We may reply to a number of inquiries by saying that Mr. Foote's health is now much improved, and that he appreciates the inquiries that have been made concerning him. He intends being present at the Board meeting of the Secular Society, Ltd., and at the meeting of the Executive of the N. S. S., both of which take place on April 30. Branches who have business for the Agenda should forward their motions by that date if possible. The last date for sending in is May 2.

A correspondent reminds us that with the beginning of May the Freethinker completes thirty-three years of its existence. This is not an old age, and we believe we may say without boasting that no signs of old age are observable in its columns. But it is a good age, considering all the difficulties attendant upon running a paper of this kind. Only those who have given themselves to a great cause would care to face all these difficulties, and not only face them when they arise, but expect them. We take pride, too, in the fact that during all those years the Freethinker has never lowered or sullied its flag. It has never stooped to compromise, and it has been repaid by the personal respect and devotion of thousands of its readers. We believe we are right in saying that the Freethinker is the only paper in London—perhaps in the country—that has been under the same editor for so long a period. And that, too, is no small achievement. All things considered, it would not be a bad thing if the readers of the Freethinker turned May into a birthday month, and each one resolved to present the paper and the cause it represents with at least one new subscriber. That should not be a difficult matter in a very large number of cases, and it would form the best of birthday congratulations.

Our reply to "Anti-Cant," of a couple of weeks ago, on the question of "Brotherhoods," has brought to hand several letters, one of which is deserving of more than a line or two in the "Answers to Correspondents" column. This gentleman writes that he has made it a practice of attending several brotherhood meetings, and finds that while in some considerable latitude of opinion is permitted, in other cases—the majority—"they are simply occasions for goody-goody preaching, as a rule, religious gatherings under another name." In any case, the opportunity for a Freethinker speaking his mind on religious questions seldom arises. Still, he is satisfied that he is doing good work in attending these meetings, and in broadening the minds of those who attend by, apparently, a policy of permeation. In conclusion, this correspondent agrees that if Freethinkers would speak out when religious questions are introduced in non-religious associations, they would soon find their position changed for the better.

There are several points raised in this letter, all of which deserve a word of two of comment. One point is whether these brotherhood societies would really permit a free expression of opinion on religion? We do not believe for a moment that it would be tolerated. Those who tried it would be made to feel that their room was more desirable than their company, and would be forced, in some way or other, to leave. Of course, they are welcome there—even though their opinions may be known—while they keep their mouths shut. In the first place, their presence serves to keep up the pretence of no religious tests. Secondly, it keeps them out of "mischief" elsewhere. If they were not listening at a brotherhood meeting they might be listening, or talking, elsewhere, and their doing so might lead to further injury to the Churches. Every man they can get there is so much gain to the Churches. This fact must never be forgotten.

Finally, is it quite certain that the policy of permeation is the wisest or the best one at present? In the absence of all possibility of anything else, something may be said in its favor, but there is an unfortunate tendency to take the policy of permeation as an end, rather than as the means to an end. It is safe, it is comfortable, and, therefore, it is attractive. But permeation does not seem a pressing need to-day. What is needed is rather outspokenness. There are thousands, hundreds of thousands, of non-believers who ought to speak out. There is a much larger number of believers who need instructing as to where they really are in matters of religion; and, therefore, the real need is for greater boldness of thought and speech, not a mere broadening. You may broaden a river until it becomes a swamp; and you may broaden thought in such a way that it becomes of no value to anyone. And we have watched the effects of this policy of permeation in more than one instance. We have seen Freethinkers commence a Sunday Lecture Society, with the intention of breaking down religion. What has been the result? With the exception that the meetings were held on Sunday, the lectures have developed into a class of a very harmless character, such as do not injure superstition to any particular extent. Nay, they have positively helped the Churches by withdrawing from the direct attack many men and women who might otherwise have been conducting a vigorous campaign against superstition. Our advice is to let those societies conduct their own work in their own way and with their own people. Those Freethinkers who really take pride in their opinions, and who duly appreciate their value to the community, will best advance their cause by working for the direct organisation and propaganda of Freethought in their respective localities. The real way to make people respect your opinions is to lead the way by respecting them yourself.

We are asked to announce that Miss Vance has received a number of subscriptions towards the W. J. Ramsey Testimonial. All of these will be duly acknowledged when the Committee of the fund has made its final arrangements.

Some Notes.

I AM sorry in one way, but glad in another way, that I referred somewhat too seriously to Miss Vance's position in the metropolitan hospital where she is undergoing special treatment for her old trouble—rheumatism, which, of course, is affected for the worse by the conditions involved in her later malady of blindness. I misunderstood some expressions, and the tone of my remarks rather belonged to my own mood. I learn now that the hospital treatment is doing Miss Vance some good. Nevertheless the essence of what I said remains true. After all, being a very careful writer, though liable to mistakes, like everybody else, including writers who are not careful,—I did not state that Miss Vance actually was "fighting for her life." I added the word "almost," which shows that even then I felt the need of some qualification in that extremely brief sentence. I do not find that she is in any special danger at present, but her danger is general and continuous if nothing can be done for her relief. I hope I have made the matter fairly clear; anyhow, I must leave it there now.

Mr. Cohen's paragraph on the case of Mr. W. J. Ramsey tempts me to say that it was not a real kindness on the part of those who have taken his case up to treat me as too ill to be troubled or consulted about it. I wish to say, at this earliest opportunity, that I sincerely desire to have my name associated with the effort that is being made to mitigate the lot—as far as it can be mitigated—which Nature is dealing out to him in his last days or years, as the case may be. It is one of her most malignant forms of execution. I shall send my subscription as soon as I see the name of the general treasurer of the Fund projected by various bodies of sympathisers in his behalf. Mr. Ramsey went to prison with me in 1883 for the crime of "blasphemy." I am afraid the responsibility was all mine, but he accepted the share he was charged with, and took his portion of the punishment without weak complaint or foolish boasting. I care to remember nothing else now. He participated in the public subscription raised for the "prisoners for blasphemy" then, but it was not a colossal figure, and the lapse of thirty years, and the approach of the final need of his life, are enough to justify a last appeal for an old Freethinker who has always been, in his own way, a hard worker for the movement.

The death of Mr. Hubert Bland reminds me of something which the newspapers do not report, and which his latter-day friends would not wish to recollect. Long ago he stood as the Secular Education candidate for the Finsbury Division of the London School Board. I have not time, or spare energy, to look the matter up in the old pages of the Freethinker, but I think it was the London Secular Federation, which still existed, and of which I was still President, that invited Mr. Bland to enter the lists as the "secular" champion. It also found the cash for the campaign. Mr. Bland kept his contract faithfully, but I don't think he succeeded in convincing anybody that he was very much in earnest. His wife took part in the public meetings, and was in all ways an attractive speaker. Both of them were Socialists; Mr. Bland, indeed, was one of the founders of the Fabian Society. They did not catch the Socialist vote, however. I fancy Mr. Bland had too few marks of the "'orny-'anded son of toil" to satisfy them. His military appearance and his monocle may have suggested Satan canvassing the "saints" at the door of the tabernacle. I was in the thick of the fight myself, for it was soon evident that the purely "secular" vote was all we could rely upon.

The Referee comes into my house on Sunday, though I seldom read it. But I gave a good look at it last Sunday. I wanted to see if my "intellectuals," as Charles Lamb would have said, had suffered from my recent illness. I turned to "Mustard and Cress" by the great "Dagonet." There were two emphatic witticisms by this distinguished journalist. He remarked that "the vacation [of Easter] was over" but "the Government had not vacated." He also remarked that the wax treatment for gout was appropriate, as "gout always made one waxy." After these wonderful efforts of the distinguished journalist and playwright I felt reassured.

My recent illness was primarily the result of overwork. Behind the scenes, more than before the footlights, the past six months has been a very trying period. I say no more at present; I may have to say more in the near future. A good deal of the troublesome work has to be faced again. I am facing it again. At the same time, I am doing my best to nurse my strength back into fighting form. So thanks to Mr. Cohen again for his saving me for a time the editorial worry of the Freethinker.

G. W. FOOTE.

The Idea of God not Universal.—II.

"We only know of the supernatural through human thought. The dog, the bird, the elephant may dream, but the dream leaves no result in their sensoriums. Man only has faith, he only sees a supernatural existence, out of humanity there is no God; nay, with man the sentiment of a universal Deity is but, as it were, of yesterday. The united balance of physical action that now pervades the kosmos had persisted through untold periods of time, before man existed there were no temples, no prayers, no rites, no ghosts or gods. Then the sun shone and the tides flowed as now; life came and went, and came again, and the Ichthyosaur and the Dinosaur were the princes of the earth; days, years, and cycles passed without the presence of charm or spell, of sacrifice or fetish, or god-power being feared."—J. H. KING, The Supernatural (1892), vol. ii., pp. 266-7.

"In spite of the vulgar prejudice, it is certain that belief in imaginary beings worthy of the name of 'gods' is far from universal. There are two principal causes which keep certain tribes or races outside or above these errors: either a brain so ill-developed that it is incapable of any speculation, or else our own clear practical sense, or an innate common sense too strongly born."—LETOURNEAU, Sociology (1881), p. 276.

"'I cannot entertain the slightest doubt in my mind,' says the famous anthropologist Broca, 'that there are among the lower races people without worship, without dogmas, without metaphysical conceptions, without general creeds, and consequently without religion.'"—BUCHNER, Force and Matter, p. 382.

HERBERT SPENCER says:—

"From various parts of the world, witnesses of different nations and divergent beliefs bring evidence that there exist men who are either wholly without ideas of supernatural beings, or whose ideas of them are extremely vague. 'When Father Junipero Serra established the Mission of Dolores in 1776, the shores of San Francisco Bay were thickly populated by the Ahwashtees, Ohlones, Altahmos, Romanons, Tuolomos, and other tribes. The good Father found the field unoccupied, for, in the vocabulary of these people, there is found no word for god, angel, or devil; they held no theory of origin or destiny.' This testimony, which Bancroft cites respecting the Indians of California, corresponds with the testimonies of old Spanish writers respecting some South American peoples. Garcilasso says that, 'the Chirihuanas and natives of the Cape de Passau.....had no inclination to worship anything, high or low, neither from interested motives nor from fear.' Balboa mentions tribes without any religion as having been met with by Ynca Yupangui; and Avendano asserts that in his time the Antis had no worship whatever."*

All the Indian tribes now existing are credited with a belief in a Great Spirit; but when the Spaniards discovered America, and sought to introduce Christianity among the inhabitants, they found them quite destitute of any idea of a Supreme Being, as we have seen by the testimony cited by Spencer. Junipero was a Spanish priest, and Garcilasso one of the earliest historians of America, who had the intimate knowledge of the native language necessary to a knowledge of native beliefs.

Mr. R. Dorman, a competent authority, writes:—

"that the Great Spirit of the red man or Supreme God of the Indians is almost certainly nothing more than a figure of European origin, reflected and transformed almost beyond recognition in the mirror of the Indian mind."†

Mr. J. H. King, who cites Dorman, also cites the high authority of Stephen Powers, who goes further still. In the "Ethnological Report of the Geographical Survey of the Rocky Mountains" (iii., p. 413), published by the United States Government, he writes:—

"With the exception, perhaps, of a few tribes in the northern parts of the State, I am thoroughly convinced that the great majority of the Californian Indians have no conception of a Supreme Being. Nearly all now speak of the Great man, the Old man above, the Great One above, but they have the word and nothing more. This is manifestly a modern graft on their ideas, because this being takes no part in their affairs, is never mentioned in the real and genuine aboriginal mythology or cosmography, creates nothing, upholds nothing. They have heard of the white man's God, as some of them have taken enough interest to translate the word into their own language, as Pokoh, Lush, Sha, Komus. It is an idea not assimilated. The Indian asked knows no more than the name, but questioned on man, fire, and familiar objects, his interest is aroused and coyote (the Prairie Wolf) comes forward; the coyote did everything, made everything, that his father told him, and his father's father. I affirm without hesitation there is no Indian equivalent for God. There are numerous spirits, chiefly bad, some in human form, some dwelling in beasts and birds, having names which they generally refuse to mortals, and haunting chiefly the hills and forests. Some of these spirits are those of wicked Indians returned to earth, others appear to be self-existent. There are great and potent spirits bearing rule over many of their kind, and there are inferior. All these spirits are to be propitiated and their wrath averted. There is not one in a thousand from whom the Indians expect any active assistance; if they can only secure their non-interference all will go well. Nature was the Indian god and the only god he knew, and the coyote was his minister."*

Like the native Americans, the natives of Africa knew nothing of a Supreme Being until the belief was introduced by Christian and Mohammedan missionaries. Sir John Lubbock observes: "Among the Koosa Kaffirs, Lichtenstein affirms that 'there is no appearance of any religious worship whatever'" (Lichtenstein, vol. i., p. 255). And "Dr. Vanderkemp, the first missionary to the Kaffirs, 'never could perceive that they had any religion, or any idea of the existence of God.'"†

The Rev. F. W. Farrar, in an article dealing with this subject, contributed to the Anthropological Journal (1864), says of the Africans, "The missionary, J. Leichton, tells us of the Mpongwes that he found among them neither religion nor idolatry; and another missionary, the Rev. G. Brown, tells us of the Kaffirs, 'That they have not in their language any word to use as the name, or to denote the being, of a God—of any God.'"

According to one account,—

"the nearest approach to it appears to be the word 'Tixo,' which means 'wounded knee,' and was the name of a celebrated medicine-man a few generations back! The natives of Cape Mount, when questioned by Smith about their religion, said they obeyed their chiefs, and troubled themselves about nothing higher."

And, again, "Of the Kaffirs the missionary Soultheiss also says that 'they have no religion, never pray, know nothing of a higher Being, and believe only in the existing life.'"‡

In the face of all this evidence, Dr. Livingstone declared of the Africans, "There is no occasion for telling even the most degraded of these people of the existence of a God, or of a future state, these things being universally admitted."§ Yet it is a fact that only on the previous page (157), speaking of the Bakalahari who live at Motlasa Wells, he says, "When we kneel down and address an unseen Being, the position and the act often appear to them so ridiculous that they cannot refrain from bursting into uncontrollable laughter"; and of a tribe of Bechuanas, that when a missionary attempted to sing to them—

"the effect on the risible faculties of the audience was such that the tears actually ran down their cheeks. Nearly all their thoughts were directed to the supply of their bodily wants, and this has been the case with the race for ages" (p. 157).

He admits—

"the want of any form of worship, or of idols, or of formal prayers or sacrifice, make both Caffres and Bechuanas appear as among the most godless races of mortals known anywhere. But, though they all possess a distinct knowledge of a deity and of a future state, they show so little reverence, and feel so little connection with either, that it is not surprising that some have supposed them entirely ignorant on the subject" (p. 158-9).

Well, the belief in a God without "any form of worship, or of idols, or of formal prayers or sacrifice," is scarcely worth dignifying with the name of a "belief." And, indeed, he tells us that once, speaking to a native about God, "I discovered that, though he was employing the word which is used among the Bakwains when speaking of the Deity, he had only the idea of a chief and was all the while referring to Sekomi" (p. 159), Sekomi being a native chief.

Moreover, when Livingstone said that the Kaffirs had a clear idea of God, he was not competent to express an opinion; for he tells us explicitly, "I have not had any intercourse with either Caffres or Bushmen in their own tongues" (p. 159). Therefore, he could not possibly know what their ideas upon the subject were. In spite of his sweeping assertion that all the African tribes had a belief in God, he tells us of the Bambiri, "They pray to departed chiefs and relatives, but the idea of praying to God seemed new, and they heard it with reverence."*

In his Last Journals, Livingstone says of the Matambwe:—

"They have all great reverence for the Deity, and the deliberate way in which they say 'We don't know Him' is to prevent speaking irreverently, as that may injure the country. The name is 'Mulungu.' Makochera afterwards said that 'He was not good, because he killed so many people.'" †

It is evident that Livingstone was so prejudiced in favor of the belief in God himself that he could not realise that people could exist without the same belief; and when they declared their ignorance of any such being, he puts it down to their "reverence," an idea wholly foreign to the savage mind, as we shall see when we come to consider the ideas and capabilities of thought of the uncivilised.

In the last passage quoted, Livingstone tells us that the name of God is "Mulungu." Now, the Rev. Duff Macdonald, an African missionary, and well acquainted with the language, says:—

"In all our translations of Scripture, where we found the word God we used Mulungu, but this word is chiefly used by the natives as a general name for spirit. The spirit of a deceased man is called his Mulungu, and all the prayers and offerings of the living are presented to such spirits of the dead."‡

Sir Richard Burton, the famous traveller, linguist, and explorer, who is said to have mastered forty languages, observes:—

"Dr. Livingstone, with his usual peremptory and unsatisfactory way of laying down the law upon every question, affirms that 'the existence of a God and of a future state has always been admitted by all the Bechuanas.' A far better authority, Dr. Moffat (Missionary Labors, p. 245) remarks concerning the Bachwanas (Bechuanas), whilst owning that they are acute reasoners and minute observers of men and manners, that 'to tell them, the greatest of them, that there was a Creator, the Governor of the heavens and earth—of the fall of man, or the redemption of the world—the resurrection of the dead, and immortality beyond the grave—is to tell them what appeared to be more fabulous, extravagant, and ludicrous than their own stories about lions, hyænas, and jackals.'"§

"ORGANISMS ANTAGONISTIC TO HEALTH."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

Sir,—It will be admitted by all Freethinkers that theologians are apt to run in ruts, to accept dogmas in blind faith on the authority of someone else, and to pass them on unquestioningly to others. In a like spirit, the pseudo-scientist of to-day blindly accepts the germ theory of disease, warns us against flies and germ carriers, writes confidentially about things like toxins and anti-toxins which have never been seen or chemically demonstrated, parrots a fairy tale as to the supposed actions of invisible agents, confuses causes and results, disease and disease germs, micro-organisms and animal parasites, and builds up a whole body of doctrine, including the usual kind of legendary narrative, which he expects others to swallow as "facts."

And yet the whole theory rests upon a foundation of sand, owing to the failure of the alleged disease germs to comply with three simple rules laid down by Koch, which, had they been the malign creatures they are represented to be, they ought certainly to have complied with. These rules are very simple:—

"1. The alleged specific germ should invariably be found in connection with the disease it is supposed to have caused.
"2. It should not be found apart from it.
"3. It should, when injected into an animal, give rise to the same disease."

Alas! even the editor of the Lancet has been obliged to confess that "these postulates are seldom, if ever, complied with."

But the association of a particular germ with a particular disease has become a dogma. If the patient clearly has malaria, but one of the various illusory blood tests shows Micrococcus Melitensis to be present, his case is labelled "Mediterranean Fever." If, in connection with laryngitis, the Klebs-Loeffler bacillus be found, the case becomes one of "diphtheria." Nay, if you are perfectly well, and are found to harbor some alleged specific germ, you are accused of being a danger to the community. The diagnosis of disease has been turned topsy-turvy by this method of deciding everything by the germ, and a class of experimenters who are bacteriologists before they are physicians has arisen, regarding men but as a battle-ground for microbes, and vying with each other in producing ever-increasing numbers and varieties of disease-inoculation, under the mistaken idea that the way to get rid of bad matter is to pump more bad matter into the body. In their wake has sprung up a large and enterprising class of serum and vaccine manufacturers, and the Lister Institute presses its nostrums for sale with as great a pertinacity as a Holloway and a Beecham have displayed. "Keep the blood-stream pure" is no longer considered the ideal counsel for health; our medical men who rave about the supposed danger of germs entering the body by natural means think nothing of inoculating them in countless thousands direct into the blood-channels, which nature has so well protected from interference by their covering layers of cells.

Concerning this Alfred Russel Wallace wrote:—

> "The medical profession appear to hold the view that pathogenic or disease-producing microbes exist for the purpose of causing disease in otherwise healthy bodies to which they gain access—that they are, in fact, wholly evil. It is also claimed that the only safeguard against them is some kind of 'anti-toxin' with which everyone must be inoculated to be saved from the danger of attack by some or all of the large number of such diseases which affect almost every organ and function of the body. This view seems to me to be fundamentally wrong, because it does not show us any use for such microbes in the scheme of life, and also because it does not recognise that a condition of health is the one and only protection we require against all kinds of disease; and that to put any product of disease whatever into the blood of a really healthy person, is to create a danger far greater than the disease itself."

And now comes Madame Henri's claim to have discovered that germs change one into another—that the alleged specific germ for anthrax, by treatment with ultra-violet rays, turns into a differently shaped organism capable of causing a disease differing in every respect from anthrax! If the ultra-violet rays can do this outside the body, may not conditions inside the body bring about equally startling changes? Here we are back again at the question—Are not these germs the normal inhabitants of our bodies, changing their shapes in accordance with varying states of health, found now in association with one disease and now with another? The theory that they are specific was started by Pasteur, a man with no medical training or experience. Like Jenner, who bought his degree of M.D. for £15, he led a profession much more qualified to decide such matters than himself, had not its love of sensationalism and hero-worship given him his opportunity. It is said that a new idea starts as a heresy and ends as a superstition. The germ-theory, once accepted and hailed as a dogma, soon became a superstition, and all those who have found flaws in it and dared to voice them, especially when they have been medical men, have been penalised for so doing.

Most laymen imagine that the association between an alleged specific germ and its disease is so close and unmistakable that it is easy of detection. This is not so. So difficult, in fact, has it been to decide between the claims of rival germs to produce the same disease that the honors have frequently been given to one and afterwards filched from it and handed on to another. Pages of Mr. Stephen Paget's book, Experiments on Animals, were devoted to claims (including, be it noted, statistical claims concerning the success of a serum obtained from the germ!) for a certain germ of yellow fever which was afterwards denounced as the wrong one. The same thing happened with the sheep-pox germ. As an example of the cocksureness of bacteriology, beside which the cocksureness of theology must take a back seat, I quote from Sir John Simon: "By these experiments on sheep it has been made quite clear that the contagion of sheep-pox is something of which the habits can be studied as the habits of a fern or moss can be studied." But the "contagion" alas! was not the germ. "Sheep-pox," said Sir Stewart Stockman to the Royal Commission on Vivisection, "has been shown not to be due to these organisms." Sleeping sickness was a few years ago put to the credit of an altogether different organism from the one now fashionable, and that on the authority of the Royal Society.

There is not a single germ which complies with Koch's invaluable test laid down in the postulates I have quoted. Human tuberculosis is known to be set up in certain manufactories by lung-irritation; it has been produced in guinea pigs by inoculation with silver wire or cotton. Sir Douglas Powell naively states that the tubercle bacillus is far more virulent "when mixed with other infections"! The disease is notoriously more rife among the slum children who seldom taste milk than among those in constant danger of imbibing the bacillus.

Confectioners are not decimated by disease as they ought to be, seeing that flies usually swarm in their neighborhood. Draining swamps gets rid of malaria apart from any question of mosquitoes. Plague is got rid of wherever stone houses are substituted for mud hovels in India. Smallpox vanishes as sanitary science marches onwards and vaccination declines.

The articles contributed to the Freethinker by Mr. T. F. Palmer lead me to believe that he has not made any independent study of both sides of this question. He is so certain that he has been told the truth about these germs without any possibility of error that he is ready even to vouch for the hotly disputed stable-fly theory of infantile paralysis (Pettersen and Landsteiner proving that it exists too far north for the stable flies to live), and he asserts that "the natural healthy healing of wounds is absolutely dependent upon the absence of bacteria or the presence of some powerful anti-toxin," although Dr. George Stoker's classical experiment showed that an ulcer treated with corrosive sublimate to kill the bacteria refused to heal, whereas another ulcer on the same patient, at the same time, in the same part of the body, treated with oxygen whereby the bacteria swarmed and multiplied, healed up to perfection. And his experience was amply confirmed by Dr. Granville Bantock in his own surgical work.

But the germ theory is "orthodox." The position of the medical profession towards it is displayed with absolute accuracy, and consequently with humor, in Mr. Bernard Shaw's play, The Doctor's Dilemma. The same keen-witted critic pointed to a fact which merits the attention of all Freethinkers when he suggested that the law of the conservation of energy operates in human credulity, and that every atom of it withdrawn from theology has been diverted to what passes for science. "If people will believe in tales and miracles," he writes,

> "is it not better that they should believe that Balaam's ass spoke, that Joshua stopped the sun, that Samson cracked the pillars, that Jonah was swallowed alive by a whale, and that the blind Syrian saw men as trees walking, rather than that they can live for ever with sound bodies if only their men of science will shrink from no cruelty, and they themselves from no filthiness in the pursuit and use of magical inoculations? The truth is your ordinary man cannot reason, or perform any other skilled mental operation..... The scientist comes along and says to him: 'My friend, by a diabolically cruel process I have procured a revoltingly filthy substance. Allow me to inject this under your skin, and you can never get hydrophobia, or enteric fever, or diphtheria, etc. I have even a very choice preparation of unmentionable nastiness, which will enable you, if not to live for ever, though I think that quite possible, at least to renew in your old age the excesses of your youth.'"

This, be it noted, is actually what has been offered :—

"The ordinary man jumps at the bait.....As to filth, science has taught him that dirt is only 'matter in the wrong place.' It has not taught him that disease is only matter in the wrong condition, and to inject matter in the wrong condition into matter in the right condition [healthy flesh, to wit] is to put matter in the wrong place with a vengeance."

Much more might be written on this interesting topic, but I fear to encroach further upon your space. May I, in conclusion, urge your readers to study the numerous critical writings of Dr. Hadwen, the President of the British Union, and if they want to hear the subject discussed from both sides, to try to induce any doctor of their acquaintance to debate with him on the germ theory of disease.

A Mission to Wowsers.

(There is great need of a mission to convert the poor heathen wowsers.—Tasmanian paper.)

SHALL they perish, O my brothers?
Let us rise and call the others—
Let us start and save the heathen,
  Save the pulpiteering crew;
Save the wowsers, save them early!
Won't you help us, Maud and Pearlie?
Girls, I beg you do a hustle,
  For I think it's up to you!
They are heathens all benighted—
Some are sepulchres and whited—
O be forward, men and brothers,
  Help us, sisters, night and day;
Shall the heathen wowsers perish?
I beseech you, save and cherish—
Help us load Australia's wowsers
  In our earnest mission dray!

For the wowser in his blindness
Needs the hand of Christian kindness—
Stroke the curate, pat him softly,
  I implore you, Kate and Jane;
Lead him back to life and gladness,
And remove his look—whose sadness
Seems to ooze across the landscape
  Like a melancholy stain!
Let each wowsing tax-expounder
Cease in sin to moan and flounder—
Lead him back again to manhood,
  Make him human, I implore;
Bishop, rector, solemn deacon—
Show to each a gladsome beacon,
Let us save them with this mission
  Whilst our gay girls shout "Encore!"

Think, my brethren! Turk and nigger
Have their missions waxing bigger,
And the Chow is pawed and prayed for,
  And likewise the Cherokee;
But I find no earnest mission
Saving wowsers from Perdition—
Therefore rise in haste, my brethren!
  Rise in scores and follow me!
Let us save these pious wowsers
With the drab and dismal trousers—
Sisters, kneel, and urge each curate
  From his wowsing to refrain;
From Perdition let us snatch 'em—
Girls, get busy! Skip and catch 'em,
For the wowser hath his weakness,
  So we shall not mish in vain!

Join the mission, friends, I urge ye!
Help us save the solemn clergy—
Men who know not joy nor pleasure,
  Help us, daughters and mammas;
Seek the mournful wowser-chappie—
Make him cheerful, make him happy;
Parents, hearken to these pleadings!
  I implore you, good papas!
Mish in earnest! Mish with vigor!
Shall we save the Chow and nigger—!
Shall we pray for brown and brindle
  Whilst the heathen wowsers groan?
O my sisters, be not bashful!
Pass the plate, sweet emblem cashful—
Mish with me; and raise an anthem,
  Joy infecting every tone!

See the heathen, joyless vicar!
Lead him gently to his liquor,
Let the damsels dance before him,
  Bearing jars of purple wine;
Softly lift 'em, consecrate him—
If he's single, likewise mate him—
Round this mission-temple's doorway
  Let Hymeneal symbols twine!
Days are these that call for labor—
He who hath a wowsing neighbor,
He who meets with persons solemn,
  Let him mish with words of cheer;
Ah, the joy! The speechless rapture
O'er wowser-cove we capture—
Oh, the hymns of praise ascending
  When we lead him to his beer!

Shall they perish? That's the question!
So I make this great suggestion—
Doth the wowser in thy township
  Call in vain, dear friends, to you?
Save the wowsers! Help this mission!—
They are leaping to Perdition—
Sisters all, with me go forward
  Towards the heathen in the pew!
Hark! the trump at last is sounding!
Let us mish then, gaily bounding—
Let us lead the heathen wowsers,
  Bringing Whiskers to the fold:
Make them Men!—aye, make them human!
So get busy, Men and Women—
Will you? Won't you? Can't you? Don't you
  Mean to mish like soldiers bold?

THEN AND NOW.

Rev. A. J. Waldron says he does not believe in the resurrection of the body, and adds that there would probably have been a different account of the affair had psychical research reached its present stage when Christ was crucified. We agree, not only as regards psychical research, merely in relation to the resurrection, but to the whole story. Imagine anyone coming along to-day with the story of Jesus, from the birth to the resurrection. People would have examined the evidence, and they would have criticised the reliability of the witnesses. They would have said that here was only a rehash of a very old superstition. They would have pointed out that the woman who first saw the empty tomb was one who had been "possessed of devils"—probably an epileptoid subject. They would have known how common were delusions of sight and of hearing. They would have rightly seen in Paul's conversion either a sunstroke or an ordinary attack of epilepsy. They would have laughed at the miracle of the loaves and fishes, of walking on the sea, of conversations with the Devil. If the whole story were told for the first time to-day, there is not a daily paper in existence that would waste a couple of columns on printing it.

If the knowledge available to-day had been present two thousand years ago, the story simply could not have been told. Such legends, to originate and to gain credence, require a peculiar environment. The general mind must be saturated with supernaturalism. It must regard such things as only slightly out of the usual order, and there must not be current a degree of positive knowledge with which they conflict. In the time of Jesus these conditions were all present. People were ready to believe in more stories of the supernatural because they already believed in a goodly stock. Jesus, performing miracles, was only doing what religious leaders had always done and were still doing. The resurrection was no more wonderful than a thousand-and-one other stories in which the people believed. That is why the Christians of the earlier centuries accepted Pagan miracles as readily as their own. They questioned none, and swallowed all that were offered. Whether they came from God or the Devil was the only question at issue; but they were all genuine. That is also why it was so easy to start a new religion then, and so impossible to inaugurate a new one to-day. The thaumaturgist was then hailed as an instrument of Deity. To-day he is described as either an impostor or a lunatic.

The picturesque Easter ceremony of the washing of the feet of choirboys, in imitation of the humility of Christ when he washed the disciples' feet, was performed by the Catholic Archbishop. This "imitation humility" is merely an annual feature of a lordly and profitable business.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from th Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 18 SUNDAY, MAY 3, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Every separate act of a religious ceremony becomes a fraud and a criminal satire when performed by a cultivated man of the nineteenth century.—MAX NORDAU.

The Wicked Atheist.

THE wicked Atheist is almost an extinct being. I do not mean the Atheist who may do something wicked, but the one who is wicked because he is an Atheist, or, more accurately, an Atheist because he is wicked. That was the original type as pictured in religious literature, and he had a very long, a flourishing, and —to the religionist—a useful career. He was the "'orrible example" held up at religious meetings for the edification of the devout, and as a lesson to those with a tendency to stray. He became an Atheist because he was naturally bad, he gloated in performing deeds of villainy after he became an Atheist, and, useful to the last, he died shrieking for forgiveness to the God whose commands he had laughed at and whose forbearance he had outraged. He had a long career in the religious world. Peace to his ashes! One is rather surprised that the Churches did not combine to erect a monument to one who had served so well the sermoneer and the tract-writer.

Then gradually the world experienced "piping times of peace." Atheists became more numerous, and better known. Those who knew them observed that if they were not better than other people, they were certainly no worse. When they died they failed to raise the neighborhood with their terrified shrieks, and they never—no, never—sent in hot haste for the local parson or district visitor to explain to them the kind of hell to which they were going. So the wicked Atheist gradually disappeared. Instead of blackguarding, religionists began to sympathise with him, or to slobber over him. It was such a pity that so intelligent or so good a man should be an Atheist! His Atheism must be due to some accident in his career, or to want of development of some part of his nature. Perhaps he had been over-devoted to science, as in the case of Darwin; or he had met with poor types of believers who had disgusted him with religion; or it may have been that his spiritual nature was undeveloped. In any case, the Atheist came to be treated as an erring friend rather than as a social outcast. Atheists were not to be cursed; they were simply to be pitied.

Now, all at once, I have come across the wicked Atheist again. It is like meeting a long-lost friend, and I rejoice accordingly. He has been discovered away in the highlands of Scotland, and his discoverer is Mr. W. D. M. Sutherland. I haven't the ghost of a notion who Mr. Sutherland is; but every man must begin to be famous—if he is to be famous at all—and I hasten to give this gentleman all the possible publicity in my power. Mr. Sutherland is writing a series of articles in the Ardrossan and Saltcoats Herald on "Dangerous Types," and he gives the place of honor to the Atheist. As an Atheist, I appreciate the compliment, and thank him. There is nothing like being at the top of your profession, whatever it is, and Mr. Sutherland does not belittle the Atheist by lumping him in with a lot of miscellaneous and mediocre villains. He is the chief of his tribe, and Mr. Sutherland shows his courage in tackling the chief first of all. The others he will, presumably, wipe out at his leisure.

But, if I may venture a word of criticism, Mr. Sutherland is ill-advised in the opening of his article. He goes back to the time of Micah, and he points out that in his time things were pretty bad in the land of Judah. Things were then so bad, he says, that they could not be much worse. Now, if this doughty Christian went on to show that these people were Atheists, one could understand the opening of the article. But they were not, and Mr. Sutherland does not say they were. They were all pious; they belonged to God's chosen people; they were on intimate terms, so to speak, with Deity. And if under such conditions things became as bad as they could well be, it does not look as if an absence of Atheism is any guarantee of righteousness in a nation. I don't like this opening much, because it makes the Atheist's pre-eminence in wickedness sort of questionable.

Things are "vastly better with us," says Mr. Sutherland, but there are still men with us who "do evil with both hands earnestly." More, "they are many." Worse, "they are not getting fewer." And "one of the worst and most dangerous types of these men is the type we call Atheists. The type who believe, or say they believe, there is no God." Mr. Sutherland will have no half measures. "The Atheist believes there is no God." This is very bad indeed; but if the Atheist were allowed to put in a word, he might only say that he is imitating—on a more thoroughgoing scale—the example of believers. For all of them say of somebody's God that he does not exist. I do not know how many gods there are in the world; they are very plentiful, anyhow. But I do know that any Christian brushes the whole lot out of existence—save one. And nearly all the other believers follow his example. The Atheist need not trouble himself to deny the existence of God. All he need do is to go amongst believers and agree with all of them when they dismiss each other's God as a myth. And that is all the Atheist does, as a matter of fact. He agrees with the Brahman that the Christian God is a myth. He agrees with the Christian that the Brahman God is a myth. He agrees with them all—and he is blackguarded by them all for his amiability and catholicity.

Mr. Sutherland divides Atheists into classes. Some are passive, others are active. The former may be excused, it is the latter that rouses his antipathy. He says, "I call every active Atheist—and with few exceptions, every Atheist I have known has been active—has been missionary, I call every active Atheist a bad man." Mr. Sutherland could forgive the Atheist who keeps his opinions to himself, but the one who seeks to make Atheists of other people is past forgiveness; he is wholly, irredeemably bad. And the reason for this is not so much religious as it is ethical. If, he says,—

> "you get men to believe there is no God—you will get them to believe there is no sin, for there is no God for them to sin against—and that there is no future state. Now what follows? What follows is this. It is a matter of simple logic. Get men possessed with the idea that there is no God, and no sin, and no future state, and they will do what seems right in their own > eyes.....Work it out in your mind. I imagine—try to imagine—the majority of men and women in this country Atheists. What will happen is this. Immorality will stalk about in broad daylight, with brazen face and cruel hands, anarchy will be rampant, and Ichabod will be written across the face of the nation's history."

There it is. The logic, as Mr. Sutherland says, is simple. If men only do right because they believe in God and in a future state, then if they cease to believe in these things, the justification for doing right will be gone. If Mr. Sutherland only refrains from stealing because he believes there is a God watching him, then it is as plain as a pikestaff that he will steal if God does not keep an eye on him. The logic of the situation is clear—much clearer, indeed, than the facts. For these are somewhat puzzling. When we look at the people who actually do wrong, who commit sin, as Mr. Sutherland would say, we find that these are not—save in a very small percentage of cases—Atheists. Certainly they are not those active Atheists whom Mr. Sutherland specially detests. Taking the inmates of our prisons, they are nearly all pious. Most of them would be genuinely shocked if they were called Atheists. In fact, I have long been conscious that as an Atheist I am not receiving value for that proportion of my rates and taxes that go in the upkeep of prisons. This is not being spent for the detention and reformation of Atheists, but almost entirely for the benefit of Theists. And this is hardly fair. Why should Atheists have to pay rates that are spent almost exclusively on Theists? There are several million non-Theists in Great Britain, in all probability, and no one can pretend that they furnish their fair proportion to the prison population. Christians are getting more than their fair share here as elsewhere.

And, again, I feel that Mr. Sutherland's warning is ill-advised. On the authority of Christians we know what a trouble it is to lead a decent life. They are always talking about "moral restraints," of the many temptations there are to do wrong, of the stern discipline needful to do right. They emphasise the attractiveness of vice and deadly dullness of virtue. Now, it is plain that, at present, Atheists have not awakened to this view of the subject. If they are really "doing evil with both hands earnestly," they are evidently not aware of it. They are under the impression that virtue is really more attractive than vice, that the latter imposes more "restraints" than the former, and that people can be good without God and the future state. They may be laboring under a delusion, but they think so. They think that friends, and family, and society remain just what they are whether there is a God or not. They foolishly, perhaps, think that duty and loyalty in these directions bring their own rewards, and that nothing further is necessary.

In all of this they may be wrong, but at least they think so, and they apparently act up to it. And is it wise of Mr. Sutherland to go about disabusing their minds, pointing out that there is reason why they should behave themselves, and inviting them to a career of villainy, so long as they retain their present opinions? Why should Mr. Sutherland go round disturbing the faith of these poor, simple-minded Atheists, and encourage them to start out on a career of vice? Mr. Sutherland gives his reason. It is because the Atheist "is doing his best to ruin the immortal souls of his neighbors, and because he is threatening his country with the greatest and worst peril—the substituting of immorality and anarchy for religion and law." But, surely, the power of religion over the minds of those who believe should be proof against the attacks of the Atheist? Surely, the high character evoked, the discipline enforced by religion, should be proof against both immorality and anarchy? The value of all training lies in its power to evoke the quality of resistance that is necessary, and the discipline of religion should by now have made its followers secure. It almost looks as though Mr. Sutherland is afraid of Atheism; as though he feels that when the Atheist sets out on his missionary labors religion can hardly withstand his attack.

Mr. Sutherland's warning would be incomplete without historic examples. "If Atheism," he says, "ever becomes dominant, this fair land of ours—this great land—will be doomed and go down in darkness and disaster as surely as every other land in which it became dominant was doomed." Rather vague, but still impressive. It does not say where Atheism was dominant, or in what lands it has been dominant. That would have been to distract its readers' attention with queries as to whether the lands mentioned really were atheistic or not. So one is left with the general impression that all "doomed" lands were somehow or other atheistic. This is a wise policy, and shows that Mr. Sutherland, if he has the innocence of the dove, is not without the cunning of the serpent. Francis Bacon was of opinion that Atheism did never perturb states, and that it left a man to sense, to philosophy, and to natural piety. But Bacon lived a long while ago. And he was not an essay-writer for the Ardrossan and Saltcoats Herald.

The Reign of Cant.

LIKE many other words, "cant" comes to us from the Greek. Originally, kanthos denotes the corner of the eye, or the iron which bounds a wheel. In its Latin form, canthus, it bears practically the same meaning. Primarily, then, "cant" signifies a corner, angle, niche, and from this all its other meanings are derived. So, likewise, to cant is primarily to incline, set an angle, tilt over, tip upon the edge. The passage from the primary to some of the secondary significations is exceedingly difficult to trace; but it is to be borne in mind that in all its varieties of meaning, "cant" represents something on the slant, something that lies obliquely to something else, a departure from the natural and simple. Thus a canting rogue is a vile person who employs the language of honesty and honor, and a canting hypocrite one who resorts to all sorts of expedients to prevent his hypocrisy from becoming known. Some there are who maintain that we owe the word "cant" in its secondary connotations to two Scottish preachers and leaders of the Covenanters, who flourished at the commencement of the seventeenth century, and whose surname happened to be Cant. It was a characteristic of those men of God that they cursed all who made use of the Prayer Book, and advocated the excommunication of those who refused the Covenant, while in their grace before meal they invariably "prayed for all those who suffered persecution for their religious opinions." In reality the Cants did but furnish an apt illustration of this modern meaning of the term. Ben Jonson, a little earlier than the Cants, uses the word in the sense of professional slang in the following lines:—

> "The doctor here,
> When he discourses of dissection,
> Of vena cava and of vena porta.....
> What does he do but cant? Or if he run
> To his judicial astrology,
> And trowl out the trine, the quartile, and the sextile.
> Does he not cant?"

Now, ethically speaking, in all forms of cant there is an element of insincerity, of conscious or unconscious deceit. It is said of Zachary Macaulay that he "never canted" (Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay, p. 68), by which saying is meant that he did not speak theoretically, sentimentally, or as the mouthpiece of a party, but from direct observation and knowledge of the facts in any given case. The majority of people, however, indulge continually in mind-corrupting cant. They belong to a faction, or represent a system, loyalty to which, at whatever cost to individual conviction, is their all-controlling principle. This is profoundly true of politicians at the present time. You know exactly what they will say on every conceivable subject, if you are aware of the views of the party to which they may happen to belong. Each political party has its Shibboleths upon the correct pronunciation of which it rigorously insists, with the result that if any member, on any occasion, says Sibboleth, he is cast out as a cumberer of political ground. This naturally leads to political dishonesty and dishonor, to the sinking of individual personality in that of the party as expressed by its leaders. Party government is, consequently, bound to be more or less corrupt and corrupting. And yet it is in religion that cant is seen at its lowest and worst. Religious factions are more numerous and more bitterly exclusive than all other factions combined. To know a person's religious opinions you only require to ascertain to which denomination he or she is attached. There is always a pope, a creed, or some common law or other, by whom or which people's religious views are determined and controlled. The Anglican Church is peculiar in that it embraces within its pale three great and distinct schools, the High, the Broad, and the Low; and, as a rule, you have only to look at a clergyman to discover in which school to locate him. "I can smell a Presbyterian forty miles," brutally exclaimed cruel Judge Jeffreys at the Bloody Assizes on Sedgemoor; but brutal as the exclamation was on that infamous occasion, it was merely an exaggeration of a fact patent to all. Enter any church or chapel you please, and you need not wait long to learn what set of beliefs it stands for. Why, it is plainly written on the very countenance of almost every professing Christian what brand of Shibboleths he or she is in the habit of pronouncing. Well, the inevitable consequence is, that cant is on the throne in every Christian community, and that there can be no such thing as absolute religious sincerity. Woe to anyone who has the audacity to say Sibboleth when all around him are shouting Shibboleth. The best Christian is nothing but a faithful parrot repeating phrases carefully stored up in the memory.

Webster defines cant as "the use of religious phraseology without understanding or sincerity; empty, solemn speech, implying what is not felt; hypocrisy." That definition is inaccurate only in so far as it regards cant as implying the absence of feeling. We know from experience that the hollowest cant ever uttered is often most profoundly felt; but we also know by the same means that feeling is the most unreliable thing under the sun. Let any born orator play in his own inimitable style upon the keys of the heart, and there is instantly a whole flood of emotional response. George Whitefield had only to intone the word "Mesopotamia" with his wonderful voice, which was like silver bells in tune, to make his hearers cry out in the intensity of their feeling. Yes, the worst cant ever conceived is often most tremendously felt even by the canter himself. What is a canter? "A person given to hypocritical ranting, specifically, in the seventeenth century, a Puritan"; but then it is possible for a man to play the hypocrite quite successfully to himself, a feat which countless myriads are perpetually performing. We must not forget that there is unconscious as well as conscious hypocrisy. The difference between the two is that there is hope for the victims of the former, while those of the latter are quite hopeless.

Our contention is that all technically religious utterances are unadulterated cant. Take the popular pulpit talk about God and Christ. In public prayers and discourses God is invariably referred to as being absolutely supreme. He sits upon the throne of the Universe as Lord of lords and King of kings. He is also described as the greatest of all workers; and while his servant is on his knees or standing as his spokesman in the pulpit, he is everything and the servant nothing. But the moment the preacher ceases to pray to and speak about God, he acts and calls upon his people to act as if they did everything and the Divine Being nothing at all. Billy Sunday, the eccentric American evangelist, talks endlessly about the all-saving power of the Cross, the all-conquering Christ; but as he was entering his motor-car after one of his sensational meetings, a drunken man accosted him, to whom the man of God spoke thus:—

> "Hello, old chap. Just cut away from the dirty whisky gang, and come around to-night and I will fix you up. Straighten up now and be a man. Here's two apples for you."

Outside the tabernacle Billy was an entirely different man, quite equal to doing the job himself. What infinite twaddle flows unceasingly from the pulpits of Christendom week after week, and yet how quickly it is forgotten when work has to be done, which can only be accomplished by exclusively human agencies.

Or take the cant about the indestructible, ineffaceable religious instinct said to be implanted in every human being, whose natural and irresistible cry is the following:—

> "As the heart panteth after the water brooks,
> So panteth my soul after thee, O God.
> My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God."
> —Psalms xlii. 12.

We are confidently assured that there is not a tribe, however savage, without its idea of and desire for a deity. It is not at all uncommon to define man as a being who cannot help being religious, and who must have an object of worship above the skies. Big books have been published and innumerable sermons preached in confident support of this thesis. Do the authors and preachers really believe what they so earnestly advocate? Apparently they do as long as they play the part of theoretical apologists for their religion; but no sooner are they ever so remotely threatened with the withdrawal of religious instruction from Government supported and controlled schools than they recklessly fling their theological thesis to the four winds, exclaiming, "Once the secular system of education has been introduced the Christian religion shall be doomed to complete extinction." In the same way, as they sorrowfully witness the gradual secularisation of the Sabbath, they angrily say to the spirit of the age: "You wicked thief, why do you rob us of our field-day? If you succeed in entirely stealing this day from us, you will sound the deathknell of Christianity itself."

No one takes religion seriously, not even the preacher himself. In practice every Christian is an Atheist. In reality no living being trusts in God. Even those who pretend to believe in special providence take good care to be their own providence as far as ever they can. On Sunday the man of God authoritatively calls upon his hearers to rely alone upon the Lord, which some of them do sentimentally while the Lord's Day lasts; but for the rest of the week they all rely upon themselves as wholly as if there were no God to rely on. Religious belief does not count in life's daily struggle, thereby proving itself to be the merest cant. But the reign of cant even in the emotional realm is at last seriously menaced; while the reign of reason and common sense, which will be the reign of the people, is looming higher and higher as the sure promise of the future. The passing of the gods has always meant, and always will mean, the COMING OF MAN.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Phenomena of Procreation.

THE father of all life is the sovereign sun, and from that early day in the history of our world when our solar sire came wooing the virginal earth the offspring of their union have ever been endowed with the powers of reproduction.

Organic reproduction is a form of growth which assumes the function of generating new organisms from existing organisms more or less similar in character. All individual organisms, both animals and plants, tend to lose their vigor as they grow older, and death is then a mere matter of time. Their power to produce descendants is therefore essential to the perpetuation of the species. Countless reasons exist for the belief that the first living creatures were one-celled plants and animals, and that from such simple organisms all succeeding forms have been evolved by the moulding energies of all-creating Nature.

As all are now aware, single-celled animals like the amœba, paramecium, and others reproduce themselves by mechanical division of their cell-bodies into two equal halves. The two new organisms thus formed act precisely like their parent cell; they feed and grow, and when they reach the limit of growth they themselves divide until in a short time a numerous family is established. The paramecia, for example, when favorably circumstanced, divide about three times in forty-eight hours, which means that the original paramecium splits into two, these into four, and these again into eight in a couple of days.

In a certain sense these lowly creatures are immortal, as the parent cell, although it sacrifices its individuality when it reproduces, never, apart from accident or disease, can it become worn out to the point of death. For as soon as it attains its maximum size it divides into two young animals, and this process is by them repeated generation after generation.

This persistent procreation is, however, subject to an important limitation. In certain circumstances the paramecia arrive at a time when self-division ceases. At this period conjugation becomes necessary, and this is consummated in the following manner: Two of these organisms come together, and through their tender cell-walls part of the nucleus of each one travels across to join the nucleus of the other. Being thus rejuvenated, the two tiny creatures separate, division recommences, and their descendants continue to reproduce themselves for some considerable time before conjugation is again called for. Very many other unicellular organisms have been observed in the act of conjugation.

One-celled plants perpetuate themselves in a similar way: bacteria, yeast, and the green coating on walls and tree-trunks are all examples of this nature. The organisms above mentioned illustrate a type of reproduction in which sex plays no part. The individual cells are sexless, but all possess the power of procreating their kind. With them the generative process merely takes the form of constant growth and multiplication, and is therefore termed asexual reproduction. Sexual generation, which is so general among the higher plants and animals, is to these simple organisms unknown.

But the genesis of sexual generation is soon detected in the ascending order of life, just as reminiscences of an earlier asexual generative process are encountered among the many-celled or multicellular plants and animals. The hydra reproduces itself asexually in conditions of abundant nourishment, and other favoring circumstances. The animal throws out a bud which develops in a few days into a miniature hydra. This soon separates from the parent body, and commences an independent life. In a normally suitable environment the hydra grows apace, and several buds may be developed at the same time, and the young animals thus begotten begin to reproduce themselves soon after their detachment from their parent. But in less propitious conditions, where the water is stagnant and food is scarce, the growth of the hydra is arrested and budding ceases. The animal now evolves sexual structures (ovaries and spermaries), which develop egg-cells and sperm-cells.

> "When the spermaries of a hydra are mature, the sperm-cells escape and swim freely in the water. A single ovum or egg-cell develops in an ovary, and is fertilised by the entrance of a single sperm-cell. The fertilised egg-cell forms an embryo, and becomes surrounded by a hard shell or cyst. The protected embryo falls to the bottom of the pond, and it may remain there for some time. Dry dust scraped from the bottoms of ponds during midsummer drought may contain embryos which will develop into hydras soon after being placed in water."

Fundamentally considered, reproduction is what Huxley described as continuous and discontinuous growth, and this underlying principle is made abundantly clear by a further procreative characteristic which this same interesting and instructive hydra displays. If a hydra be severed into two or more pieces, each fragment will develop into a perfect hydra. This very remarkable aspect of reproductive power comes under the heading of regeneration. Regenerative phenomena are by no means special to the hydra. A divided earthworm will develop into two perfect worms; a starfish may be broken into pieces, and each will refashion itself into a complete animal. Far higher organisms, such as frogs and lizards, will regenerate lost tails or toes. It is not suggested that regeneration is a normal generative process, but its existence proves the close kinship between procreation and body growth.

The colonial hydroids are near relatives of the hydra, and these animals produce buds which do not wander from the parent organism, but remain attached, and grow into branches resembling those of a tree. A single hydroid which itself has arisen from an egg will in this manner develop into a tree-like group which displays a hydroid at the tip of each twig. Some of the hydroids change into medusæ or jelly-fishes, separate from the colony, swim in the water, and generate eggs and sperms. Each fertilised egg grows into a young hydroid, which fixes itself to some solid surface, and then, by repeated budding, a new tree-like colony is formed.

The majority of worms are sexually generated, but some reproduce themselves asexually. Certain marine worms develop new organisms at their anterior segments; occasionally several such segments may be seen, so that the parent worm has become a chain of young worms. In course of time the chain breaks up, and the various individuals which formed it in its unbroken state are now enabled to begin an independent life.

In the vegetable kingdom, especially under cultivation, asexual reproduction is almost universal. Plants frequently propagate themselves without the aid of their generative organs. And some of the most striking examples are to be found among those plants whose sexual apparatus is most perfectly developed. Although these normally reproduce themselves from seeds which are formed by the agencies of floral structures, they may be as well, or better, produced from roots, cuttings, and even leaves.

The runners of the strawberry plant are prostrate branches which, at some distance from their parent, take root in the soil and send up a vertical stem, while the runner withers away. The plant thus spreads itself over a wide area; as many as fifty new plants may be established in this manner in a single summer. Fruit bushes extend themselves by producing new plants from subterranean branches which assume the functions of roots. The fallen leaves of the bryophyllum will develop into independent growths of this garden plant. A leaf or even a fragment of a begonia leaf will form a perfect plant. Many beautiful flowering growths flourish better when bulbs are set in preference to seeds. The hyacinth, narcissus, daffodil, the tulip and crocus, and various lilies are always most successfully cultivated from bulbs.

In purely natural conditions, where the presence of the gardener is unknown, numerous blossoming plants will propagate asexually from roots, leaves, stems, and bulbs. Under cultivation, slips from almost any botanical growth may be made to take root in conditions natural to the plant. Among favorite flowering plants, the geranium supplies an instance of this. Cuttings from the vine and the willow almost invariably take root and flourish in a suitable soil.

Our standard choice fruits cannot be secured from seed-sown trees; grafting and budding are the only known methods for the certain propagation of the finest varieties of apples, pears, peaches, plums, and cherries. The cultivated tubers of the potato plant, which are in reality the thickened branches of the underground stem, will, when planted, reproduce the excellent qualities of that useful vegetable; but no potatoes worth eating can be produced from seed.

Seedless apples are necessarily propagated from cuttings:—

> "The millions of seedless orange trees in California have descended from a single tree which grew from seed but could not itself produce seed. Without man's help, such a variety could not have multiplied."

Phanerogams are those vegetable forms that normally propagate by seeds which are produced in the floral organs or sexual structures of these flower-bearing plants. A glance at the reproductive structures and functions of a bean plant will illustrate the general laws which govern the fertilising processes of blossom-bearing vegetation as a whole. The bean will grow almost anywhere, and anyone sufficiently interested can therefore easily acquire first-hand knowledge by watching the plant as it passes through its successive stages of development.

The bean flower is more or less familiar to all; its color and beauty attract the most careless observer. Nor is its striking appearance merely accidental, for its arresting loveliness serves to secure the visits of those insects that are essential to the production of its seeds. When, in search of honey, the bee alights on the petals of the flower,—

> "the stigma and the upper part of the style are exposed and pollen is brushed on the bee's body by the hairs of the style. Then the bee goes to another flower, and when its style touches the bee's body, the stigma will touch some pollen from the first flower; and at the same time the hairs of the style will brush on to the bee some pollen from the second flower. And so, as the bee goes from flower to flower, it will brush pollen-dust on stigmas and get pollen-dust brushed out from the anthers by the hairs on the styles below the stigmas. There is very little chance that the stigma of a flower will get pollen-dust from anthers in the same flower. This may sometimes happen when a bee leaves a flower and at once goes back to it, carrying pollen-dust received on its first visit."

The preceding quotation will probably become clearer to the non-botanical reader if a brief description of the sex organs of flowering plants is appended. The male organ is the stamen, which is made up by the stalk or filament, and the anther which bears tiny grains of pollen. In the middle of the flower is the female organ, the pistil, which consists of the ovary and the style which extends upwards and has the stigma at its termination.

As we have shown, self-pollination is usually prevented and cross-pollination most frequently secured. Darwin, in the course of lengthy and elaborate experiments, kept beans protected with netting which prevented all access of insects to the flowers, with the result that seeds seldom formed. There is now little doubt that the agency of insects is indispensable to the production of healthy seeds. When the pollen particles have once been placed on the stigma they soon swell, and each pollen grain sends forth a delicate tube which grows down into the tissues of the style and enters into an ovule in the ovary. There the pollen tube embraces an egg-cell, and the passage of the protoplasm from the end of the pollen tube into the egg-cell consummates the act of fertilisation. In a very short time the fertilised egg-cell splits up into many cells, and these form an embryo within the ovule which develops into a seed.

Among non-flowering plants is the fern, whose generative processes are, consequently, of a less evolved order. The stems of our native ferns are usually semi-prostrate on the soil or buried from view beneath the earth, although the noble tree ferns of the tropics have splendid upright stems. Fern fronds bear on their under surfaces elevations and ridges entirely foreign to anything seen on the leaves of flowering plants. These structures contain spore-cases (sporangia) which develop spores. When the sporangia are ripe, they burst and scatter their contained spores over the surrounding soil, from which they suck up water and begin to germinate. The first stage of the developing fern is that of the prothallium, which, when full grown, evolves male and female organs on its under side. Each ovary develops an ovum, and each spermary produces numerous spiral sperm-cells provided with cilia. These cilia act as swimming-organs, and the sperm-cells are urged through the water previously absorbed from the soil, and move towards the opening of the ovary, and once inside, they come into contact with the egg-cell. One sperm-cell suffices to ensure this act of fertilisation.

The egg-cell now divides itself again and again; an embryo is evolved, and this develops into a small fern plant. We thus see that the ordinary fern first reproduces asexually by means of spores which grow into prothallia, and then these, in their turn, reproduce with the aid of sexual organs, and generate new fern plants. These phenomena furnish an excellent example of the law of the alternation of generations.

Spore development represents an earlier evolutionary process of procreation, which was once universal among the ancestors of the blossom-bearing plants. Traces of this more primitive mode of reproduction are still to be detected in the floral structures of the highest order of plants. Detailed study of plant morphology has revealed the fact "that inside the pistil of flowers are microscopic groups of cells which represent the prothallium that lives independently as a stage in the life-history of ferns and other lower plants."*

The Idea of God not Universal.—III.

"The assertion generally passes current that the idea of an Omnipotent Being is familiar to all people, even the most barbarous. My limited experience argues the contrary. Savages begin with fetishism and demon-worship,.....the deity is the last and highest pinnacle of the spiritual temple, not placed there except by a comparatively civilised race of high development, which leads them to study and speculate upon cosmical and psychical themes."—SIR RICHARD BURTON, First Footsteps in Africa, p. 50.

"If we may believe the testimony of travellers,—who are generally prejudiced in the opposite direction, and who frequently implant their own belief, which is found there by subsequent voyagers,—there are not only isolated tribes, but whole nations who are so degraded as to live with no knowledge of their Creator."—REV. F. W. FARRAR, "On the Universality of Belief in God, and in a Future State," Anthropological Journal (August, 1864), cxxvii.

"And in what condition are these, or the other Indians who are still scattered up and down in the vast continent of South or North America? Religion they have none; no public worship of any kind! God is not in all their thoughts."—REV. JOHN WESLEY, "The Imperfections of Human Knowledge," Wesley's Sermons, vol. ii., p. 181.

"It is impossible to take religion in its strict sense as the faculty of believing in a God; if so, half of the population of the globe would be destitute of it. Taking Buddhism alone there are three or four hundred million votaries of this 'religion without God, founded on charity amounting to madness' (Laboulaye)."—DR. PAUL TOPINARD, Anthropology, p. 152.

MR. LAUDER LINDSAY cites the statement of Dr. Mouat, who says of the Andaman Islanders:—

> "They have no conception of a Supreme Being. They have never risen from the effects they see around them to the most imperfect notion of a Cause. They have never ascended in thought from the works to a Creator, or even to many creators—that is to say Polytheism" (Mouat, Adventures and Researches among the Andaman Islanders (1863), p. 303).

He also quotes the testimony of Lieutenant Low, of H.M. Indian Navy, who similarly remarks of them: "They do not believe in the existence of a Supreme Being, and perform no religious ceremony of any sort" (Low, The Land of the Sun (1870), p. 168).†

"Of the inhabitants of Pleasant Island, Mr. T. Beckford Simpson tells us, 'They have no religion of any kind, neither do they believe in a future state, but they appear to have some slight idea of an evil spirit.'"‡

Mr. Bonwick, in his work on the Tasmanians, has compiled a long list of tribes and races without belief in a God, from which we extract the following:—

> "Mr. Bates says that the Mandurens of South America have 'no idea of a Supreme Being.' Sir Samuel Baker declares that the Nile 'flows through a land of barbarians without a belief in God.' There is not a trace of it among the Papuans of New Guinea or the Negritos of the Phillipine Isles. Mr. B. H. Hodgson found no word in the Tamil language of India for God or Soul. Dr. Mouat calls the Andamanders 'mere undeveloped children,' and records, 'They have no conception of a Supreme Being. Mr. Mouhot refers to the wild Bannavs of the forests of Annam as having 'no idea of a Supreme Being, Sovereign, and Creator of all things."*

The Rev. F. W. Farrar tells us that when Wallace, the naturalist, was among the wild tribes of the Moluccas and New Guinea,—

> "he endeavored to ascertain what were their ideas respecting the Creator of the universe, but he could only get from them a confession of total ignorance of the subject. It was difficult to distinguish the real opinions of those savages from the opinions they had heard. If they were told by any traveller that there was an invisible Creator of the Universe, so far as they were capable of receiving such an idea, they would receive it, and repeat it afterwards when questioned on the subject; but so far as he was able to ascertain, they had no such idea whatever. They had no desire for knowledge, but were contented to go on in their own ways. They have, indeed, some vague ideas of the existence of unknown powers; diseases, for instance, were supposed to be unnatural, and to be caused by some supernatural agency, but that was very different from the belief in a God. The intellectual capacities of those tribes were so feeble that he doubted whether they could be made to appreciate or understand what was meant by a God."†

The Rev. F. W. Farrar cites many other travellers to the same effect, and in his paper on the subject, given to the Anthropological Society, he said—

> "his object in bringing the subject before the Society was to obtain testimony on one side or the other. He should have been delighted if the opinions he had stated, on the authority of various travellers, had been refuted by other travellers; and that was his main object in bringing the question forward" (ccxxi.).

Surely, one would think if testimony to the contrary existed, it would scarcely have escaped the search and inquiry of such a widely read critic.

But if all the savage tribes existing to-day believed in a God, yet there must have been a time when they had no such belief. For if man has evolved, by slow degrees, through countless ages, from lower animal forms, as science proves, then the belief in a God must have arisen at some time since he evolved from animal to man. There is no race at present existing without a language, yet there must have been a time, during the early evolution of man, when he was like the lower animals—speechless.

But the evidence which the Rev. F. W. Farrer failed to find, the late Mr. Andrew Lang attempted to provide in his book, The Making of Religion (1898), in which he attacks Sir John Lubbock, who, in his works Prehistoric Times and the Origin of Civilisation, deals with the evolution of religion. He also states that these works have been "confuted" by M. Roskoff, of Vienna, who has devoted one entire section of his work on the religion of savages to a criticism of the same works.

Shortly before his death, Sir John Lubbock (Lord Avebury) published a reply to his critics in his last work, Marriage, Totemism, and Religion (1911), in which he observes:—

> "Mr. Lang's view of the whole subject is not only very different from, but the very opposite of mine. He believes that the lowest savages had a simple, pure, and beautiful religion which gradually deteriorated; while I believe that our primitive ancestors started without religion, and that, speaking generally, as they rose in civilisation their religious conceptions rose with them. So far as religion is concerned, Mr. Lang believes in a golden age long past and succeeded by one of iron" (p. 156).

To use Mr. Lang's own words, among "the lowest savages there exists, not a doctrinal and abstract Monotheism, but a belief in a moral, powerful, kindly, creative Being."* "Turning to races yet higher in material culture, we find a crowd of hungry and cruel gods" (p. 280). And "The Supreme Being is succeeded in advancing civilisation, and under the influence of animism, by ruthless and insatiable ghost-gods, full of the worst human qualities. Thus there is what me may really call degeneration, moral and religious, inevitably accompanying early progress" (p. 276).

In reply to this curious attempt to read evolution backward, Lord Avebury replies:—

> "Why should men proffer costly sacrifices and bribes to the inferior deities, rather than prayer to the Supreme? What evidence is there that savages ever had any living faith in their 'High Gods' or ever did pray to them? Mr. Lang's theory seems most improbable, and only to be accepted if supported by the strongest evidence. He looks to a golden age in the past; I hope for one in the future. He devotes a considerable portion of his important work on The Making of Religion to cases of clairvoyance and second-sight, crystal-gazing, and demoniacal possession, and dwells on the stories of Mr. Home floating out at one window and in at another; of Mrs. Piper, Miss X., etc., etc. Speaking of such superstitions, he says: 'I regard them, though they seem shadowy, as grounds of hope, or at least as tokens that men need not yet despair.
> "For my part, I look forward with hope; but if I were to despair, it would be to see some of our ablest intellects still clinging to the most childish superstitions of the darkest ages and the lowest savages."†

Lord Avebury then deals in detail with the evidence brought forward by Mr. Lang in support of his theory, and shows that it will not stand examination.

M. Roskoff's attack is somewhat different to Mr. Lang's. He attacks Lord Avebury for holding that the lowest savages have no religion whatever—an interesting question about which many big books have been written. But, before dealing with this question, it would be well to understand something of the modes and capabilities of thought among primitive races.

Acid Drops.

We have received the following letter from a Staffordshire clergyman, and this seems as good a place as any in which to deal with it. It runs:—

> "A week or two ago, when in Birmingham, a man politely offered me a new copy (April 5) of the Freethinker, and asked me to read it. My being in holy orders accounted probably for his offer. Well, Mr. Editor, I have read nearly all of it and I am writing to ask why it is published? I could say a good deal more and ask a lot more questions, but I will only ask that and one other. What grounds have we for believing that so-called 'Freethought' (such as contained in the issue of April 5) can possibly appeal to men's intellect, or, rather, to intellectual men? The man in Birmingham, I am sure, means well, and he could not have been more polite; but I cannot conceive why he and others should want to busy themselves in such a way."

We are not surprised that the Freethinker does not appeal very powerfully to a gentleman in "holy orders," although it has hit the mark now and then even in that direction. Still, we should have thought that even a clergyman would have realised why this paper is published. Its object is to say what cannot be said in other papers; and, moreover, express what a large number of people feel to be the truth but cannot themselves say—partly because they may lack the power of putting their thoughts into words, partly because they dare not. The primary purpose of the Freethinker is to tell the truth about religion. And the clergy need to be told this as well as other people. This may have been the reason why the Birmingham Freethinker handed the rev. gentleman a copy of this paper.

We could not forbear a smile at the question, Whether we thought the Freethinker would appeal to intellectual men? In all seriousness, whom else should it appeal to? It does not pander to people's love of sensationalism, or to their taste for pruriency. It does not trade on their passions, play on their emotions, or make profit out of their fears. To some intellects the Freethinker would not, of course, appeal. To people, for example, who have been used to soaking themselves in sermons, and who have seriously come to take them for great intellectual efforts. For sheer brainwork we have no hesitation in placing the Freethinker beside any paper in England; and this reverend gentleman would be considerably surprised did he know the class of people who read its pages and more or less agree with its teachings. It is one of the carefully nurtured slanders of the religious world that the Freethinker is a journal written by illiterate men for illiterate readers. We would seriously advise our questioner to place the Freethinker beside any religious journal in the kingdom and compare the quality of both.

Finally, why should we and others busy ourselves in this way? One can only reply, Why not? Our questioner cannot conceive why we should. So much the worse for him, and so much the worse for the credit of the training which has landed him in "holy orders." The promulgation of what one believes to be the truth is one of the greatest of social duties, for the discharge of which the discovery of truth is only a preparation. The Freethinker believes he has got hold of the truth about religion; if not the whole of the truth, at least more of it than the Christian possesses. And, believing this, he sets out to enlighten the Christian and rid him of his error. Imagine a Christian minister, who should be always on the look out to convert people to his way of thinking, wondering why other people should be engaged at the same work. Or perhaps it is that, as the Freethinker has no future rewards to offer, and no future punishments to threaten, our clerical questioner is puzzled to understand why anyone should bother himself in the matter. And if that is so, we can only reply again, so much the worse for him and his creed. A more human creed would have developed a keener sense of social responsibility. It would certainly have caused him to better appreciate the efforts of men, inspired by no hopes of material gain or public applause, going out of their way to confer upon others some of the truth they have themselves discerned.

"Dante's conception of God was one of hideous malignity, Milton's merely puerile." Thus writes a penman in the Times. Maybe the journalist prefers the deity of Bramwell Booth or Gipsy Smith.

The Daily Chronicle has been complaining of degenerate journalism on the part of the Tory press, which is accused of using such terms as "liar," "rogue," "bully," "traitor," in referring to Liberal ministers. Such quotations could be paralleled easily from the utterances of the Christian Evidence lecturers, but, as they are only aimed at Freethought leaders, the "Liberal" press never notices them.

Temperance propaganda is very vigorous in America, and water is used instead of wine in the communion services at the churches. Certainly water would be preferable to the red ink and vinegar used in some places of worship.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton suggests the new name of "The Limits" as a suitable one for the modern democrats. As G. K. C. adds that "the devils also believe and tremble" at democracy, we agree that the title is suitable in some cases.

American speakers have a fondness for Biblical illustrations in their speech, and frequently the references are somewhat apocryphal. Mr. Thornton, the new manager of the Great Eastern Railway, in his first speech in England, said, "I have always had a great respect for Daniel, the original lion-tamer. When he was in the den of lions they roared, and Daniel smiled because he knew there would be no after-dinner speaking."

According to an insurance expert, the clergy are negligent concerning the risk of fire in the churches under their care, and do not insure them. This is strange, for the parsons are always shouting "fire" in their pulpits.

There is nothing like a good mouth-filling phrase for satisfying the ordinary religionist. Here, for instance, is one from the Christian Commonwealth. It is given as a definition of religion: "Religion is the activity of a highly evolved intuition which pierces to and responds to a supersensible reality that attracts it." We take a deep breath, and with a slight rearrangement read it backwards. "A supersensible reality attracts a highly evolved intuition and constitutes religion." It does just as well. That is the beauty of a deeply religious formula. However you take it, it answers the purpose in an equally satisfactory manner. We wonder what Mr. J. Bruce Wallace—the writer of the sentence—imagines it to mean? Try and imagine a religious savage—and all savages are religious—exercising the "activity of a highly evolved intuition"—which men like Spencer and Darwin and Wagner did not possess—and so get ting into touch "with a supersensible reality." Intuition, like instinct, is a word with a meaning, but religious writers rarely seem to be aware of what it means. As it is, they use it as a cover for the first piece of nonsense that comes into their minds. And their readers accept it as profound philosophy because they are in the same condition of ignorance.

Mr. Wallace also discovers that the "main function of science in the service of religion is to destroy effete thought-moulds that have become limitations to the religious consciousness." Really, we were not aware that there was such a thing as a "religious consciousness" any more than there is a heat consciousness. There is a consciousness of religion and there is a consciousness of heat. But this is quite another matter. The functions of every human brain are absolutely identical, the difference arises solely in the degree of development. And as to science liberating the "religious consciousness," we were under the impression that the great work of science had been to show that the things which were accepted as evidence of the truth of religion were really nothing of the kind. That is what science did when it killed spiritual agency in astronomy, in geology, in biology, in chemistry, in the causation of plagues, diseases, insanity, and in other directions. Science has been all along proving that phenomena believed to be religious were really nothing of the kind. Mr. Wallace may call this the liberation of the religious consciousness; other people, not in the habit of drugging themselves with words, will see in it the destruction of one religious belief after another.

The Vicar of St. Luke's, Nottingham, has been complaining of the behavior of the people who come to his church to be married. Some of them, he says, come there in a state of intoxication. The vicar says he would much prefer that they went to a registry office to get married. This is very kind and thoughtful of the Rev. F. J. Taylor, but we can assure him that we have never heard of people going to a registry office in a state of intoxication to get married. Evidently that kind of thing is confined to religious circles.

The Archdeacon of Bath has been warning the clergy under his control of the need for adequately insuring their churches against fire. What on earth is the matter with prayer?

According to a London evening paper, a blind reporter is to report football matches and record his impressions. We fancy deaf, dumb, and blind representatives of the ordinary press attend Freethought meetings, for their reports never get published.

An American missionary named Tridick has been killed by a lion near Khartoum. Perhaps he upset the animal by singing "Dare to be a Daniel."

Writing in Lloyd's Weekly News, the Rev. Charles Brookes, vicar of Ravensthorpe, Northampton, says: "After all, death is nothing more than the end of our lives here, and that we shall go on living a fuller, freer, happier life than any we can hope for here on earth." Is this a free advertisement of the Kingdom-Come business.

A female patient in the Physico-Medical Institution at Kieff, who died, had a temperature of 122 degrees Fahrenheit for some days during her illness, and twice it rose to 140 degrees. The lady should suffer little discomfort even if she went to the wrong place.

The Catholic Times is very angry with Sir T. S. Clouston, the eminent surgeon. "With the unashamed and hardened ignorance so characteristic of the exponents of modern science," Sir Thomas Clouston has written of "the implied opinion of the mediæval Christian Church.....that the reproductive instincts were innately evil, and should be repressed and trodden under foot by all religious and moral men and women." This really does not strike us as a very serious exaggeration of the facts of the case. What else did the celibacy of the mediæval Church imply if not this? Of course, celibacy was not the only element in the mediæval religious ideal, but it was certainly a very powerful and a very prominent one. It was by abstention from sexual relationship that most of the "saints" showed their superior degree of holiness, and their marriage would certainly have been regarded as a lapse from a superior to an inferior state. Of course, the Church never went so far as to brand the reproductive instincts as evil, and Sir Thomas Clouston does not say that it did so. But it certainly implied that their exercise was a bar to the saintly life. For generations the truly "saintly" character was a celibate, and if that does not imply the relative evil of the reproductive instincts, one would like to know what meaning one is to attach to it.

In these days of dwindling church congregations, it is interesting to learn, from a recent article in the Times, that there is a village "within excursion distance from London" which can boast of a good church attendance. The secret lies in the fact that some long time ago a misguided person bequeathed a sum of money to be given annually to the person who most regularly attended church. Women generally bear off the prize, and the writer of the article says that the one to whom it was awarded last Christmas was "obviously a woman of determination and will." He says, "her face reminded me a little of others seen waiting outside the pit doors of London theatres; it had an expression upon it that seemed to say, 'I am here to get through this business, and here I stay until it's done. When will the doors open?'" Something of the same kind really exists in a large number of churches. Presents of groceries and clothing given to poor people at many churches are dependent upon attendance at Mothers' Meetings and the like. It would not be at all a bad thing for the railways to advertise excursions to the village where church attendance is not dwindling. It would be enough of a curiosity to attract visitors.

At Llanelly, according to the Daily Mail, six traders pay thirteen shillings each, weekly, in fines for trading on Sunday. They have been doing this for about six years, and the game still goes on. Some of the Justices who inflict the fines employ workmen every Sunday. Perhaps some of the Welsh Members of Parliament who are so frantically anxious for religious freedom in Wales will call attention to this sample of Sabbatarianism in action.

"How is it," asks the Rev. Dr. Forsyth, "that so much literature connected with religion tends to be poor and thin and sentimental?" Perhaps the answer may be found on the lines of the old maxim that one can't make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. Religious literature was not always poor and thin and sentimental. Some of the strongest pieces of writing of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were connected with religion. But the world was different then. Men of ability and information could still be religious. Nowadays these are becoming a rarity. It is mostly men who are themselves poor and thin and sentimental who give themselves to religion, and the men are reflected in their writings. When The Rosary and When It Was Dark, and Mr. Harold Begbie's productions, are boomed because of their religious value, what else could we expect but poor stuff to be the vogue in the religious world?

Dr. Forsyth says that "we have religious novels whose mawkish sentiment is a real danger. They are more mischievous than Tom Jones." More mischievous than Tom Jones—one of the strongest, manliest, and sanest novels in the language! God help the poor devil who can't read Tom Jones without its doing him a mischief. Books of that kind never did, and never will, do anyone harm. When Fielding is coarse, he is coarse as nature is coarse; but he is also tender, and tolerant, and sympathetic, and, above all, wise in a degree that divests his coarseness of all harmful tendencies. It is not such books as Tom Jones that are bad books. The really bad books, the books that have the most demoralising influence, are just those that Dr. Forsyth would in all probability commend. Books that are filled with false and misleading views of life, of people, of systems, and of nations. Dr. Forsyth should purify his taste before he again ventures to criticise the first great novel, and still one of the greatest novels, in the English language.

Here is a curious illustration of the value of prayer. It is taken from an official report by Major Hirst, who has been engaged on survey work in the Sundarbans, India. The Major reports that four men were killed by tigers. "The first man taken was a religious person, imported to pray while a surveyor and his squad were at work. His prayers were supposed to keep off tigers, but either he did not pray sufficiently or was unlucky." Another man was seized by a tiger, but the surveyor got a brass rule and beat it about the head until the man was dropped. There it is. Brass versus prayer. Surveyor versus God. The odds are all in favor of the man and the metal.

The late Cardinal Kopp, the Prince Bishop of Breslau, left a fortune of £350,000. Unless Peter's sight is failing, the former bishop should have some difficulty in getting through the pearly gates.

A little time ago the Methodist papers were full of talk about the great revival that had been taking place in the Church. Now the membership for the year are published, the great revival has resulted in a decrease of 1,282 members. And significant enough is the fact that there is a decrease in Cornwall—one of the hotbeds of Methodism in the country. The Methodist Times says that "these figures are frankly unsatisfactory and dispiriting." More so because "competent observers" have declared that "the spiritual atmosphere of the Church has perceptibly been rising." We fancy Dr. Scott Lidgett mistakes a consequence for a cause. What is meant by greater "spiritual fervor" is, we take it, outbursts of revivalistic and evangelical enthusiasm such as the Methodist Times has been chronicling for many weeks. But this does not indicate progress; it means decadence. The better balanced, the more normal, types of mind forsake the Churches, and as these go other and lower elements are left to express themselves with greater freedom. Religious movements experience the same thing in their beginnings. And for the same reason: they are outside the main current of social life. When they are brought within its influence this "spiritual fervor" dies out, and religion becomes more or less of a pretence.

Recently a twelve-year-old girl stole half-a-sovereign from her mother. She spent it in buying cheap jewellery, articles of finery, and a Bible. Had she purchased a copy of Bible Romances there would have been a moral.

"It is a fact that physicists are, as a rule, more religious or more superstitious than ordinary men," says the Times "Literary Supplement." We should like to see the names of the scientists and the places of worship they attend.

Father Robinson, an Australian Catholic priest, wanted a new chalice for his church, and he asked his congregation to give articles of jewellery, which formerly belonged to dead friends, "to God in the name of the dear dead." Imagine an orphan Catholic subscribing for candles for the repose of his parents, and also giving up father's watch and chain and mother's trinkets.

Prayer is said to be able to move mountains, but when it comes to raising cash the bazaar is far more effective. At Bradford the Baptist ladies have raised £2,500 in two years.

J. KING.—John Stuart Mill's praise of the Jesus of the Gospels was, as both John Morley and Alexander Bain, beside many others, pointed out, an extremely ill-advised piece of writing. The character of the Gospel Jesus is a composite one, and the materials for its construction were to hand for anyone who cared to utilise them. Mill's intellectual equipment was not such as entitled him to an authoritative opinion on the matter. We are not attempting to belittle John Stuart Mill in saying this, but only emphasising what should be an obvious truth, namely, that the greatest man will trip when he deals with subjects on which his information is imperfect.

A. J. MARRIOT AND J. G. FINLAY.—Received.

For various reasons it has been found desirable to again hold the Annual Conference in London this year. The Queen's Hall has been engaged for the evening (public) meeting, and there will be the usual arrangements made for the comfort of delegates and visitors, including a Conference luncheon. Those who intend visiting the Conference on Whit-Sunday will expedite the arrangements if they will communicate with the Secretary as speedily as possible, saying what accommodation they will require during their stay, and whether they intend to be present at the Conference luncheon. The last item is of importance, as the number must be notified beforehand.

Mr. Cohen lectures at Failsworth to-day (May 3) at 2.45 and 6.30. Admission to both meetings are free. There should be a good attendance of Freethinkers from Manchester and district.

The London open-air propaganda is now in full swing. Some branches commenced operations a week or two ago. To-day (May 3) lecturing under the auspices of the N. S. S. commences at Finsbury Park (11.30), Regent's Park (3.30), Parliament Hill (3.30). The Kingsland Branch this year holds its meetings both in the morning and evening, commencing May. In Victoria Park Miss Kough commences the evening meeting with a lecture at 6.15. We hope that London Freethinkers will give the lecturers at all these stations the support that they and the cause they represent deserve.

The splendid lead given to Liberals by Mr. Asquith to the deputation that waited on him in connection with the abolition of the Blasphemy Laws is not without avail. At the annual meeting of the South-East Cornwall Liberal Association, Mr. J. A. Elliott moved a resolution to the effect that the Association regretted the revival of prosecutions for blasphemy and the attitude of the Home Secretary in relation thereto, heartily approves of Mr. Asquith's promise to support a Bill for their abolition, and urged the Government to give special facilities to Mr. Holt's Bill for removing the last remnants of religious prosecution. The resolution was supported by Mr. H. Perry Coste, and, among others, a Mr. Foot, who announced himself as a Christian and a Nonconformist. The resolution was carried, and we hope other Liberal Associations will follow suit.

Sir Arthur Quiller Couch sent the following letter to the meeting, which was read by the Chairman:—

> "I am very glad to see that Mr. Asquith has received a deputation, and given it—as I understand—assurance of his personal desire to repeal the absurd 'Blasphemy Laws.' I do not know how far this promise will affect the wording of the resolution you propose to submit to the South-East Cornwall Liberal Association, but—if I am allowed to express a hope—I hope very earnestly that some resolution will be passed strengthening the Prime Minister's hands in repealing these odious Acts. My religious opinions are not yours. It is as a Liberal Churchman that I detest those rusty weapons of persecution. Certainly it seems to me that all Nonconformists, whose religious freedom was won against just such statutes, should have an hereditary interest in destroying them. 'Blasphemy' is the word used by officials of religion, from Caiaphas downward, to silence any speech of which they disapproved. It is not creditable that these laws have been so often invoked of late under a Liberal Government, and I hope the Government will redeem its credit in this matter by sweeping the statutes off the book."

"'Blasphemy' is the word used by officials of religion, from Caiaphas downward, to silence any speech of which they disapproved." That is well said, and it says in a sentence all that can be said.

According to the Bishop of Willesden it is "the duty of the Church to see that justice is done to the workers." We congratulate the workers on this discovery. It will rank with Newton's discovery of the law of gravitation.

Scripture contains many truths. One of them is that godliness hath the promise of the life that now is as well as that of the life to come. Proofs of this appear almost daily in the newspapers. Here are some recent ones. Rev. Robert Townson, Worthing, Sussex, left £9,165; Rev. Walter Francis Laufear, of Bath, left £6 531; Rev. Joseph Boord Ansted, of Highbury Hill, London, left £11,865. We like to see the Bible corroborated.

Mr. Dean C. Worcester, who has written an authoritative volume on The Philippines, Past and Present, tells an amusing story of popular ignorance of the archipelago. Once a lady said to him, "Deanie, are those Philippians you have been visiting the creatures that Paul wrote his epistle to?"

Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P., is a fluent writer, but sometimes his pen runs away with him. Writing of John Bright recently, he said, "the most Radical in religion, like Gibbons, have often been the most Conservative in politics." Presumably, "Tay Pay" meant Edward Gibbon, the greatest of all historians; but all his readers may not know this.

Reviewing Sabatini's book on Torquemada and the Spanish Inquisition, the Daily Chronicle used the headline, "The Inexplicable Crime Book." This tender consideration for the feelings of Catholics suggests that there are some faithful sons of the Church in the neighborhood of Fleet-street.

The name of the Trinity Brethren is unfamiliar to most people. When John Bright, who was a hard-shell Nonconformist, was President of the Board of Trade, he was asked to dine with "The Trinity." He nearly had a fit, until the matter was explained.

More Notes.

How easily nations slide into war! I have been thinking of this very sadly to-day, out of doors, seeking fresh life and strength, which is all I have to do now to complete my recovery from a shaking illness. The air is cool and refreshing in the shade, the sunshine is balmy and tonic, the sky is a dream of tender blue and shimmering opalescence, the sea sparkles under the rays of the one real glorious light which "lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Peace and quiet brood over the scene. Everything seems idyllic. The birds thrill the air with music and now and then a note of rapture. One feels that if optimism is false pessimism is not true. Browning sang, or made a happy girl sing, "God's in his heaven, All's right with the world." And heaps of religionists regard this as a justification of God. But is it? Early this lovely morning I heard the boom of guns at sea. Men were learning skill in the art of destruction. The screaming gulls overhead need little further training. They dart with such rapid certainty upon their prey. The sweeter songsters of the wood are all more or less engaged in nature's great work of rapine and murder. Life is fed by death. Eat or be eaten is the general law of animal existence. Behind the beautiful palace lies the gloomy slaughter-house. Good and evil are relative. They are the systole and diastole of the heart of the world. So one must not be surprised that the newspapers bring news, even on this delightful morning, of arms landed on the coast of Ireland for one set of religionists to fight another with,—or, worse still, of a dispute, growing into a quarrel, and now fast developing into a regular war between the United States and Mexico. The former country was basking in the sunshine of peace. It was preparing to celebrate a hundred years of peace with Great Britain. It was making treaties of peace right and left with all sorts of other nations. But suddenly the sky darkened; the lightning flashed the signals of passion, the thunder spoke the voice of anger and hatred; and presently there began to fall the "red rain" which Byron saw with his mind's eye over the field of Waterloo. Yes, I repeat, how easily nations slide into war! I am not taking sides. I eschew politics in the Freethinker. I do not read moral or diplomatic lessons to President Wilson. He has plenty of advice (it is a very cheap article) without asking for mine. All I want to say is what I have said twice already—How easily nations slide into war!

Did you think the millennium was coming? Many voices have been crying "Peace! Peace!" in my time, and Andrew Carnegie has spent millions upon it in all the ways of self-advertisement—to say nothing of diffusing an interest in American Steel Trust Bonds. But how much real good has been wrought by all the shouting and agitation? Some, no doubt, amongst the better class of minds. The "glory" of war is less praised than it used to be in educated and thoughtful circles. The "intellectuals" recognise the military spirit as one of the greatest obstacles to moral and social progress. The "intellectuals," however, are a small number in comparison with the multitude. Their voices are drowned in the roar of the crowd. The mob of to-day is little, if anything, better than the mob of yesterday. It is just as easily practised upon in the name of "patriotism" to serve the ends of the priests of the worship of Mammon, the selfish ambitions of pretended statesmen, and the sinister bigotries of race and creed. I say in the name of patriotism; for patriotism itself is necessarily personal; it is the subordination of the individual citizen to the welfare of the nation,—not the subordination of the nation to the greed, pride, vanity, or other bad passions of the individual citizen. To keep calling your own country the greatest nation on earth is not patriotism; it is vulgar, foolish boasting, and usually means that your own country is the greatest nation on earth because it has the inestimable honor of counting you among its native inhabitants.

No, the millennium of peace, fraternity, and happiness is not coming yet. But blessed is he who works for it knowing he will never see it. Let him smile at being called a fool or a fanatic. Man's head, after all, is not placed upon his neck merely to serve his belly. Evolution is a forward-looking process; the self-preservation, which is its basis of development, is that of the species rather than the individual. The friends of progress, I repeat, may smile at being called fools or fanatics by people without sense or enthusiasm. Let them think of Shakespeare's "prophetic soul of the wide world dreaming on things to come"—and rejoice in the electric touch of the Master's hand.

My readers may tell me that I am not exactly saying what they want to hear. They can read about the American and other troubles in the newspapers. They expect to hear something about myself in the Freethinker. Yes, but I also have this particular thing to impress upon them before the opportunity grows cold. Freethinkers must not despair of the triumph of peace because mankind are such combative animals. The teaching of evolution shows us that peace must win in the end. Progress in the past is the certain guarantee of progress in the future. That the process is slow only proves that it is natural. Man is a risen animal not a fallen angel. That one sentence explains everything. Understanding it, one has patience as well as ardor in the battle of humanity.

And now for the news about myself. My insomnia is the worst complication of any illness I may suffer. Influenza, for instance, gives asthma a chance of attacking me, and the insomnia renders them such aid that I have to depend on medical help for sleep. When I am free of the influenza, and have fought down the asthma, I have another battle to fight for the restoration of natural sleep. It is no joke, but I hate the idea of becoming a slave to morphia or any other drug, so I fight with the determination of winning. Well, that fight is all over again. I feel under no sort of temptation to indulge in drugs. What sleep I get is natural. It is now as good as usual. I am gaining strength daily, I am able to walk about almost as well as ever, and I hope to be soon in tolerable fighting form. I am looking forward to seeing my friends again at Queen's Hall on Whit-Sunday.

G. W. FOOTE.

The instant you assign a motive of any sort whatever for doing right, whether it be the love of God, the love of man, the approval of one's own conscience, or even the pleasure of doing right itself, you admit the principle that the question relates to the weight of motives.—"Liberty, Equality, Fraternity," Sir J. Fitzjames Stephen.

If you teach a man to keep his eyes upon what others think of him, unthinkingly to lead the life and hold the principles of the majority of his contemporaries, you must discredit in his eyes the authoritative voice of his own soul. He may be a docile citizen; he will never be a man.—Robert Louis Stevenson.

Reconstruct, it is said, before you destroy. But you must destroy in order to reconstruct. The old husk of dead faith is pushed off by the growth of living beliefs below. But how can they grow unless they find distinct utterance; and how can they be distinctly uttered without condemning the doctrines which they are to replace? The truth cannot be asserted without denouncing the falsehood. Pleasant as the process might be of announcing the truth and leaving the falsehood to decay of itself, it cannot be carried into practice.—Leslie Stephen, "Essays in Freethinking and Plain Speaking."

Christian Apologetics.

III.—IGNATIUS AND POLYCARP.

THE last two "apostolic fathers" are Ignatius and Polycarp. These I will notice in the order given.

On December 13, A.D. 115, the city of Antioch suffered from the shocks of an earthquake, and many of the houses were thrown down. The emperor Trajan, who was then in the city, very narrowly escaped injury. These shocks were believed by the Pagan population to be a visitation from heaven, and soon the cry "The Christians to the lions!" resounded through the city. Trajan was not a persecutor of the Christians; but in this instance he gave way to the popular desire. Ignatius, the bishop of the Christian church there was arrested, and on December 20 was thrown to the wild beasts in the amphitheatre, to appease the anger of the gods. His bones were afterwards collected by some of his church, and buried in the city. The ablest and most learned critics, who have investigated the circumstances connected with this martyrdom, are agreed upon the foregoing points, among whom are Volkmar, Hilgenfeld, Baur, Davidson, and Scholten.

Now, many years later, some pious Christians placed in circulation the story that Ignatius, after being sentenced to "the lions," was sent to Rome in the custody of ten Roman soldiers, to be cast to the wild beasts there. During this journey, though a prisoner and closely guarded, he is said to have found time to write seven long epistles to different churches, and also to receive visits from friends. Though chained to his guards, he had apparently perfect freedom, and was supplied with writing materials and granted time to compose and write the ninety chapters contained in the seven epistles. To the church at Rome, for instance, he writes, among a heap of other nonsense:—

> "I write to the churches, and impress on them all that I shall willingly die for God, unless ye hinder me. .....I am the wheat of God, and let me be ground by the teeth of the wild beasts, that I may be found the pure bread of Christ.....May I enjoy the wild beasts that are prepared for me; and I pray they may be found eager to rush upon me, which also I will entice to devour me speedily," etc.

In these epistles, too, are found dogmatic teaching and views of church government of a more advanced character than were held in his days. He says, for instance, to the Christians of Smyrna: "He who honors the bishop has been honored by God: he who does anything without the knowledge of the bishop serves the Devil." In another epistle he says: "Let all reverence deacons as Jesus Christ, of whose place they are the keepers." It was also said that Ignatius became bishop of Antioch in A.D. 98, and suffered martyrdom in A.D. 107.

Coming now to the so-called Ignatian Epistles, there are no less than fifteen extant which profess to have been written by this martyr: but only seven are now considered genuine by any critic. It is thus admitted by all that eight Ignatian letters which have come down to our day were the work of pious forgers. Next, of the seven epistles which are held by Christian advocates to be genuine, there are two versions—a long one, and a very much shorter one—and both versions are in Greek and Latin. Of these, rational critics are of opinion that the longer epistles are simply interpolated versions of the shorter ones. Moreover, in the year 1845 Dr. Cureton published three still shorter Epistles, written in Syriac, which had been discovered not long before. Upon examination it has been found that all the quotations of the "fathers" up to the fourth century are contained in these three shorter Syriac epistles—thus pointing to the fact that the seven long epistles and four of the short ones in Greek and Latin are likewise forgeries. But when we consider the circumstances under which the Epistles profess to have been written, we are compelled to put them all down as forgeries, written many years after the martyrdom.

The idea of a long journey to Rome, after being condemned by Trajan at Antioch—for that the sentence was passed during a visit of the emperor to that city is not denied by anyone—is in every way perfectly ridiculous. There were both amphitheatre and wild beasts at Antioch. Trajan would himself be a witness of the races, combats, and the martyrdom. No purpose could be served by sending Ignatius to Rome; while the Antiochians would not, without protest, allow themselves to be deprived of a spectacle that was relished by all in that gladiatorial age. Only a crack-brained Christian forger could have originated the Christian story and have concocted the Ignatian Epistles. The story was fabricated to give countenance to the Letters. Hence, since Ignatius is said to have been a bishop for nine years, his episcopate would date from A.D. 106 to 115.

Polycarp is said to have been bishop of Smyrna in Asia Minor for some unknown period preceding the year A.D. 165, at which date he is stated to have suffered martyrdom at the stake. This event is recorded in the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius (A.D. 325), and in the Paschal Chronicle (A.D. 630): both compiled from pre-existing documents not now extant. An account of the martyrdom is given in an encyclical letter purporting to be from the church of Smyrna to the catholic churches generally. At the end of the letter it is stated that the martyrdom took place on the second day of the month Xanthicus, the seventh before the kalends of May (April 25), Philip of Tralles being Asiarch, and Statius Quadratus proconsul. Eusebius says in his "Chronicle" that Statius filled the office of proconsul—which was an annual one—in the sixth year of Marcus Aurelius (i.e., A.D. 165—166). The latter statement is thus in agreement with the History of Eusebius and the Paschal Chronicle.

Notwithstanding the latter fact, the great Christian apologist, Dr. Lightfoot, has made strenuous efforts to place this event at an earlier date, and, with the assistance of a wiseacre named Waddington and several unwarranted assumptions and baseless conjectures, he has fixed it at A.D. 155. But, I need scarcely say, that until some real historical evidence is forthcoming, I shall adhere to the date given by Eusebius and the Paschal Chronicle. The reason why Christian advocates endeavor to push back the dates of the earliest known Christian writers is obvious. These writings usually contain passages from a primitive Gospel, which our apologists assert were the present canonical evangels. Hence, by placing the writings as far back as possible, and by asserting that the writers quoted "freely from memory" from the canonical Gospels, the latter are apparently proved to be in existence in much earlier times than was actually the case.

Speaking of Polycarp, the early apologist Irenæus (A.D. 185) says in his work on Heresies:—

> "But Polycarp was not only instructed by apostles and conversed with many who had seen Christ, but was also, by apostles in Asia, appointed bishop of the church in Smyrna; whom I also saw in my early youth.....He it was who, coming to Rome in the time of Anicetus, caused many to turn away from the aforesaid heretics to the Church of God" (Her. iii., iii., 4).

From the foregoing it will be seen that Polycarp was in Rome some time during the episcopate of Anicetus (A.D. 156—168). How does Dr. Lightfoot, who places his martyrdom in 155, get over that fact? Oh, very easily. That distinguished apologist was light of hand as well as light of foot, and so took the liberty of altering A.D. 166 into A.D. 154, thus giving Polycarp time to go to Rome in 154 and return to Smyrna to suffer martyrdom in 155.

What Irenæus says about Polycarp being "instructed by apostles" and made bishop "by apostles" is, of course, untrue. We have to look at the following dates: A.D. 28 and A.D. 165. In A.D. 28 the apostles were men, and probably as old as their teacher—thirty years. None of them would be likely to be living (or teaching) after the age of ninety—i.e., after A.D. 88. In A.D. 165 Polycarp's life was cut short by martyrdom, though he is said to have then been an old man. Placing his age at martyrdom at eighty-five, then he would have been born in A.D. 80 —that is to say, he would have been eight years old when the last apostle died. Now, teachers of religion in those days did not give instruction to children, but to men: neither did the early Christian teachers appoint little boys of eight to be bishops of Christian churches; they chose mature or elderly men who had long been in the church, and possessed the confidence of their fellow-churchmen.

The Letter narrating the martyrdom of Polycarp contains twenty-two paragraphs, from which I make three short extracts, merely to show the character of second century Christian "history."

> "Now as Polycarp was entering into the stadium, there came to him a voice from heaven, saying, 'Be strong, and show thyself a man, O Polycarp.'" — "When he had pronounced his 'Amen,' and so finished his prayer, those who were appointed for the purpose kindled the fire. And as the flames blazed forth in great fury, we to whom it was given to witness it, beheld a great miracle, and have been preserved that we might report to others what then took place. For the fire shaping itself into the form of an arch, like the sail of a ship when filled with the wind, encompassed as by a circle the body of the martyr. And he appeared within, not like flesh which is burnt, but as bread that is baked, or as gold or silver glowing in a furnace." — "At length when those wicked men perceived that his body could not be consumed by the fire, they commanded an executioner to go near, and pierce him through with a dagger. And in doing this, there came forth a dove and a great quantity of blood, so that the fire was extinguished. And all the people wondered that there should be such a difference between the unbelievers and the elect, of whom this most admirable Polycarp was one, having in our own times been an apostolic teacher, and bishop of the catholic church which is in Smyrna" (par. ix., xv., xvi.).

A portion of this Letter is given by Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History (iv. 15). The Letter is chiefly of value as showing the kind of legends that were in circulation among the Christians of the second century, as well as the excessive credulity of that age. Polycarp was an orthodox and devout Christian, as may be seen by the following passage in his extant Epistle:—

> "For whosoever does not confess that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is Antichrist; and whosoever does not confess the testimony of the cross is of the Devil; and whosoever perverts the oracles of the Lord to his own lusts, and says that there is neither a resurrection nor a judgment, he is the first-born of Satan" (par. vii.).

There is the true Christian ring about this, which is not easily mistaken. Those who do not recognise it should go and listen to some of the Christian Evidence fraternity anathematising more moral, rational, and better informed men than themselves in some of the London parks.

From this brief examination of the "apostolic fathers" we find that not one of the five individuals, so called, lived in apostolic times, and that all their writings were composed in the second century. We also find that the production of those writings was in every case, save one, connected with lying, misrepresentation, and fraud—which primitive Christian characteristics plainly indicate how the Gospel stories originated.

ABRACADABRA.

Puff and Bluff.

A FRIEND of mine recently sent me a copy of the Lancaster Observer of March 27, with a marked leading article the title of which puzzled me not a little. The article was headed "Two Philosopher Heroes." The combination seemed to upset all my previous notions of classification. I was acquainted, of course, with the names of a few philosophers, such as Kant, and Schopenhauer, and Mill, and Spencer. And I had read of the heroes of a thousand battles in days of yore, and also of the modern hero of Mafeking, and that other hero whose immortality will ever be linked with that soul-stirring song, "The Cock o' the North." But two heroic philosophers, or philosophic heroes, who on earth could they be?

There is a firm of hosiers in our northern town who trade under the style of "The Two W.'s." And as I glanced at the first paragraph of the article, I found that these philosophic heroes (or purveyors of philosophic second-hands and misfits, as I afterwards discovered) were Two B.'s. It was a curious coincidence. I ransacked my memory to try and recall two heroes whose names began with a B, but the only ones I could discover were General Blucher and General Buller; but as I had never heard their names associated with philosophy, I concluded it could not be these worthy warriors. If there were any two men to whom the title in question might be applied with any kind of fitness, they were surely the Emperor Marcus Aurelius and Julius Cæsar. Did not Longfellow say of the latter:—

> "Here was a man who could both write and fight,
> And in both was he equally skilful"?

But then the names of these two noble Romans did not begin with a B.

As I sat musing thus (my mind the while wrestling with the seeming incongruity of the heading), it occurred to me that a perusal of the article might afford some enlightenment. Then I learned that these two philosophic heroes were an Englishman and a Frenchman, who are at the present time "the centres of the world's attention." And these two brilliant luminaries, who were dazzling the eyes of the world by their philosophic exploits; this firm of "Two B.'s," who had made bankrupt the whole of modern science, whose theological and metaphysical speculations had superseded all knowledge and all research, were—Mr. Arthur Balfour and Professor Bergson.

This writer on the Observer evidently makes a third hero (although his modesty prevents him from mentioning the fact), and, curiously enough, his name also begins with a B, the title of the trio being —Balfour, Bergson, and Bunkum.

But let us sample this newspaper scribe's puff of his two philosopher heroes:—

> "Both of them are defending the ideal, as against the crude realism of the age. Both say to science, —'Your verdicts on the cosmos cannot be final, for you only deal with the relative. The absolute lies not in your province. Your discoveries are for the moment; further discoveries will make them obsolete, perhaps absurd guesses at the fundamental verities. Your work is in time and space; ours goes beyond these forms of thought to the timeless and to immortality.'"

How thankful, I thought, we all ought to be to our fellow-countryman, Arthur James Balfour. After all the wranglings of philosophers for centuries, after all the spiritual and mystical speculations of the divines, and the futile efforts of scientists to solve the riddle of the universe, it remained for our Arthur James to pronounce the final verdict on the cosmos!

It appears that Mr. Balfour has been giving the Gifford Lectures at Glasgow. Mr. Balfour's theme was Theism.

> "Not the narrow thesis of the sects, not even the common ideas of Christianity. Mr. Balfour expounds the God of Gods, the Infinite, the eternal, the ever-inscrutable. All that man has evolved of the God-idea Mr. Balfour dissects and explains. Then he synthesises these into a general concept."

If these be not the common ideas of Christianity, at least they are the common phrases that one meets in theological literature everywhere. The God of Gods, the Infinite, the eternal, the ever-inscrutable, are the stock-in-trade of every theologian. For ages they have been expounding the Divine, each according to his own fancy or the desire of his particular flock, and it may be safely predicted that Mr. Balfour's efforts will only make confusion worse confounded. Strange that the writer should think him to be better qualified to deal with the subject of Theism than all the professional representatives of Christianity. He says:—

> "Mr. Balfour is the fittest Englishman alive for this gigantic undertaking. He is a born philosopher. Politics has only been an interlude in his life. As a young man he wrote that subtle book on Philosophic Doubt. Afterwards he devoted years to psychical research. He was president of the society of that name, and he is still an officer of it, and an active researcher."

He is a born philosopher! Before ever he left the care of his wet nurse, or had cut his wisdom teeth, he began to have philosophic doubts concerning the verdicts of science. When other children were playing with their toys, he was toying quite familiarly with the Berkeleian philosophy. Long before he reached the age of twelve he could discuss with the most learned doctors of the law, and baffle them. And in his mature age he is "the centre of the world's attention." The writer continues:—

> "Mr. Balfour is a student of man, as a spiritual, mental, and corporal being. He knows how much the body affects the mind, and how the mind reacts on the body. And he is quite Spencerian in recognising the immense influence of environment on both. Thus he is fully equipped for his great task of expounding the Divine."

How Spencer's Unknowable could aid Mr. Balfour to expound the Ever-Inscrutable is one of those mysteries known only to newspaper writers like the scribe of the Observer. His eulogy of this politico-philosopher really becomes a little nauseating:—

> "Equipped with all science, steeped in all philosophies, an expert in psychology and physiology, Mr. Balfour has a further advantage—he is a religious man."

What was it Goldsmith said of the village rustics and the schoolmaster?—

> "And still their wonder grew,
> That one small head could carry all he knew."

You will notice, dear reader, the reason of all the foregoing extraordinary puff of Mr. Balfour—he is a religious man. He might, indeed, be equipped in all the sciences, and steeped in all the philosophies, and be an acknowledged expert in all departments of knowledge, but unless he possessed the further advantage of "being a religious man" he might be non-existent so far as the columns of this provincial Observer are concerned. In what way religion proves to be an advantage to a student of science or philosophy we are not informed; but to speak of it giving a man like Mr. Balfour an advantage over intellectual giants such as Mill, or Darwin, or Huxley is not only sheer bluff, it is ignorant impertinence. Religion must have fallen very low indeed when it has to rely on the wilful misrepresentations of such a newspaper leaderette writer.

It appears that all the pre-Balfourian religions required miracles and marvels to make them acceptable to the multitude.

> "The superstitious are unable to comprehend the god of inflexible law. They need miracles and marvels, and they are fully entitled to have them."

This was the most unkindest cut of all. To teach the people for ages to put their trust in a flexible God, one who works miracles and marvels for the benefit of his people, who turns live women into pillars of salt, who makes the sun to stand still, and divides the waters of the sea so that multitudes can pass through on dry land, who causes the clouds to shower down bread from heaven or withholds the rain at his pleasure—to teach the people these things as eternal truths, and then, when science has shattered such beliefs, to turn round and taunt them with being superstitious for their faith, is something more than unkind—it is heartless and cruel. If the people of Christendom are superstitious, and need miracles and marvels; if they put their faith in the tomfooleries of Lourdes or the mysterious operations of a Holy Ghost, it is because their religious pastors have taught them that these superstitions were part and parcel of revealed religion. Inflexible law is a fundamental tenet of Buddhism, but it is not and never has been part of Christianity. And neither Mr. Balfour nor any other sophist will ever convert the God of the Bible, with all his whimsicalities, into a god of inflexible law.

The superstitious need miracles, and "they are fully entitled to have them." Thus, when they want to see water turned into wine, or five thousand hungry mouths fed with only twelve barley loaves and a few small fishes; when they want to see a man walking upon the water without sinking, or ascending bodily up into the clouds; when they want to hear a talking donkey, or see a grass-eating king walking upon all-fours, the superstitious are fully entitled to witness these wonders, or have their money returned. But, look you! Mr. Balfour is not in the common religious show business. He is not competing with the Archbishop of Canterbury, who is probably the fittest Englishman alive to conduct the miracle and marvel business. Nor is he to be confounded with the swarms of religious fakirs who, under all sorts of fanciful titles, trade upon the misguided emotions of the ignorant and credulous. Mr. Balfour has an "elite following," whom he dazzles with aerial flights that require a philosophic telescope to discern the whereabouts of his movements.

Mr. Balfour's God does not reveal unto babes and sucklings what is hidden from the wise and prudent, nor does he use the foolish things of this world to confound the mighty.

> "Mr. Balfour admits that we can only know God through our personal intelligence. The fool's god cannot be that of the wise man, and per contra."

Every man's "God" is thus a reflection of his individual personal intelligence. Quite so. Mr. Balfour's god is an old gentleman of the aristocracy with philosophic doubts as to the validity of the verdicts of science, and a conviction that some kind of religion is necessary for the masses. The savage, not having any use for "a synthesis into a general concept of all that man has evolved of the God-idea," proceeds to make a god corresponding to his crude notions, out of wood or stone. John Smith, the cheesemonger, worships a god exactly corresponding to the thoughts and aspirations of—John Smith, the cheesemonger. The god of the fool (although some fools, according to the Scriptures, have repudiated this theistic insinuation as a reflection on their personal intelligence) has all the weaknesses of his devotee. Which is to say that all gods are man-made, and reflect the mental and moral characteristics of their makers. Mr. Balfour's God is, confessedly, no exception to the rule, and they are all alike useless and unprofitable.

Although this writer has so much to say concerning Mr. Balfour's God (the expression is his), when he comes to deal with M. Bergson, he never once mentions Theism in relation to the Professor's metaphysics. He is evidently conscious that between the "self-creating universe" of Bergson and the Theism of Balfour there is a great gulf fixed, and he very wisely does not attempt to bridge it. M. Bergson's verdict on the cosmos is quite at variance with that of Mr. Balfour's. And if both these philosophers say to science,—"Your verdicts on the cosmos cannot be final," we can reply to these gentlemen,—"Neither can your verdicts on the cosmos be final, since they hopelessly disagree. They are evidently only guesses, more or less absurd, at the eternal verities."

JOSEPH BRYCE.

"I followed for one week the reports of events where human life was in peril, to ascertain to whom honor was due for successful rescues, with this result: Steamer burned at sea—rescued by man, 186; by God, 0; theatre burned—saved by man, 412; by God, 0; mine exploded—rescued by man, 77; by God, 0; railroad accident—victims helped by man, 216; by God, 0. And so it goes. God renders no assistance when a Titanic goes down, or a lodging house burns, or a coal mine gets afire. God could do no less if he was dead."—Truthseeker (New York).

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was ormed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 19 SUNDAY, MAY 10, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

There can be no safety in an illogical position, and one's chances of snug quarters in eternity cannot surely be bettered by believing at one and the same moment of time self-contradictory propositions.

AUGUSTINE BIRRELL.

"The God of this World."

BIGOTRY is the very atmosphere in which the Christian religion lives and moves and has its being; and in proportion as Christians cease to be bigots the faith loses its hold upon them. The better Christian a man is the greater is his bigotry. The word "bigot" is of unknown origin, though there is something to be said for the old supposition that it is a corruption of by God, a phrase which the French, who often heard it, would easily pronounce as bigot. But, whatever the origin of the term may be, there can be no doubt whatever as to its meaning. By general consent a bigot is a fanatical and intolerant adherent of a religious creed; and of all the creeds the Christian is the one in which bigotry flourishes most luxuriously. It is impossible to be a Christian, in the New Testament sense, without being a bigot. Even the Gospel Jesus was the incarnation of bigotry. The greatest of all sins was not to believe in him. He cursed Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum simply because they turned a deaf ear to his Gospel. The Scribes and Pharisees were called all the bad names imaginable solely because they were his opponents. The moment Paul was converted he blossomed into a hot-headed fanatic to whom toleration was unknown. All who ventured to introduce the slightest variation upon the Gospel preached by him were anathematised as enemies of God and man. Unbelievers in Christ were under the dominion of "the god of this world," and, consequently, doomed to eternal damnation. He and his converts alone possessed the light of truth, while all others grovelled in the gross darkness of ignorance and sin.

Now, this attitude of Jesus and Paul has been the attitude of the orthodox Church in all ages. In the strictest sense, toleration is a Christian vice, while persecution is exalted into a high virtue. Between the Church and the world there cannot possibly be any fellowship, because the former is a temple of the living God while the latter must be characterised as a synagogue of Satan. In other words, the Church belongs to God and the world to the Devil. With what delightful self-complacency Christians are in the habit of saying, "We know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in the evil one." Well do we remember the time when Church membership was regarded as essential to salvation, and when to be cut off from it, for any reason, meant to be separated from Christ and driven back into the world of lost souls. We children did not quite know what and where the world was, but we profoundly dreaded it as a God-forsaken and accursed region. Indeed, only the other day, the Rev. John Hutton, of Glasgow, who is now hailed as an authoritative voice in the Free Churches, boldly declared that "the whole nature and principles of the world are opposed to that kingdom of God which Christ came to found." This is doubtless true, but it by no means follows, on that account, that the nature and principles of the world are to be morally condemned. We hold that the world is opposed to the kingdom of God, not because it is wicked, but because that kingdom fails to meet its requirements. At this point Mr. Hutton seriously misrepresents Paul's teaching. The apostle does not say that "if our Gospel is hid, it is hid to them that are drifting away from the serious aspect and view of life." What he does say is this:—

> "If our Gospel is veiled, it is veiled in them that are perishing; in whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of the unbelieving, that the light of the Gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God, should not dawn upon them" (2 Cor. iv. 3, 4).

In Paul's estimation, no aspect and view of life, however honest and serious, could be of any avail apart from Christ. As a preacher of the Gospel, his supreme point was that salvation can be realised, not by character, not by morality, not by good works, but by faith alone. No matter how valuable a member of society a man may be, or with what earnestness he may devote himself to the promotion of human welfare, he is yet eternally lost until he accepts and relies upon the finished work of Christ. What the world lacks is, not "a serious aspect and view of life," not simplicity and sincerity of heart, but trust in the redeeming blood of the Cross. The Pauline Gospel, as stated in the Epistles, is intelligible though false, but as expounded by Mr. Hutton it is unintelligible as well as false.

Let us calmly examine this point. The contention is that the people of the world are blind to all the higher things. Paul maintains that this blindness is due to the active interference of the Devil; but Mr. Hutton accounts for it thus:—

> "The Apostle says there is an eye of the soul, and that fragile, delicate, but most authentic organ, whereby man perceives and knows God, like the eyeball of the natural eye, may be veiled over with a tissue of coarsened fibre.....The delicate mechanism of the soul by which we apprehend the unseen and communicate with God may, through neglect or misuse, lose its power, so that the whole world to which our souls at one time lay open may shrink and retreat, until as a basis for—the supreme concern of—a man's life it ceases to exist."

Here the reverend gentleman builds wholly upon a pure assumption. Of the soul we know absolutely nothing, not even that it exists. Consequently, the eye of the soul exists only in the preacher's imagination. It follows from this that the spiritual world, which it is claimed the soul apprehends and has intercourse with, is as hypothetical as the soul itself. But this gift of spiritual vision is a false inference from a baseless assumption. The vision at best as at worst is an illusion, a will-o'-the-wisp, into which mere belief often transforms itself. Vision invariably grows out of belief, but belief never out of vision. There is a legend that the disciple Thomas disbelieved in the resurrection of the Master, and gave vigorous expression to his unbelief. Soon, however, the Lord appeared and invited the Sceptic to inspect him carefully, and when he saw and recognised him Thomas exclaimed, "My Lord and my God." Then "Jesus saith unto him, Because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed; blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed."

That blessedness may be claimed by all Christians, who believe and imagine that they see, but who never see first, and then believe.

Mr. Hutton asserts that non-Christians "are dedeprived of something," and we agree with him. They are deprived of many illusions, doubts, and fears. "They do not see certain things." True; but they do not see them because they are not visible except to believers, which is the strongest possible argument against their reality. Mr. Hutton is of opinion that not to see such imaginary things "is the awful penalty," but we regard it as the reward, of unbelief. To our mind "the awful penalty" is to believe in things of whose existence there is no evidence. Piling on the agony, the reverend gentleman adds that they who "do not see certain things" are tremendous losers—"they lose that without which life is not worth living"; but this is a bare-faced bearing of false witness against countless myriads of people. Mr. Hutton knows full well that in this country alone there are many thousands of unbelievers who find life pre-eminently worth living. Do our scientists live in vain, though the overwhelming majority of them "do not see certain things"? Were Herbert Spencer, Charles Darwin, John Tyndall, and Thomas Huxley, while they lived, merely "doing time," with no other object than to wear out their boots? Only the blindest, most inveterate bigotry could so characterise the lives of such great, bold, and noble thinkers. Who is Mr. Hutton that he should thus sit in judgment upon men incalculably his superiors? It is true that unbelievers do not see that "the world of God's intention is moving towards some wonderful thing from which" they shall be excluded; but has such a vision been vouchsafed to this oracular pulpit orator? We venture to affirm that he knows absolutely nothing, either of God or the world of his intention. Surely, if there were a God, the world of his intention would be identical with the world of his actual creation. He would not make one world while intending another.

We rejoice exceedingly that we do not see certain things. We do not see the dawning of Christ upon the world for two valid reasons; first, that if Christ were a reality it would be an insufferable insult to him to say that, after two thousand years, he is only just dawning upon the world; and secondly because, as a matter of fact, Christ is not at the dawn of his career, but at the evening twilight. He has had his day, such as it was, and the world is now turning its back upon him. It is false to say that he ever won Europe. Europe never wanted him; he was thrust upon her by force; and the man who began the job was one of the worst men that ever sat upon a throne. No, Europe never desired Christ, and she is now gradually getting rid of him. Neither do we see God, for the simple reason that we are convinced there is no God to see. Life largely becomes what we take it for. It more or less comes round to our way of looking at things. We do take the view that we are in the world to have a good time, to have our way, and see that we get it. And after all said and done, is not Mr. Hutton here for the same purpose? Is he not having a very good time just now? But we do not believe in having a good time at the expense of a terribly bad time for some other people. We believe rather in being happy by doing our utmost to promote happiness all around us. No true man can ever have a thoroughly good time when his neighbors are being crushed down by injustice and greed, unless he is doing his best to destroy injustice and greed by fostering the sense of universal brotherhood.

The God of this world is not a superhuman being called the Devil, but, at bottom, the spirit of goodwill and fairplay. It is a fair, sweet goddess in whom we believe, and her name is Reason. As yet, she is not seated upon her throne, but her feet are on the steps, and her ascent is nearer completion today than it ever was before. As soon as she begins to wield the sceptre with consummate authority, superstition, which is the cause of all bigotry, shall wither away; and with the disappearance of the Fables of the Above shall come into happy force the Facts of the Around.

J. T. LLOYD.

Christianity and Politics.

THE emergence of the religious preacher in the political field is at once the most sinister and the most encouraging of present-day events. It is encouraging because it is a confession of the truth that the purely religious appeal is losing ground. The preacher who keeps strictly to religion finds either a dwindling body of listeners or has to select them from the admittedly least enlightened portion. Others tell him with almost brutal frankness that his message lacks reality; that people cannot be interested in their souls while their bodies are in a state of semi-starvation or while the social environment makes for material degradation. Preachers confess quite openly that under present conditions hell has lost its terrors and heaven its attractions; and they add that if religion is to maintain its hold on people, it must show itself capable of dealing with matters that really interest the man of to-day. And what interests the more thoughtful men and women of to-day is not religion.

So far the phenomenon is encouraging. But it has also its sinister aspect. For even though the parson may be in politics, he is not of it. His work in church or chapel is the promotion of sectarian influence and interests. And his work in Parliament or on the political platform is still the promotion of sectarian influence and interests. The object is the same; the method of achieving it has changed. His outlook on life is bounded by his sect; his point of view remains that of the religious advocate sworn to subordinate everything to the religious interest. To realise this one need only consider the attitude of Nonconformist leaders in the House of Commons on the question of education, or the recent Sunday Closing Bill introduced into the House of Lords by the Bishop of London. They talk largely of other things—of sobriety, of social justice, of morality, etc.; but it is the religious interest that bulks largest in their minds, and which determines action. They would, if they could, make politics a department of religion; and if this cannot be done, they will at least infect it with the religious temper.

It may be said that the clergy always have been in politics, more or less, and have always influenced the course of political events. And this is quite true. But there is an important distinction between things as they were and as they are. So long as right religious belief is avowedly a question of national concern, the interference of the clergy will at least be open, and people will submit to it with open eyes. If they subordinate other things to religion, it is done consciously, and because they believe it right that things should be so. To-day this interference is not open. It is masked in a thousand-and-one ways. Support is asked for on social and ethical grounds, and is given in the belief that social and ethical reform is being accomplished. And the support, once gained, is used to bolster up religious pretensions. How much support—to take only one instance—would the bald principle of Sabbatarianism gain if preached to-day? It is probable that a majority even of religionists are against it. But by confusing this with various ethical and social considerations—the need for rest, for leisure time in which to cultivate character, etc.—people are induced to oppose the rationalising of the day of rest, and thus play into the hands of the priesthood. And not only play into the hands of the priesthood, but give this class a position of power and importance in the social and political world that it would not otherwise have.

The real question that lies behind all these tricks and turns of the political parson is that of the place of religious belief in the modern State. Is religion a mere hypothesis, to be held as one may hold a theory concerning the habitancy of Mars or the origin of language? Or is it something vital to the wellbeing of the State—vital in the sense that no government can neglect it without impairing social efficiency? The very raising of the question is indicative of the decline of the power of religion. In primitive societies religion and sociology are one. Although essentially connected with another world, and with an order of beings other than human, religious belief is so powerful in early times that it colors social life in all directions, and determines the form of all social institutions. Under such conditions there can be no question as to the place of religion in the State. Its place is determined by the universal belief that to displease the tribal gods brings inevitable disaster. In this way religion becomes closely associated with every aspect of ethical and social life, and the association is maintained for so long that the ordinary mind finds it impossible to conceive their separation. Even to-day we find this to be the case in a very large number of instances; although if one carefully analyses the reasons given for the retention of the alliance, we find the real basis to be none other than the fact that religion always has more or less controlled social institutions.

But the growth of knowledge and of the social consciousness offer a fatal obstacle to the power of religion. It must be remembered that in the true sense of the word there is no such thing as growth in religion. What is called such is sheer delusion. To reduce the number of the gods from many to a few, and from a few to one, is not growth. To limit their functions from those of a direct, particular, and universal character to an indirect and general character is not growth. To refine the idea of a personal deity until it becomes the conception of a mere abstract force is not growth. All these are modifications of the religious idea under pressure of advancing knowledge—so many attempts to state religion in such a way that it can conflict with nothing we know to be true because it answers to nothing of which we are certain. The growth of man is not in religion, but out of it. He becomes less and less concerned with his gods as he becomes more conversant with the true nature of the forces moulding life.

The consequence of this is, as I have said, that we are all driven, sooner or later, to face the question of the place of religion in the State. And to the modern mind, only one of two positions is logically possible. Either we must direct social affairs from the point of view of religious beliefs, or we must judge religious beliefs from the point of view of social requirements. Either a theocracy or an atheocracy. The first is that which the political parson is really fighting for, although he lacks the courage to say so openly. And it is the one that religionists must fight for. So long as men believe that religion is the supremely important thing in life, they are bound to subordinate everything else to it. More; if right living is really dependent upon sound religious belief, if Atheism is—as only a few now say, but as many apparently believe—a growth that threatens social well-being, then the State as a whole has as much justification for enforcing right religious belief as it has for spending public money and using public resources on education. The State can only ignore this obligation on the assumption that it really does not matter what a man believes in religion. It is of no vital consequence. The normal forces of social life are by themselves adequate to social well-being and national progress.

Moreover, the practical evils that follow the attempts to regulate social life in accordance with religions are obvious. Jew hunts, witch-burnings, heresy hunts, persecution in all its forms, social division in its bitterest aspects, have been the fruits of allowing religion to control life. It is not true, as many Nonconformists assert, that religious persecution has to be placed to the credit of the State. Quite to the contrary, the State has invariably been the peace-making partner in the combination. It is the religious influence that has forced persecution upon the State, because to the deeply religious man the heretic, the "blasphemer," was a social plague spot, a centre of contamination, the source of innumerable evils. And, granted the truth of the Christian religion, I, as a heretic, agree with him.

The second position, that we judge religious beliefs from the point of view of social welfare, is the more powerful one, and it is fatal to all forms of religion. For just as soon as people begin to discuss religions from this point of view, they begin to realise that there is not one of the functions of social life that cannot proceed as well without religion as with it. If people can be honest, truthful, just, loyal, good husbands, parents, and citizens, without religion, what justification can there be for the maintenance of huge religious organisations that involve the expenditure of millions of money and the withdrawal from productive pursuits of an army of men who might be otherwise employed? To say that there are still many who need the exercise of religion if they are to be good citizens, only—to use Sir Edward Carson's phrases—passes sentence of death with a stay of execution. It is saying that religion is necessary to socially undeveloped characters. And that is also saying that so soon as these have reached the level of development achieved by the Freethinker, the need for religion will be gone.

It is, indeed, the appeal to utility that is largely responsible for the decay of religion with the general public. The very appeal to utility by believers was, as Mill pointed out, evidence that they were doubtful about its truth. And its use proved it to be a two-edged weapon. To the Freethinker's charge that Christianity was not true, the believer retorted that anyway it was useful, and pointed to the good work done by Christians, the institutions founded by them, etc. The Freethinker did not decline the challenge. He met the Christian on his own ground. He pointed out, in the first place, that the plea was one-sided. It counted the good done by believers, and which was assumed to be the fruit of their belief, and said nothing of the evil which could be clearly shown to be the outcome of religious conviction. In the second place, the Freethinker pointed out that good works are not the fruits of the Christian life exclusively, and, therefore, Christianity cannot be credited with their existence. A Christian is not only a Christian. He is a human being, sharing in all the qualities that result from generations of social life. His Christianity is not something anterior to these qualities, they are merely added to them as the consequence of a sheer environmental accident.

This last sentence expresses what will be to some—and ought to be to all—a commonplace. And yet the whole discussion hinges on its appreciation. For it means that hitherto Christianity has gained credit by a sheer exploitation of human nature. It has claimed credit for that which belongs to humanity. It still does so. The political parson who gives us a sociology with a religious label, who appeals to our sense of truth, or justice, or beauty, on the grounds of religion is still engaged in an exploitation of human qualities in the interests of supernaturalism. The trick has succeeded in the past, and it still succeeds with many in the present. But there can be no question of its ultimate failure. Art and science have now shaken themselves completely free from religious control, and claims independency and self-sufficiency. It is only a question of time for sociology and ethics to achieve a like emancipation. Religion will then be seen in its true nature as a pure supernaturalism that has too long been allowed to obstruct sane views of nature and of man.

Primitive Man.

"The savage is a human document, a record of man's efforts to raise himself above the level of the beast. It is only of late years that the full value of the document has been appreciated; indeed, many people are probably still of Dr. Johnson's opinion, who, pointing to the three large volumes of Voyages to the South Seas, which had just come out, said: 'Who will read them through? A man had better work his way before the mast than read them through; they will be eaten by rats and mice before they are read through. There can be little entertainment in such books; one set of savages is like another.'*

"But the world has learned a good deal since Dr. Johnson's day; and the records of savage life, which the sage of Bolt-court consigned without scruple to the rats and mice, have now their place amongst the most precious archives of humanity."—J. G. FRAZER, Psyche's Task (1913), p. 173.

"There can be no doubt that Darwin's theory ignores a personal Creator, and his direct interference in the transformation and creation of species, there being no sphere of action for such a being.....Even man is neither a distinct creature, formed in a special manner, and differently from all other animals, nor provided with a special soul and endowed with a divine breath of life—he is only the highest product of a progressive selection, and descends from the simious [ape-like] group standing next to man."—CARL VOGT, Lectures on Man (1864), p. 449.

ACCORDING to the Bible, God created man perfect, and placed him in the Garden of Eden; but through disobedience—in the matter of eating forbidden fruit—he fell from his perfect state and commenced to degenerate. Luther said, "Since Adam's fall men see nothing, and are stupider than beasts"; and declared, "If Adam's fall had not spoilt us, we should have had no care either. We should have lived without pain, in possession of all kinds of knowledge, and have passed from time into eternity without feeling of death."† John Wesley held the same opinion, and, in fact, it was the belief of all Christians before Charles Darwin shattered it with his Descent of Man. Even to-day the majority of Christians give assent to this view, especially among those circles where the light of science has failed to penetrate.

But, as Professor Frazer remarks, science "assumes that civilisation has always and everywhere been evolved out of savagery. The mass of evidence on which this assumption rests is, in my opinion, so great as to render the induction incontrovertible."‡

As the great geologist, Sir Charles Lyell, pointed out,—

> "had the original stock of mankind been really endowed with such superior intellectual powers, and with inspired knowledge, and possessed the same improvable nature as their posterity, the point of advancement which they would have reached ere this would have been immeasurably higher."

Since the immense period of time that has elapsed since man co-existed with the extinct animals, with whose remains his own have been found, continues Lyell:—

> "During those ages there would have been time for progress, of which we can scarcely form a conception, and very different would have been the character of the works of art which we should now be endeavoring to interpret."

Instead of the rudest pottery or flint tools, so irregular in form as to cause the unpractised eye to doubt whether they afford unmistakable evidence of design, we should be finding sculptures, lines of buried railways or electric telegraphs, astronomical instruments and microscopes of more advanced construction than any found in Europe. "Still farther," continues Lyell,—

> "would the triumphs of inventive genius be found to have been carried, when the later deposits, now assigned to the age of bronze and iron, were formed. Vainly should we be straining our imagination to guess the possible uses and meaning of such relics—machines, perhaps, for navigating the air or exploring the depths of the ocean, or for calculating arithmetical problems, beyond the wants or even the conceptions of living mathematicians."§

The older the geological strata in which the remains of ancient man are found, the more rough and rude are the implements he used. If, then, man evolved from the animal world, our best means of getting some knowledge of our earliest ancestors would be by the study of those primitive races now in existence, whose intellectual development has been arrested, and who represent an earlier stage of evolution which the higher races have passed through and left behind. And this is why scientists are so interested in the study of these primitive races, and scientific expeditions are continually being sent to out-of-the-way places where these surviving representatives of primitive life are to be found untouched by our civilisation.

It may be said—it is said—by old-fashioned opponents of evolution who still believe the Bible account of the original perfection of man, that thousands of years before Christ the Egyptians and Babylonians were highly civilised races, living in great cities and building immense palaces, temples, and tombs for their kings and priests. Therefore, these early men were highly civilised.

This is true. Professor Flinders Petrie, a great authority, who has himself made many important discoveries during his excavations in these countries, places the beginning of Egyptian civilisation at from 9,000 to 10,000 years ago.† And even so conservative a critic as the Rev. Professor Sayce quotes with approval the estimate given by Professor Hilprecht for the founding of the Babylonian Temple of Bel, "somewhere between 6,000 and 7,000 B.C.; possibly earlier.‡ That is nearly 8,000 or 9,000 years ago.

But, if the archæologists have traced the civilisation of man back to 10,000 years, the geologists have traced the existence of man back, not for thousands, or tens of thousands, but for hundreds of thousands of years! The last few years have brought to light astonishing evidences of man's antiquity, to deal with which would require a separate series of articles. Suffice it to say that so careful and cautious an authority as Professor Keith, in his Ancient Types of Man (p. 102) says:—

> "We know now that the men who lived in Europe during the earlier and greater part of the Glacial period—one estimated to have extended over a period of from 500,000 to 1,500,000 years—were of the Neanderthal type."

This was written in 1911; and the same authority, lecturing to the Royal Dublin Society, last March, on the newly discovered Piltdown skull, which he does not hesitate to place in the Pliocene formation, believes it reveals a history for man "beyond the wildest guess or dream of the most speculative philosophers."§ Sir Ray Lankester is also a believer in the existence of Pliocene man‖.

The beginnings of civilisation are but of yesterday compared with the immense period of time man has been in existence, and those far-away places where the savage still exists untouched by civilisation may be compared to those small islands in the Pacific Ocean, far from the mainland, like Juan Fernandez—the island dear to our boyhood as the home of Robinson Crusoe—where plants are still growing which have disappeared on the mainland, crushed out in the struggle for existence. A naturalist who recently visited the island of Juan Fernandez tells us "It is as if one had been carried back to past geological periods, as if one walked about in a living museum, crowded with rare specimens."¶ So the savage belongs to a past order of things that was once universal. And that is why science takes such an interest in him, and sends out expeditions to remote and, to ordinary people, inaccessible places, to record his manners and customs, language, superstitions—if any—and modes of thought.

But, as Professor Frazer points out, no existing race of savages can be compared absolutely with the earliest representatives of man; savages "are not primitive by comparison with truly primæval man, that is, with man as he was when he first emerged from the purely bestial stage of existence," for, as he says, all the evidence goes to show—

> "that every existing race of men, the rudest as well as the most civilised, has reached its present level of culture, whether it be high or low, only after a slow and painful progress upwards, which must have extended over many thousands, perhaps millions, of years."*

For instance, no race of savages has yet been discovered without a language—although some of them are very rudimentary, as we shall see—none without stone or wooden weapons or utensils, none without the art of making a fire. No wild animals have ever attained to either of these accomplishments, and probably untold ages passed in acquiring, and improving upon, these arts, and every child that is born has to be taught these things, as he does not bring the knowledge of them with him.

So, again, from the child we can learn a great deal about the thoughts and ideas of primitive man. Many travellers have compared savages to grown-up children. Children have to be taught to reason and think properly—some even then do it very poorly—but the savage is never taught—or, rather, never educated—he grows up thinking the thoughts of a child.

Christian Apologetics.

IV.—IRENÆUS.

IRENÆUS became bishop of Lyons in the year A.D. 178, and some years later—about A.D. 185 or 186—wrote a book in five parts "Against Heresies." It is from this work we derive the evidence which that bishop bears to persons and writings before, and up to, his days—including the canonical Gospels and their writers. Copies of this great book were in the hands of nearly all the so-called "Christian fathers" who succeeded Irenæus, for several centuries. Hence, everything relating to the Gospels or the apostles contained in this bishop's book we find repeated by later writers, who now and again name Irenæus as their authority, as does Eusebius, for instance; but, in the majority of cases, the statements are copied as undoubted historical facts, without mention of the source. Prior to the time of Irenæus, we hear only of the existence of the Pauline Epistles, the Book of Revelation, and a primitive "Gospel," though we know that all four of the canonical Gospels were written nearly thirty years before the time he wrote. This may be accounted for by the fact that each of the canonical Gospels, being supposed to be merely a revised copy of the primitive Gospel, was at first used only in the church to which the canonical reviser belonged; but that after a decade or two all four became known to the other churches, and, being found to be a decided improvement on the primitive Gospel, came into general use. Irenæus is the earliest writer who names our present Gospels. He says:—

> "Matthew also issued a written Gospel among the Hebrews in their own language, while Peter and Paul were preaching at Rome and laying the foundation of the church there. After their decease Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, delivered to us in writing what had been preached by Peter. Luke also, the companion of Paul, recorded in a book the gospel preached by him. Afterwards John, the disciple of the Lord, who had leaned upon his breast, did himself publish a Gospel during his residence at Ephesus in Asia" (Her. iii., i., 1).

The testimony of Irenæus is unquestionable as to the existence of the four canonical Gospels in his day; but what he says about each proves conclusively that he did not know anything about the writers. In the first place, if Matthew wrote his Gospel when "Peter and Paul were preaching at Rome," he did not write a Gospel at all: for Peter and Paul never went together to Rome, and never preached and founded a church there. If we turn to Gal. ii. 11—14, we find that in consequence of Peter's dissimulation at Antioch, Paul in righteous indignation "resisted him to the face," and denounced his conduct before the whole church. Up to this time—about twenty years after Paul's conversion—neither Peter nor Paul had visited Rome; and after this public rebuke, Peter would certainly not desire to go there with Paul, nor indeed anywhere else in that fearless preacher's company. Moreover, from Gal. ii. 7 we learn that an agreement had been made between Paul and the apostolic party that Paul should confine his preaching to the Gentiles, while Peter kept to the Jews—which arrangement appears to have been carried out. To the apostolic party Paul was an interloper, who preached their new religion unasked, and received Gentiles as converts without requiring circumcision or the observance of the Mosaic laws. Instead of fraternising with him, they withstood him, and denounced him as a false apostle. In the time of Irenæus there were several apocryphal writings in circulation relating to Peter and Paul, in one of which—"The Travels of Peter and Paul"—the two were represented as travelling together to Rome, where they preached and founded a church, and afterwards suffered martyrdom. This was the source of Irenæus's statement respecting Peter and Paul at Rome. It was also from three of these apocryphal writings that Luke compiled the canonical "Acts of the Apostles"—which book is, of course, unhistorical.

Irenæus's statements respecting Matthew and Mark were derived from a book written by Papias, bishop of Hierapolis (A.D. 140—150), which work he names and quotes from. The statement of Papias was as follows:—

> (1) "Matthew composed the Sayings in the Hebrew language, and everyone translated them as best he could."
> (2) "Mark, having become the interpreter of Peter, wrote down accurately what he remembered [of Peter's preaching].....but with no intention of giving a regular narrative of the Lord's sayings. Wherefore Mark made no mistake in thus writing some things as he remembered them. For of one thing he took especial care, not to omit anything he had heard, and not to put anything fictitious into the narratives."

It will here be seen that no claim is made for "inspiration" on behalf of Matthew or Mark. As regards the latter, we are to suppose that Peter went about narrating all the sayings and incidents contained in Mark's Gospel, and that Mark remembered them all accurately—so accurately, in fact, that some of them are in verbal agreement with Matthew, and many others in verbal agreement with Luke.

But how came Papias to know the circumstances he has stated about Matthew and Mark? Well, he says he was told so by a presbyter of his acquaintance named John. As a matter of fact, we do not know that he ever saw either of the writings he mentions; neither do we know that he had ever heard of the Gospel of Luke or John—which he has not named. Eusebius, writing with Papias' book before him, says (Eccl. Hist. iii., 39):—

> "Papias asserts that he had heard in person Aristion and the presbyter John, and mentions them frequently by name.....He has set down many things as coming to him from unwritten tradition, amongst these some strange parables and instructions of the Savior, and some other things of a more fabulous nature.....He moreover relates other narratives of the Lord's sayings given by Aristion, and traditions received from the > presbyter John.....He also gives the story of a woman who was accused of many sins before the Lord, which is found in the Gospel according to the Hebrews."

From the foregoing it appears evident that Papias had never seen any of the canonical Gospels. He had but a Greek translation of the primitive Nazarene Gospel, to which he had added a large number of apocryphal stories and sayings, some of which even Eusebius recognised as "fabulous." In mentioning Matthew and Mark as evangelists, Irenæus, of course, referred to Matthew the apostle, and to an apostolic Mark—respecting whom nothing certain is known. Moreover, the fact of Mark being stated to have been "the interpreter of Peter" is a proof that Papias and his two friends, Aristion and John, had never seen the "Acts of the Apostles"; for in that book Peter is said to have been filled with the Holy Ghost, which gave him power to speak every known language—whence he would not need the services of an interpreter.

Neither had Papias seen our present Gospel of Matthew: this is evident from what he says of "Judas the traitor." The latter personage is purely mythical. Had the "chief priests" desired to arrest Jesus at night, they had only to commission one of their spies or servants to follow him. The New Testament accounts of the death of Judas are the following:—

> Matt. xxvii. 3—8.—"Then Judas.....cast down the pieces of silver.....and he went away and hanged himself.....And the chief priests took the pieces of silver .....and bought with them the potter's field, to bury strangers in."
> Acts i. 18.—Judas "obtained a field with the reward of his iniquity; and falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and his bowels gushed out."

Neither of these conflicting statements was known to Papias: that credulous bishop's account reads as follows:—

> "Judas walked about in this world a sad example of impiety: for his body having swollen to such an extent that he could not pass where a chariot could pass easily, he was crushed by the chariot, so that his bowels gushed out."

This, no doubt, is one of the stories which Eusebius thought was derived from "unwritten tradition." But, in the Acts account, it can be plainly seen that some of the circumstances connected with the story have been discreetly omitted. How, for instance, came Judas to "fall headlong," or to "burst asunder in the midst"? The buying a field does not account for either of these circumstances. Papias's story, however, explains both. Judas being knocked down by a chariot would account for his "falling headlong," and his enormously swollen condition for his "bursting asunder in the midst." Hence the Acts account was made up from that of Papias and from some other, in which the purchase of a field formed part of the story. In Matthew's account the field was purchased after Judas's death.

Coming, now, to the Third Gospel, Irenæus says that "Luke, the companion of Paul recorded in a book the Gospel preached by him." That the Third Gospel was written by one named Luke is certain; for had not the writer's name been known to be "Luke," the Gospel would have been ascribed to one of the apostles. But the compiler of the Third Gospel was not the Luke named in Col. iv. 14, Philemon 23, 24, or 2 Tim. iv. 11: nor was he a companion of Paul. He says himself that he did not live in apostolic times. Speaking of the narratives in the primitive Gospel in use in his days, he says—"even as they, who from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, delivered them unto us," etc. Here Luke asserts, and probably believed, that the Gospel narratives which had been handed down to his time (say, A.D. 150) were written by apostles or companions of apostles in apostolic times—the latter period being called "the beginning." Had Luke been a colleague of Paul, he would have been one of the "ministers of the word" in "the beginning"; but he was not. In compiling a Gospel he professed only to make a selection from the Gospel stories in existence in his day, selecting and retaining those which he believed to be the most credible. Luke also made selections from some of the apocryphal writings, which he added to the older primitive Gospel, and revised the whole, altering or omitting as he thought fit, and improving the diction throughout. His work, when completed, was received, not as a new Gospel, but as a revised copy of the old one handed down. That the Gospel of Luke could have been derived from the preaching of Paul is an idea almost too absurd to be seriously considered. Paul knew nothing of our present Gospel "history"; it had not then been written, or even thought of. He did not know a single Gospel saying; none had then been composed. In the Pauline Epistles we have plenty of Paul's preaching—but no Gospel history. Some early Christian, it is true, has piously inserted an interpolation in 1 Cor. xi. 23—26, which is nearer to Luke's version (xxii. 19—20) than to any of the other Gospels. Irenæus has simply ascribed the four Gospels written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, who lived in the second century, to apostolic men of the same names in the first century.

With regard to the apostle John, Irenæus has identified that unknown disciple with Papias's friend John the Presbyter. He says, for instance: "These things are borne witness to in writing by Papias, the hearer of John, and a companion of Polycarp." We have already seen that Irenæus made Polycarp also a hearer of the apostle John, though both these bishops lived half a century too late to see or hear that much-belauded individual. Irenæus may have thought that Papias lived at an earlier period than he actually did; for he says that John the apostle "remained among them [i.e., the Christians] up to the times of Trajan" (A.D. 98—117) which reign he probably took to be the period when Papias wrote.

Irenæus several times bolsters up the opinions he has expressed by some alleged testimony of apostles. Speaking of the age of Jesus, he says: "But from the fortieth and fiftieth year a man begins to decline towards old age, which our Lord possessed," and then states that the elders who had conversed with John the apostle "testified that John had conveyed to them that information": after which he quotes John viii. 56, 57 in support of his contention, and concludes by saying that "Jesus did not want much of being fifty years old" (Her. ii., xxii., 5). In another place he says: "As I have heard from a certain presbyter, who had heard it from those who had seen the apostles, and from those who had been their disciples," etc. This alleged "testimony" of apostles and their disciples was, of course, simply Irenæus's way of adding confirmation to some of his doubtful statements. He knew nothing whatever about the sayings or doings of any apostles. His book is useful chiefly as showing what was affirmed of the canonical Gospels in his days, and as describing the various "heresies" that had arisen up to his time.

The Blasphemy Laws (Amendment) Bill came up for discussion before the Lower House of Convocation of Canterbury the other day. In the course of the discussion, the Archdeacon of Surrey said there were "grave fears that if the Bill were carried in its present form there would be in many quarters a serious outbreak of profanity, a sort of thing which a civilised country, and above all a Christian country, could not tolerate for a moment." Profane is a very elastic word, and may mean either coarse or indelicate speech, or treating so-called "sacred" subjects with irreverence. If the Archdeacon means the latter, we can only say reverence is quite out of place towards a teaching or an opinion that one does not believe worthy of it, and if a Freethinker cares to speak "irreverently" of religious beliefs, there is neither justice nor common sense in preventing him. The utmost that can be done is to make him a hypocrite in addition to his being an unbeliever. And if coarse and indelicate speech is dreaded, the cure for that is not legal enactments, but education and culture. People will speak coarsely while their natures are coarse, and the language of a very large number of our religious fellow citizens is enough to show that this has no special connection with unbelief. Finally, the Blasphemy Laws do not prevent profane language, and never have prevented profane language. If anything, they tend to encourage it. For human nature being what it is, it would indeed be strange if the oppression of an opinion by legal enactment did not drive some people into more violent language than they would use if religious opinion was, like other opinions, left to hold its own without the protecting arm of the policeman and the gaoler.

It seems that there would have been more railway strikes during this last year or two but for one thing. Had they occurred the success of the Baptist Sustenation Fund of £250,000 would have been jeopardised. We do not mean that the railway men did not strike because they saw it would injure the fund; they were only pawns in the hands of Providence. This is what we gather from Mr. Shakespeare's report before the Baptist Conference the other day. That gentleman thanked God for the fund, and said "We have been under his guidance, and have only been the unworthy instruments of his will. As we began the country entered upon a season of unparalleled commercial prosperity. Up to that point there had been disastrous railway strikes which would have made our campaign impossible. But we have worked during a time of comparative peace." So the matter is plain. The Lord did not mind a building strike, or a strike of municipal employees, but he drew the line at a railway strike. For that, he said, would prevent my "unworthy instruments" from collecting the £250,000. Now, we presume, the railway servants are at liberty to strike when they please—unless the railway directors can arrange with Mr. Shakespeare to start another campaign.

When Gipsy Smith asked a Portsmouth audience "How many mean to be better Christians?" the whole of "the vast congregation rose to their feet." We do not for a moment question the need for improvement, but we do question the value of the resolve a week after it is made.

Saint George, the sanctified pork dealer, must have had as many bones as the dragon with which he was associated. For relics of George were once scattered over the land. Canterbury, Lincoln, and Norwich Cathedrals, and St. Nicholas Church, Great Yarmouth, each possessed an arm, and other places of worship had other bony relics.

Beer and Bible trotting in double harness is revealed once more by the transfer of the license of the "Beverley," Canterbury. This house is the perquisite of the parish clerk, who lives there. The new landlord of the "Beverley" is the butler of the vicar. Gospel temperance advocates will note this with glad eyes.

Dr. Crozier, Primate of all Ireland, says he views with "holy horror" the "growing prospect of intensified hatred and separation" in Ireland. Dr. Crozier should reflect that the principle cause of that "hatred and separation" is the religion he represents. If Protestants and Catholics in Ireland could suddenly forget their religion all other causes for difference could be settled in the way that political differences are settled all over the civilised world. The one thing that makes the Irish problem what it is, is religion. It is a "holy" business right through.

The Primate of All Ireland's "holy horror" reminds one of Lever's lines on the two parties in Ireland:—

> "A glorious nation,
> A splendid peasantry, on fruitful sod,
> Fighting like devils for conciliation,
> And hating each other for the love of God."

The Bishop of St. Albans says it is a perilous thing in the twentieth century to tamper with "facts" that have been the creed and life of the Church for nineteen centuries. Perilous to whom? If the "facts" that are "tampered with" are real and valuable, no one need fear. The more they are examined, the more they are criticised, the clearer will their truth and value become. What the Bishop really means is that it will be dangerous for the Church if its creeds and statements are criticised. In this we agree with him, and can only say, so much the worse for the Church. In this world progress is only made by a continuous overhauling of our social and intellectual inheritance. We reject what is bad, retain what is good, and we modify what demands modification. Examination, rejection, and revision are the only means by which the present can prevent the past weighing upon it like a garment of lead. The fact that a thing has endured for nineteen centuries is no conclusive reason for retaining it for another nineteen. It is often a very good reason for its removal.

In a Yorkshire parish no deaths took place during last year. Before we praise God for this special mercy, let us remember that it nearly killed the local undertaker.

A seaside rector had announced his intention of holding an early morning Sunday service for golfers. It is suggested that the service should finish with "Let us play."

At the beginning of the winter the cinematograph proprietors in the County of Middlesex bade defiance to the Middlesex County Council by opening the picture palaces on Sunday. The Council has not taken any steps in the matter up to the present, probably not feeling quite sure of their ground. The matter came up for discussion at the Council's meeting on April 30, and there was a motion that the Council's solicitor be instructed to take proceedings if there were sufficient grounds to secure a conviction. The matter was finally adjourned for another month. The Union of Picture Palace Proprietors had already announced that if one of their number were attacked the matter would be fought to a finish, and we expect this has given the Council pause. For our part, we should not be at all sorry to see a good fight over the matter. It might lead to a wiping away of some idiotic laws that ought to have been repealed long since.

The Bishop of New Guinea, quite unconsciously, let in a little light the other day on the effects of missionary activity. "If a New Guinea lad," he said, "started to buy singlets, coats, and trousers, and to wear them, he degenerated physically and morally." This was only another way of saying that when we separated the native from his tribal customs we invariably succeeded in turning a decent man into a blackguard.

Rev. William Corkey, of Belfast, speaking in London at the meeting of the World's Evangelical Alliance, said that in Ulster we were only "at the beginning of the struggle against Rome.....We feel we are placed by God's will in the front rank of this great struggle to maintain our religious freedom against the efforts of the Church of Rome." The idea of Ulster Protestants in the front rank of fighters for religious freedom is delicious. It reminds one of the old expression about Satan rebuking sin.

A wealthy Swedish merchant has committed the heinous offence of working in his garden clad only in shirt and trousers on Easter Sunday. Two constables saw him at work during divine service and ordered him to desist. The hardened sinner refused and said that he was fully occupied with his business all the week and Sunday was the only time he had for gardening. So the Commissioner of the Police summoned the merchant, and the case is to be heard shortly. The papers report that the matter is exciting indignation all over Sweden. It looks as though the police are converting themselves into theological experts in Sweden as well as in England.

Popular ideas on theology are very vague. Here is a London weekly paper trying to be smart, and saying, "Through the churchyard to the flying," runs a notice at

Mr. Bernard Lucas, who has had a quarter of a century's experience of the Indian mission field, says that proselytism has had its day, and has failed. His remarks will not be quoted in future appeals for money on behalf of the missionary societies.

"Ministers have won from Ananias and Sapphira the record held for nineteen hundred years," said the Rev. T. Kingsborough at a Volunteer Church Parade at Kildarton. He was referring to the King's Ministers, but it applies more aptly to the ministers of the King of Kings.

Christians are getting afraid of their religion, and the old Freethought jest that Christ was the first and last Christian will soon be brought home to the man in the street. At the Spring Assembly of the Baptist Union the president, the Rev. C. Joseph made lengthy reference to the Old Age Pensions and the Insurance Acts, and the Back to the Land propaganda. There is not much Baptist doctrine in those three items.

Father Vaughan confesses to having a "tremendous belief" in advertising. He also said that he belongs "to the oldest and biggest advertising firm on this planet—the Roman Catholic Church." We quite agree; and if ever a business in modern times was built up by advertising the Christian business has been. And the curious thing is, that all this advertising has not made it self-supporting. If it were to stop advertising, in a generation the firm would have to close. It cannot rely upon the value of the goods supplied to keep the business up to the mark. Father Vaughan says the Catholic Church "delivers the goods all the time." It is a pity he does not tell us how often they are returned as "not up to specifications."

We have pointed out many times that what the Churches have to fight is neither a man nor an association of men—but life. We are glad to see the Methodist Times endorsing this opinion. It says, in discussing the decrease of membership, for the eighth year in succession, "We are living in a secular age.....And the main currents of life at present run strongly against the growth of all the Churches, Methodism included." Quite so; the currents of life not only run strongly against the Churches now, but they will gain in strength with each generation. There may still be, as there has been, set-backs here and there, but the main drift is undeniable. Naturally, the Methodist Times qualifies its admission with the remark that "the manifold influences of life tend to obscure its supreme ends and to shut out its highest influence"; but that is pure bunkum. The world is more generally alive to "supreme ends" and "highest influences" than it has ever been before. People were never more ready to spend themselves for an ideal than to-day. And the significant thing is that this sensitiveness to higher ideals and influences has been increasing side by side with the declining power of religious belief.

The modern method of filming scenes from the Bible at picture theatres would seem tame to our ancestors, who preferred greater realism. From the accounts of a City Company in the Middle Ages we learn that 4d. was paid for "hanging Judas; "cock crowing, 4d."; and "setting the world on fire, 5d." The last item seems remarkably cheap.

Mr. Hilaire Belloc, writing in the Daily Herald, boasts that he is a Catholic, a creed not common to the writers or the readers of the Herald. Does he imagine that Messrs. Chesterton and Lansbury are Mohammedans?

There were three persons before the magistrates at Acton recently, and each individual had a cast in one eye. This fact may be of service to the defenders of the design argument.

The Daily Mirror quotes a saying that "The first fruit of a life in Christ is love, the love of God and of our neighbor." There are other fruits, such as the Christian Evidence variety, which burlesques its God and insults its neighbors.

The Times tells us that "it is plain that at the present time very many devout Church people find the repetition of the Athanasian creed almost intolerable." Translated into simple English this means that the Christian superstition is in the melting-pot.

A correspondent in the Catholic Tablet protests against the use of the term "offertory" as a synonym for the word "collection." The clergy are indifferent as to the choice of terms so long as the shekels roll in.

Christians, by the mere force of custom, have acquired the right to do things that in other people would rightly be considered to show want of taste, if not actual impertinence. Some years ago, an East End Mission, by working upon a mentally afflicted son whose parents are Freethinkers, at Stratford, managed to secure his conversion. Both the mother and father are convinced Atheists and members of the N. S. S. Their opinions are fairly well known, and they are both advanced in years, but neither consideration prevented some impertinent busybody belonging to the mission leaving their stupid tracts at the house of the old people. Good taste would certainly have chosen some other occasion for propagandist efforts; ordinary humanity should have left two old people alone in their grief. If Freethought had nothing else to commend it, its lifting people above this kind of thing would speak in its favor. We sympathise with Mr. and Mrs. High in their bereavement, and we trust they will meet with no further annoyance from this quarter.

The congregation of St. Mark's Church, Tunbridge Wells, has been shut out from "divine service" owing to a plague of flies. It is thought that the flies made their home under the slates of the roof last winter, and have been kept alive during the winter by the heating apparatus. A couple of centuries ago there were some poor old women burned for witchcraft over such a matter. The presence of flies was deemed by the famous Matthew Hopkins a sure proof of the presence of familiar imps. In the present case there was no one who saw the hand of the Lord or the tail of the Devil in the occurrence. Simple fumigation did the trick.

The educational value of the press is frequently the subject of after-dinner speeches. The Daily Mirror recently contained a number of illustrations showing how to foretell the future by tea-leaves in cups. The editor knows his readers.

In a column notice of that industrious novelist, Mr. Charles Garvice, the Daily Chronicle says his works are read by bishops. This seems a left-handed sort of compliment.

"The whole world of humanity is crushed just now by the dead weight of Materialism," writes George Lansbury in the Daily Herald. George bears all he can of the burden with "a tolerable grace"—as Lady Teazle says.

According to the newspapers, the number of rifles landed in Ulster varied from 20,000 to 70,000, and the accounts of what happened varied as much in detail. Yet some credulous people imagine that the "Gospels" are more reliable than newspapers, although they deal with far more marvellous events than gun-running.

The Daily News, reviewing a new book on missionary work in India, says that "the ultimate evolution of Hinduism may not be to Christianity, but an amalgamation of all that is best in both." It is startling to think of statues of Christ and his disciples squatting, with crossed legs, and contemplating the lotus.

H. R. WRIGHT.—There is an American edition of Voltaire's works, in English, running to about forty volumes. There was an English translation, published during the eighteenth century, running to some sixty or seventy volumes; but in more recent times only very few of Voltaire's works have been issued in English—The Philosophical Dictionary, Candide, and two or three others. A collection of his philosophical stories, under the title of Tales and Romances, was issued early in the last century and was re-issued either by Edward Truelove or by the old Freethought Publishing Company.

J. G. FINLAY.—Our "work" has always been heavy but never a burden. We have had our heart in it.

D. C.—A blunder, evidently; but not very blameable in an Englishman, to whom "Church" is familiar and "Kirk" almost foreign. Not to our own ears, though; for we have known Burns intimately more than forty years; and we admire and love hime (yes, love him) as much as ever. It was an adventurous thing to do, but, as a matter of fact, we have even read "Holy Willie's Prayer" to Scottish audiences, not without applause. And we were born in Devonshire! A county once, at any rate, celebrated for the bravery of its men as well as the lovely complexions of its women. Richard Carlile himself was a Devonshire man, but he never dared the risk of reading Burns to a public audience north of the Tweed.

JOSEPH PEARSON.—We have read your letter carefully, but you ignore the fact that goats cannot be organised like sheep. Freethinkers have more individuality than Christians. This is a fact, though it is not always an advantage. Pleased to see your letter in the Wisbeach Chronicle. We have often urged the "saints" to pursue that sort of propaganda.

GEORGE PORTER.—We have ordered its continuance as desired. It was not Holyoake but Hetherington who started the prosecution you refer to. Strictly speaking, it was a public committee. They went for "tolerated" blasphemy. Moxon, the publisher, was prosecuted on account of Shelley's Queen Mab. A verdict of "guilty" was obtained, but nothing ever happened in the way of a sentence. Judges know how to help "respectable" sinners. Not that Shelley was "respectable." The mere suggestion is worse than blasphemy. But he belonged by blood to the upper classes, although his head and heart were with the people.

W. H. DEAKIN.—Thanks for the generous subscription and pleasant letter.

A. MILLAR.—Pleased to have your appreciation of the Freethinker. We can only keep pegging away, and in the long run it is pretty sure to tell.

J. KING.—(1) We note your appreciation of Mr. Mann's articles, in which we concur. (2) Tiele's opinion would turn upon the precise meaning attaching to "gods." If in the more modern sense, he is decidedly wrong. If the term is used to cover the belief in ghostly agencies, he is right. And the ghost is the raw material of the god. (3) We hardly think we should care to print one of the rev. gentleman's sermons as a sample of his style, but our columns are always open to him for a reply to anything we print, and to which he takes exception.

T. MOSLEY.—Mr. Foote is rapidly regaining his old form. Mr. Cohen's last debate with Rev. A. J. Waldron was in the Morley Hall, S. Hackney. There was no report of the discussion—save those that appeared in the newspapers at the time. We cannot reply, at the moment, to your last question.

J. TAMAGNI.—Charles Bradlaugh never refused to take the oath in the House of Commons. He merely claimed to affirm, and believed he was exercising a constitutional right in making the claim. The story of his challenging the Deity to strike him dead in the House of Commons is ridiculously false.

The North London Branch, which was last year responsible for the open-air meetings at Wood Green, has now transferred part of its energies to Regent's Park. Wood Green is already well looked after from a Freethought point of view, and the new move was quite justified by the first meeting on Sunday last. The audience was a good one, and the lecture appeared to give complete satisfaction. Regent's Park has been without regular Freethought meetings for many years, and the new station ought to prove in every way successful.

We believe that the Ramsey Testimonial Committee has completed its arrangements, although we have, by an oversight probably, not received a copy of the official circular which, we believe, is going round. The treasurer of the Fund is Mr. B. T. Hall, Club Union Buildings, Clerkenwell, London, E.C. The subscriptions that have been sent to this office have been forwarded to Mr. Hall, and any other subscriptions that may arrive will be forwarded also. All subscriptions will be acknowledged by Mr. B. T. Hall. We are not aware as to how the Fund is progressing, but, we trust, well.

Both the business and the public meeting of this year's N. S. S. Conference will be held in the Queen's (Minor) Hall, Langham-place, W. Visitors from the provinces will have no difficulty in finding their way there, as it is one of the best known halls in London, and it is well served by motor-'bus service from all parts of London. We must again advise those provincial friends who require accommodation to write as soon as possible to the N. S. S. Secretary, saying what accommodation they require and for how long. The matter of a Conference luncheon is under arrangement, and details will be given in good time. The Conference Agenda will be published in next week's Freethinker. We hope to see a good muster of provincial friends. As the Conference is held on Whit-Sunday, there is no difficulty about finding suitable excursion trains.

More Notes.

Very early in my career George Meredith wrote that I was "fighting for the best of causes." He wrote the same thing, although in slightly different language, only a short while before his death. And he added that this cause was destined to victory. These words sank deep into my heart. They gave me inspiration for more than thirty years; they will afford me consolation in what may look like disillusionment or defeat to the very end. For I have a notion that when I cease to work I shall soon cease to live.

Well, if I have been fighting for the best of causes, I have been fighting against the worst of religions. I have often called Christianity the worst religion in the world. Not only has it been false and fraudulent, it has been wicked and cruel, and it has caused endless tears and bloodshed. Perhaps its worst vice is hypocrisy. No other religion approaches it in this odious and detestable offence.

Let us take what may be called the hypocrisy of color. Christians pretend that one God is the father of all men,—brown and yellow, and even black and white. They preach that all are brothers in Christ. They carry the Gospel to the "heathen." They declare that the Creator "hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth" (Acts xvii. 26). That is the text. But what is the sermon? Or rather how does the doctrine work out in practice? In America, where the negroes number millions, and largely live amongst the whites, and where the color problem is a really serious one—too serious for Americans' political capacity—the "black brother" is brutally ill-treated, and "lynched" in all sorts of ways, from burning alive to being leisurely riddled with bullets. Blacks and whites, in the bulk, are both good Christians. But the white will not let the black worship in the same church with him, or attend the same Sunday-school, or belong to the same Young Men's Christian Association, or join with him in any religious function whatever. That is how the "common Creator" and "one blood" doctrine realises itself in daily life in America. And how is it realised over here? A black man in England is not a common sight; he is rather a curiosity; he does not excite anger and hatred; so there is no lynching of black Christians by white Christians on this side of the Atlantic. But when the black brother in Christ is not being exhibited at missionary meetings, as an ebony brand from the burning (in Hell), he is kept in his proper place and not allowed to participate in all the privileges of "God's Englishmen." Jack Johnson's only crime was his color—and the certainty of his beating any white pugilist who stood up to him. This dread of the black man's prowess is now openly avowed. The Home Office has just interfered with another match between a white and a black boxer in London. The illegality of the fight is not alleged, but if the black man won, as was most probable, it would cause great unrest throughout the British empire. The glamor of the white man would be gone. The colored populations would see that white men could be beaten. Nobody knows what might happen if this were plainly demonstrated. The British empire, therefore, rests upon a basis of bounce and brag. This is a fact if we are to believe the Home Office. What a mean and miserable confession for a Christian nation to make!

When Noah awoke from his drunken sleep, he cursed the descendants of Ham for ever and ever. By some peculiar biological law, Ham's descendants are the negro section of the human race, and it is their function to slave for the rest of their species, in consequence of Noah's blind anger, backed up by the omnipotence of his God.

The space still left me suffices for a paragraph on two other matters. For myself, my health is still returning, though it doesn't gallop back. I am looking forward to seeing many of my friends at the National Secular Society's Conference, and more, of course, at the evening public meeting in the Queen's (Minor) Hall. There will be plenty of good speakers—including Mr. Cohen and Mr. Lloyd—at the evening meeting. I shall be present as Chairman, and I believe I shall be in good fighting form by then. There ought to be some good weather in May. The weather is a thing I cannot control. In all other respects I am more and more approaching my normal condition. If I could only sleep well I think I should live for ever. Not that I want a stern discussion on the scientific accuracy of this bold statement.

RELINQUISHING the plant world, we will now review those laws of development which relate to the reproductive phenomena of higher animal life. For the purpose in view, this survey of the processes of generation may well be restricted to the vertebrate classes, and these will best be dealt with in evolutionary order.

Broadly speaking, the fish family may be regarded as representing the lowest order of backboned life. The sexes are almost invariably separate, although traces of an ancestral bisexual stage are sometimes in evidence. In the ovary wall of two species of bony fishes, vestiges of the male generative organs are sometimes found embedded, and one of these fishes is apparently capable of self-impregnation. "As in most other vertebrates," writes Professor J. A. Thomson, "occasional hermaphroditism occurs as an abnormality—e.g., in mackerel and herring. The males of bony fishes are usually smaller than their mates, and sometimes very markedly so." The majority of fishes are oviparous and discharge their eggs broadcast in the water or deposit them in the sand or gravel below the liquid medium in which they dwell. The salmon and the sturgeon ascend the rivers for spawning, while the eel goes down to the sea. Many of the sharks and some of the teleostean fish give birth to living young. In the case of the viviparous teleosteans, which are a later product of evolution than the sharks, the eggs hatch out in the ovary; in the sharks the young develop in the posterior portion of the oviduct.

