNBEE.

There are Others.

IT seems one of the most difficult things in the world to get Christians to recognise the existence of others. At first glance this seems an extravagant statement, since one would imagine that the existence of non-Christians was too obvious to be ignored. In a sense, this is so. Christians will admit the fact even while they deplore it. But the great bulk of believers, having made the admission, appear to consider that their duty in this respect has been fully discharged. When they come to consider the value of proposed measures before Parliament, or discuss any subject of social consequence, the argument is conducted, very largely, as though Christians were the only people that needed consideration, and the bearing of legislation on the Christian religion the really important point at issue. Under pressure, it is admitted there are others; but straightway their existence is ignored.

Take, as an illustration, the education question. This is constantly discussed among Christians as though the whole of the problem was how to secure a working agreement between the sects. I admit this is a problem, and if it could be secured there would be little chance of any other claims receiving consideration. Fortunately, the conflicting claims of the sects cannot be adjusted for any length of time, and so others are secured against a larger measure of injustice than would otherwise be the case. But how often does it dawn upon these people that there are others besides Christians to be considered? The modern civilised State is not a Christian State in any genuine sense. It is made up of all sorts of religious believers, with all sorts of creeds, and a large and growing number of unbelievers. And you cannot possibly satisfy sectarian demands for privileged treatment without inflicting an injustice upon those who are outside the sects. For, in the modern State, even the Christian believers, as a whole, represent nothing but a sect. A large one, maybe, but still a sect. This is a consideration that few Christians bear steadily in mind.

It is the same with the Sunday question. Christians demand, and feel morally injured if the demand is not granted, that nothing shall be done on that day that "outrages" the feelings of believers. They do not say nowadays that you must go to church, but they do say that you must do nothing on that day that hurts their feelings. It is exactly the same with Sunday concerts, Sunday excursions, and Sunday picture shows. No one should be allowed to say or do anything that displeases the Christian. He lives under the stupid delusion that the modern State is a Christian society that must be controlled in strict accordance with what he calls Christian principles. He does not always say this in so many words, but the idea is there all the same. He does not realise that the only rational basis for the modern State is to ignore these sectarian differences and deal with people on the basis of a common social life. He forgets, in short, that there are others.

In this matter, the Christian suffers from a very bad heredity. He has had it all his own way for so long, that he naturally finds it difficult to realise any radical change in the situation. He is in the position of a spoilt child who has never known what it is to have a wish refused, and who has seen the whole household arranged to suit his whims. The average Christian is not living in the modern State at all. Mentally, he is still living in the Middle Ages, when society was deliberately organised, so far as was possible, with reference to the maintenance of Christian doctrine, however much the doctrines might change from time to time. He simply cannot understand that society is, with increasing rapidity, freeing itself from the controlling influence of religious ideas. He not only continues to discuss social movements from the point of view of whether they hinder or promote the dissemination of religious beliefs, but he expects others generally to take up the same attitude. The discovery by an infant of its own toes, in all probability, initiates a very profound psychological revolution. But it is a trifling affair compared with the one that will be worked when Christians genuinely appreciate the existence in the State of others besides themselves.

The need for this revolution is shown very curiously, but very plainly, in the course of a recent article in the Inquirer on the Blasphemy Laws. The Inquirer has on several occasions spoken in favor of the repeal of these laws, but nearly always as though the decisive consideration was a religious one. In the present article, after expressing its dislike of the Blasphemy Laws, it points to the "injury which they do to the cause of religion," regrets that the agitation should be left largely in the hands of free-lances and Freethinkers," and asserts, "There is nothing in the least hostile to Christianity in the movement for the repeal, and it will be unfortunate if the impression is created in the public mind that what is demanded is greater liberty to attack the faith of other people in blunt and disagreeable language."

These strike one as rather poor reasons for supporting an excellent cause, and though doubtless they will appeal with some force to religious people, the strength of their appeal is derived from the inability of Christians to recognise the legitimate claims of non-Christians. Is it really a vital question whether the operation of the Blasphemy Laws injure religion or not? Would the Inquirer support prosecutions for blasphemy if they helped religion? Once upon a time, they unquestionably did this. In a society where religious belief is general and uniform, it can hardly be doubted that the suppression of anti-religious opinion helps to preserve and perpetuate religion. Persecution can accomplish its end if it can be made effective enough. It may work greater evil in other directions, but it can do, and has done, time after time, all that it aimed at doing. Assuming, then, that all attacks on Christian belief could be crushed out by persecution, would the Inquirer support it? If it would not, does it matter whether these laws injure religion or not? It is quite sufficient that they are unjust, that even though they benefit religion they strike at the higher interests of the whole of society. And their removal is demanded on the ground that in the modern State they are inevitably unjust and fundamentally vicious.

Why should it be unfortunate if the public—the Christian public, of course—get the impression that the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws will mean greater liberty in attacking religion, even in "blunt and disagreeable language"? It is quite a matter of taste whether language is disagreeable; and blunt speech is anything but a vice. Why should the faith of the Christian not be as open to attack as one's opinion concerning vaccination or the land laws? If the Christian will only awaken to the fact of others being in the world, he will realise that these others have the same right to attack him that he has to attack them. The demand of any believer that laws such as the Blasphemy Laws shall be maintained because their removal would make attacks on religion easier is a piece of sheer impertinence. If religion is attacked, it must depend for defence upon the weapons that every threatened opinion has to depend upon. But non-Christians do not now exist in virtue of the gracious kindness of Christians, and they decline to be muzzled in order to gratify the egotism and cowardice of believers.

To be quite frank, Freethinkers do want greater liberty to attack religious opinion—not merely legal liberty, but social liberty. What is the use of liberty if it does not include the right to attack—within limits recognised by all and imposed upon all—anything that we consider untrue or dangerous? Truth is always attacking. Justice is always attacking. There is no good done in the world without attack. And we object to special limitations being imposed upon Freethinkers when they choose to attack religion. We object to the policeman being turned into a theological expert, or a judge in first instance, as to what constitutes profane or blasphemous language. When the Catholic Church punished people for blasphemy, it had at least the dignity and sense to bring the offender before a court of ecclesiastics who might be considered experts on the subject. If the charge was damnable, the procedure was dignified. But it never condescended to the ridiculous measure of calling in the watchman or the man-at-arms to inquire whether his chaste ears had been affronted by the language used. Why, if Christians were only moderately endowed with a sense of humor, the Blasphemy Laws would not need repealing—they would be laughed out of existence.

What the Christian must be brought to realise is that we are not living in the thirteenth, or even in the seventeenth, century. We are in the twentieth century, and the conscious basis of the State is no longer what it was in the Middle Ages. Society is no longer made up of believers, and no one expects that it ever will be made up of believers. The existence of all sorts of opinion is not merely regarded as inevitable; it is accepted as something that is beneficial to the State. Uniformity of religious belief is as impossible in modern society as it is undesirable; and by mere social growth the position of religion has changed from one of paramount importance to a matter of purely private opinion. As an opinion, it can lay no greater claim to special treatment than opinion in general. If attacked, it must defend itself as it best can; but it is justified neither in resenting attack nor in calling in the aid of the policeman to repel it.

There are others. That is the immediate lesson for the Christian to learn. The modern State is not Christian. It is not based upon Christianity; it does not aim at the realisation of Christian ideals. The Christian is a member of the State. So is the Jew, so is the Mohammedan, so is the Atheist, so are scores of others. The Christian is no longer cock of the roost. He is but one of many. It may be disturbing to his egotism to face the fact; but face it he must, sooner or later. And when he does face it, if he does not become a better Christian in consequence, he will at least be a better man and a more profitable citizen.

C. COHEN.

Good Friday.

BOTH historically and mythologically Friday is an eminently interesting day. The Scandinavians regarded it as the luckiest day of the week. Such it turned out to be on six of the greatest occasions in the life of the illustrious discoverer, Columbus, the most wonderful of which was the discovery of the American continent on Friday, June 18, 1494. It was on a Friday that the famous battle of Bunker's Hill was fought; and it was on a Friday that John Adams made the motion that the United States were and ought to be independent. It was on a Friday that the Great Eastern sailed from Valencia, and it was on a Friday that she landed in safety with the cable at Heart's Content, Newfoundland.

It was on a Friday, mythology tells us, that Adam was created; on a Friday that, alas, he partook of the forbidden fruit, thereby bringing "death into the world, and all our woe, with loss of Eden"; and it was on a Friday that he died. Friday is a mythological term, signifying the day consecrated to the goddess Freya, or Frigga, a Scandinavian divinity of the character of the Roman Venus. Frigga was the wife of Odin, and the mother of Balder and other gods. She was worshiped as the goddess of fruitfulness and sexual love. Consequently her day was looked upon as a lucky one. But the moment we come to Christian mythology Friday becomes an unlucky day. In the Catholic Church, the Greek Church, and the Anglican Church it is a day of abstinence and mourning, in memory of the crucifixion of Jesus of Nazareth. It used to be the day commonly selected for the execution of criminals, and was in consequence often called "the hangman's day."

> "But once on a Friday ('tis ever they say)
> A day when misfortune is aptest to fall."

A man is styled "Friday-faced" because he is dejected and melancholy. Because Jesus is believed to have suffered a violent death on a Friday, every Friday is to be devoted more or less to fasting and lugubrious meditation.

It naturally follows, therefore, that Good Friday is pre-eminently a day of profound and universal grief. The Anglo-Saxons and Danes called it Long or Great Friday, and we read that "housel [eucharist] ought not to be hallowed on Long Friday, because Christ suffered for us on that day." From the fourth century the prohibition of communion became common. For a time it was customary in Spain to close the churches altogether as a sign of mourning; but in the seventh century the prohibition was condemned by the Council of Toledo. The Catholic Church has always insisted upon a specially rigorous fast on Good Friday. During the celebrations everything is draped in black, the officiating clergy not excepted. Even in Lutheran churches black is the universal color. The Church of England has a three hours' continuous service, during which the so-called "last seven words" are read and commented upon; and a tolerant, compassionate spirit seems to prevail. In one of the Collects this remarkable petition occurs:—

> "Have mercy upon all Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics, and take from them all ignorance, hardness of heart, and contempt of thy Word; and so fetch them home, blessed Lord, to thy flock, that they may be saved among the remnant of the true Israelites, and be made one fold under one shepherd, Jesus Christ our Lord, who liveth and reigneth with thee and the Holy Spirit, one God, world without end."

O the cruel irony and mockery of it all! In one form or another that petition has been going up to a deaf and silent heaven for many long centuries, and yet Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics are as far from conversion to-day as ever, if not much farther.

This is the day of the suffering Savior of the world. All the week he has been slowly and wearily treading the Sorrowful Way, and to-day it has landed him upon the cross of shame, and his suffering is so extreme that it drives him to the heartbreaking conclusion that his Father in heaven has utterly forsaken him. Why was all this cruel suffering inflicted upon him who never did any wrong? Why did the Father desert the Son with whom he was declared to be always well pleased? It all happened to him, we are confidently assured by both Bible and Church, because he represented us; because, though he knew no sin, he was yet made to be sin for us; in other words, because he was earning, through obedience and suffering that cost him his life, the right and the power to be the Redeemer of a lost and ruined world. Well, what proof is there that the colossal sum-total of tragic suffering was accepted by Heaven as an adequate propitiation for the sins of the whole world, or as the supreme pledge of the redemption of humanity? The certain fact of his resurrection some thirty-five hours later, answers Paul. He was "declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead" (Rom. i. 4).

Now, the doctrine of the Cross is fully before us. Let us look at it from several points of view. In the first place, although the story of crucifixion is very dramatically told, the Gospels cannot be pronounced to be perfect works of art. They represent Jesus as solemnly foretelling, in clearest language, and repeatedly for many months, the exact nature of the approaching end, which was not going to be an end, but only a new beginning, merely the gate into a larger and infinitely more efficacious and glorious ministry. And yet when the end did come the disciples are described as being in a state of the utmost despair, as if they had never heard their Master's confident prediction of his speedy resurrection. This is one evidence that the Gospels are not historical documents. According to one account they all forsook him and fled in his hour of direst need, following the example of his Father. In the second place, if the Church verily believes her own doctrine of the Cross, what canting hypocrisy it is, on her part, to mourn on Good Friday. If it became God the Father, "for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings," why should the sons who are being brought unto glory hang down their heads and weep on this the greatest and grandest day in all history? Is it not an unmistakable sign that the Church does not truly believe her own doctrine? Thirdly, if the doctrine of the Cross is true, how can you account for the incontestable fact that the alleged Spirit of the Cross has completely failed to win a dominant position in the so-called Christian world? Europe is governed to-day, not by the spirit of love, but by stern physical force. We sometimes hear London boasted of as the most thoroughly Christian city in the world, but London is kept in order from day to day, not by the love of God, "for whom are all things, and by whom are all things," but by the police, who never leave our streets, night or day, and who never venture out on duty without weapons of defence and attack. The same thing is true of Edinburgh, which is frequently spoken of as the city of churches. This is the rule throughout Christian England, to which there is not even one exception. What brazen mockery it must be, then, to claim Jesus Christ as "our Lord, who ever liveth and reigneth" with the Father and the Holy Spirit, "one God, world without end."

Is it not a reasonable, necessary, even inevitable, inference from the existing conditions of life in Christendom that Good Friday and Easter Sunday are of a purely mythological character, and that Christianity, resting upon the Incarnation, the Cross, and the Resurrection, is as mythological as any Pagan cult it ever succeeded in forcibly crushing out of existence? Every return of the sun, every fresh advent of Spring, is a beautiful and inspiriting spectacle, and as we witness it year after year we do well to feel joyous and jubilant; but the idea that individual and social salvation can come by mystic union with a dying and resurrected Savior-God is so visionary, so chimerical, and so fantastic that one cannot but be amazed at its survival in its Christian form. It is highly amusing to read present-day discourses upon "The Triumphs of the Cross" when the only things visible to the eye of reason are "The Glaring Failures of the Cross." It is perfectly true that Christianity did succeed in establishing itself in Europe; but its success, its so-called triumph, was due to the fact that the secular power was on its side and gave it the free use of its sword. The triumphs of the Cross have always been the triumphs of physical force. It has never reconstructed social life. It has ever winked at, sometimes even formally encouraged, injustice, the inequality of the sexes, the sovereignty of wealth at the expense of the poor, and class divisions and antagonisms. The truth of that statement is abundantly proved by the very fact that such social wrongs exist at this moment. It is well known that Charlemagne was a great Christian Emperor who flourished some four centuries after Christianity had become the State religion; but the administration of justice in his reign was a horrible travesty of justice. The plaintiff and defendant, in each case, were requested to cross their arms upon their breasts, and the verdict went to him who could hold out the longest. Charlemagne was a great conqueror, who gave the conquered the altogether delightful choice of either becoming Christians or being put to death. To those who read history dispassionately and impartially the establishment of the "Holy Roman Empire" under this monarch was one of the darkest deeds ever perpetrated, for it enabled Church and State to play into each other's hand in the most wicked manner imaginable.

Good Friday thus stands condemned as the date on which there came into being, according to the theologians, a new religion in which was revealed the infinite love of a heavenly Father, but which in in its influence upon the world engendered suspicion, jealousy, and hatred, and has caused more bitter strifes and brutal wars than all other agencies put together, but which at last, we rejoice to know, is gradually taking its departure.

Organisms Antagonistic to Health.—II.

(Concluded from p. 221.)

THE general conditions that govern the relationship of bacteria to diphtheria are substantially those that apply to all other diseases of bacterial origin. The disease germs invade the body, reproduce themselves, and evolve toxins. Anti-toxins and other opposing substances battle with the toxins, and the patient is restored to health. So far, however, in very few instances have disease-controlling substances of outside origin been discovered which may be injected into the tissues for the prevention or cure of human ailments.

All known anti-bacterial products are specific. That is to say, the anti-toxin of diphtheria, for example, has no preventive or remedial effect on any other disease. Animals into whose bodies the poisons of tetanus, or, as it is commonly termed, lockjaw, have been injected, manufacture the anti-toxin of tetanus and no other.

The problem of immunity to disease is a very instructive one. Some subjects never contract certain diseases however frequently they may be exposed to infection; and it is only in rare instances that we meet with patients suffering a second time from the same disease. Again, grown people seldom contract those complaints that commonly affect children. This absence of susceptibility to disease is what is meant by immunity. And this phenomenon may be usefully considered under two heads—that which is natural and that which is acquired.

Micro-organisms of one kind or another appear to be present in every human or other animal body. Natural immunity to disease, however, is much more general than susceptibility. The reason is not far to seek. Unless the invading germs discover a favorable environment, they fail to develop their malign powers. There is abundant evidence for the view that bacteria generate disease in a small percentage only of the individuals they attack. Proof positive exists that the germs of pneumonia and other maladies are to be found in the bodies of those who betray no signs of disease. Several ascertained causes account for this. Pathogenic germs are being constantly devoured by the white cells of the lymph and blood; soluble substances present in the blood oppose themselves to bacterial injury; antiseptic body conditions check baterial growth; the poisonous products of bacteria are rendered impotent for ill by the anti-toxins which the cells of the healthy animal body secrete. The part performed by these four valuable physiological processes varies widely with different individuals. Broadly considered, they all reach their highest state of efficiency when our minds and bodies are in a thoroughly healthy state. Conversely, they are least efficient when the mental and physical powers are depressed. Physicians testify to this in the case of many maladies. In dealing with the baneful tubercular diseases, it is regarded as of the utmost importance to aim at the restoration of the general well-being of the body if tuberculosis is to be cured or prevented.

But where ideal physiological conditions are lacking, a state of affairs which commonly exists, protective inoculation has proved extremely serviceable. The great Pasteur discovered that the toxins of cattle anthrax and chicken cholera, when they are developed in pure cultures in test tubes, tend to become weaker as the cultures grow older. Other means have since been devised by science through which it is possible to lessen the virulence of bacterial toxins. Prolonged investigations have proved that if weak toxins are first injected into the system, there is merely a mild attack of the malady. Then if toxins of steadily increasing strength are successively introduced into the animal body, the organism becomes more and more immune to the disease, until it is ultimately invulnerable to all further attack.

There is every prospect of the thoroughly successful application of the above principle to typhoid in the near future. The cholera so fatal to swine and the distemper so mortal to dogs, are diseases which are being treated by the same process, and let us hope that in the end much valuable food will be saved, and thousands of our faithful and intelligent canine companions will be spared a premature death.

It is of some interest to know that a few simple precautions may avert the unspeakable woes to which disease germs so frequently give rise. In the greater number of instances the bacteria enter the alimentary canal with food and water, they find their way into the breathing organs, are introduced into the blood through insect punctures, or secure an opening into wounds.

Asiatic cholera and typhoid fever are intestinal disorders generated by germs which are spread by excrement. Insect activity, aided by ill-regulated drainage, cause the contamination of nutritious matters, such as milk, fruits and vegetables, and oysters. Moreover, that indispensable necessity to health and cleanliness—drinking-water—is liable in such circumstances to constant contamination. Where these diseases prevail, every drop of water should be boiled, and all foods, including fruits and salads, should be cooked. The menacing powers of the dingy milk vessels are by no means inconsiderable.

Turning to the risk of infection through the organs of respiration, we find that tubercular affections are salient examples of these. Tubercle bacilli enter the lungs in many ways, and anything that encourages the dirty habit of indiscriminate spitting, slobbering, the fly pest, impure air, doubtful milk, and even the insane passion for draughty apartments is highly favorable to the dissemination of this infernal disease—a disease which has affected and proved fatal to some of the brightest intellects of the human race.

The natural healthy healing of wounds is absolutely dependent upon the absence of bacteria or the presence of some powerful anti-toxin. Any serious cut demands medical attention, and this, above all, in the case of those whose general health is in any way undermined. The use of surgically clean bandages and instruments is an all-essential condition if the very serious danger of lockjaw or septicæmia (blood-poisoning) is to be avoided. The inflammation of any wound, great or small, is a certain sign of bacterial activity.

Malaria is a disease of animal origin, which, in its worst forms, has long been one of the greatest scourges to mankind. Many valuable territories of wide extent have remained outside the pale of civilisation owing to its death-dealing powers. Malaria remained a practical mystery until the early 'eighties, when a protozoan parasite was detected in red blood corpuscles. From the earliest times malaria had been universally attributed to the poisonous vapors or miasma which haunted swamps and marshes. The word "malaria" itself means "bad air." In 1897, however, a British army officer, the now world-famous Sir Ronald Ross—an excellent Freethinker, by the way—demonstrated that the germs of malaria develop in the stomachs of mosquitoes which have absorbed the blood of malarial fever patients. In the following year, other scientists proved that mosquitoes, which suck the blood of diseased subjects, transmit the malarial parasites in drawing the blood of persons free from the malady. It has since been positively proved that the anopheles mosquito is the carrier of malaria, and this has led to a crusade of extermination against these offending insects.

Another protozoan disease is that horrible African disorder, the well-known sleeping-sickness, which has proved fatal to more than half-a-million natives of the Congo during the past dozen years. Sleeping sickness is caused by—

> "a parasitic protozoan which is injected into the human blood-plasma by the bite of a peculiar African fly. The parasite swims freely in in blood-plasma. Many experts on parasitic diseases are now engaged in studying the sleeping-sickness; but so far no satisfactory remedy has been discovered. It is spreading rapidly, and has become one of the greatest problems in Africa."

Other derangements, the protozoan genesis of which, although practically certain, so far lack conclusive proof, are yellow fever, scarlet fever, hydrophobia, and smallpox. In the case of yellow fever, however, it has been demonstrated that one of the various mosquitoes is concerned with the transmission of the undiscovered disease germ. The mosquito has, in consequence, been condemned, and the war of extermination waged against it has very materially minimised the death-rate from yellow fever both in Cuba and Panama.

The ubiquitous "harmless" house fly is a notorious disseminator of disease. It enters into every nook and cranny, and nothing is sacred to it. The insect is as partial to the refuse-heap as to the sugar-box, and wherever it wanders it carries the seeds of disease and death. Bacteriological science has shown the imperative need of a war to the point of extinction against the noxious creature. Experiment proves that if a fly is made to move across a sterile gelatin plate, it leaves along its line of march innumerable bacteria which it has gathered during its previous visit to the dunghill or other putrefying mass:—

> "Now, if a fly walks on sewage containing germs of typhoid or of other intestinal diseases, or on sputum from a tuberculous patient, and later on walks on food or on dishes ready to be used for food or drinking-water, it may leave in its tracks dangerous bacteria, which may be taken into the body with the food or water, and then cause disease. It is obvious that in this way a single house fly may be a very dangerous animal."*

The importance of sanitary dustbins, good drainage, and the absence of decomposing substances of all kinds in the vicinity of human habitations cannot be too urgently insisted on. The removal of the favorite breeding-place of flies is of as much consequence to us, as the destruction of mosquito-breeding spots has been to areas formerly decimated by tropical diseases.

And before leaving this filth-distributing and disease-creating insect, it will be well to remark that it is now definitely known that the biting stable fly is guilty of transmitting the germs of infantile paralysis.

Possibly the most disgusting of all known parasites is the tapeworm. All these loathsome creatures, and very many species are known to science, take up their abode in the alimentary canal of man and other animals. Destitute of mouth or digestive organs, they absorb through their integument the digested food of the organism on which they prey. The tapeworm's body is ribbon-like in form, is divided into segments, and narrows towards the head, which is rounded and provided with hooks and suckers. These last appendages enable the parasite to cling securely to the lining of the intestine.

Each of the larger posterior segments—those nearer the rectum of the animal host—has a complete bi-sexual reproductive system. After each of these reproductive segments has undergone the process of self-fertilisation, the segments which lie nearest the orifice of the animal they inhabit become swollen with ripe eggs. The mature segments now separate from the parent body, and are discharged with the excrement of their host. As the old segments drop off and are carried away, new ones are being formed. In the case of the human tapeworm, should the ripe segment happen to alight on herbage cropped by cattle, or infest the food of pigs, it secures an easy entrance into their stomachs, the digestive juices of which dissolve its outer covering and liberate the embryo tapeworm. Being now at liberty, it bores its way into the flesh of these animals and becomes encysted.

If underdone pork or half-raw beef be eaten by man, there is thus a risk of the encysted bladderworm attaching itself to the intestine, and there developing into an adult tapeworm. The most terrible of the roundworms is the trichina, and if pork infested with this parasite is used as food, the dangers are very serious indeed. In a single German city in 1884, the flesh of one pig infected 364 people, of whom 57 died within a month.

The foregoing description of the life-cycle of tapeworms affecting man is equally true of tapeworms in general. Two hosts are necessary, one for the adult tapeworm and one for the succeeding bladderworm stage. The early, or bladderworm, period of the tapeworm of gulls is passed in earthworms; that of cats in rats and mice. There is a large human tapeworm in Asia which goes through its first stage in the bodies of certain fishes.

The dog is a great sufferer from tapeworms, and one of the commonest of these pests (Tænia cœnurus) infests the intestines of the animal in its mature stage. The embryonic form of this parasite has been found in the brain of the sheep, occasionally in that of cattle, and more rarely in that of the horse. Another parasite passes its cystic stage in the bodies of hares and rabbits, which naturally form part of the food of the dog, and this tapeworm reaches maturity in that animal's intestines. As in the cases instanced above, the segments of the worm are expelled with the fæces, and the eggs they contain fall on the herbage, which is eaten by the rabbits and hares. But probably the most remarkable parasitic biography is that of a small, but long cucumber-shaped, tapeworm, the segments of which, when ripe, escape from the dog's intestines and scatter their ova upon the animal's skin. The eggs are there eaten by the dog louse or the dog flea, in whose bodies the ova are hatched and develop into cysts. The fleas and lice irritate the dog, who, in hunting for them with tongue and teeth, is apt to swallow some of them. The eggs in their bodies are then hatched in the dog's interior, and soon reach the mature form. So that we see that the wants of the tapeworms are better provided for than the fall of the sparrows.

Omar Khayyam.

"Golden Eastern lay
Than which I know no version done
In English more divinely well,
A planet equal to the sun
Which cast it, that large infidel,
Your Omar." —TENNYSON.

THAT large Infidel!