Various of these facts possess striking evolutionary significance, as they serve to link up the fishes with the reptilia, and, in consequence, with the mammals. Two of the viviparous sharks possess reproductive structures which are almost identical with those of certain lizards. Another remarkable approximation towards more advanced living forms is indicated by their reproductive methods. With the fish world in general, the male deposits the milt upon the spawn or eggs, but it becomes evident that the fertilising process is internal when fish produce their young in a living state. As Principal Starr Jordan says:—

> "In the case of viviparous fishes, actual copulation takes place, and there is usually a modification of some organ to effect transfer of the sperm-cells. This may be the sword-shaped form of the anal fin, as in many top-minnows, the fin itself being placed in advance of its usual position."

Parental care is seldom shown by fishes, nor would it be of much service if it were. The eggs laid by fishes are of so vast a number that to guard them from danger is practically impossible. They are therefore left to the care of Providence, with the result that the tiniest percentage ever succeed in reaching maturity. With the viviparous sharks, on the other hand, the young are comparatively strong at birth, and quite able to shift for themselves.

The foregoing considerations are strengthened by the following passage from Dr. Bigelow:—

> "Codfish spawn near the shores of New England between December and April. The hatcheries liberate annually more than 75,000,000 young fry. It is easy to collect the cod eggs for hatching, for in a 20 lb. female the two ovaries (popularly called 'roes') contain more than 2,500,000 eggs, which are so small that a quart bottle will hold about 335,000. Think how abundant codfishes would be if all the eggs of a thousand females were to hatch and grow to maturity, and one-half of these were to be equally prolific females. However, since cods do not appear to be increasing or decreasing rapidly, we are justified in concluding that, on the average, two eggs from each female produce mature individuals. The others are destroyed by enemies or die from diseases."

The amphibia stand next in evolutionary succession to the fishes, and the frog is a typical amphibian. Its embryology has been more thoroughly and systematically studied than that of any other organism. In the adult frog, ovaries and spermaries distinguish the separate sexes. The egg-cells are discharged by the female into the water which the frogs select for their breeding spot in early spring. At the same time the sperm-cells discharged by the male move briskly through the water to meet the egg-cells which they enter and impregnate. The eggs now develop and hatch out into tadpoles. Then, in the course of a few or many weeks, the differences of time varying with the species, they develop legs, lose their tails through absorption and grow into small frogs.

The ovaries of a young female frog contain numerous tiny egg-cells:—

> "Each egg-cell is a spherical mass of protoplasm with a nucleus near its centre. As the eggs grow larger, each one accumulates granules of a material known as yolk; and after a time the yolk comes to occupy one hemisphere of the egg, while the protoplasm is concentrated at the other. Frogs' eggs, examined soon after they are laid in water, are seen to be black (with pigment) in one hemisphere, and whitish (due to yolk) in the other. The black hemisphere contains most of the protoplasm. Each egg is surrounded by an envelope of transparent jelly, which was secreted by the walls of the oviduct as the eggs passed from the ovaries to the exterior."

As soon as the egg-cell has been impregnated by the male element, it prepares for division into two cells. In genial spring weather this process has usually taken place within two hours of its discharge from the parent body. An hour later the four-cell stage is reached, and the cell mass continues to multiply by repeated division until on the second or third day a sphere of several hundred cells has been evolved, and from this aggregation of cells the tadpole is slowly developed. When the critical moment arrives, the tadpole emerges from the jelly which encircles the egg and moves through the water. The tadpole, on emerging, appears larger than the egg itself, but this seeming discrepancy is explained by the fact that the tadpole is swollen by the water it has absorbed during development, as may easily be proved by drying the tadpole, when the organism shrinks very materially in size. The time occupied in the evolution of free-swimming tadpoles from the fertilised egg varies with the warmth of the water. Some species hatch out sooner than others; toads' eggs hatch in three or four days, and the same may be said of those of tree-frogs.

Differences of duration in the succeeding stages of metamorphosis are also to be observed. Toad and tree-frog tadpoles, in a high temperature and provided with abundant food, will reach the adult condition a month or two from the period of hatching. This speedy development possesses a survival-value to these amphibians, as their eggs are frequently deposited in temporary ponds which evaporate in late spring or early summer. On the other hand, where water is abundant and a genial climate prevails through the year, the metamorphosis of frogs is prolonged for over twelve months.

It is generally supposed that the tails of tadpoles are cast away in the course of development. This is completely erroneous; for, as a matter of fact, one has only to examine a net full of tadpoles taken at random from the nearest pool to see very plainly that these creatures exist in all stages of development. Some of the specimens have stumpy tails and long legs, while others exhibit intermediate stages between these and tadpoles with long tails and no legs. These varying phases find their explanation in the truth that as the legs develop, the tail dwindles. The disappearance of the tail is due to the activities of the phagocytes (white blood corpuscles) which absorb the tissues of the caudal organ and transfer them to the tadpole's body. The tip of the tail commences to wither a short time after the white blood-cells begin their operations, and this disintegrating process continues until the caudal organ has completely disappeared. Its substance being thus restored to the body, it is forthwith utilised in building up other tissues.

All the higher vertebrates, including man, pass through similar phases to those of the frog, but their tadpole or larval stage, unlike that of insects and amphibia, takes place in the womb, and not in the form of an external metamorphosis. Internal development is universal among mammals. The duck-bill platypus of Australia, which links up reptiles with mammals, is oviparous; but some reptiles, and, as we have seen, some fishes, bring forth living young. The advantages bound up with the lessening of the number of eggs produced are further illustrated by the salamanders, organisms closely related to toads and frogs. The common salamanders deposit an immense number of eggs, but a species which abounds in the mountainous districts of Europe produces two eggs only for each female, and these are retained in the oviducts until they are fully developed, so that at birth they are quite able to face the ordeals of life. In this instance the small number produced in an advanced stage, which guarantees their survival, is amply sufficient to maintain the species.

The early embryological phases of mammalian development, and also those of birds and reptiles, are suggestively similar to those of the frog, and they meet their only rational explanation in the theory of their common origin. In each case the fertilised egg-cell splits up into innumerable cells, which afterwards evolve into the embryo and its wrappings. The resemblances between the embryos of fish, reptiles, birds, cats, monkeys, and men are in their early stages so close that only the expert biologist can distinguish one from the other, although in the course of their later development each embryo evolves into the specific form which characterises its progenitors.

With birds the main processes of development are external, and the eggs require incubation. If the eggs are to hatch out successfully, they must be maintained at a high temperature, somewhat above blood heat, about 104° F. being necessary for those of the ordinary hen. The cock bird fertilises the female at a period when the eggs emerge from the ovary and enter the oviduct, and early cell multiplication proceeds during the twenty-four hours which elapse before the eggs are laid. When the egg is laid, however, it cools rapidly, and all development is suspended. With birds in a wild state, one egg is usually deposited daily in the nest, and the hen bird rarely covers her eggs except at night. After the blackbird, thrush, linnet, starling, etc., has laid her full complement of eggs, she commences her patient brooding over her treasures, and is rarely found absent until she leaves them in search for food for her never-satisfied family.

The majority of birds in a state of nature breed once or twice in a season, and the parent birds are fully occupied in building their nests and feeding and training their defenceless offspring until such time as they may fight the battle of life alone. In poultry farming—particularly that of an intensive character—all this is changed. Fowls are carefully chosen for their egg-producing powers, and many hens will lay over two hundred eggs per year. Needless to say, these birds are not permitted to waste time and energy in hatching out eggs and attending to the wants of chickens.

The eggs of insects and amphibia are usually very minute, and the nutriment necessary to the evolving butterfly or frog is mainly derived from its surroundings. The eggs of birds, on the other hand, are relatively large, and richly stored with food materials for the use of the embryo during the period of incubation. Eggs that have been observed in the ovaries of young birds assume the appearance of small spherical cells, which, as they advance towards maturity, absorb food and grow. In an average-sized fowl's egg the yolk, with its enclosing membrane, is about one inch in diameter, but in a young hen's ovary it is a microscopic cell. The white or albumen which environs the yoke, as well as the shell, are built up around the egg as it passes through the oviduct on its way to the nest. The yolk is the all-essential constituent of the egg; the albumen and hard coverings are additions evolved for the purpose of protecting the egg from injury, and thus fulfil the same function as the jelly which shields the spawn of the frog.

Bitter Fruit.

"NOTWITHSTANDING the abounding evidences of the fact that the people are becoming more materialistic," the pastor is reported to have said, "and notwithstanding the amount of spiritless Materialist literature produced to-day, we Christians have no cause to be dejected." He continued in the usual spiritual strain, of which, seemingly, he was so proud, to speak about an unvanquishable soul, whose abiding place in the heart of man could never be shattered. This soul, this God's gift, was the only hope of the individual, the only hope of the world. It was the central fact of Christianity, he said; it was brought to us by Jesus Christ; consecrated by his life and death; and so long as our hearts possessed the treasure there would be no need for complaint. Against the consciousness that there lived in us this soulful spark of divine love all the materialistic influences of our lives were futile. The soul, which was God's love manifesting itself in our consciousness, would never perish; and Christianity, being warmed by this wonderful spark, would never grow cold.

Christians, the majority of them, are not deliberately blind; they are not deliberately untruthful; but there are moments when I think they come pretty near the latter. Perhaps it cannot honestly be named lying. We do not like to accuse our friends of being consistently in support of falsehood. We are not very inclined to call them children, and well-bred children of the father of lies. The accusation is too hard. And yet, their attitude often forces to our lips the word we dislike to utter, even while our minds are busy with extenuations. Custom, ignorance, prejudice, weakness, the demands of human affection, and many other things, crop up to bear the burden of blame. We make excuses for our friends, although impulse would have us brand them. Knowing them well, we feel compelled to question the righteousness of the accusation; but we cannot rid ourselves of the idea that their toleration is tantamount to lying.

They know that all this religious stuff is absurd; that the soul has no more redemptive influence upon the ordinary life of humanity than a politician's prayers; that the spark of divine love vitalising Christianity is blarney. They know that the belauded importance of religion to the people who work beside them in mine, factory, workshop, or field, is moonshine, without moonshine's beauty. And they know that the value of religion, gauged by the results of its activities, the benefits it gives them, is a fantastic idea, meriting contempt and ridicule.

The ordinary Christian fully recognises that the important things of his life must be considered. They must be discussed, and carefully weighed in the balance of good and evil. Things that matter most in the daily round receive the greatest attention, and naturally so; but religion, the soul, the divine spark, and all the rest of the heavenly pyrotechnics, where do they come in? The average Christian is strangely unconcerned.

It is not that the average Christian thinks he need not trouble about the welfare of his faith; nor that it was never meant for practice. It is not that he thinks the pastor's salary releases him from all responsibility. He does not even imagine that the creeds he tolerates are sufficiently strong in their social crystalisation, in customs, in churches, in funds, in membership, to justify his neglect. He does not think that the defenders of his faith are, in themselves, powerful enough of intellect and belief to frustrate any attempts to demolish them. It is not because his mental attitude towards sacred things would be openly flouted by his fellow Christians if he were to use it amongst them in the daily toil, that he gives his religion the cold shoulder. Perhaps it is because of its very obvious individual and social uselessness.

Pastors may pour forth their million platitudes for all the average Christian cares. What matters it? He knows that his church-going is a mere custom. He knows that to take the church environment into his common life would be like taking a sloppy vegetarian dish to a man who relished roast beef. He knows that his religious observances must be indulged in the only environment for which they are suitable, surroundings pre-eminently famous for bringing utter weariness of mind or red-hot resentfulness to those unaccustomed to them.

Moreover, he is perfectly conscious, when he enters the church doors, of the distance he has travelled from the realities of life. He feels it when the minister introduces the common affairs into his remarks. The ordinary Christian's mind, at these times, is retrospective. He looks back upon the things of the past week. He sees them in the colored lights of religion. They have lost their real significance of actuality. They are more dream-pictures than happenings. It is as if they were mere memories drawn from a dream-life than facts remembered in a real life. And when he leaves church he renounces the dreams for the actualities. He forgets the former. The latter crowd them out from his mind.

The little circle of our acquaintances may, I suppose, be taken as the epitome of the larger life of humanity. Coming into contact with the commonplace but interesting characteristics of our friends, having the opportunity to observe the sweep of their minds upon their lives, we draw near, in our thoughts, to the greater humanity. Our deductions may serve as reliable generalisations. We need not fear for the truth of them. We may trace trends of thought; study mental development; observe the influence of a quietly operating sense of freedom, in the lives of our friends, as revealed by the activities of their intelligence; and our conclusions may serve to prove or disprove assertions like those embodied in the quotation.

If it is true that the social mind is changing in outlook towards certain long established opinions, we need not go far from home for evidence to substantiate the statement. We will find it in our own little human circle. Readiness to entertain a once despised idea, willingness to discuss subjects once rigorously excluded from conversation, the lowering of the degree of personal animosity, a more spontaneous inclination to laugh at sacred things, all go to give the lie to the hieroglyphics of the pulpit. We see the change operating in the lives of our friends. They are not unconscious of this different attitude of theirs; nor are the priests; for the webs woven by religionists are never heavy enough, nor thick enough, to hide the commonplace life; and the bitter fruit of reality is always seen through the diaphanous veil of religious mysticism.

Bitter fruit most assuredly it must be, else why so many "unchristian" invectives on Freethought literature? Why so much unbrotherly anger over our vitality? Why so much unJesuslike enmity because we are successful in reaching the young mind? And we, surely we need more love, more kindness, more of that wonderful fraternal consideration, more of the soft laying on of hands than the laying on of knotted verbal whips, from those who are inspired by God; for are we not the greatest of sinners?

Naturally, this is not an appeal for that sort of treatment; but if Christians would only endeavor, for once, to be logical, we would certainly receive more of this attention than we get at present. However, perhaps the whips are better for us and our movement.

So long as the average Christian continues to object to ministerial interference, for this is another characteristic of the times, there will always be the possibility of mental development, necessarily slow, but along secular lines. The bitter fruit will become abundant and more bitter for priests, and less abundant and less bitter for the average Christian. His quiet toleration of Christian customs will disappear. He will hate sham and artificiality; and perhaps he will recognise how closely, in the days past, when the ordinary happenings of his life mocked the ideas his forefathers worshiped, and his priests and ministers served, his toleration approached the category of "lying."

"The Challenge."

THE above is not the name of a special make of sewing machine, and it is not meant to denote the extraordinary qualities of a new brand of pickle. It is simply the title of a weekly religious journal that has just been launched. A company has been formed, and the meagre sum of £25,000 (merely the combination of the annual salaries of two archbishops) is required for capital. In all probability this is a matter of form, for when a balance sheet is issued no doubt "prayer" will occupy a prominent position among the assets. A comparison of the prospectus of this concern and that of an ordinary company proves Mr. Cohen's assertion that commercialism is more honest than clericalism.

The introduction to the prospectus states that "the paper will deal with matters relating to the Church of England," but "it will put in the forefront the need of the reduction of sectarian strife." This sounds remarkably like a Chestertonian paradox.

The paragraph headed "The Fight Against Secularism," will afford some amusement to our readers, so the whole of it is quoted:—

> "Both at home and in the Dominions beyond the Seas there is need for a journal to fight in the front rank against shallow Secularism and subversive teaching on morals. Rationalistic pamphlets are read by the masses to an extent hardly realised by the leaders of the Church. Not only the authority of the Bible, but the value of religion, is freely disputed in park, club, and workshop, while little is done to stem the tide of doubt. A weekly penny paper might do good service in spreading light, and so rescuing many who, for lack of information, fall victims to a plausible but superficial scepticism. It would be of assistance, moreover, in conducting a crusade against the propaganda which attacks the Christian basis of morals, and threatens the foundations of society."

For sheer audacity and cheap bombast these sentiments would be difficult to beat; but, after all, they are only characteristic of bigoted Christians whose sole argument is force. The latter used to take the form of the stake and instruments of torture too numerous to mention, but to-day it is composed of money, misrepresentation, and calumny, all of which have no effect whatever against the forces of intellectualism.

The passage quoted invites amusement. It simply expresses the tricks of a very loathsome trade. At the eleventh hour the merchants themselves are losing their heads, and, consequently, the wildest of assertions are made and the vilest of slanders are circulated. But it is all of little avail, for money and mud are poor opponents of common sense and truth.

"ORGANISMS ANTAGONISTIC TO HEALTH."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—About a fortnight ago I was present at what was probably the last lecture delivered by the late Sir E. Durning-Lawrence on "Bacon is Shakespeare," at Stanley Hall, Tufnell Park. The lecturer roundly abused the memory of "the vulgar and illiterate clown," whom Bacon employed as a mask for his own deathless dramatic masterpieces, and denounced in unmeasured language the orthodox Shakespeareans in general. Sir Durning-Lawrence claimed, in a style somewhat similar to to that adopted by Miss Kidd, that Bacon founded the English language, translated the Bible, wrote the works of Spenser, and created the whole literature falsely attributed to Shakespeare. The address was unfortunately brought to an untimely end by the collapse of the lecturer, who fainted on the platform. But the same impression was made on at least one of the audience as that conveyed by Miss Kidd's truculent epistle. In each instance the doctrines advanced were buttressed by false reasoning, inconsequential comment, and sinister suggestion; and in each case the result is one of utter inconclusiveness.

It is quite unnecessary to traverse the farcical statements of your correspondent in detail. The germ theory of disease is as firmly established as the doctrine of evolution, and will easily outlive the animadversions of its enemies.

That the conditions imposed by Koch are not now supplied is admitted. Every department of science, including that of bacteriology, is progressive. As science advances its concepts undergo modification in the light of later discovery. With reference to the purity of the blood-stream, I, as a matter of fact, emphasised the importance of sound physiological conditions in the interests of mental and bodily health.

The passage quoted by your correspondent from Wallace is very significant, as it represents the Wallace of superstition rather than the Wallace of science. It contains a lame attempt to bolster up the theory that disease germs are part of a providential scheme of things. The view set forth by me—which is unquestionably the view of the overwhelming majority of men qualified to speak on the subject—did not commend itself to Wallace "because it does not show us any use for such microbes in the scheme of life." Very pretty, no doubt; but there speaks the Wallace of Spiritualism, the amazing doctrine of angel supervision, and the quite chimerical theory that our insignificant earth, with its favored inhabitants, has been specially set in the centre of the universe by some supernatural power.

Miss Kidd's sneers at the mighty Pasteur, the man who saved the silk industry of France and made Lister's magnificent achievements possible, make mournful reading and stand self-condemned. Her gibes at Jenner are also to be reprobated rather than condoned.

If Miss Kidd were to study, and strive to understand, some standard work on immunity in disease, she would cease to wonder why confectioners are not decimated by disease as they should be from the number of flies that swarm in their neighborhood.

Miss Kidd is mistaken in surmising that I am not acquainted with what the poverty of the language compels me to term the "case" for the other side. In my callow days much time did I innocently waste in perusing the perverse productions of the enemies of medical progress. But that, thank heaven, is of the past; my time is now otherwise employed, Mr. Boffin.

That the stable-fly may carry the germ of infantile paralysis where the stable-fly abounds, is not to contend that the disease is disseminated by that organism alone. This quite simply explains the fact that the disease may be present where the stable-fly is absent, as the meanest tyro in these matters is perfectly well aware.

I hope to return to these important phenomena, and put them to the proof in the columns of the Freethinker at no distant date. It seems a pity that no medical authority will deign to discuss with Dr. Hadwen; but if Miss Kidd will supply the platform I could furnish one layman who would be prepared to cross swords with Dr. Hadwen or any other debater she or her friends may choose to appoint.

Miss Kidd's reference to the anti-toxins reminds one of the belated theologians who pitted their puny prejudices against the majestic mind of Galileo. They flatly refused to look through Galileo's telescope at the newly discovered satellites of Jupiter. One of these obscurantists died shortly afterwards and Galileo comforted himself with the reflection that his antagonist probably saw them on his way to heaven.

The introduction into this controversy of the modest and retiring author of Mrs. Warren's Profession provides the crowning absurdity of Miss Kidd's stream of invective. The conservation of energy not only operates in human credulity but in the realms of the merry andrew, the purveyor of paradoxes, and the prophet of chronic insincerity. In another and a better world than ours one might have aspired to hope that the man who conserved so little truth or even common honesty in dealing with Darwin, "the mere pigeon fancier," the immaculate conception, spontaneous generation, and the manhood, or was in the godhood of Mahomet, might very fitly be left out from any matter to which science and rationality are essential ingredients.

National Secular Society.

REPORT OF MONTHLY EXECUTIVE MEETING HELD ON APRIL 30.

The President, Mr. G. W. Foote, happily recovered largely from his recent severe illness, occupied the chair. Other members present were: Messrs. Baker, Berry, Bowman, Brandes, Cohen, Cowell, Cunningham, Davey, Heaford, Judge, Lloyd, Neate, Nichols, Roger, Rosetti, Samuels, Silverstein, Schindle, Thurlow, and Wood.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed. New members were admitted for the Parent Society. Correspondence was also read.

This being the final meeting of the year, the President addressed the meeting at some length upon the general situation, and pointed out that for various reasons it was deemed advisable to hold the Annual Conference in London this year. The Queen's Minor Hall had been engaged for the business and public meetings.

Notices of Motion for the Agenda were reported, and resolutions moved by the Executive were ordered to be referred to the Agenda Committee, Mr. Cohen and Mr. Lloyd being elected for that purpose.

Mr. Davey reported his attendance at meetings called to further the W. J. Ramsey Testimonial Fund, and that an appeal by circular was about to be made.

Other matters of routine business were dealt with.

E. M. VANCE, General Secretary.

Obituary.

With deep regret I have to record the death of Mrs. Edward Moorhouse, one of the kindest and gentlest of women, a true Secularist, who, with her husband, worked for the "best of causes"—especially so during the stormy period of the Bradlaugh and our President's struggles thirty years ago. She had been suffering from a very painful malady for two years, but she lived and died fortified in the principles of the Secularist "faith." Her remains were cremated at the Leeds Crematorium, on the 2nd inst., and our good friend Mr. R. Tabrum read the beautiful Secular Service.—W. H. SPIVEY (Huddersfield).

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 20 SUNDAY, MAY 17, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

No one appears to perceive that intellectual cowardice is as disreputable as physical cowardice.
—WILLIAM ROMAINE PATTERSON.

More Notes.

Several years ago (I cannot fix the date without laborious reference) I spent a week at Brighton with my wife and one of our children. Their object was to keep me company. My object was to pick up strength after recovering from an attack of influenza. I never bought clothes in my life until I was obliged to, and on this occasion I had to purchase a new overcoat, partly to keep me warm on the windy Brighton front, and partly because my old overcoat —as I was informed, and could not honestly deny— had got to look quite disreputable for a man in my position, walking out with a lady. The new garment was not an expensive one, but it did credit (at the price, as they say) to my tailor, and I rather fancied it. Yes, and I fancied myself in it, too; for I defy any man in the world, or any woman either, to remain indifferent to the elevating effect of new raiment. Emerson was perhaps cynical, though probably quite accurate, when he reported a pious lady as saying that the consciousness of being well-dressed gave her a support which religion was powerless to afford.

But how we are paid out, after all, for giving way to these little flatteries! When I went back to my lodgings one day for dinner I found a Christian Evidence paper amidst a packet of things sent down to me from London. It was of no importance then, and its name is of no importance now. It was one of the many insignificant journals I have known during the past forty years, that have done their poor little best to prove Christianity divine by constant displays of envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness — and absolutely nothing else. "Freethinker" in their vocabulary meant "blackguard," "Secularist" meant "rascal," and "Atheist" meant "scoundrel." Other "infidel" terms were used with similar "Christian charity." Had the writers in these journals possessed any brightness or wit they might have done considerable mischief. The laughter they raised, however, was usually in the wrong place. The moment these "organs" were born they started on the way to oblivion. They lacked the first virtue of a periodical. They were not interesting. People soon get tired of hearing Bradlaugh called a liar, a blackguard, a thief, and other epithets from the venerable collection of what Arnold called "the amenities of theological controversy." Even the "proofs" were not very thrilling when read for the first time. On the second reading they had all the dullness of their stupidity. It was obvious to any person of common sagacity that Bradlaugh (or any other name you like) was only not accused of murder because such a charge involved the production of a corpse. Rank fanaticism provided the only readers of these "defenders of the faith" after a brief career; and the usual appeals for cash to sustain the only real barrier to the wave of infidelity which was surging against the cause of Christ, were followed by death-bed groans, and then—silence. The thing was dead, and forgotten before there could be a funeral, with half-a-dozen mourners. Time, the collector, picked it up and threw it into the bag he carries with alms for oblivion. (I beg Shakespeare's pardon for bringing him, even for a moment, into such company).

Well, one of the contributors to that particular number of that particular sample of Christian Evidence journalism, reported what must have tickled my friends amazingly if they had come across it. I had been seen at Brighton, where I was "living on the fat of the land" (as if I ought to have shown a Christian preference for the lean) and walking about "gorgeously attired." The joke nearly did for me on the spot. My wife collapsed dangerously. Fortunately, the dinner was brought in just then; it was sweet-smelling, we were very hungry, and it appealed to us with all the power that Esau's venison exercised on poor old father Isaac; so we "fell to" as they say at beanfeast dinners, and the devastating effect of that Christian Evidence joke (unconscious, and therefore all the more effective) was arrested.

How did the Christian Evidence reporter learn that I was living on the fat of the land? Perhaps it was a general conclusion. I don't think I ever looked averse to a good dinner. Certainly not in those days. Christians, who are so indifferent to the meat which perisheth, might call a chop and potatoes (with or without tomato sauce, à la Pickwick) the fat of the land. In a certain way it is—and in a certain way it isn't. It is a palatable and nourishing dish—if the Vegetarians will let the statement pass, as a relative one, for the sake of argument; but a more luxurious repast is easily conceivable. If I may make a personal confession, I agree with the late George Gissing, and some American friends too, that English cooking is not the worst, but much nearer the best, in the world. I like good food, well cooked, and I like to know what I am eating. I doubt if the very best English public-house dinners (with an appetite, of course; the appetite is indispensable—and preferably after an agreeable walk with a "pal") can be beaten anywhere on this planet. Everything plain, everything nicely done, the meat and the vegetables well-matched, and the sauces in bottles on the table rather than too much in evidence on the plates, and one "sweet" if you want it, and a "pinch" of Stilton, Cheddar, or Cheshire (no longer list)—this, on ordinary days, if not on days of celebration, is a dinner for a man. I do not speak for the ladies. I leave them to speak for themselves. There may well be organic differences of taste in the two sexes.

But the question with which the last paragraph opened has not yet been answered. How did the Paul Pry reporter penetrate the arcana of our daily menu? Was he a friend of the landlady's? Was he acquainted with the servant? Did he "tip" the errand boys at the butcher's, the greengrocer's, and the provision dealer's, where my wife bought our meat, vegetables, fruit, bacon and eggs, and cheese —for information as to our purchases? Or did he extract it from them at Sunday-school on the blessed

Sabbath afternoon? Possibly, as I have already hinted, the "fat of the land" was a guess, not exactly in the dark. But what was the explanation of "gorgeously attired"? That new overcoat must have given me away. No doubt its value had been immensely exaggerated. But what an imagination the Christian reporter must have had to represent me, and what an imagination the Christian reader must have had to accept the description of me, as "gorgeously attired." Me! Gorgeous! And all on the strength of what was a very common-priced overcoat! Some of my lady friends laugh at that "gorgeously attired" still.

I have just been informed of another characteristic Christian Evidence story. I have frequently referred to my insomnia. Readers ask me questions about it, and get their answers. Some send me advice on the subject. They all mean well, and they all have my thanks; although I should never edit another number of the Freethinker if I followed them all together, nor would life be long enough to follow them all separately. Now insomnia is a curse. I am not proud of it—like the old lady in the hospital who, when the late King Edward was operated on for appendicitis, told a visitor that her complaint was the same as the King's, only she had it in the feet. I am not proud of insomnia, although I share it with Lord Rosebery and other distinguished people. I could wish it farewell to-night and "dote upon its very absence" ever afterwards. Insomnia is a curse, and the Christian Evidence people say that "God" has sent it to me as a punishment for my "infidelity." It is gravely stated that I may be seen walking by the water at Southend every night, tormented with remorse, and bending under the Almighty's chastisement of the deprivation of sleep.

Let me pause to tell an old story. Cuvier, the great naturalist, was asked what he thought of the definition of a Crab in a new dictionary. It was defined as a red fish that walked backwards. "Well," said Cuvier, "the crab is not a fish, it is not red, and does not walk backwards. With those three exceptions the definition is a very good one."

Now I am not "bending"—at least physically; but am as upright as ever, the result of almost daily exercise; I rarely walk about at night, especially in the winter; and I don't look in the least like a man tormented with remorse—or anything else. My life has been singularly free from pain; a fact which may somehow be connected with another fact—that the temperature of my blood never rises. As for "remorse" itself, I laugh at the very idea. Any earthly or heavenly Being who punished me for exercising my own intelligence would only prove that he was devoid of intelligence himself. On the other hand, I never wilfully injured a fellow-mortal; I am capable of mistakes, but not of crimes; my temperament is, if anything, too sympathetic; I can hardly see a strange child cry in the street without joining in; and there are things in literature—Lear, for instance, over the dead body of Cordelia—which, with all my experience on the platform, I have never been able to read aloud. Not even alone in my study, preparing for a Shakespearean lecture, and practising the recitation of illustrative passages. I have tried, and tried, and summoned up the stern forces of self-control, and reminded myself of the claims of art, but I have broken down every time, with a feeling that all one could do was to grope about, as it were, in the darkness of grief for a consoling touch of the Master's hand.

Anybody who visits Southend for the sake of seeing me bowed down with remorse by the seashore at night—a sort of Byron of the beach—will make a poor investment of his time and money. I strongly advise him not to trust so much in Christian advertisement.

G. W. FOOTE.

Why We Exist.

A FORTNIGHT ago I wrote three "Acid Drops" in reply to a letter received from a clergyman who had been given a copy of the Freethinker. I did not mention the name of the writer of the letter, and do not intend doing so now, as, although there is nothing private about the communication, I am not sure that he would care for his name being made public. He has, however, in another letter, replied to the paragraphs, although he says he would have preferred a written communication. I hardly know why. It is not likely that he would convert me or that I should convert him. Those who have studied the subjects at issue with any thoroughness may be taken to have their opinions fairly well settled, and in such cases the expression that one is ready to be converted really means little more than that each one is willing to receive the other's arguments and reply to them. The chief value of such discussions lies in their giving to the general public an opportunity of seeing both sides of the question stated. And if this reverend gentleman really desires to put his case against Freethought, the columns of this journal are open.

In reply to the writer's wonder why the Freethinker should be published, I said that one reason for its publication was that it said what could not be said in other papers. In reply to this my critic says, "I think that to be a mistake. Our press seems open to every shade of thought and opinion." Now, without being either impolite or conceited, I think I may say on that point that I—or any other Freethought advocate—am a much better authority than my critic. We know what it is to try and get our opinions before the public through the channels of the ordinary press. Mildly heretical communications from men whose position makes it dangerous for editors to refuse may appear; but uncompromising expressions of Freethought opinion are boycotted in every paper in Great Britain. Sometimes editors refuse them gladly, at other times they are refused because they dare not print them. This is not only true of papers; it is true of publishers. Quite recently, a manuscript of my own was returned from one of our oldest publishing firms with a confession that, despite a flattering report from the firm's reader, they dare not publish for fear of offending their clients. On the whole, the British Press is, perhaps, as cowardly as any on the face of the earth.

Here is a sporting offer to this reverend gentleman—one that I feel sure the editor of this journal will agree with. If he really feels convinced that "our press is open to every shade of thought and opinion," let him try and arrange for, say, four articles of mine, stating the Freethought position, in either a newspaper of standing or in one of the religious weeklys. In return, let him, or some other clergyman, put their case in an equal number of articles in the Freethinker. In that case we shall each achieve our end. He is desirous of converting Freethinkers; we are desirous of converting Christians. And this is clearly the best plan of reaching both classes. If this can be brought about, we shall have had a demonstration that the press of Great Britain is less bigoted than Freethinkers believe it to be.

I am next told it is irrelevant to say that the Freethinker expresses what a large number of people either cannot say or dare not say, and in any case there is no proof that we are expressing these thoughts. I confess I see neither the irrelevancy nor the absence of proof. Want of power to verbally express feelings or nascent convictions, and want of courage to say outright what one believes to be true, are among the plainest facts of everyday experience. The first is a natural incapacity, pure and simple; the latter due more to social pressure. When a man finds the welfare of himself and those dependent upon him likely to be seriously injured by the expression of heretical opinions, there is small wonder that he hesitates before speaking out. I do not applaud the reticence; neither do I, without qualification, condemn it. The fault lies far more with those who penalise honesty of speech than with those who, for one reason or another, feel bound to bend to the storm.

The guarantee that the Freethought writer or speaker is putting into words what a large number feel to be true, it seems to me, lies in the reception given to his message. No one can elicit response to an idea unless it encounters a mind fitted to receive it. We see this admitted in the expression that public opinion is "ripe" or is not "ripe" for a certain teaching. Even with the teacher himself the idea is with him in a nebulous form long before he is able to express it in words. And when it is expressed its power will depend very largely, if not entirely, upon the extent to which it interprets what other people are feeling upon that topic. The only guarantee really needed that the Freethinker is expressing what a large number of people cannot so well put into words is that it is alive. No other proof is required.

In reply to my statement that our object is to tell the truth about religion, we are told:—

> "That statement implies an active, positive setting forth of what is believed to be the truth. But if I may judge from the one issue (April 5) your chief motive is to show that what other people believe is not true—rather than to put forward positive truth."

Now, it might be replied that to prove to a believer that his beliefs are false is a very "positive" piece of work. For this can only be done by showing that the belief is contrary to some known truth or conflicts with some accepted principle of reason. And, as a matter of fact—although one issue is rather a narrow ground on which to judge a paper of thirty-three years' standing—every article in the issue of April 5 contains positive truth of a very important character. They at least indicate to believers a point of view from which to examine religious beliefs that may cause them to appear in quite a new light. And this point of view can only be obtained in specifically Freethought publications. Believers will not hear it from the pulpit, they will not read it in the religious press. Both do their best week after week to ignore the fact that modern thought has completely revolutionised our knowledge concerning religious beliefs. How much will a church congregation learn from the pulpit of the demonstrated truth that all existing notions of Deity and of a future life are derived from the fear-stricken brain of the primitive savage? And this is only one question out of many. For all that the pulpit does to the contrary, the mass of worshipers might still be living in the eighteenth century instead of in the twentieth. And how much of the truth would appear in other directions, but for the existence of an active Freethought propaganda, which, in spite of many serious obstacles, still manages to force some recognition of the truth. And the positive truth is there, and is emphasised, all the time. It is the natural that is used to disprove the supernatural. The strength of man is used to abolish the providence of God; the principle of causation to negative the idea of the miraculous. It is mere petulance to cry out that one is negative because one's belief is threatened.

My critic is surprised that I should say he would be surprised did he know the class of readers to whom the Freethinker appeals. Well, what was meant by the doubt expressed in his first letter, whether the paper could possibly appeal to intellectual men? I wrote what I did because I am aware of the carefully nurtured superstition that the Freethinker is conducted by illiterate men for illiterate readers. Of course, those who know the Freethinker know to the contrary. They know that for sheer hard brain work the Freethinker is the equal of any paper published in Great Britain. Those who write in its columns express their views plainly, and without dishonoring compromise. There is no attempt to placate the "respectables," and their revenge is to keep alive the delusion that the paper is "gross," "offensive," "ignorant," etc., etc. All quite false, but all evidently useful, since the charges alone are enough to keep the timid and cowardly "respectable" public from giving it the support that it might otherwise receive. Strong and brave men have always recognised the value of the paper; but strong and brave men are, unfortunately, in the minority.

Finally, we have the question of propaganda. I am told that if we had any hope of making men happier, or if we had a better religion, my critic could understand our wishing to convince people. He could "understand the man who believed in nothing, but I cannot see why he should want to destroy such belief, which, he could see, was at least some comfort to his friend who held it."

One feels inclined to reply, "Thou sayest it." This reverend gentleman has supplied one of the reasons for Freethought propaganda in the act of wondering what possible reason there is for its existence. His own attitude shows the need for Freethought work, and I sincerely hope that in future he will read the Freethinker with something like regularity. How can a man believe in nothing? All this reverend gentleman means is that the Freethinker does not believe in some of the things he believes in. And it is equally true that he does not believe some of the things we believe. He is as negative to us as we are to him. He would destroy some of our beliefs as we would destroy some of his. What a hard thing it is for some people to realise that the distance between A and B is not a bit greater or lesser than the distance between B and A.

Of course, we see that the religious man's beliefs give him comfort. But why stop there? The statement is true of nearly everybody and nearly everything. Do not the Hindoos find "comfort" in their beliefs? And yet we have missions for their conversion. Does not the belief in the Jewish religion yield comfort? But we have a society for the conversion of the Jews. Does not drinking whisky or eating beefsteak give comfort? But we have ravenous vegetarians and fiery teetotalers pursuing an energetic propaganda. And may it not be that the Atheist finds comfort in his beliefs? Why, then, trouble about correcting anybody? If the rule is good in one direction, it is good in all directions. Are we, then, to let everybody alone? Or are we to conclude that the cry, "Let me alone; I am comfortable where I am!" is the cry of a coward unwilling to play his part in the battle of life? Strange that a Freethinker should have to point out to a clergyman that the duty of determining what is true should rank higher than the desire to feel comfortable!

It may be startling to my critic, but we really have hopes of men becoming better. Nay, we believe we have made men better. We have taught men to see in co-operation and intelligence the conditions of human betterment. We have taught them that true rewards and penalties in the sphere of conduct lie in the effects of conduct on our own natures. We have taught that to care for each other for the sake of man is better than hating each other in the name of God. We have taught men that it is saner to judge the value of life from the point of view of this world than from that of some fanciful hereafter. We have taught men to be serious in thought, brave in speech, and straightforward in action. And if these things will not make men better and happier, then the lot of mankind is indeed hopeless.

Discredited Apologetics.

BY "apologetics" is meant the so-called science which attempts to vindicate, by defence or defensive assault, the absolute truth of the Christian religion. There are three kinds of apologetics, the fundamental, the historical, and the philosophical, but the present article is concerned only with the historical, which deals with the Divine nature and origin of Christianity. The apologists declare that the evidences of the Divinity of Christianity are irrefutable, that all attempts to break their force are utterly futile, and that consequently anti-Christians are without a rag of rationality wherewith to hide the nakedness of their position. Indeed, some of them go so far as to assert that unbelievers build their negative theory on two assumptions, namely, that the Christian faith is not true, and that its teachers do not believe it to be true. In that assertion there is not a single atom of truth. No Freethinker ever takes it for granted, without argument, that Christianity is false, or that its teachers are destitute of belief in its truth. There are those among its official champions who are convinced of its essential falsity, but it is incontrovertible that the majority of them firmly believe it to be true. It would indeed be indescribably absurd for anyone to assume that all divines are conscious hypocrites, or that Christianity itself is false. Of course, nothing is easier than to characterise Freethinkers as the victims of prejudice, but nothing can be more difficult than to prove such a charge. On the part of a Freethinker prejudice would signify an unreasonable predilection for the tenets of Freethought, a bias, preconception, or presumption against the Christian faith; but it must be borne in mind that the bulk of Freethinkers are converts from the Christian religion, all whose worldly interests were powerful arguments against their conversion. They renounced their belief alone in obedience to the dictates of reason. Had they listened to the voice of prejudice, they would have remained believers. How utterly unfair it is, therefore, to say that their judgment is now warped because they conscientiously argue against the faith, the truth being that they argue against the faith because they honestly must, not because they have any selfish motive to serve in so doing.

Advocates of Christianity almost invariably describe their opponents as ignorant and narrow-minded, shutting themselves up in a narrow sphere, refusing to examine Christian thought and teaching, and never getting on intimate terms with intelligent Christians. How absolutely false that description is appears from the fact that Christianity is presented to us as an object, not of knowledge, but of belief. An intelligent Christian believer is a natural impossibility, because God, Christ, and immortality are subjects that lie outside the scope of intelligence altogether. A believer in them may be zealous, fervent, pious, and prayerful, but never intelligent. Both a Christian and an Atheist are equally ignorant of spiritual realities, the only difference between them being that the former believes on the authority of a Book or a Church, or of both, and the latter disbelieves because the realities known to him indicate the non-existence of the spiritual realities believed in. In other words, the objects of knowledge testify to the unreality of the objects of belief. He who knows the natural cannot possibly believe in the supernatural. We are told that "spiritual truths and historic statements of Christian teaching stand or fall by the tests of experience, observation, and reason," but a moment's calm thought shows the infinite absurdity of such a claim. Is the Virgin Birth an object of experience? Has anybody ever observed the incarnation of God in Jesus of Nazareth? Can the reality of the life everlasting be subjected to the critical test of reason? Merely to ask such questions is to wholly discredit the statement that "spiritual truths stand or fall" by such tests. Of spiritual or supernatural truths experience, observation, and reason are totally ignorant. They are merely objects of belief, and to charge unbelievers in them with ignorance is to be guilty of obvious irrationality.

Now, it is contended by the apologists that "spiritual truths" ought to be taught to children at the earliest possible age. If "spiritual truths" were objects of knowledge, and not simply of belief, the contention would be justifiable, and there could be no valid objection to the religious education of children. But to make supernatural believers of unthinking children is to be guilty of injustice and unfairness towards them. One over-zealous apologist argues thus:—

> "To say that the future of Christianity is dependent upon its being crammed down the throats of little children before they acquire the art of thinking is as nonsensical as it would be to say that the future of arithmetic, or the future of geographic science, or the future of elementary sanitation is dependent upon its being crammed down the throats of children before they acquire the art of thinking. We teach the children these things because we believe them to be true and part of their useful and necessary equipment for life. I imagine that the most convinced Freethinker would teach a child points of conduct and observance which would conduce to his bodily welfare and surround him with an atmosphere of health and cleanliness from his earliest youth."

The marvel is that our critic fails to perceive that the cases cited are in no sense parallel. Arithmetic, geographic science, elementary sanitation, and the laws of ethics are subjects the truth of which can easily be demonstrated, and it is as such that they are placed in the curriculums of our schools; but "spiritual truths" belong to an entirely different category. We teach our children natural truths because we know that they are verifiable, and that the knowledge of them will be useful to them in their later life; but "spiritual truths" are not susceptible of verification, and to force the little ones to swallow them on the authority of teachers as ignorant of them as themselves is the acme of imprudence and unjustness. And yet we are assured by the clergy that, in the absence of the religious instruction of the young, Christianity would be doomed soon to disappear. So far is this from being nonsensical that the opponents of Secular Education are unanimous in its affirmation. Nobody knows that Christianity is true; but even on the assumption that it may be, it would be fairer to the children to allow them to judge for themselves when they arrive at years of discretion.

Let it never be forgotten that the overwhelming majority of Freethinkers started by assuming that Christianity is true. Not one of them arrived at his present position by assuming that there is nothing in it, all its professors being either selfish rogues or patient dupes. Atheism is the outcome of long, anxious, and painful thought. In this department the thinker assumes nothing but endeavors to prove everything. The critic already quoted regards the phrase that "to think is to doubt" as a demonstrable falsehood, because in his opinion "there is no strong positive belief on any subject whatever which is not the result of thought." With a considerably longer and wider experience than he is as yet able to claim, we beg to differ from him. As a matter of fact, all supernatural beliefs can be traced back to an Age of Ignorance, "a stage to which our anthropologists and explorers have found parallels in every part of the world." As Professor Gilbert Murray so aptly says:—

> "It [the Age of Ignorance or Primal Stupidity] is so typical of stages of thought elsewhere [than in Greece] that one is tempted to regard it as the normal beginning of all religion, or almost as the normal raw material out of which religion is made. There is certainly some repulsiveness, but I confess that to me there is also an element of fascination in the study of these 'beastly devices of the heathen'" (Four Stages of Greek Religion, p. 16).

We infer that our critic has never studied the origin and evolution of religious beliefs, and is likewise ignorant of the difference between beliefs and dogmas. Christianity has come down to us as preeminently a dogmatic religion, and everybody knows that dogmas are the result of speculative and philosophical thought. Theologians have never acted as critics of Christianity itself, but always and only of other systems than their own. Every supernatural belief is the result, not of thought, but of ignorance of the laws of Nature; and we maintain that to think critically about Christianity is to doubt its truth. We well remember that in our own case doubt invariably dogged the steps of thought, and that continual thinking ended in total unbelief.

The fact is that the so-called science of apologetics has completely broken down. No defence of Christianity serves the intended purpose. That is why such a flood of defences is being poured out upon Christendom from day to day, and why unbelievers are at last more numerous than whole-hearted believers. That also explains why Freethinkers are so violently hated and abused, and so frequently prosecuted. It has at length come to pass that the most damaging attacks on the faith are made, not by avowed Atheists, but by professing Christians within the orthodox Church. At the recent meeting of the convocation of Canterbury numerous petitions were presented, some respectfully beseeching the Archbishop "to vindicate the authority of Holy Scripture, and to banish and drive away all erroneous and strange doctrine contrary to God's Word," and others pleading for freedom of thought and speech. The Council of the Churchmen's Union desired to lay before their Lordships of the Upper House, amongst others, the following solemn warning:—

> "We dutifully and respectfully pray your Lordships to remember how often in the past, when the Episcopate or the Convocations have attempted to pronounce authoritatively upon scientific, critical, or historical questions, they have committed themselves to positions which are now by practically universal consent admitted to be untenable."

The Church of England is now a house divided against itself and, as such, destined to be overthrown. The Bishops of London and Oxford figured as stout defenders of orthodoxy, while Bishops Percival and Boyd-Carpenter were in favor of a larger latitude of opinions. Others, men equally in Holy Orders, were condemned as spreading views of Christianity which denied its miraculous character, and which depicted Jesus as "a certain Palestinian Jew," who was by no means infallible, and who never contemplated, and assuredly never instituted, the Church that bears his name. Well, Jesus is reported to have said that a house divided against itself cannot stand; and Christianity, defended by conflicting and necessarily false apologies, is bound sooner or later to vanish, utterly discredited.

"Where No Fear Was."

The Early Poems of Walter Savage Landor, A Study of His Development, by W. Bradley. (Bradbury, Agnew: 1914).

IN spite of the constant growth of new reputations, Landor's fame continues undimmed. Nor is this to be wondered at, for, when alive, he cast the spell of genius upon all who came near him. Southey, who had so many opportunities of judging, has left a magnificent tribute to his memory. Shelley was no less enthusiastic. De Quincey, Carlyle, Dickens, Emerson, and Lamb have all combined in their various ways to render affectionate tribute to that "deep-mouthed Bœtian," as Byron called him. Browning dedicated his "Luria" to him, and Swinburne, the most golden-voiced of recent poets, sat at his feet and found inspiration in his wisdom. How lovingly he refers to him:—

> "I found him whom I shall not find
> Till all grief end,
> In holiest age our mightiest mind,
> Father and friend."

It is given to few to inspire such love among friends, or such fear among enemies. A link between two literary ages, Landor stands a herculean figure in complete steel, towering above his contemporaries, ever ready to do battle for liberty.

Landor's literary activity extended over seventy years. He was a poet embodying revolutionary aspirations in classic language. He was a literary dramatist of great power, and, above all, he was a critic in the widest sense of that much-abused word. The "Imaginary Conversations," on which competent judges have bestowed unbounded praise, is his masterpiece. There is nothing like it in the range of literature. It is a great panorama of historic persons, and includes Plato, in far-off Greece, to our own Porson; Hannibal, of old-world Carthage, to David Hume; Seneca to his own friend Southey. He has painted them all, kings, and greater than kings, statesmen and fair ladies, philosophers and prelates, writers and scientists, of all ages and of all types. Epicurus discusses philosophy in his garden; Montaigne laughs at the worthy Scaliger; Melancthon reproves Calvin.

How, perfectly, too, has Landor caught the relations of the French Court and the great lying Church in the ironic conversation between Louis XIV. and Pere La Chaise, when the king confesses the most damnable crimes and the obsequious confessor imposes the most trifling penances. Scene succeeds scene, each richer and fuller than its predecessor, supplementing one another, and go to make a magnificent picture of "life, like a dome of many-colored glass."

When Landor is at his best, not many are so perfect as he. There are few things more pathetic than his portrait of the unhappy Anne Boleyn. He represents the pious and hypocritical Henry coming disguised to see Anne in the condemned cell. Very touchingly does he express her womanly desire to see her child: "Could I kiss her but once again, it would comfort my heart or break it."

For long Landor's work was "caviare to the general." His masterpiece was venomously and ignorantly described as "the adventures of seven volumes, which are seven valleys of dry bones." This lack of appreciation is the more remarkable because Landor was a real and remarkable genius. In nearly every page of his writing one finds high thinking and rare eloquence. Indeed, a well-edited selection of his works would be one of the most beautiful books in the language. Although he addressed a small audience while he lived, he looked confidently to the future: "I shall dine late; but the drawing-room will be well lighted, the guests few and select."

The chief of Landor's other books is undoubtedly Pericles and Aspasia. Another of his works, The Citation and Examination of William Shakespeare for Deer-Stealing, provoked Lamb's happy epigram that it could only have been written by "the man who did write it, or he of whom it was written." Landor's poetry is not large in quantity, but few poets have won such recognition with such a small nosegay of verse. The exquisite lines on "Rose Aylmer" have found their way into many anthologies and many hearts, whilst the sympathetic lines on the death of Charles Lamb are an exquisite tribute to a splendid genius. The single stanza, in his own original manner, prefixed to one of his last books, epitomises Landor's life and aims in four lines:—

> "I strove with none, for none was worth my strife.
> Nature I loved; and next to Nature, Art;
> I warmed both hands before the fire of life;
> It sinks, and I am ready to depart."

For those who care for concentration and restraint in literature, Landor's writings are full of delight. As a man he was dowered with the hate of hate, the scorn of scorn, the love of love. Withal he was a typical Englishman, with an appetite for the heroic. He showed this when, on Napoleon's invasion of Spain, he went over, and, with his own energy and money, raised a regiment with whom he marched to the seat of war. A man of letters, he was also a man of action.

Landor has been called "a grand old Pagan," and his sympathies were certainly secular rather than religious. The eternal arrogance of priests always roused his opposition, and on this subject he writes with vigor. Speaking of the Bible, he makes Melancthon say to Calvin:—

> "The book of good news, under your interpretation, tells people not only that they may go and be damned, but, unless they are lucky, they must inevitably."

And again, referring to religious persecution :—

"The unsoundness of doctrine is not cut off nor cauterised; the professor is. The head falls on the scaffold, or fire surrounds the stake, because a doctrine is bloodless and incombustible. Fierce, outrageous animals, for want of the man who has escaped them, lacerate and trample his cloak or bonnet. This, although the work of brutes, is not half so brutal as the practice of theologians, seizing the man himself, instead of bonnet or cloak."

In another page he returns to the attack :—

"There is scarcely a text in the Holy Scriptures to which there is not an opposite text, written in characters equally large and legible; and there has usually been a sword laid upon each."

He has a sly hit at spiritual intoxication :—

"At last the zealot is so infatuated by the serious mockeries he imitates and repeats that he really takes his own voice for God's. Is it not wonderful that the words of eternal life should have hitherto produced only eternal litigation?"

He closes the conversation with the magnificent words, "There is nothing on earth divine besides humanity."

Carlyle finely said of one of Landor's best literary efforts, published when the "old lion" was over eighty years of age: "The sound of it is like the ring of Roman swords on the helmets of barbarians! The unsubduable old Roman!"

The last few years of Landor's life were spent in peace. On reading of Swinburne's visit to the old man shortly before his death, one is reminded of Turner's superb picture, "The Fighting Temeraire," where the old battleship is being towed to her last berth and transfigured by the last glance of day's expiring glory. The symbolism of that great painting is exalted in the harmony between the memories of brave, old Landor and his abiding quiet, for whom for ever—

"All winds are quiet as the sun,
All waters as the shore."

    "That the present inadequate state of Freethought organisation militates against its effectiveness as a national force in England, and that Freethinkers should, if possible, be united in one National Federation, and that the N. 14. Motion by Mr. J. T. Lloyd :—

    "This Conference congratulates the Government on the practically assured success of its Welsh Disestablishment Bill, and hopes it will carry the same principle forward in a Bill for the Disestablishment of the Church and other forms of religious privilege in England."

15. Motion by Mr. C. Cohen :—

    "This Conference deeply deplores the continued growth of the spirit of Militarism, both at home and abroad, and regards the growing expenditure of the European nations on war and preparations for war as unimpeachable evidence of the failure of the Christian Church as a civilising force; it therefore looks to the growth of Freethought principles and humanitarian ideas as the only agencies that promise a release from the moral and financial burden of Militarism."

This Conference will sit in the Queen's (Minor) Hall, Langham-place, W.; the morning session lasting from 10.30 to 12.30, and the afternoon session from 2.30 to 4.30. Both are purely business meetings. Only members of the N. S. S. can speak and vote. A public meeting will be held in the evening at 7 o'clock. Acid Drops.

The funniest "thanksgiving" service we ever heard of took place on Sunday. It was organised by the Churches. There has been a great deal of talk about the blind lately. The lot of these unfortunate people has been bewailed, and special efforts are being made to provide them with better means of earning their living and brightening their leisure hours. A bright idea occurred to the clergy. Of course it was something illogical. While so many people were blind many more people could see, and these should thank God for "the gift of sight." It would have been less selfish on their part if they had sunk the thought of themselves and besought God to extend the gift of sight to those who had never had it or had been deprived of it by some accident or some disease. All their "thanks"—and they know it—will never make the "Father of All" display an impartial benevolence to his children.

We have no doubt that those people who have sight will feel deeply appreciative of their own good fortune. But if they are really justified in thanking God for sight — that is, if it comes from God, for otherwise it were absurd to thank him for it—what of the many thousands of people in this country who are blind? Clearly they have a legitimate complaint against God; for if people see because God has given them sight, others do not see because he has withheld the "blessing." To make the thing complete the blind people ought to hold an indignation meeting protesting against the action of Deity in causing their blindness. This is not blasphemy, it is only common sense. The right to praise implies the right to blame. If piety did not invariably dull intelligence every-one attending those services would have asked themselves the question, "Why has not God given to all people the 'blessing of sight' that I have myself?"

This "thanksgiving" idea might be developed. Religious services might be held to thank God for the gift of a good liver or a good pair of kidneys; though it is to be feared that a multitude of religious people, including a large per-centage of the clergy themselves, especially in crowded centres of population, would have to be left out of such assemblies. They could join the Holy Willies' meeting, however, and thank God for making them "sae gifted." Two-legged Christians might thank God for giving them the full number of lower limbs, and the one-legged might thank him for not depriving them of both. There is no end to the developments of this idea, and the clergy should really work it for all it is worth.

The May meetings have brought the usual crop of mis-sionary visitors and missionary sermons. The Secretary of the Church Missionary Society, preaching at Bow Church, Cheapside, says that China is now ready for Christianity. We have heard that before, and we fancy all that it means is that Christians are ready to supply it. The only evidence offered is that of a Christian Englishman in China, who said, "China's one hope is in Christ." That, too, we have heard before. More pertinent is the remark which the Secretary says was made to him by a "distinguished states-man in China" some eighteen months ago. He said, "If, as we develop our resources, we spend them on education, on hospitals, and put first the welfare of the people, instead of spending large sums on armaments, will the Christian nations keep their hands off us?"

Now, that sentence has an authentic ring about it. It is the kind of thing a shrewd Chinaman would ask a Christian who was bothering him with all the cant talk about the civilising influences of Christianity. And it must have been a poser. Would the Christian Powers keep their hands off China? Have they done so? Why the only safeguard for China for many years has been the fact that the gang of European brigands could not agree upon the share of the plunder. Piratical expeditions in all directions have been the rule of the Christian powers, and always under the sickening guise of religion and morality. The question of the Chinese statesman was exactly the complaint of the leader of the Turkish Parliament a few years back. He, too, said that they had hoped to devote their energies and their resources to a betterment of the people. But Christian Europe would not have it. It compelled Turkey to embark on a great military development if it was to retain its freedom. It is compelling China to take the same course. From the greed and brutality of Christian nations the non-Christian nations have only one sure protection—that is to be strong enough to make spoliation a dangerous enterprise.

Finally, the Secretary of the C.M.S. asked, "Have mis-sions any part in helping to arrest war?" And, of course, he said Yes. It is a safe thing to say before a religious audience, but it was utterly false. A very large part of the trouble with China in the past has been directly traceable to missionary activity. More than one outbreak there was the result of missionary interference with native justice and native customs. In New Zealand the war with the natives had as a powerfully contributory cause the greed and aggrandisement of missionary societies. In India missionary zeal was one of the causes of the Mutiny. All over the world the missionary has been the advance guard of armed intervention. How can missionaries prevent war? They obviously do not make their own people less warlike; and none but a lunatic would argue that missionary interference with native customs make a people more kindly disposed towards those whom the missionary represents.

In a religious contemporary the advertisements include notices to the ruptured, toothless, paralytic, bald-headed, half blind, flat-footed, and the cancerous and dyspeptic. We always thought Christians were on the down grade; we are sure of it now.

A portrait of the late Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, unveiled at the Central Hall, Westminster, is described as "start-ling." Why so? Is the figure holding a copy of The Atheist Shoemaker?

The Rev. A. J. Waldron says there are "in reality three Bibles: The Book of Nature; The Old and New Testa-ments; The sum of human experience." He appears to know as little of religion as of irreligion, for the veriest tyro might have reminded him of the existence of the sacred books of the East.

After officiating for thirty-seven years, the Rector of Stock, Essex, has resigned the living. The rector says, in announcing his resignation: "The number of able-bodied men who never, or only rarely, attend public worship shows me that my ministry is to a great extent wanting in due influence on the spiritual life of this parish." We congra-tulate the rector on his candor. Thousands of other clergy-men would say the same were they equally straightforward. And yet the reverend gentleman has no obvious cause to attribute his failure to personal demerit. No man ought to expect to overcome the spirit of his time. In theory the clergy still remain the spiritual guides of the nation; in practice they are becoming of ever-lessening consequence. No one seriously troubles about their spiritual thunderbolts, or is gravely concerned with their supernaturalistic preten-sions. They are mere survivals, and the world bears with them because they have always been here. Here and there one man feels the position, but the majority of the clergy will hang on so long as the world is stupid enough to tolerate them.

It is strange, however, how the cant about the authority of the clergy is kept up. Speaking on the second reading of the Sunday Closing Bill, Mr. Ellis Griffith said in the House of Commons that "leaders of religious thought of all denominations were in favor of some such restrictions as were proposed." One would like to know from Mr. Ellis Griffith what he considers to be the precise value of the authority of the clergy on the subject, and on what facts that authority is based? The clergy as a body are not expert statisticians, sociologists, or scientists. In either of these directions no one counts them as of any weight what-ever. Their views on all social questions are obviously directed by sectarian considerations. Imagine anyone in their senses taking as a guide on a social question of any importance the opinion of a person like the present Bishop of London! Viewed from any rational point of view, the opinion of the clergy carries no weight whatever. We do not say this as a Freethinker, but as an expression of opinion that few thoughtful people would challenge. The power of the medicine-man belongs to the savage, not to the civilised State.

When the Balkan War was brought to a close, Albania was created an independent State, and Prince George of Wied elected as its king. Both the Mohammedan and Orthodox Catholic inhabitants were agreeable, and Dr. Dillon, the eminent authority on Eastern affairs, is of opinion that left alone the Albanians might have worked out their own political and social salvation. But this was to reckon without the opposition of Greek Christians in Albania and beyond its borders. These have mad trouble from the outset, and recent reports, now well confirmed, contain sickening accounts of the barbarities exercised by these modern "Crusaders." In one village, Hormova, over 200 villagers have been hanged or killed. At Kodra nearly 200 Mohammedan Albanians were crucified, the nails being driven through the chests, hands, and feet of the victims; many others have been massacred or burned alive in their houses. A later report adds that at Hormova the children were cruelly tortured, many of them having their fingers cut off. One thing seems certain, that is, that assuming as true Christian stories of previous Mohammedan cruelties, they were mild compared with the barbarities of these Crusading Christians. For refinement of cruelty the Mediæval Inquisition was an easy first in the world's history. Modern Eastern Christians seem bent on showing that Christianity, in modern times, has not quite lost its power of supremacy in this direction.

Rev. W. H. Thorpe, a missionary home from India, says if there were no Christian missionaries in India there would be "profound unrest," because "as modern knowledge spreads and grows, the disintegration of creeds is bound to follow." Just so; but that is a consequence that no more affects the religions of India than it affects those of Great Britain. What Mr. Thorpe assumes is that, if Christianity is on the spot in India, it will take the place of the native religions. And this is a dream of sheer fanaticism. The educated Hindoo—the one, that is, who is chiefly affected by the spread of modern knowledge—does not become a Christian. He is willing, in the absence of other means, to get his education in Western ideas through missionary agencies, but that is all. And some of the greatest native opponents of Christianity in India are those that have been educated in missionary colleges.

Christianity is the worst religion in the world. Especially for lies and hypocrisy. Some of our readers will remember how the American clergy chortled over the grief of Mrs. Ingersoll at the death of her husband. They did not even allow for the fact that she had more than most widows to weep over. They laughed at the "consolations" of Agnosticism. Why don't they laugh now at the consolations of Christianity? The American newspapers report that "Mrs. Horne is prostrated with grief." Ingersoll died suddenly in his wife's company; the Rev. Silvester Horne died suddenly in his wife's company. The two cases are essentially similar. Yet the Christian wife's grief is treated as perfectly natural, while the Agnostic wife's grief is treated as a warning against "infidelity." The orthodox head is as soft as the orthodox heart is hard.

We are inclined to think that when John Bull speaks of the Rev. A. J. Waldron as representing "a surplice with a man under it," and as one who will speak the truth and "damn the consequences," the editor is writing with his tongue in his cheek. The remarks quoted are apropos of Mr. Waldron's recent confession that he does not believe in the resurrection of the body. But does that really require much courage and demand a superior sort of a man nowadays? Why, there are probably hundreds of thousands of Christians who have already said the same thing; and in that fact lies, in all probability, Mr. Waldron's rare "courage" in following suit. Imagine, too, the quality of a man who has only just realised that the resurrection of the body is unthinkable! It requires no ability to come to that conclusion, and nowadays it requires precious little courage to say it. Any man calling himself civilised and educated ought to be ashamed to confess that he believes so stupid a teaching.

John Bull is on safer ground when it points out that Mr. Waldron is an ordained priest of the Church of England, and is paid to teach the doctrine he says is unthinkable (it is not a bit more unthinkable than other doctrines he still preaches), and "to men of honest instinct it is equally unthinkable that the Vicar of Brixton should long remain bondsman to a Church whose tenets he has obviously outgrown. It is inconceivable that he should continue to eat the bread of the Establishment while claiming the freedom of dissent. For is not he an honorable man?" It is to be observed that John Bull puts the last sentence in the form of an interrogation.

There is no fear whatever that Mr. Waldron will abandon his post as vicar of Brixton merely because he does not believe in the teachings he is paid to preach. He is only in the position that many others occupy. There are thousands of clergymen, both Conformist and Nonconformist, who do not believe, in any straightforward sense, in the teachings of the Church to which they belong. They remain, they draw their salaries, and they invent numerous devices by which they may interpret doctrines to suit themselves, or delude themselves with vague talk about the advance of thought. As though the advance of thought had anything to do with it. The advance of thought may explain a change of opinion, it will explain a man leaving the Church, but it cannot explain, nor excuse, a man continuing in a Church after he has rejected its teaching. To vary the expression cited above, "No straightforward man could continue to eat the bread of a Church while claiming freedom to reject its doctrines." In no other profession would such conduct be considered permissible for a moment. And the curious thing is that, apart from the question of religion, these same men will act quite honorably. It is religion that appears to demoralise them.

Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner does well to contradict the old "watch" story about her father as often as she can. We are glad to see her recent letter to the Times correcting a new version of it from the pen of Mr. Stephen Graham. But why talk about "the feelings of Mr. Bradlaugh's relatives and friends" at this time of day in relation to such a matter as this? Mr. Bradlaugh was a public man—he belonged to the world, and he belongs to history. Besides, it is not the wickedness of the "watch" story that anybody cares about now, but its shocking silliness. Whatever he was or was not, everybody is agreed that Bradlaugh was not a fool. It would be perfectly obvious to a man of his intelligence that "God" was not bound to accept a challenge from anybody, at any moment, and at any place; and that the challenge had no logical relation to the question at issue.

A Suffragette tried to burn down Spurgeon's Tabernacle by means of a bomb last week-end. It was very wrong, of course; but she did not succeed in doing much damage. "God's" week-end effort was on a grander scale and far more successful. With one of his earthquakes he destroyed one of the most beautiful parts of Sicily, killing hundreds and injuring thousands of his own creatures. The Suffragette is rightly denounced; not a word is said against "God."

A lady complained to the Rev. Forbes Phillips, of Gorleston, that she was poisoned by the incense at his church. The vicar's characteristic reply was that he would await the finding of the coroner's inquest before dealing with the matter. A palpable hit!

The May meetings are sounding their "annual bray," as Macaulay phrases it. Two of the meetings were presided over by princes and two by dukes. The Archbishop of Canterbury takes six, and the Lord Mayor of London five. Peers preside over twenty-two. What a change since the fishing-nets of the apostles were sold to the rag and bone dealers!

Half of the Baptist ministers have salaries of £100 a year and less, and a quarter of a million of money has been raised to supplement the incomes of the poorer pastors. Who would think that the founder of Christianity was sold for thirty shillings?

Christian preachers, realising that their religion is a stage nearer the melting-pot, are now taking a great interest in social reform. At the Presbyterian Synod, the Rev. J. A. Wilson, in supporting a resolution in favor of a living wage, said there were 50,000 women in London earning only 1½d. an hour. It was only a penny a day in the New Testament.

A new Biblical play, entitled The Holy City, was produced appropriately at the Comedy Theatre recently. The scenes include the roof of Mary Magdalene's house, and Christ is supposed to be just off the stage on several occasions during the drama. Perhaps this is less laughable than the attempt to portray the Second Person of the Trinity by means of the limelight and some spangles, as was done in a melodrama some years ago.

"There is nothing in politics, rightly understood, that cannot be a service to God," is a saying attributed to the late Rev. Silvester Horne. It should comfort the hearts of the carpet-baggers and "mugwumps."

The Rev. Father Rance, of Southend-on-Sea, says that people who spend five shillings on a Saturday outing often put twopence in the plate at church on Sunday. How much does he expect them to have left for the collection?

The Rev. A. Newman, of Whittlesea, has made the amazing discovery that Sunday games are unobjectionable. He might conduct a mission among his ministerial brethren.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £146 5s.

W. HEPWORTH (Johannesburg).—We note your correction that the alleged Zulu word "tungi" in our issue for March 15 should have been "tunzi." The error, we feel, is pardonable in a proof-reader in this paper. Our shop manager received your subscription quite safely, and we hope the paper has reached you regularly.

E. RUSSELL.—Your question was answered in last week's issue. The publisher is Methuen; price 6s.

W. BYNION.—We are not surprised that straightforward speaking on religion is not relished at the gatherings you attend. The reverend gentleman to whom we replied in "Acid Drops" of a fortnight ago is not the one you have in mind. You will find a further reply to another letter from the same gentleman in this issue.

A. J. MARRIOTT.—Your letter, beyond expressing your endorsement of Miss Kidd's article and disapproval of Mr. Palmer's opinion, does not add anything material to the discussion. Miss Kidd and Mr. Palmer have both had their say, and so far as we are concerned the matter must now be left. We have only a limited space at our disposal; so far as is possible this must be reserved for those specific objects for which this journal exists.

T. LECONTE (Paris).—Subscription for paper received. We are glad to learn that you find so much pleasure and profit in what you call our "interesting and courageous paper."

ATHEIST (Birmingham).—We do not see how one can very well separate the "ethical system" of the New Testament from the New Testament theology. It is quite evident that it was the theology about which the first Christians were most interested, if not the only thing in which they were interested. And it was certainly that upon which the Christian Church was built. The notion that it was the ethical teaching of Jesus that was all-important is quite a modern idea. It is just one of the means by which modern apologists have tried to commend an outworn superstition to a civilised community.

THE COMING CONFERENCE.

I SAID the other week that there must be some fine weather in May. Fortunately I never pretended to be infallible. It looks as though the fine weather in this May would have to hurry up. Personally I find the lack of warmth and sunshine a bit trying, but I am getting stronger every day, and also every night, for I am sleeping rather better. I have no doubt of being reasonably fit at the N. S. S. Conference on Whit-Sunday at Queen's (Minor) Hall. I hope to meet a good rally of "saints" then, and a larger rally, of course, at the evening public meeting. I have some things to say there which I consider to be of the highest importance to our movement. They occupied my mind a great deal during my recent illness. I believe they will occupy the attention of the Freethought party a great deal in the future. My friends well know that I mean all I say.

G. W. FOOTE.

Sugar Plums.

Arrangements for the N. S. S. Conference are now well in hand, and some of the items on the Agenda, which appears in another part of this issue, may have developments that will be of importance to the Secular movement. We hope that London Freethinkers will be doing their best to make the Conference, and particularly the evening meeting a complete success. As it is in London, the advertisement most of necessity be of a personal nature. One cannot "bill" London as one could a small town. Some slips advertising the evening meeting are being prepared, and those who can oblige by their distribution should send their names to Miss Vance, the N. S. S. General Secretary. As will be seen from the Agenda, a Conference luncheon has been arranged, and notice should be given as early as possible by those who intend to be present at that function.

We are sorry to learn that Christian rowdies continue to do their best, and their worst, at Edmonton. Miss Kough was the lecturer on Sunday last, and was subjected to a running fire of interruptions, not in the best of taste or expressed in the choicest language. After her lecture was concluded, and she had left the meeting, the rowdyism became more marked, and the police were compelled to interfere. Under the circumstances Mr. Cohen has promised to deliver a lecture there this evening, and we hope the platform will receive proper support. The meeting will be held on Edmonton Green, and is timed to commence at 7.30. Edmonton Green is near the Town Hall, and can be reached either by tram or 'bus, or by the Great Eastern Railway service.

The English Review has always the merit of not being platitudinous and "respectable." This should be an appeal in itself to Freethinkers. The May number contains one of Henri Fabre's interesting articles on Insects—this time on Red Ants. Mr. Frank Harris's symbolic story, "The Veils of Isis," will repay a close perusal. We cannot say we are any more in love with Mr. H. G. Wells's "The World Set Free," which ends in this number. A clever political skit by the editor, called "King Carson," deserves special mention amongst the remaining contents.

Sir Herbert Tree has been speaking very freely to a Referee interviewer on Sunday performances in theatres. He is all for legalising them as soon as possible. He denounces the methods by which the clergy of all denominations still fight the Sunday opening of theatres, even where they are obliged to wink at the Sunday opening of picture-shows and concert-halls. It is pretended that the performances at these places are devoted to charity. "Yes," Sir Herbert says, "yes; I know that 'charity.' It comes from — well! I will say no more, lest I should drop into, say, Shavian prose."

We sometimes wish we had the power ascribed to Jesus in the Apocryphal Gospels—that of stretching a plank of wood to a desired size. In that case we might be able to do the same with the columns of this paper, and so find room for much that often has to be left out. Unfortunately, our qualities are of a less picturesque character, and so we regret that we have been compelled to hold over a further instalment of "Abracadabra's" Christian Apologetics. We apologise both to our contributor and to our readers, but cannot get thirteen inches into a foot, try how we may.

According to the Christian Age, Dr. A. C. Dixon, of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, has been asked to allow his sermons to be translated into Chinese, Russian, Spanish, and other languages. Let us hope that the reverend doctor will expunge his references to Ingersoll before the translations are made. Otherwise, we shall be compelled to have a Chinese edition of the Freethinker.

Religion—Protestant as well as Catholic—is ceasing everywhere to control the life of the State. Government in all countries is becoming sternly secular. The preambles of old Acts of Parliament contained usually in formal words a reference to the will of the Almighty. Legislators looked for instruction, not to political economy, but to the Bible. "The will of the Almighty" is now banished to the conscience or the closet. The statesman keeps rigidly to the experienced facts of the world, and will have neither priest nor minister to interpret them for him. Political economy may contradict the Sermon on the Mount, but it is none the less the manual of our political leaders.—J. A. Froude.

"Humanity in its misery has put question after question to science, and has lost patience at the slowness of the advance of knowledge. It has declared that the answers already formed by science are futile and of little interest. From time to time it has preferred to turn back, and to delude itself with the beautiful mirage offered by religions and systems of philosophy.

"But science, confident of its methods, has quietly continued to work. Little by little, the answers to some of the questions that have been set have begun to appear. Whence do we come? science has been asked unceasingly. Is not man a being unlike other beings, made in the image of God, animated with the divine breath, and immortal? No, science answers. Man is a kind of miscarriage of an ape, endowed with profound intelligence and capable of great progress. His brain is the seat of processes that are very complex and much higher than those of other animals, but these functions are incompatible with the existence of an immortal soul."—PROFESSOR ELIE METCHNIKOFF, The Future of Man, p. 286.

"Instead of having fallen from a perfect religion, man has but slowly emerged from the grossest superstitions. No one now supposes that some God invented architecture or music. We can trace how these arts have grown. Religion, as much as the arts, has developed from rude beginnings. It is a growth of earth, not a gift of heaven, and its manifestations have usually very clear traces of their clayey origin sticking to them."—J. M. WHEELER, Footsteps of the Past, pp. 1-2.

DRYDEN, in his play, The Conquest of Granada, speaks of a time "When wild in woods the noble savage ran." Jean Jacques Rousseau declared that primitive man, as he first appeared upon the earth, was perfect, both physically and morally. "Man is born free and everywhere he is in chains"* are the arresting words with which his Social Contract opens. While men like the Atheist Condorcet were nerved to action by the dream of human perfectibility in the future—which was, indeed, the dominant belief of the best minds of the eighteenth century—Rousseau turned from this splendid vision, regarding it as fantastic mockery. For him, the golden age lay, not in front, but behind. From his glowing imagination he conjures up an idyllic picture of a primitive arcadian state, where pity takes the place of laws and manners, and where the savage enjoys rude health through avoiding the overheated dwellings and over-abundant diet of the rich. So long, says Rousseau, as men lived in hovels, used bows and arrows, and were content with garments of skins, "they lived free, healthy, good, and happy."† Rousseau traces all the calamities, woes, and ills that beset mankind entirely to man's presumptuous efforts to emerge from that happy ignorance in which, he declared, eternal wisdom first placed us. As man has progressed in science and art, so he has lost in health, freedom, and morality.‡ Our best plan, therefore, would be to retrace our steps along the path we have travelled, discarding civilisation by the way, until we again arrived at the primitive state of innocence and ignorance from which we started.

Such were the ideas with which Rousseau captivated Europe, and were destined, later on, to bear fruit in the great French Revolution, the leaders of which were all impregnated with these ideas of Rousseau, whose works constituted their Bible.

But we know a great deal more about savage life, and primitive man, than at the time when Rousseau wrote his Discourses (1750-4) and his Social Contract (1762). Three sciences have sprung into existence since then—Anthropology, Ethnology, and Sociology—and these have given the death-blow to the idea of the "noble savage" and the beautiful arcadian existence led by primitive man. As that gifted Frenchman, M. Salomon Reinach, well observes: "The idea evolved in the eighteenth century of the free savage, emancipated from all constraints, is irreconcilable with the most elementary facts of ethnography. Rousseau's free savage is not a real savage, but a philosopher who has stripped himself naked."*

The savage is not noble, he is not free, he is no healthier than we are. Lionel Decle, the traveller, tells us that in Africa, in spite of the practice of polygamy and the large number of children born, "More than seventy per cent. die before they reach the age of five months; and for this reason, if polygamy ceases to exist, the native races will disappear from Africa."† Mr. E. D. Morel, another good authority, says that among the Nigerians "Infant mortality is terrible."‡

The average duration of life among adults is also far below the civilised standard. It is well known that missionaries rely a great deal more upon the medicine-chest than upon the Bible for making converts, and every missionary now sent out has to have a knowledge of medicine.

> "Honesty, kindness, gratitude, do not exist for them. The thief is not despised because he has stolen, but because he has allowed himself to be caught, and if his crime remains undetected, he is admired by all. The higher powers, whether chiefs or spirits, are respected in direct proportion to what we should call their cruelty and tendency to evil. At the great dance, as we have seen, the great warriors came forward and enumerated the number of people they had killed, not only in war, but also in their own country—for instance, if they had put a man to death by order of the King. Whenever Lo Ben wanted someone killed, every man was anxious to be entrusted with the mission, whether the intended victim were his bitterest enemy or his dearest friend. Kindness is considered by them the result of fear."§

Their women are only worth slightly more than cattle, and are only appreciated for the work they are able to perform; "our conception of love is unintelligible to them" (p. 166). The same author says: "I could tell many stories of unnatural and barbarous abominations among them." But the negro, meaning thereby the Bantu, is not the lowest type met with in Africa. "That distinction," says Mr. Decle,—

> "belongs to the bushman. The bushman is, perhaps, a little more developed than the anthropoid ape, but he remains his first cousin. He makes himself a fire, and we understand his language. The ape cannot make a fire, and at present we do not understand his language. That is all the difference between the two."

He is by instinct "intensely malicious and destructive." And further:—

> "The African black in the primitive state is hardly further removed from the beast. His existence centres itself almost wholly upon one aim—for it can hardly be called an ideal—eating. Thought for the morrow is absolutely unknown to him. Give him his food for a week, he will devour it until he cannot gorge another mouthful, and then he will spoil the rest. He is as little conscious of the past as of the future. Things are wiped from his mind the moment after they have happened; he is absolutely incapable of measuring time, even from the most recent and important events. Only in one way does he bring himself into relation with the past—through the sentiment of fear and revenge. Gratitude is unknown to him. The animal affection of parents for their young rarely extends with the primitive African beyond the years of infancy; after that the relation is forgotten, as it is among the beasts. Love is unknown to him. There is no word in any Central African language meaning 'kiss.'"‖

Added to all this,—

> "the native sees nothing beautiful, wonderful, or attractive in Nature. Flowers and trees, and the most enchanting scenery, are entirely lost upon him. A tree only begins to interest him when it is fit to burn. And yet, though he finds nothing to be enjoyed in Nature, he is quite satisfied with his position. All he wants is plenty to eat and little to do, and these wants are generally perfectly easy to satisfy" (p. 517).

Miss Kingsley, in her Travels in West Africa (p. 356), says "You rarely, indeed I believe never, find an African with a gift for picturesque scenery." And Crawford, the missionary, speaking of a gorgeous African sunset, a "dissolving scene which memory makes its own," says of the Negro, "To him this painted poetry is the plainest of plain prose."*

Of course, there are many other tribes in Africa who have made more progress than these, and Mr. Decle is careful to point out, more than once, that he is referring to the most primitive. That he was a competent observer is testified by the famous explorer, H. M. Stanley, who, in writing an introduction to the work, says that Mr. Decle was entrusted by the French Government with a scientific mission "to proceed to South and East Africa, to study their ethnology and anthropology, for which purpose he was peculiarly well qualified by his training and observation" (p. 8).

Gluttony and waste seem to be characteristic of primitive man in all quarters of the globe. J. P. Thomson, in his book on British New Guinea, speaking of the feasts at which the natives "gorge themselves," observes:—

> "Native festivity is not infrequently accompanied by great privation brought about through scarcity of food. This degenerative social institution of feast and famine does not confine itself to New Guinea, but extends itself over the whole equatorial zone of the Pacific" (pp. 70, 71).

—Resulting in "thousands of hungry children and weak, lean mothers."

Catlin, who lived for many years among the North American Indians, tells us that a party of Indians returned to camp "with fourteen hundred fresh buffalo tongues," not a pound of the flesh or a skin being used, the camp being well stocked with dried meat. "This profligate waste of the lives of these noble and useful animals," says Catlin, "is a fair exhibition of the improvident character of the savage."†

Again, in far-away Patagonia, Carl Skottsberg tells us:—

> "What delight when they come across a stranded whale! Feasts are held as long as anything eatable is left; from all directions the savages hasten up, eat till they are fit to burst, and pull away with loaded canoes. Several of the Indians we met had big quantities of whale-blubber. This does not contradict the fact that the Indian only lives for the day and never thinks of saving anything; he leads a wild life, with meat and blubber one day and nothing to eat the next."‡

Messrs. Spencer and Gillen say of the Aborigine of Australia:—

> "He has not reached the agricultural stage of civilisation, and has no idea of cultivating cereals or of laying in a stock of food to maintain himself during the time when food is scarce. He lives from hand to mouth without any thought of the morrow. When food is abundant he eats in plenty and is quite happy; when it is scarce he accepts the condition philosophically, and, if hungry, merely tightens his waist-belt and patiently waits until such time as he can find something to eat."§

Design and Natural Selection.—II.

THE second illustration—that of the human eye—is rather an unfortunate one to put forward as affording design in nature. Nothing is more common than to see persons or animals with defective eyesight; and any imperfection in vision resulting from an inherent quality of the organ is an evidence either of bad design or an absence of design altogether. To allege that an imperfect organ can be the work of of an all-wise and all-powerful Deity supposes that a perfect being can produce a failure.

Nor could a perfect organ, designed by an Almighty God, get out of order; for it is a positive evidence of imperfect workmanship that an organ or instrument becomes impaired or rendered valueless by use. Thousands of people born into the world are born with eyes out of which they cannot see. As Tom Hood, in one of his satirical poems, says of Tim Turpin, who was gravel blind:—

> "And ne'er had seen the skies;
> For Nature, when his head was made,
> Forgot to dot his eyes."

But in this case the deficiency would be chargeable against Deity; for Nature, being neither intelligent nor good, cannot be considered as answerable for her imperfect productions.

There are thousands of persons born blind, and hundreds of thousands whose sight is so defective that they keep the doctors at our ophthalmic hospitals in constant employment. As an optical instrument, the human eye is very imperfect. To enable him to see small objects, or objects at a great distance, man has to call in the aid of the optician, who can manufacture microscopes by which very minute particles of matter can be seen, or telescopes by which heavenly bodies altogether out of view to the naked eye are brought within the range of human vision. "Optically," says Professor H. D. Garrison, of America,

> "the eye is not perfectly planned to guard against spherical and chromatic aberrations, while in mechanical construction it is inferior to the cheapest optical instrument in the market. Astigmatism, or want of sphericity of the cornea, is present in a greater or less degree in every human eye, while the crystalline lens are not truly centred, as Helmholtz has shown, on the optical axis of the eye. The refracting media of the eye, as the aqueous humor, the crystalline lens, the vitreous humor, are not uniformly transparent, and hence rays of light during transmission undergo absorption and refraction, giving rise to various shadows, halos, and fringes, which fall upon the retina, to the great impairment of vision. Even in the best of eyes there are numerous opaque granules, or floating patches, in the humors, giving rise to moving spots or spectres, so well observed, and yet so annoying, while using the microscope, especially if the field is well illuminated. Long-sightedness and short-sightedness are common difficulties, arising from want of proper relation between the refracting power of the eye and its depth, or the antero-posterior diameter. All these difficulties are practically overcome or avoided in even the cheapest photographic cameras in the market, and yet no one has ever claimed that the camera had a miraculous origin, or that the wonderful design manifest in its mechanism proves its designer to have been a God."

Every organ that man possesses is in some respect imperfect—indeed, absolute perfection is altogether inconceivable, there being degrees of perfection only, by reason of comparison with other objects. Thus, as organs, one pair of eyes may be more perfect than another, though each may be defective; and so on.

When, instead of individual objects being taken separately, we take the working of nature as a whole, we find that all animated nature is in constant warfare—the insect against the vegetable, the birds against the insects, the lower animals against the birds, and man against them all. And so terrible is this struggle that, if the Design Argument were really true, many of the designs are of so destructive and horrible a character as to reflect anything but credit upon the wisdom or goodness of the Deity who is the alleged author. Thus we find the claws and teeth of some carnivorous animals are so arranged as to be just suited for the purpose of laying hold of and tearing the flesh of their prey. In fact, in nature the strong oppress the weak, the brutal ride roughshod over the gentle, the lion tears the peaceful deer or the inoffensive lamb; idleness and hypocrisy revel in luxury whilst modest honesty walks about in rags. And how oft indeed the earth has been deluged in blood through the wickedness, the superstition, or the caprice of the powerful! With truth crushed to earth, virtue outraged, misery and suffering perpetually abounding in the various nations of the earth, is it not folly to talk of the beautiful designs of Omnipotence? Man, assuming in his vanity that everything was made especially for him, has arrogantly declared that everything in the universe was arranged to subserve to his benefit

Curé Meslier, in his Bon Sens, relates an Eastern story which fittingly describes this arrogance. A priest, on a pilgrimage, wanders through some gardens; he is surrounded by trees, whose foliage enchants the eye and the perfume of whose leaves is delicious. Some of the trees contain luscious fruit, of which he partakes, and, as he does so, he shouts up in his ecstasy, "Allah, Allah, how good thou art to the children of men! Thou hast made these trees to charm our sight and the fruit to minister to our wants; how good thou art to the children of men." Proceeding on his journey, he goes through still more beautiful gardens. He hears the birds singing in the trees; while the sun in all his glory and refulgence shines upon the face of the earth, and everything seems to breathe an air of joy and peace, and in his ecstasy the priest again exclaims: "Allah, Allah, how good thou art to the children of men." The sun had sunk below the horizon when the priest, still on his journey, proceeded to climb an exceedingly high mountain, on the summit of which, at nightfall, he lay himself down to rest. When, in the morning, he arose from his sleep, he looked on the other side of the mountain, and lo, he saw the corpses of men who had been slain in battle strewn about the earth, and wolves were devouring the carcases, and as they did so they seemed to exclaim in their ecstasy, "Allah, Allah, how good thou art to the children of wolves! Thou hast made these men fight in order that we might have the ineffable bliss of devouring their bodies; how good thou art to the children of wolves!" And it is this arrogant feeling that the earth and the fruits thereof were made specially for him that has caused man to imagine a God designing and arranging everything with a view of making him happy and contented.

That we may understand the meaning of natural selection it is well that the facts upon which the theory rests should be briefly stated. And, first, it assumed that the proposition, that all animated matter has the power to increase beyond the means of subsistence, is one of irrefragable truth; and that, were it not for the constant operation of checks, the number of beings that would be produced under favorable conditions would outstrip nature's capability to provide enough food to enable them all to live. It has been calculated by Linnæus that a plant which produced only two seeds annually, and whose seedlings only produced two, would, in the course of twenty years, produce no fewer than one million of plants. Nature kills off the young of animals and destroys thousands of eggs and seeds. For every seed that comes to maturity, a thousand perish; for every animal that survives and lives to a good age hundreds die young or are destroyed at birth. And nature kills man in precisely the same way. When too many are born a famine kills thousands, and disease kills more. Among the millions of plants and animals that exist no two are alike. Either from inherited qualities or other similar causes there are found to be some variations from other existing beings in every creature born into the world. However slight these variations they constitute an advantage or a disadvantage to the individuals possessing them. These variations take place under two well-ascertained conditions—under nature according to geographical position and the constantly changing conditions of life; under domestication as the effects of habit, and, in regard to plants and the lower animals, the result of artificial selection, or selection by man on account of possessing some superior qualities which were thought worthy of preservation. From the fact of there being more beings in existence, as compared with the amount of food at their command, a struggle for existence is set up in which the "fittest" or those best adapted to their surroundings get the advantage, while the weak and those in other ways unfit for the uneven battle have inevitably to succumb.

And all experience goes to show that it is only to "those who survive" in the great struggle for existence that the theologian points so triumphantly as the evidence of the wonderful designs of an all-good and all-wise God.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

The Phenomena of Procreation.—III.

WHEN the yoke of an egg is examined, a white spot is seen on its upper surface. This white spot is the germ-disk from which the embryo arises, and all the remaining material contained within the yoke membrane is rich food provided for the needs of the growing embryo. If an egg which has been incubating for several days is examined, the embryo is seen surrounded by membranes, parts of which are provided with blood vessels. The fluid in these tubes is propelled by the pulsation of the embryo's heart, which begins to beat on the second day of incubation. These blood vessels, in the first instance, convey the food particles contained in the yolk, and afterwards from the white of the egg to the expanding embryo. This blood circulation also enables the embryo to obtain oxygen from the air which penetrates the pores of the egg shell, and supplies it with an instrument for expelling the waste matters it produces in the course of development.

The importance of these two circulatory processes, which together constitute the respiration of the evolving bird, is made manifest by the fact that the embryo perishes from suffocation when the pores of the shell become choked with any foreign substance. If the embryo is to develop into a chicken, duckling, or any other nestling, unimpeded access to oxygen, and ability to discharge its waste carbon-dioxide are absolutely essential. Realising this, poultry breeders and bird fanciers make a point of keeping eggs that are intended for hatching, clean before, and during the period of incubation.

Some of the snakes, the crocodiles, and the various turtles are oviparous, and their embryos are remarkably similar to those of the feathered family. Unlike birds, however, reptiles do not brood over their eggs, but resign their hatching to the gracious warmth of the sun. Various snakes give birth to living young, as do some of the lizards. With these viviparous reptiles, the eggs are retained in the oviducts until the young are fully developed, and are then expelled from the body by muscular movement. Viviparous snakes are moderately prolific. "The garter snake sometimes gives birth to as many as 45 in one brood; the rattlesnake produces 9 to 14; the copperhead, 7 to 9; and the water-moccasin, 7 to 14."

Some of the embryological phenomena relating to those organisms in which internal development is universal remain to be briefly outlined. To meet their new requirement, the oviducts of mammals have been enlarged and arranged to enable them to hold their eggs during development. This expanded organ is the uterus or womb. In primitive mammals such as the kangaroo and opossums, a right and left uterus has been evolved through the enlargement of a part of each oviduct. But, in the higher mammalia, the right and left uteri become fused in the course of embryological development, and there then remains one single uterus, which is connected with each ovary by a Fallopian tube. The eggs formed in either oviduct are conducted along the corresponding tube into the womb, where, if they have been impregnated, they evolve into embryos. In all mammals, man among them, the egg cells are impregnated by sperm cells which have joined them after passing through the secretions of the lining membranes of the womb and its tubes. The egg divides almost immediately after fecundation, and may have undergone marked changes by the time, usually a day or two, that it passes from the tube into the womb.

The number of egg cells fertilised on a single occasion varies considerably with different animals. Apes, horses, cattle, and women usually produce one at a birth, although twins and triplets are far from uncommon. The pig, rabbit, rats and mice, the domesticated dog and cat produce quite a litter of young. The number of offspring appears to depend on the number of egg cells that are matured and fertilised. With different mammals the period of pregnancy is also subject to wide variations, and is to some extent conditioned by the size of the animal. The guinea pig is pregnant for about three weeks; the rabbit and squirrel deliver their young after thirty days. Gestation occupies three months in the lion; four months in the pig; six months in the bear; nine months in the cow, and a little more than nine months in the human female. The whale takes ten months, the horse eleven, the giraffe fourteen, and the elephant twenty-two months from the copulative act to the casting of the young from the womb.

The embryological arrangements for nutrition and respiration previously described in the case of birds become far more elaborate with mammals. The connection established in the egg of the bird between one part and another is in mammals developed into a system of communication between the blood channels of the embryo and those of its mother. This may easily be verified through an examination of the embryo of a rabbit, which answers for a study of mammalian embryos in general. The membranes which encompass a rabbit's embryo are abundantly furnished with blood vessels running towards the embryo's heart. Lining tissue (epithelium) of the doe's womb encircles the embryo, and this tissue absorbs the nourishing blood from the heart and arteries of the parent body. Tree-shaped outgrowths may be seen embedded in the external membranes of the embryo :—

> "These tree-like processes receive their blood supply from the embryo's heart through blood vessels in the umbilical cord attached to the embryo at the umbilicus or navel. As a result of this close attachment of the membranes of the embryo and the lining of the uterus, the blood vessels of the two are near enough to allow osmosis. From the maternal blood capillaries, foods, and oxygen osmose into those of the embryo, and the excretions of the embryo's cells pass into the maternal blood. Solid bodies, like red-blood cells, cannot pass from the maternal to the embryo's blood; and the blood cells in the embryonic blood vessels are formed from certain cells belonging to the embryo. However, the important point is that food, oxygen, and excretions osmose between the maternal and embryonic blood vessels in the membranes which attach the embryo to the wall of the uterus."

The membranes which fix the embryo to the womb are termed the placenta. As a rule, the placenta or afterbirth detaches itself from the womb as soon as the young are delivered, and is itself driven from the body through the muscular motions of the uterus. The embryological phenomena just passed under review substantially explain the large size of most mammals at birth. The provisions for internal nourishment are so elaborate, and the time occupied in the greater mammals for intra-uterine development is so long, that the highly evolved condition of the newly born offspring is easily understood.

The placental structure which attaches the unborn mammal to the womb of its mother and provides a nutritive connection between them is a specially mammalian organ. It is not present in the monotremes, which lay eggs, and its condition in the marsupials is little more than incipient. But with all the higher mammals it occurs in some form or other, "always acting as a double vascular sponge, by which the blood of the mother nourishes and purifies that of her unborn young."

As already intimated, the eggs or ova, after their development within the ovaries, soon reach maturity, and are automatically expelled. If, at this period, they are impregnated by the male element, they evolve into embryos; but if they are not, they soon lose their vitality and perish. Under favorable conditions, then, fertilisation of the ripe egg is accomplished through its union with the spermatozoon. This union is believed to occur in the human female in the upper third of the oviduct, or Fallopian tube, the fertilised ovum afterwards entering the uterus, where it develops the attachments necessary to the nutrition of the embryo or fœtus during its development within the womb.

Direct knowledge concerning the development of the human embryo was far from complete until Wilhelm His published his investigations in his work on Human Embryology. A few isolated descriptions of the appearance of the embryo during the first few months of pregnancy were previously available, and even now the obstacles which bar increased information are very serious. The main sources from which detailed knowledge is obtained are post-mortem examinations, operations, and abortions.

Nevertheless, many phenomena are now clearly demonstrable as a result of observation and experiment. From the fertilised ovum, then, proceeds the embryo, and from this the fœtus is evolved. If we adopt the scheme of His, the ovum phase covers the first two weeks; the embryonal period covers the third, fourth, and fifth weeks, in the course of which, the principal organs make their appearance until in the fœtal stage the embryo passes into the fœtus, when, at the end of nine months, the child is born. The average length of the embryo at the age two weeks is approximately 0·1 ins., at eight weeks 1 in., at three months 2 ins., and at birth 19·7 ins.

One of the earliest ova was described by Peters in 1899, and was ten or eleven days old. In this case, as in various others of later development which were subsequently studied, there was nothing which in the slightest degree distinguished the human embryo from that of other animals. One human embryo about four weeks old which was figured by Mall would pass for that of a rabbit or a dog.

The doctrine enunciated by Haeckel, which that eminent zoologist founded on Von Baer's law: that the development of the embryo or fœtus broadly represents the phases through which its ancestors have passed in the course of evolution, and which is more briefly stated in the expression that ontogeny recapitulates phylogeny, remains unshaken. Even Louis Agassiz was powerfully impressed by these facts although he never had the courage to admit the truth of evolution. Some of the universally acknowledged embryological facts are sufficiently striking. At one stage the human embryo possesses gill-slits and a two-chambered heart like a fish; at a later stage the gill-slits disappear and the heart becomes reptilian. At a still later stage a monkey-like tail is present, and even at birth the child uses its feet in most ape-like fashion, and not until it is several months old are the essentially animal instincts replaced by those that are specifically human. As a distinguished naturalist remarks, unless the phenomena of embryology point to evolution they are most mischievously misleading, and apart from their evolutionary interpretation, remain utterly meaningless. It is not claimed that the embryological record holds good in every little detail, but in a broad and general way. In the words of Maitland Balfour, "It may be compared to an ancient manuscript with many of the sheets lost, others displaced, and with spurious passages interpolated by a later hand."

T. F. PALMER.

I say that the State power should not be used to arrest discussion, because the State power may be used equally for truth or error, for Mohammedanism or Christianity, for belief or no-belief, but in discussion truth has an advantage. Arguments always tell for truth as such, and against error as such; if you let the human mind alone, it has a preference for good argument over bad; it oftener takes truth than not. But if you do not let it alone, you give truth no advantage at all; you substitute a game of force, where all doctrines are equal, for a game of logic where the true have the better chance.—Walter Bagehot, "Literary Studies," vol. iii.

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

The strength of a man's virtues must not be measured by his occasional efforts, but by his ordinary life.

The Savage in Our Midst.

THE other day the Daily Telegraph devoted a fair-sized paragraph to what it evidently considered an interesting, if not an important, item of news. One of the players in the Ladies' Golf Championship had lost her mascot, a model of a little black pig, which she carried for luck. And the writer went on to describe how the lady, in consequence, played much less skilfully than was her custom. That, of course, one can well believe. If she believed that the possession of the charm brought her "luck," its loss would ensure a certain loss of nerve. That everyone would admit, and I have no doubt the lady herself would admit that this was all there was to say about it. The power of "faith" is not a religious truth, but a psychological one.

Those who are not in the habit of carrying "mascots" or wearing charms have generally little conception of the vogue these things have. During the past two or three weeks I have marked three or four advertisements in widely circulated papers, offering for sale mascots of various kinds, and one advertisement assures possible purchasers that their's is the genuine Eastern article which has brought luck to so many of its wearers, and is being worn by people in the highest ranks of society. The latter one can well believe. From an anthropological point of view, those who move in the higher social circles may be just as primitive as those in a lower stratum, and their beliefs equally crude. Again, one observes on the front of motor-cars miniature "teddy bears" or other articles that are supposed to exert some influence in securing good fortune. Charms are carried about on the person, or hung up in the house, and a real concern is often shown at their loss. People still talk about their lucky or unlucky days, while houses, years, or numbers are still credited with a baleful or favorable influence; and although, in the vast majority of cases, there will be disowned any real faith in the efficacy of these things, their vogue bears evidence to a huge, and often unsuspected, mass of primitive superstition still current.

In a lecture on The Scope of Social Anthropology, Professor Frazer well says:—

> "In civilised society most educated people are not even aware of the extent to which.....relics of savage ignorance survive at their doors.....Systematic inquiries carried on among the less educated classes, and especially among the peasantry, of Europe have revealed the astonishing, nay, alarming, truth that a mass, if not the majority, of people in every civilised country is still living in a state of intellectual savagery; that, in fact, the smooth surface of cultured society is sapped and mined by superstition. Only those whose studies have led them to investigate the subject are aware of the depth to which the ground beneath our feet is thus as it were honeycombed by unseen forces. We appear to be standing on a volcano, which may at any moment break out in smoke and fire to spread ruin and devastation among the gardens and palaces of ancient culture wrought so laboriously by the hands of many generations."

Dr. Frazer had in mind, in writing the above, the more glaring examples of savage survivals, such as are found among the peasantry of Europe, but his observations apply to a much more extensive area. It applies to the "educated" classes as well as non-educated. The superstitions may not be as gross in the one case as in the other, but they are there; and, being there, form part of the "intellectual" savagery to which Professor Frazer refers. In the West End of London there are hundreds, perhaps thousands, of fortune-tellers and professional "occultists." Their clientele is not made up of uneducated, but of educated people. Education does not always protect a man against superstition; often, it only provides him with specious excuses for its existence and its exercise. In the case of the savage or uneducated person, we see the superstition, so to speak, in the raw. In the case of the educated man, we have it glossed over with a number of scientific and philosophical terms. But it is the same thing at bottom. There is no vital distinction between the savage offering prayers to the tribal ghosts and the modern believer praying to his magnified, but still anthropomorphic, Deity. It is less brutal to hold a thanksgiving service after a successful war than to butcher one's prisoners in order to please a God who has delivered them into one's hands, but the mind that is capable of the one will be capable of the other, given a different social environment. The one who believes that a man is "divinely called" to officiate as a minister of religion is only perpetuating in a changed form the primitive belief that the tribal god enters and takes possession of the medicine-man in order to express his will. Taking the sacrament is just as much a savage custom as the primitive practice of god-eating. All these religious rites and ceremonies upon which so many dwell are as much evidence of the persistence of intellectual savagery as is the purchase of a charm to scare away a disease, or the wearing of a "mascot" to bring good luck. Animism may be expressed in scientific terms, just as a savage may wear clothes made by a West End tailor. But the language no more robs the idea of its animistic character than the mere wearing of clothes converts a savage into a civilised person.

Most people, when they come across accounts of admittedly superstitious customs or of savage survivals in our midst, smile pityingly, and then dismiss the subject from their minds. But the matter is of a far graver import than such people think. It is, from one point of view, amusing that a lady should be unable to play golf with her usual skill because she had lost a charm in the shape of a little black pig. From another point of view, and bearing in mind how widespread is the superstition, and noting also its connection with kindred superstitions, it is symptomatic of one of the dangers that front modern civilisation. Professor Frazer, in the lecture from which I have already quoted, says that "the community is really dominated by the will of an enlightened minority," and that "the higher human intelligence sways the lower, just as the intelligence of man gives him the mastery over the brutes." In a general way this is, I suppose, true. But the intelligence that sways a society need not be either "higher" or "enlightened" in a cultural sense. It needs only be strong, and strongly directed towards a clearly perceived end. I do not think anyone will claim that the intelligence of the early Christians was higher or more enlightened than that of the writers and leaders of Pagan Roman society. The reverse of this was demonstrably the case. But Christianity eventually dominated that community, and brought Roman civilisation to ruin. And its success was mainly due to energetic but unenlightened intellects appealing for support to a mass of superstition current in Pagan society.

What has occurred once may occur again. Culture is wider, perhaps, to-day than in the days of the old Pagan Empire, and it is based on a more solid foundation of fact; but its greatest danger now, as then, comes from the presence in our midst of widespread superstition, to which the reactionist may at any time make a successful appeal. On a small scale this appeal is being constantly made, and with some amount of success. Local agitations may still be worked up in favor of a Sabbatarianism that is a living illustration of the survival of the savage principle of taboo. People may still be imprisoned for blasphemy; and a vast number of our fellow-countrymen still seriously believe that the nation would go to the dogs without an Established Church. And one can conceive—even though it is not immediately probable—a conjunction of circumstances that would induce a body of men like the clergy, whose influence is threatened by the advance of civilisation, making a final appeal to that floating mass of superstition that exists around us. Whether the appeal would be successful or not is another question; but the possibility of its being made is always with us, and while that is the case civilisation is indeed "standing on a volcano." Fortunately, the diversified character of modern culture has had the effect of withdrawing strong minds from the Churches to such an extent that its power for evil has been seriously curtailed. But the possibility of having at command, by means of an appeal to their ingrained superstitions, a vast mass of human material is one that may at any time appeal to one or more strong men greedy of power and unscrupulous as to the method by which they acquire it.

The pig-wearing golf-playing lady may, therefore, stand as symptomatic of an aspect of our civilisation that will not be without its significance to those who bear in mind the nature of the causes that determine social change. For whether its consequences be cataclysmic or not, some consequence all this survival of primitive superstition must have. You cannot have hundreds of thousands of people believing in luck and charms and magical formulæ, believing in angels and devils, and ever greedy after the supernatural—if only in the diluted form of "occult science" (whatever that may be)—without there being induced a more or less unsound conception of social life. By such minds scientific formulæ are accepted, but they are not assimilated. They become no organic part of the mental life. This type of mind becomes, too, a vast reservoir on which the reactionist will be always able to draw, and on which he is constantly drawing. It is the one real danger that threatens modern civilisation. So far as one can judge, ancient civilisations perished because they were overrun by a people of less culture. This was the danger that was ever before the rulers of old Rome, and against which they were constantly battling. But they overlooked the danger within, and in time that oversight proved fatal. So it is with ourselves. We are not to day threatened by any barbarian invasion. We cannot be overrun by savages from without. We have a thousand-and-one safeguards against that. It is the savage in our midst that constitutes the danger, and how to civilise him is the great problem of the future.

Guessing is only fertile in proportion to the fertility of the experience it reproduces. If a man knows little, he can infer little.—George Henry Lewes.

Notes on Some May Meetings.

STRANGE admissions are being made just now by the leaders of various religious denominations. The Rev. Joseph Hocking, preaching at Burton-on-Trent a few Sundays ago, stated that "the majority of people are living in practical forgetfulness of God, which is evidenced in the general neglect of public worship, of prayer, of the religious services which nourish the life of the soul." He also said that "Sunday, as a Christian Sabbath, seems to be passing away." We all know how entirely true those admissions are, but although he made them quite frankly, Mr. Hocking very inconsistently contended that the Gospel cannot be treated lightly. Is it possible to forget God and neglect public worship without treating the Gospel lightly? Can people turn the Christian Sabbath into a holiday without showing disrespect for the message of the pulpit? The fact is that the Gospel not only can be, but actually is, treated with exceeding levity by an overwhelming majority of the people of this island. It is also admitted, not merely that the Church is being gradually shorn of its influence, but that the Gospel is losing its hold of the Church. A writer in the Christian Commonwealth for May 13, tells us that the supremacy of Jesus Christ in his own House is now at stake, which is equivalent to saying that the Church has deteriorated in quality. A layman, speaking on the subject of Religion and Business at the recent Presbyterian Synod, expressed the opinion that the people most difficult to manage are churchgoers and teetotalers. Principal Selbie, in his address from the Chair of the Congregational Union, deplored the deadness of the Church, declaring that what they needed was "a new sense of Christ's headship and of the reality of his presence, as well as a new idea of the Church and of their own responsibility to and for it."

Now, the curious thing is that, in spite of these grave admissions, some speakers at the May Meetings maintained that Christ is the King of the world, and that the body of which he is the head rules Christendom. Principal Forsyth, for example, asserted that the Church is the mother of modern Europe, and that historically the attitude of nation to Church was filial piety. Take the following extract:—

> "The Church in its Calvinist, Puritan, and Independent forms was the mother of modern civil liberty. It was in a Church issue and a Church crisis in this land that modern democracy arose. And its worst perils are those that arise, not from being a son of the Church, but her prodigal. The Free Churches, as the legatees of Puritanism, saved the nation when the Anglican Church, which had so greatly blessed it, took a wrong path, and could save it in that crisis no more. If the Catholic Church created England, the Free Churches saved it.....The Church gives to the nations their object in life, their true destiny and moral selves."

That is what the Nonconformists call the highest of High Churchism; but it is so high that it never touches solid ground. It is simply a beautiful castle in the air. The Catholic Church did not create England, nor did the Free Churches save it. England became what it is very largely by setting itself in opposition to the voice of the Church. Modern civil liberty owes nothing to Christianity, though it must be confessed that Protestantism, by its powerful resistance to authority, has rendered an indirect service to the cause of freedom. Dr. Forsyth regards the Free Churches as "the legatees of Puritanism," forgetting that Puritanism was the sworn enemy of liberty and afforded no support whatever to the brotherhood of mankind. We are told on the best authority that the Puritan "loved all that were Godly, much misliking the wicked and profane." As John Richard Green says of him:—

> "His bond to other men was not the sense of a common manhood, but a recognition of a brotherhood among the elect. Without the pale of the saints lay a world which was hateful to them, because it was the enemy of their God. It was this utter isolation from the 'ungodly' that explains the contrast which startles us between the inner tenderness of the Puritans and the ruthfulness of so many of their actions" (A Short History of the English People, p. 466).

As a matter of fact, the brotherhood of mankind is not a Christian doctrine, any more than the universal Fatherhood of God. According to the teaching of the New Testament and the orthodox Church, mankind are not by nature children of God, but become such by a second birth, nor are they brothers and sisters until they are made Christians. The only brotherhood recognised by Christianity is that of the believers. To say that the Free Churches ever saved the nation is to utter a positive falsehood. The nation is still unsaved, or is in the slow process of self-salvation. The Bishop of Oxford knows quite as much about the nation as Dr. Forsyth, and will only smile disdainfully at the latter's egoistic claim.

Historically speaking, the State never was in love with the Church, though the latter made a long and resolute attempt to dominate the former. The State resented and finally successfully resisted the Church's domineering attitude; and the story of the gradual secularisation of politics is in reality the story of the Church's decreasing power and glory. When was the attitude of the nation to the Church that of filial piety? Certainly that is not its attitude to-day. In proportion as ignorance and superstition disappear, the Christian faith decays. The general neglect of public worship is sufficient evidence that the nation no longer loves its alleged mother. Its filial affection is conspicuous only by its absence. Now, the question naturally arises, why do the majority of people live in forgetfulness of God? Why do they neglect public worship, prayer, and the exercises which it is alleged nourish the soul? The true answer is that supernatural religion and natural knowledge cannot coexist. As light annihilates darkness, so intelligence displaces superstition, and sets man on his rightful throne. Christianity is dying because it is false. Had it been true, not even the gates of hell could have prevailed against it; but being false, not even the gates of heaven can prevent its dissolution. The disintegration of the Church proves the non-existence of the Christian God and the utter powerlessness of the loving Savior of the world. Professor Bartlet said that "every man and woman is raw material for the image of God," while the Bible assures us that man was created in that very image; but we are convinced that every human being is what heredity and environment have made him, and that improvement or salvation is not possible except by means of these two great laws. Dr. Bartlet said further that "the conscience of the average citizen and that of the true member of the Church are very different things in quality and in range"; but we vehemently deny the truth of the statement. The reverend gentleman must be woefully ignorant of the world if he verily believes that an average Christian is a better person than an average non-Christian. The superior conscience is that by which the best citizens are ever guided in their treatment of one another; and we are fully persuaded that the true member of the Church cannot help regarding and treating non-members as children of the Devil who richly deserve eternal damnation. The Nature of Things decrees that a believer can have no portion with an unbeliever, and that Christ can have no concord with Belial. We have renounced the belief in God, Christ, and Belial in order that we may consistently cherish the belief in the brotherhood of mankind. Christianity divides mankind into sheep and goats, placing the former on the right and the latter on the left hand of the God of love; and this false division has resulted in thousands of heartless persecutions and bloody wars.

Mr. Hocking spoke the truth when he told his Burton hearers that the general public no longer troubled itself about the supernatural, the followers of the Lamb being a miserable minority; but he was entirely mistaken when he stated that the people who give up religion "fail to find a true content" and are the victims of "a mighty famine." He no doubt said that because he did not know any better; but he had no moral right to speak in the name of people concerning whose mental condition he was wholly ignorant. It is our solemn conviction that the intellectually emancipated are the happiest people on earth. They look at life from an intelligent and intelligible standpoint, and are never disturbed by supernatural hopes and fears. Neither God nor Devil causes them a moment's anxiety, and their sole object is to promote the wellbeing of society; and than this there can be no higher or nobler end.

J. T. LLOYD.

"The mental condition of the lower forms of both races [Negro and Bantu] seems very near the other great borderline that separates man from the anthropoid apes, and I believe that if we had the material, or rather if we could understand it, we should find little or no gap existing in mental evolution in this old, undisturbed continent of Africa."—MISS KINGSLEY, Travels in West Africa, p. 312.

"Mankind, as it has been well said, advances in échelons; that is, the columns march not abreast of each other, but in a straggling line, all lagging in various degrees behind the leader. The image well describes the difference not only between peoples, but between individuals of the same people and the same generation. Just as one nation is continually outstripping some of its contemporaries, so within the same nation some men are constantly outpacing their fellows, and the foremost in the race are those who have thrown off the load of superstition which still burdens the backs and clogs the footsteps of the laggards."—PROFESSOR J. G. FRAZER, Psyche's Task, 169.

"He [the savage] is always suspicious, always in danger, always on the watch. He can depend on no one, and no one can depend upon him. He expects nothing from his neighbor, and does unto others as he believes that they would do unto him. Thus his life is one prolonged scene of selfishness and fear. Even in his religion, if he has any, he creates for himself a new source of terror, and peoples the world with invisible enemies."—SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, Prehistoric Times (1865), p. 484.

ALTHOUGH the savage is generally abominably cruel, he is not altogether consciously cruel, at least among the most primitive races. It is due in great measure to lack of sympathy and reasoning powers, just as a very young child will pull a kitten or a puppy about, causing pain through lacking the power of reflection. As Sir Richard Burton points out:—

> "The cruelty of the negro is, like that of the schoolboy, the blind impulse of rage combined with want of sympathy. Thus he thoughtlessly tortures and slays his prisoners, as the youth of England torment and kill cats. He fails in the domestication of the lower animals, because he is deficient in forbearance with them; in a short time his violence will permanently ruin the temper of a horse; and he will starve to death the English dog, for which, perhaps, he has paid a high price."*

In a footnote, the same writer adds:—

> "Amongst the traders of the Bight of Biafra there are, I am glad to say, few men so base as to sell an English dog to a negro king or chief; and were a man to do so, he would be loudly blamed by his fellows."

The savage is also, like the child, a creature of impulse. Sir John Lubbock observes:—

> "Some of the most brutal acts which have been recorded against them are to be regarded less as instances of deliberate cruelty than of childish thoughtlessness and impulsiveness. A striking instance of this is recorded by Bryon in his narrative of the 'Loss of the Wager.' A cacique of the Chonas, who was nominally a Christian, had been out with his wife to fish for sea-eggs, and having had little success, returned in a bad humor. 'A little boy of theirs, about three years old, whom they appeared to be dotingly fond of, watching for his father and mother's return, ran into the surf to meet them; the father handed a basket of eggs to the child, which being too heavy for him to carry, he let it fall, upon which the father jumped out of the canoe, and catching the boy in his arms, dashed him with the utmost violence against the stones. The poor little creature lay motionless and bleeding, and in that condition was taken up by the mother, but died soon after.' "*

Mr. Wilfred Powell, who spent three years among the cannibals of New Britain, says :—

"The passion for killing is often so strong in them that I have been told by natives themselves not to walk in front of them when they are armed, lest this feeling should get the better of them, and they might do me an injury. Of course, this is not so strong a feeling with some as with others, but I believe it to be more or less natural to all, especially the wilder and more savage tribes. Moreover, from infancy they have been brought up to carrying arms and to consider every stranger as an enemy, either openly or covertly. A man without arms they despise and look down upon as being no warrior, and if he be a stranger, all the more do their feelings rise against him."†

In the matter of food, nothing comes amiss to the primitive savage. Major Tremearne, who, besides being a competent anthropologist, has acted as Political Officer in Nigeria, remarks :—

"Sir Harry Johnston says that in Liberia some women eat the lice out of each other's heads, that delicacy being the perquisite for doing duty as barber. I do not know if the same holds good in Northern Nigeria, but I should not be surprised to find that it does amongst the Yoruba people, for they will eat anything."‡

One day, when out with Ajai, a most faithful servant and a Yoruba man, the Major relates an amusing incident :—

"Suddenly Ajai made a dart at a large stone, rolled it over, and began cramming things into his mouth with evident satisfaction. I looked, and to my horror saw that he was eating live insects like cockroaches, and turning to the Mado(i)ki, expressed my opinion of Ajai in no polite terms. 'These Yorubawa,' said the great man, with a gesture of extreme disgust, 'would eat anything; I should not eat those cockroaches unless they were cooked'" (p. 243).

Mr. J. P. Thomson also notices the habit, among the natives of British New Guinea, of eating the vermin with which their woolly mops swarm, and observes : "This vile institution seems to exist in many parts of Polynesia, where the writer has observed the practice for many years."§

Charles Darwin, describing the disgusting appearance of the natives on the bleak and barren shores of Tierra del Fuego, who he found it difficult to "believe that they are fellow-creatures and inhabitants of the same world," describes them as feeding on putrid whales' blubber, and says :—

"It is certainly true that when pressed in winter by hunger they kill and devour their old women before they kill their dogs; the boy being asked by Mr. Low why they did this, answered, 'Doggies catch otters, old women no.' This boy described the manner in which they are killed by being held over smoke and thus choked; he imitated their screams as a joke, and described the parts of their bodies which are considered best to eat."‖

A good deal of cannibalism still goes on in New Guinea and some of the South Sea Islands. Mr. Decle observes that "A great deal of unsuspected cannibalism exists in Africa."

The Gallas, according to the testimony of a writer cited by Major Tremearne, "bury their dear ones in the stomach instead of in the ground." Many writers have exercised their ingenuity in devising reasons for this horrible custom, such as famine, sympathetic magic, religious ritual, etc. The truth is, they prefer it to all other food. Major Tremearne observes :—

"There is no doubt that a longing for the actual flavor of human meat is one of the principal causes, it being sometimes preferred 'high,' and being kept in water for the purpose, sometimes seasoned with lime juice. Thus we are told of paddocks where 'human' cattle were kept and fattened for the market like stall-fed oxen, and when in good condition would fetch about twelve shillings each, and of the bodies of even the nearest and dearest being disinterred and bartered for others not coming within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity."*

Karl Lumholtz, who knew the Australian natives well, says :—

"The natives of Northern Queensland and of many other parts of Australia are cannibals. My people never made any secret of this, and in the evenings it was the leading topic of their conversation. The greatest delicacy known to the Australian native is human flesh. The very thought of it makes his eyes sparkle."†

As to the flavor of human flesh, it has often been compared to pork, but it is evident that this was a mere guess. Mr. Decle, while at Ujiji, eat human flesh two or three times, unknowingly, and found it delicious. It happened in this way. The Rinderpest had destroyed most of the cattle and run the price up until they were almost double the price of slaves. Therefore, there was a strong temptation to supply human flesh in place of animal. But, says Mr. Decle,—

"Some of the natives whom I had engaged at Ujiji had been assured by David that nothing could be hidden from me, and they determined to test my power; they accordingly supplied my cook with human food to see if I would find it out, and I confess that I ate it with great relish, unconscious of what it was. David found this out afterwards, but was afraid to tell me about it; however, to avoid a repetition of the experiment, he only brought meat from goats he saw killed himself. It was only afterwards that he told me about it. I then remembered eating a curry I thought excellent, and having brought to me some grilled bones that I enjoyed so much that I asked several times for more of them: these, it appears, were human ribs. So far as I can recollect they had but very little flesh on them, but this had a fine flavor of venison, with a salty taste, one of the reasons why cannibals greatly relish human flesh. I may add that cannibals seldom eat this meat without having kept it for a few days; usually they bury it, and when it is à point they feast on it."‡

Further revolting details of this disgusting practice may be read in Major Tremearne's book, but no doubt my readers are—to use a slang expression—"fed up" with the subject; at any rate, the present writer is, and concludes this portion of the study of Primitive Man with a sigh of relief. We shall next consider the intellectual powers, modes of thought, and powers of expression of Primitive Man.

A Stormy Petrel.

GENERALLY there was trouble when he appeared on the scene. Had he come and gone without a discussion, the circumstance would have been regarded suspiciously, and there would have been inquiries concerning his health. Expecting an argument, his friends seemed to drift into conversation that asked for it. Unconsciously, maybe, they took the shortest possible tack into the stormy regions; and it was really wonderful how absolutely inevitable that storm was.

Often he would say, with a grin, that his friends were simply proving that mind controlled matter; that mind, in fact, put matter to the blush; and that if a religionist desired something very much he was certain to realise it without the assistance of God at all. It wasn't necessary in the least that God should exist that Christians should see him. It wasn't necessary that Christ should have died on the cross. Christians could see him there now. It wasn't essential that the spirit should be created a palpable entity; for Christians could feel it. That was enough. Their unconsciously expressed demand for an argument, he would say, was pretty similar, in many respects, to the mental attitude of religious fanatics when they wanted badly to see God, or be taken into the arms of Jesus, or feel the Holy Ghost in them, or any other of these religious hallucinations. And he would chuckle to himself.

The two favorite topics were Religion and Social Reform. Invariably they became inextricably interwoven as the discussion generated heat. Religion could not be kept apart from social life. Endeavor as he did to separate the two, he found that the task, in the circumstances, was hopelessly impossible. His opponents seemed quite incapable of examining religion on its own merits and demerits. All their lives it had been estimated the hub of their existence. Their morality had sprung from it; the well-being of their lives was the fruit of their religious principles; and their peace of mind had emanated from the love of God. If Christians would only live as Christians, there would be no need of social reform: that was their conviction; and they instanced their own lives as admirable proof of the idea.

So it was that his friends pulled him down from the intellectual plane into the social gutter; and he used the social ailments that have been chronic to humanity ever since one man discovered that his personal strength of body and brain gave him a power he could enjoy over his less efficient fellows—he used the degradations of humanity to confute their statements.

There were times when the argument terminated in maternal tears and much paternal advice; when the mother heart, poisoned by the vile fumes of religion, thought her son was lost for ever, and mourned as a woman does over her dead; pathetic times and tragic, for an unconquerable bitterness would engulf the son's mind, and his enmity towards Christianity surged and heaved, a storm-lashed ocean of anger under sad, gloomy skies. And the paternal advice, so futile in its well-meaning applications, so sincere in its triviality, so impossible of crystallisation, so full of vague incomprehensibilities, but engendered a despair that hung over the storm like spray-drenched air, damp and heavy.

Repeated renewals of the discussion, however, he told me, gradually wore thin the unpleasantness of the conclusions; and it became possible to enjoy an evening's sitting without suffering and mental anguish on either side. Perseverance and discretion, he said, had made their mark. Not that the minds he had influenced had changed their beliefs; they had not; but it was something to have achieved discussion lacking the tragic element, particularly when the people interested were as sincere as it was possible to be in their beliefs of God, and Christ, Holy Ghost, Spirit, and all the rest. It was something, even in these modern days, to break down the old barrier of religious intolerance. It was something, even assisted by the human blood-ties of relationship, to vanquish the dark and devilish belief of complete segregation, because of a mere difference of opinion, in minds trained from infancy in that doctrine. It was something to have destroyed the religious cancer that makes disbelief a horrible crime. But the memories of that maternal grief were not pleasant. They will always be bitter.

Occasionally, when the recollection burned in his sensitive mind, he would ascribe his hatred of Christianity to his mother's tears. "Had it not been for that," he would say, "I might have been easy on the matter. I might have been peacefully philosophical on the subject, content to let time scatter its dust on religious creeds. The quiet, calm methods, very gentlemanly and considerate, might have claimed my support. Instead of intellectual war it might have been intellectual wonder, and nothing more. But we must hate evil; and hatred is never complacent. Warfare is inevitable. With the sensitiveness to evil goes a relentless antagonism. It is war to the death. The man who hates evil best will fight evil best. He will never own defeat. Well, I saw, in those tears, all the horrible crudeness of Religion, all its harshnesses, all its vile, anti-social qualities. The creed that can turn the mother-heart from her son, the creed that fills her eyes with tears, the creed that forces her to her knees in prayer for a lost child, is a despicable thing. It is criminal. It deserves more than contempt, more than mere censure, more than polite animosity. Sometimes, when the hatred overwhelms reason in me, I fancy it merits open rebellion, revolt in deeds as well as words. Scattered over the world there must be thousands, millions, of people who suffer in this ugly way from the results of Religion's bigotry. When I think of the miseries I have endured, and when my mind goes over Humanity, seeing countless thousands suffer, in the home quietness, from these atrocious tentacles of the octopus of Religion, arms that shoot out and suck joy from youth and love from age, there springs up in me an anger I can hardly quell. The tears are so real and so foolish, the sad thoughts so heavy and so silly, the condemnations so unjust, the woe so deep and so absurd, that the blood boils with wrath. And Religion is responsible for this, Religion alone. It would dominate the mother-heart. It would blast and sere the flowers of love, and cast them into the mire. People would not believe me; but it is true. For years the fondness, the natural fondness, was chilled in my veins. My parents were repugnant to me. I came near to hating them. Didn't my infidelity mean immorality? Didn't it mean present and future damnation? Wasn't I a social outcast? I had forsaken the faith of my fathers. Prematurely I had gone to hell. My mother believed all this nonsense. My father's beliefs struggled with common sense, with knowledge; and he endeavored to pour oil on the troubled waters by saying that I was passing through the valley of darkness to the land of light, and that the rays of God's love would be all the more brilliant because of the time of darkness and gloom. I would change, he thought. As I grew older I would see the error of my ways. I was the lost sheep on the mountain, and the good shepherd spared neither pains nor toil to rescue his wandering lamb. And he was always, always successful. For years I endured this, years of the misery of bitter thought. Is it any wonder I should hate Religion? Is it any wonder I should consider it the most disgusting sore on the social body? Is it any wonder I should bemoan my incapability to fight it as it should be fought? I hate Religion with a bitter hatred; and, if my hatred be uncanny in its intensity, remember I have seen my mother weep, not once, but dozens of times, because her son had strayed from the fold. However, the lamb has never returned, but the stormy petrel comes now oftener than before, and the storm always gives his visit a touch of mental life; but the ships are iron-built these days; they weather the storm bravely; there are no wrecks; for which let there be praise."

Concerning Souls.

FOR downright crudity, for absence of the saving grace of utility, there is no religion to equal the Christian one, which maintains an attitude of dignity upon a pile of absurdities. Though we may test it by contemporary religions, or by the newest of new religions, we find that it stands revealed in naked hypocrisy with its pitiful concept of God. "God as the deity of the sick, God as spider, God as spirit—is one of the most corrupt concepts of God that has ever been attained on earth." In this manner Nietzsche summed up the object of Christian veneration. As the Christians have sadly bungled their God-idea, so, in a similar manner, have they debased their ideas of the soul.

In the present age, when commercialism cuts at the root of culture, when Christian materialism (and there is truth in this paradox) has no broader vision than that of interfering in prize-fights or transforming its places of worship into glorified music-halls, we cannot wonder that, as the God-idea is low so is its soul-idea on the same plane, and an insult to any person of average intelligence.

We have lately made the acquaintance of Plotinus through the good taste of Messrs. Bell & Sons, who are the publishers of his select works in Bohn's Popular Library, and our copy is liberally marked. Although personally we cannot see our way clear to even accept the Platonic idea of the soul, we were struck by its singular beauty and sublimity, and by its immeasurable superiority to the Christian conception.

Plotinus was an ardent disciple and interpreter of Plato, and, bearing in mind the arresting beauty of his philosophy, we are surprised that the early Christians did not crucify him and all those who were attracted by this good and noble man. We can only be truly thankful that the heavy-footed vandals were otherwise engaged, and so we are enabled to know one who soared as an eagle in the realms of speculative philosophy. It is chiefly in his discourses against the Gnostics that the striking contrast is seen between the Greek soul-idea and the Christian one. The former is achieved through laborious days of study and self-discipline; the latter can be claimed by any brutal murderer who uses to advantage the eleventh hour. By this remark we do not sit in judgment on murderers; we do at least say that if a soul is worthy of hostage in a murderer, it is also worthy of lodging in a guinea-pig. But even here we find ourselves face to face with an absurdity. The animal is denied it by Christians, and probably it has never committed any action more criminal than that of subsisting.

Plotinus was extremely reticent about his birth and parentage. One very striking aspect of this remarkable man's character was that he was ashamed that his soul was in his body. When we consider his anti-Christian idea of the soul, such an admission gives us an idea of the loftiness of his character, and we become impatient to know more of one who commenced his philosophy where the Christians finished. To those superior people called God's elect, we venture to think that this idea would cause many heartquakes. Man, in the image of his maker, deliberately stating that he is ashamed of his soul in body; this is blasphemy immortal and divine. But, nevertheless, it is leagues in advance of those crude doctrines used by Christians to frighten women and children. Furthermore, if the blood sacrifice was necessary to save that which is imperishable, the believers in this travesty of a religion would be too ignorant to behold the beauty of such a magnificent conception of the soul as that held by Plotinus.

The Gnostics, against whom Plotinus wrote, were a Christian sect, very active from the first to the sixth century. They held that Christ was of divine origin, and that knowledge instead of faith was the means of reaching heaven. This is an early example of Christian harmony. It is somewhat ironical, too, to find Plotinus at variance with them on the matter of the soul. Their soul-idea failed to satisfy one who had devoted his life to philosophy; he was constrained to shatter and remould it, and, greatest of all, to strip it of that doubly damned exclusiveness which claimed it for the few.

"Nor again is it fit to assert that the soul of the vilest man is immortal and divine." In these words he will not have the soul flung gratuitously to everybody if the Gnostics deny it to "all heaven and the stars that are there, though they consist of things far more beautiful and pure than anything terrestrial."

Poor fallen Gnostics! running round to tag the soul on human beings and forgetting such trifles as the stars. We do not think that the times have changed much. Any victim of the present system called civilisation, be he a murderer or a tyrant, if he can be led to see the error if his ways in time, may partake of glory everlasting. In a comparative sense, the modern Christian and also the Gnostic sects aim at a popular basis for the exploitation of the soul-idea, and, of course, in this manner deliberately court failure. Lovers of animals cannot view with pleasure the prospect of their favorites being soulless; it remains now for some fierce aggressive and progressive branch of Christianity to take up this theory of souls for animals. We should imagine in this Christian country the idea might take root. One pleasing feature of this new departure would be easily observed; most animals in the present day, as far as beauty and fitness are concerned—but there, we think that readers will see our point. Christianity has accomplished so much for mankind that the horses one sees about are better fed and better cared for than the lambs of Christ. We really must return to Plotinus.

That there are many difficulties attendant to a proof of the soul no one will deny, and least of all, Freethinkers. If the proof did not rest on faith and assumption no one would care to disbelieve—Freethinkers included. But the conclusion we came to after reading Plotinus was this: that we, as Freethinkers, are unconsciously treading those paths which lead to harmony with the world, and, although our imperfect efforts meet with no degree of popular success, we must not relax them on that account. Wisdom, temperance, and fortitude were the three degrees whereby the soul, according to Plotinus, was purified. Who shall say that these are not part of the armory of Freethought? And, furthermore, we should be prepared to assert that, logically and by the tu quoque argument, we ought to be ready to burn those who do not think as we do.

In the sixteenth chapter against the Gnostics there is a passage of singular truth and beauty, "Again to despise the world, and the gods, and other beautiful natures that are in it, is not to become a good man." We cannot see anything here to run contrary to the principles of Freethought; in fact, we hesitate to call the soul supernatural, as postulated by Plotinus. It would seem that his acute mind had ransacked the whole of the world's philosophy and brought his theories to light, to ennoble existence, and to satisfy intellect; and it was only natural that such theories should be antagonistic to the Christians.

We recall a particularly odious story in connection with a certain Biblical prophet called Elisha. This saint, hero, or fanatic was subjected to a little rude criticism from children, and, as a result, Elisha cursed them in the name of the Lord, so that two she bears came out of the wood and tear forty and two of them. Chronology has it that this incident of love and tolerance must have happened about the year 896 B.C. At a later period, about two centuries previous to this, Plotinus must have lived. In his conclusion, "Against the Gnostics," he delivers these noble sentiments: "It is possible, therefore, not to be a lover of body, to become pure, to despise death, to have a knowledge of more excellent natures, and to make them the objects of pursuit." We are inclined to think that this kind, wise, and gracious philosopher who could set forth such sentiments, would stand as a God himself in comparison to Elisha, whom, it appears, had not the courage to curse in his own name—not even at children. The reader may say that the comparison is incongruous. So it is, and so it is intended to be. It is our candid and sincere belief that not one character in the Old Testament was worthy to sit at the feet of Plotinus. They all seemed to live in an atmosphere of blood and carnage and crudity that was repulsive, and in comparison, Greek thought seems to inhabit another world

The book in question is dedicated by the translator as a tribute of the warmest gratitude to Meredith and his brother William, and we feel confident that every Freethinker, though he may refuse to surmount the difficulties of belief in a soul, will find in it much that is good and true, much gold and little dross, and its modest price will commend it to all.

Acid Drops

To be a "man of science" is no guarantee against talking nonsense, as we have often pointed out. And when he sets out to champion religion, nonsense is almost inevitable. From the summary of a paper by S. W. F. Barrett, read before the Congregational Union, we learn that—

> "The foundations on which the materialistic school of thought rested its negative agnosticism had been rudely shaken, if not overthrown by recent discoveries of physical science. That school founded itself on the molecular hypothesis of matter. The atomic theory had been shattered. An atom of matter, though of inconceivable minuteness—at least 100 millions being found in the smallest point visible under microscopic power—was found to be a solar system in miniature, and it was a solar system in process of eruption. The atoms were neither solid, nor simple, nor immutable, nor immortal."

We are quoting from a summary only, but as it stands the comment is very largely nonsensical, and part of it is untrue as a mere statement of scientific fact.

It is quite a delusion to assume that Materialism as a philosophy is based upon the "molecular hypothesis of matter," or indeed upon any special theory of the nature of matter. Naturally, Materialists, in dealing with the problem of existence, took the conception of matter that was generally regarded as having the greatest scientific warranty. And when a more accurate knowledge showed the need for revising an accepted scientific formula, the Materialist had a full right to demand leave to reshape the presentation of his case so that it would harmonise with that revised formula. As a philosophy, Materialism is quite independent of any hypothesis concerning the nature of matter. Historically, it is a philosophy of nature that sets what one may call mechanical causation against supernaturalistic operations. Is nature, as a whole, such that phenomena occurring at any time are the exact and necessary equivalents of all that has preceded the appearance of such phenomena? If the answer be in the affirmative, the truth of Materialism is admitted. If in the negative, then supernaturalism takes rank as a probably truthful hypothesis. Naturalism versus spiritualism, mechanical causation versus supernaturalism—hat is the essential issue between Materialism and its opponents.

Now, what discoveries in physical science have been made that tell against the materialistic philosophy? There are none. Every discovery goes to strengthen it, and as a matter of fact it is the accepted working creed of every scientific man, even of Professor Barrett himself. Professor Barrett says the atomic theory has been shattered. If that were true, it could not prove that Materialism was false. But it is not true. The atomic hypothesis is not shattered, and Professor Barrett ought to know better than to make such a statement. That the atom was solid, simple, and indestructible was not a part of the atomic theory. Professor Barrett must know that this is true; and his misleading a lot of clergymen gathered in congress is the more inexcusable because they have no desire to contradict him, and will utilise his opinion to propagate false notions. The ultimate and indestructible nature of the atom were deductions drawn from the atomic theory, but were no essential part of it. The atomic theory—and when a scientist uses that term he must mean Dalton's atomic theory—was an assertion of laws of definite, multiple, and equivalent proportions that are as true now as ever, and they form the basis of modern chemistry. The atom remains. Our conception of the nature of the atom is undergoing, or has undergone, a change. That is all that has occurred. To say that the atomic theory is shattered is simply untrue. Professor Barrett may say that before an assemblage of parsons; we question if he would dare to say it before a congress of chemists.

A few items from two days' announcements of latest wills: Rev. L. M. Seir, Somerset, £27,691. Rev. R. D. Plummer, Folkestone, £11,227. Rev. R. F. Thornhill, £15,000. Rev. R. Preston, Altrincham, £8 219. Rev. J. Ainsworth, Molesey, £2,573. Ven. W. Donne, Wakefield, £11,469.

The Rev. F. Dormer Pierce, vicar of St. John's Church, Southend-on-Sea, has been elected Chairman of the local branch of the London Christian Evidence Society. The other officials include a fried-fish merchant and a Church Army "captain." This trinity of Pierce and Plenty will hardly set the Thames Estuary on fire.

The very same men, says Mr. R. J. Campbell, "who in their private lives may be quite exemplary and even devoted to the church, are in their public capacity as administrators and diplomatists, frankly immoral; their policy is dictated not by moral considerations, but with an eye to the main chance." We have often said the same thing, and the moral seems to us obvious. Mr. Campbell's moral is, of course, that the Church must exert power—which is absurd. Things being as Mr. Campbell says they are, what is needed is the recognition that devout religious belief has no necessary connection with right conduct. When that is generally recognised people will not find it so easy to salve their conscience with acts of devotion to a church, and religious belief will not be so freely utilised as an excuse for "unmoral" action. There will be no veil between a man's actions and their social consequences, and self-deception—rascality's most effective assistant—will not be easy. Mr. Campbell is merely emphasising the failure of religion as a moral force without the courage to admit the truth even to himself.

"It is sickening to read," says Science-Grounded Religion, a monthly Indian journal published at Lahore, "how, in spite of intellectual education and external civilisation of a high order, the West is going down and down in moral life." It then proceeds to give evidence from English preachers of the moral decadence of Western peoples, and concludes that the attention of Indian ethical reformers is sadly needed. It will be a shock to the complacency of Christians to learn that non-Christian people are struck by their need of moral reformation, and yet it is an old complaint. Japanese and Chinese have said much the same thing. We talk of our moral superiority, and repeat the talk so frequently that we have come to take it as an accepted fact. Educated non-Christians who study us at home come to quite a different conclusion. They admit that we are in front of them in scientific attainment and commercial prosperity, but in other directions they are as anxious to improve us as we are to improve them, and with as much justification.

Referring to a forthcoming novel by Miss Corelli, the devout Daily Chronicle says it cannot impart the plot, but readers are requested to "watch and pray." This is serious! One lady of the name of Mary has already been deified; we are not keen about a second.

Mr. Max Mayer, the Hatton Garden pearl specialist, says there are plenty of people rich enough to spend £300,000 on a necklace. Christians pretend to despise money, but they don't let the cash pass them by.

In the early years of Calvinistic rule, Geneva must have been a delightful place in which to live. The following is a pen-picture of the way in which the Consistory controlled life, and is taken from Mr. Hugh Reyburn's recently issued John Calvin:—

> "The Consistory by no means confined its attention to those who were slack in their attendance at church. It looked after their behavior when they were there. Three men who had been laughing at church—one of them behind the shelter of his cap—were sent to prison. Others who criticised the sermon and said that the preachers of former days were better than those who filled the pulpits now were sharply advised not to absent themselves on that account. Others were dealt with for playing cards on Sunday evenings, for spending their time in taverns, for cursing and swearing, for attempting to commit suicide, for possessing a copy of the Golden Legend, for kneeling on a husband's grave and saying Requiescat in pace, for using money to get Masses sung, for fornication, for betrothing a daughter to a Papist, for getting a fortune told by a fortune-teller, for eating fish on Good Friday, for making a chalice and other instruments of idolatry, for singing obscene songs, for shaving the tonsure on a priest's head, for saying it was better to have a quartan fever than to let the ministers have charge of one's soul, for saying there is neither devil nor hell, and that if there is Election and Reprobation there is no condemnation for guilt, for saying there are people who get themselves adored and Calvin is one of them, for arranging a marriage between a woman of seventy and a man of twenty-five, for saying that if all who did not believe in Christ would be damned there would be lots of room in Paradise, and for arguing that men should not be put to death for religious opinions. These instances, taken from an extended period, give a fair idea of the matters which engaged the attention of the Consistory during the first years of its operations."

Principal Selbie, of Mansfield College, says that Christians everywhere are beginning to show they have some conscience in the matter of reunion; and show a desire to stand together and speak together with one voice and one mind. What a triumph for Christianity! What a proof of the power of Christian love! After nineteen centuries Christian people are beginning to think it is time they left off fighting and began to agree together! Well, they never have agreed together, and we venture to prophesy that they never will. And some of the leaders are only anxious for agreement because they realise the increasing growth of an enemy that threatens all sections of the Christian faith. In face of a common enemy, they feel the need of mutual concord. The desire for union has nothing to do with a genuine agreement about matters of faith; it springs wholly from the perception of a danger that threatens to destroy them all.

The truth is that religious belief always makes more strongly for division than for union. Essentially religious belief involves a policy of exclusion. It unites a few who believe by excluding the majority who dissent. Each Church shuts out all who disagree with it, and thus proceeds on the direct opposite to social union, which, of necessity, aims at binding together diversified tastes and beliefs on the basis of common and fundamental needs. Hence, while social development makes for a greater union over a wider area, religious development makes for a greater division. Principal Selbie says that "to introduce methods of party politics into religious assemblies is a sheer desecration." Well, we are no lovers of party politics or of the methods of party politicians, but we may point out that in the past political assemblies will compare very favorably with religious assemblies, and also that the tone and character of political gatherings and political movements are invariably worsened by the introduction of religion. Will anyone say that our present House of Commons has been improved by the introduction of a number of religious Nonconformists? Does a religious discussion in the House make members more polite or more considerate to each other? And look at the Irish question! How much has religion improved the tone of politics there?

In the Englishwoman a Miss St. John complains that Mr. Israel Zangwill in his play, The Melting Pot, has slurred over the fact that the Jews were as bad as the Russians, for had they not killed Christ? This is as sensible as if present-day Suffragettes were made responsible for the behavior of Jael with her little hammer.

During a recent thunderstorm the House of Lords was considering a Bill for the prevention of floods. Why do not the Lords make use of the services of the Bishops, who have special forms of prayer for rain-making and dry weather?

"Learn how to laugh," says the Christian Age. Christians will take a lot of teaching, for their Deity is not exactly a Falstaff.

"People are always good-tempered when they are standing in front of a drop of something," said the Chairman of the Southport Licensing Bench. What, always? Even before communion port at a shilling a bottle?

Trombone-player Carlile says the duty of the Church is to prodigal sons, and not elder brothers, who are too difficult. Dear! Dear! Cannot the musician-evangelist try the inducement of the fatted calf?

"The horrible discovery by the Albanian gendarmerie, reported by Reuter, of two hundred half-charred bodies of Albanian peasants who had been captured by Hellenic 'sacred bands' and crucified within a Greek church, which had then been set on fire to conceal the deed, comes very near to being the most devilish exploit of the Balkan Christians in recent years. As the Greek recruiting agents have gathered the most desperate and lawless elements into the bands organised against Albania, all their proceedings have been savage in the extreme. Perhaps the Balkan Committee will now issue another pamphlet on Moslem wickedness and Christian virtues in the Near East."—The Outlook.

A poor woman at Wokingham killed her six year old child and then herself. In a letter to her husband she asked him "to lead a good life in Christ" and promised to wait "at the pearly gates" for him. The child, she said, she was going to take with her to "the better land." The case is a sad one, as the wife expressed affection for her "dear, loving husband." The only moral we desire to draw is that of wondering when Christians will drop the sickening cant about the strength and courage given by religion to those who believe in it.

In a recent leading article, the Daily Sketch describes the modern church services as "too often an all-long sermon, with a few decorations." Once the Church's services were filled with eternal hell and no decorations.

"You can only get the public to move when you frighten them," says Dr. Edwards Jones. The clergy have known this elementary fact for thousands of years, but the hell-fire scare is nearly played out.

The Vicar of Mellor complains that visitors who came to the Choral Eucharist on Easter Day left at various times during the service. We expect they went because they had had enough, and the rational cure would seem to be shorter or more attractive services. But the vicar threatens pains and penalties for those who will not stay to the end. He says: "We must see that the law of the Church in this respect is observed in future. It is punishable by law to leave the church from the beginning of the service to the end." It may be so; but all the same we do not fear that many will be prosecuted for the offence. The Vicar o Mellor has the misfortune of being born too late. Somewhere about the fourteenth or fifteenth century is his proper period.

Rev. John Raper, curate, was on May 11 sued for damages for the seduction of a girl aged nineteen. The offence had been proceeding for about two years. The jury returned a verdict for the father for £400.

"It is an extraordinary thing that all the boys who come here for this kind of offence seem to be regular attendants at church and Sunday-school." The "here" referred to in the above sentence was the Liverpool Police-court, and the speaker was the magistrate, who ought to know what he was talking about. Two boys, sixteen years old, were charged with being found at night with burglars' tools in their possession. Hence the magistrate's comment. Had these two youngsters been in the habit of attending Freethought meetings, the moral—to the religious world—would have been obvious. As they, and the majority of other youthful offenders at the same court, were regular attendants at church or chapel, the religionist fails to see any moral in the situation. And we do not think it necessary to provide our readers with one.

How little it takes to build up a reputation—with some people. A religious weekly we were glancing through refers to the "abounding humor" of Mr. Will Crooks. Here is the sample given. "You can call on the biggest blackguard you like and ask him if he wants to turn the Bible out of the schools, and he'll say, 'No, I may be a bad lot myself, but I want to give the children a chance.'" As Dominie Sampson would say, "Prodigious!" Consider the subtle humor of the remark! If it were not Mr. Crooks, we should call it sarcasm. For who but Mr. Crooks would consider the fondness of the "biggest blackguard" for the Bible a reason for keeping that book in the schools? The "biggest blackguard" had probably been brought up on the Bible himself. And the result was there in his blackguardism. At least, it had not saved his being a blackguard; and it is possible that his children would stand a better chance brought up on some other kind of literature.

One cannot expect a clergyman to read history accurately, and so one is not surprised to find the Rev. Dr. Forsyth declaring that "it was in a Church issue and a Church crisis in the land that modern democracy arose." Naturally, while the whole of a nation's life is dominated by a Church, any change must be connected more or less with the Church. And that is really all there is in Dr. Forsyth's generalisation. Modern democratic movements began in England in connection with a Church crisis because the power of the Church had to be broken before a democracy could arise. For the same reason the French Revolution also commenced with a Church crisis. In either case, had the dominant Church remained unconquered, genuine civil and political freedom would have been an impossibility. The lesson is not, as Dr. Forsyth thinks, that freedom is founded in religious belief, but that the power of religious belief must be broken before freedom can assert itself.

In a letter to his brother—a clergyman—written just before committing suicide, Mr. J. Lucas, ex-M.P. for Portsmouth, gave as the reason for his action the fact of his suffering from a malignant and incurable disease. He also said, "I trust to the mercy of Almighty God, who has blessed me so abundantly." With an incurable disease Sounds like deliberate sarcasm.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £146 5s. Received since:—F. Akroyd, 11s.

MISS E. KIDD.—We regret we cannot afford further space to continue the controversy between yourself and Mr. Palmer. We have been compelled to decline the insertion of several letters for and against for the same reason. Letters addressed to Mr. Palmer, c/o this office, will be duly forwarded.

BY a slip of the pen we wrote "Prince George of Wiel" in our last week's paragraph on Albanian affairs. It should have read "Prince William of Wied."

S. BEARDALL.—Thanks for cuttings and good wishes for Mr. Foote's "speedy recovery." It is useless regretting what one cannot do; the main thing is that we can all do something to promote the interests of a cause that we have at heart, and you appear to be doing what you can in your own way. If every Freethinker did the same our movement would soon be "booming."

ATHEIST (Birmingham).—We really do not know how you managed to read into our reply the conviction that people cannot be good without theological beliefs. When we said that you cannot separate New Testament ethical teaching from New Testament theology, we meant that the former had no independent existence there, but was obviously based upon the theology taught. And that in the main has been the conviction of the Christian Churches until recent times.

J. KING.—(1) Pleased to have your appreciation of Mr. Cohen's reply to his clerical critic. The reverend gentleman has not accepted the offer for an exchange of articles, but he has written that he would like to see it accepted, although he fears to undertake it himself. Perhaps he will induce someone else to take advantage of the offer. (2) We do not know that we could do justice to our opinion of Adam Smith's Theory of Moral Sentiments in a sentence. Although this work was overshadowed by his Wealth of Nations, we are of opinion that the Moral Sentiments was by far the greater work. It was a valuable contribution to ethical philosophy, and will always repay careful study.

G. BEDBOROUGH.—The advertisement in the Sunday Times of "Bargains in Correct-made Lingerie" is, as you say, about "the limit." Still, it is only what is being done by religious labor homes in this country. Regular dealers are brought into competition with goods manufactured by underpaid labor, and the regular workers suffer in consequence. Sweating for "Christ's sake" is a well-established form of industry.

F. AKROYD.—Thanks for your good wishes for Mr. Foote.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

The Coming Conference.

I BEG to remind the "saints" once more of the National Secular Society's Annual Conference, which takes place on Whit-Sunday at the Queen's (Minor) Hall, Langham-place. The morning and afternoon meetings are purely for business and are confined to members of the N. S. S. The evening public meeting is open to all comers and every seat is free. I hope the "saints" will do their best to advertise this meeting, at which I am booked to take the chair. We cannot offer the "converted infidel" attraction, which is the essential basis of Mrs. Besant's appeal; but her audience in the same block of buildings will still leave some people who prefer Reason to Mysticism.

G. W. F.

Sugar Plums.

This is almost the last opportunity we shall have of calling attention to the N. S. S. Conference on Whit-Sunday. There will be a good list of speakers at the evening meeting—including Messrs. Foote, Cohen, Lloyd, Moss, Heaford, and Miss Kough. As admission will be free, this will be a good opportunity for Freethinkers to introduce their Christian friends. It is not often that so many of our leading speakers are to be heard at once, and the most should be made of the opportunity. Those who intend being present at the Conference luncheon should notify Miss Vance at once.

The Secretary of the Edmonton Branch of the N. S. S. desires to thank those Freethinkers who supported the platform at Edmonton Green on Sunday last. Mr. Cohen had a very large meeting, and, with the exception of a few casual interruptions, good order was maintained. A Father Caverner appears to have been the centre of whatever disturbance there has been, and we are afraid that Secularists themselves have been partly to blame for this in making too much of him. We strongly advise them to continue with their propaganda, and ignore the reverend gentleman altogether. In the long run he will find his proper level, and the more thoughtful of the public will soon discover what that is. Meanwhile, those Freethinkers who are not otherwise engaged on Sunday evenings would do well to favor the meeting-place with their presence.

After twenty-four years' open-air lecturing, Mr. Cohen had decided on giving this form of propaganda a rest for awhile, but he has arranged to deliver a couple of lectures in Victoria Park to-day (May 24), afternoon and evening. Weather favorable, there will no doubt be a good rally of East End Freethinkers.

We have received, after considerable delay, a copy of the circular prepared and sent out by the Committee of the Ramsey Testimonial Fund. Only a few subscriptions are acknowledged on the circular, which was probably drafted at an early stage of the Committee's proceedings. We have before expressed the hope that Freethinkers who bear in mind Mr. Ramsey's many years' work for Freethought will subscribe as quickly and as liberally as possible, and we now repeat it. The treasurer of the fund is Mr. B. T. Hall, Club Union Buildings, 127 Clerkenwell-road, London, E.C. For the encouragement of others, we are ready to insert a list of subscriptions to date on receiving it from the official treasurer of the fund.

We are informed that our paragraph in the Freethinker for May 10 concerning lectures in Regent's Park was incorrect in one particular. "No regular Freethought meetings" should have read "no regular N. S. S. meetings."

More Notes.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING consists of a streak of genius in a loud and vulgar nature. The latter still subsists in full vigor; the former seems nearly played out. What has he done worth reading since his "Recessional," which, after all, was only imitation great work? "The Absent-Minded Beggar" with its "Pay, Pay, Pay!" refrain was a disgrace to the nation, and an insult to the Army. That Mr Kipling thought it rather flattering to Mr. Thomas Atkins, and likely to raise money for him, only shows his sense of the fitness of things when he tries to be serious; perhaps one ought to say when he tries to be a serious patriot. Mounted on a political platform, he raves at the opposite party in the language of a barrack stable-yard. A few days ago at Tunbridge Wells he declared that the Government took up Home Rule for the sake of their official salaries, and nothing else. Now no Government in the world is quite as bad as that. Men's motives are very mixed, and no man would ever be in politics long enough to reach the post of Cabinet Minister if he had not some disinterested desire for the welfare of his fellow citizens. Even that charge against the Liberal Government (of course it never applies to a Conservative Government) does not satisfy Mr. Kipling. He charges the Liberal, Radical, and Socialist members of the House of Commons with "embezzling the public funds" in voting themselves £400. He hasn't heard, apparently, that the Tories, Unionists, Orangemen, and other members of other parties with fancy names, take the "embezzled" money just as cheerfully as the "thieves" who voted it. Neither has he heard that members of Parliament are paid all over the English-speaking world, to say nothing of most foreign lands. Mr. Kipling has made a lot of money by his books; probably hundreds of times more than Shakespeare did; better writers than Mr. Kipling have died of starvation in England. His financial success depended on the fact that he found a popular craze ready to his hand and worked it for all it was worth. Upon this stroke of luck it is that he presumes to talk so insolently to some of his decided superiors. Pausing in his Tonbridge Wells speech to take a glass of water, he said "You've got to clear your mouth for such filth." Such are the manners of "the poet of Empire."

Mr. Kipling, as I understand, is a professed Christian. He is one of those people who are rather for maintaining the Blasphemy Laws than for doing away with them. Freethinkers must be punished for not respecting the feelings of Christians. Had any Freethinker drunk cold water at a public meeting, on the ground that he had to wash his mouth out after talking about such "filthy" things as Christians and Christianity, Mr. Kipling would, we believe, have justified the blasphemous wretch's imprisonment. Thus it always was, and probably ever will be. Those who are quickest in demanding consideration for their feelings are slowest in showing consideration for the "feelings" of others.

I wonder if the picture of Mr. Kipling as a public speaker in Monday's Daily Mirror had any valid pretensions to accuracy. The front view made him look all mouth and spectacles below the eyebrows; and the cerebrum above the glasses looked worthy of an imbecile. Don't do it again, Mr. Kipling. Avoid being caricatured in that way. And by your friends, too!

Tennyson could write what is not very wisely called patriotic verse. The "Revenge," allowing for the defect of too much boasting put into the mouth of the hero, is a magnificent ballad; and the verse at the end, describing the great storm, moves like the rise and fall of the tempest-tossed Atlantic. Mr. Kipling never did work of that kind, but he gained a word of praise from Tennyson for his "English Flag." That was in 1881. His acknowledgment was about as good as it could be:—"When the private in the ranks is praised by the general, he cannot presume to thank him, but he fights the better next day." Mr. Kipling was "clothed and in his right mind" then. He might have been a better poet if he had preserved his modesty. It was well said by Longfellow in his sonnet to Tennyson that the latter was "not of the dancing dervishes of song." Unfortunately that fate overtook Mr. Kipling. And when he mounts partisan platforms he drops the song but wears the costume.

Shelley was a partisan—in a sense. He espoused the side of the people against their deceivers, oppressors, and exploiters. And what a gentleman he was! But he was a great poet.

The Christians worship the Bible. But worshipers seldom study their idol; if they do they become iconoclasts. "Money is the root of all evil" was quoted lately in the Daily Mirror. There is no such text in the Bible. It is "the love of money." If you want to know what the Bible says, ask a Freethinker.

"The King has been spending five days with his soldiers" a newspaper says. His soldiers! Another thing illustrates the superstition of monarchy. The same newspaper, on the same day, described Queen Alexandra as "a miracle of youth and beauty." I don't like discussing a lady's age, or appearance. But I was a schoolboy when Queen Alexandra and the late King Edward were married; and there is no miracle of youth and beauty about me. The author of the Golden Bough has shown that kingship, and all that flows from it, is one of the ancient devices for "gulling the mobs to keep them under." The kings ruled but the priests really governed. The king was their man. When he wasn't he soon disappeared. Read the history of King Saul—then that of David.

Christian Apologetics.

V.—PALEY'S EVIDENCES.

HAVING briefly noticed the so-called "apostolic fathers" and the apologetic work of Irenæus, I will now take two or three examples from the "Evidences" of Paley, in which the testimony of these early writers to the truth of Christianity are adduced. In Prop. I., chap. ix., sec. i., this well-known apologist makes the following confident assertion:—

> "The four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles are quoted, or alluded to, by a series of Christian writers, beginning with those who were contemporary with the apostles, or who immediately followed them, and proceeding in close and regular succession from their time to the present."

This proposition, Paley says, is proved by the "testimonies" which he brings forward from the writings of the following ancient Christians: Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Hermas, Ignatius, Polycarp, Papias, Justin Martyr, Hegesippus, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, etc. The four canonical Gospels, as we have already seen, are named and quoted from by Irenæus (A.D. 185); it will therefore be unnecessary to notice the last three writers. It may also be admitted that these four Gospels were written between the years A.D. 185 and 155—and probably in the order Mark, Matthew, John, Luke. The evidence we require is of their existence in apostolic times—say, from A.D. 80 to 70. When it is borne in mind that the apostles were men when called to the apostleship in A.D. 28, we may take it that if they, or their colleagues, wrote anything at all, these writings would have been produced before A.D. 70, and have been known and named by all Christian writers after that date. I will now call Paley's witnesses in the order named, and for convenience will reply to each before he leaves the box.

I. Barnabas, whom Paley calls "the companion of Paul." In the Epistle ascribed to this individual are found the following quotations:—"as it is written, There are many called; few are chosen"—"he came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance"—"Give to every one that asks."

REPLY: The writer of this Epistle was not Paul's Jewish colleague, Barnabas. He was a Gentile Christian, who wrote in the reign of the emperor Hadrian. The first quotation is almost identical with Matt. xxii. 14—"For many are called, but few chosen." The second quotation reads:—

> "But when he chose his apostles, who were to preach the gospel, [he did so] from among those who were sinners above all men, that he might show that he came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance."

There is nothing in the canonical Gospels which indicates that the apostles were greater sinners than other Jews of their time; neither is this saying employed in those Gospels in connection with the apostles. The quotation is thus given by the three Synoptists:—

> Matt. ix. 13.—"I came not to call the righteous, but sinners."
> Mark ii. 17.—"I came not to call the righteous, but sinners."
> Luke v. 32.—"I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance."

Now, this saying was taken by Matthew, Mark, and Luke from a more primitive Gospel, and Barnabas does not give the name of any Gospel writer. In the third quotation Barnabas says:—

> "Thou shalt not hesitate to give, nor murmur when thou givest. Give to every one that asks; so shalt thou know who is the good rewarder of thy gifts. Keep what thou hast received," etc. (par. xix.).

The nearest parallel to the foregoing in the canonical Gospels reads—

Digitized by Google

Matt. v. 42—"Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away."

I turn next to the "Shepherd," written by Hermas in the second century, and there read:—

"Give to all the needy in simplicity, not hesitating as to whom you are to give. Give to all, for God wishes his gifts to be shared among all. They who have received will render an account to God, why and for what they had received," etc.

Here it is quite clear that the third "quotation" of Barnabas was not taken from the canonical Matthew, where nothing is said of "not hesitating," or of "receiving," or of "gifts"—all three being found in the "Second Commandment" of the "Shepherd." The other two quotations were derived from the primitive Gospel in use in Barnabas's time.

II. Clement, bishop of Rome, of whom, Paley says, "ancient writers, without any doubt or scruple, assert to have been the Clement whom St. Paul mentions in Phil. iv. 3 as a fellow-worker." This Clement says in his Epistle:—

"Remembering the words of the Lord Jesus.....for thus he said: Be pitiful that ye may be pitied; forgive that it may be forgiven to you; as ye do, so shall it be done to you; as ye give, so shall it be given to you; as ye judge, so shall it be judged to you; as ye show kindness, shall kindness be shown to you; with what measure ye mete, with the same shall it be measured to you."

REPLY: Clement was an honored presbyter of the church at Rome in the second quarter of the second century. One of his duties was that of corresponding with other churches. His quotations were all made from the primitive Gospel. The parallel passages in our Gospels read as follows:—

"Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy" (v. 7)—"For if ye forgive men their trespasses your heavenly Father will also forgive you" (vi. 14)—"whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them" (vii. 12)—"Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, shaken together" (Luke vi. 38)—"For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged" (viii. 2)—"and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured unto you" (viii. 2).

All the foregoing passages, save one, are in Matthew's Gospel. One of Clement's quotations—"as ye show kindness, shall kindness be shown to you"—is not in any of the canonical Gospels.

III. Hermas, who, according to Paley, was the Hermas named in Rom. xvi. 14. His "Shepherd," Paley says, "contains tacit allusions to the Gospels of Matthew, Luke, and John," but without naming, or quoting from, any of them.

REPLY: This book of fabricated visions and revelations was written about A.D. 150. After reading it through carefully, I can find no allusions, tacit or otherwise, to any Gospel.

IV. According to Paley, "Ignatius, as testified by ancient Christian writers, became bishop of Antioch about thirty-seven years after Christ's ascension..... In his Epistles are undoubted allusions to the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. John."

REPLY: Ignatius was bishop of Antioch for nine years, his career being cut short by martyrdom in A.D. 115. The Epistles which bear his name were forged about A.D. 150—160.

V. Polycarp, respecting whom Paley says:—

"Polycarp had been taught by the apostles; had conversed with many who had seen Christ; was also by apostles appointed bishop of Smyrna.....The Epistle of Polycarp contains nearly forty clear allusions to books of the New Testament—more especially to Matthew and Luke."

REPLY: Polycarp suffered martyrdom in A.D. 165; that is to say, 137 years after the call of the apostles (A.D. 28). Paley has simply repeated the erroneous and misleading statements of Irenæus. Polycarp was a Pauline Christian, who thought more of Paul than of all the apostles lumped together. Though Irenæus says he was a disciple of the apostle John, and used to talk of "his familiar intercourse" with that apostle, Polycarp never once names this beloved teacher, nor this teacher's Gospel, in his Epistle; neither does he make any mention of the other apostles, or of Matthew, Mark, or Luke—or their Gospels. To make up for this remissness he quotes from Paul's Epistles about twenty times, and in one place says: "For neither I, nor any such one, can come up to the wisdom of the blessed and glorified Paul" (par. iii.). But Polycarp does quote from a Gospel; he says, for instance:—

"Remember what the Lord said, teaching: 'Judge not, that ye be not judged; forgive, and it shall be forgiven to you; be pitiful, that ye may be pitied; with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again'" (par. ii.).

This first saying is exactly the same as Matt. vii. 1, and the last (omitting one word) the same as Matt. vii. 21. Polycarp would thus appear to have been acquainted with Matthew's Gospel, though the other two sayings are from a more primitive Gospel.

VI. Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, who, Paley says, "was a hearer of the apostle John, and a companion of Polycarp, as Irenæus attests." The fact that Papias names the Gospels of Matthew and Mark "proves that these Gospels must have borne the names of these evangelists at that time, and probably long before."

REPLY: Papias and Polycarp were certainly contemporaries; but it is very unlikely that one ever set eyes on the other. Papias was a hearer, not of the apostle John, but of a presbyter named John, connected with a neighboring church. Eusebius, who had read Papias's book, comments upon the fraudulent statement of Irenæus, and says that it was disproved by what Papias said himself. Though this ancient bishop has named writings by Matthew and Mark, we have no evidence that he saw either; he was merely told of their existence by his friend the presbyter. Both were written in his day (A.D. 130—150), but were not yet known to all the churches. Papias's book contained sayings from "unwritten tradition" and from the "Gospel according to the Hebrews."

VII. Justin Martyr. Of this writer Paley says:—

"In Justin's works, from which might be extracted almost a complete life of Christ, there are but two instances in which he refers to anything as said or done by Christ, which is not related in our present Gospels. One of these is a saying of Christ not met with in any book now extant—'Wherefore also our Lord Jesus Christ has said, In whatsoever I shall find you, in the same I will also judge you.' The other is a circumstance in Christ's baptism—a fiery or luminous appearance upon the water, which is mentioned in the Gospel of the Hebrews.....All the references in Justin are made without mentioning the author, which prove that the four Gospels were perfectly notorious, and that there were no other accounts then extant. But although Justin mentions not the author's name, he calls the books 'Memoirs composed by the Apostles.'"