An advertisement of the Young People's League connected with St. James's Congregational Church, Newcastle, announcing "An Evening with Omar Khayyam," with the additional attraction of a song cycle, "In a Persian Garden"—a selection of the quatrains to be rendered by a quartette—was sufficiently alluring to tempt me into the religious atmosphere of a church meeting. I was curious also to see how the philosophy of old Omar would be received in such a quarter, and how it would be treated by a Christian speaker. The reflections of the Persian poet on life and destiny, so utterly at variance with Christian thought and tradition, if presented in all their naked significance, would surely shock the religious susceptibilities of even a Congregational audience. Or so I thought. But one never knows. The old Presbyterian church of my childhood was recently the scene of an amateur theatrical performance—notwithstanding that the Westminster Confession forbids stage-plays as a breach of the seventh commandment, a sin in the same category as adultery. Could it be that these Congregationalists, also forsaking their one-time belief in heaven, were going to give god-speed to the Caravan starting for the Dawn of Nothing?

The evening's program was arranged by a Mr. Arthur Lambert, well known in local musical circles, and a member of the said church. In his introductory lecture, before the appearance of the quartette, Mr. Lambert said it would be his purpose, the better to enable them to appreciate the music that was to follow, to try and create something of an Oriental atmosphere. To that end he had been drinking black coffee and smoking Turkish cigarettes all the day. And everything seemed favorable to the lecturer's object: the fine commanding presence of the speaker, a good audience, a splendid lecture-hall, a desirable platform arrangement, and a subject worthy of the occasion. But somehow the Oriental atmosphere was not forthcoming. The few bald facts connected with the poet's life and Fitzgerald's popular translation of the Rubaiyat which he presented, failed to conjure up the faintest trace of an Eastern environment. Indeed, it was not long before one realised that the philosophy of Omar Khayyam was beyond the speaker's mental grasp. Omar's verses, he said, had a peculiar fascination for him; but it was apparent that it was not the sentiments or ideas of the poem that charmed him; it seemed rather that fatal kind of fascination produced on the mind by the repetition of phrases like "Punch, brothers, Punch." And when the speaker rather pityingly apologised for the heresies of Omar, by declaring that if the Persian's search for God was unavailing, the search itself was to his credit, inasmuch that many people at the present day never even troubled to seek for him, it was evident that his point of view was a serious hindrance to his understanding of the old Pagan. The Christian apologist is always assuming that every philosopher in the world is in search of the little tribal Deity of the Jews, whom he has been graciously pleased to adopt as his own pet idol. He is unable to realise that a thinking person may meditate on the deeper things of life without reference to his theistic beliefs; and it is this limitation which prevents him from comprehending a wider outlook than his own.

Perhaps the most objectionable feature of the address was the statement that it was permissible for each individual to read into the text his own particular views, no matter how much at variance, apparently, they might be with its obvious meaning. This ingenious method of interpretation might, indeed, cause some surprise, if we did not know that it is the usual Christian method of explaining away views and opinions with which they disagree. A French translator of the Rubaiyat, Mons. Nicholas, in order to hide the pronounced irreligious opinions of Omar, substituted for the words "wine" and "winebearer," the terms "Dieu" and "La Divinity"; although he exposed his own verbal jugglery by stating, in his notes, that whatever be the nature of the wine that Hafis drank and sang of, it was the veritable juice of the grape that Omar used. It was a strange method of exegesis that could extract a divine meaning from the following:—

> "Ah! take heed to stay me with the wine cup, and make this amber face like a ruby. Wash me when I die with wine, and out of the wood of the vine make the planks of my coffin."

As a friend of mine very neatly puts it, in his booklet, Omar, the Tentmaker: "It was a prodigious stretch of the imagination that drew a theological inference from that quatrain."

A Mrs. Cadell, too, an Englishwoman, attempted to revise the Rubaiyat on the plea that it was "too unbelieving." In the preface to her booklet she says: "Omar was a person of varying moods, strong feelings, and remarkable boldness; but he had some sort of belief at bottom"—meaning that he had some sort of belief in a Deity or the supernatural. In one quatrain she makes Omar say:—

> "Oh! Khayyam, this thy body is a tent.
> Death, the tent pitcher, strikes this tent of thine
> For life's next stage, whence thy soul hence must roam."

And thus the words of this "large infidel," by Mrs. Cadell and other Christian pietists, are twisted and distorted, interpreted, translated, and explained, to mean anything or everything but what the text plainly indicates. Showing that whatever virtues the Christian religion may have emphasised, intellectual honesty is not one of them. One has only to put some of Omar's verses side by side with Christian teaching to see how utterly irreconcilable the two are. Take, for instance, the believing suppliant looking up into the heavens and crying,

> "Our Father who art in Heaven.....
> Give ——,"

and then listen to old Omar's reply to all such futile prayer:—

> "that inverted Bowl we call the sky,
> Whereunder crawling coop't we live and die,
> Lift not thy hands to It for help—for It
> Rolls impotently on as Thou or I."

Again, Christian saints and sages have invented for us pictures of the felicities of heaven and of the tortures of the damned in hell; they have taught us how to make the best of both worlds; they have essayed to unravel the knots of human death and fate, and professed to possess the key to futurity and be able to pierce the Veil of the Hereafter. Omar summarily dismisses all such pretensions:—

> "Why, all the Saints and Sages who discuss'd
> Of the Two worlds so learnedly, are thrust
> Like foolish prophets forth; their words to scorn
> Are scattered, and their mouths are stopt with dust."

Omar's oft-repeated praise of the Wine-cup stamps him as an unbeliever in religion. Not that the Christian has any quarrel with him on that score—or did not have, until the rise of the modern temperance movement. But the Koran strictly forbids alcoholic intemperance, and this prohibition he satirises as follows:—

> "I drink wine and mine enemies from left to right say, 'Do not drink wine, for wine is the foe of religion.' When I heard that wine was the foe of religion, I said, 'By Allah! let me drink the foe's blood, for that is lawful.'"

When we remember that in chapter two of the Koran it is written that all foes to Islam may be slain with impunity, the quality of the sarcasm is seen to be simply superlative. Von Hammer was justified in calling Omar "A Freethinker." But it is more than probable that his lavish praise of wine is purely iconoclastic.

Mr. Lambert, in the early part of his address, illustrated the general ignorance of the Persian poet by the following story. A commercial traveller of literary bent had recently taken two grocers in the neighborhood, who were brothers, out to dinner. In the course of the meal he asked how they liked Omar Khayyam? Said the younger of the two: "I think I like Chianti better." On the way home, the elder took his younger brother severely to task for his display of ignorance. "Whenever you are in any doubt about a subject like that," he said, "you should be careful not to say anything definite so as to give yourself away. Omar Khayyam is not a wine—it's a cheese!"

Which reminds me that the gentleman who seconded the vote of thanks at the end of the meeting must also have been a grocer, as his knowledge of Omar Khayyam was as newly acquired as the pitman's of the Crucifixion. This collier, on the way home from work, met a peddling Jew, whom he very soundly thrashed. "What you do that for?" said the astonished Hebrew. "Well, wasn't it you Jews that killed Jesus Christ?" "My dear fellow, that was two thousand years ago." "Never mind," said the pitman, unabashed, "A'w only heard aboot it yisterday." And so the seconder of the vote of thanks, who professed his ignorance of what the lecturer had called one of the world's poetic gems, only appeared to have heard of old Omar that night for the first time.

Whether this gentleman in particular, or the audience in general, were much the wiser as the result of the meeting respecting the profound philosophy of Omar, may reasonably be doubted. A Christian apologist makes but a poor expositor of the Rubaiyat. As we left the meeting, the lady who accompanied me said she thought an evening with Omar Khayyam was much better spent "beneath the Bough" or at the fireside. And I thought so too.

According to the orthodox creed, Easter is the anniversary of a judicial murder. Judging by all the circumstances surrounding it, it might be the anniversary of a wedding. Excursions by road, river, and rail are advertised wholesale. The common salutation of friends is, "Going away for Easter?" Given fine weather, the beauty spots around London will be crowded with thousands of holiday-makers solely bent on enjoying themselves. Hardly one in the whole lot will think of the holiday as in any way connected with the death of the Son of God for the sake of their sins. Sympathetic souls, if they happen to hear anyone piling on the agony about the agony and death of "our Lord," may, like the old lady in the story, reflect that it happened a long while ago, and hope that it is not true. But the vast majority won't care a brass button whether it is true or not. Easter is a holiday for them, and nothing else matters.

Easter is not the anniversary of an historic event in the way that June 18 is the anniversary of the Battle of Waterloo. It is a piece of very ancient world-wide mythology and was in existence before Jesus was ever heard of. Its date is avowedly fixed by the spring equinox, and this was a period of rejoicing among all the nations of the ancient world. Attis, Adonis, Osiris, Dionysus, all had, like Jesus, their death and resurrection symbolised at the spring festival. Easter has nothing whatever to do with the resurrection of a man, but it has a deal to do with the nature festival celebrating the resurrection of nature after the apparent death of winter. All that the Christian Church did here was to take the old myth and attach it to a supposed historical personage. Take Easter for what the Churches say it is, and an educated man is either disgusted or amused. Take it for what we know it to be, and we can appreciate its significance to primitive peoples, and still utilise it as a piece of poetic imagery now that its mythological significance has passed away.

The Christian Endeavor Union of Washington, U.S.A., has founded a society for the prevention of Easter desecration. It is objected that Americans utilise the "sacred season" as an occasion for displaying fashionable dress. The members of the new society pledge themselves not to wear any new clothes from Palm Sunday until after Easter. This is self-sacrifice beyond question. But why not revive the good old religious practice of doing without clothes altogether; or, at least, going without a wash?

The Bishop of London's Bill, introduced in the House of Lords last week, is pure Sabbatarianism, with the usual addition of personal tyranny that accompanies such measures. It proposes not only to still further limit the hours during which publichouses are to be opened on Sunday, but provides that the licensing justices may attach any conditions they see fit to the renewal of a licence. It also gives these same justices the power to issue a "general order" closing all the publichouses in a district during the whole of Sunday. No one but a religious "reformer" or a fool would dream of favoring proposals of this kind. His idea of reform is invariably that of forcing other people to act so as to please him. So far as we are concerned, the publichouses might be closed altogether without causing us any personal discomfort; but at present selling drink is a legitimate business, and there is no justification for placing them at the mercy of religious bigotry. If our legislators were stupid enough to make this Bill law, it would mean another sacrifice of personal liberty to the tyrannical spirit of Sabbatarianism.

The combined stupidity and injustice of the Blasphemy Laws could not be better exhibited than is done, quite unconsciously, in a leaflet that has been written and is being circulated in favor of their retention. We are told that the law only interferes in a case of blasphemy "in order to prevent a disturbance of the peace," because "blasphemous preaching and writing has led, and may lead, to dangerous outbreaks of fanaticism." So the real trouble is, evidently, not the "blasphemer," but fanatical people who are neither level-headed enough nor civilised enough to hear their opinions assailed. One would think that the real cure for this state of things would be to take hold of these ignorant and fanatical people and teach them better manners. The writer of the leaflet evidently thinks they deserve special protection, if not patronage. His defence of the laws is really an attack on religious believers. The sum of his argument is this: If religious people were all cool and level-headed there would be no need for Blasphemy Laws. But, he says, we are not that. We are hot-headed, we easily become brutal, we lose our tempers, we easily become fanatical, and unless the State stops people "blaspheming" we are bound to misbehave ourselves. Usually we aim at suppressing the lower in the interests of the higher. Here the only argument found in favor of the Blasphemy Laws involves the suppression of the higher in the interest of the lower. The "blasphemer" must be suppressed in order that the ignorant fanatic may flourish. It is not we who say this. It is the Christians themselves who say so.

The cocksureness of the religious mind is becoming modified. The Guardian says, "We greatly doubt whether the collective mind of our race would desire for itself a perpetuity of life on this planet, except under conditions widely different from any that are likely to obtain." What of the credo, "I believe in the resurrection of the body"?

We are pleased to find the Baptist Times approving the advice of an American writer who warns us that there has been too much dwelling of late on vice, and that no nation is ever made better or healthier by such means. This is exactly what we have pointed out when dealing with writers like Mr. Harold Begbie, preachers like Rev. F. B. Meyer, and organisations like the Salvation Army. These people and parties have of late gone in for a perfect carnival of exaggeration and deliberate lying concerning the amount of vice in our midst. They have set thousands of amateurs prowling round in search of vice of one sort or another, who have developed in turn a Munchausen-like aptitude for narrative, and a credulity that would have made Tertullian green with envy. "Educationally," says the Baptist Times, "it is a mistake to be always looking at the dark side of life." Of course it is. Life is not all dark side, and a healthy vision sees life whole. But it is worth noting that those who have served most powerfully to demoralise the public mind of late have been Christian preachers and writers.

From the New York Truthseeker we see that Police-Lieut. Becker, who was recently convicted and sentenced to death for murder and "graft," has spent the time pending his appeal in religious meditation. Becker is a staunch Roman Catholic, and the only event in his life he expresses remorse for is that of remarrying after being divorced. The agent of Becker during his official career, Jack Rose, turned State evidence, and was the principal cause of securing a conviction. Rose is also a very pious person. He has become a preacher, and spends his time on evangelical tours. Now, if only Becker is released eventually, and if he and Rose could join forces and go round the world conducting revival meetings, we feel sure that they would make more—far more—in this way than they ever made out of bribery and assassination. Both have had the finest conceivable preparation for a successful evangelical combination.

"From America, the Chapman-Alexander Mission has descended on Scotland to give the populace religion, and judging by a meeting in Edinburgh they are getting it hot and strong. We knew Mr. Alexander as a singing evangelist some years ago in partnership with Dr. Torrey; Dr. Chapman is newer—and different. 'So help me God,' he exclaimed in one part of his sermon, 'if you, you the keeper of a publichouse—you who are helping to ruin young Scotland worse than the plague of tuberculosis, worse than cancer, are in this audience, so help me God I would fight you to the last drop of blood left in my body. If you continue in it you are worse than a murderer, a murderer, a murderer! You get it, don't you? You are worse than a murderer.' This may demonstrate that Dr. Chapman is teetotal, but it is not convincing evidence that he is sober. Mr. Alexander should prevail upon his brother to cool his throbbing brain under the pump."—John Bull.

The minister of the Upminster Congregational Church understands the way to untie the purse-strings of the average Christian. In the Monthly Calendar for April he writes that "the more we give to Foreign Missions the more prosperous shall we become at home in every way." That is the right note to strike. Spiritual advancement abroad with material progress at home. The spread of the Gospel with a solid cash dividend. That is what the ordinary Christian likes, and he is never happy till he gets it.

"How was it," asks Rev. R. J. Campbell, "that Christ was able to sweep that whole [Pagan] Pantheon out of existence?" Well, he didn't. That is the plain and complete answer to the query. "Christ" was, indeed, part of the Pantheon. The heaven-born, crucified savior was one of the world's religious figures long before the Christian Church was heard of. Mr. Campbell himself says:—

> "The practice of the Roman Catholic Church to-day..... is exactly that of the pagan world out of which it arose, and has doubtless been copied from it. People went to certain shrines to be healed, and hung up their crutches and other relics of their infirmity as a thanksgiving for recovery. The little niches in the walls and inside the dwelling-houses which used to be occupied by little statues of gods are now replaced by those of saints. The old processions, feast days and fast days, the candles and the incense, even the altar vestments of the priests, have been adopted into the Church. It is not too much to say that the worship of the Madonna in the countries of Southern Europe is a survival of the worship of Isis; as some authorities declare, the Madonna is but Isis renamed."

If this is so, where is the sense of asking how Christ cleared out the Pagan Pantheon? The Christians simply adopted an old business as a going concern, and effected various modifications in view of a larger turnover.

What nonsense some of our religious philosophers do talk! There is no law of progress, declares Dean Inge, because only a proportion of the race really makes progress, and because degeneration is as common in nature as ascent. We do not think anybody ever questioned these rather commonplace observations. All they prove is that there is no certainty of progress. That is admitted; but the "law of progress" only means a statement of the conditions under which progress is achieved. And, obviously, these conditions admit of a summarised statement whether progress be an isolated or a universal phenomena, or whether it is permanently cumulative or merely sporadic.

"The quarrel between theology and physical science," says Canon Carnegie, "is almost a thing of the past." We should say quite a thing of the past. It takes at least two to make a quarrel, and theology has been so hopelessly beaten here that it no longer pretends to put up a fight. Canon Carnegie goes on to say that "the best theologians and the best scientists have practically agreed to delimit their territories and to exchange their former attitude of hostility for one of friendliness, and often of cordial co-operation." We were not aware of the fact. There is only one limit to the region over which science rules or claims the possibility of ruling, and that is the limit fixed by all knowledge, actual and possible. Everything that is known or may be known forms a portion of the scientific domain. What lies beyond this is blank, irretrievable ignorance. Religion is quite welcome to reign over that territory, and science has never questioned its jurisdiction. One only wonders how there can be any co-operation between the two. The fact is that it is too dangerous nowadays for religion to lay claim to special knowledge concerning anything that is made the subject of verification. It tried that game for centuries, and has evidently learned a little wisdom from its decisive defeat.

Canon Carnegie says, "We are inclined nowadays to regard the Cardinals who tried Galileo, and forced him to recant his statement that the sun goes round the earth, as a very arrogant and foolish set of old gentlemen." Personally, we are not inclined to regard them as foolish, although they may have been arrogant. They were even wiser in their generation than Canon Carnegie is in his. They were Christians, their business was to uphold Christianity, and they saw, with absolute accuracy of vision, that to admit the teaching of the new astronomy was to take the first step towards the disintegration of Christian doctrines. Subsequent events fully justified their judgment in this direction. True, they were mistaken in thinking they could altogether crush the new knowledge. But they did their best. They were Christian soldiers fighting a forlorn hope, and one really feels a more sincere admiration for these men who fought to the last, and who would admit of no compromise, than for those who, on the approach of the enemy, show an overpowering anxiety to come to terms.

Suppose the Church could have crushed out the new astronomy, as it had crushed out the science of antiquity? Suppose it could have crushed out the teachings of Copernicus, of Galileo, of Newton, of Buffon, of Laplace, of Lyell, of Darwin, would not Christian belief have been sounder and stronger, and unbelief more of a rarity, than is the case to-day? We should still have had the earth as the centre of the systems, we should still have believed in witches, in demoniacal possession, in miracles, in direct answers to prayer. We should be living in a quite Christian world, and our knowledge of nature would have offered no serious obstacle to the reception of Christian doctrines. We should have been very much more ignorant, much more brutal, but we should have been much more Christian. These Cardinals and their kind did their best in a desperate situation. And it ill becomes a Christian preacher, whose chief anxiety is to run with the hare and keep in with the hounds, to call them "a very arrogant and foolish set of old gentlemen." Their real fault was that they were Christians who believed in their creed and in their Church.

Few Christians need to pray to be given a good conceit of themselves. It appears to be part of their nature. Here is the Dean of Durham, Dr. Hensley Henson, calmly remarking that the Christian seems "marked out at this crisis for the rescue of the country," which is rather cool considering the large share Christians have had of getting it into difficulties. Dr. Henson offers two reasons for his belief. One is that the Christian is pledged to self-sacrifice, and is not daunted by the sacrifice of self-interests; the other, that "his religion is a genuine enfranchisement, making him what a Secularist can never be, independent of his circumstances." We do not care what the Christian is pledged to, we only know that there is to be found in any church or chapel in the country as fine a collection of greeds and self-seekings as can be found anywhere. The average Christian talks about sacrifice, and imposes it upon other people. As to the Christian being independent of circumstances, that is just sheer nonsense—the kind of nonsense that constitutes nine-tenths of pulpit talk nowadays. If the country's only hope lies with Christians, the outlook is a poor one indeed. But this assumption that Christians are the only ones that really count is merely a part of Christian egotism and impertinence.

Every Englishman, said Heine, will say something stupid if you talk to him about religion. Heine intended this, not for those whom nature has liberally endowed with folly at their birth, but for those who, in other directions, were blessed with a fair share of common sense. The strange thing is that so many of these act as though their chief object in life was to demonstrate the truth of Heine's observation. Judge Parry, for instance, contributes articles to the Sunday Chronicle that are usually marked by good feeling and good sense. But, in the issue for April 5, he brings in Christianity, and straightway what he says reminds one of Heine. Judge Parry is an Englishman; he touches on religion; he says something silly. Heine would have said it could not be otherwise. And we agree with Heine.

Nineteen hundred years ago, says Judge Parry, "a new principle was introduced into the world. It was the principle of unselfishness." Really! One wonders whether Judge Parry seriously believes that unselfishness began two thousand years ago. If he does, and he will turn into one of the excellent libraries that Manchester possesses, and spend an hour or two with any one of the Roman writers—Seneca, or Epictetus, or Aurelius, for instance—he will find how woefully he is mistaken, and how unwise it is to import into a newspaper article the irresponsible chatter of the pulpit. Two thousand years ago, we are told, doing good to others, promoting good-will instead of strife and ill-will, these ideas "as business propositions" were as unknown as railways, telegraphs, or aeroplanes. Well, this is simply not true. They were taught then as they are taught now, and we seriously invite Judge Parry to open his eyes and reflect on the huge war taxes that the whole of Christian Europe is groaning under, and also to reflect on the further fact that Old Rome could maintain its rule with an army of 400,000 men, where Christian Europe needs 4,000,000, and is clamoring for more. A vision of to-day, says Judge Parry, would seem to Marcus Aurelius like a "wild fairy tale." Hardly that; more probably a nightmare. And one can imagine the grand old Roman philosopher wondering what all our talk of progress is about if the Europe of to-day is all we have to show for what has been done since the sceptre of Roman rule was broken.

Pious invective is often found in the sporting pages of the lively Referee, but "Vanoc" recently made a slip in his theological terminology by saying "If the Cabinet does not destroy the Empire, the All-compassionate Allah will have intervened." "Jehovah" is first favorite in England, and "Allah" a rank outsider.

The Oxford manner has been described as like that of Almighty God addressing a bug, but sometimes under the haughty culture there is something of note. Dr. T. B. Strong, Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, preaching at Southend-on-Sea recently, said:—

> "There was one view of the Bible and one way of teaching it that had become impossible. They could not go to it any longer for information upon the subject of natural science. When they read its history—say the history of the Kings of Israel—they must bring to it the same tests as history of other sorts; and therefore the notion that they could teach people religion by making them read the Bible without note or comment had, in his opinion, disappeared for good. It never was true, and it only seemed to be true because they had never realised the context in which the books of the Bible were written and should be read."

If this sort of thing goes on, Mr. Foote's Bible Heroes and Bible Romances will be used as Sunday-school prizes.

"Abolish religion and we go back to the stone age," says Mr. Winston Churchill, the American novelist. In spite of Winnie's tears, we are going back.

"It is safe to disregard what is known as the spirit of the age," says Canon Green. Some greener Christians prefer the spirit of the Stone Age.

There is just as much religion in making a good pie as there is in making a prayer, says the Rev. R. L. Jones. Very likely; but there is a deal of difference from the point of view of nourishment.

The Times Literary Supplement published a two-column appreciation of the great Italian poet, Giosue Carducci, and referred to him as "the greatest poet alive at the beginning of the twentieth century." Of course, no mention was made of his Freethought opinions. On this subject the Times is always "out of joint."

The Southend-on-Sea Town Council have transferred the care of the Borough Cemetery from the Entertainments Committee to that of the Health Committee. An appropriate text for the cemetery gates would be the quotation from the Prayer Book, "There is no health in us."

Religious periodicals still persist in their statement that "popular Freethought is dead." The editors are now trying to ignore a very lively corpse.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £124 6s. 11d. Received since:—"Manchester" (per J. T. Lloyd), 5s.; T. A. Matthews, £1; Juliet and Julian, 7s. 6d.; Josh Roeckel, £1 1s.; Wm. Stevens, £1 1s.; Mancunian, 2s.

ANTI-CANT.—Some good might be done by Secularists joining these "brotherhoods," and then insisting on expressing their opinions about religion, but we are not very hopeful of what can be accomplished in that direction. As you say, it would test the genuineness of the talk about "brotherhood." The probability is that they would be made to feel so uncomfortable that they would soon leave again. They would not be directly excluded, they would be quietly squeezed out. We do think, however, that in most organisations Freethinkers too easily permit Christians to air their religious opinions whenever and wherever they please, while maintaining silence about their own convictions. If they would insist on the same right for themselves, they would soon find themselves in a position of advantage and respect.

H. PAIGE.—We noted that one of the jurors in the Starchfield case affirmed, and that his affirmation was taken without trouble. This is usually the case in the higher courts and before responsible judges. It is usually the fussy, irresponsible J.P. or Coroner who makes a bother about permitting a Freethinker to exercise his legal rights. We, personally, agree with you on your comments concerning the futility of capital punishment, and also as to what you say on the question of punishment in general. But our criminal code is a semi-barbaric survival, and reforming ideas progress almost as slowly in legal matters as in the Church.

A. J. MARRIOTT.—Received, but we are arranging for a reply from another quarter, and there is no need for duplication.

H. D. MARSH.—We do not see that it is any special concern of yours where the discussion on which Mr. Moss based his article, A Three-Cornered Contest, took place, and we decline to bother him about the matter. The only legitimate concern of readers is whether anything is said that misrepresents the speakers in the discussion. For our own part, we do not care whether the discussion ever took place in fact or not. Imaginary conversations constitute a perfectly legitimate vehicle for the expression of opinions. We were under the impression that everybody was quite aware of this, but your letter shows that we were mistaken.

MANCUNIAN.—Acknowledged as desired. Your communication will appear next week. Mr. Foote, as you will see, is improving in health, but is not yet able to resume work.

CORRESPONDENTS will greatly oblige, and will also facilitate the dispatch of business, if they will mark all letters "Private" that are intended for Mr. Foote and are of a personal nature. Those containing editorial matter may be addressed in the usual manner.

I HAVE little to say to my friends amongst my readers except that I am gradually getting my strength back, and that this is one of the most melancholy businesses I know. But I have no doubt I shall get to the end of it before very long, and my pen will (so to speak) long for fresh activity when the hour strikes. Meanwhile I have two duties to perform; one is to keep as quiet as I can,—the other is to thank Mr. Cohen for doing the editorial work of the Freethinker in my absence. He is not merely doing a good turn for a friend; he is serving what George Meredith called "the best of causes." For there is only one Freethinker in the world. And we have all of us made it what it is.

Whit-Sunday is now only six weeks ahead, which is the date of the Annual Conference of the National Secular Society. The place of meeting is not yet fixed, but Branches should be preparing, so as to send in good time any resolutions they may have for the Agenda. The Executive of the N. S. S. is keenly alive to the need for a more effective organisation of propaganda throughout the country, but much of what it is able to do in this direction will depend upon the amount of local interest exhibited.