REPLY: In his first Apology (par. 46) Justin states that the Christians of his day "say that Christ was born 150 years ago under Cyrenius." According to this statement, Justin wrote in the year A.D. 156; for Quirinius or Cyrenius came into Judæa to superintend a registration for taxation in the year A.D. 6—and at no other time. At this date the canonical Gospels had all been written, though they might not yet have come into use in many of the churches. If at this time, as Paley states, they were "perfectly notorious," it is strange indeed that Justin never once names one of them. Paley has given two statements of Justin, which are not found in our Gospels: to these I will now make some additions.

(1) and (2)—adduced by Paley as all that are given by Justin.

(3) Justin says: "For Joseph not being able to find a lodging in the village, lodged in a certain cave near the village; and while they were there Mary brought forth the Christ" (Dialogue 78). In the Protevangelium it is recorded that, when near Bethlehem, Mary was taken in labor. "And Joseph found a cave there, and led her into it," etc. In this cave Jesus was born.

(4) Justin says of John the Baptist: "He cried as he sat by the river Jordan"—"while John still sat by the river Jordan" (Dial. 49 and 51).

(5) Justin says of the child Jesus: "For even at his birth he was in possession of his power" (Dial. 88). In the Gospel of the Infancy miracles are said to have been wrought by the babe Jesus soon after his birth.

(6) Justin says of the man Jesus: "For when he was among men, he was in the habit of working as a carpenter, making ploughs and yokes" (Dial. 88). In the Gospel of Thomas it is stated: "And his father was a carpenter, and at that time made ploughs and yokes."

(7) Respecting the teaching of Jesus, Justin says: "Brief and concise utterances fell from him, for he was no sophist" (1 Apol. 14). This statement clearly shows that Justin was not acquainted with the Fourth Gospel. Had he read the long rambling discourses there, he could not have made it.

(8) Justin says of Christ's miracles: "But though they saw such works they asserted it was magical art. For they dared to call him a magician and a deceiver of the people" (Dial. 69). In the apocryphal Acts of Pilate, the Jews accused Jesus of working miracles by the aid of magic, after which "they say again, 'Did we not say that he was a magician?'"

(9) Justin says of the mockery at the trial: "For also they reviled him, and set him upon the judgment seat, and said 'Judge us'" (1 Apol. 35). No such proceedings are recorded in the canonical Gospels.

(10) Justin says: "And that these things did happen, you can ascertain from the Acts of Pontius Pilate"—"And that he did these things, you can learn from the Acts of Pontius Pilate" (1 Apol. 35 and 48). Here we have two plain references to the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus or Acts of Pilate, which Justin cites as a proof of the actual occurrence of certain circumstances he had just mentioned—which circumstances are all found in the extant Acts of Pilate.

It is unnecessary to go further. Justin was acquainted with most of the alleged facts contained in the three Synoptical Gospels (and found also in the primitive Gospel), as well as with the stories in the apocryphal Gospels; but as he has never once named Matthew, Mark, Luke, or John, or professed to draw anything from their Gospels, I can see no reason for gratuitously crediting him with a knowledge of them—though all four were in existence when he wrote.

Here I bring this inquiry to a close; for Paley's next witness, Hegesippus, wrote about A.D. 180.

Looking back now at Paley's opening statement—that "the four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles" can be shown to have been in existence from the apostolic age—I can only say that such an assertion is truly apologetic. As a simple matter of fact, we have not a scrap of evidence which proves that any one of the five books named was written in apostolic times, or in any part of the first century. Like all modern Christian Evidencers, Paley appears to have had no idea that the Synoptical Gospels contain within themselves conclusive proof that all three were derived from pre-existing writings—whose originators are unknown.

ABRACADABRA.

Those Wasted Years.

WE met again after the lapse of nearly a quarter of a century. I was the speaker at a weekly Socialist meeting, he was one of the audience, and certainly about the last person of all my former acquaintances whom I would have expected to meet at such a place.

When last we parted on the shore (so to speak), the wild waves were saying something about the mysterious ways of God in planting his footsteps in the sea and riding upon the storm. We had both attended the same Bible class in that long ago, and doubtless considered ourselves very good Christians and firmly rooted in the faith.

The Bible class consisted of thirty or forty young men, and was connected with the Presbyterian church of which I had previously been a Sunday-school scholar. We sat around a huge table circled by two rows of seats. The teacher was a Presbyterian elder, but scarcely a typical one, being of a strongly evangelical turn of mind. A schoolmaster by profession, he was one of the most narrow-minded and bigoted men it has ever been my misfortune to meet. I do not say this with any disrespect to his memory. He was naturally kind and genial, and was possessed of a sense of humor quite unusual in a Presbyterian elder. But anything in the shape of heresy or heterodoxy, or that did not agree with his own doctrinal views, seemed to shrivel up all that was human in him. I remember well one Sunday afternoon when the subject of conversation related to the life of the hereafter and the condition of the soul in the intermediate state. For some reason or other, he appealed to me for my views on the subject. I have never had much hesitancy at any time in stating my beliefs, and I replied that I was certainly of the opinion, as the Scriptures themselves state, that "the dead know not anything." The effect of this innocent reply was a display of Christian bigotry that I have never forgotten. Rising from his seat, with all the scorn he could command, this teacher warned the whole class to shun me as a viper. "I warn you all," he said, "to have no dealings with that fellow [mentioning me by name], not even to speak to him." Whether it was the magnanimity of my nature, or the passive effect produced by my religious teaching and environment, I can truthfully say that I did not then, or ever afterwards, feel the least resentment towards the perpetrator of such outrageous conduct. This same zealous servant of God, only a short time ago, on his way to conduct a Sunday morning service, without a word of divine warning, or the chance to bid farewell to those he loved, suddenly dropped down dead in the public street. Which is certainly not very convincing evidence that God's own people, as Christians delight to call themselves, are subjects of his especial care—especially when we set such a dreadful end against the fact that the Atheist is often allowed to die peacefully in his bed.

But to return to my friend. At the close of the meeting, our conversation turned upon the days when we both attended the Bible class, and the influences which had brought about our changed outlook upon life. I found that the evolution of his mind had progressed along lines very similar to my own. It was the utter failure of Christianity in the industrial world to secure anything like economic justice to the toiling masses that had first shaken his faith in the orthodox creed. The later realisation of its failure in every other sphere of life to give a satisfactory answer to the many questions that present themselves to the thinking mind, led to its ultimate rejection. My friend had also come to see that religion, with its hope of a future recompense for the evils and miseries of the present life, was taught the people very largely for economic reasons. The contentment with the present unjust social conditions, which was taught by the Churches as a Christian virtue, was in reality the suppression of all that was noble and manly and dignified in human nature. If the social lot of the toiling masses was ever to be improved, it would not be by religion, but by the application of human thought and human effort. "And to think," he said, "of the years that we wasted sitting round the table of that Bible class, listening to talk which had no relation to any of the concerns of life."

Wasted years! Such was his verdict upon the time we spent listening to the childish fairy tales of a smiling face hiding behind a frowning providence, and a home beyond the skies, and the attempts of the teacher to produce something like theological order out of the chaos of inspired Scripture. My friend, as I afterwards learnt, was not by any means the only member of that class who had come to regard those years in the same light; and it would certainly be interesting to know how many retained the narrow creed they were then taught.

It may be that in the course of years some are dead and gone to glory; but others, I know for certain, went all to the dogs. While the present writer, sad to relate, became a contributor to the Freethinker.

It is surely a serious indictment of religion if it can be substantiated that it is responsible for the waste of so much valuable time. If time be the stuff that life is made of, it has robbed many of us of years of life. To sit in the Sunday-school year after year, singing "There is a happy land far, far away," when we should have been learning to appreciate and admire the many beauties and wonders of the visible world, is not only a waste of childhood's years, it is a sin against its future. To teach a child that man's chief end is to glorify God, and, by implication, that its duties to its parents, its relations, and society are of only secondary or minor importance, is to distort its views of life's claims and responsibilities. It is wasting the time that might otherwise be profitably used to inculcate practical truths which in after life would bear valuable fruit. What matters it that the streets of the New Jerusalem are paved with gold, if want and poverty be the portion of so many here and now, and the wherewithal for present needs be a source of constant anxiety? What matters it that there are mansions above, if countless thousands are compelled to pass the only life they know in disreputable, unhealthy, and overcrowded hovels? Better to improve the life we know than wait for another that we know not of.

The history of Christianity, beginning with its suppression of Greek and Roman culture, and the subsequent long reign of ignorance and superstition; its insistence on the futility of moral effort in effecting any human improvement, and the absurd value it placed on faith, all bear witness to the sterility of religious teaching, and constitute a complete justification of its indictment as a time-waster. It has had the control of our intellectual and social life for twenty centuries, and all that it thought necessary to offer for our guidance was contentment with present conditions, no matter how unjust or oppressive, and the Bible, as containing all that it was necessary for man to know.

The few wasted years lamented by my friend are but a drop in the ocean of the centuries of wasted time and life for which Christianity is responsible. Fortunately, the steadily decreasing membership of the Churches is evidence that a growing number of people are finding a better use for their time than to dance attendance upon the preachers of a good time coming—when you're dead.

JOSEPH BRYCE.

Priests Afraid of Ridicule.

WHEREVER the priests have the most power, religion has the least. Being neither appointed by the law of Nature, nor the law of Christ, they are only intruders into the affairs of religions; which is therefore under a usurpation, while it is under them. So that their foundation being false, they are in most countries reduced to support it by false facts and deceitful appearances. And as they are thus obliged to cover fraud with fraud, and support one violence by another, it is no wonder that we find it often so carefully hidden under inventions, and deformed by absurdities; and all those inventions and absurdities defended by cruelty and a strong hand.

This strange jumble of fictions they have the front to call by the holy name of religion, and gravely to create faith out of lies. And with the grovelling multitude, whose eyes are in the earth, all this passes off well enough. They have fearful hearts and simple heads, and so stand always prepared to be frightened or deluded at the priestly word of command. But because the craft lies subject to daily detection from rational and discerning men, its champions have raised loud cries and strong prejudices against the two principal weapons, by which their cause is most annoyed; I mean the weapons of reason and ridicule; the former of which discovers truth, and the latter exposes fraud.

What civil treatment these reverend seers afford to reason, I have shown elsewhere; and shall handle in this paper, the business of ridicule, which they always represent as impious and profane, whenever it meddles with the cassock; and yet always exercise it according to their talents, without mercy, when the waggish grave creatures are pleased to be arch upon Dissenters or Freethinkers.

To them is no doubt owing, that frequent but false saying, now in the mouth of every ignorant; namely, that it is an easy matter to make a jest upon religion or the priesthood, which, whether they are aware of it or not, is saying that their religion and its priests are a jest. For he, upon whom the jest is made, does, in effect, make the jest; otherwise it is none. Religion and virtue cannot be ridiculed; and whoever attempts it, by showing himself a villain, raises horror instead of laughter, which is the end of ridicule. But the vending of grimace for religion, and setting up for piety without virtue, are the natural subjects of jeer and merriment.

Whoever fears ridicule, deserves ridicule. He is conscious of a weak side, and knows that he cannot stand a laugh. This is the case of sacred grimace, or gravity, which men of sense see to be only a studied restraint laid upon the muscles of the face, and the joints of the body, and teaching them to move, not by the impulses of nature, and the motions of the heart, but by design, either to attract admiration, or obtain credit, or gain followers. And therefore sacred grimace dreads men of sense. However, it is never to be set aside; for this same affected demureness, ridiculous as it is in itself, is a solemn bait to catch the mob, whose respect always follows their wonder. The vulgar are caught, like woodcocks, by the eyes, and led, like calves, by the ears; show and sound lead their fat heads captive. It is therefore no wonder, that in popish countries, a showy chancel, a curious tall steeple, gilded organs, and a delicate ring of bells, keep the many on the parson's side, make them all good churchmen; and always get the better of a plain religion, that has its abode only in the heart, and wants all the above-mentioned marks of the true church. Besides all this, there is more mirth and more holy days in their orthodox faith, than in the contrary scheme, which obliges men to earn heaven with the sweat of their brows, and take pains to be saved.

These, however, are but small instances of ridicule, taken from the force and grimace of an external religion. I shall here give instances much more considerable, as well as much more ridiculous. Do we not see the pretended successors of the apostles, at home and elsewhere, instead of making tents, or converting the world, living voluptuously, and promoting the excise? Do we not frequently see the ambassadors of God, sent to promote virtue and peace, and the observance of his laws, promoting strife, frequenting debauched houses, rooking after wealth, and plaguing and reviling their neighbors? Do we not see holy men, who have the call of the spirit, rioting in all the works of the flesh? Do they not buy livings with money, and then claim them by divine right? Do they not chop and jockey away poor parishes for such as are richer, and yet pretend to have upon their hands the cure of souls; though, by such vile bargaining, they show that they value as little those souls which they have just bought, as they do those which they have lately sold? Do not many of them, though they are void of all merit, yet demand great respect; and though ignorant, pretend to teach and to reveal God's will which is already revealed, and yet live as though there were no God? And do they not, without obeying God, set up to command men? Do they not seek honor from their cloth which yet they dishonor; and do they not for the blackest crimes claim sanctuary from the church, which church is the people, which people they abuse and deceive? Do they not pretend to mend others, but in truth more idle and proud than all others; two qualities neither suited to the welfare of religion nor of human society? Do they not flatter and support the worst of tyrants, plague and distress, and often destroy the best of kings; and in both cases, do they not belie the Holy Ghost, and pervert his meaning? Do they not pretend to be appointed for the good of mankind, and yet always make mankind, wherever they have power, thoroughly miserable, base, poor, ignorant, and wicked? And finally, do they not invent vile lies for vile ends, and then blasphemously make God Almighty to father them?

Here is such a motley mixture of opposite principles and practices, as will always render those who are chargeable with them, the contempt or abhorrence of all men who have eyes and understanding. Jest and scorn will subsist as long as their causes subsist; and clergymen, of all others, will be most exposed to them, while they continue to deserve them, because more modesty, truth, and consistency may be expected from them than from any others. It is but a piece of justice due to religion to ridicule those who, as far as they can, ridicule religion, though they set up for its defenders. Ridicule, when it has no longer matter to feed on, will die of itself; and the clergy, to avoid it, have no more to do but not to deserve it; but to go on complaining, without amendment, is to nourish raillery and satire, by their own actions.—Thomas Gordon, "Independent Whig."

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 22 SUNDAY, MAY 31, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

The golden rule is that there are no golden rules.
—G. B. SHAW.

Blessed Are the Meek.

NOTHING could be more misnamed than the Sermon on the Mount. It is obviously not a sermon at all, and never could have been delivered straight off to one congregation. In reality it is a collection of religious and ethical maxims, of various value and significance; maxims that had, in one form or another, been floating about the East for many centuries.

The so-called Sermon on the Mount has always been highly lauded in the pulpit, although its teaching has very rarely been reduced to practice, even by those who most vaunted their piety and devotion to Christ. Divines and casuists have, indeed, taught us how to violate every injunction with a good conscience. Where the text is too hard for mortal virtue we have only to regard it as a counsel of perfection, instead of a positive command; and nobody is to be damned for not taking advice. There have always been some mystics, like William Law, for instance, who insisted on the literalness of Christ's teaching. You might not be able to attain to the "Christian Perfection" of the Sermon on the Mount, but you were bound to attempt it, on peril of your eternal damnation.

Other exhorters take the Sermon on the Mount with large grains of salt. They indulge in the greatest liberality of interpretation, and really give us a new Sermon on the Mount, containing not what Jesus Christ did say, but what he would have said if he had possessed the art of making himself understood. It is very kind on their part to make him intelligible, and we hope he is duly sensible of the obligation; but, at the same time, it is to be wished that they were a little more intelligible themselves, and a little more in harmony with each other.

Perhaps the most difficult text for the kind ingenuity of these gentlemen is "Blessed are the meek; for they shall inherit the earth." The two halves of this text are as opposed to each other as the front benches in the House of Commons. A table in the one case, and a semi-colon in the other, divides them; but they eternally face each other in an everlasting antagonism.

Meekness is a virtue of which few men are ever proud—if we may be pardoned such a paradox. It is generally commended in others. What it exactly means is rather to be determined by etymology than example. "Moses was very meek above all men," says the Bible (Numbers xii. 3); but as his meekness was capable of rising to murder, we had better drop the illustration. Johnson defines meek as "mild of temper; not proud; not rough; not easily provoked; soft; gentle." That is, meek is meek, for this is all the definition comes to. Richardson is not more helpful, although he gives a long and valuable series of extracts, showing the use of the word by English writers. It is the more scientific Skeat who throws a real light upon the matter. Meek appears to be a compound of softness and pliability. The meek person is a piece of human dough, that can be kneaded and moulded by others. A dog is meek when he takes a licking; a woman is meek when she stands any amount of male brutality; and a man is meek when he bows his head to another man's arrogance. Meekness is passive; it can hardly rise to the level of an active virtue; and perhaps it is only not a vice on the principle that it is better to suffer wrong than to inflict it; the best thing being to do neither.

Whether meekness be good, bad, or indifferent, it will certainly never enable one to "possess the earth." The land of this kingdom is mostly owned by the aristocracy, and they are a remarkably meek body of men. According to Jesus Christ, we have only to be meek enough, and the lords will give us back the land. "Blessed are the meek; for they shall inherit the earth." So they will, so they will—in coffins!

So exquisite is the absurdity of this text that an owl might laugh at it. That is, the text as it stands. But you must not let it stand; you must knock it about, twist it and turn it; and it will look a highly respectable piece of morality. Keep, "inherit," but play the devil with the "earth." Make it mean something else; make it mean anything. Tackle it like Bishop Porteus, who wrote as follows: "By inheriting the earth, he [Jesus] meant inheriting those things which are, without question, the greatest blessings upon earth, calmness and composure of spirit, tranquillity, cheerfulness, and comfort of mind. Now these, I apprehend, are the peculiar portion and recompense of the meek."

There now, you meek people, this is your inheritance of the earth. Not broad acres and big rents, not so much as a moderate-sized farm, not even three acres and a cow; but calmness, composure, tranquillity, cheerfulness, comfort, and such blessings, are to be your "recompense"; that is what you will get by giving up the tangible possessions to the people who are not meek, but very much the reverse. They have the solid property, and you have the spiritual blessings which are promised to poverty and meekness.

Jesus Christ may have meant this—only this, and nothing more; but, in that case, what an unfortunate way he had of expressing himself! It takes a bishop to penetrate the obscurity of his metaphors, and even then a great deal has to be taken on trust from the episcopal interpreter.

Let us brush away these subtleties. It appears to us that if Jesus Christ did not mean what he said, it is impossible to say what he did mean. The secret perished with him, and "interpretations" are only conjectures.

The plain truth is that the poor never were blessed, and never will be. Wiser than Jesus Christ was the old Hebrew who prayed for neither riches nor poverty, but the golden mean of sufficiency. Nor will the meek ever inherit the earth. Certainly they have not yet made a beginning. If the people are to become possessed of the land, which is their natural birthright, they will have to abandon meekness, and stand up resolutely for justice. Popular rights are never conceded; they are always wrested from the privileged classes. Kings and aristocracies give way slowly before democratic pressure. Every step of progress involves a heavy battle. And the Church has always befriended the wealthy and titled usurpers, preaching meekness to the people in order that they might not inherit the earth.

Does Man Need Religion?

MODERN religion is very largely a matter of phrases. By long usage certain expressions have acquired a value that does not naturally belong to them, but which, by the mere fact of tradition and custom, exert all the authority of rationally established propositions. Words and expressions of a certain kind become, as Oliver Wendell Holmes said, polarised. Particular implications have gathered round them, and these implications prevent those who hear them subjecting them to a careful and rational examination. They do not impose only upon those who hear them; they are equally effective with those who use them. The speaker or writer drugs himself before handing on the narcotic for the use of listener or reader. Observe the solemn and reverential way in which a Christian speaks of the Jesus of the New Testament or the God of the Bible. And consider the difference if the words Joshua and Jahveh were used in their place. Both would mean exactly the same, but in the latter case time has not been busy weaving the same associations, and the mind is left freer to examine the statements placed before it.

This is, indeed, one of the difficulties before the Freethought propagandists. Most of my readers will be familiar with the old Punch cartoon of two costers quarreling, and the friends of one of them urging him to "say somefink." "How can I?" was the reply, "'e's bin and gorn and used up all the best words." It is much the same with religion. Being first in the field, and having such a long start, religion has, so to speak, cornered all the best words. It has dominated life for so long that naturally it has become the hardest of tasks to purify the non-religious aspects of life of their religious associations. And the more insecure the fundamental religious beliefs become, the more strenuously religions struggle to retain the use of words that appeal powerfully to man's social nature. Truth, justice, morality, aspiration, idealism, etc,, are all used as though they were parts of essential religion, and by constant association quite separate things are regarded as identical. The tactical advantage given to the religionist by this policy is obvious. The Freethinker is made to appear as fighting against certain things when, as a matter of fact, he is only contending for their independent existence and value.

I was reminded of this truth while turning over the pages of a work by a well-known writer on philosophy, and coming across an expression referring to "Freethinkers whose attitude to the religious problem proves how little sense they have of the deepest human needs." This is a common expression, and in the usual way one passes it by without particular notice. But when a writer of the rank of Hoffding uses it, one may be excused paying it a little attention. Not that its use by him gives it any greater measure of truth; it only becomes more impressive to a certain type of mind. For my own part, I do not hesitate to say that its use is no more than an illustration of the truth that even eminent thinkers are not secure against the tyranny of phrases. For a little independent thinking on the question would at least have shown Hoffding that whether religion is one of man's deepest needs or not is one of the principal issues between the religionist and the Freethinker.

On what ground can it be argued that religion is one of man's deepest needs? Is it that religion is, in a general sense, universal? No Freethinker will dispute that proposition. Human societies everywhere have developed some sort of a religion. That is admitted. The Freethinker is the first to point to the truth of this, and his philosophy is in nowise disturbed by the admission. For on that he has two comments to make. The first is explanatory. He points out under what conditions religious beliefs originate. He shows that they are natural, and therefore inevitable to the human mind at one stage of its development. They do not emphasise a need, they merely express a conclusion that ignorance everywhere draws in the face of phenomena not properly understood.

The second comment is that if religion is, indeed, man's deepest need, it should become more firmly established, more difficult to eradicate, as the race grows older. But everyone knows that the very opposite of this is the case. All over the civilised world religion sits lightly upon an increasing number of people. Millions have rejected it altogether. How, then, can religion be called one of man's deepest needs? A deep and fundamental need cannot be suppressed. If a need is suppressed, its superficial character is demonstrated. But here is something that men and women can get on without; they are —in the light of every rational test—none the worse for being without it. They confess to no sense of loss at its absence. And their number precludes their case being dismissed as the manifestation of an abnormality. It is sheer folly to speak of, as man's deepest need, something that millions deliberately reject, and which is weakening even with those who still retain it.

Let me emphasise the fact that reaching the Freethought position is essentially a question of growth. This is true both historically and individually. The further back we go in human history —taking things generally—the more religious we find people as a whole. The non-religious man is unknown to primitive society. For good or ill, he is a product of civilisation, of culture, of acquired and inherited knowledge. And, individually, it is a simple and easily verified truth that the overwhelming majority of non-religious men and women commenced their lives with a belief in religion. Their Freethought represents sheer growth. Religious belief antedates advanced culture both historically and individually. The man who never thinks about religion, who never tests its teachings, remains a supporter of religion. I do not mean by this that the man who remains religious never thinks about it. Such a statement would be absurd. He may think and may remain religious; if he does not think, he is certain to continue so. But the man who does not think about it cannot become a Freethinker. In the main, religion in civilised society is something that a man inherits; it is due to no mental activity on his part. On the other hand, Freethought is something he acquires. He must think. Rightly or wrongly he must use his intelligence. It is a question of growth. And the problem of perpetual motion is simple compared to the task of explaining the process by which man outgrows his deepest need.

The notion that religion is man's deepest need is pure fallacy. It is not even his most enduring need. By a mere accident of association religion has been connected with all the more important affairs. The reign of the priesthood has secured the connection of religion with marriage, with the family, with birth, and with death. It has secured it a place in private and public life, and given religion authority to which it has no valid claim. But the whole process of civilisation consists in breaking down this connection, and in secularising human life. And if this is accomplished; if the purely social aspect of human life, from the cradle to the grave, is once recognised, how long will religion maintain its power? The essential nature of religion is contained in one word —supernaturalism. Divest religion of this, and all that is left is a mere name. And it is not the Freethinker only who says that the supernatural does not exist. It is the message of all modern scientific thought.

What need of human nature is there that is dependent upon religion? It is certainly not the need for beauty, for art, for poetry, for literature. All these have existed, and do exist, quite apart from religion. Family life, with all the affections that cluster round domesticity, are independent of religion. Social existence is equally independent. In all these instances religion does not help; it is helped. When appeals are made, in the name of religion, for social justice, what is it that is touched—man's sense of justice or his religious belief? By nature, man is not a religious animal at all. As I have already said, that is something he acquires. But man is a social animal; and nothing can rob him of that quality without destroying his character as a human being. In short, once we get above the stage of primitive life, religion ever after lives by exploiting human nature. It has taught people to express themselves in terms of religion, much as the feeling of social solidarity is made to express itself in terms of personal loyalty to a reigning monarch. Those who look a little deeper into things, however, know that just as a feeling of loyalty to a king is no more than an accidental expression of the feeling of social unity, created and strengthened by generations of social life, so the connection of religion with the real needs of life is by nature accidental, and is doomed to disappear as man becomes aware of the true nature of the social forces.

The Freethinker is not, then, blind to the "deepest human needs." On the contrary, he is keenly alive to their reality and importance. His opposition to religion is not based upon ignoring certain aspects of human nature, but upon recognising all and allowing for all. It is too often assumed that the Freethinker denies the "facts" of the religious life. He does not; he recognises them all and explains them all. The issue is not one of a dispute about "facts" or "needs," it is really a dispute on a matter of interpretation. Are we to accept the naturalistic or the supernaturalistic interpretation? That is the whole issue and there never has been any other. The Freethinker admits the value of much that the modern religionist talks so much about, but he points out that complete satisfaction for every aspect of human life is to be found apart from religion. And the proof of the truth of this is found in the fact that such satisfaction is found. Millions of men and women, neither the least worthy nor the least intelligent, are finding to-day in social life all that the religionist finds in connection with religion, and their doing so is really conclusive. For just as the majority of these were once religionists, so religionists will one day be where they are. They have passed through the religious phase of development; and their having passed through it is proof, not that religion is one of man's deepest needs, but that it is a new phase of his development, and is to-day as reminiscent of a lower culture-stage as many parts of the body are reminiscent of his simian ancestry.

C. COHEN.

The Beginning of the End.

IT will be remembered that a few weeks ago the Upper House of the Convocation of Canterbury discussed the various attacks that have been made upon the Christian Faith as embodied in the Apostles', Nicene, and Athanasian Creeds, and passed resolutions reaffirming the Church's loyalty to those historical documents. The resolutions were moved by the Bishop of London. The Bishop of Hereford moved a mild amendment for which only three cast their votes, and thus the resolutions were adopted with practical unanimity. According to one speaker, the Church of England was in danger of becoming a secular organisation. On one occasion, while on his holidays, his lordship had the unhappy experience of hearing two extraordinary sermons, the one not naming "our Lord or Christ or Jesus or even God" from beginning to end, and the other being a deliberate attack throughout upon the Virgin Birth and the Resurrection. Incontrovertibly the Bishops acted wisely in issuing a fresh declaration in support of the great creeds. As a matter of fact, Christianity is completely rooted in the miraculous. The Gospel Jesus is a miraculous being who cannot be placed in any known category. Being himself the greatest of all miracles, he naturally performed miracles; and to those who believe in him as such, the Virgin Birth, the Resurrection, and the Ascension are most credible events. The twenty-five Bishops who declared their complete and firm adhesion to the orthodox faith must be regarded as the apostles' genuine successors. They stand just exactly where Peter and Paul stood, and their Christianity is identical with that contained in the New Testament. As Dr. Ingram well said:—

> "The Gospel was shorn of its power when the facts on which it rests were doubted or denied; the Gospel was a Gospel of deeds rather than words. Why otherwise should so many chapters be devoted to the death of Christ? Why should the Apostles have preached Jesus and the resurrection?"

Such has always been the creed of the true Church, and we know at what terrific cost she has often fought for it. To its doubters and deniers she has never shown the least mercy. Some of us remember with what awful cruelty she persecuted the famous Dr. Colenso because he ventured to criticise the Pentateuch, and the Bishop of Oxford maintains that, though she made many mistakes, her opposition to him was fully justifiable. Colenso's offence was that he attacked the belief in the infallibility of the Word of God; and in the controversy that raged so furiously for many years the facts which his criticism had brought to light did not count at all. The Church's doctrine of inspiration could not be assailed with impunity. To find mistakes in God's Book was an unpardonable sin. Bishop Colenso was paid for defending, not assaulting, the Bible. Whether the Virgin Birth, or the Resurrection, happened or not, is not the point at issue, but the fact that it is an article of the faith which every clergyman is ordained to hold and teach. What the Bishops are now entitled to say to every minister in their dioceses is this: If you are an honest man you will leave the Church the moment you cease to believe the Articles of Religion. Now, to a man who really believes in an omnipotent God the question of miracles should present no difficulty whatever. If such a being exists, he can do anything he likes. It is to us utterly incomprehensible that people who call themselves Christians should boggle at miracles. To a believer in the supernatural, the miraculous should follow almost as a matter of course. Dr. Sanday disapproves very strongly of the step taken by the Bishops because, though a minister of the Church of England and a Professor of Divinity at Oxford, he rejects some of the miracles; but he is aware of the insecurity of his position, for in his Bishop Gore's Challenge to Criticism, just published, he says:—

> "I was not disposed to put any limit to the Divine power or to ascribe any necessity to natural law as such. I did not for a moment doubt the power of God to make what exceptions he pleased. I only asked for better evidence of his will to make them" (p. 22).

To this the Bishop might reply that no evidence is required other than the continuous testimony of the Church. It is difficult to understand what other evidence could be expected. If the Church is what the New Testament represents her to be her testimony ought to be entirely convincing for all her members, and specially to all her ministers.

The Church Times, for May 15, informs us that "there are some who will think that the words of Dr. Sanday alone weigh more than the words of the whole Episcopate," and it must be admitted that as a critic he has done excellent and enduring work; but, our contemporary continues, "our present point is that Dr. Sanday rejects the testimony of the Church, rejects the interpretation of the Creeds put upon them by the authority of the Church, and claims for himself and others the right to exercise the teaching office in the Church with complete independence of judgment." We agree with the Church Times. We fail to see how those who reject the Christian miracles can reasonably claim to be Christians. In what respect do they differ from the Unitarians, or from those who call themselves Liberal Christians? We repudiated the belief in miracles only because we had ceased to believe in the truth of Christianity itself. We renounced the miraculous because we had already lost the supernatural. If no exceptions to natural law are ever made the supernatural is perfectly useless, and all the claims made for Christianity fall to the ground.

The Bishop of London asserted that, in the absence of miracles, the Gospel is shorn of its power; but we hold that the Gospel never had any power of its own. The Church has been a power in history, and almost always an evil power; but apart from the Church, Christianity has been absolutely non-existent. For many years Jehovah was carried about in a wooden box, and the Christian God has been imprisoned in the Church all through the centuries. The Church's testimony is the sole evidence of his existence, and this carries no weight whatever except with believers. The truth is that the power which the Gospel is alleged to possess and exercise is the power of the people who preach it. The Christ believed in by the Church has never existed except as an object of belief. Dr. Ingram was wholly right when he said that if a non-miraculous Christ were accepted by the Church to-day the next generation would go a step further and think of "the Palestinian Jew moving on the stage of history" as nothing but a deluded man, or as a wholly unhistorical character. All the Bishops were alive to the fact that their Church is gradually drifting away from sound doctrine, and beginning to trample the venerable creeds under her feet. The fact which they so profoundly deplored causes us great rejoicing. The Bishop of Chelmsford stated that on Freethought platforms now, the names of Voltaire, Paine, and Bradlaugh are seldom heard:—

> "A new type had arisen. The appeal of the street corner Infidel was now to the names of writers who were professedly connected with the Christian Church. It might be crude, but it was a great danger. He was speaking some time ago on the authority of the Bible, and a man said: 'You come here and ask us to receive the Bible and the facts of the Bible, and you know that learned men at Oxford and Cambridge tell us that Genesis is a myth and a fable, and others tell us that the first three chapters of St. Luke are not to be believed literally. You have a man at Westminster who criticises everything.'"

Voltaire, Paine, and Bradlaugh did not live in vain. Their labors are now bearing abundant fruit everywhere. Such men as Canon Cheyne and the late Canon Driver have done more to dethrone the Bible than any avowed Freethinker. They are undermining the very religion whose champions they profess to be—a fact for which we are devoutly thankful.

It is not likely that the resolutions so enthusiastically passed by the Upper House of the Convocation of Canterbury will do much to check the rationalising tendency which is so powerful just now in the English Church. Probably they will serve only to strengthen and quicken it. Criticism has come to stay, and reverence is foreign to it. It is the sworn enemy of superstition. It has done great havoc to the orthodoxy of so great a theologian as Dr. Sanday. He has moved considerably since he wrote his famous pamphlet against Dr. Conybeare, and is evidently still moving. He has been as angry now with the Bishops as he was then with the author of Myth, Magic, and Morals. Yes, there is a stream of Freethought making for itself a channel within the National Church, and all the Bishops are powerless to turn it back. They may call it all the bad names in their vocabulary, they may move innumerable resolutions against it, but it will flow on and grow stronger under their noses. It is the spirit of the age. It is reason awaking from its long sleep.

The Tyranny of Terror.

"Goblin Market," "The Prince's Progress," and Other Poems. By Christina Rossetti. The World's Classics. (Oxford Press.)

CHRISTINA ROSSETTI enjoyed the rare privilege of being treated in her own lifetime as a classic author. Now that her complete poetical works are published in a single volume, and reprints of other poems are being made constantly, the final seal of honor may be said to have been set on a great and deserved reputation. That such fame will lessen there is not much reason to anticipate, for it has been founded on the slowly formed but sure appreciation of all good critics and lovers of real literature. It is noteworthy that one family should have produced two such eminent poets as Christina and Dante Gabriel Rossetti. Christina shared with her brother the delight in mediæval coloring and theme, and in the sensuous appeal of verse; but, unlike Dante Gabriel, she had a strong strain of superstition in her character, and she soon lost her vision of a brightly hued and romantic world, and turned her eyes to the contemplation of purely religious subjects.

Almost from the first, her verse exhibited a definite personality. It is perhaps her sex which renders her lyrics more bird-like than her brother's verses. It can be nothing but her own constant experience of ill-health which made her dwell constantly on the morbid side of religion.

Death, which to Swinburne seemed own brother to sleep, was to her a more horrific shape, and was a perennial subject for her verse. The constant burden of her muse was the mutability of human affairs. And when to her physical ailments were added love disappointments entirely caused by religious bigotry, there is small difficulty in understanding how Christina Rossetti became a devotional poet; and one of such distinction that only Crashaw, Donne, and Vaughan can be held her compeers. And Donne, be it remembered, mitigated his raptures concerning the Savior by writing poems on such less sacred subjects as seeing his mistress getting into bed.

Many of Christina Rossetti's poems are very short, and are concerned with trite religious themes. In nothing is her undoubted power so much shown as in the fact that so few are commonplace. Had she not had genius, they might have sunk to the ordinary level of pietistic verse, orthodox in purpose and contemptible in execution. The only trait she has in common with the ordinary hymn writers is a certain morbidity in dwelling on the idea of mortality and the pathological side of religion. She disemboweled the Bible. Her brother, Mr. W. M. Rossetti, has even said that if "all those passages which were directly or indirectly dependent upon what can be found in the Bible" had been taken out of Christina's verse, it "would have been reduced to something approaching a vacuum."

Starting her poetical career as the one lady member of the Pre-Raphaelite enthusiasts, she, naturally, showed the effect of that romantic spirit in her first mature poem, "Goblin Market," and in the less extravagant "Prince's Progress," both of which have all the glow and rich tints of William Morris's early works. The meditative and introspective sonnets of even her later years have much in common with this early artistic impulse. But what a change was there! It is impossible not to deplore the narrowing down of Christina Rossetti's poetic interest. Here was a woman of warm blood and a passionate sense of beauty, who with better health and satisfied affections might have interpreted the joy of life. Instead, she turned with morbid pleasure to the contemplation of the fancied delights of a barren religiosity. She was a paradox, an anomaly; a Puritan among Anglo-Catholics, a nun outside the Great Lying Church. Necessarily preoccupied as she was with attenuated religious emotions, her melody with difficulty escapes monotony. And yet again and again the old romantic instinct will out. The truth is, she was not a sacred, but, in the highest sense of the word, a secular poet. Her religious bias forced her sympathies into wrong channels. To the real world she became indifferent. With actual life, its questionings, its humors, its perplexities, its despairs, its hopes, its loves, there is no sympathy in her poetry. Beyond the wall of her residence her tired eyes saw but a mad world rushing to perdition. Her idea of wisdom is to withdraw from the tumult into an inner shrine of pious meditation, disturbed only by anxiety for the fate of the Christian Church.

Her piety was essentially of the womanly, prayerful, submissive kind, so attractive to priests of all ages and all countries. It asks no questions, it is posed by no problems. It only kneels in adoring awe. Naturally, her picture of "the world" is grim and forbidding, as given in one of the most vigorous and fantastic of her sonnets:—

"By day she woos me, soft exceeding fair,
But all night as the moon so changeth she,
Loathsome and foul with hideous leprosy,
And subtle serpents gliding in her hair.
By day she woos me to the outer air,
Ripe fruits, sweet flowers, and full satiety:
But through the night a beast she grins at me,
A very monster void of love and prayer.
By day she stands a lie: by night she stands
In all the naked horror of the truth,
With pushing horns and clawed and clutching hands.
Is this a friend, indeed, that I should sell
My soul to her, give me my life and youth,
Till my feet, cloven too, take hold on hell?"

She does not overlook Nature; but, if she notices natural beauties, flowers, birds, it is always through a religious haze. Despite her "nest of new-born sweets," she seldom arrests with vivid, triumphant phrase. She could not rise to the art of Coleridge's—

"hidden brook,
In the leafy month of June,
That to the sleeping woods all night
Singeth a quiet tune,"

or to the magic of Meredith's—

"hear the heart of wildness beat
Like a centaur's hoof on sward," or the impressionism of Keats'—

"Charmed magic casements opening on the foam
Of perilous seas in faery lands forlorn";

but she has a music of her own:—

"When I am dead, my dearest,
Sing no sad songs for me.
Plant thou no roses at my head,
Nor shady cypress tree;
Be the grass green above me,
With showers and dewdrops wet;
And, if thou wilt, remember,
And, if thou wilt, forget."

Her poem, "Sleep at Sea" is full of haunting music:—

"Sound the deep water:
Who shall sound that deep?
Too short the plummet,
And the watchmen sleep.
Some dream of effort
Up a tiresome steep;
Some dream of pasture grounds
For homeless sheep."

These, however, are exceptions. When the spontaneous emotions of a poet is regulated and refined by ascetic priestly traditions, she is at a great disadvantage among singers of free utterance. It is to Christina Rossetti's undying credit that the poet is not merged in the Sunday-school teacher.

At the worst, she is never crude, extravagant, or commonplace. She has that fine quality inseparable from genius, and her lyrics have a fragrance all their own. She challenges comparison with the greatest of her sex. Mrs. Browning is the inevitable foil of Christina Rossetti, and the two suggest each other by the mere force of contrast. The author of the "Sonnets from the Portuguese," "Casa Guidi Windows," and the "Cry of the Children" is the very antipodes of the woman who gave us the shy, devotional "New Poems." There is none, of course, of Mrs. Browning's fluency in Miss Rossetti's work, but the sister poet lacks the warm humanity of the other. Christina Rossetti, despite the magnificent lyric gift, hardly stands the comparison. How should she? A delicate spinster, holding the Christian superstition in the most absolute and the most literal manner. Shadow, instead of light, was her nourishment, and her music was a delicate undertone, not more sorrowful than that of a tree sighing in the wind. We long for something individual. Like the dying farm laborer, we like something concrete. His friends tried to solace him with the joys of heaven. He raised himself for a last word: "'Tis all very well for thee; but give I the 'Pig and Whistle.'" His mortality, like that of most of us, was unequal to raptures "too severe."

Though Christina Rossetti cannot claim the highest place among her sister poets, yet she has evoked such music that she will not be forgotten. She loved the muses without misgiving, and the muses, loving her in return, have crowned her grave with honor.

MIMNERMUS.

Primitive Man.—IV.

"Savages have often been likened to children, but so far as intelligence is concerned, a child belonging to a civilised race at a sufficiently early age, the parallel is fair enough. Thus they have no steadiness of purpose. Speaking of the Dogrib Indians, we found, says Richardson, 'by experience, that however high the reward they expected to receive on reaching their destination, they could not be depended on to carry letters. A slight difficulty, the prospect of a banquet on venison, or a sudden impulse to visit some friend, were sufficient to turn them aside for an indefinite length of time.'

"In fact, we may almost sum up this part of the question in a few words by saying, as the most general conclusion which can be arrived at, that savages have the character of children with the passions and strength of men."—SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, Prehistoric Times, pp. 463-5.

"The most obvious source of interest in the doings of infancy lies in its primitiveness. At the cradle we are watching the beginnings of things, the first tentative thrustings forward into life. Our modern science is before all things historical and genetic, going back to beginnings, so as to understand the later and more complex phases of things as the outcome of these beginnings. The same kind of curiosity which prompts the geologist to get back to the first stages in the building up of the planet, or the biologist to search out the pristine forms of life, is beginning to urge the student of man to discover by a careful study of infancy the way in which human life begins to take its characteristic forms."—PROFESSOR SULLY, "The New Study of Children" (Fortnightly Review, November, 1895), p. 725.

WE have noticed the feeble powers of reasoning and reflection among the most primitive races. "It is only in man," says Sir Ray Lankester,—

"it is only in man that the power of reasoning—the conscious use of memory, of deciding on this or that course of action by a conscious appeal to the record of the individual's experience inscribed in the substance of the brain—becomes a regular and constant procedure. And in the lowest races of man—as, for instance, the Australian 'black fellows' this power is much less developed than in the higher races, owing to the feebleness of their memory. Just as a little child or an old man recognises the fact that his memory is bad, so does the Australian native confess to the white man that he cannot remember, and marvels at the memory of the white man, who, he says, can see both what is behind and what is to come."*

The life of a man illustrates, on a small scale, the life of the race. The child is born without reasoning powers, memory, language, or moral ideas, and without instruction would attain a very low standard in these matters. "According to this way of looking at infancy," says Professor Sully,—

"the successive phases of its mental life are a brief résumé of the more important features in the slow upward progress of the species. The periods dominated successively by sense and appetite, by blind wonder and superstitious fancy, by a calmer observation and a juster reasoning about things, these steps mark the pathway both of the child-mind and of the race-mind. This being so, the first years of a child, with their imperfect verbal expression, their crude fanciful ideas, their seizures by rage and terror, their absorption in the present moment, acquire a new and antiquarian interest. They mirror for us, in a diminished, distorted reflection, no doubt, the probable condition of primitive man. As Sir John Lubbock and other anthropologists have told us, the intellectual and moral resemblances between the lowest existing races of mankind and children are numerous and close."*

"The very inferior savage, like our own infant children, does not know what to-morrow means," says Letourneau, and he adds:—

"All travellers are agreed in saying that the majority of the black races in Africa may be compared to our young European children. They have all the lightheadedness, the capriciousness, the want of prudence, the volubility, and the same quick and confined intelligence, as a child."†

Herbert Spencer observes:—

"And how general is this type of unreflectiveness among inferior races is implied by Dr. Pickering's statement that, in the course of much travel, the Fijians were the only savage people he had met with who could give reasons, and with whom it was possible to hold a connected conversation."‡

He also remarks that Sproat's account of the Ahts may be taken as descriptive of the average state. Sproat says:—

"The native mind, to an educated man, seems generally to be asleep.....On his attention being fully aroused, he often shows much quickness in reply and ingenuity in argument. But a short conversation wearies him, particularly if questions are asked that require efforts of thought or memory on his part. The mind of the savage then appears to rock to and fro out of mere weakness."

And again:—

"Spix and Martius tell us of the Brazilian Indians that 'scarcely has one begun to question him about his language, when he grows impatient, complains of headache, and shows that he is unable to bear the exertion'; and according to Mr. Bates, 'it is difficult to get at their notions on subjects that require a little abstract thought.' When the Abipones 'are unable to comprehend anything at first sight, they soon grow weary of examining it, and cry—"What is it, after all?"' It is the same with Negroes. Burton says of the East Africans, 'Ten minutes sufficed to weary out the most intellectual' when questioned about their system of numbers. And even of so comparatively a superior race as the Malagasy, it is remarkable that they 'do not seem to possess the qualities of mind requisite for close and continued thought.'"§

Letourneau observes:—

"But of all savage races none are more childish than the Polynesians. Their thoughtlessness and lightheadedness are extraordinary. It is impossible to fix their attention upon anything for two minutes. The most civilised, the Tahitians, had no idea as to their age; to recall the date of an event that had happened two or three years previously was altogether beyond their power."‖

The same writer also remarks:—

"D'Entrecasteaux bears the same testimony. 'The Tasmanians,' he says, 'express a wish for every kind of trifle, but drop them immediately afterwards; everything seems to distract them, nothing can occupy their minds'" (p. 553).

Lubbock cites Cook as saying that the tears of the South Sea Islanders, "like those of children, were always ready to express any passion that was strongly excited, and like those of children, they also appear to be forgotten as soon as they are shed." And again:—

"At Tahiti, Captain Cook mentions that Oberea, the Queen, and Tootahah, one of the principal chiefs, amused themselves with two large dolls. D'Urville tells us that a New Zealand chief, Tauvarya by name, 'cried like a child because the sailors spoilt his favorite cloak by powdering it with flour.'"

He also gives the statement of Sir Richard Burton to the fact that the Negro kings of Western Africa, "from Gelele to Rumanika of Karaqwah, are delighted with children's toys, gutta-percha faces, Noah's arks; in fact, what would be most acceptable to a child of eight—which the Negro is."*

Of the aborigines of Australia, Sir John Lubbock observes:—

"No single fact, perhaps, gives us a more vivid idea of the mental condition of these miserable savages than the observation that they cannot count their own fingers—not even those of one hand. Mr. Crawford has examined the numerals of thirty Australian languages, 'and in no instance do they appear to go beyond the number four.' Mr. Scott Nind, indeed, has given an account of the Australians of King George's Sound, to which a vocabulary is annexed, containing the numerals, which are made to reach the number five. The term for this last unit, however, turns out to be only the word many. In fact, the word 'five' conveys to them the idea of a great number, as a 'hundred' or a 'thousand' does to us."†

Of the Esquimaux,—

"Dr. Rae, whose partiality for the Esquimaux is well known, assures us that if a man is asked the number of his children, he is generally much puzzled. After counting some time on his fingers, he will probably consult his wife, and the two often differ, even though they may not have more than four or five" (p. 513).

The Indians of Paraguay "could only count up to four." The Abiponea can only express three numbers in proper words. The Dammaras,—

"when they wish to express four, they take to their fingers, which are to them as formidable instruments of calculation as a sliding rule is to an English schoolboy. They puzzle very much after five, because no spare hand remains to grasp and secure the fingers that are required for units."‡

Of these Dammaras of South Africa, Galton says "Each sheep must be paid for separately. Thus, suppose two sticks of tobacco to be the rate of exchange for one sheep, it would sorely puzzle a Dammara to take two sheep and give four sticks." Galton adds:—

"Once, while I watched a Dammara floundering hopelessly in a calculation on one side of me, I observed Dinah, my spaniel, equally embarrassed on the other. She was overlooking half-a-dozen of her new-born puppies, which had been removed two or three times from her, and her anxiety was excessive, as she tried to find out if they were all present, or if any were still missing. She kept puzzling and running her eyes over them, backwards and forwards, but could not satisfy herself. She evidently had a vague notion of counting, but the figure was too large for her brain. Taking the two as they stood, dog and Dammara, the comparison reflected no great honor on the man."§

Lindsay, in his Mind in Animals, says that—

"The Veddas of Ceylon are described by Hartshorne as 'quite unable to count.....They cannot count even by the aid of their fingers, having no conception of numbers.' Among the Amazon Indians there are no words for numbers.....Even at the present day many savage tribes of Brazil and Australia cannot count beyond two or four, and can only indicate higher numbers by gestures. Oldfield even describes a tribe who count no further than the number two, and designate all beyond by a word signifying 'many.'"‖

He also says, "The aborigines of New Caledonia 'can with difficulty count the lowest numerals'" (p. 452). These savages were not so far advanced in this matter as the chimpanzee "Sally" at the Zoological Gardens, whose keeper taught her to count up to five.

Acid Drops.

A great deal is being made of the action of the Rev. E. W. Lewis, a leading Nonconformist preacher, who has given up a post worth £600 a year, in order to lead a life of poverty, preaching wherever occasion offers. Mr. Lewis appears to be taking St. Francis D'Assissi as a model, and we have no desire to say a word against his personal sincerity. Such a life is obviously nearer the New Testament ideal—which is the Eastern ideal—of a preacher of religion than that of men drawing large salaries, and clamoring for funds to raise the salaries of other preachers less lavishly paid. The mendicant preacher is a common figure with all Eastern religions, and we ought never to forget that Christianity is essentially an Eastern religion. It was born in the East, and it has never been really acclimatised to the West. What the West has had has been a Christianity modified in various directions, and so far an unfaithful representation of the genuine article.

But with every allowance for the sincerity of Mr. Lewis, his action only serves to emphasise the hopelessly irrational, non-social, if not anti-social character of Christianity. Consider what this ideal of a perfect man involves. A wandering mendicant preacher, without family or domestic ties; developing what he is pleased to call his "spiritual" nature, but quite obviously leaving the other part of his nature undeveloped. All cannot adopt the plan or society would dissolve into fragments. His poverty and self-sacrifice only gain emphasis from the wealth and arrogance of others. But it does nothing whatever to diminish either arrogance or excessive wealth. The Ascetic is much older than Christianity; he has been in the world for thousands of years, and no sane person will say that he has been instrumental in diminishing social evils. Usually his presence has had the opposite effect. Men do not make the world better by leaving it. The rational enjoyment of all that the world offers is a much healthier plan than that of ignoring either its beauties or its possibilities. Above all, the ideal of St. Francis presupposes a world in which extreme poverty and extreme wealth are perpetual and irremovable features. And that is a supposition that no progressive sociologist will readily grant. A good man in the world, sharing its activities and striving to purify them is an inspiring sight. A man shutting himself out from it—no matter how good or sincere he may be—is, at best, a pitiful sight. Naturally, the surrender of £600 a year has impressed Christians greatly. It is an illustration of the Christian's standard of value.

Mr. M. M. Mangasarian, of Chicago, one of the ablest and most popular Freethought advocates in the United States, delivered a lecture for the Twin City Rationalist Society at Minneapolis. The local clergy replied to him on the spot, but not at the same time. They called upon the owners of the hall not to let it to the Rationalists again, and the call met with a favorable response. We congratulate the local clergy on the preservation of the Christian business instinct, which started so well in the proceedings of Cashier Judas and the death-dealing performances of General Peter in the case of Ananias and Sapphira. Their reply to Mr. Mangasarian was simple, easy, and effective. Once more—we congratulate them.

The Weekly Rest Day Bill, recently introduced in the House of Commons, was doomed from the first, and expired amid many peals of laughter. Mr. Harry Lawson's happy description of the Bill was, "It's a Bill a maiden aunt might have drafted after listening to a sermon on the want of Sabbath Observance." Mr. Henry Chaplin declared that "soon the Sabbatarians will want to prevent hens laying on a Sunday."

To cane or not to cane? that is the question which Dean Inge has disinterred, after having had a decent burial long ago by all educationalists. The gloomy Dean laments the abolition of the "wholesome birch." It is appropriate that the official of a reactionary Church should admire the methods of Wackford Squeers and Dotheboys Hall.

Rev. H. Barrow Williams, the well-known Calvinistic minister of Llandudno, is on the rampage, and Welsh heretics in high places had better beware. "I know men," he is reported to have declared, "who are practically heathen—professors in our colleges—(shame)—and we cannot consistently with our deepest convictions entrust the tuition of our boys and girls to educated heathens. These people should realise their position, and I say that if they cannot reverence our sacred institutions, we must prefer their room to their company. (Applause.)" This is a clear warning to the professors against incurring the loss of their bread and butter. But suppose these gentlemen, as is very likely, defy the warning? In that case the Rev. H. Barrow Williams and his clerical colleagues will have to "realise" their "position." The note of alarm, indeed, is perceptible in their threats already. They would show less temper if they were not afraid that, after all, their own is the dying cause.

The Catholic Archbishop Whiteside, speaking on "Motherhood" at Liverpool, said that keeping children alive was necessary. "They would live, grow up, marry, rear families, increase the Catholic population, and, finally, the number of citizens of the kingdom of heaven." How transcendental! Presumably, the heavenly "citizens" will wear clogs.

Professor Phillimore, orating at Glasgow, said that "the dirty work the Catholic Church had to do was to make more tolerable or less intolerable the social conditions of the day." How true of all Churches! If the masses did not think of the mansions in the skies, they would not tolerate living in slums on starvation wages.

Despite the rejection by the House of Commons of the Sunday Closing Bill, the Bishop of London is still proceeding with its sister measure in the House of Lords. Notoriously careless about his facts, the Bishop informed the House that "nobody challenged the statement that wherever Sunday closing had been tried it had proved a success." As a matter of fact, the statement is being constantly challenged, and proofs have been brought forward of cases where it has quite failed as a reformative measure. And Lord Salisbury actually challenged the statement on the spot. He pointed out that in Wales the rate of drunkenness on Sunday was ·64 per 1,000 from 1885 to 1895, and ·65 from 1902 to 1912. On the other hand, in England the cases were ·46 and ·45 during corresponding periods. Sunday closing certainly does not lead to a smaller consumption of intoxicating drink, and does not always mean even a decrease of Sunday drinking. Saturday night drunkenness often gets more pronounced. There are, of course, other causes that make for a general decline of drunkenness; but of these, as may be expected, the Bishop of London does not appear to have the slightest conception.

This is the way the Rev. A. E. T. Newton, Vicar of Whittlesey, near Peterborough, speaks of our English "Sunday":—

> "It has neither history nor theology behind it. No primitive or mediæval theologian knew aught of it. Nowhere out of these isles and America is it known. Neither South of Europe of Romanism, nor Northern Europe with its Protestantism, nor Eastern Europe and the Greek Church know anything about it. It is a mushroom in its growth and an evil fungus in its existence."

Mr. Newman goes on to advocate the right of liberty to Sunday games, and to do that which helps a man "most to realise that it is good to be alive." He points out the dangers of a Sunday with nothing to do, and says it would be a good thing if "pious people" would organise a concert and a dance after service hours. Mr. Newman is on the right road, but he errs in thinking that Sabbatarians have at heart the moral and intellectual good of the people. They have not. Their principal purpose is a theological one. Otherwise, they would welcome the opening of picture palaces on Sunday, which, on the testimony of the police everywhere, have done more to keep the streets decent on Sunday evenings than all the sermons that were ever preached.

The Roman Catholic Bishop of Bayonne has been denouncing the Boy Scout movement in France. His objection appears to be that there is no religion mixed up with it. He says they are offered the religion of honor, justice, truth, and conscience, but God is disregarded and ignored. For our part, if we must have a religion, this seems the most admirable one that can be selected. The Bishop says that the boys will not understand such "pretentious jargon." We beg to differ. A boy of nine or ten years of age has a fairly keen perception of truth and honor; and, at all events, if these things are beyond him, it is certain that what are called the "truths of religion" are above his comprehension. The fact of the matter is that the French leaders of the Boy Scout movement appear to have wisely kept God and the clergy out of it, and naturally they do not like it. So "honor, truth, and conscience" become to the Bishop "mere pretentious jargon."

Superstition is a hardy plant. As an inducement to subscribers to a Catholic school, an advertisement in the Universe informs us that "Blessed Lourdes rosaries and medals which have touched the spot where Our Lady appeared, will be sent to contributors on application."

A good joke is always welcome, and one occurred in connection with the recent Ipswich by-election. The chairman of the Lloyd George meeting related the following story. A canvasser told an old lady that the Chancellor was likely to make a railway to heaven. "I don't know about that," the old lady replied, "but he has made the waiting-room a good deal more comfortable."

Mr. Lloyd George's theology is generally a bit shaky. In his Ipswich speech, replying to the old objection that the Insurance Acts would ruin English industries, remarked that unemployment had dropped from 8 to 2 per cent. since 1910. "England," he added, "has never had such prosperity as she has had since she began to look after the sick, the broken, and the aged, and every man who believes in providence will know the reason why." We wonder if Mr. George really believes this? That God is on their side is a common idea amongst religious statesmen. Mr. Gladstone carried the Almighty with him every time he changed his mind. Mr. Lloyd George seems equally sure of always having the Deity's company. The oddest thing of all is that Mr. George's opponents express the same assurance of the divine support.

The Saturday Journal is publishing a series of articles on "What Happens to Us When We Die?" and the editor promises that they will embrace "all sorts of opinions." We have seen that sort of announcement before, and it often means all sorts of opinions—within limits. Contributors are allowed to differ about religion, but they must not reject it altogether. They must always find room for it somewhere, and express a certain feeling of sorrow for their departure from orthodoxy. The writer of the article in the issue for May 21 is described as a "well-known author," and the concealment of the name is itself symptomatic. Writers are afraid to avow themselves, editors are afraid to print, publishers are afraid to publish. We have not the direct persecution of earlier days, to which a man might yield without a feeling of personal degradation, but we have a religious tyranny exerted which inevitably lowers the character of those who submit to it, and enlists them as agents for ensuring the same demoralisation in others.

We are convinced that this general timidity is largely unwarranted. Because a few parsons shriek out when writers are allowed to speak plainly through the columns of a paper, or because a few bigots write protesting, it is assumed that the whole of the public is up in arms. The fear is, we believe, unwarranted. The bulk of the public really care for a respectful, firm, straightforward speech. There is no real need for editors to be so timid, so fearful of exposing themselves to a popular clamor. This dread of giving offence is really a heritage; it belongs to a time when the Churches actually possessed the power to punish by death or imprisonment those who gave offence. The tradition remains after the power has largely gone, and writers terrify each other into evasion or suppression. The old hand—who has never tried plain speech—cautions the beginner, and he in turn hands on the warning as though it were the product of his experience. The result is that writers and editors are, as a rule, a cowardly lot. They are daring within the limits of safety. The first editor of a widely circulated newspaper who has the strength to lift himself out of the rut, and give the same opportunity for anti-religious as for religious news, will probably discover that he has been all along trembling before a bogey of his own creation.

The Daily Telegraph has raised a sum of nearly £40,000 for the benefit of the Young Men's Christian Association. We presume that it is the traditions of the house of Levy that is responsible for this zeal on behalf of a Christian institution.

Plaster Saints is the alluring title of a new play in which a parson runs amok and proves himself a first-class hypocrite. Other plaster saints, varying in size from an inch or so to the ample proportions of Falstaff, may be purchased at Catholic toyshops throughout Europe.

Mr. Israel Zangwill says that the reason for the reaction against Rationalism is that Freethinkers have taken consolations from people, and given them nothing in return. This reminds us of Charles Lamb's jest, "I design to give up smoking, but I have not yet fixed upon an equivalent vice. I must have quid pro quo."

A sailor, charged recently at the Guildhall with a minor offence, was found to be a religious picture-gallery, for he was tatooed from head to feet. Round his neck was the snake that tempted Eve; on his back was the Lord's Prayer; and on his chest and legs were portrayed the twelve disciples. Even his arms and bald head had sacred decorations. Despite the optimists, one Christian has "the needle."

"Arley Lane"—the writer of "Pulpit and Pew" in the Birmingham Weekly Mercury—devotes a couple of columns to a sketch of a recent lecture by Sir Oliver Lodge. There is a good deal of good-humored sarcasm in the sketch, and Sir Oliver is "chaffed" for his knowledge of the "Creator's" aims and intentions in creating the world as it is. There is nothing easier, for anyone who can talk at all, than to talk in the strain adopted by Sir Oliver Lodge, but he is really no more an authority on the topic than the primitive worshiper of thousands of years ago, or the most ignorant of preachers to-day. Says "Arley Lane," "Delightful as was his discourse, it raised a dozen queries for one it tried to meet. Sir Oliver rambled on, and on, and on, without much connection, without clear final aim, always agreeable, but leading to nowhere." We can quite believe that the lecture roused more doubts than it allayed—to the critical listener. But we do not suppose that many in the audience were that way inclined. The majority probably came to hear familiar expressions uttered, and cared little about anything further.

Sir Oliver repeated the very old observation that it was impossible to imagine all things originating without having been conceived in a mind. This is sheer confusion. One is quite warranted in retorting that it is impossible to imagine a mind originating the universe. You may conceive a mind planning or arranging forces or material already in existence, because that is analogous to what we ourselves are constantly doing. But that leaves the question of origin untouched. The truth here is that our only conception of mind is by way of a relation, and it is utterly impossible for anyone to form the slightest conception of a "mind" antedating everything else and creating everything. Sir Oliver Lodge is simply illustrating the vulgar confusion between originating and arranging. When he says we can conceive the universe originating in a mind, he really means that we can conceive it arragend by a mind. And these are quite distinct propositions. No one can conceive the first, and there is no necessity for his making the attempt. No one can think beyond existence, since thinking implies existence. We are not bound to think of the universe originating in a mind. We simply cannot think of such an originator.

The other half of Sir Oliver's confused statement is no more than an assertion of human impotence badly formulated. We do not know how the present cosmic arrangements have come about; we can conceive—granting a mind of adequate calibre—that some mind arranged things as a mechanic arranges his materials. Granting the assumption of the existence of such a mind, this is conceivable; but it is not probable, and it is not necessary. For so long as the beauty and "order" of nature express relations between the various parts of nature—and this must always be the case—there must always remain the possibility, if not the probability, of this beauty and order occurring without the intervention of mind. One might almost say that this must be so, since "order" is not something that is established; it is inevitable. Scientifically, there is no such thing as an absence of order; there can only be a variation in the kind of order existing. And the discovery of the way in which any order is maintained is a problem of scientific inquiry. It provides no basis whatever for the spiritualistic moonshine of Sir Oliver Lodge.

Mrs. Annie Besant, who is now President of the Theosophical Society, is lecturing on "Mysticism," including such subjects as "The God-Idea" and "The Christ-Idea." The lady in the mist might try to answer some of her previous arguments to the contrary.

The latest begging dodge in religious circles is an imitation "Special Summons" in behalf of the funds of a certain St. Savior's Church. It is printed on blue paper and conforms to all the characteristics of a legal summons. Copies are delivered at front doors indiscriminately—even if the inmates are Atheists. The cheek of the thing is—quite Christian.

"The Futurist Man's Dress" was the title of a lecture by Signor Marinetti at the Doré Galleries. Let us hope that the costume won't be too much like David's when he danced before the ark.

Nokes, 5s.; Mr. Vickery (Peckham), £1 1s.; Richard Johnson, £5; Arthur Powell, £1; T. W. Love, 2s. 6d.; T. C. Riglin, 2s. 6d.; John Grange, £2 2s.; J. M. Wood (Winnipeg), 4s.

W. CROMACK.—Thanks for cuttings. They are always useful, even though we may be unable to use them at the moment.

H. GEORGE FARMER.—Please send your new address at once to enable to send proofs.

R. WOOD.—The "continuation of improvement" in our health seems fairly certain.

RICHARD JOHNSON.—Glad to have your best wishes for our "good fighting form" in the future. We think you do well not to travel to the Conference unless you feel pretty sure of weather and health. You wear wonderfully well, but it isn't wise to tempt Providence, as the Christians say,—as though he were always looking out for a meal.

JOHN BLUNDELL.—The passage occurs in King Lear, Act IV., scene vi.

D. RUSSELL.—Our contributor's pen-name "Abracadabra" is a word that was greatly used by the "Occultists" of the Middle Ages. It is mere gibberish, but as written in the form of a triangle was believed to be powerful as a charm, particularly against disease. Glad to have your appreciation of the quality of this journal.

C. F. BUDGE.—There was certainly a stage at which the followers of the Pagan deities accepted their existence as a fact. At a later stage the tendency was, with the more rationalising and cultured, to represent them as symbols. We see exactly the same process in the case of Christianity. All religions appear to follow much the same road of development—and decay.

BONNAICE.—We are glad to have your tribute to the Freethinker's "cheerful and wholesome tone" and abstention from the vulgarities that are patronised (for business reasons) by so many other papers. We quite sympathise with you in your present state of mental unrest, but we beg you not to try to force your mind; trust to time and reflection.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS FREETHINKER.—Yes, it is something for the Christian Evidence lecturer you name to be proud of when he contemplates the maltreatment of two young ladies by a couple of thousand infuriated Tunbridge Wells believers. Undoubtedly the responsibility for this brutality rests with the Christian Evidence lecturer, who has been busy filling their minds with his filthy slanders. Luckily, the police appear to have done what they could, or the consequences might have been really serious. For our part, we should be inclined to let the Tunbridge Wells hooligans severely alone. If the Christians of the place are content with the knowledge that in 1914 Tunbridge Wells is so far behind the times that no two opinions on Christianity are permitted, we are content with it as evidence of the value of Christianity.

J. JACKSON.—We are afraid that our regular contributors would not be able to join in the correspondence you name, unless some special occasion presented itself for their so doing. Glad to know that you have been doing your part.

D. ENGLAND.—It is difficult to advise you without more precise knowledge. You would probably find Mr. Cohen's Determinism and Mr. J. M. Robertson's Pagan Christs of use to you.

Delegates to the N. S. S. Conference who arrive in London in time on the Saturday evening will receive an informal welcome at the Bay Malton Hotel, 160 Great Portland-street. The Secretary, Miss E. M. Vance, and several members of the Executive, will be in attendance. There is still on hand a supply of small bills advertising the evening meeting, and we hope that London Freethinkers will see that these are well and profitably used. They are to be had on application at this office. It is also probable that an excursion may be arranged for the Monday following the Conference. Details of this will be announced at the morning meeting. The Conference luncheon is to take place at the Café Marguerite, Oxford-street, at 1 o'clock. Tickets 2s. 6d. each.

Mr. John Grange, the veteran Bradford "saint," whose name is so well and so honorably known in that district, sending his annual contribution to the President's Honorarium Fund, compliments Mr. Foote on preserving his mental powers unimpaired in spite of all his bodily troubles. He refers to the Editor's recent criticism of Kipling as "a marvel of incisiveness." "It is the finest thing of its kind," he says, "that I ever read at any time."

Mr. Arthur Powell, a personal friend of Mr. Foote's, whose subscription is acknowledged in this week's Freethinker, is a veteran Secularist, and old age is now telling upon him visibly. But in body and mind he was built on one of nature's best models; one of those who (allowing for the religious conventionalism of Robert Burns's energetic language) "derive their patent of nobility direct from Almighty God." Mr. Powell has an old friend, counting more years than he does himself, being eighty-two, and still taking an interest in the progress of advanced movements. Mr. Powell sends his older friend the Freethinker in batches of half-a-dozen or so. After reading the last batch the older friend wrote Mr. Powell an interesting letter, from which we are permitted to extract the following passages. Referring to the fact that the Freethinker has passed its seventeen-hundredth number, the writer says:—

> "What an immense quantity of editorial and other work these figures represent, besides his other important literary work, much of it now, I suppose, untraceable; the Presidency of the N. S. S.; and last, but not least, his lectures in widely separated parts of the country, involving much tedious travelling, and sudden, cold-catching changes of temperature—from the warm lecture-room to the chilly, draughty railway-carriage. Truly an amazing record of work.....You see I have been taking some interest in the public life of the Editor of the Freethinker. On first hearing him address a public meeting, when he was little more than a lad, his able and earnest style so impressed me, that I thought he had a great future. What will it be? I asked myself. Anticipating Mr. Asquith's well-known words, I replied (to myself) Wait and see. We can now see."

Forty-three or forty-four years—perhaps even forty-five—have elapsed since Mr. Powell's old friend took note of the youth who had already devoted his life to Freethought. If the record closed to-morrow it would be a fair stroke of work in the world—and for the world. George Meredith—one of the master-geniuses, whose true greatness, both of mind and character, has yet to be fully recognised—was also taking note of that youth, and told him, only a few years after, that he was fighting "for the best of causes" although he knew "how profitless it must be." The Master's fight is over, except through his writings; the Disciple's will last until his hour strikes on "the horologe of time."

The completion of the third edition of the Golden Bough, which grew from the original fine book published in two volumes, and is Dr. Frazer's masterpiece, has suggested to some of his admirers that this is a "fitting occasion for offering him some token in recognition of his great services to learning." This is not expressed as it might be, for Dr. Frazer is anything but a pedant, but we quite agree with the object and the occasion. It is proposed that a Frazer Fund be raised, with a view to promoting the study of Anthropology by means of grants to travelling students, of either sex; the Fund to be held in trust by the University of Cambridge. The Secretary and Treasurer is Mr. F. N. Cornford, Trinity College, Cambridge. Contributions to the Fund may be sent to him, or to the "Frazer Fund Account," Messrs. Barclay & Co., Mortlock's Bank, Cambridge. The Committee includes a number of distinguished scholars and writers. We hope the Fund will be liberally supported. No honor can be too great for an investigator and thinker like Dr. Frazer.

Human institutions are inventions. They are devices to aid in the promotion of human welfare. They should be judged by the same standards of utility as agricultural implements and everything else. Whatever can be made over to advantage, they should be made over. And whenever they can be rendered useless by something better to take their place, they should be sent without sighs or lamentations to the junk-pile. Nothing is too sacred to be improved. —J. H. Moore, "Ethics and Education."

Christian Apologetics.

VI.—PALEY'S EVIDENCES (No. 2).

ANOTHER example of Christian Evidence reasoning by our great apologist Paley is that relating to Celsus and Porphyry (Part I., chap. ix., sec. 9). Paley says:—

> "Near the middle of the second century, Celsus, a heathen philosopher, wrote a professed treatise against Christianity. To this treatise Origen.....published an answer, in which he frequently recites his adversary's words and arguments. The work of Celsus is lost, but that of Origen remains.....Celsus, or the Jew whom he personates, uses these words: 'I could say many [other] things concerning the affairs of Jesus, and these, too, different from those written by the disciples of Jesus, but I purposely omit them.'.....It is not easy to believe that if Celsus could have contradicted the disciples upon good evidence in any material point, he would have omitted to do so.....This statement of Celsus proves that the Gospels were composed by the disciples of Jesus, strictly so called."

In the foregoing statement of Celsus I have inserted one word—that placed within brackets—which must have been inadvertently omitted by an early copyist. Celsus has said "many things concerning the affairs of Jesus," which contradict the accounts in the Gospels, some of which will be noticed presently. Meanwhile, Paley is greatly in error in thinking that the statement of Celsus which he has quoted "proves that the Gospels were composed by the disciples of Jesus, strictly so called." What it does really prove is, that at the date when Celsus wrote (A.D. 178), the Gospels were asserted by Christians to have been written by disciples of Jesus. Celsus simply accepted what was said of the origin of the Gospels in his day.

Speaking of another hostile writer, Paley says:—

> "What Celsus was in the second century, Porphyry became in the third. His work, a large and formal treatise against the Christian religion, is not extant. We must be content, therefore, to gather his objections from Christian writers who have noticed, in order to answer them.....Porphyry objects to 'the abomination of desolation'.....to John's application of the term 'Word'; to Christ's change of intention about going to the feast of Tabernacles; to the judgment denounced by St. Peter upon Ananias and Sapphira.....Neither Celsus in the second, Porphyry in the third, nor the emperor Julian in the fourth century, questioned the authenticity of the New Testament books, or even insinuated that Christians were mistaken in the authors to whom they ascribed them."

Here I may say that Paley is again in error as to what this unquestioning attitude proves. It proves only that opponents of Christianity, who lived at a period too late for investigating the origin of that religion or its writings, gave assent to the Christian view because they had no means of disproving it. At the date when Celsus wrote, all the canonical Gospels had been in circulation for some time. According to the historian Glover, "Celsus was above all a man of culture—candid, scholarly, and cool." His book, which was entitled the True Account, was "powerful and popular, and it proved a real obstacle to the spread of Christianity among the educated classes. Origen's answer decided the controversy in the Church's favor." Scholars who have endeavored to reconstruct the arguments of Celsus from Origen's reply have found the order disarranged, the objections presented sometimes in the author's own words, sometimes in paraphrases or epitomes, and they are often left to discover what he may have said from details of the rejoinder.

Porphyry was a Platonic philosopher of great learning, who, near the end of the third century, wrote fifteen "books" or chapters against both the Jewish and Christian scriptures. Neither of the works written by Celsus and Porphyry has come down to us. We have therefore no means of knowing exactly what these two cultured Pagans had to say against Christianity. True, Origen replied to some of the matters in the work of Celsus, and some later Christian writers have preserved a few extracts from that of Porphyry; but these fragments give a very inadequate idea of the contents of the books in question. To form a correct estimate of them, we require to see the works as a whole. How is it, then, that neither of them has been preserved to our day? Paley merely tells us that "the work of Celsus is lost" and that of Porphyry "is not extant." But why is this the case? Did not our ingenuous apologist know? Well—yes; Paley did know; but he thought it might not redound to the credit of the Christian Church to give the reason.

During the two centuries in which the Christians were merely tolerated by the Roman authorities, any heresy might be taught, and any book hostile to the Christian religion might be placed in circulation, with perfect freedom. But as soon as Christianity was made the religion of the State, all heterodox writings and all attacks upon the orthodox religion were rigorously suppressed. The movers in these matters were the Christian clergy, by whose influence edicts were issued against the possessors of such writings. Thus, in A.D. 325, in the reign of the emperor Constantine, an edict was passed in which it was stated:—

> "As Porphyry, an enemy of godliness, for having composed wicked books against Christianity, hath found a fitting recompense in being infamous, and having all his impious writings destroyed, so now it is my pleasure that Arius and those of his sentiments shall be called Porphyrians.....If anyone shall be found to have concealed any writing of Arius, and shall not immediately bring it and consume it in the fire, death shall be his punishment."

A few years previously, under the same emperor, all the copies that could be found of the works of Celsus and Porphyry were consigned to the flames. The writings of the so-called heretic Arius were now doomed to the same fate. Arius believed all the New Testament scriptures, but differed from many other Christians in his interpretation of the first two verses in the Gospel of John. The majority held that "the Son was of the same substance, essence, or nature as the Father, and was equally eternal with the Father." Arius maintained that "the Son was begotten by the Father before all worlds, but did not exist before he was begotten." It was thus a case of tweedledum and tweedledee. It would appear, however, that all copies of Porphyry's book had not been destroyed; for in A.D. 392 an edict of Theodosius was issued in which it was enacted:—

> "All writings whatsoever which Porphyry or anyone else has written against the Christian religion, in the possession of whomsoever they shall be found, shall be committed to the fire"—the penalty for non-compliance being death.

A similar proclamation was issued in A.D. 449, after which we hear no more of these "wicked books." The work of Porphyry was of a more scholarly character than that of Celsus, and was considered far more dangerous to educated persons; hence only the former is specially named. We see now the significance of Paley's disingenuous statement—"the work of Celsus is lost"—that of Porphyry "is not extant."

We will now see something Celsus has said "concerning the affairs of Jesus" which differed from that recorded in the Gospels. Celsus says, in effect, that the mother of Jesus was a poor Jewish countrywoman whom her husband or betrothed, a carpenter, had divorced for adultery; that her child, Jesus, was the son of a soldier named Panthera; that Jesus was taken to Egypt and lived among Egyptian conjurors, whose arts he there acquired; that upon returning to Palestine Jesus practised these arts, and persuaded the common people that he was a god. Certain obscene details of the story, however, Celsus "purposely omitted," not caring to soil his parchment with them. Paley is discreetly silent respecting the foregoing, and Christian advocates denounce the story as a foul slander—which it may have been—but it was not fabricated by Celsus. That philosopher heard it recounted by opponents of Christianity in his day—probably Jews. The question to be determined is: Was the story invented to discredit the accounts in the Gospels? or, Was it known before any of the evangels appeared? This question has never been answered; I will therefore leave it—for the present. Renan's reconstruction of some of the arguments used by Celsus runs as follows:—

> "Perhaps it ought first to be made a subject of examination whether any man really dead has risen with the same body.....Living, your Jesus has been able to do nothing for himself; dead, do you say he rose, and showed the marks of his suffering, the holes in his hands? But who has seen all that? A woman with an evil spirit, as you yourselves confess.....At his tomb there were present, some say one angel, others say two, to announce to the women that he had risen. For the Son of God, as he appeared to be, had not the power alone to open his tomb: he needed someone to come and displace the stone.....If your Jesus really wished to make his divine power to shine, he should have shown himself to his enemies, to the judge who condemned him, to the whole world. For since he was dead, and God besides, as you pretend, he had nothing more to fear from anyone: and, apparently, it was not that he should remain concealed that he had been sent. .....Dead, he only causes himself to be seen in secret. .....His suffering had had innumerable witnesses..... It is the reverse of what should have taken place," etc.

From the foregoing it will be seen that Celsus had read Mark xvi. 9, where Jesus "appeared first to Mary Magdalene, from whom he had cast out seven demons." Celsus compares the Christians of his day to a number of frogs sitting in the mud, squabbling, and saying: "God exists, and we next to him; and it is for our sake that the whole world was made: and God will come and take us up to heaven, except those who are wicked, whom he will burn with fire." We know from other sources that the early Christians did talk in this way.

I will now briefly notice Paley's statements respecting Porphyry.

(1) That apologist says: "Porphyry objects to 'the abomination of desolation.'" The word "objects" is far too mild. Porphyry asserted that the book of Daniel was a forgery written in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes (168—164 B.C), and that the "abomination of desolation" mentioned in that book (and named in Matt. xxiv. 15 as referring to the Romans) was fulfilled in the reign of Antiochus—which is true.

(2) Porphyry objects "to John's application of the term 'Word.'" The reference is to John i. 1—14, which commences, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." Porphyry, as a Greek scholar, would know that to call Jesus "the Word" was simply ridiculous; for the term Logos denoted word, saying, discourse, doctrine, speech, account, reason; but never a person The Gospel writer took the idea from Philo.

(3) Porphyry objects "to Christ's change of intention about going to the feast of Tabernacles." This is incorrect. In John vii. 8, Jesus says to his brothers —"Go ye up unto the feast: I go not up yet unto this feast." But as soon as his brothers had gone up, Jesus also went up—but secretly. Porphyry did not object to "Christ's change of intention"; he objected to a great moral teacher telling a downright falsehood. In Porphyry's time there was no "yet" in the passage; that word was inserted (in some copies) later. In the Revised Version it is stated: "Many ancient authorities omit yet." Amongst the latter is the oldest MS.—the Codex Sinaiticus.

(4) Porphyry objects "to the judgment denounced by St. Peter upon Ananias and Sapphira." Just so; and if the narrative in the Book of the Acts (chap. v.) is true, Peter was a cold-blooded murderer. But the account is not true. The chief priests and Sanhedrim, it is stated, several times arrested the apostles, and having nothing to charge them with, let them go. But had Peter struck two persons dead, as recorded, the double murder would have been widely known; Peter, and any apostles present at the murder, would have been brought before the authorities, charged with the deed, found guilty, and stoned—as in the case of Stephen. Yet the pious Christian who fabricated the doings of Peter could not perceive this obvious fact—neither does the unthinking church or chapel-goer of the present day.

ABRACADABRA.

The Stormy Petrel of Doubt.

CHRISTIANS who live by the profession of their beliefs have a delightfully picturesque habit of drawing profit from the hell of infidelity. It is a strange habit, in these days, a monstrously strange habit; in many respects it is funny; but, like most things and customs and ideas that owe their existence to Religion, it is fraught with results, with effects, that are unlovely and painful. The ludicrousness is mixed up with the sadness, the fun with the tears, the cruelty with the amusement, the bitterness with the sweetness. Looking upon some of these religious characteristics from a broad viewpoint, we laugh; but, often, when we enter the narrow spheres of the individual, we see nothing but tragedy. Coming to the personal, we notice all the hardness, the coarseness, the hatefulness, of their operations. We see them in naked reality. Their malformations are more ugly than grotesque. They sicken us. We wonder how it is that humanity allows Religion to exist.

You know what happens when the stormy petrel of doubt pays its first of many visits to the young mind. The mind never lives a recluse. Action, in various forms, but particularly in speech, is inevitable. One might say that the activities of intelligence were the fruits of the functioning of the mind, just as mind is the effect of the functioning of the brain. The young mind cannot resist its own power. Doubt cannot be imprisoned. At first the comments are humorously poohpoohed by the elder people. Experience and knowledge are theirs by right of life and living. What satisfies them should surely be accepted unquestionably by their children.

Slowly the doubts develop. With increase of strength comes the trouble. The storm threatens. Ultimately it bursts upon the family circle; and the home peace is disturbed by the rushing winds of mental confliction. In the glaring lights of anger and disappointment, Christian habits crucify themselves; the hard sadness tastes bitter; the comic element is displaced by tragedy, the little tragedy of the common people.

Is it idle sentiment to ask how many homes, even in these presumably enlightened days, are transformed into storm scenes? How many mother-hearts, sailing along on love's silver seas, are suddenly caught in the storm and all but wrecked? How many sorrows, in the shape of broken hopes, tattered disillusionments, torn ideals, crushed memories, litter the waters, when the storm subsides.

Seldom does the raging of the winds penetrate from the family seclusion. We cannot tell of the amount of useless human suffering heralded by the stormy petrel of doubt. All we know is that thousands of homes, at this very moment, are shivering and trembling in the blast of the gale; that in the unseen social heart of humanity there goes on a hateful turmoil and strife blown into being by the winds of religious bigotry. Part of the tragedy is that so little of the destructiveness of the storm ever becomes known.

The mother-heart suffers most. It is a characteristic of mother-hearts, this suffering. But how much of it comes directly from a public opinion engineered by Religion? To what an extent is the influence of our neighbors' opinions responsible, and to what an extent is the influence of belief responsible?

Crude, perhaps somewhat cynical, questions these are; and yet there is the rankle of truth in the suggestion that the hell of infidelity is not so much hell for the infidel as it is for his relations. The public opinion, whose forum is the Church, is, seemingly, a weightier matter in the estimation of our friends than the opinion of God. What our neighbors may say is more important than what God may think.

All over the country we see this so-called infidelity masquerading as belief, that business may not suffer, or that social position may not be rendered unpleasant. And in the little lives of the common people we see the same forces in activity. The hell of infidelity opens its mouth for our Christian friends when the neighbors, the acquaintances, begin to notice that so-and-so has ceased attending church. The love our mothers have for Jesus is a detail compared with the worship they yield to churchy public opinion.

Religious ardor is not responsible for the disturbances that arise when the stormy petrel of doubt comes on the wings of knowledge. Religious ardor is dead. But the old lessons linger long in the women minds. They have been taught to recognise the Church as the guarantee of moral respectability; taught to see danger in the drifting from it; taught to expect hell in disbelief; and the teaching returns to be woven into garments to hide weakness. The despicable religious ideas that surround alienation from the Church are used to cover the ugly nudity of the power of a contemptible public opinion, governed by the Church. To endure the commiserations of good church-going acquaintances is hell to the mother-heart.

Where did the mother-minds get those ideas? Where were they taught to see moral death in infidelity? In church. Who were the teachers of this atrociously dismal prison of ideas? Who passed the poison into minds that, otherwise, would have been pure? Who continue to imbue the mother-minds and mother-hearts with this damnable doctrine, this tissue of evil lies? The pastors, priests, ministers of the Gospel; the black-coated gentlemen who walk amongst us with a lovely moral halo around their benevolent heads.

Outside the church our mothers have little time, and less inclination, to read what Jesus said on any subject under the sun of humanity. Inside the church they are told what Jesus said. It needs interpretation, of course. The simplest Saxon requires interpretation. And from this elaboration springs that discolored vision used to enwrap the maleficient influence of a public opinion born in the same gloom.

With the coming of doubt there is the Devil to pay—a double Devil; one disguised as Deity, the other naked custom. It is strange to sit listening to the paying process. Sometimes the maternal words raise an edifice of such imposing structure that a faithful mind could not but worship; but an unfaithful mind is quick to see the rapid change from God to neighbor, quick to feel the slenderness of the religious building, quick to see the foundation-stone shattered by the banality of church opinion. Although the tears drop hot upon a faithless heart full of faith, there is still the clear vision that sees the horror of those hypocritical accusations that emanate first from the pulpit. They are like snakes sneaking over human love. The mother-heart could never imagine them, nor tolerate them, did not some human power assist their entrance. Condemnations of vility, convictions of damnation here and hereafter, are foreign to the mother-mind. Love knows them not. And yet, at those storm-times, we experience this unnatural combination.

While priests have been responsible, in the past, for the building up of the church-opinion that operates as the human influence, they are also responsible for the teaching that gives this human influence its poisonous qualities. The hell of infidelity has been profitable to them; but in the ordinary life of humanity how much unknown sorrow has it caused, how many unseen tears, how many wounded hearts?

When the glories of religion are being counted, and God's bles-ings named one by one; when the ministrations of God's apostles are being recollected and praised; and the goodness of God is being extolled to the skies; when man's debt to priests, to the Church, to the Christian influences are being sung in mellifluous strains, perhaps it is not foolishness to draw aside, for a moment, the curtain of the commonplace, and gaze, for a little, on the innumerable storms with their bitterness, their sorrows, and griefs, and miseries, that have followed the visit of the Stormy Petrel of Doubt to the young mind.

ROBERT MORELAND.

Artists and Freethought.

"The majority of historians would have us believe that Atheists in art were unknown. The principle is nicely applied, when we come to think of it; unless a painter believed in the Trinity, say, he was incapable of anything truly artistic."—WILLIAM REPTON, Freethinker.

IN Ford Madox Hueffer's recent book on Rossetti, the point of Ruskin's attitude to art is discussed, and Hueffer strongly condemns his "over-emphasised asceticism and his continual falsification of æsthetic standards to give body to his ethical doctrine." This charge against Ruskin is substantially true, but not wholly true, as we shall see presently. Ruskin, at one time (and, indeed, with very sparse modification throughout his life) went to the utmost limits of sheer religious bigotry to maintain his doctrine that all great art was the expression of a religious man. He even went so far as to narrow this down to a Christian religious man.

Yet I have said this is not the whole truth. After Ruskin's death, an Edition de Luxe (in 39 vols.) of his works appeared, with compendious notes from his hitherto unpublished MSS. In this work, The Thesis, alluded to above, which Ruskin held for so many years, was cancelled peremptorily in the following lines:—

> "How far has art been strengthened by her employment in religious service? Many careful thinkers on this subject, and I myself, very strenuously in past years, have contended that the occupation of artists in the representation of divine histories or persons, has stimulated and purified the powers of the art so employed. It is not, of course, possible for me to-day to enter with you even on the first steps of so vast an inquiry; but it will be part of my subsequent duty to lay before you the grounds of my now fixed convictions that few of the greatest men ever painted religious subjects by choice, but only because they were either compelled by ecclesiastical authority, supported by its patronage, or invited by popular applause; that by all three influences their powers were at once wasted and restrained; that their invention was dulled by the monotony of motive and perverted by its incredibility .....I then thought that all the nascent and dawning strength of art had been founded on pious faith; whereas I now with humiliation, but I dare not say with sorrow, recognise that they were founded, indeed, upon the scorn of death, but not on the hope of immortality; founded, indeed, upon the purity of love, but the love of wife and child, and not of angel or deity; and that the sweet skill which gave to such feelings their highest expression came not by precept of religion, but by the secular and scientific training which Christianity was compelled unwittingly to permit, and by the noble instruction received from the remnants of that very heathen art which Christianity had done her utmost to destroy."*

This is a fine passage, but it crumbled to ruins that false sentimental structure which Ruskin had built around it. Alas! how few know of this passage. This Edition de Luxe cannot be purchased under a small fortune, whereas the ordinary editions, bearing the teachings which Ruskin abandoned, are circulated by the thousand.†

Of course, to all thinking people, the early contention of Ruskin's was arrogantly foolish, for as John Stuart Mill has pointed out in Liberty, there are a considerable number of the world's "brightest ornaments" to be classed amongst the sceptics in religion. Art alone can claim not a few of these ornaments.

In the early days of European art (the fourteenth to sixteenth century) there were no documented

* Italics mine.

† For years the present writer only knew this Ruskin, and it was Mr. Chapman Cohen who brought the passage in question in the Edition de Luxe to the writer's notice.

biographies, or lettres intimes of artists, from which to learn their philosophy and religion. Indeed, in some cases, only their art-works have come down to us, and when we remember that at this period art was bound hard and fast to religion, these works, in many ways, speak as plainly as any discourse. Religion is always conservative, and so, too, is art. For a religion to allow an innovation in its art would simply conduce to an innovation in its ritual and dogma, and so could not be tolerated. Thus, when we find in these early days of strict priestly domination a deviation from the set art of the Church, one may safely infer an act of spiritual non-conformity, if not scepticism, however small.

When Giotto (1266-1337) deviated from the recognised art form, it was in fact an act of scepticism or non-conformity. Although the great "reformer in the art of painting" is said to have devoted his genius to the Franciscans, he evidently did not hold to their precepts, since he could bring the "bride" of St. Francis into ridicule in his Canzone. Indeed, Mather says that Giotto was "by no means a faithful believer." There is a story told of him in Sacchetti's Novelle which certainly is not agreeable with a pious reputation. Giotti was asked why Joseph was always depicted so melancholy? and he replied, "Has he not reason, seeing his wife [the Virgin Mary] pregnant, and not knowing by whom." It is a most irreverent remark, and I think there are good grounds for those who doubt the sincerity of his religious life. (See Quarterly Review, July, 1904).

In the fifteenth century the real effect of the "infidel" renaissance began to be felt, and painters may in fact, from this period, be divided into two classes: those in whom faith predominated following the Church tradition, and those in whom reason predominated following the Greeks. Among these latter were Massaccio (1401-28), whose work Rio called naturalisme classique, Mantigna (1431-1509), "the most pagan of all the pagan artists of his age" (Heaton), Perugino, and Botticelli.

Perugino (1446-1524) is the first artist of whom we have precise evidence that he was a Freethinker. Vasari says "he was an irreligious man, and could never be made to believe in the immortality of the soul." There are several of his paintings in the National Gallery.

Botticelli (1446-1510), a fine, poetic, imaginative artist, and perhaps the earliest painter of mythological and allegorical subjects, was, in spite of the religious atmosphere of most of his work, decidedly a free man in theology. He narrowly escaped the stake for lending his brush to express Palmieri's theory on the nature of angels. Botticelli was one of the first to illustrate a modern work of imagination —which he did in Dante and Boccaccio.

Leonardo da Vinci (1452-1519), "the divinely endowed," as Vasari calls him, was the harbinger of the dawn in art of what J. A. Symonds termed that "passionate outgoing towards the ancient world—the renaissance." His great work, the Last Supper —perhaps the most famous picture in all the world —reveals the significance of his art. What an immeasurable distance separates him from his predecessors who treated this subject! Here no dumb, meaningless physiognomies are grouped around Christ, but real transcripts of humankind. Every face, figure, and attitude bespeaks an individual, as much so as Christ. This same human, individual expression pervades all his works—the Mona Lisa, which so "absorbed and fascinated" Michelet, St. Anne and the Virgin, John the Baptist, etc. Vasari says of Leonardo that "he had taken up such heretical notions that he really belonged to no religion, and, in short, that he laid more store by his quality as a philosopher than as a Christian." Müntz thinks him a Deist, whilst Heaton calls him an Atheist. He was certainly a most pronounced Freethinker, as is evident from his Enigmas, which contain some biting sarcasms on priests and religion.

Heine says, in his Romantic School, that "the painters of Italy combated priestdom more effectively perhaps than did the Saxon theologians," and that the "vigorous marbles" of Michael Angelo and the "glowing flesh" of Titian were "much more fundamental theses than those which the German monk nailed to the church doors of Wittenburg." Now the art of Michael Angelo (1475-1564) is Pagan. It came, not from Christian Byzantium, but from Pagan Greece. As Walter Pater points out, that even in the Doni Madonna Angelo actually brings the Pagan religion, and with it the unveiled human form, the sleepy-looking fauns of a Dionysiac revel, into the presence of the Madonna as simpler painters had introduced other products of the earth, birds or flowers. "Scarcely any other great painter," says Lecky, "so completely eliminated the religious sentiment from art.....By making the Last Judgment a study of naked figures, and by introducing into it Charon and his boat, he most effectually destroyed all sense of its reality."

One cannot associate such a work as the Last Judgment with the Revelation of St. John. It seems to be more a setting of an Æschylean drama. Heaton says that "although this idea of a day of wrath is pre-eminently a Christian one, Angelo has conceived the scene in a wholly Pagan spirit."

There can be little doubt that Angelo belonged to Rationalism. That ardent Republican who could rush to the defence of Venice against imperial cannon; that rebellious spirit that could defy a Pope; that brooding mind that could philosophise on Death, the mistress of all, as he did in his poems, was not the man to subscribe to a Credo. Walter Pater has summed up his religion thus:—

> "In earlier days.....he might have been for spiritualising the papal sovereignty, like Savonarola; or for adjusting the dreams of Plato and Homer with the words of Christ, like Pico of Mirandula. But things had moved onward, and such adjustments were no longer possible. For himself, he had long since fallen back on that divine ideal which, above the wear and tear of creeds, has been forming itself for ages as the possession of nobler souls."

The other painter who helped to free mankind from that "Alp-like burden of Christianity" which Heine speaks of was Titian (?1477-1576), that superb colorist, whose art, as Kugler says, is the "expression of life itself." It is said that where Angelo gave the nude its most scientific expression, Titian gave its most sensuous. His Madonnas and Venuses have equally all that charm of life about them. It was this vivid realistic art that led Ruskin to say that "there is no religion in any work of Titian's; there is not even the smallest evidence of religious temper or sympathies, either in himself or in those for whom he painted. His magnificent Assumption of the Virgin is considered his finest work. It was painted for the Church of Santa Maria de Frari, and it is said that the pious brothers of Santa Maria were at first somewhat disturbed by the bold beauty of their altar-piece. Here, in England, the National Gallery possesses, among other of Titian's work, the splendid portrait of Ariosto, and a charming Bacchus and Ariadne, both of which—the former especially—display wondrous harmonies of color.

PLOTINUS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—Through some mischance an Irishism crept into my article of last week, entitled "Concerning Souls." Towards the conclusion there is a riotous attempt at period-fixing. To be explicit, I may say that the year A.D. 203 is taken as being the time of his birth and A.D. 262 that of his death. This would make it about one thousand years between the time of Plotinus and that of Elisha; if it were two thousand years, the contrast of the two lives would be just as vivid. The reader with a love of chronology may reckon how many years previous to the times of Calvin, Luther, Knox, and Spurgeon this good and noble man lived. I can imagine the hell-fire doctrine of Spurgeon being flourished in the face of Plotinus. I say I can imagine it, because I have just heard a toy terrier barking at the thunder. CHRISTOPHER GAY.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE

Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 23 SUNDAY, JUNE 7, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

All truth is safe, and nothing else is safe; and he who keeps back the truth or withholds it from men, from motives of expediency, is either a coward or a criminal, or both.—F. MAX MULLER.

Man's Greatest Blunder.

MY last week's article dealt with a remark by Professor Hoffding to the effect that the Freethinker, in attacking religion, ignored one of the deepest of human needs. In that article I tried to show that this could only be accepted as true in the sense that it is among the earliest of human beliefs. Every Freethinker will admit its antiquity, but there is abundant evidence against both its veracity and its utility. Many who have despaired of establishing the truth of religion have, nevertheless, pleaded for its usefulness—if not now, at some future time. Amongst these are to be reckoned such men as Professor J. G. Frazer and the late Walter Bagehot. Both supported the thesis that, while false as a theory, religious beliefs had served to strengthen various useful customs by attaching to their infraction supernatural penalties. If this were true, the harmful customs that have been perpetuated, together with the obstruction to reform offered by religious fears, would be more than enough to balance the claim. But even though true, the apology would only apply to human societies in the very earliest stages of culture. Above these, I think it may be demonstrated that the religious idea represents one of the greatest and most disastrous blunders ever made by the human intelligence.

What is the essence of religion? The modern fashion is so to define religion that it becomes inextricably confused with ethics, or with various aspects of social life. It is, we are told in the cant phraseology of the contemporary pulpit, a life. It is what we do, not what we believe, that is important. This is quite wrong. Morality, if not anterior to religion, is certainly independent of it. Of course, what we do is to some extent affected by what we believe, and sometimes powerfully affected; but this is true of religion, not as religion, but only as one of numerous ideas. And essentially religion centres in an idea. There is a religious life only as that idea expresses itself in conduct. If we can conceive man never coming to any definite conclusions about the nature of the phenomena around him, never forming any idea as to their causes, we should be unable to conceive religion coming into existence. He would have developed as a creature of instincts only, gregarious as some of the lower orders of life are gregarious, and with habits that, although unreasoning, would preserve life; but he never would have been religious.

Religion commences when man arrives at certain conclusions concerning the causes of phenomena. If these had been conceived as modern science conceives them, then religion would never have arisen. But in the circumstances of the case this was a sheer impossibility. Early mankind finds itself faced with questions to which some answer must be found, and this answer is given by what is generally known as animism. Not that this philosophy of things is worked out as a modern theory is elaborated. The philosophy that represents primitive man speculating on the nature of things is quite false; the conclusions that face us as religion, are in all probability reached in the semi-conscious way that even modern man registers the results of his daily experience. The attitude of a domesticated animal in the presence of unusual sights or sounds probably gives us a fair picture of the earliest type of mankind confronted with anything that roused his fears or awakened his curiosity. It is the accumulated pressure of experience that generates beliefs; a consciousness of their existence is in the nature of a discovery.

But a conclusion was reached by man. The world was alive, or rather it was made up of a number of living forces, with whom man must come to terms. This conclusion we now know to have been a radically wrong one, but it was one of the most important in the history of the human intellect. It meant that the first step had been taken in the attempt to understand the world, to give a rational account of phenomena. In reality it was the beginning of scientific thinking. Later ages have corrected the error made by primitive man, but in the beginning it had its use. It codified experience, and so paved the way for future corrections and more correct theories. But the great thing was that the world should be conceived as amenable to a plan; whether the plan accepted was right or wrong was really a matter of secondary importance. The religious hypothesis was the most important, the greatest, and yet the most necessary blunder ever made by the human mind.

Had religion—this primitive science of nature—been held as later scientific theories were held, the history of mankind would have been very different. The older hypothesis would have yielded place as later and better ones were framed. We should then be able to treat religion in the same spirit that we treat the early and discarded theories of the scientific investigator. But there were two factors that made this impossible. One was fear, the other was self-interest. All the early religions are based, more or less, on fear, and fear has remained the chief ingredient of all historic religions. Man began to worship the gods because he feared their malevolence. Nor was their anger of a discriminating character. If one person offended, the whole of the tribe might be punished; and to guard against offence became one of the most important of duties. It was in this way that the main road to improvement was blocked. To doubt the gods became a tribal offence. Heresy was the greatest of crimes. Thousands of generations have passed since, but the feelings generated in this manner persist to-day.

Next, there is the feeling of self-interest, sometimes of the individual, but very often that of a class. The thinkers among mankind have ever been the few, and there is no reason for doubting that the earlier priesthoods included the bulk of the most serious thinkers, and that the available knowledge was kept from the many in the interests of a special class. But this policy, from whatever reason adopted, involved a position of aggrandisement, and, once secured, such a position is not easily surrendered. Thus a priesthood growing in power, and clinging with all the tenacity of a vested interest to its privileges and possessions, would act as a constantly opposing force to any new idea that threatened its security. In this way the two factors, fear of change, and love of power and possession, have combined to prevent in religion that process of modification, rejection, and addition which has been so gratifying a feature in the history of science.

Whatever utility religious beliefs possess can, therefore, only exist in the very earliest stages of culture. At every subsequent stage they act as a drag upon the mind and an obstruction to progress. This is observable even amongst savages, with whom deviation from the customary rites is the most difficult of operations. In all the early civilisations we can see how senseless customs were perpetuated, and the introduction of new ones prevented, from the same fear of offending the gods. Even freethinking Greece and Rome felt the weight of the same incubus, although the restless intellect of the one, and the practical genius of the other, reduced the obstructive influence to a minimum. A change came when various causes combined to place religion once more as a commanding influence in life, and Christianity became the established religion of the Western world. The primitive blunder was re-established, and how repressive that influence was can only be gauged by those who are sufficiently acquainted with the history of scientific ideas to know how much had been discovered in pre-Christian times. It is simply beyond question that, whatever the precise responsibility of the Christian Church, its undisputed reign coincided with the most ignorant and deplorable period of civilised history.

After Greek and Roman thinkers, Christianity. After light, darkness. After civilisation, barbarism. Starting from next to nothing, the ancient world had built up a huge fabric of actual knowledge and suggestive speculation. With this to hand as a possible foundation for further development, Christianity gave us—the Dark Ages. Against this solid fact all the apologists for the religion of the Dark Ages struggle in vain. On the most favorable view, a Church that could allow freedom of thought to be stifled, civic life and sanitation to decay, learning to die out, and the arts of civilisation to disappear, ought not itself to have survived. With such a condition of things, mere survival is little short of a disgrace; it argues, at least, passive acquiescence with what occurs. But to be in a position of power right through this period of degradation argues more than acquiescence; it is proof of participation.

There is no real escape from the conclusion that the blighting influence that rested on Europe for so many centuries was its religion. Other causes may be found, but this is the dominant one, and it sheltered and strengthened others. Consider that the death of the ancient civilisations meant not only a loss of actual knowledge; it meant also the loss of a mental habit—of the habit of facing the world as something to be studied and conquered, and its replacement by habits of mental servility and credulity. Who would trouble after knowledge when its acquisition might mean imprisonment or the stake? What was the use of considering social improvement when the Church sat enthroned above all, sucking from society its very life-blood? Europe was palsied by its religion; robbed of initiative by its belief. Ranke, a fairly cautious writer, calculates that the reign of the Catholic Church cost Europe over ten millions of lives. All these were not, of course, thinkers, but many were, and their fate offered little encouragement to others. And in the end it was the little of the Greek and Latin writings that survived the storm which enabled it to partly liberate itself from the cramping influence of Christianity.

Religion commenced in a blunder. Of the truth of that there can be no doubt. It was only one of a host of blunders that man was bound to make before he reached truth; but it became the most fatal of all. It hangs over primitive life like a pall. Having created the gods, man finds them everywhere in his path. They demand continuous sacrifice in this world; they threaten him with penalties in the next. Every attempt at improvement meets with the same obstacle. In uncivilised and in civilised times the consequences of the initial blunder persists. It persists not alone in direct suppression, but in the perpetuation of a frame of mind that is all but fatal to orderly progress. The race has been taught to look to religion for guidance, a religion that is permeated with fear; and fear perpetuates ignorance, as ignorance in turn perpetuates fear. In earlier times the gods demanded human sacrifices. We have outgrown that, but we still continue to sacrifice the mental and moral freedom of man to the gods called into existence by the stupid blunder of our savage forefathers.

C. COHEN.

Orthodoxy Self-Condemned.

IT is an incontestable fact that all attempts to establish the truth of Christianity, when brought before the bars of logic, history, and ethics, are demonstrated to be signal failures; and by Christianity we understand the religion expressed in the creeds and conciliar decisions of the Church. From this it follows that Christianity and orthodoxy are interchangeable terms. It is sometimes maintained that the simple religion of Jesus is not exemplified in any existing Church, which may be perfectly true; but it is also true that we have no means of ascertaining what the religion of Jesus was. Even on the assumption that the Four Gospels are historical documents, there is no possible escape from the conclusion that what they contain is an interpretation of what the authors believed, or what they wished their readers to believe, to have been the religion of Jesus. The Epistles offer us two or three further interpretations of the same, and these appealed to different types of believers, thereby becoming subjects of controversy. The controversy lasted for many centuries, giving rise to unspeakable hatred, bitterness, and persecution. In the long run, the Pauline interpretation carried the day and became the organised religion of the Catholic Church. This is what is now officially meant by Christianity, the truth of which we declare to be insusceptible of verification. It is contended that it rests upon certain alleged historical facts, not one of which can be supported by a single shred of evidence. Of course, there was a time when the West bowed its knee either to an infallible Church or to an infallible Book, giving ready assent to whatever the one or the other, or both, presented as the truth. Those were the Ages of Faith, during which criticism was practically unknown. When Modernism arose in the Catholic Church and by its bold employment of the severely critical method imperilled her future, she put her foot down and stamped it out. The Anglican Church is trying hard to treat the claim of Liberalism within her own borders in the same manner; but she will not succeed because she lacks authority. The Bishops may pass what resolutions they please when they meet in Convocation, but they know well enough that they have no power to put them into operation. The clergy of the Church of England are not even required to sign the Thirty-Nine Articles. They are merely asked to make a general and vague declaration of assent to them as containing doctrines "agreeable to the Word of God."

Another peculiarity of the Anglican Church is that she pretends to be in favor of criticism while seeking to suppress it. Bishop Gore, for example, denounces the views of those who no longer regard Jesus as an infallible teacher as contrary to sound doctrine. He refers to The Eschatology of Jesus by Dr. Latimer Jackson, and The Miracle of Christianity by Dr. Bethune Baker, and says:—

> "I have tried to show why I disagree profoundly with the critics in question—not because I deprecate the application of criticism to the New Testament, but because I do not think that their criticism is sound. It is based, it seems to me, on a mistaken view of natural law, and on something much less than a Christian belief in God" (The Basis of Anglican Fellowship, p. 9).

In reality the Bishop does object to the application of criticism to the New Testament. He is himself a Higher Critic in relation to the Old Testament. He does not believe the Book of Jonah to be history; he admits that the Historical Books are replete with myth and legend and poetry and allegory, and he does not "wish to define, or ask anyone else to define, where history passes back into legend or myth"; he even allows that criticism has shown us "that a great part of the historical narratives of the Old Testament is not strict history, but gives us what St. Gregory of Nyssa admirably calls "ideas in the form of a narrative"; but he seems to himself "to see quite clearly the broad difference between the Old Testament as prophecy and the New Testament as fulfilment in fact." And yet he is not wholly blind to the fact that even in this holy of holies of Scripture criticism has done some good. "It has, I think, shown us that there is one pseudonymous book in the New Testament, the Second Epistle of St. Peter, and that there are discrepancies and errors of detail in the narratives of the New Testament."

So far so good, but at this point the critic is driven out by the theologian:—

> "When the element of fact becomes of supreme significance, in the region of the Incarnation, there also the historical evidence is adequate and, to my mind, convincing" (The Basis, p. 22).

In the name of reason, what "historical evidence" of the Virgin Birth or the Resurrection is there, or can there be? Joseph and Mary were apparently totally ignorant of the former, and there is nothing to show that they believed in the latter. Dr. Sanday looks upon that extract as "one of the indications which raise my doubts as to the real flexibility and freedom from bias of the Bishop's historical criticism." The great scholar adds:—

> "The wholesale and over-emphatic references to the conclusiveness of the evidence are not promising to the eye of a scholar. The wish is too evidently father to the thought. If the Bishop brought the same clear-sightedness to bear upon the study of the New Testament that he has brought to bear on that of the Old, I submit that various expressions would have been considerably chastened" (Bishop Gore's Challenge to Criticism, p. 12).

The curious thing about Professor Sanday is that his theology and his criticism are utterly independent of each other. As critic he has made decided progress within the last few years. He has gradually grown into the "conviction that it is impossible to draw any clear line of demarcation between the New Testament and the Old; nay, that the New Testament must be even more liable to the same kind of influences as the Old, because, whereas the Old Testament writers shaped their own methods of writing history for themselves, the New Testament writers followed throughout the model of the Old Testament." Consequently, he rejects the Virgin Birth, the Resurrection, and the Ascension, as well as all other contra naturum miracles. But as theologian he has stood quite still all through the years. While denying the Virgin Birth, he thus writes:—

> "In regard to the birth of our Lord, I would say that I believe most emphatically in his supernatural birth. I do not doubt that the birth of our Lord was sanctified in every physical respect in the most perfect manner conceivable. The coming of the Only-begotten into the world could not but be attended by every circumstance of holiness. Whatever the Virgin Birth can spiritually mean for us is guaranteed by the fact that the Holy Babe was divine. Is it not enough to affirm this with all our heart and soul, and be silent as to anything beyond?" (Ibid., pp. 19, 20).

Now, will Canon Sanday be good enough to inform us what he means by a supernatural birth? Can an event be both natural and supernatural? If a birth is not natural, is it not of necessity unnatural; and is not the unnatural, by the same necessity, also anti-natural? It seems to us that the erudite gentleman strains out the gnat and swallows the camel. What is the use of denying the Virgin Birth, the Resurrection, and the Ascension, which are intelligible events, however incredible, while affirming a supernatural birth, a spiritual resurrection, and a symbolical ascension, events as unintelligible as they are unbelievable? Fancy this statement being made by a real critic:—

> "That the Risen Lord as Spirit still governed and inspired his Church is proved beyond question, if by nothing else, by the first-hand testimony of St. Paul—not only by his own experience, but by the experience of the Christian Church around him. All this, I repeat, is verifiable history" (Ibid, pp. 20, 21).

Surely Dr. Sanday must have forgotten all about historical criticism when he penned that extraordinary sentence. All that is verifiable about the Churches organised by St. Paul is that they were composed of men and women of whom the organiser himself testified that they were contentious, censorious, disorderly, drunken, litigious, incestuous, and who are yet known to have regarded themselves as the elect of heaven, while looking down with contempt upon the Pagan world as a world abandoned by the God of love and governed by evil spirits. All this, we submit, is verifiable history, while the talk about the Risen Lord as a Spirit governing and inspiring his Church is unverifiable though very pious rhetoric.

Yes, Christianity, like every other supernatural religion, is self-condemned, and even such apologists as Dr. Gore and Dr. Sanday only succeed in making this fact more apparent. Bishop Gore says, in effect, to the critics: "We give you full liberty to demonstrate the fact that the Old Testament is made up of myth and legend and fable and poetry and parable, but we warn you that when you enter the New Testament you must be believing and reverent, treating the great miracles that find place in our creeds with humble respect, or we shall anathematise you in the name of the Lord. Our duty is to accept without question all miracles and doctrines that have been handed down to us under the guidance of the Holy Spirit." While the theologians thus prate with oracular self-sufficiency, the science of literary and historical criticism is quietly but certainly knocking away the foundation of the structure they are guarding with such zealous assiduity.

J. T. LLOYD.

Primitive Man.—V.

"Primitive man, like the child and the animal, is at first only a bundle of wants, tendencies, instincts which, when not simply unconscious, are connected with external or internal tendencies.

"The child, who feels acutely the possession of a toy, or the deprivation of it, is not affected by the beauty of a landscape, by reason of a limited intellectual power. We know that (in spite of common opinion) a savage, even a barbarian, is not moved by the splendors of civilised life, but only by its petty and puerile sides. Its greater aspects inspire him neither with desire, admiration, nor jealousy, because he does not understand them. Bougainville, in the last century, had already remarked this fact, which has frequently been confirmed since. Speaking of the profound indifference of the Pacific Islanders to the skilled construction of his ships and the instruments belonging to them, he says, 'They treat the masterpieces of human industry as laws and phenomena of Nature.'"—Professor T. H. Ribot, The Psychology of the Emotions (1897), pp. 189-190.

"It is no easy matter for a man of ordinary education to form a notion of the mental fallowness of a rustic of his own day; it is far more difficult for him to divest his mind of all its acquisitions through study and observation and reduce his ideas to the level of those of the progenitors of his race, whom we will call Arcice."—Baring-Gould, Origin and Development of Religious Belief, vol. i., p. 135.

M. Bourien speaks of the wild tribes of Malay, as inconstant, fickle, and erratic; this—

> "together with a mixture of fear, timidity, and indifference, lies at the bottom of their character; they seem always to think that they would be better in any other place than in the one they occupy at the time. Like children, their actions seem to be rarely guided by reflection, and they almost always act impulsively."*

Letourneau says, "The very inferior savage, like our own infant children, does not know what to-morrow means."

Major Tremearne also observes, "A wild pagan's idea of even the present time is, to say the least, hazy, and of the past quite valueless." And in exacting tribute,—

> "We must necessarily be extremely lenient in all matters where time is concerned with these pagans, for most of them have absolutely no idea of any divisions of the year other than 'harvest' and 'non-harvest,' nor of the sunny hours of the day than meal-time and not-meal-time; as the Geisha has it, 'a month or a week or a day, sir?' are nought to the happy-go-lucky savage. In fact, these names are quite interchangeable in his mind unless connected with anything regarding his own welfare, and even then only if to his own advantage."†

We have said that there has been no tribe yet discovered without a language, but among the most primitive races it is a poor affair, like that of the Yamparicos of North America, who are said to speak "a sort of gibberish like the growling of a dog."‡

Others eke out their language with signs and gestures to such an extent that they cannot carry on a conversation without them. Sir Richard Burton speaks of "those who, like the Arapahos, possess a very scanty vocabulary, pronounced in a quasi-intelligible way, can hardly converse with one another in the dark."§ Nor is this confined to the savages of America, for Miss Kingsley says of the languages of Africa:—

> "Some of them are very dependent on gesture. When I was with the Fans, they frequently said, 'We will go to the fire so that we can see what they say,' when any question had to be decided after dark. And the inhabitants of Fernando Po, the Bubis, are quite unable to converse with each other unless they have sufficient light to see the accompanying gestures of the conversation."‖

The same writer says that "at least one-third of an African language consists of gesture."¶

In the light of our knowledge of the irresponsibility, selfishness, childishness, and limitations of thought of primitive man, we are in a better position to judge the claim of the late Mr. Andrew Lang, that the lowest savages have a belief in High Gods—in an immortal, powerful, moral, and kindly creative Being. Fancy creatures who cannot count the fingers of one hand, so deficient in language that they cannot make themselves understood in the dark, to whom the past and the future are a blank, as gluttonous as pigs, who love no one but themselves, whose daintiest dish is a repast of human flesh, and whose greatest pleasure is shedding human blood—fancy such beings worshiping, or having the idea of, an almighty, moral, and benevolent God! The mere statement of such a proposition refutes itself.

Pious people, who gladly follow Mr. Lang in this grotesque theory, forget that if such savages have such a belief, what becomes of their argument—if it can be called such—that without the idea of a God who rewards goodness and punishes evil, people would sink into immorality? If these utterly immoral savages believe in such a God, how is it that the belief does not restrain them from immorality?

And again, if they already believe in such a Being, why spend such enormous sums in sending missionaries out to teach the natives something they already believe?

As for the much-vaunted civilising work of the missionaries—upon which two million pounds a year is spent by this country alone—the truth is, they do a great deal more harm than good. Nobody would think of employing a missionary-educated boy in Africa. All the missionaries do is to make hypocrites. Instead of discarding his own superstition, the native merely adds the white man's superstition to his own. Civilisation, to be permanent, is a very long and painful process; you cannot suddenly turn a savage into a civilised being by teaching him a new religion, any more than a pumpkin and a couple of mice can be changed into a carriage and pair by a wave of a wand. As Buckle, the historian, remarked, "We may as well expect that the seed should quicken in the barren rock as that a mild and philosophic religion should be established among ignorant and ferocious savages."* It is quite true, as he further remarks, "They receive the externals, but there they stop.....The rites and forms of a religion lie on the surface; they are at once seen, they are quickly learned, easily copied by those who are unable to penetrate to that which lies beneath." He further points out, "The religion of mankind is the effect of their improvement, not the cause of it" (p. 146). The truth of these remarks can be proved over and over again. Mr. Stanley Portal Hyatt, who knows the South African natives well, and has protested vigorously—in his books and in the press—against the manner in which they are treated by the authorities, also protests against the attempts to Europeanise them. He declares:—

> "As a rule, the so-called education given to the natives is not only useless, but positively harmful. You cannot turn the barbarian into a civilised man in one generation, possibly not in ten generations. You may catch your Kaffir young, send him home, cut him off completely from all his old associations, send him to an English public school and then to the Varsity, ordain him a priest, even consecrate him as a bishop. But if he goes back to his village when there is some festival in progress, if he smells the blood of the sacrificial bull, hears the rattles and the drums, the lewd chorus of the dancers, it is practically certain, that before many minutes have passed, he will have stripped himself of his European garments and will have joined the yelling crowd. It is a curious and significant fact that the clothed native always wears his loin cloth underneath his other garments; it is a wholly unconscious tribute to the savage side of his nature."†

The same writer says that as "the sense of being clothed seemed to bring out all the immoral instincts in the native girls—and most missionaries insist on clothing," so the only use the educated native made of his learning was to forge the "liquor-passes," which every native is required to show from his employer before a trader will supply him with a bottle of spirits. Mr. Hyatt says:—

> "The forging of passes soon became a profitable industry amongst the educated natives, practically the only industry in which they cared to engage, in which they could engage, perhaps, for it was extremely hard to find employment. No white man would risk having one in his house; they were generally regarded as a gang of thieves and forgers, and were kept at arm's length by the whole white community. Possibly, the prejudice against them was carried a little too far, but I do not think so. There were plenty of good, raw savages to be obtained, and it was absurd to run unnecessary risks by employing educated ones" (p. 27).

Mr. Lionel Decle is of the same opinion. He observes:—

> "It is to be feared, again, that the results produced by missionaries, in the way of native converts, are not any high testimonial to the value of their work. Sir Harry Johnston in his book on Kilima Njaro, has given his opinion that the native Christians of the Mombasa district are liars, cowards, thieves, and drunkards. From my own experience, I should say that almost every boy brought up in a mission is the same."

He says:—

> "You have only to go about Khama's capital and see a native as you approach pull out his Bible and begin to read it upside-down to understand the hollow character which is inseparable from ninety-nine hundredths of native Christianity."‡

And, as he further remarks,—

> "It is very easy to teach savages to sing hymns or to repeat their catechism; some of them will learn to read and write with wonderful ease. But this is mere imitativeness, like that of the monkey or the parrot. It means nothing at all. To the native the Bible is simply a series of stories of what recently took place in the white man's country; so that, instead of assisting civilisation, the teaching of the Bible, by giving wholly false ideas, actually hinders it. The idea of the redemption of the world by Christ is utterly incomprehensible to the native, for no native has the faintest idea of self-sacrifice."*

We have said that the converted native merely adds the white man's superstition to those of native manufacture, and upon this point we can cite the testimony of Miss Kingsley, who, speaking of the mission converts, says:—

> "Yet how many of these earnest people could one guarantee to have completely cast out all their belief in Ju-Juism? If I were put upon my oath to answer truthfully, according to my individual belief, I am afraid my answer would be not one."†

Directly the eye of the white man is off him, says Miss Kingsley, he sinks back to his old level again; and "The travellers of a remote future will find him, I think, still with his tom-tom and his dug-out canoe—just as willing to sell as 'big curios' the débris of our importations to his ancestors at a high price." And she adds, "I do not believe that the white race will ever drag the black up to their own particular summit in the mountain range of civilisation."‡

Least of all by means of the missionary, for Miss Kingsley emphatically declared that "The missionary-made man is the curse of the coast," and "it is not the missionaries' intent to turn out skilful forgers and unmitigated liars, although they practically do so" (pp. 490-1).

We will next consider whether there are any primitive tribes, or races, without religion. A question over which much ink has been spilt.

W. MANN.

An Angel's Visit.

SOMEONE has suggested that the emotional excitement associated with religious "conversion," and the state of feeling commonly known as "falling in love," may possibly, as psychological phenomena, be reduced to a common denominator, and find their explanation in the same fundamental psychic law. In the same way, perhaps, such ideas as are expressed by the terms "angels' visits," "inspiration," and what we call "new thought," may be but different forms of stating a mental suggestion, the hidden springs of which are not always discernible, and which sometimes appear mysterious and inexplicable. The incident I am about to relate is one of those flashes of inspiration which often startle one by their suddenness, and which come as the solution of some perplexity without any conscious mental effort. But in order to show the force and relevancy of this heaven-sent message, it will be necessary to give some little details of my previous life and religious evolution.

Until I was well into my teens, my literary knowledge was bounded by the Bible, the Shorter Catechism, and the monthly Missionary Record. The dismal Calvinistic creed of Presbyterianism is perhaps the worst phase of Christianity upon which a child can be nurtured. The fear of the Lord, in its Presbyterian interpretation, strikes a more solemn note than in any of the other sects. The ministerial gown, the sombre visage of the elders, the solemnity of the Communion, all tend to impress the childish mind with the seriousness and infallible truth of religion.

A gentleman who recently read some of my articles in the Freethinker, for the first time, told me he thought I must have been trained for the Presbyterian ministry. All the education the Fates allowed me, however, was a few short years at a colliery school, which ended at the age of twelve. But if my secular knowledge was of the poverty-stricken order, I must have been a promising student of spiritual matters, as I succeeded one year in gaining the first prize of the Sunday-school for Biblical knowledge. This prize took the form of a book, with the significant title How to Get On. I say significant, because it represents the real ideal of Christendom. For however much the Christian may profess to set his affection upon things above, his main desire seems to be to "get on" down below.

The variance between the Christianity of Church life and what I conceived to be the teaching of the New Testament soon appeared to me so obvious that I was anxious to have some explanation of the Church's apostasy. I must have been little more than a boy when I sought an interview with the minister to ask him to reconcile the two. But if this man of God had been a wax model or a wooden dolly, I could not have got less satisfaction in respect to my difficulties. If I was to be religious at all, I could not be satisfied unless there was conformity between practice and belief. A popular preacher at that time among the Congregationalists drew me for a time into the fold of that nondescript body. But the desire to find some definite basis for my religious life tended to keep my convictions unsettled. Some time later I joined the small body known as the "Churches of Christ," which professes to find the sanction for all its beliefs and observances in the New Testament alone. In accord with their plea for a return to primitive Christianity, they repudiate the office of the priesthood, the work of exhortation and preaching devolving upon those who are moved by the Spirit, or otherwise qualified for the work. Possessing a little gift in that direction, I took my share of the platform duties; but, unfortunately, the Spirit must have moved me in the wrong direction, as the socialistic tenor of my addresses soon brought upon me the censure of the "elders." I was quietly given to understand that no interpretations of Christianity were admissible that were not in agreement with their particular Church traditions. And so I was cast out into the void, to make my way a lonely pilgrim to the gates of heaven as best I could.

I belonged about this time to a local Christian Evidence Society, which was composed of all sorts and conditions of believers, and which, needless to say, went to wreck in the seething waters of jealousy and sectarian bigotry. I set to work to study the so-called "evidences." I remember going to the Reference Department of the Public Library in the town, and, not being quite sure of the books I wanted, interviewing the old librarian. With a confidence born of blissful ignorance, I said, "I want you to put me in the way of some book or books that will definitely prove the Bible to be the Word of God." I will never forget the strange look with which he regarded me. "I'm afraid you'll have a difficulty," he said, in a slow but deliberate way which surprised me not a little. A difficulty in proving the Bible to be the Word of God! Why, was not the fact proclaimed every Sunday from ten thousand pulpits in the land? And then a horrible suspicion arose in my mind. Could it be that the old fellow was an Atheist, who by some means had got into this responsible position, and dared to suggest doubts about the Bible. But, after I had spent some six months of my leisure time in studying the subject of Inspiration, and came to realise that it rested on nothing better than theological assumption, my feeling toward the old librarian underwent a marked change.

While attending the Christian Evidence meetings, the Freethinker naturally came in for its share of abuse, and I have a dim recollection of buying a copy at that remote period, only to be disgusted with its contents. After the wreck of this Society, and the Church had turned me adrift, I was left without any of the means of grace. In looking back over the years that followed, it is somewhat difficult to remember all the milestones of the journey, and locate their exact position. They were years of practical isolation so far as any social fellowship was concerned. I read everything I came across for and against religion, clinging to every raft or floating straw that I thought would save me from being drowned in the sea of scepticism. One of the books I read about this time was Supernatural Religion, and although I could clearly perceive the weakness of all the arguments used in support of Christianity, the influence of my early mental environment prevented me, I think, from fully realising the extent of my intellectual convictions. In a case of religious evolution such as I am describing, the reason often travels apace, regardless of the feebleness of our powers of adjustment. The conclusions of the intellect have for a time to contend against the forces of a previous mental atmosphere, and all the subtle ties that bind us to the past. But, with sufficient moral courage, the sympathies ultimately come into harmony with the findings of the intellect.

My progress towards emancipation was very slow; but I was not blessed with any friendly help in my lonely transition. I was living in a kind of wilderness, with the refuge of Egypt lying behind, and the promised land of settled habitation not yet reached. Every vestige of religious belief at last disappeared, but still I had not come into contact with anyone connected with the Freethought movement. Often and often I pondered upon the change in my beliefs, and wondered at my own audacity in daring to question the truth of such a hoary institution as Christianity. Years passed—years of patient study and reflection and widening thought; until one day a curious thing happened. I was walking along the street, and, as usual, meditating upon my changed condition, when I began to wonder just exactly where I then stood. Surely, I thought, there must be some paper or periodical devoted to the advocacy of the views I had come to hold as alone consistent with reason. And immediately I heard a loud voice from heaven saying, "Why its the Freethinker."

If any sceptical reader should imagine that I am merely romancing or telling a fairy tale, I can assure him that this voice was just as audible, and just as distinct as any voice that ever spoke from heaven. I have called it an "Angel's Visit" because of its mysteriousness. For, with the exception of the single instance I have previously mentioned, I am not aware that the Freethinker had ever crossed my thoughts during the ten years or so that followed. I could not even have told the name of its editor. And to this day, although I have often thought of the matter, I have been unable to trace any of the underlying causes which might possibly account for such an inspiration. It may be that the heavenly voices are not confined to the Joan of Arcs and the Christian mystics.

Such, then, are the somewhat strange circumstances under which I first made the acquaintance of the Freethinker, and which accounts for my connection with the paper. For, although I have contributed some fifty or sixty articles to its pages I have not even had speech with its editor; but they may be taken as evidence that I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision.

A Boon for Bairns.

Stories from the Children's Realm. By George Bedborough. (London: Vegetarian Union, Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street, E.C.; 1914. 6d. net.)

THERE is no literary task more difficult than the art of cultivating the interest of children in the ethical problems that surround their little lives. The child's psychology is a realm unknown, except from the distant glimpses and happy intuitions of an elect few. In that number Mr. George Bedborough deserves distinguished place of honor. Nothing more charming in the way of story-telling for children has been done for a long time than in the thirty-two beautiful stories which Mr. Bedborough has compressed into the hundred delightful pages of this little volume. His stories are good without being "goody"; they are moral without being mawkish; and they cover a very wide field of practical ethics in a freshly original manner. And if the moral elevation is high—high till it converges upon the realm of the ideal—the literary flavor is maintained at an equally lofty standard of excellence. Unlike so many tales with a purpose, these stories neither obtrude religion upon the child's mind nor extrude it from his mental purview. And, very properly, Mr. Bedborough refrains altogether from offering to the children the bribes and enticements of eternal glory, or heavenly lollipops, as the reward for making themselves happy by the agreeable process of widening the area of happiness available for the men and animals who cross their path in life. His chosen method of influence is not the method of arid proselytism; it is a method of sympathy and sweet reasonableness applied to the numerous practical problems of character-forming which intimately affect the child at his different and varied points of contact with the social life of his fellows in the home, at the school, in the nursery, or in the playground, or which affect him in his relations with the humbler but no less sensitive types of animal life.

I should like to know that these delightful stories—which, by the way, are woven with a literary artistry that can equally appeal to the thinking adult as well as to the wonder-child (for all children, until we spoil them, are wonder-children)—could find their way into thousands of homes and be read by myriads of children. I confess without any qualm of shame that I read the whole collection with eager delight at one sitting, and was fascinated by the charm and ease and naturalness of the varied groups of stories which compose this welcome volume.

The collection contains "some Dreams" (five in all), in which Mr. Bedborough shows that dreaming does not prevent the seer from keeping a wakeful open eye fixed upon the realities of the workaday world. One of these dreams, entitled "To-day: A Dream of New Year's Eve," is quite a literary gem set with poetry and sentiment and imagination. Another dream—"A Pilgrim's Progress"—is almost equally beautiful; the dream is an admirable summary in the pictorial form of allegory of some of the cruelties and absurdities that mar the life of so-called civilised man. One of these "dreams" is perhaps too obviously a tale with a purpose (though, like the rest, it is very well told): I refer to that entitled "The Isle of Vegetariana." Here, perhaps, the dietetic doctrines of Vegetarianism are too obviously pushed to the fore. On the principle that children should not be proselytised, but be left to learn their ethical truths by the logical force of the indirect appeal, it seems to me that Mr. Bedborough had better omit this story from the next edition of his book.

I have refrained from making any quotations from this book because quotation would fail to give any indication of the freshness, the vim, and directness of the appeal which Mr. Bedborough's volume makes alike to the child's ingenuous fancy as well as to the "grown-up's" ethical and literary taste. The stories are thoroughly secular in tone and tendency, and the terminology is commendably free from that slimy touch of theology with which no teacher of the young has the right to soil the nascent mind. Secularists and Rationalists will do well to let their children revel in these stories. My two grandchildren (there is one other who as yet reads naught else but his mother's eyes) have already devoured them with gusto and profit.

Acid Drops

If the English police, in some of their proceedings, do not become the laughing-stock of the civilised world, it will not be due to any fault of theirs. And some of our magistrates, who never ought to have been appointed to anything more important than a mothers' meeting, seem to be doing their best to help the police. At Scarborough, on May 27, a man was fined for exhibiting for sale two "profane" picture postcards. The cards were called "The Bachelor's Prayer" and "The Old Maid's Prayer," and each "depicted a person kneeling in prayer." Chief Constable Windsor submitted that "to make a comic postcard of people kneeling in prayer was profanity." He also said that he was "annoyed" by seeing the cards. They were "most improper." We have every sympathy with the delicacy of mind evidenced by Chief Constable Windsor, and we would suggest that such a chaste and sensitive person is quite out of place in the force. Necessarily the occupation of a policeman must bring him into contact with many "improper" sights and sounds, and the wonder is that, having been so many years in the force, this police officer should retain such a virginal simplicity and sensitiveness. In his interests we hope that he is near the pension age. The magistrate fined the seller of the postcards 10s. 6d. and costs. England will soon be a most delightful place—to get away from.

We wonder what would have happened to Walter Bagehot—economist and man of letters—under the rule of the Eugenists. We fancy there would never have been a Walter Bagehot, and so nothing could have happened to him. Of the value of his writings there is no question, and his keenest appreciators are found among some of the keenest thinkers of his time. Yet his mother was a widow of thirty-eight when Bagehot's father married her. By her first marriage she had three children—one died of some illness while young, another died from the effects of an accident, the third grew up insane. The mother herself was subject to occasional fits of insanity. We are afraid that Eugenists would have labelled her as an undesirable case, and forbidden marriage. Yet the offspring of that marriage became one of the sanest and most suggestive writers of his time. Anyone who has read only his Physics and Politics will concede this. His sister-in-law—who is his biographer—says that his standpoint in religion was really Unitarian. We should be inclined to describe it as more nearly Atheist.

Taken from a recent Guardian list of wills: Rev. H. Allott, £20,701; Rev. E. Brumell, Norfolk, £11,717; Rev. J. H. A. Gibson, Brighton, £38,959; Rev. G. Granville, Wasperton, Warwick, £25,199. Rev. C. E. Hammond, £3,497; Rev. F. Lear, Canon of Salisbury, £12,273; Rev. T. R. Shand, Chichester, £10,240; Rev. H. Shepherd, Hove, £76,636.

It is now understood, says the Academy, that "Science and religion are working on different planes to the same end—viz., the discovery of truth." We welcome the information, and should be still more pleased if the Academy could tell us what are the truths that religion has discovered. Up to the present, not only has religion failed to establish any truth, but it has been compelled to relinquish a great many teachings which it said were true. Of course, the clergy would like to be regarded as fellow-workers with the scientist, but it is a partnership to which only one side contributes. The other simply draws a part of the profits.

Dean Inge is not very hopeful concerning the future of church-going. In a recent volume of essays he says that:—

> "The outlook from the point of view of clerical professionalism is not very hopeful. The practice of church-going is likely to decline still further, especially in Protestant Churches.....The Roman Catholics are likely to be more successful in keeping their congregations together, and this will give them a statistical advantage. But from this Church, more than some others, the irresistible march of modern culture and education is certain to detach an ever-increasing number of adherents."

The concluding sentence really hits the nail on the head. Church attendance is declining, and must continue to decline, because of the "irresistible march of modern culture and education." And, obviously, no church can fight against that. As we have often pointed out, it is not this or that individual or organisation that religion has to fight. It is modern culture and the better and more enduring aspects of modern civilisation that it will have to defeat if it is to live.

The Turkish Government has adopted a friendly attitude towards the sect of Devil-worshipers. Under Abdul Hamid efforts were made to convert or suppress them. The present Government is more tolerant, and has decided to recognise their existence as a distinct religious sect. For our own part, it seems to us that worshiping the Devil is as rational as any other religious worship, and it is certainly more politic. If there be a God and a Devil, then it seems a safe game to keep on good terms with the latter. God ought to be good enough to look after his creatures whether they worship him or not. It is the Devil who ought to be placated. As it is, however, worshipers spend all their time in placating Deity, and leaving the Devil alone. Which is more complimentary to the latter than to the former.

What Secularists these Christians are! Even priests are not exempt. In a recent issue of the Universe, the Catholic newspaper, the following quaint advertisement appears: "Young priest dying for motor-cycle; set his heart on Douglas model V., £48; sees no chance of getting one himself for years; writes in desperation." The poor young man must be desperate, for he has forgotten the clerical cant of the value of prayer.

Biblical criticism now centres around the personality of Christ, and a fierce encounter has taken place between Mr. J. M. Robertson, M.P., and Dr. F. C. Conybeare, the latter's book on The Historical Christ being the subject of severe criticism at the hands of Mr. Robertson, who asks his readers to contemplate "the hysterical Conybeare" before studying the "historical Christ."

A mummy case in the British Museum was smashed with an axe by a Suffragette. This courteous action of hitting a four-thousand-years'-old corpse on the nose in order to help her cause should entitle the lady to be elected an honorary member of the Christian Evidence Society.

The Cost of Wings is the title of a new book. We suppose it depends upon the church or chapel one attends, and whether a copper or a threepenny-bit is expected in the plate.

Music in the Church forms the subject of an interesting book by the Rev. G. W. Stewart. Ordinary folk are more interested in music outside the church, such as concerts on the kerb by the Salvation Army band, and a collection by the bandmaster, with the pathetic appeal, "We'll stop here till the hat's full."

The Rev. Luke Wiseman says that every supposed miracle of the Acts of the Apostles has been repeated in our own day, except the opening of prison doors and the raising of corpses. Dear! Dear! Only the quick and the dead.

A popular writer in an advanced journal remarked that Charles Darwin was "one of the greatest Englishman ever born." Are there any Englishmen who were not born? What "Hosea Biglow" called "combinin' morrul truth with phrases sich as strike" has its dangers.

The clever "Asterisks" writer in the Star quotes a Sunday paper as saying of Satan that "There have been many who have dismissed him as a sort of Mrs. Harris—a mythological pigment." Whereupon the Star man remarks that "There are many, on the other hand, who say he is not so black as he is pigmented." But the mythological pigment probably means mythological figment. So Satan has the top of the joking, after all.

The Middles x County Council has at length decided to institute legal proceedings in cases where "the provisions of the statutes of the regulations relating to the granting of music, dancing, stage play, cinematograph, and horse-racing licenses are infringed." The legal proceedings are to be in the nature of test actions against the proprietors of cinematograph shows, and if these remain true to their original intention of fighting the Council, some important developments may be anticipated. Some of the local Councils desire these places to be open on Sunday, and an amendment in favor of taking proceedings only in such cases where the local bodies concurred was vigorously opposed by the Sabbatarians, and lost. These men are quite ready to favor local option when it suits their purpose, but in this case they discovered that it would mean "throwing the apple of discord among local authorities." Mr. H. Nield, M.P., in supporting the Committee's resolution, said that "Sunday ought to be kept as it had been hitherto"—which is precisely the way in which it ought not to be kept. Picture palaces have at least made plain the fact that, given opportunities for harmless or rational enjoyment on Sunday, harmful and irrational occupations decrease. But one can hardly expect considerations of this kind to weigh with bigots.

But picture palace owners must be on their guard. The Bishop of Chichester solemnly informed a Conference of Churchwomen that he was going to London, and intended visiting a picture palace. Bravo Bishop! This is what we call genuine moral courage. Imagine this Conference of Churchwomen solemnly considering who will beard the Devil in his den in order to find out if he really is as black as he is painted, and their relief and admiration when their own Bishop offers to run the risk! It is truly Christian. Does not the good Christian in Paris sacrifice most of his holiday-time in searching into the shady side of life in the "gay city," in order to report the evils to his friends at home? We wonder whether the Bishop will go in gaiters and shovel hat, or whether he will adopt the disguise of a layman, and plank down his "tanner" at the pay-box with an assumed air of dissipation? We would advise the latter course. Otherwise the proprietors might be artful enough to alter the program for his benefit.

The Conference in question was not called to consider the character of picture palaces. The matter arose out of a discussion about servants. The subject under consideration was how to promote the moral and spiritual welfare of servants. There was no suggestion of shorter hours or larger wages, but opportunities were to be provided for attending "Divine service." It was suggested that servants should be let out only in couples; that they should be allowed out only during the daylight; and that, when out, they should be induced to spend their time at a girls' club. Then someone wanted to know if picture palaces were fit places for servants. Hence the Bishop's resolve to inspect and report. We are afraid that his report may be adverse. We have ourselves seen films on which were displayed servants kissing each other, and even kissing their masters. And one can easily conceive how demoralising this must be to the ordinary "domestic." We are inclined to favor the idea of servants being let out in couples during daylight, marched to a girls' club or a mission service, and solemnly escorted home—not later than 6.30—by one of the curates. We had almost forgotten to say that servants were not invited to the Conference.

Rev. Dr. Robinson delivered the annual address to the Christian Evidence Society, and we fancy that its lecturers must have wished that someone else had been selected. He told his hearers that evidential books were full of smart debating points, but they did not leave the impression that here was a man really anxious to get at the facts. "Too often the Christian apologist traded upon the ignorance of his audience." Dr. Robinson also dwelt upon the ineffectiveness of the work. He said they were too much occupied in knocking down their opponents instead of declaring the truth. We would suggest to Dr. Robinson that he spends a few Sundays in visiting some of the Christian Evidence meetings if he wishes to properly appreciate the character of both the lecturers and the lectures. Nothing more hopelessly vulgar, stupid, and untruthful than the present generation of Christian Evidence speakers has ever existed. They are the Rudyard Kiplings of religion—minus his ability and education.

A testimonial to the good done by a South American Missionary Society, written by the manager of an American company, is published in one of the religious weeklies. The manager writes in praise of the Society's work in Paraguay, and thinks his company fortunate in securing land under the influence of the Mission, where it can obtain Indian labor, which is "a very valuable asset to us." If only the introduction of alcohol can be prevented, the manager dwells upon the possibilities before them "owing to the extreme cheapness of labor." We can quite believe in the manager's gratitude. If the Mission can "tame" the natives, and keep the American company supplied with an abundance of cheap labor, it does well to feel grateful. Only we fail to see in this a clear proof of the value of the Mission—to the Indian. It is all right for the preacher and for the trader. The latter makes the money, and hands over a percentage of the profit to the preacher. But does the native benefit? May it not be better for him to go cheerfully to hell after his own fashion than to reach heaven after being sweated to death in the joint interests of English missions and American shareholders?

There is an old proverb about the futility of giving a pail of milk and then kicking it over. We are often reminded of this saying by Mr. R. J. Campbell's sermons. In a recent sermon he pointed out the fallacy of assuming design from an examination of the cosmic order. That, he rightly said, "does not prove anything as to an intelligent directing purpose at the back of it." And he went on to point out:—

> "As far as one can see, in the very nature of things an order of some kind always results from the interplay of forces, physical or psychical.....Forces which cannot destroy each other must get along together somehow: they will check and modify each other, and then settle down into a system of relations which will continue until some new factor disturbs the balance. This would happen of necessity without anyone arranging it.....Every natural phenomenon within our range of acquaintance can be thus accounted for."

This is well said, although it is possible that Mr. Campbell does not see its full implications.

Of course, Mr. Campbell has to find room for God somewhere—that is his business; and having given his pail of milk, he proceeds to kick it over the roadway. Purpose is to be found, not in the universe, but in ourselves. "We should have no notion of purpose if we were not conscious of it in ourselves." Therefore, "Can we do otherwise than attribute the same kind of spiritual faculty, though immeasurably greater, to the mysterious power of which we are ourselves the outcome, and whose works we behold in the myriad worlds around us?" Now, this is really the ground on which purpose in the universe is inferred, but there is no evidence whatever offered that would lead one to assume the inference to be correct. Man assumes purpose in the universe because he himself plans. But to make the analogy complete, or even to establish an analogy at all, one would have to show that the universe resembles man as one man resembles another. I may assume that another person acts from the same motives as myself because he resembles me in all other points. But does the universe resemble me? Clearly, it does not, and consequently the whole analogy breaks down. The uncivilised mind infers purpose in the universe because it places a personal intelligence at the back of phenomena. Design in nature is not something we discover, it is something we create for ourselves. Mr. Campbell really gives the cause of a fallacy, and imagines he is establishing a scientific analogy.

It is rather a curious thing, but since the appearance of the article "The Savage in Our Midst" in our issue for May 24, we have received about half-a-dozen articles from various papers on the subject of Mascots and the use of charms generally. We hardly like to suggest that the articles in question were inspired by those who find the Freethinker very good to steal from, but we may take it as a proof that the Freethinker is more widely and more closely read than most people imagine.

The thirtieth annual report of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children states that the Society had in hand last year 54,772 cases. These were accounted for as starvation and neglect, 47,960; ill-treatment and assault, 3,991; exposure and begging, 903; and other minor offences. The Society has a deficit of £6,550. Here is a ghastly illustration of what Christianity does not do.

Dr. Drummond, of Edinburgh, says that the best thing that can be done for children is to see that they have "decent Christian homes." Let them have decent homes, by all means. We need not bother about their being Christian. Decency and Christianity are not by any means synonymous.

The General Assembly of the United Free Church (Scotland) discussed the other day the question of housing in Dundee. It appears that there are 15,000 people living in homes of one room, and 85,000 in homes of two rooms. Eventually, the Assembly decided it could do nothing. Then it proceeded to discuss the question of a stained glass window, containing a figure of Christ, in one of the Arran churches, and ordered its removal.

The Bishop of Colchester has been lamenting the want of cash in the English Church. Many, said the Bishop, who have been preferred to "livings" find themselves in possession of "starvings." We have heard this familiar tune before, but expressed in better language. Many working people would find themselves passing rich on the stipends of "clerical poverty."

The Pope has created thirteen new cardinals, including the English Benedictine, Abbot Aidan Gasquet, and Mgr. Begin, the Archbishop of Quebec. Presumably, the remainder are Italian gentlemen, as usual.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £158 3s. Received since:—D. Wright, 5s.; "Ernest," 5s.; Mr. and Mrs. Harden, £2 2s.

MR. AND MRS. HARDEN.—Your letter has reached us. Thanks for your very good wishes as well as for the enclosure.

T. CLINTON.—Sorry there has been a delay in your newsagent delivering your paper. The mistake is not, of course, due to us, as the Freethinker is published on the same day and, as near as possible, at the same hour each week. Our shop manager will, however, look into the matter and write you.

H. THOMSON.—We regret to hear of the death of Mr. Drummond. He lived and died as a brave man should. Mr. Foote is not back "in the editorial chair" yet, in the full sense of the expression, but we hope to see him there very shortly. He will appreciate your good wishes for his return to complete health.

NON COM.—David Watt is an old correspondent of ours. We much regret to hear that he is lying so weak from such a painful illness. Pray let us hear when you can report his recovery.

E. HALL (Melbourne).—We are afraid there is no likelihood of Mr. Foote visiting Australia on a lecturing tour. We can quite believe that there is room in Melbourne, Sydney, and Perth for "a live and really educated lecturer"; but Mr. Foote's hands are sufficiently full of work in this country, and there would be small wisdom in neglecting work at home to undertake other work at the Antipodes. We hope that some native Australian may be found able and willing for the work. Thanks for cuttings. We shall be happy to comply with the request in your letter.

The full report of the proceedings at the National Secular Society's Conference on Sunday last is held over until our next issue. Mr. Foote was, of course, re-elected President, and all those present were delighted to see him back again after his rather severe illness. Several figures familiar at these gatherings were absent, mostly on account of ill-health or age. On the other hand, we were glad to observe a number of younger men who seem to take a keen interest in the promotion of Freethought ideas. And it is, after all, to the younger ones of a party to whom one must look for the carrying on of the fight. And the number of young men and young women who are at present avowing themselves as Freethinkers is one of the most pleasing and inspiring features of the situation.

The evening public meeting at Queen's (Minor) Hall was a pronounced success. The Hall was well filled, and, judging from the applause, the speeches were greatly enjoyed. As we publish in another part of this paper a full report of the evening meeting, our readers will be able to judge the quality of the speeches for themselves. We need only say that the listeners seemed as fresh and as interested at the end as they were at the beginning; and that, at the expiration of two hours' speaking, is no small tribute to the speakers themselves. We are also glad to record that a quite satisfactory "offertory" was taken up towards the expense of the evening.

Considerable interest was taken in the statement of the President concerning the reorganisation of Secularism, and the party may expect to hear more on this subject in the near future. Conditions are not what they were when the National Secular Society was established, and the time appears to have arrived for a careful consideration of the whole position in the light of existing circumstances. It should be quite possible to conserve all that is really valuable in the present constitution of the N. S. S., including its record as the foremost militant Freethought Society in Great Britain, and at the same time make it a still more effective weapon in the war against superstition. When the scheme of reorganisation is complete, it will be placed before the party, and members will then be in a position to express their opinions on the matter.

There was no excursion arranged for Whit-Monday for Conference delegates and visitors. London is such a huge place, and with so many attractions, that it was thought wisest to leave those who attended the Conference to indulge their own inclinations. In the evening, however, a number of delegates and other friends foregathered at the Bay Malton Hotel, and an enjoyable time was spent in listening to songs, recitations, and music. This was kept up until such time as some delegates had to leave in order to catch their trains.

There is one point for congratulation in the tragic story of the sinking of the Empress of Ireland. Less religious humbug has been imported into the newspaper narratives. A band was on board the liner, but it didn't play "Nearer my God to thee." The Salvation Army musicians seem to have been as busy in saving themselves as any of the other passengers. On the other hand, it is not pretended that "Providence" paid them any special attention. There is the usual account of some selfish idiot, who was going to travel by the fated boat but changed his mind at the last minute, and imagines himself therefore to have been "divinely preserved." But it is also confessed that Mr. Laurence Irving, the famous actor, changed his mind the other way; travelling with his wife by the Empress of Ireland and leaving the bulk of his company to come on from New York; and nobody suggests that he was "divinely lost." On the whole it seems that the prayers of some survivors for their own safety—which is what it comes to—are looked upon as rather a human weakness. What a change from what we should have read in the newspapers twenty years ago!

FLASHES FROM EMERSON.

As men's prayers are a disease of the will, so are their creeds a disease of the intellect.

A foolish consistency is the hob-goblin of little minds adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines.

Whenever a true theory appears, it will be its own evidence. Its test is, that it will explain all phenomena.

We say the old forms of religion decay, and that a scepticism devastates the community. I do not think it can be cured or stayed by any modifications of theologic creeds, much less by theologic discipline. The cure for false theology is mother-wit.

There is no virtue which is final; all are initial. The virtues of society are the vices of a saint. The terror of reform is the discovery that we must cast away our virtues, or what we have always esteemed such, into the same pit that has consumed our grosser vices.

Blame is safer than praise. I hate to be defended in a newspaper. As long as all that is said, is said against me, I feel a certain assurance of success. But as soon as honeyed words of praise are spoken for me, I feel as one that lies unprotected before his enemies.

There is always room for a man of force, and he makes room for many. Society is a troop of thinkers, and the best heads among them take the best places. A feeble man can see the farms that are fenced and tilled, the houses that are built. The strong man sees the possible houses and farms. His eye makes estates as fast as the sun breeds clouds.

This view of the world, the real idea of Christianity, spread with great rapidity over the whole Roman realm like an infectious disease, and the whole Middle Age endured its agonies, sometimes in the delirium of fever, and anon in death-like exhaustion, and we moderns still feel its cramps and debilities in our limbs. Even if one of us be in health he cannot escape the general lazar-house atmosphere, and he feels miserable as the only sound man among utter invalids. When it shall come to pass that mankind shall regain their perfect health, when peace shall be restored between body and soul, and they blend again in their original harmony, then we shall hardly understand the artificial, unnatural strife which Christianity caused between them.—Heine, "Germany."

National Secular Society's Annual Conference.

EXECUTIVE'S REPORT.—BY THE PRESIDENT.

THE past year has been a very uneventful one for the National Secular Society, as well as for other advanced organisations. Preoccupation of the public mind with political questions, rivalries, and disputes, always causes a dimunition of interest in other questions which are only indirectly of material importance. The thought of to-day determines the action of to-morrow, but that is only seen when to-morrow itself belongs to the past.

Unfortunately, too, the N. S. S. has received very slender financial assistance from the Secular Society, Ltd., which is unable at present to act with its customary generosity. The N. S. S. Balance Sheet should be read in the light of these facts.

One great fact in the credit side of the account is apt to be forgotten. The President of the N. S. S. is the Editor of the Freethinker. It is difficult to separate the two functions even in fancy. And the Freethinker, which is the only Freethought weekly journal in England, still maintains its circulation, and occasionally adds to it in favorable circumstances.

One new Branch has been formed at St. Helens, and arrangements have been made by the Executive, in the absence of local Branches, for carrying on outdoor propaganda in Regent's Park and Finsbury Park. Two half-yearly special meetings of the London members have been held, according to Conference resolutions, and reports of same have appeared in the Freethinker. The Annual Dinner—this year at Frascati's Restaurant, was the usual success; a special feature being a humorous Freethought speech by Sir Hiram Maxim.

Your Executive was unable to carry out the resolution of the last Conference,—that the N. S. S. should be represented at the Lisbon International Congress by at least three delegates. It was found that each delegate would cost £20 at the lowest, and that each would have to devote three weeks at the lowest to the delegation. It was impossible to find even one who could give so much time to travelling and attendance at the Congress. Of necessity, therefore, the project fell through. It is to be hoped the Society may be luckier on the next occasion. Not much practical good results from these International Congresses, but they serve to show that Reason as well as Faith is of a universal character.

One unpleasant incident in the past year's history might well be forgotten, if it were not necessary to be referred to, for the sake of future peace and quiet, as a warning to those who, having little respect for themselves, pay (if possible) as little or less to others. Mr. J. W. Gott, in spite of official prohibition, insisted on using the name of the N. S. S. to cover propagandist work under his own personal control, for which he was soliciting funds from the Freethought party. Refusing to desist from this abuse of the Society's name, he had to be declared as out of connection with the N. S. S. Responsibility for any of his proceedings was repudiated, and it was resolved that his membership would not be renewed on the expiration of the current year.

Some persons who object to all discipline, who imagine that individuals acting "on their own" are the only ones who have any rights at all, and that even a voluntary Society ought not to protect itself against insult and defiance, called this an act of tyranny on the part of the N. S. S. Executive. Mr. Gott himself posed as a painfully persecuted martyr. He was left to maintain that position as he could,—with what success is seen.

A prosecution for the sale of Freethought literature without police permission resulted in a fine of five shillings at Bolton. A similar prosecution at Leeds, more recently, resulted in the case being dismissed. The views of policemen and magistrates as to their right of interference in matters where the "interests of religion" are supposed to be involved are of a most chaotic character. It is to be hoped that the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws will put an end to all future possibility of such a state of things.

Mr. W. T. Stewart has been prosecuted again for "blasphemy"—to say nothing of other "offences" with which the N. S. S. has no special concern. He is not a careful speaker, but none of the language quoted against him would have been considered indictable if employed in political or social discussion. It was really, therefore, talking too freely on religion for which he was sentenced to three months' imprisonment. A great opportunity presented itself for another clear and authoritative statement on the Common Law of Blasphemy. Your President, on behalf of the Society, immediately offered to carry the case to the Court of Appeal—which did not exist in criminal cases in 1883. Unfortunately Mr. Stewart left his interests in hands as incapable as his own—and the great opportunity was lost.

What was done by others afterwards, in the way of petition for the prisoner's release or better treatment, was good in its way. But it could not possibly lead to any fresh step in the direction of the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws; although, of course, it served as a public advertisement of their origin and character. The same may be said of the deputation to Mr. Asquith, satisfactory as his own declaration was from a personal point of view. All the really effective fighting against the Blasphemy Laws—apart from the courageous agitation against them, in which the N. S. S. has always more than taken its share—has been done in the Law Courts. It was there that Lord Chief Justice Coleridge's epoch-marking judgment was elicited in 1883. It is there that a fresh, and perhaps final, judgment may be elicited, to crown and complete Lord Coleridge's work; unless a Repeal Act be carried through Parliament in the immediate future, which is possible but hardly probable.

The effective fighting, it may be repeated, has been waged in the Law Courts. That is why the N. S. S. deserves commendation for taking up the Boulter case in 1908. The Boulter case was a turning point. The argument at issue was legal. The bulk of critics did not agree with your President that Lord Coleridge's judgment in 1883 stood practically unchallenged and unchallengeable as the Common Law of Blasphemy in England. The policy pursued by the N. S. S., at great expense, in the Boulter case, compelled the judges (Phillimore and Darling) to endorse Lord Coleridge's statement of the law. That endorsement has been repeated by other judges since. Nobody now thinks of suggesting otherwise. What remains to be argued is something historical and critical. Has not other legislation virtually repealed everything substantive in the Blasphemy Laws? Do the "decencies of controversy" in debates on religion differ in any respect from the "decencies of controversy" on any other subject? If they do not—if the criterion in the one case is deduced from the common principles in the other cases — then the definition of "Blasphemy" sinks down to the simple formula of "annoying Christians," which would reduce the law to a disgusting and disgraceful farce, incapable of being presented again in the light of day.

A curious case of religious bigotry, no doubt expressing the same spirit as the Blasphemy Laws, but even more insolent in outward form, occurred at Morpeth. A witness called Snowball, who claimed to affirm instead of swearing, which he had a perfect right to do, was browbeaten by a Captain Mitford, one of the magistrates, who actually refused to take the witness's evidence, on the ground that nobody could believe the word of a man who did not believe in God. Fortunately, the newspapers read this bigot a lesson, both in law and in good manners; and the culprit seems to have got out of the trouble with a minimum of publicity. The N. S. S. communicated with the solicitor conducting the case in question, and offered to contribute towards the cost of a "mandamus" to compel the offending magistrate to act legally; but his own prompt surrender made such action unnecessary.

It is gratifying to record that the London County Council arrived at a satisfactory settlement of the question of collections at public meetings in parks and other open spaces under the Council's control. The deputation—consisting of representatives of the N. S. S., the London Trades Council, and other Labor organisations—that waited upon a general meeting of the Council, was able to show that the new order prohibiting collections without a special permit was both unwise and unjust. There appears to have been some misunderstanding on the part of certain members of the Council, under the influence of a handful of bigots. The deputation was treated in a very friendly way, not an unpleasant word occurred in the speeches or the discussion, and the Council seemed to feel that their visitors represented men who wanted nothing of a revolutionary character, but just the time-honored rights of citizenship. Eventually it was decided that at all meetings of bonâ-fide societies, holding "permits" as such, collections should be made for such societies' general funds, but not outside the limits of such meetings. Thus the matter ends with a substantial victory for the principles of freedom and fair-play.

The part played by the N. S. S. in this matter is one of which it may well be proud. It bore the brunt of the actual fighting. It defended Miss Vance before the Marylebone Police-court, paid all the legal expenses that were incurred in relation to a large number of other summonses that were "hung up," and undertook the arrangements for testing the law by moving for a mandamus against the London County Council in the High Court of Justice, if a settlement could not be reached in any other way. Your President, as editor of the Freethinker, raised the sum of £77 18s. 3d. by a preliminary appeal. That sum was eventually handed over by him, without any deduction for expenses, to the N. S. S. treasury; so that the Society gained (even financially) instead of losing over the transaction. Speaking from a higher point of view, the raising of that subscription must have convinced the hostile portion of the County Council that there was reality in the intention of appealing to the law of England against the arbitrary action of a single municipal authority.

The Education Question is likely to come to the front before long, as the Nonconformists are beginning to cry more lustily for their pound of flesh. It seems hardly possible, however, that a new Bill can be more successful than its unhappy predecessors. Church and Chapel want the same joint, and are too hungry to be persuaded that they both have it. Their mutual hostility is, indeed, the Secular Educationists' strongest guarantee of his own ultimate victory. Fortunately there exists an instrument which represents the Secular Educationists of all schools in the Secular Education League. Mr. Foote and Mr. Cohen are members of the League's executive committee, and this should satisfy Secularists that they may safely join the League and give it their best support. All sections of the executive committee work together in perfect harmony. They are united in promoting one, and only one, object; namely that the education of children in elementary State-supported or State-subventioned schools shall be confined to subjects which the Education Code calls "secular." The League's office is at 19 Buckingham-street, Strand, London, W.C., and the secretary, Mr. Harry Snell, will be glad to send prospectuses and other printed matter to all applicants, and to answer all questions that may be asked of him regarding the League's affairs.

A veteran Freethinker, associated with the Secular movement in the Bradlaugh days at the Hall of Science, who suffered imprisonment for "blasphemy" in connection with the Freethinker case in 1883, having fallen on evil days through age and a painful malady, a few of his friends (political as well as theological) have formed a committee to raise a fund that may make his last days somewhat easier. The N. S. S. is not acting officially in this matter, Mr. W. J. Ramsey not being one of its members; but the first list of subscriptions, to be published after the Whitsun holidays, will show that a good many members of the N. S. S. have already contributed. No doubt others will follow suit in the near future. The General Treasurer is Mr. B. T. Hall, Club and Institute Buildings, Clerkenwell-road, London, E.C., whose lists of acknowledgments will be printed in the Freethinker.

This Annual Report may close with the usual glance abroad. There is much unorganised Freethought activity in America. Mr. M. M. Mangasarian still carries on his eloquent and fruitful propaganda in Chicago. Mr. Percy Ward appears to have settled down in the same city, lecturing with great acceptance to good audiences. At New York we find Mr. George Macdonald still conducting with the old verve the weekly Truthseeker; and it is to be hoped with more than the old success. It is regrettable that Mr. W. W. Collins—one of the N. S. S. vice-presidents at Christchurch, New Zealand—has broken down in health, at least temporarily. His friends hope for his speedy recovery, and are meantime glad that his journal, the Examiner, is being carried on by his colleagues. There are many Freethinkers in South Africa, but very little organisation—as might indeed be expected. To describe the progress of Freethought in Europe would require volumes. Suffice it to say that the general prospect was never brighter, and that France still leads the great procession of Reason and Humanity.

EVENING PUBLIC MEETING.

A GOODLY audience assembled at the Queen's (Minor) Hall, London, W., to hear Mr. G. W. Foote, the leader of English Freethought, and his colleagues, at the public meeting in connection with the Annual Conference of the National Secular Society on Whit-Sunday.

It was Mr. Foote's first public appearance since his recent illness, and when he took the chair he had a most flattering and enthusiastic reception.

Mr. Foote's was the first speech, quite in his best vein, and full of wit and wisdom. It was punctuated throughout with laughter and applause, and he had a perfect ovation at the finish. He said that intellectual honesty was the scarcest honesty on this planet. Few men would stand to the colors of unpopular ideas, and face a world which hated them because they were dangerous to every sinister interest. The only irreconcilable was the Freethinker. When political canvassers call on such a man, they say "He thinks for himself; we'll go next door." Voting was only of value when it was done by men who thought freely. So many persons go through life thinking as their parents and teachers did before them. Ignorance was very prevalent. When a little daughter of his was withdrawn from religious instruction at school, she was asked if her father was a Jew. She said he was a gentleman. Other children regarded the situation as uncanny. Yet if all people who were inclined to Freethought put aside fear, and spoke out the actual truth concerning their opinions, it would frighten the Churches more than the sinking of any number of Atlantic liners.

Freethinkers were feared. Even Socialists were regarded as clever fellows; but let a Freethinker stand up and avow his principles, and he will be certain to be at the bottom of the poll. As intellectuals, they were content to be at the bottom of such a poll. They would rather be true to the highest and most durable interests of mankind than take part in mere party triumphs.

No one who espoused Freethought must expect public applause. Opponents say that Freethinkers set themselves up as being better than other men. They do not; but if they did, it would not be a tremendous effort of vanity. One half of the world lived by deluding the other half. The clergy know that the Bible is not the Word of God, yet they allow it to be placed in the schools, and martyrise the children who are withdrawn from its influence. There are purple passages which no clergyman would dare to read to a congregation, unless he wanted to have all the bonnets leave the church, and all who did not wear bonnets wait for him at the door.

Look at the clergy! £200 a year is considered bad pay. Jesus Christ had not where to lay his head, and modern bishops have scores of bedrooms in their palaces. Why doesn't the Rev. R. J. Campbell, when he gets a new motor-car, offer the old one to me. Christianity is the falsest religion in the world. It has made its way by lies and impostures, filled the world with blood and tears, and made artificial barriers between men who had no other quarrel. Its influence is felt in the political world, for all the present trouble is caused by the hatred between Catholics and Protestants. Let Christianity give place to Humanity, and let faith give way to reason. What happened when the great liner sank? Who saved those who were saved? Science, in the shape of wireless telegraphy, brought help and saved hundreds, whilst God did—nothing.

Miss Kough followed with a bright speech full of charm. The air, she said, was full of talk about the revolt against reason, but there was nothing to be terrified at. A speaker at a recent Church Congress said that once scientists used to believe in the operation of natural law, but since the discovery of radium, which was so erratic, one might believe in the miracle of the Gadarene swine. Reason could never have been established in that person. A highly cultivated lady told a story of two friends, fishing by night, who had caught a member of a house-party who had turned into a pike. Opponents often magnify Freethought efforts to suit their own ends. One had stated that there were seven Atheistic Societies, all publishing their own papers, and sending out their own lecturers. There was, however, a real and growing danger in the growth of the Roman Catholic Church among certain sections of the population.

Mr. C. Cohen, who was in excellent form and warmly welcomed by the whole audience, pointed out that the world had been terrified throughout its history by a religious goblin, but it was a goblin whose head was empty. He had a contempt for the whole thing, and had never thought it worth hating. If Christianity improved, he might hate it. Christian scholars discussed whether the Virgin Birth was a fact. Such a subject was unworthy of discussion by a civilised people. People who were in such a state of mental confusion were only savages, even if they wore hobble skirts or frock-coats, and were as uncivilised as the denizens of Central Africa. A change was coming over the scene. People no longer questioned as to whether the Bible was the Word of God, but how did people get to believe in the idea of Deity? At a recent debate on Miracles, which was conducted by popular dramatists and apparently cultured men, none of the speakers got mentally within 150 years of the twentieth century. Children grow out of their beliefs in fairies and goblins, but grown-up people are afraid to grow out of their beliefs. At the last French census 7,000,000 declared themselves as Atheists, and there were enough English Freethinkers to form seventy societies, but for the lack of moral courage. This want of courage was the bad heritage of the Church, which had bred from the worst material for centuries. The reason why the average Jew was sharper than the average Christian was that the Church made it impossible for any Jew to live unless he was sharp. The Church killed all the brave men and preserved the cowards. For 200 years Mohammedan Spain led the world in arts and sciences; but Christian Spain for 200 years killed thousands of the best men every year, and no nation could stand such treatment with impunity. It was astonishing that religion had not bred universal idiocy. The objection that Freethinkers had nothing to put in the place of religion was absurd, for religion was not worth having. The clergy pretend to be afraid of immorality, and run fearful risks to be conversant with the subject. Recently the Bishop of Chichester, speaking of safeguarding the interests of servant girls, said he intended to visit a picture palace. Imagine the reckless daring of a disguised Bishop planking down his sixpence to see the awful screen, and then—imagine his disappointment! Clean-living men were not always thinking of immorality.

Men cowered before witches and goblins until knowledge wiped them out of existence. We want religion out of the way and the nightmare of the gods removed, so that man can face the world with conquest in his eyes, and leave it without a lie in his mouth or a mask on his face.

A rousing reception was given to Mr. J. T. Lloyd, who was the next speaker; who spoke of the unscrupulousness of the Christian opposition to Freethought. Sometimes the Freethought movement was described as being rich, issuing many newspapers, paying large numbers of lecturers, and organising a powerful campaign throughout the country against religion. At other times, and for other purposes, the same Freethought movement was called poor, moribund, and its leaders representatives of a dead cause. At one time the Freethought speakers were characterised as clever and eloquent, and at others as obscene and blasphemous. No abuse was neglected by the defenders of universal love. We ought not to underestimate the strength of the enemy, for, although Christianity was dying, it was yet capable of inflicting terrific blows. Christian apologists propped up their position by absolute misstatements, but, fortunately, the Church was not impregnable, for critics within the Church and Freethinkers without would hasten the day when the yoke of superstition will be broken. Christian critics were helping the Freethinkers to tear the Bible to tatters, and to unsettle the faith of the people.

The veteran Mr. Arthur B. Moss wound up the evening with an eloquent appeal to Freethought tradition. He said the great work accomplished by the pioneers of Freethought had practically destroyed Christianity. Forty years of Freethought advocacy had taught him what a persecuting religion Christianity was. When he was young a Freethinker could not get employment, and Freethinkers were not invited to Christians' houses. The work done by Holyoake, Bradlaugh, and Foote, who fought with all their great powers against intolerance, had changed the position, and to-day it was the orthodox religion that was in the melting-pot; but the change was entirely due to the fighting of the Freethinkers. If we wanted to rout the enemy, the fight must go on. Lukewarm Rationalists ask, Why continue to fight? for science and ordered knowledge will achieve the object. But science and knowledge are helpless, unaided, against an organised superstition with millions of money behind it. Fighting alone trampled out the fires of hell, and will in time get rid of the fantastic heaven which a Christian dean says many Christians regard as a fairy tale. Freethinkers said the same thing long years before. Superstition and credulity never assisted mankind in the past, and men in over-increasing numbers were turning to Secularism as a philosophy which is of vital importance. Freethinkers will not be content till they have wrested from Nature all her secrets and used them for the benefit of mankind, and made this world a nobler one than ever our fathers knew.

So ended a memorable meeting, the outstanding feature of which was the high level of oratory displayed. Organised Freethought has always had the best speakers since the days of Holyoake and Southwell, down through the stormy Bradlaugh era to the present day, and the present speakers easily maintain the proud reputation of their honored predecessors. It is one of the chief of the fighting weapons of a great party, which has done more for intellectual emancipation than any other organisation in the English-speaking world, and it is one that will ultimately lead to the emancipation of the nation from the "lie at the lips of the priest." It is a noble dream, and the National Secular Society has brought it within the grasp of the realities of the future.

C. E. S.

Gradually there came gasping towards them a pale Jew, dripping with blood, a crown of thorns on his head, bearing a great cross of wood on his shoulder, and he cast the cross on the high table of the gods, so that the golden goblets trembled and fell, and the gods grew dumb and pale, and even paler, till they melted in utter mist. Then there were dreary days, and the world became grey and gloomy. There were no more happy immortals, and Olympus became a hospital, where flayed, roasted, and spitted gods went wearily, wandering round, binding their wounds, and singing sorrowful songs. Religion no longer offered joy, but consolation; it was a woeful, bleeding religion of transgressors.—Heine, "Pictures of Travel."

Artists and Freethought.—II.

TINTORET (1518-94) is one of Ruskin's "five supreme painters." His bold realism is patent in all his works. Sacred and profane subjects were all the same to him in this respect. Hence we find the former condemned for their "coarse realism," and being "entirely opposed to the feeling and dignity of religious art." Vasari says that, notwithstanding the power displayed in his Last Judgment, "it had all the appearance of being painted in jest." Heaton says of the Last Supper that the artist "degraded" it into "a scene of a vulgar carousal."

In Paola Veronese (1528-58) we have the very opposite extreme of an artist in relation to sacred subjects. Where Tintoret brought "realism" to bear against the accepted devotional treatment of sacred art, Veronese sought the utmost "romanticism." All his Madonnas and Saints are clothed in the finest Venetian raiment. In his Marriage at Cana he has introduced Christ, in company with the Sultan of Turkey, "Bloody Mary" of England, the King of France, and artist friends, at a sumptuous Venetian banquet. In his Supper at Emmaus, in the Louvre, he brings himself and his family into the solemn episode, his two little children playing with a dog at the very feet of Christ, in innocent indifference to the presence of the Son of God. This "romanticism" seems even more irreverent than the "realism" of Tintoret, and I can quite understand one commentator saying that "there is no hint in any of his works of a belief in any higher life than that of the beautiful city in which he dwelt."

We now come to two undoubted heretics and rebels, Caravaggio and Salvador Rosa, practically the last two great names in Italian art. Caravaggio (1569-1604) was the leader of the so-called naturalisti. His works are marked by a very forcible "realism," and especially his religious subjects, notably the Supper at Emmaus, in the National Gallery, in which the meal (a fowl) seems to be the essential feature. One of his altar-pieces, the Calling of St. Matthew, was rejected "as too vulgar for a religious edifice."

Salvador Rosa (1615-73), the greatest painter of the Neapolitan school, was clearly a Freethinker and anti-clerical.* He not only consorted with the Freethinkers of his day, and wrote his thoughts as freely as they did, but he painted his heresy in such works as L'Umanana Fragilita and La Fortuna, and had to fly from the Inquisition in consequence. Rosa, with Falcone and other artists, joined in the Naples revolution under Masaniello. He was the first in Italy to write in the cause of Freedom. His landscapes in the National Gallery, and at Edinburgh and Glasgow, reveal his highly wrought spirit.

Albrecht Dürer (1471-1528) was nominally a Roman Catholic; but how much of his mind, if any, the Church owned is doubtful. We know that the artist was in full sympathy with the Protestant Reformation, and Kugler claims his Four Apostles as "the first complete work of art produced by Protestantism." But, as Heaton points out, "it is not Protestantism or Catholicism that they express, but the artist's own individual thought on the subject, unbound by any creed, and free from the dogmas of any Church." This remark may fittingly cover the whole art work of Dürer; for, indeed, those weird fantasies, The Apocalypse, The Knight, Death and the Devil, and Melancholia, seem altogether incompatible with orthodoxy. At any rate, I fail to see much "faith" in any man who could depict the Blessed Virgin sitting very unbecomingly on the floor, whilst Joseph, dead drunk, is seated at the table with the guilty tankard as a support.

With Rubens (1577-1640) came to Flemish art the light of the renaissance. The religious spirit which had dominated the national art fell with Rubens to rise no more. Rubens' art is thoroughly pagan, and the works we have in England, such as the Judgment of Paris, at the National Gallery, and Nature Adorned by the Graces, at Glasgow, certainly reveal how "gloriously pagan" (as Wedmore puts it) it really is. In dealing with religious subjects, as Coleridge has pointed out, there is nothing of the "spiritual" in Rubens. His mind, says Heaton, "was never troubled by the mystery of life," and "he had no sympathy with the spiritual aspirations of humanity." Ruskin, too, found Rubens "a healthy animal, without any dearly perceptible traces of a soul." Let anyone look at the Descent from the Cross and the Crucifixion and this is immediately evident. These works simply depict the execution of a malefactor—no more and no less. There was no room for "spirituality" in such a realist as Rubens.

* In an article in the Freethinker, September 21, 1913, I have dealt at length with Rosa's art and religion.

Teniers the Younger (1610-90), unlike his predecessors, was much affected by genre subjects. The merry-makings of the people—at the tavern, the fair, or the market were his special delight. His "religious" pictures, which gave great offence to the pious folk, are conceived in his ordinary genre style. Christ Buffeted and Christ Crowned with Thorns, have been described as "vulgar and almost repulsive scenes of low life," the artist being "totally wanting in that elevation of feeling that marks all the great Italian masters." We know little of the private life of Teniers, but it certainly seems that he had no "elevation of feeling" for sacred themes. His best known work, the Temptation of St. Anthony, leads us to this view. This subject, which had always been treated with the utmost propriety, if not reverence, by earlier masters, is to Teniers a huge joke. The original is in the Louvre, but there are several good copies, one being at Glasgow.

Jan Steen (1626-79) has been called "the one original Dutch genre painter." He, like, Teniers, introduced the fun and frolic of the people into his art. Busken Huet considered him an anti-clerical, and he certainly has every reason for it in regard to his art, for as Heine says, after you have seen his pictures you "know the whole life of the man." His Marriage at Cana shows Christ blessing a Dutch wedding party. But he is a "nobody" in the scene. The essential features are in the foreground—a fiddler and a boy being handed drink, and an apparently tipsy woman. Again, in the Disciples at Emmaus, Christ is not the personality. As a matter of fact, he is right at the back. His disciples and a maid are in the front, and they are gazing very disconsolately at the repast; for although the table is broad, there is a solitary lemon upon it. The Expelling of Hagar gives the merry Jan a chance for fun despite the "Blessed Book." Sarah is seen sitting "examining" little Isaac's head. There are a couple of spaniels in the picture, and seemingly are taking a tip from their mistress, since they also are engaged in what Mark Twain calls a "hunting expedition."

Hogarth (1697-1764), the founder of English painting, was most certainly a Freethinker, for no Christian could have handled brush and graver for such blasphemies as his. The parsons were a fund of amusement to him in their absurdities, and in their follies he caught them in biting satire. Sala calls Hogarth "a decorous man in theology." Fancy a "decorous man" treating the Bible (whose cover is used to sole boots) as he does in the first scene of the Rake's Progress. The Sleeping Congregation is scarcely a "decorous" work, and neither is the marriage scene in the Rake's Progress. But for downright blasphemy that powerful print, entitled Credulity, Superstition, and Fanaticism, stands an "easy first." Churchmen pretend that the satire was directed against Wesley and Whitefield, the revivalists, but it is clear that Hogarth was dispensing it against the entire superstition of Christianity.*

Henry Fuseli (1741-1825), a painter little heard of nowadays, was, despite all adverse criticism, an artist of genius. It was no ordinary man that undertook such a theme as the Bridging of Chaos from Milton. His Titania and Bottom, in the National Gallery, and Œdipus and His Daughters, at Liverpool, ought to be a sufficient answer to the host of his detractors. Fuseli mixed with all the prominent Freethinkers and political rebels of his day, and appears to have been at one with them in their opinions.

One of the closest of Fuseli's artistic confrères was William Blake (1757-1827). He, too, consorted with rebels, and was hailed before the "authorities" for treason! Blake was certainly much in sympathy with the French Revolution, and both his art and poetry reveal its influence. None but the closest students of his life and work can arrive at a clear grasp of the psychology of Blake. Swinburne calls him a "heretic and mystic." He had a most wonderful sense of phantasy and symbolism, and this, under the promptings of a deep spiritual nature, led him to the creation of those remarkable religious visions in his art. He ought, perhaps, to be classed as a Pantheist; yet, withal, he was an enemy of religion, the Church, and the priests—a Freethinker to the core.

J. M. W. Turner (1775-1851) was one of the greatest of English landscapists. "None before Turner," wrote Ruskin, "had lifted the veil from the face of Nature." Never before, indeed, had Nature been clothed in such glorious harmonies. His tones of coloring strike the senses like beautiful chords. The Fighting Téméraire, Dido Building Carthage, the Bridge of Sighs, etc., are among our great national treasures. Ruskin sought to associate Turner's art with a certain ethical and religious feeling, a thing from which (as Benn points out in his Modern England) Turner stood aloof. As a matter of fact, Turner was, according to Hamerton, the art critic, a complete sceptic in religion.

Obituary.

At Paisley, in the Royal Alexandria Infirmary, on May 24, Andrew Drummond, aged 35 years. Mr. Drummond was well known in Paisley and Renfrew as a militant Freethought propagandist. His was the moving spirit which brought into being the Renfrew Secular Society. He had not the natural equipment of a public speaker; still, his wide reading and his zeal for the cause made him a ready and trenchant penman. When he realised the serious nature of his illness, he expressed the wish to be buried without religious ceremony. His Christian relations respected that wish, and Mr. Robertson, of the Renfrew Secular Society, made arrangements for a Secular funeral, which took place on May 27 at Hawkhead Cemetery.—H. THOMSON.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 24 SUNDAY, JUNE 14, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Genuine simplicity of heart is a healing and cementing principle.—EDMUND BURKE.

The Boothite Booming.

GENERAL BOOTH THE FIRST left some of his advertising genius with the Salvation Army. He was the best self-advertiser in England,—Mr. Bernard Shaw being the second-best; and the old man's mantle, though a good deal worn, has descended upon "Bramwell's" shoulders. There is indeed a certain sly look about General Booth the Second's face, which, shed, as it were, over those rotund and soft features, rather suggests the Heathen Chinee of the late Mr. Bret Harte, playing at the game he did not understand. Bramwell's native gifts, combined with what he learnt from the old man, render him an excellent successor to the wily founder of a body that has made more noise and less of anything else than any other body in the Christian world.

Believers in Providence, especially in the ranks of the Salvation Army, might have little difficulty in concluding that the Empress of Ireland was rammed and sunk under divine guidance. The conclusion startles reason, of course, and staggers humanity; but we know from the poet that God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform. There were a lot of Salvationists—Salvation officers, we understand—on board the fated ship. Without making the miracle too crude it was impossible to save them and drown all the other passengers, so they were left to take their luck with the rest when the drowning began, and the proportion of saved and lost amongst them was pretty much the same as it was amongst their fellow-voyagers. It was a good and sufficient ground for a world-wide advertisement of the great Salvation Army gathering that was being organised to take place in London, and to which the Canadian contingent was travelling, with other contingents from "the ends of the earth."

Bramwell Booth certainly made the most of this fine opportunity. A memorial service was organised in the Albert Hall—and well organised, for the "Army" is always good at spectacles. The first name we ever applied to the late William Booth in the Freethinker was "The Grand Old Showman," and the reigning member of the family maintains the tradition. Meetings at the Albert Hall, however, are not so rare nowadays, and a fresh feature had to be introduced. What it was will be seen by the following extract from a morning newspaper:—

> "Mute witness to the great tragedy of the disaster which overwhelmed the Empress of Ireland, there were 148 vacant places in the wide space of the Albert Hall on Friday night. It was a memorial service for the members of the Salvation Army who had died in the calamity. Everywhere the hall was crowded save in one small space—the centre of the arena where the 148 empty seats were ranged. Each place, draped in white, was testimony to the loss which the Salvation Army suffered in the cold fog of the Canadian St. Lawrence. The service was wonderfully impressive. General Booth paid an eloquent tribute to the devotion of the Salvationists, who showed such rare bravery in the hour of peril."

General Booth's tribute to his own army is not exactly above suspicion. He had far better have left the task to a disinterested outsider. But the "Army" never failed in the direction of modesty. Puffing itself has been one of its most assiduous practices. When the Anti-Suicide Bureau was established, it saved more people from suicide in a week than had committed suicide in the whole of London during the previous year. Thus the Salvationists who went down with the great liner off the Canadian coast showed "rare bravery" apparently because they did not cry and howl and hold themselves up to derision and contempt. Executed criminals generally die "game": why should men who reckon themselves the salt of the earth, and are confident of heaven, die like cowards?

The sources of human goodness do not lie in religion but in human nature itself. The "rare bravery" of the Boothites was nothing beside the bravery of Captain Kendall and Dr. Grant, who being rescued themselves after long immersion in icy water, and nearly done for, addressed themselves at once to saving and succoring others. Practical bravery that! Not a story for the Albert Hall. And what of the dead mother, with her right arm curved rigidly round her dead baby, so that they had to be buried together?

The reservation at a funeral party of chairs for the dead is a big step backwards to primitive superstition. The difference between this performance and "waking the dead," with a drop of something "short" for the corpse, is only a matter of degree.

The Salvation show at the Albert Hall included the following item:—

> "One of the most interesting of the colored folks represented was a 'devil-worshiper' from India. He is a little man with a ragged moustache, and now he has become rather ashamed of the numerous cuts on his body which were self-inflicted by a sword before he was made a convert by the Salvation Army.
> "Until four years ago this man regarded it as the height of religious fervor to make frenzied attacks upon his own limbs with a knife, inflicting severe wounds, and at the same time to perform weird contortions.
> "His arms bore traces of his former ordeals. The flesh is scarred with a number of whitish lines showing where it had been laid bare with his knife and had healed in long ridges.
> "It was a tribute to the work of the Salvationists to see this same man yesterday. There was no trace of his former frenzy, but he was singing the Salvation Army hymns with obvious sincerity and understanding."

General Booth brings that exhibit all the way from India. He brings it to London, the greatest centre of civilised population in the world, to show the transcendent reforming power of the branch of Christianity known as Salvationism—or, as old General Booth used plainly to call it, the Gospel of Blood and Fire.

General Booth completes this grand new advertisement by gaining an interview with King George. The General expresses his admiration for the King—the King expresses his admiration for the General. But what, after all, does King George know about the Salvation Army? We venture to say no more than its friends and parasites tell him. If we might advise so august a person as a King, we would advise his Majesty to study the Hadleigh Colony. He will then know whether the Salvation Army is likeliest to save or ruin the world.

Intolerance.

INTOLERANCE is one of the most general of mental vices. It is so general that few people seem to look upon it even as a fault. When it assumes an extreme form it is apt to meet with condemnation, but generally its nature, and effects, are disguised under a show of earnestness and sincere conviction. Indeed, we need not question either the sincerity or earnestness of the bigot; that may be granted with the qualification that sincerity is no guarantee of accuracy, and earnestness naturally goes with a conviction strongly held, whether the conviction be sound or unsound. The essential question is not whether a man holds an opinion strongly, but whether he has taken enough trouble to say that he has a right to that opinion. Has he taken the pains to study the subject on which the opinion is expressed? Above all, has he made due allowance for possible error, and for the possibility of others seeing the question in a truer light than himself?

It was pointed out at the conclusion of my article last week, that chief amongst the evils resulting from the psychological blunder that led to religion, was the establishment of a frame of mind all but fatal to orderly progress. Of this frame of mind the most persistent expression is that of intolerance. Let us look at the facts. To begin with, intolerance is common to all religions, past and present, savage and civilised. There is not, and there never has been, a single religion in the whole history of the world that has freely admitted the right of inquiry and the right of difference of opinion. Still less has there been one that has regarded variation in opinion as a good thing. Universally, to question the truth of religion has been declared at all times undesirable, and generally it has been denounced as a crime. Some of the greatest amongst Christian theologians have denounced unbelief as the greatest of offences, and the once popular Charles Haddon Spurgeon said that if you were to add all other crimes together they would not equal the sin of unbelief. In our times there are a number of "advanced" theologians who concede the right to differ, but it is evident that this is a concession forced from them by the spirit of the time, and does not spring from their religious conviction. Generally, now as ever, intolerance remains a characteristic feature of all religious belief.

Of course, it may be said that people are intolerant in directions other than that of religion. This is admitted, although, as we shall see, religion cannot escape some of the responsibility for this. But in other directions people do not make a virtue of their intolerance. Moreover, the intolerant person in other directions is the exception; in religion, it has been—until recently in some areas—the rule. And generally, when people differ on questions of politics, science, or art, they have no rooted objection to meet each other and discuss their differences. In religion, mere discussion has been held—quite properly—to indicate doubt, or at least the probability of error, and that no really religious person will admit.

Or it is said that intolerance is not a special feature of religion, as such; it is rather a fault of human nature. But it is exactly the same human nature, whether we are dealing with religion or with any other subject. How comes it that intolerance should be so much more pronounced in religion than in other matters? Why cannot people discuss religious differences as they discuss a difference of governmental policy or a difference of opinion in literature? To say that they feel religion to be a more important question than any other is no answer at all. At any rate, it only raises the question of whether there is any justification for such a conviction, and that raises the original issue in another form. Why is it, then, that religion has not done for human life what political and social intercourse invariably does—teach a healthy toleration of difference and a certain readiness to look at a subject from more than one point of view?

The reply to this question is two-fold. First, there is the nature of primitive religious beliefs. With a great many of the things that man does, whether in savage or civilised society, he must very plainly bear their consequences, and there the matter ends. His friends may advise him, or caution him, but there are a large number of his actions with which no one but himself is directly concerned. But with religion, from the very outset, the case is different. What he believes about religion is never his sole concern; it is also the concern of the tribe or society to which he belongs. The Biblical story of the throwing overboard of Jonah is a case in point. God was not angry with the rest of the ship's inhabitants; it was Jonah alone who had given offence. But to punish Jonah a storm arose, and the sailors were in danger of shipwreck. In their own defence the sailors threw Jonah overboard. Jonah's disobedience to God was not, therefore, his own concern. All those with him were involved, and God was ready to punish the lot for the offence of one.

For the ship, take a primitive tribe; for Jonah, take a primitive heretic, and we have an exact picture of what actually transpires. Everybody is interested in suppressing heresy, because the heretic is really a public danger. This is not only true of primitive savage societies, it is true of all deeply religious communities. Even in our own time we have plenty of people who are ready to connect a national disaster with the desecration of the Sabbath or the prevalence of unbelief. And this, unquestionably, was the attitude of the Christian Church for many centuries. God could not be expected to bless a society in which heresy was tolerated. The heretic must be suppressed as a duty to God and as a measure of self-protection. From the dawn of human history this view has been more or less prevalent, and it is that which has, in the main, made intolerance a religious virtue. It became a duty to the gods, and a duty that had behind it the sharp spur of self-interest.

In the next place, there was nothing connected with religion, even as a mere opinion, to check intolerance. In other directions, an opinion is avowedly based upon facts, and has no value apart from the facts it connotes. And the facts are common property, open to all, and may be examined by all. The consequence of this is that there is not only a greater readiness to submit an opinion to the test of its agreement with the facts, but it is also realised that the more prolonged the discussion concerning their meaning, the greater becomes the settled body of generally accepted truth to which all may appeal for guidance. But in religion "facts" of a common verifiable kind are almost entirely wanting. The "facts" of the religious life are mainly of an esoteric character—visions, mere feelings, "intuitions," etc.—few of which may be made the subject of experiment or verification. And while on the one side discussion is justified by the agreement that results from it, on the other, and the religious, side the value of discussion is discounted by the fact that it never does lead to agreement. The more people discuss religion, the more seriously they differ in their conclusions. A religious conference only agrees on a matter of doctrine by excluding a portion of its members. It is unification by exclusion, never by inclusion.

Further, it is quite a mistake to suppose that the feeling of intolerance gains support from the secular side of life. The tendency is in quite the opposite direction. In primitive societies there is not the least disinclination to discuss secular affairs and to listen to opposing opinions. If it is a matter of war, or a hunting expedition, or of arranging the purely secular affairs of life, there is usually a "powwow" of some sort, and the opinions of various members taken. And this persists right through human society. Under even the most autocratic government, differing opinions are invited and considered, because it is recognised that widely differing judgments may contribute towards a more correct and more profitable view of the matter at issue. Whether a government is carried on by discussion or not, discussion does form part of every government and of every combination of human beings. And the mere putting up of a subject for discussion implies the possibility of error; it invokes toleration, and familiarises all men with the give and take of intellectual life. Moreover, there is a very vital fact connected with the secular life of man that further emphasises the value of toleration. Religion, as I have already said, proceeds on a principle of exclusion. It collects believers in a common deity or doctrine, and holds them in the bond of a common belief. But every society exists on a basis of inclusion. It does not select its members; they are born into it. And it must of necessity make allowances for all the differences of mental habit and disposition that occur.

There are thus two tendencies in human society. On the one side there is the religious tendency, intolerant from the outset, and treating the doubter as something to be eliminated because of the danger to which he exposes the whole of his fellows. It is of necessity intolerant, because to merely question the truth of religion involves danger. And this original feeling becomes the safeguard of the vested interests that grow up around religion. On the other hand, there is the more tolerant tendency connected with the secular side of life. There is nothing here to breed intolerance, but, on the contrary, everything to encourage it. And as a mere matter of historic fact, when we study the influence of these two powers, the secular and the religious, we find that over and over again the impulse to intolerance and persecution has come from the religious side, the impulse to toleration from the secular side. Eliminate religion from human history, and there is no reason for doubting that toleration would by now have been the general rule, and intolerance the rare exception. But with religion in a position of commanding influence for so many generations, it is not difficult to realise how the intolerance that is part and parcel of religion necessarily influenced the whole. Intolerance in one direction breeds intolerance in others, and not the least of the evils inflicted by religion on the race is that of the cultivation and perpetuation of habits of mind that have been responsible for some of the darkest and most deplorable pages of human history.

Christianity and the World.

PROFESSOR RUDOLF EUCKEN, of Jena, whom Dr Horton pronounces the greatest thinker of the age, is about to visit China and Japan for the purpose of delivering a series of lectures on "The Great Problems of Human Life and their Relation to Christianity." It is to be borne in mind that in the sense which Dr. Horton attaches to the term, Professor Eucken is not even a Christian. Like his English disciple and interpreter, Dr. Tudor Jones, he is a sort of vague, undefined Unitarian, and can be called a Christian only by courtesy. And yet he is going to the East as an advocate of what he calls the substance of Christianity. In this religion, he informs us, there are permanent and transient elements between which he differentiates in a fundamental manner. It is the permanent element that constitutes the substance of the Christian religion, while the transient element represents the various attempts of the intellect to give itself some satisfaction concerning the meaning of that substance. Theology is, therefore, an ever-changing commodity. As Dr. Jones puts it, "any and every change in the intellectual form of the physical substance may be adopted without any kind of alarm if the spiritual substance of the Christian religion is preserved intact as an experience of the deepest soul." By "the physical substance" is evidently meant the intellectual forms and ideas of Christianity which, we are confidently assured, will never save mankind. Now, stripped of its intellectual forms and ideas, what vital elements can Christianity boast of? What is its spiritual substance? On this point Dr. Eucken is hopelessly beclouded and confused. To say that "the deepest and most permanent satisfaction for the soul is to be found in the substance of the Christian religion" is to explain nothing. What is this substance of the Christian religion which Professor Eucken hopes to import to the East? He cannot tell us in any intelligible terms. The Chinese and the Japs are to be offered some invaluable and imperishable treasure which is devoid of all intellectual forms and ideas, but which, in some inexplicable fashion, belongs to the soul and its needs, and is therefore eternal in its nature. Now, this indefinable something, this spiritual substance which cannot be expressed in words, this transcendental union of the Divine and the human experimentally realised in and by the Gospel Jesus—this is what we are to understand by spiritual and universal Christianity, the Christianity which this modern apostle intends very shortly to present to the East.

This mystical Christian substance, which alone possesses saving power, is what the Christian Church in all its branches has lost, and it is this loss that accounts for her lamentable lack of power at the present time. Consequently, it is a radical mistake to declare that Christianity has failed, the failure so patent and so often deplored being applicable only to its intellectual forms and ideas. It is not Christianity, but the Church, that has failed, and the latter has failed simply because she has abandoned the spirit while retaining merely the outward form of former. "The Churches," says Dr. Eucken, "must undergo great transformations before they will regain so many men and women who are now outside them." Then he significantly adds:—

> "It is my conviction that such transformations can be undertaken and accomplished without either injuring or discarding the Christian religion. There is so much to-day that needs doing in order to give Christianity free play, and to give scope for it to show its mighty power over the world. But before this becomes possible much remains to be done within the Church herself."

This is only another way of saying that no conception of Christianity has any chance whatever of conquering this wicked world except that so warmly cherished and recommended by Professor Eucken. Once the Church has adopted this conception of the substance of Christianity, there will come such a mighty revival of religion as the world has never yet witnessed. Unfortunately, before the Churches of Christendom have come round to the Euckenian way of looking at things, the famous Professor has resolved to shake the dust of the West from off his feet and go to try his powers of persuasion upon the Pagan East.

Well, we shall soon see whether the East will be more appreciative of the Professor's peculiar Idealism than the West, or whether Christ is likely to supplant Confucius and the Buddha. Meanwhile, we are profoundly convinced that Dr. Eucken entertains an extremely exaggerated and erroneous idea as to the position of his brand of Idealism in the West. In answer to the question, "Do you think, then, that the systems of Materialism and Intellectualism have spent their force?" he says:—

> "Of course I do. Naturalism and Materialism have been banished even from science as one-sided, insufficient assumptions. They belong to the past, and are not likely to occur again. And even intellectualism has been shown to be a life-system which leaves the deepest part of man's nature out of account. Its day is quickly passing away. That ought to be the conviction of all teachers of religion in the present and their hope for the future."

Most assuredly the wish is in that extract father to the thought. Naturalism and Materialism are, of course, interchangeable terms, denoting the antithesis of Idealism, and nothing is more certain than that they have not been banished from science. The only outstanding Idealists of to-day are Professors

Eucken and Bergson, who are extremely clever men; they are woefully mistaken if they imagine that they have set up a reaction against reason in the scientific world. All science is of necessity an investigation of matter and its functions. This is true even of psychology, the province of which is described as co-extensive with the province of physiology. The facts of consciousness are regarded by the Idealists as spiritual realities, but to the psychologist they are as yet inexplicable by-products of the brain. It is entirely unscientific to define psychology as the science of the soul, as the Idealists do. It is more accurate to define it as the science of behavior or conduct, but it is behavior or conduct of the human organism, which is purely material. On what ground, then, can it be affirmed that Materialism has been banished even from science, or that intellectualism is quickly passing away? It is no concern of ours what ought to be the conviction of Christian teachers in the present or their hope for the future, all we know being that science, in all its departments, is as naturalistic to-day as it ever was, and that in the nature of things it cannot be otherwise. Whether there be a Supernature or not, science is incontrovertibly the study of Nature, and takes no cognisance whatever of anything else.

Professor Eucken's Christianity is a pure nonentity, while his Idealism is shared by many Christians and non-Christians alike. It is easy enough to assert that Christianity, as defined by our philosopher, "dare not remain merely as one religion by the side of other religions"; but he forgets that it has dared so to remain for nigh two thousand years, and that it is less likely to-day than ever to become the universal religion of mankind. The East is at last finding out what a dismal disappointment it is in the West, and in consequence shows a growing disinclination to give it a welcome harborage. It is well known that Francis Xavier preached it in Japan about the middle of the sixteenth century, and that early in the seventeenth century there was every probability of its being made the State religion; but persecution arose and eventually drove it completely out of the land. It had nearly a hundred years' trial, but the final verdict of the Japanese was wholly against it. A similar experience befell it in Siam and China a little later. The East would have none of it. Another desperate attempt is being made to Christianise the East. For upwards of a hundred years millions of pounds have been wasted in pursuit of a hopeless propaganda. At the present moment the East, speaking generally, is as Pagan as it was five hundred years ago. From every point of view the Christian converts are a negligible quantity, while the missionary motive of a hundred years ago is no longer operative in the West. Not many Christians now believe that non-Christians go to hell when they die; and it is becoming a growing conviction among thoughtful people that such countries as India, China, Burma, and Japan are morally fully equal, if not in some respects superior, to the best Christian lands. No, Christianity is not the universal religion, but one among many religions all of which, with the exception of primitive Buddhism, are gradually dying. China and Japan will doubtless grant Professor Eucken a respectful hearing; but we do not think he will make many, if any, converts. The educated classes, in the centres he intends to visit, understand Christianity as well as he does himself, whilst many of them have seen it at work on the continent of Europe and in Great Britain. They have studied our slum-areas, our courts of justice, our economic conditions, and our morals, and they are not likely to accept for the East a religion so utterly discredited by existing conditions in the West. But Christianity claims to be the only true religion, and condemns all other religions as either positively false or essentially inadequate; but that claim has been belied by the facts for nineteen hundred years, and facts are such stubborn things that in the end they always carry the day.

Christian Apologetics.

VII.—PALEY'S EVIDENCES (No. 3).

ANOTHER sample of Christian Evidence reasoning is that relating to the Gospel miracles. The astute apologist, Paley, says (Prop. II., chap. i., sec. 7):—

> "The miracles recorded in the Gospels were wrought in the midst of enemies, under a government, a priesthood, and a magistracy, decidedly and vehemently adverse to them, and to the pretensions which they supported. They were Protestant miracles in a Popish country; they were Popish miracles in the midst of Protestants. They produced a change; they established a society upon the spot, adhering to the belief in them; they made converts.....Jesus had not one follower when he set up his claim. His miracles gave birth to his sect."

Here we have a big bouncing assumption which, without the smallest scrap of evidence, implies that the miracles ascribed to Jesus in the Gospels were wrought exactly as therein described. All those in authority in Palestine—Herod Antipas in Galilee, Pilate in Samaria and Judæa, the chief priests and scribes, and the Jewish Sanhedrim—are declared to have been "decidedly and vehemently adverse" to Jesus Christ going about the country orating and working miracles, accompanied by twelve disciples, and followed by multitudes of the lower classes. These authorities, it is asserted, had a "vehement" desire to stop this unauthorised preaching; but they had no power to do so. If Jesus, or any other self-styled prophet, chose to go from city to city, and from village to village, declaiming to the populace and promulgating a new religion, the authorities could only look on: they were powerless to take action. This is what Paley—and what all present-day apologists—would have us believe.

Now, as a matter of history, during the period when Samaria and Judæa were under Roman procurators (A.D. 6—66) the authorities of Palestine never in a single instance allowed men who had set themselves up as prophets, miracle-workers, preachers, mob orators, or public agitators, to roam the country at large, and preach, orate, or declaim to crowds of the common people. No such open-air propagandism was permitted for a single day. Every self-constituted prophet, miracle-worker, or orator, that appeared in Palestine during the period named had his career cut short, before well begun, by Roman "horsemen and footmen," sent against him by the procurator then in authority, amongst the latter being Pilate, Fadus, Tiberius Alexander, Felix, and Festus. The lower orders among the Jews, during this period, were too ignorant and gullible, and of too excitable a nature, to be safely allowed to listen to street preachers or mob orators. The mischief wrought by the agitator "Judas of Galilee" (A.D. 6), when authority was for a short time withdrawn, stood as a warning. Hence, all individuals of the orator class that found their way into Palestine were hunted down and ruthlessly suppressed, as a precautionary measure against sedition. The procurator had a legion of Roman soldiers, quartered in Jerusalem, for this or any other purpose in the maintenance of order. It is quite certain, then, that Jesus never went about the country, preaching and working miracles, as recorded in the Gospels.

Next, the Jewish authorities in Palestine were not so powerless as represented in the Gospels. Though they left to the Romans the maintenance of order in the two provinces, they kept in their own hands all matters connected with their sacred law. Had Jesus really appeared in public as the promulgator of a new religion, calling himself the divine "son" of the deity they worshiped, and trying to persuade orthodox Jews to give up the Mosaic ritual as related in the Gospels, his public ministry would have been brought to a close the first day. In the case of Stephen, we are told, the Jews "rushed upon him with one accord, and they cast him out of the city, and stoned him" (Acts vii. 57). Whether true or false, this incident correctly describes both the action of the Jews and the fate of Jesus, had that personage attempted to subvert the orthodox Jewish religion. And in doing so, the Jews would only be following the command given in Deut. xiii. 1—5.

But, apart from the foregoing considerations, we know that for the actual working of the Gospel miracles we have no evidence whatever. The editors of the canonical Gospels found the accounts already written—the originators being unknown. The Gospel records are therefore mere stories, without corroboration of any kind: we may safely say, then, that they are unhistorical. Hence, the alleged miracles of Jesus, never having been wrought, established no society. "Jesus the Nazarene," as the name implies, belonged to "the sect of the Nazarenes," and "set up" no claim for himself, save, perhaps, as an exorcist in that sect. The Nazarenes, as a society, existed before the time of Jesus; some members of the sect, at a later day, came to regard the latter personage as a prophet—but not as a divine being—and fabricated stories of his alleged sayings and doings. The Nazarenes were a branch of the Essenes, and did not go about preaching, to gain converts, as represented in the Acts of the Apostles. They were all Jews, and they all conformed to the Mosaic ritual, except upon one point, sacrifice; and for this innovation they had some authority from the Jewish scriptures (e.g., Hos. vi. 6).

A luminous sample of Paley's reasoning on the genuineness of the Gospel miracles is given three pages further on, and reads as follows:—

> "If a person born blind be restored to sight, a notorious cripple to the use of his limbs, or a dead man to life, here is a permanent effect produced by supernatural means. The change, indeed, was instantaneous, but the proof continues. The subject of the miracle remains. The man cured or restored is there: his former condition was known, and his present condition may be examined.....When Lazarus was raised from the dead, he did not merely move, and speak, and die again; or come out of the grave and vanish away. He returned to his home and family, and there continued; for we find him, some time afterwards, in the same town, sitting at table with Jesus and his sisters; visited by great multitudes of the Jews, as a subject of curiosity.....No delusion can account for this.....The blind man, whose restoration to sight at Jerusalem is recorded in the ninth chapter of St. John's Gospel, did not quit the place or conceal himself from inquiry. On the contrary, he was forthcoming to answer the call, to satisfy the scrutiny, and to sustain the browbeatings of Christ's angry and powerful enemies.....Here, though the miracle was sudden, the proof was permanent."

This is real jam. As an argument it is entirely dependent on the word "if"—"If a person born blind be restored to sight.....or a dead man to life." If either of such miracles happened "the change was instantaneous." Why, certainly; the miracle is so represented in the Gospel story. And, not only was this the case, but "the subject of the miracle remains." Why, certainly; that is to say, the person healed "remains" in the Gospel story, and can be found in every printed copy. "The man cured or restored is there." Yes, undoubtedly he "is there"—that is to say, in the story. "His former condition was known"—that is, it is described in the story. "And his present condition may be examined"—that is to say, it is so implied in the Gospel story.

Coming to a particular case, "When Lazarus was raised from the dead, he did not.....die again.....or vanish away." Certainly not; had he done so, it would have marred the story, as the author, when concocting it, knew perfectly well. "He returned to his home and family.....for we find him, some time afterwards," etc. Just so; the author brings him again upon the scene, and "we find him" in the next chapter (John xii. 2) "sitting at table with Jesus" in the house of Martha and Mary, whom the writer calls his "sisters." At the same meal in Luke's Gospel (x. 38—42) there is no brother Lazarus; neither does Matthew, Mark, nor Luke appear to have ever heard of this brother, or of his being raised from the dead.

Next, the man born blind, after receiving his sight (John ix. 6, 7) "did not.....conceal himself from inquiry.....he was forthcoming to answer the call, to satisfy the scrutiny" of the sceptical. This is perfectly correct; he remained and answered the questioning of his neighbors, as well as that of the Pharisees (John ix. 9, 15)—that is to say, he is represented as so doing in the Gospel story, in order to bring more credit upon the Christian Savior. We thus arrive at the inevitable conclusion of this grand argument—and all must admit that Paley has fully proved it—that if the Gospel story be true, the miracle in each case was perfectly genuine; consequently there could be no deception or delusion in the matter. And this point being settled, all we require now is evidence of the truth of the Gospel story. When this is adduced we are ready to consider and weigh it impartially. But where is this evidence? As a simple matter of fact, Paley has not advanced any—not the smallest scrap. He tacitly asks us to accept all the Gospel narratives as true in every particular—without anything in the nature of evidence. It does not appear to have dawned upon him that, for those inclined to be sceptical, evidence of some kind might be necessary. For, it is almost needless to say, we have not the testimony of a single person who witnessed the alleged raising of Lazarus from the dead, or the miraculous cure of the man born blind, neither of which miracles was among those recorded in the primitive Gospel from which the first three evangelists drew the main portion of their narratives. Neither do they appear to have been amongst the stories which are called apocryphal. It is, therefore, more than probable that the writer of the Fourth Gospel piously fabricated them himself.

ABRACADABRA.

Artists and Freethought.—III.

(Concluded from p. 365.)

ONE of the few modern artists who believed in a didactic art, an art with a social and moral purpose, was G. F. Watts (1817-1904). In his Mammon and the Minotaur he preached his social gospel that wealth was the abomination of cruelty. In the Shuddering Angel we see him pleading for dumb animals. In the Dweller in the Innermost his moralising is made plain. In his Messenger and Love Triumphant, and other subjects on Death, we read his philosophy. And so in his Faith, Hope, and the Spirit of Christianity, we see his religious faith. Watts was an Agnostic. Creeds, dogmas, Churches, had no place with one who placed Humanity before everything.

A great and original English painter was Ford Madox Brown (1821-93). He was the first of the English Romanticists. His two gorgeous canvases—Work, at Manchester, and the Last of England, at Birmingham, are landmarks in the history of our national art. This artist, as his biographer (Hueffer) tells us, was an "an absolute Agnostic, with a great dislike for anything of the nature of priestcraft."

Sir E. Burne-Jones (1833-98), a greater contemporary (in public estimation) than the foregoing, was originally intended for the Church, but doubts took possession of him, and he abandoned her service for that of Art. Among his finest art creations are: King Cophetia, the Star of Bethlehem, Pygmalion, the last two at Birmingham, and Danäe, at Glasgow. He, too, was a Freethinker.

A life-long friend of Burne-Jones, and one who influenced him to a considerable extent, was that noble artist, poet, and rebel, William Morris (1828-96). This fine "craftsman," as he called himself, by his work and teaching, did more for decorative art and taste in this country than all the schools put together. His interest in the Socialist and Secularist movement is well-known. Although most of his biographers have ignored the fact, Morris was an Atheist.

Two of the famous Pre-Raphaelites, Rossetti and Millais, were also Freethinkers. Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1828-82) found subjects for his canvases in the Bible; yet for all that, his biographer, A. C. Benson, tells us he was "a Freethinker and held an Agnostic position." His Annunciation, in the National Gallery, is an example of his sacred themes; but when we compare it with such an ideal conception as his picture called Found, we see the value of Carlyle's warning to a certain artist "not to confuse his mind with mysteries, but to use it for something he could see about him."

Sir John Millais (1829-96), the painter of Lorenzo and Isabella, at Liverpool, the Blind Girl, at Birmingham, the Forerunner, at Glasgow, and two fine portraits in the National Gallery; but perhaps better known for the North-West Passage. The fine, sturdy mariner in this was "sat for" by Byron's friend, Trelawny. What a scene was caused when he found he had been pictured with a glass of grog in his hand; for Trelawny was a life-long teetotaler! Millais, as I have said was a Freethinker.

Among those artists whom the French term dessinateurs, are not a few sceptics in religion. One of the greatest artists of English wood engraving was W. J. Linton (1812). He was a good Freethinker and Democrat, and not only helped with his purse the Freethought cause, but contributed to such journals as the Oracle of Reason and the Reasoner. Two of the most sublime mockers in "black and white"—who helped to make Punch famous—Charles Keene (1828-91) and Du Maurier (1834-96), were both Freethinkers. In the latter's charming novel, Trilby, there was an occasional fine sword-thrust at Christianity. William Simpson (1820-99), the war and travel artist, whose fine gallery of water-colors are among the treasures of Kelvingrove, Glasgow, was a Freethinker who took much interest in popular propaganda. Lastly, I may mention the name of a "household goddess," Kate Greenaway (1846-1901), the creator of those lovely children in art. She, too, belongs to Freethought. Once she said, "Death is the one thing I can't reconcile with God. After such a wonderful life it seems such a miserable ending." Her life by Spielmann and Layard contains much of her heterodox opinions.

Vasili Verestchagin (1842-1904), the first really great Russian painter, was a confirmed Freethinker. His "Thoughts Upon Religion," in his Autobiographical Sketches, certainly place him outside the "goodly fellowship of the apostles." Unlike his contemporaries, there is no sloppy sentiment in Verestchagin's treatment of religious themes. He was a realist, and painted the "whole truth, and nothing but the truth." The Blessed Virgin in A Syrian Home is the most vulgar slut imaginable, and the boy Christ is just a gamin, and no more. The figures are placed in a dirty backyard, and the picture truly gives us just the sort of surroundings one would expect to find with a humble carpenter's family in the East. The figures in Christ and John the Baptist appear like two Arab mendicants. The Resurrection depicts Christ leaving the tomb, not in "all his glory," but crawling very ungraciously out of the bottom of the sepulchre. This picture was severely censured by the clericals, and by the order of the Archbishop was withdrawn from the Vienna Exhibition in 1885.

To the French Revolution art owes much. It struck the first blow for the freedom of the artist—his liberation from the Church, court, convention, and the schools. The great representative artist of the Revolution was J. Louis David (1748-1825), a good rebel and "a thorough Freethinker," says J. M. Wheeler. As a friend of Robespierre he went to prison and narrowly escaped the guillotine. In his early years David became enamored of ancient art, and when the classical political ideals became the law and custom of the Revolution his early love found full scope, not only in his designs for the Republican fêtes, but in his most admired canvases: The Oath of the Horatii (painted before the Revolution) L. Junius Brutus, and the Sabine Women. David died in banishment.

The real artistic influence of the Revolution, however, is not found in David nor in France, but in Francisco Goya (1746-1828), one of the greatest names in Spanish art. Although a Court painter and a decorator of churches, Goya was at heart an Anarchist and Atheist. His famous work in the St. Anthony Church is the most daring religious picture ever painted. It depicts St. Anthony blessing the cripples; but look behind this mere subject and you will see a crowd of beggars, mendicants, courtesans, and dandies behind a balustrade. The ladies bestow most enticing glances, and here and there a leg protrudes through the rail, or a skirt is lifted to display some petticoat finery, whilst others are actually engaged in a dance. But it is in his engravings that Goya reveals his Freethought. In one of these a corpse is rising from a grave, and with a finger writes the word "nothingness." And then Goya himself writes, "There is no such a thing as immortality of which the priests speak to us; no such a thing as those heavenly joys on which we set our hopes, which bowed us to the earth, which helped us to bear without a murmur want and misery, while these kings and priests were growing fat at our expense."

When the Romanticists founded their Nouvelle Société in opposition to the Salon, in the days of '48, there were many rebels in both religion and politics among them. At any rate, their leaders, Delacroix (1798-1863) and Daumier (1808-79), were both Freethinkers. Daumier, the father of modern French caricature, was a solid fighter for the cause of liberty, and in his early days had gone to prison for a disrespectful lithograph of Louis Philippe.

Gustave Courbet (1819-77), the great protagonist of "realism," was an Atheist and Anarchist.* He was a friend and disciple of Proudhon, and took a prominent part in the Paris Commune of 1871, for which he suffered imprisonment, fine, banishment, and a heap of indignities, which even to-day are put upon his name. Courbet "hated" the priests, and the picture of them in the Return from the Conference, which represents several drunken curés, was conceived from a view of caricature. It was refused by the Salon as "an outrage on religion."

Jules Dalou (1838), the famous sculptor of La République, at the Paris Hotel de Ville, was also implicated in the Commune of 1871, and had to fly the country in consequence. Dalou was as free in religion as he was in politics or art. Meunier, considered second only to the great Rodin, was an avowed rebel and heretic.

Among artists of the last half-century, Freethinkers are more the rule than the exception, especially on the Continent. Rodin, perhaps the greatest sculptor of modern times, is clearly a Freethinker, although no definite attitude can be assigned to him. As to Jean Baffier, the sculptor of the statue of Michael Servetus, he is an open political rebel and sceptic. The greatest living painter in Russia—Elias Ryepin—is an avowed anti-clerical. In conservative England—the land which so annoyed Schopenhauer for its make-believe in religion—we can boast of many heretics, from the highly successful Hon. John Collier to the brilliant, but unappreciated, Walter Sickert—not forgetting, of course, the master illustrator, Walter Crane.

With France, it would be difficult to point to a modern artist who was not a Freethinker of some shade or other. The great Manet—apostle of "Impressionism"—and all his unconventional associates who gathered under the roof of the free-thinking Père Tanguy—Cezanne, Pissaro, Vincent van Gogh, Renoir, Monet, and Paul Gauguin—were Freethinkers. Jules Hereau, Cazin, Eugène Carriere, Feyen-Perrin, Hippolyte Moulin, Jean Paul Laurens, as well as most of "Neo-Impressionists"—Luce, Seurat, Paul Signac, and Pissaro fils, must also be counted with their irreligious brothers. As for the dessinateurs, like Gavarni and André Gill, the moderns to a man are sceptics—and to name a few—Léandre, Steinlen, Hermann-Paul, and Willette.

The Observer winds up a notice of the sinking of the Empress of Ireland by saying:—

> "We have spoken often of Fate. Do not let it be inferred therefrom that we write as a 'hopeless, blind idolator of Chance.' These things do not happen save by the will of Him without whose knowledge not a sparrow falls to the ground. The why we cannot ever guess. One thing only we can do; bow the head in submission and try to realise our own dependence upon the Eternal. These things do not happen in vain if those who are afflicted by them rise from the blow stronger because more humble, truer because more purged of the pride of life, closer to realities because the spiritual and the material have taken more closely their proper value in their eyes. They who perished were not adjudged more guilty than those on whom the tower of Siloam fell. They had reached their appointed time."

We suppose this is intended for fine and impressive writing. Seriously, it would be next to impossible to string together greater essential drivel. The wreck occurred by the will of God; those who died "had reached their appointed time." Then it was all arranged beforehand. The bookings were supernaturally prompted. The fog was part of the plan, so was the arrival of the Storstad. Everything was part of the scheme, because the people were not drowned for their deserts, but because they had reached their "appointed time." What, then, does the Observer mean by saying that "stern inquiry will have to be held into the navigation of the Storstad"? No inquiry is necessary if the whole thing was "appointed"—that is, unless the court of inquiry has the courage to pass a vote of censure on the one who arranged the scheme.

And observe the moral of the disaster. These things will not have happened in vain if those who are not drowned "read aright the lessons of the Empress of Ireland." What is there to learn? If it all happens by the "will of Him without whose knowledge not a sparrow falls to the ground," if the time of our dying is "appointed," what lessons are we to read from the disaster? One lesson is implied. We are in the hands of God, who does with us as he wills, and we can only whine out our submission, or play a man's part, if only for a brief moment, and "Curse God and die." One other lesson is also stated by the Observer. We are to rise stronger from the disaster. God drowns over a thousand people in order to give other people a desired lesson. The drowned, we have it on the Observer's authority, were not more guilty than others. But they were punished nevertheless. They can get no benefit from the lesson of the disaster. The benefit accrues to others. God selects a thousand people and drowns them in order to teach other people a lesson in navigation. What incurable hostility there is between religion and common sense!

We do not quite know exactly what is meant by a "hopeless, blind, idolator of Chance," but we feel that anything is preferable to believing we are the mere sport of an intelligence too powerful for us to coerce, and absolved from all the ethical considerations that regulate human actions. Nothing could be more depressing, more truly horrible than that. Theist and Atheist are in the same world, and have to face the same facts; and while it remains true, on any hypothesis, that the rain falls on the just and unjust alike, and in any disaster the innocent and the guilty suffer equally, the Atheist is not burdened with the depressing conviction that this obliviousness to moral considerations is deliberate. To the Atheist the fight is one of human intelligence versus non-conscious forces. To the Theist it is between human endeavor and an invisible personality too powerful to be subdued, and not sufficiently human to be swayed by the moral deserts of those whom he punishes or rewards.

The restraining value of religion is not often shown so clearly as in the case of George Marriott, who was charged at Southend Petty Sessions with stealing tools from workmen, and sentenced to four months' hard labor. When accused, the prisoner produced a card containing the Ten Commandments, saying that it was given him by his mother when he left home.

An American "Evangelist," only fourteen years of age, named Forbes, is engaged with his father, the Rev. Charles Forbes, in conducting a soul-saving "mission" at Stratford. He is said to be very successful. No doubt his youth is the attraction. But these boy preachers seldom come to anything in riper years. Jesus Christ was one of the exceptions. He started at twelve. But his mother's hand or his father's slipper subdued him for a long while after that first attempt. He was thirty years old before he took to the road in real earnest.

Gravesend isn't far from Stratford. The boy evangelist should try his hand on his thirsty countryman. But it is probably a great deal easier to save sham sinners at a public meeting than real sinners at a public-house.

Why on earth did the Rev. Henry Coulan, of Boston, Mass., come all the way to Gravesend to get fined 7s. 6d. for being drunk and disorderly? Couldn't he have managed it at home?

The Times Literary Supplement is not a theological publication, but on occasion it can "out-Herod Herod." Recently it stated that "The Rationalist argues that the contradictions in Holy Writ and dogmas prove them to be not of Divine origin, whereas the Mystic contends that within the domain of spiritual revelation it is precisely these contradictions that prove the Divine origin of Holy Writ and dogmas." Does the Times scribe mean that his faith would be stronger if he read that Jonah swallowed the whale instead of the other way about?

"Tradition is a thing of the past; it spells stupidity," declared the Rev. Nigel Cross at the Unitarians' annual meeting. So long as tradition has 50,000 salaried defenders in this country alone, it may spell lunacy, but it will not be a thing of the past.

Sir Oliver Lodge advises people not to attempt to prove the existence of God. He says this cannot be done, and so far we agree with him. We also congratulate him, for it looks as though he is seeing how useless some of his own "proofs" are. But, he adds, "Let them ask if they thought man was the highest intelligence in the whole of the universe. If the questioner once admitted there was a higher being than man they had got him. They could not stop after that." Sir Oliver must try again. That kind of argument would hardly impose on a child. No one need admit that there is any higher intelligence than man in the universe. Human intelligence is the highest we know, and the most that anyone in their senses would admit is that there may be higher. But it is left for those who assert it to prove it. Besides, a merely higher intelligence is not "God." There may, for instance, be inhabitants of Mars with intelligence as much above ours as ours is above the anthropoid ape. But that would no more make the "higher intelligence" God than our superiority to the ape converts us into deities. What a pity it is that a man of Sir Oliver's eminence in science goes out of his way to repeat the illogical twaddle of a Christian Evidence platform.

Addressing the annual gathering of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Dean Inge, of St. Paul's Cathedral, said some very nasty things about the Materialists, which appeared to please his heterodox audience. Yet, if there is any truth in the Christian creeds, Unitarians will go to the same tropical regions after death as the Intellectuals.

Dr. A. C. Dixon, the American evangelist, spoke at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London, on behalf of the work of the British and Foreign Sailors' Society. Presumably, he spoke on behalf of the foreigners.

Christian and liar have, historically, been almost convertible terms. This truth was put in more parliamentary language by Herder, when he wrote that "Christian veracity" deserved to rank with "Punic faith." Here is a fair sample of up-to-date Christian mendacity. Colonel John Adamson Ferguson, Hon. Sec. Church Laymen's Missionary Movement, in a letter to the Westminster Gazette the other evening (Friday, June 5) made the following pretty statement: "The times are critical in many parts of the world, notably in China, Japan, India, and Africa. The first two are hesitating between Christianity and unbelief." We should be surprised if the editor who inserted Colonel Ferguson's letter,—for good business reasons, just as he would refuse to insert one from a known Atheist on the same subject—does not know perfectly well that the missionary puff is a great absurdity. China and Japan are not "hesitating" at all about Christianity or any other religion. If they give up their own faiths—as most educated Chinese and Japs have already done—they will accept no others in the place of those they abandon. Ever since we can remember they have been going to accept Christianity. "Some day, some day"—as the song says; but they are not a bit nearer doing it up to the present, and it is fairly safe to say they never will. But why, it may be asked, do missionary officials tell such falsehoods? The answer is plain. Partly from religious zeal—partly from a desire to obtain money for the missionary business. It is easy enough to understand.

It is not easy to see the sublime courage of setting fire to churches and running away from the consequences. Freethinkers, in former days, did not wage war in that fashion. They attacked churches, not as buildings, but as institutions; they attacked dogmas, and pretensions; and they suffered for it, but they won. They did not sacrifice others—they sacrificed themselves. There was some honesty and decency in that.

The Bishop of London appointed June 12 as a "day of intercession" for the Church in Wales. Bishop Ingram should make up his mind whether he intends trusting to votes or to God in the matter, although now that the Bill is practically law we fail to see what God can do. The Bishop says that man's extremity is God's opportunity—which is very, very true. It is only when man is helpless or ignorant that God is called in. "God help us" is only another way of saying that we do not see how we can help ourselves, just as "God only knows" is a universal formula for complete ignorance.

The Carnegie Peace Endowment Commission on the Balkan War has issued its report. The report says that the war, which our readers will remember was called by the Christians a "crusade" on behalf of the Cross, belongs "to the age when constant fighting, with its inevitable cruelties, was followed by abominable excesses which civilised people have excluded from the province of war for centuries—systematic massacres, ill-treatment of prisoners, pillage and incendiarism, and innumerable cases of injury to women and girls." The Commission declares that "there is no clause in international law relative to war on land and the treatment of the wounded that has not been violated in greater or lesser degree by all the belligerents." Wounded men were put to death on the battlefield, and both the Greek and Bulgarian armies are charged with using explosive bullets.

Mrs. Besant's irreligion drove her out of her husband's home, and threw her upon "the world" which, in the form of the Freethought party, treated her extremely well. But there was no fortune hanging to that. People paid as little as threepence to hear her then. They pay as much as five shillings to hear her now. She has "verted" to religion again—not the old one, but a new one, which is in many respects a good deal worse—and is once more "respectable." And one result is that she has just signed a £100,000 contract with the London Building Industries Federation to construct the Theosophical Society's new headquarters in Tavistock-square.

The Dean of Belfast reminds us of the brigand in the Italian story who prayed for God's assistance when he set out on an expedition to murder a rich man and violate his wife. The reverend gentleman assures the people of his city (not the Catholics, of course, but the Protestants) that "Ulster's prayers" induced God to take command of the "gun-running" through the Fanny. The Deity sailed the ship and ran the weather. "God's hand guided her," the Dean says, "God's fogs shielded her." We rather fancy the speaker himself is in one of "God's fogs."

A Roman Catholic procession at Preston, in spite of the warnings of the police, insisted on carrying the Madonna, alias the Virgin Mary, alias the Mother of God, in the "fighting line." Extra police were drafted into the town, which was full of religionists and disorder. How they did love each other! It took the men of law and order all their time to keep Catholics and Protestants from murdering each other. Yet both belong to Christianity—the religion of love.

The Church Family Newspaper announces that fifteen bishops are to meet fifteen Nonconformist leaders in order to "discuss a basis on which civic and social enterprises can be undertaken by all sections of believers." From such a combination—to use the words of the Litany—"Good Lord deliver us!" The only basis on which Nonconformists and Conformists can combine is a religious one. "All sections of believers" are clearly not united on any social question. They do not agree on the land question, the housing question, the military question, or any other question of a social character. They exhibit, and must be expected to exhibit, all kinds of divergences. It is both inevitable and desirable that this should be so. They can only agree on one point, and that is the direction of social affairs in a manner that will promote the interests of religious organisations. If an agreement is reached it means the regulation of social life by organised religious bodies. And that, as all experience shows, is the most disastrous thing that can happen in the life of a nation.

The emergence of the priest in politics is, indeed, one of the most sinister features of our time. Once upon a time, religion openly claimed to regulate social life. The claim was put forward by Catholics and Protestants alike, and so far it was straightforward and intelligible. Then came the rapid development of science and social theory, and religious leaders felt themselves in danger of being crowded out altogether. The counter move was the development of a "social Christianity." This was an illogical monstrosity and consisted in discovering in the New Testament, if not a theory of sociology, at least principles and ideals that might profitably inspire social action. And so the clergy, who were in danger of being driven out of sociology and politics, saw their way to make a last stand in defence of their old claim. It is no longer the right of religion to direct social life—at least, not in so many words—but the power of religion to inspire social action. Yet it meant the same thing. The Roman Church openly claims to control social life. The Protestant Churches desire to do so, and aim at doing so, but with their customary hypocrisy, refrain from putting their claim in plain language. It is the same claim in both cases; and the direction of social life by religious sects means both tyranny and retrogression. That is one of the plainest and surest of historic truths.

Revivalists are continually asserting that Atheism leads to suicide. It was not the cause in the case of the late Mr. Herbert Slade, an Oxford undergraduate, who suffered from "religious depression," and cut his throat.

The King has contributed £1,000, and the Prince of Wales £1 000 towards the cost of a church at Kennington Cross. The Throne and the Church have always been mutual back-scratchers.

At the Paris Academy of Medicine, Professor Tuffier introduced a bearded woman to his colleagues. At the age of forty, the unfortunate woman began to assume a masculine aspect and to develop her muscles like a boxer. Defenders of the Design Argument will kindly note the latest of Providence's playful pranks.

"Shot by a Dead Man" is the attractive headline in a recent issue of the Daily News. The paragraph told the story of the finding of a suicide's body in Switzerland. The corpse's hand still clutched a revolver, and the finder was shot whilst attempting to move the body. The Holy Bible is the only authentic repository of stories of really lively "corpses."

At the Salvation Army International Congress grace is to be said in a dozen languages at the dinners. Salvationism is not like Holyoake said Secularism was—a religion that gives God no trouble. Twelve graces for one dinner! It is enough to make Omnipotence shudder.

Bad language is not confined to His Majesty's Theatre. A little girl had upset her parents by using the word "devil." "Dear," said mother, "that is a nasty word, and do not use it." All went well, and a few weeks later the mother inquired what the Scripture lesson had been about. "Why, mamma," was the answer, "it was about the temptation by the gentleman who keeps hell."

God counts the hairs of the heads of Christians, and has a partiality for sparrows. Are we to assume that the 17,000 accidents caused by motors during 1913 all occurred to non-Christian persons?

In Mr. Thomas Joyce's new book on Mexican Archæology, there is much material for the students of comparative religions. In ancient Mexico, for example, infant baptism was a well recognised practice. Christians imagine that the rite is one peculiar to their own superstition.

Stands Jerusalem where it did? Here is Mr. Israel Zangwill, referring to his play, Plaster Saints, and saying that it has been commended by "some of my most eminent Christian contemporaries," and that it contains "nothing whatever to wound Christian feeling." If the distinguished dramatist is not very careful he will be asked to subscribe to the Young Men's Christian Association.

A bundle of asparagus recently sold for £15. The price seems high enough to have purchased the apple that caused all the trouble in Eden.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £160 15s. Received since:—H. Wyllie, Esq., £1 1s.; J. Barry, £1; S. H., £1; R. Daniell, 2s.; C. E. Hearson, £1 1s.; Per F. Rose (Bloemfontein):—L. N., 10s. 6d.; H. E. Irving, 10s. 6d.; F. Rose, 10s. 6d.

A. H.—We have seen George Bernard Shaw's attack on Secular Education, and also what he has to say about religious instruction, and there is only one word that properly describes it—it is silly. Far more serious attacks on Secular Education, and much less ridiculous defences of religious instruction, have been made by avowed Christian writers; but they had an obvious advantage over G. B. S. They knew something of child psychology, and they were conversant with present-day school life and methods. We are glad to hear from a recent subscriber to what you describe as our "powerfully written weekly."

M. ROBINSON.—The period of Mohammedan supremacy in Spain covered, roughly, seven centuries. Its influence on the life of Spain, and also on the rest of Europe, together with the demoralisation that followed the Christian reconquest, will be found in H. C. Lea's The Moriscoes of Spain, Stanley Lane-Poole's Moors in Spain, Buckle's History of Civilisation, and Draper's Intellectual Development of Europe. We agree with you as to the "brigandage" of some of the European States in relation to Turkey.

S. H.—Thanks for your good wishes. The cutting shall have attention next week.

H. LION.—Received, but regret we cannot make use of your contribution.

J. W. KELL.—Certainly, the Golden Bough is worth possessing, if you can afford to get it. The complete work is published in 12 vols. at 10s. net per vol. But the volumes may be purchased separately.

J. D. JOHNSON (Michigan).—The matter mentioned in your letter is receiving attention. We received a copy of the circular you enclose, and we quite appreciate the very excellent work done by Mr. Reichwald as Secretary of the Secular Union, but considerations of space prevented our reprinting the whole of the circular at the time. Judge Black's letter was printed as a sample of the license Christian officials permit themselves when dealing with Freethinkers.

J. KNOX.—The good wishes of earnest men are always welcome, and the gratitude and respect of one who has been a reader of the Freethinker for 25 years repays one for much of the vexation that Freethought work brings. We are glad you have derived so much personal benefit from the reading of the paper.

J. YOUNG.—Is there any virtue in troubling about the senseless scandal of irresponsible speakers? People who live in the gutter—mentally—naturally become so familiar with filth that they see nothing else. We have never allowed such things to trouble us, and we advise you to follow the same policy.

T. F. PALMER.—Article to hand. Will appear next week. Crowded out of present issue.

Mr. W. Bailey, of Manchester, who was added at the recent Conference to the list of N. S. S. vice-presidents, should have been added long ago. Curious delays happen in human affairs, and this is one of them. "What everybody sees nobody sees." We coin this epigram for the occasion. Most people will endorse it on the spot.

Dr. Nichols, a N. S. S. vice-president for many years, and a member of the Board of Directors of the Secular Society, Ltd., is a familiar figure at these Annual Conferences, and as welcome as he is familiar. Unfortunately he was unable to attend this year in consequence of severe neuralgia in different parts of the head, which has been plaguing him for some time. We are very glad to hear that the bracing air of Deal is powerfully assisting his recovery.

Mr. W. Heaford, who was announced to speak at the evening public meeting in connection with the N. S. S. Conference, finding himself tired out with overwork, was obliged to go away for a little rest and change. We hope he has profited by the brief relaxation.

The members of the Edmonton Branch have arranged an excursion to Epping Forest on Sunday, June 21. One party starts from "The Two Brewers," South-street, Ponder's End, and will meet another contingent at "The Robin Hood," High Beech, at 12 o'clock. Tea will be provided at "The Gardener's Arms," Loughton, at 5 o'clock. Tickets 1s. 3d. each. These may be had of Mr. R. H. Grant, 30 Kenwood-road, Lower Edmonton, or of the Branch Secretaries. London N. S. S. members will receive a cordial welcome.

Professor Metchnikoff, Freethinker and man of science, is to receive a "Golden Book" on the attainment of his seventieth birthday. The book will form a record of the latest scientific researches, and will be signed by the leading scientists of to-day. Professor Metchnikoff is one of the greatest of living micro-biologists, and has made no secret of his heretical opinions. His work, The Nature of Man, left little room for religion, and clearly reduced the supposed longing for a future to a purely physiological basis. We die before we are physiologically exhausted. We desire to live longer because we have not really worn out our bodily vitality. Given a complete life here, and that the Professor thinks is quite within the power of science to secure, this desire would be exhausted, and we should meet death as calmnly and as contentedly as we sink to sleep.

A memorial tablet to the novelist, "Mark Rutherford" (William Hale White), was unveiled at Hastings on Thursday, June 4, by Sir William Robertson Nicoll, who had been a friend of his for many years. Hale's works were praised highly, but not too highly. He came of Nonconformist stock; yet he was only technically a Nonconformist himself, and would probably have called himself an Agnostic if he had been bound to choose a label. We have a high admiration ourselves for "Mark Rutherford's" writings.

"The New Spirit in Portugal," by Lady Muir Mackenzie, is probably the article that will have most interest for Freethinkers in the June number of the English Review. The writer flatly challenges the statements made about the Lisbon prisons by the clerical party in England, who have been so industrious in misrepresenting the Republican Government in Portugal. She describes the great Penitenciaria as almost ideal. And listen to this:—

> "Before the coming of the Republic a great chapel stood in the centre of the building. From this point radiated six sections filled with seats in tiers one above another. Each prisoner's seat was enclosed in a box open only to the chapel; no prisoner ever saw another, for every man on leaving his cell had to draw a grey linen hood over his head and shoulders. To-day hoods are abolished, prisoners work together in company, the chapel is no more, and it has been replaced by a school."

We congratulate Lady Muir Mackenzie and the editor of the English Review on vindicating the Portuguese Republic against its partisan traducers. "English people," the lady writer says, "hold a high place in the esteem of the Portuguese, and a word of sympathy from them is truly appreciated." Another foreign article is Sydney Brooks' on "President Wilson." While admiring the man, the writer is pessimistic as to the President. Editor Harrison deals with "Mr. Asquith's Duty." We cannot follow him in these columns. We are quite certain, however, that, whether right or wrong, Mr. Asquith will do his duty as he sees it. And that is something.

The religion of Christ and him crucified is nowadays advertised like a patent medicine. Recent titles of sermons include "The Straight Tip," and "Up a Gum Tree." We like the last title, for it represents the position of the belated believers in the Christian superstition.

Clear Thinking; or, An Englishman's Creed is a publisher's announcement of a new book. The two things are not usually identical.

N. S. S. Conference.

IMPORTANT FORWARD MOVEMENT.

THE forty-seventh Annual Conference of the National Secular Society was held at the Queen's Hall, London, W., on Whit-Sunday, and was well attended by delegates and individual members from all parts of the kingdom.

As was to be expected, Mr. G. W. Foote was re-elected President unanimously, and he thus entered upon his twenty-fifth successive year as the acknowledged leader of British Freethought; he having received the President's hammer from the honored hands of Charles Bradlaugh, the first President, in February, 1890. Indeed, the election showed the depth of respect with which the President is held, for the tone of all the speakers was that of personal affection, and Mr. C. Cohen, who occupied the chair during the election, voiced the feeling of all present when he said that "he hoped for many years to come Mr. Foote would be able and willing to lead the Freethought movement, and to keep it in the best position."

In a dignified speech, thanking the delegates, Mr. Foote said when old friends meet and have to do business as well as to look friendship, they have to put on a formal appearance. They had known one another long, and he did not mind telling them that serving Freethought was not profitable. When he accepted the Presidency on Charles Bradlaugh's nomination, he knew that Freethinkers were ostracised and tabooed men. After George Meredith's death, why was he selected by the editor of a great review to write about him? Because he wrote what he thought, and he wrote under no other condition. He would rather write an article in the Freethinker for nothing than under the restrictions of other papers for payment. Editing a propagandist organ such as the Freethinker was not a joke. He could afford to dispense with public applause now, for he had done without it all his life; but he always had the recognition of the worthiest and the best. Early in his career, George Meredith wrote saying that he was "fighting for the best of causes, profitless as he knew it to be," and these words had been an inspiration ever since. Such a cause must be profitless. Meredith's remark was true, and he hoped it would be true whilst he had strength to fight.

Great interest was aroused in the President's statement concerning the reorganisation of Freethought, and an animated discussion ensued. It was resolved by an overwhelming majority that the President be requested to draw up a plan and to call a special meeting hereafter.

Mr. Foote's statement was followed with keen interest. He pointed out that at the beginning of organised Freethought the Society set up was inevitable in the circumstances; but unless necessary changes were made, progress would not be rapid. When the National Secular Society was established, many people took part, but Charles Bradlaugh did most of the work. There were contributory causes to Bradlaugh's popularity, for he was a known and trusted friend of the people. He was also the first great popular orator who went about the country advocating Freethought. Sundays at that time were dolorous; there was no alternative to the churches except the public-houses. To-day the conditions were entirely different, for the very spread of Freethought has made serious rivals to the lecturers. Even Sunday Society meetings attract small audiences with lecturers of importance. The Freethought party raised more money now than in Bradlaugh's days, but it was becoming more profitable to spend money on books, pamphlets, and tracts than on lectures.

The interpretation of the Blasphemy Laws, arising from the trial of 1883, had altered everything. Had he known of this vast change years ago, he would have registered the National Secular Society. The Secular Society, Ltd., was formed to safeguard the interests of Freethought, and it had answered the purpose. A way should be found of simplifying the organisation of those interests, and the President explained that he had a plan in his head.

Mr. Victor Roger objected to such a sweeping step merely at the discretion of the President, but Mr. Cohen pointed out that the Conference was only asked to sanction the drawing up of a scheme to be drawn up and submitted to a joint committee to accept or reject.

After the adjournment, Mr. Chapman (South Shields) made a breezy speech, saying that a Freethought organisation could not expect millions of members. Lectures did not attract so much as formerly, and even sermons enjoyed the same fate, and churches were fast becoming places of entertainment.

Mr. Wood asked whether the Secularists could not co-operate with other Freethought societies, but Mr. Foote said that it was not possible to have one boat for voyagers of different temperaments. Since the inauguration of the Secular Society, Ltd., the robbery of the movement had been stopped, and thousands had accrued to it. It had been the financial salvation of Freethought. It was not the same Society as the N. S. S., but it was formed in the interests of the N. S. S., and that fact had always been kept well to the front. At the end the Conference passed a resolution declaring that it had heard Mr. Foote's statement with pleasure, and that it trusted he would prepare detailed plans as soon as possible, with the aid of any committee he might summon to his assistance, and call a special meeting of all the parties concerned in the matter.

The ever-green subject of Secular Education was introduced by the veteran, Mr. A. B. Moss, in an able speech on a subject with which he is familiar. He proposed the following resolution, which was carried:—

> "That, in view of the repeated failures of the Government to settle the Education Question on sectarian lines; in view also of the marked growth of public opinion in favor of a non-sectarian solution of a problem that owes its existence to the rivalries of Church and Chapel, this Conference calls upon the Government to put an end to a dispute that has for more than a generation obstructed the progress of education by restricting all instruction in State-supported schools to purely secular subjects."

Mr. Moss said Lord Haldane had spoken of the introduction of an education scheme, which should unite all democratic parties, and which promised to go further along secular lines than any of its predecessors. He did not think that the present Government would introduce it, but if so, he hoped that Freethinkers would insist that it was purely secular. Not only Bible teaching, but prayers and hymns must be abolished. Religious instruction was colored by the bias of the teacher, who might be a Baptist, Congregationalist, Unitarian, Churchman, or of any religious opinion. The only chance for the children lay in freedom from the priest, and Secularism not only gave the children liberty, but also gave it to the teachers.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Cowell, and speeches were made by Messrs. Thurlow, Bellamy, Chapman, Cunningham, Davidson, and Hecht. An amusing interlude was afforded by Miss Vance, who, remarking on the fact that many Freethinkers' relations were religious, said that perhaps a society should be formed for the conversion of Freethinkers' wives. She objected to a man trying to convert people when he had not converted his own wife.

A resolution that officials be appointed to obtain fuller particulars from Branches concerning the work done, proposed by Mr. Cowell, and seconded by Mr. Bellamy, was lost.

Another resolution, proposed by Mr. Hecht, to appoint a small committee to work with the Secretary in organising demonstrations and extra meetings on new ground, was carried; as was also a resolution that a committee be appointed to consider the feasability of forming a National Federation.

Mr. J. T. Lloyd was in excellent form in proposing—

> "This Conference congratulates the Government on the practically assured success of its Welsh Disestablishment Bill, and hopes it will carry the same principle forward in a Bill for the Disestablishment of the Church and other forms of religious privilege in England."

In a short and effective speech, he emphasised that the passing of the Welsh Disestablishment Bill was another step in the secularisation of the State in the British Empire.

This was seconded by Mr. A. B. Moss and carried.

Mr. Cohen was in his element in introducing a strong protest against Militarism:—

> "This Conference deeply deplores the continued growth of the spirit of Militarism, both at home and abroad, and regards the growing expenditure of the European nations on war and preparations for war as unimpeachable evidence of the failure of the Christian Church as a civilising force; it therefore looks to the growth of Freethought principles and humanitarian ideas as the only agencies that promise a release from the moral and financial burden of Militarism."

Speaking in his happiest vein, Mr. Cohen said that among Freethinkers there could be no two opinions on Militarism. Civilisation was skin deep, and a very thin skin at that. Militarism on the Continent meant commercial enterprise, and he felt certain that business interests were at work in the British Empire. Whole peoples do not go to war for the sake of gain, and the promotion of Freethought and friendship between nations was the best safeguard, for Freethought was international and humanitarian.

Mr. Heeht, who seconded, said Militarism was fostered by the Boy Scout movement, and by so-called Imperialism at schools. Religion and Militarism were twin brothers.

The resolution was carried.

The following vice-presidents were re-elected:—Messrs. J. Barry, W. H. Baker, J. G. Bartram, E. Bowman, R. Chapman, Victor Charbonnel, E. A. Charlton, C. Cohen, W. W. Collins, H. Cowell, W. Davey, F. The Conference was a notable one, for it marked another step in the forward movement inaugurated by Mr. Foote about a quarter of a century ago. Great changes have taken place during his able administration, the outstanding features of which are the safeguarding of bequests to Freethought, by which thousands have been saved to the movement, and the ever-increasing number of ladies associated with its propaganda. In the days of Charles Bradlaugh the audiences were almost entirely composed of men, whereas now it is entirely different. Mr. Foote has also broadened the literary appeal, and he has made the Freethinker the first definitively Freethought paper in the world. It circulates throughout all English-speaking countries, and is read by all classes. To his enterprise, too, we owe the earliest of the "sixpenny reprints," so noticeable a feature of modern publishing. Under his leadership the National Secular Society has ever been in the vanguard of progress, sheltering behind it all the weaker heterodox people, who otherwise had been crushed by the weight of orthodoxy. Behind militant Freethought all forms of advanced thought have advanced to some measure of Freedom. As the little Revenge earned an undying name by hurling itself against the great battleships of the Spanish Armada, so the Secularists have displayed extraordinary courage in attacking the heart of the Armada of Superstition. The greater the perils, the greater the victory; and in the ripe years to come recognition must be given to the superb courage which, disregarding any reward, was satisfied with the proud knowledge that their action would diffuse the blessings of Liberty to countless thousands of their countrymen. For in that happy time the stormy note of contention will be changed to the unfaltering trumpet-call of victory.

Design and Evolution.—III.

FROM what has been said it must not be supposed that Natural Selection is the sole cause of organic changes in the structure either of animals or of plants; but only that, by the means of what is called Natural Selection, the variations that occur and are beneficial to the individual are preserved. Nor must it be understood that the term Natural Selection implies that nature is conscious of selecting or choosing one being or set of beings in preference to another. It merely means that the totality of natural phenomena produces certain results and that the term Natural Selection is the most convenient with which to describe one factor by which these results are brought about.

First, as to climate. Nobody will dispute the fact that the climate of various countries has undergone many changes within the past few centuries; nor that with the change of climate the people inhabiting these parts undergo a no less distinct change. With changed conditions many beings would necessarily succumb. A severely cold climate would quickly kill off thousands of human beings before the majority had so adjusted themselves to their changed conditions as to enable them to live without extraordinary effort. Man having been diffused more widely over the face of the earth than any animal, as a consequence becomes subject to greater variability; and having developed to a large extent his intellectual faculties, aided by his social instinct and power of speech, was enabled to make much greater progress than any other organised being. But, taking a barbaric creature, and tracing his advancement on the road to civilisation through its various stages, it will be found that it has taken place solely through the incessant action of the law of nature by which the fittest alone are enabled to survive, while the unfit are unceremoniously and mercilessly eliminated. Suppose there are a thousand persons living in a country who have been only fairly equipped for life's battle, and suppose there should from among them arise a dozen or so in a slight degree an improvement upon them, the chances of life for the latter would be much greater than for the former, and they would rapidly increase in numbers; so that in a short time, from the dozen, there would be hundreds above the common level to augment the severity of the struggle. Among these, the best—that is, those most fitted—would come to the front, and, by a constant repetition of this process, it is easy to recognise the manner in which the character of a people might be changed.

To understand aright man's progress as compared with other beings, the importance of the advantage of his bodily structure must not be underestimated. Man has not always gone erect, but has used his hands in locomotion and in climbing trees; and there can be no question that the first set of beings that went erect had an immense advantage over all others. Then the structure of his hands, when he had learned to walk erect, would be very advantageous in helping him to perform work for which other animals were, by their very formation, entirely unfitted to undertake. The free use of the arms and legs of man would assuredly be conducive to other modifications; and when man had learned to make articulate sounds, he could then easily outdistance all other organised beings.

All this, however, would take an immense period of time to accomplish, and would result only from the slow and everlasting process of Natural Selection. Sexual selection, or the selection of the fittest males to the fittest females, would add considerably to the advance of man; and under social influences even greater advantages would follow. While man would thus improve himself by contact with his fellows, he would also improve many of the lower animals by domesticating them, and many plants by artificially selecting and preserving those that best suited his tastes or possessed some real utility.

How, it will be asked, does the evidence of the gradual evolution of man from lower organic forms affect the argument drawn from Design? In this way. Take the eye. The Darwinian hypothesis presupposes a time when what is now called an eye was a most imperfect organ in all animals; that only those animals that used these organs developed them to any extraordinary extent; and that to-day the eye in man seems to have reached its highest point of development, and refuses to do all the work which the brain requires it to perform.

It may safely be affirmed that, in regard to organised beings, functions precede organs; for it has been discovered that there are some animals in existence that have no organs of vision, and yet, in a sense, it may be said that they perceive, though indistinctly, objects about them. For example, the jelly-fish sees, though it has no eyes. Other animals—such, for instance, as the mole, and some species of rat—have eyes, but, passing their lives entirely in subterranean passages, have lost the power of vision.

Now, if the best eyes are only the result of development, how can it be said that eyes were originally designed by an omnipotent, all-wise, all-good Deity? On the other hand, if it be said that God designed the world and man, and let nature do the rest, it is only saying, in other words, that Deity, in his infinite wisdom, designed imperfect eyes, and allowed them to become more perfect by a slow and painful process—that is, that God is good, but not all-good; that he is wise, but not all-wise; and that, being all-powerful, he did not exert either his wisdom or goodness in the creation of the universe. Rudimentary organs would be extremely difficult to understand on the principle of Design. In the human ear there are several muscles in a rudimentary condition which are absolutely useless. For what purpose was the mammæ of all male quadrupeds designed? They are in a rudimentary condition, and serve no useful purpose. Or of what use are the incisor teeth in ruminants that never cut through the gums? There are in man, also, various muscles which are of no use to him, but which are highly developed in some of the lower animals. A horse or cow, for instance, twitch their skin when annoyed by flies; and though man possesses remnants of the muscles by which this movement is effected (the panniculus carnosus), it is, for the most part, useless to him. Some men, it is true, can contract the muscles of their scalps, move their ears, or perform other extraordinary movements; but in the large majority of human beings these muscles are in an altogether rudimentary condition.

The Design Argument, therefore, is an ingenious attempt to make use of certain facts of nature, such as the adaptations of certain organs to perform certain functions, with a view of proving that they were designed for such a purpose; while the whole of human experience goes to show that only those whose organs were so adapted could possibly have survived; and that those whose organs were ill adapted for the purposes of life's struggle were pressed out in the general scramble for existence. To reason accurately, the theologian should begin to reason at the other end. He should take man in his primitive condition, and try and demonstrate admirable design in a God-made savage. Or, tracing the horse back to the bear, as Professor Huxley has done, he should endeavor to show the infinite wisdom of the arrangement by which a wild beast was transformed, by a slow and painful, though a purely natural process, into a tame, handsome, and useful animal. No; in the face of the facts of evolution, the Design Argument is no longer tenable. It has been slain alike by reason, by science, and common sense, and in a few years will be consigned to that oblivion in which older and more pernicious errors have found a well-deserved and final resting-place.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Is Religious Belief Universal?

"It was in the lap of ignorance, in the season of alarm, in the bosom of calamity, that mankind ever formed his first notions of the Divinity. From hence it is obvious that his ideas on this subject are to be suspected, that his notions are in a great measure false, that they are always afflicting."

"In many places man trembles, at this day, because his progenitors have trembled for thousands of years past. The thought of his gods always awakened in man the most conflicting ideas."—D'HOLBACH, Mirabaud's System of Nature, pp. 249-50.

"I had expressed the belief that the lowest races were without any belief which could be so called. No one would attribute religion to any of the Quadrumana. Hence to the believers in evolution there must have been a time when it gradually came into existence.

"The weight of the evidence which I have brought forward in the Origin of Civilisation and in Prehistoric Times seems to me to be overwhelming. Sailors, traders, philosophers, Roman Catholic priests, and Protestant missionaries, in ancient and in modern times, in every part of the globe, have concurred in stating that there are races of men altogether devoid of religion. The case is the stronger because in several instances the fact has greatly surprised those who record it, and has been entirely in opposition to all their preconceived views."—LORD AVEBURY (Sir John Lubbock), Marriage, Totemism, and Religion (1911), pp. 138-140.

EVER since the publication, nearly fifty years ago, by Sir John Lubbock, of his Prehistoric Times (published in 1865) and his Origin of Civilisation (1870), the question as to whether there are tribes existing without religious ideas has been hotly contested. Sir John Lubbock cited the testimony of many travellers, missionaries, priests, and others, to the fact that there were such people. Letourneau, the French sociologist, took the same view. He says:—

"In spite of the vulgar prejudice, it is certain that belief in imaginary beings worthy of the name of 'gods' is far from universal. There are two principal causes which keep certain tribes or races outside or above these errors: either a brain so ill-developed that it is incapable of any speculation, or else our own clear practical sense, or an innate common sense too strongly born."*

Dr. Paul Topinard, the anthropologist, held the same opinion, for, after remarking that "many, even among the most civilised, have neither this belief nor this impulse," he adds:—

"There are nations and tribes without religion and without any mode of worship, and who believe only in wizards or fetish. It is true they make every form of superstition to subserve their religiousness. But some African or Melanesian tribes have not even superstitions."†

Broca, another great anthropologist, also declared: "I cannot entertain the slightest doubt in my mind that there are among the lower races people without worship, without dogmas, without metaphysical conceptions, without general creeds, and consequently without religion."‡

The great authority of Herbert Spencer may be cited on the same side. He observes:—

"From various parts of the world, witnesses of different nations and divergent beliefs bring evidence that there exist men who are either wholly without ideas of supernatural beings, or whose ideas of them are extremely vague."‡

Carl Vogt, replying to Quatrefages, who held that man was differentiated from the animal world by his religious faculty, observes:—"I know of no sufficient reason for endowing the human race with religiousness as an exclusive quality."§

Professor Frazer also sides with Lubbock, as we shall presently see. On the other hand, Professors Tylor and Waitz, the great German anthropologist, hold that no race has yet been discovered without religious ideas. M. Roskoff, of Vienna, has devoted a large part of his work, on the religious ideas of primitive people, to a criticism of Lubbock's view of the matter. Mr. Andrew Lang, as we have seen in our previous articles, attempted to prove that the lowest savages held ideas of God higher than those of most of the lower classes of the most civilised nations—a view effusively welcomed by theologians and apologists of religion, but not countenanced by any scientist of repute. It is a view that accords well with Mr. Lang's dalliance with Spiritualism and the supernatural, and is very different to the views of Tylor and Waitz, who are evolutionists, and who have shown how religion has arisen by a natural process of evolution from the myths and dreams of the primitive savage; and who, although they hold that there is no race at present existing without religious ideas, yet hold that there must have been a time in the past when man was devoid of them.

"But," it will be asked, "how is it that two such great authorities as Tylor and Waitz are in opposition to such equally great authorities as Frazer, Lubbock, and Spencer?"

The trouble arises in this way. Both parties are agreed that the beliefs of the lowest races of mankind consist of witchcraft, magic, luck, etc., without any belief in a Creator or Supreme Moral Being. But Lubbock, Frazer, and Spencer refuse the name of religion to these practices, while Tylor and Waitz include them all under the name of religion. It is simply a matter of definition; and although religious apologists side with and flaunt the testimony of Tylor and Waitz as to the universality of religious belief, a further examination will show that this testimony is of a very dubious character; for they do not make any distinction between religion and superstition.

For, as the biologist believes that the organic evolved from the inorganic, and as the plant world merges imperceptibly into the animal world, so that there is no dividing line separating the animal from the vegetable kingdom—some low species possessing at different times the essential characteristics of both species—so the evolutionist cannot recognise any dividing line between superstition and religion. To him the belief in a Creator and Heavenly Father is just as much a superstition as the belief in witchcraft and magic. It is almost needless to say that neither Tylor nor Waitz put the case so strongly as we have done—plain-spokenness on matters of religion is not encouraged by the society among which we live—but a quotation from Professor Theodor Waitz' work will prove our statement of the case beyond refutation. Professor Waitz says:—

> "It has been asserted that there are people among whom there is not a vestige of religion; and, on the other hand, that all known peoples have their gods. A strict investigation has established that the first assertion is false, and the second not true. All depends on what is meant by religion and religious worship, otherwise the contest is merely a play upon words. Though it may be admitted, as indeed it is the truth, that there are some savages among whom hitherto religious ideas —taken in a restricted sense, a belief in divine beings —have not been found, it must be noticed that they are generally those peoples of whom our knowledge is very scanty, and that on becoming better acquainted with them, religious sentiments have been detected, as is sufficiently indicated by certain superstitious ceremonies."*

Thus, according to Professor Waitz, if these savages are devoid of all belief in "divine beings," but have "certain superstitious ceremonies," it is wrong to say that they have no religion. He gives a few cases in point. For instance, he says it has been asserted that the Aru Islanders neither believed in God nor a future life, "yet they possess carved images of men and beasts, who protect their habitations from evil spirits." Of the Dajaks of North-east Borneo, who have neither priests, nor temples, nor images, "still they have omens and augurs." And again, "Neither images nor any religious worship have been met with in New Caledonia; still, the natives have their tabus, magic, and magicians." Anderson could find nothing approaching religious worship among the Ovambos, but they "have some idea, though a very crude one, of an invisible power" (p. 278).

So that we see that if savages only possess carved images, or believe in "omens and augurs," or "tabus, magic, and magicians," or a crude idea "of an invisible power," they have religion. It is apparent from this that he regards superstition and religion as equivalent terms.

Professor Waitz further observes:—

> "It is certain that all people do not believe in a God who directs everything in the world; but if by religious belief be understood the conviction of the existence of invisible mysterious powers which, in various modes, influence the phenomena of nature, so that man and his fate is dependent on their favor, we may safely assert, that every people possesses a kind of religion. No doubt, in peoples standing in the lowest scale of civilisation, this religion is merely a belief in spectres, still the religious element is there."†

And as he further points out, moral ideas are not allied with these low religious conceptions, "and flow from an essentially different source than religion."

Sir John Lubbock declined to accept this definition of religion, and, replying to his critics in the last book he wrote, he says:—

> "The question as to the general existence of religion among men is, indeed, to some extent a matter of definition. If the mere sensation of fear, and the recognition that there are probably other beings more powerful than himself, are sufficient alone to constitute a religion, then we must, I think, admit that religion is general to to the human race. But when a child dreads the darkness, and shrinks from a lightless room, we never regard that as an evidence of religion. Moreover, if this definition be adopted, we can no longer regard religion as peculiar to man. We must admit that the feeling of a horse towards its master is of the same character; and the baying of a dog to the moon is as much an act of worship as some ceremonies which have been so described by travellers."‡

He also observes that much of the evidence of his critics merely proves the existence of a belief in magic, and he claims to have proved that "magic is not only not religion, but the very opposite of religion," a suggestion since adopted "by such high authorities as Sir Alfred Lyall, Mr. Jevons, and Dr. Frazer. In any case, evidence of belief in witchcraft is no answer to me." He illustrates this point well, as follows:—

> "The lives of Australian savages, for instance, are made up to an extraordinary extent of tedious and almost interminable ceremonies, involving severe, gruesome, and in some cases terrible suffering, but in no way of a religious character. They contain no prayers or confessions, no offerings or sacrifices, no appeal for help or forgiveness to any superior power. They are gone through as immemorial customs, and when any meaning is attached to them it is as a form of magic, an attempt to control nature and secure material advantages—mainly rain or food" (pp. 142-3).

If these are religious customs, then the actions of a cabman in spitting on his fare before pocketing it, or the nailing of a horseshoe on the barn-door, must also be pronounced religious.

"You can have too much of life," said Mr. John Barker, a veteran of ninety-two years of age, speaking to a newspaper reporter. What pessimists those Old Testament heroes Adam, Methuselah, and Noah, who counted their age by centuries, must have been. Another sacred hero, Melchizedeck, had neither beginning nor ending of days. Perhaps he was the original of the Wandering Jew.

The fossilised remains of an extinct sea monster has been found at Saltersford, near Grantham. This animal had a long neck and lizard-like head, and when alive was about twenty feet long. Some clerical humorist is sure to claim that the "whale" that swallowed "Jonah" has been discovered. Poor old Jo!

According to a paragraph quoted in a daily paper, the War Cry, the organ of the "blood and fire" brand of the Christian superstition, has a circulation of about 600,000 copies, including twenty-four foreign editions. Won't the pious editors of the opposition religious papers be filled with hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness?

The popular idea that the naval distress call, "S. O. S.," is a telegraphic abbreviation for "Save Our Souls," has no foundation in fact. The letters were simply adopted for telegraphic convenience. Maybe, the idea originated with some lugubrious longshoreman who enlivens the dullness of the Christian Sunday with a harmonium and three lady friends at street corners.

A woman aged 102 died at Bolton Workhouse recently, and the journalists are writing paragraphs concerning the event. The old Bible patriarchs were trundling hoops at that age.

A volume has been published with the title of The English Soul. It should prove an interesting psychological discovery. Was it caught with a butterfly net or a small-tooth comb?

"The Demand for Soft Jobs" is the alluring title of an article in the Daily Mail. Curiously, it does not mention such positions as those of archbishops and bishops. Maybe there are no vacancies.

Obituary.

I regret a misunderstanding has delayed this notification that a veteran Freethought warrior, Mr. R. Rosetti, died on Tuesday, May 26, after a short illness. More than forty years of his life were spent in an uncompromising struggle against supernaturalism and priestcraft. He often recalled his visits to, and chats with, the late Charles Bradlaugh, and the early days of active service when meek and lowly Christians more than once smashed his platform. He was the chief mover in forming the Bethnal Green Branch of the N. S. S., and was its first president. A large number of friends attended the burial in Woodgrange Park Cemetery, where Mr. J. T. Lloyd read a beautiful address.—R. H. ROSETTI.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—Miss E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

Faith Healing.

IN 1910 a conference of clergymen and medical men was held to consider the question of "Faith" healing. That conference appointed a committe of twenty-one persons — eleven doctors and ten clergymen — to collect evidence and report. After about three years labor the committee has just issued its report, and it is quite what one might have expected. The outsider will find himself very little "forrader," and the points on which the committee agree are practically those on which, among people of intelligence—whether they were Freethinkers or Pietists—there was little or no dispute. The mountain has labored and brought forth a mouse. The committee proposes to continue its sittings, and, in due course, may be expected to issue another report, which we hope will be more definite than the present one.

By a great many the report has been taken—as one might have expected—as an endorsement of "Spiritual Healing." Writing in the Evening News, the Rev. Percy Dearmer says "It is of great importance that the committee have blessed spiritual healing." This, in a sense, may be true, but it is not borne out by the evidence offered. The committee was essentially a pious one, and it naturally couched its conclusions in pietistic terminology. Thus, in its "Conclusions," the report says that the committee:

> "Would say at the outset that they can conceive no limitation to the exercise of the power of God.....in inspiring courage and hope to resist morbid conditions of the body. They fully recognise that the operation of the Divine Power can be limited only by the Divine Will, and desire to express their belief in the efficacy of prayer."

Clearly that is not the language of a committee of men collecting, examining, and sifting evidence in a scientific spirit. It is an expression of religious belief that would have been suitable to any religious meeting. We do not want to know, and do not care, whether the committee believes in the power of prayer, or whether they can conceive limits to the "Divine Power"—although one might say that the "Divine Power" was evidently not equal to the task of making the committee do its business in a sensible and scientific manner.

Although two of the questions submitted to witnesses were "What do you understand by 'Spiritual' healing?" and "Do you make any distinction between 'Spiritual' healing and 'Mental' healing?" the committee made no very serious attempt to discriminate between the two. There is a remark to the effect that "the physical results of what is called 'Faith' or 'Spiritual' healing do not prove, on investigation, to be different from those of 'Mental' healing, or healing by 'Suggestion'"; but the committee do not appear to have grasped the significance of the admission. The witnesses were not very helpful in this direction. The Rev. F. Boyd said he would "define 'Spiritual' healing as the healing of the body by spiritual means"—a perfectly circuitous answer. Rev. W. F. Cobb said that he "considered religious faith to be nine-tenths of the battle." He also added that he was connected with several "prayer groups" in which persons were prayed for without their knowledge, but he could furnish no proofs of any case of cure. Of course not. Prayer is only helpful when the person prayed for is aware of it, and believes in its efficacy. And that is suggestion pure and simple.

Rev. Percy Dearmer, in his Evening News article, writes jubilantly that "At last we have a declaration of eminent scientific medical men which acknowledges the new light that has burst into the realms of scientific Materialism." This is pure verbiage, and Mr. Dearmer would do well to make himself acquainted with what it is that "Scientific Materialists" believe, and what is the attitude of medical men on the question. Personally, I do not know of a medical man who has ever denied the beneficial effects of a cheerful mind, or of the desire to get better. What is meant by the doctor's invariable advice to keep a patient cheerful? Or by his keeping saddening aspects of the case from the patient? No one—least of all a medical man—has ever denied that by giving any sort of a mental stimulus, a patient's recovery is helped. And this is all that the evidence collected really amounts to. Dr. Milne Bramwell, author of a work on Hypnotism and Healing by Suggestion, quite rightly said there was much loose talk, and more precise definitions were required. He said he could not differentiate between "spiritual healing and suggestion," and was of opinion that:—

> "Mental healing might exclude the religious element.....He himself did not introduce any religious element into his treatment by suggestion. He was unaware of any power of suggestion which might be possessed by a clergyman which could not also be possessed by a medical man. He deemed the treatment by a clergyman as unnecessary."

These strike one as the most sensible comments in the whole of the report. The subject is really not a religious one at all, although religious quacks have tried to make it their own. It is a question of psychology. The problem is really one of how to set up a nervous stimulus that will react favorably on the condition of the patient. This may be done through prayer—if the patient believes in prayer; it may be done equally well by wearing the salted hair of a black cat; or it may be done by other means. But religion has really nothing to do with it, except so far as it operates as a belief. As a matter of fact, I know several medical men who rely very much on the power of suggestion in dealing with certain cases, and who are avowed Atheists. The essential thing is a stimulus in the right direction, and the possibility of this is one of the commonest of everyday experiences. Any purely functional derangement may be corrected in this way. This is a truth that Materialists have never failed to recognise; and all the talk about the irruption of new light into Materialism is sheer nonsense. The light has been there all along; the only new feature is the attempt of a number of religious cranks to create a science of "Spiritual" healing in the interests of a set of unscientific theologians.

In spite of its faith in the power of God and of prayer, the committee was "forced" to the conclusion that "Spiritual" healing is only effective in functional disorders. "No satisfactorily certified case was adduced of any organic disease, competently diagnosed as such, which had been cured by these means alone." The alleged exceptions are so disputable that they cannot be taken into account." Mr. McComb, founder of the American "Emmanuel Movement," confessed that he had found no evidence "that a truly organic disease can be cured by mental influence alone." Quite a number of cases were offered to the committee, including cirrhosis of liver, pneumonia, blindness, hip disease, Raymond's disease, etc. On these the committee say that—

> "No medical evidence was obtainable. The only confirmation available as to the nature of the disease and the result of the treatment was offered by the 'Healers' or their friends.....But in no instance was medical evidence forthcoming to confirm any cure by 'Spiritual' or mental healing of such disease. For example, in the case of cancer, Raymond's disease, and disseminated sclerosis.....it did not appear that the course of the actual disease was in any way retarded."

In the light of the above, one may judge the value of the Rev. Dearmer's statement that "the committee have blessed spiritual healing."

Mr. Dearmer says there is always "a great danger lest the faith-healer will give a wrong diagnosis, through lack of medical training," and the Rev. W. F. Cobb said "a wise person praying for a sick person would consult a doctor to know what to pray for." Both the warning and the advice strike one as curious. Correct diagnosis is everything in medical practice, because the doctor is treating a definite complaint with definite remedies. But what is the need of diagnosis to a "Spiritual" healer? All diseases are on the same level, and subject to the same remedy. It is not diagnosis but faith that is important. And why find out what the disease is before praying to God to cure it? Would not a general request to the Deity to cure a certain person be enough? Of course, the name and address might be included in the petition; but that is all that seems necessary. When we call in a doctor, we do not tell him what is the matter—we simply ask him to call at such an address and set to work. Why is not that enough? Or, if it is necessary to tell God what he has to cure, then, it seems to me, we ought to go further. We should include in our prayers the latest discoveries concerning the nature of the disease, and include the report of the doctor whose opinion has been invited. If we must instruct God, let us do it thoroughly.

The committee have added nothing whatever to what intelligent people already knew about the subject—and intelligent people never expected they would. "Spiritual" healers write and talk as though the easement or cure of functional complaints by mental action was a startlingly new discovery with profound religious implications. As a matter of fact, for generations text-books have never failed to recognise it. What of hysteria?—which, contrary to popular opinion, is about as common with men as with women. Hysterical patients are constantly professing complaints and exhibiting their symptoms—so far as they know them. And, in the main, the treatment here is mental or suggestive. Everyone knows, also, the beneficial effects of a cheerful disposition, of cultivating habits of mental serenity, just as all doctors are aware that for a patient to have faith in his medical adviser is half the battle. There is nothing new in all this; there is nothing religious. It is a question of psychology.

Naturally, as Dean Inge sarcastically said, the "priests are overjoyed at the unexpected boom in their earliest line of business." The situation has in it just enough truth to weigh with those who crave for a religious teaching that shall not be in obvious and avowed conflict with science, and enough falsehood to allow for any amount of imposture and quackery. It is the kind of situation that delights the soul of a priesthood, and they may be expected to make the most of it. Hopes and fears concerning a future life are not now very powerful, but hopes and fears concerning our own health and the health of those near to us are still active, and are likely to remain so. And where, as in the case of disease, there is so much that is obscure, religion sees its opportunity, and will not let it pass unutilised. The committee profess to have great faith in the power of God, and I must confess to a lively, if sorrowful, faith in the credulity of man. And where the one is, the other is certain to flourish.

C. COHEN.

Reason versus Authority.

ANOTHER notable work on apologetics has just appeared from the pen of the Rev. George Freeman, Chaplain of the prison at Shepton Mallet. It is entitled Authority (published by Messrs. H. R. Allenson, Ltd., at the price of 2s. 6d. net), and deals with the subject from five points of view, namely, Individualism, the Church, the Scriptures, Tradition, and Pragmatism. It is an exceedingly able book, well-written, fair to opponents, and characterised by obvious sincerity. There are several points on which we are gladly in full agreement with the author. In the last analysis authority in religion naturally signifies the voice of God. The Pope is believed to be infallible simply because he is regarded as the mouthpiece of the Deity. The Bible Leaguers point to the Bible as the only perfect rule of faith and practice merely because they declare it to be the Word of the Lord. On these points there is no room for the slightest divergence of opinion. By Tradition is meant the body of Christian doctrine, handed down from one generation of faithful believers to another, and looked upon by the Church as belonging to the inerrant deposit of faith, even though it may not be found in the Bible; and in tradition, as thus understood, many claim to recognise the unmistakable voice of God. According to Pragmatism, religious ideas are true and authoritative only when they can be "assimilated, validated, corroborated, and verified" in practice. It is to be borne in mind, however, that the late William James, the chief exponent of this system, confessed, in a letter to a friend (quoted in the Hibbert Journal for October, 1911, pp. 233-4), that he had "no living sense of commerce with God," and that he had grown completely out of Christianity. He did admit that deep down in his nature there was "a mystical germ," because of which he could withstand "all purely Atheistical criticism." Then, in the same letter, he added: "Dogmatic Atheism or Naturalism is a consistent position. Without any mystical germ at all in us, I believe that is where we would probably all be to-day." Thus, we see that for James, at any rate, Pragmatism was not one of the sources of Christian authority.

For Mr. Freeman, Tradition and Pragmatism possess very little value. Of the former he says that, "in some respects, it may be nothing more than gossip that has outlived its time," or "shaky history," while he charges the latter with leading to Materialism. "Pragmatism," he says (p. 164) "is virtuous, but yet it is entirely unredemptive. Perhaps some may ask, 'Then is morality antagonistic to Christianity?' There need be no questioning on this point. Morality is included in Christianity." Then, on the same page, he proceeds thus:—

> "Christianity embraces morality. But morality is not equivalent to Christianity, any more than the part is equal to the whole. Our Lord's teaching upon the distinction between the two is recorded for us in the pages of the Gospel narrative. The young ruler who came to Christ was a moralist; he had kept all the commandments of the law from his youth up, and was an admirable specimen of a moral man."

We endorse the statement that "morality is not equivalent to Christianity," but maintain that Christianity is conspicuous in the Four Gospels merely by its absence. What we find there, as Professor Bacon so aptly observes, is the religion of Jesus, and not the religion about Jesus. Certainly the young ruler was found fault with, not because he was "an admirable specimen of a moral man," and nothing more, but because he was not. It was his morality, not his piety, that was defective. What he lacked was the real sense of human brotherhood, the genuine moral touch. There is nothing higher and nobler than morality, but it must involve a deep sense of the solidarity of all mankind. To say that a man cannot be truly moral unless he is something more and better is to go in the teeth of well-established facts. Let us examine the narrative concerning the rich young ruler for a moment. The young man's question was significant: "Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life?" Now mark the Master's answer:—

> "If thou wouldest enter into life, keep the commandments. He saith unto him, Which? And Jesus said, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Honor thy father and thy mother; and, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. The young man saith unto him, All these things have I observed: what lack I yet? Jesus said unto him, If thou wouldest be perfect, go, sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven" (Matt. xix. 16-21).

Here is eternal life freely offered in return for the discharge of certain purely social duties. The name of God is not mentioned, nor any duty towards him. For being simply a good neighbor, cheerfully sharing his good things with those around him, the young man is promised treasure in heaven. If Mr. Freeman will look again at the narrative, we are convinced that he will pronounce this exegesis perfectly correct. On further examination he will also find that the Pharisees were rebuked, not for being merely "the sternest of moralists," but for not being such. Let him carefully read and consider the words attributed to the Gospel Jesus:—

> "The scribes and the Pharisees sit on Moses' seat: all things therefore whatsoever they bid you, these do and observe: but do not ye after their works; for they say and do not. Yea, they bind heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with their finger" (Matt. xxiii. 2-5).

Not once did the Gospel Jesus draw a line of demarcation between religion and morality. All he did was to urge his hearers to perform their duties to their neighbor in imitation of their Father in heaven.

Now, the only authority or sanction of the morality taught by Confucius and the Buddha, as well as by later moral leaders, lies in human nature itself, or in the requirements of social life. No voice of God is needed to assure us that murder, adultery, theft, false witness, disrespect to parents, and unneighborliness are anti-social evils, to be severely avoided by all members of society. When Mr. Freeman says that "the only man who can work with and for the people, to the people's lasting good, is the man who is inspired by the Christian message, the man who finds his driving force in the Christian redemption" (p. 161), he only betrays gross ignorance of the moral elevation of the leading nations of the Pagan East. Has he never read Chester Holcombe's Real Chinese Question, Eugene Simon's China: Its Social, Political, and Religious Life, Robertson Scott's People of China, Professor H. A. Giles' Chinese Sketches, Religion of Ancient China, or Fielding Hall's Soul of a People, and A People at School? These are only a few of scores of works written by men specially qualified by long residence among, and intimate first-hand knowledge of, the people concerned to speak with absolute authority about them, all of which give the lie direct to the assertion so confidently made by our author. Surely nothing more need be said on the subject.

We admit that Christianity, as conceived by the orthodox Church, is to be radically distinguished from morality, and treats of a world and its interests whereof the reason is totally ignorant. God, Christ, Virgin Birth, Resurrection, Redemption, Eternal Life, all these are terms utterly unintelligible to the intellect, and for which there is no authority save the word of mere men. It is a human voice that ever utters itself, and when it calls transcendental fancies spiritual realities, the only authority it can fall back upon is that of its own ignorance, and consequent credulity. Our author tells us that Rationalists are guilty of "refusing to recognise a power superior to the human reason," but he ignores the fact that their refusal is based upon a complete lack of evidence. Mr. Freeman is so generous as to allow that both Roman Catholics and Nonconformists have authority for their distinctive positions, but at the same time claims that in the Church of England "alone can be found complete, comprehensive, and inerrant authority." Take the following extract:—

> "The average Nonconformist thinks his Bible or his minister is invested with all the authority he needs; and so they both are for certain things. The Roman Catholic belongs to a Church which says to him, 'I am Authority'; and so it is indeed for certain things. But without ostentation or pretension, the Anglican is the only one who hears, accepts, and obeys the Voice of God as expressed in its completeness and finality" (pp. 15, 16).

Far be it from us to impugn the sincerity of the writer of that extract; but we must candidly confess that we have never before come across such an absolutely absurd claim. It goes infinitely beyond any assertion made by even Bishop Gore or his Lordship of London. What ideally perfect and miserable people Anglicans must be if they are the "only ones who hear, accept, and obey the Voice of God, as expressed in its completeness and finality." As a matter of fact, they are neither perfect nor miserable, neither better nor worse than other Christians, as all Christians are neither better nor happier than non-Christians. Perhaps, on the whole, the best and happiest people on the planet are the Burmese, who are tormented by neither God nor the Devil, but who thoroughly enjoy communion with one another as brothers and sisters in the same human family. To the dictates of reason, warmed by the heart, alone they bow, and by the rule of reason alone they live, Nature being their all in all.

J. T. LLOYD.

The Fauna and Flora of the British Isles.

PLANT and animal life in our islands presents many interesting problems to the student of science. At the first glance, many of the apparently anomalous phenomena which our flora and fauna display make them as enigmatical as the famous fly in amber. We wonder how the dickens they got there. But the patient industry of a couple of generations of careful and thoughtful inquirers has thrown a flood of light on these intensely interesting problems.

The study of Geographical Distribution is of recent and rapid development. When once it was realised that living forms were not specially created for the habitat in which they flourish, but were the outcome of a natural process of evolution, it became a matter of surpassing importance to inquire into the reasons of past and present organic distribution. Men asked themselves why tapirs were restricted to the Malayan region and South America, why camels were confined to Asiatic deserts and the Andes, and why marsupials were special to the Australian area and America. Why should the birds and mammals of North America show closer kinship with those of Europe than those of South America?

Mountains and rivers present serious obstacles to the migrations of plants and animals. Climate is also an important barrier to such wanderings; but the greatest obstacle of all is to be found in a wide expanse of water. It is perfectly true that, since the European peoples invaded America, the entire northern continent has been overrun by our native weeds, and that, wherever the European sailor has travelled, the European black and brown rats have been his companions, and have frequently settled in the new lands his ship has visited. But in the days with which we are about to deal no ships existed, and few, if any, men who were capable of crossing anything larger than a lake or stream.

One of the pioneers in the study of organic distribution was the celebrated Edward Forbes, who wrote an essay on the living fauna of the British Isles, in which he argued that the majority of our plants and animals had spread from the Continent before our islands were severed from the land-mass of Europe by the sea. Forbes contended that the vegetation of Britain was made up of five distinctly marked floras, "four of which are restricted to definite provinces, whilst the fifth, besides exclusively claiming a great part of the area, tends to overspread and commingle with the others." These facts had not escaped the notice of at least one earlier observer, but Forbes appears to have been the first naturalist to point out that the animal groups to some extent correspond with those of the plants in each area. For example, in what he termed the Germanic group, Forbes included the polecat, the English hare, the mole, and the dormouse, which are all restricted to Southern Britain, and become rarer as we travel towards the north.

As a result of his inquiries, Forbes reached the conclusion that the flora and fauna of our islands established themselves at different periods, and that their entrance was from a continuous land surface, prior to, during, and after the Glacial Epoch. He also espoused the view that the Germanic organisms are of post-Glacial date, but that the organisms of Scandinavian origin arrived during Glacial times; whereas the groups he termed Kentish and Devon were with us before the Ice King began his gloomy reign. And he was likewise of opinion that, as the Miocene Period neared its close, the Lusitanian group wandered to the south-west of Ireland from Northern Spain, along a bridge of land which at that time connected the two countries.

For several years the matter remained where Forbes had left it, but his example ultimately stimulated various other observers along the same fruitful path. To Dr. Buchanan White, Dr. A. R. Wallace, Professor James Geikie, to mention three only out of a crowd of brilliant investigators, we are indebted for the wealth of knowledge now possessed by science.

More recently the problems under review have been very ably considered by Dr. R. F. Scharff, in his fascinating work on European Animals, and in this volume we possess the findings of one of Forbes' most faithful and discriminating disciples. As Scharff points out, in Lough Neagh, the largest sheet of fresh water in these isles, there dwells a fish called the pollan, which is also to be found in other Irish lakes and in the upper reaches of the River Shannon. Now, in the English Lake District two closely allied fish are met with, the vendace and gwyniad.

> "Both species also inhabit the south-west of Scotland, while the gwyniad has also been taken in a small mountain lake in Wales. All the British lakes in which these fish of the genus Coregonus occur communicate with the Irish Sea, and it is probable that the Irish lakes alluded to did so in former times."

Under the present distribution of land and water, the habitat of these fishes fails to find any reasonable explanation. But the land surface of North-Western Europe has only to be raised a few hundred feet to cause the larger part of the Irish Sea to rise above sea level, leaving a deep channel in its centre into which the leading rivers of North-Western England and Eastern Ireland would empty themselves, thus creating a great lake. Such conditions would furnish all that is necessary to explain the present distribution of the pollan and its kinsmen. There is nothing unreasonable in the theory that if the common ancestor of the three species resided in this prehistoric lake, and that as the sea invaded the land the fish would naturally wander along the rivers and find a home in their adjoining lakes, and as time rolled on would become transformed into the three nearly related species as we now know them.

It has long been a matter for remark that, near as Ireland is to Britain, many of our most characteristic organisms are unknown in Erin. The mole, whose mounds are so familiar in English pastures, is not found in Ireland. Twenty-one British species of animals are there unrepresented. Ireland has no voles, no blind worms, no snakes, and stranger still, various of our fishes and songsters are absent. Many of our commonest insects and molluscs are likewise not present there. "A naturalist who visits Ireland for the first time," writes Dr. Scharff,

> "and extends his travels beyond the east coast into the south-western or western parts, cannot help being astonished at the assemblage there of a set of plants some of which are cultivated in England as garden species, and which there grow wild. And if he investigates the lower animals, he will meet with many strange forms which he never expected to find across the Irish Channel."

Patriotic Irishmen are justified in denying the oft-repeated assertion that the fauna and flora of Erin form but a feeble copy of the wealth of life in the larger island of Britain proper. Although numerous English species are not indigenous to Ireland, that country contains numerous northern and southern organisms which our own land cannot claim. The evergreen strawberry, which abounds in southern Europe, finds its only wild resting-place in Cork and Kerry throughout the entire British Islands. London pride (Saxifraga umbrosa) flourishes in a state of untended nature in Ireland and the Iberian Peninsula alone. There are two kinds of heather—the Mediterranean heath and St. Dabeoc's heath—which grow luxuriantly in Connemara, and these must be elsewhere sought for in Spain and Southern France.

In addition to these, other Irish plants have a similar geographical range, and there are animals whose distribution is of a like character. Among the lichens of Cork and Kerry lives a spotted slug nowhere else to be found in Britain, but it reappears in Spain and Portugal in company with other related species. A millipede occurs in Ireland which is unknown with us, but it dwells in Southern Europe and in the Azores. A County Waterford woodlouse has no relatives nearer than those of Southern Europe, and the same seems to be true of a large spider of the South of Ireland. A large beetle common on the east coast of Erin, but so far undiscovered in Britain, is found in the Auvergne and also in the Pyrenees. Again, a dragon-fly not known in England and Scotland is constantly encountered in Southern France and throughout the Iberian Peninsula.

These are, however, but a few of many instances of a similar character which all point to a period when Ireland and Western Europe were joined together. All these members of the Lusitanian group found in Ireland appear to be of Southern origin, and date from a time when the climate was more genial than at present. As we have seen, their distribution is discontinuous; the land bridge which enabled them to reach Ireland has long since disappeared beneath the waves. And it is also to be observed that where these ancient organisms survive in Ireland, they are favored by a very open climate and a comparative freedom from the keener struggle for existence.

There is another series of organisms which presents distinct evidences of discontinuous distribution, but, unlike those previously dealt with, these have reached Ireland from more boreal lands. These northern migrants appear to have settled in Ireland at two separate periods. Certain sponges, elsewhere unknown save on the eastern shores of North America, dwell in some of the coast lakes of Western Ireland. These, and other survivals from the past are the lingering representatives of the early period when Ireland formed part of a continent which stretched over the Northern Atlantic and linked up boreal Europe with Northern America. The distribution of the European fresh-water pearl mussel strengthens the evidence. This mussel is absent from Eastern Europe and Western Asia, but it is widely dispersed through Western Europe from Scandinavia to Spain. Its European habitat is very striking in the light of its circumscribed area, and it survives as a relic from a long past. Several species of the New World flora are in Ireland indigenous. Two of these, as Dr. Scharff emphasises, are of outstanding interest, as they confirm the theory of the origin of the fresh-water organisms just mentioned. One of these plants is a water weed—the slender naiad — which lives in three Irish lakes near the west coast. It also grows in Perthshire and on the Scottish Isle of Skye. The other is the pipe wort, a bog-loving plant, and this like most of the other species mentioned is more or less restricted to the West coast of Ireland. It is, however, met with in the Isles of Coll and Skye. Again, a pretty orchid, the "Irish lady's tresses" has been plucked on the Western coast as well as in the Ulster counties of Londonderry and Armagh.

The great auk, a recently extinct bird, may be added to the foregoing examples. Although one might suppose that the distribution of bird-life has little bearing on the subject under discussion, Wallace, a great authority on the question, was of opinion that the distribution of mammals (which is of supreme importance in arranging zoogeographical areas) corresponds to that of birds to a quite startling extent. Now the powers of flight possessed by the auk family are very meagre, and its area is limited. The great auk was living in Ireland and Scotland less than a century ago. Its remains have been unearthed in the refuse heaps of our barbarian ancestors in Durham, Ireland, Scotland, and Denmark, and doubtless it formed part of their food. Great flocks of these birds congregated in Iceland, Greenland, in Maine, and Massachusetts, and on Funk Island near the Newfoundland coast, thus forming a further link between the fauna of North America and north-western Europe. Another series of organisms, seemingly of Arctic origin, and of later date than the foregoing American forms remains for notice. The Irish hare (Lepus timidus) is merely a variety of the Arctic hare and is the only species found in Ireland. The English hare is known in Scotland mainly in the lowlands, while the Arctic hare prefers the hilly districts. The distribution of this northern rodent, which is very extensive, ranging as it does through the Caucasus, the Pyrenees, the Alps, and even in the mountains of Japan, is instructive. From the fact that its fossils are unknown beyond the southern boundaries of its present habitat, it is to be inferred that its primeval home was within the Arctic area. It appears highly probable that during the Glacial Period the Arctic hare wandered to more genial southern climes, and that as the ice retreated again to the north the animal was left in its present upland solitudes. The English hare, on the other hand, came from the south, and its absence from Ireland is explained by the circumstance that the green island was severed from the European continent before its advent in Britain. Herein seems to be the solution of the problem set up by the presence of the Arctic hare in Ireland, both in mountain and plain. It was not incommoded by the appearance of the southern rodent, and was consequently left in sole possession of the feeding grounds upon which the newcomer, had it ever arrived, would have been bound to encroach.

There are various plants and insects of contemporary Ireland which are either restricted to that country or are elsewhere very rare in our wave-girt isles. And the secrets yielded by the Irish caves also support the views already advanced. The tools and implements of prehistoric savages are amongst these relics. But what is more germane to the present argument is the evidence they afford that thousands of years ago, the fauna of Ireland was composed of animals of a character which indicates their separate northern and southern origin. The remains of the reindeer, arctic fox, and lemming are intermingled with those of the African wild cat, hyæna, brown bear, wild boar, and Irish elk. Surviving organisms, such as the red deer, badger, common fox, and others have also been discovered among the remains of animals long since extinct in Ireland.

To sum up this first part of the case. There are now living in Ireland numerous very ancient forms of plants and animals that are almost entirely confined to the west and south-west of the island. These came into the country along a land bridge from south-western Europe. At about the same period there occurred a migration of organisms from the north. Ireland was subsequently isolated from the near mainland masses, and therein lies the solution of the problems presented by a flora and fauna which were previously so puzzling to the student of geographical distribution.

Is Religious Belief Universal?—II.

"Whether he [primitive man] were the ferocious wild beast described by some, or a puny, feeble, naked being, chipping his first weapons among the rolled flints of a river-bed, keeping up with difficulty his famished life from day to day, and finding a precarious shelter from incessant dangers in the hollows of the rocks, it is in any case certain that he made originally but a poor figure on the surface of the globe. How has he progressed from primitive cannibalism to his present moral and social culture? from the bestial sexual act to chivalrous love? from coarse fetishism to religious metaphysics or mysticism? from the rude drawings of the Neolithic age to the refinements of the æsthetic sentiment? from a narrow and limited curiosity to a disinterested enthusiasm for science?.....The principal, essential, fundamental cause is intellectual development."—RIBOT, The Psychology of the Emotions, p. 189.

"Religion and religious ideas are among the most remarkable products of the human spirit. With all their reason-defying assertions and astounding incongruities, they seem at first sight inexplicable. Time out of mind, therefore, men have found it difficult to conceive them as having arisen otherwise than through a supernatural or divine revelation, which, it would follow, must originally have been imparted to all men alike. But gradually, as people became acquainted with the more or less rudimentary religions of the various races, which often differ greatly on the most essential matters, they began to doubt the accuracy of this assumption, and came more and more to consider whether religious ideas must not be reckoned as a natural product of the human mind itself, under the influence of its surroundings."—FRIDTJOF NANSEN, Eskimo Life (1894), p. 209.

PROFESSOR TYLOR, who, like Waitz, includes a belief in witchcraft, magic, ghosts, fear of the dead, etc., under the name of religion, also reproves several travellers for saying that certain tribes had no religion when all the while they held these beliefs, the fact being that the travellers in question did not recognise these beliefs as religion, but superstition. Professor Tylor observes:—

> "Even with much time and care and knowledge of language, it is not always easy to elicit from savages the details of their theology. They try to hide from the prying and contemptuous foreigner their worship of gods who seem to shrink, like their worshipers, before the white man and his mightier Deity."*

And he cites the case of Sproat, who lived among the Ahts for two years before discovering their religious ideas; of Moffat, who declared that the Bechuanas had no belief in man's immortality, and yet in the previous sentence had remarked that their word for the shades of the dead is "lirili." But it by no means follows that because a tribe believe in shades or spirits of the dead that they also believe in "man's immortality." Many of them, as we have seen, believe that the spirit does not survive the destruction of the body. Even the civilised Egyptians held this belief; hence their practice of embalming and burying in pyramids. Then, of Dr. Mouat's assertion that the Andaman Islanders had "not the rudest elements of a religious faith," Tylor remarks that the natives "did not even display to the foreigners the rude music which they actually possessed"; but he does not produce any evidence to rebut Dr. Mouat's statement. He is especially severe with Sir Samuel Baker for stating that the northern tribes of the White Nile were "without a belief in a Supreme Being, neither have they any form of worship or idolatry; nor is the darkness of their minds enlightened by even a ray of superstition"; and remarks that the details of the religion of the White Nile tribes had been recorded "years before Sir S. Baker's rash denial that they had any religion at all" (vol. i., p. 424).

Sir Samuel Baker was mistaken, but Professor Tylor does not tell us how he came to make the mistake; but we can find the cause for ourselves in Sir Samuel Baker's book on The Albert N'Yanza (1867; vol. i., p. 235), where Sir Samuel retails a conversation he had with an African chief named Comoro, to whom he attempted to prove the existence and immortality of the soul. After several unsuccessful analogies, Sir Samuel tried the effect of St. Paul's argument. Taking a grain of corn, and making a hole in the ground, Sir Samuel placed the grain within it:—

> "'That,' I said, 'represents you when you die.' Covering it with earth, I continued, 'That grain will decay, but from it will rise again the plant that will produce a reappearance of the original form.' 'Exactly so,' replied Comoro, 'that I understand. But the original grain does not rise again; it rots like the dead man, and is ended; the fruit produced is not the same grain that we buried, but the production of that grain: so it is with man—I die and decay, and am ended, but my children grow up like the fruit of the grain. Some men have no children, and some grains perish without fruit; then all is ended.' I was obliged to change the subject of conversation. In this wild savage there was not even a superstition upon which to found a religious feeling; there was a belief in matter; and to his understanding everything was material. It was extraordinary to find so much clearness of perception combined with such complete obtuseness to anything ideal."

Sir Samuel Baker evidently made the error of attributing to the natives of the country as a whole the independent and advanced views of this exceptional chief.

Professor Tylor has pointed out the danger of a too hasty conclusion as to the lack of religious ideas among savage tribes. On the other hand, there is the danger, equally great, of attributing religious ideas to these people when they do not exist.

Bonwick says:—

> "All persons who have lived among barbarians are aware of their readiness to acquiesce in a statement, from inability to comprehend the remark; from idleness arresting thought, or from a disposition to be agreeable, especially if there be any chance of 'white money.' Hence, as the Rev. John West said of the Tasmanians, 'Persons of sanguine minds are apt to attribute to them religious ideas, which they never possessed in their original state.'
> "I know a gentleman who, by dint of questioning, astonished himself and his friends by ascertaining that the Blacks were well acquainted with the doctrines of the Trinity, justification, sanctification, and the millennium! The good-natured fellow whom he had interrogated had nodded his head with a very grave face to every inquiry of the worthy Christian, and ended with a solemn protestation of 'Me b'lieve every ting.' The ardent Millennarian, though delighted with the native recognition of his favorite dogma, was rather scandalised when the believer asked him for some grog."*

Wake quotes Thunberg to the same effect, who says quaintly:—

> "'It is, however, not always easy to get the truth out of the Hottentots. One must never attack them with questions to the point, when one wishes to know the truth of anything; but it must be fished out of them by degrees.' The same complaint is made by travellers with reference to the Australians, who are so polite that they never contradict, and always agree with a question."†

The Rev. Duff Macdonald, the African missionary, observes:—

> "As we tried to reduce native beliefs to an intelligible form, we were often discouraged by finding that one man would make a statement that his nearest neighbor would contradict. But as years passed on, I discovered that this accident was not so much the fault of the African, or of his belief, as of the European that questioned him.
> "One cause of error is that we mix up what the African tells us with our own ideas, which are European. As a consequence of this, we put questions to him that he cannot understand. Many of our questions strike the African exactly as a question like the following would strike a European. 'If seventy miles of the sea were burned, who would be the losers, the Insurance Companies? or the Harbor Commissioners? or — ?' If an African put this question to a European, the European would laugh at him; but if the European put it to an African, the latter would be more polite, and would think the European was very ingenious in finding out a supposition that would never have occurred to himself; and although the African knows that the difficulty could never arise in his own country, yet he feels bound to believe that the poor European is perplexed by it, and states what he thinks would happen in Africa on such an extraordinary occurrence: thus he gives an answer, which the ingenious European carefully lays past."‡

The same writer also observes:—

> "Bishop Steere says—'In Africa they never say no, they always say yes, certainly; but possibly you are no nearer your object.' One must be careful never to suggest an answer to a native; if the native and his questioner are strangers to each other, the former will make it a point of etiquette to find out what answer the stranger would like, and may by-and-by take occasion to compliment him on his cleverness and the accuracy of his knowledge! Statements made in answer to direct questions are not to be relied on unless the questioner has had years of experience in conversation with natives, and knows the subject he converses about" (p. 5).

Then, again, these primitive people have not the clear and definite ideas which are the result of education and science among Europeans. As Herbert Spencer remarks:—

> "Just as the child, ignorant of the course of things, gives credence to an impossible fiction as readily as to a familiar fact; so the savage, similarly without classified and systematised knowledge, feels no incongruity between any absurd falsehood propounded to him and some general truth which we class as established: there being for him no established truth. Hence his credulity."†

Nansen says of the faith of the Greenland Eskimos:—

> "It is so primitive that I doubt whether it deserves the name of a religion. There are many legends and much superstition, but it all lacks clear and definite form; conceptions of the supernatural vary from individual to individual, and they produce, as a whole, the impression of a religion in process of formation, a mass of incoherent and fantastic notions which have not yet crystallised into a definite view of the world."‡

Thus, it will be seen that it is by no means a simple matter to ascertain the beliefs of savages; and only especially gifted men, scientifically trained, who have lived with, and gained the confidence of, these primitive folk, and understand their language, can be relied upon to describe what they believe and disbelieve.

(To be concluded) W. MANN.

Men are like sheep. They do things and think things, not because the things are useful and true, but because they have been done and thought by those who have gone before. They imitate their ancestors. They are chained to tradition. Look at the sheep-like procession of the generations of men. Each generation jumps over the same hurdles that preceding generations have jumped over, although in most cases the usefulness of the activities, if they ever had any in the first place, has long ago passed away. We eat like our ancestors, reverence the same creeds, and cling to the same customs, institutions, and idiocies. Why should we have kings, and queens, and poets laureate, and wars, and etiquette, and beliefs in creation, and quail-on-toast, and millionaires, and the study of Latin and Greek, and the dread of "13," and "styles," and gods, and criers calling from court windows "Oyez, Oyez, Oyez?" It is the call of the past—the oldest and most hopeless of human slaveries.—J. H. Moore, "Ethics and Education."

Acid Drops.

"Mrs. Annie Besant: an Appreciation. By L. Haden Guest," is the heading of an article in T. P.'s Weekly. It is a mass of eulogy without an atom of discrimination. Nobody could gain from it the least idea of Mrs. Besant's mental and moral idiosyncracies, except that she is very energetic and a big "draw" as a public speaker. But energy is a physical quality, and really has a great deal to do with drawing a big audience from a public platform. Nobody disputes Mrs. Besant's "eloquence" in the common sense of the word. "Eloquence" belongs to every fluent speaker who is able to voice the ideas, whatever they are, of a considerable body of people. But what a vulgar test of greatness is the ability to fill Queen's Hall. According to that test Billy Sunday, the American pugilist-turned-evangelist, is a far greater thinker and apostle than even Mrs. Besant.

This article on Mrs. Besant says that she was wrong, and admits it, with regard to the publication of the Knowlton pamphlet, and nearly everything else she did in the old Bradlaugh days—and even with regard to what she did in her early Socialist days. Quite so. And she was just as cocksure she was right then as she is now—and just as modest now as she was then.

Mrs. Besant understands advertising—or those who "run" her do. Every time she lectures the Oriental get-up in which she indulges is worth half her audience.

The long and short of the eulogy is this: "Mrs. Besant is a Prophetess of the Order of the Star in the East which proclaims the near coming of the World Teacher, He whom the western world calls Christ." What a mouthful of moonshine!

English parsons are always pretending that Freethought is dead. Presumably the Pope knows his business as well as any simple-minded Anglican curate. At a recent consistory, His Holiness lamented the irreligion of the day and the persistent spread of Modernist ideas within the Church.

In October, 1,400 churches in the United States are to be fitted with a cinematograph apparatus, in order to give a weekly performance. The project has the "unofficial" sanction of the Presbyterian Church. We do not doubt that if they only have the parson preaching on the screen, it will, in many cases, be preferable to hearing him.

One of life's little ironies occurred at an alfresco concert at a seaside place near London. The vocalist was warbling pianissimo, and the program boy shouting fortissimo. To the audience, therefore, the words of the singer sounded: "Good night, love, good night! God keep thee in his—Program!"

"A breach of promise case is like prehistoric times, starting with terrific heat and ending in glacial coldness," said the counsel in a law case a few days since. The same thing is true of religious revivals and special missions.

Fashionable women now wear their hair drawn back from their foreheads, with side-whisker curls. Maybe the famous sausage-curls, as worn by the Ever-Blessed Wielder of the Jack Plane, will become popular before long.

The Suffragette who hacked the £2,000 picture by Romney in the Birmingham Art Gallery told the police that she acted under "divine guidance." That was the excuse of the Old Testament lady who hammered a tenpenny nail through Sisera's head.

"The London Miracle Girl," Miss Dorothy Kerim, would be a "godsend" to a class of medical students. She is almost an encyclopædia of diseases in herself, and the student who walked round her for a week or two, instead of "walking" the hospitals, would be ready for his certificate. The other day, according to the Yorkshire Evening Post, this young lady told a Sunderland audience that about five years ago, when dying, she was restored to health by a vision. Since then she has had a fractured skull, appendicitis, and gastric ulcer—all cured by faith. Still bent on piling up a record, she enjoyed a further experience last summer. She was knocked senseless, her skull fractured, and lay "between life and death." Then the usual thing happened. "The Lord appeared" to her, the fever left her suddenly, her temperature dropped from 105 to 98, and she "was instantly and suddenly well." She got up at once and walked two miles. Another time, when seriously ill, she had a vision of the Lord, and she at once rose and ate a big meal of cold beef, pickled walnuts, and cold apple tart—"an enormous meal such as you would give a navvy." Next morning she had increased in weight, and could run upstairs. Bravo Miss Kerim! And we don't suppose she is done yet. There are still a number of diseases Miss Kerim hasn't had. But she'll get them sooner or later.

Theosophists are not the only ones that are to have a £100 000 building devoted to an Eastern religion. Mohammedans are forming plans for a London mosque of equal value. A Moslem campaign for the conversion of England was inaugurated at the Albert Hall the other day, and a young Englishwoman was publicly converted to Islam. Last year Lord Headley joined them, and the Mohammedan missionaries are looking forward to many converts. We shouldn't be surprised if they get them.

The Christian World asks whether those who are resorting to prayer as a political power "realise the harm they are doing to belief in prayer as a spiritual force?" We confess that we do not see why prayer, if of use at all, should not be used in politics as well as elsewhere. Prayers are offered in the House of Commons, and there doesn't seem any valid objection, from the religious side, against people praying to God for either positive or negative political ends. We expect the Christian World realises that this kind of prayer is likely to give the game away. Usually, when people pray, it is left an open question whether they get an answer or not. But if people pray for a political end, we can all see within a reasonable time whether the prayer is answered or not. And that is clearly dangerous. It is bringing religious faith to the test of fact—always an unwise procedure.

In a recent issue of the expansive but inexpensive Daily Mail a reference was made in a leading article to "Browning's" "Abou-Ben-Adhem." Browning never wrote it, but Leigh Hunt did; and, as the poem is in almost all anthologies and school reading-books, we may assume that the writer, the printer, proof-reader, and editor are not "literary gents."

So huge is the glut of cherries at Covent Garden that it has been found necessary to have auction sales every day to dispose of the stock, and fruit-growers are destroying the fruit rather than further cheapen the market. Evidently the Lord thinks more of "apples" than he does of cherries.

Defenders of the exploded Design Argument will kindly note that flies, which are frequent carriers of disease, have become an absolute pest in many districts. A "Kill that Fly" agitation has been started, in order to do what Providence has neglected.

Three men were killed by lightning during the violent thunderstorms of last week. As they were not Freethinkers, it is not considered a judgment of "God."

"What are the wild waves saying?" asked little Paul Dombey. At this season of the year, with so many "blood and fire" evangelists on the sands of seaside resorts, the word is Hades—in the vernacular.

Amongst the mottoes displayed at the Salvation Army Congress was "Live for Others." Very likely the Boothites thought this was taken from the Bible. It was really taken from Auguste Comte:—"Vivre pour Autrui."

General Booth did not tell the Congress much about "Blood and Fire," but he told them that the Army holds firmly by its belief in "the old and simple things" of Christianity—including "a real Bible that tells the truth," and "a real Devil." But what about "a real Deity"? It is not so difficult to find the Devil in this world as to find God.

Mr. Asquith's message to the Salvation Army Congress was highly applauded. He had a right to send his own "warm congratulations," but how about those of "His Majesty's Government"? What right had Mr. Asquith to use the name of the Government in delivering religious messages to individual religious denominations? The State in England is secular—or should be. Not even the price of a piece of paper should be spent by the Prime Minister on letters to religious denominations.

One of the exhibits at the Salvation Army Congress was "a platform of six tiny girls, children of a criminal tribe in India. Their parents were Thugs, and the children had been rescued from their evil surroundings, and had come to the great West to bear testimony, in their own childish way, to the wonderful work of the Salvation Army." This is quoted from the Daily Chronicle of Saturday, June 13. And it is of a piece with Salvation Army reports of every description. Mr. Mason's book abounds with instances of their positive hatred of the truth. They appear to avoid it on principle.

Tiny girls! The children of Thugs! And who are (or were) the Thugs? We take the following answer from the great Standard Dictionary:—

> "Thug.—One of an organisation of religious assassins in India, bound by vows to secret murder in the service of Devi (Kali, Durga), the Hindu goddess of destruction: a phansigar or strangler. They often disguised themselves as pilgrims or travellers, and killed by strangling. They arose in the 13th century, and were finally exterminated by Lord Bentinck in 1828-35, when 1,562 of them were hanged, transported, or imprisoned for life."

The Thugs were not a race; they were a voluntarily associated body, bound together by religious vows. They were deliberately broken up by the Government of India some eighty years ago. Yet six little girl "Thugs" are produced by General Booth after all that lapse of time. "Their parents were Thugs!" No wonder General Booth is fond of the Bible.

The "Thugs" were very wicked people, of course. But there was no need to go all the way to India to find them. All the Christians who murdered their fellow men on religious grounds, and robbed them of their property to boot, in order to make their destruction complete, by delivering over their wives and families to destitution — were Thugs. Torquemada was a Thug. Alva was a Thug. Laud was a Thug. There are many Christians now who would kill Freethinkers if they could. They are all Thugs.

Pastor A. S. O. Birch, of Sheffield, writes to the Sheffield Daily Telegraph that he is greatly perplexed over the loss of 140 Salvationists in the Empress of Ireland. It does not seem that Pastor Birch is at all troubled about the drowning of the other people, but he cannot understand what the Lord was about to drown so many of his uniformed servants. This has "greatly perplexed and staggered" Mr. Birch, and he would like to know whether before sailing there was any meeting of members of the Army "definitely committing them to the care of God." Of course, if there was not, the Lord may, we presume, be held guiltless. But if such a meeting was held, then it looks as though Pastor Birch is ready to rise up in the streets of Sheffield and charge God with gross carelessness. He concludes that many people are anxious to discover what "such a staggering blow really means." "Has the Almighty forgotten his people, or is there a flaw somewhere?" We fancy the proper person for Pastor Birch to consult would be a specialist in brain disorders.

It seems that wrecking ships is a favorite plan of God's when he is displeased with anything that is done on earth. Rev. J. K. Jacques, of Carlton-on-Trent, writes to the Guardian pointing out that the Delhi sank just after Delhi was made the capital of India, and the Empress of Ireland the same week that the Home Rule Bill was passed. We wonder if there are any passenger ships called the Prince of Wales! If so, we advise everybody to give them the go-by. For the Lord is certain to mark his opinion of the Welsh Disestablishment Bill in the same way. The best plan would be to drop giving ships names, and stick to numbers. Then the Lord would have to find some other manner of expressing his displeasure. Seriously, it seems a sheer impertinence for men like Mr. Jacques to call themselves civilised.

How easily in print defenders of the Faith ward off the attacks of naughty infidels. In Mr. A. G. Gardiner's book, Prophets, Priests, and Kings, he tells us that the Bishop of London "has gone out into Victoria Park to meet the Atheists face to face, answer their pet posers with ready wit, and win their hearts by his genial comradeship." Mr. Gardiner is an idealist.

A new work on the Gods of India is announced as being illustrated from "photographs specially taken." By kind permission of the originals, we assume.

Three hundred and seventy invalid pilgrims, accompanied by ten nurses, left Victoria Station, London, in two special trains for Lourdes. Yet English people smile at the idea of Mohammedan pilgrims journeying to Mecca.

A small Russian bear belonging to the 11th Hussars Regiment has collected over £50 for charity. The animal will help to wipe out the bad reputation earned by the bears who ate the children in the Old Testament.

"To experiment is to ask God a question," says Mr. J. Stephen. When the experiment is a failure, presumably the result is a divine snubbing.

Pope Taylor has banned three books of Philosopher Bergson's—Matter and Memory, Creative Evolution, and the Immediate Effect of Consciousness. Philosopher Bergson may now expect a larger sale. We wonder that "G. B. S." hasn't tried for this advertisement. Perhaps it will be a case of "My turn next!"

The Archbishops of Canterbury and York have issued a joint manifesto on the question of Disestablishment in Wales, protesting against the measure being put into force. In the course of the manifesto they say that they have no desire to have the Church of England placed in an unfair position, and in any reconstructed Second Chamber they would have no objection to the presence of other representatives of the religious life of the nation. We daresay not; although we don't feel convinced that they are anxious for the presence of Nonconformists. And we are quite willing to believe that this would quite suit many of the Nonconformist leaders. As we have often pointed out, what they desire is not the disestablishment of religion, but the equal establishment of all religions. That is the utmost that they mean by religious equality—all Christian sects receiving equal support and patronage from the State, and all non-Christians forced to put up with it and pay the piper.

It is the sheer impudence of this bargaining that strikes us most forcibly. Both Nonconformists and Episcopalians write and speak as though they alone are to be considered. No one else matters. If they agree, all must be content. What we should like to know is, What rational justification is there for religious leaders of any kind having a place in a legislative chamber? Why should the religious life of the nation be represented in the House of Lords more than any other aspect of national existence? Art, literature, science, commerce are all unrepresented, as such, in the House of Lords; why should religion be the sole exception? The truth is that the two Archbishops—with many other religious leaders—are living away back in the Middle Ages. They belong, mentally, to a time when the medicine-man was looked upon as possessing a power that ordinary men lacked. But we no longer believe this to be the case. The priest is only a man, of no greater value to the community than any other, and often, because he is a priest, of less value. No one to-day believes that a parson is better informed than other people, or possesses any more genuine authority. It is really time that these medicine-men were made to realise that we are living in the twentieth century not in the tenth.

What is British Nonconformity coming to? With imported Yankee preachers as numerous as soda-fountains; the formation of a feminist church in the North of England; and clerics of the Government religion coquetting with Unitarians, it looks as if the Free Churches were in the melting-pot.

Some humanitarians are up in arms concerning the treatment of lobsters by plunging them into boiling water. Millions of Christians, for many centuries, regarded the idea of the eternal "frying" of the bulk of the human race with touching equanimity. The Roman Catholic Church and some of the "fancy religions" still teach the same inhuman dogmas.

A particularly interesting exhibit at the Leipzig Exhibition is a number of copies of translations of Shakespeare's plays into the various dialects of the Indian Empire. Unlike the subsidised versions of the Bible, Shakespeare's works make their way by the sheer force of his splendid genius.

Two items from the Times Summary of June 15: "The Cambridge May Races ended on Saturday, Jesus retaining the head of the river." "A dog at Mannheim named 'Rolf' is credited with answering theological questions." Evidently religion has gone to the dogs at last.

F. W. HALL.—We endorse what you say; but, after all, isn't the reverend gentleman quite right according to orthodox Christianity? If the very hairs of our head are numbered, and the fall of every sparrow is noted, it is a logical inference that every ocean liner is carefully watched.

B. N. KOZAKE.—We cannot deal with the historicity of Jesus Christ in a sentence or a paragraph, or even an ordinary article.

A. CAIFER.—Sorry we do not know of any institution such as you require. There are one or two schools managed on secular principles, but that is all.

J. CALLAGHAN.—Sorry your newsagent has delayed getting your paper. The fault is none of ours, and while we regret the annoyance, we hope you will press until you get what you require.

J. D. REID.—Thanks for good wishes.

R. KENNEDY.—We cannot afford an Index to the Freethinker.

W. J. RAMSEY.—We have declined all outside advertisements for a good while. You are welcome to the editorial paragraph.

E. BUTLER.—We are almost tired of answering questions concerning the highly imaginative statements of Musgrave Reade. His chief asset is evidently that of the "converted infidel." His being "a great friend of the late Charles Bradlaugh" is too ridiculous for comment.

Mr. Cohen's article on "Christianity and Politics" is reprinted from our issue of May 10 in Town Topics, Edmonton, Alberta. A friend of the movement on the spot paid for its insertion at full advertising rates as a means of introducing a little Freethought among the people. This is a very good, although rather expensive, form of propaganda, and we hope the results will justify the effort. The article is accompanied by full acknowledgment of the source from which it is taken, and an advertisement of the Freethinker rates of subscription.

We are reminded by the above that letters continue to reach us concerning the difficulties subscribers have in procuring their copies of the Freethinker. Newsagents report it as out of print, or even dead; and, in the case of those unacquainted with the paper, the lie probably does its work. Of course, the Freethinker is not dead; it is not even ailing. Its health—and health with a paper, as with a human being, is largely a matter of circulation—is as lusty as ever. Seriously, however, we would ask our readers to be on their guard, and to do what they can to check these attempts to prevent the Freethinker reaching the public. There is no difficulty whatever in procuring the paper. It is offered to the trade on the most advantageous terms, and Freethinkers should insist on their newsagents getting the copies required. If they can induce them to display the paper, so much the better. Wherever this is done, the sale increases. We are not fond of boycotting, but the newsagent who declines to procure the Freethinker when requested should not be permitted to supply other papers. This would soon bring the more bigoted to their senses.

We regret to learn that Father Cavenor still continues his boorish behavior at Edmonton. This gentleman's policy is to hang round the platform, interjecting more or less impolite remarks during the whole of the meeting, and then moving off to the Christian Evidence platform to offer what he is pleased to call a "reply." Last Sunday Miss Kough was subjected to this treatment during the whole of her address. We hope that Freethinkers with an hour to spare will do what they can to favor Edmonton with a visit.

The Bradlaugh Fellowship has arranged for its (seventh) annual visit to the grave of Charles Bradlaugh on Sunday, July 5. The train leaves Waterloo (No. 5 Platform) at 11.15. The Brookwood Club will be open for the accommodation of the party, and dinner and tea at moderate prices will be provided at Marshall's Dining Rooms, close to the Station.

Miss Durham is a lady who went out to the near East during the Balkan War, and did much excellent work among the wounded. She has just issued a volume detailing her experiences of Montenegro and the Montenegrins, and endorses all that has been said by adverse critics of the "Crusaders." She describes the behavior of both officers and privates in the Montenegrin Army as a compound of "booze and boast," who subjected the conquered to horrible atrocities. She gives an account of hospitals in which Turks had their noses cut off by their captors, and sums up as follows:—

> "There are people, I believe, who still imagine that war brings forth fine qualities. To me it had appeared only as a sort of X-ray, which showed up pitilessly all that is most base, most foul, and most bestial in human nature.....In the sacred names of Liberty, Civilisation, and Christianity, the Montenegrin people, blood-drunk, lust-drunk, loot-drunk, had reverted to primitive savagery—and in so doing had lost the very small idea of discipline they had acquired. Judging by their talk, they proposed to live in future as a marauding army. Never fond of work, they declared that they had conquered enough people to do the work for them, and looked forward to a life of something like slave-driving."

Most wars are brutalising, but this Christian Crusade bids fair to establish a record in savagery.

Those of our readers who happen to be Esperantists may be interested to learn that the Esperantist Freethought Society will be holding meetings in connection with the Esperanto Congress to be held in Paris in the August of this year. The Society has published—in Esperanto, of course—works by the Polish Freethinker, Niemojewski, and the Plea for Ferrer delivered before the military tribunal. The name and address of the secretary of the Society is R. Deshays, Sens, France.

Notes and Views.

BY a report in the Daily Chronicle I see that Mrs. Besant has had "a splendid reception at Brighton," where she lectured "before a crowded audience" on "Reincarnation and Social Problems." I learn that the lady "made an impressive figure," and I can well believe it. She was dressed in oriental fashion in white silk robes, and the living portrait was framed in "choice pink and white flowers." Sooner or later the people who deal in mystery find out the value of tickling the bump of wonder through the eyesight. There was nothing very "impressive" about Mrs. Besant's figure on the platform in her old Atheistic days. A plain little woman—though with expressive eyes—dressed very quietly, and with no histrionic appeal whatever, occupied an ordinary chair, on the right of which there was a table and another chair occupied by a plain gentleman (probably a workman in Sunday clothes) who technically presided over the meeting and regulated any discussion that took place,—for Mrs. Besant was not an oracle then but an advocate of reason, willing to answer questions and reply to criticism. At that time she sought the aid of nothing adventitious. The spoken word was her sole passport to her audience. She has different ideas now—and different practices. What she says has to be eked out with oracular attitudes and sacrosanct costumes. To question such a figure is an affront, to think of discussing with it is insolence. Mrs. Besant is no longer an Atheist: she is a Theosophist,—that is one of the huge army of "spiritual" practitioners who are spread over the whole globe, and whether "savage" or "civilised," are all engaged in imposing on the weakness of their fellow human beings by the pretentious and hypnotic arts of what—in African witch doctor, in Church of England clergyman, or in Theosophic mahatma—is nothing but priestcraft.

Mrs. Besant's lecture began with a compliment to Christ, which she herself would be one of the first to smile at in the days when she "dealt" less in "futures"; and it ended with the common gabble of religious circles to-day about "the gospel of despair" which is taught by the advocates of irreligion. Irreligious people don't look despairing, but they are, for the religious people say so. They suffer from an interior malady; and they are not aware of its presence until they are ripe for an operation or ready for a funeral. They appear to be happy enough, but they are full of despair, if they only knew it; and they will never be sound and happy again until they undergo a drastic clearance by one or other of the many pious pills that are offered for sale in the religious medicine market.

Between the opening and the close of Mrs. Besant's lecture there was some sensible teaching which was familiar to her audiences when she preached Atheism. One need not become a Theosophist to understand the need of prison reform, the folly and wickedness of beating children, and the uselessness of punishment in the formation of character. I should have learnt all that from Godwin, and Shelley, and Mary Wollstonecraft, and Robert Owen, and John Stuart Mill, and other "infidel" teachers—if Nature and my own reflections had not taught me without them—even if Madame Blavatsky and Mrs. Besant had never been born and Theosophy had never existed. No child of mine, for instance, was ever beaten or subjected to any form of violence; and I was an Atheist before I was a father. I have learnt by experience that Freethinkers are much more in danger of spoiling than of ill-using their offspring. It is a fact which deserves pondering that only in Christian countries is there the slightest need of a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Nor should I go to a Theosophist for the loveliest words about the loveliest things on earth, without which the world were a desert, whose babble is the divinest of languages. I should turn to the atheist Ingersoll.

I am far from being a Catholic, but when I think of all the mental and moral energy which went to the building up of the Catholic Church (wrong as it is) and then reflect on the mental and moral sloppiness of Theosophy in comparison, I feel that if ever my brain wearied of thinking for itself, and yearned for a soft and satisfactory pillow, I should despise the latter and unhesitatingly accept the former—in spite of all its crimes against reason and humanity. When all is said and done it is the real thing. It is the logical development of Faith, founded, as faith must be, on the principle of authority. Who is going to bow before such a coarse creature as Madame Blavatsky was, with her ascetic professions and gross appetites and her pretentious parade of stolen learning? Who is going to take his beliefs from such an unoriginal and unstable person as Mrs. Besant, whose intellectual life has been a long round of helpless discipleship? There is no use in talking of her many fine qualities. They are not to be disputed, but they are not the facts which are to the purpose in this discussion. Her "eloquence" may be admitted, but eloquence proves nothing, you cannot rest anything on eloquence; it may be ever so precious in its way, but it is only an intellectual luxury, after all. And some of us are fastidious in our taste for eloquence. Listen to the Scripture which the Church of England takes for the opening of its Burial Service: "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." It isn't true, but what a magnificent challenge! Merely as eloquence, is there in all Theosophic writings extant, including Mrs. Besant's, any sentence to put in comparison with it? Any sentence to be placed within a million miles of it? Many glorious sentences are marked in my set of Newman—many in my copy of Shelley, at the other extreme. Both had Nature's great gift of genius, though one was a Catholic and the other an Atheist. Yes, an Atheist; for Shelley was not in any sense a "spiritualist." I admit he was an idealist. But that does not depend upon religion in any sense of the word whatever. It depends upon sympathy and imagination, which are natural human faculties, whose rudiments are clearly perceptible in several of the lower animals.

Outside the Catholic religion what is the real religion of England to-day? What is the "Religion of Protestants," as Chillingworth called it? For the most part it is Monarchy. The classes and Churches are working that superstition for all it is worth. Even with the Blasphemy Laws unrepealed, you may talk about God with far greater freedom than you may talk about King George. From the King downwards, the royal family is worked for all it is worth in laying foundation-stones, opening bazaars and institutions, and fulfilling social functions of all kinds. Recently the Prince of Wales was put up to deliver his first public speech—it was written for him, of course, and read by him—at the laying of the foundation-stone of the new Church of St. Anselm at Kennington. The Daily Chronicle rather unkindly printed a snap-shot of this performance. A bowed clerical on the right of the photograph seemed to be worshiping the Prince in the middle. The Prince himself looked like a poor little schoolboy. On the other side was the Archbishop of Canterbury, with a ferociously envious expression. One felt amazed at such a scene. The poor lad was being initiated into a wretched business, and the nonsense given him to utter was worthy of the occasion. He was glad that his "first public duty should be on behalf of the Church," and he said in conclusion:—

> "I pray that it may please God to pour his blessings on all who shall worship in this place and to prosper the work of those who now or hereafter may be called upon to minister in this parish."

Why "this" parish more than any other parish? One sees the priest's hand behind the Prince's pen. And the working people of England wink at it as a perfectly honorable game. At the same time they complain (how foolishly!) of the slow progress of improvement in their own condition. How comic it would be if it were not so tragic.

I desire to say a word, before it is too late, about the death of Mr. Watts-Dunton. I think he was ridiculously overrated, but I do not wish to discuss that subject now. I want to recall the fact that he buried Swinburne like a Christian. It was an outrage and a betrayal. George Meredith in writing to me could only "suppose" that he "was ill and feeble at the time of the funeral." But the real explanation seems to be given in Sir Robertson Nicoll's account of a dinner party at the Pines, where he took "Mark Rutherford" to meet Swinburne. "At one point our kind host asked 'Mark Rutherford' if he had read Kipling. 'No,' was the reply. 'I am getting to be an old man now, and I read my Bible.' 'Oh,' said Mr. Watts-Dunton, 'that's what I do.'" I understand now.

"Orthodox" Atrocities in the Balkans.

ABOUT this time last year, the feelings of the civilised world were shocked by the atrocities committed in the course of the two recent wars in the Balkans, and especially by the abominations which stamped with special, if not unexampled, inhumanity the second Balkan War which was waged between the Bulgarians on the one hand and the Greeks and Servians on the other. Impartial observers of the dreadful spectacle of carnage in the Balkans did not fail to distinguish between the first war, which, in any case, was an inevitable outburst of national revolt, a war of liberation planned and concerted by the long-time oppressed Montenegrins, Servians, Bulgarians, and Greeks who had grown strong and won astounding victory by mutual alliance, and the second war, a war of fratricidal fury between vultures gorged with carrion on the field of battle.

The first war was practically a religious crusade of Christian against Moslem, but the second was a war of senseless and selfish conquest and mutual spoliation which, in effect, compromised the fruits of victory in the earlier contest, brought the Turks back to effect the recovery of Andrinople, tempted Rumania to enter burglariously upon the scene in order to dismember Bulgaria, and finally delivered Bulgaria over to her former allies for her territory to be plundered and the men and women of Bulgaria to be massacred and outraged.

During that second war the Christian nations of the nearer east showed to the world at large what a thin veneer of civilisation covers the brute beast in man lurking amongst the deeply religious and half-moralised races whose attachment to a boasted religion of love was centuries old before some of the non-Balkan races had emerged into the twilight of Christianity. During the worse than mediævalised atrocities of the second Balkan War we saw the torch of destruction carried from village to village and from district to district not only by the fanaticised armies of the holy allies and their irregular Comitadjis, or bands of freebooters, but by the different populations themselves, by the hostile and hopelessly intermingled populations who for ages had been rendered antagonistic to each other by furious rivalries and conflicts of race, religion, language, culture, and national traditions of a mixed medley of Turks, Slavs, Albanians, Jews, Gypsies, Servians, Bulgarians, Rumanians, and Montenegrins. Europe—Christian Europe—looked down on the scene of horror with the impassive serenity of God himself; there were no goldfields to grab, no oilwells to be exploited, in the Balkan towns where, for many months, murder held high carnival and young girls were raped before the eyes of their agonised parents.

The Committee of Inquiry, appointed by the Carnegie Endowment for the Promotion of International Peace, will soon be issuing its report, giving the results of its investigations into these Balkan atrocities. The report, which will simultaneously appear in several languages, will be published in Paris, Washington, New York, and, I believe, in London, and there is abundant reason that it will shed a flood of light upon one of the darkest episodes in the history of civilisation. An admirable summary of the findings of the Report has just been published by Professor Th. Ruyssen.* In his article, which was written with the impatiently awaited Report before him, the Professor tells us that the Balkan War (the second to a greater degree than the first) takes us very far back from the twentieth century; it not merely transports us to the darkest periods of the Middle Ages, but to "the times of Assyrian conquests," to the deeds of primitive ages when regular hand-to-hand fighting was followed by abominable excesses which civilised races have for ages past banished—"or nearly so"—from the established curriculum of war, viz., the systematic murder of the population on their native soil, the infliction of torture upon prisoners of war, the slaughter of non-belligerents, or the pillage and arson of their property, and, more frequently, we are told, in the Balkans than anything else in the way of horror, innumerable acts of violence upon women, not to mention, as an additional feature of horror, the violation of wounded or dying young girls. The documentary testimony in proof of these "Evidences of Christianity" in the Balkans will be published in the Appendices to the volume in which these accusing crimes are detailed. When the book reaches my hands it will be my painful duty to place some of these appalling facts before the readers of this journal in order that they may taste and see how lordly is the man of war when he is let loose upon a defenceless population.

Professor Ruyssen points out that these savage outbursts of bestiality cannot be explained merely as the awakening of the base passions as yet unstilled in the heart of man. The war in the Balkans was something more than a duel between nations which measured their strength in mortal conflict. The Carnegie Committee appears to have taken into account the psychological reason for this bubbling over of the cauldron of horrors during the war, at any rate, during the first war, when it explains that the results of the conflict reversed the secular relationship of master and slave between the dominant Turk and the subject races. In principle, the Balkan atrocities were acts of reprisal—savage and senseless, and therefore unjust—after a long and painful period of racial oppression.

The Report declares that—

> "in nearly every case the conquerors were followed by local bodies of armed men, by volunteers on the margin of the regular army, and that these licensed ruffians, sure in advance of impunity, took revenge upon their adversaries for unexpiated personal or national injuries. The Committee declares that 'in North Macedonia it was the victorious population that organised the systematic suppression of the Mussulmans.'"

Moreover, the Report states that—

> "the populations themselves killed and rooted out each other with all the greater ferocity because of the fact that they knew each other well and nourished in their hearts old quarrels and hatreds of many years' standing."

On the vexed question of the responsibility of the different Governments in regard to these horrors, it has been difficult in every case for the Committee to arrive at a definite conclusion, as quite naturally the orders given would in most cases be shrouded in mystery—at any rate, to the probing vision of the present generation—but Professor Ruyssen is able to state that the Committee has in several cases been able to fix the responsibility of the authorities. The instances given include the responsibility of the Bulgarians for the massacre of the Turks at Serrès; that of Turkey for the acts of violence committed on the victorious return of the Ottoman troops in Thrace and at Andrinople; that of Servia in respect of the forced conversions of the Bulgarians in Eastern Macedonia, and the responsibility of the Greeks for the massacre of Bulgarians and other outrages during the second war. Apparently, on a general survey, the Committee's Report finds that the case of Servia was not so black as that of the other co-partners in these atrocities; but, on the other hand, the Report takes an extremely severe view of the culpability of Greece, and is able to support its view upon an imposing mass of facts of incontestable weight and authority. One of the most important and reassuring facts brought to light is that the Bulgarians are certainly disculpated from a portion of the sensational crimes which the Greeks laid to their charge during the second war. Professor Ruyssen, however, thinks that public opinion will scarcely relieve the Bulgarians from responsibility for the atrocities which they are alleged to have committed at Serrès, Doxato, and elsewhere.

The cases last cited by Professor Ruyssen leave me more than sceptical as to the justice of these reflections upon the criminality of Bulgaria. I have before me at the present moment the terrible* volume of Bulgarian recriminations against the Greeks which Professor L. Miletitch (of the University of Sofia) has recently issued. It would be difficult to estimate or even imagine the amount of human misery, of moral turpitude on the one hand and physical misery on the other, contained in this eloquent and touching book. We must remember that the Greeks had every incentive, on the grounds of national aggrandisement and racial animosity, to vilify the reputation of the Bulgarian people, and that, during the combined onslaught of the Allies upon Bulgaria, Sofia was cut off from intercourse with Europe and the European press deluged with anti-Bulgarian stories furnished or fabricated by the Greek press agencies. The perusal of Professor Miletitch's book, which is categorical and crushingly convincing in its detailed proofs of the atrocities wrought in Macedonia by the Greeks upon the defeated or captured Bulgarian troops and the despised civilians of Bulgarian race, read in conjunction with the very moderately worded "Answer"* which Dr. Stephen Kyroff writes as Rector for and on behalf of his colleagues, the professors of the University of Sofia, will, I think, put quite a different complexion upon the weirdly harrowing story of these Macedonian atrocities, and must be read side by side with the Carnegie Report if a sound judgment is to be arrived at. There can be no doubt that last year the public opinion of Europe was largely ricked and deceived by Greekophile sources, and that something strongly resembling to myth was created in the minds of many well-meaning people as to the degree of Bulgaria's culpability in these crimes. It is to the credit of Bulgaria that she courted inquiry, and to the discredit of Greece and Servia that they shunned, and endeavored to thwart, the investigation undertaken by the Carnegie Committee into these atrocities.

No one will pretend that Bulgarian victory was not sullied by excesses, and even by horrifying and exceptional excesses—it was in the psychology of the Balkan peoples that this should be so, at least in the course of the first war. But history, when it gathers the documents together, and especially when it reads, as I have done during the last few days, the Fac-similes† of the Greek letters seized before transmission through the post at Rozlog last year, will moderate, if not revise, some of the one-sided and over-prejudiced views which have recently prevailed concerning the nature of Bulgaria's responsibilities in the recent horrors and her degree of complicity in the sensational horrors which the Greeks have laid to her charge. In the meantime we can wonder how two Christian nations can afford to love each other so well.