Branches are reminded that all Notices of Motion for the Agenda should reach the Secretary by May 2, so that they may appear in the Freethinker a fortnight prior to the meeting. The annual collections, one on behalf of the Benevolent Fund and one on behalf of the General Fund, are also due on the same date.

The April number of the English Review opens, as usual, with specimens of poetry. Sometimes they are striking and meritorious, but they cannot always be so, for good poetry is seldom written. This month's batch of verses can hardly be regarded as successful, though there is a touch of originality—or should we not rather say frankness?—in "Lips of My Love" by Katherine Prichard. Mr. Henry Newbolt's prose article on "The Poets and their Friends" is interesting in its way, but not of any special value. We confess to being bored by every fresh instalment of Mr. H. G. Wells's "The World Set Free." "An Ordinary Corpse" by Grant Watson is a gruesome story. When you have finished reading it your consolation is that it can't be true. James Stephens' curiously named "Essay in Cubes" is an extraordinary mixture of sense and nonsense. There are some excellent things in "Some Maxims and Reflections" by the late Professor Churton Collins. Here is a good sample:—

> "'I will give you,' said a certain tutor of my time at Oxford, 'all Theodicy in a nutshell. There is a pond and a duck. The Ancients said the pond was made for the duck; the Moderns say the duck was made for the pond; but the really wise man says there is the pond, and there is the duck.'"

Mr. Harrison's editorial contributions are always good reading. This month's is no exception to the rule.

From the last issue to hand of the Christchurch (N. Z.) Examiner, we regret to see that Mr. Collins' health has "completely broken down." We do not know the exact nature of the trouble, but we have a suspicion that the cares attendant to running a Freethought journal—never an easy task—are not unconnected with it. We hope that Mr. Collins will abide by the decision of his medical adviser and give himself the complete rest ordered. It may be the quickest and most profitable way in the end. His many friends in this country will hear of his illness with regret and join with us in wishes for his speedy recovery.

There is hardly any talk more mischievous than that which proceeds by way of asserting the "God-given" supremacy of this nation or that race. It is a gospel of international or inter-racial hatred and tyranny that brings its own nemesis sooner or later. Here, for example, is Major S. L. Murray preaching, in the Nineteenth Century, the "God-given" supremacy of the white man over all others, and calling upon the European peoples to combine in order to dominate all others. Above all, the white man is implored to organise so as to keep the yellow man out of Australia. These short-sighted preachers of racial animosity do not realise that their own preaching is a very active force in bringing about international trouble. It is teaching the millions of Japanese and Chinese that the only way to make the white man act fairly to them is by their being strong enough to compel him to act justly. The notion that the population of Australia can for ever bar out the Japanese and the Chinese is a dream of white egotism and greed. The yellow races will only submit to exclusion so long as they cannot prevent it, and they will meanwhile, under the constant irritation of exclusion, serve as a real danger elsewhere. The real "yellow peril" is created by the white man's treatment of people as civilised as himself, but whom he persists in treating as his natural inferiors.

When religious differences come to be and are regarded as mere differences of opinion, it is because the controversy is really decided in the sceptical sense, though people may not like to acknowledge it formally.—"Liberty, Equality, Fraternity," Sir J. Fitzjames Stephen.

Louise de la Ramee.

Ouida: A Memoir. By Elizabeth Lee. (T. Fisher Unwin.) 1914.

To those who are passing into middle life the name of Louise de la Ramee, better known as Ouida, will recall a novelist who earned the title of the queen of the circulating libraries. A younger generation may have favorites of its own, but the great mass of English readers grew up under the influence of Ouida's genius, and delighted in each manifestation of her brilliant intellect. Her novels charmed their earlier years, and the freshness of her powers seemed only to furnish them with fresh gratitude every time they were exercised. They may have got to know the tricks of her style and the turn of her mind; but such knowledge served only to heighten the pleasure in a delightful personality that could not be disguised, however it was clothed.

It required extraordinary talent for a young and unknown woman to make a name in the literary arena as a novelist in 1868. At that date many really great writers held the field against all comers. Dickens and Thackeray were at the zenith of their extraordinary reputations. George Eliot, Mrs. Gaskell, Lytton, Lever, Charles Reade, Wilkie Collins, and Charles Kingsley were popular and deserved favorites. Obviously a new and untried writer had to contend against the giants. That Ouida did this successfully shows the fascination of her work.

It was in this year that Ouida captured her public with Held in Bondage, and she held her own successfully until the end. A very late work, The Massarenes, an able study of a plutocrat, showed all of the old magic. Under Two Flags, issued in 1867, is probably her best story, excellent in plot and movement, and containing a charming story of a vivandiere.

Ouida had power, imagination, and more knowledge than many of her rivals, having a keen interest in intellectual and social matters. She had an abiding sympathy with suffering, and was a humanitarian before that pursuit became fashionable. Her gift for epigram was not confined to novels; and, unlike Mr. Chesterton, she always mixed her epigrams with common sense.

A striking personality, she had her little vanities. "You must make much of me, for now George Eliot is gone there is no one else who can write English," she writes. With scornful accent she tells Mrs. Shirley Brooks that she "ought to be listened to even if singing is going on." So proud was she that she tore up cheques sent to her when she was in poverty, and on the edge of want she would entertain with oriental hospitality. She was a friend of Lady Orford, who powdered her hair with flour, and used the kitchen dredger in the process; and Ouida's own unconventionality was worthy of the model.

The most marked trait in Ouida's character was her love of animals. She was an early champion of those dumb slaves for whom Mr. Henry Salt and the Humanitarian League have since done so much. She was attracted to Matthew Arnold by his love of dogs, and her elegiac lines upon him recall his own lines upon "Geist's Grave":—

"Stern law of every mortal lot!
Which man, proud man, finds hard to bear
And builds himself I know not what
Of second life I know not where.
But thou, when struck thine hour to go,
On us, who stood despondent by,
A meek last glance of love did'st throw,
And humbly lay thee down to die.

Thy memory lasts both here and there,
And those shalt live as long as we,
And after that—thou dost not care!
In us was all the world to thee."

Thackeray was fond of dilating upon the power that novelists enjoy of conferring pleasure. He tells how he read Scott, Fenimore Cooper, and Dumas as a boy, and he boasted that the tastes of his youth had not deserted him in manhood. How many hours of pleasure has not Ouida given to her readers? For over forty years she delighted the reading public. All Englishmen knew her books, and their popularity in the Colonies was enormous. In America rival publishers competed which should be first to print them for Transatlantic readers.

Yet it would be a mistake to dwell merely on the amusement that her books provided, or to think of Louise de la Ramee as an idle writer of an empty day. The appeal of her novels may have been melodramatic; but their most censorious critic could not deny that their author had brains. From story-telling Ouida turned easily to intellectual matters. She put forward arresting opinions on Italian politics, on the development of woman, on Socialism, on the defects of society, and on the rights of downtrodden races. On all the movements of her time she formed clear and strong opinions. She denounced militarism with all the wealth of her poetic and voluminous vocabulary. In religious matters Ouida was an outspoken Freethinker, and her picturesque denunciation of the Christian superstition had something of the eloquence of Ingersoll.

Ouida was more than a mere writer, for she fought in the Army of Human Liberation. On the battle-grounds of Freedom the soldiers get many wounds. If Ouida's works exhibit this warfare and this tumult on too many eloquent pages, we judge with the wisdom which tempers justice with sympathy. Her first claim is genius; but we recognise in Louise de la Ramee a woman born of that heroic temperament to which, after life-long recognition of the vanity of vanities, Liberty never grew old, nor Love failed of his loveliness.

MIMNERMUS.

Christian Apologetics.

I.—THE APOSTLE BARNABAS.

SOON after the publication of the first primitive Gospel, and many years before the appearance of the four evangels which are called "canonical," we find a considerable number of Christian writings of an apologetic nature in circulation among the primitive Christians. Some of these were of such an outrageous character that in later times, when many educated Pagans had entered the Christian fold, they were rejected as fabrications, their authorship was ascribed to heretics, and they were called spurious or apocryphal.

Apart from these, however, there were several writings that were received by all Christians as genuine documents, written by men who were said to have been companions of apostles, or to have been taught by apostles. Among the latter are the compositions of five writers who are called "Apostolic Fathers." These are: Barnabas, Hermas, Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp. The first, Barnabas, is said to have been Paul's colleague on his first apostolic journey (Acts xiii. 2—xv. 39); the second, Hermas, is said to have been the person named in Rom. xvi. 14; the third, Clement, to have been a companion and fellow-laborer of Paul mentioned in Phil. iv. 8; the fourth, Ignatius, is said to have been appointed bishop of Antioch less than forty years after the crucifixion of Jesus, and to have known and conversed with many of the apostles; the fifth, Polycarp, is said to have been a disciple of the apostle John, and to have been made bishop of Smyrna by apostles. Each of these "apostolic" fathers left writings behind him connected with the Christian religion, most of them containing quotations from the primitive Gospel. These quotations have been carefully examined by our modern Christian apologists, and those that are found to be in almost verbal agreement with similar statements in the canonical Gospels are declared to have been taken from the latter.

I will now briefly notice the so-called "apostolic" writings, with the view, chiefly, of fixing the date and illustrating the character of each. They are adduced by Christian apologists in proof of the apostolic authorship of the canonical Gospels.

The "Epistle of Barnabas" is found, with the "Shepherd" of Hermas, in the oldest MS. extant—the Sinaitic Codex—the two being placed after the other New Testament books. The Epistle is not addressed to any church, nor to any individual: it bears neither date nor author's name. It is therefore impossible to say with certainty when or by whom it was written. Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 198) is the first who mentions it, and he quotes it as "scripture." Though Clement calls the writer "the apostle Barnabas," the writer himself as good as says he was not an apostle. He states, for instance:—

> "I, then, not as your teacher, but as one of yourselves, will set forth a few things by which.....ye may be rendered more joyful" (par. 1)—"And this also I further beg of you, as being one of you, and loving you individually and collectively" (par. iv.)

The writer of the Epistle was not the Barnabas who is said to have been the Hebrew companion of Paul, nor was he even a Jew. This will be seen from the following extract:—

> "Moreover, I will also tell you concerning the temple, how the wretched Jews, wandering in error, trusted not in God himself, but in the temple, as being the house of God.....for through their going to war, it was destroyed, by their enemies; and now they, as the servants of their enemies, shall rebuild it," etc. (par. xvi.).

The allusion here to the Jews having to rebuild their city and temple as servants of the Romans is a clear reference to the building operations under Hadrian. About A.D. 120 that emperor commenced to rebuild Jerusalem, which he named Ælia, and he also caused a temple dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus to be erected on the site of the old Jewish temple. After the capture of Jerusalem by the Romans (A.D. 70) over 100,000 Jewish prisoners were sold into slavery, and an edict was issued forbidding all Jews to enter the holy city. Hence, when Hadrian commenced rebuilding, it is more than probable that all Jews found in or near Jerusalem were pressed into the service and made to assist as laborers. At any rate, it cannot be shown that the Epistle of Barnabas was written before A.D. 120, or even so early. The fact that Barnabas refers to a rebuilding as about to take place shows that if the building of the city had not already commenced, materials for the work—and probably the men also—had arrived there.

Again, no Jew, however much a Christian, would speak of his countrymen as "the wretched Jews," nor would glory in the destruction of their city and temple. Moreover, Paul's companion, Barnabas, was a Jew first, before being a Christian (see Gal. ii. 13). Furthermore, Barnabas says (par. xv.): "For which cause we observe the eighth day with gladness, in which Jesus rose from the dead." The regular observance of this day by the Church as a sabbath is another mark of the late date of the Epistle: no such observance can be traced to the first century.

With regard to the character of the so-called Epistle of Barnabas, this will best be perceived by giving three or four samples of the writer's teaching; for notwithstanding his disclaimer, it is clearly evident that the composer was a primitive Christian teacher.

> (1) "Blessed be our Lord, who has placed in us wisdom and understanding of secret things. For the Scripture says concerning us, while He speaks to the Son, 'Let us make man after our image and after our likeness.'.....And the Lord said, on beholding the fair creature man, 'Increase and multiply and replenish the earth.'.....Again, I will show thee how, in respect to us, He has accomplished a second fashioning in these days. The Lord said, 'Behold, I make the last like the first.' In reference to this, then, the prophet proclaimed, 'Enter ye into the land flowing with milk and honey, and have dominion over it.' Ye see, therefore, that we have been refashioned; as again He says in another prophet, 'Behold,' saith the Lord, 'I will take away from them their hearts of stone, and I will put into them hearts of flesh'" (par. vi.).

I have not omitted a syllable that would add to the lucidity of the foregoing teaching: I have placed the writer's quotations from the Old Testament in italics, in order to make the reasoning—I mean "teaching"—somewhat closer; though I cannot say that I thoroughly understand what he is elucidating. the only point that appears certain is that Barney claims to have been inspired by "the Lord" to correctly interpret the Jewish scriptures.

> (2) "Moreover, when fixed to the cross the Lord had given him to drink vinegar and gall. Hearken how the priests of the people gave previous indication of this. His commandment having been written, the Lord enjoined that whosoever did not keep the fast should be put to death, because He also Himself was to offer in sacrifice for our sins the vessel of the Spirit..... What says he in the Prophets? 'And let them eat of the goat which is offered with fasting for all their sins. And let the priests alone eat the inwards unwashed with vinegar.' Why so? Because to Me, who am to offer my flesh for the sins of my new people, ye are to give gall with vinegar to drink" (par. vii).

The foregoing exposition is a tissue of falsehoods and a conglomeration of nonsense. No such passages are found in the Old Testament, and no such commands were given to the Jews. The "inwards" were always washed, when not burnt (Lev. i. 9, etc.); the priests only ate choice portions (Lev. viii. 31—34; x. 12—15), and never with vinegar: it is not easy to see how or where the gall comes in. It should also be noted that the writer confounds "the Lord" of the Old Testament with Jesus Christ, both being called "the Lord" by the primitive Christians (including Barnabas), and both applying, without the smallest hesitation, anything stated of the god Yahweh to "the Lord Jesus." The foregoing extract furnishes further evidence that the writer was not a Jew.

(3) In the following paragraph Barnabas ascribes to Abraham a knowledge of the Greek language and numerals, though that patriarch, assuming him to be historical, lived more than a thousand years before a Greek kingdom or language came into existence. Barney assumes that Abraham knew that IH were the first two letters of the name Jesus, when written in Greek capitals—IHSOUS—and that I stood for 10, H for 8, and T for 300, as numerals. He says (par. x.):—

> "Learn then, my children, concerning all things richly, that Abraham, the first who enjoined circumcision, looking forward in spirit to Jesus, practised that rite, having received the mystery of the three letters. For the Scripture saith, 'And Abraham circumcised ten and eight and three hundred men of his household.' What, then, was the knowledge given to him in this? Learn the eighteen first, and then the three hundred. The 'ten' and 'eight' are thus denoted: 'ten' by I, and 'eight' by H; you have thus the initials of 'Jesus.' And because the cross was to express the grace of his redemption by the letter T, He says also 'three hundred.' He signifies therefore 'Jesus' by two letters, and the cross by one. He knows this who has put within us the engrafted gift of his doctrine. No one has been admitted by me to a more excellent piece of knowledge than this: but I know that ye are worthy."

The foregoing is most certainly an "excellent piece of knowledge," and for an ingenious and unscrupulous distortion of a simple passage in Genesis, Barney beats all our modern commentators hollow. I have space for but one more "excellent piece of knowledge" from the pen of this gifted writer.

(4) In the following extract Barnabas explains a portion of Lev. xi., in which the Jews are forbidden to eat the flesh of certain animals:—

> "'And thou shalt not eat, he says, the lamprey, or the polypus, or the cuttle-fish.' He means: Thou shalt not join thyself to be like to such men as are ungodly to the end, and are condemned to death. In like manner as those fishes, above accursed, float in the deep, not swimming like the rest, but make their abode in the mud at the bottom. Moreover, He says, 'Thou shalt not eat the hare.' Why so? Thou shalt not be a corrupter of boys, nor like unto such. Because the hare multiplies year by year the places of its conception..... Moreover, 'Thou shalt not eat the hyena.' He means, Thou shalt not be an adulterer, nor corrupter, nor like them that are such. Why so? Because that animal annually changes its sex, and is at one time male, and at another female.....Behold how well Moses legislated? But how was it possible for them to understand > or comprehend these things? We, then, understanding His commandments rightly, explained them as the Lord intended. For this purpose he has circumcised our ears and our hearts, that we might understand these things" (par. xi.).

The suggestions in the foregoing paragraph prove the writer to have been a man of very impure mind, with a coarse and positively filthy imagination. Setting aside his crass ignorance of Natural history, and his impudence and presumption in offering his own crude ideas as an interpretation of a passage which required none, only one of the animals he mentions—the hare—is named in Lev. xi. (or in Deut. xiv., from which that chapter is derived).

Paley tells us that the first promulgators of the Christian religion were men of "probity and good sense": but it is far more probable that they were, like Barnabas, silly, conceited, mendacious, and what we would now call old "bounders." ABRACADABRA.

Times of Tears.

SEE how they swing life along through the days, these ordinary pleasures and pains with their rich red drapings, their thousand shades, their art free from guile, and their philosophy in homespun! There is no room for God in the crowded thoroughfares of life's ordinary sorrows and joys. He is banished, but not, it may be, deliberately. Rather unconsciously than from clearly conceived desire is God forsaken in the laughter and tears of the everyday life. And, sometimes, when the mind is wearying in the drab plethora of the modern religious art that sings of God's many marvellous manifestations, it is refreshing to turn to the commonplace and see truth.

There is so little evidence of God in it that, after the ponderous weight of words, after the glaring colorings of religious experts, after the poetry and prose of supernatural passion, all flung heedlessly upon the commonplace by those inspired painters, we are surprised to find a strangely artistic plainness about the ordinary happenings of our lives.

God is not essential to our lives, nor to our happiness, nor to our sadness. Everything around us proclaims it very complacently. Everything proves it. Everything upholds the simple plain truth of it. Elaboration there is none; nor is there the least endeavor to force its evidence. You see it clearly, and feel it easily. God is not here. And, when I reflect upon this strange truism, there arises in my mind the old sense of the marvel of it all. God is not here. The great exertions of priestcraft to disprove it are like gossamers trailing after the sun to die in the west. The huge organism called the Church is a mirage whose last visioned palm melts with the taste of the real waters of truth. The verbal splendors of the glories of God are so many wind driven doves that fall dead and unnoticed by the waysides of the commonplace. God is not here. The natural passing of the hours, the ordinary fleeting of the days, gives God no opportunity. To be with us he must be brought.

Banal experience tells us that God, when he does come into the average mind, comes as an intruder. Whatever the heights of happiness we may be enjoying, whatever depths of despair we may be suffering, the entrance of God is heralded by a chilly breeze through the corridors of the brain. His welcome is cold in varying degrees. Never does the average mind glow warmly with appreciation. If merriment touch our moments with sunshine, God's welcome is zero. If we are nursing the little devils of human sadness the degree of cold generally corresponds with their number. We are more inclined to question the propriety of his entrance at these times than we are to bless him, or rather the people who announce his arrival, for without them he does not exist.

The ordinary person, it is noticeable, prefers to shake the wise head, smile somewhat sadly, and say, "Ah! you don't understand; you can't understand. Nothing can comfort me." And if the little devils are very numerous, and their prongs very sharp, God's welcome is very unsatisfactory. The average human mind simply won't tolerate God's soothing presence. It is more of a slight on the sincerity of the sadness than anything else. To be very sorrowful, then suddenly to be aware of the divine joy, and to use it as if it were really joy, is pretty much like playing the fool. Christians understand this; but, peculiarly enough, they do not seem to comprehend that it is rather hard lines on God.

Sometimes, too, the introduction of God is the introduction of the author of the sorrow; but not so much nowadays as it used to be. Still, there is a goodly number of people who feel themselves, in some dimly conceived way, opposed to God at these periods. Pastors tell us so, at any rate; and we believe them. And to bring God into the grief is like bringing the robber to anoint the wound with solace. Naturally enough, this is resented, in a quiet, furtive manner. Besides, is there not a double dose of bitterness in it? The burglar is recognised, and so also is the utter hopelessness of expecting a return of that which he stole. What God takes God keeps.

As I looked into the fire just now, I noticed, reclining against a caked mass of chirls, a white-hot piece of coal shaped like a cross, and glowing amidst blue flames. Perhaps it is an omen, a warning to me for this blasphemy. Who can say?

While God's presence is chilly, nowadays, during all the ordinary sorrows of commonplace life, there is yet a warm corner for him when the cold arms of death reach out from the darkness, as pastors put it, to encircle the body of someone dear to us. There is not so much God at the first crisis of human life, birth, in modern times; still less at the second crisis; but he still draws near at the third and last. Perhaps it is a crude, hard thing to say; but it seems that when decay begins God's opportunity comes.

The day may not be far distant when the only occupation allotted to priestcraft will be that of bidding farewell to the bodies of the dead. Gradually has God been shut out from the times that are draped with the dark curtains of sorrow in the lives of the common people. Already he has totally disappeared from their times of sunshine and happiness. Only death is left him.

And even here the warm corner is not without its discomfort. Minds are less sure of him than ever they were; and the twinge of heart-pain is not made any less severe by the mind's fitful struggles to think itself into a belief the heart cries out against. No matter for how long the dove of heaven may have fluttered through the skies of religious beliefs, no matter how strong may be the conviction that God dealt the blow from the kindliness of his great love, neither the strength nor the age of the belief influences the dull pain one whit. The heart closes around its own woe. God, and his consolation, play only on the surface, when they play at all. The average person, at these times, hangs around the consciousness an impenetrable egoism, through which I doubt, often, if even the dearest friend can enter. And the truth that is human tells us that a sister, a brother, a father, or a mother, well-beloved, comes nearer to the average heart than all the gods that were ever spun from fables and fears of man's mind.

When death speaks to us, a harder, and sadder, perhaps, realisation of the verities surges over our minds; and in the process there is a self-concentration that debars God. Unaccustomed to the strong faith of our philosophy, the average person pleads for an immortality his sorrow denies; and he pleads against a vague conviction that the after-life is a dream. With death in the darkened room close by, the ordinary mind is dubious of the heaven above; but, in its longings, despite the teachings of modern religion, it adheres more to the idea of resurrection than to that of an incomprehensible immortality. Only when the minister arrives does God make his entrance. The doubts are lulled. Resurrection gives place to immortality. The contradictions are smoothed down. The minister panders to the desires; and the closed door of the mind opens to let in—an instinct. The minister takes God away with him, and leaves immortality.

Without the idea of an after-life there would be no God. Immortality really keeps God in the picture. Nowadays God is a cosmic force, his supreme activity the making possible of another life where the old loves, cut asunder by death, will be relinked. Sensitive people, actuated by desire, and deluded by religion, still think the idea of immortality is a feeling, an instinct, something that lowly whispers to their hearts the graphic statement that it is something. This is the instinct of immortality. It only operates when the sorrow is somewhat assuaged by the balsam of the commonplace, when the curtain of egoism has been lifted by the pressure of the demands of the days. In times of tears there is no God; and immortality comes only as a longing, a sudden rush of the spring-waters of human love, when the mind discovers that the opportunities are lost for ever.

There is more truth in the commonplace times of tears and joy than in all the mighty works of religious learning; and some day, when the priests and pastors have been vanquished by the Army of Freethought, the people will marvel and wonder at the gullibility of their forefathers.

The white cross in the fire has crumbled to ashes. Underneath there is still the glow of red cinders. That, too, will disappear; but sleep will not come less soundly because the cross has crumbled; nor will the commonplaceness of life lose its social strength and health because the fires of religious faith are burning out.

ROBERT MORELAND.

National Secular Society.

THE Second Half-Yearly Meeting of London Members was held on Tuesday, March 31, at Chandos Hall, Strand.

Mr. Cohen was elected to the Chair, the President, Mr. G. W. Foote, being unable to attend on account of illness. A letter from Mr. A. B. Moss was read explaining his absence for the same reason. After the Chairman's opening remarks, the discussion was opened by Mr. Cunningham, who regretted that the resolution remitted from the last Conference, to arrange public demonstrations in places where the Freethought movement was not making satisfactory progress, and the resolution moved at the last half-yearly meeting, that Branches should be asked to break new ground by holding meetings at places adjacent to their present stations, had not yet been carried into effect; and, as a recommendation to the Executive, moved a resolution embodying both the foregoing, but making it apply more particularly to the Metropolitan areas. This was seconded by Mr. Rosetti.

Mr. Heaford thought that the term "Metropolitan areas" should be literally interpreted, and suggested taking advantage of the cheap excursions to provincial towns, and believed many men could be found to do pioneer work of that kind. After further discussion, Mr. W. Davidson moved, as an amendment:—

> "That the Executive be asked to appoint a committee of two to work in conjunction with the General Secretary in organising demonstrations and extra meetings on new ground within the London district, with a view to extending the work of the Society."

This was seconded by Mr. H. Thurlow. The resolution was then withdrawn and Mr. Davidson's motion was put to the meeting and carried unanimously.

Mr. Collinson, North London Branch, moved a resolution expressing the opinion that the interests of the Cause would be furthered by a more systematic method of organisation, and that this could be accomplished both successfully and economically by merging the existing London Branches into one. This was seconded by Mr. Hecht, Edmonton, and gave rise to much discussion. Mr. T. Thurlow was opposed to the principle of relying upon a centre. Mr. Roger pointed out its impracticability, in view of the great distances across London; and Mr. W. Heaford most emphatically protested against it, saying that what was required of the Secularist Party, which was the oldest organised party in Great Britain, was the intensification of local interests, and suggested that the compilation of a directory of Freethinkers would enable them to be brought together whenever necessary. Mr. Davey, Kingsland Branch, objected on the ground that it would destroy home rule. It was suggested that the experiment of amalgamation might be tried with the North London Branches, which lie close together. The Chairman thought the suggestion would be workable, if carried out on the lines of the old London Secular Federation, which all would agree, did good work, and pointed out that where Branches, or local Freethinkers, were in need of assistance in organising, the services of the Executive could be relied upon. Though lost when put to the meeting, it was felt that the discussion this resolution had given rise to, had been exceedingly useful.

A suggestion from the Kingsland Branch that a monthly list of all out-door lectures of the London Branches should be published, and a further suggestion that the Editor of the Freethinker be asked to publish condensed reports of Branch lectures, at least monthly, in that paper, were discussed, and the Secretary was asked to lay both matters before the Executive.

Reference was made to the increasing number of requests for N. S. S. members to act as stewards at meetings, and on the motion of Mr. Earthy, North London Branch, it was resolved to recommend that members be invited to add their names to the list of those already willing to act as stewards.

The Secretary promised to arrange a meeting of Branch Secretaries, at headquarters, at an early date.

The Secretary was instructed to convey to Mr. Foote the good wishes of all present, and their hopes that he would soon be able to resume his work for the cause to which he had devoted himself for so many years.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

CUNNING AND CREDULITY ON THE NIGER.

Until quite recently on the banks of the river which flowed beneath the windows of our last station, a human sacrifice was offered at the beginning of each fishing season, to ensure good fortune to the nets. The victim was bound to a stout stake, driven deep into the mud, left bare at low tide, to be drowned by the rising water. One year the man chosen chanced to be of unusual strength. By straining every nerve he burst the bonds which held his huge limbs, and found himself free once more, but with no place of refuge, since every town was closed to him, and to take to the mangrove swamps meant not life but a lingering death. In this desperate strait he decided on a daring stroke. Back to the beach he swam, where townsfolk were merrily holding his death-feast. It chanced that he was blind of an eye, so no sooner did he near the shore than he began to upbraid them, in the "Juju's" name, for daring to offer a blemished victim—stating that the Spirit had sent him back as unworthy, and with the command that a better should be substituted. Unquestioningly the people obeyed. A perfect victim was chosen and offered up, while the resourceful one-eyed deceiver lived out his life to a peaceful close.—P. Amaury Talbot in the "Times."

Obituary.

It is my painful duty to record the sudden death, at the age of 61, of Mr. John Easton, whose stalwart figure and genial expression was generally conspicuous at all meetings, lectures, etc., in Newcastle that had for their object the advancement of intellectual progress. He had a wide circle of friends, who will never forget the cheerful smile, the sterling and honest outspokenness of this admirable man, whose generous and sympathetic heart never failed to respond to others' troubles. His loss to the Newcastle Branch of the N. S. S. will be most keenly felt by those with whom he has taken an active share of the work for over twenty years. Being also one of the active workers of the Tyneside Sunday Lecture Society, of which he was a member since its inception in 1883, he was followed to the grave by a large number of friends from both Societies. Here, what the deceased had often expressed his fear of, happened. Despite the fact that a written request to be cremated, and that his funeral be a Secular one, had for some time been carefully prepared, a parson was engaged and buried him with the usual "Sure and certain hope of a glorious resurrection," much to the disapproval of many of his best friends. On March 30 Mr. Easton went to bed healthy and apparently well, and had slept peacefully away before anyone was aware of the fact. He leaves a widow, four grown-up sons, two daughters, and an aged mother, twenty-three years older than himself, to mourn their loss. We share their grief, but rejoice that he lived.—J. G. BARTRAM.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from th Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Tricks of Trade.

SOME time ago there appeared a number of letters in one of the papers on the question of the dishonesty of business men. The dishonesty alleged was concerned chiefly with untruthfulness in selling. Merchants, it was said, were not above stooping to misstatements concerning their goods, and the falsehoods commenced at the top filtered right the way down to the humble shop-walker. He was compelled to tell lies to customers. If an article was inferior, he dare not say so. If it possessed faults, he was forced to hide them. For a shopman to be loyal to his conscience and honest to the people who purchased was to invite dismissal. It was impossible under these conditions for a man to lead a "Christian life," and it was solemnly alleged that many people declined to confess themselves Christians because they felt the standard of morality set to be too high, and shrank from a false confession on the most sacred of subjects.

I read these protests against the dishonesty of business men and remained unmoved. Of course, it is wrong for people to adulterate their goods or to tell lies to their customers; and yet I did not feel the evil to be of so serious a kind after all. It would be better if every salesman told the whole truth and nothing but the truth about his goods, but a lie is only serious in proportion as it is likely to obtain currency. If a man tells me something that I do not believe, and which he knows I shall not believe, it seems to me that things remain much as they were. When a dealer assures me that he is getting a living by selling his goods at less than cost price, or that he is giving better value than anyone else in the trade, or that he is keeping his shop open solely for the benefit of the public, we all know these things to be part of the small talk of the commercial world. And even though I were charged half-a-crown for an article worth sixpence, that still strikes me as a small affair. There are much greater evils in the world. These things are more annoying than aught else. And, truth to tell, I feel more annoyed at people expecting me to believe these stories than at their being told.

The curious feature about the controversy was that a number of prominent clergymen took part in the discussion, and protested against the practice. This was very interesting, but I felt a little uncertain whether their interference might not be due to the irritation of the expert watching the bungling attempts of the amateur. Part of the protest was based upon the lies told being connected with such paltry matters. Which is rather illuminating. There is such a difference between false statements that affect the issue of some hundreds of thousands of pounds' worth of shares and the falsehoods that procure a sale of a yard of flannel at two shillings when the proper price is only one and elevenpence-three-farthings. One could not imagine a Christian gentleman like the Archbishop of Canterbury telling a lie in order to get an article sold for sixpence that was only worth fourpence. This in itself is evidence of the bracing effect of Christianity on character, or perhaps it is only the difference between £15,000 a year and twenty-five shillings a week. Still, it must really demand a fine development of character for men circumstanced as are the bulk of the clergy to refrain from telling lies for the sake of the paltry benefits to gain which shopmen and shopkeepers daily and hourly scarify their moral nature.

To be quite serious, one could imagine a tradesman, irritated by these rebukes, advising bishops and archbishops that before lecturing others it might be as well to reflect upon the number of trade falsehoods connected with their own business. And both on the negative and on the positive side the clerical profession involves quite as many trade falsehoods as occur elsewhere, and some of them of a far more serious character. For the tradesman does not tell his tales in the interests of morality; the clergyman does. And that involves a world of difference. And I am quite certain that, taken on the whole, the morality of the business world, imperfect as it is, is still superior to the morality exemplified by the clergy.

It is said that tradesmen charge for work that is ill performed. Well, so do the clergy. Tradesmen claim that their goods are superior to any others on the market, knowing that is not the truth. What is this but one of the stock claims of the clergy? Commercial men, it is said, work for a monopoly, and crush out by all possible means—fair and foul—their competitors. Agreed; but is not every religion in the world, and particularly the Christian religion, striving to create a monopoly? What was the State Church but a monopoly in religion? What are all the other Churches doing but trying to create a monopoly? And how have they all met competition? The State Church met it by imprisoning Dissenters, cropping their ears, whipping them at cart's tail, imprisoning them thousands at a time, and even selling them into slavery. A commercial monopoly never did these things. A monopoly in oil, or coal, or corn, or copper, is really far less disastrous to a nation than a monopoly in religion. And when events brought other competitors into the field, competitors that threatened all Christians alike, a new combination was formed that strove to suppress this competition by the same methods of imprisonment and torture. Really there is not an evil connected with the establishment of a trade monopoly that is not being continuously put into force in order to maintain a corner in religion. And certainly the suppressed truths and suggested falsehoods practised to build up a business monopoly are poor, weak things compared to what is done in connection with religion.

Look at some of the falsehoods connected with the clerical business. First of all, there is the Bible. When a tradesman sells a cotton mixture for pure wool, is he really acting worse than the clergyman who nowadays presents the Bible before a congregation as the Word of God? Everyone knows who knows anything about the subject, that this conception of the Bible is now completely shattered. It is admitted to be so by numerous clergymen, under controversial pressure. And yet one is constantly meeting in religious papers with a discussion of the question whether clergymen ought to introduce critical questions into the pulpit. Thoroughly straightforward men, determined on their clients being fully acquainted with the nature of the article placed before them, would answer the question without the least hesitation. If there is one place in the world from which the results of the most critical study of the Bible should be shouted trumpet-tongued, it is the pulpit. For it is precisely the people who attend church who are most in need of such instruction. No courage is needed in making admissions to people outside the Churches. It is people who are within who need to be told the truth. And the discussion as to whether critical questions should be introduced into the pulpit or not is really a discussion as to whether a church is the place in which the truth should be told.

For, mark, all critical questions are not excluded from the pulpit. It is only critical questions, so far as they tend to unsettle orthodox beliefs, that are excluded. Other religions may be freely criticised. Unbelief may be criticised. And both these forms of criticism give rise to a fresh batch of falsehoods. For, just as we have the suppressio veri in connection with Christianity, so we have the suggestio falsi in connection with non-Christian forms of thought. The better aspects of a religion such as Mohammedanism are ignored and its worst aspects exaggerated. The evils existing in non-Christian countries are deliberately attributed to the prevailing religion. And where religions are treated in this way, non-religious naturally fare worse. Hardly any business man would circulate stories concerning a rival one-half so untruthful and malicious as those circulated by religious preachers concerning their opponents. If the sense of decency did not restrain, the law of libel would. Credit is too valuable an asset in the commercial world for the average business man to ignore the value of a good reputation. But if one will compare the stories told by Catholics of Protestants, of Protestants by Catholics, and by both of unbelievers; if one bears in mind the slanders circulated concerning Paine, and Bradlaugh, and Ingersoll, and other leading Freethinkers, he will see how much below the ethic of the business-world is the ethic of the pulpit.

Only a month or so ago the Rev. Dr. Forsyth was prophesying that there were troublesome times ahead for the Churches when congregations began to realise the bearings of modern criticism on religious beliefs. But why should there be trouble from this source? And whose fault is it that the church and chapel congregations do not already realise the bearings on religious doctrines of modern knowledge? If the clergy had been really interested in telling the truth and seeking the truth, their congregations would have nothing to learn and preachers nothing to fear. The fear was really a confession that congregations have been deliberately kept in the dark about matters on which they ought to have received information. They have looked to their preachers for guidance, and these have misled them. And in what way is the preacher who has refrained from telling his hearers the truth about religion, because he was afraid it would unsettle their faith, superior to the tradesman who tells a lie in order to sell a customer something over the counter? If the preacher has a genuine article for sale, he need be in no fear about a decline of custom. He is really alarmed lest the growth of knowledge should have the same influence on his profession that a Fraudulent Marks Act has on certain unscrupulous traders.

It would require a very bulky volume to deal at any length with all the various falsehoods that have been put into circulation at various times in the interests of their faith. There have been documentary falsehoods in the shape of tampering with existing writings and forging new ones. Manufactured falsehoods in the shape of spurious miracles and false records. Personal falsehoods relating to opponents and the suppression of the truth concerning Christian leaders. Falsification of history secured by suppressing facts and creating an atmosphere that made the publication of the truth almost an impossibility. Falsehood connected with the influence of Christianity on civilisation, and of the state of pre-Christian civilisations. One may allow unconscious distortion of truth that arises from the operation of strong religious prejudices, but Christianity has gone further than this. There has been a constant tissue of falsehoods deliberately concocted in the supposed interest of religion and morality.

And these falsehoods belong to a much more serious order than those associated with business life. For they strike at the root of character itself. People who have been taught that religion is the most valuable thing in the world, but who have not been taught to associate habits of mental uprightness therewith, are hardly likely to be very scrupulous in matters that they consider of less importance. It is bad to adulterate goods, bad to tell lies in the interests of trade, bad to suggest lies about one's competitors in business. But it is more serious to debase the moral currency of a people, to treat with contempt the exercise of some of the most valuable qualities of the mind, and besmirch the character of those whose real fault has been that they have had the courage to inquire and the honesty to speak. The falsehood of the shopkeeper may, indeed, leave us poorer in pocket, but the falsehoods told in the interests of religion have left the race poorer in all those qualities that do most to dignify human nature.

C. COHEN.

The Glorification of Murder.

NOW that Lent is over once more we may congratulate ourselves upon the fact that it is yearly getting to mean less and less even to Christians themselves. That this is the case is evident from the lukewarm and languishing manner in which it is usually observed. Lent is a fast of forty days, excluding Sundays, from Ash Wednesday till Easter; but how many are there who really fast all that time? It is related of George Whitefield that he partook of nothing during these forty days but coarse bread and sage tea; but even in his day the practice was rare. And yet fasting is ecclesiastically represented as an essential element in the religious life, because it conduces to the mortification of the flesh and is a certain means of securing the Divine favor. It is defined by the Church of England as "a withholding of meat, drink, and all natural food from the body for a determined period"; but in all communions the number of those who starve the flesh to feed the spirit is comparatively very small. Even in Lent of fasting there is astonishingly little. Many thousands of sermons are delivered, and innumerable are the services held; but the wicked flesh receives scarcely any punishment at all, beyond that involved in listening to the preachers and repeating prayers. The discourses given during this period deal generally with what the divines call fundamental articles in the Christian Creed, such as the Fall, the Incarnation, the Cross, and the Resurrection. The Rev. J. Neville Figgis, D.D., Litt. D., for example, has just favored the congregation at St. Mary Abbots, Kensington, and the religious press, with a series of Lenten addresses, in which an attempt is made to restate several doctrines that are regarded as vital. We frankly admit that Dr. Figgis is an extremely able defender of the faith, and that if his defence of it is not a success it is not his fault, but must be accounted for by the absolute indefensibility of the faith. Let us examine a few of his points.

In the sermon on Sin the reverend gentleman makes a most startling admission. According to him sin is a disease, the cure for which is Christ. Now, London accepted Christ fourteen centuries ago, and has been a Christian city ever since. Yet this is what Dr. Figgis says:—

> "The home of moral horror is to be found in brilliant Athens and grand Rome, in Paris with its graceful polish, in Venice with all her gilded splendor. and it may be in modern London [the italics are ours], not in the Polynesian Archipelago."

No Freethinker ever supplied a better example of the moral impotence of the Christian religion. Here is another fine sentence: "It is not to barbarous people that we go for examples of moral perversion; it is to ages of culture and amid scenes of refinement"—in fact, to modern London, where Christ lives and reigns. The sad thought is, that from this "home of moral horror" missioners have gone out to convert the Polynesian race to the religion under which London has become a glaring example of "moral perversion." Indeed, Dr. Figgis gives himself, a minister of Christ, a terribly bad character. He dramatically exclaims, "John Neville Figgis, torn by temptations, impure, cowardly, vain, selfish, worldly."

Dr. Figgis defines sin as "a foreign thing" which "ought not to have been." "Sin is a corruption, a disease," he adds; "it need not have happened." We are firmly convinced that sin, as here defined, does not exist, but is solely a theological invention. It is the business of the pulpit to keep the sense of it alive in the minds of the people; but, as Mr. Arnold Bennett informs us, the malady known as conviction of sin, from which our ancestors used to suffer so much, has almost entirely vanished from educated society, and it has vanished simply because science has shown us the unreality of sin. It is sheer impertinence to call humanity a damned race. We are imperfect and often do wrong; but we are not damned. There are many grievances to be redressed, many evils to be washed away, and many forms of tyranny to be overthrown; but society is not damned. It is merely in the throes of evolution, gradually throwing off the things that annoy and hurt and establishing the conditions essential to its well-being.

Dr. Figgis is an anti-evolutionist. He believes that humanity has experienced "an initial catastrophe," generally known as the Fall. Adam fell and became the father of a fallen race which is powerless to rise again. If it is ever to stand upon its feet again it must be raised by someone of superhuman strength. In other words, we are lost sinners and cannot save ourselves. Dr. Figgis says:—

> "Supposing our condition loudly calls for deliverance, and supposing that we are conscious that we cannot deliver ourselves. Then whatever does deliver us must come from outside. It must be the work of a person not ourselves; and it must therefore be objective. Crude language may be used to express this objectivity, but its necessity is inherent. The whole possibility of conversion rests on the fact that we can point the sinner to something beyond himself—Jesus did it, did it all, long, long ago."

As we reject the reverend gentleman's second supposition, that we cannot deliver ourselves, we naturally reject the inference he draws from it. Numerous are the conditions from which society needs to be delivered, but history assures us that each deliverance already effected has come from within, not from outside. The spectacle that meets our eyes to-day is society in the process of slowly delivering itself. Upon his second baseless assumption Dr. Figgis builds a most remarkable theory of the atonement. He vainly endeavors to distinguish between the fact of the atonement and any theory of it, forgetting that to call the death of Jesus an atonement at all is to offer a theory of it. The important thing to be borne in mind here is that we are said to be responsible for our fallen condition. We are accounted guilty before the bar of Divine justice, and in front of us is hell-fire, in which we deserve to burn for ever. Therefore, we need forgiveness as well as deliverance, and the Scripture declares that "apart from shedding of blood there is no remission." Consequently, "the atonement is a thing so tremendous that it cost God the death of his Son." Why God could not deliver and pardon mankind without killing his Son, or how such a horrible murder enables him to do either, we are not told; and it is a greater mystery still how faith or trust in that murdered Son brings salvation to the lost. On such points Dr. Figgis is discreetly silent. Utterly ignoring them, he speaks of the atonement as a thing so tremendous that to many it will seem "too good to be true." To us it is a thing so hideous, so brutal, that our whole nature revolts at the very thought of it. To the reverend gentleman, alas, it is "that great act which has reversed all the values of the world," whatever he means by such a statement, which to us is meaningless.

Dr. Figgis imagines a man who is too great a sinner to be forgiven even through so tremendous an atonement. "I can never be forgiven," he cries. "But God loves you," the preacher assures him. The sinner exclaims, "Ah, that makes it only worse. I have done it, done it to all eternity, and the world can never be the same as if I had not." "But God is love, and he will never shut you out." "I shut myself out; so ugly a thing shall not be in his sight—my loving Father! I am a traitor, and I cannot, cannot ever be in his sight again." Now listen to the appeal Dr. Figgis makes to this self-condemned sinner:—

> "What hope is there for such? This hope: Let the man say that his treachery to love has been the cause of an act so beautiful that its splendor outshines all the whole world of spiritual values apart from it, and that it is through him in the sense that but for this sin this beauty would not be. Then he can be reconciled. It is the addition to the value of the world of this act of supreme devotion, and the fact that it would not have been but for human sin that allows the sinner to think of himself as forgiven and the past as done away with."

Such is speculative theology as expressed by this clergyman—a series of ridiculous conclusions based upon a series of unverifiable assumptions. Our charge against it is not merely that it is unreasonable, but that it is monstrously immoral as well. The Gospel preached by Dr. Figgis shocks our conscience and wounds our sense of right. The only truth in it is that had it not been for the doctrine of sin we would never have heard of it. The full salvation which it offers to those who believe it is wholly imaginary, an emotional affair only. If you believe that Jesus died for your sins God justifies you, and to justify means not to make just but to declare just. That is to say the moment a fiend of the deepest dye accepts the finished work of Christ, God looks upon and treats him as if he had always been a beautiful angel. "This declaration of our righteousness when we are still sinful," Dr. Figgis tells us, "is made to us as sharing in Christ's death through faith.....Jesus Christ has become the meaning of us." That, we claim, is a thoroughly immoral Gospel. Our only comfort is that it is not true, and that this is being found out by an ever-growing number of our fellow-beings.

Christian Apologetics.

II.—HERMAS AND CLEMENT OF ROME.

FOLLOWING Barnabas, the next two "apostolic fathers" are said to be Hermas and Clement of Rome—the first being declared to be the Hermas named in Rom. xvi. 14, and the second to be the Clement mentioned in Phil. iv. 3. It appears to be tacitly assumed by Christian apologists that no writer named Hermas or Clement could have lived in the second century.

Now, we have the testimony of what is called the Muratorian Canon, one of the most ancient documents extant, that the author of the "Shepherd" was Hermas, the brother of Pius, bishop of Rome, and that it was written while that prelate was "sitting in the chair of the church" in that city (i.e., between A.D. 142 and 156). The only writing of Hermas, the "Shepherd," may therefore be placed at A.D. 145—150. The character of the work may be summed up in three words—"a pious fraud" or "a fraudulent revelation." The book consists of three parts — visions, commandments, and similitudes. The visions the author claims to have seen in an out-of-the-way field, where, he says, they were explained to him by an angel in the form of "an old woman, arrayed in a splendid robe." The commandments and similitudes, he tells us, were delivered to him by "the angel of repentance," who appeared to him as "a man of glorious aspect, dressed like a shepherd." He received the command, he says, to write these down as he was told them, and he did so. These commandments, etc., are a mass of clotted nonsense, too absurd to have emanated from anyone save a second-century Christian. That the work is a tissue of falsehoods from beginning to end no one now denies. Modern Christian apologists generally ignore this fact, and appear to think that they do away with a big Christian fraud by calling the book "the Pilgrim's Progress of Ante-Nicene times." Had the book been given to the world as a work of fiction, like that of Bunyan, such a description might be allowable; but this was not the case. The "Shepherd" was given to the Christian world as a revelation made by God to his servant Hermas, and was received as such, and was copied, and read in the churches as "scripture." As already stated, this lying book and the misleading "Epistle of Barnabas" were found in the oldest MS. of the New Testament—the Codex Sinaiticus. It should also be noted that this pious fraud was not the work of a heretic, but was the production of an orthodox Christian. The following extracts will give some idea of the author's pretended revelations:—

> TENTH COMMANDMENT: "Put all sadness from thee; for it is the sister of doubting and of anger.....For every cheerful man does well, and relishes those things that are good, and despises sadness. But the sad man does always wickedly. First, he doeth wickedly, because he grieveth the Holy Spirit, which is given to man, being of a cheerful nature. And again he does ill, because he prays with sadness unto the Lord..... For the prayer of a sad man has not efficacy to come up to the altar of God," etc.
> SECOND SIMILITUDE: "The rich man has wealth; howbeit towards the Lord he is poor: for he is taken up with his riches, and prays but little to the Lord, and the prayers which he makes are lazy and without force. When, therefore, the rich man reaches out to the poor those things which he wants, the poor man prays unto the Lord for the rich; and God grants unto the rich man all good things because the poor man is rich in prayer, and his requests have great power with the Lord."

I now turn to a paragraph in which the writer mentions Clement as a contemporary. In Vision II. the angel in the form of an old woman says to Hermas:—

> "When you have written down all my words, the elect shall become acquainted with them through you. You shall write therefore two books, and you shall send one to Clement and one to Grapte. And Clement shall send to foreign countries, for it is his office to do so. And Grapte shall instruct the widows and orphans. But you shall read the words in this city [i.e., Rome] with the presbyters that preside over the church."
> Note: Grapte is supposed to have been a deaconess.

It would thus appear that Hermas was himself a presbyter of the church at Rome, of which church Clement was corresponding secretary. We have seen, however, that the author of the "Shepherd" was not noted for veracity. The question arises, then, Can we accept his statement that Clement was a contemporary? There can be no doubt whatever that in this case we can, and the reason is obvious. However great a liar Hermas may have been, it was not in matters of this kind that he exercised his talent. He desired his book to be accepted as a revelation from heaven by the members of the church at Rome, to most of whom he was well known. He could not, therefore, have spoken of one, whom everybody knew to have been long since dead, as then living, unless such was actually the case. He only lied in connection with matters in which his falsehoods could not be disproved.

Moreover, in his day, and for many decades later, there were men and women in the Christian Church who professed to see visions and receive revelations from God, and their claims were admitted by all the churches. Hermas, therefore, had no fear of his fraud being detected. Hence, though we reject, of course, his fabricated visions and revelations, and his statement of being commanded by an angel to write copies of his book for Clement and Grapte, we cannot, as a matter of reason, doubt the fact that those persons must have been living when he wrote his book. We may therefore take it that Clement was one of the dignitaries of the Church of Rome some time during the episcopate of Pius.

The document which is properly associated with the name of Clement of Rome is an Epistle to the church at Corinth, written in consequence of dissensions in that church connected with the office of presbyters. The Epistle is addressed—"The Church of God which sojourns at Rome to the Church of God sojourning at Corinth." As a sample of the language employed I select the following:—

> "Our apostles knew, through our Lord Jesus Christ, that there would be strife on account of the office of the episcopate.....We are of opinion, therefore, that those appointed by them, or afterward by other men of repute with the consent of the whole Church, and who have blamelessly served the flock of Christ, in a humble, peaceful, and disinterested spirit, and have for a long time possessed the good opinion of all, cannot be justly dismissed from the ministry" (par. xliv.).
> "Take up the Epistle of the blessed Paul. What did he write to you at the time when the gospel first began to be preached! Did he not, by the Spirit, admonish you concerning himself, and Cephas, and Apollos, because that even then ye had begun to fall into parties among yourselves?.....It is disgraceful, beloved, yea, highly disgraceful, and unworthy of your Christian profession, that such a thing should be heard of, as that the most steadfast and ancient church of the Corinthians should, on account of one or two persons, engage in sedition against its presbyters" (par. xlvii.).
> "And we have sent faithful and prudent men, that have walked unblameably among us from youth until old age, who shall be witnesses between you and us" (par. lxiii.).

It is evident from the Epistle itself that the writer was not contemporary with Paul or the apostles. The words I have italicised clearly show that a long period of Church government, during which the church at Rome had gained an ascendancy over the other churches, had elapsed when the Epistle was written.

Clement appears to have been of too kind and gentle a nature to have been entrusted with the control of a church that had assumed authority over all the other churches. Such a church would require as its head one with more force and determination of character. Though Clement was living when the "Shepherd" was composed, it is quite possible that his Epistle to the church at Corinth may have been written much earlier, say in the episcopate of Hyginus, the predecessor of Pius (A.D. 138—142).

In 1873 a document called the Didaché or "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" was discovered in a library at Constantinople, which document is assigned by Biblical critics to A.D. 80—100. The following passage in the "Teaching," which no Christian advocate appears to have noticed, enables us to fix approximately the date of its composition:—

> "To every one that asketh thee give, and ask not back: for to all the Father desireth to have given of his own free gifts. Blessed is he that giveth according to the commandment, for he is guiltless. Woe to him that receiveth; for if, indeed, one receiveth who hath need, he shall be innocent; but he who hath no need shall give account, why he received, and for what purpose, and shall come under judgment" (par. i.).

Where do we find the "commandment" to which reference is here made? Apologists, of course, refer us to Matt v. 42, which reads:—

> "Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away."