In a future article I propose to examine a few out of the multitude of horrors which the foregoing volumes accumulate to the charge of the Greeks. In the meantime, it will suffice to state here and now that the documents adduced by Dr. Miletitch show, with terrifying detail of horror and inhumanity, that women of all ages, from children of 12 years to old dames of 80 and 85, were violated by the Greek soldiers; that mutilation and even crucifixion were inflicted upon certain victims; that the daughter of a Bulgarian priest, Theodor Staeff, was carried off, and himself colported about the village for two days after his eyes were gouged out, and then killed, together with other inhabitants. The participation of the Greek Archbishop of Serrès in Greek atrocities at that place seems fully established; and it is no less fully established that all the Greek bishops in the district, without exception, were the accomplices, if not the actual instigators, of the outrages at Drama and Cavalla. When I resume this subject I shall have some fuller details to give concerning these and similar horrifying facts, and especially in reference to the Greek fabrications which have been wrought for the discrediting of the sister Christian State and some damning facts of appalling inhumanity which Christian and Orthodox hands of Greek patriots were willing to perpetrate against the hated and maligned Bulgarian race.

The Pitman's Prayer.

IT was a hot Sunday afternoon, one of those days when the spirit of langor steals sweetly over the senses and you listen to a tale of reminiscences as in a dream. I was returning from a short walk, and was nearing the town, when I lighted upon a friend of my boyhood sitting all alone upon a seat by the wayside. We had been boys at school together, but I had seen little of him during the long intervening years. In those far-off days we had both lived in the same colliery row of houses, and daily trudged the long distance between our homes and the school at West Moor.

We sat and chatted leisurely of the days of our boyhood, and recalled many an incident in our youthful escapades. He was generally a ringleader in any mischief that was astir, the indulgent leniency of his uncle and aunt, with whom he lived, being accountable, perhaps, for his waywardness. His guardians, having no family of their own, were better circumstanced than most of their neighbors, whose proverbial quivers were all well filled. We were Presbyterians, they were Methodists, and attended the chapel in the distant village where the day school was situated. His uncle had a good voice, and was one of the principal singers in the meeting. They were people, too, who enjoyed the good things of life, as pitmen usually do, and they were in a position to indulge their hospitable bent. The Methodist pastors were fairly frequent visitors at their house; for you can always trust a parson of any denomination to discover the houses of his flock that keep a good table.

About half-way between where we lived and the village in which the Methodist chapel was situated was a public-house known as the "Clousden Hill," where the pitmen used to congregate at the week-ends to spend their spare cash, and some also that could ill be spared, in exchange for the doubtful pleasures of inebriation, and sometimes the certain one of a broken head in a drunken melee. This public-house was in bad repute among the religious folk. My friend's uncle probably had as little sympathy with such carousals as he had with teetotalers and their fad.

"I always had a high opinion of my uncle," he said, when we came to talk of our separate homes. "Although he was a religious man, there was not the least trace of any bigotry in his composition. He believed everyone had a right to their own opinion, and he was not ashamed of his own, even if they happened to be unpopular among his particular friends. I remember one evening there was a preacher waiting to accompany him to the week-night prayer-meeting. After he had washed and changed his clothes, they set out on the road. I suppose there must have been a quantity of coal-dust about my uncle's throat which the evening's tea had not successfully washed away. When they came to the 'Clousden Hill,' he somewhat astonished the minister by asking him if he was 'gannin in to hev a drink?' In very solemn and reproving tones the reverend gentleman replied: 'Mr. McPhail! considering the solemn function to which I am proceeding, it would scarcely be seemly of me to enter a public-house.'

"'Well, thoo can please thisel', of course,' said my uncle, 'if that's the way thoo looks at it; but A've a duty t' mi throat t' discharge, and if thoo dis'nt care t' wait, thoo can gan on t' the meeting, and Aw'll follow.'

"My uncle arrived at the meeting all in good time, and although he could put up a good prayer at any time, that night he seemed to surpass all his previous performances. The religious emotion of the meeting was so exalted that many declared their belief that they were on the eve of a great revival. Even the minister himself wondered at the marvellous spell of his outpourings.

"'What a grand man McPhail is,' said Mrs. Brown, as the meeting dispersed; 'and to-night he seemed to be filled with the Spirit.' 'Yes,' said her husband, 'I felt lifted nearer to God while he was praying than I ever remember since my conversion. Surely the power of the Lord was present with us to-night.'

"But, as you know," added my friend, "little boys often come to some very matter-of-fact conclusions, and I think I could have made a good guess as to the source of my uncle's inspiration."

As my friend pulled out his tobacco-pouch to refill his pipe, he found it was empty. "I am going to call at the tobacconist's a little further on," I said, "and I hope you will let me have the pleasure of refilling it." I thought the story was worth it.

JOSEPH BRYCE.

The Growing Fame of Paine.

As fast as open-minded persons become acquainted with the record and merits of Thomas Paine they begin to praise him. On invitation of Treasurer Harvey of the Thomas Paine National Historical Association, Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox became a member of that organisation, and having read the literature of the Society, wrote the following article, which has been published in the Hearst papers throughout the country. It is one brilliant writer's tribute to another:—

Thomas Paine (1737-1809): "The world is my country; to do good is my religion."

The man who named our country.

The man first to advocate independence for our country.

The man who did more to achieve this independence than any other man, giving his pen, tongue, sword, and pocket-book to the cause.

The man who in the darkest hour of the revolution wrote the Crisis, commencing with the words, "These are the times that try men's souls." (General Washington ordered this mighty work to be read to the Army once a week.)

The man who was joint author of the Declaration of Independence with Jefferson.

The man who borrowed ten million dollars from Louis XVI. to feed and clothe the American Army.

The man who established the Bank of North America in order to supply the Army.

Napoleon said in toasting him at a banquet: "Every city in the world should erect a gold statue to you."

The author of the Rights of Man, acknowledged to be the greatest work ever written for political freedom. This masterpiece gave free speech and a free press to England and America.

The man known as the "The Great Commoner of Mankind," the "Founder of the Republic of the World."

The man first to urge the making of our Constitution.

The man first to suggest the Federal Union of the States and to bring it about.

The man first to propose the Louisiana Purchase.

The man first to demand justice for women.

The man first to plead for dumb animals.

The man first to advocate international arbitration.

The man first to propose old age pensions.

The man first to propose "The land for the people" (single tax).

The man first to propose the care for the children of the poor at public expense.

The man who invented and built the first iron bridge.

For a century the world has forgotten its debt to Thomas Paine.

Indeed, that name has been branded by bigots and fanatics with all imaginable obloquy.

He was called an Atheist, a Freethinker, a blasphemer, simply because he could not believe in some old traditions which to-day are known to be allegorical, and which few intelligent minds regards seriously.

Thomas Paine was one of the founders of our great United States of America. We would undoubtedly be under British rule to-day but for the wise and wonderful efforts of Thomas Paine.

In January, 1776, he wrote and published a plea for American independence. Previous to this he had made a strong argument urging separation from the Mother Country.

No one had been daring enough to think of such a move before.

All the Colonists had rebelled against the unjust taxes and impositions, but Paine was the bold rebel who dared say Liberty.

After his pamphlet, Common Sense, was published the people were electrified. No pamphlet ever written sold in such vast numbers, nor did any ever before or since produce such marvellous results. Paine donated all the financial proceeds of the pamphlet to the cause of liberty (as he did with all of his other works). Washington, now converted, wrote to his friends in praise of Common Sense, asserting that Paine's words were "sound doctrine and unanswerable reasoning."

Jefferson, John Adams, Franklin, Madison—all the great statesmen of the time, wrote praisefully of Paine's "flaming arguments."

In July, six months after Common Sense had awakened the people, the Declaration of Independence, embracing the chief arguments of Paine's great pamphlet and much of its actual wording, was signed by the committee of patriots in Philadelphia.

The great revolution commenced at home. The oppressed Colonists took up arms at a great disadvantage, by reason of the lack of food, clothes, money, and munitions of war; but, inspired by the forceful message of Common Sense, they fought bravely and well.

When winter set in, however, the ill-clad, poorly nourished little Army had been greatly reduced in numbers by desertions from its ranks. Many of the soldiers were shoeless and left bloody footprints on the snow-covered line of march. All were but half-hearted at this time, and many utterly discouraged. Washington wrote most apprehensively concerning the situation to the Congress.

Paine, in the meantime (himself a soldier with General Greene's army on the retreat from Fort Lee, N.J., to Newark), realising the necessity of at once instilling renewed hope and courage in the soldiers if the cause of liberty were to be saved, wrote by campfire at night the first number of his soul-stirring Crisis, commencing with the words:—

> "These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country, but he who stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheap we esteem too lightly; it is dearness only that gives everything its value. Heaven knows how to put a proper price upon its goods; and it would be strange indeed if so celestial an article as freedom should not be highly rated."

Washington ordered the Crisis to be read aloud to every regiment of the Army. The effect was magical. Hope was renewed in every breast. Deserters returned to the ranks; men who had half-heartedly withheld from joining the Patriot Army took courage from Paine's thrilling words and shouldered muskets with the rest. The great cause, tottering on the brink of dissolution, was saved. Paine's Crisis did it.

Following the first number of the Crisis came others—thirteen in all—the last commencing with the words: "The times that tried men's souls are over."

Paine was not only a great author and statesman, but he was distinctively a pioneer, an originator, an inventor and creator. To him we are indebted for many of the world's greatest ideas and reforms.

It was Paine who first proposed the abolition of negro slavery; Paine was the first to suggest arbitration and international peace. Paine originally proposed old age pensions. These are a few of the other great ideas he fostered. He first suggested international copyright; first proposed the education of the children of the poor at public expense; first suggested a great republic of all the nations of the world; first proposed "the land for the people"; first suggested "the religion of humanity"; first proposed and first wrote the words "United States of America"; first suggested protection for dumb animals; first suggested justice to women; first proposed the purchase of the Louisiania territory; first suggested the Federal Union of States.

It is time the world awakened to his merits. With that end in view the Thomas Paine National Historical Association was organised in New York some years ago. Through the efforts of this Association, Thomas Paine is at last coming into his own. The Association intends that Thomas Paine shall occupy that niche in the world's Temple of Fame where it properly belongs, and to that end it bends its every endeavor. The Association has established its home at New Rochelle, N. Y., in the house that Paine built.

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—Miss E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 26 SUNDAY, JUNE 28, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

When we marry, the choice is voluntary, but the duties are not matter of choice. They are dictated by the nature of the situation.—EDMUND BURKE.

The Word of God.

An Open Letter to the
MINISTERS OF ALL CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

GENTLEMEN,—

I am going to address you on a very important subject, and I shall do it in very plain language. It is my desire to be understood, both by yourselves and by others who may read what I write. At the same time I have no intention to be rude or personal. The truth of what I utter may hurt your feelings, but in that case you have only yourselves to blame.

You are, all of you, as Christian ministers, the expounders of a book called the Bible, which you all allege to be the Word of God. Many of you, being Catholic priests, do not treat this book with exactly the same veneration as others who are Protestants; you put the Church first, and the Scriptures second, and make the truth and authenticity of the one rest upon the living authority of the other. Yet it is evident that all of you, Protestants and Catholics alike, would be lost without the Bible. Say what you will about tradition, and inspiration, and infallibility, it is after all the BOOK on which you depend. Were the Bible lost for ever, and all recollection of it obliterated from men's minds, the Christian religion would certainly disappear. The "fathers" and "divines" would be some assistance for a while; but unless you had the BOOK to quote from, to select texts from your sermons, and to put into the hands of children, nothing could save your faith from speedy, absolute, and irrecoverable destruction.

Now it is upon this Book—the Book of God, as you call it—that I wish to address you; and my right to address you is involved in my being an English citizen. In this country the Bible is only allowed to be printed by certain printers; it is "appointed" by the King, that is, by the Government, to be "read in all the churches" of the Established Religion; it is put into the hands of the children in our public schools, supported out of the rates and taxes, and they are forced to read it as a sacred volume; and, further, it is protected by law against such criticism as may be applied to other books, so that men are still liable to terms of imprisonment like common thieves for bringing it "into disbelief and contempt." This being the case, and your BOOK being set up by law as something holy, I have a right to ask you some questions about it. Every book that is published, in a certain sense challenges criticism; but a book like yours, which claims, and enjoys, such an exalted position, should have its reputation established beyond any reasonable doubt. Every man, I think, must agree that a book, which we may be imprisoned for bringing into "disbelief and contempt," ought to be God's Word, whether it is or not. For my part, however, I do not believe it is; and, before I have done, you will know why.

The Book of God which you use in this country is printed in English; in other countries it is printed in French, German, Italian, Spanish, and so forth. It is not alleged, however, that God wrote himself, or inspired men to write, in these languages. The Bibles in use in the various Christian countries are translations. Now I know something of translating, and I know it is simply impossible to translate from one language into another with perfect accuracy, and sometimes difficult to translate with any approach to accuracy. I am sure, therefore, even without an examination, that the English Bible cannot be the real Book of God. Besides, there is more than one translation into English. The Authorised Version, done in the reign of James I., in 1611, was very largely a collation of previous translations. The Revised Version was done by an "appointed" Committee of Christian scholars in the last generation; and it was done, I suppose, because the old version was unfaithful. This new version is found fault with in turn, and many disputes have arisen over special passages. In the face of these facts, I say that you have no right to pass off your Bible as the Word of God. You may declare it is pretty nearly the same, or as nearly as you can make it; but the very same it is not, and in learned books, not meant for the people's eyes, you admit its deficiency.

Have you then, I ask, the hardihood to stand up and tell me that this is all I am entitled to expect from my "Maker"? If a father has any communication to make to his children, should he not make it in their own language? Do you believe that God is not as able to speak in English as in Greek or Hebrew? Ought not his "Revelation" to be expressed clearly, definitely, unmistakably? Ought it not, therefore, to be expressed, not through questionable translations, but at first-hand, in all the several tongues on this planet? It would cost God no effort to do this, for he is omnipotent; and no trouble, for he is omniscient. Can you assign any legitimate reason for his not addressing us all in the only way in which we should be sure to understand him?

I will now go back to your real Book of God, if such exist, and ask you a few questions about that. Is not the Old Testament written in Hebrew? Is not Hebrew a language very hard to understand? Was it not written right on, from side to side of the parchment, without a break between the words? Was it not written without vowels? Would it not be difficult for one man to be quite sure of the meaning of another who wrote in this way? Would not the writer himself, after a lapse of time, be occasionally puzzled to know what he meant himself? Is it not a fact that the meaning of a vast number of passages in the Hebrew Bible is still disputed? Have not candid authorities, like Sir William Drummond, confessed that they hardly knew of any two Hebrew scholars who translated six consecutive verses in the same way? Is not all this now admitted by Christian scholars, such as the late Canon Driver and the late Professor Bruce? Does not the latter plainly declare that the Masoretic Hebrew text—that is, the text now in use, with vowel points—is only "a translation by Hebrew scholars of the vowelless original"? Does he not decisively assert that the "errorless autograph" is a "theological figment"?

A Critic in a Fog.

SOME years ago the Rev. F. C. Spurr left these shores for Australia. One of his objects in going there was to stem the flood of unbelief at the Antipodes. He went, he preached, he returned; and Australian unbelief does not appear to have been greatly affected by his presence or his preaching. He is said to have had a successful church, which is quite probable. But a well-filled church does not always mean a real gain to Christianity as a whole. It may only mean —it usually does mean—that one church is filled by depleting a dozen others, and the popular preacher is surrounded by a number of clerical failures. And meanwhile the number of those who reject Christianity altogether steadily increases.

This year Mr. Spurr returned to England. And one of his earliest discoveries is offered to the world in a recent issue of the Baptist Times, in the form of an article on "The Bankruptcy of Rationalism." Rationalism, he says, "has been brought to bay. Men are finding it out. Some of its chief exponents are being subjected to deadly criticism, from which they cannot emerge with honor. Rationalism is already bankrupt." There it is! Rev. F. C. Spurr has said it. And if further proof be needed, it is supplied. While Freethought societies are crying out for funds, the Daily Telegraph raised £10,000 for the Y.M.C.A.! Here is proof beyond question—to a clergyman. If £40,000 can be raised for a Christian institution, there must be something in it. It commands respect—Christian respect. It carries conviction—to a Christian. What a pity Jesus did not make his appearance with a good fat banking account in his hand.

Rationalism means with Mr. Spurr two things. At one time it means the control of human affairs by reason; at another time it means a system of thought that is in opposition to religion. And he skips from one to the other, with obviously no clear perception of the distinction between the two. Part of the time he is attempting to prove that reason cannot be trusted, and so saws off the branch of the tree on which he is sitting. For if reason is not to be trusted, what are we to say of Mr. Spurr's reasoning? It must be admitted that he gives a fair proof of his own contention, but he is certainly not aware of it. On the contrary, he goes along quite cheerfully reasoning against the use of reason, and never realises that, blundering as are his own efforts, they yet serve the purpose of demonstrating the foolishness of his own position.

Of course, reason is not an infallible guide in human affairs, but it is the best we have. Very often we cannot be certain we are right when we have used what reason we possess; but we are still less certain if we ignore reason, and act in opposition to its dictates. And, in any case, reason—human reason—as a force in human affairs is here, and its function is to analyse, discriminate, and to pass judgment. We all do this; Mr. Spurr does it. Talking glibly about "intuition" and "instinct" does not alter the fact, but only obscures it, because people have such very hazy ideas as to what is intuition and what is instinct. For the justification of instinct or "intuition" is reached ultimately by reason. We cannot avoid reason passing judgment upon the value of the qualities of human nature whether they are of a ratiocinative character or otherwise. The "Rationalist" does not ignore the non-ratiocinative nature of many of the factors of life; he merely asserts that, so far as they become or can become the objects of conscious judgment, the only sound rule is to test them by reason. Indeed, we cannot avoid doing this. For denial of the rule is really an admission of the rule. To reason against reason is still to reason, even though it be reasoning of an absurd and self-contradictory character.

After protesting that reason cannot be a guide in human affairs, Mr. Spurr discovers that things are ruled by Reason—with a capital letter—after all. "There is a Supreme Reason in the universe, but it is not human reason." Well, if it is not human reason, then it is probably not reason at all. The only ground on which I can say that other men have reason, or on which I may assume that animals have reason, is that their actions conform to mine. Human or animal reason is the only reason that anyone knows. And if we recognise reason anywhere else it must be because it manifests its presence in substantially the same way. The reason of man is only a fragment of the "complete Reason." But whether human reason is a fragment or the whole, it cannot alter its quality. If the whole is like the parts, the parts must be like the whole. A "fragment" of anything must be like the whole thing, otherwise it is not a fragment at all. So that, in the same sentence, after protesting that the reason in the universe is not human reason, Mr. Spurr ends by affirming that it is the same as human reason—only there is more of it. Oh, the childishness of this man!

These would-be philosophers, how simple they are! They seem to imagine that words acquire a special value if they are only printed with capital letters. "We believe," says Mr. Spurr, "that since the part is personal, the Whole cannot be less than personal." Mr. Spurr does not really mean "less than personal," he means that the whole is personal. For that is the essence of his Theism. The Atheist is not concerned whether the "whole" is less or more than personal. His point is that it is not personal. And whether it is less or more, if it is one or the other, it is different. What Mr. Spurr really wants to prove is that there is a personality controlling the universe other than human personality. What he says is that it is more than human personality. Well, in that case, it may not be personality at all. For the moment you destroy the characteristics of what we mean by personality, you have no right to give it that name. If a cat hasn't legs or a spinal column, if it breathes through gills instead of lungs, and lives in the water instead of on land, what kind of a cat is it? Of course, you may call this a cat if you please. So may Mr. Spurr call his production philosophy; but the character of a thing is not derived from the name, it is the name that should describe the thing.

Mr. Spurr asks Rationalists to face Sir Oliver Lodge's question and say frankly whether they believe that the human species represent the highest form of life in the universe. I do not see that there is anything to face. At present, the human species is the highest we know. It is the highest that Sir Oliver Lodge knows. And until some evidence is forthcoming it is stupid either to believe or disbelieve. What Sir Oliver Lodge really meant—but did not say—was whether it was possible that higher forms of life existed. Well, it is possible —all things are possible that do not involve a contradiction. But suppose this to be so, and suppose there exists evidence enough to warrant a belief on the subject, we are no nearer a God than we were before. All we have is a species of superman—but not a deity. It might make room for some of Sir Oliver's "spooks," although, judging from the communications said to have been received from them, their superiority is not very obvious. And the joke of the whole situation is, that although Mr. Spurr blunders into the same confusion as Sir Oliver Lodge, he does not accept the grounds on which Sir Oliver really bases his beliefs.

How does Mr. Spurr establish the bankruptcy of Rationalism? First, the "New Science" is proving itself the foe of Rationalism. "The Materialists have gone; the Vitalists have arrived." Biology, chemistry, and evolution are aids to faith. The new philosophy, in the person of Bergson, is "a thorn in the sides of Rationalists." "The science of comparative religion has become our weapon." "Human nature is turning on Rationalism." There does not seem any adequate reason why Mr. Spurr should not extend this list. It is so easy to talk, and mere assertions give so much comfort to a great many people. And to meet Mr. Spurr on his own ground one need only make assertions in the opposite direction. Whatever the "New Science" may mean, science is more rationalistic and more materialistic than ever. Even Sir Oliver Lodge disclaims being a Vitalist, and says that Vitalism is useless as an explanation of anything. Bergson is a mere fashion with a class, and in any case does not find a God essential to his system. At any rate, he ignores him. Mr. Watson may return to his "Father's House," but others are taking apartments elsewhere. And comparative mythology has demonstrated the common origin of all religious beliefs in the fear-haunted mind of the primitive savage. As assertions these are quite as good as those of Mr. Spurr, and they have the additional merit of being provable in detail.

We have had, says Mr. Spurr, a century and a quarter of Rationalism. It has had the help of "such important Rationalists as John Stuart Mill, Professor Huxley, Ernest Renan, Herbert Spencer, Ernst Haeckel, Friedrich Nietzsche, Goethe, Schopenhauer, and others." Mr. Spurr is convinced that had one quarter of what they said been true, the Church must have inevitably perished. And yet, see what has happened! Professor Gilbert Murray is compelled to admit that a reaction has set in against Rationalism. The Church is alive, there is a new stirring of religious life. Above all, there is the £10,000 raised by the Daily Telegraph.

Let me—although it is not easy—treat Mr. Spurr seriously for a moment. In what has the Freethought attack failed? What has become of the Bible that Paine attacked? Of course, so far as the mere paper and type is concerned, it is still here. But so far as belief is concerned, it is Paine's Bible that is believed in by the majority of educated Christians. What has become of the doctrine of eternal damnation? Why, Christian papers were only recently denouncing Roman Catholics for continuing to issue a little book teaching what all of them once preached. What has become of miracles? of a particular Providence? and a dozen other doctrines? They are either dead or dying. What has become of the power of the Church? As Churches, that is, so far as they represent supernaturalistic doctrines, they are afraid to interfere openly in social affairs. They can only do so in the name of social betterment or moral improvement. There never was a more brilliant triumph in human affairs than that marked by the last hundred years of Freethought. And it has been very largely brought about by men without money, without position, fighting one of the strongest, wealthiest, and most powerful superstitions in all human history. Of course, there is the possibility of reaction. That is always possible in human affairs. Wise men are fully aware of the fact; but only fools or knaves count it a gain.

"The Difference Christ is Making."

A SERIES of leading articles, bearing the above title, and written presumably by the editor, Sir Robertson Nicoll, is now appearing in the British Weekly, the claims so dogmatically set forth in which are at once of so surprising and groundless a character as to call for a most critical examination. The central and often-repeated contention is that whatever improvement is effected in the moral and social conditions of the people is due solely to the influence of Christ. No attempt whatever is made to substantiate such an assertion. It is taken for granted that the excellence of the Christian religion is demonstrable from history, and that the supreme argument for its truth is derivable from the numerous benefits which mankind have received from the Galilean. Now, we maintain that no divine has a moral right to make such an assertion without proving its truth. It is stated that "to the great and simple intellect of Walter Scott, and many others, the effects of Christianity on slavery and polygamy were sufficient proofs of its divine origin"; but a vague statement of that kind is evidentially valueless. Harriet Beecher Stowe knew much more about slavery than Walter Scott, and surely no one could read Uncle Tom's Cabin, published in 1853, and conscientiously say that the effects of Christianity on slavery were sufficient proofs of its divine origin. It may be objected that the famous book just mentioned is only a work of fiction; but unfortunately for the objectors, the distinguished authoress issued A Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin, which contained the original facts and documents upon which her heart-breaking story was founded. What effect has Christ ever had upon polygamy? The Gospel Jesus never uttered a word in condemnation of it, while in the Epistles only bishops are exhorted to have but one wife. It is well known that neither in Greece nor in Rome, nor among the Germans, was polygamy practised, while among the barbarian kings of Gaul, under Christianity, it prevailed unchecked for several centuries. To the Mormons it still forms an integral part of religion.

The writer of the articles under consideration is flagrantly heedless of the facts of life. Take the following extract as a sample:—

> "It seems idle in the present day for any man to separate himself from Christianity and say, 'Though I am not a Christian, I think so-and-so.' In fact, he is a Christian in many respects, and he cannot cease to be one, however much he may wish it. He might just as well try to cease to be a Briton. The Spirit of Christ is to be found in strange places, and cannot be restricted to areas defined by strict lines of creed."

This is sheer nonsense, and the writer ought to be ashamed of himself for having put it on paper. There are thousands of people in this country at the present moment who do separate themselves from Christianity, repudiating it root and branch. In no respect whatever are they Christians, no matter what Sir Robertson Nicoll may say to the contrary. Though they will never dream of trying to cease to be Britons, they have succeeded in completely ceasing to be Christians. The object of that absurd extract is to break the force of "the objection that so much of what has been won is due to the efforts of those who are not Christians." To show that such a plea does not fully apply to this country, at least, he declares that in many respects we are all Christians. He might just as well call noble-minded and good-hearted Chinese Christians. As an illustration of the difference Christ has made, Sir William supplies the following quotation from a paper on the slums of Scotland which appeared in the Glasgow Evening News only a few weeks ago:—

> "After careful study and personal examination, I do not hesitate to say that the condition of housing in Scotland is a standing disgrace to the nation. I find, not only in the big towns, but in the smaller towns, a great scarcity of houses and a lamentable state of congestion, misery, and wretchedness. Nothing short of a revolution will put Scotland in the position it ought to occupy."

We were extremely surprised to see that dismal report in an article on the difference Christ has made, and could not understand what purpose it was intended to serve. Here is another puzzling utterance:—

> "Nevertheless, it must be owned that after two thousand years the Christian Church is very far from the comprehension and the faithful following of her Master."

It is a most curious fact that the improvements cited as due to Christ are all of a very recent origin, which proves, if Sir William is right, that the Spirit of Christ is coming into vigorous life when the Church of Christ is dying. It is incontrovertible that the overwhelming majority of Britishers are no longer churchgoers; but if the words of the Gospel Jesus are to be taken as they stand, his Spirit was to dwell in the Church and make her co-extensive with the human race. From his throne in her midst he would convict and convert the whole world. That prophecy was made two thousand years ago, and yet to-day the Church, so far from winning the world, is rapidly losing the bit of it she once gained. However, we are assured that "the Spirit of Christ is to be found in strange places," having evidently abandoned the Church into which he was originally sent. In other words, history has signally falsified Christ's prophecy, and his spirit, in consequence, keeps strange company. The truth is, that what Sir William regards as the Spirit of Christ is, in reality, that rational Humanism which has slowly been coming into its kingdom ever since the revival of learning, and the consequent gradual decline of supernaturalism. The reverend gentleman contends that the twentieth century is a vast improvement upon the eighteenth, and so it doubtless is; but the explanation of the difference lies in the diffusion of natural knowledge and the decay of supernatural beliefs.

Some Christian sayings become wonderfully illuminating when the hand of criticism is laid upon them. One of them is, "Trust in God and keep your powder dry." If you neglect to keep your powder dry, your trust in God will be of no avail to you; but, on the other hand, if you do keep your powder dry, it makes no difference whether you trust in God or not. Russia was defeated in the war with Japan, in spite of her trust in God, because she had an inefficient Army; and Japan won, despite her Atheism, because she was wide awake and up-to-date in her military equipments. As Napoleon so aptly said, "The good God is always on the side of great battalions," or as Julius Civiles put it, "God sides with the strongest." Another equally significant saying is, "God helps those that help themselves." Of course, he is the help, not of the helpless, as the hymn has it, but of the helpful. Those who really need help never get it from above, while those who help themselves have no means of ascertaining whether God helps them or not. That is to say, the Almighty never gives any direct evidence that he deserves to be so called. The same principle fully applies to the Spirit of Christ which, Sir William informs us, "is to be found in strange places." We will take one or two of his own illustrations of the difference Christ has made. He describes the eighteenth century as a period when people took their lot easily, declining to trouble themselves with great schemes, accepting things as they were, living friendly, social, and easy lives, seeing, as a rule, only what they wanted to see, and then adds:—

> "And yet every real student of the period knows that the condition of the poor was appalling. The want of work, the scarcity of provisions, the horrors of workhouses, the swarms of vagrants were notorious and undeniable."

He avers that though pity and kindness were to be found here and there, the prevailing mood was stern. The early Methodists were hated because of their sympathy with the poorest classes. For that reason, the Duchess of Buckingham denounced the impertinence of Methodism and its outrage on good breeding in reducing all ranks to the common level of sinners, saying to the Countess of Huntingdon: "It is monstrous to be told that you have a heart as sinful as the common wretches that crawl on the earth." Sir Robertson Nicoll is of opinion that the condition of the poor is incalculably better in the twentieth century. Certainly an improvement has occurred, but it is so very slight that to treat it as the work of an omnipotent Christ would be to insult him. The bare idea of its being due to a God of infinite love is unutterably ludicrous. The existence of rich and poor, of class divisions and antagonism, of prisons and lunatic asylums, of workhouses and reformatories, cannot possibly be reconciled with the existence of an infinitely powerful, wise, and loving Heavenly Father. A perfect Creator and an imperfect creation are inconceivable anomalies. A Gospel described as the power of God unto salvation in a world still steeped in degradation and woe is the most fantastic stupidity with which the world has ever been tormented and mocked.

And yet, after all, Christ has made a difference. Belief in him has resulted in all sorts of evils under which Christendom is still groaning. The elevation of an imaginary world, with its equally imaginary interests, to a position of supreme importance necessarily led to a shameful neglect of the real interests of the only real world known to us. To exhort people to think continually of death and fear it, to set their affection on the things that are above, not on the things that are upon the earth, and to devote their whole time to the task of preparing to meet God beyond the tomb, is to degrade them in their own eyes, and to discourage the cultivation of the noblest qualities of manhood. The passion of love for Christ has never failed to express itself in hatred and cruelty towards all heretical Christians and non-Christians. Happily, the imaginary Being who has made such wicked differences is at last passing; and like his coming, his passing is both slow and sure. More happily still, his passing implies, and is in fact caused by, the Coming of Man to make the world anew.

"Meredith" for the Million.

Selected Poems by George Meredith. (Constable & Co. Ltd.) 1s. net.; 1914.

THE publication of this volume arouses mixed feelings. Had it been issued years ago at the modest price of a shilling, it would have helped to widen the reputation of a very great writer and thinker during his lifetime. As it is, it will but increase the wreaths upon his tomb. The selection is by the Master himself, and when that is said, all is said. For, by virtue of his splendid gifts, Meredith's best work remains among the brightest gems of English literature, so rich in glorious genius and transcendent talent. Tennyson has told us that, when Byron died, it was as though the firmament had lost a mighty star, in whose vanishing the world was left to chaos and night. Meredith was more to us than Byron, for he had been a living glory of our State for over half a century, and the star of his genius had wheeled so long and with such majesty that we had grown inured to his presence, and looked upon him as essential to the aspect of our heaven. So continuous was his influence, that the intellectual life of our time runs in a channel largely of his making, and to ends that but for him had been shaped far other than they were.

A striking instance of the provincialism of the average English reader was the comparative unpopularity of George Meredith. Popularity, of course, may mean nothing or everything. It may be that of "You Made Me Love You" or of "The Messiah," of "The Rosary" or of "Don Quixote." It may be absolutely damning, or the one incontestable proof of supreme merit. The tests are universality and endurance, for only noble work shall win and keep a lasting position. The best appeals in the long run to all, like "Hamlet," though not in equal degree. With no advertisement, no clique, no furious opposition, but by sheer merit, George Meredith won his place in art.

Like Shakespeare, Meredith unlocks his heart in his verse. His magnificent novels remain among the finest works in our language; but in the poems we have Meredith's own passion; his great heart beating at the sight of love and of heroism. The poems are so personal that one is tempted to imagine that, instead of having worked on the book, the author had worked straight on us. He defies, like Whitman, our æsthetics, and proves that the greatest thoughts are those which are quickest dismembered and absorbed by the reader, and turned into part of himself.

Genius refuses to be labelled. Study these poems separately, and you think you can classify the author. In one poem he seems to be optimistic, in another he appears pessimistic; and then, perhaps, "Juggling Jerry" or "The Old Chartist" comes to upset the pleasant little theory. At the bedrock of his work lies the Horatian liking for the golden mean.

To dip into this book is, of course, to re-read the old favorites, and to bring home more forcibly how large is the proportion wherein we hear "the voice of great Nature." Her praise is hymned in "The Woods of Westermain" and in many other glorious lines, such as "The Thrush in February" and "Love in the Valley," where the golden cadences linger in the ear like the notes of an ascending skylark.

Those who think that poets are always extremists will do well to ponder Meredith's lines, "Lucifer in Starlight," one of the sanest and noblest utterances in the language:—

"On a starred night, Prince Lucifer uprose,
Tired of his dark dominions swung the fiend,
Above the rolling ball in cloud part screened,
Where sinners hugged their spectre of repose,
Poor prey to his hot fit of pride were those.
And now upon his western wing he leaned,
Now his huge bulk o'er Afric's sands careened,
Now the black planet shadowed Arctic snows.
Soaring through wider zones that pricked his scars
With memory of the old revolt from Awe,
He reached a middle height, and at the stars,
Which are the brain of heaven, he looked, and sank.
Around the ancient track marched rank on rank,
The army of unalterable law."

The same perfect sanity appears in the lines from "Modern Love":—

"Ah, what a dusty answer gets the soul
When hot for certainties in this our life!—
In tragic hints here seek what evermore
Moves dark as yonder midnight ocean's force,
Thundering like ramping hosts of warrior horse,
To throw that faint thin line upon the shore."

A more ironic note is sounded in the dramatic "Juggling Jerry," where the dying showman says, with a fine touch of stoicism:—

"It's past parsons to console us;
No, nor no doctor fetch for me.
I can die without my bolus;
Two of a trade, lass, never agree!
Parson and doctor!—don't they love rarely,
Fighting the devil in other men's fields!
Stand up yourself and match him fairly:
Then see how the rascal yields."

Read Meredith's magnificent tribute to Shakespeare:—

"O lived the Master now to paint us Man,
That little twist of brain would ring a chime
Of whence it came and what it caused, to start
Thunders of laughter, clearing air and heart."

In another sonnet he describes the Master's laugh:—

"broad as ten thousand beeves
At pasture!"

It is a resplendent distinction that, apart from the play-going public, who agree to crown Shakespeare as the King, his most resolute partisans are those of his own household, poets and novelists, men with the blood of genius flowing in their veins. And in Valhalla assuredly the artist of "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel," shall not sit far below the artist who gave us "Hamlet." For Meredith through a long life lifted his voice in praise of high and noble things:—

"Are not his footsteps followed by the eyes
Of all the good and wise?
Though the warm day is over, yet they seek
Upon the lofty peak
Of his pure mind the roseate light that glows
O'er deaths perennial snows."

The Greater Bacon.

OXFORD has been busy celebrating the seventh centenary of the birth of Roger Bacon. A statue in the University has been unveiled, addresses delivered, and it is proposed to translate and publish the whole of his writings. The interest in Bacon is, of course, mainly historical; but from this point of view he is worthy of more attention than any thinker that Christendom produced till the end of the sixteenth century. Sir Archibald Geikie well described him as "one of the most remarkable men that ever studied within the walls of the University of Oxford." He mastered practically all the knowledge of his time, and was the real founder of the experimental philosophy of Europe. In many respects he was a greater and clearer thinker than his famous namesake, Francis Bacon. At all events, the latter had the advantage of coming several centuries later, and pursuing his work in a freer atmosphere and under much more favorable conditions than the thirteenth century monk.

Bacon was a Somersetshire man, born at Ilchester in 1214. Like most men of his age who longed for genuine knowledge, his principal teachers were Mohammedan and Jewish scientists. After working for years, and spending all he possessed on manuscripts, the manufacturing of instruments, and the cost of experiments, he seems to have experienced a season of depression, during which he joined the Franciscans. His new masters forbade him to write anything under pain of imprisonment, and for some time the order was observed. Then the man's natural craving asserted itself, and "some few chapters, written at the entreaty of friends," called down the anger of his superiors, and Bacon was sent to Paris to await the pleasure of the General of the Order. His pleasure was soon expressed, and Bacon went into an imprisonment that lasted ten years. Here he remained, deprived of books, writing materials, and instruments. The Catholic Times calls him "that illustrious Franciscan," and says that the Order is proud of its son. Its appreciation of him while alive was ten years imprisonment.

The malice of his enemies overreached itself. It was reported to the Pope, Urban IV., that Bacon had written works of an heretical nature. One of his chaplains—who afterwards became Clement IV.—was commissioned to inquire into the matter, and he, on his election to the papal chair, ordered Bacon to supply him with a copy of his writings. The cost of materials alone was great and Bacon was penniless. The Pope sent nothing, and the Franciscans would give nothing. "How often," writes Bacon, "was I repulsed and looked upon as a shameless beggar. Distressed above all that can be imagined, I compelled my friends, even those who were in necessitous circumstances, to contribute what they had, to raise money at interest, to sell their property, to pawn the rest." The money, however, was found; and in about eighteen months Bacon wrote the Opus Majus, Opus Minus, and Opus Tertium, three works that place him in the front rank of the world's thinkers.

A few of his sayings will well illustrate the bent of Bacon's mind: "Physicists ought to know that their science is powerless unless they apply to it the power of mathematics, without which, observation languishes and is incapable of certitude." "He who knows not mathematics cannot know any other science; and what is more, he cannot discover his own ignorance, or find its proper remedies." "The shortness of life requires that we should choose for our study the most useful objects, and exhibit knowledge with all clearness and certitude." "Authority is valueless unless its warranty is shown; it does not explain, it only forces us to believe. And so far as reason is concerned, we cannot distinguish between sophism and proof unless we verify the conclusions by experience and practice." Experiment and verification; these were the keynotes of Bacon's teaching and which entitle him to be called the first of the moderns.

How much he actually discovered, or how much he received from his Mohammedan teachers is uncertain. But it is certain that he was acquainted with the manufacture of gunpowder, that he made phosphorous, laid down rules for the construction of a telescope, suggested reaching the Indies by sailing to the west, and a reform of the calendar that was not carried out until 1582. There are hints in his writings that he was not unacquainted with the power and uses of steam, speculated on a machine that appears to have been a diving bell, and in astronomy, botany, optics, and chemistry, was as universal a genius as Da Vinci; but one working under such difficulties that, after forty years labor, there was wrung from him the despairing cry, "I repent that I have given myself so much trouble for the good of mankind." He died in 1294.

In the history of Christianity there is nothing more disgraceful than the Church's treatment of Roger Bacon. Altogether, nearly a fourth of his life was spent in prison, prohibited from writing under penalty of "many days' fasting on bread and water." For centuries after his death his writings were only studied surreptitiously by the few. Not for 450 years after his death was his Opus Majus translated into English. The Oxford orators glibly attribute Bacon's persecutions to the faults of his age. So they were; but the dominant factor of the age was the Christian Church. It was that which made the life of the student of science so unbearable. It was that which caused Bacon to be handed down in popular legends as a mere mediæval wonder-worker. It was the Church which embittered his life, as it embittered the lives of thousands of others. It was the Church that caused Bacon to complain from his cell that he was "unheard, forgotten, buried." The first of the moderns, Roger Bacon paid the price that so many have paid who faced Christian superstition in the interests of a liberated humanity.

Acid Drops

There was a National Liberal Club dinner the other evening to celebrate the completion of a hundred years of peace between Great Britain and America. Andrew Carnegie, the multi-millionaire, and Lord Shaw, both of Dunfermline, were amongst the speakers, and were well reported in the Daily News. So was the Rev. Dr. Horton, who, we suppose, represented Jesus Christ,—who gets on better with rich society now than he used to in the early days of his career. Finally came the statement that "Mr. J. M. Robertson, M.P., Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade, presided over this gathering." Just as if he were the mere toast-master of a public festival, instead of being in all probability the brainiest man in the assembly. Mr. Robertson presumably made a speech from the chair, but not a single sentence of it is reported. His name is included like "the stars also" in the Bible story of Creation, simply because it could hardly be omitted. Such a vulgar insult must be owing to Mr. Robertson's being a well-known Freethinker. The Daily News represents the Nonconformist Conscience—the most wonderful Conscience on earth.

The "assembly of converts" on the "Strand Citadel" platform at one meeting of the Salvation Army's International Congress contained, according to "Colonel" Kitching,—

> "442 ex-drunkards
> 47 ex-burglars
> 58 ex-gamblers and 'bookies'
> 12 ex-pugilists."

Still the London police have plenty to do. Isn't there some mistake with the figures or the descriptions?

A negro choir from the Southern States sang a "coon hymn." This was sung to a kind of cake-walk. The first verse was as follows:—

> "When trouble came in Noah's time,
> My, didn't it rain!
> Forty days and forty nights,
> My, didn't it rain!"

This is the stuff that is going to save the world—if we are to credit King George and Queen Mary, and above all Ex-Queen Alexandra. What faith some people do possess!

"An Hour in Hell" was one of the most "blasphemous" of Mr. Foote's early lecture-titles. Thirty years ago it positively frightened people. A good many Christians came to hear the lecture in fear and trembling, half expecting to see a divine judgment on the wicked editor of the worst paper in the world. It was openly suggested by well-known good Christians that the local authorities should prevent such awful lectures from being delivered. Owners and lessees of halls were told that they ought to be ashamed to let their premises for such purposes. Even some old-fashioned Freethinkers expostulated with Mr. Foote for "outraging" Christian feelings in that way. In vain did he reply that he only proposed to take people into Hell for an hour, and bring them out again, instead of leaving them there for ever and ever. His jocosity only made the matter worse. In some provincial places feeling ran so high that there was talk of arresting him. But nothing happened except to Hell itself, which suffered a good deal in the course of the campaign. Since then Hell has suffered on all sides. Its fires have failed; it has cooled down in an astonishing manner; it is in many parts a safe receptacle for frozen meat. And that "blasphemous" title of Mr. Foote's which caused such a commotion is so meek and mild nowadays that like the "Hades" that takes the place of "Hell" in the Revised Version of the New Testament it would hardly frighten a cat off a garden wall.

What a change has taken place during those thirty odd years! Here is an illustration. One of the features of the recent Salvation Army Congress in London was "A Day With God." The words suggested a picnic with the Almighty, at so much a head, with the "Blood and Fire" Army taking the commission on the sale of tickets. It would be hard to imagine anything more "blasphemous," unless it was unprintable. Yet a London morning newspaper, of unimpeachable piety, mildly calls it "an expressive phrase" if a little strong for some of the more sensitive believers. "Expressive!" That's good! We shall get back in time to the innocent simplicity of the miracle-plays. Some future General Booth—perhaps the present one—will be advertising a cinema scene between "Old Nick and Jahveh," or the "Bethlehem Boy and the Championship"—or something else of that sort. Oh, yes; the world does move—and even Christians move with it.

General Booth was loud in his praises of the way in which the press has treated the Army meetings. And there is no doubt that the praise has been earned. Journalists have discovered that the Army is good "copy," and in addition the Army has a very good press service of its own. Reports of its own meetings are sent out broadcast, it prepares all sorts of statistics and picturesque accounts of its own work, and these go into various papers without readers being in the least aware that they are reading the Army's own accounts of its doings. It would be well if editors of papers, when they publish these accounts, print with them a notice, "Supplied by the Salvation Army." Readers would then be in a better position for estimating their value. As it is, the Army gives the reporter a statement, the statement is published in a newspaper, and then the Army quotes, or reprints, its own statement as independent testimony. Perfect candor from a newspaper office would be a new Book of Revelations.

General Booth says that the Salvation Army still believes in a real God, a real Devil, a real heaven, and a real hell. We may add that it also believes in real cash.

"Providence" has been leaving the "militant" Suffragettes in the lurch lately. What are a few burnings and explosions in churches and other empty places to killing children by lightning, swamping London, digging fatal chasms in Paris, wrecking big liners, smashing trains, and other "Acts of God"? Man—and even woman—is nowhere in the destructive line when that same "Providence" starts business.

"The Act of God," by the way, is not an infidel joke. It is a legal finding in the courts of England. The coroner's jury returned it the other day in the case of the children who were struck dead by lightning near London. That ended the matter. There was no suggestion of proceedings against the responsible party. Maybe it was thought impossible to serve the summons.

Mr. Bottomley does well to denounce the "God" that Christian clergymen preach about as the author of these "judgments." But, after all, this is the God of the Bible, this is the God of Christianity.

There are no limits to the ways in which priests everywhere seek to saddle their maintenance upon the whole of the population. In Pennsylvania the clergy are trying to get either free passes or reduced rates in travelling about the country. The legal authorities have, however, ruled that such a concession would be contrary to the Public Company Law. The argument of the clergy is that they are paid such poor salaries that they cannot afford the expenses of travelling. The reply to this seems clear. Let their congregations pay them more, or let them stay at home. If the congregations desire their ministers to travel—and we can well believe that in many cases they do—they should pay their expenses. There is no reason whatever why these congregations should expect the community at large to pay for the relief they get from the minister travelling from home.

"Here in England," says the Catholic Times, "the Christian religion is decaying with a rapidity none the less swift that it is so silent. Men are not opposing Christianity loudly. They are denying it that compliment. They are dropping it quietly. Year by year England becomes more indifferent to religion, more materialistic, more secular." We do not believe that things are vitally different in England to what they are elsewhere. The truth is that the movement away from Christianity is co-extensive with civilisation. It is proceeding more rapidly in some countries than in others, but that is the only difference. All the "revivals" and all the efforts of the clergy can do no more than produce a semblance of vitality in an organism that is stricken with death.

Of course, the Catholic Times makes this alarmist pronouncement for a purpose. Its text is the necessity of closer union amongst Catholics for political action. We Catholics, it says, "will have influence with the overwhelming majority of our fellow countrymen in proportion to our unity among ourselves, and the weight that such unity will enable us to bring to bear upon the electorate, the candidates, and the party in power." Quite so; and that does foreshadow a real danger. A party strongly knit together may, although a minority, yet wield a great power in the State. And when the ground of this union is not a purely social one, we have all the worst evils of religious bigotry and tyranny before us. It means that the Roman Church is prepared to sacrifice all other considerations to its own aggrandisement. What this means, affairs in France, Spain, and Italy have shown. Fortunately, the Roman Church itself is not secure from the operation of those forces that are causing the decay of religious belief among other sects, and every advance of Freethought minimises the danger indicated by the Catholic Times. There is only one sure way of checking the anti-social tendencies of Christianity, and that is by multiplying the number of Freethinkers.

"The River of Doubt" is a newspaper headline referring to ex-President Roosevelt's alleged discovery of a 1,000 miles long river in Central Brazil. We hope that there is more truth in the discovery of the river than in Teddy's description of Thomas Paine as a "filthy little Atheist," which is a world's record of three lies in three words.

Mr. Israel Zangwill says, "The New Testament was entirely written by laymen of my race." It would have been more to boast of had the work been written by honest men of any race. And how about the Old Testament?

According to Mr. Alan Dale, the well-known dramatic critic of the New York American, the Roman Catholics have a censorship of the stage, and they have a white list of plays that their people may see. What an independent, manly citizen the Roman Catholic is, to be sure! The priest tells him what to read; makes out a list of his amusements; at election times dictates who he is to vote for; and keeps one eye on his salary all the time.

In that religious paper, the Referee, Mr. George R. Sims, writing in "Mustard and Cress," says: "Hallo, Up Above! This is June, not December." The pious readers will be apprehensive of "Dagonet's" future.

Writing in Lloyd's Weekly News, Monsignor Hugh Benson tells a tale of a mediæval Yorkshire village, where a caravan of a bull-fight arrived on a Sunday. Of the population fifty went to church, and about 450 to the bull-fight, and the church-roof fell in and killed the faithful fifty. The editor says that Monsignor Benson will answer the difficulty next week. By that time his readers will have recovered from the shock.

Commenting on the Weekly Rest-Day Bill, an artful measure introduced by the Sabbatarians, Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper reminds the promoters that twenty millions of persons read the Sunday papers, and that the restriction of Sunday labor would interfere only with the production of the Monday morning papers. A palpable hit!

The Christian World thinks but little of the Day of Intercession for the Church in Wales, apparently because the churches only drew small audiences. At Norwich Cathedral only twenty-five persons were present. We should have thought that number quite enough. All that seems necessary is to call the Lord's attention to the matter. But the Christian World evidently thinks numbers the important thing, and that the Lord, looking down on Norwich, will say: "What's this? Intercession for the Church in Wales! Wants me to upset the Government Bill, and only twenty-five present! Not good enough. Next business." We are afraid the Christian World does not discriminate between the Deity and Mr. Asquith.

From a note in the Christian World we see that Rev. Dr. Griffith Jones is astonished at the public listening so eagerly to Sir Oliver Lodge and others when they deliver themselves on religious problems. So are we; but we can easily understand it. Ordinary men know that the clergy are not better informed than themselves, and they apparently hope that men of science, who are informed on other subjects, will have some information to dispense on this one. What people have to realise is that, on such questions as the existence of God or the soul, Sir Oliver Lodge is no greater authority than the most ignorant of Salvation Army preachers. Both of them can do no more than profess belief. Neither can show the slightest evidence to warrant that belief.

Dr. Griffith Jones is laboring under the delusion that a clergyman is an expert in religion, and therefore ought to be listened to with attention. He is nothing of the kind. He may be an expert so far as a knowledge of religious teachings is concerned, but that is all. He may be able to say authoritatively how one ought to stand when saying prayers, what kind of dress a parson should wear, or what doctrine is orthodox; but as regards the real meaning of what are called "religious" frames of mind, or concerning the origin of religious beliefs, the ordinary clergyman exhibits a most deplorable ignorance. That is really the condition of his being a clergyman, and his education is designed to perpetuate it. He is not trained to understand the significance of numerous states of mind—both normal and morbid—masquerading as religion. He is not trained to observe the significance of the same feelings that in one case manifest themselves as religious convictions and in another case express themselves in relation to purely social activities. He is like a man discoursing on the steam-engine in the absence of a knowledge of physics and mechanics. And, as a matter of fact, the world's reliable knowledge about religion has not been derived from theologians, but from those who have taken religious phenomena as part of phenomena in general, to be explained on the same lines that science has found so helpful elsewhere.

Pastor Russell, the American evangelist, has hired a London theatre in which he is giving a cinematograph illustration of the Bible story. Pastor Russell is a "whole-hogger" in religion, and accepts the Bible in the most literal manner. His performance is called Creation, and we can see great possibilities in it. Eve's adjustment of the fig-leaf—once an actual part of the old miracle play—would have to be omitted, but the separation of light from darkness, the creation of woman from a rib of Adam, with other items, should make interesting pictures. One of the religious papers says that Pastor Russell's comments on the pictures may be treated as "comic relief." The absurdity seems to lie in the preacher taking the Bible story to mean what it says.

The new Chinese Review, published in London, but edited by two Chinamen, contains a comment by one of its editors that is well worth attention. In 1912, he says, "the honorable and high-minded" promoters of the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition decided to add to it a touch of Chinese color. So it was proposed to install an opium den, and attempts were made to hire Chinese sailors to play the part of opium smokers. Now, says this editor, suppose the tables were turned, and the promoters of a Chinese exhibition proposed representing Great Britain by a low-class public-house, with English sailors to play the part of drunkards. "Great Britain would probably have sent a fleet of warships to demand reparation for the national insult." Contrasting English virtues with foreign vices is a favorite pursuit with the average Englishman, and in time he naturally ignores other people's virtues altogether.

Here is another passage that contains an important truth:—

> "One looks in vain in Western newspapers for reports of progress and of incidents illustrating the higher and better traits of Chinese character; but the ravages of a White Wolf or the details of a political murder are immediately hound with an energy worthy of a better cause. And the dismal pessimist, ignoring all the wonderful progress made in China during the last fifty years, in the face of untold difficulties, chants his funereal lay with a gusto and a vehemence which tempts us to conclude that he must be paid to do it."

That, it must be confessed, is the way in which our glorious British press usually instructs its readers. After the expulsion of the Monarchy from Portugal, not the least notice was taken of the constructive work that the new Government attempted and performed. But anything in the shape of an "outrage" on either side, or a collision between the Government troops and a few Royalists received instant and lavish notice. It was the same with Turkey after the dethronement of Abdul Hamid. And the misfortune is that the average reader doesn't seem to possess enough intelligence to realise that, in the very nature of the case, these "lurid" and exciting incidents can only be mere incidents in the general life of a nation.

1,374 starving dogs were saved by the London police last year. Christians were too busy saving their own souls.

Mr. W. Hill Murray, who introduced the Braille system for the blind into China, estimated that one person in every 600 is sightless in that country. Our Heavenly Father is rather careless of his children.

Are the angels on strike? We ask this question with due solemnity, for we notice that "God's houses" have to be protected by paid watchmen against Suffragette attacks.

The peerless patterers of the Christian Evidence Society are almost the sole defenders of the Design Argument. Even the dear Daily News and Leader recently referred jestingly to the "old argument from design, Paley's watch and the watchmaker. Nowadays, watch and watchmaker have somehow failed to keep time."

"Hall of Science ideas still linger round the rostrums in the parks," says a writer in the Referee. Other correspondents suggest that Freethought is dead. It needs a referee to decide between the disputants.

It was one of life's little ironies that in a daily paper the two headlines, "Salvationists in Congress," "Barbaric Revivals," should have been in adjoining columns.

A Nonconformist preacher, wishing to be topical, preached a sermon on "A Mixed Grill." Did it include a description of the horrors meted out to the heterodox in the next world?

Mr. Brandon Thomas made a big fortune out of the play called Charley's Aunt, which has been translated and played in eighteen languages. Would the Bible have been translated into so many without artificial pushing?

M. George Brandes, the eminent Danish critic, landing at New York, was asked by an interviewer what he thought of their great statue of Liberty. "Is that all the Liberty you have?" he said. They tried another subject.

A number of pious ladies and gentlemen have been writing in the Saturday Journal on "What Happens to Us When We Die?" We will listen to them, if they can make us hear, when they are dead. Not before.

"They have broken my heart and my spirit between them, and I no longer care to live." These words occurred in a letter found on the body of Sister Anastasia, the head mistress of Shilton Roman Catholic Schools, who was found drowned in the river at Normanton. The jury returned a "temporary insanity" verdict, but added a rider stating their opinion that the deceased had been unkindly treated at the convent.

Mr. Burch, a wealthy manufacturer, collapsed at the Harvard-Yale baseball match, where he was a spectator. The doctors called in pronounced him dead. But his wife, who is a Christian Scientist, had the body brought to New York, and a well-known "healer" with a lot of other people prayed over it for hours. It wouldn't budge, however, and they had to get on with the funeral. But we daresay the Christian Science lady will go on believing in the nonsense all the same.

Christian professionals don't seem to see that the harder they try to get people to come to church the more surely is Christianity decaying. They are going to carry on a "Come to Church" campaign, to secure the attendance at church of every man, woman, and child in England and Wales on a Sunday in next January. Every man, woman, and child! We know a few who won't go,—in spite of all the impudent "invitations" left at their houses.

The Rector of Walberton, Sussex, advertises for "fifteen God-fearing Englishmen" to superintend the farming of 640 acres of land in Canada. We do not know what is the connection between "God-fearing" and agriculture, unless the Rector hopes to get his men at a reduced rate.

Three poor Christites in one day's "wills." Rev. Reginald Alfred Gatty, of Hooton Roberts, Rotherham, left £2,079; Rev. Edward Clowes, of Bexhill, £10,640; Rev. Alfred Cooper, Brighton, £15,524. Average about £9,000. How Judas's mouth would have watered at the figure!

Puritanism is a fearful and a wonderful thing. There is not a nude statue in any public place in the whole of the United States, but Coney Island has a seething mob of trippers every Sunday during the summer, and "Tammany" is a by-word throughout the civilised world. It was well said that it would have been better if Plymouth Rock had landed on the Pilgrim Fathers instead of the other way about.

Throughout Sunday collections were made in the London churches and chapels for the hospitals. Why do Christians have to collect money in the same way as ordinary touts? Have they no use for prayer?

A writer in a parish magazine, describing a bazaar, says, "crystal-gazing, palmistry, and fortune-telling are also available for more adventurous visitors." Adventurous! It would not require the courage of a tame rabbit to face such nonsense.

"We in England have a hard, direct, swift speech, if we will only use it, instead of ranting, like Shelley and Milton and people like that," said a Mr. Richard Aldington. Something similar to the flowers of speech used by the Ever-Blessed Carpenter of Nazareth might do.

The Rev. J. Williams discussed the question of church members' contributions at a Calvanistic Conference at Llanrwst, and said some people would only contribute half-a-crown if the world caught fire. Why should they? They only pay that sum now to insure themselves against fire in the next world.

The following report appeared in the Daily Telegraph of Wednesday, June 17:—

"RIGHT OF FREE SPEECH.

'VAIN NONENTITIES.'

At Lambeth Police-court yesterday Thomas William Stewart, 31, a lecturer, of Derby, was charged before Mr. H. C. Biron with behaving in a disorderly manner.

Police-constable Gibson, 901 W, stated that on Monday night he found a large crowd assembled in Brixton-road. The speaker was speaking on Atheism and the crowd were throwing missiles at him.

Prisoner: Do you think the opposition was organised?—Constable: I don't think it was.

Mr. Biron: The point is that you have no right to hold a meeting in a public street.

Prisoner: Technically, there is no legal right to hold a meeting: but, as your worship is perfectly well aware, as a fact all magistrates allow the right of free speech.

Mr. Biron: The right of free speech in the proper place. Nowadays everybody seems to think that he has a right to say what he pleases in the public street. It is getting an abominable nuisance.

Prisoner, who had previously mentioned that he was in a bad state of health, explained that this was the last of a series of meetings. Probably, he added, it was the last meeting he would address.

Mr. Biron: I am delighted to think it is the last. Now go, and take your farewell, and don't trouble us any more.

Prisoner was then discharged.

As Stewart was leaving the court his worship remarked, sotto voce: 'At the present time there is a perfect plague of vain nonentities who will obstruct the streets by talking rubbish.'"

Some will blame us for inserting this. Others would blame us for not inserting it. We believe the best plan is to insert it, and let it tell its own tale.

The defenders of the Christian superstition are using the cinema to bolster their religion. A film has been prepared, entitled "Creation, from Nebula to Perfection," under the auspices of the Bible Students' Association. We wonder if it includes the creation of Eve from Adam's rib and the other absurdities of "Genesis." If so, the Freethinker staff will have to book seats.

The recent heavy storm in London was on a Sunday. That is how "Providence" remembers the Sabbath day to keep it holy.

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £170 12s. 6d. Received since:—Mr. and Mrs. James Neate, £1; Captain G. B. Taylor, £1; R. J. Binns (Auckland, N.Z.), 12s.; F. O. Richards, £1.

B. T.—Your remittance has arrived safely, but you do not give your name, and we cannot very well send the paper without it—unless you want "B. T." put before your address on the wrapper. Glad to hear that, although you have had the Freethinker only for "some time" through the kindness of a friend, you regard its editor as "your best friend" and "feel that you have known him personally all your life." With regard to your query, it would be the lady who would be liable to any legal proceedings—not the man. Barbaric law cannot be dodged in the way you suggest. We are sorry we cannot give your friend any practical advice.

G. B. TAYLOR.—We should not mind being with you on board your good ship in the Bay of Biscay—whence you write your pleasant letter. Your subscription to the Ramsey Testimonial is passed over to the Treasurer.

E. B.—Many thanks. Shall have attention.

H. DAWSON.—(1) The Freethinker is never "published late this week," and could not be so except by some unforeseeable accident. If the fault is not your local newsagent's it is the fault of his wholesale agent's. Pressure should be put upon the latter. (2) The report shows you gave a good lecture, but what is there in it which has not been said by N. S. S. lecturers and writers for the last fifty years? We judge by the progress of our propaganda, not by the mere increase of useless numbers. The Salvation Army is a big affair, reckoned that way, but is there one Christian the more in any "Christian country" because of its existence? Has it converted one single Freethinker? We have converted a crowd of Christians. (3) We never saw any gain in the multiplication of Freethought societies. We have seen lots of them come and go. But the old N. S. S. remains, and the Freethinker is still the only weekly Freethought journal in England, commanding (and not with cash) most of the best brains in the party. We wish success to all sincere workers for Freethought, but we cannot act on their judgment instead of our own.

W. R.—Mr. Foote will write you himself shortly.

A. L. (Beccles).—A violation of the directions printed every week in this column is sure to cause delay, besides wasting the editor's time and energy.

JAMES NEATE, a London veteran, subscribing to the President's Honorarium Fund, trusts we "may live many more years yet for the 'best of causes.'"

DR. F. DE LISLE (New Zealand).—Your subscription to the President's Honorarium Fund was acknowledged last week. There was no time to reply to your letter, which reached us viâ Dr. Nichols. Pleased to hear you say you "wish it was ten times as much." Also that you are "glad to see that the subscriptions are rolling in this year more rapidly and in larger amounts than formerly" and that you "hope the pace is not too fast to last."

C. JELLEE.—Glad you find so much help from the Freethinker. The whole subject of organisation is under consideration, and the district you name may then receive attention.

W. P. BALL.—Much obliged for cuttings.

J. PARTRIDGE.—We wish you good weather and a good gathering.

E. JOICE.—Your order is passed over to our shop manager.

A. WYCHERLEY.—Macmillan's half-crown edition of Omar Khayyam is the best. It contains all four editions. The fourth edition is still copyright, and it is much the best. Thanks for cuttings.

A. J. YOUNG.—We regret to hear of Mr. Thomas Thorp's death at Sand, and of their giving him a Christian burial at All Saints' Church when they knew he was an Atheist. We note what you say at the end of your letter. Mr. Foote's health has greatly improved.

J. T. L.—Miss Vance had already sent in an obituary notice, which was in type.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED, office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY'S office is at 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

WHEN the services of the National Secular Society in connection with Secular Burial Services are required, all communications should be addressed to the secretary, Miss E. M. Vance.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 2 Newcastle-street, Farringdon-street, E.C., by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish us to call attention.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to the Shop Manager of the Pioneer Press, 2 Newcastle-street Farringdon-street, E.C., and not to the Editor.

THE Freethinker will be forwarded direct from the publishing office to any part of the world, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One year, 10s. 6d.; half year, 5s. 3d.; three months 2s. 8d.

Editorial.

I AM sorry to say that Mr. Cohen has not been looking very well lately. The wintry June we have have had in "God's Own Country," as the clergy call it, has rather worsened the cold he was suffering from at the Conference on Whit-Sunday. He really ought to take a holiday. He went to Southsea last week-end, and I hope he will stay there or go to some other place equally eligible. I am therefore sitting in the editorial chair again, and I think I had better remain there. I will not thank Mr. Cohen at the fag-end of a hurried paragraph. I will do it next week. And I shall have to tell the "saints" of some of the grave difficulties that have to be confronted in the near future.

G. W. FOOTE.

Sugar Plums.

The June number of the Secular Education Chronicle (quarterly), issued by the Secular Education League, is priced at one penny, but we do not know of any shop where it is sold. Readers of ours who would like to see it—and we hope many will—should apply to the Secretary, Mr. H. Snell, 19 Buckingham-street, Strand, London, W.C. Amongst other items is a report of the Seventh Annual Meeting held at Caxton Hall on March 24. Mr. Foote was ill then and confined to his bedroom. His absence from the meeting was sympathetically referred to by Sir Henry Cotton, who took the chair for the President, Mr. George Greenwood, who was unable to be present. "Sir Henry," the report says, "took the opportunity to express his great regret at Mr. Foote's illness, which prevented him from being present. He was indefatigable in the cause, and his sound judgment was greatly valued." The report adds that at the public meeting later on, "Sir Henry also referred again with sympathy to the ill-health of Mr. Foote."

We are pleased to see from the official report that Mr. George Greenwood continues his Presidency of the Secular Education League. It was feared that a bad accident had incapacitated him for life, but he is recovering the use of his lower limbs, which is an excellent piece of good fortune after a twice-broken kneecap's necessitating two operations. All who know Mr. Greenwood's services to the cause of progress will be heartily glad to hear this good news.

The report of Mr. Halley Stewart's speech at the League meeting shows that he is back from his trip in search of health with a fair supply of that desideratum. We judge by the vigor and trenchancy of his address.

Mr. Cohen's article on "The Consolations of Religion" is reprinted from our issue of April 26 in the New York Truthseeker. The source of the article is duly acknowledged

The Birmingham Branch is having its ANNUAL Picnic on Sunday, July 5, to Stourport, and the members would like to meet Freethought friends of the district. Full information may be obtained from the Secretary, Mr. Jas. Partridge, 245 Shenstone-road, Birmingham.

We have received (on Tuesday afternoon, much too late for the Freethinker) a further list of subscriptions from the Treasurer of the Ramsey Testimonial Fund—Mr. B. T. Hall, Club Union Buildings, Clerkenwell-road, London, E.C. A glance at it shows there is a mistake somewhere. Names are included which were acknowledged in former lists. We have returned the list to Mr. Hall for correction.

The Salvation Army is played out in the worst sense of the words. It is no longer taken seriously by the bulk of the people. When it was first established it was taken as a really earnest—if vulgar and absurd—agency for saving souls. The crowds who watch its parades no longer regard it in that light. "Blood and Fire" makes no impression now. Familiarity, if nothing else, has bred contempt. "The Army" has taken its place as one of the regular shows of the day. This is quite legible on the faces of the spectators. We have watched them very carefully during the recent Salvation Congress performances.

Is Religious Belief Universal?—III.

"Lacking ability to think, and the accompanying desire to know, the savage is without tendency to speculate. Even when there is raised such a question as that often put by Park to the Negroes—'What became of the sun during the night, and whether we should see the same sun, or a different one, in the morning,' no reply is forthcoming. 'I found that they considered the question as very childish..... They had never indulged a conjecture, nor formed any hypothesis about the matter.' The general fact thus exemplified is one quite at variance with current ideas respecting the thoughts of primitive man. He is commonly pictured as theorising about surrounding appearances; whereas, in fact, the need for explanation of them does not occur to him.

"We see in the young of our own race a similar inability to concentrate their attention on anything complex or abstract. The mind of the child, as well as that of the savage, soon wanders from sheer exhaustion when generalities and involved propositions have to be dealt with."—HERBERT SPENCER, Principles of Sociology, pp. 87-89.

"Non-religious tribes may not exist in our day, but the fact bears no more decisively on the development of religion, than the impossibility of finding a modern English village without scissors or books or lucifer matches bears on the fact that there was a time when no such things existed in the lane."—PROFESSOR E. B. TYLOR, Primitive Culture, vol. i., p. 425.

Of the Veddahs of Ceylon, Sir J. Emerson Tennant says, "They have no religion of any kind—no knowledge of a God or of a future state; no temples, idols, altars, prayers, or charms" (Ceylon, vol. ii., p. 441). Mr. Bailey, long a resident among them, confirms this judgment, "They have no knowledge of a Supreme Being! 'Is he on a rock? on a white ant-hill? on a tree? I never saw a God' was the only reply I received to repeated questions. They have no idols, offer no sacrifices and pour no libations."*

Of the Andaman Islanders, Dr. Monat says, "They have no conception of a Supreme Being. They have never risen from the effects they see around them to the most imperfect notion of a Cause. They have never ascended in thought from the works to a Creator, or even to many creators—that is to say, Polytheism" (Adventures and Researches Among the Andaman Islanders (1863), p. 303).

Lieutenant Low, of H.M. Indian Navy, similarly remarks of them, "They do not believe in the existence of a Supreme Being, and perform no religious ceremony of any sort" (The Land of the Sun (1870), p. 168).†

M. Bik says of the Arafuras of Vorkay (one of the Southern Aru):—

> "To convince myself more fully respecting their want of knowledge of a Supreme Being, I demanded of them on whom they called for help in their need, when their vessels were overtaken by violent tempests. The eldest among them, after having consulted the others, answered that they knew not on whom they could call for assistance, but begged me, if I knew, to be so good as to inform them."‡

Wallace, the naturalist, says of the wild tribes of the Moluccas and New Guinea that when he endeavored to ascertain their ideas respecting the Creator of the universe, he could only get from them a confession of total ignorance on the subject. "The intellectual capacities of those tribes were so feeble that he doubted whether they could be made to appreciate or understand what was meant by a God."§

Similarly, the naturalist Bates says of the Indians of the Upper Amazons:—

> "Their want of curiosity is extreme. One day we had an unusually sharp thunder-shower. The crew were lying about the deck; and after each explosion all set up a loud laugh, the wag of the party exclaiming, 'There's my old uncle hunting again,' an expression showing the utter emptiness of mind of the spokesman. I asked Vicente what he thought was the cause of lightning and thunder? He said, 'Timaã ichoquã.'—I don't know. He had never given the subject a moment's thought! It was the same with other things. I asked him who made the sun, the stars, the trees? He didn't know, and had never heard the subject mentioned amongst his tribe. The Tupí language, at least as taught by the old Jesuits, has a word—Tupáon—signifying God. Vicente sometimes used this word, but he showed by his expressions that he did not attach the idea of a Creator to it. He seemed to think it meant some deity or visible image which the whites worshiped in the churches he had seen in the villages. None of the Indian tribes of the Upper Amazons have an idea of a Supreme Being, and consequently have no word to express it in their own languages. Vicente thought the river on which we were travelling encircled the whole earth, and that the land was an island like those seen in the stream, but larger. Here a gleam of curiosity and imagination in the Indian mind is revealed: the necessity of a theory of the earth and water has been felt, and a theory has been suggested. In all other matters not concerning the common wants of life the mind of Vicente was a blank, and such I always found to be the case with the Indian in his natural state."‖

As to the "High Gods"—Baiame, Deiramalam, and Bungil—which the late Mr. Andrew Lang, in his book, The Making of Religion, tells us the Australian aborigines believed in, Lord Avebury points out that Bungil, according to native belief,— > was an old man who once lived on earth and possessed great multitudes of cattle, an idea which cannot evidently have arisen before the advent of white men, as there were no cattle in Australia. He had a dispute with the Jay, who let out the winds and blew him away. He is now the star Homalhaut. Bungil, moreover, is a common title of respect. Mr. Howitt himself was often called Bungil."†

Professor Tylor, dealing with the idea that the Australian belief in a "Great Spirit" was derived from missionary teaching, declared "this view will not bear examination."‡ After further study of the subject, however, he changed his opinion. He observes: "Let us now, however, inquire whether Baiame, near 1840 so prominent a divine figure among the Australians, was known to them at all a few years earlier"; and points out that Backhouse, a minister of the Society of Friends, who spent a long time in Australia between 1832 and 1840; William Buckley, the "wild white man," who lived thirty years among the natives of the district, till he had forgotten English; and the Rev. L. E. Threlkeld, the first grammarian and lexicographer of New South Wales, are all agreed that the natives had no idea of a Supreme Being.§

Mr. Thomas, in his Natives of Australia (p. 216) objects that Henderson gives a long account of Baiame, of which he learnt particulars from a native in 1829, three years before the missionaries came to those parts. But Lord Avebury observes that—

> "Mr. Thomas does not give the exact reference or quote the passage on which he relies. Henderson speaks very doubtfully. His informant, he says, 'endeavored to explain to us their rude system of mythology. We experienced, however, great difficulty in comprehending the import of what he intended to communicate.' I do not find that Henderson anywhere speaks of Baiame as a Creator or attributes to him any divine powers, but says that he was 'the father of the race, and formerly sojourned amongst them.'"‖

But, even before the missionaries arrived, the natives had opportunities of picking up European ideas, for there was a British settlement at Port Jackson as early as 1788. The truth seems to be that Baiame was a chief who once lived among them. Mr. Hartland says that, since 1840,—

> "his Biblical characteristics, as reported by missionaries, constantly expanded down to the publication of Mr. Brough Smythe's work in 1878, and that in the most recent accounts—those of Mr. Matthews, who is not a missionary—they have so far disappeared that he is now only said to have created the tribesmen themselves."*

Professor Frazer has dealt with the subject at length in an article in the Fortnightly Review (July, 1905)—since included in the third edition of his Golden Bough. He points out that—

> "it is to be observed that the reports of moral Supreme Beings among the Australian aborigines come chiefly from Victoria and New South Wales, that is, the parts of the continent where the natives have been longest under the influence of the white man. If we could deduct from these reports the elements of fraud, we should probably find that the residue would be small indeed; and we might acquiesce in the opinion of Professor Baldwin Spencer: 'I do not think that there is really any direct evidence of any Australian native belief in a "Supreme Being" in our sense of the word.'"

Professor Frazer also cites the testimony of Mr. J. F. Mann, who says:—

> "Many persons try to persuade themselves that they can detect the existence among these natives of a true religion and a knowledge of a Supreme Being; but they forget that these Blacks are extremely shrewd, so that when they perceive the object of the conversation, they readily adapt all that they have been taught on this subject to their replies. I have always found that the rigmarole stories which many of them told me, and which are supposed to represent their religious belief, were founded upon the teachings of missionaries and others."†

Professor Frazer also narrates the experience of Dr. A. W. Howitt, the ethnologist, who, wishing to learn some particulars about a spirit named Brewin, questioned two of the most intelligent natives, one of whom was a member of the Church of England:—

> "After consulting together for a few minutes, one of them said, 'We think that he is Jesus Christ.' When this answer proved unsatisfactory, they laid their heads together again, and after mature deliberation declared that he must be the Devil. Which, says Professor Frazer, illustrates the readiness with which the natives adapt their answers to the supposed taste of the inquirer, and the little dependence that can consequently be placed on their statements on this subject."

But whatever may be the case as to the coast tribes of Australia, who have been so long in contact with Europeans, there is no doubt as to the absence of religious ideas among the central tribes of Australia. Professor Baldwin Spencer and Mr. Gillen, who lived with the natives, learned their language, won their confidence, and who witnessed and took part in their most secret practices and ceremonials, and whose work, The Northern Tribes of Central Australia, is universally recognised as the most careful, minute, and trustworthy study of savage life ever compiled, declare emphatically in this work that—

> "the Central Australian natives, and this is true of the tribes extending from Lake Eyre in the south to the far north, and eastward across to the Gulf of Carpentaria, have no idea whatever of the existence of any Supreme Being who is pleased if they follow a certain line of what we call moral conduct, and displeased if they do not do so. They have not the vaguest idea of a personal individual other than an actual living member of the tribe who approves or disapproves of their conduct, so far as anything like what we call morality is concerned" (p. 491).

The women and children are taught to fear a powerful spirit; but the youth, at the initiation ceremonies, learns for the first time "that such a being does not really exist, and is only an invention of the men to frighten the women and children."

In future articles we shall consider the origin of religious belief.

The Fauna and Flora of the British Isles.—II.

THE fauna and flora of Scotland, like those of Ireland, are of composite origin. In Ireland, in the Hebrides, and in Skye a dark-furred field mouse is found which is special to these stations within the British Isles, and its only other known European habitat is in Portugal. This mammal is a relic from ancient days, and, in company with the natterjack toad, which is occasionally met with both in Ireland and Scotland, it is of southern origin. A weevil, which is quite common in Erin, occurs as a rarity in England and Scotland; but in order to again encounter it, one must travel to the Mediterranean region and the Atlantic Islands. Two species of woodlice which occur in Britain reach their northerly limit in Caledonia. Again, two species of snails are to be included with the southern fauna, and these also do not extend further north than Scotland. There is a fern which is found in secluded spots in Southern Ireland and Wales—the bristle, or Killarney fern—but we must journey to Spain to again encounter this plant, which also thrives in Madeira, the Canary Islands, and the Azores, while it is once more met with in the West Indies and South America. To once more quote Dr. Scharff:—

> "The thirteen species of liverworts peculiar to the British Islands all occur on the West Coast, and all have their nearest relations in tropical and sub-tropical countries. This seems to show that at some remote geological period, when a much milder climate prevailed in Northern Europe than at present, they advanced northward, and are the last remaining relicts of this modified tropical flora."

Plants and animals of Arctic ancestry are more fully represented in Caledonia than in the Emerald Isle. So far as the British area is concerned, the ptarmigan is confined to Scotland. It flourishes in Scandinavia, and, like the Arctic hare, it reappears in the Alps and Pyrenees. The snow bunting, a markedly northern bird, does not breed south of the Tweed. Scotland possesses several insects of boreal origin; the white underwing occurs in the North of Scotland, in Scandinavia, and in the Alps. Two dragon flies are confined within our area to Scotland, and one of them is found elsewhere in Norway, the Alps, and the mountains of Silesia. Various other organisms have a similar distribution.

Many of the vegetable growths of Scotland are pronouncedly Arctic in character. Crombie declared that the British Alpine flora bore a closer resemblance to that of Scandinavia than to that of any other country. The Scottish primrose, the rock draba, the blue menziesia, are special to Scotland and the Scandinavian countries. The dwarf birch and the mountain avens, whose remains are so conspicuous in many Glacial deposits, are members of the same Arctic group. The mountain avens still flourishes in the Alps and Asiatic highlands, and it grows in Ireland, on the Atlantic coast, in a mild climate, right down to the level of the sea. But whether the avens is of Arctic or temperate origin seems hard to ascertain, as it grows luxuriantly both in an intensely cold and in a quite equable climate.

The Lacustrine deposits of Scotland have given up the remains of the Irish giant deer, the moose deer, the reindeer, the beaver, and other organisms long since in that country extinct, as well as the remains of the roedeer, which is still to be numbered among contemporary Scottish mammals. This group must be regarded as of mixed origin.

Turning to the Germanic element in the Scottish fauna, the beaver commands attention. This highly intelligent quadruped, of which one species alone survives, is still extensively distributed. It is now completely extinct in Britain, but it was fairly abundant both in England and Scotland down to a couple of thousand years ago. The beaver is trembling on the verge of extinction throughout Western Europe, although a few colonies survive in the rivers of Germany and Austria, where they are protected both by public opinion and the State. In the Russian Empire it is still abundant, but as an undomesticated creature it is destined to die out in its old-world home. That the beaver belongs to the Germanic fauna is evidenced by the fact that its fossils have never been discovered in Spain, Italy, or Ireland.

The absence of that common British insectivore, the mole, in Ireland, is significant. Geologically speaking, its present distribution is of recent date, and, like the beaver, it is of Eastern origin. Its contemporary range is instructive. It is native to nearly all Asia north of the Himalayas. Nevertheless, its habitat is restricted, although it has had ample time for dispersal throughout the land masses of the Western World. The mole has reached Northern Spain, but has migrated no farther south in the Peninsular. In Italy the mole has now reached Lombardy, but is unknown beyond its boundaries. In the Scandinavian region it has so far failed to establish itself in the extreme north, although it is comparatively common in the south and centre. It cannot be contended that the climate has checked its advance, as the mole easily adapts itself to temperature and soil. Both the beaver and the mole have left their remains in the later Pliocene strata of Norfolk. They were therefore living in England many thousands of years ago, and although they invaded Scotland, the sea barrier which then divided Britain from Ireland prevented their entrance into the latter country.

Another Scottish mammal which is absent in Ireland is the roedeer. This animal lingered in England in the northern counties until quite recently, and may still be seen here and there. When the English forests were in their glory, the roedeer was quite plentiful in our woodland wilds; but those days are departed for ever. The Continental distribution of the roedeer is practically similar to that of the two preceding animals. But although its migratory powers were extensive, it is entirely unknown in the Mediterranean region. Its failure to secure a footing in Ireland is to be explained by the insuperable obstacle presented by the sea.

The prevalence of newts in Britain, and their extreme scarcity in Ireland, despite the Emerald Isle's highly favorable amphibian environment, constrains the conclusions to which the before-mentioned organisms have led us. The common toad, which is almost universally distributed from the South of England to the North of Scotland, has never been discovered in Ireland, although this organism has an extensive range from Gibraltar to Japan. Scotland entertains one snake only, the viper; but even before the days of the blessed St. Patrick, the sister isle refused, as she still refuses, to give any hospitality to snakes. A lengthy list of spiders, insects, molluscs, and other organisms of similar distribution to those already cited might be set forth. Suffice to say that all confirm the conclusion that the Scottish fauna blends with that of England, and differs materially from that of Ireland.

Weighty evidence exists that a land connection between the Isles of Northern Scotland and Iceland united the two countries within geologically recent times. Geikie contended that the flora of the Faröes and Iceland led to the conclusion that this land bridge existed after the Glacial Period had passed away. Ostenfeld, after a systematic survey of the vegetation of the Faröe Islands, came to a similar conclusion. The animal inhabitants of Iceland also support the view that this island has quite recently formed part of the European continent. Iceland appears to have been linked with Europe by way of the Faröes, Shetlands, and Orkneys.

One might surmise that many plants and animals may have been dispersed through the agency of winds, ocean currents, migratory birds, etc. These factors are by no means entirely inoperative in organic distribution; but the theory advanced seems much more fully to account for the facts. For instance, it has been shown that out of 277 species of plants growing on the Faröe Islands, not more than ninety-eight are at all likely to have been carried there by the winds.

> "The direction of the ocean currents is unfavorable to the occasional carriage of seeds by water. As regards the transport of seeds by birds, it appears that the flight of migratory birds across the Faröe Islands is inconsiderable. The suggestion that birds during migration might carry seeds on their wings or feet to distant lands is not confirmed by actual observation. Many thousands of such birds have been carefully examined by Professor Winge and Dr. Knud Andersen, who noticed that their crops and stomachs were always empty. They never observed any seeds adhering to the feathers, beaks, or feet of the birds. Dr. Andersen, moreover, is of opinion that migratory birds are scarcely of any importance as plant disseminators."*

Although the fauna and flora of Britain proper are closely allied, their distribution is related to local conditions. The more northerly Scottish forms become rarer as we journey south. The British grouse is special to our islands, but it is only a variety of the willow grouse of Northern Europe. This bird is resident both in Caledonia and Erin, and ranges in England as far south as Shropshire. A white flowering orchid which is distinctly boreal in character is distributed from Iceland to Sussex. The animals and plants of Arctic type are fairly numerous in England generally, but they are most fully represented in the northern counties and in Wales.

A faunal element which is mainly restricted to the South-West of England startlingly resembles that of Ireland. This Lusitanian series is composed of the lingering organisms of the once rich group which entered England from South-Western Europe at the period when our country was united to Ireland by links of land. Various plants furnish illustrations of this Iberian invasion, while a spider, a centipede, and sundry molluscs are to be numbered among the animals of this group.

Organisms of Germanic ancestry are also numerous. Some of these have extended to Scotland, while others have a distinctly southern range. The dormouse has not yet succeeded in reaching the more northerly region, while its present Continental range, coupled with the circumstance "that no member of the genus to which it belongs has as yet been found, either recent or fossil, outside the limits of Europe, suggests that the dormice and their allied genera all originated on our Continent."

Very local in England is the sand lizard, while it stretches across North-Eastern Europe into Western Asia. Four of our best known fresh-water fish are not native to Ireland, but are plentiful throughout the greater part of the European Plain. A surprisingly large percentage of our plants and invertebrate animals are considerably confined to the South-East of England. The Continental distribution of these organisms also indicates their Germanic origin. The stag-beetle, the swallow-tail butterfly, and various fresh-water and terrestrial molluscs are members of this group.

The facts furnished by contemporary forms of life find substantial support in the remains disinterred from the superficial deposits of the English area under review. The organic relics from caverns and brick-earth include those of various small rodents and the saiga antelope. These organisms still survive in Asia and Eastern Europe. But their fossils have never been discovered in Italy or Spain, although their bones occur in France and Germany in deposits similar to those that have yielded them in England. These mammals doubtless migrated to England from the Continent before the land bridge had been broken. There is another rodent, the hamster; but this animal does not appear to have reached England, although its remains have been found in France. The hamster seems to have advanced from the East, and then retreated; but there is some reason to think that it is again invading the West.

* European Animals, p. 64.

Another group of animals, seemingly of more southern origin, lived in England in company with the organisms previously referred to. Among these was the lion, which appears to have survived in our country down to the dawn of the historic period. The hippopotamus has left its remains in the same deposits which contain those of the lion. This huge creature wandered as far north as Yorkshire, and its existence there certainly seems to presuppose a continuous land connection with Southern Europe, or possibly Africa.

Several of our native species are admittedly indigenous; at all events, several of our varieties must be of local origin. But this does not in the slightest degree invalidate the evidences of their ancestors having entered our islands from the Continental areas previously specified. Moreover, while the British fauna and flora have been enriched by the organisms which have wandered from other lands, our islands, in return, have been the scene of the evolution of other species which have probably added to the wealth of theirs. Nevertheless, the innumerable plants and animals which have been received in Britain immensely outnumber those it has given, and in consequence the overwhelming majority of our species are to be regarded as settlers from other soils.

Putting aside the few organisms of indigenous evolution, we find that a small faunal and floral group came to us from North America along an ancient land bridge which stretched across the Northern Atlantic to Europe. A more important series of organisms of boreal and Alpine character was derived partly from Scandinavia and partly from the mountainous areas of Continental Europe. The Lusitanian species arrived from Spain, while the Germanic group invaded Britain from Eastern Europe, or possibly from Asia.

The Spanish or South-Western element is probably the oldest, although the American group is undoubtedly very ancient. These migrations of flora and fauna were not the events of a few centuries, but covered immense periods of time. The incoming organisms established themselves in our islands when the land stood much higher than at present, and large areas of the former continents are now, and have long since been, subjected to the sway of the sea.

In conclusion, it becomes obvious that the chief flora and fauna of Great Britain and Ireland are of pre-glacial date, and, although countless plants and animals perished during the mournful Ice Age, a sufficient number survived in warmer retreats to replenish the country when the glacial wave retreated to its Arctic home. The persistence of the southern flora and fauna through all the Glacial Epoch cannot otherwise be accounted for. Another reason why the Lusitanian group is still so richly represented in Ireland is that the climate is mild and damp; and these southern organisms have also been spared the struggle with the hardier Germanic stocks which came into Britain while that island was still united with the Continent, a connection which continued after Ireland had been separated from us by the sea.

Farther still, they acknowledge that the providence of God is attentive to human concerns. Why, therefore, does he neglect the whole world, of which we are a part? If it is because he is not at leisure to look to it, neither therefore is it lawful for him to survey that which is inferior and us. Why also, when he surveys us, does he not behold that which is external; and thus look to the world in which we are contained? But if he does not look to that which is external, in order that he may not see the world, neither will he behold us.—Plotinus, "Against the Gnostics."

The Inquiry.

(AFTER CHARLES MACKAY.)

Tell me, thou sun, great source of life and light,
Of all man's faiths, hopes, fancies, which is right?
The sun, unceasing in his steady glow,
In you far sphere, responds—I do not know.

Tell me, thou wind, that blowing since the prime
In other chaos cosmos formed time,
The winds of doctrine that do round me blow,
Which is the true, oh, wind?—I do not know.

Tell me, thou gentlest moon, of sage and serious face,
Surely the record thou so far canst trace?
The silver moon, effulgent, stately, slow,
Sad heaven ascending, saith—I do not know.

Tell me, thou sea (whose tides the moon obey),
Tell me, majestic ocean—hush thy play—
Canst thou the riddle solve? In ebb and flow
The solemn sea replies—I do not know.

Tell me, ye clouds that o'er the azure pass,
And leave no stain on heaven's eternal glass;
Ye immemorial vapors, e'er ye go,
Pray tell us—ah, it rains!—I do not know.

Then to the faculties the question I
At length preferred, the everlasting "Why?"
Love grieved, faith shrunk, hope whispered soft and low,
Reason arose and answered—This we know:

The best is ours if we will take the best;
And let old dumb Oblivion take the rest:
Nor petulant and pessimistic go.
Know what you can—and value what you know.

ANDREW MILLAR.

What wonder if you torn and naked throng
Should doubt a Heaven that seems to wink and nod,
And having moaned at noontide, "Lord, how long?"
Should cry "Where hidest thou?" at eventfall;
At midnight, "Is He deaf and blind, our God?"
And ere day dawn, "Is He indeed at all?"

Obituary.

We deeply regret to record the sudden death of Mr. Wilhelm Hecht, of Edmonton, who passed away quietly in his sleep, early last Sunday morning, at the age of 73. We tender our deepest sympathy to Mrs. Hecht and to their son, John, who is well-known not only as an energetic member of the Edmonton Branch, but to our London Branches generally, as one of the most earnest and devoted workers and speakers for the Freethought cause. A simple but impressive funeral oration was delivered at the graveside by Mr. J. T. Lloyd. Tributes of sympathy and respect in the shape of some beautiful flowers were sent by friends. One remarkably large and exquisite bunch of freshly gathered roses, from the members of the Edmonton Branch, having carried its silent message of sympathy to the mourners, was sent to the Winchmore Convalescent Home, so that its fragrance should bring pleasure to the inmates, rather than be wasted on a grave. Upwards of 40 local Secularists were present, the General Secretary, Miss Vance, and Miss Stanley, V.-P., representing the N. S. S.—E. M. V.

Our cause has also lost an ardent worker in the person of Ernest Leaver, who died at the early age of 28, on June 14, the cause of death being cancer. The deceased was a constant reader of the Freethinker, and unsparing in his work for Freethought. His desire that a Secular Burial Service should be read at his graveside was carried out by Mr. Nelson King, of Ilkeston, at his native town of Bridlington, Yorks.—E. M. V.

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 27 SUNDAY, JULY 5, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

We breathe but the air of books: we owe everything to their authors, on this side barbarism; and we pay them easily with contempt while living, and with an epitaph when dead.—WILLIAM HAZLITT.

The Word of God.—II.

An Open Letter to the

MINISTERS OF ALL CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

MOST of you, gentlemen, teach that Moses (for instance) wrote the Pentateuch, and that he lived, roughly speaking, 1,500 years before Christ. But what is the age of your oldest Hebrew manuscripts? The editors of the Revised Version admit, in a footnote to their Preface, that "the earliest MS. of which the age is certainly known bears date A.D. 916." Now this is 2,400 years after the time of Moses; and let me ask you, plainly, Is not this long enough for any amount of accident and vicissitude? And, unless you fall back on a miracle, have you the slightest reason for supposing that Moses himself would recognise the A.D. 916 document as his own production?

Besides the difficulty and obscurity of Hebrew, is it not the case that the existing Manuscripts are full of different readings? I gather from scholars on your own side, to say nothing of sceptical investigators, that the number of different readings amount to many thousands, indeed to many myriads. Will you kindly explain, then, how any man, even if he be a perfect master of Hebrew, can be sure of having the exact Word of God? You are also aware, or should be, that the more ancient versions of the Old Testament—such as the Greek Septuagint and the Roman Vulgate—differ very considerably from the Masoretic text.

Thus we have Version differing from Version, and a vast quantity of variations in the current Hebrew manuscripts; that is, collection differs from collection, and, in the same collection, document differs from document. It is evident, therefore, that the Hebrew Old Testament is no more the real Word of God than the English Old Testament. I may be told, of course, that the variations are unimportant, and do not affect the substance of the volume; but I deny this, and I add that no variation can be unimportant when we are dealing with a communication from God to mankind. You may think it unimportant, but how do you know that God does?

Supposing that God, for some reason which passes human comprehension, chose that the first part of his revelation to all men should be given in a language only known to a small section of them: even then, would it not be reasonable to suppose that he would take care to preserve it in its integrity, so that we might not be burdened with the difficulty of finding out its words as well as its meaning? You admit that the manuscripts have suffered the common fate of ancient writings, in the hands of custodians and copyists; and, to my mind, this is an evidence of their human origin. I believe that, if God wrote a message for us, personally or by proxy, he would take the trouble to preserve it as he wrote it.

The New Testament manuscripts are older than those of the Old Testament. None of them, however, go beyond the fourth century; that is, the oldest copy we have of any book in the New Testament, including the Gospels, was written at least three hundred years after the death of Christ. Why is this? Why are there no earlier manuscripts? Surely, if God inspired the writers of them, he would not neglect their safety for three centuries after their composition, and then begin to take care of them. Had he preserved them until the days of Constantine, the Church could have preserved them afterwards. I daresay you will tell me that God did not work miracles to preserve the autographs of the New Testament; but he worked miracles to be recorded in them, and miracles to inspire the writers of them, and I cannot see why he should not work another miracle to preserve what they wrote.

So much for the documents themselves; and now let me ask you whether, in the Greek documents as we have them, there are not hundreds and thousands of different readings? If this be so (and you cannot deny it), the Greek Testament itself, in a multitude of cases, must contain what the Apostles and Evangelists did not write, besides omitting, perhaps, many things which they did write; so that, here, again, your very New Testament, even in the original Greek, is not, and cannot be, the real, exact, authentic Word of God.

The Gospels are four in number, and there were many others. The Church selected the four and stamped them as canonical; it rejected the others, to the number of dozens, and branded them as apocryphal. To a Catholic, of course, this is quite satisfactory, for he holds the Church to be infallible; but the Protestant does not, and what is his guarantee? You, gentlemen, who belong to Protestant Churches, take the four Gospels on trust from the Catholic Church, which you so often describe as idolatrous and fraudulent; but I want you to give me a reason for accepting these four Gospels, and no others, as the inspired Word of God. What suits your convenience does not satisfy my intelligence. I want a reason; something different from custom and tradition, something founded on logic and evidence.

Let me now draw your attention to another aspect of your Word of God. Over the heads of the various documents it contains, you have their authors' names printed. Thus you announce that the first five books, the Pentateuch, were written by Moses; that most of the Psalms were written by David; that Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles were written by Solomon; that the very curious story of a prophet and a whale was written by Jonah; that a certain prophetical book, referred to by Jesus Christ, was written by Daniel; that fourteen epistles were written by Paul, one by James, two by Peter, and three by John, who also wrote the Revelation; and that the four Gospels were written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.

These announcements of yours, as to the authorship of the books of the Bible, are most of them false. You were told so, long ago, by sceptics like Spinoza, Voltaire, and Thomas Paine; but now the fact is not only admitted, but proclaimed, by scholars and professors within your own Churches.

G. W. FOOTE.

Do We Survive Death?

AMONG the writers who have been contributing articles to Cassell's Saturday Journal on the question "What Happens to Us When We Die?" it has been left for a lady—Lady Groves—to hit the right nail on the head in the form of a question. Lady Groves commences her very brief contribution with what one may say is a too modest disclaimer. She says:—

> "When so many learned divines and distinguished philosophers have written on the subject of what happens to the human personality after death, I can hardly think that my opinion, even if I had one—which I have not—can be of great value."

This disclaimer seems quite needless. If the "learned divines and distinguished philosophers" were writing concerning anything they knew, Lady Grove's hesitancy would be highly commendable. But they are not. None of them know any more about the other side of death than she does. And when none of the participants in a discussion possess knowledge none of them can claim superiority. Under such conditions, cleric and layman, philosopher and fool are upon an absolute equality. Ignorance, like death, makes all equal.

Having disarmed antagonism by her modesty, Lady Groves next proceeds to pull these same "learned divines and philosophers" up to the mark by reminding them that they have forgotten to, so to speak, verify their quotations. They assume that something survives death, that they know what that something is, and then proceed to inquire what becomes of it. So says Lady Grove:—

> "It is futile to inquire into the unknowable, and also that, as each individual varies during his lifetime to such an extent as hardly to retain the same individuality manifested at one time or the other of his existence, it may be worth while to inquire what it is that is supposed to survive after death of all the complex phases and characteristics and characters even that go to make up one single human organism."

That, I repeat, hits the nail on the head. What is it that survives death? Something survives, certainly—the indestructibility of matter, or the persistence of force, guarantees that. But what? Everything turns upon that point. And it is one that believers seldom, if ever, face. They tell us of their faith in a future life, the comfort this belief gives them—both interesting enough as revelations of their own mental states, but absolutely valueless from any other point of view. They declare I shall survive, or you will survive, but never face the crucial question of What is the I that is going to survive?

What they ought to mean is plain enough. What much earlier generations meant is plain enough. Every person is made up to every other person, primarily, of a body possessing a certain shape, size, and color, with their varying peculiarities. Associated with these physical peculiarities are certain mental ones summed up under the heading of temperament, disposition, or character. Thus, I recognise John Smith because he is six feet high, instead of seven, white and not black, cheerful and not morose, sensible and not stupid, honest and not a thief. Reverse all these distinguishing marks, and he ceases to be my John Smith. I do not know him. More, if you could suddenly change a white, six foot, honest, sensible, cheerful John Smith, into a black, seven foot, dishonest, morose John Smith, he would not know himself. For all practical purposes he would be a different individual.

What people ought to mean, then, by surviving death is that each one of us, with all our physical and mental peculiarities, will persist unchanged; or, at least, with no more than the gradual change to which we are subject here. To say that we shall not possess the same kind of body, that people will not be short and tall, fair and dark, well-shaped and ill-shaped, is to deny the existence of the principal and primary marks by which we recognise each other. If in the next world I do not look or feel or think as I do here, it is a sheer abuse of language to say that my personality survives. It does not. Some other personality may, but it is no more me than I am a Central African now. All the talk of meeting again husband, or wife, or children, or friends, implies this. The belief is really based upon the persistence—unchanged—of the whole individual, physical and mental, that we now know. That is what the belief in a future life originally implied. And it implied that because the "soul" was originally the double of the living person, although a finer or more etherealised copy.

It is the persistence of the unchanged individual that is required, not the transformation of a "material" into a "spiritual" body—that is mere theological gibberish; nor yet the persistence of the elements of the body in some unindividualised form. And the moment the question is raised in this form we begin to realise, not merely the difficulty of believing, but the positive unintelligibility of the doctrine. The body we know does not survive. With death, decay and disintegration sets in, and is complete within a comparatively brief period. And the actual resurrection is not to-day a matter of mere disbelief; it is a physical impossibility. The resurrection of the body belongs to a pre-scientific age, to a time when almost anything was possible because very little was certain.

Under various forms, the reply to the question raised by Lady Grove is that man is a duality. He is made up of body and mind, or body and soul; and while the latter uses the former, it is independent of it, and survives it. But this is pure assumption; and when the disbeliever is asked to prove in what way mind can be shown to be dependent upon nervous action, the proper reply is to point to the fact, and leave it. The connection between mental phenomena and nervous processes is a fact. It is not the Freethinker's place to prove a fact that is as plain as daylight. We are not called upon to prove how they can be connected; it is the believer's duty to point out how they can be separated. We know they exist together; the question is, How can they exist apart? Can we even conceive of them existing apart? For man as we know him is not a duality. Man as we know him is a unity. He is not two, but one; and it is for those who hold that he is more than one to produce evidence for it.

It seems attractive to those people who habitually think in a fog, and to whom, consequently, words appear to have an inherent value, to speak of the mind as using the body, and that the differentiating peculiarities of mind are due to the body conditioning the mind. But grant that this were so, how does that help the theory of survival? No matter how caused, my personality is made up of the sum-total of my motives, thoughts, emotions, etc. If these are what they are because, having a peculiar bodily structure, they can only find expression in one way, they still remain the constituents of me. Remove this assumed conditioning body, and what becomes of me? Again, it cannot be my personality that survives, because, the body being no longer there, the conditions which created that personality have disappeared. You might have the survival of a "spiritual substance," but it would certainly not be me. I am annihilated as thoroughly on this hypothesis as on that of the most thoroughgoing Materialism.

There is really no evidence whatever that mind is independent of, or separate from, the body. A century and a half of scientific labor and research has furnished a host of presumptions against any such theory, and there is not a single spark of evidence in its favor. There exists a host of assumptions, a number of ingenious theories, forced interpretations of obscure and little understood mental phenomena, but of reliable evidence not a shred. And if it is without evidence in fact, the "soul" theory is absolutely useless as an explanation of anything. It cannot explain the phenomena of consciousness, it gives us no clearer conception of the nature of mental life. It only adds to the difficulties already existing that of assuming the existence of an unknown substance. Even the late Professor William James was forced to admit that "The soul-theory is a complete superficiality" so far as accounting for the actually verified facts of consciousness goes, and adds, "Altogether the 'soul' is an outbirth of that sort of philosophising whose great maxim, according to Dr. Hodgson, is, 'Whatever you are totally ignorant of, assert to be the explanation of everything else.'" So also another writer, Dr. Mellone, in the course of an argument for a future life, is forced to admit that "Modern psychology has nothing to contribute in favor of a belief in survival.....Psychology has effectually disposed of the conception of the soul and body as two separate things." Finally, we have Professor Munsterberg declaring, "The philosopher who bases the hope of immortality on a theory of brain functions.....seems to me on the same ground with the astronomer who seeks with his telescope for a place in the universe where no space exists, and where there would be thus undisturbed room for God and the eternal bodiless souls."

The truth is, that we do not know mind as an independent force, and it would never have been assumed to be so but for the need to bolster up a theory that rests upon no better foundation than that of primitive animism. "Mind"—if we must exalt an abstraction into an entity—is one of the most dependent of forces known to us. It is affected by most, if not all, bodily states, by degrees of temperature, by food, by air, by the secretory efficiency of various organs. We know nothing and can conceive nothing of "mind" apart from the activity of the central nervous system. Consciousness is not indeed co-extensive with nervous action, but nervous action is co-extensive with consciousness, and the correlation of the two is such that "no psychosis without neurosis" is now an accepted scientific axiom. The theory that mind has an existence apart from the body is a theological necessity, it may be a metaphysical speculation, but it is absolutely without evidence, and has no place in modern science.

In this science is only endorsing everyday experience. We all know how seriously affections of such organs as the liver or the kidneys affect frames of mind. We are all aware, in the same connection, of the importance of diet and of pure air. We see changes of mental disposition consequent on injury. We see mental character modified by alcohol or drugs. We see this "independent" force made quarrelsome or maudlin by an overdose of whisky or helpless by an inhalation of chloroform. Science only carries common observation a little farther in showing that a certain quantity and quality of the grey matter of the brain are indispensable to particular mental phenomena. It also shows that while this correspondence has grown more complex in the course of natural development, it has yet remained constant throughout. In health and disease the connection between nervous states and mental phenomena remain. It is admitted by all in practice—and by nearly all in theory. C. COHEN.

Positive Freethought.

As a rule, especially in believing circles, a Freethinker is supposed to be a most miserable person who goes through life mourning the loss of something of incalculable value which he is powerless to recover. He would give the world to be able to hold once more the simple beliefs he was taught to cherish in his childhood. The Rev. A. C. Hill, a popular London preacher, informs us that all sensible men must take their unbelief "as a matter for regret rather than delight." The dream has vanished, it is true, but they "cannot refrain from casting a wistful glance on what was once to them a veridical reality." There is no doubt but that a dream seems real while it lasts, but there is absolutely no evidence of its reality save merely this seeming. When it is over the intellect is positive that it was a pure hallucination, and surely unbelief in the truth of a hallucination cannot reasonably be "a matter for regret." But Mr. Hill, falling back upon the great Bergsonian fallacy, declares that "fortunately for us all, the world is not governed by the scholar," and that the intellect is an inadequate and often misleading guide. He tells us that one of the most pathetic figures of the last generation is that of Goldwin Smith, who failed, not because his intellect was defective, but because he lacked faith—"the faith that can move mountains and make weak men and erring men into captains of the hosts of the Lord." Listen to the following strange estimate of Goldwin Smith:—

> "With intellect sufficient to set up a dozen ordinary men he had been denied, or else had lost, that buoyant gladness of the soul, that power to hold on to the few things that men may prove in their own heart-beats, such as the worth of man and the exceeding goodness of the Most High God. Here lies the secret of his non-success. And the moral of it all is the old and trite one, that the saving forces of the world are not intellectual alone. They have their genesis in a certain majestic faith towards God and man—a faith which once and for ever was verified when the Lord of men bought his crown by the acceptance of the Cross" (British Congregationalist, June 4).

Now, we shall expose the inaccuracy of that verdict by means of the very article in which it occurs. Mr. Hill traces the failure of Goldwin Smith to the fact that "the cloister had left its mark upon him," to the fastidiousness which put it beyond the power of this stern but genuine lover of the right and true "to feel that the drunken boor who goes rolling along the road shouting his song of delight to the watching moon, and thanking the kind fates that still permit a man to get drunk when he likes, was made of the same flesh and blood as himself," in short, not to the absence of faith in God, but to an icy wall that "encompassed him, through which not even his dearest friends could penetrate." Then he naively adds:—

> "He had not that diabolic gift of familiarity that made Mirabeau a terror to his foes and a perennial joy to his friends. In the midst of a crowd and at his own fireside he was always lamentably alone."

In reality, then, the one thing lacking in the case of Goldwin Smith was not "a certain majestic faith towards God," but that greatness and charm of personality which is always the dominating factor in an efficient life. Mr. Hill might remind us that a great and charming personality is the outcome of intimate commerce with God, but his allusion to Mirabeau forbids him to make that retort, because Mirabeau was at once one of the most distinguished statesmen and orators France has ever seen and a most uncompromising unbeliever. He had numerous faults, and who has not? but he was a most commanding and lovable personality, and his power with the people was immense. It is the opinion of historical critics, among whom is Carlyle, that had he lived a little longer the Reign of Terror would probably never have taken place. Though he lacked faith in God and immortality, he was yet, according to Carlyle, the one man in France in whom the light of genius itself brightly shone, "which was never yet base and hateful," simply "the one man in France who could have done any good as Minister." Thus, Mr. Hill's case for the impossibility of achieving the highest success in life apart from religious beliefs collapses the moment we seriously consider it, and it is he himself who shows how utterly fragile a case it is.

It seems that a believer is wholly incapable of furnishing an accurate description of an unbeliever. Because we do not believe in God it is taken for granted that we disbelieve in man and cannot appreciate him at his true value. At every point Freethought is regarded as a system of negation. One of the chief characters in Tolstoy's great novel,

Digitized by Google

Anna Karenina, is called Levin, who is described by his friends as a Freethinker. Tolstoy says of him: "He could not believe; he was also equally unable absolutely to disbelive. This confusion of feelings caused him extreme pain and annoyance during the time allotted to his devotions." He fell in love with a beautiful young princess who was a Christian, and arrangements were being made for the marriage. Someone asked him if had his certificate of confession, as without it he could not be married. He had not been to confession for nine years. He was told that he must go to communion and obtain the certificate. Everybody assured him that it was only a matter of form, the priests being exceedingly accommodating. At this point Tolstoy gives us a vivid picture of the odious hypocrisy prevalent in the Greek Church. Levin appeared before several priests, and last of all before a little old man, who, crossing his hands under his stole, asked him:—

> "'Do you believe all that the Holy Apostolic Church teaches us?'
> "'I have doubted, I still doubt, everything,' said Levin, in a voice which sounded disagreeable to his own ears, and he was silent.
> "The priest waited a few moments, then closing his eyes and speaking very rapidly,—
> "'To doubt is characteristic of human weakness; we must pray the Lord Almighty to strengthen us. What are your principal sins?' The priest spoke without the least interruption, and as though he were afraid of losing time.
> "'My principal sin is doubt, which I cannot get rid of; I am nearly always in doubt, and I doubt everything'" (vol. ii., p. 81).

Throughout the empty ceremony Levin persisted in representing himself as one who doubted everything; but he returned to his friends with the certificate of confession in his pocket, and was duly married with all the formalities of the Greek Church.

Tolstoy, like Mr. Hill, is incapable of portraying a genuine Freethinker. According to him, the Freethinkers of his own day in Russia were "new-fashioned savages who rushed headlong into Atheism, Materialism, universal negation." Levin's wife "continued to go to church and to say her prayers with the calm conviction that she was fulfilling a duty," while her husband "amused himself, possibly, by calling himself an unbeliever, just as he did when he jested about her broderie anglaise." Our contention is that Tolstoy was totally unacquainted with the fundamental principles of Freethought, and that, in consequence, his portrait of a Freethinker is a miserable caricature. He makes Kitty, Levin's wife, say of him:—

> "Why does he spend all his time reading those philosophical books, which do not help him at all? He himself says that he longs for faith. Why doesn't he believe? Probably he thinks too much.....How can he be without faith, when he has such a warm heart, and is afraid to grieve even a child? He never thinks of himself—always of others" (vol. ii., pp. 443-4).

No, Levin was never a convinced Freethinker; he stopped at the half-way house known as Doubt. It was not in him, he had not the intellectual resourcefulness requisite, to complete the journey. Of course, he was profoundly miserable, yearning to return to the position he had abandoned. He could not live without knowing what he was, and why he existed, and so, devoid of pluck to go forward towards the land of complete emancipation, he went back to the region of intellectually blinding superstition and credulity, and accepted once more the answers of theology to his perplexing questions on the sole authority of the Church of his fathers. Had he completed his mental emancipation he would never have returned into the house of bondage. Once a man has tasted realities, he will never be able to subsist on dreams again. We often hear of conversions from Atheism to Christianity, but not one of them can be substantiated. If a so-called Atheist embraces Theism, it follows that his profession of Atheism must have been false. Once an American slave made his escape into Canada, he never voluntarily went back. The love of freedom is instinctive, while slavery of every kind is unnatural. To us, a return from Atheism to Theism is unthinkable. When a Theist becomes an Atheist, he merely reverts to the state wherein he was born—from Unnature to Nature, from dream-life to real life. And Atheism is not equivalent to universal negation, its negations being simply in order to affirmations. It negates the supernatural that it may affirm the natural, and give it the place and importance it demands and deserves. Freethought is negative merely in order to be positive, just as the builder is destructive in order to make clear the way for construction. And we aver that in Freethought alone is perfect mental peace to be acquired; and the truth, whenever clearly seen, maketh free, and is dearer than life.

Yankee Claims for Christianity.

> "John P. Robinson, he > Sez they didn't know everything down in Judee."
> —LOWELL, Biglow Papers.

A FEW years ago the shadow cast by the American theologian was small; but to-day, when the revivalists of the strenuous republic are occupying some of the most prominent pulpits of London, and their works are reprinted in England by tens of thousands, the situation is changed. Cocksure Americanism is no longer confined to the land of tall buildings and tall statements, and the weaker English Nonconformists are rapidly following in the footsteps of the imported theologians.

Dr. W. E. Barton, a distinguished American Congregationalist minister, has voiced the "spread-eagle" claims of his countrymen, and he has written an unconsciously entertaining article to that end in the American periodical, Faith and Doubt. Such is his transparent sense of humor that he has incorporated a manifesto of belief drawn up by some English Nonconformist scholars as embodying the essential truths of orthodox theology. As Dr. Barton has made a profound study of theological matters, he must be perfectly aware that such statements would be instantly repudiated by the Greek, English, and Roman Churches, and by many Nonconformist bodies, such as the Presbyterians and Unitarians.

Nonconformist though he be, Dr. Barton has the true priestly dislike of science, which he assumes, quaintly, to be "brand new." "Evolution," he says calmly, "is only fifty years old." Has he never heard of Lucretius, who before the Christian era suggested the theory of Evolution in his great poem, "De Rerum Natura"? Other branches of study, such as Comparative Religion, Dr. Barton says, are still more novel. We may grant this; but gratefully remember that this science, young as it is, has sapped the very foundations of the Christian belief. Moreover, Dr. Barton ignores the age-long conflict between religion and science, which keener eyes than his have perceived. Scientific teaching and investigation, or, indeed, any form of intellectual liberty, have always been incompatible with assent to the dogmas of religion. The entire organisation of priestcraft has invariably been brought to bear against science on the ground that it is a most powerful solvent of religious faith. This resistance of the Church of Christ to the prevalent opinions of scientists has no indisputable claim to respect. When we remember that the system of Copernicus, the discoveries of Galileo, the law of gravitation of Newton, the Darwinian theory, and the Spencerean philosophy were all in turn received in the same venerable quarter with equal disfavor and derision, we attribute that resistance, not to the invariable weakness of the scientists' arguments, but to the general clerical dislike of knowledge. Chemistry was opposed as an impious prying into the secrets of "God," and the early chemists were charitably regarded as agents of "the Devil." Physiology and medicine were opposed on similar grounds. Chloroform, one of the greatest blessings ever conferred on the human race, was resented as an infidel attempt to alleviate the pains "God" meant to be associated with childbirth. Geology was also opposed by "the Bride of Christ" because it made the chronology of the Bible look ridiculous. Biology was antagonised because it turned the Adam and Eve story into a myth. The Church always bitterly resented inquiry, and preferred explaining natural phenomena by mythological invention and revelation. Even Mrs. Eddy's attempt to erect a purely "Christian" science is disfavored by the orthodox.

Dr. Barton's delightful assumption that theologic dogma is necessary to morality needs direct contradiction. This inaccuracy of speech is simply the result of clerical bias. It is asserted by priests and clergymen who are attacking secular education for children, that without religious teaching morality is impossible. The "supernatural" view is that every act is moral which is in obedience to the commands of Deity; that these commands are known by direct revelation from "God," or through the conscience, which it is alleged is implanted by "God" in each person, and which decides for each individual what acts are right and what are wrong.

The Freethought objection is that the commands of Diety must be expressed either to individuals or to the whole race. In the first case, the sceptics ask, "How is it to be determined when any person is reliable who professes to be the recipient and interpreter of 'God's' commands?" In the second case it is asked, "Is it likely that any such command would have been given by 'God' without its most complete recognition by the whole human race?" The Mahdi claimed to be God-sent; Joanna Southcott declared herself charged with a special revelation; Joseph Smith professed to have a direct message from heaven; so did Mahomet; so did Jesus. How is it to be decided which prophet is sane and truthful? Is it to be determined by the numbers who accept, or reject, the message? If so, at what date or within what limits does the numerical strength become material? There are more Mormons now than there were Christians within a similar period. Mohammedanism in some countries would poll an overwhelming majority. Buddhism counts to-day more followers than can be claimed for Christianity. There is no single divine revelation universally admitted to be the command of "God." As for the Bible, the large majority of the world's inhabitants do not accept it. The greater number of the human family have never accepted it, and even of the minority who nominally take the Bible for their guide, Christians think the Old Testament imperfect, while the Jews reject the New Testament. Conscience, so called, varies in the same individual at different periods of his life and alters under different conditions of health. Three centuries ago it was moral in England and America to believe in witches, and it was moral to kill a witch. To-day it is immoral to believe in witchcraft; and to kill a witch would be regarded as murder. One hundred years ago it was moral to trade in slaves, to own slaves, and to breed slaves. Within living recollection it was moral to own and breed slaves in the United States. Why did Christians for centuries trade in slaves if morality is dependent on the immutable judgments of a God-implanted conscience? How is it that slavery, which was defended by clerical moralists only a few years ago, has now become utterly indefensible?

In England, until recently, it was immoral to marry the sister of a deceased wife, and the immorality was so clear that the children born of such union were illegitimate and legally treated as such. At the same time, in Canada and Australia, it was moral to make such marriages, and the children were legitimate. Since then the English conscience has fallen into line with the Colonial conscience, and these marriages are now recognised as being moral. The Freethinker asks how this is explicable from the supernatural standpoint?

One cannot always tell the condition of a man's mind from his writings. The most vehement assertions of the truth of a principle may be accompanied by a feeling not expressed in type, that certainty is lacking. Some such feeling was not absent in Dr. Barton, or he would not have penned the following remarkable admission, remarkable because it is preceded by such strenuous effort to prove Christianity unassailable. Says Dr. Barton, referring to the "essential truths" of the Christian religion, these "must express themselves in every generation, not merely in the language which men are speaking, but also with such imagery and unconscious figures of speech as are current and form the necessary background of men's thought." Such quibbling is only the beginning of the end. If we re-examine the Gospels in the light of the twentieth century, we shall find them anything but unassailable truths. "Miracles," said Matthew Arnold, in a celebrated passage, "do not happen." The newest of new theologians echo the same cry. Yet one thing must be evident to every unprejudiced observer. Christianity is based upon miracle. It is on the truth or falsehood of miracles that the personality of Christ must stand or fall. According to the Gospels, it was by miracles that he attested his divine sovereignty. It was by miracles that he won his first following. It was by miracles that he proclaimed himself the "Son of God," and without the credulous belief in the miracles Christianity would have died in its infancy. It is not, indeed, a creed of love and human brotherhood which has fascinated so many millions through so many centuries. Christ claimed that he was "God," and his "proofs" were that he multiplied loaves and fishes, healed the sick, and restored the dead to life. The whole question is reduced to one of facts. If we can believe that Christ was really born of a virgin, that he performed many prodigies, and that he actually and finally left the earth by ascension, then we need not hesitate to accept the pretensions of Christianity. If, on the other hand, we believe that the proofs for the miracles are inadequate, or that natural law is never broken, no amount of restatement in terms of twentieth-century enlightenment will make believable the miraculous events upon which the dogmas of Christianity are based.

The most important Christian body—the Roman Catholic Church—recognises this, and affirms that its own miracles are a continuation of those wrought by Christ, his disciples, and the saints. They tell us that the cures at Lourdes and elsewhere are precisely such as those mentioned in the Bible, and that the apparition of the Virgin to peasant children at La Salette is as genuine as the recorded appearance of Moses and Elias to a small company at Galilee. The ecclesiastics of the Greek Church take the same attitude, and contend that the annual revelation of the Holy Fire which takes place in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem is simply the latest link in a great chain that extends back to the commencement of the history of God's chosen people.

Dr. Barton admits that the present is a time of transition; but he does not appear to realise the effect of his own statement. The religion of otherworldliness is dead, or practically dead. The power of the Church has waned, and to-day exercises little influence except low down in the intellectual scale. The freethinking pioneers have sounded the march of humanity towards broader pastures and freer air. Honest human laughter has been heard in the place of the sobs of the religious, while the newer evangel of freedom and equality has been spreading over the earth. But suddenly, just as poor human nature has begun to breathe freely, this whisper of the ghosts of the Middle Ages is heard again, and the Nonconformist bodies, the youngest and rawest recruits of the Army of Superstition, are appealed to for corroboration of the fiendish formula that the human heart is evil, happiness a temptation, and the flesh a snare.

Granting that Dr. Barton and those who think with him are honest, so were their prototypes; so were the old priests and [illegible]sons who preached for century after century th[illegible]octrine of "original sin," the corruption of man's heart, and eternal damnation. What Calvin and Knox said we now smile at; what Dr. Barton and his friends say we also smile at. It must be so, unless we are to accept an interpretation of Life's riddle which leaves Humanity for ever within the gloomy portals of Superstition. The latest Yankee Nonconformist statement of the claims of Christianity is in reality an indictment of orthodoxy. It explains nothing and adds nothing, but leaves the world where Calvin and Knox found it, a world given over to devilry, darkness, and despair.

MIMNERMUS.

Acid Drops.

Monsignor Benson, novelist and Roman Catholic priest, has been lecturing at Caxton Hall on "Modern Miracles." This consecrated gentleman is not a fool, but he can play the fool, which, as the proverb says, takes a good deal of ability. "I know that miracles can happen," he said, "because they do." But this is not an argument; it is a repetition of the same thing in different words. That miracles can happen, and that they do happen, are really the same statement. They can happen because they do happen, and they do happen because they can happen. This is simply turning round a wheel, one half painted (say) red and the other half blue. The red doesn't prove the blue; the blue doesn't prove the red; they are arbitrarily indicated halves of one and the same thing. As for what Monsignor Benson calls modern miracles, he can only refer us to Lourdes, where some nervous cures, mostly temporary, undoubtedly occur, and where, for the rest, imposture is carried on as a fine art. Nobody ever goes to Lourdes with one leg and comes away with two. When that happens it will be time enough to talk about miracles.

It must have been the ignorance of his audience that tempted Monsignor Benson to refer to the miracles said to have been wrought at the tomb of Thomas á Becket at Canterbury. A drop of the saint's blood put into a bottle multiplied itself, and the bottle became full; even then it could be diluted again and again, and sold by monks for money in opposition to the doctors' medicine. This is the least gross of the stories connected with Thomas á Becket's corpse. A lively account of some of the others may be found in Froude's fourth volume of Short Studies. They are enough to make a cat laugh or a dog vomit.

A test is applied to the miracles at Lourdes, says Monsignor Benson. Yes, and a committee of monks was appointed to examine each story in detail at the shrine of St. Thomas of Canterbury. "Their duty," Froude says, "was to assure themselves that the alleged miracle was reality and not imagination. Yet thousands were allowed to pass as adequately and clearly proved. Every day under their own eyes the laws of nature were set aside." The miracles became more and more wonderful. At first weak eyes were made strong; then sight wholly lost was restored. At first sick men were healed; then dead men were brought back to life. A test indeed! Monsignor Benson is a true priest. He belongs to a Church that has always lied as much as the people would stand it. And there has never been very much limitation in that. "The prophets," says an old book, "prophesy falsely, and my people love to have it so."

Monsignor Benson related how a woman at Lourdes, with "great wounds" in her back, was "entirely and permanently" cured in a day or two. We should much like to know the name and address of that woman, and also whether any reliable person saw her before and after her alleged cure. We are quite ready to accept the stories of some cures at Lourdes. It all depends upon the complaint. But "great wounds" entirely cured in a day or two by prayers to the Virgin! It makes Jonah's whale look trivial. Anyway, while there can be found people who believe that, there is small reason for wondering at their believing the Biblical miracles.

"Providence" doesn't seem to help people anywhere else in the world but at Lourdes, and Monsignor Benson might remind it of the fact. Devastating floods have occurred in China. There has been immense destruction of property, and the loss of thousands of lives. Yet the Scripture says "He doeth all things well." Very well.

Rev. Everard Digby, vicar of St. Agatha's, Shoreditch, acted as referee at the prize-fight between Bombardier Wells and Colin Bell on Tuesday evening. Some good Christians objected to this. But did not Jesus himself attend such a match, perhaps with a "bit on" one of the combatants. "It is I, Peter, be not afraid" used to be quoted in a common joke in our younger days as—"Hit his eye, Peter, be not afraid."

Despite the formation of the League of Worshiping Children, the youngsters show no increasing anxiety to worship. Quite the other way, in fact. The Methodist Recorder publishes the figures for Sunday-school attendance for 1913-14 among the Wesleyan Methodists, and there is a decrease of over 11,000 scholars. Last year the decrease was over 12,000. This, it must be remembered, does not allow for any growth in population. That would make the decrease much greater. During the last five years there has been an average loss of ten schools per year.

The Recorder asks, "What can we expect for the future of the Church so long as this sinister sign hangs in front of us?" What, indeed! The only chance of keeping people Christian is to make them so while they are young. Christianity, nowadays, is not a religion that appeals to the uncorrupted adult intelligence, and the loss of the children means cutting off the only genuine source of supply. That is a peculiarity of modern Christianity. Art, or science, or literature, or politics makes its appeal to the adult, and, no matter what his childhood may have been, he may still be won to these in his maturity. But with Christianity, unless the seeds are sown in the young and impressionable mind, the case is hopeless. We know it, and all the clergy feel it.

The following is from the Daily Chronicle (June 26) report of the Salvation Army International Congress:—

> "In between the meetings the Overseas delegates have been exploring London. Nearly all made a pilgrimage to Mile-end, to see where the Salvation Army was born, and an American officer was seen to kneel and kiss the stone which marks the spot where the old General held his first open-air services. Many also went to the General's grave at Abney Park.
> "At the Congress Hall, Clapton, one delegate picked up some pebbles from the path, saying, 'I shall take these home. The old General may have trodden on them.' Another place of pilgrimage was a room in a house in Gore-road, Hackney, where relics of the General have been preserved—his desk, his table, a chair, and the bed on which he died. In this house the General lived in the early days of the Army, and after serving as the first training home it is now a home of rest for officers."

This is what the old Reformation Protestants used to call relic-mongering and Roman idolatry. It seems to come easy to all sorts of superstitionists.

The publication of the Life of Walter Bagehot by his sister-in-law, Mrs. Barrington, reminds us of Bagehot's sardonic humor. A friend of his had a church in the grounds near his house. "I like that," said Bagehot; "it's well the tenants should not be quite sure that the landlord's power stops with this world."

An account of the work of the Rev. S. F. Collier, of Manchester, which appears in T. P.'s Weekly, mentions that he has organised labor yards, women's refuges, training homes, labor bureaux, and lodging-house visitations. What Secularists these Christians are!

A writer in T. P.'s Weekly, referring to the stories told by Christians concerning Colonel Ingersoll and Charles Bradlaugh, that both these gentlemen took out their watches and challenged "God" to prove his existence by striking them dead in three minutes, says that "the persistence of tales of this kind proves the underlying mysticism of life even in a materialistic age." It does nothing of the kind; it proves the existence and popularity of Christian liars.

"Men need religion to prevent them from worshiping idols," says Mr. G. K. Chesterton. The Roman Catholic Church, to which G. K. C. belongs, supplies both for the same foe.

The old midsummer Fire festival, of Druidical origin, is still celebrated in remote districts, particularly at Tarbolton, Ayrshire. The Christian superstition has only one fire festival, and that lasts for ever, and the bulk of the human race will be participants in it.

The Methodist Times is nibbling at the bait recently thrown out by the Archbishops of York and Canterbury. It will be remembered that the Archbishops repudiated any desire for exclusive privileges, and said they would welcome in any reconstructed Second Chamber representatives of Churches other than their own. The Methodist Times does not decline the suggestion; it guards itself by saying that Free Churches are not anxious to be represented there, and thinks such representation would be extremely difficult. We think so too. A House of Lords as it is, is bad enough; but a Second Chamber partly filled with representatives of the Methodists, Baptists, Catholics, Salvation Army, and all the other odds and ends of the Christian world, would be an institution that only a Swift could adequately describe. One can understand a State teaching, or providing for the teaching, of a religion. That is a logical and an intelligible proposition. But a State endowing and teaching all forms of the Christian religion—some of which quite negative others—would be indeed Bedlam let loose.

The suggestion is, however, rather an astute one; and the Archbishops take the Nonconformist opposition to the Establishment at its proper value. They know, as we have often pointed out, that the bulk of Nonconformists are not objecting to the State establishment of religion, but only to the State establishment of a Church. And it is quite within the sphere of probability that some such plan as suggested may be seriously put forward as a means of perpetuating the State endowment of religion. If this were done, it would only be the policy of the Education Act over again. Neither the Church of England nor the Nonconformists ever seriously consider the presence of others in the State, or face the simple issue that the proper policy for the modern State is to stand aloof from all religions, protecting all in the expression of their opinions and favoring none. The Bishops are in the present House of Lords because they happen to be a relic of the Dark Ages. And it is to be hoped that, with the abolition of the hereditary principle in legislation, they will be abolished also. There is really no greater justification for the representatives of religion to be in the Legislature than the representatives of anything else. All who are there should be there by the vote of the people. There is no other sensible justification for their presence.

Mrs. Besant has discovered what will be to many a new cause of criminality, but which others will recognise as a very old spiritualistic theory served up afresh with a dressing of theosophic jargon. When a person commits murder, she told a Queen's Hall audience, it is because someone who has previously committed murder, and who are on "the other side of death," prompts them to do so. That, she says, is one of the reasons against capital punishment, and why in countries where capital punishment is common murders tend to increase. It seems we are all the time packing the next world with murderous spirits, who compel those still living to murder also. Their frequency is "due to the prompting which came from those miserable people who went into another world on the other side of death careless of what became of them." And with the abolition of capital punishment there comes a decrease in the number of murders, because there "is a diminution in the number of people who are forced hurriedly into the world on the other side of death." It is all so simple—and so stupid.

Stupid is really the only name for a theory of this kind. It has not even the merit of offering an explanation of what is otherwise unexplainable. For the facts of the case are adequately covered by what we know to be true. This is, the connection between the culture of a people and their criminal code. Where one is low the other is brutal. People accustomed to witness pain, and inflict pain on each other in daily life will, naturally, not hesitate to inflict pain by way of punishment. Familiarity breeds, if not contempt, at least, carelessness, here as elsewhere. When people were hanged for sheep-stealing, as Mrs. Besant says, sheep-stealing was common. But this particular crime diminished, not because we ceased to send sheep-stealers to the other world, but owing principally to commercial and industrial developments in other directions. Of course, the hanging did not stop the sheep-stealing. People were so familiar with it that it lost its terrors. Punishment, as Beccaria said, to be effective must be certain, and it must not become common. It is the brutalising effects of certain forms of punishment on those whose are alive that society has to dread. We need not trouble how it affects those who are dead.

Parallels are often drawn between our own civilisation and that of the Roman Empire during the days of its decline. Here is another that may be worth consideration. Socially, Rome showed the same extremes of great wealth and great poverty that we have to-day. It was oppressed by a swollen urban and a depleted agricultural population. A useless luxuried class developed. The more intellectual men and women of the time had ceased to believe in the old religion, and this gave the cruder and more superstitious believers a chance to assume positions of importance and control. The idle rich who were not overburdened with brains were always seeking some new sensation, and many found it in cultivating various forms of "occultism," which were as fashionable then as they are now. These facts—the withdrawal of the controlling influence of superior intelligence from the official religion of the country, and the craze for mystical religion amongst the idle classes—were very prominent features of the time, and played no small part in bringing about the retrograde movement that led to the establishment of Christianity. And they are the chief elements that make for retrogression to-day.

Judging by the authoritative tone of his pulpit utterances, one would naturally come to the conclusion that Principal Forsyth is God's plenipotentiary on earth. In the most dogmatic manner he speaks in the name of the so-called Sovereign of the Universe. Preaching on faith the other Sunday at Kensington, he said that men's "power with Christ is of more moment than Christ's own power over men." That is a strange assertion; but here is a stranger one still: "A living faith in him does move and alter the action of God." Jesus said, "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove" (Mat. xvii. 20); but Dr. Forsyth, a much superior authority, contradicts Jesus flatly, saying, "We cannot move mountains, but we can move the God who made the mountains." The fact is that mountains have never been moved by faith, knowing which this modern divine conveniently gives Jesus the slip.

In other words, defeated by the known, the reverend gentleman flies for shelter to the unknown. It is so delightfully safe to talk about God. He never contradicts, or in any way interrupts, the speaker. Neither praise nor blame has ever tempted him to utter his voice. Not even the fact that men have always fought and killed one another in controversies concerning him has induced him to interfere. Is not this inexplicable if God there be? We know nothing about God; but we confidently challenge the reverend Principal to adduce one instance of an alteration occurring in the action of Nature, which is the only action known to us, in answer to human prayer.

Mr. J. Ramsay Macdonald was speaking at Leicester last Sunday. He represents the town in Parliament, and he evidently knows the tenure by which he holds his seat. He praised the good old orthodox view of the Sunday question, and even recommended the adoption of the Scottish Sabbath. All the talk about turning Sunday into a day of recreation, he said, was humbug and dangerous. He appealed to religious organisations to see that Sunday is not secularised. He was in favor of a "dull" Sunday. Well, now, we are quite willing to let his Sunday be as dull as he chooses to make it. What we object to is the right he arrogates to himself of inflicting "dull" Sundays upon other people. That is the real point at issue; not Mr. Macdonald's own preference, but his claim to make it the rule for everybody else. Fortunately the "dull" Sunday is doomed. A thousand Ramsay Macdonald's could not save it. And calling it "Scottish" will not help it much in England. For there is an England, after all, in spite of 1603 and what some call the Scottish annexation.

The "Methody" airs, as William Cobbett called them, which some of these working-class leaders give themselves are quite astonishing. Now and then they beat the bourgeois at his own game. You would almost think that they had invented morality, and that religion was one of their monopolies.

Mr. R. J. Campbell's progress is simply phenomenal. At last he has seen the eyes of God, tells his people all about them, and flatters them with the assurance that one day soon, when they "stand free from the shackles of sense," they too shall see them, and thereafter to all eternity look at all things through those ineffable Divine orbits. And there are still superficially intelligent people who can listen to such balderdash apparently without turning a hair.

For two thousand years the omnipotent Savior has been diligently seeking the lost world, and for six thousand years the lost world has been yearning unspeakably, from the depth of its sore need, for the omnipotent Savior, and to this day the two have never once met. Is it not all wholly inexplicable and passing strange, except only on the assumption that the tragi-comical story is a complete illusion? And in highest comedy is there not always the making of deepest tragedy?

The Catholic Bishop of Northampton has the courage to face the facts concerning the religious outlook. On the one hand, he warns his followers against the modern views on religion, which he stigmatises as "cruel, impudent lies," and on the other declares "that throughout the world religion is in bad odor with the male sex." This, of course, is an intolerable reflection on the female sex; and yet what his right reverence says is entirely true, though with an ever-increasing number of brainy women religion is in worse odor even than with the men. What the Bishop fails to realise is that the modern mind is steadily outgrowing and abandoning all the ancient superstitions, and getting to look at them with disgust.

How marvellously hazy and illogical, though superficially plausible, some would-be-men of God are, to be sure. Under a cloak of exceeding cleverness, one of them explodes into verse in the following manner:—

"There is no unbelief.
Whoever plants a seed beneath the sod,
And waits to see it push away the clod,
He trusts in God.
There is no unbelief.
Whoever says, when clouds are in the sky,
'Be patient, heart, light breaketh by and by,' Trusts the most high."

When Daniel Webster, the celebrated American barrister, rose to address the jury in defence of the prisoner, on one occasion, all that he said in reply to the long and eloquent address of the prosecuting counsel was this: "Daniel Webster says, That's nonsense"; and the jury unanimously agreed with him. Well, of the sentiment expressed in the verses just quoted we venture to say, "That's nonsense." Unless Nature and God mean precisely the same thing, the lines are utterly meaningless.

"From seven to fourteen is the time for character building," says Mrs. Annie Besant. The lady need not have studied the "wisdom of the East" for twenty years to find this out, for it is engraved in every school copy-book.

A pious father found his small son's pocket book, and was struck by the entries "S. P. G.," followed by the figures 6d., 8d., 4d., 3d. Thinking his boy had subscribed to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, he asked him what it meant. "Oh! that is 'something—probably grub,' father," he replied.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton, who took the chair at a lecture on "Modern Miracles" the other day, gave vent to some of his usual quips and cranks, but incidentally touched on a rather important truth. The modern world, he said, was a sceptical world, and tried to flatter itself by calling itself daring. He maintained, however, that it was a very timid world. "It funked nearly all the problems of life." "Advanced people were holding back in a manner that was little short of cowardice." We are afraid there is a great deal of truth in this statement. Mr. Chesterton meant that if the modern world had more courage it would accept miracles—which is merely Chestertoness. But that the "advanced" world is timid we believe to be an unfortunate truth. In private conversation people will admit their disbelief in religion, or their indifference to it; they will admit the absurd and useless character of many of our institutions; and yet in practice they will be found either supporting these things or placing obstacles to the progress of those who are trying to achieve reform. There are, for example, quite enough Freethinkers in Great Britain to make Freethought a recognised power in the land. It is not so recognised because so many Freethinkers think far more of how to avoid offending Christians than of how to promote their own principles.

The truth is that the average Englishman takes less pride in his opinions than he does in anything that he possesses. He will take pride in his home, his family, his pictures, his athletic record, his possessions. He seldom evinces a genuine pride in his opinions. In the main, this is doubtless the expression of social heredity. He does not belong to a society in which the value and the power of ideas is properly recognised and appreciated. On the contrary, the man of strong opinions—particularly if they be unorthodox—is called a crank, a faddist, a fanatic, and is always regarded as more or less of a nuisance. He grows up impressed with the wisdom of keeping his opinions to himself—as if an opinion that one does not ventilate were worth the having. To realise this, one need only reflect on how few of us know the opinions of those around us on some of the most important and vital of questions. There is more or less concealment all round, with the result that there is more or less cowardice all round. And for this mental cowardice, so well established that it is practically accepted as a virtue, Christianity itself is principally responsible.

Learning was recognised in the "Honors" conferred on sundry persons on the King's Birthday. Professor J. G. Frazer, the author of that great book, the Golden Bough, received a knighthood. It reminds us of an earlier King George, who received a new volume of the famous Decline and Fall from the author with "Another big book, Mr. Gibbon!"

The Bishop of Wakefield wants children under sixteen kept from the cinema shows, which he thinks harmful. Yet the dear Bishop thinks that children under sixteen should be taught the horrors of hell.

The Evening News recently had a paragraph concerning a curate who received ten shillings a quarter. It seems like a choirboy's "honorarium"; but, really, the dear clergy may have thought that religion, like virtue, was its own reward.

According to our Nonconformist contemporary, the Daily News and Leader, William Morris "may have professed no religion," but he was among those who "whilst denying God with their tongues, admit him by their actions." This, we presume, is an admission that Morris did not worship at the same tabernacle as the members of a famous cocoa firm.

An inmate of the Milton Union Infirmary, Sittingbourne, has reached a hundred years, and the pressmen are taking photos and writing paragraphs If those scribes could only have met Adam, Methuselah, or Melchizedek! As the last-named gentleman, according to the Bible, had neither beginning nor end of days, he may be photographed yet in the halfpenny press.

Nothing shows the desperate plight of the Churches better than the way some of the religious papers are building hopes on the ridiculous "Come to church" movement that is to be tried next January. Everybody in the country is to receive a personal invitation to come to church on a particular day; and it is quite possible that some may. Anything large and impudent is bound to strike the fancy of some people, and they may attend to see what it is all about. But we doubt if the clergy are silly enough to quite believe that it will lead to any permanent increase in church attendance. People cannot have forgotten that there are churches, or that the clergy would like them to attend. Their staying away is not for want of being invited, but from want of conviction. And how is the "Come to church" game going to supply that? Besides, in the main, people don't advance backwards. A man may hang on to Christianity in spite of all one may do. But once he has outgrown it, how can you remove the knowledge of the truth that he has obtained? "Come to church" will be like the Christian Endeavor and other fads. It will amuse and interest those in the Church. It will have precious little effect on those outside.

A few weeks ago, at such an eminent Protestant centre as Edinburgh, Professor M. Bergson was hailed enthusiastically as a new religious ally, as a prophet of brilliant originality, and as a distinguished leader of twentieth century thought; though from the newspaper reports of his Gifford Lectures we do not learn that he expressed his views on the universe even in terms of eighteenth century Deism, to say nothing of Christian Theism. Now, the curious fact is that, while the Protestant world, being in a state of desperation, welcomed the pseudo-scientific philosopher with open arms, immense audiences hanging receptively upon his lips, the Catholic world was authoritatively called upon to disown him and all his works as a pernicious influence in modern life. We maintain that, having due regard to its own interests, the Church of Rome has taken a thoroughly wise action. In no sense whatever can M. Bergson be claimed as a force that is calculated, in the least degree, to help the cause of supernatural religion. He is simply an Idealist that must be put in a category by himself. But how amazingly self-contradictory the Christian world is.

C. D.—We quite agree with you that people in love with the memory of great historical characters should not inflict them upon their children. Julius Cæsar Jones is rather a burden to carry through life. So is Charles Bradlaugh Barker. Whatever ordinary name a child bears may be rendered illustrious—by himself; to start with a ready-made illustrious name is apt to be unfortunate. There is much in the story of Voltaire and the Duke de Rohan. The dull, insolent Duke, when the company were hanging on Voltaire's lips, bawled out, "Who is that young man who talks so much?" "My lord," Voltaire replied, "he is not one who carries about a great name, but one who wins respect for the name he has. You, my, lord, are the last of your house; I am the first of mine." We presume you know that there is a legal way of changing one's name. This is often done when money is at stake. The late Mr. Watts-Dunton was a case in point. His original name was Theodore Watts.

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings again.

H. F.—See "Acid Drops." Thanks.

W. P. BALL.—Many thanks for cuttings.

G. E. FRANCIS.—We are quite aware that the Catholic Church does not encourage the reading of the Protestant versions of the Bible. Neither do the Protestant Churches encourage the reading of the Douai version of the Bible; which, by the way, though the English people don't know it, preceded the Authorised Version in print.

OLD READER.—We did not mean that Mr. Cohen had broken down, but that he might be on the way to it. We are happy to say he is better.

T. N. N.—We note your view that our "Open Letter" should be ear-marked for republication as a pamphlet.

R. OGILVIE wishes he could order fifty copies of "that valuable Bible Handbook."

W. M.—Thank you for noting it. It is just one of those abominable misprints that will happen. No book is so carefully "read" as the Bible; yet the famous Adultery Bible got through with the "not" omitted from the seventh commandment, so that all good Christians were told to "commit adultery."

Editorial.

THE sudden attack of the torpid English summer has made me a sun-worshiper again. Any man, editor or otherwise, who writes more than he can help in this weather (Tuesday, June 30, 1914) is simply a fool. I will postpone fulfilling the promise I made in last week's "Editorial." Yet although the matters I mean to write about will keep a little, they are of great and grave importance.

Wales is progressive in many things, but not in the matter of religion. Welsh Members of Parliament, even, are capable of talking the greatest nonsense in this respect. Mr. Hugh Edwards, for instance, told a Rhyl meeting the other day that they would be guilty of treason if they succumbed to the temptation to destroy their traditions as Sabbath-loving people by giving facilities for Sunday boating and Sunday excursions. Treason! What on earth does the man mean? Fortunately the growth of Sunday freedom in England more than balances any Sabbatarian reaction in Wales. Recreation, and innocent recreation too, takes thousands away from "divine worship" every Sunday. The latest development is a proposal to run People's Theatres on Sunday. Many actors and managers, including Sir H. Tree, are strongly in favor of this policy. Some actors and actresses are opposed to it on the ground of the danger of a seven-days' week to their profession. But a few strokes of the pen, in a new Act, would render this impossible.

We make the following extract from a letter written by a new subscriber in South Africa:—

> "For a long time I have wished to write and let you know what delight, pleasure, and profit I am afforded by the pages of the Freethinker from week to week. About two years ago a copy of the Freethinker accidentally came into my hands, and, after reading but a few pages of it, I instantly became a confirmed Freethinker. The reason I so easily became 'converted' to Freethought will be obvious to your readers when I say that I was walking in the black darkness of religious superstition, many times wishing that something would happen soon to end my miserable existence. As I write this, I feel that I would like to be able to put a copy of your paper in the hands of every man and woman who find themselves in the same position as I was in then: knocking, but not getting any reply—knocking at a purely imaginary door; seeking, but not finding; asking, but no answer. To such people the Freethinker must be a real boon, a genuine treasure, and the Light of the World to them. I read many papers and magazines, but none will even compare with the Freethinker—written by thinking men for thinking people. I am deeply sorry to know that Mr. Foote is not as well as the readers of the Freethinker wish him to be, but I sincerely hope that before this reaches you he will be his old self again. I hope he may be spared long to be, as he has been all through his long and well-spent life, the Champion of English Freethought.
> "What a mighty difference it would make to poor distracted Ireland if only a few of her leaders—say Sir E. Carson and John Redmond—were Freethinkers. Then Ireland would be what she ought to have been, what she would have been, centuries ago."

The writer ends by remarking that the Irish question would have been settled long ago if it were not for "Protestant" and "Catholic" factions.

Mr. B. A. Le Maine, 526 Oxford-street, London, W., is organising the Annual Outing of the Metropolitan Secular Society, which takes place on Sunday, July 12, to Southend-on-Sea. Tickets, including rail and high tea, 4s. 6d. each, to be obtained at the aforesaid address before July 5.

For some years now there has been no organised work done by the National Secular Society in Regent's Park, in consequence of the North London Branch having concentrated their efforts upon the newer station at Parliament Hill. Regent's Park, thirty years ago, was celebrated for the large, orderly, and intelligent audiences that gathered round the Freethought platform, demonstrations held there being always most enthusiastic. This year the Branch has recommenced afternoon meetings, and we are pleased to have a report from Miss Vance, who attended the meeting last Sunday, that the audiences are as large and as enthusiastic as ever, notwithstanding the fact that other Freethought meetings both precede and follow the N.S.S. meeting.

White Christians—you must be white to be an accepted Christian—are such a selfish, conceited, and boastful lot of people, and go swaggering so insolently over this planet, that a Freethinker is naturally glad to see them taken down a bit. We rejoiced—assuming that there had to be a war—that Holy Russia was soundly beaten by Heathen Japan. In the same way—although we don't trouble our readers about prize fights, or trouble ourselves in ordinary cases who wins or who loses—we are glad that Jack Johnson has soundly beaten the "white champion" who was going to give him a licking at Paris. Nothing could be more hypocritical than the attitude of the Christian whites to the so-called Christian blacks; and we like to see the pride of color humbled now and then.

CHRISTIANITY A FAILURE.

Ah! how true it is that Christianity has not, as you say, Christianised the world! There is something curious in the spectacle of the embarrassment of every sect of Christians in accounting for this fact. I know no subject on which there is more miserable floundering among incompatible views and untenable assertions.—Harriet Martineau.

Christian Apologetics.

VIII.—ORIGEN AND EUSEBIUS.

MANY years ago, when I was quite a youngster, I remember going several times with some older lads to hear the great Infidel-slayer, Thomas Cooper, hold forth on the London Fields. I can see him now in my mind's eye stepping briskly along, with books under his arm, followed by three or four disciples, to take his place in the arena. I cannot call to mind any of the arguments used—I was scarcely of an age to understand them—but no one seemed able to stand against this great Christian Evidencer. Upon one point only is my memory clear. This is, the method he employed, upon more than one occasion, to reduce an opponent to silence. Looking at the latter individual gravely, almost pityingly, he slowly asked: "Have you read Irenæus?" (a pause). "Have you read Origen?" (a pause). "Have you read Eusebius?" (a longer pause). "Then allow me to tell you, my friend, that you are very, very ignorant."

After this set-down, the opponent, however strong or cogent may have been his argument, was left without a leg to stand upon. Knowing nothing of the unimpeachable evidence borne by those Christian "fathers" to the truth of the Gospel records, he ignominiously collapsed. How, indeed, was it possible for anyone who had not read a line of Irenæus and Co. to impeach the credibility of the New Testament accounts? Who would be so rash as to question the Virgin Birth story, or that of the Devil placing Jesus on a pinnacle of the temple, without knowing what bombshells lay concealed in the pages of Irenæus and Eusebius? Years afterwards, when I came to examine the Gospel "history," I did not forget to consult Irenæus and his confrères, and then I discovered that the valiant Thomas Cooper had been making much ado about nothing. I also learnt that the great Christian advocate had written several volumes on "the verity" of the Gospel narratives—copies of which I procured and read. Among these were: The Bridge of History over the Gulf of Time—The Verity of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ—and The Verity and Value of the Miracles of Christ. On the title page of each volume the author calls himself "Lecturer on Christianity."

In the first of these works the writer undertook to trace back the existence of the four Gospels from the nineteenth century into the first—each century being considered a bridge. The author might, however, have saved himself much writing and a good deal of ink, by commencing at the end of the second century, and tracing back into the first; for no hostile critic then denied, or denies now, that all four Gospels were known and in circulation in A.D. 180. But had this been done, where would Thomas Cooper's great book have been? The letterpress would then have made but a small pamphlet—which accounts for the long succession of bridges. With the aid of one of his boasted authorities, Irenæus, our "Lecturer on Christianity" thought he had succeeded in placing the Gospels in the first century; but this task was accomplished by taking all the statements made by that mendacious "father" respecting the apostle John and Polycarp as historically true—which statements, I have already shown, are not in agreement with facts. This easy work of tracing back—which our credulous lecturer believed he had actually performed—still remains to be done.

Having already dealt with Irenæus, I will now say a few words respecting Mr. Cooper's two other authorities—Origen and Eusebius. The first of these, Origen (A.D. 230—250), was a voluminous writer; but his works have no evidential value. He was one of those who indulged in a system of allegorising the Jewish scriptures, and he carried his methods of distortion to extravagant lengths. According to this perverter, every passage of "holy writ" contained three meanings—the literal, the moral, and the mystical. He was also addicted to fanciful speculations on points beyond human knowledge or reason. After reading some of Origen's distortions of the Old Testament writings, the Pagan critic Porphyry is quoted by Eusebius (Eccl. Hist., vi., 19) as saying:—

> "But some Christians, ambitious rather to find a solution of the absurdities of the Jewish writings than to abandon them, have turned their minds to expositions, inconsistent with themselves, and inapplicable to the writings; which instead of furnishing a defence of those scriptures, only give us encomiums and remarks in their praise. For boasting of what Moses says plainly in his writings, as if they were dark and intricate propositions, and attaching to them divine influence as if they were oracles replete with hidden mysteries, and in their vanity pretending to great discrimination of mind, they thus produce their expositions."

It is probable that what Mr. Cooper liked in Origen's writings was his pretentious reply to Celsus in eight "books." This was of the usual argumentative and presumptive character.

I come now to our lecturer's third authority, the ecclesiastical historian Eusebius (A.D. 320). This bishop conceived the idea of arranging and putting into historical form all matters connected with the Christian religion which he found mentioned by the various Christian writers who lived between the first century and his own days, commencing with the alleged ministry of Jesus and the preaching of the apostles, as recorded in the Book of the Acts, including the New Testament writings which were received or rejected by the orthodox, the various heresies that arose, an account of the persecutions which had taken place at different times, and many other matters. For this work Eusebius had access to a large number of earlier writings, from the majority of which he made extracts; the only point upon which there can be any doubt is, as to the fairness of his methods. He says in his introduction: "Whatsoever, therefore, we deem likely to be advantageous to the proposed subject, we shall endeavor to reduce to a compact body of historical narration." As an illustration of his mode of making selections, I subjoin what he says about Celsus:—

> "At this time [i.e., A.D., 244] Origen also composed, in eight books, a reply to that work written against us by Celsus, the Epicurean, bearing the title The True Account" (E. H., vi., 6).

This is all; nothing in the work of Celsus against the Christians and their religion was "likely to be advantageous" to Christianity; nothing therefore was quoted from it. Upon this method of selection Gibbon has something to say in his Decline and Fall (chap. xvi.).

Eusebius wrote a life of the emperor Constantine, who caused his son Crispus, his nephew Licinius, and his wife Fausta to be put to death. Referring to the latter crimes, Gibbon, in another place, remarks:—

> "The courtly bishop who has celebrated in an elaborate work the virtues and piety of his hero, observes a prudent silence on the subject of these tragic events."

It should, however, be borne in mind that Constantine was the first Roman emperor that took the Christians under his protection; that he stopped all persecution, made Christianity the religion of the State, and was very friendly with Eusebius.

I will now take another example of the methods of Eusebius. In Acts xii. 23 it is stated of Herod Agrippa I. that "an angel of the Lord smote him..... and he was eaten of worms, and gave up the ghost." This statement is, of course, unhistorical. On the occasion referred to, king Agrippa was seized with acute abdominal pains, which continued for four days, at the end of which he died (probably poisoned). The "worms" in the Acts were taken from the last illness of Herod the Great. Josephus, giving a detailed account of the death of Agrippa, says:—

> "As he presently afterwards looked up he saw an owl sitting on a certain rope over his head, and immediately understood that this bird was the messenger of ill tidings, as it had once been the messenger of good tidings to him," etc. (Antiq., xix., viii., 2).

Referring to the Acts account of the death of Herod

Agrippa, Eusebius says (E. H., ii., 10) :—

> "It is wonderful to observe.....the coincidence of the history given by Josephus, with that of the sacred scriptures" [he quotes a long passage from the Antiquities, and then the foregoing passage]......" After a little while, raising himself, he saw an angel sitting above his head. This he immediately perceived was the sign of evil, as it had once been the sign of good," etc.

Thus by the change of one word Eusebius has piously added corroboration to the mendacious Acts account. It may further be stated that Eusebius was the first to find—or at least to quote—the well-known Christian interpolation in the Antiquities respecting "Jesus a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man," etc. One point in connection with this interpolation is beyond question, namely, that it was not in the Antiquities in the time of Origen; for the latter, in his reply to Celsus, quoted the passages respecting James and John the Baptist (Antiq., xx. and xviii.) in proof of the historicity of the Gospel history; but the great passage respecting Jesus (now found in Antiq., xviii.), which would have completely disproved the allegations of Celsus, and which Origen would most certainly have cited, had it been there, is in this reply conspicuous by its absence.

It was, again, Eusebius who piously found the Letter of Jesus Christ to Abgarus, king of Edessa. According to the story, Abgarus, "who reigned over the nations beyond the Euphrates," being stricken with an incurable disease, and hearing of the wonderful cures wrought by Jesus, sent to the latter by hand a letter beseeching him to come and heal him. In reply to this request, Jesus sent the following letter by bearer to the afflicted king :—

> "Blessed are they, O Abgarus, who, not having seen me, have believed in me. For it is written concerning me, that they who have seen me will not believe, and that they who have not seen me will believe and be saved. But in regard to what thou hast written, that I should come to thee, it is necessary that I should fulfil all things here, for which I have been sent. And after this fulfilment, I shall be received again by Him that sent me. And after I have been received up, I will send to thee one of my disciples, that he may heal thy affliction, and give salvation to thee and to those who are with thee" (Eccl. Hist., i. 13).

This letter, Eusebius tells us, was "taken from the public records of the city of Edessa.....from the archives." And he further says that "it has been literally translated by us from the Syriac"—the supposed language of Edessa. Whence, its authenticity should be unquestionable. We have, at any rate, more evidence for the genuineness of this letter than for any of the Gospel miracles; yet there is not the smallest doubt that it is a Christian fabrication. That Eusebius found the letter written in Syriac, and translated it into Greek, may be readily admitted; but that it was a historical document "taken from the public records of the city of Edessa" is very unlikely indeed. I should perhaps have stated that Eusebius gives a copy of two letters—the other being that sent by Abgarus to Jesus Christ, in which the miracles alleged to have been wrought by Jesus, and the rejection of that Savior by the Jews, are mentioned as well-known facts of history. The two letters, both written in Syriac, bear marks which clearly prove that they were composed by a Christian. There is, therefore, no mystery in accounting for them. In the days of Eusebius the four Gospels were written in Syriac, as well as in Greek; the fabricator of the letters was a Syriac-speaking Christian. The statement of Eusebius, then, that the letters were taken from the archives of the city of Edessa, was made on his own authority; he had no warrant for making it.

As to the statements in the letter about believing and not believing in Jesus, the only passage in "holy writ" bearing upon the subject is the following :—

> John xx. 29.—"Because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen me, and yet have believed."

The foregoing is evidently the writing referred to by the third century Christian who forged the letters. That the Fourth Gospel was not written in the time of Jesus probably never entered this late forger's head. He could only know of some such statement by seeing it in Christian writings of his own day, which at that period were all ascribed to the apostolic age.

ABRACADABRA.

Pandemonium in the Balkans.

THE two recent wars, and the innumerable consequential massacres, in the Balkans, first as between Christians and Moslems, and then as between the rival races and religions of the Balkan States, might almost be regarded as colossal object-lessons wrought for us in blood and tears by the "Finger of God" in order to prove to the smug optimists of the twentieth century that the Middle Ages are still with us in all their callousness and naked horror. We watch on the tragic scene a group of newly formed nations who had enjoyed for centuries a community of suffering under the Turkish yoke, and observe that no sooner had they broken the power of their traditional enemy than they began to quarrel violently over the spoils of victory. They had enough religion, of a sort, to give their racial hatreds the keen edge of fanaticism, and having the same brand of religion, the difference between Patriarchalist and Exarchist came providentially in aid in order to exacerbate the primitive national enmities of the Greek and Bulgarian elements in the great Balkan imbroglio. The sanguinary war which broke out between the Allies for the political appropriation of Macedonia and Thrace produced a fresh crop of atrocities, and an equally vigorous crop of mutual accusations of murder and tortures, of mutilation, not only of prisoners of war, but of vast numbers of the civil population, of victims buried alive, burnt to death or accorded the doubtful honor of crucifixion.

The well-known Belgian Deputy, M. Georges Lorand, who knows the Balkans well, and its several races and tongues, revisited the scene of carnage in September last, and recorded his *Notes et Souvenirs in a pamphlet published at the end of 1913. M. Lorand is inclined to think that oriental exaggeration played a large part in the relation of these atrocities, especially as regards the Bulgarians, but it is sufficiently horrifying to learn even from his temperate pen that more perhaps than in any other war grave excesses were committed by the various bands of irregulars, Turkish bashi-bazouks, Bulgarian comitadjis, and Greek irregulars, and by the populations themselves, "whenever the occasion was offered to them of sating the lust for vengeance lying dormant in their breasts during generations of hatred and oppression." Official Europe, which concerns itself with boundaries, treaties, and alliances, was naturally indifferent to mere questions of massacre and torture as between Bulgarians, Greeks, Turks, and Servians; and if the full truth is ever to be known, or even approximated by dint of comparison of data, it will be due mainly to the revelations of the Carnegie Commission of Inquiry.

The psychology of the Balkan War is sufficiently indicated by the religious fanaticism which was imported into the dreary procedure of massacre and outrage, and by the ominous fact that when King Constantine made his triumphant entry into Athens, he was acclaimed by the significant cry, "Long live King Constantine the Great, the Bulgaroktonos!" Bulgaroktonos (which means "the killer of Bulgarians") was the title of a Basileus in the tenth century, who bears the name in history of Bulgaroktonos because of the frightful massacres which attended his campaign against the Bulgarians. One of his exploits was the gouging out of both eyes of 15,000 prisoners of war, and the blinding in one eye of 150 others, in order that the latter might bring back the blind Bulgarians to their country, and show the nation of what noble feats of arms the Byzantine Greeks were capable. It cannot be said that the brutalities of war—civil or otherwise—have been sensibly diminished in the twentieth century when a name like Bulgaroktonos of infamous import is fixed by a band of Athenian Jingoes as a title of honor to their victorious King. The records of the recent campaign show that some of the present-day Greeks have not lost the art of mutilating their Bulgarian prisoners in the manner consecrated by the example of their first Bulgaroktonos.*

In the prosecution of the Balkan War, and in the resultant outrages which followed in its train, three prime factors dominated the whole situation: first, the instinctive antagonism of Cross and Crescent; second, the racial antagonisms between the miscellaneous elements composing the Balkan population; and thirdly, the fierce enmities of Patriarchalists and Exarchists, representative of the Greek and Bulgarian divergencies of religion. When this situation is embittered by actual warfare in the Balkans, everybody fancies he has excellent religious and patriotic reasons for being unjust and cruel towards his fellow-man. The shocking charges and recriminations of Turk, Bulgarian, and Greek are but the lurid commentary in fire and blood on the inexhaustible intolerance of the religious instinct of man, especially when that instinct is inflamed with the animosities begotten of racial antagonism.

In the eyes of the Greeks, the Bulgarians were guilty of two capital offences: first, they belonged to a race against whom the Greeks have preserved immemorial hatred, based on national antagonisms and religious divergencies; and secondly, the Bulgarian victories in the first war had created for Bulgaria the conqueror's right to Salonica and to a major part of South-East Macedonia, and thus stood as an inexpugnable bar in the way of Greek expansion in the conquered region. At the outbreak of hostilities against Bulgaria, her armies, which had borne the brunt of battle in the fierce contests which had broken the power of Turkey, were placed in a position of grave strategic inferiority relatively to the Servian and Greek armies, and the overwhelmed forces of Bulgaria in Macedonia were quite unable to protect the population, the major part of which was Bulgarian in race and sympathy, from outrage, decimation, and exile at the hands of the Greek army and its satellites. There is trustworthy evidence adduced by Professor Miletitch and by Dr. Kyroff that the Greek army, acting conjointly with the irregulars and the fanaticised Greek elements in the population, who were hounded on to the work of destruction by the local Greek clergy and their holy bishops, displayed their heroism last year by patriotically devastating Bulgarian villages and rooting out, either to death, exile, or torture, the Bulgarian elements in the Macedonian population. The results were as profitable to the sentiment of Greek nationality as they were calamitous to the cause of Bulgarian expansion; for an enormous body of Bulgarian exiles, estimated to be one hundred thousand or more in number, were compelled to flee from Macedonia, and only escaped after many hardships and dangers into Bulgaria, where they naturally became a serious charge upon the heavily burdened resources of the stricken country. The removal of the Bulgarian elements in the Macedonian population, whether by death or exile, providentially subserved the cause of the Greek megalomaniacs, who thereby acquired a sitting claim to the decimated country, where the work of massacre had received the consecration of true religion and high statecraft. At the same time, the assiduous circulation throughout Europe of the story of Bulgarian atrocities, thanks to the astuteness of the Greeks and the press agencies worked in their interests, dried up the fountains of European and American charity, which no doubt would have been moved to generous relief of the hapless exiles but for the stigma of horror which the Bulgaroktonos had affixed to the Bulgarian national character.

The horrors related by Dr. Miletitch and by Dr. Kyroff are among the most saddening documents that I have ever read. But perhaps the most sickening of all are the two collections of "Facsimile" letters written by Greek soldiers belonging to the 19th regiment of the VII. division of the Greek army. The original letters were captured by the Bulgarian troops at Razlog before transmission through the post. The letters are intensely interesting as illustrating the awful depths of moral depravity to which self-confessedly the Greek soldiers were sunken in the inebriation of victory, and as showing the curious psychology which war creates amongst its agents and glorifiers. Before me is a letter of a Greek soldier, dated July 11, 1913:—

> "We have burnt all the villages abandoned by the Bulgarians. These burn the Greek villages and we destroy the Bulgarian villages.....Out of the 1,200 prisoners whom we captured at Nigrita, only 41 remain in the prisons, and wherever we have passed we have left no sprig of that race."

I pass over a number of letters merely relating common or garden acts of massacre, to cite the letter, dated July 12, of a Greek soldier named Costi, who gloats that "I have taken five Bulgarians and a girl of Serrès.....The girl is killed. The Bulgarians have been made to suffer; while they were yet alive we gouged out their eyes." True warriors these of the valiant Bulgaroktonos! Another hero writes that "when we find one or two" of the Bulgarians, "we kill them like sparrows." "We burn here all the villages, and we kill all the Bulgarian women and children," writes one from Tricala, Thessaly, on July 14. Another soldier, writing to his brother on July 15, declares "that such things have never taken place since the coming of Christ." One soldier writes that out of 16 prisoners committed to his charge only two were brought along; the others "were swallowed by the darkness, massacred by me." The man's name is Theophilatos, which means a man who loves God! Another hero writes to his brother George that he thanks God that his health is good after the recent five battles, and states that, "by order of the King, we are burning all the Bulgarian villages," and adds that "we have violated all the young girls we have found." One gentle letter-writer describes a battle where the prisoners captured were killed, "for such are the orders we have. Wherever there is a Bulgarian village, we set fire to it and burn it in order that this filthy race of Bulgarians may never spring up there again." A soldier, writing to his mother, tells her that "we have orders to burn the villages, massacre the young men, sparing only the old folk, the children, and minors." And, of course, much piety and trust in God run through these edifying epistles. And so I might continue the sickening relation, but a limit must be imposed to the dreadful task of exposing the nakedness of these horrifying orgies which are glorified by the name of patriotism and sanctified by the halo of religion.