This passage does not, however, explain what is said in the "Teaching" about giving and receiving, and of the receiver being innocent or guilty according as he received with or without need. Neither does the exhortation in Tobit (iv. 16) to "Give of thy bread to the hungry" throw light upon the matter. We turn now to the "Shepherd," and we find under the heading "Second Commandment" the following injunction:—

> "Give to all the needy in simplicity, not hesitating as to whom you are to give. Give to all; for God wishes his gifts to be shared amongst all. They who receive will render an account to God, why and for what purpose they have received. For the afflicted who receive will not be condemned; but they who receive on false pretences will suffer punishment. He, then, who gives is guiltless.....Keep therefore these commandments, as I have given them to you."

Here we have, beyond all doubt, "the commandment" referred to in the "Teaching." When the two passages are compared there can be no two opinions on the subject. Hermas, too, is quite original in his Visions, Commandments, and Similitudes, and has taken nothing from either the Old or New Testament. Moreover, the reference in the "Teaching" to an existing and well-known "commandment" is conclusive. The "Teaching" was therefore written some considerable time after the "Shepherd"—and not until the latter had been received by all the Christian churches as "scripture." This would probably be about two decades before the time of Irenæus (A D. 185), who quotes it as such.

The Idea of God not Universal.

> "The child is born, not into the religion of nature, but into blank ignorance; and, if left entirely to itself, would probably never find out as much religious truth as the most ignorant of parents can teach it."—PROFESSOR FLINT (Professor of Divinity), Theism, p. 23.
>
> "It is true that no one may boast that he knows that God and a future life exist; for, if he possesses such knowledge, he is just the man for whom I have long been seeking."—EMMANUEL KANT, cited in Huxley's Hume, p. 179.
>
> "Everyone is born with a nose and five fingers, and no one is born with a knowledge of God. This may be deplorable or not, but it is certainly the human condition."—VOLTAIRE, cited by Wheeler and Foote, Voltaire, p. 88.
> "After all that has been so plausibly written concerning 'the innate idea of God'; after all that has been said of its being common to all men, in all ages and nations; it does not appear that man has naturally any more idea of God than any of the beasts of the field; he has no knowledge of God at all; no fear of God at all; neither is God in all his thoughts. Whatever change may afterwards be wrought (whether by the grace of God, or by his own reflection, or by education) he is, by nature, a mere Atheist."—JOHN WESLEY, Sermon xcv., On the Education of Children.

THE ordinary believer, who has been trained from infancy to believe in the existence of a God, finds it very difficult to understand the position of the Atheist who has no such belief. He thinks that the unbeliever must have some hidden motive for rejecting a belief which his training and education has taught him to think must be self-evident to everyone else.

Indeed, there are no lack of "Anti-Infidel" works in which we are plainly told that we wish to disprove the idea of God and a ruling Providence so that we may lead wicked and debauched lives without fear of having to answer to an Almighty Judge in some after-life; little does the average, and often the educated, man know about ideas outside, or contrary to, his own religious beliefs. For our educational system, even among the upper classes, rigidly excludes any teaching as to the natural evolution of religious ideas. Nay, its first object is to maintain the current mythology, founded upon the Bible, and established as the State religion of the country.

The fact of the matter is, that the great majority of the world's inhabitants are without any belief in the existence of a God. And, far from the belief being innate, intuitional, or arising naturally in the minds of children without its being taught, it is, as John Wesley emphatically declared, true that if children were brought up from their birth "without being instructed in any religion," there is little doubt "they would have no religion at all. They would have no more knowledge of God than the beasts of the field, than the wild ass's colt."*

We have demonstrated proof of Wesley's statement, in the fact that uninstructed deaf-mutes are wholly destitute of religious ideas, as Herbert Spencer has pointed out in the following extract:—

> "The deaf Dr. Kitto, in his book called The Lost Senses (p. 200), quotes the testimony of an American lady who was deaf and dumb, but at a mature age was instructed, and who said 'the idea that the world must have had a Creator never occurred to her, nor to any other of several intelligent pupils, of similar age.'
> "Similarly, the Rev. Samuel Smith, after twenty-eight years almost daily contact with such, says of a deaf-mute, 'he has no idea of his immortal nature, and it has not been found in a single instance that an uneducated deaf-mute has had any conception of the existence of a Supreme Being as the Creator and Ruler of the universe" (Rev. Samuel Smith, Church Work Among the Deaf and Dumb, p. 4).†

Laura Bridgman, who, from the time she was two years old, was deaf and dumb, blind, and even without the sense of taste, thus having only the sense of touch, but who, by persevering instruction, attained a relatively high intellectual condition, says Vignoli, "A careful study of her case showed that she had been altogether without intuitive knowledge of causes, of the absolute, and of God."‡

Similarly, the blind deaf-mute, Edward Meystre, "had no idea of God, and could not be brought to form such an idea, despite every effort that was made, and although he had very good intellectual abilities."§ The reason for this is obvious, for if a child is born totally deaf, it will also be dumb, because a language must first be heard before the sounds of which it is composed can be spoken. Therefore the reason why deaf-mutes are destitute of religious ideas is because they have not learned them from others through the medium of language, which proves the truth of John Wesley's statement, that man "is by nature a mere Atheist."

A further proof of this is the fact that not only many tribes of savages have been found without any idea of a Supreme Being, but some highly civilised nations are in the same condition.

Professor Max Müller, the great Orientalist, says: "As to atheistic religions, they might seem to be perfectly impossible; and yet the fact cannot be disputed away that the religion of Buddha was from the beginning purely atheistic."‖

Professor Monier says of the Buddhists and Jains:—

> "With them there is no Supreme Being, no Supreme Divine Eternal Soul, no separate human eternal soul. Nor can there be any true soul-transmigration. A Buddhist and a Jaina believe that the only eternal thing is matter."¶

Dr. Findlater, in his article on "Buddhism" in Chambers' Encyclopædia, observes:—

> "Contrary to the opinion once confidently and generally held, that a nation of Atheists never existed, the Buddhist peoples are essentially Atheist; for they know no beings with greater supernatural power than any man is supposed capable of attaining to by virtue, austerity, and science. Indeed, some of the Buddhist nations—the Chinese, Mongols, and Tibetans—have no word in their languages to express the notion of God as supreme ruler."

Finally, Professor Rhys Davids—and there is no greater authority in this matter—observes: "It will seem strange to many that a religion which ignores the existence of God, and denies the existence of the soul, should be the very religion which has found most acceptance among men." Thus, the religion which counts the largest number of adherents knows nothing of a God.

Of savage tribes, as Darwin remarks,—

> "there is ample evidence, derived not from hasty travellers, but from men who have long resided with savages, that numerous races have existed, and still exist, who have no idea of one or more Gods, and which have no words in their languages to express such an idea."*

Sir John Lubbock (Lord Avebury) observes: "Those who assert that even the lowest savages believe in a Supreme Deity affirm that which is entirely contrary to the evidence." In some cases, he says:—

> "travellers have arrived at these views very much to their own astonishment. Thus Father Dobritzhoffer says: 'Theologians agree in denying that any man in possession of his reason can, without a crime, remain ignorant of God for any length of time. This opinion I warmly defended in the University of Cordoba, where I finished the four years' course of theology begun at Gratz, in Styria. But what was my astonishment, when, on removing from thence to a colony of Abipones, I found that the whole language of these savages does not contain a single word which expresses God or a divinity. To instruct them in religion, it was necessary to borrow the Spanish word for God.'"†

Says M. Bik:—

> "It is evident that the Arafuras of Vorkay (one of the southern Arus) possess no religion whatever.....To convince myself more fully respecting their want of knowledge of a Supreme Being, I demanded of them on whom they called for help in their need, when their vessels were overtaken by violent tempests. The eldest among them, after having consulted the others, answered that they knew not on whom they could call for assistance, but begged me, if I knew, to be so good as to inform them."‡

Of the Australian tribes, Messrs. Spencer and Gillen tell us:—

> "The Central Australian natives—and this is true of the tribes extending from Lake Eyre in the south to the far north and eastwards across to the Gulf of Carpentaria—have no idea whatever of the existence of any Supreme Being who is pleased if they follow a certain line of what we call moral conduct, and displeased if they do not do so. They have not the vaguest idea of a personal individual other than an actual living member of the tribe who approves or disapproves of their conduct.....We know of no tribe in which there is a belief of any kind in a Supreme Being who rewards or punishes the individual according to his moral behavior, using the word moral in the native sense."§

Mr. Gideon Lang tells a story of a friend of his trying to make an intelligent Blackfellow understand the immateriality and immortality of the soul. "One day," he says, "the teacher watched, and found that he went to have a hearty fit of laughter at the absurdity of the idea of a man living, and going about without arms, legs, or mouth to eat."‖

The naturalist Bates tells us that "None of the Indian tribes on the Upper Amazons have an idea of a Supreme Being, and consequently have no word to express it in their own language."¶

Robertson, the historian of America, says:—

> "Several tribes have been discovered in America which have no idea whatever of a Supreme Being, and no rites of religious worship.....Some rude tribes have not in their language any name for the Deity, nor have the most accurate observers been able to discover any practice or institution which seemed to imply that they recognised his authority, or were solicitous to obtain his favor."

"Father Baegart," says Lubbock, "who lived as a missionary among the Indians of California for seventeen years," affirms that "idols, temples, religious worship, or ceremonies were unknown to them, and they neither believed in the true and only God, nor adored false deities"; and M. de la Perouse also says that they had no knowledge of a God or of a future state."* The same writer also tells us "Hearne, who lived amongst the Northern American Indians for years, and was perfectly acquainted with their habits and language, says the same of some tribes on Hudson's Bay" (577).

Of the Veddahs of Ceylon, Sir J. Emerson Tennant does not hesitate to say, "They have no religion of any kind—no knowledge of a God or of a future state; no temples, idols, altars, prayers, or charms" (Ceylon, ii., p. 441). Mr. Bailey, long a resident among them, confirms this judgment. "They have no knowledge of a Supreme Being! 'Is he on a rock? on a white ant-hill? on a tree? I never saw a God' was the only reply I received to repeated questions. They have no idols, offer no sacrifices, and pour no libations."†

They were as destitute of religious ideas as the Papuans of the Aru Islands, who, when Mr. Bik sought for information as to their idea of immortality, replied, "No Arupura has ever returned to us after death; therefore we know nothing." When told by the missionaries that God was everywhere, and in everything that is for our good, one of them replied, "Then this God is certainly in your arrack (spirits), for I never feel happier than when I have drunk plenty of it."‡

In spite of the overwhelming evidence, from which we have only selected a few examples, of the existence of tribes and nations without any idea of God, there are still people who maintain the opposite opinion. We will consider these in our next article.

Acid Drops.

The Devon County Education Committee has decided that two lessons in religion, each one occupying forty minutes, shall be given in the secondary schools under its control. Canon Pryke says there is great interest taken by the teachers in this religious lesson, and is proof, offered by those most qualified to judge, that secular instruction is insufficient. We take this proof with the proverbial grain of salt. To our mind it is rather proof that the teachers have been "got at," and dare not show any dislike to the proposed religious instruction. The clergy have ways of managing these things, and if a clergyman asks a teacher his opinion on the value of religious instruction, there is little doubt as to the kind of answer he will get. It is, indeed, one of the counts in the indictment against religion in the public schools that it condemns so many teachers to a life of hypocrisy. If they are straightforward in the matter, their career is blocked, and promotion becomes almost an impossibility. And, naturally, there are very few that will risk this. If teachers could speak their minds honestly on the question, we believe that the majority would sooner see religion out of the schools than in it.

When men like Canon Pryke talk of the insufficiency of secular education, one would imagine that the nation had practical experience on the matter. This, of course, is not the case. Education in this country has never been free from the influence of religion, which, up to 1870, was mainly under its direct control. And no one who knows the history of education in England would claim that the results were satisfactory. Indeed, it was the utter inefficiency of education in religious hands that forced the Government to step in and undertake it as a national responsibility. Moreover, it is forgotten that, except for time given to religious instruction at the beginning or end of the lesson, State schools are really secular schools. And all teachers know that the religious instruction given is precisely that which is gone over in the most perfunctory manner, and to which the children pay the least attention.

How things have changed in the Churches! Exactly fifty years ago the heresy of Bishop Colenso was convulsing the religious world. And on April 9, 1864, a "Pastoral" was ordered to be read in all the Anglican churches in the diocese of Natal, stating that the ecclesiastical authorities had, "after long and anxious deliberation," decided that Bishop Colenso "had not been charged falsely with erroneous teaching," but had "openly proclaimed opinions which are at variance with the belief of the Church in all ages." It was, therefore, decided "to deprive him of his office as Bishop of Natal, unless he shall, within a specified time, retract the false teaching which has been condemned." We all know how it ended. Colenso did not "retract," and his heresy remained. To-day the teaching which was "at variance with the Church in all ages" has become orthodox. Every opinion for which Colenso was condemned is now accepted by every educated clergyman in the country. And if Colenso were alive to-day he would discover in the teachings of eminent dignitaries of the English Church heresies that he in his boldest flights never dreamed of uttering.

According to a provincial paper, Mr. Fergus Hume, the novelist, will shortly lecture on "The Christ." The subject is scarcely as sensational as The Mystery of a Hansom Cab.

"Burns was more than a poet; he was a prophet and a reformer of the Scottish clergy," says the Rev. Erskine Nicol, of Westcliff. Especially when the great poet sang "The Church and State may go to hell; but I'll go to my Anna."

"In almost all the religions right conduct has been urged on man by means of a substantial bribe," writes Mr. C. Collum in The Quest. Mansions in the skies sounds substantial as a bribe, but the priests get something more solid for the promise.

Those newest of new painters and artists, the Cubists, Futurists, and Post-Impressionists, intend bringing out a periodical with the quaint title, Blast. Probably it means the blast of a trumpet; but it appears like a word from a Christian Evidence lecture.

Bishop Gore, the once heretical contributor to Lux Mundi, has issued an open letter to the clergy of the diocese of Oxford. He says therein:—

> "An 'advanced' school of Biblical Criticism, on grounds, however, rather philosophical than strictly critical, has reached the conclusion that certain miracles—those which by contrast to the miracles of healing are called 'nature-miracles,' such as our Lord's feeding of the five thousand, or the stilling of the waves by His word, or the raising of the dead; or, again, the miracle of His own birth of a virgin mother, and the resurrection of His dead body from the grave—are for us to-day incredible, not chiefly on grounds of the evidence in each particular case, but on grounds of general scientific and historical principle."

Bishop Gore will have none of this, and has evidently decided to stick to a more orthodox conception of the creeds which clergymen are ordained to preach. He asks:—

> "Is it consistent with the sincerity which ought to attach to public office, and especially to public office in the Christian Church, that a man should pledge himself to the constant recitation of these Creeds, as an officer of the society which so strenuously holds them, if he personally does not believe that these miraculous events occurred, if he believes that our Lord was born as other men, or that His dead body did in fact 'see corruption'?"

We quite agree with Bishop Gore that it is not consistent with sincerity for a clergyman to remain in a Church while repudiating the plain meaning of its teaching by putting a construction upon its doctrines which they were never intended to bear. Such a practice reflects little credit upon the man, and still less upon the religion in which he has been trained. If Christianity had ever made intellectual uprightness one of its teachings, and had insisted upon it, there would now be no need for the Bishop's "Open Letter." Men would feel that when they disagree with a religion their proper place is outside. Only we would observe that it is the Christian Churches themselves that have made honesty of speech and fearlessness of thought two of the most costly luxuries in which men can indulge. People have not been encouraged to develop these qualities in themselves, and they have naturally ceased to expect their expression in others.

To this we would add one other observation. Suppose the clergy were really seized with an epidemic of honesty, and left their pulpits so soon as they discovered that they no longer held the plain meaning of Christian doctrines; how many would remain? Not only in the Church of England, but in all the Churches? Clearly, we should soon have an outcry about empty pulpits as well as about empty pews. For there is hardly an educated clergyman in the country—and certainly none of the leading ones—who do accept Christian doctrines in a plain, straightforward sense. Their chief energies are being given to demonstrating that Christian doctrines cannot mean what they have always been taken to mean, and to proving that they really mean a great deal of what Freethinkers have always taught concerning them. Really honest men do not ask, "What can I make a thing mean?" They ask, "What did it mean to those who wrote it?" And if what it meant to them is not in agreement with fact, it is only the exercise of common honesty to say that it is false. Dr. Gore is afraid that the clergy will, if they are not careful, "lose both the reputation and the reality of sincerity." If he will come down out of the clouds and face facts, he will discover that they have largely lost that already.

The Church Times opens its Easter number in quite a tearful vein. It laments that "as each year comes round we find what we believe to be the historical fact of the Empty Tomb more and more called in question, and that even by men who exercise the sacred ministry among us." This is very sad—for Christians, but we feel quite cheerful at the news. It is a confession that the effects of Freethought propaganda is making itself felt. Of course, we knew it was doing this all along, but usually Christian writers pretend to ignore the fact. The "historical fact of the empty tomb"! We are more impressed with the historical fact of empty heads.

"The world's great heart is aching, and nothing but Jesus will cure it," says the Bishop of Chelmsford. Whether the world is so afflicted is an open question; but at any rate it is a more difficult piece of joinery than the Carpenter of Nazareth can manage.

"One Laugh Three Hours Long" is the description of an entertainment being given at a metropolitan place of amusement. A longer laugh could be obtained by reading the stories in the Bible.

The late Mr. Prime Taylor Coulson, originator of the famous Cambridge sausages, who died a few days ago, was known as the "Sausage King." Royal persons need feel no alarm, for the "King of Kings" was a carpenter.

Defenders of the Design Argument will be pleased to hear that a Hackney baby, whose death was the subject of an inquest, had webbed toes and fingers. This condition, said the child's grandmother, had occurred in the family for several generations. This sample will not satisfy the quacks.

What wonderful Atheists are met—by Christians. We have, naturally, come across a good many Atheists in our time, but we have never been fortunate enough to meet the kind religious people so often encounter. There is the weeping Atheist, who is full of regrets that he has been compelled to give up the belief in God, and who envies the religious man his serene and comforting belief. He appears to be a very common type, but he has never come our way. Rev. F. C. Spurr, on his way home from Melbourne, met another extraordinary specimen, a Frenchman by nationality. He had no hostility towards religion; on the contrary, he had something like an affection for it. Stranger still, he thought that some kind of moral instruction was needful for France, and he would prefer this to be religious rather than nothing at all. We wonder whether Mr. Spurr was surprised at finding an Atheist who believed in some kind of moral instruction? Or did he expect that the Atheist believed the world would be able to get on without it? The old religious method used to be the presentation of an Atheist who repudiated all morality. Now we have an Atheist who believes in morality but who doesn't quite see how we are to get it in the absence of religion. And both are built up on the common assumption that there is something antagonistic between Atheism and morality. Really, the Atheist does not object to moral instruction; his chief complaint is that religious teachers are such poor hands at the job.

One of the religious journals asks "Does God Suffer?" We should be inclined to answer in the affirmative, if it is assumed that he reads all the apologists say in his defence.

formation of bands of Christians which participated in the massacre of Moslems at Kavala.

The Bishop of Winchester has received authorisation by Order in Council to borrow £100 from the governors of the Bounty of Queen Anne for improving the laundry at Farnham Castle. We have no doubt that there is much in connection with the diocese that needs cleaning.

The Christian Commonwealth publishes an article on "The Testimony to Immortality of Non-Christian Religions." We should hardly have thought this necessary even in a Christian journal. Certainly none of those who reject the belief in immortality would question the universality of the belief. Part of the modern case against a future life rests, as a matter of fact, upon the universality of the belief. If it could be shown that only a few races believed in it, and these amongst the higher ones, a much stronger case could be made out for it. But this is not so. It is universal amongst the lower races, and it is only questioned with advancing knowledge. If the Freethinker is right in asserting that the belief in a soul or double, and consequently in a future life, originated in the savage mistaking the nature of certain subjective and objective experiences, then, as the human mind is everywhere the same, and under primitive conditions, at least, is faced by the same circumstances, we should expect men everywhere to arrive at substantially the same conclusions. And this is what we actually do find. The "soul" is a product of primitive psychology. And as modern thought has revised primitive conclusions elsewhere, so it has revised them here also. The universality of religious belief is no proof of its truth, but rather of the reverse.

Bradford has just been witnessing an orgy of revivalism which ought to remind people that there is often a fine line only between religion in some of its forms and insanity. According to the Yorkshire Observer report, after the service had been in progress for awhile—

> "Everyone knelt down on the floor, and then began one of the most remarkable scenes it is possible to imagine. The preacher commenced a prayer, in which he called upon the Almighty and invoked the presence and blessing of Christ in terms which under ordinary circumstances would be described as irreverent and insulting to the point of blasphemy. The Deity was extolled in words of such familiarity and ardent personal fervor, with interjections of such fiery sentiment that the congregation set up an accompanying chorus of moans and ejaculations. The prayer became more and more fervid and less and less coherent; the people groaned and mumbled inarticulate phrases, swaying to and fro and trembling with the intensity of their ecstasy. Some cried out aloud, clutching the benches and burying their heads in their arms; others simply rocked themselves backwards and forwards, wailing as if in agony."

A young woman then began to preach, becoming more and more inarticulate, and finally collapsed, writhing on the ground in emotional rapture. An old woman followed suit, and then men and women were together jabbering all sorts of sounds which were doubtless intended to prove that the "gift of tongues" had come upon them. The scene was not an unusual one in the history of revivalism, and it illustrated what religion becomes when the controlling influence of the intellect is lacking. The regrettable thing is that there should be people amongst us who do not hesitate to trade upon the pitiful state of these poor semi-demented creatures.

"The true Puritan can perhaps never be the true saint," says a writer in the Times Literary Supplement. Had the writer been a Nonconformist, he would have denied the possibility to the followers of the Government religion.

The connection between cookery and Christianity is not confined to the roasting of missionaries. One London firm sold a quarter of a million hot cross buns, which were retailed at "penny each, or four for threepence."

Of all the "blessed words" in the language there is none more so than that of "instinct." It has a scientific sound that seems peculiarly attractive to some minds, and it is most often little more than a cover for ignorance, or an excuse for avoiding a little hard thinking. People are said to do this or that by "instinct," or to have an "instinct" for this, that, or the other, when they do and have nothing of the kind. Mr. T. J. Hardy has just written a book on The Religious Instinct, and a very pertinent criticism of the work is that the volume is based on the non-existent—which, by the way, is not an unusual feature of religious writings. There is no such thing as a religious instinct. One may possess ideas about religion, or one may have beliefs about religion, but no one has a religious instinct. If people are left alone, and remain uninstructed, they are likely to drop into the animistic interpretation of things and become religious. In that case their religion is the outcome of theorising about things in the absence of adequate knowledge. Or, if they are not left alone, but are trained in religious ideas, they may also become religious. In both cases their religion is acquired. But if, instead of being either left alone, or trained to believe in religion, religion is eliminated altogether from their education and they receive proper instruction on all other topics, what becomes of the "religious instinct"? It is simply non-existent. Man has no instinct for religion, but he is susceptible to it, just as he is susceptible to numerous diseases. And he tends to acquire immunity to both.

Mr. Hardy says that "nothing could be more detrimental to religion than the constant intrusion of 'difficulties' on the notice of mixed congregations." Quite so. If people are to be kept religious, the fact that there are difficulties in the way of their belief must be carefully kept from them. They must be brought up in the full belief that difficulties only exist for immoral or perverse people. That is really the principle on which all religious teachers work. They keep all sorts of information away from those under their charge for fear it may unsettle their belief. If they do not tell lies, they suggest falsehoods. For it is suggesting falsehoods when a growing generation is barred from access to the reasoned opinions of people who have tested the "faith" and found it wanting.

The supply of Biblical films appears to be somewhat limited. "The Messiah," "Daniel," and a few other subjects made up the Easter programs. Now the manufacturers are booming "The World, the Flesh, and the Devil." This ought to attract the "unco' guid" more than faked films of fables.

Among recent wills we observe that of the Rev. H. H. Allott, vicar of Warton, Warwickshire, and of Stifford, Grays, with a value of £20,701, also Rev. G. Granville, of Warpeton, Warwick, with a value of £25,199, Rev. T. Maude, of Selborne, Torquay, £8,295, Canon Bristow, £12,405, Rev. M. W. F. St. John, Gloucester, £8,690. All bore their inflictions with true Christian fortitude.

"Now that the talk is of Ireland, one recalls a story of Hartley Coleridge. That unfortunate youth then had as dinner neighbor an Irish enthusiast whose talk was all of Popish evils. Hartley listened in silence, but after dinner he took the Irishman aside and said with all solemnity: 'Sir, there are two great evils in Ireland.' His hearer agreed. 'The first,' continued Hartley, is Popery.' 'Most truly, was the answer, '—and the other?' 'Protestantism,' replied Coleridge as he moved quickly away."—Daily Chronicle.

"We know that our Lord loved his country and his family," writes the Dean of Durham in Lloyd's Weekly News. As the "Chosen People" have been outcasts for many centuries, he had a curious method of dissembling his love. As for his family, he publicly insulted his mother, and, if Christian dogma be true, he was his own father.

At the annual meeting of the Hotel Association, Lord Bessborough remarked that "the old Sunday had passed away." The witty writer of "Asterisks" in the Star, commenting on this, says, "Instead of the day of rest, we have the day of restaurants."

The City Council of Vancouver proposes keeping the Japanese children in that city in schools different from those which the white children attend. The Japanese Consul has protested against this, and has pointed out that very undesirable relations between his country and Canada may arise if this proposal is carried into effect. What a lovely influence Christianity has upon the relations of human beings to be sure. We do not think that any nation of the ancient world would ever have dreamed of a proposal of this character. And yet we find Christians full of the cant of brotherhood and of talk about the love and kindness that Christianity brings into the world. It might, of course, be argued that such a proposition as this has nothing to do with Christianity. But it is very evident that Christianity has not sufficiently civilised its followers to make it impossible.

Concerts are given in various prisons on Sundays, and popular hymns are special favorites. It is one of life's little ironies that there is a special call for "Abide with me."

B. KOLAKA (Calcutta).—We do not see what the N. S. S. can do concerning the missionary movement in India beyond exposing it whenever opportunity offers. We note your observation that Christianity in India is "a mere show kept up with the aid of money from England, and that the missionaries "are simply picnicking at the expense of others, and having the best of everything. Unfortunately, there are so many people at home who have an interest in keeping up the sham, and so many people on the spot who do not care to speak out on account of the ill-will that would be manifested. All we can do, and all you can do, is to keep on pegging away until the truth on the matter becomes more general than it is at present.

E. LECHMERE.—Mr. Foote will quite appreciate your good wishes for his recovery, and is, indeed, making good progress towards complete health. You may depend that his pen will not be idle in these columns once he is out of the doctor's hands.

A. FAWN.—See "Sugar Plums."

A. MILLAR.—It is always pleasant to learn that one's efforts meet with appreciation. We take it that the reason why the Freethinker keeps to so high a level is that none of its writers are "hired" in the journalistic sense of the word. With all it is a labor of love, and to that sort of work a man always gives of his best. Plenty of writers may be bought, but theirs is not usually the kind of writing that appeals to sincere men and women. And there is no mistaking that the Freethinker has a curiously effective way of getting "home" to the minds of those who read its pages.

T. M. BROWN.—We despair of making the matter sufficiently intelligible and interesting to our readers.

A. KOHN.—We do not see that "Mr. G. W. Foote" is under any obligation to answer your letter by post, or even at all. You ask "whether the Life of Bradlaugh by Mackay is allowed to be sold now?" Why do you ask him the question? And why do you expect him to answer it?

ABERYSTWYTH.—There is a good deal of truth in what you say. We shall certainly act on some of your advice.

H. ROSETTI.—Mr. Foote appreciates the West Ham Branch's resolution of sympathy and encouragement.

A. SCOTT.—We see nothing calling for special comment. Thanks all the same.

J. BRYCE.—Received. Mr. Foote, as you will see, is utilising the burst of good weather in getting back into fighting form.

G. E. QUIRK.—Will deal next week with the points raised in your letter. We are greatly afraid that your chance of getting a reply, from the Freethought side, in the paper you name is very remote. Whether that particular paper is aware or not of there being "two sides to a question," it takes care that only one shall appear.

Special.

I AM regaining my strength gradually, but surely. I am not, however, capable of work at present; although I hope my pen will be represented in next week's Freethinker. I infer this from the fact that I have just been reading a new book with real pleasure,—which is a sure sign of vital recovery. My voice, too, which I completely lost for a time, is coming back to me. Per contra, I am distressed to hear of the breakdown of my old friend, W. W. Collins, of Christchurch, New Zealand. He is a younger man than I am, and he had a healthy look when he lived in England. After all, therefore, I may venture to hope that he still has a good many years of service to render to the Freethought which has been the love of his life. I am thinking, also, of Miss Vance, who is almost fighting for her life in a London hospital. Her dreadful affliction of blindness intensifies the sufferings she experiences from other ailments, and her loneliness must be terrible in such a situation.

A correspondent who takes an interest in the Freethinker has been trying to get the Ealing Public Library to accept a copy of this paper weekly. The Librarian replied rather curtly that a similar offer was made last December and declined, and that the Committee decided not to accept it; and, therefore, they are not likely to accept the offer if it is submitted to them. Perhaps not; but we think it is the duty of the Librarian to submit the offer just the same, and the gentleman who made it should see that it goes before them. The Committee may have become wiser or more liberal in the interval. We are asked how the matter could be advanced. The only plan we can suggest is to get people of a liberal turn of mind to join our friend in asking that the Freethinker be accepted. It is simply intolerable that a paper should be barred from a public library because certain of the Committee do not agree with its opinions. We have no doubt that there are enough people in Ealing in favor of justice being done to all ratepayers, if only they can be got at. And if the Library Committee will not act fairly, there is always the elections, at which the matter can be raised.

Now that the summer months are approaching there are many ways in which friends of this paper might help in the matter of circulation. In the first place, the offer to send free specimen copies to likely subscribers is still open, and this has already been the means of introducing the Freethinker to new readers. Next, as summer is the time when most people travel about more than at other periods of the year, there are always plenty of opportunities for doing some unobtrusive but very useful propaganda work. Those who do not file their Freethinker may profitably utilise them in this direction, once they are done with. The great thing is to get the paper known. Were the paper as well known as it ought to be, it might easily become a "property" in the financial sense of the term. There are only two ways of securing this. The one is by extensive, and expensive, advertising. The other is by the personal enthusiasm of all who care for the Freethought cause. The first method is beyond our power. We have, therefore, perforce to rely upon the second.

Freethinkers, particularly those whose memories go back to the earlier Bradlaugh days, will learn with regret that Mr. W. Ramsey has fallen upon evil days. Mr. Ramsey has for many years been a worker in all sorts of advanced movements; he was one of the three sentenced in 1883 during the Freethinker prosecution, and has of late years lectured constantly at the Freethought open-air stations in London. An attack of paralysis has now prevented him following any kind of occupation, and, like many other workers in advanced causes, he now finds himself without resources. A meeting of representatives from various London bodies, held at the Finsbury Radical Club, decided to raise a fund for his benefit. An appeal will be issued, which will be supported by Mr. J. Dent and Mr. B. T. Hall, of the Club and Institute Union; Alderman Jeffrey and Councillor Garrity, of the Metropolitan Radical Federation; Messrs. Herbert Burrows, H. Snell, G. Standring, W. Darby, Miss A. Stanley, Miss E. M. Vance, and others. Miss E. M. Vance has undertaken to receive subscriptions on behalf of the fund from readers of this notice, which will be duly acknowledged. The Committee is a representative one, and we hope that the response will be a generous, and above all, a ready one. The need is urgent, and he gives twice who gives quickly.

We are just in time to acknowledge the receipt of a card from Mr. F. J. Gould, informing us that he sails for England on the Mauretania on April 23. Mr. Gould has just spent three weeks in New York, giving public lessons under the auspices of the Child Welfare League, of which Mrs. Walston Brown (née Eva R. Ingersoll) is president. Mr. Gould appears to have had a very successful tour, and his many friends on this side will welcome his return. An article from his pen on "Educational Problems in America" will appear in these columns at an early date.

The Bethnal Green Branch N. S. S. commences its summer work in Victoria Park this afternoon (April 19) at 3.15. The lecturer is Mr. Darby. East End Freethinkers will doubtless see that the lecturer has a good audience round him. There is nothing like it to spur a speaker to do his best, and even to listen as one of a large crowd is, somehow, more enjoyable than when one is only an item among a "faithful few."

Modern Poets.

IT is rather late in the day to poetise about war. The clatter and bluster of the war correspondent during the Balkan carnage has robbed the poet of his legitimate theme. Since those unhappy days of suppressed truth and deliberate lying we have looked with suspicion on most designs to point a moral and adorn a tale in connection with war. International scandals have been brought to light and armor-makers have figured pitiably in these disclosures. Therefore it was with grave misgivings that we read "The Wine Press," and we must confess that the epilogue was quite up to our expectations. We had one moment of a sense in which we thought that we were face to face with a truthful and reasonable attitude towards the problem, but that vanished when we came to the end.

The majority of our present-day poets are either incapable of rising above the level of popular applause and approval, or they fear to express in their language any sentiment that is likely to shake orthodox foundations. There is William Watson: he danced in the twilight of anæmic Agnosticism, but now he has rattled back to the haven of convention. We have only to read his "Moonset and Sunrise" to see that he prefers to be on the side of the angels. Following in his steps is one more poet—splendid, virile, and a natural singer; he also prefers to ruffle no feeling of good taste or defy any canon of what passes for respectability. Must we conclude that our modern poets are so many stuffed lions?

When we began the Prelude to "The Wine Press" we knew that we were on familiar ground:—

> "Sandalphon, whose white wings to heaven up-bear
> The weight of human prayer,
> Stood silent in the still eternal light
> Of God, one dreadful night."

Milton, in the valley of his genius, was never guilty of such banality. He could use reverential characters to command respect; but imagery of this kind is very feeble, and excites nothing but contempt. "White wings" and "dreadful night" seem to have a far-away echo of the nursery, and we venture this cheerfully: Sandalphon's function possesses at least one quality which we never suspected before—that of originality.

> "His wings were clogged with blood, and foul with mire,
> His body seared with fire.
> 'Hast thou no word for me?' the Master said,
> The angel sank his head."

Now observe the harmony of construction. Are angels material or not? We ask this question in the best of good faith, and we make due allowance for poetic license. What baffling problems are presented in these eight lines! They positively bristle and shout aloud to any critical reader not blinded by religious or non-religious prejudice. We should have thought that the question in the seventh line was slightly superfluous, but apparently it was considered necessary. We are reluctantly compelled to point out these absurdities to the Hall Caines of the Muse. It is with no surprise that we find the poet producing such an ill-balanced picture as that in the Prelude. If heaven could be visited, and authentic information obtained, we venture to think that religious prose and poetry writers would not provoke our sense of the ridiculous in this manner. If angels are invisible, they cannot have bloodstained wings; if they are visible, then it is childish to write even poetically that they up-bear the weight of human prayer. We leave the poet to take his choice of the two anomalies.

Sandalphon appears in heaven to announce that two nations are at war, and they are both invoking the Lord God of Sabaoth. This is one of those Rabelaisian situations that frequently occur in connection with the Christian faith, and one does not know whether to pity the object of Christian worship or to pity those who imagine that the Lord takes sides in the squabbles of his own children. We, as Freethinkers, will have none of this omnipotent being who is entreated, cajoled, pacified, and thanked year in year out. Neither shall we bow down to one who is supposed to be on the side of the victorious or of the defeated. To us the God of the Old Testament, when presented in the modern manner, is no more acceptable now than he was when we read of him during our childish purgatory called Sunday-school and compulsory church attendance. One important point not to be overlooked in this presentation of the Lord is this: he is not yet divorced from blood and slaughter; he still continues to be made in the image of his makers. Personally, if we needed a God (and we have not yet had that experience), we think we could choose from the world's Pantheon a much better specimen. We might go to Greece, or to India, or to Norseland. From our bookshelf we take out Heroes and Hero-Worship—we have not read it for ten years—and we open it and find underlined:—

> "We must get rid of Fear; we cannot act at all till then. A man's acts are slavish, not true but specious; his very thoughts are false, he thinks as a slave and a coward, till he have got Fear under his feet. Odin's creed, if we disentangle the real kernel of it, is true to this hour."

We commend the above to those who approach their own deity on their—knees. The Norse belief taught valor as its chief virtue; how easily would all other virtues take their place after that? England still staggers about in her choice of a deity with all the vices of the Old Testament and none of the virtues of present-day enlightenment. If we had no other signs of this, "The Wine Press" would convince us.

The story is one of a young man, Johann by name, called to war. He leaves his wife and child to bear arms against the Turk. With the Greek Allies he fights the hated Moslems, and at a later time is forced to fight against the Greeks. He eventually returns as a crippled invalid to find his wife and child murdered, with all the accompanying rites of the soldiers of the Cross, and his friend crucified. In the madness of despair he kills himself:—

> O Christ of the Little Children,
> "Over his naked blade
> Johann bowed, bowed and fell
> Gasping, Sonia, Dodi, tell
> Your God in heaven, I grow so weary
> Of all that He has made."

It was at this point that we thought we had arrived at a masterly treatment of a situation chiefly brought about through religion. But no; we read on:—

> "Conquered, we shall conquer!
> They have not hurt the soul,
> For there is another Captain
> Whose legions round us roll,
> Battling across the wastes of death
> Till all be healed and whole."

There are two more verses in a similar strain, and then we have the Epilogue, the concluding two lines of which we quote:—

> "One path of love and peace climb'd higher,
> Make straight that highway for our God."

With these we shall quote the last verse of William Watson's "Moonset and Sunrise," with its anti-Turk title and its childish prattle:—

> "Enough, if hands that heretofore
> Labored to bar His road,
> Delay henceforward nevermore
> The charioteers of God,
> Who halt and slumber, but anon
> With burning wheels drive thundering on."

Blank verse was the measure of Shakespeare's genius, but he was compelled occasionally to substitute the rhymed couplet at the end of a prologue or an act. This was caused by the demand of the vulgar patrons of the theatre. The reader will now perceive why we have quoted the two modern poets. Their conclusions are identical, and we think that we have indicated the reason of this common failing in the present day. War is a hateful business, but it is doubly so when our accepted singers have neither the Norse virtue nor the vision to throw overboard this vulgar pandering to the mob. If civilisation means an advance from the simple to the complex, then the introduction of the Deity into the problem of war is nothing more or less than demoralisation.

WILLIAM REPTON.

The Associative Principle in Evolution.

HERBERT SPENCER has very convincingly shown that the evolutionary process, inorganic, organic, and super-organic, consists fundamentally of an advance from an indefinite, incoherent state to a definite coherent state. In the sphere of inorganic evolution this is shown throughout by those aggregations and redistributions of matter with which physics and chemistry deal. Organic evolution shows it in the aggregations of cells into tissues, organs, and organisms, with all those ever-increasing differentiations and complexities of structure and function which form the subject-matter of morphology and physiology. Super-organic evolution shows it in the increasing coherence and definiteness which accompany the development of social communities among man and the higher animals, as dealt with, in the case of man especially, in the science of sociology. And among human societies this universal world-process culminates in ethics.

Through organic and super-organic evolution the advance from an incoherent to a coherent state manifests itself in that associative principle which seems to govern all living things, from the primitive cell to the member of a developed human society. As this associative principle—manifested in its three great divisions of sexual association, parental association, and communal association—forms the basis of ethics, it will be of considerable interest to trace its working from the very beginnings of life to its culmination in human communities, and thus to examine, as it were, morals in the making.

The growth and subdivision of a simple cell is a purely mechanical affair—a matter of equilibria between nutrition and waste; between the forces of aggregation and those of disruption. As the volume of a cell—the quantity of living matter it contains—increases more rapidly than its surface, and as all nutrition has to reach this living matter by way of the surface, there must come a stage in the cell's growth when the extent of surface can only permit of a supply of nutriment just sufficient to compensate for the waste. The cell then reaches a condition of equilibrium between nutrition and waste, and ceases to grow.

But the equilibrium is essentially an unstable one. The surface of the cell, by the very fact of its being the surface, is under different conditions to the interior of the cell, and the molecular elements of the protoplasm at the surface must, therefore, be different from the molecular elements of the interior. The protoplasm of the surface layer, by reason of its being in immediate contact with the surrounding medium, would probably be more adapted to rapid assimilation of the nutritive materials. It would probably contain a larger proportion of molecular motion—probably be of a more dynamic and active habit than the protoplasm of the interior, which would, on the other hand, exhibit a more inert, static, or sluggish character. As the cell reaches its limiting state of equilibrium, and the amount of nutriment assimilable through the surface reaches its minimum, the active surface protoplasm would tend to assimilate a disproportionately large share of it. We know that the vital functions of a cell have to be regarded as a sort of contest between the anabolic and katabolic forces of the protoplasm. As long as the amount of nutriment available through the surface is more than sufficient for the performance of these functions, the contest could go on without any disturbance of the cell's equilibrium, but, as the available supply of nutriment reaches its limit, the contest between the predominantly katabolic surface protoplasm adn the predominantly anabolic interior protoplasm would become sufficiently acute to disturb the already highly unstable equilibrium and bring about a disruption of the cell. The process of cell division would be initiated.

But this cell division would rarely be an absolutely equal division. It would very rarely happen that the plane of cleavage would pass exactly through the centre of the cell, but in the vast majority of cases the cell would divide into two portions not absolutely equal. Now, it follows from simple mathematical principles that when a spherical body, surrounded by an outer layer of material different from the inner mass, is divided by a cleavage plane into two unequal parts, the proportions of outer to inner substance in the two parts differ from each other and from that in the parent body. The smaller fragment would contain a larger proportion of outer layer to inner mass than the parent body possessed, and the larger fragment would contain a smaller proportion of outer layer to inner mass than the parent body possessed. Thus, when our supposed heterogeneously formed cell divides into two unequal "daughter cells," the smaller of the two would contain a greater proportion of active surface protoplasm than the large. Successive subdivisions would continue and increase this differentiation, and there would thus eventually be evolved two functionally different kinds of cells—small, energetic cells containing a preponderant share of active, dynamic molecular elements; and large, inert, static cells manifesting an essentially sluggish and passive habit. Now, these are well known to be the distinguishing characteristics of "male" and "female" cells—of sperm and ovum—and thus we reach the conclusion that possibly the very earliest steps in cell division may also have initiated the first step in the great associative principle—the differentiation of sex.

Without further following up this hypothesis, we find that, as a matter of fact, sex differentiation does take place very low down in the organic scale, and hence our proposed survey of the associative principle will have to begin almost at the beginning of life itself.

Though among the protozoa, reproduction is generally non-sexual, it is often effected by processes which may be described as partially sexual. Thus, in the gregarina, reproduction sometimes takes place after the previous fusion of two individuals, and in paramœcium, an infusorian form, fission is sometimes preceded by conjugation. Though in most cases the individuals uniting are alike, in some cases they are unlike in form and size, thus seeming to foreshadow the beginnings of true sexual reproduction. This is seen among the infusoria in vorticella, where the stalked form becomes joined with a small, actively swimming form. Among the radiolaria there may be simple fission, or there may be a breaking up into minute germs or zoospores. All these various methods of reproduction seem distinctly to indicate the beginnings of sex differentiation.

Among the metazoa, sexual reproduction is practically universal, but it presents many intermediate forms before the perfect type is reached. Thus, in the porifera, sexual reproduction does not seem to be completely established, though sometimes ova and spermatozoa become developed in certain parts of the organism—the female elements in the deeper layers and the male elements in the more superficial ones—and fertilisation of the former by the latter probably takes place. There is also a form of budding by gemmules which escape and develop into new sponges.

In the cœlenterata sexual differentiation takes a further step, but is not yet completely established. In hydra, non-sexual reproduction by budding takes place in summer, and sexual reproduction in winter. In the latter case, the mature ovum becomes exposed to the water by rupture of the cells surrounding it, and is fertilised by spermatozoa floating in the water. It then is shed from the parent, and eventually gives rise to a young hydra. Here we see the beginnings of sexual reproduction between distinct individuals, but it is effected in a more or less irregular and haphazard fashion. This is a characteristic which we find, indeed, in all the processes of evolution, none of which proceed straightforwardly to their goal as though under a definite and purposive guidance; but we see it nowhere more clearly than in this gradual advance of the associative principle. There is no steady forward march in serial order here, no cut-and-dried plan of progress; but all is tentative, groping, experimental, full of irregularities and overlaps, of deviations and even retrogressions.

In the composite hydroids there are some beautiful examples of division of labor into nutritive and reproductive functions—the "hydriform" zooids or polypites attending to the procurement and assimilation of food, and "medusiform" zooids to the business of reproduction. This may be regarded as a foreshadowing of the development of distinct sexual organs in the higher metozoa. Indeed, in the same sub-kingdom, among the actinozoa—corals and sea-anemones—there are always distinct reproductive organs, both sexes being sometimes represented in the same individual, but often in separate individuals. Thus, even as low down as this, we begin to pass from hermaphroditism to complete sexuality.

In the vermes the sexes are often distinct, especially among the higher worms, and in the echinoderms they are almost universally so.

Among the molluscoidea, the polyzoa—in those cases where sexual reproduction occurs—are always hermaphrodite, and their colonies are formed by continuous generation. Among the brachiopoda we have either distinct or united sexes, as also among the lower classes of the true mollusca. But the typical gastropods have the sexes separate, and among the cephalopods—the highest class of the mollusca — the sexes are always distinct. The remarkable modification of one of the "arms" of the male octopod cuttle-fish for reproductive purposes is very noteworthy.

With the arthropoda we see the sexes much more definitely separated, and sexual association thus more fully developed. The crustacea are generally uni-sexual, but parthenogenetic reproduction occurs in some of the lower orders, and in the degenerate cirripedia—barnacles and acorn-shells—the sexes are generally united. Nor is this the only instance we shall notice of a degenerate condition being accompanied by a correspondingly imperfect form of sexual association. The arachnida and myriopoda are unisexual, but in the special division, protracheata, the curious primitive form, peripatus, has the sexes sometimes united. The insects are all unisexual, but some parasitic and degenerate forms can reproduce parthenogenetically. Among the higher insects the development of secondary sexual characters (differences in outward appearance between males and females) give rise to forms of great variety and beauty. As is well known, among the social hymenoptera the "workers" are sexless; thus furnishing a case where the normal sexual association has been profoundly modified by the extraordinary degree to which the communal association has been carried in this order of insects.

Passing on towards the vertebrates, we find hermaphroditism in the tunicates or ascidians, which are generally believed to be a degenerate type of vertebrata; but in all true vertebrates there is sexual reproduction, and except in some fishes the sexes are separate. Sexual association may therefore be regarded as reaching its full expression only in this, the highest of the sub-kingdoms. However, the association is by no means equally developed throughout, but passes from an incomplete form in the lower classes to its most perfect manifestation in the mammalia. In most fishes and amphibians the ova are fertilised by the male after deposition by the female, but in the three higher classes sexual congress is universal. And with the progress of evolution through this sub-kingdom we find the sexual relationship becoming increasingly definite and increasingly permanent, till finally, in the higher orders of the mammalia, an ethical element emerges, and the mere physical impulse becomes largely supplemented by a moral emotion.

We have next to consider the second great stage of the associative principle—parental association. This takes its rise very early in evolution, but not, of course, as early as that sexual association we have been examining; though, like all other results of the evolutionary process, the order of the three stages of association is by no means strictly serial. Parental association begins long before sexual association attains completion, and communal association begins long before parental association reaches its final development.

Parental association can scarcely be said to exist below the sub-kingdom of the arthropoda, but here we can detect the faint beginnings of an instinctive care for the offspring. Among the crustacea, female crabs and lobsters carry their eggs about until they are hatched. Some female spiders make a sort of nest for their eggs, and guard them carefully. Among insects elaborate provision for the safety of the eggs is sometimes made, and the parental care displayed among the communities of the social insects is well known. But here, again, the normal course of parental association has been remarkably modified in accordance with the highly developed social organisation, the care of the eggs and larvæ being attended to by the whole community of "workers," and not by the actual parents.

Among the lower vertebrata parental association continues to develop, but it remains in the instinctive stage, and is aided in many cases by structural modifications. In some species of fishes the females carry the ova on the belly till hatched, and in others a pouch for the eggs is formed by the skin and ventral fins. The male stickleback makes a nest of grasses and weeds in which the eggs are guarded. In some cases the male carries the ova about in the pharynx, while in others abdominal brood-pouches are developed.

The amphibia exhibit various arrangements for the care of the eggs and young. In the Surinam toad the eggs are placed by the male on the back of the female, where they form small pits in which the young are hatched and developed. In another case there is a large pouch on the back of the female for this purpose. Sometimes the male carries the eggs in a pouch around its throat, and in the case of the "obstetric frog" the male winds the string of eggs round his legs and buries himself in moist soil till they are hatched.

Among reptiles parental care, though not very frequent or pronounced, assumes a more purposive character. Some female snakes and crocodiles guard their eggs and young, haunting the localities where the eggs have been laid and attacking fiercely any enemies which may approach. The female python is said to coil itself around its eggs and thus to facilitate the process of incubation.

But it is among the two highest classes of the vertebrata that parental association acquires its most definite, permanent, and developed form, and the instances are so numerous and so familiar that it is needless to cite them. No one who considers the care which the fiercest birds and beasts of prey devote to the welfare of their young—the eagle bringing food to her fledglings, or the lioness licking her cubs as they gnaw the meat she has provided—can fail to see clear instances of morals in the making. And among both birds and mammals, as is well known, the parental association becomes closer in proportion to the helplessness of the offspring when hatched or born, and to the length of time which elapses before they are able to help themselves.

We now come to the last and highest development of the associative principle, viz., communal association, or the association of individuals in communities for mutual protection, aid, and the achievement of the corporate welfare. Here intelligence plays the predominant part, and communal association, in the true sense of the word, is only seen among the birds and mammals. The communities formed by the social insects are indeed wonderfully organised and most perfectly adapted to their ends, but it does not seem likely that intelligence plays any part in them. The very perfection of the social arrangements in these communities—the mechanical precision with which the various functions of the social life are performed—indicate that they are brought about by blind instinct alone, and that reason, intelligence, and moral sense do not exist. But the social insects no doubt represent the highest possible achievement of terrestrial evolution along the line of instinct.

Among the three lower classes of the vertebrata the frequent groupings of large numbers of individuals in one locality seem to be the result of unavoidable conditions incidental to their manner of life rather than of deliberate choice—and deliberate choice may be regarded as the essential feature of communal association in the true sense of the term. The groupings of fishes and frogs in large numbers are due to circumstances of spawning, in which vast numbers of eggs are hatched in one locality. Crocodiles and aquatic lizards dwell together in lake or river merely because their restricted habitat compels them to do so. They would get on just as well, or better, if each pair dwelt in solitude. In all such cases the aggregation brings no mutual advantage; no aid is given or required; no real communal life is held. It may be that this is due to some failure of brain development inherent in the whole line of reptilian evolution, aided by the oviparous habit of reproduction, and this would be almost sufficient to account for that extraordinary break in the continuity of animal evolution which seems to have taken place at the close of the Mesozoic period. Here the feeble beginnings of bird and mammalian life, aided by the awakening power of the great principle of association, might easily defeat in the struggle for existence the huge, powerful, but unintelligent forms of reptile and amphibian life of the Triassic and Jurassic ages.

It is only among birds and mammals, then, that communal association really obtains, and instances of this are too familiar to need mention. It is only necessary to point out the broad fact that among both birds and mammals the degree of completeness to which the association is carried varies generally with the degree of intelligence of the species, till, reaching its culmination in man, it forms the groundwork of rational ethics.

Our brief survey has shown that the associative principle, commencing with the very beginnings of life in the form of sexual association, extends throughout the whole of organic nature known to us. And as the associative principle forms the basis of ethics, we reach the conclusion that the whole course of organic evolution has exhibited—dimly and vaguely, but none the less surely—a sort of preparation for the final development of the ethical principle. From the dawn of life we see evidences, first vague and feeble, then definite and strong, of morals in the making.

This throws an instructive light on the supposed antagonism between what Huxley called the "cosmic process" and the "ethical process"—the subject dealt with in his well-known essay, Evolution and Ethics. He fully recognised that the "ethical process" was itself a product of the "cosmic process"; but none the less insisted on the antagonism between the former, as exhibited in the moral order obtaining within human societies, and the latter, as exhibited in the natural order under the iron law of the survival of the fittest obtaining outside human societies. And the seeming paradox becomes all the more prominent when we regard the ethical process, not as an ultimate product of evolution making its appearance in human societies only, but as a fundamental element of organic evolution in general.