I do not wish to pretend that the Bulgarians are angels of light, or that they entered the Balkan campaign a race of sinners and emerged with the nimbus of beatified saints. They had their faults, and impartial history may have to apportion a heavy charge of responsibility upon them for their conduct during the two Balkan wars. But certain it is that much of that burden of responsibility will be rolled away, especially as regards the second war, when the true record is unearthed of the sinister part played in the grim Balkan tragedy by the Bulgaroktonos and his men of arms.

Animals Recently Extinct.

THE long-since extinct forms of animal life with which primitive man was familiar, comprise a very interesting group. But the organisms which, during recent centuries, have departed for ever, are probably more interesting still. Among those mammals that were undoubtedly contemporaneous with the early races of mankind, but which died out before the period embraced by history or tradition, were several at which we will glance before dealing with those animals that have survived right down to our own era.

All the mammals of prehistoric times which have since disappeared were either the ancestors or the near relatives of surviving stocks. With the advent of the human biped the range of mammalian life was seriously restricted; the larger animals were driven to more sheltered areas; the cave-lion and the cave-hyæna became extinct in their European haunts, and their descendants, the common lion and the spotted hyæna, unless their present ruthless destruction is stayed, will be numbered, in the course of a few generations, among the departed glories of great Nature's handiwork.

The remains of the hairy elephant—the mammoth—a mammal that does not appear to have outlived the Glacial Epoch, are so abundant that we know its outward and visible signs as clearly as those of any living animal. In addition to its well-preserved bones, and drawings of great artistic merit executed by prehistoric men on ivory and on cavern walls, we have been fortunate in discovering the entire carcasses of mammoths frozen for untold centuries in the icy cliffs of Siberia. The first of these was found in 1799, and the skeleton and a fragment of the hide are still exhibited in the St. Petersburg Museum. Another was discovered in 1901 which is also on view in the same building. "The beast had evidently died by an accident, as was shown by a broken hip and foreleg, by the extravasated blood in the chest, and even by grass still in the mouth."

A more primitive type of elephant, also extinct, was the mastodon. The remains of this proboscidean have been found in Tertiary deposits from Miocene times onwards in all parts of the globe. About thirty different species have been described, but the career of this varied and widely spread organism ended with the advent of man.

The hairy rhinoceros was another contemporary of the mastodon and mammoth, and soon shared their fate. Cervus megaceros, the so-called Irish elk, an animal once widely spread, and whose skeletons, dug out of the Irish peat bogs, are so conspicuous in the Palæontological Gallery at the Natural History Museum, is likewise to be numbered among the things of the past. So far as is known, this defunct deer was the noblest of its race, alike in height, antlered splendor, and grace of form. Frank Finn in his delightful book, Wild Animals of Yesterday and To-Day, declares that the Irish elk,—

> "must have been far the most grand and beautiful animal which has ever existed, since no other creature combines gracefulness and size in the same way; while its strength must have been equal to resisting the attacks of any creature in fair fight, for the ordinary red stag has been known to beat off a tiger enclosed in the arena with him, and the moose can kill a wolf with a single blow of his hoof."

But such æsthetic considerations as these made no appeal to primitive man. Without compunction he slew the Irish elk and devoured its flesh. Still, there is much more excuse for the aboriginal hunter than there is for the modern "sportsman," who, with the true spirit of the barbarian, encounters no rare beast or bird which he does not scruple to destroy.

The gigantic ground-sloths of America must be numbered with the departed fauna of the world. The megatherium is the most celebrated of these, and is probably the largest edentate that has ever lived. Apparently herbivorous, these extinct animals were highly generalised, when compared with modern forms, as they combined the head and teeth of a sloth with the vertebræ, limbs, and tail of the ant-eater. These animals reclined on their hind limbs, and employing their forelimbs as hands, they pulled down the boughs of trees on whose verdure they fed. That these huge creatures were extant when man had reached the New World appears probable from Dr. Moltено's recent discoveries in Patagonia. The remains of the mylodon, another fossil ground-sloth, were found in a similar state of preservation to those of man in the same deposit. Dr. Rudolph Hanthal's cavern investigations have confirmed this evidence, and what is even more interesting, the accumulated ordure of the animals, artificially cut grass, and the presence of human bones in the same cavern, certainly point to their domestication by man. "The cave was, in fact, a stable in which these queer cattle were stall-fed by some primitive race, and examination of the droppings showed that the food consisted of grass."

These discoveries strengthened the opinion of those who suspected the continued survival of these ground-sloths in the unexplored regions of Patagonia; but an expedition specially organised to discover them in a living state has met with no success.

Among the organisms exterminated by man within the past few centuries is the bluebuck of the Cape, the third species of the genus Hippotragus, the two others being the roan and sable antelopes. When first noted by European naturalists, the bluebuck was a declining organism. Its range was restricted to Cape Colony, and the commerce which was soon set up in its skins quickly reduced it to the brink of extinction. The animal was first described by Kolbe at the commencement of the eighteenth century. A hundred years later, in 1803, Lichtenstein, writing of South Africa, remarked that while there was wild game in plenty, the "blaubock" was practically extinct. The last of these beautiful animals appears to have been shot in 1799, and all that now survive are to be seen as mounted specimens in natural history museums.

"THE WORD OF GOD."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—It is very curious—clearly an act of Providence—that Mr. Foote's article, "The Word of God," appeared this week; for I was, for the how many hundredth time I don't know, discussing it with a friend on Sunday night, to whom I have sent the current Freethinker.

My feeble powers can but deal with this matter in a very inferior manner to Mr. Foote, and, considering that it is of perennial interest, I do hope that this article of his will appear in pamphlet form.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 28 SUNDAY, JULY 12, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Perhaps the great triumph of all moral writings, including sermons, is that at least they have produced some sweet and innocent sleep.—ARTHUR HELPS.

Providence.

THEOLOGICALLY providence signifies God as exercising his universal care and control. Very striking are the words in which the Gospel Jesus describes it: "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? And not one of them shall fall on the ground without your Father; but the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear not therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows" (Mat. x. 29-31). Mr. K. L. Parry, B. Sc., informs us that "this is one of the most precious sayings in all the Scriptures. It is so precious that we are almost afraid to look at it, lest it should vanish." Its preciousness consists in the comfort it ministers to those who are in trouble and sorrow. To us, however, the saying presents no intelligible meaning whatever. We fail to realise how it can benefit or comfort anybody to believe that God is with every falling sparrow and has numbered the very hairs of our head. Even on the assumption that this is true of him it is difficult to perceive how the knowledge of it can be a source of consolation to the afflicted. Unless the Divine presence prevents the sparrow from falling and rids mankind of all its sufferings, what is the use of it? Of what service to the world is a God who never acts? Or, to put the case differently, if God exists, is it not he who causes the sparrows to fall? Is he not to be held responsible for all the evils that darken life? Now, Mr. Parry, in a sermon in the Christian World Pulpit for July 1, candidly admits that Nature teems with ugly facts for which he is unable to account:—

> "We read in the rocks the record of great upheavals; we hear of cosmic collisions; we witness the rise and fall of mighty empires, Greece and Rome, Egypt and Babylon; we see temples left derelict, the monuments of ancient religions, and we know what all this means, we know what it has cost in blood; horrid visions rise before us of wars among the beasts, of battles royal in ancient forests; we know what it all represents in terms of mortal agony and suffering, we know because this is a war from which there is no discharge, and we witness all around us this same struggle and strife."

With those painful facts in mind, Mr. Parry exclaims, "Such is Nature. So has its Maker ordained." What a dismal confession! What a humiliating description of the Creator. Nature is "red in tooth and claw with ravine" by the decree of the Almighty. He not only permits, but ordains all the evils under which creation groans. And yet this God, who thus ordains, is called the Father, whose love knows no bounds, whose mercy endureth for ever, and who "comes quickly in response to the feeblest cry of his creatures." "So has its Maker ordained." He has ordained that the spider should catch and devour the fly in its web. Our loving Heavenly Father has ordained that the eagle should sweep down from the high rock and snatch away the bleating lamb from its mother's side. Mr. Parry has the temerity to declare that "this is God's world, that the least of his creatures is precious in his sight," and that "we are made and given life because the Creator has a father's heart, and rejoices in his children."

Without a moment's hesitation, we repudiate the doctrine of Divine providence, because all the facts of life belie it. There is absolutely nothing to show that this world is under the care of a tender-hearted and loving father. Indeed, Christian ministers themselves often describe this world as bristling with imperfections, inequalities, disharmonies, and disorders, a fact upon which they base an argument for immortality. Even they who are proud to be known as the Lord's people cannot hide from themselves the fact they enjoy no immunities, but are as dependent upon their own faculties as all others. The old belief that the Lord is mindful of his own gets discredited at every turn in life. Nature recognises no distinction between the godly and the ungodly, but insists upon treating all alike. Mr. Parry asserts that "the Gospel is this, that God is to be trusted"; but everybody is aware that, as a matter of fact, God is never trusted. Even the most pious people on earth trust themselves. Trust in God is a sentiment which nobody ever translates into practice. It is a thing to talk and sing and pray about, particularly in church on Sundays. "Trust thyself," says Emerson; "every heart vibrates to that iron string." It is a lying Gospel Mr. Parry preaches, a Gospel which nobody ever dreams of putting to the test of practice. Jesus taught that "God could be trusted to provide for and protect those who made his purpose their supreme concern"; but there is no case on record in which it could be proved that God did provide for and protect such people. Super-human provision and protection are never experienced, as history abundantly testifies.

"Providence" is a term which some people are in the habit of using in a thoughtless, irresponsible manner. When a man says, "By the good providence of God I was enabled to do so-and-so," he only means that circumstances were favorable, or that luck was on his side. He certainly does not believe that the Divine Being interposed miraculously on his behalf. There are others, however, who imagine that God is specially interested in them, and constantly takes their affairs into his own hands. A well-known clergyman had arranged to sail on the ill-fated Titanic; but at the last moment the Lord rendered it impossible for him to go by inflicting a slight illness on his wife. This was rather rough on the lady, and an illustration of the overweening conceit of the man, while it represents God as guilty of the wickedest behavior. If the clergyman was right about his own escape, then the Titanic disaster was an act of God, as every such catastrophe must be. We are therefore irresistibly driven to the conclusion that Atheism is the only rational position, every form of Theism being flatly contradicted by the facts of history.

Mr. Parry acknowledges his inability to define God's purpose in the Universe. He is convinced that he has a purpose, and that he is steadily fulfilling it in his own wise but mysterious way; and our object ought to be to co-operate with him in that fulfilment. But if we do not know what God's purpose is, how on earth can we co-operate with him in its prosecution? Take this:—

> "We are here to do God's will, let the consequences be what they will. We are in this valley of earth, shut > in on every side by impenetrable mountains, and here we are to fight a battle of which we cannot know the ultimate issue. God alone knows his inscrutable purpose. His thoughts are not as our thoughts, nor his ways as our ways."

How can we do God's will when we do not know what it is? How can we co-operate with him in an inscrutable purpose? We are told that the light shineth in the darkness, and yet that the darkness abides. The darkness abides; we are compassed about by mystery; and yet, though the darkness abides, "we can see the face of God, and know when he is pleased with us and when he is angry." Only in the pulpit is such sheer nonsense tolerated at this time of day. On the lecture-platform it would be laughed to scorn. We dismiss both God and his purpose, and substitute self-reliance. We do not know why we are here. It is possible that in the scheme of things our existence serves no purpose whatever. All we know is that, being here, we can make our lives purposeful by devoting them to the service of the race. Our work, the only work known to us, is to act as our own providence and, as far as possible, the providence of our neighbors. As Emerson says, "a man is relieved and gay when he has put his heart into his work and done his best." He needs no supernatural interference or succor, no providential intervention from beyond the clouds, but derives all requisite encouragement or inspiration from the sense of kinship and solidarity; and in proportion as his life becomes natural, it becomes also efficient.

J. T. LLOYD.

Do We Survive Death?—II.

WHAT objections are there to the theory that mental phenomena stand to the brain and nervous system in the relation of function to organ? There is no objection to it on any ground of fact, because that is the relation presented to us all, and it is assumed on all hands. We do not know "mind" apart from body, but we do know "body" apart from "mind." The only objection is one of theory; or, rather, the objection is based upon the necessities of a theory of immortality which is doomed if the mechanistic view be accepted as true. And, curiously enough, the one who has accepted a theory of a future life in the complete absence of evidence is found demanding the most rigorous demonstration of every step of the mechanistic argument before he will surrender his own totally unsupported belief. Manifesting a credulity almost without limits in the one direction, he rushes to the extreme of scepticism the moment the belief based upon that credulity is assailed.

It is argued that nervous action and consciousness are incommensurables—that is, they are two things having nothing in common; and we cannot therefore see how the one becomes "transformed" into the other. These objectors seldom pause to consider that, if this argument is given its face value, it is not only fatal to the mechanistic theory of the relations of body and mind; it is equally fatal to any theory that may be proposed. If we reject the theory that "mind" is the function of an organ on the ground that we cannot see how they are connected, we cannot adopt the bedlam-like policy of immediately assuming that nervous action, which it is admitted always accompanies mental phenomena, is due to the activity of an unknown substance which we call mind. This is denying a connection in one breath, and asserting it in the next. If there is really an unbridgable gulf between the molecular activity of the brain and consciousness, the gulf remains from whichever side we contemplate the problem. If the gap lies with the facts, and not with our knowledge of the facts only, we may assume a sort of pre-established harmony, such as one may see established between a phonograph and a cinematograph display; but nothing else is possible. On any other line the Spiritualist, in slaughtering the Materialist, commits suicide himself.

The difficulty is largely due to not bearing clearly in mind what is the scientific sense of "function." Let us take, for illustration, the case of a muscle, about which there is no dispute. The prime function of a muscle is contractility. The constituent parts of a muscle are cells and cell-fibres. If we take these cells singly, they exhibit the normal irritability of cells in general. It is their combination, their organisation, their development of specific qualities in the course of evolution, that gives the function of contractibility. It is the special combination of specially developed cells that gives us the phenomena of muscular action. The "function" in this case, it is admitted, is the expression of the activity of the muscle. We cannot separate the two; and if we ask why the molecular movements of certain cells should result in the flexing of a muscle, we can only reply that the one thing invariably accompanies the other. And this reply is accepted as quite satisfactory. No one denies that contractibility is the function of a specially organised structure.

From a biological point of view, therefore, a "function" may be defined as the activity of an organ or of an assemblage of organs. This definition holds good whether we are dealing with muscle and contractility, brain and thought, or an organism and life. We have the structure, and we have certain functions which are the expression of its activity. We do not know that any function is more than this; and it must be for those who make such an assertion to prove it.

Here a further consideration must be borne in mind. Sir Oliver Lodge, and Professor Haldane in his Mechanism and Personality, asserts that on the mechanistic theory life and consciousness becomes nothing more than the physics and chemistry of the nervous system. As put, the expression is misleading. The function of an organ or of an organism is more than can ever be discovered by any analysis of the physical or chemical nature of their constituent parts. No analysis of a compound will give the properties of a compound. That is the most elementary of axioms in chemistry. A whole exhibits all the properties of its parts plus the qualities due to their combination. And it is this plus that Spiritualists and Vitalists conveniently overlook. Naturally, therefore, an analysis of an organic structure does not give, and cannot give, all that is manifested by the structure. And except for its greater complexity, the difficulty of seeing how brain action gives rise to thought is no greater than that of seeing how any function is related to its organ. In any case, we can only show that, given a particular structure and conditions, a certain activity ensues. In a general sense, our knowledge here, although of a less precise character than in other directions, is in substantial agreement with all that we know concerning the relation of function to organ.

Much of the confusion existing is due to the way in which the question is often stated. People look for the undiscoverable, and complain that it cannot be found. When they ask how neural motion becomes a sensation, or how nervous action becomes thought, two things are separated that are in fact inseparable. Molecular motion does not become thought. Molecular motion remains molecular motion, and cannot become anything else. The famous statement that the brain secretes thought as the liver secretes bile is true only in the sense that as we find no bile in the absence of a liver, so we find no thought in the absence of a brain. "Production" carries with it the notion of separateness, and it is here that the confusion arises.

It is said, for example, that in any succession of nervous motions there is no room for the introduction of thought or consciousness. When, for instance, I tread with a bare foot upon a sharp nail, there results a complete chain of ingoing and outgoing physical changes that result in the removal of my foot. And it is said that there is no point in the chain of physical sequences at which consciousness may be introduced. The sequence is complete in its absence. Yet the presence of consciousness is denied by none. In addition to the physical changes, there is a sensation. We have at the beginning a physical shock; we follow this through a number of stages, and there emerges something quite different in character—a sensation. And the triumphant conclusion is that there can be no genuine organic connection between the two.

Certainly not, if we are observing two different facts. But is this so? Are we observing two distinct facts, or two aspects of the same fact? If the latter, the case becomes greatly simplified, and we have no longer to ask how one thing becomes transformed into another thing; but what are the conditions under which certain phenomena occur? And the cardinal fact here is, that what is viewed under one set of conditions as molecular motion is, viewed another set of conditions, feeling or thought. We may describe the same thing from either the subjective or from the objective side. In the one case we describe a phenomenon in terms of sensation, in the other in terms of matter and motion. We may, for example, describe a sensation of light from the physical side as so many nervous shocks, or we may describe it in terms of sensation, without considering the physical aspect at all. But it is the same thing all along. The distinction arises in looking at the same phenomenon now from the objective, now from the subjective, point of view. The confusion results from not always clearly bearing in mind that we are all the time observing the same fact, or set of facts, under different conditions.

The folly of asserting that if the mechanistic theory be true there should be nothing but physics and chemistry, is thus clear. The subjective aspect is as real as the objective. We do not see how motion produces mind, and we do not see how mind produces motion, because we are in each case looking for the impossible. But we can see how the same thing, under different conditions, will present quite different aspects. The psychic fact is not something that is produced, any more than H^2O produces water. Water is H^2O under special conditions, and in the same way the psychic fact is the objective fact presented under different conditions. Two things have been separated in thought that are inseparable in fact, and having done so, we treat them as independent existences, and at once fall to speculating as to What can be the connection between them?

Finally, it must be borne in mind that the neurological theory is the only one on behalf of which anything like scientific evidence can be offered. It cannot, of course, answer every difficulty that presents itself, but it is the only theory that explains, even in a general way, known phenomena by an appeal to verifiable data. Objections to it are based chiefly upon the incompleteness of our knowledge, an incompleteness not at all surprising when one remembers how brief is the period during which science has possessed the tools essential to the working of the problem. But during that period it has shown very clearly the useless nature of a soul theory. So far as positive science is concerned that is as dead as a doornail. This is admitted by a writer of the standing of Professor McDougal, who says:—

> "It is a matter of common knowledge that science has given its verdict against the soul, has declared that the soul, as a thing, or being, or substance, or mode of existence, or activity, different from, distinguishable from, or in any sense or degree independent of, the body is a mere survival from primitive culture, one of the many relics of savage superstition that obstinately persist among us in defiance of the clear teachings of modern science. The greater part of the philosophies also, mainly owing to the influence of the natural sciences, has arrived at the same conclusion. In short, it cannot be denied that, as William James told us at Oxford three years ago, 'Souls are out of fashion.'"

This summary of the present position of science loses some of its force from the writers own attempt to revive the "soul theory."

The Word of God.—III.

An Open Letter to the

MINISTERS OF ALL CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

LET me take, for instance, a volume like Lux Mundi, edited by Bishop Gore. This clergyman allows that the Pentateuch was not written by Moses, who is only responsible for the Ten Commandments; he also allows that David did not write the Psalms, nor Solomon the Proverbs; and that Jonah and Daniel are "dramatic compositions," and not history; although, as a matter of fact, Jesus Christ referred to both Jonah and Daniel as records of actual occurrences. But the admissions of Bishop Gore are outdone by those of the late Canon Driver, in his Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament. According to this clergyman, the book of Genesis was written hundreds of years after the time of Moses, by more than one hand; Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers are just as modern; while Deuteronomy was written some time between Isaiah and Jeremiah. The Hexateuch—that is, the Pentateuch and Joshua—was the work of nameless Jewish scribes; and the whole of the Priestly Code, or Law of Moses, belongs "approximately to the period of the Babylonian captivity."

This view of the Pentateuch was advocated by Thomas Paine, and unanimously opposed by the Churches. Dean Graves, Bishop Watson, Dr. Marsh, and a host of other ministers, stood up for its Mosaic origin; and scores of men and women were sent to gaol for selling books in which the opposite was maintained. However, the case is now altered; Canon Driver could only urge that the Jewish priests, who made laws and ascribed them to Moses, should not be accused of the crime of "forgery," as they were only conforming to "the literary usages" of their age and nation; though, for my part, I hold with Mr. Gladstone, that, if the Pentateuch was not written by Moses, but by Jewish priests and scribes, eight hundred years after his time, both the Jewish and the Christian worlds have been made the victims of "a heartless imposture."

Let us take the rest of Canon Driver's admissions as to the Old Testament books. David did not write the Psalms, which "set before us the experience of many men, and of many ages of the national life." Proverbs was "formed gradually," and not written by Solomon; nor was Ecclesiastes, which belongs to the second or third century before Christ; nor was the Song of Solomon, which is a love poem, and not an allegory; so that the headings of the chapters, in our English Bible, are an absurd, if not a base, imposition on the British public. Job is not history, but a drama, belonging to the period of the Captivity, and the speeches of Elihu are interpolations. Daniel was written hundreds of years after the time of its ostensible author, probably about 168 B.C.; so that its prophecies were fulfilled, because the events occurred first and the writer predicted them afterwards. Jonah was written long after the prophet's age, probably in the fifth century; and it is "not strictly historical"; that is, Jonah never converted Nineveh, and never took a submarine excursion in the belly of a whale.

There is a great outcry in your Churches, gentlemen, against the publication of such conclusions as those of Canon Driver, but I did not observe that the clamorers tried to answer him. They wanted to silence him. But it is too late to do that; the cat is fairly out of the bag. People with any eyesight, and there are more of them than you think, now perceive that all you have been teaching, for so many years, about the Old Testament, is a falsehood. Its various books were not written, for the most part, by the persons whose names you have put at the top of them; in fact, you do not know who wrote them; and, if you have been all along mistaken as to who wrote these books, and when they were written, I say it is a thousand to one that you are also mistaken as to their contents. It seems to me downright nonsense to say you do not know who wrote a certain book, and at the same time to say you are quite sure that all it contains is true.

The books of the New Testament, as to their authorship, are just as uncertain as the books of the Old Testament. Of the fourteen Epistles by Paul, only four are generally admitted as authentic, and even those are disputed. The other Epistles, by Peter and John, are also doubtful, if not spurious. Nor are the Gospels in any better plight. Matthew Arnold thought it time to tell the public that the Gospels did not exist, as we now have them, before the last quarter of the second century; that is, a good deal more than a hundred years after the death of Christ. Dr. Giles, a clergyman of the Church of England, declared that none of the New Testament books existed, as we have them, within a hundred and twenty years after the Crucifixion. It is generally allowed by the most competent critics that the earliest writings about Jesus Christ are lost; that the four Gospels, bearing the names of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, were written long afterwards, in the second century, by unknown persons; and that it was a very common thing, in the early Christian Church, to compose books and attach to them the names of the Apostles.

Now, gentlemen, I want to ask you a plain question, to which I should like you to give me a plain answer. Your Bible is stuffed with the most tremendous miracles; that is, stories which no man is called upon to believe, unless they are accredited by the most tremendous evidence. Do you really think, gentlemen, that the evidence you offer is good enough? Can you expect people, who think for themselves, to believe a host of things contrary to sane experience, on the word of men who lived somewhere—God knows where; and at some time—God knows when?

The "advanced" ministers—that is, those amongst you, gentlemen, who patronise the "New Criticism"—are patching up a new theory of Inspiration. They see that it will no longer do to maintain the old position, that the Bible contains truth only, without any admixture of error; or, to use the words of the famous Mr. Spurgeon, that every sentence of it was written by an Almighty finger, and every word of it fell from Almighty lips. Knowing that their Word of God does contain errors, in science and history, to say no more; they now teach that the writers (whoever they were) were only inspired in relation to religion and ethics; in short, that the Bible is God's Word because it reveals to us religious and moral truths which we could not ourselves discover. But this is only a temporising theory; it may do for the time, but it will presently be seen through and abandoned; in brief, your Word of God will, sooner or later, have to stand on the shelf, side by side with other Words of God; and then, gentlemen, you will have to get your livings in a more honest and useful profession.—Yours, with best wishes,

The Lesson of the Balkan Atrocities.

THE cruelties committed by the Greeks upon the Bulgarian soldiers and the Bulgarian population in Macedonia are too monstrous for condonation and too well attested to be denied. They are not to be excused as the savage outbursts of an infuriated soldiery; but are equally the outcome of the designed maliciousness of men whose official or religious status might have kept them within the bounds of a more or less decent ferocity. The public declaration made by the Bulgaroktonos, in advance of these horrors, that he would be obliged to "proceed to acts of reprisal" upon the Bulgarians, no doubt inflamed the national and religious rancor of the Greek soldiery and population against the Bulgarians, and more than accounts for the savageries which the blood-intoxicated but pious soldiers of King Constantine admittedly committed upon thousands of hapless members of a race upon which the royal lips had pronounced doom as a people that no longer had the right to be numbered amongst civilised nations.* Constantly in these horrors we find Greek archbishops and other liveried servants of God directing the operations of massacre, as at Serrès, where, in fact, the hasty tribunal of death was presided over by a Greek ecclesiastic in order that the Greek-speaking victims, who were found with the common herd, might not escape massacre by pretending that they were Greeks (Miletitch, p. 46).

The process of hellenisation, which began with slaughter and continued by enforced exile during the last two years, is still maintained upon the remnant of the Bulgarian race in Macedonia, though on a slightly diminished scale of ferocity. At the present moment, the situation of the Bulgarians everywhere in Macedonia is becoming untenable except as a temporary affliction which may, at some future time, goad the Bulgarian Government, perhaps in concert with Turkey, to wipe out of the national memory, as an intolerable affront upon humanity, by the terrible process of fresh blood-letting in the Balkans. It may be colorably contended that the harassing policy of persecution pursued by the Greek authorities in Macedonia to-day, is even more odious as being more cowardly and cold-blooded than the excesses which followed last year upon the triumph of the Greek arms over the betrayed and outnumbered Bulgarians. Accounts day by day in the Bulgarian papers show that Macedonia to-day is groaning under a veritable regime of terror, and the new masters of the Macedonian Bulgarians are burning, pillaging, and pitilessly destroying the remnants of the Bulgarian race native of this blood-drenched soil, as though to show the world how these Christians love one another. An astute policy of "beat my neighbor out of doors" is being adopted by the Greek Government, which has recently given its calculated hospitality in these parts to multitudes of Greek refugees from Turkish Thrace, and installed the new-comers—who, in fact, are the victims of another type of tyranny—in many of the villages inhabited from time immemorial by men and women of Bulgarian race. Adopting the noble principle of robbing Peter to pay Paul, the Greek authorities have winked at or connived at the plunder of waggon-loads of stock from the Bulgarian natives in order to establish the Greek refugees in their new land of enforced exile. In a number of villages the Bulgarians have recently been stripped of money, animals, furniture, clothing, and other things; and any of the poor devils who had the audacity to resist or complain were regaled with tortures of a refined character which recall the spirit of the Holy Inquisition. It was precisely because these abominations were in full swing at the time (and they continue till the present moment) that the Greek authorities frowned their disapproval upon the investigations which the Carnegie Commission of Inquiry were then proposing to make concerning the true inwardness of the Macedonian atrocities and as to the degree of responsibility resting upon the late allied nations in reference to the pandemonium in the Balkans.

In view of the present ugly complexion of affairs between the rival religions and races in the Balkans, and especially between Patriarchalist Greeks and Exarchist Bulgarians, it is easy to see that unless Europe intervenes with tact and vigor (and she will not do this, of course) war is sure to break out in the near future between the Greek and Bulgarian nations. I have no doubt that Bulgaria would be quite willing to submit her cause of quarrel to the arbitrament of the Hague Tribunal; but Greece—in the arrogance

* See "Fac-simile" letters passim cited in the Freethinker of June 21 and July 5.

of her present triumphant mood, at least—will not deign to listen to any such proposal. Two things are happening to-day that alone would suffice to justify these grave fears. First, that the hellenisation of the Bulgarian inhabitants is being enforced by the proscription of the Bulgarian tongue, and the application of torture (the insertion of nails between the fingers or the driving of sharp persuasive instruments under the nails, are among the polite attentions which recalcitrants receive) in order to induce the Bulgarian peasants to talk Greek; and, secondly, that in the Churches which formerly belonged to the Bulgarians, but are now grabbed by their enemies, the Greeks are actually chanting prayers every Sunday imploring God Almighty to exterminate the cursed Bulgarian race.

In order to estimate the moral degradation which war—or shall we say war when waged in the Balkans?—engenders even in the minds of archbishops, the case of Monsignor Germanos, the Metropolitan Bishop of Pravichta, in Macedonia, will serve for profit and edification. During the late war this holy bishop of the Greek orthodox type, placed himself at the head of a Greek batallion and took advantage of his position to intrude his presence into the harems of Turkish subjects and violate the honor of Moslem women. His turpitudes recently came before the court martial at Constantinople and were rewarded by a sentence of fifteen years' hard labor. Unfortunately for the cause of justice, he was convicted in contumaciam, his episcopal pluck not being equal to anything more heroic than the storming of a harem. In point of fact, the bishops in Macedonia seem to have comported themselves in the Balkans like the old fighting, pillaging bishops of the Middle Ages. The sordid details set forth by Dr. Kyroff* clearly exhibit the Greek bishops in Macedonia during the last two years as a collection of brigands, blackmailers, and murderers. The exploits of the Archbishop of Serrès, and his holy complicity in the butcheries perpetrated at that place, are too terrible for the sober pages of this journal: they will be found set forth with harrowing particulars in Dr. Miletitch's book.† These frightful examples, which show how the "Holy Spirit," which these men monopolise and impart, does not always render them immune from the soiling influence of passion and hate, are for our instruction and warning; they teach us that men ordinarily virtuous and kind, even those men who are consecrated to holiness here and heaven hereafter, are not to be trusted with the God-like omnipotence that enables them to do what they like or wreak their animosities upon people whom they do not like. All history, in all times, is but the inventory of the misdeeds of irresponsible power; and much of the misery in times past, and especially much of the misery in the present situation in the Balkans, is but the sordid trail of crime left by the footprints of triumphant violence.

And here, on the eve of the publication of the Carnegie report,‡ I must suspend for awhile the preliminary skirmishes of my pen. I have no doubt that the disclosures of that report will sadden once again the hearts of those who hoped—and hoped in vain—that the Balkan nations, freed from the domination of the Crescent, would make the Cross the emblem not only of liberty, but of civilisation. For the present, liberty in the Balkans is trampled under foot; civilisation is clouded by the mists of racial hatred and furious national antagonisms; and the Cross has around it a wide-spreading nimbus of tears and blood. The most cruel war of modern times, which began as a holy crusade and finished as a bestial conflict between the Crusaders themselves, leaves the future prospects of the Balkans darkened by the grim shadows of impending war. Evidently, the scramble of the Allies for the biggest slice of Turkey has only passed through the first stage of its evolution. All the marks of impermanence are impressed upon the present dispositions of the international chess-board in the Balkans. A renovated New Turkey may ere long unite with a renewed and reinvigorated Bulgaria for the purpose of adjusting frontiers at the expense of Servians on the one hand and Greeks on the other. And once more the Balkans will be bathed in blood and its populations decimated by outrage and massacre; and Cross and Crescent will become, as of yore, the emblems of national hatred and the edifying excuse for interminable slaughter.

‡ This report (a magnificent but saddening volume in French) reached me whilst I was proofing this article. Its 496 pages corroborate many of the incidents of horror related in my three articles, and on p. 274 sets forth in detail the thefts and murders committed by Greek archbishops during the war.

Joseph Chamberlain.

OTHER journals are discussing the late Mr. Joseph Chamberlain as a politician, but party politics are outside our province. We have a few words to say about him as to religion.

We understand that Mr. Chamberlain came of a Unitarian family. He might therefore call himself a Nonconformist. Certainly he was not a member of the Church of England. It was rumored that even his Unitarianism was of a very advanced order. There was little difference, it was said, between his religious views and those of his friend John Morley, in the old fighting days, when John Stuart Mill was the "prophet and priest" of the Radical dispensation.

It must be admitted, however, that Mr. Chamberlain's heresy was largely inferential. He was judged by the company he kept. And some of it was bad enough. Morley was by no means the worst. There were outspoken Atheists amongst the soldiers of progress who gathered round the standard of the Fortnightly Review and afterwards of the Nineteenth Century. We do not remember any pious expressions even in his "demagogic" speeches to the "mob,"—to borrow some of the phrases of his adversaries. He also spoke as one whose only religion was the public welfare, and his only church the House of Commons. He never "hit" it with Bradlaugh, we believe. Probably it was a case of rival ambitions. But he was much more friendly with Labouchere; and "Labby's" biographer tells us that his opinions were identical with Bradlaugh's on philosophical and religious questions.

On the "Bradlaugh question" in the early 'eighties—the question whether the Atheist member for Northampton should take the seat to which he had been constitutionally elected—Mr. Chamberlain spoke and voted according to his principles; although we do not see his name in the Index of Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner's biography of her father.

Throughout his career Mr. Chamberlain was sound on the question of Secular Education. He kept to the old Radical program of "Free, Compulsory, and Secular Education." In his last speeches on Education in the House of Commons in relation to the unhappy Bills of the Liberal Government, in desertion of their own principles at the bidding of the political Nonconformists, headed by the Rev. Dr. Clifford, who stands for "Secular Education plus the Bible," Mr. Chamberlain plainly declared that his own views had not changed in the least. He was still in favor of Secular Education as the only wise and just policy. But he had never been able to persuade his Nonconformist brethren of this, and he had therefore to satisfy himself with the best course in the circumstances. He was sure, however, that the policy of Secular Education was the policy that all parties were bound to come to at last.

This, then, is one plank of Mr. Chamberlain's program which never changed. And it is to his credit that this plank was one that did not tend to increase his popularity.

Opinions vary as to Mr. Chamberlain's personality. A French critic once said that he had the head of a Roman emperor of the decadence. Mr. George Meredith, in a later letter, referred to his "adventurous nose." His admirers, on the other hand, often spoke of him as the greatest statesman that ever lived, and for a long while at Birmingham it was dangerous blasphemy to differ from him on any subject whatever. But years have passed since bodily paralysis ended his political career. Death has only ratified the announcement made a few months ago that he would not stand again for his old constituency. It was a very touching end to a stormy career. Many people will regard it as singular that Mr. John Redmond, of all men, should say the best word on this point :—

> "Although Ireland in the past has had bitter memories in connection with Mr. Chamberlain's career, the Irish people are a generous people, and long ago these bitter memories were forgotten. There has been a universal feeling of sympathy in Ireland at the pathetic spectacle of his long illness. He was a great man."

We speak as something better than politicians in saying that we hope these generous words will help to soften the hard feelings that still keep Ireland a divided nation.

Acid Drops.

Mr. Asquith's tribute in the House of Commons to the aged Emperor of Austria, who has suffered so many bereavements by violent death, seems to have pleased the Christians. In a certain way also it was pleasant to Freethinkers. "Around few figures in the history of Europe," the Premier said, "had it pleased Providence to gather and concentrate such a pitiless and, in the human eye, such an unmerited succession of dark and wounding experience." This is an admission that the assassin of the Archduke was merely the tool of Providence. Why then should the tool be tried and punished for the action of the wielder?

It has not yet been suggested, as far as we know, that the assassination of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand and his wife was due to "infidelity." No doubt the assassins were as good Christians as the victims were. There is no need to go beyond the Bible for encouragement to assassination. Look at Ehud who went to King Eglon with "a present from God" in the shape of a long dagger which he thrust into the monarch's fat belly with fatal effect. Look at Jael who killed Sisera when he was enjoying the hospitality of her tent, by nailing his head to the floor while he was asleep; whose praises were sung by Deborah the prophetess as "blessed amongst women." Look at Judith who turned General Holofernes' head with her beauty and cut it off when he was in a stupor of satiety. These assassins, male and female, are all glorified in Holy Writ; and the inference to every believer in the Word of God is "Go thou and do likewise."

Sir William Robertson Nicoll, whenever he writes or speaks on religious questions, adopts a tone of absolute infallibity. There is no possibility of his ever being mistaken, and so whoever differs from him is in hopeless error. Samuel Butler and H. G. Wells advocate theories of human society which he denounces as fundamentally false and pernicious. Readers of Erewhon, The Coming Race, The World Set Free are solemnly warned against the ridiculous and partly profane views therein enunciated. Then in the cocksure style of the divine he says: "We know what man needs and what Christianity supplies." One thing is historically beyond dispute, namely, that whatever man needs Christianity has signally failed to supply. Nothing is easier than to criticise the various Utopian visions that from time to time have been given to the world; but the fact remains, and it cannot be honestly blinked, that, under Christianity, the human race has always been disturbed and cursed by bitter strife, malice, hatred, persecution, and war. Christendom has been for nigh two thousand years nothing but a battlefield drenched with blood mostly spilt in Christ's name.

Now, Sir William, instead of facing undeniable facts, gets upon his high horse and blindly dogmatises thus: "We affirm that there is no prospect of happiness or stability in a purely secular society. Man must depend upon God." That is fanaticism of the worst kind. In point of fact, happiness and stability have prevailed and still do prevail in a purely secular society. This statement is susceptible of the completest verification; and were he to divest himself of Christian prejudice Sir William himself would be convinced of its truth.

The Rev. Ossian Davies says that "if man has no immortal nature he is only a beast—the first and wisest of beasts, it may be, but still a beast." A sillier sentence was never penned. Immortality is an inference from an unverified and unverifiable assumption. Not a single fact can be quoted to show that man's nature differs from that of an animal. He has everything in common with monkeys, and his end is exactly like theirs. In any case, man is not a beast, this being a term now applied to a four-footed animal, or one that arouses fear or repulsion, being commonly opposed to man. Has Mr. Davies forgotten that Shakespeare calls man "the paragon of animals"?

The Rev. Dr. Orchard imparts to us the startling information that Christ is now outside his Church, but has the strongest possible desire to get inside once more. Whether he went out of his own accord, in a huff, or whether he was forcibly turned out, we are not told; but the reverend gentleman is quite sure that he is standing at the door and knocking eagerly and loudly for admission, although somehow or other the Church is not prepared to receive him. We are equally certain that the whole thing is nothing but a fairy tale.

We were rather surprised, but not the less pleased, to find a Church journal protesting against the newspaper campaign in connection with the Royal family. In this case it is in connection with the Prince of Wales at Oxford—what he eats, drinks, wears, how he walks, and other equally uninteresting and trivial details. The press booming of royalty has now been going on for some years, and it is one of the many disquieting features of our time. It has not to commend it even the robust loyalty of an earlier generation. It is mainly catering to a morbid appetite for unimportant details about prominent persons. One sees yards of pictures with "the King watching a game of football," "Mr. Lloyd George leaving Downing-street," "Mr. Balfour walking down Whitehall," or similar inspiring legends underneath. So far as we can see, George the Fifth looks at anything in the same way as other people, and Mr. Balfour and Mr. Lloyd George when they walk put one leg in front of the other much the same as ordinary folk. We suppose this sort of thing must interest some people or it would not appear, but one is left marvelling at the intelligence of those whom it interests, and wondering at the value of a press that fills its columns with such stuff.

Although the Catholic Church in England does not show as great a decrease in membership as some of the Protestant Churches, it yet fails to hold its own in relation to growth of population. In a pamphlet recently published, Rev. J. H. Wright, S.J., points out that, without taking account of the number of converts gained last year, the Catholic Church in England numbers nearly 750,000 less than it should have had had it kept pace with the increase of population. These figures strike us as rather large, but they bring out the general truth that every Church in Christendom is losing its hold on the public. Some lose less adherents than others, but none of them are holding their own.

Dr. George Nickson, the recently appointed Bishop of Bristol, in an address delivered on his enthronement, also bears evidence to the decline of Christianity. He said :—

> "No one can say that Christianity is in possession. Men are turning in other directions than Bethlehem or Calvary for the solution of their problems. The evidences for this are widespread. In social and economic movements we see labor and capital organising on lines in which Christianity, at least avowedly, plays the smaller of parts, while any attempt on the part of the Church to bring her influence to bear is regarded with aloofness, if not with suspicion. In the domain of thought and science, we are warned that these are departments self-sufficing for their purposes, and while the old antagonism between science and religion has disappeared, the claim of emancipation from its direction is insistent."

Christianity is in possession socially and financially, intellectually it has been dispossessed on all hands. It is not overstating the case to say that the majority of thoughtful and educated people in every country in Europe have rejected Christianity. We do not mean by this that they reject the name of Christian; that is about all they retain of the original article. But tried by the test of any authoritative statement of Christian doctrine, they have ceased to be Christian. And nothing shows the desperate plight of the Churches more clearly than the fact that they are anxious to claim as Christian men and women who deliberately reject most, if not all, of the cardinal Christian doctrines.

An extraordinary case is reported in the Transvaal Leader, Johannesburg, of Tuesday, June 9:—

> "Before Mr. Justice Krause, at the Pietersburg Circuit Court on Friday last, a young native girl, about 17 or 18 years of age, was charged with practising as a witch-doctor in contravention of Section 30 of Ordinance 26 of 1904. She was undefended both in the Court below and in the Circuit Court. She was an ordinary barbarian native girl from that part of the Zoutpansberg district near Louis Trichardt.
> "Three witnesses were called to establish the case for the Crown. The first, a native named Nebudogwa, stated that about February, 1913, he and eight other natives, including two named Mudzuala and Mahengani, and a native woman, Nyalalumbe, consulted the accused, who was practising as a witch-doctor, as to who had been the cause of the death of their relatives. The accused threw the bones, after being paid 5s., and said that a witch-doctor had caused the death of the relatives, and indicated the native woman, Nyalalumbe, as the witch. She was then paid a goat and a sheep by the others present, and the consultation ended.
> "The second witness was Mahengani, who corroborated the evidence of the last witness, and also stated that on the 29th August, 1913, Mudzuala killed the woman Nyalalumbe, presumably because she was a witch. On the 9th November, 1913, Mudzuala was sentenced to death for the murder at the Pietersburg Circuit Court.
> "The third witness was the father of the accused. He stated that about December, 1912, she recovered from a long illness. She then came to him and said: 'I know everything; I am a witch-doctor.' She then provided herself with a set of bones and commenced practising as a witch-doctor. He also stated that he had seen her go into trances, and that she was quite a young girl.
> "There were no previous convictions nor any police record against the accused.
>
> "The jury brought in a verdict of guilty of practising as a witch-doctor.
> "The Judge, after reprimanding the accused for practising upon the credulity of the natives, said he would make an example of her, as witch-doctoring caused a great deal of mischief and had to be stopped. He sentenced her to the maximum sentence—imprisonment for life."

We suppose this is the good old Boer law, founded on the Bible, as the English law was in former years. But surely this sentence will not be allowed to stand. Such an infamous barbarity, if carried out, would disgrace not only South Africa but the whole British Empire.

Rev. Bernard J. Snell says that the other day he received a letter from a correspondent, asking, "How do you get over that scripture, 'Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live'?" To this he replied, "It has never caused me the slightest twinge of uneasiness. How does it affect you?" This does not strike us as a very courageous way of facing a plain question. It may be that the text has never troubled Mr. Snell; but if that is so, one can only say, So much the worse for Mr. Snell. It is part of the Christian Scriptures; it has been part of the teaching of every one of the historic Churches of Christendom; it has caused the deaths of many thousands of women, and even of children; and the possibility of commerce with Satan was endorsed by Jesus Christ. And yet a Christian minister can reply that the text never troubled him. What Mr. Snell's correspondent obviously wished to know was how he could account for a religion claiming all that Christianity claims teaching such a villainous doctrine, and one which we know to have been founded upon pure delusion. And to that Mr. Snell gives no reply whatever.

Mr. Snell would probably reply that we have to take such a teaching in connection with the culture of the time at which the books of the Bible were written. That is good advice from a Freethinker, and is, indeed, the advice that any Freethinker would offer. He sees that the belief in witches is a product of pre-scientific thought, and is not surprised to find it among uncivilised or semi-civilised peoples, whether in Biblical times or among contemporary savages. But the Christian is in a different position. If the Bible is wrong on this point, how can we be certain that it is right on any other? If the belief in witches was a product of the time at which the Bible was written, what about the belief in God, in heaven, in a soul, in the divinity of Jesus, in miracles? Must not these have been equally due to the same cause? Adopt this point of view, and the Bible as an authoritative text-book of religion disappears altogether. What we have left is a collection of legends and beliefs, interesting to the anthropologist, useful enough for illustrating varying stages of human culture, but of no greater intrinsic value than the legends of contemporary uncivilised peoples.

Writing in T. P.'s Weekly, Mr. G. K. Chesterton refers to "apple-pie bed" as a "good old Christian practical joke." We assume that some of the more serious Christian practical jokes consisted of burning heretics.

A volume of short stories has been published with the title, The Mercy of the Lord. We wonder if it refers to the Plagues of Egypt, Noah's Flood, the Massacre of the Innocents, and other examples of the Divine Benevolence.

Some years ago some workmen had been excavating in Westminster Abbey, and were told to be careful because Dr. Arne, the composer of "Rule Britannia," was buried on the spot. "It's too late, guv'nor," replied one of the navvies. "If we'd known, we wouldn't have driven that drain-pipe through him."

The Rev. Joseph Wallett, of Westcliff, one of the survivors of the Empress of Ireland disaster, says, "fathers and mothers, if you do anything for your boys and girls, for God's sake teach them to swim." Why drag in Deity? According to the Bible, "God" once drowned the whole world with the exception of a few persons. Has the reverend gentleman a premonition of another dose of the divine loving-kindness?

Cardinal Gasquet says it is certain that a clergyman or a priest is worth three policemen. We are not quite so sure about that. It is certain that the clergy have not done away with the necessity for policemen, and it is not unusual for one to find both flourishing in the same area.

The Cardinal also deplores the fact that the old dictum, "Christianity is the law of the land," no longer has any force, but that "everywhere the goodly framework of society, which is the creation of Christianity, is throwing off Christianity." This strikes us as a compound of bigotry and bluff. We can quite believe that the Cardinal regrets the change that has come over the law of the country, and would prefer the days when the reply to the heretic and the Freethinker took the form of imprisonment. But we are a little surprised at Cardinal Gasquet—whose historical studies ought to have taught him better—fathering such obvious rubbish about Christianity creating the framework of society. That bears about the same relation to Christianity that Monmouth does to Macedon. Society is primarily a biological and human fact. All that theology does is to modify some of the expressions of social life in its own interests. And it does not need a very elaborate study of history to prove that whenever these modifications have been made, it has been left for a later and riper experience to modify them in turn, and to ultimately reject them. That Christianity is no longer the law of the land is a case in point.

"Faith as an Aid to Beauty" ran a headline in the Daily News and Leader. Christians will need plenty of faith, for they mostly have the expression of tired hearse-horses. How much prayer will it take to make a snub nose into a thing of beauty and a joy for ever?

When a prisoner at North London, charged with biting another man's ear, protested that he was not a cannibal, the magistrate said cannibals eat other people to acquire their virtues, and were a noble race compared with backbiters. We agree; but cannibals cannot get much virtue from a solitary missionary; they ought to dine off a Sunday-school excursion or a mother's meeting.

His Majesty, George V., has an affection for fire-fighters. He reviewed the London Fire Brigade at Hyde Park last week, and he is constantly laying the foundation-stones of churches. The King thus patronises fires in two worlds.

Mr. Ex-President Roosevelt's physicians have forbidden him absolutely to keep out of politics for four months. We hope the prohibition also extends to theological matters.

The Church Family Newspaper attributes to Garrick the answer given by an actor to a bishop who wondered why the stage had so much greater influence on people than the pulpit—"Because I recite fiction as if it were true, while you deliver truths as if they were fictions." A much better story, and one with more truth in it, is Fielding's retort to the historian who remarked that the author of Tom Jones wrote fiction. No, said Fielding, it is you who write fiction. I deal with facts, using fictitious names and dates.

Digitized by Google

With you, names and dates are the only real things. That touches a far more profound truth. A good novel deals with the enduring facts of human nature, its heights and depths, lights and shadows, and these have their value whether the actual characters of the novel ever existed or not. A good novel gives us life as we can all know it, if we use our eyes and our brains. The ordinary history gives us a list of quite correct names and dates, but attached to persons from whom all that is humanly interesting has been emasculated. History, as generally written, would be unintelligible but for the reader supplying from his own experience what the historian so often fails to give. As a case in point, let one read Flaubert's Saint Antony, and he will have a better appreciation of the life of the monk than could be derived from a score of histories.

But to return to the Garrick story. Naturally, the stage—given the right kind of actor—gripe more than the pulpit. But this is not because the first deals well with fiction and the latter deals badly with truth. It is because the stage is dealing with truth all the time. The loves and hatreds, the humor and pathos, of the stage appeals to all more or less because they are phases of human nature that everyone knows and recognises. The pulpit meets with a relative failure because it is actually and inevitably concerned with fictions. An incarnate Deity, a crucified God, a heaven and hell, angels and devils, are all fictions; they are all removed from the actualities of life, and their presentation only meets with a qualified success when they are associated with more human elements. The reason why even an indifferent actor may succeed in making a more powerful appeal than a good preacher is that the actor deals with truths, even though he robs them of some of their power in the presentation. It is the clergyman who deals with fictions, and the sense of their unreality remains when the glamor of the preacher's personality has passed away.

The Times published the other day (June 29) a special supplement on Spain. It will be interesting to many because of the evidence offered that, despite opposition, educational influences in Spain are gathering strength. The work of Ferrer and other reformers is thus bearing fruit, although the dead-weight of clericalism, Conservatism, and reactionary forces generally, is still enormous. It is also plain that there is a considerable circulation in Spain of Freethinking works, and although the Times is discreetly reticent as to their influence, there is no doubt that they are steadily undermining the authority of religion. With the power of the Church broken, there is no reason whatever why Spain should not again take its place among the foremost civilised nations of Europe. The country possesses great possibilities from both a commercial and an intellectual point of view. These have been lying idle for centuries, thanks to the power of the Christian Church, but with this out of the way their development is certain. Spain, under its Mohammedan rulers, played a part in civilisation; it sank to the depths under Christian control, and its removal is the indispensable condition of its resurrection.

Churches, a theological professor assures us, "are the only societies on earth possessing the Holy Spirit." We know nothing about the Holy Spirit; but, judging by the general character and history of the Churches, we cannot escape the conclusion that to possess him is by no means an unmixed blessing.

According to the Evening News, the Psychical Researcher is "arriving at a conviction that his own comrades, as they die, carry beyond death their own curious interests that something like a Society for Psychical Research is beginning to operate from the Other Side." It is very like the poor Indian dreaming of the Happy Hunting Grounds.

"The British Sunday remains a thing to be wondered at, laughed at, and deplored," says Mr. Arthur Bourchier, the famous actor. The world does move after all, for this is a thing that Freethinkers have said for centuries.

A squadron of Italian soldiers have at last captured the stronghold of the notorious Corraine brigands. It contained a large store of provisions sent in by persons marked out for vengeance as well as from villages by way of blackmail. Crucifixes and prayer-books lying on the floor suggested that the brigands had been disturbed at their devotions.

The Rev. Silvester Horne left over £5,000. We thought it would have been more. Perhaps the secret of that lies with Mrs. Horne. It would be absurd to say that five thousand pounds is a fortune as things go, but it is a good deal for a disciple of him who taught "Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth," "take no thought for the morrow" and "blessed be ye poor."

Here are two other professional Christites who did better than Mr. Horne. Rev. Roger Edgeworth, rector of Rusper, Horsham, Surrey, left £10,848. Rev. Charles Stead Hope, vicar of Holy Trinity, Southport, left £34,502. "And their works [but not their cash] do follow them."

A later report makes the Rev. Silvester Horne's "little bit" £8,450. We thought it would be even more than that. And here are a few more poor Christites cropping up as we go to press. Rev. Charles Fleetwood Porter, of Staverton Grange, Oxford, left £11,916. Rev. Canon Robert Hudson Borradaile, of Oxted, Surrey, left £27,171. Rev. Herbert George Morse, of Holland Park, London, formerly Rector of Littleham, Bideford, Devon, left £44,429.

An Indiana, U.S.A., lady is on her way to Europe to startle the inhabitants by a dress displaying £100,000 worth of jewels, diamonds being worn in the heels of her shoes. The lady should feel more at home walking the golden streets of the Christian heaven.

The King is interesting himself in the movement for founding an American church in London, which is to cost £150,000. In order to fill this huge building, we presume that the accepted Yankee methods of giving cups of tea and chocolates to the worshipers will be resorted to.

Mr. Israel Zangwill says, "Let me write for the clergy—I do not care who writes for the crowd." Is he grateful because the dear clergy have made the crowd worship a Jewish God?

An advertisement appears in a Sunday paper championing "Celestial Shepperton." We imagine Heaven-on-Thames is better than the Petticoat-lane ideals of the Christians.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has been quoting Victor Hugo as saying that there were only three men in the world's history who were really worthy of being commemorated—Moses, Homer, and William Shakespeare. Well now, Moses is certainly a legendary being, Homer is probably so too; which leaves us Shakespeare as the great reality.

A new religious sect has recently come into existence in Great Britain, which glories in the high-sounding name of the Brotherhood of the Universal Bond. It is said to have 16,000 members, who assemble for worship in numerous temples up and down the country, five of which are situated in London. Many outsiders call them sun-worshipers, but, in reality, they are simply reverers of nature, and of the Great Spirit which, they believe, manifests itself through Nature. They have points in common with the ancient Druids, and they share some of the views held by modern Buddhists; but justice demands that we should regard them as a distinct communion. Like all sectarians, they are noted for their sense of self-sufficiency. Their mission is to set the whole world right, and they publish a journal, the avowed object of which is, "the spiritual illumination of all mankind." After all said and done, all advocates of "spirituality," or of "the spiritual life" as the ideal life of man, are in the same supernaturalistic boat which drifts perilously and uselessly, if not very harmfully, upon the sea of life, never reaching any harbor.

Miss Elizabeth Ellis, aged fifty-eight, formerly proprietress of the "John Barleycorn" public-house at Hitchin, hung herself from a beam in the kitchen of her house in King's-road. She had dressed herself in black, and her gloves were of the same color. On the table was a Bible; also a Prayer-book open at the burial service. It is just as Talmage and Torrey said: You can't keep these Atheists from suicide!

The Bishop of London's Bill for raising the age of consent to eighteen is too modest. In view of so many clerical scandals, his Lordship should make the age eighty, not eighteen.

The Rev. R. Fotheringham, writing in Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper, says that if Methuselah were alive, he would be the saddest man in the world. Poor old Methuselah wouldn't be half so sad as the poor wretches who have to live for ever in the next world, and who had corns on their fingers through playing their harps.

Sugar Plums.

The July number of the Humanitarian contains an excellent article on "Leigh Hunt," presumably by the editor, Mr. H. S. Salt. Hunt is an author who should be much better known. He had the misfortune of coming in the way of friendship between two such men as Byron and Shelley, and suffering in the uninvited but inevitable contrast with those mighty spirits. But he had a genius of his own, nevertheless, and it was mostly devoted to good, and unpopular, and even dangerous causes. And noone is better qualified than Mr. Salt is to press Hunt's humanitarianism upon the attention of a later and forgetful age. Another item of interest in this periodical is Mr. Salt's setting the Hospital right on "Spare the rod and spoil the child." This is generally quoted as from the Bible; which shows what care the generality of Bible readers must have! The quotation is from Butler's Hudibras.

Mr. Salt fights for many good causes. One of the most unfriended amongst them is the preservation of English scenery. Mountain scenery, for instance, if once destroyed by the sordid hand of commercialism, is destroyed for ever. It was produced by Nature. Man is incapable of such production. But he can spoil what he cannot create, and degrade what he could not so much as imagine. Solitude is the greatest charm of mountain scenery. The bleating of sheep, the neigh of a horse, the thin, blue smoke from a cottage altar-fire dedicated to the first and best religion on earth, the occasional voice and footstep of a fellow pedestrian; such inaggressive sights and sounds rather add to than detract from the sense of solitude by the force of contrast—just as a ship on the horizon gives a last touch to the otherwise too austere grandeur of the sea; but the bustle of a holiday mob, carried up the hill and carried down again, is simply an abominable desecration. England is slowly waking up to these things. The unspeakable exploitation of Shakespeare's Cliff in the interest of the patent pill trade has been stopped. Let us hope that prompt public action—for nothing else really avails—will save the natural beauties that still remain in our country. Mr. Salt himself is not very sanguine. He says that, "While we are willing to spend vast sums on grabbing other people's territory, we have not, of course, a penny to spare for the preservation of our own." A bitter reflection! But the writer's own conscience is free from reproach.

The July English Review opens with a poem entitled "Morphia," by a Victim. It is not without a certain power, but it lacks art. "The Meaning of Pain," by Edward Carpenter, is thoughtful and suggestive, but is it satisfactory? Can anything on that subject be satisfactory on a Theistic basis? Mr. March Phillips' "Democracy and Art" is well worth reading. Sense as well as poetry is expressed in Mr. Eden Philipotts' "Home of the West Wind." A lady writer calling herself "Cornelia," writes with great vigor on "Epidemic Hysteria." She calls upon the men who are in authority to put down the criminal Suffragette. The immunity of the destructive woman in a calculating frenzy, trading all the while on the privileges of her sex, must be put an end to. Those who clamor for equality should have it. But the militant Suffragette objects to her share of this "divine equality"—to borrow a phrase from Shelley. "With one hand," "Cornelia" says, "she waves the banner of liberty, with the other she smacks a policeman's face, knowing that he won't smack her back." And so on through many vigorous pages. A careful and informing article by W. M. J. Williams on "The Crown Estate in London" is a valuable feature of this month's English Review. Mr. Harrison writes ably on the Irish question, but at the finish he is obliged to admit that all the trouble is at bottom religious, and is summed up in two brutal shibboleths, "To Hell with the Pope!" "To Hell with King William!"

We inserted two lists of subscriptions to the Ramsey Testimonial Fund, signed by the General Treasurer, Mr. B. T. Hall, Club Union Buildings, Clerkenwell-road, London, E.C. Two other lists have been sent us, but both obviously inaccurate, names being duplicated and maybe other mistakes committed. It is no part of our business to undertake the correction of such things. We must beg whoever is acting as the Secretary to the Fund to have a complete and accurate list of subscriptions sent to us on the Treasurer's behalf. We will gladly insert it in our next issue. By complete we mean a full and correct list of all the subscriptions received since the date of the second list acknowleged in our columns. We really cannot take further trouble in this matter.

ORIGIN OF WORSHIP.

Among primitive peoples life in the other world is conceived as identical in nature with life in this world. Hence, as the living chief was supplied with food and drink, oblations are taken to his burial-place and libation poured out. As animals were killed for him while he lived, animals are sacrificed on his grave when he is dead. If he had been a great king, with a large retinue, the frequent slaughter of many beasts to maintain his court is paralleled by the hecatombs of cattle and sheep slain for the support of his ghosts and the ghosts of his attendants. If he was a cannibal, human victims are furnished to him dead as when alive, and their blood is poured on the grave-heap, or on the altar which represents the grave-heap. Having had servants in this world, he is supposed to need servants in the other, and frequently they are killed at his funeral or sent after him. When the women of his harem are not immolated at his burial-place, as they sometimes are, it is usual to reserve virgins for him in his temple. Visits of homage made to his residence become, in after times, pilgrimages made to his tomb or temple; and presents at the throne reappear as presents at the shrine. Prostrations, genuflexions, and other obeisances are made in his presence, along with various uncoverings; and worship in his temple has the like accompaniments. Laudations are uttered before him while he is alive, and the like or greater laudations when he is dead.—Herbert Spencer.

Broken Thought-Threads.

LISTEN to their prattling! You would think Humanity were a huge and ugly growth on Nature to hear those religious realists. What tales of woe these interpreters of life tell. What baleful stories of man's degradation they relate. What awful pictures they paint of the bitterness of the struggle against evil. Down they go into the mire of immorality for their colors; and the scenes they depict impart to our minds a darkness that is sorely unpleasant.

Raw life is their material. Blood, brutality, horror, and hopelessness are woven in the texture of their canvas. Everything is heavy, gloomy, and hateful. Your mind seems to have become entombed. You sicken in the prison. The odors are nasty. The atmosphere savors of decay. Nausea-tion floods your stomach and soul. The robust activity of the decomposition, its burdensome vitality, the lustiness of its depravity, poison your ideas. You feel weak; and you seem to stand before the strength of weakness, cowering, shivering before it; and you feel afraid.

And then your better nature revolts. You long for fresh air with a new appreciativeness. You want to feel merry. Life is not all tragedy, not all misery, not all woe. Damn those religious realists! you murmur. Drat 'em! We want some happiness. And the natural man in you longs for sunshine, for the healthy, inspiriting breeze, for the mountain slopes and the fragrance of the heather, or for a smell of the sea. As you imagine the sweetness and loveliness of Nature, disgust masters you. This is unclean; it is loathesome; it is ugly. Life has more than one side. Humanity is not a gruesome thing, excreted by Nature for Jesus Christ to purify. And you send religious realists and their realism to purgatory.

Still, there are times when Christian realism cannot be so easily sent floating there; and the pictured ugliness gathers and becomes so crudely immoral that your soul—the higher ideas and tendencies and longings of your mind—rises in red-hot rebellion. You revolt against the darkness. You want to fight this mental slavery to gloom, base passion, and low life, instilled by religious realism. You see the disastrousness of it, the fatal influence it wields; and you want to tear the dirty curtain in twain, so that light and loveliness may enter. Give us purity, not dirt. Let's see beauty. Let's feel free. This makes us sick, you say. We want to get out of the dungeons of living death to the highlands of virile life. Sunrays, not gloom, we need; a breeze, not stagnation; happiness, not dirty joy; laughter like the lark's, not the sorrowful croaking of an evil-tipsy raven.

Certain types of books make us feel like that; and certain types of preachers have a similar effect upon us. It is a strange feeling of repugnance that passes through our minds. Something seems to be deepening in tint the stains on our lives. We would rather feel clean; and the soul, as we call it, having striven, even in a quiet, natural way, towards some semblance of purity, feels as if it were being defiled by these religious realists. Why do these men drag the minds of their audiences down into the gutter? How, in the name of everything beautiful, can they think and speak so much ugliness? And religious literature is full of this kind of realism.

Humanity is a wonderful thing. Well may we liken it to the ocean. Powerfully restless, its vast surface tossing in eternal dispeace, its expansive magnificence casting a sense of marvel upon the mind, its innumerable, passing shapes, and incomputable, dissolving shades of purple, grey, and green; how similar the ocean is, in its oneness and variation, to the great sea of Humanity. The breast of the waters knows no prolonged quietude. The face of the ocean reflects, in startling manner, every emotion that circles the human heart; but underneath there is the steady flow, more startling in the magnitude of its complacency than all the wonders of its vivid breast. Here you see love; there hate; yonder tempestuous anger; but below is the quiet, steady life.

A mass of glorious confliction, it puzzles and enthrals. Imagination is stunned by the scene. Its complexities amaze and charm. Solemnity and riot, laughter and tears, softness and hardness, solicitude and enmity, resolve and indecision; one observant glance, and you see them all.

Sweeping majestically onwards is a great crested wave, its haughtily poised head delighting yet awing you. Seemingly omnipotent, it draws to its might hundreds of smaller waves. Conqueringly, it imprisons them, using their foam-tipped beauties to heighten its own dignity and loveliness and strength. You would think it had determined to rule the ocean. But, as you observe its movement, you notice that, near the horizon, it subsides, losing its power; and you laugh as you see it roll away, ignominiously, to become the underflow for a bigger brother. But it, too, in turn, relinquishes its power and majesty; it, too, droops into individual extinction; it, too, falls into the underflow.

And so the wonderful scene is played on, unchanging in its varieties, eternal in its passing glories.

You look upon Humanity, and you see the same activities. Human movements, the waves on the ocean of human life, have their day and are dead. Prophesy permanency for a wave like that of Christianity, and you accuse yourself of narrowness of mental outlook. It sweeps over a portion of the great human ocean, for a little only; and is gone. The conjectures, the joys, the beauties of it depart at its departure. There are other waves to distract attention from its memories. Into it you put the life, the individuality, that abideth for ever; the supremacy that no man can challenge, you think; the glories of things unalterable, upon which man will do well to place all his trust, all his hope, all his faith; and, lo! it cheats you before your mind has lost the dying glamor of it. Movements, like men, perish. The greatest wave, like the tiniest ripple, falls into the underflow. The ocean exists.

We are funny people in our exalted moods. What giants we think we are. What terribly conclusive ideas we crystallise in words. What dreadful, "amen" truths compose our beliefs.

That poor little gutter-snipe, sitting in the mud, over there, at the alley-mouth, will one day shake God's hand, and be kissed by Mary the Mother of God. That little jigger—looks like a girl—who is sucking a banana-skin will, some day, be embraced by Jesus. She will get a bigger hug than that given to the black tot who, down under, is playing with pieces of coral in a shallow, silver pool. The dirty white one will become a Christian; and Christianity, being God's last gift to Humanity, cancelled all the boons and blessings of his earlier kindheartedness.

We are apt to forget that the waves on the ocean of Humanity lose their individuality.

. . . . .

In the country, at the present time, there is a considerable number of Humanists. The one spring of their beliefs is the conviction that life would be better and happier for the most of us if only we could abolish certain social customs. The very fact that the power of these people is made weak by their segregation into opposing sects seems to prove that mind possesses more potency over their actions than anything else. They must reach the mind if they would succeed in their task. If they would fight against the causes of social evils, they must use mental weapons; but, somehow, they do not consider it advisable to clear the field of action with a broom first. This is strange. They teach new ideas without troubling to destroy the old ones.

The majority of these Humanists are hoighty-toightily unconcerned over the greatest obstacle of the lot. Some of the oldest, fustiest ideas are even championed by many of these people. They would try to patch up; make a new framework with rotten boards. They would bring the anti-scientific to strengthen the scientific. Now, if our revolutionist and reformative friends and enemies believe that Christianity is not true, are they reasonably justified in their attitude of unconcern? The less they have to do with Freethought the better, seems to be their belief. Is the social power of Religion so negligible in quantity and quality as to support that outlook? Privately, these Humanists, many of them, will tell you they believe that Christianity should be fought. Publicly, they like to tell their audiences of what Jesus Christ would have to do were he alive to-day. They like to quote Scripture. They make the teachings of Jesus Christ the code of individual morality, if not openly and straightforwardly, then by insinuation.

All this must tend to bolster up Religion. Christianity, which is not true, receives support from a quarter that should be inimical to it. Hypocrisy is the only suitable word. To play with the false is to be treacherous to the true. There are no honorable half measures. Compromise is friendly greeting. To linger on the road with error is to stay awhile with pain. Give a lie a smile and you add a day to its life. Humanists who are "plittering" with Christianity, believing it to be untrue, are assisting in its survival.

Whether they work for social reform or for social revolution, they must clean the minds that will make reform or revolution successful in its results. If the teachings of Christianity are stains on the human mind, errors to be conquered, customs to be overthrown, and the majority of Humanists believe this privately, then, logically, methinks, this present unconcern amounts to nothing less than hypocrisy. The treatment they accord to the Freethought movement is as bigoted as Catholics.

The mind comes first. Mental change precedes social change. Keep alive the idea of God, all the fundamental ideas of Religion, and you keep alive privilege, class, autocracy, and plutocracy. Teach the human mind to worship God, and it will worship the greatest men, who are nearest God. Teach it to reverence a body of men, and you will teach it to recognise class privilege. Unreasonably admire the aphorisms of the New Testament, and you help to deify the central and essential figure of the books, and assist in the survival of Religion, with all its tremendous social powers, powers that inevitably war against the Humanists' honest beliefs. Reason demands antagonism to Christianity. Our beliefs demand nothing less than unswerving enmity towards everything that is opposed to them.

I wonder why the Freethought movement is disliked by the many Humanists in this country? Can anything be said for British hypocrisy whose other name is Respectability?

ROBERT MORELAND.

Christian Apologetics.

IX.—THOMAS COOPER ON MIRACLES.

IN his apologetic work entitled The Verity and Value of the Miracles of Christ, the great "lecturer on Christianity," Thomas Cooper, opens the discussion as follows:—

> "'We see unchangeable law in nature,' say our leading men of Science: 'fixed law, inexorable law, meets us on every side.' And, because they say so, hundreds of simple folk are being frightened out of their belief in the miracles of Christ."

Having thus introduced the subject, our "lecturer" takes no less than five pages to point out that the Gospel miracles are not in agreement with the usual order of nature. "It is not an ordinary fact of Science," says Mr. Cooper, "that a spoken word cures leprosy or blindness, and that instantaneously." To this I can only reply, "True, O king; it certainly is not." And such being the case, our lecturer proceeds to define a miracle as—"A deed which is an exception to the usual order of nature: a deed which suspends or transcends what are called the laws of nature." Just so; and further remarks upon this remarkable fact bring us to the end of the first and introductory chapter.

In chapter ii. the writer discusses the somewhat irrelevant question, "Is a miracle possible?" This, of course, was bound to come. Our lecturer says:—

> "We expect that the sun will rise and set to-morrow, and the next day, and the next. We expect that the moon will shine, and the stars glitter, for years to come. We expect the return of the seasons, as we have seen it all our lives.....But, now, can you give me a reason why you believe that the sun will again rise and set, the stars still shine, and the harvest be gathered in the future? You will reply, 'So it has been in the Past, and therefore the like will be in the Future.' How do you know that? You know nothing about it. There is no 'therefore' in what you say. You have not, really, given a reason for your belief.....That all these facts have occurred over and over again—although it may be thousands of times—is not a ground of certainty that they will occur again. There is not a rational man in the world who would dare to assert that. Custom—usage—is all that we can allege as the ground of our expectation and belief in these recurrences.....The Materialist may boldly tell us that he believes the order of nature, such as it is now, has always been, and always will be. But he cannot assert—he cannot affirm—that it will always be. He can give no true reason for his belief."

Our lecturer, it will be seen, knows how to take full advantage of the distinction between practical and absolute certainty. But "the ground of our expectation and belief" in the recurrences of natural phenomena is something more than "custom or usage." The latter terms have reference to long-established modes or practices, and long-continued use of matters connected with the people, considered as a nation or race, which could, and often has been, changed. The bold "Materialist," moreover, does not go so far as to say that the present solar system, or "the gathering in of harvest" on this planet, "has always been, and always will be." He knows that change in the material world has always been going on, is going on to-day, and will continue to do so throughout all futurity.

Our "lecturer on Christianity" next takes exception to the word "law," and proceeds through eight or nine pages "to weigh and consider some of the strong terms employed by Professors Huxley and Tyndall, and other men of science—'fixed laws'—'unchangeable laws'—'inexorable law.'" This apologetic objection was also bound to come; but, in the end, the "strong terms" are resolved into "stated, fixed, or settled order," though, as everyone knows, one of the meanings of law is "order." But here an addition is made, which, though only one word, completely alters these fixed or unchangeable laws. In the next paragraph the writer says:—

> "Man ought to consider it his bounden duty to get acquainted with the order of nature; because it is God's order, and God preserves it for man's benefit."

Having thus inserted the thin end of the wedge, our lecturer proceeds to drive it home.

> "Nature never becomes independent of God. It exists solely by His sovereign Will and Energy. He could stop all the movements in the Universe—He could arrest all the operations of nature—He could deprive nature of all her forces—He could annihilate all nature in a moment, if He chose. Otherwise He is not Almighty, the Absolute One."

Here we might reply to the lecturer in his own words—"How do you know that? You know nothing about it." And the latter statement would be true; for the only authority Mr. Cooper had for the foregoing ridiculous assertions about "God" is the ascription of omnipotence and the creation of the universe to the god Yahweh in the Hebrew scriptures, made over two thousand years ago by the most ignorant and credulous men then living.

After the addition of "God's order of nature," the question as to the possibility of miracles is, of course, answered in the affirmative. And this point being satisfactorily settled, the lecturer gives the finishing-stroke, in the most approved Christian Evidence style, to all incipient Atheism. He says:—

> "Who shall dare to say that God cannot, if he chooses, suspend the usual order of nature, or by some act, and for some reason worthy of Himself, transcend the usual order of nature?"

The answer to this question is, "No one." But the way the query is put looks very much like an attempt to "frighten" the timid sceptic out of his disbelief in the Gospel miracles. Still, one of those much-maligned individuals might, perhaps, be permitted to say that, as a matter of scientific inquiry, we have no evidence of the existence of a god who possesses the power to "suspend the usual order of nature"; that, as a matter of history, we have no evidence that any of the laws of nature has, in a single instance, ever been suspended; and that the accounts in the Old and New Testaments which assert the contrary lack the support of contemporary evidence, and are simply Jewish or Christian fictions. No one, indeed, need deny that in some remote corner of the universe, too distant to be perceived by the most powerful telescope, there may be some sort of a god, hidden perhaps behind one of the most remote stars; but if so, he could have no connection with our solar system, and, travelling with the velocity of light, it would take him thousands of years to reach this planet. Such a deity could have no part in the government of our portion of the universe, or hold any intercourse with the inhabitants of this earth; while his heaven and hell, supposing them to exist, would be in the neighborhood of the aforesaid star, and therefore inaccessible to the imaginary souls or spirits of the denizens of this planet.

In chapter iii. our "lecturer on Christianity" represents a "doubter" among his audience as asking: "Suppose you have shown that miracles are possible, is there any reason to be alleged, worthy of God, why miracles should be performed?" The lecturer's reply to this query takes up thirteen pages, the nature of which may be perceived by the following extracts:—

> "Our Savior most plainly and positively told the Jews that His miracles were the credentials of His Messiahship—'The works which the Father hath given me to accomplish, the same works that I do, bear witness of me that the Father hath sent me.' It is his own blessed declaration.....God did not expect the Jews to receive Christ as the promised Messiah, simply because Jesus told them that he was that Messiah. Nor did Jesus Christ expect men to receive Him as their Redeemer, simply because he said He was the Redeemer. The Jews were expected to believe on rational and open proof."

The "words of Jesus" quoted in this extract are from the Fourth Gospel, and were not "his own blessed declaration." They were the words of the Gospel-writer himself, who fraudulently placed them in the mouth of his Savior. The Jesus of the Synoptics never employs such absurd language. Our lecturer, in bringing this chapter to a close, says:—

> "We conclude, then, that miracles are probable, because God could not leave His fallen creatures, inevitably, to the fatal ruinous consequences of sin, but must provide a Redeemer for them: and that Redeemer needed to produce His miraculous credentials to mankind in order to assure them of the truth of His mission."

The force of this concluding statement is considerably weakened when we come to consider that "God" did "leave his fallen creatures" to the "consequences of sin," and without "providing a Redeemer for them" during the whole period of Old Testament history, with several centuries added to reach A.D. 30; that is to say, for not less than four thousand years. And, judging from the Old Testament writings, the Jewish god had no intention, at any time during this long period, of "providing" a Redeemer of the character of Jesus Christ. All the Messiahs or deliverers predicted in the Hebrew scriptures were to be great warriors of the David or Judas Maccabeas type, who should give the Jews their independence, and ultimately make them the greatest nation upon earth. The Mosaic Law, with its animal sacrifice, was to continue for ever, priests and Levites were to officiate, and proselytes from other nations were to go up to the temple at Jerusalem to keep the principal Jewish festivals, including the Sabbath, New Moon, and feast of Tabernacles (Isaiah ii. 2—4; lxvi. 21, 23; Micah iv. 1, 2; Zech. viii. 22, 23; xiv. 16—18). Moreover, according to the Gospels, Jesus Christ was to descend from heaven, with his angels, to judge the world before that generation should pass away—during the lifetime of many of his hearers—immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem.

We are thus asked to believe a most extraordinary story: that for 4,000 years prior to A.D. 30, the Lord God ordained that atonement for the sins of the people should be made by the sacrifice of animals, as prescribed in the Mosaic code of laws. Then, at the end of that period, he devised a new plan of salvation—but for one generation only (A.D. 30—70)—by which simple belief in Jesus should take the place of the former animal sacrifice.

No orthodox Jew of the apostolic age could believe in any such alteration of plan; for he deemed his deity to be unchangeable, and the Mosaic ritual to have been given for all time—both of which alleged facts are plainly stated in the Old Testament.

As it happened, however, the generation of the time of Jesus passed away, as did also the succeeding generation, without the Savior making his promised appearance. Then excuses began to be made for him by the Christian teachers, the most ingenious, perhaps, being the following:—

> "In the last days mockers shall come.....saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for, from the day that the fathers [i.e., apostles] fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning.....But forget not this one thing, beloved, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some count slackness," etc. (2 Pet. iii., 3—9).

The Epistle from which the foregoing words were taken was forged by a second-century Christian; but it shows that the Church of that day had lost all hope of Jesus ever keeping his promise, and that there were many in the Church who were called "mockers." Generation succeeded generation, down to the present day, and Jesus has made no move—and now never will. So, instead of only forty years of the new plan of salvation, we have had 1,884—and there is no saying when the old Christian superstition will end. But any intelligent reader of the Old Testament ought to be able to see that the god Yahweh had no hand in originating it. I must leave Cooper's other arguments to the next.

ABRACADABRA.

Animals Recently Extinct.—II.

THE quagga is another defunct representative of the fauna of South Africa which lingered on until quite recent years. The quagga was closely related to Burchell's zebra, and was regarded by Selous as the extreme southerly form of that widely ranging quadruped. Its extinction is deeply to be regretted, as it was one of the handsomest of the equine order. The quagga was variously striped, some of the markings being very beautiful. Its disposition was normally mild and gentle, it was readily tamed, yet, abundant as they were in South Africa, the Boers seldom employed them as beasts of burden. Like the blue-buck, the quagga's habitat was restricted to the Cape area; it formerly abounded almost everywhere south of the Vaal River, but beyond that it very rarely ranged. It congregated in troops of from ten to a hundred in the plains of South Africa, frequently accompanied by the gnu and even the ostrich. It was a high mettled animal, and when wounded or infuriated would kick or bite its human enemy. The quagga was quite a match for the hyæna and wild dogs, and the Cape Dutch occasionally utilised domesticated quaggas as guards to their horses when abroad at night at a period when dangerous beasts were more common than they are at present. But the lucrative hide business which the Boers pursued proved fatal to the preservation of the animal, and the quagga, which was still abundant in 1843, seems to have been completely exterminated some thirty years later.

The quagga interbred easily with the domesticated horse, and Lord Morton's mare became famous when, after having given birth to a male foal from a quagga, she subsequently bore to an ordinary horse a foal that was slightly striped. The belief which is so general among practical breeders that once a female animal is covered by a mongrel or an alien species, the "stain" can never be removed, in this instance received very strong support. Ewart's test experiments were alleged to have disposed of this belief, but his results may be legitimately regarded as quite inconclusive. The truth of telegony, as this phenomenon is termed, is taken for granted by several breeders and owners of pedigree animals with whom the writer has corresponded and conversed on the subject. And telegony was warmly championed by the philosopher of evolution, Herbert Spencer, by its prophet, Professor Haeckel, and Samuel Butler, the gifted author of Erewhon, seems to have had no doubt as to its truth.

Steller's sea cow is an additional organism which owes its destruction to human shortsightedness. This mammal was a member of the small animal group known as Sirenia, of which the manatees and dugongs are surviving representatives. The sea cow was first discovered by Bering's exploring party in 1741 on what is now called Bering Island. The expedition was shipwrecked on the island, and the crew were stranded there for some ten months. The ship's surgeon, Steller, penned an excellent account of the habits and appearance of the Arctic sea cow; and, despite the greatest difficulties and discouragements, he carried out a careful anatomical study of the animal. The rhytina, or sea cow, was an unwieldy creature, which weighed about 8,000 lb., and measured nearly 25 ft. in length. The males displayed the fondest affection for the females, and both sexes were remarkably attentive to the young calves. These mammals were inoffensive herbivorous animals, which fed on the sea-weeds and sea-grasses growing near the shore. But, having no previous knowledge of the ways of man, they were innocently unconcerned by his proximity, and were quite easily harpooned. The fundamental basis of all morality, the recognition of reciprocity, was highly developed among these doomed animals. Says Finn, translating from Steller:—

> "As soon as any of the beasts were harpooned and began to struggle, its comrades in the herd immediately came up and tried to help the captive. Some, with this idea, tried to capsize the boat with their backs, others bore on the line and strove to break it, or struggled by beating it with their tails to drag the harpoon from the back of the wounded animal, in which attempt they sometimes succeeded."

The sea cows supplied the sailors with fat, which proved a splendid substitute for butter, while its flesh provided excellent meat. Later adventurers in the Arctic seas who sailed there in search of copper, or for the skins and furs of the northern beasts, made the unfortunate sea cow their chief article of food, and the animal was stupidly, wastefully, and wantonly slaughtered by the human invaders. Twenty years after Bering's landing, the fauna of the island had been reduced to insignificant proportions. A party of hunters who visited Bering Island in 1767 or 1768, in quest of foxes, seem to have sealed the fate of the expiring sea cow. In any case, it was never afterwards seen alive, so that in twenty-seven years from its first discovery the unlucky animal was eliminated from Nature's book of life.

One of our poor relations, Kirk's guereza, a beautiful long-tailed monkey which was restricted to the island of Zanzibar, has been blotted out by the head of the family. Sixteen years only after Europeans had made its acquaintance, the animal had become exceedingly scarce. Man's passion for sport, coupled with the clearing of jungle and forest, were together responsible for the extinction of this interesting organism. Sir John Kirk, after whom the monkey, Colobus kirki, was named, was informed that the animal was still to be found in the uninvaded island districts. Says Sir Harry Johnston:—

> "Thither Sir John sent his chasseurs to report on the monkey's existence. After a week's absence they returned, triumph illuminating their swarthy lineaments. 'Well, did you find them?' asked the British Consul-General. 'Yes,' replied the men with glee, 'and we slew them every one!' Wherewith twelve monkey corpses were flung on the floor, and Colobus kirki joined the dodo, the auk, rhytina, and the moa in the limbo of species exterminated by man."

The only carnivorous mammal that man has done to death within historical times is the Antarctic wolf of the Falkland Islands. It was an exceptionally large wolf for such small islands, and the only other mammal indigenous to this area is a mouse which is still abundant there. The wolf preyed in the main on the feathered fauna of the islands, particularly on the wild geese which abounded, and continue to abound in the Falklands. But the animal was not averse to the penguins and the young seals when these were available.

This extinct wolf was first observed by European navigators in 1768-4, and a short time afterwards a war of extermination began. Darwin, who visited these islands during the celebrated voyage of the Beagle, forecasted the wolf's early extinction, and with reason. The hunting of the animal served to gratify the sporting instincts of the original settlers, and when the colonists commenced to utilise the new settlements as sheep-runs, its end was certain. The Antarctic wolf appears to have fled the earth in 1876, although a related species still survives on the neighboring shores of South America.

The ancestor of our common European cattle is also to be numbered with the dead. This animal, the aurochs or urus, is probably the only wild mammal that has been reduced to extinction in Europe throughout the period usually assigned to history and tradition.

Among the reptilia, a few only, and those confined to one group, have been led to the brink of extinction in recent times. We will deal with and dismiss these before reviewing the important avian animals which during the same period have been permitted to perish.

(To be concluded.)

GROWTH ESSENTIAL TO LIFE.

If the mind is artistic, it must not sit down in hopeless awe before the monuments of the great masters, as if heights so lofty could have no heaven beyond them. Still less must it tremble before the conventionalism of one age, when its mission may be to form the whole life of the age succeeding. No amount of erudition or mechanical skill or critical power can absolve the mind from the necessity of creating, if it would grow. The first condition of mental development is that the mind should be creative rather than acquisitive; or, as it has been well said, that intellectual food should go to make up mental muscle, and not mental fat. A mind that would grow must let no ideas become permanent except such as lead to action. Towards all others it must maintain an attitude of absolute receptivity; admitting all, being modified by all, but permanently biassed by none. To become crystallised, fixed in opinion and mode of thought, is to lose the great characteristic of life. Propriety is the crystallisation of a race. And if we consider that a race, in proportion as it is plastic and capable of change, may be regarded as young and vigorous, while a race which is fixed, persistent in form, unable to change, is as surely effete, worn out, in peril of extinction, we shall see the immense importance to a nation of checking its conventionalities. The positive condition is that the mind should act rather than assimilate, that its attitude should be one of creation rather than of acquisition.—W. K. Clifford.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. Vance, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

Secularism teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 29 SUNDAY, JULY 19, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

Some of your griefs you have cured,
And the sharpest you still have survived;
But what torments of pain you endured
From evils that never arrived!

The Carnegie Report on the Balkans.

"Enquête dans les Balkans. Rapport presenté aux Directeurs de la Dotation Carnegie par les Membres de la Commission d'Enquête. (Paris: 1914; volume hors commerce.)

THE long-awaited "Report of the Carnegie Commission of Inquiry on the Balkans" only came to my hands on July 1, and I have not yet had time to read all the 496 massive pages, with deeds of almost unexampled ferocity recorded in every line, which compose this eloquent and terrifying impeachment of war as waged by Christian nations against each other or against "the malignant and turbaned Turk"—whose malignancy in the light of these revelations seems to have lost its primitive splendor. So far as I can see, after a careful preliminary scrutiny of the findings of the Commission, there is nothing for me to withdraw or even to modify, except in the sense of amplification, in respect of the statements made by me in the three articles on the "Balkan Pandemonium" which appeared in the Freethinker issues of June 21, July 5, and July 12. In point of fact, many of the documents and atrocities cited by me in my articles, and especially the horrors contained in the Greek "Fac-simile" letters and the delightful doings of the Greek bishops are set forth at length, and accepted as authentic, in the Commission's Report. Up to the present stage in my studies, I have had the melancholy satisfaction of finding that the better informed and more authoritative verdict of the Report confirms the general thesis of my argument and relieves my mind from the haunting fear of having exaggerated or distorted the repulsive features of fanaticism and ferocity which, as I contended, marked with especial savagery the conduct of the Balkan War. My sin was in erring on the side of moderation.

The Report, which is enriched by fifty fine engravings and eight valuable maps and ethnographic charts, is preceded by an admirable "Introduction" (pp. 27), by M. D'Estournelles de Constant, who presided over the labors of the Commission. This contribution of the distinguished statesman makes a broad philosophic survey of the critical situation in the Balkans, where we find a medley of populations mixed together, as he tells us (p. 9), in an inextricable chaos of languages, religions, races, and nationalities, consisting of Turks, Bulgarians, Servians, Serbo-Croats, Albanese Servians, Koutzo-Wallacians, Greeks, Albanians, Gipsies, Jews, Rumanians, Hungarians, Italians, who are no worse and not less endowed than others of their race in Europe and America. "Those amongst them who seem worse have only lived a longer time in servitude and neglect. They are martyrs rather than criminals"—a judgment which is no less sound philosophically than well-merited as a difficult but necessary act of social justice to men and races placed by the cruel accident of history in abnormal conditions of conflict with each other.

The temperate, but lurid, pages of this timely analysis and report enforce, with terrible illustrations of man's inhumanity to man, and of religion's failure to humanise him, the historic statement of a well-known fighter that "War is hell"; only they prove with twentieth-century atrocities that war is never so hellish as when waged in these modern times between Christian races and nations who have had numberless temptations and opportunities during the ages to treat each other—as, for instance, Greeks and Bulgarians, Serbs and Albanians—as wild beasts. As M. D'Estournelles de Constant pertinently remarks (p. 20), "It is time that people should learn what war really is," and the Report now presented to the world by the Commission over which he so worthily presided will help to stimulate our torpid imagination and stir up our sympathies in directions favorable to the cause of peace, which, after all, is the cause of humanity.

The Committee, while issuing the awful revelations in their Report, are careful not to cry "Peace, Peace" under conditions by which our modern Zimris, with their shameless policies of national expropriation and enslavement, render peace impossible. The dignified language that M. D'Estournelles de Constant employs (p. 7) I can applaud and make my own:—

> "We repeat to those who accuse us of 'bellowing peace at any price,' the statements we have always made:
> "Rather than slavery, we prefer war.
> "Rather than war, we seek arbitration.
> "Rather than arbitration, let us have conciliation."

But the present conditions in the Balkans, as disclosed in this Report, which in every page shows us religion everywhere as the accomplice or handmaid of the rival races and politicians, would only serve to make peace the sleep of death for the oppressed races, as also for the bottom-dog religions, of this fateful region; for peace in the Balkans to-day is but a sinister period of truce during which the sleepless animosities of the Balkan races will be biding their time for fresh outbreaks of war, massacre, and mutilation. The outlook is not a pleasant one, nor creditable to European civilisation.

Nothing could be more severe—nor, alas, more true—than the summary which M. D'Estournelles de Constant makes of the net result of the most horrifying of all modern wars, where, as he tells us (p. 22), "We see hundreds of thousands of human beings systematically degraded by their own hands and corrupted by their own violence." With all its carnage and heroism, the second Balkan War, so far from being a solution, is only the prelude of other wars, or rather of the sort of war waged without intermittence in the Balkans, this being the worst of all wars, as he tells us, inasmuch as it is a war of religion, a war of reprisals, a war of races, a war of one people against another, of man to man, and brother against brother. What is actually taking place to-day and every day in Macedonia (as shown in the Freethinker of July 5) is really something more pitiless and meaner than the full-dress pomps and circumstances of official war; for what goes on is the pettifogging rooting out and administrative harassing of the bottom dog—Bulgarian, Greek, Turk, Albanian, etc.—who has been driven away from his ancestral kennel, is kicked and cuffed, "converted," proselytised, and tortured by an unholy combination of petty officialdom and narrow piety. Nothing is bettered in the Balkans after all the recent horrors. The churches and schools belonging to the rival Christian sects are left fighting against each other, and are to-day "less free," we are told, "than they were under the Ottoman domination." The result is that a new region—the Mediterranean and the countries laved by his blue waters—has received its solemn consecration as the fresh battlefield of races and religions in readiness for an endless vista of future years of carnage.

The documentary evidence, forming some 240 pages of appendix, including depositions and oral testimony proffered to the Commission and records of personal examination by its members in loco, leave no doubt in my mind that acts of horrible atrocity were committed by the soldiery, the irregular troops or volunteers, and by the racial partisans of the different armies who made the Balkans during 1912 and 1913 the theatre of their ghastly operations. In these matters, wherever war is waged, and at whatever period of human history it breaks out, one must look with placid fatalism for a certain amount of savagery as the normal product of soldierly violence, but the utmost latitude of modern charity must learn to draw the line at acts of bestial mutilation like those recorded on pp. 126-7 and those on p. 385, which were committed on the bodies (no doubt before death) of Servian soldiers by the Bulgarians. Equally horrible were the outrages of Servians upon the Bulgarians (pp. 128, 325, et seq.). The record of such atrocities takes the mind back to the worst excesses of barbarian armies at the dawn of history, and seem incredible in an age of civilisation, with churches and bishops in every nook and corner of the world. It is due in justice to the Bulgarian Government and army to note that from the outset severe measures were enjoined and put in operation against marauding and outrage; on the other hand, no regulations can avail in repression of these abominations where racial feelings are exacerbated by the bloodthirsty sentiments of animosity which moved the statesmen above and solders below during the reign of terror in the Balkans. In the case of Serbs, Greeks, and Bulgarians, it was one set of religionists mutilating and massacring their dearly beloved brethren of the common faith—a clumsy interchange of cruel compliments between the Nationalists and Orangemen in the Balkanic Ulster, which, let us hope, does not prefigure the realities in store for us when the civil, but religious, war at last breaks out, according to the threat of prophecy, in the real Ulster. But, as the Report tells us very truly (p. 76), there was never any need of artificial excitement to produce the race hatreds which serve to explain the violence of the Christian allies in the late war, "and more especially the outbreaks of Bulgarian violence against the Turks." Race, language, history, and religion had built up a barrier between Turk and Christian which was insurmountable except for the more tolerant spirits of the rival faiths, to the zealots of which all things were possible and everything permissible. The Greek press could find no word of blame for the Bulgarian excesses against the Turk when the memory of these crimes was still fresh. But as soon as the subsequent differences arose between Bulgaria and her former allies, the lightest details of Bulgarian criminality were flourished belatedly as arguments against the hated rival in the race for territorial aggrandisement in the Balkans. King Constantine began the new crusade by his celebrated telegram, dated July 12, 1913 (p. 300), in which, after fathering a number of massacres upon the Bulgarians, which are of doubtful authenticity (see Miletitch passim) he stated that he found himself obliged to proceed to reprisals, and declared to all Europe that "the Bulgarians had surpassed the horrors perpetrated by their barbarian hordes in the past, thus proving that they have no right to count themselves amongst civilised peoples." Very soon the Athenian press represented the Bulgarians as a race of monsters and exerted public opinion to a degree of jingo passion which inevitably made the war, when it broke out, one without mercy. Oral or printed, the same phrase summed up the general sentiment of the Greeks against the Bulgarians—Dhen iné anthropi—"they are not men" (p. 77). A Greek officer expressed himself thus before the writer of chapter ii. (from which I have here cited): "When you are dealing with barbarians you must conduct yourself like a barbarian. It is the only thing they understand." In the course of the inquiry the Commission saw in the streets of the Pirea and Salonica an atrocious picture, which the Greek soldiers were greedily buying, representing a Greek mountaineer bearing down to the ground, from behind, a Bulgarian soldier, whose hands were firmly gripped, whilst the Greek is seen gnawing the face of his helpless victim with his front teeth, just like a wild beast (p. 77). This disgusting emblem of national hatred is entitled "The Eater of Bulgarians" (c.f. the term Bulgaroktonos) and is embellished with four ferocious verses in the classic tongue of Homer. The picture, beautiful as a work of art, but inexpressibly horrible in its sanctification of animal ferocity, is reproduced on p. 108, and is described as a popular Greek illustration published at divine Athens. Another popular picture, also described on p. 77, represents a Greek soldier in the act of tearing out the eyes of a Bulgarian while still alive. The reproduction of the picture faces p. 116, and the letterpress represents the inhuman act as one of the episodes of the battle of Kilkich. Another popular picture illustrates a Greek making a meal off the cheek of a stricken Bulgarian as an actual event in battle. As the Commission state in their report: "These things have their importance because they tell of the sentiments which animated the Greek Army. They make it clear that the Greek soldiers were happy to think that they or their comrades in arms were able to accomplish these bestial horrors" (p. 77). The letters of the Greek soldiers seized at Raslog, which the Commission accept as authentic documents, reveal the depths of infamy to which the soldiery were brought by the inflammatory appeal of the regal telegram and the pictorial glorifications of barbaric savagery.

By the publication of this Report the Carnegie Foundation has rendered a world-wide service to the cause of humanity and fulfilled a necessary task of public enlightenment which puts to shame the indifference and reticence of European Governments who watched the shameful carnage and did nothing beyond the proffer of platitudinous words. Its just and fearless award of responsibility and blame should chasten the consciences of Balkan kings and politicians, and especially the spiritual directors of the martyred peoples who inhabit this region of the earth.

The Report is published already in French and English. I have good reason to believe that it will also be published in Spanish for the behoof of the Latin Republics in South America. I hope the Foundation will see its way to issue the Report in German and Russian, if not in other languages of widespreading influence, in order that the terrible object-lesson of racial hatred and religious rancor which the Balkans now exhibit to the world may not be lost upon the democracies nor fail to act in restraint of the jingoes who control their destiny.

Do We Survive Death?—III.

FROM the physiological point of view there is still another argument against the survival of the human personality beyond death. There were no insuperable difficulties against believing this so long as the primitive conception of a double, or ghost, or soul inhabiting the body obtained, either in the original form of that conception or in the form given it later by philosophical speculation. But now we know, not as a mere theory, but as an absolute fact, that what we call the life of man is not single at all, but multiple. However deeper research may go, this one fact remains—the unit of every organism is the cell. Every organism is built up of myriads of cells, each living its own life, and at the same time contributing to the life of the organism of which it is a part. These cells are born, they live, they die, and all the time the health and complexity of the total organism is, so far as we can see, absolutely dependent upon their health and complexity. There is hardly room for doubt about this. It is, indeed, an accepted biological truth.

In a rough and ready way we may treat individual and national life as analogous. In the one case we have cells constituting the organism, in the other we have individuals constituting the nation. And just as what we call national life is no more than the combination of individual lives, so what we call the individual life is no more than the combination of cell lives. New cells replace old ones without disturbing individual existence, just as individuals come and go without disturbing the national existence. In each case the birth of new individuals makes good the losses caused by death. But suppose instead of the deaths of individuals in a nation being partial and gradual, they were sudden and universal? Suppose that all the individuals comprising a nation were to be suddenly blotted out. What, in that case, would become of national life? It would simply cease to exist. No one individual may fully express national life, but national life in the absence of all individuals is a sheer inconceivability.

Is it not equally inconceivable that the life of the individual should persist after the destruction of the cells composing the body? Death is to the individual exactly what an overwhelming catastrophe would be to the nation As the latter means an end to all the units of a nation, and so to the nation as a living fact, so death means the cessation of cellular activity. And it would be as rational to talk of national life existing apart from the individuals composing the nation, as it is to speak of individual life persisting after the cellular activities, of which it is an expression, have ceased to exist.

Some little time back, this aspect was put by Edison in reply to the question as to whether he believed in immortality. Edison replied:—

> "No—no. I am not I—I am not an individual—I am an aggregate of cells, as for instance, New York city is an aggregate of individuals.....I do not think we are individuals any more than a great city is an individual. If you cut your finger and it bleeds, you lose cells. They are individuals. You don't know your cells any more than New York City knows its five millions of individuals. You don't know who they are. No; all this talk of an existence for us, as individuals, beyond the grave, is wrong. It is born of our tenacity of life—our desire to go on living—our dread of coming to an end as individuals. I do not dread it, though. Personally, I cannot see any use of a future life."

What has been said may be taken as the physiological aspect of Lady Grove's question as to which of the complex characters and varying characters that make up a single organism—in the course of its existence—survives? Loosely, but perhaps conveniently, we speak of "self" as though it were something more or less independent of bodily changes or states, and so obscure the fact that each organism exhibits, not a single "self," but a multitude of selves, each gliding more or less imperceptibly into the other. And, as Lady Grove asks, which is to survive? Is it the last "self"? If so, why that more than the earlier ones? Or if the earlier ones do not persist, why should the last one? The reasoning is of the same value, and the evidence is the same, in both cases.

The only reason we have for believing that there exists a "self" separable from the actual organism, is the requirements of metaphysical theories and religious beliefs. Otherwise, it is easy enough to see the way in which the conscious self is built up, and also to note, in many cases, its disintegration. A newly born infant has no consciousness of self; and even with young children it is of the weakest possible character. At an early stage of life the limbs of a child appear to have to it a quite independent existence. It actually discovers its limbs as it discovers their uses. It will appreciate blame being attached to its hands for breaking something before it can appreciate being itself blamed as the cause. We can watch the development of a consciousness of a psychic self, and trace the steps by which that self is built up. The child's experience of home, of friends, of the outside world, of school, and of the larger social life, gradually builds up that consciousness of a "self" which each possesses. The "Ego" of the philosophers is not, therefore, something that is struggling to find expression through the physical medium of the body; it is something that is being evolved before our eyes.

In brief, "self" is never more than the aggregate of sensations felt at any given moment, together with the memories of past sensations and experiences, and the ideal representations of experiences that may occur in the future. It is manifestly not simple, but complex; not indecomposable, but always offering the possibility of decomposition into simpler elements.

For we can not only observe the "self" being built up, we can also observe it being destroyed under the action of disease. Loss of memory—which is only the psychic side of neural derangement—will place an impassable barrier between the self, that is, and the self that was. In other cases, we may see how the wearing action of disease reduces a brilliant personality to absolute imbecility. Or, we have cases of alternating personality, where one personality has no recollection of the other. Which is the true self here? And which is it that is going to survive? Will it be Jekyll or Hyde? Or, yet again, we have the permanent alteration of a human personality as the consequence of an accident. In such cases we say, quite properly, So-and-so is not the man that he was. In any intelligible sense, he is not. In all such cases we are witnessing the disorganisation, the alteration, or the degradation of a personality that has been slowly organised and integrated. These cases offer no difficulty whatever to the Materialist; they do offer insuperable difficulties to the believer in the existence of an independent "Ego" and of survival after death.

Consciousness of the persistence of a "self" throughout all change is really no more than a memory of past experiences. Where this memory is lacking, no such consciousness exists. Thus, in the fairly common case, where, from accident, or other causes, a person forgets his name, friends, family, and all his previous associations, we, quite correctly, call it a loss of memory. But, in reality, the man's "self" is lost, and a new one is built up. In every case this sense of personal identity can be shown to be entirely dependent upon memory. We are told that I know I am the same person that existed twenty or thirty years ago, in spite of the constant change of bodily structure. This is quite true, so long as memory is there, but how when memory is lacking? The testimony of parents and friends assures me that I am the same person that, as an infant, extracted nutriment from a feeding-bottle, or crawled, more or less helplessly, about the floor. But, so far as my personal consciousness is concerned, that person forms no part of me at all. I have no recollection of myself as an infant, and because no memory exists, there is no sense of personal continuity. There never is, in fact, a complete sense of persistence such as is assumed. Some experiences are lost, some are blurred, others are fused together. All we have is a succession of changes—a stream of consciousness—with the fact of memory producing the illusion of a "self" that is superior to, and independent of, all change.

Now, memory is only the psychological aspect of a universal quality of organic matter. We are all, for example, familiar with the fact that, within limits, a muscle becomes stronger as it is used. It not only becomes stronger; it does its work with increased efficiency and ease. All nervous tissue has this quality, which may be described as the capacity for repeating the response to identical stimulations. This lies at the basis of all education, scholastic and otherwise. We perform an action slowly at first, then more rapidly, and at last automatically. Put in psychological language, we may say that the nervous tissue is all the time learning that particular stimuli call for particular responses. The nervous elements are contracting a memory. They remember, and they also forget; for just as frequent repetition makes an action easier, so desistence for any length of time makes its recurrence difficult.

Let me emphasise the statement that to speak of nervous tissue as possessing memory is rather more than a mere figure of speech. It is no more than an expression of the same fact, now in physiological, now in psychological, language. On the psychological side there is a memory of previous events, because there is on the physiological side a structure that responds to stimulation, conserves to some extent the effects of past stimulations, and repeats itself when identical stimulations occur. To say that memory recalls an event tells us nothing Memory is the act of recalling, and we are merely giving a name to what occurs. But to say that the structure registers impressions, and, under appropriate conditions, repeats them, offers us something in the nature of positive information. We have related the psychological state to a physiological condition, and it is only along that line that genuine information can emerge.

As I have already said, it is the necessities of a theory, not the logic of facts, that is responsible for the assumption of a "soul," a "self," an "ego," inhabiting the body, and so surviving its disintegration. No genuine verifiable evidence has ever been offered in its behalf; and, what is quite as important, all the phenomena met with may be explained without its aid. I say may be, not can be, because there are many obscurities connected with the problem that still remain. But the soul-theory removes none of these obscurities. It only adds to what is at present unexplained something that not only itself calls for explanation, but which is wholly inconceivable. And so far as questions have been answered or difficulties removed, it has been done by ignoring the hypothesis of a transcendent soul, and treating all mental phenomena as the equivalent aspects of neurological conditions. In practice we all—Theist and non-Theist alike—do this; for in practice the logic of facts is stronger than the logic of theory, and the connection between bodily states and mental phenomena, with the dependence of the latter on the former, will not be denied. The soul-theory is useless in theory and ignored in practice. It is, as Professor McDougal says, "a mere survival from primitive culture, one of the many relics of savage superstition that obstinately persists among us in defiance of the clear teachings of modern science."

C. COHEN.

Christian Courtesy.

WE are frequently reminded that Christianity is pre-eminently a religion of love. Its God is said to be love and its Savior the manifestation of love on earth. St. John's words are most emphatic: "Beloved, let us love one another, for love is of God; for everyone that loveth is begotten of God and knoweth God. He that loveth not knoweth not God, for God is love" (1 John iv. 7, 8). This is declared to be the Christian doctrine of love, and a supremely beautiful and fascinating doctrine it seems to be. St. John comes to the practical point thus: "Whoso hath the world's goods, and beholdeth his brother in need, and shutteth up his compassion from him, how doth the love of God abide in him?" (1 John iii. 17). We are pointed to these and other similar words, and asked, "Is not this doctrine of brotherly love by far the grandest and noblest in the world?" We answer, "Yes, if you can take it as it stands." Then we are authoritatively assured that the two central truths of Christianity are, the Universal Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of all Mankind. Clergymen are continually telling their hearers that Christianity surpasses all other religions by its enthronement of love. Now, as all Christians recognise the Bible as their Court of Appeal, let us examine more critically the New Testament doctrine of brotherly love. We have acknowledged the ideal beauty of this teaching, if it can be taken as it stands. Unfortunately, it cannot be so taken, because it occurs in a context which robs it of the super-excellence claimed for it. A part of the context is to be found in chapter ii. verse 15, where the "brethren" are exhorted not to love the world, and an eminent commentator says that the "world" here "is man and man's world, in his and its fall from God." That this exegesis is correct is proved by other passages in the same epistle. In chapter iii. verse 10, the world is divided into two opposite classes, the children of God and the children of the Devil, between whom there should be no fellowship because they are supposed to possess nothing in common. In 1 Peter ii. 17 the saints are enjoined to love the brotherhood and honor all men. In St. Paul's Epistles the exhortation to believers is to love one another, not the world outside.

Now, the only legitimate inference from such teaching is that, in the opinion of the Apostles, God is not the father of all mankind, but exclusively of believers in Christ, and that all men are not brothers, but only the redeemed of the Lord. We are fully aware that many modern divines teach the very opposite; but it is equally undeniable that what they put into practice is the apostolic teaching. The other Sunday, Dr. Horton was celebrating the thirtieth anniversary of his ministry at Hampstead; and in the British Weekly for July 9, he is reported to have spoken "very beautifully" on the cloud of witnesses who looked on at those midsummer services. Many of the witnesses, he said, were beyond. Then he referred to the belief in immortality as "an imperious necessity." Becoming extravagant, he exclaimed: "We live just because we are convinced that our loved ones live and that we are moving to meet them." What a deplorable and contemptible character the reverend gentleman by implication attributes to himself. What his language means is that, were it not for his hope of a future life, he would not live at all, or, in other words, would commit suicide. In other words still, Dr. Horton thinks so badly of this world, though made and governed by a loving Heavenly Father, and is so utterly tired of living in it that he would certainly destroy himself did he not believe that God had prepared another and better one into which he shall pass at death and live therein for ever with his loved ones. This is an exceedingly doubtful compliment to the God of love, to say the least. But that is only by the way. What we wish to call special attention to is this godly gentleman's following allusion to the people who do not share his belief in a life to come:—

> "The people who are unaffected by this, whose hearts are so callous and so selfish that they never loved anyone well enough to be heart-broken by a loss—these people do not count. They are of no importance in the world. They are of no importance to those who live, just because they are of no importance to those who are gone."

It was taught in the early Church that Christians were not obliged to keep faith with unbelievers. It is quite certain that Dr. Horton does not believe in being courteous towards them. Many years ago, being unable to meet Professor Haeckel's arguments, his Christian charity permitted him to fling at his honored head the most vulgar abuse. And now, unchastened by the passage of time, he is still at the same despicable game. The words employed on this occasion are coarse as well as discourteous. It by no means follows that when unbelievers in immortality lose their loved ones, their hearts are so callous and so selfish that they do not miss them. If the reverend gentleman is accurately reported, he is guilty of wickedly calumniating people of whom he evidently has no first-hand knowledge. Possibly what Dr. Horton really meant was that Freethinkers would be heartbroken by the loss of loved ones if they were not so callous and so selfish. If these wretched people could but love passionately, the death of their relations and friends would cast them into unfathomable despair; but since they are not so overwhelmed by grief, the only possible inference is that they are heartless and selfish brutes who do not count at all. They are beneath notice. It is believers alone who are of importance in the world; and apparently, of all believers, those who sit under Dr. Horton Sunday after Sunday are of the greatest importance. He said at his thirtieth anniversary: "I think no building ever gathered so many hearts that were faultlessly loyal to those they loved." We hold that such insulting treatment of unbelievers is shockingly unfair and unjust, though characteristically Christian. It is the kind of rudeness we naturally expect from the pulpit.

A few weeks ago we censured Sir William Robertson Nicoll for asserting that every Briton is "a Christian in many respects, and cannot cease to be one, however much he may wish it." This week the offender is the Rev. A. C. Hill, of Tollington Park Congregational Church, London, who, with more ingenuity and plausibleness than Sir William displayed, represents Christ himself as claiming all good men everywhere. Mr. Hill must be aware that the Gospel Jesus never makes such an absurd claim. Indeed, this preacher bases the title of his sermon in the Christian World Pulpit for July 8, "Christians Without the Name," upon a deliberate misrepresentation of the narrative as contained in Luke ix. 49, 50. He says that "these disciples of his were a little concerned because a certain man had been casting out devils, and not doing it in the name of Jesus." The actual Gospel words are these: "And John answered and said, Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name; and we forebade him, because he followeth not with us. But Jesus said unto him, Forbid him not: for he that is not against you is for you." Upon that slenderest of foundations, while misrepresenting an essential part of it, Mr. Hill bases this tremendous claim:—

> "He [Jesus] will not try to make his goods cheap in the market place. He is not content to strive and cry in order that men may be won and allured. But he does desire with all his heart that where there is no active, concrete opposition, where men are not deliberately opposed to him, it may be taken for granted that they are with him."

But Jesus, if he ever lived, has been dead for two thousand years, and desires nothing any more, and no preacher has any right to speak in his name. What Mr. Hill does is to place the responsibility for his own biassed opinions upon the shoulders of a purely imaginary being. As everybody knows, and some divines admit, the Christ of the Churches is a creation of theology. Whatever criticism may ultimately say about the Gospel Jesus, it is beyond all serious dispute that the Christ of theology never lived; and to represent him as claiming all good men is an act of unpardonable impudence. Even on the assumption that Christ exists, we unhesitatingly declare that he would have no right to claim as his own the people who do not believe in him, however good they may be. The Christ Mr. Hill preaches is a supernatural being; but there are millions of thoroughly good people in the world who have no faith in the supernatural, and who have a conscientious objection to be called what they are not. "With a daring that is absolutely startling," Mr. Hill thus advances his own and the Church's claim in Jesus' name:—

> "Wherever men are good citizens, wherever they are obedient to the laws, wherever they are rebellious against unrighteous laws, wherever they are pitiful, tender, loyal, Jesus claims them as his servants, followers of his banner, disciples of his person."

Jesus does nothing of the sort, and even if he did he would deserve the severest condemnation, or, to adopt the preacher's own words, he would "illustrate an arrogance that ought to be met with derision and contempt."

Christian courtesy towards non-Christians there is not. Even to claim all passive unbelievers who are eminently noble and good, as well as to denounce all active opponents of Christianity as people of no importance in the world, "illustrates an arrogance that ought to meet with derision and contempt." As all Christians are by no means good, so all good people are in no respect Christians.

Acid Drops.

Some hundred and fifty years ago there was a sort of young men's debating club at Tarboltom, not far from the residence of the peasant poet of Scotland, who was indeed a member of it, and is said to have drawn up its rules, which we can well believe. One rule declared that every young fellow fit to be a member of that club was, amongst other things, to be "a professed admirer of one or more of the fair sex." One or more! Surely this shows the generous genius of Robert Burns.

Burns was then only nineteen. He spoke of love with mingled innocency and ardor. No woman could hate him. Some loved him; most of them not wisely but too well,—one of them wisely and well—the woman who was his wife, and bore his children, and mothered one of them who was not hers, and put up with all his faults and failings, and whom he in his heart of hearts loved too from first to last. This should be said in justice to "Jean," and it would have her husband's approval; for he quite understood his own case, as we could prove by many profound lines from his own poems; indeed, at bottom, his views on morality in general, and sex in particular, were as austere as Wordsworth's. No doubt this statement would astonish a crowd of Burnsites who really do not admire him for his genius and his greatness, but for other qualities that bring him into too much likeness to the common herd of the Scotsmen, to whom the Kirk had left no recreations but drink and fornication—to use Henley's true and strong account of the situation.

If there are such things as "holy places"—which religion declares but which Freethought rather doubts—surely the birthplace of Robert Burns is one of them. It is a place of pilgrimage from all parts of the world. When the great "infidel," Robert Ingersoll, visited it he felt "as one who touched a shrine." Ingersoll said that in one of the two poems he wrote, speaking formally; in prose he said that he would rather stand up drunk at the Day of Judgment and say he had written "A man's a man for a' that" than stand up sober and say he had written the Westminster Confession of Faith. And every man who is a man would endorse the same statement with regard to himself.

Many a woman also would sign that statement. It was not little but great love that made Bassanio tell Portia—"only the blood speaks to you in my veins." Perhaps the blood of Robert Burns was too often in that condition, but he was not a mere sensualist, even when the "old hawk," as Stevenson called it, was dominant in him. His general feeling towards the sex of his wife, the sex of his mother, was one of love and reverence: we might call it adoration. His essential gallantry is not to be doubted; and it was not selfish but disinterested. Robert Burns could never have accepted—in the full sense of the word—the Bible theory that God made man "good" and then made woman to spoil him. He put it the other way about. He eliminated "God" altogether from the business. It was Nature who first

> "tried her 'prentice hand on man
> And then she made the lasses O!"

What a superb compliment in comparison with the Bible story of creation! And one would think that the ladies would feel it. But some of them evidently don't. Two don't for certain. They are what is called militant suffragettes.

their property, took it into their heads to blow up Robert Burns's birthplace. It is the last place in Scotland one would expect they (as women) would think of touching. But it had no sanctity for them. They did not recognise that it memorised a great man, and a great woman. Robert Burns produced some wonderful poems, but his mother produced Robert Burns: and which is the greater, the man's works or the man himself? Forgetting all this, the amazonian arsonists got their bombs ready and placed them against the lowly walls of the birthplace of that mighty spirit. Fortunately they were disturbed and the famous cottage was saved. One of them escaped, the other was arrested, jabbering just like a lunatic all the time; which she must indeed have been to fancy that such a deed could benefit any man, woman, or child on this planet.

In his latest Monthly Lecture, Dr. Horton admits that thousands of thoughtful and educated people "find golf more attractive than God," that religion has lost its attraction, and that, consequently, the multitudes have become totally indifferent to it. This is perfectly true; but the reverend gentleman is entirely wrong when he alleges that this decay of interest in Christianity is the antiquated and utterly inadequate statement of its truths still in force in the Churches. To set matters right, what is needed, he tells us, is "such a statement or setting of religious truth as will carry complete conviction to the thought of our time"; but we confidently affirm that such a statement neither man nor woman shall ever be able to make. It is not the ruling statement or setting of Christianity that is unattractive, but Christianity itself. Golf is more fascinating than God simply because golf is real and God is not. It is the supernatural, as such, that is losing its hold upon the world, not merely an imperfect doctrine of it.

In the very lecture under consideration, Dr. Horton makes assertions which are both false and absurd. It is not a fact "beyond all dispute," that "by far the greatest moral and spiritual dynamic in the world is simply the story of Jesus." Only a person blinded by prejudice would dare to put forth such a silly claim to-day. Why, the story of Jesus is just now seriously called in question by hundreds of Christian scholars. Christendom, even Great Britain, yea, London itself, in which the reverend gentleman waves the Christian banner, is a living witness to the colossal moral impotence of Jesus and his religion.

"The Heat Wave" was the advertised topic for a sermon at St. Mary-at-Hill Church, London, E.C., recently. There was no need for publicity, for parsons have preached on that subject for centuries.

The Rev. J. M. Thompson, the famous Oxford divine whose views on miracles have brought him into trouble, has a remarkable article in the current number of the Hibbert Journal, entitled "Post-Modernism," in which he maintains that criticism has a right to handle every conceivable subject. We mention it simply because it raises a point that has been raised, again and again in this journal, namely, the evidential valuelessness of religious experience. Mr. Thompson is, perhaps, the first divine to admit that it is a mistake to appeal to experience as evidence for the truth of Christianity, because it is legitimate to ask whether it springs direct from a real person called Christ, or whether it is derived from what is believed about Christ. We are firmly convinced that religious emotion is altogether due to religious beliefs, and is never shared by those who are devoid of such beliefs. Thus, the "new apologetic," as it has been called, falls completely to the ground.

"Brigham Young abolished monotony by harnessing commerce to theology," says "Vanoc" in the Referee. The same teams are driven nearer home; but our newspapers do not notice them.

"Mr. Carnegie has deluged Britain and the States with free libraries, and the effect of those libraries has been to encourage the begging-letter writer to multiply the discontented portion of the community," remarks Mr. Arnold White in the Referee. If this be so, they must be nourished on inferior fiction and worse theology, which form the staple output of such seats of learning.

The new county borough of Southend-on-Sea has a coat of arms under consideration of the Town Council, the predominant features of which are the figures of two monks. Presumably, the holy men are meditating on the Sunday bands, cinemas, and other amusements, to say nothing of the thousands of Sabbath trippers.

The Westminster Abbey authorities quickly offered to bury the late Mr. Joseph Chamberlain in that famous building, although he was known to be a Unitarian. We thought the building was full when Swinburne and Meredith died—but they were not Unitarians.

Naturally, Nonconformists have made the most that could be made of the death of Joseph Chamberlain. He has been acclaimed as a product of Nonconformity, despite the fact that for some years before his enforced retirement Nonconformists were loudly denouncing him as a "Judas," as having betrayed the democratic cause, etc., and despite the further fact that all Nonconformists are not of the Chamberlain type. And so one is left wondering what these other Nonconformists are the product of. Surely not of Episcopalianism? And if Chamberlain was a product of Nonconformity at one stage of his career, what was he a product of at another stage? The only conclusions that follow from such senseless chatter is the amount of foolishness current among those who claim to play a large part in modern political life, and also the readiness with which religious parties seize upon anything in order to practice their favorite game of self-advertisement. The steps of the reasoning are as follows: Chamberlain was a great man. Chamberlain was of Nonconformist descent. We are of Nonconformist descent. Therefore —. Anyone can draw the implied conclusion for himself.

Mr. R. J. Campbell says that Mr. Chamberlain was "a great Free Churchman, unswervingly faithful to his religious convictions." Well, we imagine that what Mr. Chamberlain's religious convictions were are very doubtful. He never paraded them; he never went about preaching in chapels, like some other political leaders, and rarely, if ever, introduced religion into his speeches. We fancy that what Mr. Campbell—who has quite a genius for giving words wrong implications—means is that Mr. Chamberlain was faithful to what is called "religious equality," but what we prefer to call the equality of opinion. We are not now discussing whether this is true or false of Chamberlain, but only pointing out that it has nothing whatever to do with religion. It does not originate with religion, and religion does nothing to favor its development—save so far as the division of religious opinion into sects makes for a larger measure of tolerance than would otherwise obtain. Indeed, we should like to see Mr. Campbell tackle this problem: If the equality of opinion is a religious conviction, how comes it that the countries in Europe where it obtains in largest measure are those in which religious opinion is weakest, and that its bitterest and most numerous opponents are always found in the ranks of the devout?

The Bishop of Bristol has been preaching on the subject of "Will Christianity Survive?" When that question is asked by a Bishop, one knows what kind of answer to expect. Of course, he thinks it will, although he admits that it is "desperately hard at times to understand the ways of God." But the attitude of the proper devotee is not to understand the ways of God, but to believe that they are for good. Christianity never taught that people were to be saved by understanding. That has always been an heretical doctrine. It is as Ingersoll said, if the world could only be saved by understanding religious doctrines, it would surely be damned beyond redemption.

Although the number of church attendants has declined, the number of parsons has increased. The 1911 census shows that there is a slight increase in all the Churches except the Established Church. That shows a decrease of about 400. The others, however, make up for them. Evidently the decline of worshipers is not due to want of preaching.

The Canterbury House of Convocation has been considering whether it should admit women on the Central Board of Missions or not. After considerable discussion, it was decided to co-opt women members to the number of twenty. The Dean of Canterbury opposed their admittance on the ground that it was contrary to the spirit, if not the letter, of the teaching of St. Paul. The Dean was unduly cautious. Both the letter and the spirit of Paul's teaching, and, one may add, the whole spirit of Christian legislation, is dead against such an innovation. Their place, if Paul is to be taken as an authority, is to obey their husbands and to keep silence in the churches. The discussion only made clear the utter hopelessness of expecting anything in the shape of a rational lead in social matters from a congregation of Christian clergymen.

The Church Times warns Dissenters not to expect too much in the way of stopping the leakage from the Churches by forcing religion on children. It points out that there are other factors beside early training to be considered; and in this we quite agree with them. Early training is a very important thing, and undoubtedly a large number of people remain with the Churches because of this. But it is not everything, for in that case there would be very few non-Christians about. As the Church Times says, there are other factors, and these remain even though every child received a sound religious education. Early training is nearly all-powerful when the general currents of life enforce it; but when the forces of life pull in one direction and early training in another, it may well happen that the former triumphs. And this is obviously what happens in the case of the majority who throw off religion when they reach maturity.

It is a little noted but extremely significant fact that this great concern about the religious training of children is, on the whole, a modern thing. In earlier ages children were, of course, taught religion, but only as they were taught other things. There was no need to specially emphasise religion, because the general social environment enforced it. Religion was a part of life, and there was no greater need to surround the child with a special "religious atmosphere" than there is to give it to-day a geographical or an arithmetical atmosphere. A change of conditions necessitated a different policy. The environment, instead of endorsing religious teachings, began to be in flat contradiction to them. The general tendency of life became anti-Christian, and it became necessary to guard the growing generation from its influence. Hence the present position. The secular teacher asks only the opportunity to instruct, and leaves it to daily experience to endorse and enforce his lessons. The religious teacher knows that this is impossible with him. He must keep the child insulated, as it were, against the hundred and one tendencies of modern life if he is to keep him religious. To some extent this may be done with children. But it is impossible to do it with adults. Life is there when the Churches have finished their work; and although early religious training may minimise, it cannot annihilate its influence.

One of the easiest things in the world is to say that a thing you dislike is dead. And to a certain type of mind saying it appears to develop a conviction that it is so. People have gone on, generation after generation, saying either there could be no such thing as an Atheist, or that Atheism was dead, quite blind to the fact that the number of Atheists in the world steadily increases. So with Materialism. It is always being killed, but yet it is always alive. Always being crushed, and yet never losing its activity and potency. Of course, this cheap and easy way of getting rid of an enemy largely owes its efficacy to confusion of thought and looseness of language. The Christian Commonwealth, for instance, says in its last issue:—

> "All the great scientific thinkers of the world have given up the materialistic hypothesis of the Universe. No thinker of reputation to-day stands for the materialistic philosophy."

The sole ground assigned for this is that the old conception of matter is shown to be inaccurate. Well, suppose it is; what then? Materialistic philosophy is no more dependent upon a particular conception of "matter" than the science of geology is dependent upon a particular theory of coal formation. The essence of Materialism is that the forces of the universe are of a determinable, and ultimately calculable, character; and with that the character of "matter" has simply nothing to do. As to scientific thinkers having given up Materialism, that is sheer nonsense. Sir Oliver Lodge knew better when he asked the British Association to be tolerant towards the anti-materialistic explanation. He knew quite well that, instead of Materialism being discarded, it is the working creed of every scientific thinker worth troubling about.

We do not deal with party politics in the Freethinker, but when "King Carson" introduces "God" into the Preamble of his new Constitution for Ulster, as being on the Protestant side, we feel like saying a word or two, and replying to those who resent our doing so by reminding them that "he spoke first." Carson represents himself and his "covenanters" as "trusting to be strengthened by the Power who helped our fathers in their need." This is not politics: this is religion: and is not entitled to pass uncriticised because it is in connection with politics. We say at once that, if there be a God, this is the most blasphemous and hypocritical language we ever read. It was not God, but Great Britain, that made the Protestant the upper dog in the Irish fight. And who dares to say that God made that upper dog the brutal and bloody beast he was? It was the story of an Irish peasant, thrashed at a cart-tail—stroke by step and step by stroke—that made young Charles Stewart Parnell clench his teeth and silently resolve to do—what he did. For the man was tied to the cart so that he had to walk backwards, and the dreadful lash cut open his belly as he went, protesting that such cruelty was against human nature itself—though an English colonel ordered it to be done and saw it done. God helped them, did he? Helped them to tear out the living entrails of a poor Irish peasant, for doing what Carson and Craig and the rest of them now profess to be doing in their turn, and call upon "the Power" (which surely must be the Orange God) to help them as he helped them before.

Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, in the course of his address to the jury in the Freethinker prosecution in 1883, said that the persecution of Catholics by Protestants in Ireland for a period of a hundred and fifty years was unparalleled in human history. The very last infamy was practised by the Protestant landlords, with the full consent of the British Government. They pulled down the peasant's cottage when they could get no more blood out of him in the shape of rent. Never before had that been done. It was a scanty dwelling, but it was hallowed by life and love, and births and deaths, and joy and pain, and all that makes a poor man's home what a rich man's mansion can never be. To strike men there was an attempt to murder the very "soul" of a nation. And the rich did it to the poor, and the men of one religion did it to the men of another religion, and "God" was with them in that "man's inhumanity to man" which has thrown a last black insolubility into the problem of evil, and made the world vile beyond redemption.

Had not Protestants been divided amongst themselves—first of all into the two great parties of Church and Dissent—they would have exterminated the Irish Catholics, which they very nearly succeeded in doing as it was. We don't say the Catholics would have been any better if they had possessed the same power; but they did not possess it, and they are not guilty; you cannot make men responsible for hypothetical crimes. Neither do we wish to stir up religious passions unnecessarily. But when convicted persecutors cry to "the Power" for help against their victims, and convicted bigots clamor against a merely possible intolerance, one can only ask if any such spectacle has been witnessed since Satan rebuked Sin?

All we have said has been provoked by that appeal to "the Power." We have nothing to do with Ulster Protestants' politics. When they publicly appeal to "the Power" of this infinite universe to take sides with them in a political contest, they are posing as religionists and they invite the most candid criticism even from non-politicians.

It is pretended that the Battle of the Boyne, the triumph of Dutch William, who was imported from the Continent to uphold the Protestant interest in Great Britain, was a victory for religious toleration. It was nothing of the sort. All the toleration it secured was between Protestants themselves. No toleration was extended to Catholics. None, of course, was extended to Freethinkers. Less than ten years after the "glorious revolution" of 1688 a fresh statute was directed against Freethinkers. It was called "An Act for the more effectual suppressing of Blasphemy and Profaness." It was a long Act, but in substance it was this: that anyone having been educated in the Christian religion, or at any time made profession of it within this realm, who shall deny the Holy Trinity, or shall say that there are more Gods than one, or deny Christianity to be true, or the Bible to be of divine authority—such person shall be disabled from holding any public employment, and on a second conviction be imprisoned for three years and deprived for ever of all civil rights. That was the "religious toleration" which followed the Battle of the Boyne, the flight of James II., and the safe seating of William III. upon the throne of Great Britain.

The government of Ireland, while it is purely secular, may be this or that so far as we are concerned. But the government of Ireland has never been anything else than the government of Irish Catholics by British and Irish Protestants. "To hell with the Pope!" was the sublime shibboleth on one side. "To hell with King William!" was the sublime shibboleth of the other. We do not mean that religious bigotry was responsible for all the misrule and misery in Ireland; we mean that it sanctioned and exasperated every other cause of quarrel; the chief of which, of course, was the oppression and exploitation of the majority by the minority of the nation.

Protestants had all the power when the Act of Union was passed. There was not a Catholic in the Irish Parliament.

Digitized by Google

After the revolutionary period of 1848 the Protestants made it "treason felony" to suggest that the Act of Union could ever be repealed. This was to make every Nationalist orator or journalist a criminal punishable by death. That is, mere reformers, like John Mitchell, who wrote pretty much what T. P. O'Connor writes now—only with real literary genius—stood in fear of capital punishment. On the occasion of Mitchell's trial, with a batch of his colleagues on the Irish Tribune, the Crown exercised its right of unlimited challenge, and every Catholic was kept off the jury, as well as every Protestant who was not thought "sound" enough. Every defendant, of course, was found guilty; every one of them, of course, was sentenced to death.

History is written too much in the abstract. The bestial circumstances of the execution of the English Regicides, for instance, is almost unprintable. Historians use abstract language; they say that the unhappy men were cruelly executed, or use some other polite circumlocution. But what was the actual death sentence on these Irish patriots—for such every man must be who risks his liberty and even his life in opposition to the government of his country by foreigners? The following sentence on William Smith O'Brien will do for all the rest,—there being only a change in name:—

> "The sentence is, that you, William Smith O'Brien, be taken from hence to the place from whence you came, and be thence drawn on a hurdle to the place of execution, and be there hanged by the neck until you are dead; and that afterwards your head shall be severed from your body, and your body divided into four quarters, to be disposed of as her Majesty shall think fit. And may the Lord have mercy on your soul."

There, dear reader; let that sink into your "soul." This horrible sentence was commuted to penal servitude for life, but it sounded in the ears of the prisoners in the dock. Had the Irish been all Catholics, or all Protestants, those infamous words would never have been uttered. The hellish spirit of religious bigotry turns men into beasts. Nay, worse than beasts; for what beast ever hated another beast for a mere difference of opinion on any subject whatever?

Party politics are nothing to us. Neither are we very much concerned about the "business government" which some people wish to see. But when a great political problem is discussed in the light of religious dogmas, and in the spirit of religious animosity, it becomes Freethinkers, at least, to insist that every word of religion should be eliminated from this controversy, and that the discussion should turn upon what is actual and appreciable by ordinary human intelligence in this world.

At the present time, Scottish Sabbatarians are fighting most strenuously for the preservation intact of their field-day. The magistrates of Saltcoats have unanimously refused to consent to the holding of Sunday evening concerts. The Ardrossan and Saltcoats Herald assures their Honors, however, that they are laboring under a delusion if they assume that their finding has the approval of the entire community. It certainly has not the approval of the Herald. But there are Sabbatic stalwarts at Saltcoats, who have the courage of their convictions. Mr. (or should it be Rev.?) W. M'Neil Biggam, for example, is a modern Goliath, who looks down with blustering contempt upon all and sundry to favor the secularisation of the Lord's Day. This warrior, flourishing two hundred years after his time, goes to the absurd length of asserting that "it is seriously open to question whether the rendering of even the finest sacred music by competent artistes, under concert conditions on a Sabbath evening, would result in permanent moral good." We contend that it is more seriously open to question whether the most eloquently and impressively conducted Church services, taken by themselves, have ever contributed to the moral elevation of the people. But the question is, Will intelligent Scotland patiently listen and submit to such crass and fumid exhalations of seventeenth century Puritanism in this enlightened twentieth century? Will the residents of Saltcoats allow themselves to be led by the nose by such obsolete teachers as Mr. M'Neil Biggam? We are confident,—

> "O Caledonia, stern and wild, > Meet nurse for a poetic child," that thou wilt take thy full share in the grand task of rescuing the venerable day of the sun from the tyrannous rule of the Sabbatarians.

There was an altercation in High-street, Southend, on Sunday, between a policeman and a citizen of London, who had come down to "see the fleet" and had been seeing it, not wisely but too well. Presently the policeman lost his temper a bit and began to use "language." Whereupon the other disputant, who seemed to belong to the working classes, said, "Look here! Don't you Bernard-Shaw me!" Such is fame.

Rev. Paulus Askanazie (an odd name), vicar of Ulrome, in East Yorkshire, had an odd experience. He went up to inspect an upper chamber in the church tower, but the ladder broke and he could not get down again. Tolling the bell for three hours brought no relief, although it caused wonder in the heads of his parishioners. Providence rendered no help—as usual. At last the reverend gentleman broke a window and held out a white flag in the form of a handkerchief with the "S. O. S." signal, which brought him relief.

Rev. George M. Norris, of South Cove, Wangford, Suffolk, left £73,897. Pity the poor clergy!

Lord Halsbury, who was the leading counsel for the crown in the Freethinker prosecution in 1883, was an elderly man then. He seems to be living from everlasting to everlasting. But he does not appear to spend much time in improving his knowledge of the Bible. He quoted Scripture the other night in the House of Lords against the Government, and this is what he made of it:—"Make no more vain orations; your hands are for blood." The real quotation, from Isaiah, is—"Bring no more vain oblations; your hands are full of blood." Orations for oblations is distinctly good. Lord Halsbury is getting quite comical in his old age.

A most remarkable man is the Rev. R. F. Horton, of Hampstead! Between his facts and his conclusions there is a connection so subtle that only the initiated are able to discern. Thus, under present conditions, he has grave doubts as to whether the British people are fit for Empire. And, as becomes so subtle a reasoner, he supplied the data on which such a conclusion was based. An Australian on a visit to England gave Dr. Horton the benefit of his experiences. One Sunday morning this Australian visitor went to High Mass at the Cathedral at Westminster. In the afternoon he went into Surrey, and found about a thousand people playing golf. That was sufficient. His next move was to visit Dr. Horton's church—all in the same day—and he "emphatically declared" that we were not fit for Empire. That is a quite wonderful chain of reasoning, and very few beside Dr. Horton would be capable of it. Because there is High Mass on Sunday morning and golf on Sunday afternoon, the English people are in a state of decadency. We cannot quite see the connection; but Dr. Horton says it, and Dr. Horton is one of the shining lights of Metropolitan Nonconformity.

The following is from the Daily News of Friday, July 10:—

> "A dock worker named William James Ahern, who said he was 'not religious,' gave some trouble to the Rotherhithe Coroner's officer when he sought to induce him to take the oath at an inquest yesterday.
> "The Coroner's officer (P.C. Allen) commenced: 'Repeat after me, I swear by Almighty God——'
> "Witness: No, I don't.
> "Officer: Repeat, 'I swear——'
> "Witness: But I won't.
> "Will you take the oath?—No, I ain't religious.
> "Then affirm, 'I do solemnly and sincerely affirm.'—No, I shan't.
>
> "The Officer: But it is not religious. Repeat, 'I do solemnly and sincerely affirm.'—Yes.
> "Repeat it.—Yes.
> "Will you please repeat what I say? 'I do solemnly and sincerely affirm.'—Yes.
>
> Officer (sternly): Will you either affirm or take the oath?
> "Witness (looking disgusted): No.
>
> "The Coroner (Mr. H. R. Oswald): If you do not you will get into trouble. Repeat after the officer.
> "Witness said he would not, but the officer urged, 'But it is not religious,' and witness consented to have another try.
> "Finally he rounded off the last words of the affirmation with the addition of words from the disliked oath, 'So help me God.'"

We hardly think this gentleman can be amongst our readers. If he were he would probably know that the Oaths Act passed by Charles Bradlaugh gives every witness or juror a right to affirm in any court of law simply on the ground that he has no religious belief or that the taking of an oath is against his religious belief. We may add that the form of affirmation in the Act was drawn up by Charles Bradlaugh himself, and it may therefore be taken as quite satisfactory.

Mr. Foote's special address to the Freethought party generally, and to his many personal friends in particular, is postponed still further. It must not be interrupted when it has once begun, and a good deal of standing matter has yet to be used up first.

One part of Mr. Foote's address will be concerned with the heavy financial strain involved in some unavoidable changes. There is more, rather than less, need of the President's Honorarium Fund being well supported. It is to be hoped that all intending subscribers who have not yet remitted will do so as promptly as possible. The money is likely to be badly wanted in the early future.

There are fewer clergymen in England than there were ten years ago. Actors and actresses have increased by fifty per cent. These are sure marks of the growth of civilisation.

Mrs. H. Bradlaugh Bonner objects to the N. S. S. President's statement, backed by the Executive, that all the effective fighting against the Blasphemy Laws has been done in the law courts. She does not state where else it was done. It was the fight over the Freethinker prosecution more than thirty years ago that produced Lord Chief Justice Coleridge's epoch-marking judgment, which made all discussion on religion, as such, entirely free, and confined the punishment of "blasphemy" to the use of outrageous language. Twenty-five years elapsed before another "blasphemy" case occurred. The President and Executive of the N. S. S. saw the importance of fighting the Boulter case. They did fight it and they won. It was a critical occasion. And the result was the endorsement of Lord Chief Justice Coleridge's declaration of the Common Law of Blasphemy. That is settled for ever. Just as Mr. Foote said it was in 1898 when he established the Secular Society, Limited. His view was that our funds were safe, but our personal liberty was still in danger owing to the manner in which Christians might choose to find that we had attacked their faith.

Nearly everybody said that the N. S. S. President was mistaken. It was they who were mistaken. He was right—as he usually is in such matters. Some of those who were pleased to think he was a blunderer in 1898 were just as mistaken in 1908. They advised Boulter to climb down, to express regret for his "blasphemy" and to promise never to do it again. And one of them plainly stated in print that English Freethinkers had quite as much freedom of speech as was good for them. Now they are posing as the heroes of the "repeal" movement, and ignorant people are actually believing them. No wonder Matthew Arnold called History a Mississippi of falsehood.

Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner objects to the statement that while the Deputation to Mr. Asquith, and his reply, were good things in their way, they "could not possibly lead to any fresh steps in the direction of the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws." She does not tell us what steps they could lead to, or what fresh step they have led to. Nothing fresh has been attempted. Circulars, questions for candidates, petitions, questions in Parliament,—all had been done before. Mrs. Bonner hints at another Bill. There cannot be a better one than her father's, which was introduced (and lost, of course) in 1889. He was still President of the N. S. S., by the way, when he made this gallant effort. To tell the plain truth, all the fighting against the Law of Blasphemy, until quite lately, has been done by the N. S. S., and by no one else. The monster has long been moribund. What is being arranged for now is its funeral. To give it the coup de grace, to bury it out of sight and sound, is a good work in its way. But the real work was the work of the pioneers—who dared and suffered and did all that men could do to maintain their and every man's right of free thought and free speech.

The circumstances under which the suggested new Bill is to be introduced "will be more favorable than has ever been the case hitherto." Very likely. But those more favorable circumstances only mean, after all, that much progress in the general spirit of toleration has taken place since 1883 and 1889.

Mrs. Bonner throws out a final hint about the necessity of Freethinkers working unitedly together in respect to the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. This will sound a little odd to some members of the Blasphemy-Laws Repeal Committee.

A vicar for a long time had to bear what was to him a very unpleasant state of things, namely, a large number of empty pews. He had tried to find a remedy, and at last thought of a novel idea. He had bills and posters printed, and sent broadcast, announcing that on a certain Sunday he would preach a special sermon on "The Old and the New Sacrifice," and that to illustrate the old sacrifices "real fire" would come down from heaven. The vicar accordingly arranged for a boy to go up in the roof of the church, and when he repeated, for the second time, the text, "And fire came down from heaven and burnt the sacrifice," the boy was to light some paper and drop it down. The appointed service came; the church was, of course, filled almost to suffocation. The vicar arose, and gave out the text—once—twice—but no fire came down, and on looking towards the roof to find the cause, the boy shouted out, "If you please, sir, the rain has got on the matches, and they won't strike." At the end of the sermon the vicar said he hoped there would be a good collection to carry on the work of the Lord at that place.

The Judge's Chair. Dartmoor Stories, by Eden Phillpotts. John Murray: 1914. 6s.

MR. EDEN PHILLPOTTS has given the reading public many surprises. First, when the capital, short stories which made the magazines unwonted sources of laughter, were collected and issued over his signature, and later and greater, when the ingenious historian of The Human Boy dropped the cap and bells, and, in The Secret Woman, contributed the most powerfully written novel of its year to our wonder and amazement. In a still later book, The Thief of Virtue, Mr. Phillpotts gave his admirers yet another surprise, for he translated the philosophy of Nietzsche into the vernacular of the West Country, and gave us a convincing picture of the superman in homespun.

No one among the present day writers has a better claim to the succession to the mantle of Mr. Thomas Hardy than Mr. Eden Phillpotts. Since the Master has forsaken novel writing for poetry, the younger writer has been gradually adding volume to volume of his Dartmoor Stories until he can claim to have attempted a prose epic of the West Country. The latest volume of this splendid series of novels, The Judge's Chair, is before us, and forms a triumphant finale to the master-work, well worthy of the strong hand of the famous Devonshire novelist.

This volume of stories bring to a conclusion the author's Dartmoor work. They are along the line of previous volumes and mingle comedy and tragedy; but as in the case of Widecombe Fair, he ended the longer stories with a play of humor and a glimpse of the happier side of life; so, for the most part, these tales, told by an old Moorman from The Judge's Chair, are laughter-moving and saturated with the quaint and original philosophy of the Moor folk.

Because of the range and maturity of the stories, The Judge's Chair is a most characteristic work. These peasants, with their racy and vigorous dialect, are not merely West Country photographs, they are "forms more real than living man" which the imagination of the author has created. The reader knows that the important factor is nature, and that the simple story is but a portion of the world's life. And the struggles and love-affairs of these peasants are to this theme merely as the hare running along the railway is to Turner's rainstorm and express train racing one another in his world-famous picture. It is a true instinct that impels Mr. Phillpotts to choose backgrounds of landscape rather than houses and furniture; for, in like position, did not the great painter crown his Ariadne with stars?

There are no less than eighteen stories in the book, and they include tragedy, comedy, and even farce. Mr. Phillpotts tells stories, too, in such a way that his readers are counted by the tens of thousands, for in this phase of his art he is irresistible. Listen, for example, to his description of Tommy Caunter, the patriarch of The Judge's Chair:—

> "A little old man with a brown and withered face all wrinkled into one laugh. Every line of a thousand lines was merry. His eyes were small, bright suns, and the obvious happiness in them must have astonished an observer. Could it be that any mortal had found seventy years on Dartmoor one long jest? Teeth Tommy Caunter had none, but his shrunken mouth followed the skull lines and grinned a genial smile. He wore a blue shirt, corduroy trousers, and battered black leggings. His coat and his hat were beside him on the seat. He was bald save for a thin ring of white hair—a half halo of silver that had slipped off his head and been caught behind his ears."

This Tommy Caunter is the character to whose memory Mr. Phillpotts professes to owe the stories. In keeping with this genial supposition, on page after page brilliant touches of homely wisdom strike the reader, as, for instance:—

> "We always remember the man who trod on our corns, though we may forget the man who tried to set our house on fire."
> "Talk is very well; but it won't heal a cut finger."
> "The youngest of us makes mistakes."
>
> "If cleanliness be next to godliness on one side, 'tis close kin with a devil of a temper on t'other."
> "Youth will rush in where middle age casts a look and goes by."

For Freethinkers these stories have an unusual interest, for the keynote of all is frankly and fearlessly Pagan, and interpenetrated with the Greek ideals of life. It is this quality that gives Mr. Phillpotts' art an imposing and elemental quality. He is, in a word, a thinker; but he is too clever an artist to allow his æsthetics to be overshadowed by his ethics. One of the most charming of the stories deals with the scientific truth that the child of to-day is nearer his prehistoric ancestors than the adult by many an age. This story, "The Apostates," recounts the superstitious wonder of two children who find a rock idol, and the dialogue between the brother and sister is very suggestive:—

> "'You oughtn't to pray but to Gentle Jesus,' she repeated.
> "'I don't see that,' argued Bobby. 'Gentle Jesus have got His hands full without me and you. Everybody be always at Him for one thing and another, and you can't expect Him to hear a couple of little squirts like us. But if this here gent chap be a real idol, so like as not he's just busting to help somebody to show his cleverness. He might be a proper friend to us, and none the wiser.'"

How the young apostates fared, and the result to the rock-god is told with consummate art.

In quite another vein is the poignant story of "The Wife" written, with a lucid and compact sense of craftsmanship; whilst "Providence and Tommy Caunter" is seasoned with a delightful irony. The remainder of the stories are the work of a writer to the manner born, and the book should increase the already wide reputation of Mr. Phillpotts.

Amid the rampant commercialism and frivolities of modern literature, it is pleasant to find a popular novelist taking his art seriously, and producing works which not only command the admiration of the many, but compel the attention of the critics. Mr. Eden Phillpotts is in this enviable position that, while he is on easy terms with his publishers and his many thousands of readers, his work shows a really notable advance from the days when he lighted up the magazines with his humorous stories until he had given us the epic of Dartmoor, and also proved by the publication of Wild Fruit, a refreshing volume of verse, that he could wear with a grace the singing robes of Apollo, and who sings for singing's sake, and who seems indifferent to the praise or blame of coteries or critics. The Dartmoor series of novels, of which The Judge's Chair is the concluding volume, have a real and lasting value. For in the country, where ways are simpler and men less prone to hide their moods, we get nearer to the heart of things than in towns. And, to his credit be it said, Mr. Phillpotts has never sold his birthright as a thinker. Like Meredith and Hardy, he has passed through the Valley of Dead Gods, and looked with wondering eyes upon the celestial ocean of Truth.

Animals Recently Extinct.—III.

REPTILE life, which reached such a marvellous state of development in the remote past, had long been deprived of its lordship before man appeared on the planet. Their fossil remains prove that gigantic terrestrial tortoises were widespread on the leading land surfaces of the earth in many areas in which they have been for ages extinct. These reptiles were latterly driven to seek shelter in secluded island sanctuaries, and from these, their last retreats, the coercive hand of man has now expelled them. During the last few generations the expiring land-tortoise has been restricted to a small number of islands in the Indian and Pacific Oceans.

Digitized by Google

That these organisms were the stranded survivors from a greater continental past, appears evident from the fact that far apart as their localities were, these tortoises displayed the closest affinity, and that the minor tortoises were entirely absent from these island havens. Unfortunately for themselves, these reptiles became a favorite food with the men who landed on their wave-encircled homes, and their numbers sadly declined. A few giant tortoises have recently been protected in Aldabra; some are kept in captivity in zoological collections, but for all practical purposes these interesting relics of the earth's earlier fauna may be regarded as departed things.

During the historical period, more than fifty species of birds have been suffered to expire. Nearly all these extinct animals were island dwellers, and it is to be feared that other feathered creatures similarly circumstanced are destined to extinction at no distant date. In the interests of science and humanity it is to be trusted that these isolated species will be protected and their perpetuation secured, for our feathered fauna are among the most lovable and beautiful of Nature's children.

The dodo is dead. There is, and there has long been, no doubt that it is as dead as Queen Anne. Our first knowledge of this "ponderous pigeon" dates from the time when the Dutch navigators landed on the island of Mauritius and annexed it to their country's possessions. The bird was not a thing of beauty, with "its huge beak, hooked and covered except towards the tip, with a bare skin..... the short, thick legs, with the usual four toes, three in front and one behind, the wisp of a tail, and the heavy, fat body, much too big for the wings, which were not actually absent, but simply very small and useless."

This fat, flightless bird was, of course, quite at the mercy of the human intruders in its only place of refuge; it was hunted down for culinary purposes without compunction, and although some of a more delicate palate complained of the coarseness of the dodo's flesh, not one was spared, and the last of its race perished towards the close of the seventeenth century.

Professor Reinhardt contended that the dodo was related to the pigeons. This theory was at one time derided until the great anatomist Owen's study of the bones, says Professor Newton, "confirmed the judgment of the Danish naturalist, and there is now no possibility of any other view being successfully maintained." The dodo was bigger than the biggest cock turkey and its nearest living relatives have been identified in the green-tinted pigeons of the tropical east. These birds, however, are strictly arboreal in habit, while the dodo was a ground bird. One of these tropical pigeons possesses a bill that is shaped remarkably like that of the dodo, and although this organ is smaller, both absolutely and relatively, its resemblance is very striking to that of the defunct dodo. The didunculus or dodlet, of Samoa, is another connecting link with the dodo, and although the dodlet is a terrestrial bird, its powers of flight are very considerable. No reliable specimen of the extirpated dodo has survived, but the earlier descriptions are amply corroborated by the fossil remains that were brought to light in 1865 when large tracts of the marsh-lands of Mauritius were drained.

The solitaire of the neighboring island of Rodriguez was a big bird with a bill similarly formed to that of the dodo. The cock bird, which was much larger than the hen, weighed as much as forty-five pounds, and, like the dodo, was pleasing to the palate. It was not, however, so easily caught; but it was captured and devoured nevertheless. The solitaire owes its name to the circumstance that its habits were solitary; it was usually found singly or in pairs. A nest some foot and a half high was constructed in the open, in which one large egg was laid. The hatching was a prolonged affair that extended over seven weeks, the two birds relieving one another in the task. They were very jealous of their nursery, no other solitaire being permitted to approach nearer than two hundred yards of the nest. But one curious characteristic of the bird, and one that attracted the attention of several observers, was the remarkable aversion of the parent birds to an attack on one of the opposite sex. If the solitaire which happened to be sitting saw "a stranger of the opposite sex approaching, it would summon its partner by a rattle-call of the wings to drive it away, for males would not attack females, or vice versâ."

The newly hatched bird remained in the nest for several weeks; but even when it was able to walk abroad, the mother bird was in constant attendance. It was repeatedly noticed that a short time after the young solitaire had left the nest, a crowd of thirty or forty others brought a second young one to it. The parent birds then joined their visitors, and all wandered away together. After an interval of time, the assembled solitaires dispersed separately or in pairs, and the two young ones were left in peace together. This custom was known among the colonists as the solitaire's marriage.

No solitaire ever left its native island alive. It moped in captivity, refused food, and soon pined to death. There appears no record of the bird's skin having at any time been sent to Europe. For its appearance and habits we are entirely dependent upon the testimony of travellers and the early colonists of Rodriguez. A large number of bones and skeletons of the solitaire have been discovered in the island during the past fifty years, and a pair of these skeletons may be seen at the South Kensington Museum. The upshot was that in less than a century after the bird's discovery it had passed to its long rest.

The great auk is the only flightless European bird, and also the only feathered creature that has become extinct in the Northern Hemisphere in modern times. Although well known in Northern Europe, the great auk's chief habitat was North-Eastern America, and there its extermination was carried out with unrestrained cruelty. As early as 1497, the war against this bird began in America, where its numbers must have been extraordinarily vast at the outset, since, nearly three hundred years later, the great auk was still very abundant. At the latter date the auk was slain wholesale for its feathers, and its numbers were seriously reduced. This destruction continued unchecked until the great auk disappeared for ever from the shores of America. In Europe the birds lingered in isolated stations until the nineteenth century, but their days were numbered. They were persecuted in their last retreat, and captured by collectors. The surviving birds were reduced to a single pair; these were killed in 1844, and since that date they have never been seen alive.

A very remarkable group of extirpated birds which inhabited New Zealand, and to a smaller extent Australia, was made up of the various species of moa or dinornis. These feathered bipeds differed considerably, both in size and structure. Some were about 2 ft. in height only, while the large moas attained a height of about 14 ft. One of the leading peculiarities of these birds was the entire absence of wings, but the lower limbs, on the other hand, reached quite massive proportions. One of these immense birds had "a drumstick bone over a yard long, and stood 12 ft. high, while the ostrich is only eight, and is much less massive in build than the moas were." An allied genus also existed, the Palapteryx, which possessed rudimentary wings and also a fourth toe, while the moas were all three-toed birds. These defunct birds find their nearest relative in the still extant apteryx, which is a tiny creature in comparison with his departed allies.

The extinction of the moa is of comparatively recent date, for, apart from the native traditions, feathers, and "a part of the neck with muscles and skin attached," have been found. Their bones have been discovered in large numbers in the sea-shore sands, in meres, stream-beds, and swamps. Many of these are in an excellent state of preservation. In general appearance the moas more closely resembled the emu than any other living bird.

Digitized by Google

As in most of the other instances dealt with, the food problem played a large part in the extinction of the moa. Despite a supposedly ancient Maori poem which is alleged to refer to something as being "Lost as the moa is lost," there are several reasons for thinking that the giant moas were still in existence a few centuries since in fairly large numbers, and that one or two survived down to the nineteenth century. In this connection it may be remarked that the notornis, which flourished in the days of the moa, and whose existence was first made known to science through remains which were found in association with those of the extirpated moa, has since been discovered in a living state. Native traditions do not as a rule carry very far, and as Finn justly says, "even the dodo was suspected of being fabulous at one time, since no tradition of its existence survived in its native island."

But, apart from the injurious intervention of the human biped, the moa is almost certain to have died out. They appear to have frequently perished from the dearth of food, from accident and disease. Moreover, the remains of an extinct eagle—a sanguinary bird of prey much larger than the golden eagle—have been found in company with those of the moa. This bloodthirsty bird doubtless devoured the young of the larger moas and easily preyed on all the smaller species of these flightless birds. Still, man must have been the chief antagonist of the ornithological fauna of New Zealand.

It has long been a puzzling problem why so small an area as that of New Zealand should have contained so surprising a number of species of moas. But this remarkable moa variety is no more amazing than that of the cormorants. Of the forty species of cormorants distributed throughout the earth, New Zealand possesses sixteen, or nearly half of the entire number.

If the innumerable accounts of the enormous flocks of passenger pigeons which flourished in America within the last few generations are moderately accurate, the utter extermination of these birds is simply astonishing. As a rule, the gregarious habit is distinctly advantageous to the animals which display it, but in the case of the passenger pigeon (Ectopistes migratorius), its communal customs aided materially in its undoing. Migrating at uncertain intervals in vast flocks, amounting at times to millions, in search of food, they perished in incredible numbers. They nested together in countless multitudes; no secrecy was possible in such circumstances, and all their enemies, "human, furred, and feathered—gathered to the spoil," and wrought wholesale destruction on the defenceless birds. Their human foe was pre-eminent at this work of slaughter:—

> "On one occasion, in 1881, 20,000 were used for the so-called sport of trap-shooting. Thus they were gradually killed out. In 1894-1902 they were still to be seen in pairs or half-dozens; but by 1905 it was believed there were none in the wild state and very few in captivity."

A number of these pigeons were sent to Europe, and some were set at liberty in England, and possibly a few may still survive in woodland retreats.

Although the enemies of the passenger pigeons were legion, and despite the fact that they supplied food to the American agriculturalists and the Indians in almost as easily accessible a form as the fabled omelettes that grew on trees, even then it is hard to understand how the birds became utterly exterminated in America in so short a period. That the birds were driven from their favorite breeding-places to less hospitable quarters, where their young commonly succumbed to cold, and that the forced migrations of the adult pigeons were attended with heavy mortality from accidents and inclement weather, must have been important contributory causes of their extinction. And what is more probable, diseases of an epidemic nature, when once they had established themselves within the flocks, would wreak appalling destruction among the millions of pigeons congregated together. But whatever the factors involved may have been, this beautiful bird may now be considered as an exterminated creature.

Deeply as we deplore the departure of so many interesting representatives of the world's fauna, and greatly as we feel inclined to reproach the human actors in the various tragedies briefly described, we are, nevertheless, bound to remember that the extinction of floral and faunal forms is no new feature of the earth's career. Thousands of different plant and animal organisms have arisen and developed, only to decay, without leaving legitimate issue. The giant amphibians were descended from puny ancestors, but, having attained the limits of growth, they were soon eclipsed by the superior splendors of reptile life. The reptilia evolved a wondrous wealth of form and function, but were destined to be completely outclassed by that rising mammalian life which grew apace while the earlier lords of the land sank to comparative insignificance. Side by side with the now reigning mammals flourished the winged and feathered avian fauna which had also sprung from reptilian stock. But mammalian life has long since passed its meridian, and is hastening towards its end. Will the proud inheritor of all the ages prove a permanent denizen of earth, or is the brainiest mammal, man, likewise doomed to pass from the scenes of his triumph and glory, having prepared the path for some other mode of Nature's eternal energies?

T. F. PALMER.

Homewards.

"WHY should your voices be lifted up in weeping? Why should your souls faint on the path of woe? Why should the sunrays be dimmed by your tears, and the merry laughter of man grow cruel in your ears? Have you no faith, O, my people? Has the love of God perished in your hearts, my children? Do not I tell you he awaits your home-coming? And who, other than my Father which art in heaven, is greater than I?"

Jesus Christ often used words similar to those in addressing his audiences. When he died and became a God, his sayings developed from dogmatic advice into commandments; and it as the latter that Christians should recognise them. The modern apostles of the Lord Jesus Christ should make no row over the matter. Almighty God cannot, in the very nature of him, give counsel. He commands. Advice can always be neglected. It gives room for choice; and were the All-in-All to concede choice to the infinitesimal bit of omnipotency, in other words, the ordinary Christian, it would simply shatter the deistical nature the All-in-All possesses. At least, I think so; for I cannot imagine such an autocrat giving all and sundry the opportunity to deem him in the wrong, so much in the wrong with his guidance that they would treat it with contempt, doing that which was directly opposed to his wishes.

No one will deny that God should have a utility value, that the usefulness of him should be most evidenced in the exigencies and hardships of life. There should be no doubt upon its clear recognisibility. In these matter-of-fact days it is necessary that Christians should be plain; and if Christians were plain in their faith they might work wonders with the minds of the rest of the people, even yet. God's activities should be felt and shown. They can be most serviceable during periods of trouble; for emotions cannot well be subdued and hidden at these times. Naturally enough, if God and his commandments are of any use-value at all, the human heart, having, as priests say, the esoteric divine knowledge in its depths, will, undoubtedly, appreciate them most when it is molested. God's commanding advice will be actualised. Strangely contrary to our expectations it is not. Something is awry.

We can sympathise heartily with the sevenpenny novelist who says that love is life. We also know what the loss of love means: the cinema tells us. Understanding these things, we cannot be justifiably accused of callousness. Professing allegiance to the aphorism that love is life, we cannot be deemed cynical regarding its influences. Possessing, at times, a nearly unrestrainable dose of sentiment in the realm of ideas, we cannot be termed serpent-hearted. For all that our gorge rises in disgust at the mawkish sentimentality, otherwise contemptible snivelling, that fills the atmosphere to putridity when the hand of God comes out, like an embracing tentacle, from the skies to the waters or to the earth, to pull a few thousand lovers of him homewards.

God is a God of love, and therefore his doings are lovable. Being lovable, he is a good God. When we imagine he smites us we are mistaken. We know, deep in our souls, his ways are not ugly and cruel; we know they are beautiful and kind. How foolish we are when we think he gives us sorrows; they are not really sorrows; they are blessings. We all know it. Besides, Jesus Christ told us; and he should have known. God's great heart is so overflowingly full of love for us that he cannot possibly chasten his children. It is not misery, nor tribulation, nor suffering, that comes to us. It is all love, all joy, all divine wisdom. We are fools to think differently. If we grieve over the loss of loved ones drowned in a sea tragedy, killed in a railway disaster, burned in molten lava, we are blasphemous fools, and we all know it. God cannot mean ill towards us and ours. Naturally and supernaturally he knows best. When we see a child torn from its mother's arms by a devouring wave; when we see a fair young girl crushed in its spray-white breast; when we see a powerful man, hopelessly futile against their wrath, tossed to death by the surging waters; when we see a mother sucked relentlessly into an ever-moving grave; there is no need for bitter grief. We are fools to moan when we see our wife's body, battered to pieces, in the wrecks of an express. We are fools, blasphemous fools, to weep when we gaze on the purple, blotched face of a once lovely daughter lying dead amidst the ruins of an earthquake-shaken town.

These are God's ways. They are beautiful, lovable, wise, and kind. They are divine. We know nothing can mar God's exquisite craftsmanship. Nothing can blight the beauty of his delicate and cunning artistry. Everything he does, he accomplishes so marvellously, and so full of his supernatural originality, so laden with evidences of his stupendous power is it, that we actually wonder how it happens that Freethinkers can disbelieve in him. Yes; God is in the riven ship and in the raging waters that engulf our friends; he is in the shivering town as its walls fall before the lava stream; the crash of a collision is the noise of his mighty voice; and in the demons of fire flames his eyes shine with joy.

For twenty centuries Christians have been endeavoring, sometimes feebly, sometimes strongly, to inculcate the household wisdom of try-try-try again. Nearly every individual in Britain has come under the sway of this Christian instruction. We are told dogmatically that a bad habit can easily be conquered if the Lord is on our side; a good habit can be easily acquired if God's grace is with us. Christians, by this time, should be able to experiment with the good habit of praising God joyously when their friends are done to death by God's most wonderful works. Long enough have they had the training essential to the substitution of a good characteristic for a bad one. It is strength of faith, of divine love, of the grace that is never dimmed, to recognise the kindly Father of Heaven in all his manifestations. It is weakness to weep within sight of the all-seeing eyes. For twenty centuries the omnipotency of God has been assisting Christians to be strong. For the same span of years his apostles have been helping God to help his followers to see that death, whatever the circumstances, is just a going home. And God, plus Jesus Christ, plus the Apostles, a trebly concentrated dose of omnipotency, with faith, mountain-moving faith, divine love, and wonder-working grace, thrown in, have been so weirdly successful that one is compelled to regard their beneficence with awe. For when God's hand clutches the souls of our friends, in storm, in fire, in calamities of all kinds, poor, weak human nature, despite its beliefs, its ideals, its heavenly joys, its divine assistance, still prostrates itself in grief. Tears fill our eyes; sadness and weariness our hearts; and the human mind silently denies its most cherished beliefs. In the dumbness of the aching soul of Humanity there is no God.

Human life denies the goodness of God oftener in tears than in laughter. Religion fights life; and life always wins. The hard facts of existence discredit Religion and deny its reality. The truths of life are the denials of Deity.

How long are the priests going to bolster up supernaturalism? How long deserve the accusation of hypocrisy? They know that all the so-called religious powers are useless to stay the tears and solace the hearts of Humanity. Thoroughly do they know that Christianity has been utterly and ignominiously unsuccessful in making even the religious mind decently religious. God sleeps in his heaven while Humanity suffers.

Christians are still preaching and praying and believing. Let them demonstrate their faith. When the next Transatlantic liner, chosen by God to be the tomb of thousands of his children, goes down into the cold darkness, let them prove their love of God beyond the love of their friends. They owe it to God. Let them be religionists first; and, if they must be natural, let them keep their sorrow for the blasphemous quietnesses of their own hearts. Let them rejoice publicly that they can see God in the fog, in the storm, in the lightning, in the collision. Let them sing hymns of praise that the Heavenly Father has taken their friends homewards in the strong grip of his fingers and the death embrace of his mighty arms. Their beliefs enforce such a demonstration from them; and when so magnificent an opportunity as at a time of national disaster? Let them prove that religious emotions are stronger than human emotions; let them show if human life, with its love, tenderness, solicitude and pathos, its grief and tears, its natural sorrow and inevitable suffering, can lay down its head on the bosom of God, in a sweet sleep, and smiling like a happy child, serenely free from trouble, while God's dark messenger, Death, busily reaps the waters of their burden of human suffering and anguish.

ROBERT MORELAND.

A patriarchal artist's model in Rome was known as "God the Father," because his benevolent aspect and long beard made him chosen to represent the boss of the Trinity in religious pictures. He, however, eked out his living by combining a little brigandage with his deific attributes. An American student, who had been absent from Rome for some time, missed his model, and inquired of an old friend, "Where is God the Father now?" "Alas!" replied the artist, "God the Father has been hanged." What an unfortunate family!" exclaimed the American.