But the apparent paradox seems to be due to a tacit assumption that there exists some sort of purpose in the cosmic process. The idea of an "antagonism" between two processes must really imply that each of them has some end or design opposed to that of the other. Once we get rid of the idea of a design in the cosmic process, the notion of its being either antagonistic or favorable to the ethical process disappears, and the fact that the latter has been actually brought about by and forms part of the former involves no paradox whatever. On the contrary, this very fact that the cosmic process has itself evolved an ethical process, the full operation of which it is constantly tending to hinder, affords, to any unprejudiced mind, a very convincing indication that the universe is subject to an eternal and unalterable necessity absolutely preclusive of any element of design.

IRISH UNREST.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—It is really remarkable that, despite the cause of Irish unrest being so obvious, not one of the numerous journalists who have written pages on the subject has, as yet, given a true account of it. Many and various reasons have been put forward, but all ignore the real cause.

Without hesitation I say (and I think every unprejudiced person will agree with me) the real root of the trouble is religious antagonism. It is all due to that grand Christian gospel of love one another. Unfortunately, the Christian translates the words love one another thus: love one another if they are of the same creed as yourself. Thus we have the continued rivalry of Christian against Christian.

To make myself perfectly clear, let us imagine we could take all Protestants out of Ireland. What would be the result? Why the Home Rule Bill would now be passed and in force. On the other hand, let us imagine we could take all Roman Catholics out of Ireland. What would be the result? Why Home Rule would probably not be thought of.

As the two courses I have mentioned are impossible, I can only suggest one remedy. Someone with a tremendous personality and influence, and more patience than the proverbial Job, is required to start the task of reconciling the two sects and teach them to live in peace and harmony side by side. In fact, he must get them to practice what they preach, i.e., love one another. That accomplished, Irish unrest will be a thing of the past.

DIPHTHERIA ANTI-TOXIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In the course of his articles on "Organisms Antagonistic to Health," Mr. T. F. Palmer says that all known anti-bacterial products are specific; the anti-toxin of diphtheria has no preventive or remedial effect on any other disease. If this be so, can he say why firms of manufacturing chemists, on the strength of medical authority, recommend it for such diverse diseases as the following: Scarlet fever, quinsy, measles, cancrum oris, tuberculous disease, ocular inflammation, exophthalmic goitre, rhinorrhœa, asthma, whooping cough, boils and carbuncles, chronic skin diseases, hæmorrhage, erysipelas, and so on?

I suggest that the alleged "anti-toxin" has just as much, or as little, relation to these diseases as it has to diphtheria—that is to say, none at all. Can Mr. Palmer safely affirm that "anti-toxin" has any real existence, and that it is not a purely imaginary substance?

TO-DAY'S EVANGELISM.

(SAYINGS OF THE REV. WILLIAM SUNDAY.)

If any minister believes and teaches evolution he is a stinking skunk, a fraud, a hypocrite, and a liar.

There goes old Darwin. He's in hell sure.

Here, you young bulls—some of you come and take these heifers out on the grass. (A rebuke to giggling girls.)

Stand up there, you bastard evolutionist! Stand up with the Atheists and the Infidels and the w —— mongers and the adulterers and go to hell.

I'd stand on my head in a mud puddle if I thought it would give me greater power with God.

And, oh say, Jesus, better take along a pair of rubber gloves and a bottle of disinfectant, but if you can save him, Lord, I'd like to have you do it.

To hell with that kind of a minister.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from th Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 17 SUNDAY, APRIL 26, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Criminals are observed to grow more anxious as their trial approaches; but after their sentence is passed they become tolerably resigned, and generally sleep sound the night before its execution.—WILLIAM HAZLITT.

The Consolations of Religion.

HOW much Christians pride themselves upon the comfort their religion brings to stricken souls! It does not trouble them that very often Christianity itself is the cause of the unrest its doctrines are supposed to allay. The larger number of those who write in all sincerity about the comfort they have derived from religion are exactly those who have been made uncomfortable by religion. The evangelist's object has always been to arouse in people what he calls a "sense of sin"; and this, in plain English, meant frightening them with the fear of hell in the more orthodox times, making them feel generally uncomfortable under more civilised conditions, and then offering another dose of the doctrine that caused the trouble as its only certain cure. He supplies a quack remedy for a purely imaginary disease. Without Christianity these people would never have needed the comfort of religion. They would have lived a fairly comfortable life and died without, as someone once remarked, the consoling knowledge that there was a hell to go to.

Who is it that talk loudest of the comfort that Christianity brings them? It is a commonplace of observation that the most worthy persons are precisely those who derive the least comfort from their faith. The more sensitive a man is, the more intelligent he is, the more fervently he strives to do his duty, the more he is tortured by doubt as to whether he is really saved, or even whether he is worthy of being saved. On the other hand, the more callous and the more brutalised he is, the more confidently he talks of the beatific rewards awaiting him in the next world. Look at the accounts of Salvation Army converts. There is the burglar, retired from the cares of his profession at an age when to follow it becomes more and more difficult. The almost chronic drunkard, the wife-beater, the thief, the loafer. One never gets any doubt as to the reward waiting for them now they have accepted Jesus. They are quite sure they are saved. Their past lives seem to give them added importance in their own eyes, and they evidently feel it is the same in the eyes of their Savior also. They realise that they are rare catches, jewels in the Savior's crown; the past evil of their lives is their principal claim to favor, and many, as they gloat over their past misdeeds—to the envy of those listeners who have led more humdrum careers—appear to feel genuinely sorry that they were not worse.

Turn from them to the lives of really admirable men in Christian history, and you at once miss this note of confidence. They are often oppressed with doubts as to their ultimate salvation; they realise that their salvation may not be so certain as some would believe. The very excellence of their lives, the sensitiveness of their nature, the keenness of their intelligence, gives birth to doubts that stupidity, coarseness, and brutality are secure against. The genuine saint—to use a religious term but with ethical meaning—is tortured by doubt. The convicted murderer dies without a glimmer of suspicion as to the certainty of his eternal salvation. What a religion that makes a good man doubtful of his own worth and fills the brute with an unshakable conviction of his own value!

Have I overstated the case? Let us see. On Monday, April 13, four men were executed in the United States. Three of the four were Jews, the fourth was a Roman Catholic. But they were all religious, and so may be taken together as they all died in the same way. They were united in death as in life. They were the agents of ex-police Lieutenant Becker, who is under sentence of death, but whose sentence is deferred pending appeal. Becker was, and is, a pious man—a Roman Catholic—who spends part of his time in prison in religious meditation, and confesses remorse for only one deed in his life, that of remarrying after being divorced. Another of the crew, Jack Rose, saved himself by turning States' Evidence, and is now doing a flourishing business as a travelling evangelist. A pretty gang! All of them pious, all convinced of the truth of religion, all probably as ready to expatiate on the immoral consequences of unbelief, as they are certain of their own salvation.

All these men were convicted of graft and murder. They had blackmailed the public, organised vice, and drawn profit from its existence, and had murdered when blackmail was refused or a witness appeared who was likely to prove troublesome. The particular offence for which these four men were executed was that of murdering a witness who was ready to give evidence against them. Two of the four men have left messages warning other people of their sinful ways—it is quite characteristic of the type to set up as moral preceptors to their fellows—and admit that they had "praying fathers and mothers." Poor fathers and mothers! The poor old people had doubtless prayed that their sons would grow up good men. They had prayed over them as little children, as youths, as mature men. And the answer to their prayers was electrocution in an American prison. What a commentary on the efficacy of prayer!

Before the four men were executed a prayer meeting was held in the corridor of the prison. The meeting was led by a Roman Catholic priest, but a couple of Jewish Rabbis joined in, as did also the prison chaplain. Two nuns who were present belonging to the Franciscan order, told "Dago Frank," the Catholic criminal, that on the morning of the execution the whole of their order would pray for their souls for two hours. These people had a most appreciative audience. Schmidt, the lecherous priest who brutally murdered his paramor, was present and joined in the service. Twelve other men under sentence of death, with three Chinamen, also convicted of murder, followed suit. The whole of them went on their knees and followed the service with attention, and, one may add, with conviction. The Litany was read to them, they recited the Lord's Prayer, they doubtless rose from their knees full of faith in a sure and glorious resurrection. It was a touching scene. Not many people have the same care bestowed upon their immortal welfare. One needs to be sentenced to death for a sensational murder to secure such treatment. Ordinary folk must get to heaven as best they can. A small detachment of specialists was told off in this case to see that their passage was secure. If orthodox Christianity be true these men are to be envied. Other people may end their days in suspense, "Lefty Louie," "Dago Frank," "Whitey Louis," and "Gyp the Blood" met their deaths untroubled by the slightest doubts. "Go thou and do likewise" seems the not illogical moral of the whole business.

From the gramaphone playing of "Whispering Hope," the evening before the execution, down to the electrocution, there was no break in the religious serenity of the proceedings. Nothing occurred to shock the officiating ministers of religion. "Dago Frank," the first to be executed, "carried a crucifix in each hand and was escorted by a priest." "Into thy hands, O God, I commend my spirit," he murmured at quick intervals. He was, says the report, "a young man, with beautifully cut features and dark, innocent eyes." One can imagine the beatific expression on his face as he took his last farewell glance at the world. "Listen, Israel; there is only one God," were the last words of "Gyp the Blood." What "Lefty Louie" said we are not told, but judging from his share in the religious services, we may assume that his last moments were equally pious. "Whitey Louis" attempted to make a statement, but it was cut short by death.

With all, not a single word of regret for their past careers. With only a few moments to live, they could not, perhaps, be expected to think of this world. Bent upon saving their souls, we ought not to expect that the clergymen who ministered to them should remind them of it. Their business was to save the souls of the prisoners. The prisoners business was to see that their souls were saved. The thieves on the cross were not sent to paradise because they regretted their past misdeeds but because they believed in Jesus. The four blackmailers and murderers were saved because of their religious belief. It is a glorious thing, religion! It can make the murderer anxious about his soul at the foot of the scaffold. But it can neither stop him getting there, deserving to get there, nor feel sorry towards the society he has outraged when he has arrived there.

Religion cannot divorce itself from the responsibility for these men. If they had been Freethinkers we should have heard much of the demoralising influences of unbelief. Articles would have been written, sermons would have been preached, tracts would have been written, all pointing out to the world where men land once they have given up faith in God and in a future life. It was not so in this case. They came of a religious stock. Two of the four, at least, had "praying parents." They had lived all their lives in a society saturated with religion, and they accepted religious ministrations up to the end with thankfulness and appreciation. What had religion done for them? Or, better still, how had religion served society in relation to these men? Of course, religion did not teach them to blackmail and murder, but at least it had not prevented their doing both. It had given them the faith that moves mountains, for it had evidently convinced them that, in spite of their past careers, their future was safe. But it could not make them decent citizens. Doubtless, some of the clergymen will "improve" their sermons with many reflections as to the way in which religion appeals to even the sin-saturated mind of the condemned convict. But they would do wisely to act carefully in the matter. It may be that some of the congregation might reflect that a low state of mental and moral development, and the power of religious appeal, have, perhaps, something in common.

Would I deny the dying convict the comfort of religion? I would neither deny it nor enforce it. It is no vital interest to me how men die; it is of far greater concern how they live. Society has no special interest in death-beds; it has a very great concern in active lives. What concern is it of mine or yours that these men die with the words of religious conviction on their lips, if they have lived up to that last moment dabbling their hands in all kinds of villainy? Neither their lives nor their characters can have undergone any change. They do but add cowardice to their bad qualities. They do not regret what they have done, they merely regret having been caught doing it. The man who breaks every social law, and then pays the full penalty with a jest on his lips, is really a less disgusting spectacle than the blackmailer and murderer marching to the scaffold with a crucifix in either hand, buoyed up by the hope of eternal salvation. A religion that cannot keep men from reaching the state of these men, but can only secure their salvation at the last moment, may be a good religion for the gaol and its inmates; but it is no creed for honest men and women.

C. Cohen.

The Anglican Church in a Bog.

The Kikuyu conference is bearing fruit with a vengeance, and of several kinds, one of which is persecution. We learn, on the authority of Dr. Wirgman, Archdeacon of Port Elizabeth, that the evangelical Bishop Peel, of Mombasa, who favors the idea that Anglicans and Nonconformists should sit together occasionally, specially on the mission fields, at the Lord's Table, has himself, "by his actions, and with no authority but his own, virtually broken off communion with the diocese of Zanzibar." The Bishop of Zanzibar is at present in this country for the purpose of explaining and defending his vigorous protest against the unorthodox and unanglican proceedings at the Kikuyu assembly; and in his absence from his bishopric Dr. Peel was requested to hold an ordination, which he positively refused to do. This refusal, Dr. Wirgman contends, "was an act of severance from a diocese in full communion with the See of Canterbury, as his own diocese still professes to be." Now, the island of Zanzibar and Mombasa, another small island close to the mainland of British East Africa, are within easy communication with each other, and it is alleged that native communicants from the former, who visit the latter in search of work, are threatened with "suspension from Communion if they make the sign of the Cross at the reception." Here is the Low Church, which boasts of its evangelicalism, persecuting the High Church, which glories in its orthodoxy. But "far worse, and even wicked," Dr. Wirgman adds, "was the action of the Mombasa clergy who refused to hear the confessions of their poor people and to give them Absolution, as the Prayer Book directs." Dr. Wirgman considers this to be "a more serious act of schism even than the Bishop of Mombasa's refusal to ordain." In our opinion all these happenings at the Anglican Mission only proves that the Christian religion is the most violently disruptive agency that has ever been inflicted upon a deplorably gullible race, illustrating so pathetically the truth of the words attributed to its alleged founder:—

> "Think ye that I am come to give peace in the earth? I tell you, Nay; but rather division; for there shall be from henceforth five in one house divided, three against two, and two against three. They shall be divided, father against son, and son against father; mother against daughter, and daughter against her mother; mother-in-law against her daughter-in-law, and daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law" (Luke xii. 51-53).

The state of things at home is even worse than it is in the mission fields. For months religious factions have been at daggers drawn, denouncing and threatening one another in the most furious fashion. The Catholic Herald calls the Anglican Church "that city of confusion," out of which Miss Jessie Southwell, secretary of the Universities' Mission, has just fled to find peace in the true fold "where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest." The Kikuyu controversy has enabled the same organ to write derisively of "the Anglican chaos." Both descriptions are accurate, and we find the Bishop of Oxford candidly admitting that the Church he loves is in danger of becoming "a mere concensus of jarring atoms, held together by some external bond." We hold that the Bishop's malediction is at this moment fulfilled. There is no such thing as orthodoxy in the Church of England, nor is it possible to establish a standard of orthodoxy therein, as it is at present constituted. Its various canons are not binding on the laity. These may hold what opinions they please; and in reality so may the clergy. But what about the Thirty-Nine Articles? someone may ask. The Articles exist, and there is an Act of Parliament authorising the punishment of any clergyman who disbelieves them, it is true; but the court, in every case, construes the Articles, and the interpretation is such that a trial for heresy cannot succeed. Fifty years ago the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury passed judgment upon the famous Essays and Reviews; but the Lord Chancellor, speaking on behalf of the Government, declared that it was "simply nothing, literally no sentence at all." One of the authors of that heretical volume became Archbishop of Canterbury, and another an illustrious Master of Balliol.

We now see how utterly futile is Bishop Gore's appeal to "the ancient fundamental faith of the Catholic Church as expressed in creeds and conciliar decisions of the undivided Church." As a matter of fact, all creeds and conciliar decisions are dead except in the Church of Rome. What have the great scholars of the Established Church been doing during the last fifty years? Quietly, unobtrusively burying the Articles of Religion. "Meanwhile," exclaims Dr. Gore, "the great body of the Church has been blind or indifferent to what has been going on." The clerical scholars have come to the conclusion that most of the miracles recorded in the Bible "are for us to-day unbelievable, not chiefly on the grounds of the evidence, but on grounds of general scientific and historical principle." The Bishop's sole argument for the retention of the belief in the miracles thus rejected is derived from the fact that it has always been the fundamental belief of the Catholic Church. He calls upon his clerical brethren of all grades, in a peremptory tone, "to undertake the painful duty of thinking." However peremptory that call may be, it will not be heeded except by those who are, to some extent at least, prepared to follow their reason. Men occupying the Bishop's position are perfect strangers to honest, genuine thinking. It is believers, not thinkers, who can hold and defend the orthodox creed, and old-fashioned believers are rapidly dying out. Thinking nearly drove the great Newman to raving madness; and to escape from thinking for himself and becoming an Atheist, he joined the Church of blind believers. Dr. Gore's greatest book, the Bampton Lectures on the Incarnation, is not the production of a straightforward thinker, but a theoretical theologian, whose one object is to explain, which he does most lucidly, and defend, "the ancient fundamental faith of the Catholic Church." We never read a clearer exposition of the faith than that well-known work provides, but as a defence of the same, it fails at every point. It is distinctly not a faith for twentieth century thought, but for mediæval credulity. We are convinced that the Bishop does hold it in all sincerity, but, apart from his social sympathies, his lordship is not a modern man; and the modern man is not likely to respond to his bugle call.

Passing from the Bishop's antiquated theology to his equally obsolete theory of the Church, we find that the absurdity of his position increases. In this respect he is a Catholic outside the jurisdiction of the Pope. The Kikuyu controversy has opened his eyes to the grim necessity of converting "a Protestant-minded country" to the Catholic idea of the Church. That is the mission of the Anglican High Church party. The Catholic conception of the Church, as interpreted by Dr. Gore, is as follows:—

> "I venture to say that nothing is more certain than that in the New Testament as it stands, and, I believe, in the strict truth of history, the Founder of our religion instituted a visible Church in such sense that membership of the new covenant in Christ coincided simply with membership of the one visible Church. I think that careful reading of the New Testament will show how much of the moral discipline of Christians was meant to lie in the obligation of all Christians to submit to the authority—the binding and loosing—of the one body."

Then he defines the Sacraments as "covenanted instruments of the spiritual gifts of Christ to the individual, the means of communion with Christ, and also social ceremonies, ceremonies of a society, so that the institution of sacraments served to emphasise, through the Christian's whole life, the fact that communion with Christ, under the new covenant, was not otherwise to be looked for than in the communion of the one visible Church." These Sacraments, to be efficacious, must be administered by episcopally ordained clergymen. Now, if the Anglican Communion is to hold together, whether in the mission field or at home, the following "contentious positions" must be rigorously maintained:

> "The requirement of episcopal ordination for the regular ministry; the requirement of an episcopally ordained priest to celebrate the Eucharist; the requirement of episcopal confirmation by laying on of hands, or at least of the readiness to receive it where it can be had, before admission to communion."

If that idea of the Church and its ministry be true, it necessarily follows that the overwhelming majority of English, Scotch, and Welsh people must inevitably be everlastingly damned. The saving mercies of heaven flow only through episcopal channels, and if you lie outside these you are doomed to eternal perdition. The Bishop will not admit this openly, but it is to this that his system logically leads. It is a signal blessing to this land that the Church of Rome is represented in it as well; but the curious thing is that the Roman Church persistently laughs this Anglican claim to scorn. The Pope indignantly declines to recognise the validity of Anglican orders, just as Anglicans refuse to admit the validity of Nonconformist orders. Just as Rome will not enter into fellowship with the English Church, so the English Church shuts its doors at the approach of any non-episcopal communions.

Thus is the Christian religion reduced to a contemptible absurdity by its own champions. Fancy a God of infinite love, a Savior of boundless compassion, or a Holy Ghost of omnipotent graciousness, being tied down to the stupendously mean line of action sketched out by the good Bishop of Oxford. And yet we are truly thankful to his lordship for coming out in his real colors. He has thereby rendered a genuine service, for a time to Rome, and permanently to the cause of Freethought.

Educational Problems in America.

BEFORE leaving the hospitable American shore, I would like to give readers of the Freethinker a brief account of the object and incidents of the tour which I undertook in the United States, beginning October 6, 1913, and ending in April, 1914. The object was to show parents and teachers, and particularly teachers of the public schools (that is, the schools of the people, roughly corresponding with, but taking in a larger variety of social classes than, the English Council schools), how the subject of personal and social conduct may be made interesting and stimulating to young minds. I did this by means of public demonstration-lessons, delivered to girls and boys, usually aged eleven to fourteen, who sat with their backs to adult audiences and talked with me as if nobody else was present. On the departure of the class, the meeting was always thrown open to discussion, though, as a rule, I did not find American audiences much inclined to put questions or raise doubts. When, a year or so ago, I was in India, I experienced a different situation, for the Hindu mind delights in controversy on ethical and philosophical topics.

At the moment of writing, my tour has not concluded, but I suppose that, by the end of April, I shall have given about 280 lessons to different groups of American children, met more than 20,000 people, and visited thirty-two cities in eleven States, ranging from New York in the east to Missouri in the middle west. In all places, except New York, I was officially associated with the local school boards. My program in New York was framed by the International Child Welfare League, of which the late Colonel Ingersoll's daughter (Mrs. Walston Hill Brown) is the president; and a supremely kind-hearted president she makes.

It is a great mistake to suppose that the moral and civic instruction which I have for many years advocated involves preaching and moralising. To me, the word moral, in connection with teaching, represents something sparkling, imaginative, courageous, dramatic, and joyous. I have often said to audiences that, as a teacher, I want to be as attractive as the moving picture show, or the writer of the blood-and-thunder tales which fascinate the plastic young heart and brain. As I conceive the business of character-training, the chief instrument should be, not so much a perpetual talk about what "ought" to be done as a recital of what is done, and has been done. The history of the world brims over with records of (to use a Platonic phrase) the true, the beautiful, and the good. I have read a colossal amount about the crimes and imbecilities of the human race; but I do not hesitate to affirm that the tale of what is noble and wholesome is richer in quantity and more extensive in its range. My idea of moral instruction is the revelation of these splendid actualities to the imagination and reason of the young. It is as if one said to the youth who will soon take the place of the elder generation:—

> "This is the kind of world you are born into. This is the stage you are beginning to tread. Such are the manners and customs of this human cosmos; and he who would play the man should understand what the love, order, and progress of our race has meant, and means, and is likely to mean for ages yet to come."

Is not this a very different attitude from that of the melancholy people who consider that the civilisation of the past has been more or less a failure, and a chaos, and who desperately advise the young to leave the bad world better than they found it? We who write in the journals and discuss ethics and philosophy are too apt to think that the morality of the race has chiefly been expressed in speech and literature. As a matter of fact, the morality of the race has been chiefly expressed in kindly deeds and daily industry by men and women who spoke rather bad grammar, had small incomes, and possessed few distinctions or accomplishments. For tens of thousands of years such people cultivated honest fruit and corn, and reared babies to vigorous adulthood and social co-operation; and these were truly eminent services, which constitute the real Bible of Humanity. Moral instruction is the revelation of this continuous neighborly action from the primitive epoch to the rise of this morning's sun. This action, indeed, is civilisation itself. So that we may put the case in another way, and assert that moral education is the transmission of the message of civilisation to the individual child. The message has been uttered by Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, Swinburne; by the fabulists and allegorists of Asia and Europe; by the Greek, Roman, Hindu, and Christian parables and mythologies; by the legends of the saints of all faiths; by novelists and ballad-makers; in short, by the grand old, and yet ever-renewed tribe of the story-tellers.

The revelation should be positive rather than negative. By this I mean that the accent should be placed upon the sane and generous rather than on the evil and mean. If you tell of the valor of Socrates in openly expressing his thoughts on human morality; if you tell of the great-heartedness of Trajan in pausing to answer the widow's prayer; if you tell of the courage of Picquart in exposing the wrong done to Dreyfus,—you are holding actions up to admiration; and Wordsworth has said, in an immortal line, that "we live by admiration, hope, and love."

So-called moralists,—dull, wizened, and kill-joy pedants,—have tortured the soul of childhood with solemn warnings, ponderous maxims (such as "Procrastination is the thief of time"), and terrific narratives of bad boys who got hanged or jailed for life, or descended to a drunkard's grave; and other tales of the skull-and-cross-bones order. This is the cynicism of ancient Diogenes in his tub; the dualism of the Gnostics, who regarded all the material world as evil; the Calvinism which damned man as born in iniquity; the Philistinism of the nineteenth century which supposed the working class was specially created to do plumbing and scavenging and to have its faults corrected by drawing-room committees. Of course, we want faults corrected, especially among the professional and college-taught classes; of course, we must condemn vice; of course, we must employ police, prisons, and punishments; of course, we must enforce the menacing but necessary "Thou shalt not." But the genuine work of education is to energise and inspire, to encourage and unfold; to move the heart by the thought of the best things in man's history, and to develop that magnanimous love which spurns meanness, pities weakness, and glories in promoting fellowship, music, and mutual service. This is the positive spirit of the twentieth century contrasted with the decadent spirit which treats morality as a machine for chastising sin.

In a preceding paragraph, I referred to the Christian mythology. But I should never use such a phrase when addressing the young citizens in the public school. In their presence the voice of philosophical criticism and controversy must be hushed, and the teacher must speak, not as a Jew, a Christian, an Agnostic, a Hindu, a Moslem, a Parsi, a Theosophist, but as a representative of the general community, detached from party issues of all kinds. For years, I have had the high privilege of illustrating this respectful neutrality of the civic platform, and I have taught the children of the various schools of belief and speculations just enumerated. I have done this hundreds of times publicly, so that men and women might hear and judge for themselves. In the United States, for example, I have seen, commingled in one audience, Christian Scientists, Rationalists, Presbyterians, Hebrews, and, occasionally (and to my delight), one or two young Hindu students. Once, I taught a class in a schoolroom, and on one side of the children sat a Lutheran pastor listening, and opposite him a group of Catholic sisters robed in black and white. I apologise for the personal character of these evidences; but only in such ways do I find it possible to render clear the meaning of the civic basis of ethical teaching in the people's schools.

The Patron Saint of England.

> "Our ancient word of courage, fair St. George > Aspire us with the spleen of fiery dragons."
> —SHAKESPEARE, Richard III.

ON the back of a half sovereign, that painfully rare object, you may see a design of a man on horseback apparently killing a cockroach with a carving knife. This is meant to portray St. George and the dragon, and the man is supposed to be the patron saint of our "tight little island." The inclusion, during recent years, of the harmless, necessary Union Jack among the symbols of our most holy religion has led to a renewed interest in the personality of St. George, and it was, indeed, fondly hoped that, by the help of the Almighty and the editor of a halfpenny paper, many otherwise decent citizens might be persuaded to observe April 23, St. George's Day, by wearing roses.

The suggestion, as might have been expected, fell flat; but it may prove interesting to many to be informed who the saint was, his connection with English history, and his association with the national flower.

We regret exceedingly to find that the saint's biography is not pleasant reading, and quite unsuited for the perusal of young persons, and the still more youthful "buds" of the Primrose League. Historians agree in disclosing a pitiable story of a misspent life. From the highest to the lowest, from Gibbon to William Smith, they describe the saint as an unadulterated rascal. Even Emerson can find no redeeming traits in the saintly sinner's character. Hear what Emerson has to say:—

> "George of Cappadocia, born at Epiphania, in Cilicia, was a low parasite, who got a lucrative contract to supply the army with bacon."

This is a bad start; but for the moment we refrain from levelling the guns of our criticism at the holy army contractor.

> "A rogue and informer, he got rich and was forced to run from justice."

This seems to suggest that St. George sold pigs which had died natural deaths, was a swindler, and had learnt the art of sprinting at the psychological moment.

> "He saved his money, embraced Arianism, collected a library, and got promoted by a faction to the episcopal throne of Alexandria."

Like the Army contractors who did business in the South African War, St. George had his saintly head screwed on the right way. As for his collecting a library, his previous commercial reputation was sufficiently bad to prevent the booksellers allowing the saint any credit. We may be equally certain that his ordination as a right reverend father-in-God was also against the public interest.

> "When Julian came, A D. 361, George was dragged to prison. The prison was burst open by the mob, and George was lynched as he deserved."

There is something very distressing in the idea of a bishop being "jerked to Jesus." If the saint had died of delirium tremens we might still have remembered prayerfully that even bishops are but human. This lynching is a dreadful business, and we read through a mist of tears Emerson's peroration:—

> "And this precious knave became in good time Saint George of England, patron of chivalry, emblem of victory and civility, and the pride of the best blood of the modern world."

A lemon-hearted cynic might liken the history of the patron saint of England to a disgusting page from the earlier books of the Bible, or the Newgate Calendar. Some modern historians, realising the disgraceful nature of George's career, have made desperate attempts to whitewash the career of the holy man. They have succeeded, after silent meditation among the tombs, in deceiving themselves that George was not George, but another gentleman of the same name. Criticism, sharp as Shylock's knife, cuts their nonsense to pieces. The tutelary saint of England, like so many Biblical heroes, was a blackguard, and there is an end of it.

A far more serious matter is that the founder of the religion, of which St. George was so distinguished a follower, would not command the smiles of Mrs. Grundy. For Jesus was merely the son of a working man, and he was born in a stable. He insulted his mother publicly, and used the Pankhurst methods of controversy. People who disagreed with him were called "vipers," "devils," and "dogs." From the time he disputed with the "doctors" until he whipped the money-changers, he proved himself a true militant in propaganda. He would never have been fitted for a working-party at a tin tabernacle or an evangelical lawn-tennis meeting.

What is worse is that Jesus was not a teetotaler. On the contrary, he even encouraged people to keep their spirits up by pouring spirits down. He also associated with "publicans" and sinners. As these tradesmen are the backbone of the Church party, this need not scare us, but what does Upper Tooting think of Mary Magdalene? Jesus's views on sociology approximated very closely to anarchy. The topsy-turvy ideas he had concerning the distribution of wealth, his panegyrics of poverty, his denunciation of riches, all have a flavor about them. But the last straw, the thing that places the Carpenter of Nazareth beyond the pale of respectability, is that he did not respect the clergy. Small wonder that he left his country for his country's good. Surely, an executed criminal is not a fit patron for the handsome knights, fair dames, and fairer buds of the Primrose League.

Fortunately, English society is too firmly anchored to be washed away by the paltry spray of superstition. Here, we are thankful to remember religion is a plaything, and not a reality. It is an organised hypocrisy worked in the interests of the governing classes. Under the spiritual sceptres of Buddha, Confucius, Mahomet, or even Mumbo Jumbo, precept is united with practice. But here, on virtuous English soil, we lightly tread the Primrose League path until the poppy of oblivion is scattered on the graves of George, the pork dealer, and his master, the carpenter and joiner of Nazareth.

MIMNERMUS.

Darwin and Design.

IN a very early stage of his intellectual development, the idea must have occurred to man that, if God was the author of everything in the universe, every creature from the monad up to man, and every faculty they possessed, must have been designed by the omnipotent and all-wise Ruler of the universe for some special and wise purpose. It would be difficult to determine the exact age of this argument, or who among the ancient philosophers put it forth with the greatest clearness and force. It is certain, however, that it may be found among the writings of some of the Greek philosophers, and that it has been presented through many centuries under various guises. Since the conflict between reasoners who have argued for a materialistic basis for all phenomena and those who have taken the spiritualistic or dualistic view, the design argument has had a prominent place in all important disputations on the existence of Deity.

No one, I think, will deny that, so far as this argument is concerned, its great popularity in Europe has been due to the excellent way in which it has been supported by the memorable illustrations of Paley, from which it was sought to demonstrate an exact analogy between the watch and its maker and the universe and its supposed author.

Even according to the early belief of Darwin himself, there was nothing inconsistent in the ideas of natural selection and design. God might have designed the universe, the naturalist affirmed, and have imparted to it the potentialities from which all forms of life have since sprung. In that case natural selection would be but the working out of God's plan or design. A little thought, however, will be sufficient to convince us that in this the great naturalist has misunderstood the argument as it is presented by the theologian; for, according to all theistic reasoners up to within the last few years, when they have been compelled to accept the doctrine of evolution or be considered unworthy of the consideration of scientific or thoughtful men, God designs things just as we find them to-day—civilised man, with good eyes and perfect frame; that he did not design an animal or a variety of animals, and allow a number of other animals to be developed from them that are now considered distinct species; but that he created the variety of existing creatures just as we find them to-day in the various countries of the world.

Before we consider the value, or otherwise, of the design argument in the light of modern thought, it is worthy of notice that coming, as it does, distinctly under the head of arguments of the mode à posteriori, that is, reasoning from effect to cause, it must be acknowledged to be a purely scientific argument. In answer to the question, "To what class of inductive argument does this one—from marks of design in nature—belong?" John Stuart Mill, in his posthumous essay on Nature and Theism, answers:—

> "The species of inductive arguments are four in number, corresponding to the four inductive methods—the method of agreement, of difference, of residues, and of concomitant variations. The argument under consideration falls within the first of these divisions—the method of agreement. This is, for reasons known to inductive logicians, the weakest of the four; but the particular argument is a strong one of its kind."

Now, my own opinion is that Mill attached to the design argument greater value than it really deserved. The point upon which he laid much stress was the improbability of the principle of the survival of the fittest "being sufficient to account for the degree of perfection found in some of the organs of man, such, for instance, as the eye"; but even this hypothesis he did not think so absurd as many suppose.

It would, he says,

> "require us, for example, to suppose that the primeval animal, of whatever nature it may have been, could not see, and had, at most, such slight preparation for seeing as might be constituted by some chemical action of light upon its cellular structure. One of the accidental variations which are liable to take place in all organic beings would, at some time or other, produce a variety that could see in some imperfect manner; and, this peculiarity being transmitted by inheritance while other variations continued to take place in other directions, a number of races would be produced who, by the power of even imperfect sight, would have a great advantage over all other creatures which could not see, and would, in time, extirpate them from all places, except, perhaps, a few very peculiar situations underground. Fresh variations supervening would give rise to races with better and better seeing powers, until we might at last reach as extraordinary a combination of structures and functions as is seen in the eyes of man and of the more important animals. Of this theory, when pushed to this extreme point, all that can now be said is that it is not so absurd as it looks, and that the analogies which have been discovered in experience favorable to its possibility far exceed what anyone could have supposed beforehand. Whether it will be possible to say more than this is at present uncertain."

Neither Mill nor Darwin, however, lived long enough to learn of the vast mass of evidence that has since been accumulated in support of this theory. Later writers on Evolution—especially Haeckel—have brought forward an overwhelming amount of evidence to demonstrate that functions precede organs, and that some animals now exist that see without organs, or that are conscious of the presence of light or of some distinct object.

But what is the value of this design argument when examined in the light of reason and common sense? It is affirmed in the first instance that nature manifests marks of design as a whole, or in objects taken by themselves; that it is inconceivable that these manifestations could have been brought about by any number of haphazard occurrences, or by occurrences that have happened by the inherent properties of bodies—indeed, these manifestations carry with them the evidence of having been produced by some intelligent agent behind phenomena which Theists unanimously proclaim to be God. Then we have the illustration of the watch, and upon that is founded an argument that there is a complete analogy between the maker of a watch, with all its complicated mechanism, and the alleged maker of the universe. Although this argument is rather out of date to-day, it is worthy of notice for the benefit of young Freethinkers, who may have it presented to them in one of its manifold guises, and who may not have heard or seen an examination of it in the light of reason and common sense. Well, here it is. It is said: "Here is a watch: obviously that watch did not make itself. Mechanism of so complicated and delicate a nature could not have so arranged itself without the aid of an intelligent person behind it. If that is admitted, then it is acknowledged that watches are made; that they are constructed by intelligent persons. If a watch," it is then argued, "requires an intelligent person to make it, how much more does the universe, infinitely more complicated and admirable in its working, require an intelligent Creator to produce it?" Or, to take another familiar illustration: "Look at the human eye. See what a delicate and beautiful organ it is—how admirably adapted for the purpose of seeing. Could it possibly occur that, in a universe such as this, an organ so perfect in all its parts could come to be possessed by man and the lower animals by any process short of Design?" The human hand is sometimes adduced as another effective piece of evidence of the existence of a designing mind in the universe.

Now, man cannot possibly transcend his own experience; and all his judgments are necessarily based upon it. And it will be observed that this argument from marks of design is one purely drawn from experience. A man sees a watch made, or sees a man whose business it is to make watches; he therefore concludes that all watches are made. If, however, instead of being made by hand, they were fashioned by machinery, the materials only being required to be placed in the cavity of a machine, he would still know that watches were made and that the machinery was constructed by the ingenious mind of some man. It is merely, so far, a matter of experience, and not a question of complicated structure at all. In point of fact, if a man saw a wooden watch that contained no wheels, no mainspring, and that was of no practical use, he would still conclude that it was made. He would know the man who made it; or, at worst, he would know a man who knew the man who made it. On the other hand, a savage seeing a watch for the first time would be very unlikely to think that it had been made. He would be very likely to think, if it was a watch in good going order, and if he heard it tick, that it was alive. Why? Because he has no experience of watchmakers. But if a watch is made, the maker is not also the manufacturer of the materials out of which he manipulates it. These are already at hand; his design, or contrivance, consists merely in skilfully arranging certain parts to produce a certain result. In this case, therefore, there is no analogy between the maker of a watch and the maker of a universe. According to all Theists, God is also the maker of the materials out of which he produces so many designs. Now, while man has some experience of watchmakers, he has absolutely none of universe-makers, and, therefore, he cannot say that the universe was made. Moreover, there is, in reality, no resemblance whatever between the natural processes of nature and the artistic works of man. Nobody ever saw anybody who made a tree; and there is absolutely no analogy between a manufactured article and the natural processes of nature, such as the growth of a tree from the seed or a human being from a germ. Unless we knew the Deity and understood his capabilities, it would be merely assumption on our part to affirm that he was the maker of trees, or indeed, that he was the maker of anything. In another article I will deal with the question of the alleged design of the human eye by an all-wise and all-good God; but, for the present, let me urge the young Freethinker to apply the rational tests which I have applied above to all arguments of this order that may be advanced by theologians and he will find that, in every case, they are utterly fallacious and unconvincing.

Acid Drops

Lord William Cecil and half-a-dozen other clergymen have issued an appeal for another day of prayer for China, following the example set in April of last year. It will be remembered how Christian preachers, from the Bishop of London downward, piled falsehood on falsehood in connection with that day of prayer. Christians at home were led to believe that China was pleading for the prayers of Christians, and that the conversion of China was imminent. "The intercession of the Churches," say the signatories to the present appeal, "was immediately followed by a relief of the situation." What a terminological inexactitude! As a matter of fact, China has been in continuous trouble ever since, and conditions now seem to be very serious indeed. And the prayers of the Churches, instead of hastening the Christianisation of China—if they had any consequence at all—led to the promulgation of Confucianism as the State religion.

Sir Thomas Clouston, M.D., says that in his experience of 2,000 alcoholic cases, nine-tenths of them took to drink before they were twenty five years of age. We may point out that the same thing holds good of religious conversion. They are both essentially complaints of adolescence.

Rev. H. Montgomery, ex-Moderator of the Irish Presbyterian Church, writes to the Times expressing his thanks for "the stream of intercession" that has gone up from English Christians on behalf of his "distracted country," and hopes for "earnest intercession to the Great Deliverer" to give light to all concerned. Now, we wonder whether the "stream of intercession" or the Ulster Volunteers has been the more effective? And is the "Great Deliverer" Sir Edward Carson or someone else? The worst of these pious folk is that they mix things up so terribly. Now, if they would only turn out Sir Edward Carson and disband the Volunteers, and trust to the "stream of intercession," one would then be able to see what it was worth. As it is, things are mixed up terribly.

The imitation of Christ must not go so far as having nowhere to rest one's head—at least in a Christian country. At an Essex police-court last week two homeless men were charged with sleeping in the open. One was fined five shillings, and the other was sent to prison for seven days with hard labor.

In accordance with an ancient Easter custom, a number of old women picked up sixpences from a tombstone in a churchyard at St. Bartholomew the Great, City, E.C. The clergy have picked up many sixpences from tombs and funerals.

Mgr. Tynan, rector of St. Mary's, Burnley, is of opinion that Christianity in this country is but a thin veneer. This is shown by the fact that Good Friday has been made a day of pleasure. During his long experience in the priesthood, the reverend gentleman has learned, further, that "on Good Friday and Christmas Day—the days of Christ's death and birth—there were more sins of impurity and other mortal sins committed than on any other day in the year." What a significant admission of the total failure of Christianity by one whose profession it is to defend it. Occasionally we get the truth from most unexpected sources.

In the Church Times recently, the Bishop of Oxford teaches that no one can be a true minister of the Gospel without being episcopally ordained, and that no saving and sanctifying grace can come through the Sacraments unless they are administered by a man so ordained. That is a polite way of saying that Nonconformist ministers are all quacks. We agree; the only difference between Dr. Gore and ourselves being that we regard all clergymen, whether episcopally or non-episcopally ordained, as persons who pretend to possess and do what they do not possess and cannot do. The ministry is in its very nature fraudulent, and all who believe in it are gulled. The man of God is only one of many illusions.

Mr. Israel Zangwill, writing in the Evening News says that "the miracle of the Shakespeare's divination of Shylock remains, unless he saw a Jew in the mirror." "Angels and ministers of grace, defend us"! If Shakespeare were a Jew, he had less to do with bacon than his most ardent admirers imagined.

According to the papers, "elastic houses" are being erected on the Duchy of Cornwall estate in Kennington. Modelled on Noah's Ark, we imagine, and made of similar materials.

It is, as we have often pointed out, almost an impossibility for a Christian to deal fairly with historic facts where his own religious prejudices are involved. Christians never have done this, and we do not believe they ever will. And, unfortunately, Christian conviction seems to give the mind a fatal twist which dulls it to any sense of duty as to finding out what the facts are, or of responsibility for misstating them. Mr. R. J. Campbell, in a recent sermon, referred to the case of slavery in the old Roman Empire, and of the relation of Christianity to the system. And the references contained all the stock misstatements and exaggerations. He did point out that "servant" in the New Testament really means slave, and it would have been as well if Mr. Campbell had also pointed out that the mistranslation is itself an example of Christian dishonesty. In other writings the word is universally translated "slave." In the New Testament it becomes "servant." Why? The answer is, of course, that it was so translated to cloak the fact that Christianity endorsed the slave system, and was so far actually behind some of the best contemporary ethical thought.

But, Mr. Campbell says, the slaves in Paul's time "were the absolute property of their masters, bought and sold in the open market, liable to ill-usage without redress, and even to be put to death at their owner's caprice." And he adds, "There were kind masters.....but these were probably the exception." Well, if the slaves in Paul's time were really in the condition stated, the endorsement of the system by Paul becomes all the more villainous. But is this picture a true one? As a matter of fact, public opinion had always placed a limit to the power of the master over the slave, and this opinion in Paul's time was reflected in legal enactments. At the time of Nero the murder of a slave was illegal, masters were forbidden to sell slaves as gladiators; if they were cast out for sickness and recovered, they became free men; private prisons for slaves were abolished; a judge was appointed to hear their complaints, and empowered to punish masters who treated them cruelly; it was forbidden to sell separately husband, wife, and children; and if a master died without direct heirs, his slaves were entitled to a share in the estate. All this where Mr. Campbell asserts slaves were without redress! And, we have only to add, all authorities agree that generally a slave could purchase his freedom with a few years' savings.

Mr. Campbell says that "Slavery had to go in time because it was seen to be incompatible with the spirit of Christ. A man could hardly be a consistent Christian and continue to own slaves." Perhaps Mr. Campbell will explain in the light of these statements how it happened that the number of slaves actually increased under Christianity; while there was a complete cessation of remedial legislation, with a repeal of some of the beneficent measures named above. As a matter of fact, slavery in Christian times, and particularly in modern times, was, as Lecky said, "carried on upon a scale and with circumstances of atrocity little known to the ancients." Another great authority upon the slave trade—perhaps the greatest—Professor Cairns said:—

> "The ancients kept the bodies of their slaves in bondage, but they placed no restraint upon the mind, and no check upon education; and they acted consistently with their principle, since a natural termination of slavery then existed, and one day or other the slave might be set free and become the equal of his master.....The education of slaves amongst the ancients prepared the way for their emancipation."

Under Christianity slavery became perpetual. The slave family was broken up and sold piecemeal. In Christian America, little more than seventy years ago, South Carolina punished with six months' imprisonment anyone who taught a slave to read or write. Virginia inflicted a similar penalty. In Georgia there was the same punishment for teaching a slave to read either written or printed characters. Louisiana inflicted twelve months' imprisonment, and Alabama from 250 to 500 dollars' fine on anyone who attempted to educate the slaves. This nearly 1,800 years after the "spirit of Christ" had made slavery impossible. And the man who thus falsifies historic fact is one of the leading lights of modern "advanced" Christian thought! When the leaders are such, what can one expect from the rank and file?

Historically, the Churches held on to slavery to the end. In the ninth century, some of the leading ecclesiastics, including Pope Adrian, were selling slaves to the Mohammedans. In the eighteenth century Voltaire notes that the Church owned over 50,000 slaves. Between 1783 and 1793, 878 ships belonging to Liverpool carried no less than 303,737 slaves. This represented to Liverpool an annual value of nearly £1,200,000. The Rev. John Newton, author of the celebrated Olney Hymns, actually commanded a slave ship during the time he was studying for the ministry. According to a paper presented to the House of Commons in 1770, out of a total of 74,000 slaves sold annually by five European countries, Christian England sold 38,000. In America scores of resolutions were passed by churches supporting slavery, and many of the churches actually owned slaves. In the American Methodist Church, out of 14,000 clergymen, only 241 could be found who would sign a protest against slavery. What a commentary on the power of "the spirit of Christ."

That delightfully religious periodical, the Daily News and Leader, describes the new Criminal Justice Administration Bill, which provides for more lenient punishment of juvenile offenders, as "the most Christian Crimes Bill." Why Christian? The root idea of the Christian superstition is the punishment of the innocent for the guilty, and it teaches infinite retribution for finite offences.

"Nine-tenths of all work is drudgery" is the startling dictum of Dean Inge, "the gloomy dean." Yet the Christian Church has ever sought to make the "day of rest" as dull as ditchwater.

Mr. Bernard Shaw put some crimson flowers of speech into the mouth of a flower-girl in his latest play, Pygmalion. If the eminent dramatist is not more careful, he will be confused with the philological members of the Christian Evidence Society.

That Christianity is saturated with superstition has again been demonstrated in a striking manner. At Catanzaro, Italy, the peasants stormed the cathedral because the Bishop deprived the religious processions of all forms of Paganism. "The Bishop," adds the report, ironically, "and the priests ran away."

A relation of the German Kaiser has become a priest of the Romish Church and preached a sermon in a Parisian church where a fashionable crowd flocked to hear him. It was a novelty to see a royal prince wearing petticoats; as a rule they only chase them.

The Vicar of St. Mary Major, Exeter, seems quite happy because "in spite of their dwindling numbers their collections had gone up, and not down." So the vicar is content, and says they are getting what they want—quality, not quantity. It looks as though what they want is cash, not congregation. Both if they can get them; but of the two, the former most.

We desire to do justice, even to the Church. Rev. J. Neville Figgis says "the belief gains ground that the Church is a body of respectable persons; that real sinners have no place in her." We can assure Mr. Figgis that he is quite mistaken. A great number of people are quite convinced that there are as many sinners in the Church as elsewhere. They are of a more saponaceous character than those outside, but that is all. We do not like to see the Church unjustly accused, and by one of its own ministers, too.

What an amiable gentleman the Bishop of Sodor and Man must be! Mr. Charles Gill, who is trying to form a Farm Laborers' Union on the island, wrote to the Ramsay Courier protesting against the Bishop discharging his old gardener and employing an Englishman in his place. He says there are plenty of Manxmen to do the work, and it is a disgrace to the Church that such things should happen. Except for the discharge of an old servant, we do not see very much in the complaint; but the Bishop denounces it as an untruth "so foul that one would not expect to be uttered by anyone outside of hell." Further, "he wondered why God allowed some people to live, and was sometimes impressed with the need of a second flood, so that the world might begin over again." Which proves, as we said, that the Bishop is a very amiable man, and an apt preacher of the doctrine to turn one's cheek when the other is smitten.

A picture in a recent issue of the Daily Telegraph represented a Catholic priest and two altar-servers going round the houses of Earlsfield and sprinkling them with holy water. A pail of limewash or of Condy's Fluid might easily have been more efficacious.

In the days of faith, particularly the Puritan times, some of the names given to children were very quaint. From a jury list in 1700 the names of some of the good men and true were: Kill-sin Pimple, Fly-debate Roberts, Be Faithful Joiner, Fight the Good Fight White, and Weep-not Billing. What a change nowadays, when even Biblical names are out of fashion.

A writer in the Daily Mail suggests the painting of buildings in gay colors. A novel idea. Imagine the churches and chapels of the Man of Sorrows painted in all the colors of Joseph's coat.

The Rev. Joseph Shaw, a member of the Epsom Guardians, has offered to swallow all the microbes found in the crevices of the workhouse infirmary flooring. It is contended that the crevices harbored germs. Maybe the reverend gentleman is relying on the Biblical promise that no deadly thing can hurt a believer.

Mr. P. W. Wilson, M.P., says, "Just causes never die. Causes rooted in the errors of mankind live on until the errors are exorcised." Exactly! But when, as in the case of the Christian superstition, error is heavily endowed, the process is a slow one.

"Neither a peace palace, nor even a large fund for paying peace lecturers is necessarily a step nearer to the establishment of real peace," says Mr. C. E. Maurice. This is true, especially as priests of the Government religion bless guns and battleships, and consecrate regimental colors.

Rev. C. Haldon writes to the Times that in twenty years experience "not a single person has ever voiced to me an objection to the Athanasian Creed, and not one of the hundreds of incumbents that I have met has mentioned it as a difficulty." Mr. Haldon has had a most remarkable experience. One would be interested in getting the cranial developments of the people he has come across. We have no reason to suppose that his clerical life has been spent in ministering to the inmates of an idiot asylum.

The Vicar of Shrewsbury has expressed the opinion that a "damn" now and then is a good thing. Well, if anyone should be an authority upon the subject it is a dignitary of the Church. Charles Haddon Spurgeon is credited with saying that there are times when a man must swear—or burst. It is astonishing, by the way, what a number of ordinary "cuss-words" had their origin in religious expressions. We fancy this will turn out to be its most permanent contribution to civilisation.

John Bull, at the conclusion of a slashing criticism of the Bishop of London's Bill to secure the closing of publichouses on Sunday, asks "Why doesn't the Bishop of London get married and settle down? He will never be any good till he does." Well, it is just possible that had the Bishop married and settled down as a young man—and possessed the right kind of wife—a good many of his absurdities might never have seen light. Whether a man is an enforced celibate, or one by natural taste, his views of life are apt to be jaundiced, and if he possesses in addition strong religious fervor, the result is certain. We do not complain, however; the appointment of F. W. Ingram to the Bishopric of London was not at all a bad stroke of work for Freethought.

A Brighton centenarian has two "children," a daughter aged seventy-five and a "baby" son aged seventy-one, and the newspaper reporters are making headlines of the matter. What type would the printers use if Adam or Methuselah were alive to-day?

A churchwarden and Sunday-school superintendent in Belfast, who has just completed a term of imprisonment for embezzling was a witness in the Belfast Bankruptcy Court the other day. It turned out that he had spent £27,000 on women, but he said "They were not immoral women, before my God." Judge Craig told him that he had "better leave God out of this. He does not trouble much about bankruptcy business." We agree, but what we should like to know is what on earth God does trouble himself with? Perhaps Judge Craig, or someone else, can inform us.

Fleet-street was once the wonder-place of London, and some marvellous exhibits were shown by enterprising showmen. Ben Jonson alludes to "Jonah and the whale being shown at Fleet Bridge." Nowadays, even the clergy would have to be put on the rack to speak of the lodging-house whale.

The litter of the streets and public conveyances caused by newspapers and periodicals is becoming a nuisance. "Littery London" is not confined to Fleet-street.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £130 15s. 5d. Received since :—J. E. Stapleton, 2s. 6d.; A. Vickers, £1; Mrs. Helena Parsons, £2 10s.; A. Galpin, £1 1s.; W. Dodd, 10s.

A. GALPIN (U.S.A.).—We note your kind wish that your subscription to the President's Honorarium Fund were "ten times as large."

C. PAPE.—Someone has evidently been testing the extent of your credulity. No such document has ever been discovered. There were during the middle Ages various letters from the Virgin Mary and Jesus afloat. Possibly your informant has been giving you one of these old stories.

E. B.—Many thanks for cuttings. As you will observe, they generally come in useful.

J. BREEZE.—Sorry to hear the news in one part of your communication. The cuttings enclosed are just symptomatic of the present state of the Churches. The problem all round is how to placate the liberal-minded without frightening others of an opposite kind.