"I am deeply interested in discovering the lost tribes of Israel," said Mr. Musty, as he came in and sat down by the busy editor for an hour's discussion on the subject. "So?" replied the man of resources. "Why don't you advertise for them? The business office is on the first floor. Here, Dick, show the gentleman to the advertising department."

When the notorious Lueger, whose platform was the extinction of the Jews of Vienna, was up for election as Burgomaster of that town, a poor Jew took a bribe of a couple of florins to vote for him. "God will frustrate him," said the pious Jew. "Meanwhile, I have his money."

Fond Parent (reprovingly) "You should not say, Bobby, when you have been out on your wheel, that you have had a hell of a time."

Bobby: "Why not, when I've been scorching?"

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 30 SUNDAY, JULY 26, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

This thing is God: to be man with thy might,
To go straight in the strength of thy spirit, and live out thy life in the light.
—A. C. SWINBURNE.

The Origin of Supernatural Ideas.

"Religion, as understood by the lower savage races, differs essentially from ours; nay, it is not only different, but even opposite. Thus, then, the deities are evil, not good; they may be forced into compliance with the wishes of man; they require bloody, and rejoice in human, sacrifices; they are mortal, not immortal; a part of, not the author of, nature; they are to be approached by dances rather than by prayers; and often approve what we call vice, rather than what we esteem as virtue."—SIR J. LUBBOCK, The Origin of Civilisation, p. 116.

"There presided nothing sentimental or meditative at the origin of religion, there was a stampede simply of a multitude of souls in mortal terror or hope, and no such thing as independence of thought; it is less of sentiment, properly so-called, than of sensation and of action, that religions have been born. Primitive religion was not a means of escape out of this world, a port-hole into the blue; the earliest gods were not in the least ethereal, they were possessed of solid muscles, of arms capable of dealing blows. To explain the origin of primitive beliefs by a nascent idealism, is to explain them by their precise opposite. One becomes an idealist when one is on the point of ceasing to believe."—M. J. GUYAU, The Non-Religion of the Future, pp. 41-42.

HUNDREDS of different definitions have been given of the word "religion," but a definition upon which all scholars are agreed has yet to be found; probably it never will be.

According to Schelelermacher, religion consists in the consciousness of dependence on a higher power. Hegel pricked this definition by remarking that if consciousness of dependence constituted religion, the dog would possess most religion.* Professor Ratzel, on the contrary, thinks "Religion is everywhere connected with man's craving for causality, which will ever be looking out for the cause or causer of everything that comes to pass."†

Professor Brinton defines religion as the belief that behind the activities of nature "lies the ultimate, invisible, immeasurable power of Mind," and that "man is in communication with it."‡ Herbert Spencer finds the origin of religion in ghost or ancestor-worship. Guyau holds that "religion is the outcome of an effort to explain all things—physical, metaphysical, and moral—by analogies drawn from human society, imaginatively and symbolically considered."§ The late Mr. Andrew Lang held that "The origin of a belief in God is beyond the ken of history and speculation."‖ According to Tiele, "the essence of piety, and therefore the essence of Religion, is adoration."¶

Matthew Arnold, by his definition of religion, as "Morality touched by emotion," excluded the supernatural altogether—a proceeding similar to playing Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark.

Professor Seeley applies the name of religion to "any habitual and permanent admiration." Professor Leuba truly observes of this definition that "Should we concur in this extension, it would be difficult to stop anywhere. We should have to admit almost anything which anyone may have a fancy for designating by that much-abused word"; and adds, "Since the function of words is to delimitate, one defeats the purpose of language by stretching the meaning of a word until it has lost all precision and unity of meaning." Professor Leuba defines religion as "(1) A belief in a great and superior psychic power—whether personal or not. (2) A dynamic relation—formal and organised or otherwise—between man and that Higher Power tending to the preservation, the increase, and the ennobling of life."* Professor Max Müller, in his Origin and Development of Religion, contends that religion arose from a conception of the infinite—a notion derived from his study of the highly metaphysical religions of ancient India. Mr. J. M. Robertson, dissatisfied with every existing definition of religion, claims to have deduced a definition in which—

> "there is room for every religion ever historically so-called, from Fetishism to Pantheism, and from Buddhism to Comtism, without implicit negation of any claim made for any one religion to any moral attribute, save of course that of objective truth or credibility."†

The definition runs to six clauses, and fills a whole page, which he sums up shortly as:—

> "Religion is the sum (a) of men's ideas of their relation to the imagined forces of the cosmos; (b) of their relation to each other as determined by their views of that, or by teachers who authoritatively recast those views; and (c) of the practices set up by those ideas."‡

As this definition does not exclude Atheists, it seems rather too comprehensive.

Charles Bradlaugh observed:—

> "On the whole, then, as all believers in God include in the word 'religion' some belief in a Deity, and as they certainly have a prior claim to the term, it appears to me to be wiser, franker, more honest, to avoid using an old word in a new sense, and thus to prevent the certainty of misconception on the part of those around us."§

Then, again, we have the difficulty of denying the name of religion to certain faiths of China and Japan, like Buddhism, whose founder denied God, and Confucianism, which ignores him.

Professor Frazer—whose services to science in these investigations has just been acknowledged by the title of knighthood—defines religion as the "propitiation, or conciliation, of powers superior to man, which are believed to direct and control the course of nature and of human life"‖—which is as good as any. For our part we prefer the definition of Reclus:—

> "'Religion is the feeling which falls upon man in the presence of the unknown.' Man fears and must fear the unknown, because the unknown may be dangerous and terrible, because the infinite is hidden in the unknown. Man personifies the Unknown; when his mind is strongly excited he cannot do otherwise. And that personification he seeks to propitiate."¶

That is, man fears the unknown cause of the terrifying phenomena of nature—such as the storm, the earthquake, the thunderbolt, etc.; and fashions this unknown cause in the likeness of a man; like himself, only more powerful. This origin of religion, says Professor Leuba, is "widely held." And he further remarks:—

> "'Fear begets gods,' said Lucretius. Hume concluded that 'the first ideas of religion arose.....from a concern with regard to the events of life and fears which actuate the human mind.' Among psychologists, Ribot, for instance, affirms that 'the religious sentiment is composed first of all of the emotion of fear in its different degrees, from profound terror to vague uneasiness, due to faith in an unknown, mysterious, impalpable Power.'* The fear-theory is well supported by two classes of interdependent facts observed, we are told, in every uncivilised people: (1) Evil spirits are the first to attain a certain degree of definiteness; (2) man enters into definite relations first with these evil spirits."†

Dr. Barr Mitchell, the archæologist, also observes: It is—

> "this timorous state of mind, in respect to the unexpected and unknown, so characteristic of the ordinary savage, which lies at the bottom of the religious as well as of the superstitious sentiments. This is admitted in the scriptural expression, 'the fear of God,' which all theologians and religionists recognise as the essence of piety."‡

The same writer also remarks that is a mere waste of time to attempt to define the difference between religion and superstition, seeing—

> "that there is only a difference of degree between the belief of the savage in the possession by distinct personal spirits, both good and bad, of terrestrial objects and the heavenly bodies, and that of the educated European in the universe possessed and governed by a good personal spirit, with a subordinate region in the possession and rule of a wicked spiritual being."

And instead of regarding religion as standing opposed to superstition, it would be more accurate to regard them as both opposed to the rational interpretations of science, which form the true antithesis to—

> "all the superstitions, whether existing in their original baldness among savages, and in the nurseries and lower ranks of cultured society, or among educated people, wrapped up in the traditional verbiage and sterile conventionalisms which still pervade the teaching of our schools and colleges."§

In fact, "religion" is one of the most ambiguous words in the English language. It has ten times more meanings than a cat is said to have lives. It is a significant fact that none of the great writers—since Hume—who have done most to solve the purely natural origin of supernatural ideas have used the word religion in the titles of their books. Lubbock's works are The Origin of Civilisation and Prehistoric Times; Herbert Spencer's, The Principles of Sociology; Dr. Tylor's, Primitive Culture; Professor Frazer's, The Golden Bough. Mr. J. H. King, who has written one of the best works on the subject, entitles his book The Supernatural: Its Origin, Nature, and Evolution. The term "supernatural" is a much better word than either religion or superstition, and the use of it would save an enormous amount of unprofitable wrangling and waste of time.

In reading the many works dealing with the origin of supernatural ideas, we have noticed a tendency to attribute the origin of these ideas to the same causes all over the world. We do not believe this to be the case. Man is governed by his environment, and the environment of the African Negro is very different from that of the Eskimo of the Polar regions, which in turn differs from that of the Australian Blackfellow, the North American Indian, or the Polynesian. We do not believe that all those tribes who have evolved the idea of a God did so by way of ancestor-worship, as Herbert Spencer states; although it is demonstrable that some, perhaps the majority of them, have done so.

An Easy Trade to Follow.

WHAT to do with our boys? is a question that naturally appeals to parents, although the answers given are not usually very helpful. Most of them leave out of sight the party chiefly concerned—the boy. Parents are advised to put their boys to this or that profession, as though it were just a question of a boy going into any department, drawing top salary, and reaching a position of distinction. It really depends upon the boy. If he is shrewd and methodical and far-seeing, he might do well in a commercial career. If he is of an acute, observant type, he might do well as a lawyer. Or he might have other qualities that would fit him for a scientist or a writer. It all depends on the boy. But if he is neither astute enough for commerce, logical enough for the law, smart enough for journalism, nor patient and persevering enough for science; if, on the positive side, he possesses a fair presence, glibness of speech, confidence in himself, and, while not manifesting ability in any direction in particular, shows a fondness for managing the universe in general, then it would seem safe advice to say, make a clergyman of him. There are few professions that suit such a character so well, and none that would suit him better.

Over a generation ago, George Eliot wrote of the evangelical preacher:—

> "Given a man with moderate intellect, a moral standard not higher than the average, some rhetorical affluence, a great glibness of speech, what is the career in which, without the aid of birth or money, he may most easily attain power and reputation in English society? Where is the Goshen of mediocrity in which a smattering of science and learning will pass for profound instruction, where platitudes will be accepted as wisdom, bigoted narrowness as holy zeal, unctuous egotism as God-given piety? Let such a man become an evangelical preacher; he will then find it possible to reconcile small ability with great ambition, superficial knowledge with the prestige of erudition, a middling morale with a high reputation for sanctity."

Nothing has occurred since the above was written to weaken the force of the characterisation. The pulpit still remains the place in which mediocrity may easily achieve distinction. Deficiencies that would be fatal elsewhere oppress but little there. Qualities that would be of small service, or positive disservice, out of the pulpit, are of advantage in it. A training, of a sort, is of course necessary. But once through with that, all is plain sailing. There is no need to keep oneself abreast of new facts, or to be ready to revise one's opinions in the light of new knowledge. For the clergyman, everything is arranged for him—his beliefs, his prayers, his postures. He need be under no bondage to so commonplace a thing as facts. On the contrary, it is better to treat them with a lofty disdain; to be most certain where proof is impossible, and to talk most when one knows least. All that is essential is to acquire the knack of pouring a deluge of words over a desert of ideas, and to confuse by a display of sheer verbosity. Given these things, and it is the easiest thing in the world for a clergyman to acquire a reputation. He may pose as a "mystic," simply because his ideas are misty. He may pass as a a daring thinker on the strength of questioning such absurd stories as the Virgin Birth and the Resurrection. And he may gain credit as a social reformer by mouthing vague and useless generalisations concerning the working classes. One need only bear in mind the reputations gained by men like Gipsy Smith, Dr. Horton, R. J. Campbell, or the Bishop of London. None of them would ever have been heard of out of the pulpit. They are heard of in it because the pulpit is, as George Eliot said, the Goshen of mediocrity.

Here is another passage from George Eliot that is as true now as when it was first written. The clergyman

> "has an immense advantage over all public speakers. The platform orator is subject to the criticism of groans and hisses. Counsel for the plaintiff expects the retort of counsel for the defendant. Even the scientific or literary lecturer, if he is dull or incompetent, may see the best part of his audience slip out one by one. But the preacher is completely master of the situation; no one may hiss, no one may depart. Like the writer of imaginary conversations, he may put what imbecilities he pleases into the mouths of his antagonists, and swell in triumph when he has refuted them. He may riot in gratuitous assertions, confident that no man will contradict him; he may exercise perfect free-will in logic, and insert illustrative experiences; he may give an evangelical edition of history with the inconvenient facts omitted; all this he may do certain that those of his hearers who are not sympathising are not listening."

Here, then, is a profession for which almost anyone may qualify. Short of downright imbecility, lack of intelligence is no serious obstacle. Men have been expelled from churches for thinking too much, but never for not thinking enough. And modest as the requirements of the Churches have been in the past, they are likely to make the test of intellect still less severe in the future. A little over two centuries ago there were still great men in the Churches. Life was simpler, less sophisticated; and the gulf between scientific teaching and religious doctrine less obvious. But life broadened and deepened, and men of ability turned their energies elsewhere. The Churches were left with what could be got, and had to be thankful for even that. Mediocrity in the secular world thus became genius in the Church, because the stronger and better minds could no longer rest content with its teachings. To ask for more was both dangerous and hopeless. It would, indeed, be an eye-opener to many if they had drawn up for them a list of the men of ability—men like Darwin, Froude, Stephen, and others—who were intended for the Church, but whose strength of intellect compelled them to remain outside.

The profession of a clergyman has this great recommendation: bad times are reduced to a minimum. Of course, many of the clergy get but modest incomes, but all hope for more, and, in any case, it would be difficult to find many who are getting less as clergymen than they would be getting in any other occupation. Even if there should be a "slump" in the business, and the number of parsons turn out to be greater than there are churches to fill, the prospect is not so gloomy as it appears. There is the mission-field still open; there are some very comfortable jobs, both at home and abroad. The home secretaries are very well paid, and generally, abroad, the missionaries manage to lead a very comfortable life. If a man is a failure at home he can always go abroad to convert the heathen. All that is needful is the display of a lively imagination in sending home the reports.

Or, if one does not care to leave the country, there still remains the home mission-field. Here the sphere of operation is limitless. Christian society presents no lack of material for philanthropic efforts, and the method of working is so simple and so profitable. You rent a large house, partly furnish it for yourself, and label a room or two "offices." All your expenses of food, clothing, travelling, etc., are put down to the "Mission." And after living up to anything from £500 to a £1,000 a year, you are able to come before the world as a Christian philanthropist, and entitled to ask the Freethinker where his charitable institutions are situated? So long as something is given out of the funds you are safe. You are not obtaining money under—legally—false pretences. Of all professions that of a Christian philanthropist is the most profitable. It combines the maximum of profit with the minimum of risk. The capital is found by the public. The profit is taken by the promoters. A liberal use of religious phrases disarms all criticism—except such as may be offered by Freethinkers, and their comments are hardly likely to weigh heavily with the religious public.

Above all, and this is a consideration that should have considerable weight with the average Briton, the occupation of a clergyman will provide facilities such as no other profession furnishes for giving all one does a moral flavor. In politics, some amount of courtesy towards one's opponents is considered necessary. In business, one must keep one's word if one is to succeed. In science, regard for truth is imperative. From all these fetters the pulpit delivers one. One is not even expected to be friendly and courteous towards one's opponents. To be so renders one more or less "suspect." No one seriously blames a clergyman for regarding a Freethinker, or a member of an opposing sect, as one with whom social intercourse is not to be held. His narrowness of mind will be simply put down to religious zeal, and will be so far counted to him for righteousness. No one, again, expects a clergyman to be strictly truthful in his statements concerning other people—so long as these other people do not belong to his religious world. What outsider would trust a Protestant's account of Catholics, or a Catholic's account of Protestants? What amount of condemnation from the religious world have clergymen ever received for circulating their falsehoods concerning Paine, and Ingersoll, and Bradlaugh? The nature of these falsehoods have been exposed over and over again, but what clergyman has lost status for circulating them? I know of none, and should be surprised if anyone else does. Such conduct would not be tolerated in science or in general affairs. It is excused only in the world of religion. It is the pulpit that enables a man to gratify the miserable, petty vices of a misdirected human nature by throwing over them the cloak of zeal for religion and pietistic morality.

Of course, there are certain drawbacks to the clerical life. One can get nothing in this world without paying some kind of a price for it. And, as Lord Morley says in his excellent book On Compromise—a work that forms such a satire upon much of his own career:—

> "It is no light thing to have secured a livelihood on condition of going through life masked and gagged. To be compelled week after week, and year after year, to recite the symbols of ancient faith and lift up his voice in the echoes of old hopes, with the blighting thought in his soul that the faith is a lie, and the hope no more than the folly of the crowd, to read hundreds of times in a twelvemonth with solemn unction as the inspired word of the Supreme what to him are meaningless as the Abracadabras of the conjuror in a booth; to go on to the end of his days administering to simple folk holy rites of commemoration and solace, when he has in his mind at each phrase what dupes are these simple folk, and how wearisomely counterfeit their rites; and to know through all that this is really to be the one business of his prostituted life."

Truly, no light business this to one who takes the higher and better view of life. And it is a burden that, apparently, is borne with ease by many thousands of our fellow-countrymen.

Why Not Face the Facts?

THE inability or unwillingness of Christian ministers to see things as they are is simply amazing. It is doubtless the result of constantly wearing specially colored spectacles; and it is even possible that some verily believe that what they see through them is the truth—"the truth as it is in Jesus." Mr. R. J. Campbell has more than once publicly boasted of his superior knowledge of history, particularly the history of the Christian centuries. In the very last sermon which he preached prior to his regrettable illness, from which we wish him speedy and complete recovery, and which appears in the Christian Com- monwealth for July 15, that claim is certainly belied. The object of this discourse is to enthrone Jesus as the King of mankind. In the effort to accomplish this tremendous task the preacher affects a wonderful originality. "There is a point here," he says, "to which, perhaps, your attention has never been directed before." We prick up our ears, and await the astounding revelation. Imagine our astonishment when the novel point turns out to be merely this:—

> "I mean that, humanly speaking, the appearance of our Lord Jesus Christ on earth nineteen hundred years ago actually saved civilisation and gave humanity a new start. I do not think that this is generally realised either by Christians or non-Christians."

We can assure the reverend gentleman that such a statement is not realised by non-Christians, solely because there is no truth in it. The "point" gloried in because of its unique originality is a wholly lying point. Christianity neither saved civilisation nor gave humanity a new start, and this we are prepared to demonstrate to the satisfaction of every unprejudiced person.

Let us look for a moment at the picture of Paganism painted by Mr. Campbell. "There was no real vision anywhere, life had lost point and purpose; the bottom seemed to have dropped out of existence." Now listen to the following words of wisdom from the Thoughts of Marcus Aurelius:—

> "First, do nothing at random or without a purpose. Second, let that purpose have no goal save the good of the community" (p. 117).
> "'Do little and be happy,' quoth the sage. But is it not better to do the things that are needful, whatsoever and howsoever the laws of our being, as living creatures and by nature members of one community, prescribe? For this resolve brings with it not merely the happiness of well-doing, but that of little-doing. For the vast majority of our deeds and words are aught but necessary. Eliminate these, and how much toil and trouble will vanish with them. Hence, on every occasion, let us ask ourselves, 'Is this one of the needless things?' remembering, at the same time, that it is not enough to eliminate the idle in action, but that we must purge our thoughts as thoroughly; for so only can we prevent the motiveless in deed from following in their train" (p. 27).

We might quote innumerable passages, equally relevant, from Seneca, Epictetus, and others, but we confine ourselves to Marcus Aurelius because Mr. Campbell singles him out as one of the great Stoic teachers who "were so filled with foreboding about the general tendency of things that all their thoughts were tinged with sadness and gloom." We affirm that this illustrious man did not tinge his thoughts with sadness and gloom, but dwelt serene in a centre of confident tranquillity, cherishing faith in the resources of his own nature and in those of his fellow-beings. He lived "as on a mountain," and exhorted all others to do the same. He lacked passion, but peace was his in great abundance. By the way, Mr. Campbell very naïvely gives his case away when, after alluding to the "sombre picture" of Roman life under the Antonines, furnished by Professor Samuel Dill, he observes that it is "a picture in many ways resembling the present civilised society," after two thousand years of "Jesus Christ our Lord."

Now, what did Jesus do? In his usual vague manner the preacher expatiates emotionally upon the transcendental blessings which his advent conferred upon the world. Among these are, a radiant vision of God piercing human life with a force and intensity never before known, the impartation of something worth living and dying for, the linking of the human and Divine. This is sentimentalism of the very worst type. "All would have been lost but for Jesus," exclaims the City Temple oracle, in the very teeth of the protesting facts. He must have read Dill's Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius very carelessly to have the temerity to claim it in support of his view. If he will reperuse that valuable work he will see that the trend of things in the Roman Empire from the year A.D. 70 was towards political and moral betterment, and that the author speaks of a Pagan period of "unexampled peace and prosperity, a period of upright and benevolent administration and of high public virtue." Renan tells us that during the whole of the first Antonine's reign not a drop of Roman blood, nor a drop of the blood of foreigners was shed; and he was in power for twenty-three years. Now, what happened after Christ began to don the imperial purple? Was an all round improvement initiated? The first Christian Emperor was Constantine the Great. His conversion was at best a very doubtful transaction. He embraced Christianity without completely renouncing Paganism, though he transformed the former into the religion of the State. Well, what was done to save civilisation under him? Nothing. One of the first fruits of the new order was the legalising of intolerance. Paganism received its death-knell, and the death threatened was to be by no means a natural one. Constantine himself set the example in the actual destruction of Pagan statues. He pursued a policy of bitter persecution towards Jews and heretics, and ordered the destruction of the books of the Arians immediately after the triumph of Athanasius at the Council of Nicæa; and yet, just before his death, he received baptism at the hands of an Arian bishop, which, according to Athanasius, was no baptism at all. In addition to all this, it must be recorded that Constantine was a heartless Christian criminal. On his conscience lay the burden of the murder of a son, a nephew, and a wife; and as he neared the end the dread of something after death began to grip him. What did he do? Like a madman he rushed about in all directions in search of some consolation. First of all he applied to the college of fifteen Pagan priests devoted to the services of Jupiter, Mars, and Quirinus, who calmly informed him that for such dark deeds their religious ritual knew no expiation. Then he turned to philosophy with the same heart-breaking result. At last he came across an Egyptian magician, a ladies' man about the imperial court, who comforted him with the assurance that in the Christian Church there was a special provision for purification from all crimes, however great. This magician was a Spanish bishop, Hosius by name, and this is what he said: "There are no sins so great but that in Christianity they may find forgiveness." Whether it was Hosius, Bishop of Cordova, or Sylvester, Bishop of Rome, who absolved the Emperor, is immaterial, the all-important point being that he was absolved, that his conscience became insensible under the influence of the most pernicious drug ever concocted. How long all this occurred before his decease we have no means of ascertaining. When seized with his last illness it is related that he suspected that he had been poisoned, and that he handed to the Bishop of Nicomedia a will which, on opening and discovering its contents, he placed for security in the dead Emperor's hand, where it lay till Constantius arrived and read his father's dying instructions. What followed was the massacre of six of the surviving imperial family. That is the manner in which civilisation was saved and humanity given a new start.

Then the Roman Empire gradually drifted into black chaos and red ruin. The Dark Ages set in, civilisation languished, morals coarsened, and all sorts of corruption reigned supreme. For nearly eight hundred years Christendom was held as in a vice by the evils from which it seemed utterly incapable of extricating itself. Several centuries were consumed in acrimonious theological controversies, during which thousands of lives were lost. From Constantine onwards the love of truth steadily declined, and by the tenth century, according to Dean Milman, "chastity was so rare at Rome as to be called an angelic virtue." Lecky tells us that in the sixth century "all classes seem to have been almost equally tainted with vice," the two queens Fredegonde and Brunehaut being conspicuous for their ferocity, and for the number and atrocity of their crimes. Lecky proceeds thus:—

> "We read of a Bishop named Cautinus, who had to be carried, when intoxicated, by four men from the table, who, upon the refusal of one of his priests to surrender some private property, deliberately ordered that priest to be buried alive, and who, when the victim, escaping by a happy chance from the sepulchre in which he had been immured, revealed the crime, received no greater punishment than a censure. The worst sovereigns found flatterers or agents in ecclesiastics. Fredegonde deputed two clerks to murder Childebert, and another clerk to murder Brunehaut; she caused a Bishop of Rouen to be assassinated at the altar—a Bishop and an Archdeacon being her accomplices; and she found in another Bishop, named Ægidius, one of her most devoted instruments and friends" (History of European Morals, vol. ii., pp. 336 7).

Baronius, a Catholic, and Milman, a Protestant, no less than Gibbon the Sceptic, make it abundantly evident that the Christian Church has been the perpetrator and abettor of multitudes of the worst crimes on record. It has often been, as Mr. Campbell tells us, "the one live thing," and it lived almost alone to perform acts of persecution, suppression, execution, and to wage bloody war against all of whom, for whatever reason, it disapproved.

Tess of the Woods.

THE evening was cool and quiet. A pleasant breeze played with the leaves, and from the music that lingered in rustling cadences rose the songs of birds as from a murmuring accompaniment. Overhead, through the traceries of foliage, the soft cloud-shades of summer nights were stealing the brilliancy from the blue of the sky and mellowing their appropriation. The white shafts of sunlight, alabaster columns that sloped to the swaying roof, and seemed to support it more powerfully than the tree trunks themselves, had disappeared; and around the trees were gathering, in solemn silence, the weird shadows that give the woods their grave charm, and wave invisible magic wands over human sentiment.

Religious romanticists have no difficulty, at these times, in picturing their dream God; nor is it a task for them to feel his activities in the sensuous appeals of Nature. Surely there is something more than mere material forces at work. Surely all this loveliness is not the essence, the blind result of blind circumstance. There is some spirit, some soul, something incomprehensibly divine in this. It can only emanate from God, they say. There is something behind the beauty of a star, within the loveliness of the woodland at nightfall, beyond the intense life-incipience of the pale, cold dawn. Naturalism cannot give us any satisfactory elucidation, we are told; God alone can make it clear.

Freethinkers, however, have no trouble in understanding the influence of the sensuous upon minds inoculated with the modern religious interpretations of natural phenomena; but, when reason has burned the curtain of Deism, it is sometimes hard to realise the thickness of that veil around the minds of others. For absurdities are not so few that we need to be abnormally acute of vision to observe them. The laughter of inanimate things is not so secret that we need to be particularly keen of ear to hear it. The merriment of speechless nature is not so dumb that we require genius to portray it for us. All around us there are happenings that render the claims of Religion absurd. Nature laughs continually at man's dreams of Deity. Anywhere, everywhere the assertions of Religion can only be entertained if the eyes and ears are fast closed to the facts of life; and it is, amongst other things, because Deism can envelop contradictions, denials, and absurdities in awful solemnity, and force the mind to genuflexion, that it is, mentally, a grave social danger.

Just as I entered the wood a cat leapt from a grass thicket to a bough, seized an unsuspecting thrush, and dropped. The crush of teeth on bones made a tragic epilogue to a song of joy and liberty.

The other birds sang on unheedingly, to the murmuring accompaniment of leaf music. The beauty was still as sensuously delightful, not a whit dulled by the sudden ending of a lithesome life in its midst. The clouds still trailed their white fleecy draperies across the deepening blue of the skies. One poor, happy bird had ceased to sing. One hungry cat had, after the exercise of perhaps unimaginable patience, obtained a much-needed meal.

With nature so is it with Humanity, despite all the religions in the world, despite Gods, and Christs, and Holy Ghosts.

Somehow my mind kept convoluting the little commonplace tragedy, and when I lay down, after a bit, on a bank behind a sturdy oak, to watch the color changes between its many-tinted leaves, I wondered how it was anyone could even attempt to harmonise the tragedies of nature and humanity with the popular ideas of Deity.

Voices, coming indistinctly from the distance, broke upon my wonderment. Soon I could hear the words.

"We're far enough away now. Let's sit here," said a girl.

"All right," replied the coarser voice of her companion; and from the intonation I judged he was annoyed.

"See here, Mary!" he blurted out after a short silence, "it was all a lark. You enjoyed it as much as me; and you're as much to blame as me, too. If I egged you on, you egged me on; and there the matter ends."

"But it doesn't end there at all, Will. Can't you understand that the serious side is just beginning, now that I'm beginning to understand. Besides, things are being said at home; and if it goes on I won't be able to stand it. Something's got to be done. You'll marry me, Will, won't you? Oh! you must! You must! I can't bear it all myself. I can't! You must help me, Will. I know I'm as much to blame as you; and you've told me so often."

"That's just it, Mary. You're as much to blame as me; but that's no reason for me marrying you. In fact, it's a jolly good reason why I shouldn't. What's more, I don't want to. I'm not going to bury myself yet, for you or anyone else."

"But it's harder for me, Will, much harder, and I'm ——"

"Maybe it is; but if you do enjoy a lark, and it turns out bad, you've to bear the brunt of it. You knew, as well as I did, what might happen; and if you're fool enough, well, you've just jolly well got to suffer it out."

"I know it was all a lark," sobbed the girl after a pause in the conversation. "But I was so happy at the time that I might have been sound asleep, for I didn't know what I was doing."

"You tell that to the horse marines, Mary," he said with a harsh laugh.

"You can afford to marry me, Will; you've a big enough wage; and everything will be better and easier."

"For you, not for me; but I'm not going to. I've asked some of the chaps about it, and they're of the same mind. If you suffer because of some fun, you've just got to suffer," he said, with a hard, stubborn ring in his voice. It was like the crunch of bones.

The girl wept bitterly for a while; but her grief seemed not to affect him in the least. Then he said roughly, "Come on! I'm fed up with this anyhow."

They rose, and Tess of the Woods returned on the homeward path with her unmarried husband.

My mind went back to an old literary sweetheart of mine, Tess of the d'Urbervilles, and the sadness of her life seemed to become enwoven in the gloom of the drowsy wood. I loved her, and lived with her again. My sympathies rushed out anew to warm themselves against her wronged heart. The black flag of sorrow was entangled in the dark tree-foliage over Tess of the d'Urbervilles, Tess of the Woods, and myself. Our three lives were interlinked in some mysterious way. The hearts throbbed together, and the minds were striving against the despair that robs the Deity of its value. Again I felt the strange, weird vibration of my being, the feeling that is the echo of genius, the response of sensitiveness to the call of the master mind. Again, Hardy was touching the chords of my life; and, for a moment, the ordinary individual that is myself was drawn into the sacred circle.

The moment passed; the echo of genius sighed, and faded into silence; the nerves resumed their commonplaceness; but the old thought shone out afresh in my brain, as it did, in similar circumstances, when I first read the book—whatever Hardy may have meant to imply, Tess of the d'Urbervilles, to me, is a glorious indictment of Deism, an immortal monument against the President of the Immortals, who, we are told, sported with Tess to satiation, tortured her, murdered her, and flung her beautiful body into the ugly mire of his own making. It is a magnificent denial of Deity.

Acid Drops

The head of Jesus Christ is alleged to have appeared to the congregation of a small mission hall at Llanelly. To the eyes of some it was crowned with thorns, but the preacher saw nothing of the kind, from which we see how objective it was. It was equally true, no doubt, that "many unbelievers fell on their knees." They must have been got there for the purpose. We suggest that J. C. should repeat this miracle at Westminster Abbey or St. Paul's Cathedral.

A few wills from recent newspapers. Rev. Leonard Edmund Shelford, Prebendary of St. Paul's Cathedral, left £5,469. Rev. C. E. B. Bell, of Chelford, Cheshire, left £1,419. Rev. Richard Pringle, of Stowford Rectory, Devon, left £4,591. Rev. Robert Alexander, Queen Anne-street, Dunfermline, left £3,123. Rev. George McGuffie, Blair Lodge, Stirling, left £11,334. Poor clergy!

There are at least 10,000 lepers in Russia. No wonder! It is the most pious country in Europe.

Sir George Turner, who is a specialist on the subject of leprosy, says there are about a hundred lepers in this country, only two of whom are women. Defenders of the Design Argument will explain, perhaps, this chivalry on the part of Providence.

The Church Times is strongly of opinion that the offer to bury Mr. Chamberlain in Westminster Abbey ought never to have been made, as a service such as would have accompanied the interment ought not to be performed over one who has never accepted the Christian faith. We are not without sympathy for the Church Times view, and we wish that all Christians would carry out the principle of refusing to read a Christian service over those who did not belong to them while living. Still, here is another aspect to the matter. Westminster Abbey is a national building, and if the nation decides on honoring a man by placing him there, it is almost impertinence for a Christian to object. There is more than one Freethinker in the Abbey already, and it is, after all, only a question of time for the English people to imitate the French people, and give their national heroes a civic funeral, leaving the sects to do as they please in the matter.

Rev. Conrad Noel writes exultingly in the New Weekly of what he calls "The Catholic Recovery"—that is, the growth of altar service, and the revival of a number of the cruder forms of superstition. We fancy that what he takes as signs of recovery are really symptoms of decay. It means that, as the stronger intellects leave the Churches, the less rational ones begin to exert power, and superstitions that were kept under find an opportunity for expression. The best brains of the country drift away from the Churches, and this is a chance for the "weaker brethren" to do as they please. Personally, we expect to see a still greater development along the lines indicated by Mr. Noel. And then will come the settlement of the final question—whether the control of civilisation is to be finally with the thoroughly rationalised portion of society, or is civilisation to undergo another eclipse such as occurred with the establishment of Christianity?

The New Witness for July 16 is a special military number, and the editor leads off by remarking that "all mankind has ever felt that arms are the ultimate test of a nation. And all mankind has been right." The sentiment seems to us incomplete. It should also be pointed out that the lower in the scale of civilisation the more profound is the conviction. Nations that are uncivilised see nothing wrong in the rule of the physically stronger, and nations that are only partly civilised see nothing very regrettable about it. With increased civilisation and culture, the value of the test is questioned. Then people begin to realise that the test of physical fighting is no more decisive as to the value of a nation than it is decisive as to the value of an individual. Indeed, if it comes to fighting as the test of fitness, there are plenty of animals that will beat man hollow, and humanity will have to vacate the premier position in the animal world. The truth is that Mr. Cecil Chesterton is writing rubbish — simple, unadulterated rubbish.

What Mr. Chesterton is probably muddled about is the fact that the readiness to struggle is one of the tests of a high vitality, national or individual. But that does not mean of necessity an appeal to arms. All social life involves struggle, as does all intercourse between nations. But it is only on the lower stages of culture that this readiness to struggle takes the form of an appeal to brute force—an appeal that means, not the survival of the best man, but only the survival of the strongest animal. In higher stages of culture we have the same repulsions and attractions working themselves out in a class of ideas, principles, ideals. The combative element is still there, still active, but it expresses itself in a worthier fashion. Mr. Chesterton thinks only of the lower stage, and evidently finds it difficult to conceive anything higher.

Mr. Chesterton says that if anyone wants an example of what the military spirit can do when it is still alive in a nation, we should turn to Ireland, where, in a few months, two armies have been raised. Well, what then? Is anyone insane enough to imagine that these two armies will settle the Irish question? Suppose these armies were let loose, and fought until one beat the other. Would that settle the Irish question? It would only be the Irish problem over again, with either the North or the South as the top dog. The problem in Ireland is not the raising of armies, but getting all the population to live at peace. And this cannot be done by an appeal to arms, but by an appeal to reason. Mr. Chesterton might reflect that even now nations only appeal to arms when reason fails, and the appeal to force does not mean that it is admirable; it only proves that men are not yet civilised enough to be guided by reason. That we all recognise as an unfortunate truth. But one is not paving the way for better things by a glorification of the brute, even though the brute be restrained a little by the rules of "civilised" warfare, and appears in the trappings of the modern soldier.

The insistent sea-serpent has made its welcome reappearance—in the columns of the press; the Nonconformist Daily News being in the front. Yet the sea-serpent is but a poor thing compared with Jonah's whale, who had a bed-sittingroom in its "tum-tum."

In a conversation recently with a veteran evangelist, the old preacher mentioned that Northampton was a stubborn place, for there were so many Freethinkers. He attributed this to the number of shoemakers, who are engaged in a sedentary occupation. "They have plenty of time to discuss things," he added, reflectively, "but I've always been too busy a man to think."

With one eye on the bonnets in their churches, the clergy are beginning to think there may be something said for the political equality of men and women, and the House of Convocation is favoring the voting of women. Yet according to the Word of God woman is but a side issue.

A sporting contemporary, describing a recent boxing encounter, informed its readers that one of the combatants was like a Greek "god." The resemblance was closer, we imagine, when the "god" had his nose broken, like the others in the museums. The defeated champion, presumably, was "a man of sorrows."

Mr. Thomas Tyler, speaking at the half-yearly meeting of the Southend Trades Council, said the local Education Committee was an affront to working people. The members of the Committee were chosen from the Anglican and Nonconformist Churches, with two Roman Catholics "thrown in as a make-weight. When they inquired the reason they found it due to the fact that the religious people could not trust each other." A palpable hit!

What a change there is in children's books. A generation ago all publications for juveniles were palpably pietistic, but this is no longer the case. In the Childrens' Magazine for July there is an article on Henri Bergson, and it is stated that "many people think that in the nineteenth century the wisest man, the philosopher with the widest vision and the clearest eye for guiding men onwards, was Herbert Spencer. He taught us that all things change from age to age in an orderly way, and this great, eternal process of change he called evolution, a word now famous." It is a pity that the same clarity of thought is not shown in publications for adults.

The Evening News and the Daily Mail are both screaming hysterically because the opposition press will not pay much attention to their Civil War Scare, and the former journal is quite delirious concerning "the hush-up press." Both papers have hushed up Freethought affairs for years, and it is good to find the engineers blown up with their own gunpowder.

The question of the Sunday theatre has been debated in T. P.'s Weekly, and among the latest contributors is the Rev. Stewart Headlam, who says "there is nothing wrong in seeing such acting, or acting yourself." The Rev. A. J. Waldron thinks differently, and wishes "Sunday more divinely human," whatever that may mean. Most people will have no difficulty in choosing between these two very opposite ministers.

As we expected, the Government has decided that the promised Education Bill will not be proceeded with. The immediate reason is want of time, but we imagine that behind this lies the conviction of inability to get a Bill through the House such as will satisfy the Government's supporters. A Bill that would satisfy them would most probably have to reckon with the hostility of the Irish party; it would, naturally, have against it a solid Conservative vote; and when to this is added the advocates of Secular Education and some of the Liberal M.P.'s, the Government might easily experience yet another defeat on its educational proposals. Naturally, the Nonconformists are exasperated, and are beginning to be suspicious of their having been misled, and threatening a "revolt." Well, they can only revolt by putting the Conservatives in, and that will certainly not get them what they desire. For our part, we quite welcome the Government pronouncement. It brings us a step nearer the day when even politicians will recognise that a straightforward policy of Secular Education is the only plan to end the sectarian strife once and for all.

"Viator," of the Church Times, wields an exceedingly facile pen, and his articles are always interesting, if not instructive. Indeed, the ease with which he writes often tempts him to write superficially, if not flippantly. For example, in the issue of the Church Times for July 10, he has a letter on "Podister," the Freethinker. This is a deplorably sarcastic contribution, and must be pronounced essentially unfair. He seems to take "Podister" as a typical Freethinker, who, as here described, is by no means a desirable character. In reality, he is not a typical Freethinker. We agree with "Viator" when he says that to call the personage he depicts a Freethinker "would be a grotesque perversion of language." Look at him. He has "an insular mind," so restricted that it is not capable of enlargement. He never "postulates a cause outside his own experience for an effect within his experience"; he is not God, nor much like God. He cannot appreciate the writings of Robert Browning, nor the book of Job. He honestly detests Mr. Chesterton, and God or Nature has withheld from him the faculty of imagination.

It is needless to observe that the above description is a grotesque caricature. We know intimately many hundreds of avowed Freethinkers, but "Podister" is not amongst them; nor have we conversed with anyone who has met him. We do not deny his existence, nor the possibility that "Viator" is acquainted with him. All that we aver is that he is not by any means a typical Freethinker, though it pleases this ready writer so to delineate him. Most of the Freethinkers we know are zealous students of science and history, as well as ardent lovers of literature. Browning is one of their favorite poets, and they revel in the Drama of Job. To them the whole Bible, regarded as a merely human document, is one of the most interesting and illuminating books in the world. So far are they from detesting Mr. Chesterton that they derive much entertainment and some profit from his fantastic and paradoxical writings. We beg to remind "Viator" that he, too, is not God, and knows no more about God than we do, which is NOTHING. We wish to remind him, further, that he cannot render any signal service to his own cause by putting on superior airs, and talking down to people he either deliberately or ignorantly misrepresents.

During the recent visit of the fleet to Southend-on-Sea a banner bore the pious legend, "God bless the Union." A Cockney visitor, glancing at the motto, said, "We don't get religious over our blooming workhouses."

It was reported in the press that Grigori Rasputin, "the Czar's favorite monk," had been stabbed by a woman, and the act was attributed to the old, old reason of the holy man treading the primrose path of dalliance. From later reports it appears the monk is still alive; and, if he can persuade his followers that it is his second time on earth, his fortune should be made ten times over.

According to the revivalists, it is only Freethinkers who commit suicide. A further proof to the contrary is found in the death of Miss Muriel Steward, daughter of Canon Steward, rector of Boyton, who shot herself with a rifle.

In a White Book on St. Helena it is stated that there were seven cases of flogging during 1913, one for a conviction under the Juvenile Smoking Ordinance. It is appropriate that a place in which boys who smoke are flogged should be named after a Christian saint.

"The war of pamphlets," so named by the Church Times, now being waged within the borders of the Established Church, is really becoming highly entertaining to disinterested witnesses. The warriors are high-placed clerics, from Bishops to Canons, and theological Professors; and it is perfectly amazing with what sublime ease they slay one another. Bishop Gore and Professor Bethune-Baker originated the warfare, but they were speedily put to death by Dr. Sanday and Professor Gwatkin. Then two fresh warriors, Dr. Scott Holland and Dean Strong, entered the field, and together gave his quietus to Dr. Sanday. And the end is not yet. The man in the street may ask, "What are they fighting about so fiercely?" but no one can tell him, nor do the warriors themselves know. There is not one unbiassed critic amongst them, not one who has the courage to be logical. In reality, their quarrel is over mere shadows, even Dr. Sanday's criticism being but shadow-criticism.

Dean Strong very properly says that if the story of the Resurrection could be decisively shown to be false, the affirmation of it by the Church in the Creed could not save it, and a ruinous blow would thereby be dealt at the authority of the Church as a teacher. Curiously enough, the Church Times admits that the details of the proofs are missing, and says: "We accept the Creeds because they come to us with the authority and guarantee of the Church; we do not regard them simply as deductions from Scriptures." What is this but a falling back with a vengeance upon the infallibility of the Church, which is the most unsubstantial of bubbles?

Why does the Rev. Dr. Orchard, of Enfield, persist in misrepresenting the teaching of eminent men of science? In the Christian World Pulpit for July 15, he asserts that commonsense revolts from materialistic conclusions concerning mental activities. This is at once a false and foolish statement, seeing that some of the sanest men living are Materialists. It is perfectly true that Huxley repudiated Materialism as a philosophy, but it is equally true that he described psychical processes in terms of Materialism, which proves that his philosophy was by no means a deduction from scientific facts. Possibly this partially explains his inability to become a whole-hearted advocate of Darwinism, as well as his ardent admiration of David Hume.

Dr. Orchard maintains that "distinguished psychologists, like William James in America and McDougall in England, have been compelled by their own psychical studies still to employ the term 'soul' for the organ of consciousness, the controlling power, the inmost self whose presence and operation they have to admit." Will the reverend gentleman give chapter and verse wherein Professor McDougall is compelled to employ the term "soul" in the manner described? On p. 16 of his Psychology, published two years ago, this "distinguished psychologist" says:—

> "It is no longer possible to define psychology as the science of the soul, for the notion of the soul is a speculative hypothesis, one much too vague and uncertain to be made the essential notion in the definition of a large province of natural science."

The book contains much more to the same effect. What does Dr. Orchard say to this?

Our Nonconformist contemporary, the Daily News, had a headline recently, "Streets Paved with Gold." It did not refer to heaven, but to the charges to be made for motor-'buses using public roads.

At a Salvation Army meeting at the seaside a stoker was the speaker. If he preached on "blazes," it ought not to have ended in smoke.

"The Church is at best a schoolmaster," says the Rev. Hugh Chapman, of the Savoy Chapel. If so, the teacher is weak in mathematics, for the dogma of the Trinity in Unity is a puzzle in arithmetic. Jonah's "whale" and Noah's ark should settle the question of the Church's zoology.

An entertaining note was introduced in the discussion on "The Sunday Theatre" in T.P.'s Weekly, by Mr. R. H. Fisher, Secretary of the North Liverpool Y.M.C.A., who wrote, "Man was told what to do with it [Sunday] by Him who gave it." May we remind Brother Fisher that the commandment relates to the Sabbath, and not Sunday; and that "Him" includes two gods and a ghost.

The famous negro educationalist, Dr. Booker Washington, is to visit Europe early next year, and will be welcomed by the Free Church Congress, which will be held at Leicester. In the advertisements of the approaching visit, Dr. Washington is described by Mr. Carnegie as "a Joshua and a Moses combined." What with? Japan black?

Amelie Rives, the American novelist, says that she loves England "because of the soft voices of the people." The lady has never heard our famous Christian Evidence lecturers, who shout the leaves off the trees in the parks, and frighten the park-keepers by dropping their h's.

The Primrose League, founded partly to commemorate a Jewish statesman, has for one of its objects the maintenance of the Christian religion. At Norton Fitzwarren recently the sports at a League meeting included clay-pigeon shooting, weight-guessing competitions, and skittling for a live pig. Remembering the great statesman, the promoters might have left out the last item.

According to the Christian Globe, the Rev. Stephen Swift, an evangelist, is "working for God." That fact should be sufficient to keep the Great White Throne in its place a little longer.

The authorities of the Roman Catholic Cathedral at Leeds brought an action against a local printer, named Stembridge, claiming an injunction to restrain him from disturbing them and the worshipers by the use of his machinery. Mr. Justice Warrington found for the printer. The Chapter House should not have been built in such a busy part of a city like Leeds. Peace and quiet could not reasonably be expected there. And the clergy cannot hope to rule the roost all around them as they used to do.

Mr. George R. Sims sometimes delights his readers with flashes of his old humor. Writing on the Sunday theatre question in T. P.'s Weekly, he says, "The Sunday theatre proper is only a question of time. The Sunday theatre improper we have had with us for some years past." Well said, Dagonet!

"Tell the children quite frankly," says the Christian Commonwealth, in a preliminary talk on the Bible, "that we have here a collection of legends and traditions of a great race who got nearer to God than anyone else in those days." But is this dealing frankly with the children? "Those days" can only mean the date of the Old Testament writings, and where is the evidence that the Jewish people were—even in the religious sense—"nearer to God" than many others? There is no such evidence. The Biblical God is as vengeful, as local, and as crude as the gods of other people, and in some respects falls below the higher levels attained by India, and, as we now know, in Greece, Babylon, and Egypt. The C. W. is simply advising that a comparatively safe falsehood may be told children, instead of the usual one that is decidedly dangerous. The proper thing to tell the children is that the Bible contains a collection of religious legends, such as the early history of every people supplies, and of value only so far as they illustrate the modes of thought current at the time they were written. That would be dealing honestly with the children. But what the Christian teacher wants is to impress the children with the notion that in some peculiar way the Bible is superior to, and different from, all other religious writings. And that cannot be done without taking advantage of their ignorance and helplessness.

Another writer, Mr. A. Burrell, M.A., in the Educational Record, complains that nowadays "Young England neither knows nor reads nor respects nor finds interest" in the Bible. He complains, moreover, that there is a "conspiracy of silence" in "all books on history, geography, psychology, and school method, in regard to this book. The Bible seems to be a book which must not be referred to, even distantly." We are not alive to the existence of any such conspiracy. On the contrary, the Bible receives far more than its share of attention in non-religious literature, and very much more praise than it deserves. If Mr. Burrell is merely referring to text-books on history, geography, etc., and complaining that they do not mention the Bible, one need simply inquire, Why should they? It is not the business of writers on these subjects to go out of their way to advertise the fetish-book of the Christian world. If the Bible were essential to the study of any of the subjects named by Mr. Burrell, it could not fail to get mentioned. If it is not mentioned, we may safely conclude that it is not essential. This is one of those instances that prove the logic of fact to be stronger than the logic of theory.

The Rev. A. D. Belden, of Westcliff-on-Sea, calls Calvary "one of the hills of God's joy." Is this a cruel misnomer, or is it a dark reflection on the character of God? How can the hill upon which was committed the foulest crime in all history be yet "one of the hills of God's joy"? Besides, that dark deed, that horrible murder of the only begotten Son of the Most High, occurred in fulfilment of the eternal decree of the Father himself. If he can rejoice in contemplation of what transpired upon that hill, he is indeed an Almighty Monster, in whose existence it is highest wisdom not to believe.

Mr. A. R. Hope Moncrieff, better known as "Ascott R Hope," has written an entertaining Book About Authors, in which he has some hard things to say of religious companies, "which, trading on a capital of subscriptions," have made their godliness a gain in the market, without displaying due consideration to the authors they employ. This is a further proof that religion covers a multitude of shortcomings.

The Rev. H. G. Houseman, of St. Peter's Church, Staines, has invited worshipers to attend in white boating flannels. If this sort of thing extends, church parades in England will resemble those in the South Sea Islands.

A clerical correspondent of the Yorkshire Post says the Church has "an incomparable liturgy," but it is recited by the clergy in a language "not understood of the people." We should imagine that the Athanasian Creed was "not understood" by the clergy either.

Humanitarian Christians are objecting to the hymn "There is a fountain filled with blood." They are not sufficiently numerous, however, to stop the hæmorrhage.

At Southend-on-Sea they sell sweetstuff "rock" of varying lengths. A Cockney visitor, purchasing a very long piece, said to the shopkeeper, "'Ere y'ar, guv'nor, give us the rock of ages."

"Weak in the head, though perhaps strong in the body," was Mr. Harry Lawson's description of the Post Office Department. The remark would apply equally to the Christian Churches.

B. C.—We cannot see anything worth dealing with in the Vicar of Clifton's sermon on "Rationalism," except a few passages, which are all quotations.

G. HARVEY.—The geographical dispute between Landor and Roosevelt is not for our intervention. The libel on Thomas Paine, of course, is quite another matter.

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings. The third article on "Laws Against Religious Liberty" was not published; partly on account of Mr. Foote's illness and partly because the Stewart case was not taken to the Court of Appeal. The third article cannot be written, as intended, until a more favorable occasion occurs.

SIX ATHEISTS (Liverpool).—Your and your friends' appreciation is welcome.

A. POWELL.—We have made use of your old friend's letter again.

CAPE COLONY.—Glad to hear you are trying to promote our circulation in your part of the world. It may be said that the Freethinker goes everywhere, though it is not read by everybody.

R. POPPER.—(1) Bradlaugh must have referred to Tithes somewhere in all those volumes of his paper, but we cannot give you a precise reference. (2) We did not agree with the late Edwin Johnson as to the chronology of the Christian faith and the Christian scriptures. (3) We agree that "many people would buy the Freethinker regularly if they only knew of its existence." The problem will have to be dealt with somehow.

J. PARTRIDGE.—We will write you very shortly on the matter.

Editorial.

I HAVE resolved not to be hurried, and not to begin printing my long-intended address to the Freethought party in the dog days. A very old and valued friend writes to me almost querulously. He is so disappointed at the delay. I promised to make a certain statement at the Conference, and I did not—and now I don't make it in the Freethinker—and so on. Begging my old friend's pardon,—I did make a statement at the Conference on the subject of future reorganisation. He was not able to be there to hear it. There was a discreet report of it in the paper. That will have to do till I am prepared to go further. For the rest, that subject will have to take its proper place in the contemplated address.

I am really under no obligation to anybody in these matters. I have not contracted to do anything in particular. I have said that I have some very important things to say to the Freethought party. At least I consider them so. But I have also said that there is no absolute urgency in point of time.

There was a time when I could get up at any moment and talk, or sit down at any moment and write. But I never scamped a bit of work, and I don't intend to do so now. Whatever I speak or write, it shall be the best of me.

I may begin next week as likely as not, but I am under no pledge. Everything must depend on the weather, and how I feel, and the exigencies of the paper.

Moreover there seems something like the promise of another "blasphemy" case in London, and if things take a certain turn I shall be busy enough, in all conscience.

G. W. FOOTE.

Some of the most interesting things we ever read came from the pens of non-professional writers. Common soldiers, for instance, have sent home letters from the field of battle that for vivid description of real facts,—the pathos of suffering that happened casually and was noticed in the natural course of things,—the irresistible comedy of the incongruities of tragic experience,—and the unartificial sense of the weary weight of all this unintelligible world,—throw the best war-correspondence of your Russells and Forbess into the shade. Somehow or other it is in Shakespeare, the greatest of the great, who includes everything, like Nature herself, and in Shakespeare alone among the modern poets, that one finds this very quality. He is not so much literature as life. Tennyson's noble ballad, the "Revenge," is vitiated—where it is vitiated—by this artificiality, this exaggeration, in short, this cant. But look at Shakespeare's picture of the ship-boy in that wonderful praise of sleep; one never begins to understand how wonderful it is until one has read it dozens of times. That picture was not laboriously painted, it was mentally photographed with one flash of heated imagination. The very thing is there. Shakespeare saw it. He was not a "literary gent." His was an art, to use his own language, that vied with great creative nature. Of course there is only one Shakespeare, but the pure naturalness of the spontaneously able, if unpractised pen—with unperverted feeling and intelligence behind it—which we meet with unexpectedly now and then in utterly unknown men and women—suggests to us that we have fallen upon a final proof of the Master's all-inclusive genius.

There was an English captain who went ashore with some of his men after the tremendous earthquake at Messina some years ago. On the top of several ruined buildings flung pell-mell together, people were waiting to be rescued. How many, or how much hurt, it was impossible to say, but women were in the number, and apparently some children. The sturdy captain flung up the rope himself, which was to be made fast by amateurs at the top. The whole thing might break away while the first rope-climber was in mid-air. But some cool strong person had to go up and superintend the lowering of those dangerously situated people. The captain tried the rope with a tug, and then turned to one of his men, and said "Now, Smith." That was all; simply "Now, Smith." And Smith said nothing, but just went. He might easily meet death on the way. But death may be met on any way, if you come to think of it. So Smith went. He had his captain's order. That was good enough for him. The course of a true man was to do his duty and chance the rest. And it seems to us that "Now, Smith" was one of the most eloquent speeches we ever heard of. Napoleon's under the Great Pyramid, Nelson's at Trafalgar, were hardly as heroic. The captain knows that two words are all that is necessary. It is inconceivable that Smith should disobey his captain's order; besides, Smith's a good fellow, and isn't the man to leave women and children in deadly peril without trying to save them. "Now, Smith."

Every now and then we receive a letter from which we should like to quote a good bit that most of our readers would relish, but it very often slips through, either from want of time or want of space. We have the opportunity just now, however, of quoting some excellent and interesting passages (never meant for publicity) from a letter written to our friend Mr. A. Powell by an old friend—the same that we mentioned some months ago. The writer, in thanking

Mr. Powell for recent copies of the Freethinker, took occasion to pen some criticisms and reminiscences. He appears to have know the Freethought party a long while, and at one time rather intimately.

Referring to the case of Mrs. Besant, Mr. Powell's correspondent says:—

> "The slashing editorial 'appreciation' of Mrs. Besant's very erratic career reminds me that I was present at her first appearance in London as a Freethought lecturer; it was at South Place Chapel, Finsbury—C. Watts in the chair: subject 'Civil and Religious Liberty.' All quite satisfactory, both in matter and manner. What a contrast to the present Mrs. Besant, with her many wild ideas and her theatrical make-up!"

Another incident of the long-ago was John Stuart Mill's candidature for Westminster and the part played in it by Woman Suffrage:—

> "I was present at one of his meetings. At the conclusion of his address a woman suddenly appeared on the platform, and made a passionate appeal to the audience to vote for him, because he was in favor of 'Votes for Women.' It was Mrs. Harriet Law, for some time a Freethought lecturer."

Mill lost the seat for Westminster at the next election, and the ordinary public sighed with satisfaction to see the book-writer go out and the bookseller go in. The oratory of neither counted for much in the result. "As a speaker," this correspondent says, "he was rather disappointing—an insignificant trifle as applied to the brilliant scholar, writer, and Freethinker, John Stuart Mill."

A last extract from the letter of Mr. Powell's friend's letter pays a merited compliment to Mr. Palmer's scientific articles in the Freethinker:—

> "Mr. Palmer's ably written Fauna and Flora of the British Isles ought to encourage readers to take up the interesting study. The subject is a very big one to grasp in all its many bearings."

Finally, in pointing out what he rightly concludes to be a misprint, he remarks that "the Freethinker is so carefully edited, and nearly always so carefully 'read.'"

A lady, writing from British Guiana, wants to know if the author of the Bible has answered our Bible Romances yet. Not that we know of. He is too late now. The battle is practically over.

Mr. Cohen has left home for a holiday in Cornwall. He will be away three weeks. We hope he will have a good time and pick up a lot of health. We might refer him to one of Wordsworth's poems, but we daresay the sunshine and the Atlantic air will compete successfully against the company of books—for a while.

"Have We Free Will?" is the heading of a recent notice of Mr. Cohen's Determinism or Free Will? in the Birmingham Gazette:—

> "Sir Oliver Lodge explains the troubles of man by referring them to Free Will, but, if we may credit Mr. Chapman Cohen, mankind has no Free Will worth naming; could not have; the thing, he argues, is impossible. His shilling book, entitled Determinism or Free Will? issued by the Walter Scott Publishing Co., apparently begins at the beginning of the subject, and ably and moderately pursues it to the end, in nine chapters of which one of the most interesting is devoted to a statement of the question. 'Beliefs,' we are told, 'do not usually die with the conditions that gave them birth. Society always has on hand a plentiful stock of beliefs, that are, like so many intellectual vagrants, without visible means of support. If a belief is in possession its ejection is the most difficult of operations. Possession is here not merely nine points of the law, it is often all the law that is acknowledged.' The book furnishes a concise and complete statement of the case against Free Will, concerning which Dr. Inge, Dean of St. Paul's, addressed a congress of Unitarians the other day. Whatever may be the reader's opinion at the close, it will be admitted that Mr. Cohen's book is a masterpiece in its way, by reason of its conciseness and fine literary style."

All this is true enough, but one fact should be added. Mr. Cohen's valuable and well-written little book is "issued by the Secular Society, Ltd." That is to say, it was financed by that Society—both as to the publishers and the author. And all the advertisements and announcements in the Freethinker—amongst whose readers the bulk of the book's public lie—have been given gratuitously. We took as much interest in the book as if it were our own; perhaps more so. Which is the way amongst good soldiers. For the pens of the Freethinker men are swords fighting the battle of their convictions.

The Partnerships of Plants and Animals.

THROUGHOUT the domain of organic Nature, individualism, in the strict sense of the term, is frankly impossible. No floral or faunal structure lives, or can live, alone, and many and varied are the associations of organic forms for selfish or for mutual benefit and aid. Among these innumerable vital associations almost every conceivable aspect is displayed. The dependence of flowers upon insects, and of insects upon flowers, is a biological truism. Lowly plants, such as algæ, are epizoic on animals, as, for example, those that live among the hairs of sloths. Internal and external parasites infest the bodies and structures of all animals and plants, usually to their detriment or demoralisation. Mosses, lichens, fungi, ferns, orchids, and many other organisms are epiphytic on various higher botanical growths.

The phenomena, however, with which we are about to deal are much more remarkable than any of these. Those organic associations which are covered by the term "Symbiosis" are truly among the most extraordinary phenomena which modern science has made known to men. In these cases, the organic connections lead to the advantage of each organism concerned in the partnership, and the close interdependence which characterises these unions is positively startling in its complexity.

The powers of adaptation which all progressive organisms possess appear almost limitless. And when any adaptation is favorable to the organism's well-being, it is strengthened by use and bequeathed through heredity; and that important factor in organic evolution, Natural Selection, is certain to promote its further development.

Symbiosis, or the association of separate organisms for mutual advantage, was first discovered by two philosophical botanists, Schwendener and Anton de Bary. But these organic unions are not confined to the vegetable kingdom. Not only do they exist between different plants, but they also occur between plants and animals, and even between separate species of animals. These mutual benefit associations are to be found in the simplest as well as in the most complicated states, as the succeeding examples will abundantly prove.

Naturalists were long aware of the close union which exists between hermit-crabs and sea-anemones, before any special attention was paid to the phenomenon. But now that the subject has been thoroughly investigated, another chapter has been added to life's romance. It is now known that several species of hermit-crab usually carry

> "a large sea-anemone about with them on the mollusc shell which they use as a protecting-house; indeed, two or three of these beautiful many-tentacled polyps are often attached to them, and this is not at all a matter of chance, but depends upon instinct on the part of the animals; they have the feeling of belonging to each other. If the sea-anemone be taken away from the hermit-crab and put in a distant part of the aquarium, the crab seeks about till he finds it, then seizes it with his claws and sets it on its house again.....The sea-anemone, on its part, calmly submits to the crab's manipulations—a fact surprising to anyone who is aware of the anemone's ordinarily extreme sensitiveness to contact, and knows how it immediately draws itself together on any attempt to detach it from the ground, and will often let itself be torn to pieces rather than give way."*

The wonderful manner in which the habits of the two creatures have been modified for their joint benefit is plainly evidenced by the following well-ascertained facts. Eisig, a most capable observer, and one of our leading authorities on organic partnerships, has propounded the theory that the bond of union which subsists between the anemone and the crab was evolved through the agency of Natural Selection. That the association of the two organisms is mutually advantageous has been proved by

* Professor A. Weismann, Evolution Theory, vol. i., p. 162.

Digitized by Google

Eisig himself. The benefit derived from the partnership by the polyp is sufficiently obvious, as it thereby secures the advantages of locomotion, it is to some extent protected, and it participates in the hermit-crab's meals. The real difficulty was to discover the benefits conferred upon the crustacean host by the presence of its anemone guests; but a simple observation of Eisig's at the Naples Zoological Station solved the problem completely. Eisig witnessed an encounter between an octopus and its intended prey. The octopus assailed a hermit-crab, and strove to drag it from its shell; and the assault would have proved successful but for the timely intervention of the crustacean's partners. The contest was speedily terminated by the circumstance that no sooner was the attack made than the anemone spread its stinging threads over the arm with which the octopus was striving to secure its victim, when it at once relaxed its hold and hurriedly withdrew. The threads, or acontia, of the sea-anemone are well stored with stinging-cells, which evidently cause sufficient smarting to compel a hungry octopus to abandon his crustacean repast. Thus we see that the partnership of the anemone and the crab may be of vital importance to the latter organism. The uneasiness always manifested by the crustacean when deprived of its attendant polyps needs no further explanation; in a state of nature their absence may soon prove fatal to the crab. And it is of interest to observe that the stinging organs of the anemone reach their fullest development in those species which dwell on the shells tenanted by the hermit-crabs, while in some of the solitary anemones these acontia scarcely exist at all.

Remarkable as the foregoing phenomena are, they are quite simple in comparison with another example which Weismann sets forth. In this instance the structural modifications undergone to meet the pressing necessities of life are wonderfully complex. In the Bay of Naples a very common hermit-crab dwells in the sea at a depth of about 100 feet. Its purloined mollusc shell frequently bears a small polyp on its outer side, which forms colonies composed of numerous individuals. These individual polyps have developed several distinct functions. Some are feeding creatures; others attend to the reproductive department; a third kind serve as guardians, inasmuch as they have evolved hard spines, within which the tender polyps withdraw when the waves dash roughly on the colony. These, then, minister to the well-being of the polyp group; but a fourth group of polyps has been developed which takes the form of stinging-threads, but among these mouths and tentacles are entirely absent. These aggressive polyps render no direct service to their own colony; their office is to protect the hermit-crab from the onslaught of their various enemies. From their restricted arrangement on the margin of the shell within which the crab shelters itself, it may be readily realised that they are powerless to protect their own species in moments of danger. From a position just above that from which the limbs of the hermit-crab protrude,

> "these defensive polyps stand in close array, sometimes spirally contracted, sometimes hanging loosely down over the hermit-crab like a fringe. Their function, like that of the acontia of Atinæ [sea-anemones], is to defend the crab when an enemy tries to follow it within the shelter of its domicile. This can be easily demonstrated by drawing out the hermit-crab from the Gasteropod shell and, when the colony has settled down again, seizing the shell with the forceps and drawing it slowly through the water. The water-stream which then flows upon the shell mimics the attack of an enemy, and immediately all the defensive polyps, as at a given signal, strike from above downwards, and repeat this three or four times; they are scaring off the supposed enemy."

As the preceding quotation from Weismann's great work proves, from the partnership between a crustacean and a colony of hydroid polyps has been built up a special set of organs whose sole function is the protection of the crab from injury. Of course, in guard ng their host from dangerous foes, the polyps indirectly benefit themselves, as they always appear to receive their share of his food. The association is, therefore, one of mutual advantage, which has been promoted and perfected in the struggle for existence. It is highly probable that even so involved an instance of animal partnership has been gradually evolved out of what was originally a casual connection. Many polyp colonies attach themselves to empty sea-shells, which merely stand and wait as resting-places for such settlers. Beyond their utility as points of attachment, the shells supply no further advantage. But when polyps established themselves on mollusc shells that were used as houses by moving crustacea, other phenomena naturally arose. Consequently, in the course of ages, the never-ceasing play of the incident forced upon the crab and its colonial guests slowly brought into being the beautiful and harmonious adaptations we have endeavored to describe.

The well-known instance of the association of ants with aphides—those pestilent plant-lice which prove such a plague to the gardener—may also be regarded as symbiotic. Instead of devouring the aphides, the ants wander among them on a rose-bush or other feeding plant, and gently stroke them with their antennæ until they void their excrement, which the ants suck up with infinite relish. Nor does the partnership end here. Various species of these highly intelligent insects carry aphides into their nests, and keep them there in much the same manner as we tend our milking-cows.

A curious organic partnership exists between yellow sea-anemones found on the coral islands of Batavia and small gaily colored fishes. These fishes flourish among the forests of sea-anemones, and while within these sanctuaries the fish are practically immune to the attacks of their various enemies. These phenomena have been carefully observed in the aquarium. When provided with its anemone partners, the fish

> "swims blithely about among the tentacles, and the sea-anemone does not sting it; for there has been a modification on its part as well as on that of the fish. The advantage it gains from the fish is that the latter brings large morsels of food—in the aquarium, pieces of meat—into the anemone's mouth. In doing so it tears away fibres for itself, and, even if the Actinia has swallowed pieces too quickly, the fish pulls them half out of the gullet again, and only relinquishes them to be consumed by its partner when it has satisfied its own appetite."

In the foregoing case, as in the others, the animal union must have been the result of a quite accidental association of the two organisms in the first instance. That the anemone does not now use its stinging organs against its finny partner cannot be held to prove that it did not do so originally. But the originally truculent attitude of the anemone—and all aggressive acts are more or less the outcome of irritability—would become softened and subdued as it gradually associated the presence of the fish with the prospect of a meal. This consideration is strengthened by the researches of Plate, who has discovered several other cases of a similar character among the organisms of the Red Sea. In one of these a little fish lives alongside an anemone, which assails it with its stings; but the fish is apparently immune to these attacks, which it treats with the utmost unconcern. Again, another fish passes its life unharmed in the presence of the powerful poison "secreted by sea-urchins of the genus Diadema from the points of their spines among which those fishes live." These last examples are not true cases of symbiosis, but they powerfully illustrate the processes involved in the evolution of organic partnerships.

A most astonishing instance of symbiosis, in which the two partners are plants and animals, was established by the researches of Belt, Fritz Müller, and Schimper. In the forests of tropical America are candelabra trees, species of the genus Cecropia, so named because their bare branches spread out like candelabra, and produce small groups of leaves at their extreme ends only. These singular leaves are menaced by the formidable leaf-cutting ants, who pile up foliage in their nests, upon the decaying matter of which fungi—for which these ants have an intense fondness—quickly grow. These ants are so numerous and destructive that they are terrible enemies to the tropical vegetation. Now, the candelabra tree defends itself from these marauders through its amicable relationship with ants of another species that live in its hollow stem and feed on its sap. Placed here and there on the tree's stem are tiny pits, through which the female ant can easily pierce her way into the hollow interior.

Science and Theology.

I HAVE always been interested in calling attention to the difference between science and theology: Science limits its activities to the visible; theology is always coquetting with the invisible. There can be no science where there is no light; and there can be no theology where there is light. When a mine explodes and we are in the dark as to how the thing happened, we call it an accident. The word accident, or chance, represents not our knowledge but our ignorance. Not knowing the cause of the explosion we invent the word chance to explain it, but as soon as we discover by study and research the cause which blew up the mine then we cease to explain it by calling it an accident. The word God, like the word chance, represents our ignorance. When we do not know who made this or who made that we say, God made it. When we cannot answer a question we say, "God knows," which really means that nobody knows. The words "God" and "chance" are the frontiers or the boundaries of human knowledge. Beyond the line of knowledge lies the unknown, and that is chance, accident—God!

By the help of science the boundary lines are being constantly extended—that is to say, the territory allowed to God and chance is being encroached upon steadily. As our knowledge increases the word chance and God are less frequently used. When everybody was uninformed and there was no science, chance and God were very much more in evidence, but as science extends its empire these symbols of the times of our ignorance slowly slip out of our vocabulary. Once upon a time we could not explain the weather without a reference to the Deity, but now we rarely use his name to account for the weather. Few preachers pray for rain or cold now. Science has explained to us the laws which govern the atmospheric movements.

It is this increasing illumination which alarms the theologian. The progress of knowledge compels him to look for some spot in the universe still dark—some cave, some thick bush, which he may still regard as the dwelling-place of the Unknown. He guards with zeal and jealousy every new darkness until advancing science compels him to seek a newer darkness. In vain he warns science from his latest retreat; in vain he calls it "holy ground"; in vain he invokes anathema, and hurls epithets at science. Slowly but surely the rising sun of knowledge compels him to move again. Science has made a tramp of the theologian. As each dark place becomes lighted up the theologian packs up his effects to move to the next darkness. —M. M. MANGASARIAN.

Christian Apologetics.

X.—THOMAS COOPER (No. 2).

IN his fourth chapter on "the Verity" of the Gospel miracles our "lecturer on Christianity," Thomas Cooper, reopens the discussion by saying:—

> "It is a remarkable fact that the earliest foes of Christianity did not question the reality of the miracles of Christ. In the second century, Celsus, a physician, wrote a book against Christianity; but we learn from Origen, who replied to his treatise, that Celsus threw no discredit on the fact of Christ's miracles. In the third century, Porphyry, a Platonic philosopher, wrote a book against Christianity; but the fragments of his work, preserved by Eusebius and Jerome, show that he did not deny the reality of Christ's miracles. In the fourth century, the Emperor Julian wrote a book against Christianity; his reasonings are preserved by Cyril; but neither did he call the miracles in question."

This statement is correct; not one of the opponents named did actually question the performance of the Gospel miracles. And the reasons for this have been already stated. In the age in which these opponents lived, the working of miracles was believed to be possible either by magic or by the aid of invisible demons. In that age, too, it was impossible to investigate the alleged performance of miracles so many years before. The opponents were not in a position to deny that those wonders had been wrought, as recorded; but all three asserted that they had not been worked by the power of God. Our lecturer admits the latter fact; but he says: "If anyone were to tell us that Christ performed His miracles by magic or the agency of demons, in our day, some of us might be inclined to give the reply, Tell that to the Marines." I really cannot see the force of this observation; for no unbeliever "in our day" lives in a period of such dense ignorance and mental darkness as prevailed in the days of the opponents named. Mr. Cooper next turns his attention to a book which, he says, "is deemed by some to be the most complete and triumphant refutation of the truth of Christianity ever published"—which book is entitled Supernatural Religion. He says:—

> "The anonymous author of this book maintains that the first followers of Christ undoubtedly shared, with their contemporaries, the prevalent belief in magic, the common slavery to superstition—and that, therefore, their low, ignorant, and grovelling character renders their recital of Christ's miracles unworthy of the regard and belief of people living in this enlightened nineteenth century."

I have no space here to question the partial statement respecting "the most complete and triumphant refutation of the truth of Christianity"; but assuming it to be correct, I reproduce our lecturer's reply to the charge. This is—

> "to remind this anonymous author that the elevated character of the miracles attributed to the Savior, and, still more, Christ's own elevated character, remove these records entirely out of the region of ignorant, low, unreasoning superstition.....If the evangelists were poor, low, credulous, and unreasoning creatures, how is it that they soar above all other writers, in drawing a portrait of such moral perfection, beauty, and dignity, as that of their Master?"

"This difficulty," our lecturer says, "has been so nobly expressed and presented by Prebendary Row," that he quotes two pages of those "nobly expressed" words, and then tacitly assumes that the contention of the author of Supernatural Religion has been refuted.

Now, as to the "elevated character" of the miracles attributed to the Savior, all that need be said is—that they are miracles of healing, suggested to the primitive Gospel-maker by the following passage:—

> Isaiah xxxv. 4—6.—"Behold your God will come with vengeance.....he will come and save you. Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb shall sing."

This is metaphorical language, indicating the joy of Hebrew captives at returning to Jerusalem (see verse 10), but was understood by the primitive Gospel-makers literally; hence the narration of miracles of healing. It is one of the two passages to which Jesus is represented as appealing in proof of his messiahship (Matt. xi. 4—6); the other, relating to the preaching of the Gospel, is quoted in Luke iv. 16—21. It is almost needless to say that neither of the two passages had the smallest reference to Jesus.

Next, as to the four evangelists being "credulous and unreasoning creatures." In the first place, then, the fact that all four Gospel-writers have represented Jesus Christ as fulfilling Old Testament "prophecies," which had no reference to him at all, proves that they were either very ignorant and unreasoning men, or that they deliberately perpetrated a series of frauds; they must have been one or the other.

In the next place, these evangelists all believed —as did the common people—that epilepsy, madness, and many other infirmities were caused by demoniacal possession; and they have represented their Savior as casting out the "evil spirits" and restoring the demoniacs to perfect health. They also describe Jesus as speaking to the demons as real beings, and as giving his disciples "authority over unclean spirits, to cast them out." Moreover, "the unclean spirits" in many cases "fell down before him, and cried saying, Thou art the Son of God" (Mark iii. 11). Knowing, as we do, that this belief of the apostolic age was a delusion shared by all the evangelists, there is not the shadow of a doubt that "their records of Christ's miracles" are "unworthy of the regard and belief of people of the enlightened nineteenth century."

If we require further evidence of the unreasoning credulity of the Gospel-writers, we need only turn to their accounts of the following fictions: the angel Gabriel and Mary the virgin, the priest Zachariah and the angel, Joseph the carpenter and his dreams, the Magi and the star, the "heavenly host" singing "peace on earth," the baptism of Jesus with its dove and voice from heaven, the encounter between Jesus and the Devil, the transfiguration of Jesus in the presence of the resurrected Moses and Elijah, the turning of water into wine, the angel at the pool of Bethesda, the raising of Lazarus, besides many other examples. It should further be stated that all the Gospel wonders were simply matters of belief; no evidence has ever been produced for the occurrence of any of them.

I come now to the "elevated character" and "moral perfection, beauty, and dignity" of the Savior, as portrayed in the Gospels. And here I must say that there is no such portrait of Jesus to be found in the Gospels. The alleged "elevation of character" and "moral perfection" are simply assumed or read into the narratives; the Jesus of the Gospels is a very ordinary personage indeed. It would take many pages to go into this subject fully: here I can only find space for a brief reference to a few salient points.

1. The Christian Savior, according to the Gospels, was an unmarried Jew who wandered about the country, for a year or more, without following any trade or occupation, and having no ostensible means of livelihood. He was accompanied by twelve disciples, besides a number of women who "ministered unto him of their substance" (Luke viii. 2, 3; Mark xv. 40, 41). Apart from the last-named contributions towards his support, this Savior and his disciples were dependent for food and lodging upon the few well-to-do people in the places he visited. When, for a short time, he sent his disciples out to preach, he commanded them to take neither money nor changes of raiment with them, and promised to punish the people of every city who did not receive them favorably (Matt. x. 5—15). Where, I ask, does the "elevated character" or the "moral perfection" come in here? Is the doing no work and living on the liberality of others a sign of elevation of character?

2. In all three Synoptics it is recorded that, upon one occasion, the mother and brethren of Jesus desired to speak with him, but could not come near him on account of the press. Did Jesus, when informed of their presence, make his way to the edge of the crowd and welcome them? Certainly not; his character was of far too elevated a nature to permit him to descend to such a commonplace action. Instead of which, he looked round upon the multitude and said: "Who is my mother and my brethren? .....Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother" (Mark iii. 31—35). Comment upon the "moral perfection" of such a teacher is unnecessary.

3. In Luke ix. 59—62 it is recorded:—

> "And Jesus said unto another, Follow me. But he said, Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. But Jesus said unto him, Leave the dead to bury their own dead.....And another said unto him, I will follow thee, Lord; but first suffer me to bid farewell to them that are at my house. But Jesus said unto him, No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God."

Here the "elevation" of character ascribed to the Savior lacks simple common sense; a more suitable word to describe his action would be "stupidity" or "wrong-headedness."

4. Upon one occasion, when Jesus was asked to dine in the house of a Pharisee, that Savior took advantage of the invitation to inveigh against the Pharisees as a sect, and then launched out in a style peculiarly his own in condemning their alleged shortcomings—"Woe unto you Pharisees," etc. (Luke xi. 37—44). If this kind of conduct towards a host by one treated as an honored guest be a mark of "elevation of character," then no one can deny that the Gospel Jesus possessed it in abundance. The same "moral perfection" is still more beautifully shown in Matt. xxiii.—the whole chapter being one long denunciation of the alleged hypocrisy of the "scribes and Pharisees." In this chapter the "elevated character of the Savior" can be plainly perceived by exalted expressions like the following: "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites"—"Ye serpents, ye offspring of vipers, how shall ye escape the judgment of hell?" Christian advocates tell us that the evil doings ascribed to the "scribes and Pharisees" in this chapter were true; but this statement is a slander unsupported by evidence of any kind. As a fair specimen of the Pharisees of the apostolic age we may take the historian Josephus.

5. In two of the Gospels Jesus is represented as saying to men skilled in the interpretation of the Jewish Law:—

> "Woe unto you lawyers! for ye build the tombs of the prophets, and your fathers killed them. So ye are witnesses and consent unto the works of your fathers. .....Therefore also said the wisdom of God.....the blood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the world may be required of this generation.....Yea, it shall be required of this generation" (Luke xi. 47—51).

This is truly a most edifying example of the "moral perfection" of the Savior, as well as of his high sense of justice.

Here I must pause, though I have not noticed half the passages I had selected as clearly proving the arbitrary, capricious, or irrational character of the Christian Savior, who, furthermore, reposed implicit faith in all the stories recorded in the Old Testament —Jonah and the whale—the Genesis account of creation—Cain and Abel—the Deluge—the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah by fire from heaven—Lot's wife a pillar of salt—Moses the author of the Pentateuch, and David of the Psalms—the historicity of the book of Daniel, etc. This Savior, like the evangelists, believed in demoniacal possession, and though he had no knowledge of the cause of any disease, essayed to cure every kind by merely speaking the word. He also believed that the god Yahweh fed the ravens, took care of the sparrows, counted the hairs of people's heads, and appointed guardian angels for little children. He taught that it was a blessing to be poor or meek, but a great calamity to be rich; that no rich man could go to heaven unless he gave all his goods to the poor, and left himself penniless; that one should allow oneself to be robbed or plundered rather than resist or prosecute the despoiler; and so on, and so forth.

We are asked to believe that the amazing ignorance, wrong-headedness, and credulity which characterise both the sayings and doings of the Christian Savior, are of such an elevated nature, and exhibit such moral perfection, that no one of the present day can ever hope to equal, much less to surpass.

The rest of Mr. Cooper's book I leave to the next.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: Miss E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Freedom of Thought.

PROFESSOR BURY'S little History of Freedom of Thought has seriously annoyed the Christian world. His offence has been, apparently, that he not only put in a plea for freedom of thought—he was not content with pointing out in an amiably vague manner how often it has been curtailed or denied—but he plainly indicated that Christianity had been the arch-offender in this direction. Had he been content with placing the Roman Church in the pillory, Protestants would not have complained. Had he even blamed Protestants for what some people foolishly call unchristian intolerance — as though any genuine Christianity could be tolerant—he might have been forgiven. But he managed to make it fairly clear that the Christian religion itself was intolerant, that its control of the world meant a set-back to the freedom that existed before it appeared, that there was, indeed, a deeply seated antagonism between the Christian faith in all its forms and freedom of thought. And that was unforgivable. Consequently, as he could not be ignored, he has been denounced. It is still far from common for public men in England to speak out plainly with regard to Christianity, and when one does so, Christians resent it. There is no telling where such an example may end. Other public men may be tempted; and if they all were to say what they think, the outlook for the Churches would be black indeed.

The latest reply to Professor Bury occurs in the July issue of the British Review, and is by Mr. J. G Vance. He says that Professor Bury has written a "preposterous" History of Freedom of Thought, and so he sets out to supply a corrective. Minds of an "unrefined and misshapen calibre," he tells us, rejoice in sharp contrasts, and in this case it is supplied by placing freedom of thought in one category and Christianity in another. But this, according to Mr. Vance, is quite wrong. He does not face the position that, as a matter of fact, Christianity always has been in opposition to freedom of thought, and so general and so universal a fact certainly calls for some explanation. He thinks you may get to the heart of the matter by settling the question, "What does or what can freedom of thought mean?" And so you might if the question were properly handled. Mr. Vance's plan is to argue that it is a shibboleth in theory, a fiction in actual life. It does not exist, unless one means by it freedom from reason.

Presumably, says Mr. Vance, freedom of thought,—

> "is supposed to offer some parallel to freedom of the will, which simply implies that the stimuli presented to the will as motives are not, of themselves, necessarily sufficient to force the will to act. Pursuing the analogy, we should be led to believe that thought is free in the sense that no stimulus is sufficient to force us to think or to reason in a particular way; that we can pick and choose, think or reason as we will, just as we select the alternative of our preference in free-will acts."

Of course, it is quite natural that one who does believe in such a psychological absurdity as the "will" picking and choosing between motives, and still remaining uninfluenced by all, should credit others with believing that "we" can think and arrive at conclusions without allowing the conditions of our thinking to play a determining part. Still, it is quite wrong. When the Freethinker speaks of freedom of thought, he means freedom of thought, neither more nor less. He does not mean the absence of determining conditions; he does not mean that he can reason and draw conclusions irrespective of the facts presented, or the influence of training, capacity, and environment. He knows quite well that all these things have their share in determining his thinking, and that between them and his conclusions there exists a relation of cause and effect. Mr. Vance writes that "by freedom in inference we mean the breaking away from the fixed laws of reasoning." On the contrary, by freedom in inference the Freethinker means allowing reason to proceed along its natural lines of determination. You cannot escape the laws of reasoning in any case. They would not be "laws" if you could. But you can allow these laws to express themselves in a legitimate or an illegitimate manner.

What, then, is the legitimate meaning of freedom of thought? One might reply by asking another question—What is meant by "freedom" when applied to any natural force? A force in nature may act in freedom, or it may operate under control. In the first case, can we properly say that it operates at random, or, as Mr. Vance says of inference, that it breaks away from the fixed laws of that particular force? Certainly not. By operating in freedom, we mean that it follows the conditions of its own being, and is not coerced, or deflected, by the operation of other forces. In the second instance where a force is not free, we do not mean that the "laws" of that particular force have ceased to operate: that would be a sheer impossibility. But it operates under coercion. It is deflected from the course it would have pursued because another influence has been brought to bear upon it. The result is not a breaking away from "fixed laws," but a product which represents the "laws" of that particular force, plus the "laws" of the other force or forces acting upon it.

Now, exactly the same principle holds good of thought. Whether free or unfree, there are always certain fixed laws that are in operation. If I say that I will not walk half-a-dozen times the length of my garden because I do not care for the exercise, there is an orderly sequence of ideas running through my mind. If I say that I will not do so because my neighbor is leaning over the wall, armed with a revolver, and threatens to shoot me if I come out, there is also an orderly sequence of ideas in my mind. Yet in the one case I should call my decision a "free" one; in the other case everyone would agree that my decision was not free. Consequently, what the Freethinker means by freedom of thought, or its absence, is this: our thought is free when it is allowed to move from premises to conclusions so determined that it can follow the "laws" of its being. It is not free when the conclusion reached is brought about by outside pressure that is deliberately applied with the intention of inducing bias. It is not the absence of "law," but the absence of coercion, that makes for thought freedom, as it makes for bodily freedom.

If Mr. Vance had considered the subject from this point of view, his article would never have been written, and he would have been saved the trouble of elaborating what should have been obvious to a schoolboy. It is quite true that the "rationalist possesses no privilege or power, no insight or method, no secret mysteries concerning truth or knowledge, which are not known to the Christian." Quite so; and, on the other hand, the Christian possesses no privilege or power, or insight or method, that is not known to the Rationalist. But it is not true that the thought of the Christian is "free" as is that of the Freethinker. His conclusions are determined by facts or considerations that do not belong to the subject before him. His mind is deflected from its true course by the operation of a bias that has been created with the deliberate intention of preventing him seeing the facts in their true light. As Mr. Vance says, the professor of dogma and the lecturer on physics all follow the same laws; but in the one case the laws of reasoning are operating free from restraint, in the other they operate under coercion. Certainly, also, many Christians yield to none in the vigor of their thinking; it is not, however, the vigor of the thinking, but its accuracy, that is of primary importance.

Mr. Vance appeals to history; let me follow suit. What stood in the way of the acceptance of the Copernican astronomy? The facts were there alike for all. Many, however, declined to look at the facts; others who did look failed to perceive their significance. To-day there is no alteration in the facts, and a schoolboy is able to appreciate the reasoning on which the Copernican system is based. Whence the difference in the situation? It lies wholly here. Those who declined to examine the facts did so because their religious training made them afraid to do so. Either they feared they might be led to doubt the teachings of the Church, or the establishment of a bias through religion closed their minds to all processes of proof in other directions. In either case the thought was not free. It still worked under the determination of all incident conditions, but amongst those conditions was the distorting and extraneous one of Church pressure and religious teaching.

At a much later date we have the same principle illustrated in the opposition to the doctrine of Evolution. The essential conditions here were the facts of animal life and the human mind. Any conclusion reached through the interplay of these two factors —whether favorable or unfavorable to Evolution— would have been "free." But between these two essential factors Christianity introduced another, and a non-essential one. It told people that it was wrong to draw certain inferences from the facts presented, because to do so would be to reach a conclusion contrary to religious teaching. And it is the plainest of truths that multitudes of people were prevented fairly facing the facts by the religious bias thus introduced. Under these conditions, the mind operated under the clear influence of bias. It was exactly like a gambler playing with loaded dice. The dice never cease to illustrate the laws of gravity, but their manufacture forces a manifestation of gravity in a special direction.

There lies in the nature of the case, says Mr. Vance, "no reason why a Christian scholar or student should not conduct a thoroughly scientific or dispassionate inquiry into any question of philosophy or natural science." On the contrary, there are dozens of reasons why he should not do so. The average Christian brings to the study of a whole host of problems a mind that is already biased in favor of a conclusion that will be agreeable to his religion. If he is genuinely orthodox, he is already convinced that his own salvation, and the salvation of others, depends upon certain teachings being accepted as true. And human nature being what it is, there is set up an almost irresistible tendency to ignore things that should not be ignored, and to reject conclusions for no better reason than that they conflict with established prejudices. To conduct a "dispassionate inquiry" on anything that has a direct bearing on his religion, a Christian must overcome the bias of his whole training. He must forget that he is a Christian; and the man who can forget that in theory soon becomes one in fact.

C. COHEN.

Palpable Absurdities.

A BRILLIANT new preacher is said to have suddenly arisen in the Nonconformist world, whose praises are being loudly sung these weeks in the religious press. Mr. Nathaniel Micklem is a distinguished graduate of Oxford, and it is confidently predicted that he "will take his place among the great preachers of England." Great preachers are few and far between; but whenever one appears he has no lack of followers. It is the gifted man, the born speaker, not Jesus Christ, who draws crowds to church or chapel. Mr. Micklem seems to possess all the requisites of a popular pulpiteer. But we are more concerned with his teaching than with his qualifications for gaining the ears of the public; and in order to ascertain what his interpretation of Christianity is we only need to consult a sermon which he recently delivered at Dr. Horton's church, entitled "Grace, Faith, Salvation," and which appeared in the Christian World Pulpit for July 23. Having perused this discourse with special care, we are prepared to deal with it from the point of view of criticism. He is described as having a style peculiarly his own, and "a quite distinctive outlook." Indeed, we are informed that "the stars in their courses have fought to give him an early and wide reputation." In our estimation, his distinction lies in the specially heavy emphasis which he lays upon the most irrational and absurd aspects of the Christian Gospel. Founding his address upon St. Paul's words, "By grace have ye been saved through faith," he states that by "grace" is meant "the sheer goodness of God." "Sheer" is a splendid and most audacious adjective, signifying pure, bright, unmixed, absolute, downright, utter, and might very properly have been used by the preacher as an intensive expletive; and we naturally ask, Where does this sheer goodness of God show itself? Taking the existing conditions, as well as the history, of the world into consideration, we are face to face with the inevitable conclusion that, if there be a God, he is utterly devoid either of goodness or of power. If he has "sheer goodness," he must be cursed with sheer impotence. Dare Mr. Micklem aver that even Christendom can be regarded as a credit to a God of "sheer goodness"? It is easy enough to weave pretty parables about the loving Father extending the warmest of welcomes to the returning prodigal; but staring us in the face all the time are the hard, frightful facts of life, which bear absolutely no witness to "the sheer goodness of God." If the Gospel story is true, Mr. Micklem's statement of it sets the facts in the very worst light possible. Here are his words:—

> "The grace of God by which, according to St. Paul, we are saved is the sheer goodness of God, and that is of course a very central point for Christian theology—that in the first instance we are not saved by our love to God but by his love to us; not by our striving after him but by his yearning after us; not by the closeness with which we may succeed in clinging to him but because he cleaves to us more closely than a brother. A writer said, 'Oh Love that will not let me go,'—that is the grace of God in the New Testament."

We frankly admit that the above definition of grace is a legitimate inference from St. Paul's teaching. Many modern preachers declare that God can do nothing in the absence of faith, saying that unbelief is the only sin that damns the soul, and their declaration is fully justified by the Epistle to the Hebrews. "If you are lost," the impenitent sinner is warned, "it is your own fault. The moment you believe in Christ you shall be delivered from all condemnation." But that is not the Pauline Gospel. The verse, part of which Mr. Micklem utilised as his text, reads thus:—

> "By grace have ye been saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God" (Eph. ii. 8).

Thus salvation is wholly God's gift. Faith is also a Divine gift. In Eph. vi. 23, St. Paul says: "Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith, from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." It is, indeed, beyond dispute that Mr. Micklem only puts his own emphasis on a purely Pauline doctrine, which emphasis, however, brings into full relief its inherent absurdity.

At this point we drop upon a fatal contradiction in Mr. Micklem's sermon. He seems to forget that he has just assured us that we are not saved by our clinging to God but by his cleaving to us, and proceeds thus:—

> "It is only as we give ourselves to God, that God is able to give himself to us, and this life, which I must call a supernatural life, which is the life of salvation, of deliverance from self, can only be given to us as we are willing to receive it, as we make that utter surrender of our own wills to God."

This fundamental contradiction, into which most preachers fall, reveals to us the essential irrationality of the Gospel message. On the one hand, we have infinite, omnipotent love yearning after a lost race, and clinging to it with a closeness unspeakably more tenacious than that of any brother; and on the other, man's finite and weak personality successfully resisting or gladly yielding to the Divine drawing at will. In other words, God's omnipotence has to bow and bend to man's feeble will. Jesus, the Savior of the world, says: "No man can come unto me, except the Father which sent me draw him" (John vi. 44). The loving Heavenly Father, the Sovereign of the Universe, doing "according to his will in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth," sadly confesses: "But I can draw no man unless he actively wishes to be drawn." Where and how the Holy Ghost comes in, it is not at all clear; but here are two Divine Beings, brimming over with tender compassion, both willing and able to save the lost, if the lost would only be good enough to allow themselves to be saved. Instead of "the sheer goodness of God," what we have here is the sheerest nonsense talked about, and usually in the name of, a being who never expresses either approval or disapproval, either praise or blame; that is, a being who has never intimated, either directly or indirectly, that he exists.

"God has never spoken, or in any way shown himself," cried the Freethinker. "O yes he has," answered the Christian; "he has spoken to me." "What did he say to you?" "He told me that my sins were all forgiven, and that a fully furnished mansion is waiting for me in the skies." As Mr. Micklem was speaking about God's great personal love and ability to save he said he knew that there were men and women in Dr. Horton's church who were anxious to get up and say in the loudest voice, "I know he can do it; he did it for me." The preacher said that this was a fact that he could not get away from; but we positively object to its being spoken of as a fact. We are convinced that such an assertion is founded on a pure hallucination, just as the experiences of a dream are. We offer no objection to the statement that the sense of being lost, as well as the sense of being saved, is a thing to which we cannot attain in our natural state. It implies a condition of abnormality to which people must be artificially worked up. Religious experiences and exercises represent the extraordinary behavior of abnormal men and women. The so-called spiritual life, which Mr. Micklem is impelled to characterise as "a supernatural life," is dream-life, a life which depends entirely upon the possession of certain supernatural ideas and beliefs, in the absence of which it is never experienced. We prefer to think of it as anti-natural. God, like King Arthur, is a being on whom you can lay hold only by faith. It is impossible to know, you can only imagine, him. Sin is an imaginary transgression of the imaginary laws of this imaginary Deity, and salvation is a purely imaginary deliverance from the consequences of an imaginary offence. Hence, religion is an affair of the emotions when under the dominion of a misguided fancy, and Mr. Micklem cannot prove that it is anything better. Instead of attacking such an impossible task, he chooses to rant about the mighty things Christ has done for our Western civilisation. Well, then, what has Christ done for Europe? He has converted it into an armed camp. He has put class against class, party against party, Catholic against Protestant, and Protestant against Catholic. Most of our worries, troubles, misunderstandings, wranglings, and warfares have their origin in religion. If Christ has done anything at all in Europe he must be held directly responsible for all these evils. We have no patience with a man who wildly asserts that "a great number of people in England who say that they owe nothing to Christ, that they can get on without him, have been saved by Christ already," or "that in a degree he has already saved those who deny his name." Does the reverend gentleman number Atheists among the ransomed of the Lord? Are Rationalists heirs to an immortality in the reality of which they do not believe? Does Christ manufacture blasphemers against his own cause whom his avowed disciples take pleasure in casting into prisons and variously tormenting? Does not Mr. Micklem realise how perfectly idiotic such a claim really is?

After all, this "born preacher, with a style of his own and a quite distinctive outlook," belongs to the same general school as all his brethren, a fact abundantly illustrated by the following statement: "There is all the difference in the world between a gentleman and a Christian." That is the finest sentence ever composed, and the truest. We will commit it to memory and repeat it daily. A gentleman is not a Christian, neither is a Christian a gentleman: there is all the difference in the world between the two. Gentlemen, whom Christ has already saved, are not in consequence Christians, and though saved by Christ himself are not saved "in the Christian sense." Verily Christ is an extraordinary Savior. Gentlemen are "members of the highest civilisation," and possess "a spiritual philosophy, a high morality, kindly hearts, and elegant manners." And Christians are not gentlemen: there is all the difference in the world between the two types. We prefer gentlemen, but minus "a spiritual philosophy."

"The Ultimate Goal."

IT is the habit of many modern thinkers to base systems of philosophic idealism upon effective catch-phrases which will not bear even the slightest investigation. I have chosen for my title one of the most prevalent of these catch-phrases—"The Ultimate Goal." The necessity for such a phrase springs, I imagine, from what Mr. Chesterton has termed "fear of the present," for it is obvious that an "ultimate goal" is part and parcel of a problematical future of which we can know nothing, and panders to our modern dislike of facing the uncomfortable truths with which we are in immediate contact.

Where, either in the realm of philosophy, sociology, science, or theology, is to be found an adequate, definite, final, and satisfactory conception of "the ultimate goal"? Does not science with philosophy deny the possibility of such a concept? Has not theology become reactionary by reiterating to the contrary?

Digitized by Google

What universal truth has been evolved from the agonies of the human mind throughout the ages? Something certain and beyond dispute. What has modern philosophy, modern science, and modern theology to offer the seeker after truth to-day that is thus substantially and self-evidently divine? What particular or unique truth has our civilisation evolved that is of indisputable value to us in our search for "the ultimate goal"? The philosopher, the scientist, and the theologian is, to-day, basing his conception of human existence upon the generally accepted theory of evolution. But, apart from the fact that evolution explains nothing in an ultimate sense, is there anything satisfactory about the theory of evolution? Assuredly not; for we have learned that evolution involves devolution—retrogression as well as progress. Further, we have learned that these two lines—the upward and the downward—are infinite; so that man, whose existence in time is finite (as far as we know) cannot possibly discover, with any certainty, exactly where he is. A man who cannot ascertain exactly where he is cannot be in a favorable position to determine exactly where he desires to go.

Evolution may be a true conception of the working method of life: devolution also—but upon which track, the upward or downward, are we moving? and what is "the ultimate goal"?

"The ultimate goal" of the idealist is the complete happiness of all mankind. The idealist will therefore ask himself, "Is the world nearer the complete happiness of all mankind to-day than it was fifty, forty, thirty, twenty, or ten years ago?" He will believe, quite consistently, that if evolution be the true theory, and, furthermore, if a noble and altruistic idealism is a part of the purpose of evolution, mankind must be nearer the idealist's hope to-day than it was last week. But, in order to answer this question satisfactorily—that is, in order to justify his attitude towards life—the idealist must decide exactly what he means by "the complete happiness of all mankind." He must define "happiness." What constituted man's "happiness" in the past? What constitutes man's "happiness" in the present? He may, of course, generalise about "happiness." He may maintain, for example, that a large number of people feel completely happy in a picture palace while watching an old gentleman being pushed into a tub of whitewash. But ask these individuals, as they filter out, whether they were "completely happy," and you will instantly be mistaken for a lunatic. These people are not "happy" in an idealistic sense; they are merely complacent spectators, acquiescing in life as they find it, and indulging in no abstract problems as to "the ultimate goal" at all. Whether they are evolving or devolving, or whether they are static (which M. Bergson will not allow you to believe), it is impossible for you to decide. In any case, they themselves are neutral to the problem. Their "ultimate goal" is inconceived and inconceivable; they are dimly conscious human atoms manifested in eternity—existing and competing with each other for the material means of subsistence. You may, by the aid of a powerful imagination, endow them with a conscious spirituality which they do not possess; you may see them as a million of divine creations, spoiled by the superficial life-values which their civilisation has forced upon them; false values which can have no intelligent connection with what you feel to be the mystic reality which quickens them; the reality which is the cause of their being. You may raise their limitations into the greatness of the infinite which admits of no limitations; the infinity which absolves finite things by absorbing and annihilating them; but in the present moment, and in terms of the individual, you must remain dumb—"The Ultimate Goal!"

What has been "the ultimate goal" of the Church? Based upon the teaching of Christ, its "ultimate goal" would have been "life." It would have endeavored to bring life more abundantly. What has the Church accomplished in this direction? Can a thing which brings life more abundantly perish itself of impotence and sterility? If ever a human institution had an "ultimate goal," assuredly it was the Church. Every individual was travelling direct either to absolute eternal happiness or to absolute eternal unhappiness. But where have these two intellectual abstractions landed humanity? Is life more abundant? Can it be possible that the obstinate conservatism of the human race is a subconscious protest against the futility of progress? Glance back into the written history of the human race, and you must acknowledge that in relation to the average life of man, as an individual, the whole "process of evolution" has failed. It has not justified itself in the eyes of those idealists which it has produced. What might conceivably have been progress in the infinity of time which preceded Christ was, in reality, no progress at all. Christ came condemning the process of evolution which had produced him. And whether this view be entirely pessimistic or not, there can be no refutation of its foundation in truth, for the known past can, with some certainty, be compared with the known present; and, moreover, in an ultimate sense, for every idealist conceives an "ultimate goal" which can never be "ultimate," nor even contemporary with his desire. The idealist with his "ultimate goal" mocks divinely at a process which has produced his dream, and, at the same time, made it impossible of universal realisation.

ARTHUR F. THORN.

The Origin of Supernatural Ideas.—II.

"Man judges of the unseen by the seen, and his natural curiosity compels him, when he feels certain sensations the sources of which are hidden from him, to seek for some cause to which they may be referred,—one, it may be, which he has already seen associated with like effects, but, if not, one which he considers to be sufficient to produce them."—WAKE, Chapters on Man (1868), p. 27.

"To say mystery is to say fear. Man, like the animals, fears the unknown, even though a kind of fascination draw him towards the object of his terror, that he may learn to give himself some account of it. This two-fold feeling unquestionably lies at the root of religion; and, in this connection, the Latin poet might well say that fear was the first creator of the gods: 'Primus in orbe deos fecit timor.'"—COUNT GOBLET D'ALVIELLA, Origin and Growth of the Conception of God (1891), p. 68.

"Fear of inanimate nature is the foundation of superstition, and the heroic efforts of a few to overthrow it have led the world into the path of science."—LESTER WARD, Dynamic Sociology, vol. i., p. 687.

"Almighty Fear the Fiend—God."—SHELLEY, Revolt of Islam.

"Terror-generated piety."—WINWOOD READE, Martyrdom of Man, p. 432.

HOW did man acquire the ideas of the supernatural which we find so widely spread to-day? Were they revealed to mankind by some God, from some far-away heaven in the depths of space? Or did some crafty priests invent these ideas, in order to control mankind, and hold them in bondage to the terrors of the unknown?

Science dismisses both explanations. Science knows nothing of any God or heaven; and has no need of the hypothesis of fraud, or craft, to explain the origin of these ideas. Science shows that the ideas of the supernatural had as natural an origin as arithmetic or music.

Jesus Christ, in the Gospels, said that we should judge a tree by its fruit. If we judge the supernatural by this standard, and if these ideas of the supernatural were revealed by a spiritual being, or beings, then we maintain that this spiritual being, or beings, are cruel, malignant, and bloodthirsty monsters, who, instead of deserving our adoration and gratitude, should receive our maledictions and curses.

As man has evolved from the animal world—and still bears the marks of his parentage in his body and mind—it is reasonable to expect to find the germs of all his qualities—moral, intellectual, and religious—in the animal world to which he belongs; and there are no lack of facts to support this idea. Carl Vogt says:—

> "The germ at least of a belief in some mysterious higher power exists also in animals. The dog is evidently afraid of spectres, quite as much as the Breton or the Basque; every out-of-the-way phenomenon not explained to it by its nose renders even the most courageous dog a coward. I knew a grove which the peasants firmly believe to be haunted by a fiery spectre, and prove it by the alleged fact that dogs which have passed the night in it will not re-enter it. It is in the fear of the apparently supernatural which is the germ of religious ideas; and this fear is developed in a high degree in our domestic animals, the dog and the horse. The germ of these ideas, as well as of others allied with it, being by man developed into a system, becomes a faith. Mathematics has just as much claim, as this belief in the supernatural, to be considered an exclusive, fundamental quality of man. No animal knows mathematics, geometry; but there are animals which can count, though only up to a few ciphers, and this is the germ of the whole edifice which man has erected, and by means of which he has measured the celestial spaces. In the same way, the animal has no faith, but it fears something unknown—the fear of God—from which man has developed his religion."*

As Professor Chantepie de la Saussaye rightly observes, "The relations between a master and his dog are religious; and many other animals must certainly regard the mysterious and often hostile strength of man as a god-like power."†

Charles Darwin noted this sense of the mysterious in animals, by the behavior of his own dog, when lying on the lawn one hot day:—

> "At a little distance a slight breeze occasionally moved an open parasol, which would have been wholly disregarded by the dog had anyone stood near it. As it was, every time the parasol slightly moved, the dog growled fiercely and barked. He must, I think, have reasoned to himself in a rapid and unconscious manner, that movement without any apparent cause indicated the presence of some strange living agent, and that no stranger had a right to be on his territory."‡

Professor Romanes was led to make several experiments by reading this instance given by Darwin. His dog, a remarkably intelligent Skye terrier, sometimes amused himself with dry bones, by tossing them in the air, or to a distance, to give them the appearance of life, so he could enjoy worrying them. One day, Romanes tied a long, fine thread to a bone and gave it to the dog to play with. After he had tossed it about a short time, and it had fallen to a distance, the dog following after it, Romanes gently drew it away by means of the invisible thread:—

> "Instantly his whole demeanor changed. The bone which he had previously pretended to be alive now began to look as if it were really alive, and his astonishment knew no bounds. He first approached it with nervous caution, as Mr. Spencer describes (in the case of a dog hurt by a cane with which he was playing); but as the slow receding motion continued, and he became quite certain that the movement could not be accounted for by any residuum of force which he had communicated, his astonishment developed into dread, and he ran to conceal himself under some article of furniture, there to behold at a distance the 'uncanny' spectacle of a dry bone coming to life. Now, in this and in all my other experiments I have no doubt that the behavior of the terrier arose from his sense of the mysterious, for he was of a highly pugnacious disposition, and never hesitated to fight any animal of any size or ferocity; but apparent symptoms of spontaneity in an inanimate object which he knew so well, gave rise to feelings of awe and horror, which quite enervated him."

And concludes that the dog "must have felt the same oppressive and alarming sense of the mysterious which uncultured persons feel under similar circumstances."§

Still more apposite is another case which the same writer also relates, as follows:—

> "I had a setter dog which was greatly afraid of thunder. One day a number of apples were being shot upon the wooden floor of an apple-room, and, as each bag of apples was shot, it produced through the rest of the house a noise resembling that of distant thunder. My dog became terror stricken at the sound; but as soon as I brought him to the apple-room, and showed him the true cause of the noise, he became again buoyant and cheerful as usual."*

Here we see fear of the unknown giving way to ease and satisfaction when a natural explanation of the cause has been arrived at.

Thompson tells us that "A dog chasing a raven fled with astonishment as the bird faced it and uttered the words it had been taught."† As Letourneau has remarked:—

> "If we could read the brain of the superior animals, we should undoubtedly find there a rudimentary mythology. Many mammalia, dogs for instance, have, like man, dreams and hallucinations; they can connect certain facts with their real or imaginary causes. We do not want more evidence than this to arrive at the puerile conceptions of primitive mythology. There is no essential difference in a mental point of view between the African negro who worships the crocodile, and who will probably eat him afterwards, and the dog fawning at the foot of his master and licking the hand that has beaten him."‡

What difference is there between the horse who shies at a white object in the hedge, at night, and the rustic who takes the same object to be a bogle or a ghost? Lindsay observes:—

> "Bartlett speaks of a sense of mystery or mysterious dread in certain animals, inmates of the London Zoological Gardens. In many animals, in short, under certain circumstances, awe or dread of the unseen, unknown, untried, unheard, readily gives birth not only to a feeling of mystery, but, as is pointed out in another chapter, to genuine delusion."§

And he further remarks that "Thunder occasionally causes panic in menagerie animals" (vol. ii, p. 189).

As Professor Leuba well remarks:—

> "A dog will beg from a man; he will not beg from a ham suspended out of his reach. Towards animals and men, animal behavior is similar to that of men when dealing with invisible anthropopathic beings..... The feelings and emotions which appear in a dog's intercourse with his master are of the same species, if not of the same variety, as those felt by a man when he deals with his fellow-men and with superhuman beings."‖

And he points out that the most significant difference between men and animals is not to be found in the manner in which they interpret certain striking natural phenomena, but in the inability of animals to fix the interpretation they have arrived at, by communicating it, by means of signs or language to their kind. He observes:—

> "Without the advantage conferred by speech, upon even the lowest savages, to hold, clarify, keep alive, and bring to fruition impressions of this evanescent nature, I do not see how a stable belief in animism could have been established. The decisive rôle played by language appears forcibly when one considers the part it takes in introducing dream experiences into waking life. The baffling evanescence of dreams caught sight of on awakening is familiar to everyone. Unless one succeeds in putting them in linguistic form, they are soon completely lost; verbal expression makes them part and parcel of our mental possessions. The mental differences between man and the higher animals to which the presence of Magic and Religion is to be referred, are not in themselves startling, however considerable their consequences may have been. Psychological analysis leaves absolutely no standing ground to those who insist upon interpreting the advent of Religion as the manifestation of essentially new kinds of powers, of the birth of a 'spiritual life,' for instance. We hope to have made clear that the use of this term in this connection constitutes a misrepresentation of the facts."*

Religion is not a divinely bestowed gift from heaven, but has developed naturally from very low beginnings. Animals, says Lindsay, suffer from "spectral delusions," and he cites Fleming, who writes of a rabid dog:—

> "It appeared as if haunted by some horrid phantom. At times it would seem to be watching the movements of something on the floor, and would dart suddenly forth and bite at the vacant air as if pursuing something against which it had an enmity. In another case the dog would throw itself against the wall yelling furiously, as if there were a noise on the other side."†

Romanes gives a similar case, described by Pierquin, of an ape who suffered a sunstroke, "and afterwards used to become terror-struck by delusions of some kind; she used to snap at imaginary objects, and acted as if she had been watching and catching at insects on the wing."‡

Lindsay also points out that animals dream; for instance, the dog sometimes moves his paws and tail, sniffs and growls, during the progress of his dream; and dreams have played an important part in the origin of religion. And so have delusions, for that matter.

King George's reason for calling eight men together, with the Speaker of the House of Commons as chairman, to discuss the Irish question with a view to finding a practical settlement that all parties might agree upon, is not a matter for investigation in the Freethinker. But, unless the last clause of his speech on receiving them at Buckingham Palace, was sheer blarney, he could hardly have been very hopeful of the result. These were his Majesty's words:—

> "Your responsibilities are, indeed, great. The time is short. You will, I know, employ it to the fullest advantage and be patient, earnest, and conciliatory, in view of the magnitude of the interests at stake. I pray that God in His infinite wisdom may guide your deliberations so that they may result in the joy of peace and honorable settlement."

Any well practised journalist could make mincemeat of these sentences in five minutes. It is presumable, therefore, that they are his Majesty's own composition. And from that point of view they are invested with a certain pathos.

His Majesty may believe in Prayer and Providence as available agencies in human affairs, even when they are in the critical stage where Home Rule stands, but in that case why call in God to help man when you are really calling in men to help God? If prayer could settle the matter the King might stop at home and do the business himself—unless "God" is hard of hearing just now, so that it takes eight men (including the Royal Commission) or nine men (including the Chairman) or ten men (including the King) to make an adequate impression on the divine tympanum. It might be objected that the Deity's answer to the King's prayer on behalf of the nation, or the nation's prayer on behalf of itself, might be difficult to ascertain. But the objection is not insuperable. The Archbishop of Canterbury could keep the key of a holy ballot-box, which could be opened in the presence of trustworthy witnesses, and the Lord's vote would decide the question at issue. It would save a lot of time and trouble in the House of Commons. "Aye's" and "No's" would not have to tramp through the lobbies and be counted by tellers. They could all sit still and "wait upon the Lord." Or, for that matter, there need be no parliament at all. The whole thing could be worked mechanically like a Buddhist prayer-wheel.

"God's" wisdom would have to be more than infinite (the Hibernicism may be pardoned on the Irish question) to guide the deliberations of eight politicians of at least four different parties. Ingersoll well said that some people expected the Deity to do sheer impossibilities. "I heard a man this very day," he said, "ask God to give Congress wisdom." A mental wink of this kind must have passed between those nine men when the King came, as it were, to the "Let us pray."

By the way, did King George forget that a professional, well-paid supplicator had asked "God's" blessing on the Home Rule Bill discussions every day it had "come up" in the House of Commons? Did his Majesty think that a more private prayer might be more efficacious?

Tennyson's praise of "honest doubt" in "In Memoriam" was excusable. That was a long time ago and Christians not only believed then, but took it for granted, like the rising and the setting of the sun, that whoever differed from them must be wicked. It was a step forward, in its way, when Tennyson sang:—

> "There lives more faith in honest doubt, > Believe me, than in half the creeds."

But that a Bishop should go about nowadays presenting this sentimentalism as if it were quite a recent discovery, proclaims him a fool of the first water. "Ninny" is the only word applicable to such a person. Plain "ninny" without any adjective whatever. And who will be surprised to learn that this "ninny" is the Bishop of London? It is doubtful if any other Bishop is capable of such flatulent imbecility.

"Honest doubt," if we may vary the metaphor, was a useful stepping-stone. But here is the Bishop of London sitting upon it sixty years afterwards—and with his face still toward the past. Everybody with even a tincture of psychology knows by this time that there is no "honest doubt" because there is no "*dis*honest doubt." Doubt is doubt. And there is an end of it. Doubt is a purely intellectual process and will not bear a moral adjective. Yet the Bishop of London actually goes about telling his fellow Churchmen that allowance must be made for doubters as some of them are honest, when, as far as they are doubters, they are all honest. We repeat that there cannot be a *dis*honest doubter. But there may be a foolish Bishop. That's certain. "Bishop" bears any adjective—rogue as easily as fool.

What unfathomable nonsense theological authors do write about religion. In their case is abundantly illustrated the unspeakable harm that has accrued from subordinating the reason to the vague faculty of intuition. The Rev. J. Cohu has just published a five shilling book, entitled Vital Problems of Religion, the main themes of which are the spirituality of Nature, the freedom of personality, and the element of will, progress, and aspiration in the processes of the Universe. Now, all these are pure assumptions inscrutible of verification. Nature presents herself to us as anything but spiritual, and it can be demonstrated that personality is subject to the unbreakable law of causation, while progress and aspiration are relative terms, of which Nature as a whole knows nothing. We know that Mr. Cohu rejects the dogmas of the Catholic Church, but he introduces peculiar dogmas of his own, and to us the latter are quite as unacceptable and irrational as the former.

Rev. John Birch-Reynardson, of Canley Rectory, Lincs, left £177,706. His housekeeper was in the will for £150 a year, his butler £200 a year, and his cook to £150. Fancy! What would Jesus (or Judas) have thought of these figures? The possession of the hundreds, let alone the thousands, would have made them feel like millionaires.

The Rev. Dinsdale Young, President of the Wesleyan Conference, stated, in his address from the chair at Leeds, that "while there was much to cause them deep concern, there was also much to hearten them, especially in the fact that the masses of the people were not averse to the great message of the Christian evangel when it was intelligently and sympathetically interpreted to them." Is not Mr. Young fully aware that the "masses of the people" never hear that "great message"? It has lost all interest for them because they do not regard it as true. Mr. Young is fortunate enough to have a crowded church; but all the people who attend places of worship form but a handful in comparison with the population. The truth is that in Great Britain, as well as on the Continent, Christianity is perceptibly dying, and its officials are losing caste.

Mr. Young is an orthodox theologian, and he was certainly right and "carried the Conference with him when he declared that a non-theological Church was a non-intelligent Church, and soon became a mere ethical establishment, a purveyor of entertainments, or, worst of all, a political caucus." The President is thoroughly consistent in his rigid adherence to the dogmatic positions so ably defended by his fathers. The Bible, we know, is entirely discredited, and theology undoubtedly doomed; but a Christian minister, who decries theology and criticises the Bible, sails under false colors, and is despicable in the extreme. That such hypocrites are possible proves that Christianity is far gone in consumption.

Miss Vance advises us that our "old opponent, the Rev. Z. B. Woffendale, is dead." We had but one public debate with him more than thirty years ago, and he always avoided another. He rested his reputation on a faked report of that debate, which we always repudiated. He used to advertise it as "The Great Debate." It was nothing like a verbatim report, and it contained about three times as much of his speeches as of our own. At the same time, according to his own assertions, he won a victory in "The Great Debate" over a thoroughly incompetent adversary. For some years Mr. Woffendale lived retired from the pulpit, and presumably on a pension. Speak no ill of the dead, the proverb says. Well, we will not. We merely say that he was a typical Christian Evidence speaker. Those who know what that is will understand. Those who do not would want more explanation than we have time to give now.

Commenting on the discussion going on between Bishop Gore, Dr. Sanday, Dr. Strong, and others, as to whether the New Testament story of the Ascension is to be accepted as a fact or not, the Christian World quotes the following from the late "J. B." as giving a common-sense view of miracles:—

> "Belief in them was easy because it coincided with a certain phase, not then outgrown, of the human development. Every religion, every history of the early world, produced them, and for the reason that it was the nature of the mind, at its then stage, to produce them. They grew in this soil as naturally as wheat grows to-day in a Midland shire. But a stage was reached when the production ceased. And that not because the outside world had changed. The change was in mind and thoughts."

We fully endorse this; it is, indeed, only what we have been saying ourselves over and over again for many years. All the same, it is a very dangerous argument for a Christian to use. It deposes all supernatural occurrences from the realm of objective fact to that of subjective delusion. The outside world is to-day what it always was. That is, the outside world always was as it is to-day. People no more walked on the water, held intercourse with the Devil, miraculously increased the supply of food, turned water into wine, or rose from the dead, than they do these things to-day. That is, they never occurred. If we could resurrect a crowd of Judæan peasants, and place them in the centre of London to-day, we could have all the old miracles over to-day. If you could have filled Judæa with a modern population two thousand years ago, the Christian religion would never have been heard of. That is the logic of the Christian World's sane view of the situation.

Great Thoughts is a professedly pious paper. No doubt its beliefs are absolutely right, but it might cultivate carefulness in other respects. Last week it quoted Tom Hood as singing: "It is not women you're wearing out, but human creatures' lives." This is a huge joke. Hood, of course, wrote linen. It was precisely women that the sweaters of those poor shirtmakers were wearing out.

The last of the prophets, Old Moore, has issued his forecasts for 1915, and, apparently, the next year is to be a stock-size one, for the prophecies are very humdrum, the most exciting features being an influenza outbreak, strikes, accidents, and the customary rows in Russia. One thing we are thankful for, our penny prophet is far saner than "St. John" with his "Revelation."

The Times is always bright and up-to-date. In the last issue of the Literary Supplement, two columns are devoted to "The Religion of Cicero." Perhaps the editor considered the old boy's theological views better than much of the religious hogwash of the day.

Five people were struck by lightning at a Sunday-school treat at Lyminge, near Hythe, Kent. If that had been a Secularists' Excursion there would have been a moral—quite a long one.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton has been protesting in characteristic fashion against the proposal to cut children's hair, and he says "All institutions should be judged and damned by whether they have fitted the normal flesh and spirit." This is a hard saying, for Mr. Chesterton's Church upholds celibacy for men and women, and every priest has a flies' skating rink on his head.

Men of God are proverbially false prophets. How many times have they fixed the exact day and hour on which the world would surely come to an end! Very vividly some of us remember the awful dread we experienced on the day appointed by Dr. Cumming, the famous Scottish divine, for the final catastrophe, and how thankful we felt next morning that it hadn't come off, though vaguely believing that, if it had, it would have meant our translation to the Glory Land. By the time Prophet Baxter, of the Christian Herald fame, appeared on the scene, and repeatedly fixed dates for the collapse of the Universe, we had become so hardened that we paid no heed whatever to his false predictions. The curious thing about Baxter was that he was neither humiliated nor daunted by the continuous falsification of his own prophecies. No sooner was one date discredited than he as confidently appointed another. Many, alas, believed in him as long as he lived, but no one does so now. The old world has a wonderful knack of thoroughly exposing all false prophets. Time puts everybody in his right place.

And yet false prophets still flourish, and are brazen-faced as ever. On January 29, 1913, the North Mail reported an address delivered the previous evening at Newcastle-on-Tyne by the Rev. J. B. Meyer, in the course of which this loquacious man of God said:—

> "There is going to be a great revival in England. I know it is coming before many months are gone, and our nets will be so full of fish that they will burst."

That was a year and five months ago, and the great revival still delays its coming. There is no sign of its advent, though the President of the Wesleyan Conference says that it is of all things the one of which the Churches stand in greatest need.

The Mundesley Conference, founded and presided over by Dr. Campbell Morgan, is a theological orgy indulged in once a year. It furnishes a splendid opportunity for certain men of God and their followers to go an annual religious spree; and they go on it with a vengeance. Every day for a week or more is filled to overflowing with lectures, sermons, prayers, hymns, and when the evening arrives the majority of the people are emotionally so elevated that they scarcely know who or where they are. And how vile the stuff is that they imbibe, and how pernicious its effect upon them. The ostensible object of the Conference is to deepen the spiritual life of all who attend it, and to strengthen their loyalty to Jesus Christ, with the result that most of them lose whatever sense of justice and fairplay they may once have had. One of the commonest notes sounded at all such gatherings is, that Jesus came in the very nick of time, when the world was rapidly lapsing into utter chaos and ruin, and that immediately he began to lay the foundations of a new and nobler order than that which was passing away. As all impartial students of history well know, that contention is utterly false, and no one can advance it without deliberately and culpably ignoring facts that cannot honestly be set aside.

At the last meeting, just concluded, of the Mundesley Conference, the Rev. W. Souper, M.A., Presbyterian minister at Clapham, delivered a lecture on "Christ and the Scriptures in the Life and Thought of To-day," in which occurred the following wild assertion, namely, that from Christ's time there had been progress, marked by three features, a new ethic, a new standard, and a new life. This is a hoary-headed old lie which has been nailed to the counter a thousand times; but it is repeated to-day as unblushingly as ever, and we are determined, every time we meet it, to confront it with the truth. The truth, in brief, is that for many centuries after Christ became supreme in the Roman Empire, there was no progress at all, but a steady and lamentable intellectual and moral retrogression. If we compare the Pagan emperors with their Christian successors, we shall find that, whilst out of thirty of the former only eight or nine were bad, the overwhelming majority of the latter were cruel, corrupt, and unprincipled. Christians bid us think of Nero, with his silly vanity and unmentionable vices and crimes; but we reply that Nero had his redeeming qualities, to which our opponents seldom, if ever, allude. Among his good points mark this, that he appointed a judge to listen to the complaints of slaves, and to punish masters found guilty of ill-treating them. In return, we invite Christians to bear in mind that Constantine, the first Christian emperor, was directly responsible for the murder of a brother-in-law, a nephew, a son, and a wife; that Constantine marched to the throne knee-deep in the blood of uncles and cousins; that Valentinian I.

kept two bears near his chamber, and amused himself by having them fed with human flesh, and that he got rid of his wife in order to marry a beautiful woman; that Valentinian III. murdered Aetius with his friends, and ravished the wife of Maximus. But why continue a tale to which there is no end, and which Mr. Souper may find told by believing as well as by unbelieving historians? Is he not aware that popes and emperors alike were ambitious and tyrannical, loving wealth and power more than everything else? Has he forgotten that Baronius, Dean Milman, Gibbon, Lecky, and many others, pronounce the tenth Christian century the lowest and most degraded period in all history? As a matter of plain fact, Christ introduced no new ethic, no new standard, and no new life. What came into the world in his name was intolerance, persecution, insane exclusiveness, the glorification of eternity at the expense of the crucifixion of time, the enthronement of an imaginary God at the cost of depreciating real Man; and from this reversion of the order of Nature we are suffering to this day.

A wealthy trinity have been staying at the Carlton Hotel, comprising citizens Vanderbilt, Wanamaker, and Gould, of the U.S.A., and their wealth is said to total £25,000,000. That beats the famous firm of Jehovah, Son, and Co., the managing director of which was sold for thirty shillings and afterwards "hanged."

A silver "apostle spoon" was sold recently at Christie's salerooms for £70. If it had been used by the Ever-Blessed Wielder of the Jack-Plane at the Last Supper, it could hardly have fetched more money. But, maybe, he used his sacred fingers.

A discussion in the press concerning the employment of dogs, as on the continent, reminds us of a delightful story of Sidney Smith, to whom it was suggested that Landseer, the great animal artist, should paint his portrait. The witty parson quoted Scripture in his reply, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?"

"People of Two Worlds" is a startling title to an article in a daily paper. Another false alarm! Not a word about a post-mortem existence, only an American's view of Eastern Europeans.

The Buckingham Territorials have taken to singing on route marches, and the Daily Chronicle reminds us that "The Watch on the Rhine" was warbled during the Franco-German War. That does not exhaust the list, for the sacred strains of "Come Where the Booze is Cheaper" have been heard in English lanes.

In a review of a book, Florence Nightingale to Her Nurses, the Times Literary Supplement says "the Agnostic nurse may be as good as the religious nurse, but she is not likely to be better; and she is not unlikely to be the least bit too business-like." The curious thing is that Florence Nightingale herself was heterodox—and there's the rub!

"In the past there was no hatred so intense as that of beauty scorned. But in our day there is a wilder and more savage enemy than any woman. It is the hatred of money when it is attacked." So says the Daily Sketch. Freethinkers know this only too well, for they are always attacking people who earn thousands of pounds for teaching lies.

Sir Horace Plunkett, one of the most distinguished of present-day Irishmen, in announcing his conversion to Home Rule, gives many reasons for the change. Amongst them he notes the fallacy of the old idea that Home Rule would mean Rome Rule. His view of this matter is very much like our own:—

> "Such cases of intolerance as are cited are usually found—if true—to have a social or political and not a religious basis. Considering both the example of other countries and the peculiar circumstances of Ireland, I anticipate that under Home Rule the people will retain their faith and the Catholic Church all its legitimate influence. But Catholic laymen throughout Ireland will be led by their new political duties to draw distinctions between the ecclesiastical and political spheres which they do not at present recognise. They will thus gradually relieve the priesthood of a class of responsibilities from which all the more judicious priests will be very glad to escape."

The last sentence may sound somewhat ironical, but with that exception we regard Sir Horace Plunkett's opinion on this point as practically unassailable. Ireland, under Home Rule, would be a new Ireland. The patriotic sentiment would cease to be allied to the Catholic sentiment. They would often be opposed to each other, as they have been in France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Belgium. And history shows that the patriotic sentiment always triumphs eventually. Protestantism won where the secular power was with it. The same may be said of Catholicism; and the division effected at the time of the Reformation has never been seriously disturbed since.

The Church Times asserts that "Mediæval nations never forgot that the Catholic religion was extra-national and universal." Of course they never forgot it, because they had been forced to believe it at the point of the sword, and knew that, if they denied it, or acted as if they did not believe it, they would be persecuted, imprisoned, tortured, and, possibly, put to death. The dogma of the universality of Christianity has been the supreme curse of the West, and would become, if Christians had their way, the supreme curse of the East. One comfort that we have is that Christianity is less universal in Europe to-day than it has been since the doleful days of Theodosius the Great.

A Sunday Defence Council for London is to be formed, apparently with the Bishop of London at its head. Defending the Sunday means preventing other people from making any other use of the day than the Bishop and his ecclesiastical friends please. The cheek of these people! It is evident from his lordship's preparatory speech that he would shut all the Sunday Picture Shows in London if he could. He is mistaken, though, if he fancies that closing them would fill the Church Syndicate Shows. Totally different publics are involved.

Fifty-three children were killed or injured in a tramway smash at Westport, Conn., U.S.A., the little ones being members of a Sunday-school excursion. Providence is as hard-hearted as in the good old Gospel days of the "slaughter of the innocents."

"A Crop of New Fiction" is a title used in a literary paper. For the dog-days, too! Isn't there enough fiction in "God's Holy Word" to fill the vacancy during August?

Mr. Bart Kennedy, writing in T. P.'s Weekly, says "the Golden Rule is at present but the most pious of pious opinions." Just so! And, like most pious things, it is hypocritical, for it is always the people who boast of loving their enemies who libel their neighbors—especially if the latter are Freethinkers.

Mr. G. H. Mair, in his recent book on English Literature, complains of the lack of appreciation of poetry, and asks who was the favorite after Edward Fitzgerald. "Not Swinburne certainly—partly because of a suspicion bold of his moral and religious tenets." What pitfall is this? There was little, if any, difference between the theological opinions of either of these two great poets.

According to that delightful family periodical, the Daily Telegraph, polygamy "was, indeed, long recognised, more or less overtly, by the Christian Church." This may partially explain why the clergy run after the petticoats to-day.

"Joseph Chamberlain in America" runs a headline in a leading paper. Dear, dear! Another illusion gone. We thought that Unitarians went to the same post-mortem retreat as Freethinkers.

"Mrs. O'Rooney," said the Reverend Father McMurphy, "why do I never see Patrick at church now?" Mrs. O'Rooney shook her head sadly. "Is it anarchism?" "Warse than that, your riverence." "Is it atheism?" "Warse, your riverence." "What is it, then?" "Rheumatism."

Country Rector: "My boy, it is a sad thing your father never comes to church. I am afraid he doesn't fear God."
Boy: "Yes, he does, sir. He always takes his gun with him."

"Father," began the prodigal son, as he knelt at his parent's feet, "are you going to kill the calf?" "I ought to," the father replied, "but you are such a fool I'll forgive you this time."

Missionary: "And how did you like my predecessor, King Totem?" King Totem: "He was very nice—very nice, though just a little stringy."

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £179 17s. 6d. Received since :—H. C., 5s.

WALTER STEWART.—There is no "serious blunder" about it. Matthew Arnold did call history "that Mississippi of falsehood." We cannot accept "many years ago" as an adequate reference to its having been quoted otherwise in the Freethinker.

W. MARSHALL.—We don't profess to give all, or anything like all, the Christian clergy who leave more money than is implied in "Blessed be ye poor." Thanks for your reference to one we had not noticed.

ROBERT BROWN.—Calling Protestants good citizens and Catholics lazy scoundrels is a short and easy way with Home Rule. The real truth is that the religion of either side is a pure accident—the result of birth and early training. You seem to think it all right for Protestants to govern Catholics, but all wrong for Catholics to govern Protestants. "A plague on both your houses!" After all, what was it we said? Simply this. We declined to discuss Home Rule as a political policy in these pages. We denied that Home Rule meant Rome Rule, and argued that those who opposed it on that ground were mistaken. A reply to this must consist of something more than mere abuse of Irish Catholics—as, for instance, that they "do nothing but lean against a wall and spit in the Liffey." Surely it is time that such vulgar bigotry were dead and buried—on both sides.

E. B.—Thanks for cuttings. Will write you on the other matter.

G. H.—See paragraph. Thanks.

WALTER DAVIDSON.—Your lively letter has had to be summarised. We admire your courage and pertinacity and wish you all success.

JOHN RATCLIFF.—Your order is passed over to our shop manager and will be attended to.

H. C.—Sorry to hear of your losses. Hope to hear a better report soon.

C. MITCHELL (New Zealand).—Pleased to hear you found Mr. Scott Bennett so good a lecturer with so good an audience. Your report will be a good introduction if he pays the old country a visit. We note your statement that he paid us "a very graceful compliment." We are not so pruriently modest as to pretend that such things are not agreeable.

JULIUS ALLMANN.—We can't trouble Mr. Cohen with your letter while he is holidaying. Besides, your question is an ancient one. And the answer is simple,—we were going to say obvious. Every living thing is wasted and repaired along the lines of its own nature. Your big toe keeps your big toe just as your brain keeps your brain. And you keep yourself just as London (say) keeps herself. But the change in both cases is gradual, and the organised old matter impresses its character upon the organised new matter as it enters into the general body. You are yourself, and London is London; but the London of to-day is not the London of twenty years ago, neither are you the Julius Allmann of twenty years ago. You think so, but you are mistaken; as you would find if you had our experience of comparing present memory with the written memory of years ago. Perhaps it is not memory at all, as a mental fact, which puzzles you. But memory is not a human mystery; it runs through all nature; it begins in form and develops in consciousness. And how does consciousness begin? Of this question, like all others, we know the how but not the why! There may be no why. Nature may require no explanation. We require it. And, as Shelley said, Human pride is skilful to invent most serious names to hide its ignorance.

FREDERIC WALSH.—Thanks for the Saturday Review article on Mr. Salt's revised Life of James Thomson. It is rather slap-dash work, but it will help to draw attention to the worthy biography of a poet who will always need such advertisement, being "caviare to the general" by reason of his merits as well as his defects. By the way, Thomson's two "Sunday" poems are not biographical; they are poetry of observation, not experience. We had it from his own lips.

W. FRENCH.—The Middlesex County Council could not legally issue a seven days' licence for picture shows or any other public entertainment. Its action, therefore, against Sunday entertainments is also illegal. We hope the matter will be taken to the High Court. The "Sunday, Christmas Day, and Good Friday" humbugs, on the Bench as well as off, would certainly be taught a lesson.

R. OGILVIE.—We hope the Freethought meetings in Jail-square, Glasgow, will be properly supported. Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner's little book, Penalties Upon Opinion, will supply you with what you require.

C. HELLER.—Robert Moreland has not, to our knowledge, written any such book as you suggest.

R. POPPER.—We don't think you have the least idea of the cost of a daily paper. "Saladin" has been dead some years. We spoke at his funeral.

T. RENNOLLS.—We don't understand it, and our readers would probably be no luckier.

L. M. HOSSACK.—If reading one copy of the Freethinker makes you a more earnest Christian, you should buy a copy and read it weekly.

CLARA GUNNING.—You state that Mr. E. Baker, a Christian Evidence lecturer, was charged with using insulting language in Hyde Park, but you don't state the result. Surely the magistrate didn't fine a Christian,—did he?

H. BRITTEN.—See paragraph. Thanks.

Mr. Foote contemplates the resumption of lecturing in October, beginning in London and afterwards visiting Glasgow, Birmingham, etc.

Mr. Heaford's articles on the Balkan Atrocities have attracted attention abroad—as we see by an editorial reference in L'Echo de Bulgarie. We understand that they are to be translated officially and inserted in the principal journals of Sofia.

We have just received a welcome letter from Mr. M. M. Mangasarian, who is privately our very good friend, and publicly lecturer to the Independent Religious Society (Rationalist), Chicago, as well as the author of some well-known books, including a Secular Catechism which has found its way (often by translations) all over the civilised world. We are very sorry to hear that Mr. Mangasarian, who congratulates us on our own recovery from serious illness, has been himself sick and had a sick son to nurse. ("Sick" is good Bible (that is, Tudor) English; it was taken over to America and has been kept there ever since.) We hope his health is thoroughly restored. He is looking forward to the possibility of meeting us in England this summer. It cannot be a greater pleasure to him than it will be to us.

The last number of the Examiner (Christchurch, New Zealand) to hand seems to imply that Mr. W. Collins is recovering from his bad breakdown, but the information on this point is neither extensive nor precise. Apparently travelling to regain health, Mr. Collins could not officiate at the funeral of an old friend and supporter, whose death is referred to in the Examiner as follows :—

> "It is with very great regret that we record the death of another stalwart Rationalist—Mr. B. Burland, of Amberley, whose funeral took place at Linwood Cemetery on Monday, April the 13th last. For more than twenty years Mr. Burland had been connected with the New Zealand Rationalist Association, and was esteemed by its members for his consistency to Rational principles, as well as for his genial personality. By dint of hard work Mr. Burland had built up a substantial business at Amberley, but the cares of business in no wise diminished his enthusiasm for the Freethought with which he had in early manhood become associated as a member of the National Secular Society, England. He held Mr. Bradlaugh in reverence, and regarded Mr. Foote with high admiration as his worthy successor."

It is pleasant to find that Mr. Foote is held in worthy remembrance by Freethinkers at the antipodes.

Mr. W. H. Thresh replies to our reference to himself, though we can hardly see what he has to reply to. We said nothing against him, as he admits; quite the contrary. We objected to his being described as "a new speaker." We cannot see it is Mr. Thresh's right or duty to explain or defend other people.

The Edmonton Branch is starting a new N. S. S. Branch at Ponders End. The "End" is all right; it is pretty well the "End" of everything in the way of civilisation. But there is very little "pondering" about the place. The first Secular meeting seems to have had a stunning effect on the local orthodoxy; the second roused them up a bit; the third brought out the usual meekness of Christians who find themselves "insulted" by opposition. The Secularists managed to take good care of themselves, and the disturbance was confined to "language" until the meeting was closing. Then the followers of the meek and lowly one "came on like an avalanche." Mr. Walter Davidson says, "the platform rose and fell like some trophy of battle, and straw hats were strewn on the ground like Highland bonnets at Culloden." One girl member of the Branch was brutally attacked by a male Christian and thrown to the ground, but Mr. Davidson rejoices that the said male Christian was immediately "crumpled up with one under the jaw." Mr. Davidson laughs at those who say that "the battle is over"—meaning that Christianity is dead if not gone. It may be so where they live, but not at Ponders End, and many other places; and if they want a job it can be found them, with plenty of work to do. Mr. Davidson's address is 131 Warwick-road, Edmonton. The Ponders End meetings are held on Wednesday evenings.

Rev. Dr. Linton Smith, vicar of St. Nicholas' Church, Blundellsands, has been preaching a series of sermons on "The Fools of the Old Testament." Another series on "The Rogues of the Old Testament" would be a desirable addendum. Meanwhile we may note the reverend gentleman's statement that "Many Agnostics and Atheists put Christians to shame by the exemplary lives they lead." Confession is said to be good for the soul. An improvement may be looked for, therefore, in the Christian character of that neighborhood. We quote from the Crosby and Waterloo Herald.

Mr. B. T. Hall, treasurer of the Ramsey Testimonial Fund, Club Union Buildings, Clerkenwell-road, E.C., sends us a Third List of Subscriptions since the Two Lists published in the Freethinker of June 7 and June 21. He says that any difficulty has arisen through our "accepting notification of amounts from other sources than" himself. This is precisely what we have not done. Lists sent to us, inserted or not inserted, have all been in the same handwriting, and ostensibly from Mr. Hall. We hope it will be straight sailing now. Mr. Hall informs us, and we are glad to learn it, that the total amount of the Fund to date (July 22) is £52 6s. 6d.

We take the following from the Advertiser's Weekly :—

> "That the Freethinker notes that in a religious contemporary the advertisements include notices to the ruptured, toothless, paralytic, baldheaded, half-blind, flat-footed, and the cancerous and dyspeptic."
> "That the lively little agnostic journal adds: 'We always thought Christians were on the down grade; we are sure of it now.'"

Now we shan't be long.

Opposition was offered to the prosecution of Mr. Frank Kennedy, a native of West Africa, for using "improper language" in a Freethought lecture at Clapham Common on Sunday afternoon, June 28. No doubt the language was not in the best of taste, but bad taste is not yet a crime; although it seems to be made one for the occasion when displayed by a Freethinker in the presence of a Christian—especially when a Christian gentleman with very acute "feelings" sits upon the Bench. Mr. Drummond, the magistrate at the South-Western Police-court, kept on saying that England was a free country; you may think what you like, but you must be careful what you say. If an ex-policeman is listening and hears what would shock everybody at the little bethel he attends, and your "improper" language is brought up before a Christian magistrate with still more sensitive ears, you might just as well have no freedom at all. Your adversaries decide your guilt. Mr. Kennedy was fined £5, which is the maximum fine under the Act, and 2s. costs. The amount was paid by his friends, who took up his case, and who consulted Mr. Foote as to the line of defence. Mr. Foote recommended that the solicitor for the defence should press for a prosecution for "blasphemy" rather than "improper language," for the language could not be considered improper, and would never be prosecuted as such, except in relation to religion. But it appears that London magistrates have been warned against this pitfall since the Boulter case. It will be remembered that Mr. Asquith was emphatic about no "blasphemy" prosecutions being conducted by the Government through the Treasury lately. Mr. Drummond wouldn't be caught by the "blasphemy" bait. He insisted on proceeding on the summons before him. And his sentence on Mr. Kennedy was perfectly vindictive. The Christian magistrate gave the Freethought speaker all the punishment he could, even though a first offender, for a crime which is really no crime at all. What happens is this. The upper dog makes it a crime on the part of the under dog to bark. That is the "blasphemy," the "improper language," and all the rest of it, under these hypocritical acts and proceedings.

Mr. Le Maine, Mr. Saphin, Mr. Beale, Mr. Kennedy, and other speakers are "holding the fort" at Clapham Common on Sunday afternoons and evenings. Their policy is to repeat the words complained of, and challenge the Christians to continue playing the part of persecutors. There will be little use in this, however, if the Christians prefer to lie low; or if they cannot be driven into the common honesty of prosecuting "blasphemers" for "blasphemy." "Improper language" is the meanest of charges. It is worthy of savages who are also cowards.

The following letter from one of our readers is worth publishing:—

> "Wadesmill, Ware, Herts, 28th July, 1914.
> "Dear Sir,—Mr. Pawle, the prospective Liberal candidate for East Herts, is holding open-air meetings in the villages of the constituency, and at one of the meetings held last evening at the village of Wadesmill, I asked him what his attitude was regarding the abolition of the Blasphemy Laws. He replied that he had not gone into the question, and did not think it an important one. I pointed out to him that this old law ought to be taken from the Statute Book, as it placed a barrier in the way of freedom of speech. He then said some people might think it was a matter of importance, but that he believed there was also a law still in existence which made it a crime, punishable by imprisonment, not to go to church. He felt sure that nobody wanted to say anything which would grate on the ears of other people.
> "I thought this might be of some interest to you.
> —Yours sincerely, HY. BRITTEN."

This "Liberal" gentleman thinks it a matter of "no importance" that men could once be burnt, and can now be imprisoned like common thieves, for "blasphemy"—that is, annoying their orthodox religious opponents. We don't know whether he thinks it of any importance that Jesus Christ was arrested for "blasphemy" and would have been stoned to death for it if the Roman authority had not interfered. Nothing seems to be of any importance to Mr. Pawle unless it affects him personally. Perhaps the truth is that the wrongs of men who are not numerous enough to decide the representation of East Herts at the next election are not worth troubling about at present. He has not "gone into the question," but Mr. Asquith has, and has also promised to give all the aid he can to a Bill for the Abolition of the Blasphemy Law. Pawle is one thing—Asquith is another: as might be expected.

EXORCISM.

The belief that the air is peopled by a variety of beings called angels, or demons, is very naturally associated with the idea that these essences can enter into the body of a human being, and produce therein a series of strange phenomena. When a man, previously quiet, and differing in no appreciable manner from other mortals, suddenly takes to preaching, prophesying, starving himself, and scolding other people, it is very natural for him to assume, and for other people to believe, that he is in reality divinely possessed; nor can the modern physician wonder at this, for his experience of insanity shows that many of its victims see visions of the Almighty, and hear utterances from his lips, which have no real existence. Such men have a profound belief that they are in reality that which their diseased brain leads them to suppose. Again, when either man or woman is affected with mania, and rages more like a wild beast than a human being, tearing into shreds every article of clothing which he or she possesses, not abstaining even from murdering others, injuring himself or herself, or yelling out day and night the most horrible blasphemies or obscenities, it is equally natural that the idea should prevail that the victim is possessed by an evil spirit. The former have been canonised as saints, the latter have been subjected to the most ingenious system of religious exorcism.—Dr. Thomas Inman.

It is astonishing how a conception of original sin or total depravity, which transforms God from an object of adoration and affection into a hideous and detestable being, could at any time, however barbarous, have been found acceptable, or how the casuistries by which people strive to modify its hardness could ever have been listened to with common patience.—Strauss.

Christian Apologetics.

XI.—THOMAS COOPER (No. 3).

IN his fifth chapter on the "verity" of the Gospel miracles the great "lecturer on Christianity," Thomas Cooper, refers to the "Old English Freethinkers, as they are called," amongst whom are mentioned Lord Herbert of Cherbury, Thomas Hobbs, the Earl of Shaftesbury, Charles Blount, Toland, Anthony Collins, Thomas Woolston, Dr. Matthew Tindal, Dr. Morgan, and others, "many of whose books are now forgotten." To these he adds: the historian Gibbon, Dr. Middleton, Lord Bolingbroke, and David Hume. The "numerous and persevering attacks of these Freethinkers," he says, called forth a long list of replies from "Christian Ministers and Christian scholars," the most notable of whom he names and comments on. "These able and laborious men," he adds, "did not write in vain: English society lost its avowed sceptical tendency under the influence of their efforts." In his sixth chapter our "lecturer on Christianity" comes to Hume's Essay on Miracles, which, he says, "is held by sceptics to be the heaviest and most fatal blow ever dealt against Miracles by the hand of unbelief." He then quotes the following extract from that Essay:—

> "A miracle is a violation of the laws of Nature and, as a firm and unalterable experience has established these laws, the proof against a miracle, from the very nature of the fact, is as entire as any argument from experience can possibly be imagined. For, as there is no such uniform experience of the truth of human testimony, as there is of the uniformity of the laws of Nature, the one experience must always be stronger than the other; and no testimony therefore, can ever render a miracle probable."

This reasoning, as it stands, is unanswerable; but Hume, to illustrate his meaning, added:—

> "Why is it more than probable that all men must die; that lead cannot of itself, remain suspended in the air; that fire consumes wood, and is extinguished by water; unless it be that these events are found agreeable to the laws of Nature, and there is required a violation of these laws, or, in other words, a miracle to prevent them?"

There can thus be no mistaking what Hume meant by "experience"; but our lecturer pounces upon this word, and proceeds to found an argument upon it. He says:—

> "The boasted 'argument' of Hume, as sceptics call it, is really no argument at all. Experience teaches us! But what experience? A miracle was contrary to David Hume's experience. But his experience was confined to what he saw, felt, touched, and so on. His experience was confined to his own life.....He had no experience of what occurred before he was born..... Yet he learned a good deal of what occurred before he was born. How? By human testimony. Past history to David Hume was what it is to us all—not experience, but testimony.....and so he failed, with all his acuteness, to see that his 'argument' was no argument at all."

Thus is Hume's argument blown to atoms, and all that remains is to gather up some of the fragments. A miracle, we are told, was only contrary to Hume's limited experience during the short period of his own life. His statements that all men must die, that lead cannot remain suspended in the air, that fire consumes, etc., were matters of testimony, not experience—or if the latter, only of his own experience. This is simply apologetic quibbling. The term "experience" may, of course, include testimony; but thousands of undoubted facts are believed and known, and are acted upon, without any special testimony. By "experience" is meant the ascertained results derived from repeated trials or experiments, by long-continued use or practice, or by a lifelong series of observations, made or carried out by the cleverest and most enlightened men of all nations, both of the present day and of preceding generations. A pupil coming to a public school has given to him, let us say, a text-book of Geography, containing facts connected with all parts of the earth; an Atlas, giving the names and positions of thousands of places on the globe; and text-books of Ancient and Modern History, recording the principal events of the past. Are these to be thrown aside as untrustworthy because the scholar had never gone outside his own country, and had not lived in past ages? Are the eclipses, yearly predicted in our Almanacs, to be accepted as correct only by the few who are able to work out the astronomical calculations by which the results were reached? Are the facts stated in works on Physiology to be believed only by those who have themselves dissected the human body? In these and other matters—Geology, Sound, Light, Heat, physical phenomena, etc.—we do not depend on the testimony of any single individual; we act on the accumulated knowledge of the present day, derived in a large measure from past ages—in other words, on "experience."

As an example of "testimony," we find it stated in 2 Kings vi. 5 that the prophet Elisha caused an iron axe-head, which had fallen into the river Jordan, to rise to the surface and swim like a cork. Now, if we had the sworn testimony of an historical Elisha, and of all who are said to have been present, to the actual occurrence of this miracle, it would be far more probable that the prophet and his friends were mistaken, or even that they lied, than that the law of gravitation was violated. For men—even religious men, including clergymen—have been convicted of lying and deceit; but we have not one authenticated case of iron, or of any other substance whose specific gravity is greater than water, being found to swim. The explanation in the case of Elisha is that the story was fabricated after his time.

In commencing his seventh chapter our lecturer represents a sceptic among his imaginary audience as saying:—

> "You seem to have forgotten, all along, that the Bible ascribes miracles to the Devil, as well as to God. Do you not perceive that this renders all you have said in defence of the verity of Christ's miracles utterly worthless?"

To this question Mr. Cooper replies that he was not surprised to find that the author of Supernatural Religion had "put this forth as one of his earliest and strongest arguments"; and then he quotes several paragraphs from that work, which conclude with the following:—

> "Even if the reality of the Miracles could be substantiated, their value as evidence for the divine revelation is destroyed by the necessary admission that Miracles are not limited to one source; but that there are miracles Satanic which are to be disbelieved, as well as divine and evidential."

This "bold language," our lecturer says, he read "with sorrow, but without surprise," and he then refers to the reasonings on this subject of "the great Samuel Clarke," of Bishop Fleetwood, and of "other great divines." The "reasoner," however, whose "thinkings" seemed to him most sound was Hugh Farmer, who wrote "a little more than a hundred years" before his own time. Farmer's Dissertation on Miracles our lecturer considered far sounder than one written by Archbishop Trench, of his own day. According to Cooper and Farmer, "Miracles are the peculiar works of God.....Whether God works the miracles Himself alone, or whether He enables and commissions others to work them, there is equally a divine interposition." These two great thinkers flatly deny that miracles are represented in the Bible as wrought by the power of Satan. Says Mr. Cooper:—

> "In the compass of 260 pages of rich scholarship and clear reasoning, Farmer disposes of all sorts of objections of a minor description, and then comes to the three crucial cases—The Magicians of Egypt, the Witch of Endor, and our Lord's Temptation in the wilderness."

How Farmer "disposed" of these is not stated; but Cooper disposes of two out of the three at once. "We will reserve," he says, "all discussion respecting Christ's temptation until we get farther on." Of the Witch of Endor he says: "She was an impostor, and therefore was affrighted when she saw Samuel, who miraculously appeared to Saul—not by her power, but by God's own appointment."

The consideration of the Magicians of Egypt forms the subject of the eighth chapter, in which Mr. Cooper professes to look "fully and fairly at the scripture history of the Plagues of Egypt, and of the deliverance of the Israelites from their Egyptian bondage." It is almost needless to say that both these events are assumed to be historical. As to the Bible statement that the Magicians of Egypt, in the first two plagues, "did so with their enchantments," our lecturer asserts that this means that they "did so with their juggleries"; for, he says, "they were not assisted by Satanic power: all they did was to play the part of low, paltry dissemblers and jugglers." And in proof of this assertion he quotes the following extract from Sharpe's History of Egypt:—

> "The magicians of Egypt, when they opposed Moses before Pharaoh, attempted to work whatever miracles he worked, and in some cases with apparent success. And at the present day their successors are still performing the same curious trick. The Egyptian juggler takes up in his hand the Naja, a small viper, and pressing a finger upon the nape of its neck, puts it into a catalepsy, which makes it motionless and stiff, like a rod; and when it regains its power of motion, the bystanders fancy that the magician's rod has been changed into a serpent."

Just so; and now we know how Moses and Aaron did the trick—or were supposed to have done it. For, assuming Sharpe's story to be true, no one can deny that Moses and Aaron, who had lived at least forty years in Egypt, would be able to do the trick quite as cleverly as Pharaoh's magicians. In concluding this portion of his "verity," Mr. Cooper says: "We have considered earnestly, and I trust conclusively, the unfoundedness of the aspersion that the Bible ascribes miracles to Satan as well as to God"—which statement, he assumes, ought to settle the matter. But in this he is mistaken. We have first to take into consideration passages like the following:—

> Job ii. 6, 7.—"The Lord said unto Satan, Behold, he is in thine hand; only spare his life. So Satan went forth.....and smote Job with sore boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown."
> Rev. xii. 9.—"And the great Dragon was cast down, the old Serpent, he that is called the Devil and Satan, the deceiver of the whole world."
>
> Rev. xii. 15.—"the Serpent cast out of his mouth water as a river after the woman, that he might cause her to be carried away by the stream."
>
> Rev. xiii. 4, 13.—"And they worshiped the Dragon which gave power unto the beast.....And he doeth great wonders, so that he maketh the fire come down from heaven upon the earth in the sight of men. And he deceived them.....by the miracles which he had power to do."
>
> Rev. xvi. 14—"for they are spirits of demons working miracles," etc.
>
> 2 Thess. ii. 9.—"he whose coming is according to the working of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders," etc.
>
> 2 Cor. xi. 14.—"for even Satan himself transforms himself into an angel of light."
>
> Acts xvi. 16—18.—"a certain maid having a spirit of divination.....Paul said to the spirit, I charge thee .....to come out of her."
>
> Matt. xxiv. 24—"There shall arise false Christs and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders; so as to lead astray, if possible, even the elect."
>
> Luke xiii. 11, 16—"a woman which had a spirit of infirmity.....bowed together, and could in no way lift herself up.....whom Satan hath bound.....lo these eighteen years."
> Matt. ix. 32, 33.—"a dumb man possessed with a demon. And when the demon was cast out, the dumb man spake."

From the foregoing, and many other passages, there can be no doubt that Satan and his army are represented as working miracles. In the last two examples the evil spirit within the woman had the power to keep her in a crouched position; in the second case the demon, by the exercise of his power, was able to prevent the man speaking: in each case the casting out of the "unclean spirit" restored the possessed persons to their normal condition. It should also be stated that the Greek word semeion, translated "sign" in some of the foregoing passages, is used in describing miracles of Jesus in the Gospels (e.g., Luke xxiii. 8; John iv. 54; x. 41).

What, now, are we to say of "the unfoundedness of the aspersion that the Bible ascribes miracles to Satan as well as to God"? The passages here adduced were, of course, among those which Hugh Farmer "disposed of" in his 260 pages of "rich scholarship and clear reasoning." One paper more, and I have done with Thomas Cooper.

ABRACADABRA.

Bible Makers.—I.

EMERSON says that "the sacred books of each nation express for each the supreme result of their experience." This is undoubtedly true. By reference to the sacred writings of a people we can, to a very large extent, form a correct estimate of their intellectual and moral advancement. A Bible, in fact, should be the result of the joint labors of the best scientist, moralist, historian, poet, dramatist, and novelist of the time in which it is written.

Not that these eminent personages should collaborate to produce a book, as dramatic authors do, nowadays, a play—one supplying the plot, another the dialogue, and, in some instances, a third being called in to compose some music for a song or two for the low comedy artist to display the versatility of his talent, and in some degree to relieve the heavy character of the play; but each writer supplying, independent of the other, essays on those subjects with which he feels himself most conversant, sometimes venturing an opinion on matters upon which his knowledge is of the scantiest kind.

Moses, or whoever the author of the Pentateuch may have been, belonged to that class of versatile writers sometimes to be found on the staff of our daily journals, who feel themselves competent to write on all subjects in heaven above and earth beneath; who can, with ease, polish off an article to refute Darwin, turn Mill's logic inside out, expose its many weaknesses, and, as a light diversion, pulverise the arguments in the latest speech of Mr. Lloyd George into the most minute particles of rubbish it is possible to conceive, and with one whiff of journalistic wisdom scatter all that remains to the four winds of heaven. Accordingly, we find Moses figuring first as a scientist, then as an historian, then as a biographer; next, after bringing the children of Egypt safely through the Red Sea, as a poet; and lastly, as a great moral teacher.

Of course, it would be unreasonable to expect Moses to write ahead of the times in which he lived, whatever they were, unless, like the theologian, we credit him with being divinely inspired—a claim which, as far as I can judge, he never put forward on his own behalf.

When Moses, on his own responsibility, made Jahveh create the earth in six days, throw into the infinite expanse the sun, moon, and stars, and finally make man and woman after his own image, he merely reflected the current beliefs of the best informed persons of his time. Had he done more than this he would not have succeeded in pleasing the people for whom he wrote, and to be a successful man even in one's own day is no small task; it is indeed to gain a position after which many strive very arduously, but which few manage to attain. To be successful through the ages, to win the admiration of the people as they increase in wisdom and goodness, is given only to a few men of rare genius, whose works shed imperishable lustre upon the nation in which they are born, only that it may spread through various sources to all the peoples of the earth.

"Sufficient for the day is the success thereof" is the motto of most men of the world. A popular dramatist of my acquaintance, upon being spoken to by a friend, some time ago, upon the unenduring character of his work, and asked why he did not consider the judgment posterity would pronounce upon it, caustically replied: "What do I care for posterity? Posterity does not pay me." And Moses and others among the Biblical writers regarded posterity with the same air of supercilious disregard, having seemingly much more care for the certain popularity of the hour than the enduring regard of subsequent generations. Not alone in his unscientific disquisitions did Moses show that he did not possess an idea above the common prevailing sentiments of the Jewish people, but he told them to act towards slaves and blasphemers in precisely the way we may fairly suppose they would have chosen to act when left to be guided by their own uncultivated feelings and judgment. He told them to buy slaves "of the heathen round about them," and to brutally ill-treat them if it pleased them so to do. He commanded them not to "suffer a witch to live" and to barbarously stone blasphemers to death.

Mahomet, in establishing a new religion, many years later, was equally careful in the Koran (chapter entitled "The Cow") to warn his followers of the fate of unbelievers, who, he said, would not believe, whether they were admonished or not.

In his poetical efforts Moses was singularly tame; he sang not the song of love or labor, but of strife and warfare; it lacked the true poetic ring. But if his poetry was bad, his history was worse. When he records the doings of the Israelites, even though he himself is Commander-in-chief, priest, and deliverer, he writes a comedy of errors which at last degenerates into the broadest of farce. His tragic seriousness is drily and unconsciously humorous; so much so that I can fancy the late Mr. Compton causing shouts of merriment over the solemn delivery of Moses' inimitably grotesque account of the plagues.

Even when he is describing such a sad and shameful occurrence as the Flood—a God-wrought crime unparalleled in the world for its vindictiveness and cruelty—he gives Noah the stupendous task of collecting all the animals prior to packing them as "close as herrings" in the ark, and the tragedy is unnecessarily delayed while this unspeakably comic business is enacted.

As to Moses' biographical sketches, they are sadly wanting in many important respects. He does not give us a particle of information concerning the earlier life of Abraham, Isaac, or Jacob, though we should be much better able to estimate their qualities if we knew how they were trained, who were their instructors and companions, and what were the social conditions by which they were surrounded. He gives us an account of such unimportant affairs as the quarrels of Abraham's and Lot's servants, of Jacob's dream, and the angel's acrobatic performances on the ladder; but of the career of the magnanimous Esau he supplies us only with the faintest possible outline.

As a writer of unconsciously grotesque and amusing narrative, Moses was, perhaps, the equal of any of the Biblical writers. Nothing can surpass in this respect the story of Balaam's visit to Balak on the talkative donkey, except, perhaps, the account of his own death and burial. But, taken altogether, in spite of its many imperfections of style and its ludicrous stories, its tales of vice and crime and bloodshed, the Pentateuch is exceedingly interesting reading, especially to the Freethinker, who, discarding the silly notion of Divine inspiration, is better able to estimate its true value as indicating the moral and intellectual advancement of a people who, though they plume themselves on being "the chosen people of God," have been the most unfortunate among the races of men.

Little Clarence: "Pa!" Mr. Callipers: "Eh!" Little Clarence: "Pa, does a woman preacher kiss the bride or the groom after marrying 'em?"

A MIRACLE DEFINED.

There's Mick M'Brierty, he has bothered the life out of ould Priest M'Guire for an explanation of how a miracle can be wrought; and he couldn't have come to a better hand, for it's his raverence that has got the larning, the logic, the metaphysics, the faith, and a big share of the practice that's necessary to distinguish between what's natural and what's supernatural. And, in troth, it's no child's play a clargyman has when he begins to chop up logic to a boy with a head on him like a hatter's block, and that doesn't know a B from a bull's fut; it's just another case of dropping your pearls in the pig market. But his raverence took a good, old-fashioned homely way of explaining to Mick; for you know there's a deal of people in the world whose feelings are more to be depended on than their judgments. So his raverence told Mick to stand up and step to the door, and, as he moved off, he gave him a tight lifter with the toe of his boot, asking him at the same time if he felt that! Mick turned round, with a lip on him like a motherless foal, and said, "Begorra! I rather think I do." "Well," said his raverence, "it would have been a miracle if you hadn't." So Mick's faith is confirmed, but he says he'll study no more at the seat of larning.

The squire's son had just been ordained, and on the following Sunday he was to take the morning service in his native village. He was a young man, and very nervous; however, he did his best, and returned to the vestry, having accomplished the service to his own satisfaction. "I think I got through the service without a mistake, John," he remarked to the old clerk, who was helping him off with his surplice. "It was first rate, Master Dick," said the old man, with enthusiasm; "I don't know as I ever heard it better done." After a pause he added: "But the old parson, he never gives us the evening service of a morning!"

One fine Sunday morning a tourist arrived at a kirk in Argyleshire, intending to enter for the English service as soon as the Gaelic was over. "Is the Gaelic service over?" he inquired of the beadle. "No; but it will not be very long." So the tourist strolled on into the churchyard, where the tombstones lay deep in the long grass. By-and-bye he was recalled by the shouts of the beadle, who stood at the door waving to him. "But is the Gaelic service over?" he asked once more. "Oh, ay! it will be over." "But I have not seen the congregation; which way did it go?" The beadle directed his attention to a solitary figure slowly wending his way up the hill, and said, "That's him."

A sky-pilot, seeing a carpenter at work, who boasted of his skill, said, "Do you think you could make me a devil?" "Why, yes," said the man. "Put up your foot; you want the least alteration of any man I ever saw."

Rev. Dr. Primrose: "This is the first time I've seen you in church in over a year, Sambo. I'm glad you have reformed this blessed Thanksgiving season."

Sambo: "Yis, sah, I'se feel thankful to de Lord that he didn't let dat spring-gun go off las' night."

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to spread education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

THE
Freethinker
Edited by G. W. FOOTE.

VOL. XXXIV.—NO. 32 SUNDAY, AUGUST 9, 1914 PRICE TWOPENCE

The poet's verse slides into the current of our blood. We read them when young; we remember them when old.
—WILLIAM HAZLITT.

The War of Wars.

"What fools these mortals be."
—SHAKESPEARE.

"And all our yesterday's have lighted fools
The way to dusty death." —SHAKESPEARE.

THE first common characteristic of men is their mortality. A genius like Shakespeare's could not miss this fact. But one could imagine even the Master hesitating about the next attribute that marks them all. With his usual felicity he hit upon the absolutely right word. It was their folly. They were fools. The exceptions were not numerous enough to justify any qualifications. And even the wisest men have some folly in them. Most men are far from being wise, but the wisest men are to a certain extent fools. So the one description that fitted all men was "fools."

It is human folly that keeps war going at this time of day. Carlyle said all sorts of things in his later years, but he saw the facts clearly enough in the first flash of his young genius, when he wrote Sartor Resartus:—

> "What, speaking in quite unofficial language, is the net-purport and upshot of war? To my own knowledge, for example, there dwell and toil, in the British village of Dumdrudge, usually some five hundred souls. From these, by certain 'Natural Enemies' of the French there are successively selected, during the French war, say thirty able-bodied men. Dumdrudge, at her own expense, has suckled and nursed them; she has, not without difficulty and sorrow, fed them up to manhood, and even trained them to crafts, so that one can weave, another build, another hammer, and the weakest can stand under thirty stone avoirdupois. Nevertheless, amid much weeping and swearing, they are selected; all dressed in red; and shipped away, at the public charges, some two thousand miles, or say only to the South of Spain; and fed there till wanted. And now to that same spot in the South of Spain are thirty similar French artisans, from a French Dumdrudge, in like manner wending; till at length, after infinite effort, the two parties come into actual juxtaposition; and Thirty stands fronting Thirty, each with a gun in his hand. Straightway the word 'Fire!' is given, and they blow the souls out of one another; and in place of sixty brisk useful craftsmen, the world has sixty dead carcases, which it must bury, and anew shed tears for. Had these men any quarrel? Busy as the Devil is, not the smallest; nay, in so wide a Universe, there was even, unconsciously, by commerce, some mutual helpfulness between them. How then? Simpleton! their Governors had fallen out; and instead of shooting one another, had the cunning to make these poor blockheads shoot."

Where there are plenty of flats, of course, there will be a numerous supply of sharpers. Man's natural taste for fighting has been fostered, not only by his governors, but by his "spiritual" advisers. Priests have been among the loudest beaters of the war-drum. Even poets, (a much higher species), when under the influence of religion, have been known to utter the most blatant nonsense. Wordsworth (but not in his youth) dared to address "God" in this fashion:—

> "But thy most dreaded instrument
> In working out a pure intent
> Is man—arrayed for mutual slaughter;
> Yea, Carnage is thy daughter."

This was splendidly answered by Shelley in "Peter Bell the Third," but the pithiest comment was made by Byron:—

> "Carnage—so Wordsworth tells us, is God's daughter;
> If he speak truth, she is Christ's sister."

[By the way, we suspect the accuracy of this quotation, but we have not a Byron by us at the moment, and cannot check it—though we are sure it does not misrepresent the original.]

Christianity has governed Europe for ever so many centuries; governed it by something stronger than physical force,—by moulding the child's mind, and practising upon the future hopes and fears of adults. And this is what it has brought us to! The great Christian nations are flying at each other's throats. It is something like the prophesied Armageddon. And their "God," if he answers their mutually antagonistic prayers at all, may act upon one of the promises in his own book, which they appear to have forgotten:—

> "I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh; when your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind.....then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer" (Proverbs i. 26-28).

Anyhow, here we are, after nearly two thousand years of "peace on earth, and good will towards men," with nearly all the foremost nations Christian, and most of them hating each other, and rushing into a ghastly war of such colossal proportions as the world has never hitherto seen.

Meanwhile the "unspeakable" Turk drinks his coffee and smokes his cigarette or hookah, and smiles at the Christians who were always reading him lessons or interfering more practically with his business. He looked forward to this. He knew them better than they knew themselves. He understood the worth of their fine maxims and the value of their noble professions. They were always putting his house in order. Now it will take them all their time to look after their own.

"There's to be war" shouted a crowd of fools gleefully at the bandstand on the front of a popular seaside town on Monday evening as the strains of "Rule, Britannia!" the "Marseillaise" and "God Save the King" streamed on the summer air. They rejoiced! But those who know what war is, and were shocked at the prospect of all Europe being engaged in it, felt almost inclined to cry with Shakespeare's Northumberland:—

> "Let heaven kiss earth! Now let not Nature's hand
> Keep the wild flood confined! Let order die!
> And let this world no longer be a stage
> To feed Contention in a lingering act;
> But let one spirit of the first-born Cain
> Reign in all bosoms, that, each heart being set
> On bloody courses, the rude scene may end,
> And darkness be the burier of the dead!"

Christianity is at once too good, so to speak, and too bad for mankind. Its evil teaching has filled the world with humiliation and misery. Its good teaching is of the impossible kind. It aims at too much and hits nothing. "Love your enemies" is an impracticable maxim. Confucius taught the better plan of giving them justice. G. W. FOOTE.

Liverpool and the Slave Trade.

THE stock claim that Christianity abolished slavery is still urged by all classes of Christian apologists, and in other directions many writers in the course of their historical or sociological studies repeat the claim, obviously without ever having troubled to test its accuracy. The mere persistence of slavery in Christian countries until a very modern date should alone be enough to show the falsity of such a statement. True, vague generalisations concerning the equality of mankind may be cited from Christian writers, but as the same may be cited from non-Christian writers and pre-Christian writers, the honors are here equal. True, also, that slavery existed in pre-Christian times contemporary with teachings that, apparently, made for the destruction of slavery, but it also continued to exist in Christian times—and under worse conditions—so that the claim that Christianity either abolished slavery or bettered the condition of the slave is again negatived. Moreover, wherever Christian people went they carried slavery with them, as, for example, the early North American settlers, who established slavery in a land where it was previously non-existent. And, finally, it has to be always borne in mind that the modern African slave trade, which most people have in mind when they talk about slavery, was of Christian creation. It was begun by Christians, carried on by Christians, and if some Christians at last worked for its abolition, it was the opposition of other Christians that made their work necessary and difficult.

Some years ago I wrote a couple of articles in the Freethinker dealing exclusively with the relations of the Methodist Church to slavery, in which I showed that its members were among its most enthusiastic supporters. On the present occasion I purpose dealing exclusively with the Christian City of Liverpool, one of the strongest centres of the British slave trade. This has been suggested by a recent article in the Syren—a journal devoted to the shipping interests. The anonymous writer of the article appears to have derived his information—although he fails to make due acknowledgment—from a work on The Liverpool Slave Trade, by a writer who veils himself under the pen-name of "Dicky Sam." But both writers leave much unsaid that deserves to be said, and it is partly to make these necessary additions that I am now writing.

It must, of course, be borne in mind that the English slave trade did not originate with either Liverpool or the other slave port, Bristol. The buying and selling of slaves has existed in all stages of English history. Green, in spite of his obvious Christian bias, is compelled to record that the Church promoted emancipation on all estates but its own, and there was a very obvious policy in the Church advising other landowners to liberate their slaves. So also he points out that in the time of Henry the Second, Ireland was filled with Englishmen that had been kidnapped and sold into slavery, while more than one great English noble during the Middle Ages added to his wealth by breeding slaves for the market. No one felt that in so doing he was outraging either the spirit or the letter of Christian teaching, and whatever the Church may have advised as a matter of policy in particular cases, it never denounced slavery as un-Christian or anti-Christian.

The English participation in the Black Slave Trade—inaugurated after the discovery of North and South America—dates from the time of Elizabeth. A monopoly of the slave traffic had originally been granted to the Belgians; but it was afterwards acquired by the Genoese, who shared it with other nations. All this was with the direct sanction of the Christian Church. "She," says Lecky, "reorganised the accursed institution of slavery on a gigantic scale, and in a form that was, in some respects, worse than any that had before existed." Sir John Hawkins was the first Englishman to engage in the traffic. One of his ships was supplied by Queen Elizabeth, who eagerly pocketed her share of the profits, while salving her conscience with advice concerning the traffic which she perfectly well knew was unheeded.

The next important step in the history of the English slave trade came with the revocation of the monopoly of Assiento Company in 1698, which threw open the African trade. From that date the traffic advanced by leaps and bounds, and it was evidently considered of great importance, as it was specially stipulated in the treaty of Utrecht (1713) that England should be allowed to supply her own colonies with slaves, and also the Spanish-American colonies. For some years the two ports engaged in the slave trade were London and Bristol. Gradually, Bristol—always a very pious city—took the lead over the metropolis. At the commencement of the eighteenth century, London had over a hundred vessels in the African slave trade. About five years later only fifty, and a little later only thirty. On the other hand, from 1701 to 1732, the number of ships that left Bristol for the slave coast, annually averaged about sixty.

The first slave vessel that left the Mersey was in 1709, and carried only fifteen slaves from Africa to the West Indies. But the profits—judging from the rapid increase in the traffic—must have been very great, for by 1714, only five years later, more than half the vessels engaged in the trade belonged to Liverpool, and it was calculated that Liverpool ships imported three-sevenths of all the slaves carried by Europeans. The following figures were soon after officially laid before the House of Commons, detailing the number of slaves imported from Africa by the subjects of various European States—Great Britain 88,000, Holland 4,000, Portugal 10,000 Denmark 2,000, France 20,000—thus giving slightly more than half to Christian England. Later in the century, the figures appear to have undergone an increase. Thus, in 1795, one-fourth of the ships belonging to the port of Liverpool were engaged in the slave trade, the actual increase being from 15 ships in 1730, to 136 in 1792. The traffic underwent a still greater increase prior to its abolition. From January, 1806, to May, 1807, no less than 185 Liverpool owned slave vessels left Africa with a slave-carrying capacity of nearly 50,000.

I have said above that the traffic yielded enormous profits. The actual cost of a slave on the West Coast of Africa—the cost, that is, to secure; because a very large part of the business was pure kidnapping—ranged from £15 to £35. The selling price would be anything from £50 to £100, depending upon the age, health, and general condition of the "goods." The net gain on the slave traffic appears to have been upward of 60 per cent. From a contemporary calculation, cited by "Dicky Sam," we learn that in 1786, "The own of Liverpool returned a net profit of £298,462 sterling, and that during eleven years the gains on 303,737 slaves was £2,361,455 6s. 1d., or, on an average, two hundred and fourteen thousand, six hundred and seventy-seven pounds, fifteen shillings, and one penny per annum." It is small wonder that G. F. Cooke, the tragedian, on being hissed by a Liverpool audience, retorted "I have not come here to be insulted by a set of wretches, of which every brick in your infernal town has been cemented by an African's blood."

At the commencement of the British slave trade there does not appear to have been any regulations concerning the carrying of slaves. It was, on the face of it, to the owner's interest to lose as few slaves as possible by death, and to get them to their journey's end in as good a condition as possible. But the obviously sensible course in such matters does not appear to have been always—perhaps not generally—followed, and legislation on the subject appears. A ship of 300 tons was allowed to carry 600 slaves, with a crew of 50. But these regulations seem to have been only nominal. Thus the work from which I have already quoted gives the actual dimensions of a famous slave ship, the Brooks, with a large folding plate illustrating the stowing of the slaves. The vessel was of 297 tons, and was allowed to carry 450 persons. As a matter of fact, she had carried 351 men, 127 women, 90 boys, and 41 girls—a total of 609. The length of the lower deck on which the slaves were carried was only 100 ft., and in this space the slaves were packed without regard for health or decency. It was customary, says the writer in the Syren, to allow 6 ft. by 1 ft. 4 in. for a man, 5 ft. by 1 ft. 4 in. for a woman, 5 ft. by 1 ft. 2 in. for a boy, and 4 ft. 6 in. by 1 ft. for a girl. Had they been measured for coffins, not much less space could have been allowed; and coffins these ships often were. In fact, in some cases it was only possible for the slaves to lie down to sleep by arranging them alternately head to feet.

> "So close were they, you could not walk without treading on them; but they were only slaves. One kind-hearted sailor, when passing over them, would remove his shoes, so as not to hurt them. So close and foul was the stench arising from the negroes, they have been known to be put down the hold strong and healthy at night, and have been dead in the morning. A trader stated that, after remaining ten minutes in the hold, his shirt was as wet as if it had been in a bucket of water."

In the case of one Liverpool ship, the Thomas, carrying 630 slaves, 100 died on the voyage; but as the remaining 530 sold at Jamaica at £60 per head, the owners were doubtless well satisfied with the trip. In some cases, however, the mortality was much greater—running to fifty out of every hundred. All the slaves were not sold abroad; some were disposed of in Liverpool. Thus, an old Liverpool Chronicle advertises:—

> "A fine negro boy, to be sold by auction. He is eleven years of age; the auction will take place at the Merchant's Coffee House, Old Church Yard. By order of Mr. Thomas Yates, who hath imported him from Bonney."

The Liverpool Advertiser (of 1765) also announces:—

> "To be sold by auction, at George's Coffee House, betwixt the hours of six and eight o'clock, a very fine negro girl, about 8 years of age; very healthy."

Also, under date of September 8, 1766:—

> "To be sold, at the Exchange Coffee House, Water-street, at one o'clock precisely, eleven negroes, imported per the Angola."

In the colonial papers long lists of runaway slaves were advertised, most of them branded like so many cattle. The following will serve as specimens: "Robert, R.P. on each cheek, and Kingston, marked Yorke on each shoulder and breast." Another is branded with "a cattle mark." "An old woman with her two sons and two daughters, one of them very big child." One man is to be recognised by his having had "both ears cropt"; another by having had "his nose and ears cut off." Another advertisement runs, "Escaped on Sunday last with a chain and collar round his neck a negro man, marked T.Y." Another, after carefully describing a runaway slave girl, concludes by saying, "Whoever will apprehend the said wench, alive or dead, receive two moidores reward from Joseph Charles Howard."

Tutiorism.

STRANGE terms, expressive of strange opinions, abound in Christian theology. Tutiorism, for example, is by no means a pretty and attractive word, nor is the doctrine for which it stands morally reliable; and yet Tutiorism has the official sanction of the Holy See. The word is formed from tutior, the comparative of tutus, which means safe, sure. A man may believe that a certain action is morally right, and yet may refrain from committing it if convinced that the commission will lead him to the brink of danger or disaster, or he may be of opinion that a specific line of conduct is in itself bad, but that in some circumstances he may pursue it without incurring any real guilt. Equivocation is never indulged in except for the purpose of deceit, but Liguori taught "that it is lawful for a just cause to use equivocation, and to confirm it with an oath." If a lie will serve the good cause better than the truth, then it is permissible to lie. If the motive is noble, almost any deed that springs from it is justifiable. A criminal makes a full confession to a priest, who may deny on oath that he possesses any knowledge whatever of the crime. An accused or a witness, if irregularly questioned by the judge in court, may swear that he knows nothing of a crime of which in truth he has intimate knowledge. If a man is needy, he may make away with property due to his creditors, and assure the judge that he has nothing. We are informed that "men and women servants may secretly pilfer from their employers to compensate themselves for their work, which they account as of more value than the wages they receive." This proposition was censured by the Pope, but the casuists managed to safeguard in various ways the principle therein enunciated. A promise is binding only when confirmed with an oath or a formal document, in the absence of which it may be considered a mistake or a jest.

The above are a few of the casuistical cases discussed in Liguori's Moral Theology. This divine flourished in a period (1696-1787) when multitudes of people were alienated from the Church, and maintained an attitude of utter indifference and coldness towards religion itself. It was Liguori's belief that the teachings of the rigorists were calculated to drive the laity further away still from what he regarded as the truth of God. He wanted to win them back by means of gentleness and leniency. As Mr. Littledale puts it:—

> "He professed to steer a middle course between errors of laxity and severity in moral teaching, and fully believed himself to have done so, yet in fact such a treatment was impossible to one who viewed the question as he did. For, while he regarded errors on the side of laxity as pardonable mistakes committed through excess of zeal in winning over penitents, contrariwise he looked on the stricter method of the rigorists, who upheld a loftier morality, as not merely inexpedient, but as positively and intentionally evil, as designed to make religion odious by making it impossible, and so to prepare the way for the triumph of unbelief. He identified all teaching of the sort with Jansenism, and Jansenism, from its resistance to various pontifical decrees, seemed to him all but equivalent to Atheism" (Encyclopædia Britannica, vol. xiv., pp. 635-6).

It follows from the above extract, as Mr. Littledale himself points out, that the line Liguori "draws is not, what he probably thought it, an intermediate one between rigorism and laxity, but between a greater and a lesser degree of laxity." What, then, is Tutiorism? In the same gentleman's words, this:—

> "When a doubt arises as to the binding force of some divine or human precept in any given case, it is permissible to abandon the opinion in favor of obedience to the law—technically known as the 'safe' (tuta) opinion, for that which favors non-compliance, provided this laxer opinion be 'probable.'"

Thus we see that Tutiorism was a device to make the confessional a centre of attraction, and so draw the people back into the Catholic Church, which had been so seriously weakened by the Protestant Reformation. It was an attempt to accommodate the moral law, as conceived by the ecclesiastical authorities, to the requirements of the new times with their altered conditions. The Jesuits felt that no stone should be left unturned in the endeavor to recover the ground already lost. Opinions were, of course, most important, but it was given out that a layman could not be disciplined for following any opinion that had the sanction of even one doctor of divinity. Indeed, the confessor was instructed to assure him that he was guiltless, and would receive the heartiest welcome on his return to the Holy Mother Church. It is a well-known fact that Christianity is the most accommodating of all religions. Her rites and ceremonies, as well as dogmas, are amazingly adaptable. She makes herself all things to all men in the hope of securing their allegiance.

Reconstruction is a process that she is perpetually undergoing. The interpretations of the so-called sayings of Jesus are countless, and scarcely any two of them agree. If Jesus were to return to life he would be completely astounded at the extraordinary statements made in his name by those who call themselves his servants. Her champions are not aware, however, that Christianity, like everything else, is subject to the law of evolution. For many centuries she kept slowly ascending towards the zenith of her power, where she remained for a long period, ruling with a rod of iron over every department of human life, and then, with the revival of letters and the birth of modern science, she began, very slowly at first, to descend towards death and the grave. She is now in a state of senile decay, tottering to her end, a fact which her professional defenders are exceedingly loath to recognise.

In the Church Times a series of articles has recently appeared on the validity of clerical orders, or holy orders as Anglicans call them. Among the writers are the Revs. T. A. Lacey and Dr. Wotherspoon, the former representing Anglicanism and the latter Presbyterianism. Dr. Wotherspoon has "no hesitation in assenting to the validity of Anglican Orders," while Mr. Lacey has the hardihood to declare that "there is no sufficient certainty that Presbyterian ministers are validly ordained." But what connection is there between the validity of ordination and Tutiorism? Here is Mr. Lacey's answer:—

> "Tutiorism is the judgment that some things of doubtful necessity must be done for the sake of assurance.....There are two reasons for the judgment. In the first place, the thing in doubt may be required by Divine appointment. In the second place, a sacrament being a pledge of assurance, the thing in doubt must be provided because some will not be assured without it; we must do what seems to be necessary. So only can we have that certainty of the bestowal of grace which a sacrament is intended to convey. It follows that a thing which theologians know to be not strictly necessary may rightly be required by the practical judgment of the Church for the sake of the less instructed."

Now, what is the thing of doubtful necessity which must be required to have the certainty of the bestowal of grace through a sacrament? The celebration of the sacrament by a validly ordained minister. Mr. Lacey fails to find "sufficient certainty that Presbyterian ministers are validly ordained." That is to say, they lack episcopal ordination, with the result that if Mr. Lacey were to receive the communion from one of them no Divine grace would flow into his heart. This is the reason why there can never be intercommunion between the Anglican and Scottish Churches. Well, is there sufficient certainty that Mr. Lacey is validly ordained? We challenge him to produce it. Was St. Paul validly ordained? It is not on record that he was ordained at all. There is ample certainty that he was not episcopally ordained. Furthermore, the largest Church in the world is fully convinced that there is no sufficient certainty of the validity of the ordination of Anglican ministers. The controversy is irresistibly laughable, the fact being that all religious ordinations are alike farcical, and the bestowal of grace through a sacrament a figment of the fancy. The reverend gentlemen are engaged in a vain controversy over mere shadows. The Pope denies the validity of all non-Catholic ordinations, the Archbishop of Canterbury admits the validity of Catholic orders, but repudiates that of the ordination of Nonconformist ministers, while we regard all ordinations as deceitful ceremonies. Such is our position, and neither the Pope of Rome nor the Archbishop of Canterbury is in possession of a single fact that discredits it. All religious rites and ceremonies are nothing but vain shows, doing nobody any good whatever.

Tutiorism is a theological absurdity which has never been of service to any Church. Whether we take the word in Mr. Lacey's sense, or whether we apply it to the moral teaching of Liguori, it has no use at all for us. As Mr. Lacey admits, it would be difficult to invent an uglier word, or one formed etymologically on a worse model, and without a moment's hesitation we dismiss both it and what it stands for.

The Origin of Supernatural Ideas.—III.

> "Not only is Fetish or Shamanism the real religion of criminals, but of vast numbers who are not suspected of it. There is not a town in England or in Europe in which witchcraft is not extensively practised. The prehistoric man exists, he is still to be found everywhere by millions, he will cling to the old witchcraft of his ancestors, the only form in which he can realise supernaturalism will be by means of superstition. Research and reflection have taught us that this sorcery is far more widely extended than any person dreams. It would seem as if by some strange process, while advanced scientists are occupied in eliminating magic from religion, the coarser mind is actually busy in reducing it to religion only."—C. G. LELAND, Gipsy Sorcery (1891), p. 13.
>
> "In civilised society most educated people are not even aware of the extent to which these relics of savage ignorance survive at their doors."
>
> "If we examine the superstitious beliefs which are tacitly held by many of our fellow-countrymen, we shall find, perhaps to our surprise, that it is precisely the oldest and crudest superstitions which are most tenacious of life, while views which, though also erroneous, are more modern and refined, soon fade from the popular memory."—PROFESSOR J. G. FRAZER, Psyche's Task, pp. 169-170.

AS Professor Leuba remarks:—

> "It is well known that long before a child asks 'how?' he wearies his guardians with the question, 'what for?' He wants to know what things are good for, and, in particular, what he can do with them before he cares for an understanding of their origin and of their mechanism."*

In like manner, primitive man was more occupied in finding out what things were good for, than the origin of them. We picture primitive man, says Guyau as "perpetually endeavoring to satisfy a restless curiosity. Unhappily, if we are to trust our experience of the lower races of man, it appears that the sentiment of curiosity decreases directly as one approaches the savage state."†

As Mr. Edward Clodd remarks, in his valuable little book on Animism, "We are beset behind and before with the impossibility of putting ourselves in man's place at the period when, of necessity, he looked on nature with other eyes than ours."‡

There was no natural, or supernatural, for primitive man. We know that things do not happen by chance or haphazard. We know that there is a natural explanation of a storm, or an earthquake, or an eclipse of the moon, and so forth. But primitive man, like the animal, knew nothing of this. He had no idea of natural causation. Anything might happen, and he would accept it just as the animal does. If it was alarming, he would fear it, in the same manner. To cite Mr. Clodd again, who, dealing with the "barbaric intelligence," observes:—

> "A Zulu well expressed its limitations to one of the most sympathetic and discerning of missionaries, the late Bishop Callaway, in these words: 'Our knowledge does not urge us to search out the roots of it, we do not try to see them; if anyone thinks over so little, he soon gives it up, and passes on to what he sees with his eyes, and he does not understand the real state of even what he sees.'"§

Although the animal, like man, as we have seen, has a sense of the uncanny, and the fear of the unknown, which is the germ of the supernatural, yet the limitations of its reasoning powers and the absence of language to express abstract concepts, prevents it from evolving any definite supernatural ideas. As Mr. King justly remarks, "As far as we can judge, no animal has any idea of luck, or ill-luck, as abstract conceptions; certainly, no animal utilises amulets."‖ It is here that man begins to diverge from the animal, and takes the first step towards the evolution of those supernatural ideas that have been, and are now, a curse and a hindrance to his progress. We believe that Mr. King is right when he contends that the idea of luck was the first form in which primitive man arrived at the idea of the supernatural. He speaks of it as "an inherent organic, or if we will, mental attribute," and declares "A man, as ordinarily formulated, can no more withhold the sentiment of luck from an object than he can the image of its visual presentation."* And, further:—

> "Forms of luck, therefore, are the earliest germs of religion; they are the basis of all religions."
> "Baal had his thousands and Yahveh his ten thousands, but luck reigns triumphant in the souls of myriads. It was so in the past, it is so in the present, it is denoted in the attire, it is indirectly indicated in trifles, in amulets, in objects for seeming use, but really retained as bringing good luck."
>
> "The concept of luck might have existed had no ghost presentation ever occurred, no spirit sentiment been ever evolved, or the capacity to conceive the ghost theory been ever dormant in the human mind. .....It is the only form of faith that is essentially individual; it knows no church or priest, its only temple the mind of its presenter, to which all things and all thoughts may be ministering powers" (pp. 91, 99, 97).

In opposition to Dr. Tylor, the same writer points out:—

> "No one ever prays to an amulet, no one treats the lucky stone as having a will, no one supposes that the curative material, whether a medicine or a charm, has any choice in the matter. Yet all these impersonal powers or attributes are classed by Dr. Tylor with, and as, ghost manifestations."

Lubbock and Spencer, as the same writer complains, also ignore the priority of luck. For them, the beginning of religion is the birth of the ghost. There is no indwelling spirit in a charm, amulet, or lucky stone; as Mr. King points out, "like a piece of coal it might lie inert in the earth to no end of time and only exhibit its active or presumed virtue when man utilised it." But when man had evolved the idea of luck, his feet were on the road leading to fetishes, idols, and gods. To cite Mr. King again, "Luck never needs the help of medicine-man or priest, it is only a self-influence; it was so when the savage had no spiritual concepts; it is so now. The man who turns the peak of his cap, changes his seat, or calls for a new pack of cards, expecting thereby to change his luck, is his own high priest in the oldest faith in the world. Such men rarely conceive of ghosts, never see apparitions, and have no knowledge of the interposition of Providence." And he cites St. Chrysostom as saying:—

> "This or that man was the first to meet me when I walked out, consequently innumerable ills will certainly befall me; that confounded servant of mine in giving me my shoes handed me the left shoe first; this indicates dire calamity and insults. As I stepped out, I started the left foot foremost; this, too, was a sign of misfortune; my right eye twitched upwards as I went out, this portends tears."

And, again, "Equally pregnant sentiments of luck influence all savage people." Dorman, in his Primitive Superstitions, writes:—

> "Among hunting tribes, the cawing of a crow at night would cause a large party of warriors to run for home and give up an expedition. The Comanches said the wolf warned them of danger: if one sprang up before them in their journeys and barked or hooted, they would turn aside and travel no more in that direction that day."†

"Among the northern tribes," says the same writer, "the march is regulated by a sorcerer, according to good or bad omens." The savage, through his ignorance of the uniformity of law, is continually making wrong inferences. Among ourselves, as our education proceeds, we get to know, more or less, "what sort of things may be inferred and what may not," says Professor Clifford:—

> "An observer of scientific mind takes note of just those things from which inferences may be drawn, and passes by the rest. If an astronomer, observing the sun, were to record the fact that at the moment when a sun spot began to shrink there was a rap at the front door, we should know that he was not up to his work."*

These are the kind of errors primitive man is always falling into. And not only primitive man, but ordinary common sense, practical, level-headed men make the same errors to-day.

I remember hearing, in a branch of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, a society which contains the flower of the skilled workers in this country, and reckons a Cabinet Minister† among its members, a member telling us that his son was being taken by the local football team, who were paying his expenses, as a mascot, to see them play their next match, because he had never seen them beaten—the inference being that as he had never, through some accident or another, been a witness of their defeat, therefore the team would always be victorious while he remained a spectator. And not a member present asked in what manner that could possibly affect the result!

I have just finished reading an article in this evening's paper, entitled "Is Superstition Reviving?" in which the writer mentions the story "of a famous American lacrosse team, who for many years maintained the orphan child of a deceased player under the belief that his presence ensured them victory." And, again, "One would think that motorists of all men would rise superior to such ideas. Yet the chassis is as often as not surmounted by a 'golliwog,' a 'bilikins,' or a 'teddy-bear.'" The same writer also mentions the fact that he knew a miner "who, if he met a cross-eyed woman on his way to work, would return home." The belief in the influence of the "evil eye" still flourishes. Dr. Haddon—Cambridge Lecturer in Ethnology—observes:—

> "'Eat not the bread of him that hath an evil eye' is just as much a maxim to-day as it was in the time of Solomon, and Mr. Elworthy says‡ in Naples, at the appearance of a person having this reputation, a cry of 'Jettatore!' is passed, and even in a crowded street it causes an instantaneous vanishing of everybody—a rush up entries, into shops, or elsewhere. Ever since the establishment of the religious orders, monks have had the special reputation of possessing the fatal influence. The last Pope but one, Pius the Ninth, was firmly believed to have had the evil eye. A Roman would candidly say: 'Nothing succeeds with anybody or anything when he wishes well to it.' When he went to St. Agnese to hold a great festival, down went the floor, and the people were all smashed together. Then he visited the column to the Madonna in the Piazza di Spagna, and blessed it and the workmen; of course, one fell from the scaffold the same day and killed himself."§

His Holiness appears to have been in the painful position of those unfortunate human typhoid germ-carriers who bring the disease to others without experiencing any ill-effects themselves. As Dr. Haddon remarks, "The belief in the evil eye is not only widely spread, but extremely ancient" (p. 33). Along with luck and magic, it existed long before any of the now dominant religions were evolved, or thought of; and will survive, among the ignorant and uneducated, long after the reigning religions are as dead as the myths of Egypt and Babylon. As the microscopic foraminifera, whose tiny shells formed the vast accumulations of chalk, uncounted ages ago, still exist, active as ever, in spite of all the changes of evolution, so do these deeply rooted forms of the supernatural survive, in spite of the progress of civilisation and science. Therefore, in reply to the journalist's question, "Is superstition reviving?" we should reply "No, it has never been dead yet."

Nor will it ever receive its death-blow from religion, for the same ideas flourish together in the minds of millions without the slightest contradiction.

Science is the real and only antidote to superstition. There is no foothold for superstition where science reigns, in spite of the fact that some scientists profess a belief in the supernatural. For instance, an analytical chemist may be a religious man, but not through any knowledge he has gained by chemical analysis. His belief is as purely a matter of faith as that of the lowliest Salvation Army tamborine player. When the chemist enters his laboratory and closes the door, he leaves all idea of the supernatural, of luck, and magic behind him. He knows that none of these things will affect the trembling balance weighing, in vacuum, to fractions of a grain. In like manner, the astronomer who tells us to a second, years in advance, when there will be an eclipse of the sun, knows that the most fervent prayer, or the most piteous supplication will have no effect on the issue. It is this knowledge of the inevitable reign of law which kills the spirit of superstition. It sterilises the soil from which the weeds of superstition spring.

Renan the Rebel.

Fragments Intimes et Romanesques. Par Ernest Renan. (Paris: Calmann-Levy; 1914.)

AT that magnificent collection of French art which was shown at the Franco-British Exhibition, there was one portrait which left an ineffaceable impression upon the memories of the onlookers. It was Bonnat's portrait of Ernest Renan, a masterpiece which presented the man with absolute sincerity. The picture was a triumph of genius, for the great Freethinker lived once more upon the artist's canvas. Renan was seated, clad in the black broadcloth of the scholar, unrelieved save for the red button of distinction, and the long, unkempt, grey hair. The heavy face, the pendolous cheeks, the glassy eyes of the dreamer of dreams, the long finger-nails, all formed a perfect portrait of a rare genius.

Renan never cared for the applause of the world; but he would have smiled his kindly smile if he had known that he was the subject of a great artist's finest masterpiece. And it is pleasant to think that we have a perfect presentation of the most accomplished author and scholar of his time.

Renan's influence has been continuous since the publication of his world-famous "Vie de Jesus," in which he attempted to write the life of the young Jew whom he had served in his childhood. What a tempest the book provoked! For years it rained pamphlets. Fifteen hundred replies were published within a few months of its appearance. Whether men applauded or criticised, none could deny its power. Priests might rail and the pious might sigh, but they both have had to reckon with it. Not even the most hidebound of the commentators on the Gospel legends have written as they would have written had Renan's book never been published. It was a famous victory, for Renan's method is as fatal to religion as Strauss's analytical thoroughness. Airily and daintily the scholarly Frenchman explained away the wonder and the glamor of the Christian fables. The result was as deadly as the frontal attack of the German scholar, although Renan does with a kindly smile what Strauss does grimly. Always under the velvet glove was the gauntlet of steel. The result was decisive, for it sapped the faith of tens of thousands:—

"While we believed on earth he went
And open stood his grave,
Men called from chamber, church, and tent,
And Christ was by to save.
Now he is dead. Far hence he lies
In the lorn Syrian town,
And on his grave, with shining eyes,
The Syrian stars look down."

The man who could alter the faith of thousands was a great writer as well as a complete scholar. In many hundreds of pages Renan showed the sarcastic power of the French language in hands that can evoke its subtleties and wield its trenchant blade. In his hands it was as effective a weapon as that handled by Gibbon, although many tracts in his thousand years of history seem as if they had been made to suit the great historian who wrote amid the acacias of Lausanne. With his scientific bent on the one side, and his clerical training on the other, Renan was still at heart Voltairean. He even suggests that Jesus in Gethsemane may have looked back with a sigh to the young maidens of Galilee who, under happier circumstances, might have made his bliss. The sentiment was popular, for many sympathetic lady readers of the Gospels have lamented that the hero was not a marrying man.

Renan's own pilgrimage from Rome to Reason is told in his own incomparable language in the volume before us. "Ernest and Beatrice" is a mere outline; but in it he tells the story of the suffering he endured as he shook off his beliefs; and the series of letters addressed to his young friend, the Abbe Liart, show step by step how he lost hold of his faith. In the final struggle, he is driven to the Bible and to Pascal. In Pascal he finds that "the greatest brain that ever existed hardly dared to affirm anything." How Renan's heartstrings were tugged, for his mother was looking forward to his ordination in happy security. As he afterwards tells us in the "Souvenirs," this was the most difficult knot to unravel. "I exerted all my ingenuity," he says, "in inventing ways of proving to her that I was still the good boy as in the past. Little by little the wound healed. When she saw me still good and kind to her, as I had always been, she owned that there were several ways of being a priest, and that nothing was altered in me but my dress, which was indeed the truth."

Renan was helped, too, by his brave sister Henriette, and the touching dedication of the "Vie de Jesus" expresses in a few sentences what he owed to her. The story of his mental development he afterwards retold in "Souvenirs," but that is the memory of a man looking back upon the past, with the sadness and fragrance of the days that are no more. Even in that book the most important episodes are those referred to in the present volume. For one thing emerges from all his writings, and that is his stern honesty. Truthful in his own despite, it was this quality that laid the foundation of his maturer influence and universal understanding. The real importance of such a man as Renan will be found not so much in what he discovered, but in the processes of his quest.

In all the little ironies of literature there are few things more interesting than that Renan's favorite subjects are chosen from a race of men, as he himself remarked, as different as possible from himself. But where his theme is one of the heroes of philosophy, Marcus Aurelius or Spinoza, his eye kindles and his smile is graver. For Renan was imperturbable. Through all the charlatanisms and deviltries of superstitions he went his way humming softly to himself. Far off, the murmur of the great world sounded but dimly; but the scholar wrote his books and brought his dreams within the realm of realities well content, for he knew that he worked at the looms of the future.

MIMNERMUS.

A CANDID CLERICAL CRITIC.

The Church is at best a schoolmaster—and a snobbish schoolmaster at that, for it only whips those who are found out. It has no bearing on life; is in no sort of touch with man's inward joys. The Church of England is excessively worldly; it is birdlimed by the world, awfully social, very respectable, without an ounce of blood—only a certain amount of red ink for its parchments. In this inhuman condition it is hopeless for it to appeal to man, who, after all, is a combination of mud and angel.—Rev. Hugh Chapman to the "Standard."

Acid Drops

When the Tsar called the first Peace Congress at the Hague we said that it reminded us of a Congress of Burglars considering how to diminish the costs and risks of the profession. Our view was soon justified by the Tsar's going to war with Japan. There was to have been a Peace Conference in Vienna in September, and the Emperor of Austria has anticipated it by declaring war against Servia. And they are all Christians; all Christians—the Turk being out of it this time; and, as a matter of fact, the Turk was the one moderating influence in the late Balkan war.

"I trust in Austria-Hungary's brave and devoted forces, and I trust in the Almighty to give the victory to my arms." Thus ended Emperor Francis Joseph's manifesto "To My People." The Tsar of Russia on the same day, looking forward to being on the opposite side in the same war, addressing some of his Army officers, said: "Trust in God and have faith in the glory and greatness of our mighty country." What bunkum on both sides! They fight each other and God fights for all of them. And whichever wins will give God some of the credit, and whichever loses will say nothing about his share in it.

The Kaiser made a similar pious appeal to the Almighty. If he were forced to draw the sword he would win "with God's help." He asked his people to "go to church, and kneel down before God and ask him for help." Poor God! with his impossible task. The old man and his ass was nothing to it.

The Archbishops of Canterbury and York have made an appeal for "suitable prayers" during "this European crisis." "We are sure," they add, "that in this grave hour all Christian citizens will be at one in the fellowship of prayer." They are all at one in the fellowship of fighting. If the Christians didn't fight there would be no peace to pray for.

Dr. John Clifford says that "the tiger and the ape are still strong within men and women." Maybe that is why Christians are fond of the hymn, "There is a fountain filled with blood."

The Daily Chronicle, in its war notes, says that the Austrian National Anthem is "the only national anthem composed by a great musician. The words, too, of national anthems are as a rule written by mediocrities, the one outstanding exception being the Norwegian." Where does the Chronicle scribe expect to spend eternity?

This journal has persistently condemned foreign missions, believing that they are productive of many injurious results. Impartial travellers have been almost unanimous in their denunciation of them. We are exceedingly delighted to be able to state that Sir Henry Norman has spoken on the subject with no uncertain voice. In a book of travels, just out, he says:—

> "I believe it to be strictly within the limits of truth to say that foreign missionary effort in China has been productive of more harm than good. Instead of serving as a link between Chinese and foreigners, the missionaries formed a growing obstacle."

Though himself a Protestant, Sir Henry does not think highly of the Protestant missionary in China. Unlike the Catholic missionary, "he has, in most cases, his comfortable home, his wife, his children, his servants, and his foreign food, and his stipend increases with each addition to his family."

The Rev. Usher Greer is a bright star in the Protestant sky. He advocates temperance with great zeal, and recommends boycotting as a religious exercise of high merit. He preached an "Orange Sermon" at the Seapatrick Protestant Church, in which he is reported to have warned his hearers in the following eminently Christian fashion: "There was one public-house owned by a person who did not belong to them, and why should they spend their Protestant money to uphold the people of the opposite Faith? If they were loyal, they would keep away; and if they were disloyal, they would go into it." After all, how these Christians do love one another!

Unfathomable is the ingenuity displayed by men of God when confronted with disagreeable facts. Nothing is more incontrovertible than that religion is slowly losing its hold upon the multitudes, churches and chapels being more and more deserted every year. The Rev. Mr. Rees, Principal of Bangor Congregational College, preached a sermon the other day, in which he enumerated five notes in the life of to-day which are making for the kingdom of God, though we regard them as making for the kingdom of Man. They are these: the present unrest, expressing itself in strikes and revolutions, as well as in the overthrow of creeds and traditions; the spirit of inquiry; the contents of the thought of the age; the philosophical attitude of mind to the world as a whole; and the effort for social betterment. In reality, these are notes in the life of to-day which make for the complete disintegration of supernatural religion, and which account for the growing abandonment of places of worship.

"Blessed be ye poor!" Here are a few of them—culled from three days' issue of the Times: Venerable Edwin Price, Rectory, Sedgfield, Ferryhill, Durham, left £3,397. Rev. Canon Peter Halbed Moore, Chadkirk Parsonage, Romley, Stockport, left £17,383. Rev. Henry James Fase, of Canfield, Upper Tooting, left £1,000. Rev. William Harpley, of Clayhanger, Devon, left £2,102. Rev. W. J. Tollemache, Grosvenor-road, London, S.W., left £6,281. Rev. John Wallace, of Tilford, Surrey, left £21,883. "Follow me!"

Rev. William Bryant, vicar of Stoke Lyne, has been found guilty of an aggravated assault on his wife and fined £10 or two months' imprisonment. He has also been bound over in £100 to keep the peace for six months, and a separation order has been granted to Mrs. Bryant.

"G. B. S." was once the idol of Socialist-Freethinkers. They worshiped him blindly. He had even brought in a new kind of Freethought; other kinds of Freethought belonged to the past and were thoroughly played out. Nobody would stand up to him on any subject; the fear of him—for all worshipers fear their idols—was overwhelming. Shaw was then at the top of his influence and reputation. He was nearly infallible. He was too big and clever for criticism. But there was one paper, edited by a real Atheist, who acknowledged no gods in heaven or on earth, that just criticised Mr. Shaw as it would anybody else; criticised him with respect and politeness, but with thoroughness and firmness. That journal was the Freethinker. We did our work when it was wanted, and we have not felt called upon to do it over and over again since. But Socialist-Freethinkers, who did not see where Shaw was driving, or were too afraid to say so, are now falling upon him tooth and nail on the question of religion, which is the only one, of course, that we felt called upon to touch in our pages. It looks as though falling upon him is the actual object of this attack, and that his religious errors—which are by no means new—are rather the pretext than the reason.

We do not propose to join in the present attack on Mr. Shaw. We prefer humor to savagery in criticism—especially in criticising one who is himself a humorist. And ours is not the courage which depends on something else than the call of sense and honor.

By Socialist-Freethinkers we mean those who put Socialism first and Freethought afterwards. We do not discuss Socialism at all in the Freethinker—we do not put it anywhere—we have no concern with it at all. We put Freethought first—and second—and last. Nothing is any good without it—not even Socialism—and not even its opposite—nor anything in between. You cannot make up a wise society of fools, you cannot make a sane society of superstitionists, you cannot make a self-respecting society of intellectual dupes, you cannot make a happy and prosperous society out of people who are taught cowardice and thoughtlessness from their very cradles. Swinburne was well-inspired in coupling "the blood on the hands of the king" with "the lie at the lips of the priest."

We fully expected that Mme. Caillaux would be acquitted. Women do not take part in politics in France and they should not be dragged into it. What can be worse than striking a man through his wife? To publish her private letters to him is infamous. They are first stolen, and then printed in defiance of her clearest moral rights. And if the law gives her practically no protection, who can wonder if she seeks redress in the only way that is open to her? The real criminal is the one who gives the unbearable provocation.

"All-Round Insurance" is a new scheme to cover all risks. The promoters had better keep clear of the clergy, who have long specialised in next-world fire insurance.

"We came into the world with nothing," the sentimental song informs us, but does not add that the dear clergy start the rolling of the financial ball with a small charge for christening, and that they stay with us until we turn up our toes to the daisies, with funeral fees as per tariff.

The heroine of modern fiction has "no isms, no retrospections, no introspections," says a writer in T. P.'s Weekly. Just so; but the fair damsel always takes a whole chapter to kiss the curate.

"The mystic makes no pretensions," says the Rev. H. E. Sampson. Sometimes it happens that the billposters do it for them—for a consideration.

The Daily Mirror has been discussing the brainy subject "Is a Man or Woman ever too old for Romance?" Remembering the number of Christians who like plenty of "romance" in their religion, we should respond in the negative.

The Rev. Edward Shillito tells us that "Christ has come in his own meekness and humility and love to turn the world upside down." All we can say is that he is taking a tremendously long time to do it. Mr. Shillito himself admits that what we have now, after nineteen hundred years of his meek, humble, and loving reign, is "a welter"; and common sense assures us that, after so long a period of commotion, confusion, and turmoil under Christ, it is perfectly idiotic to predict that out of "the present welter," the ideal order is soon to emerge. Christ has had more than a fair innings, and "total failure" must be written across his record, and we ask, why not judge his future by his past, as we do in every other case?

Methodism has lost its "pristine glory," and the President of the Conference indicated how it can be brought back. To achieve that result, Mr. Young said, every minister must make this resolve: "Whatever else I preach, I will preach the atonement." Well, if Methodism will prosper by putting all possible emphasis on the doctrine of the atonement, which is the most immoral doctrine in the world, we shall lose faith in the progress of the world. To return to the eighteenth century, or even to the first half of the nineteenth, however, is naturally impossible, and in consequence Methodism, as well as every other religious "ism," is doomed. At the recent Conference decreases were reported in almost every department, and one speaker stated that "all their meetings that were distinctive of Methodism showed signs of shrinking." In fact, the Nature of Things has given every religious sect notice to quit, which notice is being gradually put into execution.

The necessity for a strong chairman at meetings, open-air and otherwise, is often shown; but a recent example at a seaside resort, when a debate on "The Existence of God" degenerated into a wrangle on the price of beer at Gibraltar, is surely a record.

"Lost, stolen, or strayed a good old English motto, 'Fear God and honor the King.'" Thus the Referee. If true, Atheists are concerned with the earlier part, but the King's honor lies at his own door.

Mr. Keir Hardie once published a pamphlet, Can a Man be a Christian on a Pound a Week? We give it up, frankly; but the Archbishops and Bishops do not appear to succeed on much larger salaries.

The Rev. Bob Jones, a Southern evangelist, agrees with another hot-gospeller, the Rev. Billy Sunday, that New York is "past saving." Bob, indeed, told the reporters that New York is "dancing on the brink of hell." Fortunately for the New Yorkers, their town is entirely surrounded by water.

Writing in the Optimist, Mr. St. John Ervine says "The Christian religion died in England on the day that Arkwright invented the spinning-jenny." It seems appropriate that a religion brought in by Mary should go out with Jenny.

The Rev. Stanley Parker asserts that "Christ was the greatest revolutionist that ever lived." Marvellous beyond description are the achievements of Christianity, he informs us. His words are: "Christianity had turned the world upside down. Think how it had undermined Paganism and idolatry and slavery." It is true that Christianity undermined Paganism, but how? Not by winning the hearts of the Pagans, but by making their profession of Paganism a crime against the State; not by preaching the love of God, but by the execution of what was declared to be the Divine wrath. Pagans could hold no offices in the State; both their secret and their public sacrifices were forbidden and suppressed; under Theodosius the Great all their temples were razed to the ground, and all forms of their worship absolutely prohibited. Yes, Christianity undermined Paganism by physical force, by passing the sentence of death upon anyone who dared to celebrate its rites, a sentence which, whenever passed, "was universally applauded in the Christian Church." Does Mr. Parker approve of that brutal method of undermining Paganism?

Every student of history is aware that Christianity did not condemn slavery until the twelfth century. During the first nine centuries not a single Christian writer ever said a word against the institution. The idea of abolishing it did not enter any Christian head. Indeed, the Church did not abolish slavery, but merely transformed it into serfdom of the most contemptible type, which Lord Bryce, in his Holy Roman Empire, thus describes: "There is no more appalling feature in the whole Christian world than the serfdom of mediæval Europe." Men of God seem to have a perfect genius for ignoring facts.

Billy Sunday's Gems.

[Billy Sunday was once a pugilist, but you can't keep on that game for ever, so he has turned revivalist, and earns piles of money by his classic eloquence. The New York Truthseeker gives the following samples.]

"I wish I had been in heaven last night to hear the hallelujahs over the great manifestation of the spirit here in this tabernacle, and I wish I could have gloated over the groans and mutterings in hell."

"God knew the first time your mother kissed you that you were going to hell."

"I can see him [the Devil] begin to wrap his thongs about a soul and drag them shrieking to hell.....into the nethermost recess of the dark abyss of hell, and from the inferno below will belch the sulphur fumes and the hopeless wail, 'Lost!' We have no advocate with the Father in hell. 'Lost!' Oh, you can walk the streets and say I am crude. When the last day comes what will you do then? O Infidel, I've got you beat!"

"A Unitarian has never been born again, and he will go to hell whoever he is."

"To hell with that kind of a minister."

"To hell with personal liberty."

"I say to hell with the Unitarian idea that strips Jesus Christ of his divinity."

"To perdition with such fools [envious ministers]. They make me sick!"

"Stand up there, you bastard evolutionist. Stand up with the Atheists and Infidels and w——mongers and adulterers and go to hell."

"Aaron Burr is in hell to-night."

"There goes old Darwin. He is in hell sure."

"If Bob Ingersoll isn't in hell, God is a liar and the Bible isn't worth the paper it is printed on."

"Talk about Ralph Waldo Emerson being a good man; or Oliver Wendell Holmes; or Bill Taft. They are in hell or are on the road to it."

"If you want to go to hell, go to hell."

"I'm going to heaven, you can go to hell if you want to."

"The Bible puts up religion without attempting to explain it. If you want to believe it you can. If you don't believe it, you can go to hell."

"God says faith in the blood of My Begotten Son or you go to hell."

"If you want to be a progressive, be a Christian. If you want to be a mossback, go to hell."

"Any person who says there isn't a hell is a liar."

"Some one says: 'Don't you know the scholarly ministers have given up their belief in hell?' What do I care about those old lobsters?"

"To me the world replies: 'I want your truth but not your Christ.' I say to the world, 'Then go to hell.'"

"Away with your hellish, damnable Unitarianism..... You'll go to hell before I accept your doctrine."

"They say a fellow who doesn't believe in eternal damnation is a liberal preacher. I say he is an old fool."

"Hell is just as much a manifestation of the love of God as is heaven."

"Let the old Unitarian go to hell if he wants to. Oh, they try to get saved by culture.....They're big fools!"

"A man says to me: 'Then you believe in an eternal literal hell?' Yes, sir. I have never got so damnably low down as to have the audacity to put my mediocre asinine reason up by the side of an infinite God's word."

To Correspondents.

PRESIDENT'S HONORARIUM FUND, 1914.—Previously acknowledged, £180 2s. 6d.

D. BAXTER.—Glad to hear the police case against you for selling Freethought literature on the Jail-square has been dropped. No doubt your bold front had something to do with that. With regard to the Bible Handbook, it is impossible for the Pioneer Press to supply the trade at a lower price than at present. We say this for the information of all concerned. The book is only sold by the Pioneer Press on terms of commission which leave a very narrow margin of "profit," and no charge is made to the Secular Society, Ltd., for housing stock or for the lavish advertisements it gets in the Freethinker, neither is any royalty paid to Mr. Foote on the sales of the present edition of 5,000 copies. The issue of the book under these conditions is a propagandist effort, and we have done our share in it.

A. B. MOSS.—Pleased to know you are enjoying a few weeks' rest and recreation at Ramsgate, where you get some of the very best air in England, and a sky that Ruskin called the finest in Europe. As for water, one might talk of that ad infinitum and still be as fresh as itself.

P. HERTZ.—Money spent on advertising a thing likely to be in general demand may be a good investment; otherwise it is very problematical. We have dealt with this question before. The sale of the Freethinker cannot be forced like the sale of (say) spirits or tobacco. A million pounds would not make a successful appeal for it to the mob. The best advertising can be done by our readers, and by them only,—introducing it to the attention of friends and acquaintances who might take an interest in such a paper if they only knew of its existence. As for getting paid advertisements in the Freethinker, it is impossible. We speak from experience. Thanks, all the same, for your advice.

ADMIRER.—June cuttings are of no use in August.

E. B.—Thanks for useful cuttings.

H. W. THURLOW.—Under consideration. Its length is rather against it. The "opposition" you refer to is childish and not too well-intentioned.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are always useful.

J. W. ARNETTE.—Cuttings are always welcome if they are up to date and solid enough to serve as a peg for a paragraph.

F. PENLINGTON.—For years we have notified that Tuesday morning is too late for paragraphs in the new Freethinker, but we seem to have made not the slightest impression on those concerned. We strain a point for the lecturer's sake this time. It is hard that she should suffer for the fault of others.

T. RENNOLLS.—What you have to say, then, is that "the future of Freethought lies with the young folks." Very well, then; but the future of everything lies with them; so what is the weight of your discovery? We hold the field while the younger generation is arriving: what more can we do? It is to be hoped that the new-comers will respect English. "Folks" is bad English. "Folk" is itself plural.

Sugar Plums.

One of our oldest and best readers, who has been trying to give us good advice about the possible cause of our insomnia—which, by the way, has abated somewhat lately—gives a plain reason for his "great interest" in the state of our health. It is "my sincere conviction," he says, "that your personality is indispensable to the vigorous progress of Freethought." There may be some truth in this just at present, but there is another truth, we think, that ought not to be overlooked. Great ideas find their instruments or make them; or, as Burke expressed it in a different way, "When the heart is sound it finds a way or makes one." When the hour strikes the man generally appears. That is one of the consolations of loss. Otherwise the death of a leader would be "the end of all things"—and the last bitterness of mortality.

The August Humanitarian contains a delightful article on "The Humanities of Virgil," and a powerful satire entitled "Sixty Years Among Savages"—both, we take it, from the pen of the editor, Mr. H. S. Salt. The satire is at the expense of our noble selves, the people of England.

Miss K. B. Kough lectures to-day (Aug. 9) in connection with Two Services at the Secular Sunday School, Failsworth—at 2.45 on "Playtime Poets," and at 6.30 on "The Origin of the Belief in Gods." A collection for the School Funds to be made at the end of each Service.

Perhaps the most interesting thing in the August number of the Positivist Review is Mr. Frederic Harrison's article on the fifth month, devoted to "Military Civilisation," in the Positivist Calendar. This is followed by Mr. J. F. Green's "Closing Words at the National Peace Congress." There is a satirical sound (now) in the statement that the Congress had been "very successful and useful." Mr. Green would have been less jubilant if he had known that Armageddon was coming.

A Mild Rebuke.

IMPERTINENT! you call me Atheist,
What is it, then, oh hasty one, you wist
So well, that you can misbeliever call
Your fellow insect on the hither wall?
Have not I eyes to see as well as you?
Organs, dimensions,—ponder Shakespeare's Jew.
That sun, these clouds, you lakes of azure spread
Breathe equal benediction on my head.
What, then, the great artificer of all
Thee and narrow sect alone must call
His chosen ones, the sole repository
Of truth divine, heirs of eternal glory.
Impertinent, presumptuous little elf,
The god you worship is your little self,
Or some such being, puny in the vast—
Some meagre shadow on the Outward cast.
Your god, my friend, is man, a human form:
God is a man, and "man is but a worm."
Thus god, and man, and worm, have chances even,
Since heaven is earth and earth the only heaven.
Or if such doctrine suit you not too well,
Seek hell on earth, or make the earth a hell.

ANDREW MILLAR.

A SONNET.

Here swords are wrought from cups of sacrament,
The holy blood of Christ is given for gold,
For lance and buckler, cross and thorns are sold:
The patience of the very Christ is spent!
Let him within our borders come no more,
Since Rome, who in her Savior's blood doth trade,
Will sell His flesh for any price that's paid;
And hath to every virtue closed the door.
If by my work, the offspring of my mind,
I too with treasure would my coffers fill,
I see in Peter's chair Medusa throned.
Though poverty in Heaven do favor find,
What recompense shall be of earthly ill,
If earth's defeat undo the life beyond?

Ferrer's Monument in Brussels—The New Crusade.

LESS than five years ago the Clericals in Spain murdered Ferrer, the Rationalist founder of the Escuela Moderna, in the sombre trenches of Montjuich, but they have not yet succeeded in burying him. The blood of Ferrer chokes the gloomy and morose Maura, and his name, with that of the odious hyena, La Cierva, his accomplice in the crime, is today, and has been ever since the fateful October 18, 1909, pursued with infamy not only in Spain but throughout the civilised world. The Spanish democracy is prepared to go to any extremes—from assassination to revolution — rather than see the return to power of Maura and La Cierva, with all the mediæval tyranny and judicial murder which their advent to power would imply, and even King Alphonso has had to recognise the sentence of Spain and civilisation upon the assassins of Ferrer by refusing to entrust the reins of political power into their hands at the recent formation of the present Moderate-Conservative ministry with Senor Dato as its head. In a word, the blood of Ferrer cries out for vengeance upon the Cains that slew him.

The monument in Brussels, erected to the memory of Ferrer, is more than a tribute in stone and bronze to a brave man; it is also reminiscent of the martyrdom which Freethought and its heroes, teachers, and apostles have had to suffer throughout the ages at the hands of bigots, and a reminder of the martyrdom which may in future be inflicted upon Freethinkers if and whenever reaction raises its head as of yore. To the bigots this memorial is an eyesore; and standing as it does in face of the church of St. Catherine, it is a perpetual reminder to the world of the natural ferocity of religion in any country and under any regime in which, as in Spain during the Clericalist reign of terror in 1909, it may have the power to act with impunity in repression of Freethought. It is because Ferrer symbolised in his death not only the meanness and cruelty of Christianity, but the dignity and fortitude of the Rationalist ideal, that he so powerfully gripped the imagination and sympathy of the whole civilised world; and thus his name became the more hated by the obscurantists of all creeds precisely because the world-wide manifestations of sympathy which his assassination evoked revealed to the astonished soul of the priests and the priestly minded the depth and unanimity of the world's repugnance for their chosen methods of brutal repression.

Just now, the partisans of Senor Maura are anxious to reverse the verdict of civilisation and to destroy the Brussels monument erected in honor of the Founder of the Modern School. A movement is actually on foot in Spain to urge the Belgian Government to remove the peccant monument. The present Belgian ministry is a Conservative one, and Clericalist at that, but it is too anxious to save its political soul—especially in view of the narrowness of its majority—to attempt to affront the dignity and self-respect of the Belgian democracy by listening favorably to such an extravagant appeal, compliance with which would imply the abdication of the Belgian Government in slavish deference to the solicitations of the Vatican.

In order to put pressure in anti-Ferrer sense upon the Belgian Government, an excursion has been organised from Madrid of parliamentarians, professors, journalists, etc., who propose to journey to Brussels in order to shout "Long live Maura!" and "Down with the Ferrer monument!" in the streets of Brussels. The fantastic proposal is due to the initiative of a Spanish senator, Senor Luca de Tena, the proprietor of the Madrilene paper, A B C, which distinguished itself from the first by the violence of its diatribes against Ferrer. On the other hand, the Madrid radical organ, Espana Nueva, will organise a counter demonstration, also to take place in Brussels. I am not sure whether it is wise on the part of Espana Nueva to interfere with the festive excursion of the self-appointed glorifiers of assassination. The exported Maurists may, I think, be safely left to the tender mercies of the Brussels Freethinkers and Socialists, who are constitutionally incapable of turning the other cheek to the idolisers of Ferrer's murderer. A nobler revenge may more profitably be taken by rallying later on at Paris, where it is proposed to erect another monument to the memory of Ferrer. Be that as it may, another journal, El Mentidero, approves the idea of A B C, and suggests that the Maurist demonstration in Brussels should be heralded by a deluge of postcards upon the Belgian Prime Minister, imploring him to order the demolition of the monument. As El Pais very pertinently remarks, unless Spain is prepared to renew her old wars in Flanders the monument will remain for the glory of human solidarity and as an imperishable record of the triumphs of internationalism.

El Pais approves and endorses the proposition of Espana Nueva to organise the counter demonstration in Brussels. It wants to see the Freemason Lodges, the Socialist Party, the Rationalist and Freethinking Schools and Centres represented by hundreds of delegates, in order that their presence may be accepted as the offering of Spain's love in homage to the memory of the much-hated and feared Ferrer. Perhaps while the spectacle of courage thrills the human heart with its transports of love and devotion, enthusiasm will continue to build its monuments and undertake distant pilgrimages to the shrines of heroes. Certainly, not too much faith is required to believe, with El Pais, that in the process of time a monument to Ferrer will be erected at Montjuich, and that the name of Maura will be as universally execrated as is the name of the vile torturer of Maura's Jewish ancestors, Torquemada, who, by-the-bye, was himself of Jewish race.

The monument erected to Ferrer's memory in Brussels is not intended as an insult to Spain, but for the opprobrium of her evil genius—the spirit of fanaticism as incarnated in Maura. It is the protest of International Freethought against the political murder of a hated Rationalist whose crime consisted in endeavoring to raise the educational level of the Spanish nation and to impart to the democracy some generous ideals of civic duty and social morality. If Spain is ever to renew her former greatness amongst the nations it must breed more men like Ferrer and fewer bigots of the Maura stamp.

Christian Apologetics.

XII.—THOMAS COOPER (No. 4).

THE self-styled "lecturer on Christianity," Thomas Cooper, having set aside, as he imagined, every kind of "infidel objection" to the Gospel miracles, commences in his ninth chapter to demonstrate "the verity" of those ascribed to Jesus Christ, and continues to deal with them to the end of the book. As there is nothing to be learnt from any of these, I take but one example of Mr. Cooper's methods. In Mark viii. 22—26 we have the following account of Jesus healing a blind man: "And they come unto Bethsaida. And they bring to him a blind man..... And Jesus took hold of the blind man by the hand, and brought him out of the village; and when he had spit on his eyes, and laid his hands upon him, he asked him, Seest thou aught?.....Then again he laid his hands upon his eyes; and the man looked steadfastly, and was restored, and saw all things clearly." After quoting this narrative, Mr. Cooper says:—

> "The disciples could not fail to be convinced by the miracle. There was no ostentation or display. The miracle was performed slowly, that they might observe it completely.....There could be no imposture in the case. Was the man bought or hired? How could Jesus hire the man out of his poverty?.....St. Mark only relates this miracle, and he had the account of it > from Peter's own mouth—being Peter's interpreter, and writing down the substance of Peter's preaching. Peter had a strong memory for facts; and he was sure to remember these facts clearly."

It is by arguments of this childish character that our great Christian Evidence lecturer has attempted to prove "the verity" of the miracles attributed to Jesus Christ. The miracle "was performed slowly," so that all the onlookers might observe it carefully—that is to say, it is so represented in the Gospel story. There was "no ostentation or display"—according to the Gospel story. Jesus certainly did something which appeared to restore the sight of the blind man—in the Gospel story. We thus arrive at the very remarkable fact that if the Gospel story is true, "there could be no imposture in the case"—which everyone not a resident in Bedlam will admit. Hence, the only thing now left for Mr. Cooper to do is to prove the truth of the Gospel story. When this has been done, no rational person can deny that the event is really historical. But our "lecturer on Christianity" has not attempted to do so. He seems to have thought that repeating and emphasising certain portions of the story would make the narrative as a whole appear more credible. But it has not; the story remains, as at first, manifestly incredible. Our lecturer has assumed, without rhyme or reason, the narrative to be historical without a scrap of corroborative evidence. Mr. Cooper appears to have been under the impression that unbelievers were bound to admit that Jesus went about professing to heal, as narrated in the Gospels; and that the only element of doubt that could be raised was, as to whether the man had been bribed. This is not so; the rational contention is that the story is merely one of a large number of fictitious narratives that were fabricated by the credulous, primitive Christians several decades after the death of Jesus. It is to this question that his arguments should have been chiefly addressed.

Mr. Cooper says "St. Mark only relates this miracle"—which is true, the healing of the blind man being, perhaps, the only event in Mark's Gospel which is not recorded in the other three. But the statement that the miracle was wrought at a village called "Bethsaida" proves the story to be a fabrication; for the little fishing village of that name had been enlarged to the dignity of a city—and its name changed to "Julian"—twenty years before Jesus is said to have commenced his ministry in Galilee. Every adult inhabitant of Galilee would, of course, be aware of this fact, and, within a year or so of its renaming, would have got accustomed to speaking of the place as "the city of Julian"—as does Josephus.

Mr. Cooper says again that Mark had the account of the miracle "from Peter's own mouth, being Peter's interpreter, and writing down the substance of Peter's preaching." This statement is repeated by Christian apologists of the present day, who endeavor to make it appear that the Second Gospel is practically the Gospel of an eye-witness—the apostle Peter. Their authority for doing so is drawn from Mr. Cooper's favorite authors—Irenæus and Eusebius. Irenæus (A.D. 185) repeats, as an historical fact, a statement he had read in a book written by Papias (A.D. 140), but without naming his authority, though he quotes Papias on another subject. Eusebius (A.D. 330), who had the books of Irenæus and Papias before him, quotes what the latter said about Mark, apparently because it was the earliest mention he had seen of Mark's Gospel. And how did Papias come to know this story? It was told to him, he says, by a presbyter of his acquaintance named John. We have no evidence that Papias ever saw Mark's Gospel; he was merely informed of its existence and of how it came to be written. Now, in the Book of Acts, the apostles (including Peter) are represented as receiving the Holy Ghost, which, it is stated, gave them power to speak all known languages. Had Peter received this power, he would not have needed an "interpreter" to explain to his non-Jewish listeners what he had said to them in his native Aramaic. Clearly, then, the "Acts of the Apostles" was not known to Papias or John the Presbyter—a fact which lends confirmation to the theory that Luke wrote later than A.D. 140. The story of Mark and Peter, as related by Papias, is pure nonsense. The apologetic contention that Mark's Gospel was derived from the preaching of Peter can be seen to be baseless by merely comparing some of its narratives with those in one of the other two Synoptic Gospels, as in the following paragraphs:—

MATT. XXIV. 15—20.	MARK XIII. 14—18.
"When therefore ye see the Abomination of desolation, which was spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the holy place (let him that readeth understand), then let them that are in Judæa flee unto the mountains: let him that is on the house top not go down to take out the things that are in his house: and let him that is in the field not return back to take his cloak. But woe unto them that are with child and to them that give suck in those days! And pray ye that your flight be not in the winter."	"But when ye see the Abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing where it ought not (let him that readeth understand), then let them that are in Judæa flee unto the mountains: and let him that is on the house top not go down, nor enter in, to take any thing out of his house: and let him that is in the field not return back to take his cloak. But woe unto them that are with child and to them that give suck in those days! And pray ye that it be not in the winter."

The foregoing paragraphs are taken from a long discourse, placed in the mouth of Jesus, which fills three columns in the Gospel of Mark, and a few lines more in that of Matthew. They are selected from near the middle of the oration, chiefly because they contain a parenthesis. Now, according to the Gospels, this discourse was uttered but once; Matthew and Peter heard it spoken but once: it was not written down at the time. We are asked to believe: (1) that many years afterwards Matthew committed to writing what he remembered of the discourse; (2) that Peter in his preaching recited to the multitude what he could remember of it; (3) that Mark, who accompanied Peter, having heard it recited several times, also committed it to memory; (4) that in Matt. xxiv. and Mark xiii. we have these two versions of this grand oration.

Now, anyone acquainted with writing or composition will know that, under the foregoing conditions, there would not have been two sentences in the whole speech that were in exact verbal agreement. After hearing it but once, neither Matthew nor Peter could have had anything more than a confused remembrance of some of the matters mentioned—and these would be set down in different words, as well as in a different order, as they happened to think of them. In the Gospel accounts, the verbal agreement is continuous throughout, varied only here and there by a few words added or omitted by each editor; while the various subjects spoken of are recorded in the same order in both. The nature of these subjects will be seen by the following detached phrases:—"As he sat upon the mount of Olives..... Tell us when shall these things be.....Jesus answered.....Take heed that no man deceive you..... Many shall come in my name.....the end is not yet .....Nation shall rise against nation.....These are the beginning of sorrows.....They shall deliver you up.....the gospel must be preached to all nations .....ye shall be hated of all men for my sake.....the Abomination of desolation.....flee unto the mountains.....him that is on the house top.....him that is in the field.....Woe unto them that are with child .....that it be not in the winter.....tribulation such as was not from the creation.....except those days had been shortened.....Many will say unto you, Lo, here is Christ.....after the tribulation of those days .....then shall they see the Son of man coming..... Now learn a parable of the fig tree.....This generation shall not pass away till all these things be accomplished.....but of that day or hour knoweth no man.....Watch therefore, for ye know not when the Lord cometh."

When it is stated that both Matthew and Mark give the whole of the Savior's long discourse, as indicated by the foregoing catch-phrases, in the same order, and often in the very same words—then we know beyond the smallest possibility of doubt that they simply copied from a pre-existing account. Moreover, the first primitive account could not have been composed until after the destruction of Jerusalem; for its unknown writer, whoever he may have been, had no foreknowledge of what was about to happen, and the destruction of Jerusalem and of the temple is recorded as an undoubted historical fact. In the two paragraphs from Matthew and Mark, notice should be taken of the parenthesis in both—"Let him that readeth understand." This denotes that the primitive writer believed that the "abomination of desolation" in the book of Daniel was written as a prediction of the Roman army desecrating the Jewish temple—which, of course, was not the case.

Returning to Mr. Cooper, that Christian Evidencer tells us that "Peter had a strong memory for facts, and was sure to remember these facts clearly"—that is, the alleged healing of the blind man. As a simple matter of fact, we know nothing whatever about Peter's memory—or whether he had any worth mentioning. This is one of our lecturer's tarradiddles.

Looking back at the Gospel account of the miracle, I really cannot see where the "moral perfection, beauty, and dignity" of the Savior come in—unless these qualities are indicated by spitting on the eyes of the blind man. Rather, I think, the latter act would denote long practice in spitting at a mark. Probably the early Christians were good hands at this interesting pastime, and thought it in no way derogatory to the sacred character of their Lord to represent him as practising it. It has even been stated that they imagined human saliva to be good for sore eyes, and so described their Savior as employing it, either by spitting direct on the eyes, or by spitting on the ground and smearing the moist dirt on the eyes. But this filthy practice could not, of course, affect in any way the actual healing, and was not always employed. It was inserted, probably, merely to make the cure appear more dramatic.

ABRACADABRA.

The Partnerships of Plants and Animals.—II.

INTO the hollows of these trees the female ant deposits her eggs, and in a short time the entire interior of the tree swarms with an ant population, which rushes forth to do battle whenever its tree is disturbed. This in itself, however, would not save the tree's leaves from the devastating ants. But a curious contrivance has been evolved which supplies this want. The resident ants wander over the outer surface of the tree, precisely in that part where its insect enemies would prove most dangerous—at the stalks of the tender leaves. At the bases of these leaves grow soft hair cushions, from which arise egg-shaped corpuscles, upon which the friendly ants not only feed themselves, but also nourish their larvæ. In this instance, writes Weismann, "a particular organ offering special attractions to ants has been developed by the plant at the places more especially threatened; while as regards the ants, it is probable that only the instinct of feeding and habitat require to be modified, since courage and thirst for battle are present in all ants."

Only one species of candelabra tree has set up this partnership with ants. Schimper describes various other species of Cecropia in whose hollow stems ants are never seen. But these latter species, although hollow-stemmed, are all unprovided with the hair cushions which play such an important role in the partnership which has been so successfully established in the species we have dealt with. The origin of these cushions is as yet unknown, but, given the simplest beginnings, their evolution would follow from the ascertained laws of life.

An aspect of Symbiosis which is presented by the partnership of single-celled algæ and simple animals has given rise to an animated scientific discussion, but the leading facts of this amazing union have now passed beyond the pale of controversy.

Hydra viridis is a green freshwater polyp, and its verdant color is caused by the presence of chlorophyll, a substance which was looked upon as essentially vegetable in nature. That an animal organism should evolve a material which gives to plants their characteristic green color was regarded as utterly anomalous. But wonder was transformed into astonishment when Braun and Entz demonstrated that the green substance was no animal product at all, but was due to the presence of those unicellular plants, the algæ, in the endoderm cells of the hydra polyps. Further study showed that the alga cells liberate oxygen, and thus render a useful service to the polyps. This much is certain, and that the plants also furnish food to their polyp partners appears probable. In any case, the polyps have been kept in pure water for several months at a time, and despite the absence of animal food, the polyps have flourished exceedingly. In the light of this experiment, it appears practically proved that their algæ inmates supply the polyps with all the nourishment they need.

So far as the green algæ are concerned, they seem to be comfortably and securely housed within their animal dwellings, and their association is so close that through all the stages of their joint lives they are coupled and inseparable. These algæ (Zoochlorellæ) do not pass from the water into the hydra's interior, but—

> "are carried over as as a heritable possession of the polyps from one generation to another, and in a very interesting manner, namely, by means of the eggs, and by these alone. As Hamann has shown, the zoochlorellæ migrate at the time when an egg is formed in the outer layer of the body of the polyp, from the inner layer outwards, piercing through the supporting layer between them and penetrating into the egg. They make their way only into the egg, not into the sperm-cells, which in any case are too small to include them. Thus they are absent from no young polyp of this species, and it is easy to understand why earlier experimental attempts to rear colorless polyps from eggs could never succeed even in the purest water."

Similar unicellular green algæ have entered into union with single-celled animals such as amœba viridis, and one of the infusoria. To the kindness of Professor Wilder, of Chicago, the Freiburg Zoological Institute is indebted for its colonies of the two compound organisms. Their place of origin was stagnant water in Massachusetts. Researches conducted by Gruber demonstrate that the zoochlorellæ—the lowly green algæ—confer invaluable benefits upon the animal organisms they inhabit. The plant-cells supply their amœba and infusorian hosts with indispensable oxygen, as well as with food materials. Gruber cultivated the two species—the green amœba and the verdant infusorian—for seven years in clear water that contained no particle of animal matter upon which they could feed, but they flourished like the green bay-tree. The experiments prove that—

> "They only die away when they are kept in the dark, where the algæ are unable to assimilate; then one green cell after another wanes and disappears, and, in consequence, their hosts also die from the double lack of oxygen and the lack of food."

Marked modifications have resulted from these organic associations. The algæ have evolved the power to resist the absorbing influences of animal secretions. They are apparently entirely immune to the dissolving energies of the digestive juices, a quality which is quite foreign to ordinary algæ. No visible change has occurred, however, with the animal partners. Infusorian, amœba, and polyp alike remain unmodified. Their general conditions of life show no signs of transformation, and although they are able to live and multiply in the presence of the oxygen and food supplied by their plant partners, they continue to feed on other substances when these are accessible, so that in natural surroundings they are not absolutely dependent upon the friendly succors of the algæ. But they have no more choice in the selection of their associates than a sheep, whose woolly covering provides a permanent residence for loathsome ticks, despite the decimating labors of the insect-loving starling.

Plant-cells similar to those of the algæ, but which depart from the customary green color to that of a distinct yellow, people the endoderm of several sea-anemones and occupy the soft substance of various radiolarians. These yellow plant-cells are capable of breaking up carbon dioxide and releasing the oxygen, an office very acceptable to the anemones and the radiolarians alike. These yellow cells are only known in the symbiotic state, and their remarkable color is probably the consequence of the prolonged period through which their partnership with animal organisms has existed.

We will now survey an association of two distinct classes of plants which provides a very instructive illustration of symbiosis. Until some thirty years ago, the lichens, which in innumerable forms grow on rocks, stones, and the trunks and branches of trees, were regarded as lowly plants related to the ferns and mosses. Some thousand or so of species were classified by lichenologists as simple green flora without any botanist suspecting what their microscopic study held in store. Then Schwendener and De Bary staggered the biological world with their discovery that lichens were not single organisms, but the blended products of two dissimilar plants, algæ and fungi, which were so intimately interwoven, and so mutually dependent, that their union invariably compelled them to assume the same specific state. The framework of the supposed single organism, which decides a lichen's structure, is formed by the fungus. Dull-colored fungus-threads arrange themselves in various ways, according to their particular species, and on the network formed by the fungal growth the green alga cells are embedded singly, in lines, or in crowds. The fungus may reproduce itself by means of multitudes of microscopic spores which are scattered by the bursting of the sporangia, and are driven away on the breeze-like clouds of dust; the alga, on the other hand, may procreate its kind by simple cell division, but in common with its fungal companion, the alga can resist desiccation and propagate itself by means of invisible spores.

Although this partnership is one of mutual advantage, the fungus derives the greater profit from the union. In this curious association, the fungus, like all other fungi, is incapable of elaborating chlorophyll, and is, therefore, unable to decompose carbon-dioxide or manufacture its own nutrient material. These necessaries of its life it receives ready made from its partner, and the entire dependence of the fungus on its companion is demonstrated by the fact that it perishes apart from its alga associate. But, although the alga not only gets its own living, and lavishes its surplus wealth on its fungal partner, it does unquestionably derive valuable compensatory advantages in return:—

> "The alga has in the network of the fungus a safe shelter and basis of attachment, for the fungus is able to bore into the bark of trees and even into stones; besides which it absorbs water and salts, and supplies these to the partner alga. We see here the mutual advantage derived from the partnership.....Fungus spores, sown by themselves, spring up and develop some branches of fungoid hyphæ, a so-called mycelium, but without the requisite partner alga these remain weak and soon die away. The alga can, in some cases, though not in all, survive without the fungus if the necessary conditions of life be supplied to it, but it grows differently and more luxuriantly in association with the fungus."

The double plants which form lichens are not necessarily compounded of any two specific species of alga and fungus. One species of alga may enter into combination with many different fungi, with the consequence that the resulting lichens are very unlike in appearance, and are classified as of separate species. Stahl brought into being new species by artificially uniting the spores of the lichen fungus with the cells of algæ. This biologist was a real creator, inasmuch that his creations have never been discovered in a natural state.

A very striking feature of these fungal and algal partnerships is the evolution of joint procreative bodies, which is a modification of a very remarkable kind. At certain periods, reproductive corpuscles arise in the lichen's substance, the soredia, which consist of a single, or possibly several alga cells, encircled and bound together by fungus threads. When these are plentifully produced, they "form a floury dust over the maternal lichen, which 'breaks up' and leaves them, like the spores of the fungus, to be carried away by the wind." If these corpuscles reach a suitable resting-place and the other requirements of ordinary vegetable growth, they soon develop a new colony. This compound procreative process is of immense advantage to the lichen in perpetuating its species, for in the normal production of fungus spores, even when these secure suitable soil they cannot develop unless they happen—and there are a thousand and one chances against this—to meet their alga partners. The belief, therefore, is amply justified that the mutual benefits bound up with the associations of fungi and algæ, extend even to the common advantages derived from their composite methods of reproduction.

Numerous other plant partnerships between widely separated floral species are now known, and a comparatively large number of these are formed by fungi with other vegetation. Fungi are always partly parasitic, and usually entirely so to the higher organisms on which they prey. But in several well-determined cases fungi furnish their hosts with an equivalent, or something approaching an equivalent, in return for what they receive, and when this occurs true symbiosis, as in the instances afforded by lichens, may be said to take place.

Taken as a whole, the fungi are possessed of a property which enables them to absorb the tiniest trace of moisture in the earth, and with this water they absorb those salts that are so important to higher plant life, and therein resides the service they supply even to the monarchs of the forest. The roots of many of our noblest trees, the oak, beech, silver poplar, and many others; and those of heaths and rhododendrons among bushes, are entwined with a network of symbiotic fungoid filaments. In these instances a system of reciprocity has been set up. The fungi feed on the superfluous foodstuffs of the trees and shrubs, to which they in return render tribute in the form of water and salts, which are of priceless value to leaf-bearing vegetation, more especially in the season of sunshine and drought.

With one other example of symbiosis we will conclude. There exists a highly interesting union between algæ of the family Nostocaceæ and the aquatic fern, Azolla. This water fern bears some resemblance to duckweed as it floats on the surface of the mere. The under-surfaces of its leaves are provided with small openings which lead into a larger hair-lined cavity, which invariably houses a blue-green single-celled alga, surrounded by a jelly-like substance. "The cavity is present in every leaf, and the alga is present in every cavity, making its way in from a deposit of alga-cells, which is found in the incurved tip of every young shoot."

No sooner does the young frond of the fern unfold than it becomes the habitation of the invading cells. No part of the azolla foliage appears to be free from the presence of algæ, but the advantage derived by the fern from its algæ associates has so far escaped detection. Some mutual benefit in all probability exists, as the plant partnership is of extreme antiquity, and that a purely vestigial organ should persist through immense periods without bestowing some advantage on the organism possessing it, is entirely out of the question.

Four species of azolla exist, and their geographical distribution is very remarkable. Two of these species are extensively distributed in America; a third is found in Asia, Africa, and Australia; while the fourth has its habitat in the district of the Nile. All of these four species carry cavities in their leaves, and each species of azolla is tenanted by the same species of alga. We are, therefore, forced to conclude that the partnership is of very old standing, and are fully justified in the anticipation that future inquiry will clear up the difficulty which at present surrounds its symbiotic arrangements.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY
(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £—— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to plead education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.

Thoughts on War.

THE man-eating monster of fiction is terrible enough to romantic young minds under the spell of the story-teller, but he is almost genial and harmless in comparison with the real Ogre of war. Generation after generation this frightful monster gorges himself on human flesh and blood, solacing his intervals of satiety with the wine of human tears. And every time he prepares for a fresh repast he demands a larger provision for his ravenous appetite.

Awful as the Ogre's blood-tax is, his impositions between meals are even worse. In the palmy days of the Roman Empire, less than four hundred thousand troops sufficed to preserve the peace of the world; and, if we except petty frontier tussles with barbarians, they often did so for thirty or forty years together. But Europe has now its standing armies, whose total is reckoned in millions, and the peace is broken several times in a generation. Let it also be remembered that the Roman soldier was a worker as well as a fighter, helping to carry the practical civilisation of Rome wherever her eagles floated. Our high roads, the arteries of pedestrian and vehicular traffic through England, were first made by the imperial legions, who used the pick and the spade more frequently than the sword. But the armies of modern Europe are all idlers. Their sole business is destruction. In peace they consume without producing, and in war they devour like the locust and the caterpillar. They are not the lame, the blind, the maimed, and the imbecile, but the young flower of the male population, withdrawn from productive industry, and supported by the labor of others while they "learn the art of killing men."

The British Army is in one sense voluntary, as it is filled by enlistment, and not by conscription. But, for all that, it is not democratic. The "masses" supply the rank and file; the "classes" supply the officers. Tommy Atkins has nothing to do with any war except risking his life; all the direction, and all the glory and profit, rest with his superiors.

Go through the Peerage and see what an enormous number of military and naval posts are held by its scions. They command our forces, they get the lion's share of pay, they shine in the Gazettes, and they receive all the honors and rewards worth having. Poor Tommy Atkins dies unannaled and unknown, or, if he survives, has to content himself with the reflection that virtue is its own reward. His wife and children (if the celibate rule of the army for privates allows him those luxuries) are left to semi-starvation or vice or crime, unless they gravitate to the workhouse. Tommy had much better be at home earning an honest living, as he himself generally knows; but he goes abroad to fight the battles of the upper classes because their villainous laws have starved him into the able-bodied citizen's last resource.

Much has been written of late about the "great truth" that war cannot be avoided, and is indeed often beneficial in the present condition of human society. We admit that peace at any price is as mad a policy as war at every opportunity.

John Bright once said that without declaring all wars unjustifiable, he would like to see a single war justified. It was a request very difficult to comply with. Every war we enter upon is perfectly righteous, but somehow the historian afterwards writes them all down as crimes or mistakes. Self-defence is a natural instinct; it never can be eradicated, and it never should. But it implies an aggressor; and consequently all justification of war on the one side only serves to heighten its guiltiness on the other. A great conqueror is only another name for a great criminal. Nature quietly buries and conceals every trace of his ravages. Would that the world could as soon forget him, or remember him only to condemn.

Great Britain may, as the world goes, be technically right in the present war with Germany. It is difficult to see, on the face of it, at the climax of negotiations, how this nation could have avoided a conflict. It may be that the Kaiser has gone mad, and is dragging as many nations as he can with him into the abyss. But what went on before war became inevitable? Any fool can fall into a pit. Any simpleton can get into a row. Any ninny can cause mischief. Statesmen should prove their wisdom by keeping the peace where it is possible. They are placed on an eminence, as Burke said, to command a wider prospect than their fellow-citizens. If they cannot see more, or judge better, they are unworthy of the positions they occupy.

The Churches' only prescription is prayer. They pray for peace beforehand, but when war breaks out they remind "God" that he is bound in honor to give the victory to his old friends the British. And the clergy of all other Churches in all other lands pursue the same policy.

Priests may consecrate our banners, without regard to the merits of the side on which they are ranged, or the awful scenes over which they float; every regiment may carry its chaplain for ghostly succor; and the Church may solicit God's blessing on every bloody enterprise we engage in. But the teachers of religion cannot decree right and wrong, nor have they any magic to transform crime into virtue. "The primal duties shine aloft like stars" beyond the reach of chance and change, however momentarily obscured by clouds of incense from a thousand altars. And if the ministers of the Prince of Peace cannot see the monstrous wickedness of war, there happily remains enough instinctive justice and mercy in the breasts of heretics to brand it as a capital crime against humanity.

Religion never was, and never could be a friend of peace. The word "religion" is said to be derived from the Latin religare—"to bind back." Certainly religion binds men together; it bound the Thugs together; but it only binds them together in opposition to all other religions than their own. The one kindling and unifying word is Humanity. It is better even than the Balance of Power, which Mr. Bernard Shaw offers as the ideal of European diplomacy.

Liverpool and the Slave Trade.—II.

(Concluded from p. 499.)

MOST of the old Liverpool families were more or less steeped in the slave trade, and their enterprise made Liverpool the greatest slave town in Europe. Some of its "brands" were famous, particularly that of "D.D." Many of the slaves were sold openly on the Custom House steps, and the announcements of the sale and the descriptions of the slaves differs in no respect from those of cattle. Indeed, they were so much cattle. They were branded exactly as cattle are branded. The slave was made to kneel down, and the red-hot branding-iron was placed on the bare flesh—usually on the buttock. No one, for a long time, seems to have seen anything unusual or cruel in this. It was just part of a commercial transaction. And, what with the horrors of the passage on board ship and the treatment afterwards, it may safely be said that the slave trade as organised by Christian merchants far outdid, in deliberate cruelty, anything that ancient times could show.

I referred in my last article to the slave-ship Thomas. Here is a copy of one of its bills of lading:—

> "Shipped by the grace of God in good order, and well conditioned, by James Dodd, in and upon the good ship Thomas, master under God for this present voyage, Captain Peter Roberts, and now at anchor at Calabar, and by God's grace bound for Jamaica, with 630 slaves, men and women, branded D.D., and numbered in the margin 31 D.D., and are to be delivered in good, and well conditioned, at the port of Kingston (the dangers of the seas and mortality alone excepted) unto Messrs. Broughton & Smith. In witness whereof the master and purser of the ship Thomas hath affirmed to this bill of lading, and God send the good ship to her destined port in safety, Amen. October 31st, 1767."

This unctuous piety was made to cover the most villainous traffic that the world has ever seen. African villages were burned, and the inhabitants—men, women, and children—marched to the coast, branded, pushed into the holds, and carried away to Kingston or elsewhere for sale. Parties of negroes were invited on board ships to trade, and were seized and made slaves of. Slaves that fell sick were so much useless lumber, and were often thrown overboard out of hand. Some attempt to keep them in health was made by bringing them out of the hold in batches and compelling them to jump about the decks under the persuasive influence of a cat-o'-nine-tails. The deaths of a few slaves more or less, however, roused no comment so long as the dividends remained high.

In the latter half of the eighteenth century voices began to be raised, first for the humanising of the traffic, and later for its abolition. But as late as the Parliamentary election of 1761 the speeches of all the political candidates were unanimously in favor of resisting attempts to restrict the trade in "black ivory." Had there been a readiness to permit an increase of regulations concerning the slave traffic, it is possible that it might have continued for more years than was actually the case. But resistance to reform paved the way for abolition, although to the last, Liverpool put up a strong fight for its perpetuation. As late as 1790, in the Parliamentary election, the Gascoyne party enforced their claims in the following doggerel:—

> "Be true to the man who stood true to his trust,
> Remember our real situation we must;
> When our African business was near at an end,
> Remember, my lads, 'twas Gascoyne was our friend;
> If our slave trade had gone, there's an end to our lives,
> Beggars all we must be, our children and wives;
> No ships from our ports their proud sails e'er would spread,
> And our streets grown with grass, where the cows might be fed."

The ruin of Liverpool was freely predicted if the slave traffic was to be abolished. When the Bill for its abolition was finally before Parliament a petition was drawn up, signed by over 2,000 Liverpool merchants and citizens, demanding the withdrawal of the measure. This petition was signed by no less than eight ex-Mayors of Liverpool, and set forth:—

> "That many of your petitioners having, under the protection of the legislature, embarked a considerable part of their property in that trade, will be very materially injured if the said Bill should pass into law. That such abolition, in your petitioners' judgment, would not only be a great detriment to the town of Liverpool, but in its consequences produce great distress to the extensive manufactures of the County of Lancaster, and to many of the other rich, opulent, and industrious manufacturing towns in the kingdom, and would in no way answer the benevolent purposes of humanity, but only serve to remove the advantages of this trade to foreign States. Your petitioners, therefore, most humbly pray that the said Bill may not pass into law, and that they may be heard by their Council at your Lordships' bar."

As a matter of fact, the number of ships entering and leaving Liverpool fell off considerably with the abolition of the slave trade, and dock dues fell by about a third. In a few years, however, outlets were found in other directions, and the port continued to grow steadily. But it must be recorded as an indication of the state of opinion in Liverpool, that when, in 1788, the Society for the Abolition of the Slave Trade published its list of members, only two Liverpool names were found in it—William Rathbone and Dr. Binns.

As in America at a later date, the defenders of the traffic fell back upon religion and the Bible as authority for slave dealing. It was argued that the Bible had instituted slavery, and whatever abuses might occur in particular cases could not be urged against the institution. This, it must be remembered, was the line taken by W. E. Gladstone in his first address to the electors of Newark. There is nothing whatever in either the Old or New Testaments against slavery. The Old Testament recognises its legitimacy, and lays down laws for its regulation. It even lays down the cash value for men, women, and children at different ages (Lev. xxvii.). And in the New Testament the advice given to "servants" to obey their masters, to render all obedience, to suffer wrong treatment, etc., is really directed to slaves, "servant" being a mistranslation in the interests of Christian apologetics.

Foremost amongst those who gained fame in Liverpool as a champion of slavery was the Rev. Raymond Harris, a clergyman of the Church of England. In 1788 he published a pamphlet with the title, "Scriptural Researches on the Licitness of the Slave Trade, showing its conformity with the principles of Natural and Revealed Religion, delineated in the sacred writings of the Word of God." He points out that slavery was sanctioned by God, and so remains unless explicitly cancelled. He draws a number of illustrations from the Bible, and concludes that those who do not believe the slave trade to be a "licit" occupation, really do not believe their Bibles. There were other clerical champions of the trade, and it is worth while noting that the Rev. John Newton, friend of Cowper, author of the Olney Hymns, and Rector of St. Mary's, Woolnoth, actually commanded a slave-ship during the time he was studying for the ministry. Many years later, a clerical defender of slavery in the United States wrote:—

> "If slavery be a sin, and if advertising and apprehending slaves with a view to restoring them to their masters is a direct violation of the divine law, and if the buying, selling, or holding a slave for the sake of gain is a heinous sin and scandal, then, verily, three-fourths of all the Episcopalians, Methodists, Baptists, and Presbyterians in slave States of the Union are of the Devil. They hold, if they do not buy and sell slaves; and, with few exceptions, they hesitate not to apprehend and restore runaway slaves when in their power."

With a slight variation of terms this would seem to voice the opinions of Liverpool Christians at the end of the eighteenth century.

In 1776 the question was raised in the House of Commons by Mr. David Hartley, M.P. for Hull. His motion was, however, defeated. In 1789 Pitt introduced a Bill against the African Slave Trade, which was followed up by Wilberforce. The first motion of Wilberforce was rejected by 163 votes to 88. Three times it met with the same fate, and when it had passed the Lower and went to the Upper House it was rejected on an equal number of occasions. One member of the House of Commons said it appeared to him "to be the intention of Providence that one set of men should always be slaves to another." The incapacity of Parliament to deal with the matter was generally asserted. General Gascoigne fell back upon the Bible in opposing the measure, and argued for slavery on the ground that it opened up to the Negro the blessing of Christianity. Later, when Clarkson's Bill for the Abolition of the Slave Trade was before the House of Lords, Lord Thurlow denounced the measure as contrary to the spirit of the Bible. "Slavery," he said, "had flourished in the early ages when men communed with God, and to attack its legality was an insidious and heretical attack on the principles of religion."

It is a matter of history that the Abolitionists eventually gained the day; but is also a matter of historic truth that while it obtained it had all those sanctions of established Christianity that vested interests have never failed to find. With the Bible in their hands, with Christianity in full possession of the field, Christians created a traffic that for sheer cold-blooded brutality holds the world's record. They established it in places where it had been hitherto unknown. Even in Africa, Livingstone asserts that slavery was unknown until Europeans introduced it. They made it a penal offence for a slave to learn to read and write, and then when the growth of a more enlightened opinion had made the continuation of the traffic impossible, turned their backs upon the Bible and upon Christian history, and declared it to be contrary to both. The truth is well put by Finlay, the historian of Greece, that "no Christian community of shareholders has ever voluntarily abolished slavery," and that "slavery had, in fact, ceased to exist in most European countries while many Christians still upheld its legality, and maintained that its existence was not at variance with the doctrines of their religion."

C. COHEN.

An Oft-Repeated but Worthless Argument.

JESUS is reported to have said, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away" (Mark xiii. 31); but the authenticity of the saying is exceedingly questionable. However, the generality of divines accept it as a genuine saying of Jesus, and expatiate upon its truth. The teaching of the Galilean, they tell us, is imperishable. The Rev. A. C. Hill, of Tollington Park Congregational Church, London, recently preached an eloquent sermon, entitled "The Eternal Words of Jesus," which was thought worthy of publication in the Christian World Pulpit for August 5. Of course, taking the Gospel Jesus as historical, which comparatively few now do, we admit that the title of Mr. Hill's discourse is quite legitimate. In the verse just quoted the Gospel Jesus claims eternity for his words; but we contend that it is an utterly groundless claim. The words of the Gospel Jesus are no more eternal than they are original. Mr. Hill spends a good deal of time in telling us what he fancies the Gospel Jesus knew and thought about himself and his words, as well as what he knew and thought of the world in which we live. According to this preacher, the Gospel Jesus was sure of two things, namely, "that the material world, to most of us the only world, in the long run will pass away," and "that civilisations do rise and fall." Yes, he "knew that there are civilisations lying underneath the sand," which are "the material out of which the new and better world is to arise." Then Mr. Hill adds:—

> "Jesus saw this with the eye of the seer. He recognised alterations going on around him. Yet he dared to say that there was one thing that did not change—'my words shall not pass away. Everything else is under the law of mutability, but the words that I utter shall abide.'"

Such is the claim of the Gospel Jesus as expanded by a twentieth-century pulpiteer. Now, what proof is adduced, or what facts are advanced in attestation, of the truth of such unique claim? Having stated the claim at length, Mr. Hill keeps on repeating it. What is the use of asserting over and over again that the words of Jesus "enter into the soul and become the property of a spiritual being"? Does it prove anything to declare that our inventions, our palaces, our motor-cars, and our aeroplanes are but the things of a day, and, if looked at from Sirius, "may be no more than the fluctuations of a fly's wing"? We incline to the opinion that the things just enumerated, looked at from Sirius, would not be seen at all. In any case, we are perfectly sure that a man who thinks that the movements of an aeroplane, looked at from the height of the Dog Star, "may be no more than the fluctuations of a fly's wing," cannot bear a very reliable witness to the eternity of the words of Jesus. A man who can see an aeroplane from the height of Sirius, though appearing no bigger than a fly on the wing, can see anything he wishes. From him will naturally issue such an irrational statement as the following:—

> "Whatever enters into the life of the soul, whatever becomes incorporated in the spiritual essence of a man, that remains; even when his body has turned to dust, when every one of his bones and members has been gathered up into the material of the world, the man himself still abides, a living creature, having come from God and going back to God."

It is amazing how easy it is for ignorance to strut about in the guise of knowledge. Mr. Hill's cocksureness on subjects concerning which absolutely no knowledge is obtainable marks him out as the biggest dogmatist it is possible to imagine. He does not know, it is not possible to know, that "the man himself still abides" when his body has turned to dust. What he offers us is a superstitious belief, uncorroborated by a single ascertained fact.

The words of Jesus shall not pass away, we are told, because "they always find that within us which is nearest unto God." Here is the dogmatist again in the fullness of his audacity. Again: "The words of Jesus are founded upon what is permanently Divine. They speak to us precisely as we believe in our best moments God himself must speak." We do not know "what is permanently Divine," we have no means of discovering how God speaks, or that he ever speaks at all; but we do know, and make bold to proclaim, that the words of the Gospel Jesus are practically of no account whatever in the world. And on this point Mr. Hill agrees with us. He takes the saying, "Blessed are the poor in spirit," and says:—

> "It is a word that contradicts the precepts and practice of ninety-nine out of every hundred of human beings. It runs against the general philosophy of every age that has tried to improve its position in the world. It contradicts everything that is said in the House of Commons and the Chamber of Deputies and the American Senate. Because, wherever you meet with men who are, as they say, practical men and accustomed to the handling of affairs, who deal with the concrete things of life, you meet with men who believe, whether they actually express it or not, that it is force that finally rules, that the Almighty is on the side of the great battalions, that unless your ships are larger and stronger, and your guns of a heavier calibre than those of other people, you may preach until your audience is deaf, and pray until you are dumb from exhaustion, but it makes no difference to the result. In this world it is not true that the poor in spirit are blessed."

That is entirely true and extremely well said. Poverty of spirit is a greater curse than poverty of pocket, though it is probable that in its earlier form the saying had reference only to the latter. Poverty in any form has never been a blessing. Neither has meekness. And yet Mr. Hill says he is certain that Jesus is right, "that in the long run it is the meekness, the piety, the humility of the soul that wins the day in the battles that are the real Armageddons of the world." Will he be good enough to name one great battle in which the victory was won by means of those so-called passive virtues? In the long run, they are said to conquer; but they have never triumphed yet. The reverend gentleman alludes to Bismarck in terms of admiration; but does he really mean to imply that Bismarck was a man in whom the Sermon on the Mount found exemplification? And to what is Europe making its supreme appeal at this moment? To poverty of spirit, meekness, piety? Eight Christian countries have resolved to unsheathe the sword and plunge it into one another's blood. We have had the long run of nigh two thousand years since Jesus spoke on earth, and at this very hour Christendom pays no practical heed whatever either to him or his words.

It is a radical error to call the words of Jesus words of liberation. Not one of them can be quoted as having in the slightest degree made for freedom. Was not Guizot right when he described the Christian Church of the eighth and ninth centuries as "a population of slaves"? Christians have never been lovers of liberty, except their own. The Buddhists did love liberty and grant it fully to all who differed from them. They have never played at the evil game of persecution. Christianity has never taken the part of the poor against the rich, nor of the proletariat against the privileged classes. Mr. Hill is either ignorant or does not desire to be fair when he refers to Aristotle's views on slavery. It is true that the illustrious philosopher approved of that wicked institution; but it is false to jump from him to Jesus, saying that it required only that the latter should teach his doctrine of the eternal value of the soul to prove that doctrine wrong. If he had taken the trouble to consult Harnack's Expansion of Christianity (vol. i., p. 24) he would have seen how essentially unjust his observation is. Harnack is a famous theologian, and yet in this work we find this: "The Stoics had passed the word that all men were equal, and had spoken of brotherhood as well as of the duties of man towards man." Pliny saw in slaves his serving friends; and it had been plainly taught that slavery was contrary to the law of nature and ought to be abolished.

We have meditated on the words of Jesus quite as much as Mr. Hill has done, and we have carefully examined them in the light of history, with the result that we now regard them, in so far as they are true, as having been afloat in the world, in one form or another, for hundreds and thousands of years before Jesus was ever heard of; and in so far as they are not true, as having originated with himself in his rôle of a would-be reformer of Judaism. But whether true or false, the point is that in Christendom nobody ever dreams of putting them into practice. It is a minister's profession to eulogise them in the pulpit, but minister and people alike ignore them in the practical conduct of life.

J. T. LLOYD.

An Ideal Holiday Book.

The Best of Lamb. Compiled by Mr. E. V. Lucas. (Methuen; 1914.) 1s. net.

CHARLES LAMB is the most lovable of writers, and, despite his own quaint jest that he wrote for antiquity, he becomes every year a more popular writer with his posterity. "A fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy," it could not be otherwise, for much that he writes awakens a sense of personal affection in the reader. Writing of youth, of death, of familiar faces, of homely things, he keeps marvellously close to life. It was, we feel, just so with us in childhood, at school, in this sad or glad experience. This power, together with the humanist temperament of getting at the heart of things, makes him keenly alive to life.

This little volume, though its title will jar upon Vegetarians, does give us the quintessence of Lamb's unique genius. For Mr. Lucas, who has given his nights and days to the study of Lamb, has brought together a number of the most entertaining, most beautiful, and, in the case of the letters, most amusing of his writings, and it is certain to drive the reader to Lamb's complete works, the output of a rare and delightful genius.

The man himself was well worth knowing. What would it not be worth to have a few hours of his company? In his buoyant humor or in his more serious vein, it were all one. Suppose we could have dined with him that day when the dish was the sucking-pig that Farmer Collier sent him, and heard the good wishes wafted to the giver:—

> "May your granaries be full, and your rats empty, and your chickens plump, and your envious neighbors lean, and your laborers busy, and you as idle and as happy as the day is long."

Or imagine we had been present when the stately Coleridge asked him, "Charles, did you ever hear me preach?" and he replied in his stuttering way, "I never heard you do anything else." Or what if we had taken a hand at whist when Burney was his partner and he called out, "Martin, if dirt were trumps, what a hand you'd have." Or, better still, had been with him that Saturday night when he brought home the folio Beaumont and Fletcher that he had coveted for weeks, while he saved the price of it, and he could not think of going to bed till the loose leaves had been pasted in, and he had read his favorite passages. Or, best of all, had we been among those to whom his door was open on the famous Wednesday evenings in the Inner Temple Lane. Wordsworth was one of the number when he was in town, and Coleridge, Haydon, Hazlitt, Barry Cornwall and Talfourd. It must have been a rich memory, an abiding delight, to have been with Lamb at times like these. It must have been a festal evening like those ever-memorable nights at Frederick's palace when the nimble wit of Voltaire challenged the best brains of Europe, or those suppers at the "Mermaid" when rare Ben Jonson exchanged quips and cranks with the smiling Shakespeare.

Carlyle was the only man of note who misunderstood Lamb. His austerity, his want of humor, his dogmatism, shut the doors of sympathy. When they met the atmosphere was electric. On one occasion, while they were waiting for their host, Carlyle looked out of the window, watching the flight of some pigeons. Lamb, hurt perhaps at his silence, went up to him and asked, "Mr. Carlyle, are you a poulterer?" Another time, as they were together in the hall, preparing to leave a party after the sage had monopolised the conversation, Lamb handed Carlyle his wide-awake hat with the remark, "Is this your turban?" Accordingly, we find the philosopher writing in his journal: "Charles Lamb I sincerely believe to be in some considerable degree insane! A more pitiful, rickety, gasping, staggering, stammering tomfool I do not know." Carlyle was as wrong with regard to Lamb as he was in error concerning Heine and Voltaire. Lamb's jests often contained shrewd observation, as in his ironic expression of regret that the Royalists did not hang Milton, for then we might have laughed at them.

The other men of genius who knew Lamb realised his worth. They saw the good nature under the uncouth exterior. He was ready both with sympathy and help, generous and unselfish. Like Dumas, he had pensioners on his bounty, among whom were an old teacher of his own, and a cripple whose only claim was that he was recommended by his friend, Southey. Barry Cornwall tells a characteristic story. He was in Lamb's company one day, in low spirits, which Lamb thought due to want of money. Turning suddenly, Lamb said, "My dear boy, I have a quantity of useless things, including a hundred pounds in my desk, that I don't know what to do with. Take it."

Lamb was a hero, modest, and unobtrusive. There was insanity in the family, and Lamb never married

His sister Mary killed her mother in a fit of frenzy. A few weeks' restraint restored her to her right mind, but insanity recurred at intervals ever afterwards, and a retreat was provided in a private asylum. There was warning of their coming, and a friend has related how he met the brother and sister at such a time, walking hand-in-hand across the fields to the asylum, both in tears.

If Charles Lamb waged an unequal war against fate, he was, at least, a happy soldier. When his turn came he yielded up his broken sword to fate, the conqueror, with a brave and a humble heart.

Alfaro and the Ecuadorian Bigots.

> "Eloy Alfaro was an Eagle who had the heart of a dove; that is why his wings were burnt in the flames."—VARGAS VILA in his new poem, La Muerte del Condor, p. 45.

IN the Freethinker of March 8, 1912, I related the terrible story of the atrocities which crowned the triumph of reaction in the Republic of Ecuador, and my subsequent article of March 17, of the same year, set out in fuller detail the fiendish work of the Ecuadorian clericals as displayed in the murder of the ex-President, Eloy Alfaro, and his associates. The Ecuadorian papers which at that time came to my hands left no manner of doubt in my mind that the indecent mutilation of these victims, the cutting out of their tongues and the infliction of wounds upon the most sensitive parts of their bodies, the tearing out of Flavio Alfaro's heart, its slicing into pieces to be publicly eaten by a bigoted and priest-maddened populace, were atrocities committed in Quito and Guayaquil only two years ago under the holy auspices of the Archbishop and other mild but mitred men of God who were glad of the opportunity of letting loose the tiger of religious intolerance upon the old, freethinking Eloy Alfaro and his friends.

The murderers in high places who wrought these abominations have not yet been brought to account, and the Ecuadorian Republic still continues under the stigma, which any civilised community would refuse tamely to bear, of allowing these crimes against humanity to go unpunished. The almost incredible record of these infamies stands fresh and unrefuted in the pages of the Freethinker, in the Daily News of March 16 and 20, 1912, and in the issue for June, 1912, of Hispania, a well-known South American review in the Spanish language, which hails every month from our cosmopolitan London.

But although the avenging hand of justice—Ecuadorian justice—remains for the time being limp with paralysis, all memory of the horrid crime is not yet obliterated. In flaming words of indignation, a distinguished South American writer, Vargas Vila, has just published a superb prose-poem* which nobly vindicates the character of the murdered Eloy Alfaro and brands with infamy the men who compassed his death. For the story of this man's heroic life and the tragedy of his fateful death, to be framed with the laurels of these splendid pages, is perhaps the most brilliant apotheosis that this stricken martyr of noble ideals, foully murdered in his eightieth year, could obtain. The throbbing pathos, the poetic beauty, the Olympian grandeur of this Homeric poem-tragedy, should secure immortality, if not to the illustrious victim, at any rate to his cowardly assassins.

Senor Vargas Vila calls his vindication "A Poem, a Tragedy, and a History." Few poems of recent years have soared to such heights of sublimity or plumbed such depths of pathos. It is not, however, a poem in the conventional sense of the word; it is rather a combination of fervid poetry and heroic prose such as Victor Hugo, Thomas Carlyle, and Walt Whitman would write in their most characteristic moods. If Vila had written his poem of vindication in orthodox poetic lines, or framed his tragedy—a tragedy, alas! in real life and in our own times—in the conventional mode, or had he tamely pamphletised a matter-of-fact history of his hero, most likely he would have bored a public which lives so near to the lingering echoes of the awful tragedy of two years ago. But the martial grandeur of these majestic lines, which at times soar to the highest peaks of Parnassus, fascinate and enthrill according as they dazzle our imagination with their rugged splendor of beauty, or strike awe within our soul by the colossal force and daring of the mental pictures evoked. I have seen no specimen of Vargas Vila's art other than this wonderful prose-poem, but I am satisfied that he shows himself here with the poet's stride, with the bardic voice that rings clear, with the seer's eye that penetrates and reveals the essential facts with lightning flashes of intuition.

Nothing more Jove-like in its thunders of invective, in the corrosive vehemence of its poetic fervor, than the three opening chapters in which the poet describes the tyranny of "the inferior Cæsars," who tyrannise over the Republics of Central South America and over its various tribes, "who filled the terrible abyss with their lamentations during their crucifixion between heaven and earth, as though transfixed between two infinites bereft of mercy." Amongst these tyrants we read of Archbishop Merino, the recent President of San Domingo, who in one day shot forty innocent students who were accused of the crime of conspiring against him. Vargas Vila calls him the "mitred panther, whose mantle, bathed in blood, showed him to be a sinister purple-robed minister of death, in whose hands the elevated Host became red....." The moving spectacle, as here disclosed, of anarchy in these despoiled unfortunate lands, should stir up the torpor of the Central American Republics and shame its public men into getting in closer conformity with the underlying principles of true civilisation. If only for that reason, the apocalyptic terrors which this tragic poem foreshadows as the ultimate doom of the neo-Latin Republics, unless they mend their ways, should serve for warning and admonition to the nations concerned.

In my Freethinker article of March 12, 1912, I gave particulars of the secularising spirit which animated the drastic and much-needed work of social reform in Ecuador carried on by President Eloy Alfaro and by the Liberal (i.e., the Radical Freethinking) party which he represented in the country. I now find that Vargas Vila, in his poem, confirms this view and points out how the enmity of the Church against Alfaro was aroused to savage fury by his zeal for secular education and ample religious toleration. This is how Vila describes the situation preceding the advent of Alfaro:—

> "The night that had reigned over these skies was that profound night, starless and merciless, the night of fear and dismay, beneath which the nations disappear in a silent orgy, during which they are devoured by all the vultures that spring from the frozen heart of the abyss—it was the Night of Religion!
> "What think you would bubble forth from that unshapen chaos in which during an interminable succession of years the Priest and the Executioner, those twin brothers of Death, reigned supreme like absolute Gods?
> "The reign of the priests had been in Ecuador, as in all the countries of Latin America, a feast of jackals."

Vargas Vila glorifies his hero, and perhaps over-idealises him. For Vila, Alfaro was the Hero of the Sword, the Hero of Ideas; the Liberator, the Soldier who was dreamer as well. Chapter xi. describes his creative work of social reorganisation, the scheme of which (page 105) was apparently too vast for immediate realisation amidst a backward people with whom "a slavish and religious sediment" found favor, "whose policy consisted in putting one hand into the public treasury without withdrawing the other which was slimy with the waters that surged in the baptismal font." But the great constructional works of Alfaro still remain, although his enemies literally lopped off the hands of the man whose public spirit contrived them.

Vargas Vila, who is evidently a Freethinker, holds the view that when reaction took its revenge upon Alfaro its instrument was Carlos Freile Zaldumbide, whom Alfaro had appointed Vice-President of the Republic; who, as he tells us, had the "soul of a priest and of an executioner." It was Zaldumbide's hand that released the storm that overwhelmed Alfaro, and he it was who, acting as "the bacillus of assassination," organised the butcheries that made the name of Ecuador a by-word of reproach to South American civilisation. When the incomplete documents concerning these atrocities reached me two years ago I had my suspicions of the treachery of Zaldumbide. The terrible eighteenth chapter of La Muerte del Condor which gibbets him as "a slimy and corrupt Jesuit who presided over a band of assassins," sheds new light on the problem. But the moving spirit amidst these horrors, which will for ever darken the memory of January 28, 1912, was, we are assured, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Dr. Charles R. Tobar. He it was who repudiated the act of capitulation by which the lives of the defeated Alfarists were to be spared; and who hypnotised Zaldumbide into compliance with an act of odious public treachery, which soon gave birth to scenes of nameless barbarity (see Cap. xxii. et seq.). All the horrors described in the Freethinker two years ago, and many additional touches, are shown with terrifying vividness in these later chapters. The obscene mutilation of Eloy Alfaro by a monk, if you please, is described on page 239, and we learn on page 240 that these mutilations and tortures were inflicted to the cry of "Death to the Freemasons; Long live Religion; Death to the heretics; Long live the Sacred Heart of Jesus."

It is well, if horrors of this nature are still to go on to the disgrace of our common humanity, or if revivals of mediævalism are to be inaugurated to-day and blessed and perpetrated in the sacred name of religion, that some indignant pen, like that so splendidly wielded by Vargas Vila, should flash forth like an avenging sword in the pale faces of the holy assassins and of their would-be imitators. Already La Muerte del Condor is in its second edition—an augury, we trust, of many more editions to come. Let us hope that the flaming pen of the indignant poet will brand his lightning words deep into the consciences of the Ecuadorian people and of the South American Republics generally, in order to warn them of the danger that lurks for them in the unquelled spirit of fratricidal strife which ignorance engenders and which religious bigotry fans into devouring flames.

WILLIAM HEAFORD.

The supposition, that the terrors of hell-fire are essential or even conducive to good morals, is contradicted by the facts of history. In the Dark Ages there was not a man or a woman, from Scotland to Naples, who doubted that sinners were sent to hell. The religion which they had was the same as ours, with this exception—that everyone believed in it. The state of Europe in that pious epoch need not be described.—Winwood Reade.

Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts,
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals or forts.

It is rumored that the Kaiser has been induced to postpone his ultimatum to Almighty God.

The Kaiser's last words to his Army were "God help us." Looking backward, he might very well exclaim "Oh my prophetic soul!"

The papers inform us that the Prince of Wales has joined his regiment for active service. He motored down to where it is stationed, near Brentwood. We have not heard that the Germans are in strong force in that locality, but it contains a famous lunatic asylum.

Mr. Arnold White, writing in the Referee, says that "The British National Anthem assumes that the Most High is British in sympathy and hostile to all aliens opposed to the King of England." Just so! And the priests of the Government religion bless the battleships and consecrate the colours of the regiments in the name of "The Prince of Peace."

A few years ago a well-known member of the House of Lords exclaimed in the course of a public speech, "Damn the consequences." Dr. Campbell Morgan wouldn't for the world use a swear-word, but the other day he said in effect, "Damn the facts; whatever happens, whether peace or war, we must not allow ourselves for a single moment, whatever tragedy may be awaiting us, to question the truth of the text, 'The Lord sitteth King for ever.'" Then God is the direct cause of what Dr. Morgan himself called "the weird and devilish situation" in which Europe finds itself at this hour, and it is he who must be held responsible for the awful deluge of blood and misery which will soon overwhelm us. But, be the facts what they may, we must not permit ourselves to doubt his sovereignty.

Dr. Morgan made a sillier observation still. He said, "What is our duty at this hour? First, that of courage; second, that of co-operation with God." According to this clinical wiseacre, Atheists cannot have courage, because "true courage is born of certainty of God." What sheer nonsense! Then, how can we co-operate at this hour with him who "sitteth King for ever," except by doing our utmost to promote war, as he has so successfully done? Of course, these men of God conveniently ignore the obvious implications of their own foolish teaching.

Ministers of religion, in particular, are just now placing God in a most awkward position. All parties to the present European conflict are his peculiar people, who believe that he is a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering Father, and passionately implore him to grant success to opposing arms. In the circumstances, how on earth can he act with impartiality? Germany believes that she is fighting in a just cause, and fervently prays for victory; but as all her enemies do the same, God must find himself in a peculiarly unenviable quandary. Do his ordained servants never think of this?

The Archbishop of Canterbury considers the military situation "the work of the Devil." There's £15,000 worth of wisdom for the devout believer. A colored medicine man would have given the same advice for a bottle of fire-water.

"When old King William of Prussia was on his death-bed he sent for his grandson, the present Kaiser. His last words to the future ruler of the German people were, 'Keep in with the Czar of Russia.' And now—well, well! I wonder what grandpapa, looking down from above, thinks of the situation." This gem was written by Mr. George R. Sims in the Referee. But what if grandpapa is sweating tallow candles in the other place?

The Bishop of London is going to accompany the London troops while the war is on. We wonder what the soldiers will think of it. On board a ship the presence of a man of God is deemed unlucky. Perhaps it is a reminiscence of Jonah.

When we went to America in 1896 on the old Germanic with the late Charles Watts, a well-known artist, Mr. Harry Furness, was a fellow-passenger. Talking about the weather with an old sailor, he was told that the voyage could hardly be a smooth one with so many clericals on board. Mr. Furness told him that there were two Atheists in the saloon.

and asked him what he thought of the prospect with that fact in view. The old sailor replied that in those circumstances it ought to be middling, or rather better. And middling or rather better it was. The Atheists were not lightweights. They kept the scale down on their side. Some days were positively beautiful.

The Rev. Edward Shillito says that "if ever it has been easy to doubt the rule of the holy God over his world, it has been easy this week." Does the reverend gentleman verily believe that there is a holy Ruler of the world? Can he look history in the face and honestly say that "the moment, in all its sinister meaning, is arrayed against the experience of the past, and against the faith tested in other ages?" We boldly affirm that the belief in a holy Governor of the world has never been justified by the facts, and that the facts of to-day give the complete lie to it. Mr. Shillito knows, as well as we do, how utterly useless and senseless prayer is in such a deplorable state of things, or in any other state for that matter.

The organ of the New Theology that was, informs us that on Sunday, August 2, prayers were offered for the nations in the crisis through which they were passing. Now we see the answer—WAR. He who "knows and cares and guides," as the Archbishop of Canterbury said, to whom the prayers were supposed to ascend on the wings of faith, has seen fit, in his infinite wisdom and love, to send fire and sword, death and destruction, pain and sorrow. And yet the very people who admit that this is a fact aver that he "doeth all things well." On August 2 we saw a nation at prayer, and three days later we saw, and still see, the nations at war.

The Government doesn't seem to understand its own Post Office work. The following happened in one and the same office in a few minutes. A young lady tried to get a bonâ-fide postal order cashed, and the lady clerk refused to cash it. She merely wanted to buy some stamps, by means of a Government order (duly paid for), which the said Government declined to honor. That is to say, the Government refused its own currency. After a lot of haggling, the stamps were passed over and the change given in the form of another postal order. So much for transaction number one. Transaction number two was as follows. A gentleman wanted to buy a postal order to send away as a remittance, and the lady clerk refused to supply him. He tendered coin of the realm, and she wouldn't take it. Surely this is chaos come again. We always knew that the Post Office was the silliest and most impudent institution in England, but we hardly thought it would come to this.

The Government should interfere with the currency as little as possible. Stopping a panic run on banks on a declaration of war is sensible and quite easy. That is all that needs to be done. The currency was enough before the panic began, and it will be enough (perhaps too much) when the panic is ended. Bank notes for smaller sums than £5 are right enough: you meet them everywhere and every day in Scotland, for instance; but to try to make postal orders currency is madness or fraudulency. It means that the Government takes our money, and gives us none of it back. Gold is still hoarded, but the Government itself does the hoarding.

And that list of prices which the Government recommended to buyers and sellers in shops! Fancy the economics of fixing prices without fixing wages and the food supply! A poor man who had paid a shilling a pound for butter could not pay one and sixpence, unless his wages were raised proportionately. He would buy two pounds instead of three. In this case it was easy to see that Germany, the only people we were fighting, could not seriously interfere with our food supply, which would soon settle down to normal when it was recognised that the panic had nothing real to rest upon.

The interests involved in the Austrian-Servian trouble are of a very mixed character, but amongst these it is impossible to overlook the part played by religion. And, as usual, it only serves to accentuate bitterness that already exists, creates a new one, and does nothing whatever to foster the possibilities of friendly intercourse. Pan-Slavism stands for the supremacy of the Greek Church in South-Eastern Europe, just as behind Austria is the force of the Roman Catholic Church. The composite nationality of the Austrian Empire has its internal animosities sharpened by religious differences, and these, with a people like those of South-Eastern Europe, tend to create troubles where none would otherwise exist. It is thus a curious fact that in both the great political questions of the moment—the Home Rule question and the European war, religious belief is the most disturbing factor. In Ireland, but for religious belief the whole problem would be fairly easy of solution; and in the near East, for generations the great trouble has been how to get people of rival sects and religions to live peaceably together.

A United Council Sunday Defence Committee for London has been formed with the Bishop of London at its head. It is curious how the various sects can agree when it is a question of enforcing their opinions upon others. No one in London has the least desire to prevent any members or supporters of the committee attending church or chapel, or to force them to go to secular places of entertainment. All other people ask in this matter is freedom; what the Defence Committee demand is compulsion—the power to force its own ideas of Sunday on the rest of the community. The Bishop of London said that the number of cinema palaces open on Sunday had increased, and thought it was hypocrisy to pretend that they are opened for charity. Very likely. But hypocrisy in some form or another is the usual result of religious legislation. And we quite fail to see the justice in insisting that the proprietors of cinema palaces, if they open on Sunday, shall give their profits to charitable institutions. If the picture palaces have any bad results these are quite independent of where the profits go. And it is passing strange to find religious people winking at these consequences so long as the proprietors do not make a profit.

The truth is that all the hypocrisy lies with the Sabbatarians. They do not want the picture palaces open at all. They hope that if the proprietors are prevented making a profit they will not open. Moreover, the sheer hypocrisy of the religious party has been exposed by reports received from the police from all parts of the country. There are no reports of bad behavior or evil pictures. There is a general agreement that they provide clean, healthy entertainment, and that the behavior of young people about the streets has undergone an improvement. One would have thought that religious leaders with their loudly expressed desire for the moral betterment of the people would have welcomed the appearance of anything that would keep the rising generation from the attractions of the public-house and the hooliganism of the streets. But they keep people away from Church. That is the really unforgivable offence of the picture palaces. The talk of a seven-day working week is only additional hypocrisy. That could be easily enough prevented. The community may be justified in demanding that every employee shall have one day's rest out of seven. It is certainly not justified in demanding that everybody shall rest on the same day. And one could imagine that as working-men were able to win the Saturday half-holiday, and a shortened labor week-day, they might be trusted to guard themselves against being compelled to work seven days a week.

What a frightfully low opinion of the Christian Church the Church Times entertains. In its issue for August 7 it says that, though nearly two thousand years old, she has not yet learned "to draw a sharp distinction between the forces of truth and error." We are familiar with the popular adages, "It is never too late to mend" and "One is never too old to learn"; but when one has arrived at the state of decrepitude one is much more likely to forget things already learned than to learn new ones. The Church is now too busy trying to put off the dying hour to be able to devote any time to the acquisition of fresh knowledge. Any lines she draws to-day are the opposite of "sharp."

Great Britain is decidedly on the downgrade. She is rapidly losing the things she ought to value more than life. She is becoming reckless, parting with her ideals, turning its back on the sterner virtues, selling her birthright for a mess of pottage, treating sport as if it were the end of life, and flinging her ancient piety and reverence for the things of God down the wind. Hence the present "weird and devilish situation." So says Canon Newbolt, who speaks in the name of God, and who consequently must be right. God has sent the present war as a chastisement for our sins. It comes as "a call to prayer, but even more as a call to mend our ways. In spite of former chastisements we have grown careless and indifferent. We are becoming the Godless nation which tries to live without God in the world." What horrible claptrap! This is one of the very few wars we cannot truthfully accuse of being religious wars. It is a war of ambition, undertaken solely with the object of gaining additional territory and power, though it is claimed that God is actively on the side of all the parties to it.

At the Wesleyan Methodist Conference the Rev. W. H. Armstrong bade his fellow-preachers take courage, because of late Rationalists themselves had been doing something to advance the Christian faith. This "something" turned out to consist in Sir Arthur Conan Doyle having affirmed the presence of design in the universe and an alleged statement by Professor Gilbert Murray that psychology was against "Rationalism." We believe that Sir Arthur Conan Doyle has never ceased to affirm design in the universe, and we are not seriously alarmed at his statement in any case. Very much greater men than Sir Arthur Conan Doyle have said the same thing, but it has never affected the facts, nor has it prevented a growing number giving up the belief as unjustifiable. Besides, if there is design in nature, it should be quite independent of whether any particular person believes in it or not, the facts should be there to convince anyone who cares to examine them. The idea of so important a belief as the existence of God depending upon whether a popular novelist believes in design or not is really laughable. It is clear evidence of the straits to which religionists are reduced, that they should find comfort in such a circumstance.

As to Professor Gilbert Murray saying that psychology is against Rationalism, we seriously question the accuracy of the statement. In any case it is not true. Some psychologists—mostly of the variety that call "psychology" anything that is labelled "occult"—may, but the science of psychology is dead against the religious position. It will be instructive to any Christian to only glance down the index attached to any acknowledged text-book of psychology. In the vast majority of cases he will either not find the "soul" mentioned at all, or he will find it dismissed as having no scientific value. Yet psychology began as the science of the soul. But in course of time, as the study of mental functions became more accurate, it was found that not only was there no evidence for the existence of a soul, but even as a working theory it had no value whatever. Even the late Professor James was forced to admit this much, and Professor McDougal—who does argue for a real "soul"—practically admits that he is a free-lance fighting the great body of modern psychologists. Psychology, in fact, has followed the course that every one of the sciences has taken. It began with a host of theological and animistic conceptions, and it shed them just as soon and just as certainly as it reached positive results.

As soon as war was declared between Great Britain and Germany, a lot of Christians, who cared more for the meat which perisheth than for any patriotic virtue, rushed off to the shops in a disgusting panic, and bought large supplies of food, which act, of course, helped to raise the price of provisions for all their poorer fellow-citizens. A lot of Christian shopkeepers played up to this contemptible game, and helped to rob (that is the real word for it) their poor fellow-citizens who could least afford to pay from 50 to 100 per cent. higher prices for all the necessaries of life. The Christian shopkeepers (most shopkeepers are Christians) were simply taking a mean advantage of their fellow-citizens in a time of national distress. It was so like them.

We heard of one curious case. The morning after the declaration of war an angler at a seaside town went to the usual place to buy worms. To his surprise he found the price doubled. It was on account of the war.

Mr. Harold Begbie lets the truth out now and then. The following passage occurred in his article in the Daily Chronicle (Aug. 5) on "The War of Civilisation":—

> "And where are Good Manners gone? Look for them in Asia, but not in Europe. At every Christian frontier you can pick up a broken treaty and a dishonored bond."

On the same page of the Daily Chronicle there is an editorial article in which a half-hearted plea is put forward for such prayer as the Archbishop of Canterbury is (professionally) recommending to the English people. Some other ecclesiastic looks after this sort of thing for the Scotch, Irish, and Welsh. We ask our readers' attention to the following passage:—

> "Clever ridicule is sometimes poured on the prayers which opposite combatants offer to the same God; but the scoffers forget something, which simpler people know. It is that in this world of unplumbed mysteries, where frail, short-lived, short-sighted humanity gropes amid unmeasured forces, conflicts arise that are past our solving or averting or reconciling. Human wisdom is sorely limited at its best, but we believe that there is a Wisdom beyond it; and to that in the tremendous hour when the resources of human prudence have all been tried and tried in vain, we humbly commit our destiny, our lives, and the lives of our nearest and dearest."

What connection has the end of this passage with the beginning? What resemblance is there between rival combatants asking the same God for victory, and begging his assistance when one or the other of them has got a good licking? The latter prayer may or may not be answered; it is simply a question of probability. The former is a clear absurdity.

Mr. Coulson Kernahan is sometimes original, and, occasionally, antediluvian in his suggestions. His latest idea is that the best solution of the European crisis is for us to "humble ourselves before God in prayer." Perhaps some of his friends will provide him with some velvet knee-caps, but we hardly think he will set the fashion.

The Rev. Hugh Chapman, of the Savoy Chapel, London, says man is "a combination of mud and angel." We must not call this a dirty mistake; but it is altogether wrong scientifically.

Lieut.-Gen. Sir R. Baden-Powell, distributing prizes at a Hammersmith Girls' School, said "a lady was one who wore silk stockings. If cotton gloves were worn she was a woman, and if she did not wear gloves and had a dress of calico she was a person." How would the witty warrior describe Eve in the Garden of Eden?

The authorities of Atlantic City—the Brighton of New Jersey, U.S.A.—have been trying for some time to put a stop to Sunday bathing and dancing on the sands on the Sabbath. Municipal bands play on Sunday, and in order to stop the dancing the musicians were ordered to play none but hymn tunes. The dancers, however, were equal to the occasion, and the tango and other freak dances have been carried on to the accompaniment of "Abide With Me," "Rock of Ages," and "Lead Kindly Light." The next move, we presume, will be either to stop the bands altogether or to turn the show into a religious service by opening with a prayer and ending with a collection.

"Gladness enters largely into the religion of the Christ," says the Rev. F. W. Turner, of the Baptist Church, Evesham. Then why is it that male Christians wear their chins on the fifth button of their waistcoats, and the girls look as if they were fresh from a funeral?

With regard to Mr. Lucas's The Best of Lamb, the title tempts one to ask "Welsh or New Zealand?"

Here's an advertisement from a West Country paper:—"Wanted, capable Farm Laborer, hedger, buttermaker; active Churchman, regular communicant, with good tenor voice, and family of musical boys, play cornet or violin; change ringer preferred. High wages; light work." This is an extreme example of Christian "cheek." Not only must the laborer be a man of extraordinary ability; but he must provide a family of musicians.

From the agony column of a contemporary:—"Christian gentleman, lonely, tired, seeks friendship with sensible, sincere, Christian lady. Write Rev. ——." A parson ought not to be lonely when he is in constant communion with two gods and a ghost. Apparently this one, like so many of his profession, prefers female society.

Puritanism has always been associated with cant, and its modern preachers seem determined that its association shall continue. Rev. D. B. Fraser, of Pembroke Chapel, Liverpool, lecturing on "Puritanism v. Pugilism," said that "Puritanism in this country was a genuine attempt to place the emphasis on the higher side of man's nature." We do not believe that Puritanism is, or was, anything of the kind. It was an attempt to emphasise the religious side of man's nature, which is not necessarily the higher side. Macaulay's epigram that the seventeenth century Puritans objected to bear-baiting, not because it hurt the bear, but because it pleased the onlookers, is eternally true of the type. And whether in England, America, or elsewhere, the prevalence of Puritanism has never succeeded in inducing a permanently healthy, social life. It creates a standard of value that is essentially jaundiced and unhealthy. And while it has encouraged, during its seasons of power, a thoroughly unhealthy type of character and tone of public mind, the reaction against it has usually been of a depressing kind. One need go no further than the history of the seventeenth century in England to prove this. When Mr. Fraser says that "Puritanism arrested England in her headlong plunge into prurient artificiality," and created "a new type of strong man," he is talking arrant nonsense. Puritanism did not arrest pruriency and artificiality at any time or anywhere. There are only three occasions on which it has been in power—in England, in Geneva, in parts of North America. And in each case, instead of preventing evil, it brought about disaster.

S. ALMAN.—Colonel Ingersoll did not recant on his deathbed. He had no deathbed at all. His doctor had told him that he had heart trouble, and might die suddenly at any moment. This information he kept to himself, in order not to upset his wife and daughters and other persons attached to him. One day, after a bad night, he was sitting on a chair in his house at Dobb's Ferry, with Mrs. Ingersoll standing by him. She expressed concern about his looks, and presently asked, "Are you better now, dear?" "Yes," he replied, with a pleasant smile, "better now." And in a sense he was, for death took him that very instant, the pleasant smile remaining stereotyped upon his face. You see what time he had to say "how sorry he was he could not burn all he had written against religion." The same story, by the way, was told of Thomas Paine, and, before him, of Voltaire. There is very little variety in the performance of these Christian liars.

E. BURKE.—(1) Pleased to hear from you again; also to see such a good report of the debate between yourself and a Christian Evidence speaker. (2) The N. S. S. does not distribute Freethought speakers over London; they are engaged by the Branches. (3) You are right about our "enormous correspondence." And we have no one to help us; no secretary, no clerk, no assistant of any kind; one pair of hands is all we have to rely on.

W. BRADBURN.—Some attention of the kind should certainly be shown to old or feeble Freethinkers who are driven to reliance on public charity. That is the common name for it, we believe. A copy of the Freethinker weekly would be most acceptable. We will put the matter before the next N. S. S. Executive meeting.

"ABRACADABRA."—We are waiting to hear from you.

E. B.—Thanks for useful cuttings.

G. O. MCDONALL (Montreal).—Thanks for cutting from your Daily Star. When the editor quotes from a letter of George Meredith's in 1872 as giving a true view of his attitude towards religion, he is playing the fool or something worse. Meredith lived 37 years longer and broadened all the time. He denied the supernatural.

W. P. BALL.—Your cuttings are always welcome.

F. LONSDALE.—We can quite understand that Glasgow was "war mad" when you wrote. We hope it has settled down a bit by this.

Sugar Plums.

Many newspapers have had to reduce their size, and we may have to do the same. We make no definite announcement, but we warn our readers of what is at least "on the cards" in order to guard them against a possible surprise.

We are publishing in this week's Freethinker a first instalment of an address on the woman question by Mr. M. M. Mangasarian, of Chicago, who is the leading Freethought propagandist in America at the present time. We do not mean as an editor, of course, for he is not connected with any journal; and the first place on that side of the movement over there belongs to George Macdonald, of the Truthseeker. Mr. Mangasarian's "church" at Chicago gives him the widest latitude as to the subject he selects for treatment every Sunday morning, and it publishes his discourses in large pamphlet form. This woman question is suited to Mr. Mangasarian's genius. It requires insight, sympathy, delicacy, and also mental firmness. It will not satisfy fanatics on either side, but it gives suggestions as to nature's vis media, and it is nature that will have the last word on these matters, after all. Anyhow, we think Mr. Mangasarian ought to be heard, as he desires, on this side of the Atlantic, as well as the other, on any important topic he chooses to speak upon.

Just as we go to press we receive a message from Mr. Mangasarian stating that he has arrived in London. We shall be delighted to meet him again. And, by the way, when is George Macdonald going to pass this way? We hope, at least, to hear from our Chicago friend that our old New York friend is well.

"The Unmarried Mother" is, perhaps, the most important article in the August English Review. Its author is Mrs. W. M. Gallichan. It is ably written and full of humanity. But one wonders, after all, if the disadvantages of illegitimacy can be done away with as the writer suggests. The sins of the parents ought not to be visited upon the children, but all through life they are, and Nature will always have her way in the long run! Mr. Norman Douglas contributes an informing and entertaining article on "Southern Saintliness." Mr. Alister Crowley contributes some clever "Chants Before Battle." There is another of Henri Fabre's delightful (though sometimes awful) entymological articles—this time on "Parasites." The editor's article on Ulster would be well worth reading if the great War had not snowed all other politics under.

INDIAN MISSIONS.

A report on the work of the Forman Christian College, at Lahore, has been issued by the Principal, the Rev. Dr. Ewing. If judged by its staff, he says—thirteen Christians and five non-Christians—the college is largely a Christian college; but, if judged by its students—582 non-Christians and 28 Christians—then it is largely a non-Christian institution. The proportion of non-Christian to Christian students in a Christian college certainly seems a trifle paradoxical; it is, however, ingenuously pointed out by the learned Principal that it is the fees of the non-Christian students, and the grant which the Government is justified in giving on their account, that has made the development of the college possible.

The well-equipped institution that now represents the Forman Christian College could never have been built and kept up from the funds forthcoming from the Christian students. Dr. Ewing compares what he terms two "mass movements" in the Punjab—the movement of the low castes towards Christianity, and that of the higher, and better educated, classes. It is easy to baptise, but hard to educate, the former; it is easy to educate, but hard to baptise, the latter.

Last year, of the 582 non-Christian students only one, a Mohammedan student in his second year, became a Christian.

Neglect the vicarious atonement, and down crumbles the hollow and broken shell of the popular theology helplessly into its grave.—William Rounseville Alger.

SECOND THOUGHT IS BEST.

"Every time I see grandfather's sword I want to go to war."

"Well?"

"But every time I notice grandfather's wooden leg I cool down."

"You say man is a vapor?" "Yes; so the Bible says." "Well, I'm downright glad to hear it." "Why, what difference does it make to you?" "Well, it backs up a remark I made to the parson last night. I told him he was all gas."

Mrs. Bowers: "I do wish you would go to church with me occasionally. How are people to know that I am married if they never see you with me?"

Mr. Bowers: "Easy. Take the children with you."

The Origin of Supernatural Ideas.—IV.

"We cannot forbear pausing for a moment to note the vast mental schemes that have resulted from his first supernal concept of luck and his after-elimination of the dream-ghost. In these original conceptions lay hid all the possibilities of the spiritual world—fate, destiny, the spirits, the godheads, heaven and hell, all the religions of the past, all supernatural schemes for the future, every test-power to divine the unknown, every evil influence that crushes humanity, every transcendental power, a lost world, and a saved humanity.....Of the great Egyptian faith, how small now seems the heritage of humanity, and the thunders of Jove and the cognate Olympian deities exist as mere school-boy rhapsodies. So all the great mental forces that have been expressed in dynasties, empires, faiths, now remain as mere blotches on the escutcheon of time. There has been nothing eternal in human thought save the early fetish deductions man made from his supernal concept of luck and the presence of the dream-ghost. These early deductions of the mystic are ever-living, men conceive and re-conceive them, and to most men they have the same nature and express the same sentiments as when the pre-glacial man bowed in awe before the silent concepts of his own soul. From their long persistent immortality, we are bound to expect they will outlast all the divine schemes that now encumber the human soul."—J. H. KING, The Supernatural: Its Origin, Nature, and Evolution, pp. 181-2.

"The doctrine of Evolution has no 'favored-nation clause' for man. It admits no break in the psychical chain which links him to the lowest life-forms, be these plant or animal. It finds no arrest of continuity between the bark of the dog and the orations of Demosthenes, or between the pulsations of an amœba and the ecstasies of a saint."—EDWARD CLODD, Animism: The Seed of Religion, p. 14.

CLOSELY allied to the idea of luck is the idea of magic. It is a further step towards the evolution of religion, but it is not religion. As Frazer remarks:—

"The theory that in the history of mankind religion has been preceded by magic is confirmed inductively by the observation that among the aborigines of Australia, the rudest savages as to whom we possess accurate information, magic is universally practised; whereas religion, in the sense of a propitiation or conciliation of the higher powers, seems to be nearly unknown."

"Similarly," says the same writer,

"among the Fuegians, another of the lowest races of mankind, almost every old man is a magician, who is supposed to have the power of life and to be able to control the weather. But the members of the French scientific expedition to Cape Horn could detect nothing worthy the name of religion among these savages."*

Sir John Lubbock (Lord Avebury) holds that "magic is not only not religion, but the very opposite of religion," and points out that the tedious, and almost interminable, magical ceremonies which occupy a large part of the lives of Australian savages contain no prayers or sacrifices, no appeals for help to any superior power, but are "an attempt to control nature and secure material advantages—mainly rain and food."†

In this stage, as Mr. Clodd remarks,

"Man and brute alike tremble before the unusual; they fear, but know not why, or what, they fear. As yet man has no conception of body as home of an indwelling spirit, and no conception of surroundings as natural and supernatural; therefore no idea of an after life, no idea of heaven and no dread of hell."‡

"This," he continues, "to all intents and purposes, is Naturalism; or, as Professor Flint calls it, Naturism: a stage antecedent to Animism, or the belief in spirits everywhere, in the non-living as well as in the living." "Naturism" is a far better word than "Naturalism" in this connection, seeing that Naturalism has already a definite meaning, and its use would only lead to misunderstanding. The word also has the approval of Professor Leuba, who says: "The word naturism should be adopted as a name for the pre-animistic and pre-religious stage of culture, a stage corresponding to the one through which a child passes before he inquires into hidden causes and mechanisms."§

"Most forms of magic can be performed by anybody, provided he knows what to do," says Dr. Haddon;* the practice of it requires no churches, temples, or priests. But just as we have specialists in medicine, or science, or art, so the savage has his specialist in magic, known as the medicine-man or witch-doctor. Intelligent people are surprised that anyone can believe in such puerile and foolish ideas as magic and witchcraft; but, as Professor Tylor remarks, "they are intelligible if one can only bring one's mind down to the childish state they belong to."† He explains the principle of it as follows:—

"The practical knowledge of nature possessed by savages is so great that it cannot have been gained by mere chance observations; they must have been for ages constantly noticing and trying new things, to see how far their behavior corresponded with that of things partly like them. And where the matter can be brought to practical trial by experiment, this is a thoroughly scientific method. But the rude man wants to learn and do far more difficult things—how to find where there is plenty of game, or whether his enemies are coming; how to save himself from the lightning, or how to hurt someone he hates but cannot safely throw a spear at. In such matters beyond his limited knowledge, he contents himself with working on resemblances or analogies of thought, which thus become the foundation of magic" (p. 339).

He gives as an illustration the action of "The North American Indian, eager to kill a bear to-morrow, will hang up a rude grass image of one and shoot it, reckoning that this symbolic act will make the real one happen," and that "The Zulu who has to buy cattle may be seen chewing a bit of wood, in order to soften the hard heart of the seller he is dealing with" (p. 340). As he remarks, a volume might be filled with accounts of such practices. When rain is wanted by the Wara tribe of Australia, a native goes secretly to a pool, "bends over and 'sings' to the water; then he takes some up in his hands, drinks it, and spits it out in various directions. After that he throws water all over himself, and, after scattering some all round, he returns quietly to his camp, and rain is supposed to follow."‡ Nor do we see how those among us who believe that because a man has never seen a certain football team defeated, therefore that team will never suffer defeat while he remains a spectator, can afford to smile at these savages.

The logic of the belief is this, says Dr. Tylor:—

"Things which are like one another behave in the same way—shooting this image of a bear is like shooting a real bear; therefore, if I shoot the image, I shall shoot a real bear. It is true that such magical proceedings, if tested by facts, prove to be worthless. But if we wonder that nevertheless they should so prevail among mankind, it may be answered that they last on even in our own country among those who are too ignorant to test them by the facts—the rustics who believe a neighbor's ill-wishing has killed their cow, and who, on true savage principles, try to punish the evil doer by putting a heart spitefully stuck full of pins up the chimney to shrivel in the smoke, that in like manner sharp pangs may pierce him and he may waste away."§

We now come to that stage in the evolution of the supernatural known as "Animism," a name applied by Dr. Tylor, in his very valuable work, Primitive Culture, to denote the belief by primitive man that inanimate objects, such as trees, rocks, and rivers, are possessed with a soul or living principle. From Animism has sprung all the brood of spirits, gods, angels, and devils which have afflicted mankind for uncounted ages.

Primitive man, like the child, could not clearly distinguish between what psychologists call the "objective" and the "subjective"; that is, he was unable to distinguish what went on inside his mind (the subjective) from what happened outside (the objective). As the very young child is unable to distinguish between his dreams and the realities of life, so primitive man in like manner is unable to distinguish any difference. With the savage, seeing is believing; and when he sees his friends, or enemies, or relatives, some of whom may have been dead many years, he believes he really has seen them. And when his squaw tells him that he has not moved from his place during the night, then he believes that something went out of him while he slept to meet those he had seen and spoken with.

"To what other conclusion," asks Mr. Clodd,

> "can the barbaric mind come than that everybody has another self, as it has been called, which does the things dreamed of, which leaves a man for a time when he is asleep or in a fit, which leaves him altogether when he dies, but comes back, and seems the very man himself to the dreamer? The Malays do not like to wake a sleeper, lest they should hurt him by disturbing his body while his soul is out. When the Greenlander dreams of hunting or fishing or courting, he believes that the soul quits the body. The Melanesians say that the soul 'goes out of the body in some dreams, and if for some reason it does not come back, the man is found dead in the morning; when a man faints, his soul really starts on the way to Panoi [the underworld], but is sent back; the other ghosts hustle him away from the mouth [of Panoi], or his father or friend turn him back, telling him that his time is not yet come.'"

Mr. Clodd cites the personal experience of Sir Everard im Thurn, who, in his book, Among the Indians of Guiana, says:—

> "The morning when it was important to me to get away from a camp on the Essequibo River, at which I had been detained for some days by the illness of some of my Indian companions, I found one of the invalids so enraged against me that he refused to stir. For he declared that I had taken him out during the night and had made him haul the canoe up a series of difficult cataracts. Nothing could persuade him that this was but a dream, and it was some time before he was so far pacified as to throw himself sulkily into the bottom of the canoe. At that time we were all suffering from scarcity of food, and, hunger having its usual effect in producing vivid dreams, similar events frequently occurred."†

It has been observed that the dreams of primitive man are probably much more realistic than ours. Fasting and over-eating both cause vivid dreams; and savages, especially hunting tribes, often have to fast, which is followed by a gluttonous feast after a successful hunt.

Having arrived at this idea of a soul, or spirit, he carries it to its logical conclusion. Says Dr. Tylor:—

> "It may have occurred to some readers that the savage philosopher ought, on precisely the same grounds, to believe his horse or dog to have a soul, a phantom-likeness of its body. This is, in fact, what the lower races always have thought, and think still; and they follow the reasoning out in a way that surprises the modern mind, though it is quite consistent from the barbarian's point of view. If a human soul seen in a dream is a real object, then the spear and shield it carries and the mantle over its shoulders are real objects too, and all lifeless things must have their thin flitting shadow-souls."‡

This idea of another self, which could come and go from the body, was reinforced and confirmed when the savage, kneeling to drink from the water, beheld a shadowy reflection of himself, which disappeared upon his trying to grasp it. Also of his shadow thrown by the sun, and the echo of his own voice mocking him from the rocks.

Bible Makers.—II.

THE VERSATILE JOSHUA.

IT is now admitted that what Freethinkers have been saying about the authorship of many of the books of the Bible is quite true; that nobody knows when they were written, or by whom; and I think there can be no doubt in the mind of any thoughtful person that Joshua was no more the author of the book that bears his name than Moses was the author of the Pentateuch. For the purpose of having names to refer to as the accredited authors of the various books of the Bible, it will be convenient to assume that these persons were in reality responsible for the books of which they are the alleged authors. And it may at once be said that the contents of the book of Joshua show that that personage entertained not only a very good opinion of himself but a very poor one of everybody else.

When an author is writing reminiscences of his career as a General, and describing in vivid language the rapine and murder of which the soldiers under his command are guilty, is it not positively in bad taste to say a word in his own behalf, as though pleading for promotion or a pension, and to declare that "his [Joshua's] fame was noised throughout all the country"? Joshua seemed to think that fame and notoriety were much the same. In this, however, as in most other things, he greatly erred. Any murderer may get notoriety if he only displays enough brutality or callousness in the execution of the deed; but fame can only be achieved by meritorious conduct, and we have no evidence that Joshua understood what that meant.

Being the successor of Moses, he thought it incumbent on him to imitate, as far as possible, the deeds of wanton cruelty, deceit, and villainy which characterised his predecessor. Or, supposing that Joshua did not do these things, but merely recorded them as having happened for the edification of future generations, then he must have imagined that the people would be satisfied with stories of bloodshed or of the wonders wrought by the Lord for the special behoof of his chosen people. He must have thought, too, that the credulity of his readers was practically unlimited, and that it did not matter much how stupid the event was that he recorded, so long as something similar was said to have occurred before, or that nobody could doubt that such and such a miracle had been performed, if only the Lord could be placed in the background—behind the curtain, as it were—to act as the performer.

As an historian, Joshua was a dead failure. He was too ignorant to understand even ordinary events, and extraordinary occurrences simply bemuddled what little reason he may have possessed. Like all careless students of nature, he was prone to exaggerate the things he saw, and to exaggerate still more monstrously the things he did not see, but only heard spoken of by his friends and co-workers. He would have done very well for the war correspondent of a sensational Ha'penny Daily; for his special telegrams of one day could have been very easily contradicted on the day following by some other correspondent who was an "eye-witness" to the event, but did not see it "in the same light" as the gentleman who did the special.

In point of truth, Joshua was one of that class of writers who could have done his correspondence and appeared to have been on the field, just as well as in the back parlor of a Fleet-street restaurant, or in a rude tent near the seat of war. Indeed, his services during the great war that is now raging all over Europe would have been specially valuable to the proprietors of illustrated journals, who, no doubt, would have offered special terms to such a highly imaginative writer.

When Joshua wrote the account of the sun standing still upon Gideon, and the moon in the valley of Ajalon, he forgot for the moment in which department of the literary staff of the said journal he was engaged, and thought that his views on astronomical phenomena would be quite as acceptable to the Jewish public as his opinion on the best method of decapitating the Midianites. It was as though the sporting correspondent of a paper had ventured to send in a descriptive account of an archbishop's last sermon, or the musical critic had supplied an article on the "germ theory of disease." If Joshua meant that the sun stood still in order to allow him to win a battle, he must have been joking; for, as every little boy now knows, the sun, so far as this earth is concerned, never moves. I once heard a parson—the Rev. J. Wilkie—say that what the writer really meant was that the earth stood still. But that would only make the matter a good deal worse; for if the earth, which is travelling along in space at the rate of hundreds of miles an hour, were suddenly to come to a standstill, the people and all the movable objects would be precipitated into space, and leave not one person alive to record the tale.

But what about the moon? Was not the light of the sun enough? Did Joshua imagine that a night-light would be of assistance to the daylight—a rush-light an important auxiliary to the sun? If we suppose that Joshua tried to be poetic in referring to the sun and moon, his figurative language must have got slightly mixed—he made too much of the moon. As Thomas Paine pointed out, as a figurative declaration, Joshua's is inferior to one by Mohammed, who, when a person came to expostulate with him upon his doings, retorted: "Wert thou to come to me with the sun in thy right hand, and the moon in thy left, it should not alter my career." For Joshua to have eclipsed Mohammed, he should have put the sun in one pocket of his waistcoat and the moon in the other, and used them as watches—one to time his doings by day and the other to regulate his conduct by night; or, as Paine remarks, carried them as Guy Fawkes carried his dark lanterns, and taken them out to shine "as he might happen to want them." In addition to being special reporter, historian, poet, and commander of the Israelites, Joshua varied these occupations by occasionally acting as Lord High Executioner. Among his many achievements, I find that he burned the city of Ai, and hanged the king, and performed the office of executioner (without special request) to five other crowned heads. I will not question the wisdom of this last performance; he may have got rid of some awful pests by this method, and established a precedent for similar action on behalf of outraged humanity in subsequent ages of the world's history.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

The Radical Woman.

A Public Address by M. M. Mangasarian, to the Free Religious Association (Rationalist), Chicago.

(Reprinted with Permission.)

WHAT other people call us, or what we call them, is of little importance. Names and labels have no more to do with ideas than the chips which float on the surface of the sea have with its weight or depth. We are as little interested in the word radical as in the word conservative. What we should conscientiously cultivate is reasonableness in everything. There are times when to be rational we have to be conservative; and then there are times when conservatism would be cowardly. The important test at all times is whether we can command for our views or acts the full support of the facts.

What is a radical? Without entering into its etymology, the word radical may be used in either a commendable or an objectionable sense. Anyone who goes to the roots of a subject, for example, or is thorough in his investigations, or follows his premises clear to the end, is a radical. In that sense of the word, I wish we were all radicals. But I am using the word this morning to designate the extremist—the man or woman who swings too far, either to the right or to the left, from what Aristotle calls "the golden mean."

In music the dividing line between harmony and discord is a very fine one. A trifle above or below the right key is discord. The right pitch alone is music. It is so in everything else. Morality is moderation. Too much, or too little, spells moral, as well as musical discord. I am using the word radical this morning to describe the out of tune man or woman—who, instead of singing, screams. The radical, in this sense of the word, is the person who though he sings much, does not sing true, or though he thinks a great deal, does not think true.

Why do some people scream instead of speaking or singing? Perhaps it is because they have no ear for harmony and do not know that they are pitching their voices too high. In the same way there are those who have no sense of proportion, which accounts for the extravagance of the intellectual or moral notes they strike.

There are, of course, other reasons for the lack of harmony. To sing true, one must have one's voice placed. It requires time and patience to find out whether one has a soprano, or a contralto voice. In the same way there are thinkers whose thoughts are not yet placed. Drifting or floating on the waters is not navigation. Having ideas or opinions, is not reasoning. Not all well informed people are educated people. If I may mention still another cause for lack of musical harmony, it is that it is not enough to possess a splendid singing voice; the voice has to be trained to get the best results from it. Likewise, it is not enough to have knowledge or an abundance of data—to think true one must have an intellect that has been schooled.

But one may have all the qualifications for correct reasoning or singing, and still scream. In a class of children studying music, for example, when any one of them purposely raises his voice higher than the notes warrant, he does so, as a rule, to attract attention. The radical thinker is often actuated by the same motive. He is so eager to let the whole world know he is thinking, that to make sure of it he thinks loud. The desire to attract attention is very deeply rooted in us all, and is more responsible for eccentricity than we are, perhaps, willing to admit. Why does a man dress as a dandy, or why is a woman overdressed, or the other way? The loud dress, the loud voice, the loud ideas prove the penchant for attention. To be singled out, to be observed, to make people see us, to talk about us, wonder at us, tempts us to ignore the limitations imposed by the evidence, or by good taste. When men or women wear bizarre mental costumes, it is to satisfy an itching for notoriety.

Of course, there is a legitimate use for the desire for distinction. If we did not care to be pointed out and looked up to, we would lose one of the most effective inducements to great and brave deeds. It is fortunate that we do seek praise, since seeking praise encourages the effort to merit it. This criticism is directed against those who, not willing to pay the price for fame, try to steal it. To be able, for example to weigh the sun and describe the movements of the planets is knowledge, which justly honors its possessor; but the man who attracts notice by offering to communicate with the dead, or to introduce us to the society of ghosts, steals the attention of the public instead of deserving it. The witch-doctor gains notoriety by imitating a Darwin. Notoriety is imitation fame. Peculiar, startling, or sensational ideas and theories are often advocated for the sake of emerging from the obscurity to which our talents or character condemns us.

We never quite cease to be children. Everybody knows how very anxious children are to be observed. And what capers they play in order to occupy the centre of the stage! It is the desire to have interested and wondering auditors which causes the little boy or girl to see five hundred cats in the yard. If they saw only their cat and another, who would stop to listen to the tale? To compel attention the child resorts to exaggeration. That is often the infirmity of the radical.

The child nature is at least as strong in woman as it is in man. Yet a radical woman is a much more uncommon phenomenon than a radical man, and is, therefore, more likely to attract attention and to arouse interest. The average woman is hyper-conservative, which is also a form of radicalism. It is the other extreme. The objection against being too forward, or too backward is that it disturbs what we call balance. If some women are now pitching their voices too high, the majority of them still strike a note which is too low to rhyme with modern scientific thought. In the case of the radical woman the pendulum has swung from one extreme to the other. Of the two "pitches" the low pitch is really the more alarming. The woman who screams is less of a menace than the woman who is dumb. The scream is a sign of life and lung power, as well as of will power. Muteness is a sign of intellectual anæmia. The emancipated scream; the captives are tongue-tied. But between the loud woman and the subdued, there is the rational woman.

The present mental qualities of woman are largely the result of her past education or miseducation. What we call mind is not an entity, a something ready made, or made to order, and deposited somewhere in the human frame. Mind is a record of experience. The experience makes the mind, just as climate makes the complexion. The question, Are women as gifted as the men? is a vain question, for the reason that gifts are acquired only when necessary to survival. If men are, let us say, mentally stronger, it is not because they are men, but because, for their self-preservation, mental vigor and resourcefulness were indispensable. The experience of the male was of such a nature as to friction the brain into activity and expand the faculties. If women, on the other hand, have been deficient in intellectuality, it is not because they are women, but because another set of qualities was needed for their self-preservation.

In primitive times, a mentally virile woman would have had scant chance for survival. The intellectually indifferent, not to say, mediocre, woman survived, because she was better adapted to the then existing environment. In those days the quality which a man admired in his wife was weakness. I am not thinking of the exceptions. The more dependent a woman, the more flattering it was to man's vanity. It gave him an opportunity to play the role of protector. The primitive husband did not ask for an equal or a rival in his wife, but for a subordinate. How could an intellectual woman have survived in a market, if I may so express myself, in which there were no bids for brains in a woman? The intellectual woman necessarily died childless, and her weaker sisters became the mothers of men. I am trying to explain that what we call mind is a product of experience—a supply created only by the demand. Men and women have not had the same experience; that is why they have not the same minds.

It was the woman whom man selected that survived. To express the same idea differently, it was the woman who pleased man that had a chance to live. Man also picked out the qualities which the average woman possesses to-day. To find out what were the mental and moral traits which the husband desired in his wife, we must ask what kind of a husband was the primitive man? He was a warrior—autocratic, aggressive, domineering. Only the woman who could please him became his wife, and to please him meant to submit to him, to agree with him in everything, to let him rule without conditions, to allow him his way in every instance—to let him think for her, choose for her, and decide for her. The woman, therefore, who consented to efface herself completely and to become an echo, a copy, a thing, so as to give all the honor and the glory to her warrior husband, became a mother, while the strong-minded woman died without issue. It pleased the husband to call his wife "the weaker vessel," which was at the same time a suggestion to her to be delicate, dependent, fragile, timid—leaning upon his strong arm for protection.

Of course, woman herself contributed to the subjugation of her sex by selecting for husband the kind of man who could defend her against the equally big and brutal men of other and hostile tribes. Thus it will be seen that what we call mind, is a product of circumstances. As woman's environment changes, her mentality changes too, and the improvement in her mentality in turn becomes a new and better environment for her. The environment or experience fashions the mind, and the mind, as soon as it begins to function, becomes itself a factor in diverting or modifying experience. The parents produce the child, but the child in turn affects the character of the parents. In the same way, mind as the product of circumstances, becomes in time, not only the moulder of circumstances, but the chief circumstance.

The life of the mind is practically a new experience for woman. In view of this fact, it is not at all strange that feminine thinking, generally speaking, should still be in a formative or even chaotic stage, even more than man's, since man too is comparatively a novice in reasoning. To show their ability to think, as already explained, beginners are apt to think loud, hence out of tune. The newness of the experience tempts them to overplay their minds, as a child does with a new weapon.

Shall I ask the brave soldier who fights by my side
In the cause of mankind, if our creeds agree?
Shall I give up the friend I have valued and tried,
If he kneel not before the same altar as me?
From the heretic girl of my soul should I fly
To seek somewhere else a more orthodox kiss?
No, perish the hearts, and the laws that try
Truth, valor, or love, by a standard like this.

In Memoriam.

AN old reader of the Freethinker, and, before its advent, of the National Reformer, Senor Adolfo de Maglia, has just sent to me the announcement of the death of his widowed mother, the Senora Ana Galbis y Tudela de Maglia.

Like her son, the deceased was a staunch Freethinker, and in her will gave the following directions (cited textually from the document itself):—

> ".....That the interment of her body is to be in a purely secular way, that is to say, without the presence of any priest or the use of any rite or emblem of religion, in conformity with the Freethought ideas and convictions which the testatrix practised, and as an energetic and fervid protest against all dogmatic religions opposed to reason, truth, and justice."

This decided attitude of an old Spanish Freethought lady of over ninety summers is an example worthy of record and emulation. Some ten years ago I had the pleasure of receiving her kind hospitality in Paris, and noted at the time the energy and fire of her devotion to Freethought.

The veteran of Spanish Freethinkers, José Nakens, who knew her well, speaks of the Senora de Maglia as one "who never wavered in her honest convictions." One of the provisions of her will, as stated in El Motin, is especially sane and sensible. She directed that her funeral should be simple and inexpensive, and that the difference in expense between a costly funeral and the cheap one which she desiderated was to be distributed in charity for the relief of necessitous Freethinkers. Her son, Adolfo de Maglia, faithfully carried out these directions.

The deceased lady, Senora de Maglia, was born on December 24, 1823, and died in Barcelona on July 10 this year, beloved of her son and admired by all who knew her.

Obituary.

We regret to report the death of Mrs. Jones, of Bearsden, daughter of Mrs. Turnbull, of Raeberry-street, Glasgow, which occurred on August 4. She bore long suffering with great fortitude. It was something of a release when this devoted wife and loving mother passed to her rest. As a sterling Freethinker she was buried at the new Kirkpatrick Cemetery with Freethought rites.

THE SECULAR SOCIETY

(LIMITED)

Company Limited by Guarantee.

Registered Office—2 NEWCASTLE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Chairman of Board of Directors—MR. G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary—MISS E. M. VANCE.

THIS Society was formed in 1898 to afford legal security to the acquisition and application of funds for Secular purposes.

The Memorandum of Association sets forth that the Society's Objects are:—To promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. To promote freedom of inquiry. To promote universal Secular Education. To promote the complete secularisation of the State, etc., etc. And to do all such lawful things as are conducive to such objects. Also to have, hold, receive, and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised, or bequeathed by any person, and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the Society.

The liability of members is limited to £1, in case the Society should ever be wound up and the assets were insufficient to cover liabilities—a most unlikely contingency.

Members pay an entrance fee of ten shillings, and a subsequent yearly subscription of five shillings.

The Society has a considerable number of members, but a much larger number is desirable, and it is hoped that some will be gained amongst those who read this announcement. All who join it participate in the control of its business and the trusteeship of its resources. It is expressly provided in the Articles of Association that no member, as such, shall derive any sort of profit from the Society, either by way of dividend, bonus, or interest, or in any way whatever.

The Society's affairs are managed by an elected Board of Directors, consisting of not less than five and not more than twelve members, one-third of whom retire by ballot) each year, but are capable of re-election. An Annual General Meeting of members must be held in London, to receive the Report, elect new Directors, and transact any other business that may arise.

Being a duly registered body, the Secular Society, Limited, can receive donations and bequests with absolute security. Those who are in a position to do so are invited to make donations, or to insert a bequest in the Society's favor in their wills. On this point there need not be the slightest apprehension. It is quite impossible to set aside such bequests. The executors have no option but to pay them over in the ordinary course of administration. No objection of any kind has been raised in connection with any of the wills by which the Society has already been benefited.

The Society's solicitors are Messrs. Harper and Battcock, 23 Rood-lane, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C.

A Form of Bequest.—The following is a sufficient form of bequest for insertion in the wills of testators:—"I give and "bequeath to the Secular Society, Limited, the sum of £— "free from Legacy Duty, and I direct that a receipt signed by "two members of the Board of the said Society and the Secretary "thereof shall be a good discharge to my Executors for the "said Legacy."

Friends of the Society who have remembered it in their wills, or who intend to do so, should formally notify the Secretary of the fact, or send a private intimation to the Chairman, who will (if desired) treat it as strictly confidential. This is not necessary, but it is advisable, as wills sometimes get lost or mislaid, and their contents have to be established by competent testimony.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

President: G. W. FOOTE.

Secretary: MISS E M. VANCE, 2 Newcastle-st. London, E.C.

Principles and Objects.

SECULARISM teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge. It knows nothing of divine guidance or interference; it excludes supernatural hopes and fears; it regards happiness as man's proper aim, and utility as his moral guide.

Secularism affirms that Progress is only possible through Liberty, which is at once a right and a duty; and therefore seeks to remove every barrier to the fullest equal freedom of thought, action, and speech.

Secularism declares that theology is condemned by reason as superstitious, and by experience as mischievous, and assails it as the historic enemy of Progress.

Secularism accordingly seeks to dispel superstition; to plead education; to disestablish religion; to rationalise morality; to promote peace; to dignify labor; to extend material well-being; and to realise the self-government of the people.

Membership.

Any person is eligible as a member on signing the following declaration:—

"I desire to join the National Secular Society, and I pledge myself, if admitted as a member, to co-operate in promoting its objects."

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

Dated this.....day of.....190.....

This Declaration should be transmitted to the Secretary with a subscription.

P.S.—Beyond a minimum of Two Shillings per year, every member is left to fix his own subscription according to his means and interest in the cause.

Immediate Practical Objects.

The Legitimation of Bequests to Secular or other Freethought Societies, for the maintenance and propagation of heterodox opinions on matters of religion, on the same conditions as apply to Christian or Theistic churches or organisations.

The Abolition of the Blasphemy Laws, in order that religion may be canvassed as freely as other subjects, without fear of fine or imprisonment.

The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the State Churches in England, Scotland, and Wales.

The Abolition of all Religious Teaching and Bible Reading in Schools, or other educational establishments supported by the State.

The Opening of all endowed educational institutions to the children and youth of all classes alike.

The Abrogation of all laws interfering with the free use of Sunday for the purpose of culture and recreation; and the Sunday opening of State and Municipal Museums, Libraries, and Art Galleries.

A Reform of the Marriage Laws, especially to secure equal justice for husband and wife, and a reasonable liberty and facility of divorce.

The Equalisation of the legal status of men and women, so that all rights may be independent of sexual distinctions.

The Protection of children from all forms of violence, and from the greed of those who would make a profit out of their premature labor.

The Abolition of all hereditary distinctions and privileges, fostering a spirit antagonistic to justice and human brotherhood.

The Improvement by all just and wise means of the conditions of daily life for the masses of the people, especially in towns and cities, where insanitary and incommodious dwellings, and the want of open spaces, cause physical weakness and disease, and the deterioration of family life.

The Promotion of the right and duty of Labor to organise itself for its moral and economical advancement, and of its claim to legal protection in such combinations.

The Substitution of the idea of Reform for that of Punishment in the treatment of criminals, so that gaols may no longer be places of brutalisation, or even of mere detention, but places of physical, intellectual, and moral elevation for those who are afflicted with anti-social tendencies.

An Extension of the moral law to animals, so as to secure them humane treatment and legal protection against cruelty.

The Promotion of Peace between nations, and the substitution of Arbitration for War in the settlement of international disputes.
